was afraid she was in a sinking condition, and that on his repeating his request Captain Bruat put him off to the following day, saying that the night was coming on, and that they must rejoin the fleet. On the following day they returned, but could find no traces of her. Now, a good deal was made of this in the arguments of counsel; it was said that Captain Bruat, having refused to allow Commander Senez to go on board the vessel, saying that he was afraid she was in a sinking state, shows that the appearance of the vessel at that time was such as to lead him to think that she was momentarily in danger of sinking; but I do not think that this is a necessary inference. It may be that Commander Senez's application was, or that Captain Bruat may have understood his application to be, not simply to go on board and inspect the vessel, but to go on board and endeavour to navigate her into a port of safety; and he may very naturally have hesitated, looking at the nature of the duty on which the French fleet was employed, to allow his second in command to go on board an unknown and disabled vessel, night, as he says, coming on, and being under orders to rejoin the fleet. At all events, the evidence of Commander Senez is precise upon the point, that in his opinion she was not then in a sinking state; and the natural inference from Captain Bruat having returned on the following morning to look for the vessel is that in his opinion she might have ever then been still afloat. Commander Senez further states that the weather was at the time very fine, that the sea was calm, that there was hardly any wind, and that the same kind of weather continued during the night and the following day; and that the place where they fell in with the J. B. Watt was about eighteen miles to the north-west of Heligoland.

"It is not necessary that I should do more than very briefly refer to the evidence of Captain Petley, who is a retired captain in the Royal navy, and was formerly commander of Her Majesty's yacht. All that he was apparently produced to prove was that, if the vessel could have been got to Heligoland, means could there have been obtained either to repair her, or at all events to stop the leak sufficiently to allow of her being taken to a port where the repairs could have been completed.

"I have now carefully examined the whole of the evidence that has been produced before us, and I will produce to state what appears to us to be the fair inference to be drawn from it.

"First, then, we think that it is clearly established that the blow which the J. B. Watt sustained was of a much more serious character than those on board the Thuringia are prepared to admit. The discrepancy, as I have already observed, can readily be understood, if we remember the great difference in size between the two vessels, and the fact that the Thuringia, with the stem, struck the J. B. Watt on her port side, or the strongest part of the former against the weakest part of the latter vessel. The witnesses from the J. B. Watt speak positively to the fact that the water was coming in in a stream at the bilge, and, indeed, it would be difficult to account for so much water being in the vessel if there had been no damage below the water line, and none beyond a clean out, varying in breadth from a few inches to about a couple of feet, and the lowest part of which was between one and two feet above the water line

ADM.]

THE THURINGIA.

[ALM.]

On the other hand, we are not disposed to charge the witnesses from the Thuringia with deposing falsely when they state that they could see no evidence of any damage to the bilge, or any appearance of water coming in at that part. It is to be observed that the witnesses from the J. B. Watt saw it, when the damage had only just been done, and when the water would probably have been seen rushing up in a stream. When, however, the witnesses from the Thuringia saw it, the water had risen considerably, and it might very possibly be that there would then be not only no rush, but probably no perceptible flow of water into the hold. For all these reasons we are inclined to think that there must have been more or less damage done below the water line, sufficient to allow a very large body of water to get into the vessel.

"The next point to be considered is the precise spot at which the damage was done. The evidence shows that the vessel was struck about 6ft. abaft the end of the bridge. Now it appears from the plan before us, and it was so stated by the master in his evidence, that the end of the bridge aft was directly over the bulkhead which separates the engine compartment from the after hold. The rent or hole in the ship's side would consequently be about 6ft. abaft that bulkhead; and as the damage to the bilge, and from which the water may reasonably be supposed to have come in, is described as having been directly under and in a line with the rent in the ship's side, it follows that the leakage from the outside would be into the after hold, and this agrees with what all the witnesses say, that it was into the after hold that the water flowed.

"Now to determine what was the amount of danger in which this vessel was, and how far therefore the abandonment was or was not justifiable, it becomes important to ascertain what quantity of water there was in the vessel when they finally left her, and this I think we shall not have much difficulty in doing. The evidence of the witnesses from the J. B. Watt is that when they left her the first time the water was nearly over the tunnel, but not quite; the master says that before getting into the boat he took a look, a second look, into the hold, and observed that everything was beginning to get covered over; he says that he could see the top of the tunnel or screw alley, but that the water was nearly above it. To judge from the plans which have been laid before us, it would seem that the top of the tunnel was about 4½ft. above the floor of the after hold, and I am informed by the merchants that this was probably its height. We may take it then, that according to the evidence of the master and crew of the J. B. Watt there were about 4ft. of water in the after hold when they abandoned her the first time, 4ft., that is to say, above the top of the water tank.

"Turning now to the evidence of the people from the Thuringia, we find that the first thing that they did when they got on board was to go to the engine room and to see in what state that was. After a time Irvin came up, and he and the mate looked down the fore hatch of the after hold, and sounded and found 2ft. 8in. of water. It is true that they sounded on the starboard side, and that the vessel having a list to port it is probable that the depth would be somewhat greater on the port side; but both these witnesses say, that they could distinctly see the top of the tunnel, and that the water was nearly but not quite over it; if, then, the top of the tunnel was only 4½ft. above the floor of the after hold, it is clear that on neither side of the tunnel could there have been much more than about 4ft. of water. I dismiss at once the statement of the mate of the J. B. Watt, that the water was 4ft. above the tunnel, as it is wholly unsupported, and he does not say that he ever sounded, or that he looked into the after hold when he returned to the J. B. Watt, so that we have nothing to show us upon what grounds he formed his opinion. It is possible that the mate may have meant that it was 4ft. above the top of the ballast tank, in which case his evidence would be quite consistent with that of the witnesses from the Thuringia, he measuring the depth on the port side, and they on the starboard side of the tunnel. The statement, too, in the protest, that when they left the J. B. Watt the first time there were 7ft. of water in her, and that when they finally abandoned her there were about 9ft., seems to point to the same conclusion; for the top of the ballast tank having been broken it might very well be said that there was this depth of water in her, including that in the tank and after hold together. If, however, the water had been 4ft. above the top of the tunnel, the plans of the vessel show that it would have been some 2ft. above the hold beams, a fact which could hardly have escaped the attention of the mate of the J. B. Watt, or the witnesses from the Thuringia.

"I think then that the fair result of the evidence on both sides is that, when the vessel was finally abandoned the water was not higher than the top of the tunnel, and that it had not risen much, if at all, from the time when the master had first left his vessel. Now this is what might naturally have been expected from the fact that this vessel was divided into water tight compartments. The object of water tight compartments, it need hardly be stated, is to enable a vessel, even when one of her compartments is filled with water, to float by the buoyancy of the others; and in the present case, the vessel being in ballast, and the fore hold and fore and after peaks being empty, the floating power must have been very great. So far, therefore, we see nothing which should have induced a master of 'ordinary nautical skill and resolution' to abandon his vessel.

"Let us now see what was the condition of the engine room, and whether there was anything in this compartment or in the state of the engines and machinery which would necessitate the abandonment of this vessel. It was said that the force of the blow started the bulkhead, which separated the engine room from the after hold, away from the port side of the ship, that it started the joints and rivets. The only witnesses from the J. B. Watt who speak to this fact are the master and mate. They could not say to what extent it was started, but they say that the water found its way from the after hold past the end of the bulkhead into the engine room. Seeing, however, that the master, according to his own evidence, never went into the engine room at all after the collision, we can hardly place much reliance upon his statement; and the mate, although he says that water was coming through into the engine room, does not say that it came through in any great quantity. On the other hand we have the evidence of the engineer of the Thuringia, and of Irvin the pilot, who, although they will not swear that the end of the bulkhead was not started from the ship's side, swear very positively that no water, or at all events none that they could discover, entered the engine room in that place. They say that the only water that entered the engine room was from the tunnel; that they found the door of the tunnel into the engine room open; that they closed it; and that from that time no more water came into the engine-room. It is perfectly clear from the evidence of these two persons, as well as from that of the mate of the J. B. Watt, who joined them in the engine room when he returned to the vessel, that there was very little water even at that time in the engine room. The mate of the J. B. Watt indeed says that, before he left her the first time, he lifted one of the stokehole plates, and that the water was then nearly on a level with the plate; but he does not say that when he returned the water was above the plate; and the two other witnesses from the Thuringia say that they looked into the stokehole, but did not see any water in it. Either then the mate must have been mistaken the first time, when he said that the water was nearly on a level with the stokehole plate, or the water must have ceased to rise in the engine room between the time of his having looked into the stokehole and the time of his return to the vessel, a period of at least a quarter of an hour. No one pretends that it ever at any time was on a level with the floor of the engine room. I may add that the vessel being, by the concurrent testimony of all parties at that time very much down by the stern, the water which is usually found in the limbers would naturally flow towards the after part of the vessel, and would thus rise rather higher in the stokehole. We are, however, of opinion that there is no evidence to show us that the amount of water in the engine room compartment was such as to have induced a master of 'ordinary nautical skill and resolution' to have abandoned his vessel.

ADM.]

THE THURINGIA.

"I now come to a matter which appears to us to be of very great importance to the decision of this case, namely, the state and condition of the engines when she was finally abandoned. Whether the donkey engine was or was not set on before the master and crew left the vessel on the first occasion, it is certain that it was not going when they returned to her. The engineer of the Thuringia and Irvin both say so, and they are confirmed in that statement by the mate of the J. B. Watt himself. The engineer of the Thuringia and Irvin state further, that when they got into the engine room they found the water in the boilers very low, and a pressure of steam of about 80lb., a pressure which I need hardly observe is, for a marine and low-pressure steam engine, highly dangerous. They state also that the furnace doors were closed and the safety-valve shut down. If their statement is to be believed, and I can find no contradiction to it, the state in which the engines were left might have led to the boilers very soon exploding. They say that they immediately set the donkey-engine to work to pump water into the boiler, that they opened the safety valve and furnace doors, and took the proper measures for obviating any accident from this cause; they could do no more, for to put the principal engines in motion they would have required other hands to assist them. The conclusion then from this evidence is, that the engineers, instead of taking the proper and necessary precautions to avoid a catastrophe, left the engines in such a condition as might not unnaturally have led to the speedy destruction of the vessel.

And here I cannot but express my surprise that neither the first nor the second engineer of the J. B. Watt were produced before us for examination; it might have been thought that, at all events, the first engineer, who was in the engine room with Irvin and the mate of the Thuringia, would have been produced before us. I am aware that they were both produced on the principal trial, but with a view rather to show that the blow was a very severe blow, and that incidentally some evidence was given as to the state in which the engines were left; but I do not think that the somewhat loose statements made by them on that occasion can weigh against the positive and direct evidence of the witnesses that have been produced before us, supported as they are on several points by evidence from the J. B. Watt herself.

"What then appears to have been the state of this vessel when she was abandoned? She had about 4ft. of water in her after hold above the top of the ballast tanks. The other four compartments were free, save perhaps that in the engine compartment there may have been a little water, but not sufficient to cover the floor of the engine room, and very very far from extinguishing the fires, or interfering in any way with the action of the engines, which so far as the evidence goes, appears to have been in perfect working condition, steam having been turned on to set the donkey engine in motion just before they finally abandoned her. Under these circumstances, what ought to have been the duty of a master of 'ordinary nautical skill' and of 'ordinary courage and resolution?' Why, surely to have stopped up the rent in the ship's side with sails, bedding, or anything at hand, to have stopped the flow, if any flow there was, of water from the after hold into the engine room, to have put the engines in motion, and to have taken the vessel to Heligoland, where, according to the evidence of Capt. Petley, means could readily have been procured to stop the leak sufficiently to take the vessel to a port where the necessary repairs could have been completed. Instead, however, of taking any of these obvious measures, the master, immediately the collision takes place, looks over the vessel's side, concludes that she had been cut down to the water's edge, a conclusion which it is clear was not founded in fact, and which, if it had been, was not alone sufficient to justify the abandonment of the vessel; he then orders the boats out, and without going into the engine room or doing more than merely look down into the after hold, he and his crew collect their private effects, or at all events a good portion of them, and abandon their vessel. The engineers, too, seem equally to have neglected their duty, and to have left the engines in a state which might possibly in a short time have resulted in the total destruction of the vessel. And all this, too, with a smooth sea, fine weather, a favourable wind, Heligoland, at a distance of only about eighteen miles off, and a vessel from the French fleet approaching them, from whom they might naturally have expected to receive assistance, had it been needed. More gross and culpable neglect of duty on the part of the master and crew it would be difficult to imagine. The vessel at her ordinary rate of steaming would have reached Heligoland in about two hours and a half, her engines were so far as appears from the evidence in perfect working order, and according to the evidence of Commander Senex, she was still afloat at half-past five o'clock

THE THURINGIA.

or for about four hours after the collision, and this, too, without her having been pumped at all during that time. Under all the circumstances of the case we are of opinion that the master and crew of the J. B. Watt did not show that ordinary nautical skill and courage which might reasonably have been expected of them; they seem to have been taken with a groundless panic, and to have shown presence of mind only in one point—namely, in saving their own clothes and private effects.

“On the authority, then, of The Flying Fish (3 Moo P. C. C., N. S. 77; Bro. and Lush. 436; 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 619; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 221), and of the judgment of Dr. Lushington in the case of The Linda (Swa. Rep. p. 306), I must hold that the master, having shown a great want of ‘ordinary nautical skill and resolution,’ the owners are not entitled to recover as for a total loss; all that they can properly claim is the amount which would have been necessarily expended by them to restore this vessel to the same state in which she was previous to the collision. To ascertain what this should be is by no means an easy inquiry, nor, I fear, can it be a very satisfactory one, owing to the want of sufficient materials on which to form a sound opinion. It is a question, however, which must be faced, and as both parties have agreed to leave the matter to us, and have expressed their intention not to produce any further evidence on the point, we must form as fair an estimate as the materials before us will enable us to do.

“First, then, I should observe that from the view that we have taken of this case, the vessel could easily, by the unaided efforts of her own crew, have been taken into a place of safety. No reward, therefore, for salvage assistance would be admissible as a part of the claim. She would on her arrival at Heligoland, or perhaps even at Cuxhaven, have undergone some temporary repairs sufficient to enable her to reach a port where her repairs could have been completed; possibly, even, the port of her owners in this country. These expenses we should be disposed to estimate at the sum of 250*l.* On her arrival at Hartlepool, say, she would have had to be docked, the plates in her side and bilge replaced, the bulk head, if started, refastened, and generally put into a state of repair. This we estimate at the sum of 1750*l.* To this would have to be added the compensation due to her owners during the period of her detention whilst undergoing repairs. This we consider would be fully covered by a sum of 750*l.* The total amount therefore, which we should allow to the owners as sufficient to enable them to restore this vessel to the condition in which she was previous to the collision would be 2750*l.* with interest thereon, say, from the 1st Jan. 1871.

“With regard to the claim of the master and crew for their private effects, seeing that in our opinion this vessel not only ought to, but might easily have been taken into a place of safety, and that no damage appears to have been done in the collision to the cabin or quarters of the master and crew, or to any of their effects, we think that it must be rejected in toto. And the same observation applies to the claim for two cases of goods stated to have been on board, and which are valued together at 30*l.*

“The last item of the claim relates to the loss alleged to have been sustained by the owners of the J. B. Watt in respect of certain charter-parties.

It appears that the owners had, on the 29th Sept. 1870, entered into a charter-party to carry two cargoes of coal from West Hartlepool to Hamburg at a certain rate of freight. She had performed one voyage, and was returning to Hartlepool to take on board the second cargo under this charter-party when the collision occurred. In the meantime, however, and just previous to the collision, the owners had on the 11th Oct. entered into a further charter for the conveyance of two other cargoes of coals between the same ports to commence after completing the delivery under the first charter. There were, consequently, three voyages uncompleted, and the owners claim a sum of 731*l.* 12*s.*, being the net profit which they say they should have made on those three voyages, or at the rate of 243*l.* 17*s.* 4*d.* for each voyage. No evidence, however, was given that the owners had not by means either of their own or of some other vessels completed the charters and thus earned the freights; and it is clear that, if by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence they could have done so, this claim could not be allowed. It was with this view that I put the question to Mr. Wilkinson, the managing owner, as to the number of screw steam vessels of this description which they had in their employ. It is, however, not necessary to say more on the subject, as, on my asking whether the item was seriously contended for, Mr. Butt, on behalf of the plaintiffs, immediately withdrew it.

“It only remains that I should say a few words on the question of costs. In an ordinary case of this description, where the claim was reasonable, and made bonâ fide, even though I might under all the circumstances have held the abandonment to have been unjustifiable, I should perhaps have been inclined to leave each party to pay his own costs of the reference. But in the present case there are some circumstances which would lead me to come to a somewhat different conclusion. The claim for the value of the vessel is 18,480*l.* Now Mr. Wilkinson, the managing owner, in an affidavit which had been filed in the proceedings, had stated that her market value at the time of the collision was 16,900*l.*: when, however, he was examined before us he admitted that her cost price had not exceeded 15,000*l.*, but he said that, although she had been ten months afloat, the value of such vessels had risen to that extent between the times of her being built and her loss. He further stated that the difference between the alleged market value 16,900*l.*, and the amount of the claim 18,480*l.* was due to freight. But it was pointed out to him that he had received the freight on the first voyage, and that the estimated profit on the three subsequent voyages contracted for under the charter-parties formed a separate item of the claim. No other explanation was given by him of the difference. Mr. Wilkinson admitted that there had been a contract for the price of the vessel, and undertook to produce it, and when that was subsequently done, it turned out that the contract price was for 14,000*l.* only, and moreover, that the terms of sale were ‘to be considered as on the basis of half cash on completion, and half six months from date of completion,’ which is a very different thing from what we had been given to understand was the cost price of the vessel.

“On the whole, looking at the very unjustifiable manner in which this vessel was abandoned, the exorbitant claim for the value of the ship, and the claim for the alleged loss on the charter-parties which could not be sustained at the hearing; looking also at the fact that the amount claimed was 19,441*l.* 6*s.* 2*d.*, and the amount reported due is only 2750*l.*; we think that the plaintiffs ought to pay all the costs of the reference. And I shall so report.

THE THURINGIA.

From this report the plaintiffs appealed to the court, and filed a petition in objection to the report, objecting on the following grounds:—First, because the J. B. Watt had received such injury in the collision that it would have been impossible to have navigated her to a place of safety; secondly, because the abandonment of the J. B. Watt by her master and crew was not, under all the circumstances of the case, such an abandonment as would work a forfeiture of her owner's right to recover as for a total loss; thirdly, because on the facts found in the said reasons of the registrar, he has erroneously held that the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover as for a total loss; fourthly, because on the hearing before the registrar, after all the witnesses on behalf of the plaintiffs had been examined, an affidavit of one M. Senez, an officer in the French navy, which had been until that time kept back by the defendants, was produced by them and tendered in evidence; and though objected to by the plaintiffs, was admitted by the registrar. Such affidavit went to show that the J. B. Watt continued to float for a long time after she was abandoned, and that she might have been saved by her master and crew; fifthly, because the registrar found that the J. B. Watt might have been taken to Heligoland and there temporarily repaired; whereas, in fact, even if she could have been taken to Heligoland, there was not at Heligoland any place where she could have been put in safety, or any place where or means by which she could have been temporarily repaired; sixthly, because the findings in the report are against the weight of evidence.

An answer was filed on behalf of the defendants, supporting the report, denying the reasons, and submitting that the admission of the affidavit of M. Senez was in accordance with the practice at these references, and alleging that the fifth reason was unsupported by evidence. On this answer the plaintiffs concluded. As to the admissibility of M. Senez's affidavit, see ante, p. 166.

March 11 and 12.—Butt, Q.C., and Clarkson for the plaintiffs.—There are two questions: first, was the J. B. Watt so injured by the collision that she must have perished? secondly, was she improperly abandoned? The vessel had disappeared before the next morning. The law has been wrongly applied by the registrar; the case of The Flying Fish (3 Moo. P. C. C., N. S., 77; Bro., 436; 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 619), cited by him, differs widely from this case. The Thuringia abandoned the J. B. Watt and refused all assistance, and they have no right now to say that there was undue haste and want of care on our part in quitting our vessel, and that they are therefore liable only for a partial loss. They stood off with our crew within an hour of the collision. In the Flying Fish (sup.) it is said that in an emergency great allowance is to be made for errors of judgment, and this is applicable here, where a violent and dangerous collision had just occurred. The crew of the J. B. Watt were compelled to leave her because the Thuringia would not stay for fear of the French fleet. No moral blame attaches to our crew; the Thuringia was bound to have remained by her or to have left our crew on board if they thought she could be got into safety, or to have taken her into tow if her own crew were insufficient to take her to Heligoland. At common law the rule as to contributory negligence is that a plaintiff can recover nothing if his own acts have in any way caused the injury, but this is qualified by the case of Lynch v. Nurdin (10 L. J. 73, Q. B.; 1 Ad. & Ell. 29). That was a case of injury to a child of tender years; and it was held that as the original misconduct of the defendant's servant led to the accident, even the subsequent misconduct of the plaintiff did not disentitle him to recover, as he could only be required to exercise ordinary care, and that care was to be measured by his capacity. Analogous to this is the case where a tortious act of the defendants has caused such a panic that the plaintiffs are incapable of exercising their ordinary judgment and abandon their vessel. The plaintiff is not disentitled because the master has by the accident become so morally incapable that he cannot exercise ordinary nautical skill. The onus of proof in such a case lies upon the wrongdoer, who seeks to rid himself of his liability (The Kingston by Sea, 3 W. Rob. 157); he must show that the loss was not wholly caused by his default. In The Pensher (Swab. 211) it is held that a plaintiff may recover unless he be guilty of gross negligence, and this is laid down in The Countess of Durham (9 Monthly Law Mag. 279). The Pensher (sup.) is contrary to The Flying Fish. The facts in the Linda (Swab. 306), cited in the report, are very different from these. In The Flying Fish (sup.) there was no emergency, whilst here there was only a short time to deliberate, and at the end the master was bound to decide hurriedly. Was the Thuringia justified in deserting the J. B. Watt merely because a French fleet was seen some distance away? She ought to have towed the vessel. Her duty to assist is none the less binding because she is a foreign vessel. Where was the ship to go? There were no lights left on the German coast on account of the war. It is clear from the evidence that there was a large quantity of water already in her when she was left. No negligence in point of law was committed by the master as long as he remained by his vessel, and then he was suddenly called upon to determine whether he would go or stay. It is always held that if men leave a vessel immediately after collision, and whilst they are in a panic caused by it, they may still recover. This sudden call to leave placed us in a similar emergency. The French admiral was clearly of opinion that the vessel was sinking, as he would not allow M. Senez on board. The admission of M. Senez's affidavit was contrary to practice and to rule 108 of the Admiralty Court Rules.

March 13.—Sir J. Karlake, Q.C., Benjamin, and W. G. F. Phillimore, for the defendants.—Although the facts in The Flying Fish (sup.) differ, the law as laid down there is applicable, as it shows the duty of a master. The case of Lynch v. Nurdin (sup.) proceeds exclusively on the ground that the plaintiff, being a child of tender years, could not be considered as causing any part of the injury sustained, and even the law there laid down is questionable Lygo v. Newbold, 9 Ex. 302). Here the master was well capable of judging what ought to be his own conduct. He no doubt came to a conclusion, but it was not a right conclusion. The vessel was only two hours from Heligoland and four hours from the Elbe. The French fleet was near. The crew had plenty of time to get over their panic. If the Thuringia had steamed away at once there might have been good excuse for their act, but she remained for an hour. It cannot be said that she was bound to remain with the J. B. Watt, and so run risk of capture. The master was bound to exercise ordinary nautical skill in forming a judgment. The rule as to contributory negligence is, that if the accident was caused proximately by the negligence of the defendants, they are liable so long as the acts of the plaintiffs only remotely brought about the accident (Tuff v. Worman, 2 C. B., N. S., 740); but here the actual total loss was proximately caused by the plaintiffs. But the cases of contributory negligence are not really in point, as they all relate to acts done at the time of the accident, whilst here the negligence on the part of the plaintiff took place after the act done. They claim for a total loss, and therefore must show that we caused it; but even if the onus is upon us, the evidence clearly shows that the vessel might have been saved. The Flying Fish (sup.) lays down that the criterion of the right to recover is not whether the vessel could have been saved, but whether the master made proper efforts to save her. We have shown that there was reasonable probability of saving the vessel, and therefore submit that the onus is now shifted upon them. A master must have a certain amount of constancy. Even if the Thuringia did leave, the French man-of-war was then coming up.

THE THURINGIA.

Butt, Q.C., in reply.—An erroneous judgment formed by the master would not prevent us from recovering. The onus is cast on the wrong doer of proving that the abandonment was unjustifiable.

March 22.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The J. B. Watt, a screw steam ship of 770 tons, came into collision on the 14th Oct. 1870 with the Thuringia, a steam ship of 1944 tons, and for this collision the court pronounced in Jan. 1871 that the Thuringia was alone to blame, and made the usual reference to the registrar and merchants to assess the amount of damages for which the Thuringia was liable. It appears that the owners of the J. B. Watt preferred a claim before the tribunal of the sum of 19,441*l.* 6*s.* 2*d.*, such sum being the alleged entire value of the vessel—in other words, they claimed for a total loss of that vessel. The registrar rejected the claim founded upon a total loss, and awarded the sum of 2750*l.*, estimating at that sum the probable expenses necessary to restore the vessel to the condition in which she was previous to the collision. It is admitted by both parties that this estimate is fair and proper, if the claim for a total loss was properly rejected. The main question raised before the registrar was whether the master was justified in abandoning her—in other words, whether her total loss was legally a necessary consequence of the collision, or whether, by the exertion of ordinary skill and courage, she might have been saved. The registrar found, and has reported to the court, that the vessel was improperly abandoned, and that her total loss was owing to a want of ordinary skill and courage on the part of those to whom her navigation was intrusted, and from this finding of the registrar there has been an appeal to this court. The whole case has been most fully and ably argued before me, and I hope it will not be supposed that I am at all insensible to the merit of that argument, because I omit it in detail and confine myself to a brief statement of the principal points upon which my judgment is founded; and I will first say a word as to the law applicable to the case. The law as to the liability of a wrongdoer, who, as in this case, has without malice or intention, but through negligence inflicted a wrong upon the property of another, appears to be much the same in all systems of jurisprudence. Such a wrongdoer is liable not only for the immediate, but for certain consequential damages of his act. Not, however, for all damages which in common parlance may be called consequential, but for such as are the legal, or, as it is sometimes said, the natural consequences of the wrongful act, and here two questions arise; first what are the criteria of legal consequences; and, second, upon which party is cast the burden of proving such criteria to exist in the particular case? With regard to the first question, I will borrow the language from the judgment of Lord Wensleydale, founded upon an earlier decision. "The rule of law," that learned judge says, "is, that although there may have been negligence on the part of the plaintiff, yet, unless he might by the exercise of ordinary care have avoided the consequences of the defendant's negligence, he is entitled to recover; if by ordinary care he might have avoided them, he is the author of his own wrong": (Bridge v. Grand Junction Railway Company, 3 M. & W. 244, 248.) "One person being in fault," Lord Ellenborough says, "will not dispense with another using ordinary care for himself": Butterfield v. Forrester, 11, East, 60, 62). To the ordinary care here mentioned must be added ordinary courage and resolution, for whether or not the latter element be required in the driver of a carriage in the case of a collision on land, it is certainly required, and so it has often been decided, in the master of a vessel in the case of a collision at sea: (The Kingston-by-Sea, 3 W. Rob. 157; The Pensher, Swa. 213; The Linda, Swa. 308; The Flying Fish, 3 Moo. P. C. C. N. S. 89; Bro. & Lush. 436; 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 619.) The law does not exact the utmost care or skill, but the care and skill of a competent person; neither does it exact heroic courage, but such courage as belongs to the ordinary exercise of the profession, or calling of the party complaining—says Donnellus (Comm. de Jure Civili, lib. xv., c. xxxix., s. 8): "Justus metus definitur non vani hominis metus; sed qui merito in hominem constantissimum cadat. Hoc recte, cum quaeritur quis dicatur justus metus. Non minus incertum est quis sit metus qui cadat etiam in constantem virum. Id autem ex genere mali et periculi formidati aestimandum est." If the party complaining be a sailor, he cannot succeed in his suit if it be shown that the danger which has caused his loss could have been avoided by a sailor's ordinary courage and skill. With respect to the second point, it appears to me that the decisions at common law incline to the position that the burden of proving that ordinary skill and courage could not have averted the loss lies upon the party complaining. Mr. Sedgwick (Sedgwick on Damages, 4th edit., p. 539) sums up the law to be deduced from a variety of cases, as follows: "A party in an action on the case for negligence cannot recover damages which have resulted from his own negligence and want of care. He must show himself to be in the right, and the defendant in the wrong; that he has performed his duties, and that the defendant has neglected his, and that the damages are the legitimate consequences of the negligence of the defendant." The decisions in this court, however, seem to throw the burden of proof upon the original wrongdoer, who alleges that the injured vessel was unnecessarily abandoned. I will now consider the leading facts of the case to which these principles of law must be applied. The damage inflicted on the J. B. Watt was of a serious character. The stem of the Thuringia, a very large and powerful steamer, struck the J. B. Watt on her port side about six feet abaft the end of the bridge. The rent made in her was in the form of the letter V, and it was found, I think rightly, that there must have been some damage done below the water-line, probably to the extent of three feet, sufficient, however, to allow the entrance of a large body of water into the vessel. The counsel for the J. B. Watt stated that he was willing to rest his whole case upon this point; on the other hand, the counsel for the Thuringia did not dispute that this fact had been rightly found by the registrar. I accept this finding, but it seems to me by no means conclusive as to the merits of the case. The J. B. Watt was in water ballast, and—here I borrow the accurate language of the report—"was divided into five compartments by four watertight bulkheads. The centre compartment contained the engines and boilers; forward of this were two compartments, a small one in the bows called the forepeak, and between it and the engine rooms the forehold; abaft the engine were also two compartments, first, a large one called the afterhold, and behind it the lazaret; running fore and aft along the middle line of the afterhold was a square box or tunnel, called by the witnesses the tunnel or screw-alley, containing the shaft which connects the engine with the propellers. Under the fore and afterholds were large iron tanks, the tops of which formed the flooring of the fore and after hold respectively; they were intended to hold, and at the time of the collision did hold, water for ballast. The tanks did not extend under the engine compartment." The depth of the water tank was three feet, that of the tunnel four feet six inches. It is admitted that the water was not higher than the top of the tunnel; it is also admitted that, whatever water there was, it was below the plates of the stokehole; it was never at any time on a level with the floor of the engine room. The engines were in good working order, the water in no way interfered with their action; the donkey engine had been set in motion just before the vessel was abandoned; the pumps were in good order, and this most strange and discreditable fact appears by the admission of the master of the J. B. Watt, namely, that he deserted his ship without even himself going into the engine room, while the conduct of those on board the J. B. Watt with respect to the condition in which they left their engines before the arrival of the men from the Thuringia is, to say the very least, fraught with suspicion. It hardly requires nautical knowledge or experience to pronounce that ordinary energy would have discovered the means of temporarily stopping the rent in the side of the vessel. After a careful consideration of the facts which are fully set out in the report, and which I will not repeat, I entirely agree with the opinion of the registrar and merchants, that the condition of the vessel with respect to the state of the water in her did not justify the abandonment of the vessel. It has been argued, however, that this conclusion does not relieve the original wrongdoer from liability for the loss of the ship; that he is responsible for the panic which his act had caused, and under the influence of which the vessel was abandoned. In the Flying Fish (sup.) the Privy Council said: "It is to be observed that this was not the case of a sudden emergency, leaving no time for deliberation, when great allowances should be made for any error in judgment which may occur." In the present case more than an hour elapsed between the collision and the abandonment of the vessel; the master was advised by competent persons to remain by her, which, I think the evidence shows he had from the first moment after the collision determined not to do. Then what are the other circumstances of the case? The weather was perfectly fine, the sea quite calm, the vessel amply provided with boats—more than sufficient to carry all her crew, capable of steaming between seven and eight knots an hour; Heligoland, upon which the J. B. Watt had come that morning, was within a distance of sixteen or eighteen miles, where, even if the vessel could not, as I think she might have been beached upon Sandy island, she might have obtained sufficient aid to make the necessary repairs to take her some fifteen or sixteen miles further to Cuxhaven. The French fleet was within sight at the time when the Thuringia sailed away, and the J. B. Watt is proved to have been afloat for about three hours after the collision. There remains one other portion of the argument on behalf of the J. B. Watt which should be noticed. It has been urged that the Thuringia was bound to have stayed by the vessel with which she had come into collision, or to have attempted to have towed her into a place of safety. I do not deny that such an obligation, upon ordinary principles of humanity, attaches to a ship which had severely damaged another, and which can but will not afford to her the assistance requisite for her preservation. This doctrine appears to me inapplicable to the present case. The Thuringia entertained a reasonable apprehension that further delay might cause her to be captured by the French fleet then in sight—an enemy to her, but a friend of the J. B. Watt, and, moreover in my opinion the Thuringia had ascertained that the J. B. Watt might be saved by her own captain and crew if they chose to abide by her. Upon the whole I have no hesitation in pronouncing that the evidence, assuming the burden of proof to lie upon the Thuringia, leads to the necessary conclusion that the abandonment of this vessel was an improper act on the part of the captain and crew, one that led to a total loss, which by ordinary skill and ordinary courage might have been avoided, and I confirm the registrar's report, with costs.

THE BUSY BEE.

Appeal from County Court—Admission of evidence on appeal—Insufficiency of notes of evidence—County Court Rules—Reporters.

The Court of Admiralty is extremely reluctant to admit evidence at the hearing of an appeal from a County Court, but will do so under special circumstances.

By Rule 32 of the General Orders for the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction, it was intended that a shorthand writer, or at least a reporter, should be employed in all Admiralty causes in the County Courts, where there is a probability of appeal, to take down the evidence, so that the appellant might be in a position to bring up at the hearing of the appeal a transcript of the notes of evidence.

The insufficiency of notes of evidence in the court below is some ground for the admission of evidence at the hearing of the appeal, but the fact that a reporter has not been employed to take down the evidence below must always be a circumstance to be inquired into when an appellant applies for leave to produce evidence on appeal.

This was a motion in an appeal from the decision of the County Court of Northumberland (Admiralty Jurisdiction) in a cause of collision. The steamship Wallachia came into collision in the Bosphorus with the steamship Busy Bee and the owners of the Wallachia on the arrival of the Busy Bee in Newcastle instituted a cause against her in the County Court there. The cause was heard before the judge, assisted by assessors, and the court pronounced that the Wallachia was solely to blame. From this decision the owners of the Wallachia appealed to the Admiralty Court, and gave security for costs to the amount of 20*l.*, and deposited that sum in the registry of the County Court in lieu of bail. At the hearing in the County Court no shorthand writer was employed, but the judge took down the evidence, and his notes were copied and were filed in the Admiralty Court. There were no reasons given for the judgment, and it only appeared that the court had pronounced for the plaintiff. The notes of the evidence did not contain the questions asked nor the full answers given to the questions, but were only abbreviated notes of what had been given in evidence, and apparently were notes made by the judge only for the purpose of aiding his own memory. The evidence of some of the witnesses as taken down, was very short, and appeared not to have been taken down in full, but only as the answers seemed important to the judge.

The case now came before the court upon a motion by the respondents for an order of the court "to direct the proceedings herein to be stayed until security for costs be given by the appellants in a sufficient amount, and to fix the amount of such security;" and on a motion by the appellants "for liberty to examine witnesses on the hearing of the appeal, and that the notes taken by the judge in the court below be also receivable as evidence on the appeal."

Clarkson for the appellants contended that on the evidence as it was before the court it would be impossible to arrive at any conclusion, as the notes were scarcely comprehensible. The court has no power to make an order for further security for costs. The County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), s. 26, gives the power to the registrar of the County Court, and he has already fixed the sum at 20*l.*

W. G. F. Phillimore, for the respondents.—The notes are sufficient, and the court will not without grave reason admit further evidence. As to security for costs, if this evidence is admitted the court has power to make the order upon the terms of further security being given. The court ought not to admit fresh evidence.

Clarkson in reply.—We shall be content to have two witnesses already examined before the County Court.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I am most reluctant to allow witnesses to be examined at the hearing of appeals from County Courts, but in the peculiar circumstances of the present case I feel that I must accede to the prayer of Mr. Clarkson's motion, though the conclusion at which I have arrived must not be considered as affording a precedent for similar applications. In this case two things concur to render it impossible for the court to come to any satisfactory conclusion with reference to the merits of the case on the materials now before it. First, the notes of evidence filed in the registry are very brief, they appear to be merely rough notes taken by the learned judge of the court below for his own guidance, and although no doubt they were sufficient for his purpose, they cannot be regarded as satisfactory for the purpose of an appeal. Secondly, I am without the assistance which in many cases of this kind I have derived from a statement of the reasons which influenced the court below in arriving at the decision appealed against. I have not before me any statement of the grounds upon which the judgment of the court below proceeded. I wish to call attention to the 32nd rule of the general orders for regulating the practice and procedure of the Admiralty Jurisdiction of the County Courts 1869. By that rule it is provided that "at the request of either attorney, and at the cost in the first instance of the plaintiff, the evidence of witnesses examined in court shall be written down by a shorthand writer or reporter, appointed by the court, and sworn in each case faithfully to report the evidence." I think the meaning of this rule is that the evidence should be taken by some reporter at least, in every Admiralty cause where there is a probability of an appeal. It may well happen that it may be unnecessary that the notes should be transcribed, but I think it was intended that, in the event of an appeal, the appellant should have it in his power to bring up a satisfactory report of the whole of the evidence. And certainly I am of opinion that the fact, that the rule has not been followed, must always be a circumstance to be inquired into when an appellant comes to this court for leave to be allowed to adduce further evidence. In this case I shall, as has been suggested, give leave to each party to produce, at the hearing of the appeal, two of the witnesses examined on his behalf in the court below, but I shall only do this upon the terms that the appellants give further security for costs. The present security is insufficient. The appellants must give further security for costs in the sum of 100*l.*, and it may be given in this court.

THE DUE CHECCHI.

Salvage—Pleading—Statement of amount paid for salvage by one defendant struck out.

In a cause of salvage against ship, freight, and cargo, the shipowner, after the institution of the cause, paid a sum in settlement of the claim against him, which was accepted by the plaintiffs.

The plaintiffs proceeded against the cargo, and pleaded in their petition the payment of this sum by the shipowner, and stated the amount.

Held, that the plaintiffs were not entitled to plead the amount so accepted by them, although they might plead the fact that they had so settled with the shipowner.

THIS WAS a cause of salvage instituted on behalf of certain boatmen of Gorleston, in the county of Suffolk, and on behalf of the steam tugs Pilot and Pioneer, their masters and crews, against the Italian barque Due Checchi, her cargo and freight. The case now came before the court on motion to reject part of the plaintiff's petition.

From the petition it appeared that the boatmen were members of the Storm Company of Beachmen, associated together at Gorleston for the purpose of rendering assistance to vessels in distress in the neighbourhood of Yarmouth, and that the tugs belonged to the Great Yarmouth Standard Steam Tug Company; that the Due Checchi was a barque of 395 tons register, and was bound on a voyage to Leith with a cargo of barley, and that on the 26th Dec. 1871, she got ashore on the Corton sand, about two and a half miles from Gorleston; that in consequence of signals of distress displayed by the barque, the plaintiffs went off to her, and some of them succeeded with great difficulty in getting on board of her; that the plaintiffs were employed to use their best endeavours to get the vessel afloat, and it was agreed that question of remuneration should be left for future settlement; that, after a service of considerable difficulty and duration, and of danger to the salvors, they succeeded in getting the barque off the sand, and into Yarmouth harbour; that the value of the Due Checchi was 1650*l.*; of her cargo, 3060*l.* 16*s.*; and of her freight, 700*l.*

The 21st article was as follows:—

21. The owners of the barque have paid to the plaintiffs in discharge of the proportion of salvage due from the ship and freight in respect of the above-mentioned services the sum of 300*l.*

The motion was to reject this last article of the petition.

Phillimore, for the defendants, in support of the motion.—The suit is now against the cargo only, as the shipowner has settled the claim against the ship and freight. The object of the article is to induce the court to make an order for the payment of salvage upon that basis. It is a rule that the court will not allow the amounts awarded by arbitrators or other tribunals to be given in evidence in a case that is before it, and this is introducing evidence of the same character. If this article is allowed, we shall be compelled to plead to it, and to show how the sum is estimated.

Clarkson, contra.—It is right that the court should know what the whole amount is that the salvors will recover. This suit was instituted against ship, cargo, and freight, and since the institution of the suit the shipowner has settled with us. If the owners of cargo should have awarded against them a less sum than 300*l.*, it will be necessary for the court to have before it the amount paid to us for ship and freight, as otherwise we might be condemned in costs. In considering the question of costs, the whole sum recovered must be looked at, and what we have had paid to us is part of what we shall have recovered.

Phillimore in reply.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I am of opinion that this article must be struck out, or at least must be amended by leaving out the amount paid to the plaintiffs, and this is in accordance with the practice of the court. This court cannot be governed by what an arbitrator may choose to award, or by what other persons may think proper remuneration for salvage services. There may be a great many reasons why a different award should be made in this court, as different views may be taken of the facts. A new issue is raised by this article, and if it is allowed, it will compel the defendants to attempt to show why such a sum was agreed upon. If the article were merely to state that a certain sum was awarded, without stating the amount, it would stand in a different light, and that, I consider, will be the best course to adopt here. I shall strike out the amount and then the court will be in possession of the fact that this claim is against the cargo only (a) Master's wages—Necessaries—Priority of lien—Suit by master—Appearance and answer by material men.

A master of a foreign ship, who is also part owner, and upon whose orders necessaries have been supplied, is not entitled to claim priority over the material men, as he himself is personally liable to them for the necessaries supplied.

Semble, that a master who is not part owner would not in such case be entitled to priority over a material man as he also would be liable for the necessaries supplied by his orders as agent for his owners.

In a suit for master's wages and disbursements certain material men appeared and filed an answer alleging that they had supplied necessaries at the order of the master, who was part owner, and that a balance was due to them in respect of those necessaries. On motion to reject the answer it was.

Held, that the answer disclosed a good defence and that the material men were entitled to priority.

THIS WAS a motion to reject the defendant's answer in a cause of wages (5915), instituted against the Norwegian ship Jenny Lind on behalf of Johan Abrahamsen, late master of that vessel. The cause was instituted by the plaintiff to recover a sum of 151*l.* 2*s.* 9*d.*, for wages and disbursements, as shown by an exhibit annexed to his petition, together with certain moneys alleged to be due to the plaintiff by the law of Norway, in consequence of his having been discharged in a foreign country. The plaintiff was appointed master in March 1871, and in Sept. 1871 he arrived in the port of London. On the 10th Oct. the vessel was arrested in a cause of necessities, and on the 10th Dec. a suit was instituted on behalf Messrs. C. and C. J. Northcote, shipbrokers, in the city of London, to recover for necessities supplied. The master's wages suit was instituted on Dec. 5th, and an appearance was then entered on behalf of Gustav Lorenzen, the managing owner, but nothing further was done by that defendant in respect of that appearance. On 11th April, 1872, an appearance was entered in the master's wages suit by Messrs. C. & C. J. Northcote, the present defendants. Other suits had been instituted against the vessel, and she had been sold, and the proceeds brought into court, and certain sums had been paid out in those other suits. An answer was filed on behalf of the defendants claiming a balance of 28*l.* 15*s.* 4*d.* for necessities. The sum in court was about 100*l.*, and therefore insufficient to satisfy both claims. The answer filed was as follows:

1. In or about the month of Sept. 1871, the plaintiff, who was then part owner as well as master of the said vessel Jenny Lind, employed the said defendants to act as agents for the said vessel, and to do the necessary business of the said vessel, and to make the necessary advances in respect of the said vessel in the port of London, and the said defendants accordingly did the necessary business of the said vessel, and made the necessary advances of money on behalf the said vessel, and thereby supplied the said ship with necessities. The exhibit hereto annexed marked A is a true copy of the account of the said defendants in respect of the said supply of necessities, and the balance or sum of 28*l.* 15*s.* 4*d.*, thereby appearing, is still due and owing to the said defendants, and the plaintiff is liable to the said defendants for payment of the same.

The exhibit referred to in the answer contained items which were undoubtedly within the meaning of the term "necessaries," but it also contained a claim for "cash to owners," 20*l.*; for "draft to G. Lorenzen," 85*l.*; for "draft to G. Lorenzen," 50*l.* From the account it appeared that the total amount that had been due was 267*l.* 16*s.* 5*d.*, of which the sum of 239*l.* 1*s.* 1*d.* had been received by the defendants out of freight coming into their hands.

The case now came before the court on motion to reject the defendants' answer.

W. G. F. Phillimore for the plaintiff, in support of the motion.—As the fund in court is insufficient to pay both claims, this is really a question of priority. There are two questions: First, whether a master's claim for wages and disbursements has priority over the claim of a necessary man, even though the master be part owner; secondly, whether the claim of the defendants, even supposing they might have priority in some cases, can be upheld here? A master has the same priority for wages as a seaman by the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 191, and he has, therefore, a maritime lien. He takes precedence over a mortgagee: (The Mary Ann, L. Rep. 1 Adm. & Ecc. 8; 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 334; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 294.) In The Feronia (L. Rep. 2 Adm. & Ecc. 65; 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 619; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 54) it was held that a master, even though a part owner, took precedence over a mortgagee. In The Salacia (32 L. J. 41, Adm.; 7 L. T. Rep. N. S. 440; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 261) it is ruled that both seamen and master have priority over a bottomry bondholder, and that the fact of the master having signed the bond makes no difference so long as he has not bound himself personally by the bond. There is no case where it has been decided that a master's wages take priority over a claim for necessities, but as mortgages and bottomry bonds stand higher than necessities, I submit that a master's wages also takes precedence over the latter. The Jonathan Goodhue (Swab. 524) will be cited against me, but in that case the master bound himself personally by the bottomry bond, whilst here the master is not in any way bound. The defendant supplied the necessities in the credit of the ship, and not of the master; secondly, the account annexed to the answer shows that part of that account has been settled, and that a balance only remains. Certain items of that account are for money advanced to the owners and for drafts cashed for G. Lorenzen, the managing owner, and the defendants are not entitled to claim those sums as necessities: (The Riga, ante, p. 246; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 202.) Those sums are larger in amount than the balance now due, and the plaintiff is therefore entitled to say that the defendants have been paid for all necessities, and that their present claim is for a sum which is not necessities. The drafts to G. Lorenzen, the managing owner, are clearly not necessities.

Clarkson for the defendants, contra.—The master is part owner, and is therefore personally liable to the defendants for these necessities. He is liable to the defendants as master also, and is therefore personally bound within the meaning of the cases cited. By the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, sect. 191, a master has the same maritime lien for his wages as a seaman, but in The Salacia (sup.) Dr. Lushington held that a master must rank next after the seaman, and put his decision upon the ground that as it was an established rule that seamen might recover their wages from a master, it would be unjust to allow a master to take from a fund, against which the seamen have a lien, to their detriment, when the master is bound to pay them whether the fund be sufficient or not. Here the master is bound to pay for these necessities, whether the fund in court be sufficient or not, and he ought not therefore to have priority. In The Feronia (sup.) the master, although a co-owner, had not mortgaged his own shares, and was therefore not personally bound. If he had mortgaged his shares he could not have claimed priority. Over a bottomry bond a master has prima facie priority, but if he has personally bound himself, he cannot claim to the injury of those to whom he is liable: (The Jonathan Goodhue (sup.)) It can make no difference whether the master is bound by a bond or by an ordinary contract debt. The master is liable both as master and part owner. The transaction in this case was between the defendants and the master acting for the owners, and the drafts must be taken to have been for the purpose of assisting the master in the business of the ship. This was a foreign ship, and everything done must have been done by the authority of the master; and whether the drafts were drawn by him or his co-owner, can make no difference. This is within the terms of the decision in The Riga (sup.), a transaction which the master had authority to enter into.

W. G. F. Phillimore in reply.—These advances were not for the master's benefit, and he should not be held liable for anything which was for another's benefit. The drafts appear on the face of the account to have been for the co-owner's benefit only.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 30.—SIR R. PHILLIMORE.—This is a question between two claimants, each possessing a maritime lien, as to the right to priority of payment out of a fund inadequate to satisfy the demands of both. The master of this foreign ship, the Jenny Lind, claims in his petition 15*l.* 2*s.* 9*d.* as due to him for wages and disbursements; certain material men who, in England, have supplied this ship with necessaries have intervened and prayed that the sum of 28*l.* 15*s.* 4*d.* may be paid to them in priority to the claims of the master. Both parties have annexed an exhibit to their pleading, the master setting forth an account of his wages and disbursements; the material men an account of their supplies to the ship. No case has yet been decided by the court, as to whether the master or the material man is entitled to priority of lien. In this case, however, the master is also part owner; it must be taken that he ordered the necessaries that were supplied, and made application for the advances of money which are granted. The contention on behalf of the master has been, first that he has a priority of lien, as master, of which he is not deprived by the fact that he is also part owner. It has been urged that as the statute, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104 s. 191, has given him the same lien as to his wages which the common seamen possess, his claim ranks next to theirs, and that his claim has been decided to take precedence over that of the mortgagee and of the bottomry bondholder. The case of The Feronia (sup.) decided by me, has been cited, as an authority for the first proposition. In that case it was ruled that the master, who was also a part owner, was entitled to priority of payment over the mortgagees. I adhere to my decision in that case, but I do not think the analogy of it governs the case which is now before me. In the Feronia, the master, though part owner, had not mortgaged his share in the vessel, and I held that the mortgagee in possession, being obliged to acknowledge the lien of an ordinary master for his wages, was not discharged from his obligation by the fact that the master happened also to be a part owner; but this case would have assumed a very different aspect, and the master would have stood in a different relation to the mortgagee, if he had been also one of the mortgagors. So with respect to the bottomry bondholder, it has been ruled that where the master has signed the bond so as to bind himself he cannot obtain a preference for his wages over the claim of the bondholder. The master who has given the order to the material men is personally liable as on his own contract and has also rendered his owner liable, for whom as agent he made the contract; and in both capacities, as master and owner, he is liable in this case to the creditors. As part owner his ship had all the advantage from the supply of necessaries, and it would be a great injustice if he could cause that ship so advantaged to pay his wages, while by so doing, he left unpaid his share of the debt for the necessaries which he had ordered. It has been urged that he is not solely liable for this debt, and that is true; but it seems to me far more equitable that this foreign part owner should be left to recover the proper contribution from the other foreign part-owners, than that I should make a decree which would have the effect of sending the English material man to hunt out his remedy, and bring his action in a foreign country against the foreign owners, including the present claimant. Secondly, it has been contended on behalf of the master that the exhibit of accounts shows that advances have been made to the managing owner to an amount exceeding his claim, and that such advances were decided in the recent case of The Riga (sup.) not to be necessaries. But in the present stage of this cause, and on these pleadings, I think I am bound to assume that these advances were made with the sanction of the master as part-owner, and also that he will be entitled as part-owner to his share of the advances from the managing owner. In the circumstances of this case, I think the material men ought to have priority, and I so decide. The technical form which that decision takes is to admit the answer which has been objected to.

THE CHARLES.

Salvage—Putting hand on board—Agreement to pay expenses—Apportionment.

Putting additional hands on board a vessel in distress, which has been driven out to sea by stress of weather shorthanded, to assist in bringing her into port, is a salvage service.

The men so placed on board the distressed vessel are the principal salvors, but the owners, master, and crew of the salving vessel are entitled to share in the reward; the owners, however, are entitled only to a small proportion as their vessel itself does not under such circumstances render assistance, and the only risk they run is, that she may be shorthanded in bad weather.

An agreement entered into between the master of the salving ship and the officer commanding the distressed vessel, by which the latter acknowledges the receipt of the men and undertakes "to pay all expenses attached thereby, as my vessel is in distress for want of men, and I cannot bring her in without help" is not such an agreement as will oust the right of the salvors to reward, but is an agreement to pay expenses in all events. (a)

Semble, even if the agreement did oust the right of the others, it would not affect the right of the men placed on board the distressed vessel.

*A brig was driven out to sea shorthanded, and after she had been eighty days at sea and much damaged, with only four men on board, two of them disabled, a ship placed on board of her two hands, who assisted in working her till she was brought after twelve days into port. owners 50l.; to the master 50l.; to the crew 100l. to the men placed on board the brig 200l.

THIS was a cause of salvage instituted on behalf of the owners, master, and crew, of the American ship Jairus B. Lincoln against the English brig Charles and her cargo. The Jairus B. Lincoln was a ship of 1814 tons register, belonging to Freeport, in the United States and manned by a crew of twenty-two hands, all told. In Oct. 1871 she sailed from the Chinha Island with a cargo of guano, her boatswain being disabled. The Charles was a brig of 246 tons register, belonging to the port of Liverpool, and on the 12th Nov. 1871 she sailed from Banana Creek, Congo River, on the West Coast of Africa, bound for Liverpool, laden with a cargo of palm oil and nuts; she was then, according to her protest, "tight, staunch, strong, well found, and tackled, and in every respect fitted, manned, and provided for her voyage." She had on board a crew of nine hands, all told. She proceeded down the Congo River, but did not go to sea, the wind being light. On Nov. 15 her master and four hands went ashore to obtain provisions for the voyage, and whilst he was away she dragged her anchor, and was carried out to sea with the mate and only three hands on board. The mate made several attempts to get back, but as two of the men were ill of scurvy and fever he could not do so. Owing to the illness of these men, he was unable to heave in the anchor, and the vessel drifted to the northward, and the mate, finding it impossible to get back, continued his voyage to Liverpool. The Charles continued her voyage for eighty days, sometimes meeting with bad weather, and sometimes light winds, when the mate, finding that the two men continued ill, one of them dying shortly after, and that it was impossible to work the ship, and that she was in danger from the condition of her rigging, spoke the ship Jairus B. Lincoln, and requested the master of that ship to let him have two hands to assist. The chief officer of the Jairus B. Lincoln went on board the Charles, and after some difficulty this was agreed to, and two hands were sent on board. Before this was done, the master of the Jairus B. Lincoln wrote out, without the knowledge of the hands, a document, which was read by the mate of the Charles, and was signed by him. The document was as follows:—

I hereby acknowledge to have received two men from the ship J. B. Lincoln, and that I will pay all expenses attached thereby, as my vessel is in distress for want of men, and I cannot bring her in without help.

At sea, Jan. 28, 1882.

Master of the brig Charles, of Liverpool.

(Signed) WILLIAM EVANS, in charge of the brig;
master's certificate No. 6186.

Men's names } GEORGE KENNINGTON, } WILLIAM McDERMOTT.

These two men volunteered to go on board the Charles, and on doing so found the mate and the steward exhausted with extra work and watching. The standing rigging of the brig was in bad order, and many ratlines were gone and her running gear very bad, and required constant splicing, and the foretopmast staysail had been blown away, and she was badly found in provisions and had no lime juice, vinegar, or vegetables on board, nor any medicine. The brig proceeded on her voyage, meeting with bad weather, and the two men put on board had very severe labour and ran some risk, owing to the brig's lamps being short of oil and not burning all night; but they arrived safely in Liverpool on 9th Feb. 1872. The Jairus B. Lincoln also met with severe weather, and her crew had heavier work in consequence of the absence of the two men. With respect to the document above set out the owners of the Charles pleaded in their answer as follows:

9. The chief officer of the Jairus B. Lincoln, after communicating with his captain, returned to the Charles and told the mate that he could have two men. The said chief officer then told the mate that the two men would have to be paid by the Charles, as also the expenses of the men in rejoining the ship, to which the mate assented. The chief officer then produced a piece of paper on which he said was an undertaking on the part of the mate of the Charles to pay the expenses of the two men, and asked the mate to sign it. The mate thereupon signed and handed the piece of paper to the chief officer of the Jairus B. Lincoln, believing at the time that it contained such undertaking and nothing else.

The owners of the Charles and the owners of her cargo appeared separately, the former pleading to the facts and denying that any salvage service was rendered to the Charles, and the latter alleging ignorance of the circumstances and denying salvage services to have been rendered. Witnesses were called for the plaintiffs, but none for the defendants.

Butt, Q.C. (T. H. James with him), for the salvors.—This was a salvage service (The Brig J. L. Bowen, 25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 136; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 106), and the owners, master, and crew, are entitled to salvage reward, but the two men who went on board were the principal salvors.

Milward, Q.C. (Phillimore with him), for the owners of cargo on board the Charles.—There was no salvage service. These men were sent on board the ship by the order of their master, and were bound by the terms of the agreement entered into by him. That agreement shows that the parties did not intend this to be taken as a salvage service. It was an agreement to render assistance on condition of the expenses of the men being paid by the owners of the Charles. The men had no other duties to perform than they would have had on their own ship. They ran no risk.

Myburgh for the owners of the Charles.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is a salvage suit against the vessel Charles. The history of this suit is not a little extraordinary. The vessel against which it is instituted is a brig, &c. (His Lordship here proceeded to set out the facts as above.) After the chief officer of the Jairus B. Lincoln returned to that vessel, her master consented to put on board the Charles two of his men; but before doing so he wrote out the agreement which has been given in evidence in the course of the case, and that agreement, with the exception of the signature, is in his handwriting. This agreement was taken on board the Charles by the chief officer of the Jairus B. Lincoln, and was shown to the mate of the Charles. It was signed by him, and he appended to it the number of his registered certificate. The defendants have submitted that this paper is in itself sufficient to disprove the plaintiffs' case, so far as their right to salvage remuneration is concerned, for the defendants say that the paper was clearly an agreement entered into by the master of the Jairus B. Lincoln to render assistance to the Charles upon the terms expressed in the agreement, namely, that the expenses of the men transferred to the Charles should be borne by the owners of that vessel, and the defendants contend that this stipulation as to the payment of their expenses excludes the notion of salvage reward. I cannot take this view, and I consider that the document was merely intended as a security that, whatever happened, the expenses of these two men should be paid by the owners of the Charles. Even if this were not so, I could not hold that this agreement ousted the right of these two men to salvage reward, and I consider that they would be entitled notwithstanding. The defendants have tried to make out that the mate of the Charles understood the agreement in the sense for which they contend. But their answer is inconsistent with this contention, for it clearly shows that the mate understood that the agreement related to the payment of the men's expenses and that only. That the mate understood the matter at that time is clearly shown by the evidence. He read the paper aloud and then signed it. I therefore think that as far as this document is concerned, it may be entirely laid aside in considering the question of salvage. Now, as to the question of whether this is to be considered a salvage service, I am clearly of opinion that the putting these two men on board the Charles, under the circumstances shown in the case, gives a right to salvage reward to owners, master, and crew, in due proportions according to their respective merits. With respect to the owners, the court is not inclined to think that they are entitled to a large reward, as the ship itself did not render any assistance. Still the court considers they are entitled to some reward, as the ship and crew seem to have been subjected to very bad weather, and the period of the year at which the service was rendered made the risk of parting with two of the crew very considerable. Then the master is also entitled to share, as it was upon his responsibility that the two men were sent on board the Charles. It cannot, however, be doubted that the principal salvors were the two men who went on board the Charles, and it is impossible to read the protest of that ship, and to hear the evidence, without being convinced that a material service was rendered. The two men had to put up with great discomfort from the want of food and medicine; their labour was exhausting, and they ran risk from the ill-health of others on board the Charles. The value of ship and cargo was 8174*l*. I shall award in respect of this service the sum of 400*l*. Of this, I consider the two men who went on board the Charles are entitled to 200*l*.; to the crew left on board the Jairus B. Lincoln I shall apportion the sum of 100*l*. to compensate them for the extra labour thrown upon them by the absence of the other two. To the owners I give 50*l*., and to the master 50*l*.

MESSINA v. PETROCOCCHINO.

Foreign judgment—How far conclusive—Greek Consular Court—Bottomry—Average statement.

A cargo, belonging to a Greek owner, and shipped on board a Greek ship, was consigned to the appellant to be delivered at Malta. On the voyage bad weather was encountered, some of the ship's boats and apparel were jettisoned, and the ship arrived at Constantinople in a damaged state. The captain made a protest before the Greek Consular Court there, and applied for a survey of the ship and cargo. The surveyors, appointed by the Court, reported and recommended a transshipment of the cargo, and the appointment of a curator thereto. A curator, whose agent was the respondent, was accordingly appointed by the court. The captain further petitioned for the appointment of average staters. The average staters, appointed by the court, decided as to the expenses to be put in particular and general average, &c., and advised that power should be given to the curator to contract a bottomry bond to pay freight, average expenses, &c., under hypothecation of the cargo.

The decision of the average staters was confirmed by the Greek Consul-General, who declared it to have the force of a thing adjudicated, and a bottomry bond was ordered and given. On arrival of the cargo at Malta, the respondent refused to deliver the cargo without payment of the bottomry bond, and the appellant at last paid under protest, and instituted proceedings in the courts at Malta:

Held (on appeal from the Court of appeal at Malta) that, as the Greek Consular court at Constantinople was a competent court to exercise jurisdiction in such matters, it must be presumed that that Court rightly interpreted and applied the Greek law; that by that law the court had the power and duly exercised it of deciding that Constantinople should be considered as the port of destination, and that the average should be adjusted at that port; that the bottomry bond was necessary and valid, though made without communication with the owners of the cargo, or their agent; that the court had power to appoint the average staters, and that their decision gave authority to the curator to transship the cargo and to contract the bottomry bond; and that this decision was rightly confirmed by the Greek Consul-General.

*Dent v. Smith, 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 251, approved. This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal at Malta, reversing two judgments of the Court of Commerce at Malta. The suit was instituted to contest the validity of a bottomry bond upon a cargo of wheat belonging to the appellant, given at Constantinople under a decree of the Greek Consular Court at that place. The ship Evangelistria carrying the cargo put into Constantinople damaged, under circumstances set out in the judgment of the Privy Council, and the master made a protest in the Consular Court, and* applied for the appointment of surveyors, who were appointed by the court. The master carried a letter of recommendation to one Cossudi as agent for the shipper at Constantinople, but did not apply to him for assistance. Cossudi, however, was aware of the ship's arrival, for eight days after her arrival he wrote to the appellant, enclosing the charter-party, which had been forwarded to him by the shipper, and announcing the ship's arrival, and saying that she was still there, and that she had suffered some damage, viz.: "he has lost the boat cordage," &c. The surveyors sent in a first report, to the court, which is set out in the judgment of the Privy Council and a curator, one Dimitriacopulo was appointed, who chartered the Otto Sorelle under the double condition to serve as store, or to send, in case of need, the cargo to its destination. The cargo was transhipped on board the Otto Sorelle, and on 23rd Jan. 1867, the surveyors again surveyed the ship, and reported that as "the repairs to the hull of the Evangelistria cannot be but greatly delayed in this rather advanced winter time," and as "it would not suit the parties concerned in the cargo to cause it to wait for the repairs above-named and overcharge it with enormous expenses of storage," it would be more suitable to send the cargo on to its destination in the Otto Sorelle, and they fixed the amount of damage sustained by the Evangelistria. This report was confirmed by the Greek Consul-General, and thereupon the master applied on 25th Jan. 1867, for average or judicial stators to fix the amount of average in respect of the injuries received, and the freight due for the part of the voyage performed. They were appointed by the court and made their settlement or sentence in the terms set out in the judgment, but also alleged as reasons for their report, that "the cargo of the Evangelistria being sent to its destination by another vessel, its voyage must be considered as finished in this port, and in this manner is to be fixed the freight due for the voyage performed;" that "by a constant practice adopted in this city to ships coming from Azoff, bound for the Mediterranean, were always granted two-thirds of the freight and primage, and the entire gratuity" (to the master); that "the curator of the cargo having to pay the freight that shall be adjudicated due to the vessel Evangelistria, the expenses of the present average, &c., power must be given to him to contract a bottomry bond under hypothecation of the cargo sent to its destination;" that "in general averages, contribute, the value of the cargo less freight, and the vessel at half its value and half its freight." In this sentence under the head of general average was inserted the whole of the damage sustained by the ship, caused both by jettison and by injury sustained during the act of jettison by one of the boats being struck by a sea and so getting loose and breaking the bulwarks. The sentence was submitted to the Greek Consul-General and he endorsed it. "Having seen the present sentence and general average settlement we confirm it to have the force of a thing adjudicated, and send it to the Chancellerie for its due communication and execution," and he signed it. The sentence was in the usual form of a French or Greek judgment. The proceedings thereon are set out in the judgment of the Privy Council. The curator had acquainted the shipper with the fact of his appointment immediately after the first survey, by telegram. Negroponte, the shipper, thereupon wrote to the master of the Evangelistria complaining that he had not applied to Cossudi, who had in hand funds of the shipper, but took no steps to upset the proceedings in the Greek Consular Court.

On the receipt of the bottomry bond, bill of lading, and the average statement by the respondent as agent for the curator and the lender on bottomry, the appellant refused to pay the bond, and protested against the non-delivery to him of the bill of lading, but on 27th Feb. 1867, deposited in the Court of Commerce at Malta the amount of the bond as security till it should be decided whether the bond was valid, and asked the court to order the bill of lading to be delivered up to him. On 6th March 1867, the appellant consented that the respondent should take out of court the amount paid in conditionally, and bound himself to bring forward, within a time to be fixed by the court, his claim to be released from the bond. The Court of Commerce thereupon ordered the bill of lading to be delivered up on condition that the appellant should, within two days, bring forward in a suit by way of citation the grounds on which he disputed the validity of the bond. The suit mentioned in the judgment of the Privy Council was thereupon instituted and proceeded as there set out, and on appeal the appellate court held, on 16th Dec. 1867, that the Court of Commerce had jurisdiction as to the average acts, but that the decision as to the invalidity of the bottomry bond must be set aside until the question as to the average acts had been decided. The question again came before the Court of Commerce, and that court dismissed the respondent from the suit as set out in the judgment of the Privy Council. From this decision both parties again appealed to the appellate court the respondent alleging as a ground of appeal that the Court of Commerce should have decided for the absolute exclusion of the appellant from all claim to recover the amount of the bond, and not merely that the proceedings were irregular.

The appellate court at Malta, thereupon, reversing the decision of the court below, delivered on the 20th July 1868, a judgment, the substance of which is set out in the judgment of the Privy Council, holding, inter alia, that the proceedings in the Greek Consular Court, had been in accordance with the provisions of the French Code de Commerce (Articles 245, 247, 234, and 312), which was adopted as the law of Greece by ordinance in April 1835, and deciding—

"For the exclusion of the demanded declaration that the acts made in Constantinople are null, irrelevant, and of no validity, and to which the citation refers, inasmuch as they might concern the said bottomry bond; and also for the exclusion of the demanded nullity of the said bottomry bond, and revoking the two sentences delivered by Her Majesty's Court of Commerce, one upon the merit on 22nd June 1869, and the other about the said acts on 26th May, 1868.

"Costs of first and second instance to be paid by the plaintiff."

From this judgment the plaintiff appealed.

Manisty, Q.C., and Baylis, for the appellant contended that the proceedings in the Greek Consulate were irregular and invalid, no notice of the proceedings having been given to the owners of the cargo or their agent at Constantinople. This court may review the proceedings in the Greek court for error on the face of those proceedings:

Simpson v. Fogo, 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 312; 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 61; 32 L. J. 249, Ch.;
Scott v. Pilkington, 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 21; 31 L. J. 81, Q. B.; Bank of Australasia v. Nias, 16 Q. B. 717.

It must be admitted that there is a Greek Consular Court having jurisdiction in maritime questions, but the court has done acts contrary to maritime law; and the respondent asserts that the Greek court had jurisdiction to do something which the maritime law does not sanction, and he must, therefore, show positively that such jurisdiction exists. A master selling his ship under the authority of vice-admiralty courts can give no title, as they have no jurisdiction:

Reid v. Darby, 10 East, 143;
Morris v. Robinson, 3 B. & C. 196.

The average statement was erroneous and unjust on the face of it, inasmuch as the cargo is made to contribute its full value (freight being deducted), and the ship on half its value and half its freight; and because the statement includes many items which are not the subject of general average, and to which the cargo was not bound to contribute. Freight pro rata was not due. The master could have repaired, and he was bound to do so. If he could not repair, he ought to have sent the cargo on at his expense; or he could have no claim for freight.

Skipton v. Thornton, 9 Ad. & El. 314.

The statement should have been made at Malta, which was the place of discharge:

Fletcher v. Alexander, L. Rep. 3 C. P. 375; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 69;
Simonds v. White, 2 B. & C. 805.

The adjustment, therefore, should be in accordance with English law: (Power v. Whitmore, 4 M. & Sel. 141.) There was no necessity to raise money on bottomry; nor had the curator any right under the circumstances to hypothecate the cargo, without communicating with the owners or their agent, more especially as they had an agent with funds in hand at Constantinople. The lender was bound to see that there was a necessity for hypothecation, and that the owner had been communicated with:

The Hamburg, 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 1; 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 175; 2 B. & L. 253; 9 Jur. N. S. 445.

The bottomry bond was therefore invalid, or, if held valid in part, then it must stand as security for that part only.

Butt, Q.C. and Clarkson, for the respondent, contended, and the proceedings taken under the direction of, and confirmed by, the Greek Court, had been judicially determined, and could not be questioned: (Castrique v. Imrie, 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 454; 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 48; L. Rep. 4 H. of L. 414.) This court is not a court of appeal from a Greek consular court. There is nothing contrary to law maritime, or natural justice, in the decision, but it is quite in accordance with the practice of the consular courts in the Levant, and with the provisions of the French code. The powers of those consular courts are necessarily large, as they have jurisdiction in all matters affecting the interests of persons of their own nationality resident in Mahomedan countries:

The Laconia, 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 378; 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 37; 2 Moo. P. C. C., N. S., 161;

 Wheat. Int. Law, 2nd edit. by Lawrence, 224, note.

The bottomry bond was necessary. The average statement was made, and the bottomry bond was given under the directions, and with the sanction of a competent court, and with all requisite formalities. If the formalities prescribed by the French code had been complied with, a bonâ fide lender acquires, by French law, a right to recover his money even in case of fraud on the part of the master. (a)

Emerigon Traité des Contacts à la Grosse, c. 4, s. 8; Boulay-Paty, tom. 2, p. 69, at seq.

The appointment of a curator is a thing well known in continental courts. (b) This must be presumed to be the judgment of a competent tribunal, by which not only was a curator appointed but was ordered to bottomry. The cargo and the bond cannot, therefore, be impeached. The average expenses were duly and properly settled at Constantinople, which was the place of transshipment or separation of the ship and cargo:

1 Parsons on Shipping, 465;
 2 Phillips on Insurance, 134.

Even if the average statement is bad, it does not follow that the bottomry bond is bad. The lender taking the bond under the authority of the court was absolved from inquiring as to the necessity. If the appellant objected he should have gone to the proper appellate tribunal at Athens.

Manisty, Q.C. in reply.—Dent v. Smith (sup.) was decided upon evidence showing the jurisdiction of the consular court. Here, there is no evidence of jurisdiction, and as the respondent is really claiming the payment of the sum lent on bottomry, it is for him to show that such jurisdiction existed. Our. adv. vult.

Judgment was delivered by SIR ROBERT PHILLIMORE:—This is an appeal from the Court of Appeal at Malta, in the matter of a bottomry or hypothecation bond. In Oct. 1866, Negroponte, a merchant at Taganrag, shipped, at Berdianski, a cargo of wheat belonging to a Greek owner, on board a Greek ship, the Evangelistria, and con-

(a) The formalities required by the French Code de Commerce to be observed by a master requiring to raise money on bottomry, are that he should, when abroad, go before his consul and receive an authorization to contract the loan, when at home, before the Tribunal of Commerce or the juge de paix. This is prescribed by Art. 234 of the code, but it has been laid down by the Court of Cassation in Paris, that the neglect to observe the formalities prescribed by that article does not prevent a loan upon bottomry from being obligatory upon the shipowner when entered into by the lender bonâ fide, and that this ruling holds good even when the loan has been contracted abroad by a foreign master with a French lender who seeks to recover in France the repayment of his loan. See Dalloz, Jurisprudence Générale, tom. xviii., tit. "Droit Maritime," Nos. 442, 443, and Dalloz Jurisprudence Générale Année 1845, Prem. Partie, Cour de Cassation, p. 313.—Ed.

(b) There does not appear to be in the Code Civil of France any express power to appoint a curator, although by Art. 112, the courts are empowered to arrange for the administration of the property of absent persons who have no appointed agents, and it is the universal practice to appoint a curator where necessary; (Code Civil, Art. 112; Dalloz, Jurisprudence Générale, vol. 2, tit. "Absence," No. 92)—Ed.

signed it to Messina (the appellant), to be delivered to his order at Malta, or at such ports as the consignee should there order. The captain, Frutta, had letters of recommendation to Cossudi, the agent at Constantinople for Negroponte. Negroponte and the appellant are jointly interested in the shipment. The charter-party was sent by Negroponte through Cossudi to Messina, the appellant. The Evangelistria sailed, she encountered bad weather, and was obliged to jettison some of her boats, sails, chains, and other apparel. She put back to Sebastopol, but made no protest in that port; she sailed again, and again encountered bad weather, which necessitated further jettison, and arrived in a damaged condition at Constantinople on the 27th Dec. Upon the 30th Dec. the captain went before the Greek Consular Tribunal (or the Greek Royal Commercial Chancery, as it is called) at Pera, made a protest, and applied for the survey of the ship and cargo; the court appointed surveyors, who drew up "a sentence and average settlement." In their first report the surveyors, after stating various reasons, said:—"Whereas, for the above reasons, the cargo of the Evangelistria, must be transhipped on another vessel, to be chartered under double condition, to serve as store, or to send, in case of need, the cargo to its destination: Whereas, there being in this town no legitimate representative of the owner of the cargo, a curator to the same must be named by the competent authority: Moved by these reasons, we have unanimously agreed that the Royal Greek Commercial Chancery should appoint a curator to the cargo, who, with the knowledge of the representative of the underwriters, will charter a vessel of the same burden as the Evangelistria, with the double condition to serve as store, or, if necessary, for carrying the cargo to its destination, and to commence without loss of time the transshipment of the cargo in question." A Greek merchant, by name Dimitriacopulo, was appointed curator by the court; his agent is Petrococchino, the respondent. In their second and last report the surveyors recommended that the cargo should be forwarded to its destination on board a vessel called the Otto Sorelle; the captain further petitioned for the appointment of "average or judicial staters;" they were appointed by the court, and decided, among other things, as follows:—"First, that the expenses of transshipment made by the curator to the cargo, his commission, the interest of the bottomry bond, and the remaining freight to be paid to send the cargo to its destination, must be classified in particular average to be suffered by the cargo alone; secondly, that in the general average must be put the damages of the vessel, fixed by the surveyors at 44,558 piastres, the expenses of survey and towing, &c., incurred by the captain, the fees of Chancery, the fees of the legal adviser and compiler of several acts, the fees of the judicial staters, of the representative of the underwriters, and the compiler of the present decision and average settlement, for which expenses the cargo will contribute with its value, freight deducted, and the vessel with half its value and half its freight, as it is to be seen by the settlement prospectus which is to form an integral part of the present sentence; thirdly, that the freight of the vessel Evangelistria is fixed to two-thirds of the freight agreed on in the charter-party, to two-thirds of primage, and the gratuity entire, free of contribution; fourthly, that power should be given to the curator of the cargo to contract a bottomry bond for the sum necessary to pay the freight of the Evangelistria, average expenses, &c., under hypothecation of the wheat cargo, sent to its destination by the vessel Otto Sorelle." This decision was confirmed by the Greek Consul-General, who declared it to have the force of a thing adjudicated: a bottomry bond was also ordered and was given to a Mr. Facher as a security for 35,760*l.* 52*s.* The bill of lading, the average statement, and the bottomry bond, were sent by the curator to Petrococchino, at Malta. The Otto Sorelle arrived with her cargo at Malta on the 26th Feb. 1867. Petrococchino refused to deliver the cargo without payment of the bottomry bond. Messina, the appellant, refused to pay, and at last paid under protest, and litigation ensued. A suit was instituted by the appellant against Petrococchino in the Court of Commerce. The appellant called upon him to show cause why, in the first place, the pretended "Average Acts," made at Constantinople, should not be declared irregular, null, and of no validity on account of inherent faults, for want of authority and jurisdiction, and for the errors they contained, and for other reasons to be orally alleged, and why as a consequence, the said pretended bottomry bond should not be declared null and void, and if necessary, annulled without prejudice to the right of the parties, or whomsoever else it might concern, including the said Captain Giovanni Frutta, to proceed to a regular average statement in the place where the voyage of the Evangelistria ought to have terminated, and claimed damages against Dimitriacopulo (without prejudice to an action against him for fraud) with costs against the respondent. The Court of Commerce decided against the appellant on the ground that it had no jurisdiction in the matter of the average, but in his favour as to the bottomry bond, declaring it void. Both parties appealed to the Appellate Court at Malta, which decided that the inferior court had jurisdiction as to the average, but gave no judgment as to the bottomry, and remitted the case. The Court of Commerce, on the 26th May 1868, gave judgment that the said suit, so far as it related to the demand for the nullity of the said average acts, had been "illegally observed," by reason of the appellant not having summoned all the parties concerned in the said average acts, and especially Captain Frutta, of the brig Evangelistria, and that nothing was proved sufficient to make Dimitriacopulo liable in damages, and decided for the discharge of the respondent nomine (that is, in the character in which he was sued) ab observantiâ Judicii, with costs; the effect of which judgment was equivalent to a nonsuit. Both parties again appealed; and on the 20th July 1868, the Appellate Court decided that the "Captain of the Evangelistria, having taken the legal course in going before the Consular Tribunal at Constantinople, and that court having, on the report of experts of the necessity for unloading and transshipping the cargo in order to repair the ship, appointed Dimitriacopulo curator of the cargo, and declared the voyage of the Evangelistria ended at Constantinople, and authorised Dimitriacopulo to give a bottomry bond, he must be considered by a third party as the attorney for the owners of the goods, and had authority to hypothecate them. That where the formalities of a consular authority and verbal process justifying the expenses necessitating the loan are observed, the lender on bottomry is exonerated from seeing the necessity of the loan proved. That in the present case the sentence of the court supplied the consular authority, and the expenses having been incurred under the control of the consul, and sanctioned by the sentence, the production of verbal process was not important, and that substantially the formalities were to be taken as complied with, and that the lender was not bound to make inquiry as to the facts causing the necessity of the loan. That there was no proof of any fraudulent collusion between Facher, the lender of the money, and Dimitriacopulo, or that Dimitriacopulo stimulated expenses, or committed any irregular or deceitful acts to the damage of the cargo, or even, if he had himself acquired an interest in the bond, would that have affected its validity, and that any omissions on his part, even if they resulted in damage, and gave a cause of action, would not nullify the bond, and that it was not necessary to summon Captain Frutta, the master of the Evangelistria." From this decision the appeal has been prosecuted to this tribunal. It has been strongly urged upon their Lordships that all the proceedings in the Greek Consular Court, which were in substance upholden by the Court of Appeal in Malta, were invalid; and principally upon the following grounds: that, with regard to the bottomry bond, no adequate necessity is shown for having recourse to it, and also that it is bad because not preceded by any communication or attempt at communication with the owner of the cargo; and, with regard to the general average, that the proper place for the adjustment of it was Malta, the port of destination, and not Constantinople. Their Lordships are called upon now to pronounce a judgment in favour of these propositions, sitting as an appellate tribunal from the Court of Malta; in other words to give that judgment which it is alleged that the court appealed from ought to have delivered. Their Lordships are not sitting as an appellate tribunal from the Greek Consular Court at Constantinople. It is necessary to make this statement in limine, however obvious it may appear, for the following reason. If the Greek Consular Tribunal was a competent court, having jurisdiction over the ship and cargo, then the sentence of that court was not open to examination by the court at Malta, but would be properly enforced by it, or, to borrow the clear language of Lord Ellenborough in Power v. Whitmore, "By the comity which is paid by us to the judgments of other courts abroad of competent jurisdiction we give a full and binding effect to such judgments, as far as they profess to bind the persons and property immediately before them in judgment, and to which their adjudications properly relate"—4 Mau. & Sel., 150 (1815). And it is to be observed that, though the earlier cases exhibit some fluctuation and variety with respect to the application of this doctrine, it has become firmly established by a series of later cases as an unquestionable maxim of our jurisprudence. The strongest and the last case is that of Castrique v. Imrie decided by the House of Lords in 1870: (L. Rep. 4 H. L. Cas. 414; 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 48.) The foreign judgment of a competent court may indeed be impeached, if it carries on the face of it a manifest error; if it is shown to have been attained by fraud, or to be wanting in the conditions of natural justice; and it cannot be supplied to persons other than those who were parties to the litigation decided by it, except in cases where the judgment is in rem. No such infirmities can in this case be predicted of the decree and orders of the Greek Court, and therefore the consideration as to the competency of that court alone remains to be considered. It has been much pressed upon us that there is no evidence of such competence, and that the acknowledged rules of the general maritime law applicable to bottomry bonds on cargo have been violated by the proceedings of the court. Now this was the sentence of a Greek Consular Court sitting at Constantinople upon a Greek ship, and a cargo owned by Greek subjects. The holder of the bottomry bond was a stranger who, acting bonâ fide, advanced his money on the bond. That the Ottoman Porte has given to the Christian Powers of Europe authority to administer justice to their own subjects according to their own laws within its dominions is a fact publici juris, which their Lordships are not now called upon for the first time to take cognizance of, and which they fully recognised in the case of the Laconia (sup.). It would be strange, indeed, if it had been otherwise, inasmuch as her Majesty has established a Supreme Consular Court at Constantinople and provincial courts, with rules for the exercise of civil and criminal jurisdiction. This kind of jurisdiction exercised by the consuls of Christian states in Mahometan countries is to be carefully distinguished from the ordinary powers exercised by foreign consuls in Christian states. Judicial cognizance being therefore taken by their Lordships of the fact that a Greek tribunal, capable of exercising jurisdiction in this case, existed at Constantinople, it is the duty of their Lordships to apply to such a tribunal the ordinary principles which regulate the reception of the judgment of a foreign tribunal by other courts. During the course of the argument our attention was properly drawn to the case Dent v. Smith (sup.), in which the competence of the Russian Consular Court at Constantinople was placed upon this footing by the Court of Queen's Bench. In that case, the particulars of which it is not necessary to mention, Cockburn, C.J., said:—"The facts lie in a very narrow compass. The ship, having become a Russian ship, is wrecked in Turkish waters; the gold, the subject matter of this insurance, is saved by being immediately sent on shore, the captain taking advantage of having to send his boat, and thinking it best to save this portion of the cargo, which, of course, was by far the most valuable part, and, from its small bulk, the part most easily saved. He deposits it, or causes it to be placed in the hands of the Russian consul. It is unnecessary to follow these proceedings in any detail through their course; but afterwards a claim is made in respect of the expenses which were incurred in endeavours to save the ship, and the rest of the cargo on the gold in the consul's hands; and in the end, the matter having been investigated by persons appointed by the Russian consul, judgment is given as to the amount which shall be contributed by the owners of the gold to satisfy the claim for contribution in respect of the expenses. That judgment is ratified, as it is necessary it should be, by the Russian Minister at Constantinople, and being so ratified, and not being appealed against within a certain time, the judgment became a binding judgment upon the parties concerned. That being so, the owners of the gold being shown to have no alternative in order to get the gold, but to submit to the payment of this per-centage, and in the meanwhile they or someone, having given security, in the end they were obliged to pay the money themselves. Now, it has been contended, on the part of the defendants, that the proceedings of the tribunal by which this judgment was given were wrongful in many respects. In the first place, that, having to apply the Russian Commercial Code, they applied the French. I think there is quite a sufficient answer to that. It appears that, in matters relating to maritime law in which the jurisdiction of the Russian Consulate has to be exercised, they have not at Constantinople the presence and assistance of Russian advocates to explain the law, whereas there are French advocates resident there, and the laws of the two countries being with reference to these matters almost the same, they had recourse to the French law, and applied it in this instance. Whether this is strictly right or wrong, I do not take upon myself to pronounce, for I think it is a matter with which we have nothing to do; but if in this case they applied the French law as a substitute for the Russian, I think we must take it that they did it with proper authority. Then it is said that they applied the law erroneously. Again, I think we have not to deal with that. We are not to sit here as a court of appeal against any judgment pronounced by a court, which must be taken to be one of competent jurisdiction in the administration of Russian law, and whatever was substituted became for the time Russian law in respect of matters of maritime law. The proper tribunal to appeal to, if there was any ground of appeal, was to the Court of St. Petersburg. With the principles of this judgment their Lordships are disposed entirely to agree. They think it must be presumed that the Greek court rightly interpreted and applied the Greek law; that by that law they had the power, and duly exercised it of deciding that, in the circumstances, Constantinople should be considered as the place of the ship's destination, and the average adjusted according to the Greek law in force at that place; and that the bottomry bond was necessary and valid, though entered into without citing M. Cossudi, the agent of the owners of the cargo, who was, however, their Lordships must remark, aware, as is proved by his letter, of the arrival of the ship in a disabled state at Constantinople, and, it must be presumed, of the proceedings in the Greek Court, though he did not appear and take any part in them. It must also be presumed that the court had power to appoint the average or judicial staters, and that their decision gave authority to the curator of the cargo to contract the bottomry bond in question with Facher, and to tranship the cargo on board the Otto Sorelle; and that this decision was rightly confirmed by the Greek Consul-General. Their Lordships do not feel themselves at liberty to enter into the discussion into which they were invited by counsel for the appellants, or into the question whether the Greek law be or be not at variance with the general maritime law upon these points. They would be properly raised on an appeal to the Greek Appellate Court, whether sitting at Athens or elsewhere; and could not properly be discussed either before the court at Malta or before this tribunal. Their Lordships must, therefore, humbly advise her Majesty that the judgment appealed from be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed with costs against the appellant.

HARRISON v. GARTHORNE.

*Charter-party—Dangers excepted during voyage—
Ship to arrive within specified time.*

By a charter-party, plaintiffs, as owners, agreed with defendants, as charterers of a good screw steamship, name to be given up as soon as known, expected to carry from 1100 to 1200 tons cargo, that the said ship, being tight, staunch, and strong, and every way fitted for the voyage, should, with all convenient speed, sail and proceed to Alexandria, to arrive within a margin of three weeks from 15th Nov. 1870; and with liberty to take a cargo out for owner's benefit, either direct or from or to any neighbouring ports; and there load a cargo from charterer's agents, and proceed to Hull or London at certain rates in full of all pilotages and port charges during the said voyage, all dangers and accidents of the seas, &c., "during the said voyage always excepted." The plaintiffs alleged, as a breach of the charter-party, that the said steamship, although duly named by the defendants, did not arrive at Alexandria within the stipulated period. Defendants pleaded dangers of the seas after the name of the ship was given up by the plaintiffs, and whilst on her voyage to Alexandria pursuant to a charter-party, which prevented her reaching her destination at Alexandria:

Held, upon demurrer, that this plea was good.

THIS was a demurrer to a plea.

The action was brought by charterers, described in the charter party as "James Harrison and Sons," against shipowners, described as "Hornsted and Garthorne;" the declaration set out the charter-party as follows:—

Hull, 8th Oct. 1870.

It is this day mutually agreed between Hornsted and Garthorne, agents of a good screw steamship or vessel, name to be given up as soon as known, expected to carry from 1100 to 1200 tons cargo, and Messrs. James Harrison and Sons, of Hull, merchants; that the said ship, being tight, staunch, and strong, and every way fitted for the voyage, shall, with all convenient speed, sail and proceed to Alexandria, to arrive within a margin of three weeks from 15th Nov. 1870, and with liberty to take a cargo out for owner's benefit either direct or from or to any neighbouring ports, or so near thereunto as she can safely get, and there load from the agents of the said freighters a full and complete cargo of cotton seed or other grain or seed at proportionate rates, merchants finding mats and the ship wood for damage. The cargo to be brought to and taken from alongside the vessel at merchant's risk and expense, not exceeding what she can reasonably stow and carry over and above her tackle, apparel, provisions, and furniture, and, being so loaded, shall forthwith proceed to Hull or London as ordered on signing bill of lading, or so near thereunto as she can safely get, and there deliver the same on being paid freight, at and after the rate of 25s. per ton delivered if to Hull; 27s. 6d. per ton delivered if to London, in full of all pilotages and port charges during the said voyage (the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation of whatever nature or kind soever during the said voyage always excepted). Freight to be paid on unloading and right delivery of the cargo as follows, say in cash. Steamer to be loaded in Alexandria with utmost customary steamer dispatch, and to be discharged as fast as she can deliver; and ten days on demurrage over and above the said lying days at 35*l.* per day. The owner or captain to have a lien on the cargo for all freight, dead freight, and demurrage. A commission of 5 per cent. on the amount of freight, primage, and demurrage is due by the owners to Hornstedt and Garthorne on the signing of this charter-party, ship lost or not lost; and the vessel on her return to the United Kingdom to be reported at the Custom House by them or their Agents. Penalty for non-performance of his agreement estimated amount of freight and demurrage. Ship free of address.

JAMES HARRISON AND SONS.
HORNSTEDT AND GARTHORNE.

The declaration averred that the said charter-party having been made and entered into, the defendants duly gave up to the plaintiffs the name of the Astarte as the screw steam ship or vessel by which the voyage in the said charter-party mentioned was to be performed, and all conditions were performed, and all things happened and existed, and all times elapsed necessary to entitle the plaintiffs to have the said ship or vessel sail and proceed to Alexandria, and arrive there within a margin of three weeks from the 15th Nov. 1870, being the time in that behalf stipulated for by the said charter-party. Yet the said ship or vessel did not arrive at Alexandria aforesaid within the time stipulated for by the said charter-party, but on the contrary thereof arrived there a long time after the expiration of the said time so stipulated for her arrival there as aforesaid. Whereby the plaintiffs were hindered and prevented from loading the said ship or vessel, and dispatching her from Alexandria aforesaid with her agreed cargo so soon as they might and otherwise would have done. In consequence thereof the plaintiffs were hindered and prevented from receiving the said cargo at her port of destination so soon as they ought and otherwise would have done, and were thereby hindered and prevented from using and disposing of the said cargo as they otherwise might and would have done, and were put to and incurred great expense in and about providing other cargo in the place of the said cargo; and lost and were deprived of great gains and profits; and the said cargo became and was of much less value than it would have been if the said ship or vessel had arrived at Alexandria aforesaid as agreed.

To this declaration the defendants pleaded, secondly, that the said ship or vessel was prevented from arriving at Alexandria aforesaid within the time stipulated for by the charter-party by reason of perils and casualties excepted in the said charter-party, that is to say, by dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation, which happened after the name of the said ship or vessel was given up to the plaintiff as alleged [and (a) whilst on her passage to Alexandria pursuant to the charter-party], and not otherwise.

Kemplay, Q.C. for the plaintiffs, argued that this plea was bad. The exceptions of dangers and accidents in the charter-party relate only to the voyage from Alexandria to Hull, or London, for which the vessel was chartered. In the case of Croockewit v. Fletcher (1 H. & N. 893), the words of the exception were "the act of God," &c., "throughout this charter-party always excepted." The contract was concerning a ship "now at Amsterdam, and to sail from thence for Liverpool on or before the 15th of March next." The ship was prevented from sailing from Amsterdam by the act of God; yet it was held that the sailing as agreed was a condition precedent to the charterer's obligation to load. In Crow v. Falk (8 Q. B. 467), the contract was that a ship, then at Liverpool, should there receive and load a cargo from the charterers, and proceed to Stettin, "restraints of princes, &c., during the said voyage always mutually excepted." It was held that this exception was applicable only after the ship quitted Liverpool. Although in Bruce v. Nicolopulo (11 Ex. 129), the contract being that the ship should after discharging her outward cargo, proceed to Galatz or Ibraila, as ordered at Constantinople, it was held that the restraints of princes, "during the said voyage always mutually excepted," applied whilst the ship was at Ibraila, that is no authority in favour of this plea. In Valente v. Gibbs (6 C. B. N. S. 270), the ship was lying at Genoa, whence she was to sail to Monte Video, and the Chincha Islands, from the latter of which she was to take a cargo of guano to the United Kingdom. After provision for days of loading, the charter-party arranged for the payment for unnecessary detention at any other period of the voyage. It was held that detention at Genoa before sailing was not at any period of the voyage, within the payment clause. In the more recent case Barker v. M'Andrew (2 Mar. Law Cas., O. S. 205; 18 C. B., N. S., 759), the ship was at the time of the charter-party at Newcastle, and was prevented by excepted dangers from receiving on board more than part of her cargo; the voyage was in fact commenced from the commencement of the loading, and the exceptions during the said voyage were properly held to apply; the circumstances of this case are very different from that.

Day, Q.C., for the defendants, was not called upon.

BLACKBURN, J.—We need not trouble Mr. Day. Barker v. M'Andrew (sup.) is, as I think, exactly in point. I think, too, that decision is very good sense, and we could have no object in overruling it; this we must do if we decide for the plaintiff here. Willes, J., is reported to have said (18 C. B., N. S., 771): "The first [question] is in effect whether, where a charter-party stipulates that the vessel shall proceed to a particular port for the purpose of receiving a cargo, and proceed thence to the port of destination, the exception of perils of the seas, &c., applies only to the voyage of the vessel with the cargo on board, or to the preliminary transit also." He proceeds on the following page: "When one considers, therefore, the origin and the object of the exception, there can be no reason why it should be held to apply to one part of the transit rather than to the other. In truth it comes to this,—was the preliminary transit a part of "the voyage?" I apprehend the voyage is nothing more than the passage of the vessel on the transit. The commencement of the voyage is the commencing to do that for which the shipowner is to be paid freight." Applying that interpretation to the commencement of this voyage, the exceptions began when this particular ship, which had been named, began to proceed to Alexandria; and it makes no difference that the ship has no definite place from which to start on her voyage. The plea as amended, is, I think, a good answer to the action.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. When one considers Mr. Kemplay's argument, it seems to depend upon the commencement of the voyage mentioned in the charter-party being the period at which the ship proceeds from Alexandria with her cargo on board. Now that would be clearly in conflict with the decision of the Court of Common Pleas in Barker v. M'Andrew, and I consider that we are bound by that decision.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion, and I should have been so, even if it were not for Barker v. M'Andrew.

CHRISTOFFERSEN v. HANSEN

Charter-party—Agent for foreign freighters—Cesser of liability clause—Construction.

By a charter-party made between the plaintiff and defendant it was agreed that the defendant should load the plaintiff's ship at Sunderland in regular turn, with a full cargo of coals to be delivered at Kiel for a certain freight. . . "and that the said charter-party being concluded by the defendant on behalf of another person resident abroad, all liability of the defendant should cease as soon as he had shipped the said cargo." To an action for delay in loading the defendant pleaded the last mentioned clause, averring a shipment of cargo. The plaintiff demurred on the ground that the clause did not apply to liabilities accruing prior to or during shipment of cargo, but to liabilities accruing subsequently to the shipment.

Held, on the true construction of the agreement, and also on the authority of Pederson v. Lotinga (28 L. T. Rep. 267), that the defendant was liable for breaches of the charter-party committed before the shipment of cargo by him, but that upon the completion of the loading he was absolved from all future liabilities.

DECLARATION, that the plaintiff and defendant agreed by charter-party that the plaintiff's ship called the Karen Elise, should proceed to Sunderland, and that the defendant should there load the ship in regular turn with a full and complete cargo of coals; that the ship being so loaded should proceed to Kiel, and there deliver the same to the freighter or his assigns on being paid certain freight, that neither merchant nor freighter were to be held accountable for delay or detention of the ship in loading or discharging occasioned by frosts, floods, strikes of workmen, or other cause beyond their control, "and that the said charter-party being concluded by the defendant on behalf of another person resident abroad, all liability of the defendant should cease as soon as he had shipped the said cargo."

Averment of performance of condition precedent not prevented by the excepted causes.

Breach, that the defendant wholly neglected to load the said ship, and delayed the ship nineteen days in proceeding on her voyage to Kiel, whereby the plaintiff was put to great expense, &c.,

Plea: (3) That the said charter was in fact concluded by the defendant on behalf of another party resident abroad, and that the defendant before this suit shipped the agreed cargo under the said charter-party, whereupon and whereby, according to the terms of the charter-party, all liability of the defendant ceased.

Demurrer, on the ground that the clause of the charter-party relied on in the plea did not apply to liabilities accruing prior to or during shipment of cargo, but that it applied to liabilities accruing subsequently to the said shipment.

Holker, Q.C. (Lewers with him) in support of the demurrer.—The clause pleaded only applies to a cause of action accruing after the shipment of cargo. Why should the owner of the vessel insert a provision freeing the agents in this country from all liability, without deriving any equivalent advantage from so doing? If a lien had been given to the shipowner, his release of the agent would be reasonable enough: and there are cases in which the charterer has, by such a clause, been held to be relieved from all liability, antecedent and subsequent. In Pederson v. Lotinga (28 L. T. Rep. 267), there was a clause very similar to that now under discussion in a charter between the shipowner and the agent for an unnamed principal. It ran thus: "The charter-party being concluded by N. S. Lotinga on behalf of another party, it is agreed that all liability of the former shall cease as soon as he has shipped the cargo, the owners and masters agreeing to rest solely on their lien on the cargo for freight and demurrage," and an action having been brought for demurrage at the port of loading in the Tyne against the agent, the Court of Queen's Bench held that the clause meant only that he should incur no further liability after he had fully loaded the vessel, and that he was not absolved from the liability which attached to him for demurrage previously incurred. The learned judges who decided that case thought that the lien given for demurrage afforded good ground for supposing that the parties meant the charterer to be relieved from liability. And Pederson v. Lotinga, is recognised as an authority in Ogelsby v. Yglesias (31 L. T. Rep. 234; E. B. & E. 930). No doubt Bannister v. Breslau (2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 490; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 418; L. Rep. 2 C. P. 497) will be cited for the defendant. There an absolute lien on the cargo was given which the captain was bound to exercise. It would be too much to argue that because a lien is given the liability is discharged, but the fact of the lien being given is an element of consideration. The intention of the parties here could not have been to relieve the agent from all liability simply because he was an agent. In Gray v. Carr (ante, p. 115; 25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 215; L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 522), Brett, J., said (ante, p. 120), "With all respect to the judges who decided Bannister v. Breslau (sup.), I think that their interpretation of the charter-party was too severe. The case was decided on demurrer. The judges relied much on the lien given in respect of demurrage which they assumed was for delay at the port of lading. But if by other terms of the charter-party than those which were before the court, demurrage was stipulated for in respect of delay in unloading at the port of discharge, the chief ground on which they based their interpretation would be cut away." And Bramwell, B., after giving his opinion on the construction of the charter-party seemed to doubt the case of Bannister v. Breslau, saying however, "But it is to be observed that every case such as that where no general principle of law is involved, but only the meaning of careless and slovenly documents, must depend on its own particular words:" (ante, p. 124.) Decided cases have not certainly much application, but of those nearly in point Pederson v. Lotinga is most like the present, save that this is a stronger case. The whole question turns on the meaning of the clause on which the plea is founded.

Gainsford Bruce (Watkin Williams with him), contra.—The contracting parties could not have used wider words to protect the charterer from all liability. [BLACKBURN, J.—The clause in Pederson v. Lotinga (sup.) is the same as the one before us, down to the words "shall cease;" but the following words make an important addition.]—Which distinguishes that case from the present. In that case the demurrage was payable and accrued due "day by day," and it therefore was held that it could not have been the intention of the parties to divest themselves of a right of action already accrued by reason of an event happening after. Here there is no such clause. But first, apart from decisions, the intention of the parties was not to exclude the liability of the agent; if they had wished to do so they would have used express words. [COCKBURN, C. J.—The agent says, "I make myself liable as to that part of the contract which is to be performed in England, but will protect myself as to responsibilities accruing after the vessel has departed."] There would probably be a lien on the ship abroad given by foreign law for all claims. [COCKBURN, C. J.—For claims there arising possibly but not for matters in this country.] In The Patria (ante, p. 71; L. Rep. 3 Ad. & E. 448), is set out a portion of the German mercantile code, fifth book, of which Art 583, translated into English, is as follows: "When the voyage has been commenced . . . the charterer can only withdraw from the agreement, and demand the unloading of the goods, on paying the full freight as well as all other claims of the shipowner. . . . In case of such unloading, the charterer shall not only pay the additional expenses thereby incurred, but also indemnify the shipowner for the loss caused by the delay." There is no difficulty in construing this stipulation if the natural meaning be put upon the words. "Cease" certainly applies to what might have happened before the shipment, and possibly, though not perhaps presumably, to what might occur afterwards. [COCKBURN, C. J.—"Liability sometimes means "obligation," and sometimes anything to which one may be subject, for not fulfilling an obligation."] "All liability shall cease" means breaches of obligation already incurred. [LUSH, J.—Then, there is no equivalent for that.] The consideration for it is the qualified personal responsibility of the agent, who says, as it were, to the shipowner, "I will only sign on the terms that as soon as a cargo is shipped I will be under no liability at all;" and the shipowner, accepting that condition, gets a substantial guarantee in the cargo that the foreign principal is a responsible person. [LUSH, J.—The cargo is not liable for delay before it is shipped.] But when it is shipped the owner of the vessel is practically safe. The Court of Common Pleas have distinctly decided that words such as those in question relieve the charterer from all liability: Bannister v. Breslau (sup.). The clause on which that decision was given ran thus: "The charterer's liability on this charter to cease when the cargo is shipped, provided the same is worth the freight on arrival at the port of discharge; the captain having an absolute lien on it for freight, dead freight, and demurrage, which he, or owner, shall be bound to exercise." [BLACKBURN, J.—The charterer's liability is to cease; not the agent's]. Yes; and so that is still stronger provision, of course. BLACKBURN, J.—It is easier to limit the cesser of the liability of the agent, as here, than to provide for the complete dissolution of the charterer's liability.] Delivering his judgment upon the last cited case, Byles, J., says, "This charter-party certainly does not contain so express a stipulation, protecting the charterers from liability as to matters arising before the shipping of the cargo as is found in Oglesby v. Yglesias (sup.) and Milvain v. Perez (1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 32; 3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 736; 3 E. & E. 495). But those cases show that the giving a lien on the cargo, and discharging the charterer from all responsibility in respect of the goods, is not unusual." In Oglesby v. Yglesias (sup.) there was no provision giving the shipowner a lien for demurrage, yet the agent for the freighter was held to be freed from liability by a similar clause. [BLACKBURN, J.—But it contained express words that the liability should cease "in every respect, and as to all matters and things as well before as after the shipping of the . . . cargo"—and the only question here is whether the present clause means the same as if those words were expressed in it.] "Liability, as well before as after," cannot mean more than "all liability." [BLACKBURN, J.—But on the other hand "all liability" may mean something less.] There is nothing "absurd or repugnant" to sense in such a stipulation as this on the part of the agent: see per Crompton, J. in Oglesby v. Yglesias (sup.) The cause of action here was not vested. The learned judges who decided Pederson v. Lotinga (sup.) seem to have thought that it would be inconsistent with the charter party to construe it, as if the parties agreed that the shipowner might sue for demurrage day by day, and at the same time, that the agent's liability should cease. Stress is laid on the provision that demurrage was to be payable de die in diem. Gray v. Carr (sup.) does not apply. [LUSH, J.—This point was not raised there. BLACKBURN, J.—It was however assumed, and I think correctly, that the Court of Common Pleas, in Bannister v. Breslau, must have thought the lien for demurrage extended so as to cover everything, and upon that this question did arise indirectly.] Why should a narrower meaning be given to the words "all liability shall cease" than they naturally bear? The cases show there is nothing unreasonable in holding that where such a phrase is used, the agent is thereby relieved from all personal responsibility, and it is reasonable that he should be so. The shipowner has a cargo, and may have a lien in a foreign port upon it. He would deem himself to be safe as soon as he had a valuable cargo on board his vessel, and would not hesitate to undertake all responsibility.

Holker, Q.C., in reply.—Pederson v. Lotinga (sup.) is a conclusive authority in the plaintiff's favour, and the court, in deciding it, go further than they are now asked to do, for there was a clause giving a lien, and here there is none.

COCKBURN, C.J.—We need not trouble you to proceed, for I think this case comes clearly within the principle of the decision in Pederson v. Lotinga (sup.), which case is much nearer in kind to the present than either of the others referred to, and is, in my opinion binding on us. Here is a contract entered into between the plaintiff, a shipowner, and the agent, for a foreign principal, whereby the vessel of the plaintiff is chartered by the defendant, who engages to load a cargo of coals, to be conveyed to Kiel with certain stipulations as to freight, demurrage, &c. The action is brought by reason of delay which occurred in loading this cargo. The defendant, who is one of the contracting parties engaged to load this cargo, and for the failure in loading according to the condition of the contract, he would, as principal, be liable; but the charter contains a clause which, after stating that he is acting for a foreign principal, provides, that after the cargo has been loaded, the liability of the defendant shall cease. Now what construction, independently of the authorities, ought to be put on such a stipulation? The language is ambiguous. It may be that he shall be entirely exonerated, both as to past breaches of contract, and for future possible breaches, as soon as cargo was loaded; or it may be that, whereas he would have been liable for breaches of contract prior to the loading, as soon as the cargo was on board the shipowner should look to the principal at Kiel with respect to all things done touching the completion of the contract, and not to the defendant. Which is the more probable of the two? The shipowner would know little or nothing of the parties abroad, although, as soon as the cargo was loaded, he would know them to be persons of substance, that is to say, possessing valuable property on board his vessel, but he would, nevertheless, be always under considerable difficulty in proving his case against persons in a foreign country in respect of delay occasioned to his ship while here, and would be obliged to sue them in a foreign court unless under some state of circumstances through which he could sue in England. Of course then the shipowner would much prefer having a person in this country instead of one in foreign parts or within the jurisdiction only of a foreign court. But I can quite understand, on the other hand, the agent contracting for a foreign principal, saying that he, the agent, was ready to enter into a liability as far as concerned the vessel up to the termination of the loading, but that he would refuse to become liable for what might, or might not, be done at the other side of the sea. And that, according to my view, is the true construction to put on the language used in the present charter-party, looking at the surrounding circumstances, and the relative position of the parties. But it is not necessary to decide this case on principle merely, seeing that there is a case which is a direct authority, viz., Pederson v. Lotinga (sup.), which is strictly in point, and is stronger than the present case, for there was an express stipulation, and the reason for absolving the defendant from all liability was that the shipowner engaged to look to the cargo for any claim for demurrage, as well as for freight. The words creating that stipulation do not occur in the charter now before us, and therefore the present case is more strongly in favour of the plaintiff; consequently I think our judgment ought to be for the plaintiff on principle, and at least on authority.

BLACKBURN, J.—I have also come to the conclusion that our judgment should be for the plaintiff. At one time I had some little doubt, but I have brought my mind to a tolerably clear determination. The first thing to be recognized is that in a charter-party, as in every other contract, if an agent chooses to make himself a contracting party, the other party to the agreement has two different remedies; he may sue the agent, and have recourse to his, the agent's, personal liability; or he may sue the principal, though the agent be a contracting party. Of course he cannot get judgment against both; but he has two resources, one against the principal, whether known or not known at the time of the agreement, and also against the agent. Moreover, any remedy acquired by stipulation over the goods or freight, will equally be available in either case. Now, that being the state of things, it may well be, and would not be unreasonable, for the agent to say, "I prefer that you should rely on my principal, and I am not liable for anything occurring abroad," and it would be equally reasonable for the master of the ship to say, "When I have a cargo I do not care, for I shall have my lien for the freight against your principal, who, being the owner of a cargo, is probably a sufficient man, and I will be content to let you free." If they choose to agree to that, they may, and there is nothing improbable or unlikely in supposing them to do so. Now, certainly, expressions have been used in some of the cases which caused the doubt in my mind, and have given rise to the part of the argument to-day upon the question of reservation of lien. Whether there was a lien for demurrage or not in the present case I do not know, but there is none mentioned in the declaration, and the words of the clause pleaded are "that the said charter-party, being concluded by the defendant, on behalf of another party resident abroad, all liability of the defendant should cease as soon as he had shipped the said cargo." Now that means that the defendant, as agent, contracts with the shipowner to load a cargo, but adds a condition subsequent that as soon as he has shipped a cargo under the contract, which, up to that time was binding on himself, his liability shall cease ab initio. If that is the true construction of the agreement then the defendant is wrong, and the plaintiff right. Such a contract may certainly be made. In Oglesby v. Yglesias, and Milvain v. Perez (sup.), it was quite clear that such was the language used, and a condition was made that on the shipment of the cargo all liability should cease. Whether or no the shipowner would act prudently in taking such a contract would be a matter for him alone to consider. I think we must interpret this charter without regard to whether the vessel were British or foreign; but, inasmuch as the plaintiff's name is Christoffersen, and the ship is called the Klaren Eliss, and bound for Kiel, I should come to the conclusion that she was a German ship, taking a cargo to Germany in all probability owned by a foreign principal in Germany, and that the German captain would think he might trust him well enough. We must however, take the words to be the same

whether it was a British, or German, or Italian vessel. Then there would be a difficulty in saying whether, in the words "all liability of the defendant should cease," there might not be a condition subsequent that his liability should cease ab initio on the shipment of cargo, and that the shipowners should trust to their lien; I should have had doubt on that, but then the authorities remove it, and declare that the mere saying that the liability shall cease means "from that moment," not, as was expressly stipulated in Oglesby v. Yglesias and Milvain v. Perez, ab initio. The first of the cases in which this point arose was that cited from the LAW TIMES Reports (Pederson v. Lotinga (sup.)), in which there was an express contract, giving liens, I presume, though it is not stated in the case, and then this clause, viz., "The charter-party being concluded by N. S. Lotinga on behalf of another party, it is agreed that all liability of the former shall cease as soon as he has shipped the cargo." . . . Then follows "the owner and masters agreeing to rest solely on their lien on the cargo for freight and demurrage." That shows that the parties were thinking of the lien on the cargo, and were not caring that the liability of the undisclosed principal should remain. A question was raised as to the meaning of that clause, and the judges of the Queen's Bench all said that the lien for demurrage was for demurrage occurring subsequent to the cargo being put on board—the demurrage accruing de die in diem, and not for demurrage prior to the shipment of the cargo. But if the lien had been in general terms for demurrage it would apply to home and foreign demurrage alike. I understand the reasoning of the court therefore to be that, inasmuch as a vested liability was incurred by the agent, although there might have been a condition subsequent ending that, it was not to be inferred from the terms used that all liability should cease. Then came the decision of Bannister v. Breslauwer (sup.), a somewhat different case from this, as that was not a case of an agent seeking to defend himself in an action brought against him in his personal capacity, but was an action brought against the charterers, who stipulated that "The charterer's liability on this charter to cease when the cargo is shipped, provided the same is worth the freight on arrival at the port of discharge; the captain having an absolute lien on it for freight, dead freight, and demurrage which he or the owner shall be bound to exercise." Now the reasoning of the court in that case, as I understand it and as seemingly from the judgment in Gray v. Carr (sup.), my brothers, Willes, Channell, and Brett understood it, was, that the charterers stipulated that they should be free if the shipowner got a cargo of sufficient value, because the other contracting party had bargained that the shipowner should rely on his absolute lien for dead freight and demurrage which the owner should be bound to exercise. The case of Gray v. Carr (sup.) becomes material in this respect, viz., as the ingenuity of counsel pointed out, that "demurrage" might be damages for detention beyond the demurrage days, analogous to demurrage proper, and that the decision of Bannister v. Breslauwer (sup.) could not be supported unless the words there used would give a lien for such damages. But my brothers Brett and Channell both meet that argument, the one by saying that if the Court of Common Pleas in there holding that the charterers' responsibility for demurrage did cease, treated mere unliquidated damages for detention of the ship as demurrage, they were wrong; the other by more cautiously saying that if they did so the decision was some what doubtful. But I think that the Court of Common Pleas show, from their judgment, that there was a stipulation that, if a cargo was shipped, the shipowners should give up all liability of the charterers, and depend on the lien they were bound to exercise. Now, in the present case, there is no such clause giving a lien at all, and I think that the prior case of Pederson v. Lotinga proves that the words here used are not enough to relieve the defendant from all liability; and I have less regret in coming to this conclusion because I am strongly impressed with the fact that when parties mean to get rid of liability they should take care to use clear and unmistakable language, and should put into their agreement words as clear as those in the case of Oglesby v. Yglesias (sup.).

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. I own the case appears to me a very plain one, and I do not feel any difficulty in ascertaining the meaning of the parties, although the clause in question is susceptible of two interpretations. The words "All liability of the defendant shall cease as soon as he has shipped the cargo," may be interpreted to mean that in that event he shall be no longer responsible for any breach, past or future, or may mean simply that he will be no longer a contracting party, and therefore no longer liable. In which of the two senses did the parties contract? To answer that question we must look at the context. By the charter, the defendant bound himself to provide a cargo so that it should be loaded in regular turn, and also to pay the freight of that cargo at the port of discharge. Now he did not provide a cargo so that the ship could be loaded in regular turn, and this action is for detaining the ship nineteen days unnecessarily. The defendant, however, supplied the coals eventually, and says: "I, having at last shipped a cargo, am relieved from further liability." If there had been a provision in the charter-party giving the shipowner an advantage equivalent to that given to the defendant, that would be a reason why he should absolve him altogether. But there is no such provision whatever giving him a remedy against the cargo. He cannot have it by law, and the contract does not give it him, and I cannot suppose that, however long the ship might be detained before the cargo was put on board, the clause would relieve him from any liability, because that would leave the shipowner without any remedy at all except against a foreign merchant who is not even named and whose name is unknown. I think, therefore, the more probable conclusion is that the parties intended that after the cargo was on board the bargain was at an end as far as the defendant was concerned, and he could incur no further responsibility, and that such is the true construction of the clause in question.

DENOON v. THE HOME AND COLONIAL ASSURANCE COMPANY (LIMITED).

Policy of insurance—Passage money of coolies—Partial loss—Freight.

Action on a policy of insurance upon freight on a voyage from Calcutta to the Mauritius. The policy was upon "chartered freight valued at 7000l. at and from Sydney to Calcutta and London." Defendant underwrote the policy for 1000l. On arrival of the ship at Calcutta the charterers stopped payment, and the ship conveyed a cargo consisting of coolies and rice to the Mauritius. Plaintiff got the policy altered, and the interest in freight to be valued at 2000l., the sum insured by the underwriter being the same. Plaintiff did not inform the underwriters of his intention to convey the coolies. The ship took coolies and rice to the Mauritius; the freight of the rice being valued at 1412l. The vessel was wrecked near the Mauritius and several coolies drowned, the rice being totally lost. The plaintiff claimed as on a total loss, the passage money of the coolies not being "freight" within the policy. The defendants insisted that the passage of the coolies was "freight" insured by the policy, and that they were liable to a proportionate part of the sum assured against:

Held, that the passage money of the coolies was not freight within the policy:

Held also, that the policy as applicable to a partial cargo was an open policy for one half the loss of freight not in any case exceeding 1000l., and that as 1412l., the freight of the rice, was lost, the underwriters were liable for one half the value of the freight of the rice, viz., 706l.

THIS is an action brought to recover 1000l. and interest, as payable under a policy of insurance dated the 13th March 1865, and effected by the plaintiff with the defendants on freight valued at 2000l., under the circumstances hereinafter mentioned.

The defendants paid into court the sum of 440l. 1s., and stated that this sum was sufficient to satisfy the plaintiff's claim. The plaintiff replied that such sum was not sufficient.

The case came on for trial before the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas at the sittings in London after Michaelmas Term 1868, when a verdict was taken by consent for the plaintiff for the amount claimed in the declaration, and 40s. costs of suit, subject to the opinion of the court upon the following case:

1. On the 1st Dec. 1863 Mr. Frederick Bassil, the then owner of a ship called the James Nasmyth, afterwards the Sandringham, entered into a charter party with Messrs. Halliday, Fox, and Co., of London, whereby it was agreed that the said ship, which was then on a voyage to Sydney, should proceed from Sydney to Calcutta, and there load a cargo for Liverpool or London, at an agreed rate of freight.

2. On or about the 2nd April 1864 Mr. William Berry became the owner of the said ship Sandringham, and the said Mr. Bassil assigned to him all his interest in the above-mentioned charter-party.

3. On the 5th April 1864 Mr. Berry, having become the owner of the said ship Sandringham, as before mentioned, mortgaged her to the plaintiff, and also assigned to him all and singular the freights, passage moneys, earnings and gains, profits, sums of money, benefits, and advantages whatsoever, made, earned, and gotten, and to be made, earned, and gotten, and to become due and payable by or by means, or for or on account of the said ship Sandringham, and certain other ships, or any of them, and all and every existing and future charter-parties, contracts, and agreements in relation thereto.

4. On the 5th Oct. 1864 the plaintiff effected with the defendants a policy of assurance, whereby the sum of 1000l. was insured upon chartered freight valued at 7000l. in the said ship Sandringham. A copy of this policy is annexed hereto, and is to form part of this case.

5. The master of the said ship having proceeded on his voyage according to the terms of the above-mentioned charter-party, arrived at Calcutta in Nov. 1864, and was there informed, as the fact was, that Messrs. Halliday, Fox and Co., the charterers, had stopped payment, and that their agents at Calcutta refused to have anything to do with the said charter-party, or the lading of the said ship, or otherwise employing her.

6. The master of the said ship thereupon tendered for the conveyance of coolies and rice from Calcutta to Mauritius, and on the 25th Jan. 1865 the said ship sailed from Calcutta for Mauritius, having on board 360 coolies and the necessary provisions for their use on the voyage, and 12,000 bags of rice. The passage money of the coolies amounted to 1944l. and was payable on their arrival at Mauritius. The bill of lading freight of the rice amounted to 1412l.

7. On the 13th March 1865 the plaintiff, through his broker, Mr. George Tyser, procured the defendants to alter the said policy and subscribe in the margin thereof the note or memorandum, a copy of which will be found in the margin of the copy of the said policy annexed to the case, and is to form part of this case.

8. While the said ship was proceeding on her voyage from Calcutta towards Mauritius she was stranded when near the latter point, and the ship herself and the whole of the said 12,000 bags of rice, and the freight payable in respect thereof, were totally lost by perils insured against.

9. The said 360 coolies, with the exception of twelve, were all saved, and arrived at their destination, and the passage money of those who so arrived, amounting to 1879l. 4s., was duly received by the agents of the ship at Mauritius. Twelve of the coolies were drowned, and the passage money payable in respect of them totally lost by perils insured against.

10. The following evidence as to the circumstances under which the said policy was altered, and the said note or memorandum subscribed in the margin thereof was given on behalf of the plaintiff before the arbitrator, by whom this case is stated. It was objected to, and admitted, subject to the opinion of the court as to its admissibility. On the 8th Jan. 1865 the master of the said ship, who is since dead, wrote to Mr. Berry the following letter:

Ship Sandringham, Calcutta,
Jan. 8, 1865.

Wm. Berry, Esq.,

Sir,—I have been looking for a letter from you, giving me some information as to my getting money for disbursements here. On my arrival Mr. McKennon (Halliday and Fox), the charterer's agents here, refused to act for them after their failure. They gave two letters to that effect. I have been looking for something to do to pay the Sydney bottomry (£1032) and pay my way home, but without success, till the 5th inst., when I tendered for coolies to the Mauritius, at 54 rupees per adult, and 12,000 bags, at 1s. 2d. per bag, to embark on the 20th. The ship is to be surveyed to-morrow. This truly has been a most unfortunate voyage; it seems nothing but failure throughout the piece. I am sorry you are among the rest, but as to Colefellows, I am not surprised. How some people live and make the show they do is more than I could ever understand. If I am spared to reach the Mauritius safely, I shall come up to Galle, and see if I can find something for home. I am truly unhappy without money, and the owners nothing to do, and a most expensive crew. It is anything but cheering, as I hear the ships are seized as soon as they come home. Write to me to Point de Galle to say if I can do anything for your benefit by remaining out here, if employed, till you get your affairs settled.

P. S. Write us as to further funds, I shall require all I have to clear the ship at Mauritius.—I remain, your obedient servant, JOHN RIPPIN.

On the 21st Feb. 1865 this letter was received in London by the assignees of Mr. Berry, who had become bankrupt, and shortly afterwards Mr. Berry showed a copy of it to the plaintiff.

11. On the 10th March 1865 the plaintiff learned that the ship had sailed from Calcutta for Mauritius, and on the 12th March 1865 a meeting took place between the plaintiff, Mr. Berry, and Mr. Tyser, the plaintiff's broker. At that meeting the plaintiff called Mr. Berry's attention to the master's said letter, and informed him that he considered himself to have no interest in the passage-money of coolies mentioned in the master's letter, and did not wish to insure it, and requested him to compute what cargo the ship could carry over and above accommodation and provision for the coolies. Mr. Berry calculated accordingly, and said that the ship would earn in freight of rice to the value of 2000*l.* over and above accommodation and provisions for the coolies. The plaintiff thereupon instructed Mr. Tyser to insure the freight for 2000*l.*, and it was in pursuance of this instruction that Mr. Tyser procured this policy to be altered, and the rates or memorandum to be subscribed in the margin thereof, as above-mentioned.

12. If the evidence stated in the last two paragraphs was properly admitted, then it was found that that evidence is true in fact, and that the plaintiff and his broker, in procuring the said policy to be so altered, and the note or memorandum to be subscribed in the margin thereof, as before mentioned, intended to insure only the freight of rice, and to exclude from the insurance the passage-money of coolies; but this intention was not communicated to the defendants.

13. Evidence was given on the part of the plaintiff, before the arbitrator, by whom this case is stated, intended to show that by the usage and custom of insurance business the word "freight" simply when used in a policy of insurance is confined to freight of merchandise, and does not include passage-money of coolies. Evidence to the contrary was given on the other side, and no such usage or custom was proved. But the most frequent course when passage money of coolies is intended to be insured is to describe it as freight of coolies, or passage money of coolies, or by some other term distinguishing it from freight of merchandise. The premium for insuring such passage money upon a voyage from Calcutta to Mauritius is generally less than the premium for insuring freight of merchandise upon the same voyage.

14. A copy of the pleadings in the action is annexed hereto, and is to form part of this case.

15. The court is to be at liberty to draw inferences of fact.

The question for the opinion of the court is, Whether the plaintiff is entitled to recover in this action any, and if any what, sum of money beyond that paid into court?

If the court is of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to recover any further sum beyond that paid into court, judgment is to be entered for the plaintiff for such further sum as the court shall be of opinion he is entitled to recover, and costs of suit. If the court is of opinion that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover any further sum beyond that paid into court, judgment is to be entered for the defendant, with costs of defence.

The policy which formed part of the appendix to the case was in the usual form, but in the margin it contained the following stipulation:—"It is hereby declared and agreed that the within voyage is from Sydney to Calcutta, and thence to Mauritius instead of as before stated, and to return 20s. per cent. for safe arrival there.

"The within interest is now declared to be on freight valued at 2000*l.*, 13th March 1865."

Charles Pollock, Q.C. for the plaintiff.—The question in this case is, what is covered by the policy of insurance? The policy was a valued one for 1000*l.*, or freight worth 2000*l.* The defendants have paid 440*l.* into court, but say as to the remainder that, inasmuch as we had some coolies on board who were saved, that they only pay on an average loss. If "freight" includes passage money of coolies the defendant is entitled to judgment. "Freight" has a well-known meaning, being that paid for the carriage of the cargo from one port to another: (Lex Mercatorum.) When passage-money is paid for coolies, it is usual and is the custom to mention it: (Lewis v. Marshall, 7 M. & G. 729.) Maclachlan in a note to his work on Merchant Shipping, page 380, says, "According to Kent (3 Com. 219) there is an American use of the term freight which includes passage-money; such a use of the term is not English, and I do not think it enters even into the jargon of trade in this country." The arbitrator found that the frequent course is to describe the sum insured when conveying coolies as the passage-money of coolies, and the insurance money charged is less than that charged on freight, but freight must be taken in its primâ facie meaning. Emerigon, cap. 1, s. 5, says since the contract of insurance is the result of the stipulations of the contracting parties, it naturally belongs in this view to the class of actions stricti juris. The words of the policy are to be weighed with scrupulousness—"Verba assecurationis potissime ponderanda sunt"—nor can we depart from the rule of the policies' intention. "In materiâ assecurationis principaliter in hærendum est verbis apoc: assecurationis; quinimo hæc pro lege habenda sunt, nec ab his recedere debemus, quia contrarium voluntas melius haberi non potest." Pothier lays it down as a certain rule that the insurers are not held by the risks, when there has been a variance from the contents of the policy, unless it has been by their own consent or the result of necessity. Lord Ellenborough, in the course of a very elaborate judgment in Forbes v. Aspinall (13 East, 323), said, "To recover in any case upon a policy on freight it is incumbent on the assured to prove that, unless some of the perils insured against had intervened to prevent it, some freight would have been earned, and where the policy is open, the actual amount of freight which would have been so earned, limits the extent of the underwriter's liability." He referred to Merchant Shipping Act (17 & 18 Vict. c. 10).

Sir George Honyman Q.C. (J. C. Mathew with him).—The defendants are called upon to pay 2000*l.*, which the freight is valued at, because one half of the cargo is lost. If the rice had been saved and the coolies lost, the plaintiffs would have contended that the passage money was covered by the policy. The subject matter of the risk is both coolies and rice. Freight is a benefit derived from the carriage of goods, and differs from passage money, which is generally paid in advance. In Hall v. Janson (4 El. & Bl. 500), Lord Campbell says that money paid in advance is not freight, but there seems no reason why the money advanced may not be insured as freight, although not properly freight, and though it may be the price of the hire of the ship. In Kent's Commentaries vol. 3 part 5, Lect. 47 sect. 7, it is said that "freight in the common acceptance of the term means the price for the actual transportation of goods by sea from one place to another; but in its more extensive sense it is applied to all rewards or compensation paid for the use of ships, including the transportation of passengers." (Giles v. The Cynthia, 1 Peters Adm. Rep. 206.) "If cattle or slaves are sent abroad payment is to be made for those living as well as those dead: (Roccus.) Lord Tenterden in Abbot on Shipping, cap. 17, p. 233, says: "For slaves, also, who are considered as a species of merchandise, their proprietors contributed according to their value, although this dreadful traffic had not extended so far as to authorise the casting these unhappy persons into the sea, and making their loss an object of contribution." He cited passages from:

C. Pollock, Q.C. in reply.—This was a goods premium, and not a premium for carrying coolies, there being a difference in price for passage money premium.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 30.—The judgment of the court was delivered by WILLES, J.—This is an action upon a policy of insurance upon freight on a voyage from Calcutta to the Mauritius. As originally filled in, the policy was upon "chartered freight, valued at 7000*l.*, at and from Sydney to Calcutta and London." It was underwritten by the defendants for 1000*l.* The chartered freight mentioned in the policy was upon a charter party for the carriage of goods only upon a voyage from Sydney to Calcutta and London. Upon the arrival of the ship at Calcutta the voyage to England was abandoned because of the charterers having stopped payment, and the ship took coolies and rice to the Mauritius. To meet this change of voyage, and with the intention of insuring the freight of cargo only to the extent which the vessel would carry in the space not occupied by the coolies and their provisions, which intention the plaintiff communicated to his agent, but not to the underwriters, the plaintiff valued the freight or goods only at 2000*l.*, and procured an alteration of the policy, in effect a new policy, as follows:—"It is hereby declared and agreed that the within policy is from Sydney to Calcutta and Mauritius instead of as before stated and to return 20*s.* per cent. for safe arrival there; London, 13th March 1865. The within interest is now declared to be on freight, value at 2000*l.*; 13th March 1865." The sum underwritten by the defendant remained unaltered—1000*l.*, or half of the new valuation, the assured being (so far as this underwriter was concerned) his own insurer for the other half. The vessel proceeded upon the voyage to Calcutta with 360 coolies and their necessary provisions, for which the passage money of 54 rupees each coolie, payable on arrival at the Mauritius, amounted to 1944*l.* and 12,000 bags of rice, the bill of lading freight of which was 1412*l.* Near her destination the vessel was wrecked, and the rice and the freight thereof was wholly lost; 342 of the coolies were saved and reached their destination, and their passage money 1879*l.* 4*s.* was paid. The question is for what amount the underwriters are answerable? The plaintiff insists that the passage money of the coolies ought to be thrown out of consideration as not being freight within the policy, and that he is entitled to recover as for a total loss of the freight insured to 1000*l.* The defendants on the other hand insist that the passage money of the coolies is to be considered as freight insured by the policy, and that the full freight being thus taken at, coolies, 1944*l.*; rice, 1412*l.*; total 3356*l.*, they are bound to pay only the proportions of the partial freight lost; coolies 64*l.* 16*s.*; rice, 1412*l.*; total 1476*l.* 16*s.*, which will be produced by the following sum in the rule of three, viz., 3356 : 1000 :: 1476*l.* 17*s.* : 439*l.* and to cover this claim they have paid a sufficient amount 441*l.* 2*s.* into court, assuming passage money to be freight within the policy and included in the valuation. This mode of calculation was not disputed by the plaintiff and requires no further comment than a reference to the discussion in the second volume of Mr. Willard Phillips' highly valuable work on Insurance, s. 1203, where the subject is discussed. The first and chief question therefore, is whether the passage money of the coolies was freight, within the policy, and to be taken in favour of the underwriter, as included in his valuation. Freight according to the dictionaries, includes first the cargo, second the actual transport from one place to another, third the hire of the ship or part of it, or the transport of goods therein. It may, by extension, include the passengers, or even passage money, as for instance, upon a question arising upon the now abandoned maxim that "freight was the mother of wages," or upon a question of sale, or capture, or abandonment, because the passage money is, equally with the freight of goods, an incident or accessory of the ship. Accordingly Chancellor Kent, 3 Kent's Com. 219, states that "freight in the common acceptance of the term means the price for the actual transportation of goods by sea from one place to another, but in its more extensive sense it is applied to all rewards or compensation paid for the use of ship, including the transportation of passengers," and he refers to the case of Giles v. The Cynthia (1 Peter's Adm. Rep. 206), in which the question arose upon a claim to wages. And in Malloy v. Backer (5 East, 321), where the question was whether passage money or an apportioned part of it became payable in the case of capture on the way, Lawrence, J. said: "Foreign writers considered passage money the same as freight," and Lord Ellenborough added, "except for the purpose of hire it seems the same thing." It must be added to this exception that in respect of general average, not only the passengers, but also their provisions, are exempt from the general rule of contributions, not being regarded as merchandise: (Brown v. Stapleton, 4 Bing. 119.) Upon a question of constructive total loss, passage money payable at the port of discharge, so far as it is available, if at all, must be taken into account, as well as freight of goods, but so must general average, according to Kemp v. Haldiday (2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 271, 370; L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 520; 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 762), and this consideration is, therefore, inconclusive. It is certain that freight is not ordinarily used in marine policies in its most extensive sense as including cargo, and the question in each case must be what, under the circumstances and in the context of the particular policy, it was intended to express. Until late periods when, in consequence of increased facility of communication, the passage across the ocean of large bodies of free men, as emigrants or cultivators, had become so common and important, there was little reason for insuring passage money, especially as it has been, and is in so many cases, paid beforehand, so as not to be at the shipowners' risk. The only case in which the question could arise is one like the present, where the earning of passage money depended upon the arrival of the vessel. Accordingly, it is not surprising that no trace of passage money being treated as freight for the purpose of insurance is to be found in the reported cases, nor that the policy in common use should be framed with minute reference to circumstances affecting the ship and cargo, and in terms, at least, should make no reference to passengers. The case of Flint v. Flemming (1 B. & Ad. 45), was relied on as showing that freight has been extended so as to include the value of the vessel to the owner in carrying his own goods; but this only shows that the freight insured by the policy is not limited to money due upon a contract with a liability of a third party. It decided that "freight" sufficiently represents the interest of the shipowner in the carriage of his own goods, and includes the value of their carriage. That case does not decide that the value to the owner of his being carried as a passenger in his own vessel, or of others being so carried, is freight within an ordinary policy, and it does not, therefore, touch the question whether freight in this policy of insurance includes passage-money. Evidence was given on both sides to prove a customary use of the word "freight" in the particular trade; but this evidence was ineffectual to make out a binding usage either way. It appears, however, that the most frequent course is to describe passage-money by a distinguishing term, and not merely as freight, and it was proved that, for insurance purposes, there is a distinction between freight and passage-money, because the premium for the latter upon a voyage from Calcutta to the Mauritius is generally less than that for the former, so that as a matter of business the not mentioning the subject upon the occasion of the insurance would indicate that the freight was probably intended to refer to the merchandise. This distinction is further supported in the case of the present policy by more than one consideration. First, the policy was originally upon "chartered freight," and the charter was for goods only. The change to freight in general would, therefore, prima facie seem to indicate freight of the same kind upon the voyage substituted "instead of as before stated." Secondly, the policy not only generally provides as to ordinary policies for ship and goods as the subject matter under consideration, but provides in specific terms applicable to the freight of merchandise only for the time at which the risk is to commence. These terms are as follows:—"The insurance aforesaid shall commence upon the freight and goods as merchandise aforesaid from the loading of the said goods or merchandise, on board the said ship or vessel at as above, and continue until the said goods or merchandise be discharged and safely landed." This clause obviously has a specific effect upon the freight, because it excludes the application of those cases in which the risk on freight has been held to attach upon the goods being ready but not being loaded; it therefore helps strongly to indicate the meaning of freight in this policy. In this state of facts, and upon the construction of the policy in question we adopt the view of the assured, that the freight of merchandise only was assured according to his intention declared to his agent, and upon which the latter valuation actually took place; which intention, however, not being communicated to the underwriters, could not of itself have altered the construction of the policy, and whatever effect it may have led to, shows a mistake on both sides as to the subject matter of the valuation. The communications, however, of the assured with Barry, and with his agent, coupled with the fact of the large number of coolies on board, and the necessary provisions for their sustenance, are clear to show that the cargo of rice put on board was not a full or substantially a full, cargo, and that there was no total loss of freight understood as freight of merchandise to sustain the claim to recover absolutely the 1000*l.* upon the valuation. A valuation of freight refers prima facie to the freight of a full cargo, or the charter of the entire ship, and in this case there was nothing to show the underwriters that the valuation was of less than such full freight. If there had been no passengers, or so few as not substantially to interfere with the amount of the cargo, and the ship had been fully loaded with as much rice as would fetch a sum equal to the total of freight and passage money upon the voyage in question, viz., 3356*l.* and the whole had been lost, the 1000*l.* only would have been payable. If only so many bags of such as would produce a freight of 1476*l.* 16*s.*, the defendants mode of calculation would have been applicable, and they would have been liable to the loss multiplied by 1000, and divided by 3356, equal 439 and a fraction. The diminution of the liability for a partial loss under a valued policy, where the actual value of the total exceeds the valuation, is, however, an artificial rule which can only be applied where there is a total with which to establish the proportion. Where no such total is given the calculation must proceed as upon an open policy, except in respect of the maximum for which the underwriter is answerable, and the portion for which he insures. In the present case, assuming that there is a valuation by agreement of the same subject matter, there is no total loss of full freight of merchandise with which to institute the proportion. It is not stated, and we must conclude could not be stated with certainty, what the total freight would have been had the vessel been filled up with cargo, or that there might not possibly have been a full cargo, the freight of which would not have exceeded 2000*l.* Therefore, whilst on the one hand we decide in favour of the assured that the passage money of the coolies was not freight within the policy so as to make up a full freight upon which to work out this proportion; on the other hand we must hold in favour of the underwriter that the policy, as applicable to a partial cargo, was an open policy for half the loss of freight not exceeding in any case 1000*l.*, and as only 1412*l.* freight was lost the underwriters are liable for 706*l.*, for which sum, less the 441*l.* 2*s.* paid into court, viz., 264*l.* 18*s.*, the plaintiff is entitled to judgment. In arriving at this conclusion as to the operation of the policy, in case of a total loss of a partial cargo, we act in accordance with the decision in Forbes v. Aspinall (13 East, 323) as to freight, and that of this court in Tobin v. Harford (1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 297: 13 C. B., N. S., 79; affirmed 2 Mar. Law Cas O. S. 34; 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 817; 17 C. B., N. S., 528), as to goods.

SECOND DIVISION OF THE COURT.

(Before MARTIN, BRAMWELL, and PIGOTT, BB.)

BRADFORD AND ANOTHER v. WILLIAMS.

Charter-party—Condition precedent—Refusal by one party to continue performance—Partial breach—Breach going to root of the contract—Distinction between—Action for breach.

*The plaintiffs declared on a charter-party dated 26th May 1871, whereby it was mutually agreed between the plaintiffs and the defendant, that the defendant's ship Ark should sail to B. and there load from the factors of the plaintiffs a full and complete cargo of coals, and proceed therewith to H. or D. and deliver the same on being paid freight at the rate of 2*s.* 9*d.* per ton in cash, on unloading and right delivery. The vessel to be loaded and discharged with all possible dispatch; to load with G. or C. till end of Sept. at captain's option, and after Sept. with O. That it was understood that the vessel should continue at the above mentioned rate and term until the end of March 1872. Averment of fulfilment of all conditions, &c., and that the plaintiffs were always ready and willing, &c. Yet the said ship did not, after the commencement of Sept. 1871, continue to perform all or any of the matters so agreed as aforesaid, and the defendant would not permit the said ship, after the commencement of Sept. 1871, to load with G.*

or C. during the said month of Sept., or with O. during the months following the said month of Sept.

Plea, that at the commencement of the said month of Sept. and before any breach of the said agreement or charter-party by the defendant the captain of the said vessel exercised his option by electing to load from G., of all which the defendant had notice and although all things, &c., happened, &c., yet the plaintiffs were not ready and willing to cause the said vessel to be loaded in the said month of Sept. or at any subsequent time with G. according to the terms of the said charter-party, but absolutely refused so to do, in violation of the said terms, and gave notice to the defendant thereof, whereupon the defendant, as he lawfully might, refused to perform further the said charter-party.

Hold on demurrer (by Martin, Bramwell, and Pigott, BB.), that the plea was good and an answer to the action. The contract was one for the continuous employment of the defendant's vessel, and the plaintiffs, by refusing to load the vessel with G. during the month of Sept., broke the continuity of the employment and justified the defendant in rescinding and refusing any longer to perform the contract. The breach of the plaintiff's was not a partial one for which damages in an action for breach would have been a compensation to the defendant, but went to the root and whole consideration of the contract.

THIS was an action by the plaintiffs, the merchants, against the defendant, the shipowner, for breaking a charter-party, and the plaintiffs, by their declaration, charged that by a certain agreement or charter-party made between the plaintiffs and the defendant, and dated at Bridgewater the 26th May 1871, it was mutually agreed between Capt. Gower, of the ship Ark, of 120 tons burthen, then at Highbridge, and the plaintiffs, that the said ship, being tight, &c., should, with all convenient speed, sail and proceed to a loading berth at Bullo, and there load from the factors of the said affreighters a full and complete cargo of coals, to be brought and taken from alongside, at merchant's risk and expense, and, being so loaded, should therewith proceed to Highbridge or Dunball, and deliver the same on being paid freight at and after the rate of 2*s.* 9*d.* per ton of 20*wt.* in full of all port charges, as customary (the act of God, &c., (the customary risks), always excepted). The freight to be paid on unloading and right delivery of the cargo, in cash. To be loaded and discharged with all possible dispatch, working days to be allowed the said merchants (if not sooner dispatched) for loading the ship as above. Vessel to load with Gollop and Company, or Goold and Company, till end of September, at captain's option; after September, all Goold and Company. The ship to have an absolute lien on cargo for freight, dead freight, and demurrage. The ship to be reported and cleared at the port of lading by Geo. B. Sully, or his agent. Penalty for non-performance of this agreement, estimated amount of freight. It is understood that the vessel shall continue at this rate, and term until end of March 1872, and to discharge equally at Dunball and Highbridge. This is subject to Mr. William's approval. (Signed) Richard Williams, 3rd June 1871. By authority of Messrs. Bradford and Sons, George B. Sully as agent.

Averments, that the Mr. Williams, whose name is written at the foot of the said agreement, is the defendant, and the said Messrs. Bradford and Sons are the plaintiffs, and the defendant was the owner of the said ship whereof the said Captain Gower was master, and that the said ship, pursuant to the said charter, subsequently to the date thereof, and until the month of Sept. 1871, proceeded to the said loading berth at Bullo, and there loaded a complete cargo of coals, and proceeded therewith to Highbridge or Dunball, and there delivered the same, and during the said period subsequent to the date of the said agreement and charter, and until the said month of Sept. 1871, made divers successive voyages under the said charter. That all things were done necessary to entitle the plaintiffs to a continuance of a performance by the said ship of the matters and things agreed to be done thereunder, and upon the terms therein mentioned, and that the plaintiffs were always ready and willing to do and perform all things by the said charter required to be done by them, of all which premises the defendant had notice. Nevertheless the said ship did not, during the said period from the commencement of Sept. 1871, or at any time afterwards, continue to perform all or any of the said matters and things so agreed as aforesaid, &c., and the defendant would not, although requested so to do, permit the ship, after the commencement of Sept. 1871, or at any time other than during the period subsequent to the date of the said charter, and until the said month of Sept. 1871, as aforesaid, to proceed to the said loading berth at Bullo, or as near thereto as he might safely get, and there load from the factors of the said affreighters (the said Gollop and Co., and the said Goid and Co.), during the said month of September, and the said Goid and Co., during the months following the said month of September, a full and complete cargo of coals, whereby, &c. (allegation of damage by loss of the profits which would have accrued to the plaintiffs from a continuance of a performance of the charter by the defendant after the commencement of Sept. 1871, and by their having to freight other ships, and buy other coals at an additional expense, &c., &c.)

The defendant pleaded several pleas, as follows: First, that the said agreement or charter-party was not made between the plaintiffs and the defendant as alleged; secondly, that the defendant did not commit the said breaches, or any of them, as alleged; thirdly, exoneration and discharge of the defendant from further performance of the charter before any breach thereof; fourthly, that after the commencement, and long before the end of the said month of September, to wit, on or before the 7th day of the said month, and before any breach of the said agreement or charter-party by the said defendant, the said vessel was at Bullo aforesaid, ready to load according to the terms of the said agreement or charter-party and the said Capt. Gower exercised his said option by electing to load from the said Gollop and Co., of all which premises the plaintiffs had notice; and although all things happened and all times elapsed necessary to entitle, and nothing happened to disentitle, the defendant to have the said vessel loaded in the said month of September by the plaintiffs from or with the said Gollop and Co., yet the plaintiffs were not ready and willing to cause the said vessel to be loaded in the said month of September, or at any subsequent time, from or with the said Gollop and Co., according to the terms of the said agreement or charter-party, but, on the contrary, absolutely refused so to do, in violation of the terms of the said agreement or charter-party, and gave notice to the defendant thereof; whereupon the defendant, as he lawfully might, refused further to perform the said agreement or charter-party, which are the breaches in the declaration alleged; fifthly, denying that the plaintiffs or the said factors of the affreighters were ready and willing to ship coals on board the said vessel according to the terms of the said charter as alleged.

Replication and demurrer.

Issue taken and joined upon all the above pleas.

Demurrer and joinder in demurrer to the fourth plea, a ground of demurrer being that it disclosed no sufficient grounds whereby the defendant was justified in refusing further to perform the agreement or charter-party.

The cause went down for trial before the argument of the demurrer; and at the trial before Bramwell, B., at the last spring assizes at Bristol, the following appeared in evidence to be the facts of the case:—

The plaintiffs were coal merchants, and the defendant was the registered owner of a coasting vessel called the Ark, of 120 tons burden. In May 1871 an agreement was come to between the plaintiffs, through their broker and agent, Mr. G. B. Sully, and one Levison Gower, the captain of the Ark, subject to the approval of the defendant, the owner of the said vessel, that the Ark should be exclusively employed in carrying coals for the plaintiffs, from Bullo Pill (a loading place in the river Severn, below Gloucester, where the Forest of Dean coal is shipped) to Highbridge or Dunball (places of discharge in the port of Bridgwater) from the date of the agreement to the end of March 1872, at a freight of 2s. 9d. per ton, and the charter-party set out in the declaration was accordingly prepared, and was then signed by the defendant and by Mr. Sully on the part of the plaintiffs. Between the 22th May and the 2nd Sept., the vessel made seven voyages for the plaintiffs, the captain exercising his right of electing to load, and loading, in every instance, with Gollop and Co.

The plaintiffs, it appeared, had contracts with both Gollop and Co., and Goid and Co. for a supply of a certain quantity of coal from each of those firms during the summer months, and in consequence of the defendant's captain having exercised his option of always loading with Gollop and Co., the plaintiffs had taken their stipulated quantity of coal to the end of August from Gollop and Co. some time in the month of July, whereupon, on the 17th July, they wrote to Gollop and Co. requesting them to assist the plaintiffs in making up their (the plaintiffs') quantity with Goid and Co., by discharging any vessels loading with Gollop and Co. that month, and informing the captain that the plaintiffs' quantity agreed on with them to that time was already taken. Before, however, that letter arrived, the defendant's captain had taken a cargo on board from Gollop and Co., but the letter was shown by Gollop and Co. to the captain, and he was informed by them that they could not load him again. In consequence of that the captain wrote as follows to the plaintiffs:

Bullo Pill, July 22nd, 1871.

Messrs. Bradford and Sons.

Gentlemen,—I find that you have stopped Gollop and Co. sending any more coal for a time, and Goid is having scarce any down. There is vessels that have been in them with Goold for the last fortnight still empty. I shan't attempt to stem there. Unless you reply Monday I shall consider the charter broken, and I shall fix elsewhere.—Yours, &c., L. GOWER.

The plaintiffs replied to that letter as follows :

24th July 1871.

Captain L. Gower.

Dear Sir,—Yours 22nd to hand. We think you will find Messrs. Goold and Co. can load you either best or rubbles (one or the other) quite as speedily as Gollop and Co. In fact, Messrs. Gollop and Co., by their own error, have been sending us far too much coal, and we think you have not brought a single cargo from Messrs. Goold. However, if you cannot get best or rubble of Messrs. Goold and Co., then, of course, according to your charter, you can load with Gallop and Co., and this letter to Gollop, when they see it, will explain, and they will load you. Please note, if you can get either best or rubble of Goold and Co., and in face of this load with Gollop and Co., we shall not pay for it.—Yours, &c., BRADFORD AND SONS.

By the same post (24th July) the plaintiffs wrote also to Gollop and Co. complaining of their having declined positively to load in a case "where the charter had been signed optional to you or Goold," and adding, as it is, if you must you must, and we can pay you proportionately for each month the quantity as agreed on, and in this way meet the difficulty. Only load where charter gives option, and in such cases help us all you can."

Matters went on through the month of August, the defendant's vessel loading two cargoes for the plaintiffs at Gollop and Co.'s in that month, the last of which, which was loaded on the 25th Aug., was discharged at Dunball or Highbridge on the 2nd Sept. On the 7th Sept. the defendant's vessel was again at Bullo, and on that same day the captain wrote to Gollop and Co. asking when he could have a cargo of coal for the plaintiffs, to which on the 8th Sept. Gollop and Co. replied, "that they would load him as soon as they received instructions from the plaintiffs, but that they could not load the defendant's vessel, or any other, without the plaintiffs' authority." The captain also wrote on the 7th Sept. to the plaintiffs as follows :

Bullo Pill, 7th Sept. 1871.

Messrs. Bradford and Sons.

The Ark arrived here on Saturday night, and found Goold's stem over three weeks. Gollop and Co. have no orders for me to load. What must we do? I have engaged for a short voyage; will you please inform me by return?—Yours, &c., L. GOWER.

To which the plaintiffs replied, on the 9th Sept. as follows :

In reply to your favour of 7th inst., our contract with Gollop and Co., is expired, and we must now ask you for the future to load with Goold and Co.

The captain, however, declined to load with Goold and Co., on the ground that their stem being so heavy his vessel would be kept waiting for probably two or three weeks before her turn came, and the defendants thereupon elected to rescind the contract, and to treat the matter as at an end. The plaintiffs thereupon brought this action against the defendant for breach of contract in not continuing to perform his contract by loading with Gollop and Co., or Goold and Co., during the month of September, or with Goold and Co. after that month; and at the trial on proof of the above facts, and the correspondence being put in, a verdict for the plaintiffs for 40*l.* was taken, and leave was reserved for the defendant to move to set that verdict aside, and to enter a verdict for the defendant, on the ground that the defendant's third fourth and fifth pleas were proved at the trial, and were an answer to the action, and a rule to that effect having been obtained by H. T. Cole, Q.C. on the part of the defendant, the same now came on to be argued together with the demurrer to the fourth plea.

Points for argument on the part of the plaintiffs on the demurrer:—First, that the fourth plea does not allege any matters which constitute such a breach of contract or non-performance on the part of the plaintiffs as would entitle the defendant to refuse to perform the agreement or charter-party; secondly, that the plaintiffs not being ready, and willing to cause the said vessel to be loaded in the month of September from or with the said Gollop and Co., and their refusal so to do, was not a ground entitling the defendant to refuse further to perform the agreement or charter-party; thirdly, that the plaintiffs not being ready and willing to cause the vessel to be loaded at any time subsequent to the month of September from or with Gollop and Co., and their refusal so to do was not in violation of the terms of the agreement or charter-party, or a ground entitling the defendant to refuse further to perform it.

The defendant's points for argument:—First, that the fourth plea is good in substance; secondly, that it discloses sufficient grounds to justify the defendant in not further performing the terms of the said charter-party, and in treating the said charter-party as at an end; thirdly, that having regard to the nature of the charter-party, and of the voyage to be made thereunder, as in the declaration alleged, the defendant was justified in refusing to continue performance of the term of the said charter-party under the circumstances stated in the fourth plea.

Lopes, Q.C., and A. R. Poole now appeared to show cause against the rule, and to argue the demurrer on the part of the plaintiffs.—The plea is bad, and no answer to the plaintiffs' action. The defendant was not entitled, under the circumstances disclosed by the evidence, and in the correspondence to rescind the contract and treat the charter-party as at an end, nor does the plea show such a breach or non-performance by the plaintiff as entitled the defendant to refuse further to perform his agreement. The principles laid down in the cases of Weaver v. Sessions (6 Taunt. 154), and Franklin v. Miller (4 A. & E. 599), apply distinctly to the present case, and show that a partial failure of performance of their contract by the plaintiffs did not authorise the rescission by the defendant of the whole contract. In Weaver v. Sessions the defendant, the lessee of a public house, covenanted to buy of his lessor (the plaintiff) all the malt he should brew into ale or beer, or otherwise use therein, and the lessor covenanted to deliver on request sufficient good, well dried, marketable malt, and at a marketable price, for the use of the defendant in the demised premises, but, if the plaintiff should neglect to do so, the defendant might purchase of any others; and in an action for buying malt of others, a plea that the plaintiff for a long time would not deliver good malt, but delivered divers quantities of bad malt, whereby the defendant was in danger of losing his custom, and therefore bought malt of others, was held ill on demurrer, and Gibbs, C.J., in his judgment there said: "If we were to hold this plea sufficient we must decide that a single breach by the lessor would release the covenant of the lessee. The defendant may sue to recover compensation in damages." Franklin v. Miller (ubi sup.) shows that the defendant here had no right to treat the contract as rescinded; (See per Lord Denman, C.J., at p. 604, of 4 A. & E., and the reference by his Lordship to the judgment of Patteson, J., in Withers v. Reynolds, 2 B. & Ad. 882.) In Franklin v. Miller, too, Littledale, J., said: "It is a clearly recognised principle that if there is only a partial failure of performance by a party to a contract, for which there may be a compensation in damages, the contract is not put an end to." That, it is submitted, is very strongly in favour of the plaintiffs here. The rule was well laid down by Lord Mansfield, C.J., in the case of Boone v. Eyre (2 W. Bl. 1314, n. t; 1 H. Bl. 254-273, n. a) where his Lordship said, "The distinction is very clear; where mutual covenants go to the whole of the consideration on both sides, they are mutual conditions, the one precedent to the other; but where they go only to a part, and where a breach may be paid for in damages, then the defendant has a remedy on his covenant, and shall not plead it as a condition precedent." And Littledale, J., in Franklin v. Miller (ubi sup.), after referring to that rule of Lord Mansfield's, goes on, "So here it cannot be contended that, if in any one week the sovereign had been unpaid, that default would put an end to a contract made up of several stipulations, some of which have been executed." The present contract answers that description precisely. See also per Lord Ellenborough, C. J., in Richie v. Atkinson (10 East, 295). If carefully looked at, the case of Withers v. Reynolds (2 B. & Ad. 882; 1 L. J., N. S., 30, K. B.), is in the plaintiffs' favour. There the defendant agreed to supply the plaintiff with straw, delivered at his premises at the rate of three loads a fortnight, during a specified time, and the plaintiff agreed to pay 35s. for each load so delivered during the said period. After several loads had been delivered, the plaintiff refused to pay for the last load delivered, and claimed to keep one payment always in arrear; and it was held that, as each load was to be paid for on delivery, the defendant, on the plaintiffs' refusal so to pay, was not bound to send any more straw. The ground of the decision in that case was, that there was an entire alteration of the contract from a cash to a credit transaction, and so the contract was frustrated. That clearly appears from the judgments of Lord Denman, C. J., and Parke and Taunton, J. J.; and Patteson, J., there took a distinction, which is in the present plaintiffs' favour. He said, "If the plaintiff had merely failed to pay for any particular load, that, of itself, might not have been an excuse to the defendant for delivering no more straw; but the plaintiff expressly refuses to pay for the loads as delivered, the defendant, therefore, is not liable for ceasing to perform his part of the contract." [PIGOTT, B.—Is not that the case here? The defendant was entitled to the freight at the end of each voyage.] If at the end of any particular voyage we had declined to pay for that voyage, that would not have amounted to or justified a rescission; but if we had said we will keep a month's freight in hand, that would have come within Patteson, J.'s distinction. Unless what the plaintiffs did frustrated the entire contract, and went to the whole consideration, the defendant is not justified in considering the contract at an end and in rescinding it (Tarrabochia v. Hickie and another, 1 H. & N. 183; 26 L. J. 26 Ex.), and see particularly the judgments of Pollock, C. B. and Martin, C. in that case. But here, what the plaintiffs did amounted at most to a partial breach only on their part. The default to load was temporary only, and similar to a default in payment of freight on some one particular occasion. It was a subsidiary and subordinate consideration, and was such a breach as was matter for an action for compensation in damages. Again, a contract cannot be rescinded by one party for the default of the other, unless both can be put in statu quo as before the contract, which cannot be done here. Hunt v. Silk 5 East, 449. In Seeger v. Duthie and others, in error from the Common Pleas (1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 3; 3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 478; 8 C. B., N. S. 72; 30 L. J. 65, C. P.), Martin, B., in his judgment, refers to the rule laid down in Abbott on Shipping (at p. 266, 8th edit.; ib. p. 221, 11th edit.) for determining whether a particular covenant by one party was a condition precedent, or an independent covenant, and quoted from the judgment of Tindal, C. J., in the case of Stavers v. Curling and another, (3 Bing. N. C. 355; 3 Scott 740; 6 L. J., N. S., 41, C. P.), that "the rule has been established by a long series of decisions in modern times, that the question whether covenants are to be held dependent or independent of each other, is to be determined by the intention and meaning of the parties, as it appears on the instrument, and by the application of common sense to each particular case; to which intention, when once discovered, all technical forms of expression must give way." [MARTIN, B.—That is exactly my view now. The meaning and substance of this contract is that the defendant was to be employed continuously in earning freight with his small vessel at 2s. 9d. per ton. It is like the case of Hoare v. Rennie (5 H. & N. 19; 29 L. J. 73, Ex.; 1 L. T. Rep. N. S. 104), and the defendant was entitled to consider the contract at an end.] Your Lordship leaves out this, that he might have brought an action. [MARTIN, B.—But the damages he would have recovered would not be equivalent to the continuous earning of freight.] Jonassohn and another v. Young (4 B. & S. 296; 32 L. J. 385, Q. B.) is a strong case in the plaintiffs' favour. The defendant here must go the length put by Crompton, J. in his judgment in that case. The fact of detaining the vessel an unreasonable time was no ground of the decision there:

Campbell v. Jones, 6 T. R. 57;

Havelock v. Geddes, 10 East, 555-62, were also cited.

Then with respect to the rule for entering the verdict, it is submitted that the defendant's pleas were not proved. There was no refusal by the plaintiffs. Gollop & Co. merely said, "We cannot load you now, we must wait for authority." The defendant was asked to load with Goold and Co., and not with Gollop, but the plaintiffs never refused, nor were they unready. The defendant should have gone to Gollop and Co., and remained there. [PIGOTT, B., refers to the plaintiffs' letter telling the captain that their contract with Gollop and Co. was at an end.] The evidence showed no exoneration and discharge of the defendant's further performance of his contract.

H. T. Cole, Q. C. and A. Charles, for the defendant, contra, were not called on.

MARTIN, B.—I can say no more than I have already expressed in the course of the argument. The rules regarding the construction of covenants whether they are or not to be construed as conditions precedent, and as to what covenants are independent and what dependent, and whether the covenant goes only to a part of the consideration on both sides, so that a breach of it may be paid for in damages, and an action be maintained for a breach on the part of the defendant, without averring performance in the declaration, or whether the mutual covenants go to the whole consideration, and so are mutual conditions rendering an averment of performance necessary, will be found fully and lucidly laid down in Mr. Serjt. William's note (4) to the case of Portage v. Cole (1 Wms. Saund. 319), at pp. 320a to 320c., and also by Lord Tenterden, in his book, Abbott on the Law of Merchant Ships and Seamen, where his lordship, at page 226, 8th edit., and page 221, 11th edit., says—"Whether or not a particular covenant by one party be a condition precedent, the breach of which will dispense with the performance of the contract by the other, or an independent covenant, is a question to be determined according to the fair intention of the parties, to be collected from the language employed by them: (Havelock v. Geddes, 10 East, 555). An intention to make any particular stipulation precedent should be clearly and unambiguously expressed. The general rule (in the words of Lord Ellenborough in Davidson v. Gwynne, 12 East, 381) is that, unless the non-performance alleged in breach of the contract goes to the whole root and consideration of it, the covenant broken is not to be considered a condition precedent, but as a distinct covenant, for the breach of which the party may be compensated in damages." Now, contracts are so infinite in number, and in their subject and character, are couched in such an endless variety of terms, and embrace such a multitude of ever-differing circumstances, that it is quite impossible to argue from one contract to another. It is, I think, unfortunate and unapt to apply the phrase "condition precedent" to the case of a contract like that in the present case. We must look at the contract itself, its substance and nature, and, as was said by Lindal, C.J., in Stavers v. Curling (ubi sup.), apply our common sense to its construction, in order to ascertain the intention and meaning of the parties, as appearing on the face of the instrument itself. Now, it is plain that the object of the defendant here, and the intention of both parties, was that the defendant's vessel should be continuously employed from the date of the contract in May 1871 to the month of March in the following year, in earning freight upon the coals loaded for the plaintiffs at the rate of 2s. 9d. per ton, to be paid in cash on the unloading and delivery of each cargo. The cessation or interruption of the performance of the contract on the plaintiffs' part for a month would therefore, to a person in the defendant's small way, be a very serious matter, and one for which any damages he might recover in an action for breach of covenant would not be a compensation equivalent to the regular and continuous payments of freight. When, therefore, he found that he would not be able to get his vessel loaded during the whole of the month of September, he was entitled to elect to put an end to the contract altogether. The case of Hoare and others v. Rennie and another (5 H. & N. 19; 29 L. J. 73, Ex; 1 L. T. Rep. N. S. 104) is an authority in favour of that view of the matter, and Withers v. Reynolds (2 B. & Ad. 882) is also in point to the same effect. On the authority of these cases, I think that this plea is a good plea. I was, I confess, at the outset rather disposed to agree with Mr. Lopes, but, on further consideration during the course of the argument, I have come to the conclusion that the plea is good, and furnishes an answer to the plaintiffs' action. The plea being good, it is only necessary to say that it was proved at the trial, and that, therefore, the defendant's rule to enter the verdict for him will be made absolute.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am of the same opinion, and, beyond saying that I think the plea demurred to is a good plea, I have very little to add. The parties here agree to a continuing contract, and then the plaintiffs, having contracted with the defendant that they would continually load him, declined for a whole month to load him at all. What then was the defendant to do under such a state of things, or what could he do other than that which he did? No man has a right to put another person, with whom he has entered into a contract of this kind, in such a position as the plaintiffs, by refusing to load his vessel during the month of Sept., placed this defendant here. The observations of Pollock, C.B., in delivering his judgment in the case of Hoare v. Rennie (ubi sup.) are in point, and very applicable to the present case, as showing that it really does not turn upon any question of condition precedent, but that the question really is whether, where a man who is bound to perform his part of a contract does not do so, he can enforce the contract against the other party. Suppose the plaintiffs in this case had said to the defendant, "We won't load you at all until January next," and the defendant had thereupon said, "Very well, then I must do the best I can, and get other employment for my vessel," would the plaintiffs in that case have been entitled to say, "No, you must not do that, you must wait, keeping your vessel idle, and you can bring your action against us to recover damages, as a compensation for the loss sustained by you in being unemployed during all those months"? Surely not. The defendant would have a right, on the plaintiffs' refusing to load him, to do the best he could with his ship during the interval, not only for his own benefit, but also in order to reduce the amount of damages payable by the plaintiffs; and if he might do so for the interval, he might go on for a longer time, until the expiration of the contract term in March, or longer. Suppose again, a charter entered into between a charterer and a shipowner for an outward and homeward voyage from London to Calcutta and back, and then the charterer says, "I will not load you for the outward voyage, but you shall be ready at Calcutta to take in a cargo for the homeward voyage," would the shipowner be liable, under such circumstances, to an action at the charterer's suit, because he did not sail out to Calcutta, and find himself there ready to perform the homeward part of the contract?—The conduct of the plaintiffs in the present case was such as to justify the defendant in saying to them, "You won't go on with your contract for a certain time, and so I am entitled to treat the whole matter as at an end, and to rescind the contract." On these grounds I think the judgment of the court on the demurrer should be in favour of the defendant, and I also agree that the rule should be made absolute.

PIGOTT, B.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the present case is not one of a partial breach of contract, but that, on the contrary, the breach of it on the part of the plaintiffs goes to the root and whole consideration of the agreement; and if that be so, then the defendant was entitled to throw it up altogether. In order to ascertain whether it does so go to the root of the matter, we must look at the nature and substance of the contract between the parties. Now, clearly, the defendant intended to have his ship employed constantly and continuously from May 1871 to March 1872, and that as my brother Martin has observed, was the contract between him and the plaintiffs; so that when the plaintiffs told him that they would not employ him during all September, he was entitled to consider the contract at an end, and to look about for other employment for his vessel. I do not think that an action for damages would have put him at all in the same position.

THE SECRET.

Collision between a vessel under way and a vessel incapable of moving—General allegation of negligence in plaintiff's petition—Inevitable accident.

The plaintiff by his petition alleged that the schooner Secret entered the Arklow harbour under full canvas, and ran into and sank the stern of the schooner Industry, which was then moored fast within the harbour.

The 17th article of the petition having alleged, in general terms, that the collision was altogether the fault of the Secret, and was caused by the recklessness, carelessness, and mismanagement of those on board of her, and not caused by anything done or left undone by those on board of the Industry, concluded with charging one specific act of negligence only, "that the said collision was further occasioned by the want of any sufficient look-out on board the Secret."

Seemle, that the established rule, which requires a plaintiff in a cause of damage to state with reasonable certainty the instances of neglect on which he intends to rely, and if he relies on a breach of a statutory rule of navigation, that he should specifically plead that the act done or not done was in violation of that particular rule, does not apply to a case where one vessel is under way and the other incapable of moving.

Where the petition states such facts on the part of the plaintiff, as if proved or admitted, would lead to the conclusion that the vessel charged with the collision was to blame, it is then rather for the defendant to show what has been done than for the plaintiff to show what might have been avoided.

Inevitable accident is where the collision could not have been prevented by proper care and seamanship in the particular circumstances of the case.

A defendant, in order to support a defence of inevitable accident, is bound to show that everything ordinary and usual was done which could and ought to have been done to avoid a collision.

THE facts and the arguments of counsel are fully stated in the judgment of the court.

Ebrington, Q.C. and Corrigan appeared for the plaintiff.

Todd, Q.C. and Boyd, were for the defendant.

TOWNSEND, J.—The plaintiffs in this case, Messrs. George Keon and James Tyrrell, of Arklow, owners of the schooner Industry, of Dublin, seek to recover damages, actual and consequential, amounting in all to the sum of 95*l.* 6*s.* for injury done to that vessel by the schooner Secret, of Dublin, John Byrne, master, in a collision which occurred on the 12th Jan. last in Arklow Harbour. Both those vessels had arrived on the previous night at Arklow Roads, each laden with a cargo, and anchored there to await daylight and the morning tide to enter the harbour. Two other similar vessels were in company. The harbour is merely a narrow inlet at the north of the River Avoca. On each side of the creek, which runs nearly east and west, a pier has been constructed, one to the northward, another to the southward, the river flowing between the piers, and producing a current outward, varying in strength according to the time of tide, and the quantity of water in the river. The flood deadens, but does not stop it; in winter, and during the floods in the river, the current always sets towards the sea. The distance between the pier heads, is about fifty yards, but the harbour widens a little within soon after the entrance has been passed. A bar crosses the entrance close to the pier heads; the channel between the piers is about a foot deeper on the south side of the mid line than it is towards the north pier. Close to the south pier there are about 11ft. or 12ft. of water at very high tide, there are from 10ft. to 10½ft., or thereabouts in the centre, and something about 9ft. or 9½ft. to the north pier at high-water springs. A sand and gravel bank has been formed along the south pier, extending about 14ft. from it, which prevents the small vessels which frequent the pier from lying exactly alongside the wall, but they may be loaded and discharged by a plank. It is not usual to discharge vessels at the place where the collision occurred, which is about 200 yards from the south pier head, unless in summer time, or when they cannot go further up. On the 12th Jan. before either of the colliding vessels had entered the harbour, a vessel called the Brothers was laying there, close by the place I have mentioned, or about 200 yards from the entrance, moored with her head up the stream, with a chain on each bow, and a rope on the port quarter, the port chain and rope being made fast to the south wall, the starboard chain to the north pier; but it lay on the bottom, there being no strain on it. The Brothers being light, drew but about seven feet, and therefore lay afloat, for all agree that there was a greater depth than that, at the time in question, near the central line; although there is a great discrepancy in the statements and estimates of the witnesses, and unfortunately the times, distances, and depths are almost all matter of estimation. We cannot, therefore, be surprised at the want of precision and accuracy remarkable in the case. It seems that after daylight, about 7.30 a.m. or possibly somewhat later, the Minnie entered the creek: it was then much more than half-flood, for, according to the Admiralty chart, it being two days after new moon it could not have been high water until ten o'clock, and Byrne, the master of the Secret says it was high water at the hour of 10.30. Mr. James Tyrrell made it about high water at half-past eight o'clock, when the Industry got in, but as the tide was high and certainly slack, he may have been mistaken. The Minnie got into some difficulty on the North Pier, but was extricated after a delay of about twenty minutes, and was warped up to a place something about 30 yards astern of the Brothers, but nearer to the pier. A hobbler boat which supplies local pilot boats, and occasional assistance to vessels coming into the place, then went to the Secret and the Industry, and placed a pilot on board each vessel—not a regular pilot, but a person of skill and local knowledge, and able to act in that capacity. This was, it seems, between half-past seven and eight o'clock, perhaps somewhat later; the water was quite smooth, the wind SSW., freshening, not, as alleged in the defendants' preliminary act, a strong gale, but a fresh sailing breeze, to which the schooners were well able to carry sail. The Secret had a main topmast stay sail. The plaintiff, Mr. James Tyrrell, himself a seafaring man, was placed at the Industry's helm. The tide was peculiarly high, although, as I have stated, it still wanted more than an hour of high water. The Industry crossed the bar before the Secret, which was still outside, but under way. The Industry passed close to the Minnie, and was run aground ahead of her between the south pier and the port quarter of the Brothers, carrying away at the same time the port stern-post of the Brothers, but doing no further damage, and, having struck the bank formed along the south pier, she lay not parallel to the pier, but, making an angle with it, her bow being 7ft. and her stern 13ft. or 14ft. distant from the wall. The broken ends of the stern-post were then bent together by the Industry's crew, and her rope passed from her own quarter to the wall about twenty or twenty-five minutes afterwards—less than that time according to some. The Secret came in under all her canvass but her fore stay-sail and gaff-top, and although her helm was ported when she had got inside the pier head, and although her anchor was let go when she got close to the Minnie, she, nevertheless, ran into the stern of the Industry, doing considerable damage. The case of the Secret, as set forth in her answer (7th article) is that on approaching the part of the river where the Brothers and the Industry were lying, it was unexpectedly found that the passage was completely obstructed by the said vessels; that though her approach must have been seen, nothing effective was done, either on board the Industry or the Brothers to remove the obstruction, or make a passage to the Secret. I may here observe that at the time the Industry was aground, the Brothers' crew were all absent; then the Industry came in, and although they returned soon after, it is not clear that they had done so before the arrival of the Secret. The eighth article of the Secret's answer asserts that immediately when those on board the Secret perceived that the passage was blocked, and that nothing was done to make a passage for her, and it became manifest that there was danger of a collision, everything was done that could or ought to have been done on board the Secret, to, if possible avoid, and at all events to lessen, the force of the collision; her anchor was let go, and her sails were as far as was practicable hauled down or lowered; but, notwithstanding, the Secret struck the Industry, doing her but trifling damage. The defendant's counsel have commented with some severity on the petition, and contended, that as it was not charged that the collision had been the result of carrying too much sail, or not having ported the Secret's helm, the carelessness and negligence to which it attributes the collision must be taken in conjunction with the only specific act of negligence charged, namely, not having a sufficient look-out. The seventeenth article of the petition, having alleged in general terms that the collision was altogether the fault of the Secret, and was caused by the recklessness, carelessness, and mismanagement of those on board of her, and was not caused or contributed to by anything done or left undone by those on board of the Industry, concludes thus: "And the said collision was further occasioned by the want of any sufficient look-out on board the Secret." And the case of Daniel v. The Metropolitan Railway Company (L. Rep. 3 C. P. 216; 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 815) has been referred to, and the judgment of Willes, J., has been relied on by the defendant's counsel, as showing that the plaintiff should have set forth what precaution the defendant's vessel should have taken. That was an action for negligence brought by a passenger against the railway company for an injury done to him by the fall of an iron girder, through the negligence of workmen employed by contractors who had undertaken to put it up. The girder had fallen on a train in which the plaintiff was travelling, and had caused the injury complained of. It was shown that the company had not placed any person to signal that train when the girder was being moved, which was a dangerous operation. A verdict was taken for the plaintiff, to be turned into a verdict for the defendants, or a nonsuit, if the court should be of opinion that there was not sufficient evidence of negligence on the part of the company, they not being liable for the negligence of the contractors. When the case came before the Court of Common Pleas, Willes, J., did indeed state his opinion that the plaintiff should not merely show that an accident had happened on the line, but should also show some reasonable probability that the accident had resulted from the want of some reasonable precaution which the defendants might or ought to have taken; and, he adds, "I go further, and say that the plaintiff should also show with reasonable certainty what particular precaution had been taken." But I think he expressed that opinion with regard to the facts then before him, for I find, he says (p. 225), that if he were a juryman he must say he thought there was reasonable evidence that the accident might, and probably would have been, avoided, if there had been a signalman. The Court of Common Pleas inferred that the company were guilty of negligence in not having taken any precautions. But the judgment was, I find, reversed on appeal to the Exchequer Chamber (p. 591), the court of appeal (which had power to draw inferences of fact), having come to the conclusion that the persons whose duty it was to take the precautions, were the contractors by whom the work was carried on. That being so, while I regard any expression of that able judge with the greatest deference and respect, I cannot regard the words he is reported to have used, plainly with reference to a particular action at common law, as conclusive authority that in this court the petition should be deemed insufficient. It is, doubtless, the established rule here that a plaintiff in a cause of damage can only recover secundum allegata. The plaintiff must also state with reasonable certainty the instances of neglect on which he intends to rely, and if he relies on a breach of any statutory rule of navigation, he should specifically plead that the act done or not done was in violation of that particular rule. But the present case is not one founded on any statutory rule. The petition alleges that the Industry had taken up her position in the port, was moored in a proper position, her sails lowered and furled; and that the Secret, under way, and entering the harbour, ran into and struck her. If this were proved the presumption would be that the Secret was to blame, the general law of navigation requiring that a vessel under way shall keep clear of one incapable of moving. No doubt the Secret might show, if the fact were so, that the collision was inevitable in the circumstances, but I think the Industry was not bound to state more precisely the mode in which it occurred. Lord Chelmsford, when delivering the judgment of the court of appeal in The East Lothian (Lush. p. 249), says that it is always quite sufficient for a party who complains of an injury to his vessel occasioned by the improper course of another, to describe that course without attempting to attribute it to any particular cause. If the petition state such facts on the part of the plaintiff as if proved or admitted would lead to the conclusion that the vessel charged with the collision was to blame, it is then rather for the defendant to show what has been done, than for the plaintiff to show it might have been avoided. No objection was taken to the petition, nor any particulars required: the answer, though it does not use the express terms "inevitable accident," clearly treats the case as one of inevitable necessity on the part of the Secret, and on that ground alone the learned counsel for the defendant have rested their defence. As to "inevitable accident" I cannot do better than adopt the language of that great authority on maritime cases, Dr. Lushington, whose opinions I have, I may say, been taught to revere, and whose sagacity and extensive knowledge in questions of this kind I see every day deeper reason to admire. He says in The Europa (14 Jur. 629), "Inevitable accident is where one vessel, doing a lawful act, without any intention of harm, and using proper precaution to prevent danger, unfortunately happens to run into another vessel." Adopting then, as I do, the definition of inevitable necessity given in The Europa—and I think the passage cited from Browne v. Slesbray, as given in Pritchard's Digest, p. 141, is quite reconcilable with it, but as the facts of the latter case are not stated, it would hardly be safe to rely on the language of a mere passage from the judgment—remembering then that, in law, inevitable accident is that which the exercise of ordinary care, caution, and maritime skill cannot prevent, I fully admit that it is sufficient if the caution used has been such as has been ordinary and usual in similar cases. But it is not enough to show that the accident could not be prevented at the moment it occurred; that would be merely to show that it could not be prevented when it had become inevitable. The question is, to use the words of Dr. Lushington in The Virgil (2 W. Rob. 207), could previous measures have been adopted to render the occurrence of it less probable? In proportion to the necessity for care and vigilance, should be the care and diligence employed. Now the place was well known to those on board both those vessels. John Byrne, the master of the Secret, tells us that before he crossed the bar he could see the masts, though not the hulls, of the vessels which had gone into the harbour before him. According to his calculation the current was running at the rate of a mile an hour. Mr. Tyrrell supposes it to have been running twice as fast. In either case there was a current to be considered, and I do not think it possible, nor do the assessors, that the estimate of time, a minute and a half, sworn to by the defendants' witnesses, or that occupied in running up from the pier end, is quite accurate. It seems to me that it must have been more than twice that time at least. That may not be very material, yet I cannot but observe that on every point of this case a controversy has arisen, and on matters of mere opinion it is difficult to say which opinion is the most reliable. The case has unhappily been greatly protracted by these disputes, that respecting the Brothers' position after the Industry had parted the stern post, and there is a mass of evidence which cannot help us to a decision, and a length of discussion about it I cannot help thinking likely to convey an impression unfavourable to the procedure in this court. But, however our opinion may incline on that question, the passage up the harbour was not perfectly clear. It could hardly have been deemed perfectly safe on that morning by anyone who knew the locality, for before the Secret went in at least three vessels had already occupied places in that narrow channel, and it is evident that their masts were to be seen there when the Secret attempted to pass the bar. Byrne, the master, says that when he got between the piers, and saw there was no safe passage, he put his helm to port. His object, therefore, was to go to the northward of the vessels. There is very great doubt on our minds whether the Brothers did in fact swing across the creek after her stern post had been carried away. Assuming that she did so, to some extent at least, we are by no means certain that there was not sufficient room and water to allow the Secret to pass to the northward of her. The Secret actually passed there, after the Brothers' quarter had been, according to the defendants' witnesses, warped eight or ten feet to the southward, at a time that there could be no appreciable difference in the depth, so far as regarded the tide. At all events, the bottom of the harbour at or near the mid channel was flat, composed of sand or gravel. There were no rocks or large stones, except at the foundation of the wall, and a vessel like the Secret would not have been injured by merely touching the ground in such a place. The master of the Secret now says he did not like to try the experiment. However, he ported his helm. The porting of the helm did not succeed; it was found when the Secret was about twice her own length from the pier that she did not answer the helm. An attempt was then made to lower her maingaff and ease the mainsheet, but it did not succeed, nor did the attempt to keep her away by holding the head sheets, to the port. Nothing more, it is said, could have been done, in the hurry and confusion, except to anchor, which they did when too late. But why was there hurry and confusion? It seems agreed on both sides that it is necessary to keep good way on a vessel crossing the bar, and therefore it is argued it was not improper to enter the place under a press of sail. If a press of sail was necessary, no doubt it was justifiable to carry it, but the necessity implied an obligation for greater caution as to the vessel. If as Byrne states to have been the case, he was going after crossing the bar six or six and a half miles an hour through the water, and four or five over ground, he must have known that he would not have had much time for deliberation, or preparation between crossing the bar and reaching the place where the masts, though not the hulls, of the other vessels, were to be seen. I have asked the assessors what, in their opinion as nautical men, and taking into consideration the place, the weather, and the circumstances, would have been the precautions which a seaman of ordinary skill acquainted with the harbour should have taken to enter it in safety to his own vessel, and without doing an injury to others. They tell me that he should have had his ropes clear, everything ready for shortening sail, his anchor clear and ready for letting go in an instant, and a boat and warp ready to be used if necessary. They think such precautions no more than should be expected from a person of mere ordinary skill. They are also of opinion that there was nothing to prevent the vessel from anchoring between the pier heads and the place where the collision occurred; they think she had both time and space to do so. If she had done so, or even if she had run on the bank astern of the Minnie and close to that vessel, as the Industry ran inside the Brothers, the collision would have been avoided. It was, therefore, not an inevitable accident. Inevitable accident is where the collision could not have been prevented by proper care and seamanship in the particular circumstances of the case. The defendant was bound in order to support a defence of inevitable accident to show that everything was done which could and ought to have been done with safety to the Secret to avoid a collision with the Industry. Much controversy has been raised respecting the place where the Industry was run aground, but it must be considered immaterial whether her berth was properly or improperly chosen. I apprehend that it was the bounden duty of the Secret to avoid any collision whatever. This is the doctrine of the maritime law; what particular measures should be taken depends altogether on the particular circumstances of the case. The assessors think that assuming the master of the Secret to have truly stated that the Brothers appeared to him to be lying across, he should instantly have shortened sail on coming between the pier heads, and have let go his anchor in time to prevent his reaching up so far as the Brothers until they had passed the pier head by two ships' length; the master of the Secret appears to have taken no steps whatever. The Secret appears to have been quite unprepared for any of the contingencies that might have been expected at the time and in the place. It is not for us to lay down what a vessel should do in the like circumstances, but it is the opinion of the gentlemen who have assisted me with their advice, that there was a practicable and safe course, that was not followed. They attribute the collision exclusively to the Secret not having shortened sail and let go her anchor at the time, or if she had not done so, having been inside the Minnie. I need not mention the third course, about which the evidence presents some difficulty. The question of proper seamanship and proper vigilance is altogether for their consideration. I have no difficulty in adopting their opinion, and I must therefore hold that this defence has not been upheld in proof, and I must pronounce for the damage, with the costs of suit.

THE LION (a).

Suit for necessaries—Injunction—“Until further order.”

Plaintiffs brought an action to recover the price of necessaries supplied during the year 1869 to the Lion, a vessel which at that time was the property of the North-West of Ireland Deep Fishery Company. Defendants, the official liquidators of said company, lodged in court a sum of 208l. 7s., in lieu of bail, and as security for claim and costs, and to abide the adjudication of this court. They then applied to the Court of Chancery (England), and obtained therefrom an injunction restraining the plaintiffs from prosecuting said action, “until further order.” And they now applied by motion to this court for an order that said sum of 208l. 7s. be paid to them.

Held, that inasmuch as the injunction was in force “until further order” only, the court would not make an order directing the payment of the said sum of 208l. 7s. to the said defendants.

THIS was a motion on behalf of the defendants, that the sum of 208l. 7s. lodged by them in lieu of bail as security for the amount of the plaintiff's claim, and of the costs to be incurred in this cause, be paid out to the defendants. The facts of the case are as follows:

The Lion is a steamship, and registered at the port of London; and at the time of the assumed cause of action was the property of the North West of Ireland Deep Sea Fishery Company (Limited), which was a company registered pursuant to the Companies Act 1862, and had its offices in London.

The suit was brought to recover the price of necessaries supplied to the Lion during the second half of the year 1869.

There were four other similar suits instituted against four other ships of the same company, in each of which lodgments had been made in lieu of bail, and it was arranged that the decision in this case should rule the rest.

The defendants, in their answer, alleged inter alia, that by a resolution of said company, made on the 10th Dec. 1869, and duly confirmed, the company is being wound-up voluntarily in England pursuant to the provisions of the statutes in that behalf, and that the defendants were appointed the liquidators of the said company by an order of the said company in a general meeting.

The warrant under which the ship was arrested, issued on the 8th Feb. 1870. The ship was arrested on the 9th. The defendants appeared absolutely on the 11th. The money now sought to be drawn out was lodged, and the vessel released on the 12th. The petition was filed on the 15th Feb., the answer on the 3rd March, and the conclusion on the 10th March.

On the 9th March an injunction was obtained from the Court of Chancery in England restraining the plaintiffs from prosecuting these suits until further order.

Seeds, LL.D., in support of the motion, relied on the impossibility of prosecuting these suits in the face of the injunction, and urged the hardship of keeping these moneys locked up, and contended that the resolution of the 10th Dec. was equivalent to an act of bankruptcy, whereby all debts were levelled and referred to the June 4.—TOWNSEND, J.—This was a motion by the defendants to draw out of court the sum of 208l. 7s., which had been lodged by them in lieu of bail, and as security for costs in an action in rem brought by the firm of McChrystal and Elliott, to recover the price of a quantity of coals supplied by them at Londonderry to the steam tug Lion of London, during the month of July 1869, and the remaining months of that year. Four other suits of the same nature as this were instituted simultaneously with the present by the same firm against four other steamers. The Lion and three of the other vessels were the property of the North-West of Ireland Deep Sea Fishery Company (Limited) which had its office in London; and those four vessels were registered in the names of David Henry Hone and John Vanner. The other vessel, the Roseneath, was not the property of the company, but was chartered by them. These several causes were instituted on the 8th Feb. last; on the following day (9th Feb.) the vessels were arrested, and on the 11th Feb. the defendants, Messrs. Hart, Vanner, Anthony, and Cummins appeared absolutely. On the 12th Feb. the defendants lodged in court in each action the sum claimed therein with 100l. as security for costs, and thereupon the several vessels were released. The property proceeded against is now represented by the sums so lodged. The petitions were filed on the 15th Feb. On the 3rd March the defendants filed their answers; and on the 9th March consents were entered into in all the causes except this of the Lion and of the Roseneath, that proceedings should be stayed until a decision should be had in this cause, the event of which the others were to abide. No further proceedings had been had except filing the conclusions and delivering the printed pleadings in this cause and the Roseneath. It appears that, pursuant to a resolution of the company passed on the 15th Dec. 1869, and confirmed on the 30th Dec, the company is now being wound-up voluntarily pursuant to the Companies Act 1862. The defendants were appointed liquidators of the company.

There is no doubt that in the month of January last the plaintiffs were apprised of the winding-up. It is not asserted that they obtained any leave of the Court of Chancery in England to commence this or any of the other causes I have alluded to. They did so on their own responsibility, and the defendants appeared in the ordinary way. But on the 9th March the defendants obtained an order of the Court of Chancery in England restraining the plaintiffs from prosecuting these actions, or commencing or prosecuting any further action in respect of these vessels until the further order of that court. The order was served on the plaintiffs at Londonderry on the evening of the 10th March, but was not communicated to their proctor until the 12th. In the meanwhile the conclusion had been already filed as I have mentioned. The defendants now seek to withdraw the money they had thus lodged, and rely on the provisions of the Companies Act, ss. 87 and 147. But it appears from the affidavit of Mr. Cummings himself, a liquidator of the company, that this was a voluntary winding-up under the 129th section, and therefore the 87th section, which relates to a winding-up by the court on petition under the 79th section, and the 147th section, which relates to a winding up under the supervision of the court, do not apply. But it has been urged that, inasmuch as by the 164th section the resolution for voluntary winding-up is to be deemed to correspond with an act of bankruptcy in the case of an individual trader, and as this cause was not instituted until after the resolution of the 30th Dec. was passed, the plaintiffs cannot claim in priority to the simple contract creditors. The defendant's counsel have referred me to The Pacific (Bro. & Lush. 243), decided on the 5th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, to show that a material man can acquire no maritime lien under the 31st section of the Court of Admiralty (Ireland) Act 1867, but only a right to proceed in rem. That proposition is disputed by the plaintiffs, who allege that, according to the ancient law administered in the Irish Court of Admiralty, a lien is created by the very furnishing of the supplies. If it were necessary to decide that question, I should be reluctant to do so on the argument of a motion; but in my opinion it is not necessary. The real ground of the defendants' application is that as the injunction has restrained the plaintiffs from proceeding further in this cause, the money in court should not be allowed to remain useless both to plaintiffs and defendants. The defendants say it is impossible for the plaintiffs, in the face of the injunction, to bring this cause to a hearing, and useless to do so, if it were possible, inasmuch as their alleged lien has been levelled by the resolution tantamount to an act of bankruptcy. They do not, indeed, ask me to dismiss the cause, but I am asked to do that which is equivalent to dismissing it, and that before the facts of the case have been clearly ascertained, or the question of law raised by the answer disposed of. But the injunction is in force till further order only. For anything that I can tell it may yet be dissolved, and the plaintiffs again at liberty to proceed in the causes, but they would then, if I were now to pay out this money, be in the same position as if I had released the vessel without bail or money lodged in lieu of bail, and without anything having been adduced to convince me that the plaintiff's claim was unfounded or barred by law, or beyond the jurisdiction of this court. I am bound to protect the res which is the subject of litigation until, in one way or other, that litigation has been brought to an end; and I must not pay out this money unless with the certainty that my doing so will not work injustice either to those who assert a claim against it, or to those who, after the resolution of December had been passed, and with full notice of their own and plaintiffs' position, brought it into court to abide my adjudication. I must, therefore, refuse this application, and as the plaintiffs were justified in their opposition to it, I must do so with costs.

THE LIVERPOOL MARINE CREDIT COMPANY
(LIMITED) v. WILSON.

Ship—Freight—Mortgage—Charge on freight—Possession taken by mortgagee—Notice to charterers—Priority—Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), ss. 66-70.

The first registered mortgagee of a ship made a further advance on the security of a mortgage comprising the ship and the freight thereof then earned or to be earned during the continuance of the security. Prior to the date of this further advance, the mortgagor had executed a second mortgage of the ship, and had given the second mortgagee a lien on the freight for a balance due to him. The first mortgagee had no notice of this second mortgage, or of the lien on the freight, at the time of making the further advance. The second mortgagee completed his title by giving the charterers notice in writing of his lien on the freight. The first mortgagee subsequently took possession of the ship before she reached her port of discharge, and continued in possession till the ship was sold:

Held, that the first mortgagee was entitled to priority over the charge of the second mortgagee of the freight, not only in respect of the amount due on his first mortgage, but also in respect of the whole amount of his further advance, together with interest and costs (a).

THIS was an appeal from a decision of the Vice-Chancellor (Little) of the county palatine of Lancaster.

On the 5th Oct. 1868 the Liverpool Marine Credit Company, lent the sum of 2500*l.* to Messrs. Satterfield and Fox, of Liverpool, upon the security of a statutory mortgage of their ship Donna Maria, and this mortgage was on the following day duly registered under the Merchant Shipping Act.

Shortly before the date of this mortgage, Messrs. Satterfield and Fox, the shipowners, had purchased the ship of Messrs. Wilson, Hett, and Co., of Liverpool, and the whole of the purchase-money not having been paid, they, on the 7th Oct. 1868, executed another mortgage of the ship to Messrs. Wilson, Hett, and Co., to secure the balance of an account current between the mortgagors and Messrs. Wilson, Hett, and Co., which balance comprised the unpaid part of the purchase-money of the ship.

This second mortgage was, on the 19th Oct. 1868, duly registered under the Merchant Shipping Act.

Being desirous of effecting insurances on the ship and freight, the shipowners borrowed 800*l.* of Messrs. Leech, Harrison, and Forwood, of Liverpool, subsequent to the date of the two mortgages, and, by a letter dated the 24th Oct. 1868, they gave Messrs. Leech, Harrison, and Forwood a lien on the freight of the ship for the 800*l.* and on the same day the Liverpool Marine Credit Company consented in writing that the security of Messrs. Leech, Harrison, and Forwood, should have priority.

In the same month the ship sailed for the Brazils and the Chuncha Islands, whence she was to bring back a cargo of guano to England. The charterers were Messrs. Thomson, Bonar, and Co., under a charter-party dated the 18th Sept. 1868.

On the 3rd Nov. 1868 the shipowners agreed, by letter, to give Messrs. Wilson, Hett, and Co. an absolute lien on the homeward freight of the ship, as a further security for the unpaid part of the purchase-money.

On the 11th Aug. 1869, the Liverpool Marine Credit Company advanced the further sum of 1000*l.* to the shipowners on the security of a mortgage, which comprised, amongst other things, the ship Donna Maria, and all freight thereof then already earned, or thereafter to be earned, under any then existing charter-party, or any other charter-party entered into during the continuance of the security. This mortgage was not registered.

On the 9th Feb. 1870, Messrs. Wilson, Hett, and Co., gave notice to the charterers of their charge of the 3rd Nov. 1868, upon the freight.

On the 28th Feb. 1870, the Liverpool Marine Credit Company gave notice to the charterers of their charge upon the freight.

In April 1870, the ship put into Queenstown on her homeward voyage, and there the Liverpool Marine Credit Company took possession of her, and remained in possession of her until she arrived at her port of discharge.

On the arrival of the ship at London, which was her port of discharge, it was arranged between the Liverpool Marine Credit Company and Messrs. Wilson, Hett, and Co., that the freight should be received by Messrs. Rucker, Offer, and Co., brokers, until the priorities were decided, and that the ship should be sold by them, Messrs. Rucker, Offer, and Co., paid the 800*l.* due to Messrs. Leech and Co., under pressure, and upon an undertaking by Messrs. Leech and Co., to repay the amount if it should be declared to have been improperly paid.

The ship was sold, and on the institution of the present suit, which was on- to determine the priorities of the various incumbrancers, the purchase money was paid into court, together with balance of the freight remaining of the payment of the 800*l.* to Messrs. Leech and Co.

The shipowners had failed, and the money in court was not sufficient to pay the amount due from them to the Liverpool Marine Credit Company on the mortgages of the ship and freight.

The Vice-Chancellor decided that the Liverpool Marine Credit Company were entitled to priority in respect of their mortgage of the 3rd Oct. 1868, and that by virtue of having taken possession of the ship, they became entitled, as first mortgagees, to the freight, subject to the charge of 800*l.* in favour of Messrs. Leech and Co., in priority to Messrs. Wilson, Hett, and Co., but that they were not entitled to priority in respect of their mortgage of the 11th Aug. 1869.

From this decision the Liverpool Marine Credit Company, and Messrs. Wilson, Hett, and, Co. both appealed, the former claiming to be entitled to priority in respect of their mortgage of the 11th Aug. 1869, and the latter claiming to be entitled to priority over Messrs. Leech and Co's charge for 800*l.*

Pearson, Q.C. and Marten, for Messrs. Wilson, Hett, and Co.—The plaintiffs agreed that Messrs. Leech and Co.'s charge for 800*l.* should have priority, but that cannot affect us, and we submit that they cannot have priority over us, as we never agreed that their charge should rank before ours. Our mortgage having been duly registered, we contend that the plaintiffs cannot have priority over us in respect of their subsequent mortgage of Aug. 1869. We completed our title by giving notice to the charterers when the ship was at sea, and it was impossible for us to take possession of her; that had the same effect as if we had taken possession of the ship, for it is settled by Rusden v. Pope (18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 651; L. Rep. 3 Ex. 269), that a mortgage of a vessel carries with it the freight, that the mortgagee's right may be perfected by his taking possession, or doing an act equivalent to taking possession, at any time before the freight is payable, and that when it is impossible to take actual possession, notice to the mortgagor and to the charterers is equivalent to taking possession. Robinson and Yate Lee, for the Liverpool Marine Credit Company.—We contend that as we had no notice of the second mortgage at the time we made the further advance in Aug. 1869, we are entitled to tack that amount to our first mortgage. Having taken actual possession of the freight, we submit that we are entitled to it in priority to Messrs. Wilson, Hett, and Co., notwithstanding their notice to the charterers.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 27th.—Lord Justice JAMES delivered the following written judgment of the court: The question, or rather the questions, in this case, are as to the relative rights of a first and second mortgagee of a ship in respect of the freight, each of the mortgagees having taken specific charges on such freight, and the first mortgagee having taken actual possession of the ship before it reached its port of discharge. The facts may be shortly summarised thus. The plaintiff was the first registered mortgagee of the ship, such mortgage being for a sum specified, the principal defendant being the second registered mortgagee also for a sum specified. The second mortgagee then advances money on the security of an express charge on the freight then in course of earning, and completes his title by giving to the charterers notice in writing of his charge. In the meantime the mortgagor is in want of money to effect an insurance on the ship and freight, and borrows and applies 800*l.* for that purpose, giving the lender a charge on the freight, which the first mortgagee in writing agrees shall be the first charge thereon. The first mortgagee afterwards obtains a further express charge on both ship and freight. It is not contended that the first mortgagee had any notice, actual or constructive, of the charge on freight which the second mortgagee had obtained, or that he had any actual notice of the second mortgage itself. The first mortgagee took actual possession of the ship, and thereby became undoubtedly entitled at law as well as in equity to receive the freight. The ship was sold, and the produce was not sufficient to discharge the first mortgage. It is not denied on behalf of the second mortgagee that to the extent required for the discharge of the first registered mortgage, the sale money of the ship and the freight are to be so applied. But he contends that the sale money and freight being received by the first mortgagee in that character must be considered and applied as one fund in discharge of the first mortgage, and that the balance ought to go to him in discharge of the second registered mortgage. The first mortgagee on the other hand contends that the second mortgagee has no right or equity against him in respect of his application of the freight which he has possessed himself of by a legal title. It is to be observed that the Merchant Shipping Act nowhere deals with charges on freight. They were, long before the passing of the Act, securities well known in the shipping world and of ordinary occurrence; and the right of a mortgage in respect of freight had also been long settled and well recognised. But it was not thought fit to provide by that Act, either with respect to the priorities of charges on freight, or with respect to the rights of mortgagees to freight. These were left to be dealt with according to the ordinary principles of law and equity, and the rules and doctrines established by the decisions of the courts. Now, the right of the mortgagee in respect of freight was well established and clear, but somewhat peculiar. He had no absolute right to the freight as an incident to his mortgage. He could not intercept the freight by giving notice to the charterer before payment; but if he took actual possession, or, according to a recent decision in the Court of Exchequer (Rusden v. Pope, sup.), if he took constructive possession, of the ship before the freight was actually earned, he then became entitled to the freight as an incident of his legal possessory right, just as a mortgagee of land taking actual possession of the land before severance of the growing crops would have the right to sever and take the crops. What is, then, the position of a second mortgagee of a ship with respect to the freight? He has no legal right to take actual possession, and therefore cannot by his own act give himself that which is equivalent to possession. But, as between him and the mortgagor the equitable right of the second mortgagee is the same as the legal right of the first mortgagee, just as in the case of land if the first mortgagee declines to take possession, the second mortgagee may obtain a receiver, and so have the possession and the benefits of the possessory right. But this is to be understood only as between the second mortgagee and the mortgagor. As regards all intervening encumbrances, interests, and titles of every kind not requiring registration, the respective positions of the first and second mortgagees are essentially different, arising from the essential difference between a legal and an equitable title. The legal owner's right is paramount to every equitable charge not affecting his own conscience; the equitable owner, in the absence of special circumstances, takes subject to all equities prior in date to his own estate or charge. The court of equity, in appointing a receiver at the instance of an equitable encumbrancer, takes possession, in fact, on behalf of all, and so as not to disturb any legal right or interfere with equitable priorities. If there be a legal mortgage of a ship, then a charge on the freight, then a second mortgage of the ship, the second mortgagee of the ship cannot by any act of his own oust the encumbrancer on the freight; and if the first mortgagee of the ship takes under these circumstances possession of the ship, his possession cannot be allowed to alter the equities of the parties. He takes both ship and freight by the same title, and there being one equitable owner of the ship, and another equitable owner of the freight, as between those equitable owners his charge must be considered as satisfied pro rata, just as if there was a first mortgage on Whiteacre and Blackacre belonging, subject to that mortgage, to several owners. A due consideration of the same principles shows how is to be solved the question before us, viz., the right of a legal first mortgagee in possession, being at the same time a puisne encumbrancer, without notice, on the freight. He has the paramount legal title; there is nothing to affect his conscience, and we are unable to find either in principle or authority any sound distinction between his case and that of the legal mortgagee of any other kind of property who has made further advances on the property itself, or on the timber of growing crops, without notice of intervening equitable charges or interests. Having arrived at this conclusion, it is not necessary to deal with the special circumstances affecting the 800*l.* advanced for insuring the ship. We intimated in the course of the argument that that sum must be considered as if it had been advanced by the first mortgagees themselves. We agree with the Vice-Chancellor's decision as to that sum. But we go further than he did, and hold that the first mortgagee is entitled to priority in respect of the whole of his charge on the freight, adding thereto his costs of suit, including his costs of the appeal, and the costs which he will have in the first place to pay to the persons in whose favour the charge for the 800*l.* insurance money was made. If there should be any surplus it will go to the second mortgagee. If there should not be enough to pay the first incumbrancer, as well as the costs, the deficiency to answer the costs must be borne by the second mortgagee, whose contention has led to the suit. Having regard to the amount of the fund, and the reasonable certainty that there can be no surplus after satisfying the second mortgagee, and having regard to the disclaimer entered in the suit in the High Court, and no party appearing before us objecting thereto, we think it proper to make a declaration declaring the rights of the parties appearing before us; but of course this must be, and must be declared to be, without prejudice to any right of the absent parties.

V.C. BACON'S COURT.

Reported by the HON. ROBERT BUTLER and T. H. CARSON, Esq., Barristers-at-Law.

Thursday, April 25, 1872.

Re THE TEIGNMOUTH AND GENERAL MUTUAL SHIPPING ASSURANCE ASSOCIATION (MARTIN'S CLAIMS).

Marine Assurance Association—Winding-up—Unstamped policy—Loss of ship—Minute book—Admission of liability.

Where there was an entry in the minute book of an insurance association admitting the liability of the association upon a certain policy, and the association was ordered to be wound-up before the money was paid, the insured was Held to be entitled to the amount so admitted to be due, although the policy was not stamped.

THIS was a claim by Jane Martin, as the administratrix of her late husband, Edwin Martin, to be allowed to rank as a simple contract creditor against the assets of the above-named association for the sum of 150*l.*, being the balance due on a policy of insurance effected by Edwin Martin with the association, after deducting 50*l.* which had been paid by the association to the Torquay Brewing Company in respect of a claim which they had upon the policy.

In March 1863, Edwin Martin insured the ship Arbitrator, of which he was part owner, for the sum of 200*l.*, and this policy, which was unstamped, was renewed annually, the last renewal covering the year ending the 20th March 1868.

On the 16th Feb. 1868, the Arbitrator, with Martin on board, sailed from Cardigan on a voyage to Cardiff, but had never since been heard of.

Notice of the loss of the Arbitrator was given to the association, and at the next quarterly meeting of the committee of the association the claim upon the policy was allowed, and the amount ordered to be drawn for, and an entry to that effect was made in the minute book of the association; but the money, except the 50*l.* to the Torquay Brewing Company was not paid, owing to the fact that Jane Martin was unable to obtain letters of administration to her late husband's estate until Dec. 1871. The association was ordered to be wound-up in Feb. 1870, and the official liquidator now refused to admit the claim, on the ground that the policy was unstamped.

It appeared to be the practice of the association to issue unstamped policies, unless a special application was made by the insurer for a stamped policy, but no such application was made by Martin.

Ince, in support of the claim, contended that there was a sufficient admission in the books of the association to entitle the widow to recover the amount claimed as upon an account stated, and that the amount having been allowed could not now be disputed: (Barker v. Birt, 10 M. & W. 61).

A. G. Marten, for the official liquidator, contended that the claim could not be allowed, as the policy upon which it was founded was void, being unstamped (Re The London Marine Insurance Association, Smith's case, L. Rep. 4 Ch. 611; 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 97; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 280), and that there was no evidence of any account stated, for until administration was granted, which was not until some time after the winding-up of the association, there was no person to whom an account could have been stated.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR was of opinion that the acknowledgement in the books of the association was quite sufficient to establish the relation of debtor and creditor, and that the administratrix must be allowed to prove in the winding-up for the amount remaining due upon the policy.

SIMPSON AND ANOTHER v. BLUES AND ANOTHER.

County Courts Admiralty jurisdiction — Claim arising out of charter-party—31 & 32 Vict. c. 71 32 & 33 Vict. c. 51.

The "County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Acts" (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71, and 32 & 33 Vict. c. 51), although they invest certain county courts with a jurisdiction to entertain and determine a limited portion of the cases which were formerly entertained and determined only in the High Court of admiralty, do not by inference and indirect enactment enlarge the jurisdiction of the High Court of Admiralty never possessed.

A County Court having admiralty jurisdiction has no jurisdiction to entertain a suit for damages for short delivery of cargo arising out of a charter-party, the High Court of Admiralty having no jurisdiction to entertain such claim (a).

(a) In giving the reasons why the County Court cannot be considered to have jurisdiction over such claims, the learned judge appears to have overlooked an important matter. No doubt in the construction of such Acts, "all words, whether they be in deeds or statutes or otherwise, if they be general and not express and precise, should be restrained into the fitness of the matter," and "there should be no implication to extend the jurisdiction," but, with great submission, these principles must be qualified in so far that where words exist in Acts giving jurisdiction to inferior courts, however inconvenient, which words cannot be satisfied without those courts acquire a jurisdiction which did not before exist, then, despite the inconvenience, the statute must have effect. The learned judge rules that the County Courts can have no greater jurisdiction than the Admiralty Court had previous to the passing of the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 51. If the words of the 2nd section of the latter Act can be satisfied by giving to the County Courts the jurisdiction possessed by the Admiralty Court under the Admiralty Court Act 1861, sect. 6, it is manifest that the reasons given for restraining the new jurisdiction within those bounds are convincing. The Admiralty Court derives jurisdiction in all claims for damage to cargo and breach of contract of that nature from that Act alone, and therefore the extent of its jurisdiction depends upon the construction of that Act. By sect. 6, the Admiralty Court has "juris-

A SUIT for damages for short delivery of cargo, arising out of an agreement of charter-party made in relation to the use and hire of the ship Madge diction over any claim by the owner or consignee or assignee of any bill of lading of any goods carried into any port in England or Wales in any ship, for damage done to the goods or any part thereof by the negligence or misconduct of, or for any breach of duty or breach of contract on the part of the owner, master, or crew of the ship, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that at the time of the institution of the cause, any owner or part owner of the ship is domiciled in England or Wales." Under that section, a claim may be made in the Admiralty Court by the owner of any goods, the consignee of any goods, or by the assignee of any bill of lading of any goods carried into any port of England or Wales in any ship the owner of which is not domiciled in England or Wales; a claim may be made by any of those persons for damage done to the goods by the negligence or misconduct of the owner, master, or crew of the ship: a claim may also be made for any breach of duty on their part, or for any breach of contract; but, with respect to this latter claim, it is probably intended that the claim must be in respect to some actual or constructive damage to goods, as the only persons who can make the claim are the owners, &c. of goods carried into a British port (see The Santa Anna, 32 L. J. 128 Adm.) Now, a claim for "damage done to goods by negligence or misconduct" is a claim in tort; a claim for breach of duty or contract in this section is a claim arising out of an express or implied condition of the contract entered into for the carriage of goods, as in the case where a master claims to detain the cargo for freight and average, and at the same time refuses to give information so that those claims may be satisfied: (The Norway, B & L. 226; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 17.) The words of the Act under discussion are that "any County Court appointed, &c. . . shall have jurisdiction, &c., to try and determine the following causes: (1) As to any claim arising out of any agreement made in relation to the use or hire of any ship, or in relation to the carriage of goods in any ship, and also as to any claim in tort in respect of goods carried in any ship." The wording of this section gives jurisdiction over three different claims, first (taking them in inverse order), a claim of tort in respect of goods carried in any ship" which, construed strictly according to the principle adopted in the present case, would correspond with the claim for "damage done to goods by negligence or misconduct" in the Admiralty Court Act 1861; secondly, a claim "arising out of any agreement in relation to the carriage of goods in any ship" which would in the same way correspond to the claim for "breach of duty or breach of contract on the part of the owner, master, or crew of the ship," in the Admiralty Court Act; and thirdly, a claim "arising out of any agreement made in relation to the use or hire of any ship" for which, it is submitted, there are no corresponding words in the Admiralty Court Act. The obvious meaning of these words, when read with the whole section, is that they give jurisdiction over claims other than those relating to the mere carriage of goods, that is to say, over claims arising out of a breach of an agreement, by which a ship is hired, independently of any goods being laden on board or carried on that ship They would appear to relate to claims in the nature of breach of contract in refusing to proceed to a port of loading, or in arriving at such a port after the stipulated time for loading a cargo. Unless such a meaning is attached to them they must be wholly inoperative and have no meaning, except such as is to be gathered from the succeeding words of the section. What makes it still more probable that these words were intended to have an operative force is the fact that the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71) s. 3, gave jurisdiction to the County Courts for claims for "damage to cargo," and those words would include, if interpreted by the meaning usually attached to them in the Admiralty Court, all the claims that could be made under the Admiralty Court Act 1861, the amount only being limited. If these conclusions drawn from the comparison of the two Acts are correct, it is difficult to imagine how it can be said that the words of the County Courts Act can be satisfied, except by giving

May 7.—The judgment of the court (Willes, Byles, Brett, and Grove, J.J.) was delivered by BRETT, J.—This was a rule moved by Mr. F. M. White calling upon the plaintiffs to show cause why a writ of prohibition should not issue to the County Court of Lancashire holden at Liverpool to prohibit the court from further proceedings in a suit against the ship the Madge Wildfire, and the defendants, her owners, and from further proceeding in the matter of the arrest and detention a larger jurisdiction than that already possessed by the Admiralty Court, and if it is once admitted that there is a larger jurisdiction, in respect of any one thing, there is no reason why a larger jurisdiction should not exist in all such matters.

With regard to the particular case it is submitted that the proposition that the Admiralty Court never had jurisdiction over a claim arising exclusively out of a charter-party is a little too broad. Under the wording of sect. 6 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 the court may entertain any claim by the owner or consignee of goods, independently of his being the holder of the bill of lading. If the owner or the consignee were a party to the charter-party, there seems to be no reason why he should not prosecute a claim in the Admiralty Court for a breach of its provisions so long as his goods were damaged by that breach. The Norway (B. & L. 226 ; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 17) only decided that the assignee of a bill of lading could not sue on a charter-party to which he was not a party.

Whatever may be the construction put upon the wording of the County Courts Act, there is little doubt that those who introduced it intended to give the County Courts the largest possible jurisdiction, they being of opinion that certain local tribunals should have the exclusive power of trying such questions, and that these County Courts, having the maritime questions of a large district before them would be, by constant practice, more competent to deal with them than the ordinary County Courts, and that much expense would thus be saved to shipowners and others who would otherwise be compelled to resort to the Superior Courts.

Since the above was written the learned judge of the Admiralty Court has given judgment in two similar cases, and, although he held that he was bound by the judgment of a Common Law court upon the construction of a statute, he was of opinion that the County Courts had the larger jurisdiction contended for, and hoped that the cases might be taken to a Court of Appeal.

These cases, The Cargo ex Argos, and the Hewsons, will be found reported later on in the present volume.

of the ship, &c. Cause was shown against the rule in the first instance by Mr. Clarkson. The suit was commenced in the County Court having admiralty jurisdiction under the statutes 31 & 32 Vict. c. 71, and 32 & 33 Vict. c. 51, by a plaint, in which the nature of the suit was declared to be for damages for short delivery of cargo arising out of an agreement of charter party made in relation to the use and hire of the Madge Wildfire, and in which the suit was stated to be brought on behalf of the plaintiffs against the barque or vessel "The Madge Wildfire," and against the owner or owners thereof unknown, &c. The plaint was nailed to the mast of the ship in the Sandon Dock at Liverpool. A summons to enter an appearance to the suit was served on the defendant Blues. He was resident and domiciled at Sunderland. The ship, on an affidavit of the plaintiff that she was about to leave, was arrested and detained. It was admitted on the argument that the only cause of action was an alleged breach of the charter-party, and that the claim of the plaintiff was founded on his being a party to the charter-party. On the one side it was argued that the County Court had not jurisdiction over such a claim by virtue of sect. 2 of 32 & 33 Vict. c. 51, because on comparing that section with others in the same statute and in the statute 31 & 32 Vict. c. 71, which statutes are to be read as one, and considering the general apparent object of the statute, namely, to allow to the County Court a part, limited as to amount, of existing admiralty jurisdiction ; and considering further the effect which would be produced if the words were read in so large a sense as suggested, of indirectly enlarging the jurisdiction of the High Court of Admiralty, with which the legislation does not profess to deal ; and considering the effect which would be produced on the business relations of merchants ; it would be a wrong interpretation to construe the words so as to give jurisdiction in the present case. On the other side it was contended that there was no sufficient ground for construing the words otherwise than in the largest sense they seem to import. The words relied upon in support of the jurisdiction are as follows : "Any County Court appointed, &c., shall have jurisdiction and all powers and authorities relating thereto, to try and determine the following causes : (1) as to any claim arising out of any agreement made in relation to the use or hire of any ship, or in relation to the carriage of goods in any ship, and also as to any claim in tort in respect of goods carried in any ship, provided the amount claimed does not exceed 300*l*." These words, read apart from qualification by the context, are undoubtedly large enough to create a new jurisdiction in respect of a claim as for a breach of charter-party. The question is whether their meaning is limited by the subject-matter and the context so as to exclude such a claim. The High Court of Admiralty has no original jurisdiction to entertain such a case as the present, and no statute has conferred on the High Court of Admiralty any original jurisdiction to entertain any claim as for a breach of charter-party. It follows that if the claim had been in excess of 300*l*. neither the High Court of Admiralty nor the County Court would have had jurisdiction to entertain it. Yet if the County Court has jurisdiction to try such a case where the claim does not exceed 300*l*., it seems difficult to say that, by virtue of section 26 of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 71, the High Court of Admiralty has not a secondary jurisdiction to determine the case by way of appeal, and might not by virtue of section 6 assume, by removing the case into the High Court, a quasi original jurisdiction. Nay, if the rule of construction to be applied to these statutes is that the words are to be read in their largest sense, a suit for breach of charter party with a claim in excess of 300*l.* being brought in the County Court, might be removed under section 6 of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 71 into the High Court of Admiralty, and be there entertained, tried, and determined. In the case of The Swan (L. Rep. 3 Ad. & Eccl. 314; 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 633), the Judge of the High Court of Admiralty held that if the County Court Act 32 & 33 Vict. c. 51, does give jurisdiction to the County Court to deal with a claim for demurrage, it follows that the High Court of Admiralty may transfer the suit, and entertain and determine it under section 6 of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 71, although the High Court of Admiralty has no jurisdiction to deal with a claim for demurrage. "It is true," says the learned judge, "that this court has no jurisdiction to entertain a cause of this nature in the first instance; but if the legislature has given to this court power to transfer the cause, it has thereby conferred upon the court jurisdiction over the cause." The High Court of Admiralty might therefore, according to the supposed effect of this legislation, obtain indirectly a jurisdiction, which the general law has directly forbidden, and which the statute has not in any direct way extended, by allowing suits commenced in the County Court to be removed immediately for trial into the High Court. Another effect of the suggested construction would be that the rights and liabilities of parties entering into the contract of charter-party, and of those claiming under them by sale subsequent to the charter-party, would or might be materially altered. It cannot be seriously contended that either of the County Court Acts, upon the suggested interpretation, would, in the absence of distinct enactments, impress upon a breach of charter-party a maritime lien. There would be no ground for implying such a lien, because the High Court of Admiralty never had any jurisdiction of any kind with regard to the breach of a contract of charter-party. But it might be, and indeed must be, argued that the suggested construction would, by reason of section 3 of 32 & 33 Vict. c. 51, enable the County Court, and therefore also the High Court, to realise the damages by seizure before judgment, and by sale of the particular ship. In other words, the damages would from the moment of the arrest be impressed upon the ship in rem. The difference between this and a maritime lien, and the real effect of this, are pointed out by Dr. Lushington in the cases of the Gustaf (1 Mar. Law. Cas. O. S. 230; Lush's Rep. 506), and the Pacific (2 Mar. Law. Cas. O. S. 21; Brown & Lush, 243). Whatever the exact effect be upon the ship by virtue of the reading together of the two Acts, there must be some effect, and consequently, the rights and liabilities of ship-owners and the other merchants interested in the mercantile use of ships must be altered; for at present such damages are realised not by seizing, detaining and selling the particular ship, but out of the general personal property of the shipowner by seizure and sale in execution after judgment. As affecting commercial business and enterprise, the seizure and detention of a ship are of the utmost gravity; for, if she be a general ship, the mercantile adventures of many merchants are by such seizure and detention dislocated, if not destroyed. The suggested construction would also, as it seems to us, create as matter of fact an inequality in the administration of law between different merchants; it would lay a greater burden on the smaller ship-owners and merchants using their ships. Where the claim would be small, as under 300*l.*, it would generally arise in respect of small cargoes on board small ships, which ships would be impressed with the damages; but in the case of claims in excess of 300*l.*, unless the High Court of Admiralty should successfully assume to remove the cause in the way suggested above, the suit would be tried at the common law, and the ship would not be exposed at a critical moment to detention or delay upon the mere assertion or pretence of a claim, and the ship upon a claim being established by judgment would be no more liable to the damages than any other chattel of the shipowner's property. In the one case, that is in the case of small claims, whether well or ill founded, the navigation of the ship would be hampered both as to the ship-owner and as to persons who had contracted for the use of the ship; in the other case, namely, in the case of larger claims, the ship would go free. It would also lay a greater burden on charterers of smaller ships. If the larger effect is to be given to the words of the statutes, charterers of small ships might be brought into the County Court under its Admiralty jurisdiction on claims for charter-party demurrage, or for short freight payable according to charter-party; and if such charterers were to be made liable according to admiralty procedure, the remedy would be against the cargo in rem. If the cargo belonged solely to the charterer, this would be a different and more onerous remedy against him than the existing law allows against a charterer of a larger ship; and if the cargo belonged to different shippers, the cargo of one who had made no delay in shipping, or of one who had loaded all he contracted to load, might be seized, detained, and sold for a delay in shipping, or a short shipment of another shipper over whose acts he could have no control, whereas charterers and shippers of part cargo on board larger ships would incur no such burdens and risks. These considerations lead, we think, to the conclusion that we ought not so to construe the words of these County Court Acts as to create this large, novel, and inconvenient jurisdiction when we find from the context that the general intention was only to distribute the existing admiralty jurisdiction by allowing suits of limited amount to be instituted in inferior courts. As to such courts, the rule which has been invariably applied is that there should be no implication to extend the jurisdiction. If ever the rule of construction that "all words, whether they be in deeds or statutes or otherwise, if they be general and not express and precise, should be restrained into the fitness of the matter," were applicable, it would be to limit the alleged erection in an inferior court of a new and unheard of jurisdiction in rem over so many of a class of suits as happened to be within a certain limit of amount, in no respect calling for the novel mode of treatment sought to be extracted from the general expressions employed, and at the same time leaving all cases of the same class, which are above that limit of amount, to be dealt with according to a different law. The correct mode of reading such expressions is to read them as including, without restriction, the whole of the class of causes in respect of which a like jurisdiction had previously been exercised, and to restrain them in construction to causes of that class.

The authorities upon the construction of these and analogous Acts illustrate the propriety of this rule of construction. In the case of The St. Cloud (Br. & Lush. 4; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 309), Dr. Lushington had to consider what was the true rule of construction to be applied to sect. 6 of the Admiralty Courts Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), which enacts that "the High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim by the owner or consignee or assignee of any bill of lading of any goods," &c. It was contended that these words ought to be construed in their largest sense, and therefore gave jurisdiction in the case of a claim by any and every assignee of a bill of lading; but that learned judge held that the words must be limited in construction so as to include only an assignee to whom the property in the goods passed by the contract and assignment. "Prima facie," he says, "the words of the 6th section would give every assignee, whether for value or not, a right to sue in this court, &c." "What is the true construction, however," he afterwards says, "of the words 'any claim?' I think that the true construction of the words 'any claim' is any claim lawfully existing independently of this Act. It may be said, I think with some force, that if it was intended to create a new right of action, the Legislature would have expressed such intention in clearer and more intelligible terms." It is true that in The Nepoter (3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 355; L. Rep. 2 Adm. & Ecc. p. 375; 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 177), the present learned judge of the Admiralty Court has intimated an opinion that the construction put upon the statute in the case of The St. Cloud cannot be supported; but, as he held in the case before him that the property did pass, his intimation as to the construction of the statute was not necessary for the decision of the case. In the case of The Dowse (3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 424; L. Rep. 3 Adm. & Ecc. 135, 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 627) a suit was instituted in the County Court against a British ship and owners for necessities to an amount less than 150l. supplied to the ship, it appearing that a part owner was domiciled in England. Under such circumstances the High Court of Admiralty had no original jurisdiction, either under 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65 or under 24 Vict. c. 10. But it was contended that the County Court nevertheless had jurisdiction by virtue of the large words in sect. 3 of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 71, which are "that any County Court, &c., shall have jurisdiction, &c., to try and determine, &c., as to any claim for necessities, in which the amount claimed does not exceed 150l." But it was held on appeal by the judge of the High Court of Admiralty that the construction must be so limited as to give the County Court jurisdiction only in cases where the High Court would also have jurisdiction. In the case of The Ruby, brought before Willes, J., at chambers, the suit was instituted by the shipowner for demurrage alleged to be due according to charter-party, and was commenced by plaint in the County Court. The jurisdiction was claimed under sect. 2 of 32 & 33 Vict. c. 51, as in the present case. But the learned judge granted a writ of prohibition on the ground that the words, not being clear, though large, ought not to be construed so as to give a new right to the shipowner as against cargo, and to impose a new liability on cargo. In Everard v. Kendal (sup.), the question came before this court whether by virtue of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 71, and 32 & 33 Vict. c. 51, the County Court had jurisdiction to entertain and determine as in an admiralty suit a claim by the owner of a barge propelled by oars only, in respect of a collision in the Thames by another such barge. It is true that the case is not a direct authority with regard to that now before the court, because the question there turned rather upon the construction of the word "ship" as interpreted by general orders, than on the construction to be put upon the statute, where the alleged enactment is not direct and clear, but indirect and doubtful. But the arguments and the judgments delivered treated much of the effect of the large words used in some sections of the County Courts Acts, and on the effect of them, if interpreted in their largest sense, upon the jurisdiction of the High Court of Admiralty, and the rights and liabilities of parties, and on the effect on them of the sections giving to the High Court of Admiralty the powers of appeal and transfer. The judges who took part in that case were of opinion that the large words used in the two County Court Acts were, upon a true interpretation, to be held to apply only to such subject matters of suit as were before the passing of those Acts within the jurisdiction of the High Court of Admiralty. We are of that opinion now. The County Court Acts, we think, invest certain County Courts with a jurisdiction to entertain and determine a certain limited portion of the cases which were formerly entertained and determined only in the High Court of Admiralty; but those Acts do not, we think, by inference and indirect enactment, enlarge the jurisdiction of the High Court of Admiralty, or, by giving to the County Courts a method of procedure not before used either in the Admiralty Court or at the common law, alter the rights and liabilities of merchants engaged in maritime adventure. They give as indeed they profess in terms to give, a part of the admiralty jurisdiction to be administered in a modified form: they do not give as admiralty jurisdiction a jurisdiction which the Court of Admiralty never possessed. The case of The Swan (sup.), does not incline us to modify this view. In that case it was assumed without argument that the County Court had jurisdiction in a case of demurrage, and we think, assumed without argument that an indirect jurisdiction was given to the High Court of Admiralty; and the only point really decided was that, if both those assumptions were true, the High Court of Admiralty ought to transfer the cause. Again, the case of The Sylph (3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 37; L. Rep. 2 Adm. and Ecc. 24; 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 519), affirmed on appeal by the Privy Council in The Beta (L. Rep. 2 Priv. Co. App. 447; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 988)—in which it was held that a claim for compensation for personal injuries caused by negligent management of a ship might be maintained by a suit in rem in the Admiralty Court against the ship, by virtue of the words "the High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim for damage done by any ship," which are contained in sect. 7 of 24 Vict. c. 10—and the case of The Guldfaxe (3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 201; L. Rep.

2 Adm. & Ecc. 325; 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 748) would be, if unimpeached, authorities to a great extent against the conclusion to which we in this case arrive. But those cases have been seriously impeached by the case of Smith v. Brown (ante, p. 56; 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 808; 40 L. J., 214, Q. B.), in the decision and reasoning and observations of which we entirely concur. We are therefore of opinion that the County Court had no jurisdiction in the present case to entertain the suit or to detain the ship, and that a writ of prohibition ought to issue.

IONIDES AND ANOTHER v. THE PACIFIC FIRE AND MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Marine insurance—Slip—Open policy—Mistake in name of ship—Innocent misrepresentation—Evidence—30 Vict. c. 23, ss. 4, 9.

Plaintiffs, ship and insurance brokers, having received instructions from Messrs. G. and K., of Hamburg, to open a policy on hides to the amount of 5000*l.*, filled up a slip for that amount on hides per "ships" and left it at the office of the defendants' underwriters. About four months afterwards, an agent of Messrs. G. and K. having written to the plaintiffs about hides on board the Socrates a clerk of the plaintiffs called on the defendants, and, after referring to the French Veritas which contained the names of two vessels, the Socrate, an old French vessel, and the Socrates, a Norwegian vessel, said he believed the vessel on board of which the hides were to be shipped was the Socrates. About a week after, one of the plaintiffs, taking up the old slip for 5000*l.* at the defendants' office, filled up two slips instead, one for 2500*l.* on hides per the Sophie, the other for 2455*l.* on hides per the Socrates; and policies were duly issued in accordance with the slips. The hides were loaded not on board the Socrates, but on board the Socrate, and were totally lost, whilst on board that vessel, by the perils insured against. An action having been brought upon the policy for 2455*l.*, the jury found that the parties intended to insure the hides by the vessel on which they were shipped, whatever the name might be.

Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench), that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover, although the hides were on board the Socrate at the time they were lost.

Held, also, that the slip for 5000*l.* was admissible in evidence, to show the intention of the parties at the time the policy founded upon it was executed although by 30 Vict. c. 23 ss. 4, 9. the slip, not having been stamped, would not be available as a policy (a).

(a) The court, in deciding that a slip is admissible in evidence to show what was the intention of the parties in entering into the contract, get rid of the difficulty suggested in a note to the report of the case in the court below (ante p. 146). They expressly say that a slip is not a policy, and not an agreement at all within the

THIS was an appeal from a decision of the court of Queen's Bench, making absolute a rule to enter a verdict for the defendants on the second and sixth pleas, so far as they related to the fourth count of the declaration, and discharging the rule as to the rest. See the report of the case in the court below, ante, p. 141, where the pleadings are fully set forth.

The facts of the case were as follows :

1. The plaintiffs are ship and insurance brokers carrying on business in the city of London, and have for some years been in the habit of effecting insurances by the instructions of a Mr. Schaffler, an insurance broker at Hamburg. Some of these insurances were on behalf of a Mr. Gayen, and others on behalf of Messrs. Kalkmann, both merchants at Hamburg.

2. The defendants are a company carrying on business in the city of London as underwriters, and prior to Aug. 1869, had been in the habit from time to time of effecting insurances for the plaintiffs on ship or ships.

3. On the 12th Aug. 1869 the plaintiffs effected on behalf of Messrs. Kalkmann, with the defendants, a policy of insurance for 3000*l.* on hides, per ship or ships, as might be declared, from any port or places at the Brazils to any port of call in the United Kingdom.

On the 13th Aug. another similar policy was effected for 2354*l.* on behalf of Mr. Gayen.

4. On the 23rd Sept. 1869 the plaintiffs received a letter from Mr. Schaffler of which the following are the material parts :

Messrs. Kalkmann, Brothers, hereby request you to open at once a policy of insurance on hides to the amount of 5000*l.*, as by their next letter they will have to declare 3000*l.* to 4000*l.* on that head.

5. On receipt of this letter the plaintiff, Mr. De Chapeaurouge, had an interview with Mr. Drummond, the underwriter of the defendants when a slip, of which the following is a copy, was submitted to, and accepted by, Mr. Drummond, on behalf of the defendants, by writing the words and letters upon it :

5000 Pefe.	Cash.
Hides.	Ionides and De Chapeaurouge.
	Insurance 12½ o o
	Average recoverable on the whole interest.
	Ship or ships and steamer.
Brazils	U.K. H/H
	and for steamer to Hamburg.
60/-	9/6 U.K
	5000 Pefe.
23/9/69.	Not more than 2500 l. by each vessel.

6. At this interview according to the evidence of Mr. Drummond, the plaintiff stated that the ships to be declared under it would be first-class vessels, and that the consignees under it would be first-class people. The plaintiff denied this, but said that, in answer to inquiries from Drummond upon the subject, he might have referred to the declarations made upon previous policies which in many instances were on first-class German ships, but that he did not remember any such thing having occurred.

meaning of the statute, and cannot be set up as such, but can only be used as explaining the intention of the parties in entering into a subsequent contract, valid within the statute. It would follow from this decision that under no circumstances could a slip be used as evidence, unless it were followed by a duly executed policy of insurances.—ED

7. Mr. De Chapeaurouge then filled up a slip on one of the printed forms kept by the defendants and left it at their office. The following is a copy of such slip.

8. On the 21st Jan. 1870, a letter of which the following is an extract was received from Mr. Schaffler by the plaintiffs.

Hamburg, 19th Jan. 1870.

Messrs. Ionides and De Chapeaurouge, London.

Messrs. Kalkmann declare as follows: Cotton from Ceara to Hamburg, per Socrates C. Jeancard, K 1/100, 100 bales cotton valued at £730.

9. On or about the 23rd Jan. 1870, the plaintiffs received a letter from Mr. Schaffler, dated the 22nd Jan. 1870, of which the material part was as follows:

Hamburg, 22nd Jan. 1870.

Messrs. Ionides and De Chapeaurouge, London.

I beg to refer you to my respects of yesterday's date, and this is to inform you that Mr. Gayen is declaring today from Ceara to Hamburg by the Socrates. Bill of lading, dated the 23rd Dec. last year made out to order.

P. B. 1008 hides
M. 158 do.

Mr. Gayen keeps upon his hide policy only £1500 still. As, however, he does not expect any fresh shipment near at hand, he does, therefore, not feel disposed at the present moment to enter upon fresh insurances.

10. On the 24th Jan. in pursuance of the instructions contained in the above letter, Mr. De Chapeaurouge, made an indorsement upon the 13th Aug. 1869 as follows:

The following interest is now declared and agreed to this policy.

Per Socrates—Ceara to Hamburg. B.L. 23rd December.

M. 158 }
C. 35 }
S. 199 }

1400 dry salted hides, valued at 1450l.

London, 24th January, 1870.

He then gave the policy to his clerk, Mr. Lambert, and directed him to take it to the defendants.

11. At the same time Mr. De Chapeaurouge having noticed that a portion of the hides belonging to Mr. Gayen, were insured in the Progress Insurance Company which had failed, instructed Mr. Lambert to offer that portion of the insurance to the defendants, and wrote in pencil in the fold of the said policy the words following:

"Re-insurance Progress, £121."

12. At this interview between Mr. De Chapeaurouge and Mr. Lambert, they both referred to the Veritas and found in it that there were two ships—the Socrates and the Socrate. [The descriptions of the two vessels were set out.]

13. Mr. De Chapeaurouge observed to Mr. Lambert that he supposed that the Socrates referred to in the letter of the 22nd January was the Norwegian ship, as that ship was most likely to be engaged in the trade, or words to that effect.

14. In consequence of these instructions Mr. Lambert called upon Mr. Drummond on the same day, and handed him the policy of the 13th Aug., which Mr. De Chapeaurouge had endorsed as above, to initial, and at the same time he offered him the reinsurance for 121l.

15. Mr. Drummond turned to the Veritas and finding in it entries of the Socrates and Socrate, as described above, asked if the Socrates was the ship. Mr. Lambert replied that he thought so, whereupon Mr. Drummond handed the policy to his clerk, Mr. Lark, to initial, and at the same time a slip was prepared for the reinsurance, which risk was taken without discussion at the same premium as the other policies. The following is a copy of the slip:

EX. CH.] IONIDES AND ANOTHER v. THE PACIFIC FIRE AND MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY. [EX. CH.]

16. The following is the account given by Mr. Lambert and Mr. Drummond, the defendants' underwriter, of what passed at the interview.

The following is the account given by Mr. Lambert:—

He, Drummond, asked me to show him the ship. I found it in The Veritas. There are two ships, the Socrates and the Socrate. I said, "I think this is the ship," pointing to the Socrates. I believe it to be the ship. I did not tell him the information I had. I then prepared a slip, and this is it, and, further (on cross-examination) I mentioned the name Socrates. The French Veritas was on the table; I think I took it up. I pointed to the Socrates. I suppose I led him to believe it was the Socrates.

17. The following is the account given by Mr. Drummond:—

The plaintiff's clerk, Lambert, called on me on the 24th Jan., and presented me with the open policy and a declaration of the Socrates, which I passed to my assistant for registering in our books. He then produced a slip for 121*l.*, on which I referred to the Veritas. I found two vessels, and said to him, "What is your vessel?" He said, "Socrates." In taking that risk, I believed I was insuring a risk on a specific vessel the Socrates, Captain Albertsen, the Norwegian. In insuring the policy of that date I thought I was insuring the Socrates. The risk on the Socrate was decidedly greater than on the Socrates; I would not have insured the Socrate.

18. The French Veritas is a book in which are entered the names and description of foreign vessels, and it is usual and customary for underwriters and others to refer thereto when questions arise as to the names and descriptions of foreign vessels.

19. On the 3rd Feb. the plaintiffs received a letter from Mr. Schaffler, an extract from which is as follows:

Messrs. Ionides and De Chapeaurouge, London.

Hamburg 1st. Feb. 1870.

Messrs. Kalkmann Brothers declare further on hide policy by Socrates, Captain Jeacord, from Ceara, to Hamburg. 2600 dry salted hides, valued at £2700. The balance which Messrs. Kalkmann Brothers have still open at your place is to the amount of £245, on Policy No. 13 (that is to say, policy of 12th Aug. for £3000), and £5000 on Policy No. 14 (that is to say, slip of 23rd Sept.), out of which £2500 can be declared by ship bill of lading, dated Jan. As the last policies, so far as I can remember, are running up to June, this declaration will be therefore quite in order. In case, then, that you are able to add on the same conditions another sum of £1100, you may further declare, and thus close the hide policy per Sophie, Captain Boltzen, from Ceara to Hamburg.

K.	1018	} 3444 dry salted hides, £3600.
K. K.	1260
K.	575
A.	591

Sophie is 5.6.1.1., K.'s own ship, and the Serie is so large that I hope you will have no difficulty in succeeding. In any case, I must request you to let me have at once a telegram from you. Bill of lading per Sophie is likewise dated January in the present year. Moreover, the said gentlemen are declaring on cotton, &c. Policy per Sophie, Captain Boltzen, from Ceara to Hamburg, U. K. 45 bales of cotton, valued at £340. I am looking forward to your telegraphic message, and beg meanwhile to remain yours, &c., S. H. SCHAFFLER.

20. In consequence of this letter, Mr. De Chapeaurouge called the same day upon the defendants, and saw their clerk, Mr. T. Lark. Mr. De Chapeaurouge endorsed on the back of the 3000*l.* policy of 12th Aug. 1869, which is referred to in the above letter as No. 13, a declaration of interest on hides, per Socrates, to the extent still open on the policy, viz., 245*l.*

21. He at the same time took the slip for the 5000*l.* policy of 23rd Sept. 1869, mentioned in paragraph 7, and filled up two slips, one for 2455*l.* on hides per Socrates, and the other for 2500*l.* on hides per Sophie.

22. Mr. De Chapeaurouge suggested to Mr. Lark that it would be more convenient for both parties to have two separate policies, instead of drawing up an open policy for 5000*l.* and then declaring on it for 4955*l.*, which would leave the small balance of 45*l.*, and Lark thereupon initialed the above declaration and the two slips, and in due course the policies were executed by the defendants.

23. It was admitted between the parties that the hides on which the plaintiffs and their principals were interested were loaded on board the Socrate, and not the Socrates, in the French Veritas mentioned, and that whilst on board that vessel, on a voyage from Ceara to Hamburg, they were lost by the perils insured against.

24. It was also admitted that there were in existence at the time of the insurance the two said vessels as described in the Veritas, and that the description therein given of them is correct, and that the risk on the Socrate was greater.

25. A copy of the several policies and of the pleadings are to form part of the case.

26. The cause came on for trial before Hannen, J., and a special jury, at the Guildhall sittings after Michaelmas Term 1870, when the learned judge left to the jury the question, amongst others, whether the parties in making the policies both meant to insure the hides by the vessel on which they were shipped, whatever her name might be, though they supposed her to be the Socrates, or whether the defendants meant to insure hides on board the Socrates.

27. The jury found for the plaintiffs upon the questions submitted to them, and the verdict was entered for the plaintiffs, subject to leave reserved to the defendants to enter a verdict for them or a nonsuit.

28. On the 14th Jan. 1871, the defendants obtained a rule nisi to set aside the verdict so entered for the plaintiffs and to enter a verdict for the defendants, or a nonsuit, pursuant to leave reserved by the learned judge, on the ground that no insurance ever was effected on goods on board the Socrate, and no loss was proved within the meaning of the several policies declared upon, or why a new trial should not be had between the parties on the ground that the learned judge misdirected the jury in putting to the jury as material whether they thought the parties intended to insure the hides by whatever ship they might be carried, or that there was any evidence proper to be submitted to them that the parties insured, or meant to insure hides carried by any other ship than the Socrates, and that they might properly find for the plaintiffs on the pleas of concealment and misrepresentation upon the evidence of the captain's name under the circumstances proved, and also on the ground that the verdict was against the evidence.

29. The rule came on for argument in Trinity Term 1871, when the court made it absolute to enter a verdict for the defendants upon the re-insurance policy, and discharged it as to the other. Against this judgment the defendants now appealed.

Milward, Q.C. (with him Murphy), for the defendants argued that there was a misrepresentation on the part of the plaintiffs, which exonerated

the defendants from liability on the policy. The policy was effected on goods shipped on the Socrates, whereas they were actually shipped on the Socrate, an old ship, thereby increasing the risk. If there were really no other vessel than the Socrate it might be said that the French name of the vessel was simply Anglicanised; but there being two distinct vessels, and of very different ages, the matter amounts to a material misrepresentation. The ordinary words found in other policies, "or by whatever other name or names the said ship should be called," are not found in the present policy. In Le Mesurier v. Vaughan (6 East, 382), where the broker had received instructions to insure goods by an American ship called the President, and by mistake insured as on a ship called the American President, and it was held that the plaintiffs might recover, notwithstanding the mistake, we find in the policy the words "or by whatever other name or names the same ship or the master was or should be named or called"—words sufficient to cover the case, but which are absent in the present instance. Lord Ellenborough, C.J., in the case referred to, relies, in giving judgment, on the presence of these words. He said, "Certainly a true description both of the name of the ship, and the voyage intended, should be observed to the extent which the terms of the policy itself require. But the framers of this policy, contemplating that there might be a mistake in the name given to the ship, have added these words, 'or by whatever name or names the same ship should be called;' they have therefore provided for the event which has occurred, of a mistake in the name." There was in reality no contract between the parties in the present case—no consensus ad idem. The slip is inadmissible to show the intention of the parties. 30 Vict. c. 23, s. 9, makes the slip inadmissible, enacting that "no policy shall be pleaded or given in evidence in any court, or admitted in any court to be good or available in law or equity unless duly stamped;" and sect. 4 provides that the word "policy" shall mean "any instrument whereby a contract or agreement for any sea insurance is made or entered into." In Mackenzie v. Coulson (L. Rep. 8 Eq. 368), where plaintiffs, underwriters, having executed to the defendants, iron merchants, a policy of marine insurance on a cargo which suffered loss, filed a bill for a rectification of the policy so as to make it conformable to that which they said was the real contract between the agents, in proof of which they produced in evidence the slip which was signed by their agent when presented at Lloyd's by a clerk of the defendants' insurance broker; the defendants denying that they ever entered or intended to enter into any contract other than that expressed by the policy, it was held that, as the slip formed no contract, and there was no binding agreement between the parties until the policy was signed, and the premium paid, the bill must be dismissed with costs. [CLEASBY, B., referred to Cory v. Patton, ante, p. 225; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 304.]

Cohen (with him Lanyon) for the plaintiffs.—First, there was no misrepresentation in this case. Paragraph 20 of the case describes what really took place. The prior conversation took place with Mr. De Chapeaurouge, and he had nothing to do with the policies sued on. There is no ground for supposing that the policies sued on were executed by reason of any preceding conversation; the two slips were given without reference to any such conversation. There is no evidence therefore, to show that the defendants were induced to execute the policy now in dispute by any misrepresentation. That the naming of a ship in a policy does not amount to a warranty that the vessel has that particular name, is well established by decided cases. They are collected in the last edition of Arnould on Marine Insurance, 4th edit., p. 316: "An insurance was effected on ship, as on a ship called the Leopard, it appeared that the name of the ship was in fact called the Leonard, and that she had never been called the Leopard, it being proved, however, that the ship lost was the same that the underwriters intended to insure, the court held that the variance did not affect the validity of the policy: (Hall v. Molineaux, before Lee, C.J., 17th Dec. 1744, cited 6 East, 385.) So where an American ship called the President was described in the policy as the good ship called the American Shin President; but it clearly appeared that the error was a blunder of the broker's clerk, and that the ship lost was really that on which the underwriters meant to insure, the error was held immaterial: (Le Mesurier v. Vaughan, 6 East, 382.) And the decision of the court was the same in another case, where a ship really called by the Spanish name of Las Tres Hermanas was described in the policy by an English translation of the name as The Three Sisters: (Clapham v. Cologan, 3 Camp. 382)." The reason is stated by Arnould to be that "as it is for the purpose of identification that such desirable accuracy derives its whole importance, misdescription by name, if not the source of error as to the subject designated, does not invalidate the policy. This is a general principle of law: nihil facit error nominis cum de corpore constat." Phillips on Insurance, par. 430, states the rule thus: "If the description designates the subject with sufficient certainty, or suggests the means of doing it, a mistake of the name of the ship or any other particulars, will not defeat the contract," referring to Pothier, Ins. n. 105, and Estrangin's note. 1 Emer. 159, c. 6, s. 2. [BRETT, J.—The only question really is—was the ship insured the ship intended to be insured? On this point the verdict of the jury is decisive, they having found that the parties intended to insure the hides by whatever ship they might be carried. Then as to the admissibility in evidence of the slip, the production of which was not objected to at the trial, Mackenzie v. Coulson (ubi sup.), decides only that it does not amount to a contract, which is not disputed. In Nicholson v. Power (3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 236; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 580), the defendant, an underwriter, signed a "slip" effecting an insurance on the freight of a certain ship, and at the time of his so signing it the plaintiff knew of, but did not communicate to the defendant, a fact which the court held to be a material fact which plaintiff was bound to communicate. The defendant subsequently, at a time when he was fully acquainted with this fact, signed a policy in conformity with the terms of the "slip," but also at the same time wrote a letter of protest to plaintiffs' brokers, declaring that he would resist any claim made under the policy. It was held in an action on the policy that it was vitiated by the concealment, and that the action was not maintainable;—in other words, so far as the present contention is concerned, that the "slip" might be looked at for some purposes. The section in the last Stamp Act has no such effect as contended for by the other side. It means merely that no unstamped policy shall be available as a contract of marine insurance. [KEATING, J.—Unstamped bills of exchange have often been received in evidence for collateral purposes.]

Murphy in reply.—There is no evidence to support the finding of the jury, that the underwriters intended to insure hides by any other ship than the Socrates. In the various cases cited of mistake in the name of the ship there was no evidence of the existence of any other ship than the one, so that no confusion or misunderstanding could arise. The case is quite different here, and the slip cannot be looked at to show that the parties intended to insure by any other ship than the Socrates. In Xenos v. Wickham (3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 537; L. Rep 2 Eng. & Ir. App. 314; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 800), Willes, J., says: "The statutes requiring contracts of marine insurance to be in writing and stamped (35 Geo. 3, c. 63, s. 11; 54 Geo. 3, c. 144, ss. 3, 4, 5) annul contracts not so framed; consequently a marine policy, or contract for a marine policy, to be valid, must be in writing, which by the assent of both parties shall represent the contract between them. But for the decided cases, it might have been supposed that upon the slip being completed there was a contract on the part of the assurers to prepare and hand over a policy according to the slip, and that although because of the statutes no action could be maintained as upon a policy of insurance, yet an action might be maintained for not preparing a policy; and causes have been tried without objection, upon the notion that the insurance is complete from the date of the slip. But the law, as settled by the decisions upon the construction of the statutes referred to, is that as there can be no valid insurance, or contract for an insurance, unless by writing, with the statutory requisites, the slip by itself has no binding force, . . . it follows that the slip, though complete, is no contract, nor even part of a contract of insurance, but a mere proposal that a policy of insurance shall be entered into in futuro, and in case of insurance with a company, a request that the policy shall be prepared at the office."

KELLY, C.B.—In this case the question we have to consider is, whether the verdict for the plaintiff in respect of the point reserved is supported by the evidence; and there is the further question, whether the slip which was received in evidence—received indeed, without objection made at the time—was admissible; whether it has been dealt with in any way which the law does not allow. Now, it is better in the first instance to consider the former question independently. The policy is upon hides coming from Brazil by a ship described as the ship Socrates, and the question which has arisen is, whether the ship the Socrates is so named as to make the particular ship the Socrates an essential part of the contract between the parties, or whether the contract was such, and intended to be such, and that not inconsistently with the language of the policy itself, as to be on any ship or ships by which the cargo of hides was coming from Brazil to England. When we come to look at the facts of the case, as they were given in evidence, we find that the ship Socrates is named in the policy, though it turns out that the ship on which these hides were placed was the ship Socrate, a French vessel. It appears that at an early period of the transactions between these parties several communications had taken place in which another ship, the Socrates, commanded by a Norwegian, named Albertsen, had been mentioned, and it also appeared that there was a ship, the Socrate, the commander of which was named Jeancard; and with respect to the question which has been determined by the Court of Queen's Bench in favour of the defendants, and as to which there is no appeal now before us, it became material to consider which of the two ships, the Socrates or the Socrate had really been intended. But in the case before us it appears that when the policy was about to be made—certain communications having taken place between these parties; but the house on whose behalf the plaintiff acted having been different altogether from the parties on whose behalf they acted in respect of the other policy, and a slip having been prepared on the 23rd Sept., and at a later period, that is, on the 3rd Feb.—when the policy in question was about to be entered into, the parties met. What occurred is stated in paragraph 20, 21, and 22 of the case. [His Lordship read these paragraphs.] It thus appears that this policy was framed and executed upon a declaration of a ship, or it may be a ship or ships, and the question arises, therefore, when we find the name Socrates is the name and description of the ship introduced, what was really intended? Whether upon the contract between the parties, and upon what took place between the parties at the time this policy was framed, it became at all material to consider the precise name of the ship; whether the contract was not pursuant to a declaration on a ship or ships, and consequently whether it was competent to the party to name any ship he thought fit, and in pursuance of that accordingly the name Socrates was introduced; and for that purpose it became absolutely necessary and inevitable that the question should be considered what it was that the parties really intended. But where a policy is framed upon a previous arrangement between the parties that it is to be upon ship or ships to be declared, or upon the cargo of a ship or ships to be declared, it becomes absolutely necessary then to see what is declared. In order to see whether the precise name of the ship is material at all, authorities have been cited to shew that in a certain class of cases the precise name of the ship is really immaterial. A mistake in the name of the ship, as for example, mentioning the Leopard instead of the Leonard, is perfectly immaterial to the insurance. The question is, whether this is not a case of the same nature, and whether, therefore, the parties did really enter into this policy in pursuance of some arrangement between them, that it was to be a policy on a cargo of hides by a ship or ships to be declared. Evidence to this effect as stated in the paragraphs which I have read was given. It is not disputed that hides to the value insured were in fact shipped on board the Socrate by the parties interested, and that they had no hides whatever on board the Socrates, and that the Socrate was totally lost with the hides on board. My brother Hannen reserved leave to the defendants to move to enter the verdict for them on all or any of the issues, subject to the finding of the jury on the question he left to them, which was whether the parties, in entering into the contract, meant to insure hides by the vessel on which they were actually shipped, whatever her name might be, though they supposed it to be the

Socrates, or whether the defendants meant to insure hides on board the Socrates. The jury answered this question in favour of the plaintiffs, and the consequence is, that upon these facts, and the mode in which this transaction was conducted between these two parties, De Chapeaurouge, who represented the plaintiffs, and Lark, who represented the defendants, the naming of the ship really did become wholly immaterial. The question, therefore, to be determined was, whether that was so, and what it was that the parties really intended. The jury have found that they intended, in effect, that the insurance should be made upon hides by the vessel on board of which they were actually shipped, whatever her name might be, although the one party may have supposed it to be the Socrates. In preparing the slips, and executing the policy, they acted in a very irregular manner—first, in splitting the slip of the 23rd Sept. into two slips, and then in indorsing it and preparing the policy in the way they did, naming the Socrates in it. Although that was so, the real question is, what they intended to do—whether they intended that this transaction should be a transaction and policy upon ship or ships to be declared. Well, the jury have found that they did; and if that be so, the name of the ship—I mean the orthography of the name—becomes almost immaterial; and no question arose whether the parties meant the Norwegian ship Socrates; and secondly, no question arose whether there was any misrepresentation with respect to that ship. Well, the jury having found that the parties intended to effect this insurance on ship or ships, there is an end of the question of the materiality of the name Socrate or Socrates which was given to the ship in the policy. But the question still remains, first, whether the slip was admissible in evidence at all; and, secondly, if it were, whether it was admissible in evidence for the purpose for which alone it was used on the trial of this cause. Now, it is quite true that under the statute in question the document called a slip, although it constitutes a contract, binding in point of honour, between parties circumstanced like these parties were, with a view to a policy of insurance, is utterly void to all intents and purposes, utterly unavailable as an agreement for insurance, and for such a purpose is not admissible in evidence. It is not like an agreement for a lease, where an action can be brought for the non-acceptance of the lease, or the refusal to grant a lease, and the agreement may be given in evidence to show the obligation imposed on one party or the other, and is treated as, and really is, a binding contract. This slip, by force of the statute, is in truth no contract at all. It is utterly useless, utterly unavailable for the purpose of enforcing the performance of the contract; but it does not follow that it is not admissible in evidence for a great variety of purposes. It is unnecessary to do more than to consider whether it is admissible in evidence in the present case for the purposes of showing what the two parties intended at the time they made the policy; in other words, whether they intended it to be a policy pursuant to a previous contract, though not binding—a contract namely for insurance on ship or ships to be declared. For that purpose it was receivable in evidence. In the first place, it may be observed that its admissibility was not objected to, and on that ground alone I do not think that we could be called upon to hold that it was inadmissible in evidence; but if had been applied to a purpose forbidden by the Act of Parliament, I, for one, should not have hesitated to say that it ought not to be admitted in evidence, or if admitted, applied to any such purpose. But for all purposes to which it may be applied, in all cases where a fraud is suggested, in all cases where there is a plea, as there is here, of misrepresentation, the slip may be evidence of a representation which may turn out to be false. For example, supposing a slip of this nature, although it constitutes no binding contract, had been made with a view to the insurance from a port in South America, which had been under blockade a little while before the contract was entered into, but the slip, prepared at the instance, I will suppose, of the plaintiff, had described the port as an open port, and the question had arisen, not upon the slip, but upon the collateral question of whether the policy had been procured by misrepresentation of some fact material or essential with reference to entering into the policy, and the misrepresentation was alleged to be that a port which to the knowledge of the parties who had made and signed the slip, was under blockade, had nevertheless been described as an open port, and it had been expressly stated on the slip that the blockade had been raised and had ceased, in such a case no one can doubt that upon the collateral question of fraud, the collateral question of whether one of the parties to the insurance had been guilty of misrepresentation, the slip would for that purpose have been admissible in evidence. It is quite enough, therefore, to say that here the slip was not given in evidence to prove a binding contract between the parties, or to contradict, or to explain, or in any way affect the construction of the policy in question; but that it was given in evidence only inasmuch as it had been looked at, and considered, and found a guard to the parties who arranged the contract, to show what their intention was in preparing the policy. I am clearly of opinion that for that purpose it was admissible in evidence, and that it might be used for that purpose; and when we come to consider that the question is not whether this was a binding contract, or what was the contract which had been contained in the slip, but what these two parties who prepared and framed the policy intended at the time, in other words whether they intended it should be a policy on ship or ships to be declared, for that purpose, as it appeared they acted on the slip, and prepared from the slip two other slips from which the policy was prepared, it was admissible. It is quite impossible to decide this question without looking at the slip upon which the parties, though they were under no obligation to act upon it, did nevertheless act in this particular transaction. Upon the question as to what was meant, and whether it was not meant that this should be a policy on ship or ships to be declared, the evidence is decisive. The parties, in order to determine on the form of the policy, how it should be prepared, looked to this slip, took it into their hands, considered its effect, what it was that had by this slip been arranged, and finding it was to be an insurance on the cargo of a ship or ships to be declared, they prepared the two other slips and executed the policy in question. Under these circumstances it appears to us that the question was correctly left to the jury, and there was evidence by means of this slip which, though not a binding contract, the parties acted on as a binding contract, which showed that the parties did intend it should be a policy upon the hides by a ship or ships, and that, consequently, the policy was prepared in its present form. The name of the ship is immaterial, and, consequently, the plaintiffs were entitled to the benefit of the policy and the verdict of the jury; and, inasmuch as it was open to them to declare any ship or ships they thought fit, the declaration of a wrong name from whichever point of view it is considered became wholly immaterial.

TAUBMAN v. THE PACIFIC STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY.

Carriage by sea—Wilful act and default—Exemption of carrier from liability, under special contract.

A special contract, entered into between a shipowner and a passenger by sea, contained a provision that the shipowner would not be answerable for loss of baggage "under any circumstances whatsoever."

Held, that such a stipulation covers the case of wilful default and misfeasance by the shipowner's servants.

Martin v. The Great Indian Peninsular Railway Company (17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 349; 37 L. J. 27, Ex.; L. Rep. 3 Ex. 9) explained.

THE plaintiff became a passenger on one of the defendants' vessels from Rio Janeiro to England. On taking his passage he signed a contract by which the company engaged to carry him and his luggage upon condition, among other things, that the company would not be answerable for loss of or damage to the luggage "under any circumstances whatsoever." On the voyage, the plaintiff's portmanteau was lost through the negligence of the defendant company's servants. The plaintiff brought an action for the loss of the portmanteau, averring in the declaration that the loss was occasioned by the wilful act and default of the defendants.

To this the defendants pleaded, setting out the terms of the contract.

Replication, that the defendants did not use proper skill and care, but were guilty of gross negligence and wilful default, and that, by reason of the said gross negligence and wilful default, the loss was occasioned, and demurrer to the plea.

Demurrer to the replication.

Garth, Q.C. (with him Morgan Howard) for the plaintiffs.—The act complained of is a wrongful act of the defendants' own doing, against the consequences of which no form of contract can protect them. The contract would protect the defendants in a case of ordinary negligence, but not in a case of wilful misfeasance or default. The courts have never held that a company could screen itself from liability in such cases, and it was to prevent such attempts that the Railway and Canal Traffic Act) 17 & 18 Vict. c. 31) was passed. He cited:

Peck v. The North Staffordshire Railway Company, in the House of Lords, 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 768; 32 L. J. 241, Q. B.; 10 H. L. Cas. 743;

Story on Bailments, s. 549;

Martin v. The Great India Peninsular Railway Company, 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 349; 37 L. J. 27, Ex.; L. Rep. 3 Ex. 9.

Cohen for the defendants was not called upon.

KELLY, C.B.—The defendants in this case are entitled to our judgment. It is only necessary to read the contract in order to decide this case. The defendants are not to be liable for the loss of luggage "under any circumstances." The "gross negligence" of the defendants' servants is a "circumstance"; so is "wilful default." If the act had been actually done by the shipowners, the act would have been a trespass, whatever the contract might be. But this is the act of the servants, and the action is really one for breach of contract. Martin v. The Great Indian Peninsular Railway Company is distinguishable, for there the freedom from liability only extended to the time during which the baggage was to be in the charge of the troops.

MARTIN, B.—I am of the same opinion, as far as I can see from the imperfect statement of facts we have before us. The defendants are not under the liabilities of common carriers, and they are free to make any terms they choose. Probably the words in the special contract were inserted for the very purpose of exempting the company from liability for the acts of their servants.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am of the same opinion. Prima facie, the defendants are not liable, for the contract says they are not to be liable for the loss of baggage under "any circumstances." A loss has occurred under certain circumstances, and the plaintiffs are seeking to recover. Next, we must consider is there any implied exception? I am of opinion that there cannot be, for the parties could easily have expressed it; see the judgment of Maule, J., in Borradaile v. Hunter (5 M. & G. 639; 12 L. J. N. S. 225, C. P.) Then it is urged that in certain cases the Legislature have interfered. That, as far as it goes, is against the plaintiff's case. And the court will not extend the Railway and Canal Traffic Act further than they can help, for it has been already the cause of more dishonest transactions than any Act of Parliament.

CLEASBY, B.—What is the meaning of the word "circumstances"? I find in Johnson's Dictionary that the word "circumstance," in a legal sense, means "one of the adjuncts of a fact, which makes it more or less criminal." Arguing from this definition of "circumstance" by analogy, I should think the words in the contract will cover the present case.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.Reported by J. SHORTT, M. W. MCKELLAR, ESQRS.,

Ex parte MICHAEL.

County Court—Admiralty jurisdiction—Claim for necessaries supplied to a ship—Owner domiciled in England or Wales—Time for taking objection—Prohibition.

Where a suit is instituted in a County Court (Admiralty Jurisdiction) under 31 & 32 Vict. c. 71, s. 3, for necessaries supplied to a ship, the objection that the owner or part owner of the ship is domiciled in England or Wales (24 Vict. c. 10, s. 5) must be taken before judgment is pronounced. Where the objection is taken for the first time after judgment has been pronounced, a prohibition will not be granted.

A SUIT was instituted in the County Court of Bristol (under 31 & 32 Vict. c. 71, s. 3) for necessaries supplied to a ship, which was at the time in the port of Bristol, and judgment was given for the plaintiff. After judgment had been given an application was made on behalf of the owner, Mr. Michael, to the judge to stay proceedings, on the ground that Mr. Michael was domiciled in England. The judge having refused to give the owner relief on the ground that this objection to the jurisdiction should have been taken at the trial, and that the domicile of the owner should then have been proved to the court.

R. E. Webster moved for a prohibition.—The County Court jurisdiction in a suit for necessaries is given by 31 & 32 Vict. c. 71, s. 3, sub-sect. 2, which enacts that "Any County Court having admiralty jurisdiction shall have jurisdiction, and all powers and authorities relating thereto, to try and determine subject and according to the provisions of this Act the following causes. . . . As to any claim for towage, necessaries, or wages, any cause in which the amount claimed does not exceed 150*l.*" The County Court jurisdiction as to such suits cannot exceed that conferred on the High Court of Admiralty, and the jurisdiction of the High Court is limited by 24 Vict. c. 10, s. 5, which provides that "the Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim for necessaries supplied to any ship elsewhere than in the port to which the ship belongs, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that at the time of the institution of the cause any owner or part owner of the ship is domiciled in England or Wales." [BLACKBURN, J.—That was not shown to the County Court judge until after judgment was given. LUSH, J.—If the judge had jurisdiction to pronounce judgment, we cannot interfere, and he clearly had jurisdiction when it was not shown "that at the time of the institution of the cause, any owner or part owner was domiciled in England or Wales."] There was no opportunity of raising the objection at the hearing, for the defendant was absent and had no legal advice. The statute fixes no time for showing this, and it ought to be open to an owner or part owner to show it at any time before the ship is sold. [BLACKBURN, J.—The statute says the court is to have jurisdiction unless a certain thing is shown to its satisfaction. That must mean that this thing must be shown whilst the court is still seised of the case, and before judgment has been pronounced.]

VOL. I. N. S.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I am clearly of opinion that there ought to be no rule in this case. The case is not one to which a writ of prohibition could properly be applied by this court. It is conceded that the County Court had jurisdiction over the subject matter of the suit, and the only ground on which the judge could be called on not to proceed is that it should be shown to his satisfaction that the owner, or some part owner of the vessel, is domiciled in England or Wales. That is a thing which must be shown to the court. And when must it be shown? Before the court has pronounced judgment. If it is shown afterwards, it may be a ground for appealing to the court itself to grant a new trial, but is not a case for a prohibition. The judge had jurisdiction unless a particular defence was set up which was not set up. It is said that the defendant was absent and was inops consilii, but any attorney could readily have explained to him the position in which he was.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. The general rule of the common law was that where necessaries were supplied to a ship at home the Court of Admiralty had no jurisdiction, but if the necessaries were supplied abroad then the Court of Admiralty had jurisdiction. Sect. 5 of 24 Vict. c. 10, enacts that "the High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim for necessaries supplied to any ship elsewhere than in the port to which the ship belongs, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that at the time of the institution of the cause, any owner or part owner of the ship is domiciled in England or Wales." It seems to me to be clearly intended by this that the Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction though the necessaries are supplied in England, just as if they had been supplied abroad. If, however, the owner or any part owner, is domiciled in England or Wales, this is an exception; and the court is not to have jurisdiction if that is shown to its satisfaction before judgment is given. The objection in the present case does not seem to have been taken until after judgment was pronounced, and then it was, I think, too late.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I may add another reason why the objection must be taken before judgment is pronounced. The fact of the domicile of the owner or part owner may be a matter in dispute between the parties on which evidence is to be given by both sides, and the court may have to determine the matter before giving judgment for either side.

Rule refused.

Bailee—Wharfinger—Detention of goods by—Collusive transfer of bill of lading.

The plaintiff, a merchant abroad, received an order for wine from L, and accordingly shipped certain cases thereof to him in London, also forwarding a bill of lading. Before the arrival of the vessel L deposited the bill of lading with the defendant, a wharfinger, directing him to warehouse the goods on account of L. The wine came, and was warehoused by the wharfinger, who entered it in L.'s name, but subject to a stop order put on it by the shipowner for freight, pursuant to 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, s. 28. L. declined to accept the wine, as not equal to sample. The plaintiff thereupon agreed to take it back, and L. promised to send a delivery order to enable him to obtain it, but did not do so, and it afterwards appeared that L. had, on the same day, indorsed the bill of lading to one M., who thereby caused the wine to be transferred into his own name in the books of the wharfinger. The plaintiff demanded the wine from the latter, offering to pay all charges, and to indemnify him against other claims, but the defendant having given warrants to M., refused delivery. The jury found that the transfer of the bill of lading from L. to M. was collusive and not for value. An action of detinue having been brought by the plaintiff against the defendant, Held, that the wharfinger had no better title than L., his bailor, who could not have justified a detention of the wine, and consequently the plaintiff was entitled to recover.

THIS was an action of detinue to recover 200 cases of wine, which had been deposited by one Leah with the defendant, the proprietor of a sufferance wharf, under the following circumstances:

The wine had been ordered by Leah of the plaintiff, and was shipped by him, consigned to Leah, on the 20th Jan. 1870. The bill of lading and invoice were forwarded in due course. Before the arrival of the vessel, which was on the 12th Feb. 1870, Leah deposited the bill of lading at the defendant's wharf, with directions to take delivery and warehouse the goods on his account. This was done, the shipowner putting on a stop order for freight, pursuant to 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, s. 68, and the wine was entered in Leah's name, subject to the freight. On the 19th Feb. Leah, having in the meantime sampled the wines, gave notice to the plaintiff that they were not according to contract, and that he refused to accept them. A correspondence thereupon ensued, which led to no satisfactory result, and on the 19th April the plaintiff came to London, and called on Leah, when it was agreed that the wine should be taken back, and Leah promised to send a delivery order to enable the plaintiff to obtain it. This, however, he failed to do.

It appeared that on the same day on which he had thus promised to deliver to the plaintiff, he had endorsed the bill of lading to Magnus, and that Magnus took it to the defendant's, and procured a transfer of the goods into his own name.

In the beginning of May the plaintiff, not having succeeded in obtaining the delivery order, called at the docks to make inquiry, and in consequence of what took place his attorney wrote to Leah on the subject, and received an answer that the wine was at the disposal of the plaintiff, but subject to charges which were stated to amount to 22l. 14s. 9d. After an ineffectual attempt to see Leah, an appointment was made to meet at the office of the plaintiff's attorney on the 27th May, when, instead of Leah, Magnus came. He said he was ready to give up the wine on payment of the sum which had been previously named by Leah. That amount according to an account which he then showed, was made up of 17l. 14s. 9d. for charges, and 5l. for loss of profit. The attorney tendered the former sum, but refused to pay the 5l. for loss of profit. Magnus promised to see Leah and send an answer the same afternoon, but this he never did. On the 10th June the plaintiff's attorney, having ascertained where the wines were deposited, called on the defendant, showed the correspondence to his manager, and explained the transaction, and then, in order to get possession of the goods, offered to pay all the charges and indemnify the defendant against the claim of any other person. The defendant refused to deliver, on the ground that he had given warrants for the wine to Magnus. Ultimately the wines were delivered up to another person by Magnus's order.

It further appeared that Magnus, into whose name the wines had, as above stated, been transferred on the 19th of April, had on the 3rd June paid the freight and obtained warrants for delivery to him or his order, and that a transfer had then been made from Magnus to the holder of the warrants. Magnus stated at the trial that he had bonâ fide advanced money to Leah on the wine, but this was negatived by the jury, who found that the transaction between Magnus and Leah was colourable, and with knowledge on the part of Magnus of the intention of Leah to deprive the plaintiff of the wine.

The Lord Chief Justice, before whom the cause was tried, thereupon directed a verdict to be entered for the plaintiff for 150l., with leave to the defendant to move (subject to the finding of the jury) to enter a verdict for him, the court to have power to draw any inferences of fact not inconsistent with that finding, a rule having been obtained according to leave reserved.

Gibbons (McCull with him).—These goods were originally the plaintiff's, and the only question is whether he parted with the property so as to vest it in any other person. A bailee is to give the bailed goods back to the bailor, unless the true owner steps forward and claims them. So "a party with whom an article is pledged undertakes to return it to the pledgor, provided it turns out not to be the property of another;" (Cheeseman v. Excell, 6 Ex. 344; 20 L. J. 209 Ex., per Pollock, C.B., citing Ogle v. Atkinson, 5 Taunt. 759.) Leah's position was only that of a holder of a bill of lading. But as Lord Campbell said in Gurney v. Behrend (23 L. J. 265, Q. B.), "A bill of lading is not like a bill of exchange or promissory note a negotiable instrument which passes by mere delivery to a bonâ fide transferee for valuable consideration, without regard to the title of the parties who make the transfer." And as against the plaintiff the defendant can have no better title than Leah. In Wilson v. Anderton (1 B. & Ad. 450) the captain of a ship, who had taken goods on freight, and claimed to have a lien upon them, delivered them to the bailee. The real owner demanded them of the latter, and he refused to deliver them without the direction of the bailor. Held that the bailor not having any lien upon the goods, the refusal by the bailee was sufficient evidence of a conversion. At the time the plaintiff here claimed the goods they were in the defendant's keeping, and the latter was quite aware of the circumstances. There is no estoppel in this case whatever. "The indorsement of a delivery order or dock warrant has not (independently of the Factors' Acts) any effect beyond that of a token of an authority to receive possession": (Blackburn on Sales, 297, as cited in Benjamin on Sale, p. 614.) The wharfinger cannot stand in a better position than the captain of a ship in the case above referred to, who recovered the wine; and the jury have found collusion between Leah and Magnus, which defeats the effect of the transfer: (Cuming v. Brown, 9 East 506). These goods, being at a sufferance wharf were, in contemplation of law, still on board ship: (Meyerstein v. Barber, 22 L. T. Rep. N.S. 808; L. Rep. 4 H. L. 317.) The property never passed from the plaintiff. The property certainly did not vest on shipment (Brandt v. Bowlby, 2 B. & Ad. 932), and could not vest until the goods were accepted, but when seen by Leah were rejected. The plaintiff who would recover them from him can likewise recover them from the defendants.

Q. B.]

HARRIS v. SCARAMANGA.

Ingham (H. James, Q. C. with him) in support of the rule—Admitting that the property of the goods was in the plaintiff, Leah would have no answer to an action by him. But the wharfingers are in a better position than Leah. The goods arrived with a bill of lading. The defendants, keeping a sufferance wharf, are in the place of the shipowners, therefore the goods were still in transitu. The plaintiff says, however, by his bill of lading, "I authorize you to hold this wine to the order of Leah." In Meyerstein v. Barber (sup.), it was held that "where goods are at sea the parting with the bill of lading, which is the symbol of the goods, is parting with the ownership of the goods themselves. The same principle applies to goods which, for the convenience of parties, have been landed at a sufferance wharf (11 & 12 Vict. c. xviii. and 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, s. 67). As long as the engagement of the shipowner has not been completely fulfilled, the bill of lading is a living instrument, and the transfer of it for value passes the absolute property in the goods." Here the shipowners deliver to the defendants, under a bill of lading, giving them authority to transfer the goods to Leah. An entry is made in the wharfinger's books by Leah prior to the arrival of the wine, and when it reaches the wharf he proceeds there, and causes a fresh entry to be made, and there was an authority to hand over the goods, coupled with an interest, and that being so the plaintiff could not revoke it: (Wood v. Leadbitter, 13 M. & W. 838.) In Walker v. Rostron (9 M. & W. 42), Lord Abinger, C. B., said: "This is a case of a party engaging himself to appropriate the proceeds of the goods according to certain directions of the owner, and appears to us to fall within that class of cases where, when an order has been given to a person who holds goods to appropriate them in a particular manner, and he has engaged to do so, none of the parties are at liberty, without the consent of all, to alter that arrangement." Therefore, even if what took place in May was notice not to deliver to Leah, yet nevertheless it was not competent to the owner to revoke the authority which he had given. But there was no revocation: (Williams v. Everett, 14 East, 582.) There such an authority was held revocable, because the broker had not entered into a subsidiary arrangement. [LUSH, J.—What point do you make on the Sufferance Wharf Acts?] That the shipowner not being paid his freight, is entitled to hold the goods, and, therefore, the defendants are likewise entitled, for the wine was landed at their wharf under a stop for freight. [LUSH, J.—Leah received the goods and entered them in his own name.] The freight was not paid for some time. No warrants were given until the freight was paid. [LUSH, J.—Your conversion was not only a refusal to deliver, but a delivery to some one else.] The defendant had warrants to deliver.

[MELLOR, J.—But to Magnus; and the jury have found that Magnus and Leah were identified with each other.] It is quite consistent with the evidence that Leah was entitled to get possession of this wine as against the plaintiff. Martin, B., in Meyerstein v. Barber (16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 569; L. Rep. 2 C. P. 676), says: "For many years past there have been two symbols of property in goods imported; the one the bill of lading, the other the wharfinger's certificate or warrant. Until the latter is issued by the wharfinger, the former remains the only symbol of property in the goods." [COCKBURN, C. J.—The important question, is how far an attornment to a particular individual binds the bailee so as to compel him to yield to the demand of the person to whom he has attorned, when in the meantime he becomes aware that the property is in anyone else.]

Cour. adv. vult.

July 6.—The judgment of the COURT (Cockburn, C. J., Mellor and Lush, JJ.) was delivered by Mellor, J., who, after stating the facts as above set out, proceeded as follows:—It was admitted that Leah, if he had been the defendant, would have had no answer to the action; but it was ingeniously contended by Mr. Ingham that, as the defendant received the goods for the shipowner, subject to his lien for freight, he stood in all respects in the position of the shipowner, and when the freight was paid was bound to deliver according to the bill of lading, and that the transfer by direction of Leah to Magnus, and the giving the delivery warrant to Magnus, amounted to a delivery to Leah, and discharged the defendant. We are of opinion that this argument is fallacious. The defendant received the goods as bailee to Leah, and, although he might have justified detaining them on behalf of the shipowner for his freight, yet when that was paid he held in no other than the ordinary relation of bailee, and could have no better title than his bailor had. Then by the finding of the jury Magnus had no better title than Leah, and, as the plaintiff had tendered the amount of charges both to Magnus and the defendant, the plaintiff's title was as good against the defendant as it would have been against Leah. We therefore discharge the rule.

HARRIS v. SCARAMANGA.

Policy of insurance—Place of adjustment—General average loss—Law of port of Bremen—Liability of underwriters—Foreign average statement.

Action upon a policy of insurance on a voyage from Tugenrog to Bremen. The ship, through stress of weather, was obliged to put into Constantinople, and the master there executed a bottomry bond on ship, freight, and cargo, for the purpose of raising money to repair the ship, so that she might continue the voyage. The ship was again obliged to put into Malta in distress, where the master executed a second bottomry bond on the ship, freight, and cargo.

On the ship's arrival at Bremen the master was unable to take up either bond, and the consignees of the cargo, to obtain possession, paid off the holders of both bonds. A statement of average was drawn up by an average stater at Bremen, in which the ship and freight was charged with the sum of 1185*l.* 11*s.*

The underwriters paid the plaintiff the sum with which the cargo was charged. The shipowner being unable to pay his share the ship was sold, when a sum of 663*l.* 2*s.* 10*d.* still remained unsatisfied.

It was admitted that such a loss was treated by the law of Bremen as a general average loss.

The policy, which was in the usual form, contained in the margin the following conditions, "To pay general average as per foreign statement if so made up."

In an action on behalf of the consignees of the cargo against the underwriters for the unsatisfied sum.

Held, that the defendants were bound by the foreign average statement, both as to the facts and as to the law of general average at the port of Bremen, and that the plaintiffs were, therefore, entitled to the sum awarded by the average stater.

Per Brett, J., that although the underwriter of a policy in the ordinary form is not liable to indemnify against general average loss, whether according to the law of his own country, or according to the law of a foreign country, if the general average loss be not made in order to avert loss by a peril insured against; yet that the construction of the policy "To pay general average as per foreign statement" must be considered as an obligation to indemnify the assured against any loss which might fall upon him by compulsion at the foreign port of adjustment.

THIS was a special case stated for the opinion of the court, pursuant to an order of Byles J., made with the consent of the parties. The action was brought upon a policy of insurance for 4160*l.* to recover a loss of 663*l.* 10*s.* The declaration contained special counts on the policy for a general average loss, and on the suing and labouring clauses, and for a loss according to a foreign average statement made up with the terms of the policy, and there were also the common money counts for money had and received, and for money paid and for interest. The defendants pleaded a denial of the general average loss, and a denial of the loss under the suing and labouring clause, and that the claim upon the policy had been satisfied by payments, and to the money counts that they never were indebted. Before the case came on to be tried, by consent of the parties the above-mentioned order was made and the action was submitted for the decision of the court.

1. The plaintiffs and the defendants are corn-factors, and carry on their business respectively in the city of London, where the policy of insurance on which this action was brought, was underwritten by the defendants. The said policy is on 3122 chetwerts of rye by the ship Bella Leandra, on a voyage from Taganrog to Bremen. It contained a clause to pay general average as per foreign statement, if so made up, and was underwritten for 4160*l.*, being the whole sum thereby insured.

2. The plaintiffs bought the cargo of rye of the defendants on behalf of their principals Messrs. Bacmeister and Stone. These last-named gentlemen again sold the cargo to Messrs. Kneist and Todeman, who again sold it to Messrs. Bolte and Co., of Bremen. The policy in question, and the bill of lading of the rye were first handed by the defendants to the plaintiffs, who passed them on to their principals, Messrs. Bacmeister and Stone. Thus, ultimately, the documents came into the hands of Bolte and Co., as final owners of the cargo.

3. The Bella Leandra was an Italian vessel. She sailed from Taganrog on the voyage insured, on or about 22nd Sept. 1867, having on board the said cargo of rye. After leaving Taganrog she encountered very severe weather, and was, in the month of Oct. 1867, compelled to put into Constantinople in distress. There Capt. Schiaffino, the master of the ship, in order to raise the money necessary for repairs, so as to enable the ship to continue the voyage, executed a bottomry bond, dated 17th Feb. 1868, on the ship, freight, and cargo, to secure the repayment of the capital sum of 2120*l.*, with maritime interest at 11 per cent. which, on the said ship's arrival at Bremen, amounted to the sum of 2353*l.* 4*s.*, to Herman Helbing, merchant, of Constantinople, who advanced him that sum. It is to be assumed, for the purposes of this case that the said bond was and is valid and binding on the said cargo.

4. The Bella Leandra sailed from Constantinople, on or about 23rd Feb. 1868, and again met with very bad weather, and on or about 26th March 1868, the captain was compelled to put into Malta in distress. There again, in order to raise the money necessary for repairs, so as to be able to continue the voyage, the captain executed a bottomry bond, dated 20th April 1868, on ship, freight, and cargo. This last-mentioned bond was for the capital sum of 442*l.* 15*s.*, with maritime interest at 5 per cent., which, on the arrival of the said ship at Bremen, amounted to the sum of 465*l.* 6*s.* 5*d.*, and was in favour of Mr. Ignazio Buttigieg, merchant, of Malta, on behalf of the firm of Guiseppe Buttigieg e figlii, who advanced that sum. It is to be assumed for the purposes of this case that the said bond was and is valid and binding upon the said cargo.

5. The said Messrs. Bolte and Co., who are merchants carrying on business at Bremen, had in the meantime become the purchasers of the rye, and this action is brought by the plaintiffs as trustees for the said Messrs. Bolte and Co.

6. The ship sailed from Malta on or about the 1st of May, and on or about the 25th of June she arrived at Bremen, Messrs. Bolte and Co. being the consignees of the cargo.

7. The bond which was executed at Constantinople had been endorsed by Hermann Helling to the order of the said Messrs. Bolte and Co., who took it up, and on the arrival of the ship at Bremen the captain was unable to pay the same, or any part thereof.

8. The bond which was executed at Malta had been endorsed by Guiseppe Buttigieg and Co. to the order of, and was taken up by, the defendants, and by them endorsed to Messrs. W. A. Fritz and Co., of Bremen, and as the said captain was unable to redeem the same the said Messrs. W. A. Fritz and Co. demanded payment thereof from the said Messrs. Bolte and Co., the consignees of the cargo. The said Messrs. Bolte and Co., in order to prevent the holders thereof from covering their claims by a sale of the said cargo, took up the said bonds and paid off the holders thereof. By taking this course, which was the only course they could take, the said Messrs. Bolte and Co. obtained a delivery of the cargo.

HARRIS v. SCARAMANGA.

9. A statement of average dated the 3rd of Aug. 1868, was prepared by Heinrich Tecklenborg, an average stater in Bremen, in which the loss arising upon the said bottomry bonds was apportioned between the cargo and the ship and freight. By the said statement the amount of 1088*l.* 14*s.* 11*d.* was the proportion shown as falling upon the cargo, and the amount of 1185*l.* 11*s.* was shown as falling upon the ship and freight.

10. No question arises as to the said sum of 1088*l.* 14*s.* 11*d.*, which, it is admitted, is properly chargeable on the defendants as underwriters on the cargo, and the defendants have paid the same to the said Messrs. Bolte and Co. accordingly.

11. The said Captain Schiaffino was unable to pay or to give any security for the said sum of 1185*l.* 11*s.*, the said proportion of the said loss so falling on the said ship and freight, according to the said average statement or any part thereof.

12. The said Messrs. Bolte and Co., in order to obtain payment of the said sum of 1185*l.* 11*s.*, the said proportion of the said bottomry moneys so as aforesaid falling upon the said ship and freight, have applied to the Tribunal of Commerce at Bremen, the same being a court of competent jurisdiction in that behalf, to order the said ship to be sold, and the proceeds to be applied in or towards the liquidation of the said amount. The said Tribunal of Commerce duly made the said order, and after the requisite public notices had been given the said ship was, with due observance of all legal form, sold by public auction by one Gotfried Steinmeyer, a ship broker, at Bremen, on or about the 12th Sept. 1868, under the order of the said Tribunal of Commerce for 4450 thalers gold, equal to 129*l.* 10*s.* 2*d.* sterling, or thereabouts being the highest price that could be obtained for her, and the net proceeds of the said sale were handed over to the said Messrs. Bolte and Co. under the order of the said Tribunal.

13. After deducting the said net proceeds of the said sale from the said sum of 1185*l.* 11*s.* so falling upon the said ship and freight according to the said average statement of the 3rd Aug. 1868 as aforesaid, there remained a balance of 663*l.* 2*s.* 10*d.* of the said sum so as aforesaid falling on the said ship and freight, in respect of which the said Messrs. Bolte and Co. were still unsatisfied, and a further or supplemental average statement, dated the 3rd Oct. 1868, was made up by the said Heinrich Tecklenborg, in which the said sum of 663*l.* 2*s.* 10*d.* was stated as the amount which the cargo had to pay as additional bottomry debt to the said Messrs. Bolte and Co. It is admitted that the said last mentioned average statement of the 3rd Oct. 1868, as well as the said former statement of the 3rd Aug., is in all respects accurate as to amounts and figures, and is correctly made up in accordance with the law in force in Bremen.

14. Such a loss as that which has occurred in the present case is treated at Bremen as a general average loss, and not as a particular average loss. At Bremen the German code of commercial law is by legislative enactment in force. The sections of that code which enunciate the principles of law more particularly applicable to the present case are articles 695, 697, 734, 735, 824, sub-sect. 5, and 838, sub-sect. 1. Either party is, on the argument of this case, to be at liberty to refer to a copy of the said code, which was identified by several witnesses under the commission which was sent to Bremen.

Art. 692. All the objects hypothecated are jointly and severally liable to the bottomry creditor. Even before his claims become due the creditor can, after the arrival of the vessel in the port of destination of the Bottomry voyage, apply for an arrest of all the bottomried objects.

Art. 695. The master shall not deliver the bottomried cargo, either entirely or partially, before the creditor has been paid or properly secured, otherwise the master is personally answerable to the creditor for the bottomry debt, so far as he could at the time of their delivery have been paid by the goods so given up; until the contrary is proved, it shall be considered that the creditor could have been paid in full.

Art. 697. If the amount of bottomry is not paid when due, the creditor may apply to the proper court to order the sale of the ship and cargo on which bottomry has been taken, and also to hand over the bottomried freight. The action shall be brought, as far as the ship and freight are concerned, against the master or owner; as to the cargo, if before its delivery, against the master; after its delivery, against the consignee, so long as it is in his own possession, or in the custody of any person holding it for his account. If the master, in order to continue his voyage for the purpose of an expenditure that does not come under general average, has hypothecated the cargo, or has disposed of the cargo by sale or by appropriation, the loss sustained by one proprietor of the cargo by reason that his claim for indemnification cannot be at all, or cannot be fully satisfied, out of the ship and freight (Art. 509, 510, 618) shall be borne by all the proprietors of the cargo, according to the principles of general average. In ascertaining the loss, the indemnification indicated in Art. 713 is applicable in relation to the proprietors of the cargo in all cases, especially also in the case of the second paragraph of Art. 613, for the value of which this indemnification is determined, the goods so sold shall contribute to a general average, if such occur.

Art. 735. The contributions to be paid under the stipulations of Art. 735 and Art. 734 are in all respects placed on the same footing as contributions in cases of general average.

Art. 824. The insurer bears all risks to which ship or cargo are exposed, during the continuance of the insurance, if not otherwise determined by the following provisions or by contract. He bears in particular (sub-sect. 5) the risk of the hypothecation of the insured goods, for the purpose of continuing the voyage, or of the disposal of the same by sale or by hypothecation for the like purpose (Art. 507, 510, 734).

Art. 838. The insurer is liable for (sub-sect. 1) the contributions to general average, including those which the insured has to bear on account of a loss suffered by him, the contributions, which by Art. 637 and 734, subject to the principles of general average, shall be accounted, and an amount to contributions to general average. If ships and cargo are hypothecated together, each has to contribute its proportion towards the discharge of the amount for which they have been hypothecated, as if the loss were a general average loss, and, should the ship be unable to discharge its proportion of liability, the owner of the cargo would, in addition to discharging the proportion of liability attaching to the cargo, have to make up the deficiency as a general average loss.

This deficiency would be made good to the owners of the cargo by their underwriters, if the owners of the cargo have insured their interest. If this case, therefore, had been decided at Bremen, the defendants would have been held liable, by the tribunals there, to make good to the said Messrs. Bolte and Co. the whole of the said sum of 663*l.* 2*s.* 10*d.*

15. The defendants have refused to pay to the plaintiffs, as trustees for the said Messrs. Bolte and Co., the said sum of 663*l.* 2*s.* 10*d.* or any part thereof. The court is at liberty to draw inferences of facts. The schedule annexed to the case, containing a translation of the first and second bottomry bonds, executed at Constantinople and Malta, formed part of the special case.

The question for the opinion of the court is, whether the plaintiffs, as trustees for the said Messrs. Bolte and Co., are entitled to recover from the defendants the said sum of 663*s.* 2*s.* 10*d.*, or any part thereof.

If the court shall be of opinion that they are so entitled, judgment is to be entered for the plaintiffs with costs of suit. If the court shall be of opinion that they are not so entitled, judgment shall be entered for the defendants, with costs of suit.

The plaintiff's points of argument were that the average statement of 3rd Aug. 1868 in the ninth paragraph of the case mentioned, and also the further or supplemental average statement of 3rd Oct. 1868, in the thirteenth paragraph mentioned, were and are foreign statements made up within the meaning of the memorandum in the policy of insurance; secondly, that the sum of 663*l.* 2*s.* 10*d.* is a general average loss for which the defendants are liable under the said foreign statements, or one of them; thirdly, that the execution of the bottomry bonds was the consequence of injuries by the perils insured against, and that Messrs. Bolte and Co. were compelled to take up the bonds before they could obtain possession of the cargo, and are entitled under the policy to recover from the defendants the money so expended as a loss by perils of the seas.

The defendants, on the contrary, relied on the following points of argument: First, that the payment which is sought to be recovered in this action is not a loss or expenditure covered by the policy declared upon; secondly, that the said payment was not caused proximately by perils insured against so as to constitute a general average loss within the meaning of the policy; thirdly, that the average statement was made up at Bremen, upon the hypothesis that there was an absolute necessity for the captain of the Bella Leandra to make the bottomry bonds on which payment has been made, and the plaintiffs have not proved this was the case, as they were bound to do; fourthly, that the clause to pay general damage as per foreign statement, if so made up, is not to be extended to make the underwriters liable for a loss by way of general average which is not a general average loss according to English law; fifthly, that according to Bremen law, as stated in the special case, the claim now sought to be charged upon the cargo was primarily chargeable upon the ship and freight, and it is not shown that any part of the claim in question has been charged upon the freight which was earned.

The policy of insurance was in the usual form for a voyage from Taganrog to Bremen, but in the margin were inserted additional conditions, as follows:

Additional conditions—p. Bella Leandra.—With leave to call for orders as often as required, and at any intermediate port or ports, place or places, for any purpose whatsoever, including all risk of craft to and from the ship, and particularly of any special lighterage, each lighter or craft being considered as if separately insured.

To pay general average as per foreign statement, if so made up.—Warranted free from particular average, unless the ship or craft be stranded, sunk, or burnt, but this warranty not to exonerate the underwriters from the liability to pay any special charges for mats, warehousing, forwarding, or otherwise, if incurred, as well as partial loss arising from transshipment.

Warranted free from capture and seizure, and the consequences of any attempt thereat.

Sir George Honyman, Q. C. (M'Leod with him).—The important point is whether the underwriters are liable to pay general average, which is not general average according to English law; and what is the effect to be given to the clause to pay general average as per foreign statement if so made up? The policy is on cargo alone, and the question is one which should be discussed between the ship-owner and owner of the cargo at the port of adjustment. As a general rule the place for the adjustment of general average is the ship's port of destination or discharge. When this happens to be a foreign port the general average loss is adjusted there according to the law and usage of the country to which such foreign port belongs, and the adjustment so made is called a foreign adjustment. There is a great diversity in the practice of different countries as to what shall and what shall not be included in general average; sometimes losses are included and charged for, which are general average in the country where the adjustment is settled, but not in the country where the charter-party was entered into and the policy of insurance effected; and sometimes a different proportion of contribution is assessed in the foreign port from that which is chargeable in the home port. In either case two questions arise: First, are the coadventurers as among themselves bound by the foreign adjustment? Secondly, are the respective underwriters bound by it? It is generally agreed that parties are liable to make contribution in accordance with the laws of the place of adjustment. Arnould on Marine Insurance, p. 814, says, "That the underwriter is in all cases bound by a foreign adjustment of general average when it is rightly settled according to the laws and usages of a foreign port. But that unless it is clearly proved to have been settled in strict conformity with such laws and usages, he is not bound thereby in any case in which he would not be bound in his own country." So in the case of Newman v. Cazalet (2 Park Ins. 900), the assured owner of goods had been compelled to pay under a foreign adjustment settled at Pisa, in respect of losses which would not have been general average in this country, and upon contributory values differently computed from what they would have been here; yet as it clearly appeared in evidence, that all the losses allowed were general average at Pisa, and that the apportionment was correct according to the mercantile usage of the place, the assured recovered against the underwriters the full amount of his claim. So in Walpole v. Ewer (3 Park Ins. 898), the holder of a respondentia bond, not liable to general average at all in this country, was compelled to pay a contribution under a foreign adjustment settled in Denmark, and, upon evidence given that it was in accordance with the law and practice of Denmark, he recovered. Here the parties entered into the contract, not with reference to the law of England, but according to the state of the law at the port of adjustment (Simons and Loder v. While, 2 Barn. and Cres. 805.) In Power v. Whitmore, 4 M. & S. 141, it was decided that the insurer of goods to a foreign country, is not liable to indemnify the assured, who is obliged by a decree of the court there, to pay contribution to a general average, which by the law of this country could not have been demanded, where it does not appear that the parties contracted upon the footing of some usage among merchants obtaining in the foreign country to treat the same as general average; but such usage is to be collected merely from the recitals and assumption made in the decree.

Dent v. Smith, L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 414; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 868.

Watkin Williams (with him Cohen), for the defendant.—The defendant is not liable for the surplus of 663l. 2s. 10d. This was an English policy made in London from Taganrog to Bremen. Although the policy is an English policy, I do not contend that the average is not to be calculated according to the practices and usages of the port of adjustment. But it does not appear that the 663l. 2s. 10d. was general average according to the law of Bremen, and was not a loss covered by the policy. The meaning of the clause "to pay general average as per foreign statement if so made up" means that if the assured has by the perils insured against been compelled to make a contribution in general average, the underwriters will repay him according to the foreign average statement, if so made up. The definition of general average is where several interests are exposed to one common danger which threaten the destruction of all and one is sacrificed for the general good, the owner of the goods which are sacrificed is entitled to call on the owners of the others to contribute rateably towards the loss. This is the rule of the general average by the Rhodian law two centuries later than the law of marine insurance. Benecke says: "This is a law by which everybody is bound according to the law of the place of adjustment, and it varies in different countries. The ship, cargo, and freight are all, therefore, liable to contribute. The captain was justified in raising money on a bottomry bond binding them all, and binding each separately for the whole sum. [BOVILL, C.J.—You say this liability arises from the insufficiency of the ship to pay the bondholders.] Yes, for this is a liability arising under the bottomry bond. [BRETT, J.—We may take it that according to English law, that would not be a general average contribution.] The ship must be kept in repair by the shipowners; this is a mere debt from the shipowner to the owner of cargo. [BOVILL, C.J.—Do you say you are not liable under any clause in the policy?] I say we are not. The policy is warranted free from particular average, unless the ship is stranded, sunk, or burnt, but not to pay any special charges for mats, warehousing, forwarding or otherwise. This is not particular average according to Kidston v. Empire Marine Insurance Company (15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 12; L. Rep. 1 C. P. 535, (Ex. Ch.) 2 C. P. 357); for this is not a loss at all from any peril insured against, and it is not because the goods have been bottomried that the owners can come down on the underwriters. This is clearly a loss not covered by the policy, and arising from a peril uninsured against; for the plaintiff to recover he must show that this was a loss which has arisen proximately from the perils insured against:

Powell v. Gudgeon, 4 M. & S. 431;

Sarqny v. Hobson, 2 Barn. & C. 7.

When part of the cargo is sold for the benefit of the ship and cargo, that would not be a loss by perils of the seas, but it would be a general average loss; but if the ship were chased by an enemy, and part of the goods were thrown overboard to escape capture, that would be a case of general average loss, but would not come within the terms of the policy, and even assuming here that this is a general average loss, which I dispute, we are not liable if the loss is not included in the policy and if the underwriters are made liable, it is in spite of the words of the policy. The case of Dent v. Smith (L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 214; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 868) is distinguishable. The gold being cast into the hands of persons who would not part with it, it was a payment of a ransom to obtain back the possession.

Great Indian Peninsular Railway Company v. Saunders, 4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 240; 1 B. & S. 41, Ex. Ch.; 2 B. & S. 266;

Booth v. Gair, 15 C. B., N. S., 291; 33 L. J. 99, C. P.

In Hallet v. Wigram (9 C. B. 580) it was decided that a claim for contribution to general average arises only where a part of the cargo is sacrificed for the preservation of the ship and the rest of the cargo from an impending danger, not where part of the cargo is sold to raise money at a port to which the ship has put back for the repair of damage incurred by ordinary perils of the sea. In delivering the judgment of the court in that case, Wilde, C. J. says, "The result of these cases is thus summed up in Abbot on Shipping, p. 497: If a vessel goes into port in consequence of an injury which is itself the subject of general average, such repairs as are absolutely necessary to enable her to prosecute her voyage, and the necessary expense of port charges, wages, and provisions during the stay, are to be considered as general average; but if the damage was incurred by the mere violence of the wind and weather, without sacrifice on the part of the owners for the benefit of all concerned, it falls, with the expenses consequent upon it, within the contract of the shipowner to keep his vessel tight, staunch, and strong during the voyage for which she is hired."

Sir George Honyman in reply.—It is not necessary for me to show this to be a case of general average according to English law. If I show it was a case of general average according to the law of Bremen, the underwriter will be liable to the consignee of the goods.

Cour. adv. vult.

June 6th.—The judgment of the court was delivered by BOVILL, C. J.—This action was brought to recover from the underwriters on goods for an alleged general average loss sustained by the plaintiffs as owners of a cargo of rye, by the Bella Leandra, insured on a voyage from Taganrog to Bremen. Upon that voyage the vessel with her cargo on board having reached Bremen; that was the proper port for the adjustment of any claim or liability for general average, and the adjustment would have to be made there according to the law of Bremen, and would be binding as between the shipowner and the owner of the cargo. It does not, however, necessarily follow that an underwriter upon an ordinary form of policy would be liable for the whole, or even any part of the general average so adjusted. If the sacrifice or loss which occasioned the general average arose from any of the perils insured against, or the consequences of them, or from proper endeavours to avert such perils or their consequences, to that extent the underwriters would under the terms of an ordinary policy, and according to well-known maritime usage, be liable to indemnify the assured, though as between the shipowner and the owner of the cargo neither might be introduced into the statement of general average, for which the underwriters upon the ordinary form of policy would not be liable. There are also many differences in the laws of various countries as to what are to be deemed the proper subjects of general average, as well as with respect to the proportions or value in or upon which the apportionment should be made; and under these circumstances the present policy was entered into, with a special memorandum as to general average. By that memorandum, in addition to the ordinary insurance in the body of the policy, the underwriters agree "to pay general average as per foreign statement if so made up," with certain special warranties as to particular average and capture or seizure. It seems to me that the general effect of the memorandum is to make the underwriters liable as for general average for whatever the assured owners of the goods might be called upon to pay on that account by the foreign statement of adjustment. This memorandum was probably introduced in order to avoid all questions not only as to the propriety of particular items being treated as the subject of general average, but also as to the correctness of the apportionments, and I find it difficult to place any other reasonable construction upon the term of the policy and memorandum. If it be open to this court to consider and determine the question whether the 663*l.* 2*s.* 10*d.* claimed in this action or any part of it was properly the subject of general average according to the law of England, I should be of opinion that it was not, and that this was not a loss covered by an ordinary policy in the usual form. So if we had to determine whether this sum was strictly general average according to the law of Bremen, as set forth in the special case, it may well be argued that it is not strictly general average, but is merely to be treated in a similar manner by the law of that place. It seems to me, however, that under the terms of this policy the underwriters and the assured have both agreed to accept the adjustment and statement of the average stater in the foreign port if and when made as conclusive between them, both in principle and in details as to the loss which the underwriters are to undertake in respect of general average, subject to the exception of any matters, such as capture or seizure, which are excluded by the express terms of the policy. In this case a maritime lien on the cargo was created by the bottomry bonds, and which involved a liability of the cargo to make good any deficiency caused by the insufficient value of the ship to cover its own proportion of the bottomry bonds, and the necessity for giving the bottomry bonds and creating that lien arose from perils of the seas, though these debts would not necessarily be the subject of general average as against the underwriters according to the law of England or, possibly, by the law of Bremen. How, then, is the question to be determined whether the claim in this case is to be considered as general average for which the underwriters are liable? Is it to be determined by the court, or by the statement of the foreign average stater? It seems to me that by the express agreement of the parties contained in the memorandum, it is not open to us to determine it, and that we have only to see whether the foreign adjustment which gives rise to this claim has been in fact made or not. Has there, then, been such a statement of general average made in Bremen with respect to the amount now claimed? and how does the matter stand upon this fact as stated in the special case? The plaintiffs contend that there was such a statement; the defendants, on the other hand, contend that there was no such statement, and that the passages in the case as to the statement of October do not treat it as a statement of general average, but as a mere calculation of the deficiency arising upon the sale of the ship from the proceeds of that sale being insufficient to pay the amount apportioned to the ship and freight, and that this loss, therefore, cannot be considered as coming within the perils or terms of this policy. Now, what are the statements in the special case upon this subject? In paragraph 13 it is said that a further or supplemental average statement, dated the 3rd Oct. 1868, was made up by the said H. Tichlenborg (who had been previously described as an average stater in Bremen), in which the 663*l.* 2*s.* 10*d.* was stated as the amount which the cargo had to pay as additional bottomry bonds to Messrs. Bolte and Co. (which is in accordance with the fact), and that a translation of the average statement was annexed to and formed part of the case. It is further mentioned that the last-mentioned average statement of the 3rd Oct. 1868, as well as the former statement of the 3rd Aug. was in all respects accurate as to amounts and figures, and was correctly made up in accordance with the law in force in Bremen; it is also stated in paragraph 14 that such a loss as that which had occurred in the principal case was treated at Bremen as a general average loss, and not as a particular average loss, and at the end of that paragraph it is further stated that if this case had been decided at Bremen the defendants would have been held liable by the tribunals there to make good to the said Messrs. Bolte and Co. the whole of the said sum of 663*l.* 2*s.* 10*d.* Upon these facts, thus stated, I am of opinion that the statement of the 3rd Oct. must be considered and treated by the court as a foreign statement of general average made up at Bremen within the terms of the special memorandum on this policy, and that as neither of the exceptions nor warranties is applicable to this case, the question of the liability of the underwriters to pay the amount now in question is conclusively settled against them; that it is not competent for this court to inquire into the propriety of that foreign average statement, and that our judgment, therefore, ought to be in favour of the plaintiffs. In this view of the case it becomes unnecessary to go through the authorities or discuss the elaborate arguments which were very ably addressed to us by the learned counsel for the defendants. If his contention be correct, it would equally have entitled his clients to dispute each item in the original average statement of the 3rd Aug. on the ground either that it was not properly the subject of general average, or that it did not arise from any of the perils covered by the policy. But it appears to me that the intention and effect of the policy and memorandum were that all such questions should be excluded in all cases where a foreign statement of general average had been made up, as it was in this case, at the proper port of adjustment abroad, and that the underwriters by this policy, as between themselves and the assured, agreed to be bound by the opinion and decision of the foreign average stater, both as to fact and law, on the subject of general average in the statement which he might make up in the foreign port. I think the underwriters agreed to pay according to that statement, with the exception of any matters which are expressly excluded by other parts of the policy (but which are not applicable to this case); and that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover from the underwriters the whole of the sum claimed in the action.

C. P.]

HARRIS v. SCARAMANGA.

BRETT, J.—In this special case the question ultimately in dispute was whether the plaintiffs, the assured, as trustees for Messrs. Bolte and Co., were entitled to recover from the defendants, the underwriters, a sum of 663*l.* 2*s.* 10*d.* The plaintiffs, merchants in London, had insured with the defendants, as underwriters in London, by a policy dated the 23rd July 1867, a cargo of rye on board the Italian vessel, the Bella Leandra, on a voyage from Taganrog to Bremen. The vessel, after starting on the voyage insured, was compelled by severe weather to put into Constantinople in distress. The master, in order to raise money necessary for repairs, so as to enable the ship to continue her voyage, executed a bottomry bond on ship, freight, and cargo, to secure the repayment of 235*l.* 4*s.* on the said ship's arrival at Bremen. The ship, having sailed from Constantinople, was compelled, by further severe weather, to put into Malta in distress, and was there obliged to execute another and similar bottomry bond, on ship, freight, and cargo, to secure repayment at Bremen, of 465*l.* 6*s.* 5*d.* The vessel arrived at Bremen, and the captain was unable to take up either bonds, Messrs. Bolte and Co., who had become owners by purchase of the cargo of rye, took up both bonds, and in order to obtain delivery of the cargo, paid off the holders of both. This was found by the case to be the only course by which the Messrs. Bolte and Co. could obtain possession of the cargo. The special case then found that a statement of average, dated the 3rd Aug. 1868, was prepared by an average stater in Bremen, in which the loss arising upon the said bottomry bonds was apportioned between the cargo and the ship and freight. By the said statement the amount of 1088*l.* 14*s.* 11*d.* was the proportion shown as falling upon the cargo, and the amount 1185*l.* 11*s.* 6*d.* was shown as falling upon the ship and freight. No question, it was stated in the case, arises as to the said sum of 1088*l.* 14*s.* 11*d.*, the proportion by that adjustment falling on the cargo, which, it is admitted, is properly chargeable on the defendants as underwriters, and the defendants have paid the sum, but the captain was unable to pay or give any security for the said sum of 1185*l.* 11*s.*, the proportion falling on the said ship and freight. The Messrs. Bolte and Co., therefore applied to the Tribunal of Commerce at Bremen to sell the ship, which was accordingly duly done, and the net proceeds of sale were handed to Messrs. Bolte and Co. After deducting the said net proceeds from the said sum of 1185*l.* 11*s.*, there remained a balance of 663*l.* 2*s.* 10*d.*, in respect of which the Messrs. Bolte and Co. were still unsatisfied. The special case then continued, "And a further or supplemental average statement," dated the 3rd Oct. 1868, was made up by the same average stater in which the said sum of 663*l.* 2*s.* 10*s.* was stated as the amount which the cargo had to pay as additional bottomry debt to the said Messrs. Bolte and Co.; a translation it was said "of the last mentioned average statement, is annexed, &c." It is admitted that the said last mentioned average statement is correctly made up in accordance with the law in force in Bremen. Such a loss as that which has occurred in the present case is treated at Bremen as a general average loss, and not as a particular average loss. It was admitted on the argument that the last paragraph was intended to apply to the loss of the 663*l.* 2*s.* 10*d.* The case there stated that the German Code was in force as law at Bremen, and set out several sections or articles of the code; and then it was stated as a fact that according to that law, if ship and cargo are hypothecated together, each has to contribute its proportion towards the discharge of the amount for which they have been hypothecated, as if the loss were a general average loss; and should the ship be unable to discharge its proportion of liability, the owners of the cargo would, in addition to discharging their proportion of liability attaching to the cargo, have to make up the deficiency "as a general average loss." This deficiency would be made good to the owners of the cargo by their underwriters, if the owners of the cargo had insured their interest. If this case, therefore, had been decided at Bremen, the defendants would have been there held liable to make good to Messrs. Bolte and Co. the whole of the said sum of 663*l.* 2*s.* 10*d.* The court was to be at liberty to draw inferences of fact. The policy was as to the body of it in the ordinary forms of an English Lloyd's policy, with the ordinary enumerated risks. But in the margin there were among other provisions the following: "To pay general average as per foreign statement, if so made up," "warranted free from particular average, unless the ship and craft be stranded, sunk, or burnt; but this warranty not to exonerate the underwriters from the liability to pay any special charge for mats, warehousing, forwarding, or otherwise, if incurred, as well as partial loss, arising from transshipment, warranted free from capture and seizure, and the consequences of any attempt thereat." Upon this case Mr. Watkin Williams, in an able argument, every part of which seemed to me to deserve and require the utmost attention, contended that the defendant's English underwriters of an English policy were not liable in respect of the 663*l.* 2*s.* 10*d.*, and maintained that the loss of Messrs. Bolte and Co., in respect of that sum was not a general average loss according to English law, or according to the law of Bremen, and that it was not stated or made up as a general average loss in the Bremen average statement, and even if it were a general average loss according to the law of Bremen, and were so stated in conformity with such law, or if it were stated in fact, but erroneously, according to the Bremen law, and if in either case the defendants were bound by it as a foreign adjustment of a loss to be taken as a general average loss, yet that the defendants were not liable, because it was not a loss arising from any peril insured against by this English policy. Now in the first place I agree that this was not a general average loss according to the law of England. There was a general average loss incurred during the voyage, insured by reason of the necessity arising from sea perils of the ship, putting into two different ports of distress, and being necessarily repaired in order to enable the voyage to be continued for the benefit of all concerned, but all the contributions of the owners of cargo to that loss which can properly be called a general average contribution according to the English law were included in the first average statement, dated 3rd Aug. 1868. It is true that the loss of the 6632L 10s. was necessarily incurred by Messrs. Bolte and Co. as owners of the cargo, by reason of the cargo being bound by the bottomry bonds; and it is true that the loss was the result of sea perils in the sense that without the happening of such perils the loss would not have been incurred; but this particular loss was not the immediate or the necessary result of any effort to avoid a peril of the sea. It was the result of the insolvency of the ship-owners, or of the want of means or credit of the master, and of the deficiency in value on sale of the ship, contingencies which might or might not have happened after the peril of the sea had happened, and without the happening of some one or more of which the particular loss would not have occurred notwithstanding the occurrence of the peril of the sea. Moreover, payment of the 663L 2s. 10d. was made after the completion of the voyage and the safe arrival of the ship and cargo, and was not made for the common advantage of ship freight and cargo, but upon consideration of a balance of advantage and loss to the owners of cargo alone. It was made in order to obtain possession of the cargo. But as to the second point, I think that upon the special case as stated the court is bound to hold that the loss was a general average loss according to the law of Bremen. The allegations made at the beginning and end of paragraph fourteen, seem to me to amount to express findings on the point. I further think that upon the allegations made in paragraph thirteen and fourteen treated as they are in the fourth of the defendants' points, and it being admitted that the words "such a loss as that which has occurred" at the commencement of paragraph fourteen refer to the sum of 663L 2s. 10d., we are bound to hold either as upon an express finding, or as upon an inference of fact to be drawn, that the loss of the 663L 2s. 10d. was stated by the average stater at Bremen as and with intent to be a general average loss falling on the owners of the cargo. The next point to be determined is whether under such circumstances underwriters of an ordinary English policy would be liable. That raises the question as to how far underwriters of such a policy on an insured voyage to terminate at a foreign port are bound by a foreign general average adjustment made at the port of destination. Now I think it is clearly established that upon such a policy English underwriters are bound by the foreign adjustment, as an adjustment, if made according to the law of the country in which it was made. They are bound, although the contributions are apportioned between the different interests in a manner different from the English mode, or, though matters are brought into or omitted from general average, which would not be so treated in England. I further incline to think, notwithstanding the case of Power v. Whitmore (4 M. & S. 141), that underwriters, if they are not absolutely bound to accept the foreign adjustment as rightly made, if "bonâ fide made," must assume it to be rightly made, until the contrary be proved. It seems to be stated as a general principle of insurance law that when a general average is fairly settled in a foreign port, and the assured is obliged to pay his proportion of it, he may recover the amount from the insurer, though the average may have been settled differently from what it would have been at the home port (2 Phillips on Insurance, par. 1414); and further on, in paragraph 1414 it is thus stated: The lex loci is that underwriters shall reimburse general averages, if within the perils insured against, according to the apportionments made and contributions exacted abroad at the port of destination. But I think that according to the English and American law, the underwriter of a policy, in the ordinary form, is not liable to indemnify against any general average loss or contribution, whether it be general average according to the law of his own country or according to the law of the foreign country in which the voyage terminates, or whether the adjustment be made according to his domestic or to the foreign law, if the general average loss be not incurred, or the general average contribution be not made, in order to avert loss by a peril insured against. I do not find this doctrine as clearly expressed in the English books or cases as I should have expected. But the statements in Phillips on Insurance, a book of the highest authority as to English as well as to American insurance law, are clear and precise. "Underwriters are liable to make indemnity by payments of either a particular or general average or total loss only in case of its being caused by the perils insured against:" (Phillips's Insurance, 1353.) It is obvious that this must be so in case of a particular average loss; for a total loss. And a general average loss, as meaning the loss to the person who suffers damages, is no more than a particular average to each of the parties who has to suffer or pay contribution in respect of it. By the word "general" it is only meant that the loss is to be generally distributed on the ship and cargo, or the contribution to be generally made by all. It is the loss to each and all caused by a sea peril which must, as in the other cases, be the loss caused by a peril insured against. "So far as general average is occasioned by perils insured against," says Phillips, "the insurers are liable for it in proportion to the amount insured:" (par. 1409). "General average is only payable," says Story, J., "where it is a consequence or result or incident of some peril insured against.—Sherwood v. The General Mutual Insurance Company (1 Blatch Rep. 251), quoted in 2 Phillips on Insurance (par. 1414, 3rd edit.) So far, then, except as to the true meaning of the special case itself, I have gone almost entirely with the arguments and propositions put forward by Mr. Williams; but it is the force and truth of them which now makes me break from his next point. If these propositions be true, and the conclusion in which he asks us to concur be correct, the proviso in the margin of the policy seems to me to be of no real effect. The same interpretation and effect would be practically given to a policy in the ordinary form, that is, to this policy without the marginal provisions. This policy, being an English policy, is to be construed according to English rule of construction, and amongst those rules are two, first, that the court must, if possible, give some effect to words apparently used as words of obligation in a written instrument made between parties; and the other, the words are rather to be construed so as to impose a burden on the person who apparently assumes them as obligatory. Mr. Williams contended that effect would be given to the proviso by holding that it met the case, otherwise unmet, of a foreign average statement erroneously made according to the law of the foreign port. But in the first place I have already expressed an opinion that such a statement, by virtue of which the assured would be just as much compelled to pay his appointed contribution as by a correct statement, is binding on the underwriters; and if not I cannot adopt the view that this important stipulation is introduced in contemplation only of a foreign average stater not knowing how to conduct his own business according to the law of his own country. It is well known, says Mr. Phillips in the paragraph I have so often quoted (paragraph 1414), amongst underwriters and merchants, that there is a diversity in the effect of foreign adjustments. Three well recognised diversities are there pointed out. The third is thus stated: "Where a loss is included in a general average in one country which is not insured against in the policies of another," the underwriters in the latter certainly ought not to be liable to indemnify the assured against the proportions of a foreign adjustment of such a loss. This is, of course, averred with respect to policies in the ordinary form. It seems to me that the only way to give effect to the marginal provision in this case and an effect as against the underwriter who has by it taken upon himself some real substantial obligation, different from his ordinary obligation, is to say that it was intended to meet this recognised diversity, and to oblige the underwriters to indemnify the assured against a loss which should fall upon him by compulsion in the port of Bremen, and which should be there treated as against him as a general average loss or contribution, unless such loss so treated should be a consequence of an attempt at capture or seizure. Upon such a construction of the policy the defendants are, under the circumstances, liable to the plaintiffs in respect of the disputed sum of 663*l.* 2*s.* 10*d.* This decision makes it unnecessary to determine whether the present case is within the principle of the decision in Dent v. Smith (sup.) or what is the legal principle upon which that case was decided. I cannot, however, help expressing the greatest doubt whether the present case can be brought within the principle on which I understand the decision in that case to have been founded, that there was in that case, before the completion of the voyage insured, a total loss by shipwreck and a detention of the cargo in the hands of a foreign government, and a detention by the foreign government to the end, so that the total loss could only be overcome by a payment exacted by such foreign government. I am of opinion that the judgment should be entered for the plaintiffs for 663*l.* 2*s.* 10*d.*

Damage to Cargo—War—Risk of capture—Reasonableness of delay—Foreign ship—Governing law—Charter party—Bill of lading—Excepted perils.
Where a contract of affreightment contains the exception "Queen's enemies," an apprehension of capture, founded upon circumstances calculated to affect the mind of a master of ordinary courage, judgment, and experience, will justify delay in port during the continuance of the risk; nor is such delay less justifiable in the case of a ship belonging to a belligerent nation, but carrying a neutral cargo.

Where a charter-party contains the exceptions "Queen's enemies, restraints of princes," &c., and a stipulation that the master is to sign bills of lading in pursuance thereof, "without prejudice to this charter-party," and the bills of lading are signed containing no exception but "dangers of the seas only excepted," the cargo being thereby consigned to consignees named therein, who had notice of the terms of the charter-party at the time it was entered into, the contract is contained in both instruments, and the stipulation in the bills of lading does not supersede the stipulations in the charter-party.

By a charter-party in the English language, entered into between British merchants and North German shipowners, it was agreed that a North German ship should load a cargo at V. I., and carry the same to a British port for orders for any port in the United Kingdom or on the continent between Bordeaux and the Baltic (Queen's enemies, &c., excepted); the master to sign bills of lading "without prejudice to this charter-party." The master signed bills of lading referring to the charter-party, but containing only the exception "dangers of the seas only excepted." The ship sailed with her cargo, and was compelled to put into V. for repairs, and there the master learned that war existed between France and Germany, and there being great risk of capture by French cruisers outside the port, from Sept. 21st until Dec. 23rd 1870, he remained there during that period (three months), and the risk being then ended, sailed for the port of call and was ordered to a British port, where he discharged. The cargo was damaged by the delay. The consignees named in the bills of lading had negotiated the charter-party and so had notice of his terms. In a suit by them for demand to cargo by unreasonable delay:

Held, that at the place of performance of the contract was fixed in England, the English law governed the question of delay, and that the shipowners were entitled under the exception of "Queen's enemies" in the charter-party to remain in port, although carrying a neutral cargo, so long as the actual risk of capture existed. (a)

THIS was a cause instituted under the 6th section

(a) These cases, taken in conjunction with those cited in the argument—the Heinrich and the Wilhelm Schmidt—establish, so far as a court of first instance can do so, the proposition that a vessel in danger of capture may delay in port so long as that risk continues to exist, provided that she sails under a charter of bill of lading containing the exception "Queen's enemies." How far this doctrine would apply where the charter contained no such exception is a question yet undecided. There can be little doubt that the delay of a few days would be reasonable even in such a case, as a master, even with a neutral cargo, is not bound to put his ship in actual danger; he is rather bound to take precautions to enable him to fulfil his contract, which he would be unable to do if captured. There is also a further question, and that is, whether the exceptions in a contract of affreightment do not relate to the case of an absolute non-completion of the contract, and are intended as an excuse in such case only. If this be so, the question of delay would be reduced to one of reasonable construction of the contract, and the question would be solely did the master act for the benefit of both ship and cargo in delaying in port.—Ed.

of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 on behalf of James Anderson, James George Skelton Anderson, Alexander Gavin Anderson, and William Richard Anderson, trading as Anderson, Anderson, and Co., merchants in London, consignees of cargo laden on board the San Roman, against that vessel and her freight and against her owners intervening, to recover damages consequent upon the non-delivery of that cargo within a reasonable time, and the deterioration and depreciation in value of the cargo by delay.

The San Roman was a vessel sailing under the flag of the North German Confederation, and belonging to the city of Hamburg, a free city of that confederation, and her owners were subjects of that confederation. On 13th Feb. 1869, whilst the San Roman was lying at Antwerp, her owners sent over to the firm of Anderson, Thomson, and Co., merchants of London, a charter-party signed by or for the shipowners, in order that the London firm might obtain, if possible the desired employment of the ship. The charter-party was accepted by the firm of Thomas Bilbe and Co., shipwrights and dealers in timber, carrying on business at Nelson Dock, Rotherhithe, and the charter-party was signed by that firm. The charter-party, so far as material, is as follows :

Charter-party.

ANDERSON, THOMSON, and Co.,
Billiter-court, London, E.C.

London, Feb. 13, 1870.

It is the day mutually agreed between Messrs. Aug. Jos. Schon and Co., owners of the good ship or vessel called the San Roman, of the measurement of 1335 tons register, or thereabouts, classed _____, and now at Antwerp, and Thomas Bilbe and Co., of London, merchants and charterers ; that the said ship being warranted as above described, and tight, staunch, and strong, and every way fitted for the voyage, and so to be maintained throughout the voyage, shall, after discharging outward cargo at Japan @ Wales, for owners' benefit, with all convenient speed, sail and proceed to a safe loading place in Paget Sound or Burrard's Inlet, as ordered, in Royal Roads of Victoria, Vancouver's Island, or so near thereto as she may safely get, and there load, as supplied by the agents of the said charterers, a full and complete cargo of spars, of diameters not exceeding 38in., and of the ordinary proportionate lengths, and (or) other lawful merchandise which the said charterers bind themselves to supply, not exceeding what she can reasonably stow and carry over and above her tackle, apparel, provisions, and furniture ; and being so loaded, shall therewith proceed as charterers' agents may order on signing bills of lading, either to a port of discharge direct, within the limits hereinafter mentioned, or to Queenstown, Falmouth, for orders for a port of discharge within these limits, or so near thereto as she may safely get, and shall there deliver the cargo on being paid freight at the following rates per load of fifty cubic feet English Customs Calliper Measurement—i.e., as used by H.B.M. Customs before repeal of duties on timber—viz., for spars (masts or yardpieces) of twenty inches diameter and upwards :

If ordered from port of loading.—A port in the United Kingdom, 95s. ; a port on the Continent from Bordeaux to Hamburg, both inclusive, 100s. ; a port in the Baltic, 110s.

If ordered from Queenstown or Falmouth.—A port in the United Kingdom, 100s. ; a port on the Continent from Bordeaux to Hamburg, both inclusive, 105s. ; a port in the Baltic, 115s. ; and 10s. per like load less for like spars under twenty inches, &c.

The freight to be paid on final and right delivery of the cargo, one half in cash and one half by good and approved bills on London, at three months from same date The master to sign bills of lading for the cargo as required by the charterers or their agents, but at not less than the above chartered rate, without prejudice to this charter-party. The cargo to be brought to, and taken from alongside the ship free of risk and expense to the ship. The vessel to be discharged with all dispatch, in such safe dock or place in the port of discharge as charterers may order (the act of God, the Queen's enemies, restraints of princes and rulers, frost, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation, of what nature and kind soever, during the said voyage, always mutually excepted) forty-five working days, &c.

AUG. JOS. SCHON and Co., as owners.
THOS. BILBE and Co.

26th Feb. 1869.

This charter-party was indorsed with the following words :

A true copy of the original in our possession.—Anderson, Thompson and Co.

From answer to interrogatories administered by the defendants to the plaintiffs, it appeared that the plaintiffs James Anderson and James George Skelton Anderson were between the month of Jan. 1869 and the 31st Dec. 1869 partners in the firm of Thomas Bilbe and Co., and after the latter date all the plaintiffs became interested in the business of that firm ; also that the two plaintiffs above mentioned were, in Feb. 1869, partners in the firm of Anderson, Thomson, and Co., and that that firm having negotiated the charter, retained a copy of it till May 1870, after the bill of lading was signed and the goods shipped ; that Messrs. Sproat and Co., of Vancouver's Island, acted as the plaintiffs' agent and consigned the cargo to the plaintiffs in the ordinary course of business, and that the plaintiffs sent on June 12th 1869 a copy of the charter party to Messrs. Sproat and Co., that the plaintiffs had notice of the charter.

It further appeared that the plaintiffs were aware the San Roman was a German ship and that her owners were Germans ; and that the charter-party was signed by the defendants in Hamburg.

In pursuance of the above charter-party the San Roman proceeded to Vancouver's Island, and there received orders by Messrs. Sproat and Co., the plaintiffs' agents, to proceed to Port Ludlow, Washington territory, U.S., which she did, arriving there in April 1870. The plaintiffs' agents there loaded the vessel with a cargo of spars, yards, masts, and other timber ; and on May 21st, 1870, the master signed and delivered to the agents the following bill of lading—

Shipped in good order and condition by Sproat and Co., as agents, on board the ship called the San Roman, whereof C. Martens is master, now lying at Port Ludlow, bound for Queenstown or Falmouth, for orders for a port of discharge, forty-eight spars, four hundred and twenty-seven yards, twenty-nine topmasts, seventy-one masts, six bowsprits, one thousand three hundred and twelve pieces lumber containing 110,314 feet, as per specification, indorsed hereon, and are to be delivered in like order and condition at a port within the limits mentioned in charter-party, as may be ordered at Queenstown or Falmouth (the dangers of the sea only excepted), unto Messrs. Anderson, Anderson, and Co., or to their assigns he or they, paying freight for the said cargo, as per charter-party, with average accustomed as per charter-party.

In witness whereof the master of the said vessel hath affirmed three bills of lading, all of this tenor and date, one of which being accomplished, the others to stand void.

Dated at Port Ludlow, the 21st May 1870.

R. MARTENS.

This bill of lading was forwarded by Messrs. Sproat and Co. to the plaintiffs, who were the consignees and owners of the cargo.

On 24th May 1870 the vessel sailed with the cargo from Port Ludlow ; but on the 7th June the master was taken seriously ill, and the vessel was compelled to put into Mazatlan, in Mexico, where the master was landed on 22nd June. On 24th June the vessel again sailed under the charge of Edward Hacké, the first mate, who was appointed master by the German consul. The voyage continued till 9th Aug., when the vessel, meeting with bad weather, had the mainpiece of her rudder broken, and was compelled to put into Valparaiso, the nearest port, for repairs. She arrived there on 26th Aug., and the repairs were completed with all despatch on 21st Sept. At Valparaiso the master was informed by the German Consul-General that war had broken out between France and Germany, and thereupon a letter was written by Messrs. Schutte and Co., the defendant's agents, at Valparaiso, to the plaintiffs, at the master's request, informing the plaintiffs that the San Roman had been compelled to put in for repairs, and saying, "The repairs will be finished in a short time; but as the master has been warned by his consul not to proceed to sea as long as vessels of his nation are exposed to capture by French men-of-war, he wishes to get instructions from you as to what to do in case of the war between Germany and France continuing at the receipt of the present." This letter was received by the plaintiffs on 17th Oct. 1870, and was answered by them as agents for the charterers on 19th Oct., but they sent the letter as an enclosure to Messrs. Sloman, of Hamburg, the defendants' brokers, so losing a mail to Valparaiso, and it did not arrive at Valparaiso till after the vessel had left. The plaintiffs' letter was as follows :

19th Oct. 1870.

Gentlemen,—Messrs. Thos. Bilbe and Co. have asked us as their agents to reply to your favour of the 2nd ult., which reached them yesterday. We have first to point out to Capt. E. Hacké, of the San Roman, that the mere dread of being captured is not a sufficient reason for his breaking his contract with the charterers; and while calling upon him, as we now do, to prosecute the voyage with all reasonable diligence, we have to give him notice that our principals will hold him or the owners of the ship liable for loss of market or other damages which they may sustain by the delay. Be kind enough to communicate this to Capt. Hacké.—We are, &c.,

ANDERSON, ANDERSON, and Co.,

Agents to Thos. Bilbe and Co., Rotherhithe.

Messrs. Schutte and Co.

As there were French cruisers in and about the port of Valparaiso, the master kept the San Roman in that port until 12th Dec., when having heard that the last of the cruisers had left Peruvian waters, he prepared for sea, and sailed on 23rd Dec. for Europe; and on 16th April, 1871, the San Roman arrived at Queenstown, and received orders to proceed to the Tyne, where she arrived 25th April, and began to discharge on 28th April and completed her discharge on 29th May. Her cargo was heated and charred, and it was admitted by the defendants that if it should be held that the delay at Valparaiso on account of the war was unjustifiable there must be a reference to the registrar and merchants to ascertain what damage was sustained and whether it was caused by the delay or original bad stowage. It was also admitted by the plaintiffs that the deviation in consequence of the master's illness, and the deviation and delay for repairs were justifiable and not unreasonable in point of time.

The above were the undisputed facts of the case.

The plaintiffs in their petition pleaded, after setting out the charter-party and the bill of lading as above,

5. The San Roman sailed from Port Ludlow with the said cargo on board, but her master, in violation of the terms of the said bill of lading, without any justifiable cause, deviated from the said agreed voyage by putting, with the said vessel and cargo, into Valparaiso, and by for a long time remaining there, though not prevented by the said excepted dangers from prosecuting the said voyage to the port of Queenstown or Falmouth, according to the terms of the said bill of lading.

6. By reason of the premises the plaintiffs have incurred great loss on account of their being for a long time deprived of the said cargo, and have also been put to great expense in and about endeavouring to obtain possession of the same, and the said cargo has been greatly deteriorated and depreciated in value, and the plaintiffs have been otherwise greatly damaged and injured.

The defendants' answer, after setting out the above facts, contained the following paragraphs :

6. Subsequently to the sailing of the San Roman from port Ludlow, as aforesaid, and before her arrival at Valparaiso, war broke out and was declared between the empire of France and the States of the said Confederation, and such war continued until and was existing at the time of the arrival of the said vessel at Valparaiso, and thence until and at the time of the departure of the said vessel from Valparaiso, as hereinafter mentioned. By reason of such war the San Roman became and was liable to risk of capture. Upon the arrival of the San Roman at Valparaiso, the said E. Hacké received, for the first time, information of the said war.

7. The said E. Hacké, immediately upon his arrival at Valparaiso, caused proper survey to be made of the said damage, and the repairs found necessary were proceeded with and completed with all reasonable despatch, and on or about the 23rd Sept. the said repairs were completed, and the vessel was ready for sea.

8. From the time when the San Roman put into Valparaiso, and thence until the completion of the said repairs, and until the 12th Dec. 1870, French armed national cruisers were off the port of Valparaiso, and lying in the said port in readiness at any time to proceed to sea under sail or steam with the intention of capturing North German ships, and if the San Roman had, during the time and under the circumstances aforesaid, left Valparaiso, and attempted to proceed upon her voyage, she would almost certainly have been captured by some or one of the said cruisers, and there was no reasonable expectation that she would have escaped such capture.

9. On or about the 12th Dec. 1870, the last of the said cruisers left Valparaiso and the ofing, and the master of the San Roman immediately proceeded to make, with all reasonable despatch, the necessary preparations for proceeding upon his voyage, and on the 23rd of the said month the said preparations were completed, and a reasonable and proper time having then elapsed since the said cruisers had sailed, so that it appeared that they were not in the neighbourhood of the port of Valparaiso, or intending to return thereto, the San Roman on the said 23rd Dec. got under weigh, and proceeded on her voyage. It is wholly untrue as alleged in the 5th article of the petition, that the master of the said vessel, in violation of the terms of the said bill of lading, and without justifiable cause, remained a long time in Valparaiso; on the contrary, the master of the San Roman, as soon as the aforesaid repairs were completed, was always ready and willing to proceed on the said voyage as soon as it was reasonable and prudent so to do, regard being had to the said liability to risk of capture.

11. By the law of the said city of Hamburg, and of the said North German Confederation, the master of the San Roman was entitled to keep the said vessel in Valparaiso whilst she would have been liable to risk of capture at sea by reason of the said war, and by such law the master of the said vessel, whilst the said war and liability to risk of capture continued, was not under any obligation to the plaintiffs to proceed, or to attempt to proceed, upon the said voyage with the San Roman; and by the said law the master of the said vessel has not been guilty of any breach of contract or duty with or to the plaintiffs by remaining in Valparaiso with the said cargo, under the circumstances hereinbefore stated.

13. The said delay of the said vessel at Valparaiso and the damages, if any, resulting to the said cargo, and to the plaintiffs therefrom, were caused by the act of God, the Queen's enemies, restraints of princes and rulers, and dangers and accidents of the seas, within the true intent and meaning of the said charter-party, and bill of lading.

14. By the law of Hamburg, and of the said Confederation, the defendants are not liable to the plaintiffs in respect of any deterioration of the said cargo or losses of the plaintiffs, arising from the prolongation of the said voyage owing to the said war, and liability to risk of capture.

The evidence for both plaintiffs and defendants was principally directed to the risk of capture. A joint commission was sent out to Valparaiso, and witnesses were there examined for both parties. From the plaintiffs' evidence under the commission, it appeared that from 3rd Aug. 1870 to 15th Dec. 1870 five North German ships sailed from Valparaiso, one for Hamburg, and the rest for South American ports, four clearing before 18th Aug. 1870 and one on 15th Dec., and that only one North German vessel was captured in the vicinity of the coast of Chili; that between 24th Sept. and 28th Nov. 1870 nine North German vessels entered Valparaiso; that in the opinion of the plaintiffs' witnesses there was little risk of capture; that no French man-of-war was known to be stationed to intercept German vessels, but they were entering and leaving the port; that there were five French cruisers about the port, and that the last finally left on 13th Nov. 1870, leaving only a store-ship in the harbour.

From the defendants' evidence taken under the commission it appeared that the war became known in Valparaiso on 18th Aug. 1870; that when the master of the San Roman, on the repairs being completed on 21st Sept. 1870, applied for his papers, he was warned by his consul not to proceed to sea, the consul producing an official notification from the German Chargé d'Affaires at Santiago, to that effect; that in the opinion of the defendants' witnesses no German ship could have sailed without almost certainly being captured by French men-of-war, which were all steamers, as the movements of one of those vessels made it apparent that from 17th Sept. to 13th Nov. there was a cruiser outside the port watching for vessels; that from 17th Sept. to 13th Nov. there were always French cruisers in the port, except for eight days—viz., from 22nd Sept. to 30th Sept. sometimes one, sometimes more; that, even if no cruiser had been outside the port in the track which sailing vessels had to take, a sailing vessel even with twenty-four hours' start (which allowance of time was never tested, and it was a question whether it would have been allowed) would have been in imminent danger of capture by one of the men-of-war in port; that south winds prevail in Valparaiso during the day, but generally die away at night, and it sometimes happens that there is a breeze in the bay and a calm outside; that the destinations of the French men-of-war were kept secret; that there was telegraphic communication between Valparaiso and the coast outside the port, by which intelligence of the departure of German vessels might have been communicated to cruisers; that on the departure of the last French man-of-war the master of the San Roman could not leave at once as he had to raise money on bottomry to pay the expense of the repairs to his ship; but that the reason why no German vessel cleared between 13th Nov. and 15th Dec. 1870, was because they did not then know the destination of the cruisers, and it was not until intelligence came that they had arrived in Peruvian waters that they could safely leave; that fifteen or twenty German vessels remained in port in consequence of the war; that such vessels could not have sailed with the same facility as they entered, as the cruisers could not know what vessels were arriving, but would know what vessels left; that the ship's agents advertised for a loan on bottomry on 12th Dec., and the ship's average papers were returned on the 23rd; that the ship's crew refused to go to sea then for fear of capture, but the master had the vessel towed out, and so compelled them.

At the hearing several ship masters were called for both plaintiff and defendants, and from their evidence it appeared that the prevailing wind during the months of August, September, October, November, and December, at Valparaiso is S.; that it generally dies away in shore during the night, but well out at sea it generally blows steadily, sometimes, however, dropping at night; that a vessel leaving Valparaiso would have to make straight out to sea before she stood on her course; that the departure would probably be known as it is usual to start from a buoy at the mouth of the harbour, but that a vessel might be towed out in the night. The plaintiffs' witnesses thought there was little risk of capture; whilst the defendant's witnesses considered there was considerable risk, owing to the uncertainty of the wind.

The defendants called a North German advocate, Dr. Julius Siebohm, practising at Hamburg, to prove the law of North Germany as pleaded by them. His evidence was as follows:

Hamburg was at the time of the making of the charter-party a city in the North German Confederation, and is now in the German Empire. The German commercial code has been in force in Hamburg since the year 1866. I have read the pleadings, charter-party, and bill of lading in this case. According to the German Code, it would be the duty of a German ship with a neutral cargo arriving in a port of distress, and there learning the existence of war between France and Germany, to avoid exposing herself or her cargo to any danger. It is the duty of the master to avoid danger as much with respect to the cargo as with respect to the ship. That question has been decided in two cases in the Commercial Court at Hamburg, the Guttenburg and the Landwürster (a).

(a) The case of the Guttenburg was a claim by the ship-owners against the neutral owners of cargo on that vessel for average falling upon the cargo for the cost of delay originating in the port of departure, New York, through the Franco-German war, and was made under Art. 631 of the code. The defendants pleaded that the lading of the vessel had only begun after the breaking out of the war had become known in New York; that the freighters, who according to American law could not withdraw from the contract for the freight, were compelled by the master to load, although he knew that he could not sail; lastly, that the hindrance affected the ship only, and not the neutral cargo. The Commercial Court of Hamburg held that, although the costs of delay are under Art. 637 only payable in respect of delay caused by the events provided for by Art. 631 of the code, after the ship has been fully laden, they must be paid although the event which prevents the ship sailing has only taken place or come to the knowledge of the parties concerned before the ship has received its cargo; but that to avoid such payment the freighter must withdraw from the contract under Art. 631; that the master was not only entitled but even bound with regard to the owners of the cargo to take care that his ship should not be captured by the enemies' vessels, since even, where the cargo of a captured ship consists of neutral property, the delivery of the cargo at the port of destination becomes as a rule, in consequence of the capture, a very remote circumstance, and can only be effected at considerable expense; that the owners of cargo must have known that These decisions were based on the German Code, Arts. 504, 505, 631, 636, 637, 708, 735 (see post). The code distinctly lays down that a bill of lading does not over-ride a charter-party as between the charterer and ship-owner: Art. 653 (see post). In that article "contract of affreightment" means charter party. The provisions of Art. 645 (see post) as to the form of a bill of lading are descriptive, not compulsory; omitting a portion of the bill of lading there provided would not affect the operation of the German law. If anything is provided for by the code there is no need to include such a provision in the contract; the provisions of Art. 607 (see post) would apply if not referred to in a bill of lading. Even if one of the provisions of the code were specially referred to, that would not affect the application of others without such reference. The words "dangers of the seas only excepted" in a bill of lading would not, according to the German code, justify a master in proceeding on his voyage, if by so doing he might expose his ship and cargo to capture, even if the cargo were neutral.

In cross-examination he gave the following evidence:

In case the owner of the cargo requested the master to proceed, he would still be bound to stay in port for the safety of his ship. If he sailed he would be guilty of a breach of duty to his owner, but not of a breach of the German law. A master would be justified in stopping in port to avoid such risk as would, in the judgment of a sensible man, make him consider it the interest of his owner that he should stop. If there is any risk he should communicate with his owner. The master must exercise a sound discretion. The provisions of the code do not forbid a shipowner undertaking the risks excepted by the code. If the shipowner authorised the master to take the risk the code does not prevent him. Unless there was an absolute and clear stipulation that the shipowner was bound to take the risks, the printed forms in use would not exclude the code; such a stipulation must be an express agreement binding the shipowner. Perils of the sea would in German law include capture. These words have a wider meaning in a bill of lading than in a policy of insurance, as their meaning is restricted in the the German master would not have exposed his ship to danger and would only act as he was bound to do by German law, and, therefore, that the German law governed the question of delay at the port of discharge, and that therefore the plaintiffs were entitled to be paid the cargo's share of the expenses of delay as the contracting parties were bound to await the removal of the hindering cause.

The case of the Landwurster was a similar claim against the neutral owner of cargo of that ship in respect of delay in a port of distress, and also delay at Gibraltar in consequence of the war. The ship, which was German, sailed from the Chinese Islands with a cargo of guano under an English charter and bill of lading for a port in the Mediterranean. She had to put into Callao for repairs and called at Gibraltar for orders, where she heard of the war and there stayed till the end of the war, and then owing to change of orders proceeded to Hamburg and discharged at that port. The court held that the charter-party and bill of lading, although in English, were not of such a specific English character as to make English law govern; but that, however that might be, as the parties had elected Hamburg as the port of discharge, they chose that port as the place for completing the contract, and submitted to the laws of that place; that, therefore, under Art. 708, the ship having put into a harbour of distress and refuge to avoid a danger common to ship and cargo, the cargo must contribute to the expenses at that port; that the only exception to this rule is when the putting into the port of distress is caused by some default on the part of the shipowner (Art. 704); that Art. 657 prescribes that in the case of a ship ceasing to be free in consequence of war having broken out, and of the ship being compelled to remain in port, the division of the expenses of delay is to be settled according to general average, without providing for the case where the cargo has likewise ceased to be free, and that therefore there could be no distinction between the two cases, more especially as the owners of the free goods might easily sustain damage through capture of the ship.

This last decision was affirmed by the Court of Appeal.

latter case by the code, Art. 853 (see post.) The German courts give effect to the fact that charter-party and bill of lading are in English, but hold that a master of a German ship must be supposed to sign them, wishing German law to apply with the exception that where the place of delivery is in England, then as to matters concerning freight and delivery the law to be applied is the lex loci solutionis.

The Articles of the North German Code (taken from "Maritime Legislation," by E. E. Wendt), referred to in the evidence and the argument, were as follows:

504. The master shall at the same time take every possible care of the cargo during the voyage in the interest of those who are concerned therein. When special measures are required to avoid or lessen a loss, it is his duty to protect the interests of those concerned in the cargo as their representative; to take their instructions, if possible, and, as far as circumstances admit, to carry the same into effect; otherwise, however, to act according to his own discretion, and generally to take every possible care that those interested in the cargo are speedily informed of such occurrences, and of the measures thereby rendered necessary.

He is in such cases particularly authorised to discharge the whole or a portion of the cargo; in the most extreme cases, if a considerable loss on account of deterioration or other causes cannot be otherwise averted, to sell or hypothecate it for the purpose of providing means for its preservation and further transport; to reclaim it in case of capture or detention; or, if it shall have been otherwise withdrawn from his charge, to take all extra-judicial and judicial steps for its recovery.

505. When the prosecution of the voyage in its original direction is prevented by an accident, the master is at liberty either to continue the voyage in another direction, or to suspend it for a shorter or longer period, or to return to the port of departure, according to the circumstances and to the instructions received, which latter are to be adhered to as far as possible.

In the case of the cancelling of the contract of affreightment, he shall act according to the provisions of Art. 634.

607. The shipowner is answerable for any damage arising through loss of, or injury to, the goods, from the time of their being shipped until their delivery, unless he can prove that such loss and injury has been caused by the act of God (vis major), or by the natural condition of the goods, more particularly by vice propre, by diminution in quantity, by ordinary leakage, &c., or by such defective packing as could not be noticed externally. Loss and injury arising from a defective condition of the vessel, which, in spite of all possible caution, could not be discovered, are to be considered as loss and injury by the act of God.

631. Either party can withdraw from the contract without being liable for damages.

(1) When, before the commencement of the voyage, the vessel is placed under embargo, or taken possession of for the service of the country or a foreign power; the trade with the port of destination is prohibited; the loading port or the port of destination is blockaded; the exportation of the goods, to be shipped according to the contract of affreightment, from the port of loading or their importation into the port of destination is prohibited; the vessel is by a Government order prevented from putting to sea, or the voyage, or the transmission of the goods to be shipped according to the contract of affreightment, is prohibited.

In all the foregoing cases, however, the Government order justifies the withdrawal from the contract only when the impediment that has arisen, is apparently not of short duration.

(2) When, before the commencement of the voyage, a war has been declared, in consequence of which the vessel or the goods to be shipped according to the contract of affreightment, or both, can no longer be considered free, and would be liable to risk of capture.

632. The contract of affreightment is terminated when, after the commencement of the voyage, the vessel is lost by an unforeseen incident. The charterer shall, however, pay such proportion of the freight for the goods saved or rescued, as the actually performed part of the voyage may bear to the entire voyage (distance freight).

[ADM.]

THE SAN ROMAN.

[ADM.]

No claim for distance freight shall exceed the value of the goods saved.

634. The dissolution of the contract of affreightment alters nothing in the obligation of the master to take care of the cargo in the absence of the interested parties, even after the loss of the vessel (Art. 504). The master is, therefore, justified and obliged, and in urgent cases even without previous inquiry, as circumstances may require, either to forward the cargo to the port of destination in another vessel for account of the parties concerned, or to have it stored or sold, and in case of its being forwarded or stored, to sell a portion of the same for the purpose of realising the funds necessary thereto and to its preservation, or in case of its being forwarded, to take a bottomry bond on the whole or as part of it. The master is, however, not obliged to part with the cargo, or to deliver it to another master for the purpose of its being forwarded, unless the distance freight, as well as all other claims of the shipowner, and the contributions due from the cargo for general average, salvage and assistance, and bottomry have been paid or secured.

The shipowner is answerable for the fulfillment of the duties devolving on the master, according to the first section of this article, to the extent of his ship, so far as anything has been saved of it, and of the freight.

636. When, subsequent to the commencement of the voyage, any of the incidents occur to which reference is made in Art. 631, either party has a right to withdraw from the contract without being liable to damages.

When, however, any of the incidents mentioned in Art. 631, No. 1, have occurred, the parties have, before being able to withdraw to wait for the removal of the impediment three or five months respectively, according as the vessel is in a European or in a non-European port. Such period shall be calculated from the day of receiving notice of the impediment, if the master is then at a port, otherwise from that day on which, after having received such notice, he first reaches a port with the vessel. The discharge of the vessel shall, in default of an agreement to the contrary, take place at the port at which it is staying at the time of the receipt of the notice of withdrawal.

The charterer is bound to pay a distance freight for such portion of the voyage as is actually performed. (Art. 632.)

When, in consequence of such impediment, the vessel has returned to the port of departure or to any other port, in calculating the distance freight, the nearest point to the port of destination which the vessel has reached shall be taken as the basis for ascertaining the distance actually performed. The master is likewise bound to act in any such cases, before and after the dissolution of the contract of affreightment, in the interest of the cargo, in conformity with the Arts. 504 and 634.

637. When the vessel, after taking in its cargo, is detained in the port of loading before the commencement of the voyage, or in an intermediate port, or in a port of refuge after its commencement, by any of the emergencies mentioned in Art. 631, then the expenses of such detention (even if the requirements of general average are not present) are divided among ship, freight, and cargo, according to the principles of general average, whether the contract is thereby put an end to, or afterwards completely fulfilled. The expenses of the detention include all the expenses enumerated in the second clause of Art. 708, No. 4; but those of putting into and leaving port only when the vessel has put into a port of refuge on account of the obstacles.

644. After the termination of each single shipment, the master shall sign for the charterer, without delay, and on return of the provisional receipt that may have been given on delivery of the goods, as many bills of lading as the charterer may demand. All copies of the bill of lading must be identical, bear the same date, and state how many copies have been issued. The master is entitled to demand from the shipper a copy of the bill of lading bearing the latter's signature.

645. The bill of lading contains:

1. The name of the master.
2. The name and nationality of the vessel.
3. The name of the shipper.
4. The name of the consignee.
5. The port of loading.
6. The port of discharge, or the place at which orders for the same are to be obtained (port of call).

7. The description, quantity, and marks of the goods shipped.

8. The stipulations respecting the freight.

9. The place where and date on which it has been issued.

10. The number of copies issued.

653 The bill of lading is decisive for the legal position of the shipowner and consignee of the goods towards each other, more especially the delivery of the goods shall take place in accordance with the contents of the bill of lading.

Provisions of the contract of affreightment not embodied in the bill of lading have no legal effect as against the consignee, unless special reference has been made to them. When such reference has been made respecting the freight the contract of affreightment (for instance by the words "freight as per charter-party") the stipulations as to the time for discharging, the days on demurrage and the demurrage, are not considered to be therein included.

As regards the legal position of the shipowner and the charterer towards each other, the clauses of the contract of affreightment remain conclusive.

708. The following cases are especially general average. . . .

4. If the vessel has put into a port of refuge in order to avoid a common danger threatening the ship and cargo in case the voyage were prosecuted, more particularly if the putting into port is for the necessary repair of damage done to the ship during the voyage.

To general average belong in this case the expenses of entering and leaving, the expenses attached to the ship itself during the stay, also the expense of lodging the crew on shore if, and as long as, they could not remain on board; further if the cargo must be discharged as a consequence of the cause which led to the ship putting into the port of refuge, the expense of discharging and reshipping, and the expense of warehousing the cargo on shore up to the time when it might have been put on board again. The several charges for detention are only taken for the time that the cause of putting into the port of refuge remains in force.

853. Should it have been stipulated that the underwriter shall be exempt from the risk of war, but be liable for all other risks even after a molestation of war has commenced, which stipulation is more particularly presumed to have been made when the contract has been concluded with the clause "only against dangers of the sea," the underwriter's risk terminates only with the condemnation of the insured object, or so soon as it would have terminated if the risk of war had not been excepted; the underwriter is, however, not responsible for damages caused immediately by danger of war, &c.

Butt, Q.C. (Cohen with him) for the plaintiffs.—The main question here is whether the delay at Valparaiso after the repairs were completed was reasonable. We submit that the delay was unreasonable, whether English or German law governs the contract; but as the defendants contend that German law governs and is more favourable to them than English law we submit that English law governs. The contract is in the English language, the consignee is English, and the ultimate place of performance is an English port, and the lex loci solutionis therefore governs: (The Wilhelm Schmidt, ante, p. 82; 25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 34.) The Lundwurst (see note, ante) shows that the German courts apply that law, and raises a strong presumption that if the port of delivery in that case had been an English port the English law would have been applied. The lex loci solutionis is the law applicable to questions of reasonable delay, which is the main question here. The mere length of the delay we do not put forward as the only test of reasonableness. It must depend upon the circumstances of each case.

Pole v. Cetcovich, 9 C. B., N. S., 430; 3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 438; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 2;
The Wilhelm Schmidt (sup.).

According to the evidence of the German advocate, the test in German law is what a reasonable man would do under such circumstances. Whether the court applies German or English law, or even if there be no difference in this point between the two laws, still on the merits the delay was unreasonable. There was no such risk shown as would excuse the master from sailing on the completion of his repairs. Valparaiso was a neutral port, and the vessel would have had twenty-four hours' start. She might have been towed at night far out to sea. The delay of forty days from 13th Nov. to 23rd Dec. is at any rate indefensible, as there was then no French cruisers in the port. The defence that the master had to borrow money on bottomry is of no avail, as he did not advertise for a loan till 12th Dec.

Milward, Q.C. (E. C. Clarkson with him) for the defendants.—The fact that there were French men-of-war not only in the harbour of Valparaiso, but also cruising outside, rendered the risk of capture imminent if a vessel sailed. The rule as to twenty-four hours' start was never tested, and it was not known if it would have been accorded. No vessels left Valparaiso between 18th Aug., when the war was known, and 15th Dec., which shows that it was prudent to stay. There was such risk as to justify the master in remaining at Valparaiso. The Wilhelm Schmidt (sup.) decides that English law justifies delay if a risk actually exists; and therefore whatever law applies, the evidence is sufficient to show that the delay was justifiable in this case. But I submit that the German law applies. In The Teutonia (ante p. 214; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 48; L. Rep. 4P. C. 171) the Privy Council say, "It was argued, however, on the part of the appellant that to justify this course (deviation) both ship and cargo must be exposed to a common peril. . . . It appears to their Lordships, however, that there is no sound ground for this distinction; if the cargo had been a Prussian cargo it would have been exposed to the same danger as the ship from entering the port of Dunkirk; and it appears to their Lordships that when an English merchant ships goods on board a foreign ship, he cannot expect that the master will act in any respect different towards his cargo than he would towards a cargo shipped by one of his own country, and that it cannot be contended that the master is deprived of the right of taking reasonable and prudent steps for the preservation of his ship because, from the accident of the cargo not belonging to his own nation, the cargo is not exposed to the same danger as the ship." The letter from the defendants' agents show that the master considered he must follow the law of his flag, and he was not bound to put his ship into danger because the cargo was in no danger. He had no orders from the plaintiffs to run any risk. The law to be applied is to be gathered from the incidents of the contract. The ship was German, the owners German, and the ship was not in an English port when the charter was made; these facts were known to the plaintiffs; the charter-party was between Englishmen and Germans, and was partly executed in Germany. Under these circumstances what law did the defendants expect to govern? Could the plaintiffs shipping on a foreign ship expect anything but German law to be applied? The port of call is the only definite English port named in the charter-party. The ship might have been sent to Hamburg. The freight is payable in English money, but that is now a common standard everywhere. The charter-party contains the exceptions "Queen's enemies, restraints of princes," &c., and the master had only power to sign bills of lading in accordance with this charter-party, of which a copy was given both to the plaintiffs and their agents in Vancouver's Island. The bill of lading is therefore only a receipt for merchandise, and the charter-party is the governing contract.

Sandeman v. Scurr 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 608; L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 869; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 446;
 1 Parsons on Shipping 286.

[Butt.—I must admit that the charter-party and bill of lading are one contract, and that the defendants are entitled to take advantage of the exceptions if they existed.] Where it is not otherwise expressed in the contract the law of the flag governs: (Lloyd v. Guibert, L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 115; 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 602; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 26, 283.) If an offence had been committed on board this vessel the German criminal law would have applied, and it cannot be said that as to questions of civil law anything but German law applies. As a matter of convenience the law of the flag should govern, as the extent of the master's authority must be limited by that law: (The Karnak, L. Rep. 2 P. C. 505; 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 159; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 103, 276.) In The Wilhelm Schmidt (sup.) it is held that the naming a port of delivery fixes the law as that of the lex loci solutionis; but it is submitted that the governing law is decided at the time of entering into the contract, and it cannot be right that, by naming a port ex post facto, the charterer should have the power to change the law. The Patria (sup.); The Heinrich (ante p. 79; 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 914; L. Rep. 3 Adm. & Ecc. 424), and Wilhelm Schmidt do not conflict with Lloyd v. Guibert (sup.), as they all proceed upon the ground that the intention of the parties indicated the governing law. What is the German law? Under certain circumstances the owner of cargo may withdraw from the contract (Arts. 631, 636). The master had no right to leave Valparaiso as long as any risk existed, until the owners of cargo had received their option of withdrawing, and this they received by the master's letter, but the risk was ended before their answer came out. We were bound to communicate under Art. 504 and also to stay for the preservation of the cargo, and under Art. 657 the owner of cargo is liable for his share of expenses up to the time he withdraws or the voyage is continued. This was held in the two German decisions cited (see note), and there the law of the flag governed. I submit that even English law would justify the delay, and à fortiori German law which ought to govern.

Butt, Q.C. in reply.—Mere risk of capture is not sufficient to justify delay; there must be at least great probability. With respect to the duty of communication with the owners of cargo, I submit that it cannot be the law that where a ship is in a place where there is difficulty of communication—as in Valparaiso—the master need do so. He then becomes their agent, both by English law and under the provisions of Art. 504 of the code. Every case must be considered with regard to its particular risk, and I submit there is a clear breach both by English and German law.

June 25th.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is a suit instituted under the 6th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, by certain persons as owners and consignees of the cargo against the ship San Roman, a foreign vessel, for a breach of contract or duty in respect of the carriage of that cargo. The charter-party, dated the 13th Feb. 1869, was made between the owners of the ship and certain English merchants and charterers, by which it was agreed in substance that the vessel taking an outward cargo from Wales to Japan should proceed to Vancouver's Island, and load a cargo of spars, and therewith proceed as the charterers' agents might order, on the master signing bills of lading, either to a port of discharge direct within the limits thereafter mentioned, or to Queenstown or Falmouth for orders for a port of discharge within those limits. The master was to sign bills of lading without prejudice to the charter-party. The excepted perils were, "The Queen's enemies, the act of God, restraints of princes and rulers," and others. The bill of lading, which the plaintiff pleads as being pursuant to the terms of the charter-party, was dated 20th May 1870. It referred to the charter-party but contained only one excepted peril, "the dangers of the seas." The plaintiffs charge that the contract was violated by deviation from the voyage and by a delay as caused by the excepted dangers. There has been in this case, as in the former cases growing out of the German war (a), a contention as to what law governs the rights of the parties. In this case the ship was German; but the charterers were English and the charter-party, dated at London, was executed while she lay in the port of Hamburg, at both Hamburg and in England, in the English language. The bill of lading was in the same language, dated and delivered at Port Ludlow, in Vancouver's Island. The only material difference between the two instruments for the purposes of this suit is that the charter-party contains amongst its exceptions "the Queen's enemies" and "restraints of princes and rulers," while in the bill of lading the language is "the dangers of the seas only excepted;" but then this instrument refers to the charter-party, and the charter-party provided that the master might "sign bills of lading for the cargo as required by the charterers or their agents, but at not less than the above-chartered rate, without prejudice to this charter-party." I am of opinion that the contract is contained in both these instruments, but that the stipulation of the single exception in the latter does not supersede the stipulations as to the other exceptions stated in the former instrument. The port of call for orders and the port fixed for delivery were English. With respect to the law applicable to the circumstances, I must observe that this is not a case in which the master would be contravening the law of his country by carrying the goods to their destination, but is a case in which, so far as that law is concerned, he might do. The question as to the reasonableness of the delay, with reference to the excepted perils, seems to me, as in the case of the Wilhelm Schmidt, to be properly governed by the law of the place of performance; and this also appears to be the principle on which the Court of Commerce at Hamburg decided the case of the Landwirster (sup.). It has been argued that these opinions conflict with the judgment in Lloyd v. Guibert (sup.). It is not, however, necessary to decide this point, or whether the case of Lloyd v. Guibert be reconcilable with the decision of the Privy Council in the Hamburg (sup.), because I agree with Mr. Butt that upon the question of the reasonableness of delay there is really no substantial difference between the law of England and Germany. According to both an apprehension of capture, founded upon circumstances calculated to affect the mind of a master of ordinary courage, judgment, and experience, would justify delay. The San Roman sailed to Port Ludlow, there loaded a cargo of spars, and proceeded on her voyage to Queenstown. The serious illness of her master compelled her to put him ashore, and damage sustained at sea constrained her to put into Valparaiso on the 26th Aug. In the petition of the plaintiffs this putting into Valparaiso was charged as a breach of contract, but this charge at the hearing was abandoned, and the allegation of breach of contract confined to the subsequent remaining at that port. She did not leave it before the 23rd Dec. The necessary repairs were completed on the 23rd Sept., when the ship was ready for sea. It is the delay during this interval of time, namely, from the 23rd Sept. to the 23rd Dec., which the plaintiffs now allege as a breach of contract. The delay is admitted; the defence set up is that it was caused by the danger of capture from French cruisers, which rendered it unsafe to leave Valparaiso, and which brought the delay within the exception in the charter-party, as to "the Queen's enemies." It is admitted that there was a danger of the kind stated, but it is contended that it was not of the degree which warranted this long postponement of the execution of the contract; it was not of that pressing and imminent character which alone would justify a delay; it was a danger rather in the nature of other perils by sea, which it was the duty of the master to encounter. I must not omit to notice one argument addressed to me upon the hypothesis that this case is governed by the law of the flag—German law. That law, it is said, entitles the owner to charge a portion of the expenses incident to the delay, on the principle of general average, upon the shipper, the master is exposed to a strong temptation to remain in port during a war of this kind, certain on the one hand that the loss would only partially affect his employers, and, on the other hand, that he will be the gainer by being employed a longer time, because if he reached the port of destination his employment would be at an end till the war was over. I am not insensible to the force of this argument, but the only effect of it must be to render the court vigilant in ascertaining the character of the danger and the bonâ fides of the excuse. I must also bear in mind that the German law in this case does not, as was proved to me in this case, as also in the case of the Patria (sup.) forbid the master to run the risk of capture in fulfilling the engagements. The material evidence as to the delay appears to be as follows:—On the 2nd Sept. the correspondents of the plaintiff and consignees of the ship wrote this letter (His Lordship read the letter as before set out). To this the following answer was written: (His Lordship read the letter of 19th Oct. from the plaintiff to Schutte & Co.) This answer, however, did not arrive at Valparaiso till after the 23rd Dec., when the San Roman had sailed. I must observe, that in the letter of Messrs. Schutte & Co. there is on the one hand no suggestion that Captain Hacké was to blame, or that his alleged reason for remaining in port was unsupported by fact; while on the other there is conclusive evidence that he was acting under the advice, indeed the admonition, of his consul not to go to sea, and in the case of The Teutonia (ante, p. 214; 26 L. T. Rep. N.S.; L. Rep. 4 P. C. 171), the Privy Council, affirming my judgment, held that if a neutral merchant put his goods on board a foreign ship belonging to a belligerent nation, "it cannot be contended that the master is deprived of the right of taking reasonable and prudent steps for the preservation of his ship, because from the accident of the cargo not belonging to his own nation the cargo is not exposed to the same danger as the ship." The following facts are clearly proved: that a French man-of-war or store ship was always in the port; that there were several German ships in it waiting there from the first days in August to 15th Dec.; that during this period one only sailed, on the 5th Aug., for Hamburg; that no German vessel left Valparaiso between the 18th Aug. and the 15th Dec.; that up to the 13th Nov. French men-of-war were in and out of the port; that after this time, according to the register of the commercial exchange of Valparaiso, it was impossible to discover the destinations of the French ships, which "were kept strictly secret," but that it appeared on the registry that they were gone on a cruise (para cruzar); that there had been captures made by the French off Peru and Chili; that even after the 12th Dec. French ships were reported in Peruvian waters; that after the news of the German victories arrived, the first German vessel left Valparaiso on the 15th Dec. I think it is also proved that between the 15th Dec. and the 23rd, when the San Roman left Valparaiso, the captain was guilty of no unnecessary delay with respect either to the bottomry bond or to obtaining the average papers necessary for the protection of his employers, and that even then his crew at first refused to go to sea through fear of capture. It has been urged that in spite of the French cruisers, the San Roman, having liberty of twenty-four hours' start, might have steamed, with the aid of a tug, out of the reach of the French cruisers. But the evidence satisfies me that this course would have exposed the ship to the greatest possible risk of capture. There were French cruisers without the port and a stationary French store ship within. Some communication was doubtless kept up between them. The evidence shows that the preparations of the San Roman to be ready for sea would in all probability have made known her intention, and the evidence as to the usual state of the wind off that coast does not, in my judgment, add any circumstances which would favour the escape from French cruisers, but the contrary. However this may be, I think the defendant has, on the whole, established his defence, that he has exercised "his right in taking reasonable and prudent steps for the preservation of his ship," in refusing, under the advice of his consul, and in all the circumstances of the case, to sail before Dec. 23, and I dismiss the suit with costs.

Damage to cargo—War—Risk of capture—Reasonableness of delay—Governing law—Excepted perils—German law—Duty of transshipment.

By both English and North German law, risk of capture, such as to justify a master whose vessel is carrying a cargo under a charter-party and bills of lading, containing the exceptions, "Queen's enemies. &c." in putting into and remaining in an intermediate port during the continuance of that risk, need not amount to an actual operative restraint (almost a blockade), but must be that risk which would induce a reasonably prudent man, exercising due discretion and fortitude, not to expose the vessel to capture.

Semble, that where the chances of escape and capture are equal, the master would be justified in remaining in port.

By a charter-party in the English language entered into at Constantinople between the master of a North German vessel, and North German merchants there resident, it was agreed that the vessel should load a cargo, and proceed therewith to Falmouth, Plymouth, or Queenstown, for orders for a safe port in the United Kingdom, or on the Continent between Havre and Hamburg, Queen's enemies, &c., excepted. The cargo was laden, and the master signed bills of lading in accordance with the charter-party, also in the English language, but with an endorsement in German, and the cargo was therein consigned to consignees resident in England.

Held, that the law to be applied to the execution of the contract was the North German law. (a)

The vessel sailed, but her master learning on his voyage that war existed between France and Germany, and fearing capture by French cruisers, put into Gibraltar. During the war there would have been great risk of capture off that port and off the ports of call if the vessel had continued her voyage; her master in consequence remained there until the end of the war (nine months). He then sailed, and arriving at a port of call was ordered to an English port. The cargo was damaged by the delay. In a claim by the consignees, Held, that by both English and North German law the master was justified in putting and remaining in port, and that the shipowners were not responsible for the damage caused by the delay.

By the North German law, when, subsequent to the commencement of the voyage, a war has been declared in consequence of which the vessel or the goods shipped therein under the contract of affreightment, or both, can no longer be considered free or would be liable to risk of capture, either party may withdraw from the contract without being liable to damages. On such dissolution of the contract the master is bound, if necessary or if required, to

(a) It is to be presumed that the learned judge in this case meant to decide that the German law applied to the question of transshipment and that only, otherwise the decision would appear to conflict with the San Roman (ante p. 347), where it was held that the question of reasonableness of delay was governed by the law of the place of performance. As German and English law appear on this latter point to be nearly identical, it is practically immaterial in the present case by which law the question was governed. The real importance as to the governing law was in so far as it affected the question of transshipment.—Ed.

transshipment and forward the cargo at the expense of the owner of cargo, but he is not bound to part with the cargo unless the distress freight for the part of the voyage performed and other expenses have been paid or secured.

Whilst the master of the vessel was at Gibraltar, the consignees required him to proceed or to transship at his own risk and expense. This the master refused, offering, however, to transship against a reasonable reduction of freight, which offer the plaintiffs would not accept.

Held that, as the master was entitled by the German law to his distance freight and expenses, the demand of the plaintiffs was not such a legal demand within the meaning of that law as compelled the master to transship.

THIS was a suit instituted under the 6th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, on behalf of Messrs. Scaramanga and Co., merchants, of London, against the vessel Express and her freight, and her owners intervening, to recover damages for injury sustained to cargo belonging to the plaintiffs, shipped on board that vessel, and caused by alleged wrought and unjustifiable delay and deviation on the voyage whilst carrying the cargo. The Express belonged to the port of Rostock, in the Duchy of Mecklenburg, one of the States of the North German Confederation, and was owned by subjects of that Confederation. In May 1870, she was lying in the port of Constantinople, and whilst there her master entered into a charter-party with Messrs. Schott and Reppen, merchants at that place, and also subjects of the North German Confederation. By that charter party, which was in the English language, it was agreed that the "Express North German flag," should proceed to a loading place in the sea of Azoff, as ordered at Berdianski, and there load from the factors of the freighter a full and complete cargo of tallow, wheat, Indian corn, seed, or other stowage goods, at the option of the freighter, and, being so loaded, should therewith proceed to a safe port in the United Kingdom, or to a safe port on the Continent, between Havre and Hamburg, both inclusive, or so near thereunto as she might safely get, calling for orders at Queenstown, Falmouth, or Plymouth, at the master's option, and deliver the said cargo on being paid freight, as there set out, "the act of God, the Queen's enemies, the restraint of princes and rulers, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation, always excepted." In pursuance of this charter-party, the Express proceeded according to orders received at Berdianski, to Taganrog, and there the plaintiffs, who were the factors of the freighters, shipped upon the vessel a cargo of rye in bulk, and the master signed and delivered to the plaintiffs a bill of lading in respect of the cargo which was as follows:

Shipped in very good order and condition by Messrs. Scaramanga and Co. for account and risk of whom it may concern, in and upon the good ship called the Express, North German flag, whereof is master for the present voyage William Fretwurst, and now riding at anchor in the port of Taganrog, and bound for Queenstown, Falmouth, or Plymouth for orders, rye in bulk, say two thousand four hundred and ninety-seven chetwerts, being marked and numbered as in the margin, and are to be delivered in the like good order and well conditioned at a safe afloat port in the United Kingdom or on the Continent, as per charter-party (the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation of whatever nature and kind [soever excepted], unto Messrs.

Scaramanga and Co., of London, or to their assigns, paying freight, gratuity, and demurrage (if any) for the said goods, and all other conditions as per charter-party, stipulated in Constantinople the 3rd of May, 1870, with primage and average accustomed. In witness whereof the master or purser of the said ship hath affirmed to three bills of lading, all of this tenor and date, the one of which three bills being accomplished, the other two to stand void.

On the back of the bill of lading there was a receipt by the master for 200*l.* on account of freight. The rest of the freight would have amounted to 750*l.*

On 26th June 1870, the Express set sail from Taganrog with the said cargo, and proceeded on her voyage, and on 16th Aug. 1870, she cast anchor off Algeiras, for the purpose of filling her water casks. On 19th July, war had broken out between France and Germany, and the master of the Express learned at Algeiras this fact, and thereupon communicated with the North German consul at Gibraltar, and he received a reply from the consul warning him of the risk of capture he would run if he proceeded on his voyage, and advising him to put into Gibraltar as a safer port. Accordingly the master on 18th Aug. sailed and reached Gibraltar on the same day, and there stayed until 2nd Feb. 1871. On 30th Jan. 1871, the master learned that an armistice had been concluded between France and Germany, and thereupon sailed on 2nd Feb. for Falmouth, where she arrived on 17th Feb., and having given notice to the charterers, received orders for London, to which port the Express proceeded, arriving there on 26th Feb. 1871. On 28th Feb. the discharge of the cargo began, and it was completed on 2nd March. The cargo was found to be damaged by heating, caused by the delay.

Whilst the ship lay at Gibraltar from Aug. 1870 to Feb. 1871, a long correspondence took place between the master and Messrs. Mosley and Co., of Gibraltar, the plaintiffs' agents, and between Mosley and Co. and the plaintiffs, as to the ship proceeding on its voyage in spite of the war, and as to the transshipment and forwarding of the cargo in another vessel, and as to the amount of freight to be paid to the master. The substance of this correspondence will be found set out in the judgment.

The above facts were undisputed on either side. The plaintiffs' petition after setting out the contract contained in the charter-party and bill of lading was as follows:

3. The Express duly sailed on her said voyage with the said cargo on board, and in the course of the said voyage, without justifiable cause or excuse, put into the port of Gibraltar. After the said vessel had so put into the said port of Gibraltar, and whilst she was lying there, her master was requested by the plaintiffs to proceed on the aforementioned voyage, and if he would not do so, then to transship and forward the said cargo.

4. The said master, however, declined to comply with such request, and remained at Gibraltar with his said vessel and the said cargo on board of her for a very considerable time.

5. By reason of the premises the said master wrongfully and without justifiable cause, in violation of the terms of the said bill of lading, deviated from and delayed proceeding on the voyage in the said bill of lading mentioned.

THE EXPRESS.

6. The plaintiffs were and are the owners of the said cargo, and the holders of the said bill of lading.

7. By reason of the premises, the said cargo became and was greatly heated, damaged, and depreciated, and the said cargo was delivered to the plaintiffs in a much worse order and condition than it was shipped in, this not being occasioned by any of the perils, causes, or matters in the said bill of lading excepted, and thereby the plaintiffs have sustained great loss, and have been deprived of divers profits which they would otherwise have derived from the said cargo.

The defendant's answer set out the terms of the charter-party, the bill of lading and the facts as above given, and then proceeded;—

5. Upon arriving at Algieras, as aforesaid, the master of the Express was informed of the outbreak and existence of the said war, and learned that it would be dangerous for the Express to proceed upon her voyage owing to the risk of her being captured by French cruisers at sea; and on the 18th Aug. 1870 the master of the Express, as he lawfully might do under and by virtue of the laws of Mecklenburgh and of the said Confederation, and as was reasonable and proper for him to do under the circumstances herein set forth, sailed with the Express from Algieras, and proceeded to and on the same day arrived in the roadstead of Gibraltar, which was a safer and more sheltered roadstead than that of Algieras. It is not the fact that the master of the Express without justifiable cause and excuse, or wrongfully or in violation of the terms of the said bill of lading, put into the port of Gibraltar, as alleged in the 3rd and 5th articles of the petition.

7. From the time of the arrival of the Express at Algieras until the 20th Jan. 1871, the said war continued to exist, and during all such time the Express would have been liable to risk of capture if she had attempted to proceed on her voyage, and during all such time the French armed national cruisers were cruising off the Straits of Gibraltar, and in the Atlantic Ocean, and in the English Channel, and off the ports of Cork, Falmouth, and Plymouth, with the intention of capturing the Express and other North German vessels; and if the Express had during the time aforesaid attempted to proceed on her voyage she would almost certainly have been captured by some or one of such cruisers.

8. It is not the fact that the master of the Express unjustifiably, or in violation of the said bill of lading, delayed proceeding on his voyage, as alleged in Art. 5 of the petition. On the contrary the said master was always ready and desirous to proceed from Gibraltar as soon as he could do so without being exposed to risk of capture.

9. By the law of the said North German Confederation the master of the Express was entitled to keep her at Gibraltar whilst she would have been liable to risk of capture at sea by reason of the said war, and the said master was not, whilst the said war and liability to risk of capture continued, under any obligation to attempt to proceed further upon his said voyage; and, by the said law, the master of the Express was not guilty of any breach of contract or duty with or to the plaintiffs in respect of his putting in Gibraltar, or remaining there with the Express with the said cargo on board of her, or in respect of not transhipping the said cargo.

10. The master of the Express sailed from Gibraltar, with the Express, within a reasonable and proper time after receiving notice of the termination of the risk of capture by reason of the said war.

11. On the 17th Feb. 1871, the Express arrived in Falmouth harbour, and her master having duly given notice of his arrival to the charterers' agents in London, on the 20th of the said month, received orders to proceed to London, and on the same day the Express left Falmouth, and on the 26th Feb. 1871, arrived in London.

12. On the 28th of the said month of Feb. the discharge of the cargo was commenced, and on the 2nd March 1871, such discharge was completed.

13. It is not the fact that the cargo of the Express was delivered in a worse order and condition than it was in when shipped.

14. If the said cargo was delivered in worse order and condition than it was when shipped, the deterioration was caused by the detention of the Express at Gibraltar, as hereinbefore mentioned, which is an exceptive peril within the true intent and meaning of the exception of "the Queen's enemies," contained in the said bill of lading, and by the natural condition and inherent vice of the said cargo, and by one of such causes.

15. Whilst the said vessel was detained at Algieras and Gibraltar, as aforesaid, the master of the Express used all due and proper and reasonable care and skill, in ventilating, trimming, and otherwise caring for the safety, order, and condition of the said cargo, and did all things on his part to be done, in taking care of the same, and any deterioration or depreciation of the said cargo, was not caused by any neglect or default of the said master, but was caused by the detention of the said vessel as aforesaid, or by the natural condition and inherent vice of the said cargo, or by both of such causes, and by the law of North German Confederation, regard being had to the terms of the said bill of lading and charter-party, neither the Express nor her owners, nor her said master, is or are liable to damages, in respect of the depreciation or deterioration of the said cargo.

The plaintiffs traversed the defendants' allegations of law and fact, and concluded the pleadings.

The evidence was principally directed to the risk of capture, and to the question of transshipment of the cargo and the freight to be paid to the master. A commission was sent out to Gibraltar to take evidence for both plaintiffs and defendants. From the evidence of Michael Porral, a member of the firm of Thomas Mosley and Co., agents for the plaintiffs, it appeared that on the arrival of the Express at Gibraltar, he requested the master to proceed on his voyage, and the master proposed to land the cargo in Gibraltar if the whole freight was paid; that the master afterwards proposed a deduction from the freight, but that this the agents, having communicated with the plaintiffs, refused, and that they thereupon entered a protest against the delay, and refusal to transship; that the master again offered to deduct 125*l.* from the freight, but always refused to transship or forward the cargo; that other German vessels remained at Gibraltar on account of the war, but that the witness knew of no French cruisers being in Gibraltar Bay during the war.

The defendant produced six witnesses for examination under the commission—the North German Consul at Gibraltar, his clerk, Lloyd's agent at Gibraltar, his clerk, and two merchants. From their evidence it appeared that the consul wrote officially to the master of the Express, whilst the latter was at Algieras, to notify to him the existence of the war, and to tell him that if he proceeded he would be liable to be captured by French cruisers, the consul being bound to do this by the instructions of his Government; that whilst the war lasted five or six different French cruisers were frequently in and out of Gibraltar Bay, and passing through the Straits, and some of them more than once, and that they were cruising in the neighbourhood; that this fact was ascertained by the consul's clerk and Lloyd's agent's clerk, whose business it was to keep a look out for French men-of-war, and to report them, the one to the consul the other to Lloyd's; that it was officially reported to the consul that four German vessels had been captured in the Mediterranean by French cruisers, and that this report was communicated by the consul to his Government and also to the master of the Express; that nine North German vessels left Gibraltar during the war, but that some of these vessels had, as they came from French ports, safe conducts from the French Government, four or five sailing with such papers; that the German masters could themselves see the French cruisers from the Bay; that the Bay was never free from French men-of-war for more than a week together, and usually they came more frequently.

At the hearing, witnesses were called for the plaintiffs, who stated that although they had frequently passed through the Straits of Gibraltar in command of vessels during the war, they had seen no French men-of-war.

For the defendants the master of the Express gave evidence to the effect that he at first declined either to proceed or to deliver over the cargo at Gibraltar, except on the payment of full freight, and would not transship the cargo and forward it at his own expense; that on 24th Sept. he offered to make a reduction of 125*l.* from his freight, and deliver at Gibraltar, but that the plaintiffs' agents declined to accept this offer, as they had no authority; that as the cargo, becoming warm, in spite of all precautions to keep it in good condition, the master wrote, offering to the plaintiffs to transship as against a reasonable reduction of freight: that the plaintiffs never offered to pay to the master a distance freight at Gibraltar, but if they had offered it he would ultimately have delivered it at Gibraltar; that if the full freight had been paid to him, he would not have transshipped the cargo, or have forwarded it at the ship's expense; that he remained in Gibraltar because there was great risk of capture all the time; that he stayed not only on account of the ship, but also on account of the cargo, as he was responsible for it as well as for the ship; that he frequently saw French men-of-war in Gibraltar Bay.

Witnesses were also called for the defendants to prove risk of capture off the channel ports, and they proved that French men-of-war were constantly cruising in the channel, and German vessels were often captured there, and similar evidence was given with regard to Queenstown.

It was agreed that the evidence given by the North German advocate in the San Roman (ante pp. 347, 250), should be evidence in this case so far as applicable.

He was called again in this case, and gave the following additional evidence:

The master of a North German ship carrying a neutral cargo who deviates from his course from fear of capture and enters a neutral port, is entitled to remain there whilst the risk lasts, and cannot be compelled to go on even if the owner of the cargo wishes him to proceed. The shipowner may order the ship to stay, or the master may stay without an order. No right is given by the code to the owner of the cargo except to withdraw from the contract on payment of distance freights, and the owner of cargo must pay his share of expenses of detention up to the time of withdrawing. The master must have reasonable ground for his delay.

The sections of the North German code referred to in the argument and the judgment will be found set out in the San Roman (ante p. 351). It was agreed that the arguments in the San Roman (ante p. 352) should be taken as arguments in the present case, so far as they were available.

Butt, Q.C. (Cohen with him) for the plaintiffs.—The delay in this case was 108 days; there was, therefore, time for communication with owners of cargo (German Code, Art. 504), and, if German law applies, there was opportunity for either party to withdraw from their contract, on the plaintiffs paying a distance freight, but the master refused for a long time to accept anything but full freight. The plaintiffs brought themselves within Art. 634, if the German law applies, and were willing to withdraw. The master only offered to deduct 125*l.*, whereas the two-thirds only of the distance was performed, and the proportionate amount to be deducted was 250*l.* If the contract was put an end to by the acts of the plaintiffs in offering a distance freight the master was bound to transship under Art. 630, and this he refused to do. As the master refused to discharge his cargo at Gibraltar, or to take a distance freight, then the reasons for delay must be narrowly observed (a). The master delayed after he knew that the cargo was heated, and even then refused distance freight. The danger of capture about Gibraltar was very slight. There was no actual danger, only a dread of capture. We submit that the master was bound by German law to have transshipped, and by English law he should, as a reasonable man, either have proceeded or have transshipped. He was not entitled to keep the cargo on board the ship in part. English law should govern this contract for the reasons stated in the San Roman (ante p. 352).

Milward Q.C. (Clarkson with him), from the defendants.—If either party withdraws from the contract under Art. 634, all the master need do to earn pro rata freight is to put the goods ashore. He need not transship, save at the owner's expense. We submit that the German law applies to this contract. This was a German ship, German master, and the charter was entered into at Constantinople, between German subjects, and although the bill of lading is in English, that portion of it written by the master is in German. There is nothing especially English in the contract; except that the ship is to call at Falmouth, &c., for orders. As to freight and transshipment the only definite proposition that was made to the master was, that he should transship at his own expense. The master, on the other hand, offered to deliver the goods at Gibraltar, on payment of a reasonable amount of freight, and that must be considered as an offer to take pro rata freight or reasonable distance freight. He was not bound to part with the goods without payment of such freight: (Art. 634) As to risk of capture, there was actual danger, and the apprehension of the master was so reasonable as to justify delay. More than a week did not elapse without a French man-of-war being in Gibraltar Bay, and there were more passing through the Straits, and there were actually captures in the vicinity of that port. The Landwirster (see note to the San Roman ante p. 350) remained in Gibraltar till the end of the war, and the court at Hamburg, held that she was justified in so doing, there being a substantial peril. There was also danger in the English Channel. If there was such risk as made it right for the master to stay a week, then, so long as the risk remained the same, the master was entitled to stay in port any length of time. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The risk must be absolutely imminent, and so great as to induce a reasonable man to delay.] In past wars where England was a belligerent, it was unlawful for ships to sail without convoy (38 Geo. 3 c. 76; A. D. 1798; 43 Geo. 3 c. 57). These enactments were passed to prevent merchantmen giving the enemies of the country the chance of enriching themselves by capture.

Abbott on Shipping. Part IV. c. 5, p. 356. (American edition.);

Valin Ordonnance de la Marine. Vol. I., Liv. III., Tit 4, Art 5, p. 691;

This accounts for there being no cases of this nature arising out of the earlier wars, as it was illegal to sail without protection. The German code has attempted to carry out this same purpose by making vessels stay in port during risk of capture.

Butt, Q.C. in reply.—I submit that to justify delay there must be an actual operative restraint almost approaching to a blockade. If the chances of escape and of capture are equal, a master would be bound to proceed. It has never been decided that mere risk of capture justifies delay, as seems to be the opinion of the German masters. No doubt the master acted with bonâ fides; but it must be remembered that he is of opinion that he might stay as long as he liked whilst making the cargo pay a large portion of the expense as average. Would he have stayed at all if he had supposed that he must bear the expense? It was for his interest, in his view of the law, to remain in port half way, as, by proceeding to his port of discharge he would have had no further claim for expenses of delay against the cargo, and would have lost employment till the end of the war. Reasonable apprehension of danger is not a sufficient excuse for delay; there must be such actual danger as would operate upon the mind of a reasonable man. There is here a contract, and the defendants are bound to perform or to show excuse. The German law, unlike the old convoy Acts, imposes no penalty on masters proceeding to sea without convoy, and, therefore, does not make it illegal. Those Acts were probably passed because the Legislature considered that without enactment, masters were bound to proceed under the bills of lading in ordinary use.

June 25.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is a suit instituted under the 6th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, by Messrs. Scaramanga and Co., merchants, owners of the cargo, and holders of the bill of lading, against the foreign vessel Express, for a breach of contract or duty in respect of the carriage of that cargo. In the month of May 1870, a charter-party was entered into between the master of the Express and certain merchants of Constantinople. In pursuance of this charter-party the Express sailed to Taganrog, and took on board a cargo of rye upon the terms of a bill of lading which was as follows: (His Lordship here read the bill of lading as above set out.) In this case the ship was German, her master was German, she was lying at Constantinople, her charterers were German, her charter-party was in English, the bill of lading was in English with a proviso in German. She took on board her cargo at Taganrog; her charter-party provided for a delivery at a safe port in the United Kingdom, or on the continent between Havre or Hamburg. Her port of call in fact was Falmouth. I think in these circumstances the law to be applied to the execution of the contract is German, though in this as in the case of the San Roman (ante p. 347), with the exception of the question of transshipment the principles of the English and of the German law would be pretty much the same. On the 30th June 1820 the Express sailed from Taganrog. On the 16th Aug. she anchored off Algeiras, there she was informed of the war which had broken out between France and Germany, and on the 18th Aug. she arrived at Gibraltar. On the 30th Jan. 1871, the news of the armistice reached her. On the 2nd Feb. she left Gibraltar. On the 17th she arrived at Falmouth; there she received orders to go to London, where she arrived on the 26th. On the 28th she began to discharge her cargo: and on the 2nd of March the discharge was completed. The questions to be determined by the court are—first, whether the master was justified in putting into Gibraltar? secondly, whether he was justified in remaining there? thirdly, whether he was bound to transship and forward the cargo? The burthen of proving the affirmative of the two first propositions, and of the negative of the third lies upon the defendants. I am of opinion that the fair result of the evidence is that the Express would have run great risk of capture if she had left Gibraltar at an earlier period than she did leave it. I do not assent to the proposition, that if the chances of capture and escape were equal the master was bound to proceed, but I think the former preponderated. It was contended that there would be what was called “an actual operative restraint.” This would seem to indicate that nothing short of a blockade would justify the delay of the vessel to sail. I am not of this opinion; I think a reasonably prudent man, exercising due discretion and fortitude, would not have sailed, thereby exposing his ship to capture at this time. I am of opinion that the master was justified in putting into Gibraltar, and remaining there till the 2nd Feb. The question as to his duty to transship remains to be considered. This is a duty which, I may observe, is set forth in the plaintiff’s petition, but which only could arise under the German law. [His Lordship here read Article 634 of the North German Code (see The San Roman, ante, p. 352).] The most important evidence upon this point appears to me to be contained in the correspondence between Messrs. Scaramanga and Co., and their agents, Mosley and Co., at Gibraltar. The first letter is from Mosley and Co. on the 17th Aug., in which they announce the arrival of the Express at Algeiras, that the writer has had an interview with the Prussian Consul at Gibraltar, who told him, “that he was going to take upon himself to order the captain, through the Prussian vice consul at Algeiras, not to proceed.” The answer to this is on the 22nd Aug., in these words: “In reply to this, we beg to say that the captain is bound to proceed, but if he desires to transship cargo at his risk and expense for United Kingdom or Continent orders, or for Amsterdam direct, we are willing to allow him to do so by first-class vessel or steamer.” On the 26th Mosley and Co. write that the captain says “he cannot proceed because of their being at a short distance from this port French privateers, he would expose both the vessel and cargo, and that unless the whole freight was paid to him and under the due formalities with reference to his charter-party, he would not transship cargo under the unfavourable conditions as proposed by you." On the 3rd Sept. they write that, having remonstrated with the captain for asking the whole freight, he said "he was prepared to make an equitable deduction"—200*l.* out of 750*l.*; but they said "they had no authority to enter into any arrangements of this kind." On the 10th Sept. Scaramanga and Co. write that if the captain would pay the charges of transshipment to Amsterdam or Rotterdam, "we should be disposed to accept Gibraltar as port of discharge and pay balance of freight due to him." On the 12th Sept., the captain, through his agent, assures Mosley and Co., that "he will continue his voyage as soon as he can do so in safety." On the 17th Sept. the cargo is surveyed and declared to be "in most excellent condition." On the 24th Mosley and Co. write that they cannot find a sailing vessel for the purpose of transshipment; they add: "We had an interview with the captain and endeavoured to persuade him to accept what you propose. He told us that the only thing he could do is to make a deduction of 125*l.* from the total freight;" and added that he was more liberal than another German captain had been in like circumstances. On the 30th Sept. Scaramanga and Co. wrote that they were not "disposed to modify" their proposition. On the 21st Oct. the captain wrote to Mosley and Co. that the cargo was becoming warm, and that he wished to know whether they "would be inclined to transship the cargo into another vessel here against a reasonable reduction of freight." Mosley and Co. replied that they had no other offer to make than that which they had already proposed; they informed Scaramanga and Co. that they had made this reply. On the 4th Nov. Scaramanga and Co., wrote that the captain's letters "do not call for any special reply, as he makes no definite proposal therein," and said that by making no offer themselves they would "probably be in a better position ultimately to deal with him for loss arising out of his unwarrantable conduct in remaining in port." On the 24th Nov. they wrote that they should be willing to entertain any proposal emanating from the captain. On the 4th Feb. Mosley and Co. wrote that the captain had sailed, and on the 11th that "all the Germans that were lying here have now disappeared." I am of opinion that the only definite proposal made by Scaramanga and Co. to the captain was that he should transship at his own cost and expense; and that they were not authorised by the German code to make such a demand. I therefore pronounce that the defence is successful, both upon the ground of the deviation and delay being caused by a reasonable apprehension of capture, and upon the ground that no legal demand, in the sense of the article of the code for transshipment, was made to the captain. I dismiss the suit with costs.

THE HEWSONS.

County Courts—Admiralty jurisdiction—Limitation to existing jurisdiction—Construction of statutes—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Acts (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71; 32 & 33 Vict. c. 51).

The High Court of Admiralty will not give a decision upon the construction of a statute which would be in direct conflict with the decision of a court of common law, although not agreeing with that decision.

The County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Acts, in giving jurisdiction to the County Courts in certain admiralty and maritime causes, give only such jurisdiction, limited in amount, as is already possessed by the High Court of Admiralty. Simpson v. Blues (ante, p. 326, C. P.) followed, but doubted.

THESE two cases were appeals from County Courts, and the question in each being almost identical only one judgment was delivered.

CARGO ex ARGOS.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the City of London Court (Admiralty jurisdiction), The case was instituted in that court in rem by the following præcipe:

We, Cattarns, Johu, and Cattarns, attorneys, hereby institute a suit for freight, demurrage, and expenses on behalf of Jules Gandet, of No. 73, Lower East Smithfield, owner of the steamship or vessel Argos, against 147 barrels of petroleum lately shipped on board the steamship Argos by W. Horner, but now laying at Plaistow Wharf, Plaistow, in the county of Essex, owner or owners unknown, in the sum of 200*l.*, and we consent that all instruments and documents in the said suit may be left for us at No. 33, Mark Lane, in the city of London.

Dated this 28th Dec. 1870.

An appearance was entered in the suit on behalf of Walter Horner Brown, the owner of the goods, on the 31st Dec. 1870, and bail was subsequently given.

The Argos was a steamer trading between the port of London and the port of Havre, in France, and the petroleum had been shipped on board her to be carried to Havre under a bill of lading signed by the master, by which it was agreed that the goods, being in good order and condition, should be delivered in like order and condition at Havre, the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, machinery, boilers, steam, and steam navigation excepted on payment of freight as agreed, demurrage to be paid if the goods were not taken out within twenty-four hours after arrival. The Argos arrived at Havre, but the port authorities refused to allow her to approach the quay, the usual landing place, with the petroleum on board, as there were so many munitions of war lying about that it was dangerous; it was during the Franco-Prussian war, and the Prussians were in the neighbourhood. After various unsuccessful attempts to get permission to land the goods at neighbouring ports, the master was compelled by the authorities to discharge the petroleum into a lighter in the outer harbour. This he did, and was then allowed to discharge the remainder of his cargo at the quay. When his homeward cargo was shipped, he was compelled to reshipe the petroleum and convey it back to London, as the authorities would not allow it to remain in Havre. On arrival of the ship in London the owners claimed the freight, demurrage, and expenses incurred, but this the appellant refused to pay on the ground that the cargo was not delivered. This suit was thereupon instituted, and resulted in a decree for the respondent (the plaintiff), from which decree the appellant (the defendant) now appealed:

No objection was taken to the jurisdiction in the City of London Court, but after the case had been argued on appeal on its merits in the Admiralty Court, the Court of Common Pleas, in Simpson v. Blues (ante, p. 326; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 697), decided (on 8th May 1872) that under the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), and the Amendment Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51), the County Courts having admiralty jurisdiction had only such jurisdiction as was already possessed by the Admiralty Court, and that those Acts did not confer a more extensive jurisdiction, and a prohibition was granted restraining the Liverpool County Court from proceeding in a cause over which the Court of Admiralty would have had no jurisdiction. The learned judge of the Admiralty Court thereupon ordered this case to be argued upon the question of jurisdiction, as upon the facts shown it was a cause over which he would have no original jurisdiction, under the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10, sect. 6), nor in virtue of his ordinary jurisdiction. The case now came on for argument. (a)

(a) The sections of the statutes referred to are as follow: Admiralty Court Act, 1861, sect. 6.—The High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim by the owner or consignee or assignee of any bill of lading, of any goods carried into any port in England or Wales in any ship, for damage done to the goods or any part thereof by the negligence or misconduct of or for any breach of duty or breach of contract on the part of the owner, master, or crew of the ship, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that at the time of the institution of the cause any owner or part owner of the ship is domiciled in England or Wales.

The marginal note to this section is:—"As to claims for damage to cargo imported."

The County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, "An Act for conferring Admiralty Jurisdiction on the County Courts":—

Sect. 3. Any County Court having Admiralty jurisdiction shall have jurisdiction, and all powers and authorities relating thereto, to try and determine, subject and according to the provisions of this Act, the following causes (in this Act referred to as Admiralty causes):

(2) As to any claim for towage, necessaries, or wages, any cause in which the amount claimed does not exceed one hundred and fifty pounds:

(3) As to any claim for damage to cargo, or damage by collision; any cause in which the amount claimed does not exceed three hundred pounds.

Sect. 7. If during the progress of an admiralty cause in a County Court it appears to the court that the subject matter exceeds the limit in respect of amount of the admiralty jurisdiction of the court, the validity of any order or decree theretofore made by the court shall not be thereby affected, but (unless the parties agree by a memorandum signed by them or their attorneys or agents, that the court shall retain jurisdiction), the court shall by order transfer the cause to the High Court of Admiralty; but that court may, nevertheless, if the judge of that court in any case thinks fit, order that the cause shall be prosecuted in the County Court in which it was commenced, and it shall be prosecuted accordingly.

Sect. 26. An appeal may be made to the High Court of Admiralty of England from a final decree or order of a County Court in an admiralty cause, and, by permission of the Judge of the County Court, from any interlocutory decree or order therein, on security for costs being first given, and subject to such other provisions as general orders shall direct.

The County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869, "An Act to amend the County Courts (Admiralty Jurisdiction) Act 1868, and to give jurisdiction in certain maritime causes."

Sect. 1. This Act may be cited as the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act Amendment Act 1869, and shall be read and interpreted as one Act with the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868.

June 11th.—Milward, Q.C. for the respondents.—I submit that in sect. 2 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869 "use" means "demise," and "hire" means "charter." Any agreement for the employment of a ship falls within those words, and they relate to a jurisdiction which the Admiralty Court does not originally possess. It is of advantage that local tribunals should have a jurisdiction which can be speedily exercised over ships which are likely to depart at once. It is submitted that power given by the Act is not confined to the original jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court. If it were so, then the Act would give no more than that already given by the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), whereas the second Act is "An Act to amend the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, and to give jurisdiction in certain maritime causes." Under the first Act the County Courts had already the same jurisdiction as the Admiralty Court, only being limited in amount. Simpson v. Blues (26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 697) assumes without foundation that the object of these statutes was "to distribute the existing Admiralty jurisdiction." One ground of that judgment is that holding the County Court to have this jurisdiction would have the effect of indirectly enlarging the jurisdiction of this court, with which the Legislature did not profess to deal. It should be remembered, however, that the only effect of these Acts is to give an appeal to this court, and there must be an appeal to some court, and why not here? Even the transferring suits under sect. 6 of the first Act is only another form of appeal. If the County Court have the original jurisdiction on their Admiralty side, the appeal would naturally be here. The words of the Act are large enough to give an extended jurisdiction. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—There was formerly an appeal to this court from the Vice-Admiralty Courts in revenue cases, although there was no original jurisdiction here.] Causes of this nature are intended by the Act of 1869 to be Admiralty causes, and as the two Acts are to be read as one, an appeal lies to this court under sect. 26 of the Act of 1868. The argument in Simpson v. Blues is, that because an appeal is given under sect. 2 of the Act of 1869 to this court, a construction, different from their usual meaning, must be put upon the words "use and hire of a ship." The power to bring up a case by certiorari will not give the court so doing original jurisdiction, and yet it may hear and determine the case. If the construction put upon sect. 2 of the Act of Sect. 2. Any County Court appointed or to be appointed to have admiralty jurisdiction, shall have jurisdiction, and all powers and authorities relating thereto, to try and determine the following causes: (1) As to any claim arising out of any agreement made in relation to the use or hire of any ship, or in relation to the carriage of goods in any ship, also as to any claim in tort in respect of goods carried in any ship, provided the amount claimed does not exceed 300*l*.

Sect. 3. The Jurisdiction conferred by this Act, and by the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, may be exercised either by proceedings in rem, or by proceedings in personam.

Sect. 5. In any admiralty or maritime cause the judge may, if he think fit, or on the request of either party, be assisted by two mercantile assessors; and all the provisions of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, with reference to nautical assessors, shall apply to the appointment, approval, summoning, and remuneration of such mercantile assessors.

CARGO ex ARGOS—THE HEWSONS.

1869 by the Common Pleas is right, then no addition is made to the jurisdiction of the County Courts by that section, as those courts already possessed all the admiralty jurisdiction in these matters by sect. 3 sub-sect. 4 of the Act of 1868. There are no words in either statute which profess to give only a part of the existing Admiralty jurisdiction.

Gainsford Bruce on the same side.—The act of 1869 must be considered to have extended the jurisdiction to some extent. By the act of 1868 sect. 3, the County Courts had jurisdiction over claims for damage to cargo, and that jurisdiction must be considered by analogy drawn from the decisions on the other parts of the same section to have been the same as the Admiralty Court possessed:

Everard v. Kendall, 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 408; L. Rep. 5 C. P. 428; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 391;
The Dowse, 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 627; L. Rep. 3 Adm. & Ecc. 135; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 424.

If the second Act only gave the same jurisdiction it would be unnecessary, and, as it cannot be supposed that the Legislature passed a useless Act, it must be taken to extend the jurisdiction. The name given to the causes in the first Act is "admiralty causes," in the second "maritime causes." Then by sect. 5 the Act of 1869, "in any admiralty or maritime cause, the judge may be assisted by two mercantile assessors." By sect. 3, "the jurisdiction conferred by this Act and by the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 may be exercised either by proceedings in rem or in personam." These sections clearly indicate two jurisdictions, one given by the first, and another by the second Act. The whole scope of the Act is to extend the jurisdiction as shown by sect. 4, which gives jurisdiction over all claims for damage to ships whether by collision or otherwise.

The Admiralty Advocate (Dr. Deane, Q.C., Murphy with him) for the appellants.—In every case where these questions have been raised it has been held by the common law courts that the words of these Acts, though large, must be construed with reference to the existing jurisdiction. In Simpson v. Blues (sup.) it is said that "we ought not so to construe the words of these County Courts Acts so as to create this large, novel, and inconvenient jurisdiction, when we find from the context that the general intention was only to distribute the existing admiralty jurisdiction." This course was adopted in previous cases.

The Dowse (sup.)

The vice-admiralty courts had original jurisdiction of an undoubted character in revenue questions, and the appeal lay here from them, but in this case it is the original jurisdiction of the County Courts that is disputed, not the appellate jurisdiction only. The St. Cloud (Br. & Lush. 4; 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 54; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 309) decided that the claim by an assignee under the Admiralty Court Act 1861 must be a claim such as could be made before the passing of that Act, although the words were wide enough to cover any claim. This court has no original jurisdiction over such a claim as this, and yet, if this claim can be made in a County Court, it can be transferred here by sects. 6 and 7 of the Act of 1868. This would entail enormous inconvenience to small ships. The object of the second Act was to amend the jurisdiction of the County Courts by giving jurisdiction in rem, and their jurisdiction is extended by sect. 4. The power to appoint mercantile assessors is also an amendment and extension. Sect. 2 of the Act of 1869 is to be explained by reference to the Admiralty Court Act 1861. That Act, by sect. 6, gave jurisdiction over claims by the owner or consignee or assignee of any bill of lading of any goods carried into any port in England or Wales, in any ship, for damage, &c., or for any breach of duty or breach of contract. It was the intention of the Legislature to give this jurisdiction in certain cases to the County Courts. The words in the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, giving jurisdiction over any claim for damage to cargo not exceeding 300*l.*, do not give jurisdiction over a claim by the consignee or assignee for breach of contract, as they would not be parties to the contract, and the Act of 1869 was passed to extend the jurisdiction of the County Courts to all suits under the Admiralty Court Act 1861, with a limitation of amount. If the construction contended for by the other side is right, then the County Courts have unlimited (except as to amount) jurisdiction, where this court has none. In addition to these reasons, I submit that this court is bound, in the construction of a statute, by the judgment of the Common Pleas in Simpson v. Blues (sup.).

Milward, Q.C. in reply.—The title of the Act is to "give jurisdiction in certain maritime causes." Sect. 3 is only directory as to the mode of exercising jurisdiction. There is no limitation as to domicile in either of the County Court Acts, as in the Admiralty Court Act 1861, sect. 6. It cannot be material what court exercises the jurisdiction, it exists in some court in England, and the Legislature has chosen to say that the County Court is a convenient place for its exercise, and this court is chosen as a convenient court of appeal.

THE HEWSONS.

This was an appeal from a final decree of the County Court of Durham, holden at Hartlepool. (Admiralty jurisdiction.) The suit was instituted in rem in that court, against the Hewsons, for breach of a charter-party. Both plaintiffs and defendants were domiciled in England. The ship was chartered to Geipel and Co. for successive voyages from Hartlepool to the Elbe, with cargoes of coal from 14th March 1870, till 31st Oct. 1870. During the fourth voyage war broke out between France and Germany (19th July), and from the beginning of Aug. until 22nd Sept., the Elbe and the port of Hamburg were blockaded, and the Hewsons could not during that time proceed on another voyage under the charter without risk of capture. Her owners on her return to Hartlepool in the beginning of Aug. chartered her for a voyage to Elsinore, and she proceeded thither, and did not return till 4th Dec. This was done without the consent of the plaintiffs, the original charterers, who were compelled to hire other vessels at increased rates. The alleged breach was for not taking on board a cargo or cargoes as provided by the charter-party, and for not carrying the same to Hamburg.

The appellants (defendants), in the court below, objected to the jurisdiction of the County Court on the ground that the Acts which confer admiralty jurisdiction on the County Courts, do not give any new or original jurisdiction, but merely a portion of the jurisdiction formerly possessed by the High Court of Admiralty exclusively; and that the High Court of Admiralty has not any jurisdiction to try a claim arising out of an agreement made in relation to the use or hire of a ship especially if the owner or any part owner of the vessel is domiciled in England or Wales at the time of the institution of the suit. See 24 Vict. c. 10 Sect. 6. The case was also argued on its merits. The learned judge of the County Court on 5th Jan. 1872, gave judgment, holding that "although the High Court of Admiralty may not have jurisdiction to try such a claim, yet the Act (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51) for amending the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, and for giving jurisdiction in certain maritime causes, expressly confers upon the County Courts jurisdiction to try any claim arising out of any agreement made in relation to the use or hire of any ship, and such jurisdiction is not limited or restricted to cases where neither the owner or any part owner of the ship resides in England or Wales." The learned judge gave judgment on the merits for the respondents (plaintiffs) for 85*l.*, and thereupon the appellants appealed.

June 11th and 18th.—E. U. Clarkson for the appellants.—What jurisdiction was given to the Admiralty Court by the Admiralty Court Act 1861 sect. 6? It has jurisdiction over claims for actual damage done to goods; over claims for breach of contract in respect to the carriage of goods; and also over claims where the goods have not been delivered at all to the owner:

The Marie Joseph, Bro. & Lush 449; 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 236; 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 6; 2 Mar. Law Cas. 190, 394.

Under that section, so long as the holder of the bill of lading is the owner of the goods, the court can go into the construction of a charter party, although the court has only jurisdiction over claims by the owner or consignee or assignee of the bill of lading. Under the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, sect. 3 subsect. 3, the words "damage to cargo" could not give jurisdiction over anything in the nature of a mere breach of contract for non-delivery, without there was at the same time damage done to the cargo. By that act the whole jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court was not given to the County Court. The County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869 gives the jurisdiction which the former Act 1869 did not give. The title of the Act is technical and the Legislature must have referred to causes "civil and maritime," the usual phrase in this court. Under sect. 2 of the Act of 1869, claims for delay in delivery of goods loss of market, breach of contract, would all be included. An owner and charterer may sue under the Admiralty Court Act 1861 in this court, and the second County Court Act gives the same right in those courts. All the terms in that section may be satisfied without extending the jurisdiction beyond that already exercised in this court. Bills of lading are little more than receipts for goods so far as the charterer is concerned (1 Parsons on the Law of Shipping, p. 287), and the charter-party is the controlling instrument. In a claim by the owner of goods and charterer, the court could look at the charter-party to see if there had been any breach as in this court, and could therefore entertain a claim arising out of an agreement made in relation to the use or hire of a ship, and to the carriage of goods, and so satisfy the largest words of the section restricted only by domicile. There is no "claim in tort for the carriage of goods in any ship" which would not be included in damage to cargo or breach of duty in the Admiralty Court Act. If a cause were instituted on the Admiralty side of a County Court, over which this court had no original jurisdiction, and it should appear that the subject-matter exceeds in amount the jurisdiction of that court, the judge is bound, under sect. 7 of the Act of 1868, to transfer it to the Admiralty Court. It seems improbable that the Legislature intended to give jurisdiction by such a transfer to this court in cases where it has no original jurisdiction. The object of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, s. 6, was to give a remedy to British merchants suffering damage to their goods laden on board foreign vessels, and to give them the opportunity of proceeding at once against those vessels whilst in British ports. If the construction asked for by the respondents be placed upon these Acts, then they apply equally to English ships, and the reason of the legislature in passing the Admiralty Court Act is set aside. It has been decided that in causes of necessaries the limitation as to domicile must be imported, although not mentioned in the Act of 1868: (The Dowse, L. Rep. 3 Adm. & Ecc. 135; 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 627; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 424.) It follows, therefore, that this limitation must be imported in other cases where it exists with regard to the Admiralty Court, and that no jurisdiction exists here as the owner is in England. If this is to be considered as a maritime cause, then no appeal lies here as the Act of 1868 (sect. 26), only gives appeals to this court in Admiralty causes. Simpson v. Blues (sup.) is binding on this court. The question before the court is as to the construction of these statutes giving jurisdiction to the County Courts, and it has been held that this court is bound upon the construction of a statute, by the decision of a common law court:

The Earl of Auckland, Lush. 164; 3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 786; 5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 558; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 27, 177;

The Milan, Lush. 388, 402; 5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 590; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 185;

The Helen, L. Rep. 1 Adm. & Ecc. 1; 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 305; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 293.

In the last case a distinction was drawn between the Chancery and common law courts, and it is said that whatever conclusion this court may come to itself, it is bound to follow the decision of the common law courts upon a statute.

Cohen and Phillimore for the respondents.—There is no appeal from the decision of a common law court in prohibition to a County Court: (19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, s. 42.) If there were an appeal, then no doubt this would be bound by the decision, because if the common law court were wrong, its decision could be rectified on appeal, but as there is no appeal, we submit this court is not bound. One great object of prohibition is to secure uniformity of decision throughout all courts and that is attained by the appeal from the courts which have the power to prohibit, lying ultimately to the House of Lords, so that whatever may be the appellate tribunal of an inferior court, a party objecting to its jurisdiction can proceed by prohibition to the highest tribunal. We submit, therefore, that as the decision of the Court of Common Pleas in Simpson v. Blues (sup.), cannot be reviewed by an appellate court, this court is not bound by it.

CARGO ex ARGOS—THE HEWSONS.

If the appellants object to the jurisdiction, let them prohibit this court, and then an appeal will lie to the House of Lords. With respect to "claims in tort," there are cases where a shipper's goods have been injured by the wrongful acts of a shipowner or his master, and yet, because there was no privity of contract between them, the owner of the goods could make no claim in the Admiralty Court; as where the owner of goods has shipped through his agents who have paid freight, and the master has wrongfully thrown the goods overboard at sea. The goods would not then be carried in England or Wales. The Act of 1869 gives jurisdiction over "any claim in tort," and unless such a case as the above is within those words they are unsatisfied, and if so the County Court has a larger jurisdiction than the Admiralty Court. Such causes are very rightly not called "Admiralty Causes," as they are not such as this court has cognisance of. If the Legislature had meant to give to the County Court the same jurisdiction as this court had, why did it not use the same words in the County Courts Act as gave jurisdiction to this court in sect. 6 of the Admiralty Courts Act 1861? The difference in the words marks a distinction in the jurisdiction. The words in sect. 2 of the Act of 1868, "any claim arising out of any agreement made in relation to the use or hire of any ship" must mean "any claim arising out of any charter-party." No doubt at first it was considered necessary only to arrest foreign ships; but where claims are of a small amount it is a wise policy on the part of the Legislature to allow the arrest of English vessels. There can be little or no inconvenience, because if an owner is solvent he would at once release his vessel from arrest for a small debt, and if he is not solvent then the creditor is entitled to the security of the property. It is erroneous to suppose that the Legislature does not give jurisdiction to inferior courts where the appellate court has no such original jurisdiction. The Consular Courts have a large jurisdiction, and the appeal lies to the Privy Council, which has none of the same original jurisdiction. The Act of 1868 was large enough in its terms to give the same jurisdiction as that possessed by this court under the Admiralty Court Act 1861. The operative words in sect. 3 of that Act are set out as shortly as possible, and jurisdiction is given over claims for "damage to cargo." The marginal note of sect. 6 of the Act of 1861 gives the words "claims for damage to cargo imported," showing that that phrase includes all claims under that section, and that the words are large enough to include all the admiralty jurisdiction on that head; it is a technical phrase always used in that sense (Williams and Bruce Admiralty Practice, c. v., p. 85), and as such used in the Act to give the jurisdiction. The Dowse (sup.) decided that the County Courts had the same jurisdiction as to necessities as this court up to a certain amount by the words "any claim for necessities" in sect. 3 of the Act of 1868, and it follows from that decision that the words "any claim for damage to cargo" gave the County Courts a similar jurisdiction in respect of such claims, and it has been practically decided in several cases that the whole jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court is given to the County Courts by that Act, the amount only being limited:

The Swan, L. Rep. 3 Adm. & Ecc. 314; 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 633;

If the Act of 1869 is merely to supply the admiralty jurisdiction omitted to be given by the Act of 1868, then no meaning can be given to the words "an agreement in relation to the use or hire of any ship," as such jurisdiction is clearly given without those words at all.

Clarkson in reply.—The Dowse (sup.) only decides that the jurisdiction of the County Court is limited to that of the Admiralty Court. So here a like limitation must be imported, and the analogy between the cases go no further. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The Court of Common Pleas admit that the words of the Act of 1869 are wide enough to give the jurisdiction sought, but they held that the context of the Act, and the general policy and intention of the legislature, restricts their meaning. They assume, without actually holding, that the words may be satisfied without giving a larger jurisdiction. You must admit that very different language is used in the two Acts.] A charter-party is an agreement for the "use or hire of a ship," and a claim arising out of such an agreement may be a claim for breach of charter party; and so long as the owner is not domiciled in England or Wales, the Admiralty Court has, in some cases, jurisdiction over claims arising out of charter-parties, as where the charter-party is the governing instrument: (The St. Cloud, Bro. & Lush. 4; 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 54; 1 Mar. Law. Cas. O. S. 309), this interpretation would satisfy the words without giving a more extensive jurisdiction.

July 16th.—Sir R. J. PHILLIMORE.—The case of the Cargo ex Argos is an appeal from the City of London Court. The case of the Hewsons is an appeal from the County Court of Durham. In the case of the Cargo ex Argos the cause of the action is an alleged refusal to pay freight, demurrage and expenses, in respect of certain goods carried from London to Havre. In the Hewsons the cause of action is an alleged breach of charter-party, arising independently of any damage to cargo. In both these cases the same question of law arises, namely, the true construction of sect. 2 of 32 & 33 Vict. c. 51. (His Lordship read the section.) In order to put a due construction on this section, the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 71; and 32 & 33 Vict. c. 51, must be read together, for it is expressly enacted by the latter statute that the two Acts "are to be read and interpreted as one act." The title of the former statute was "An Act for conferring Admiralty Jurisdiction on the County Courts." The title of the latter statute is "An Act to amend the County Courts (Admiralty Jurisdiction) Act 1868, and to give jurisdiction in certain maritime causes." What jurisdiction did this Act give? Some jurisdiction, it must be answered, not already possessed. It is necessary, therefore, first to inquire what jurisdiction did the County Court already possess relatively to the subject of the present suit? Sect. 3, sub-sect. 3 of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 71, conferred jurisdiction "as to any claim for damage to cargo, or damage by collision, any cause in which the amount claimed did not exceed 300*l.*" The same pecuniary limit is maintained whatever additional jurisdiction is given in the last Act. In the present causes I am concerned only with damage to cargo, but it is not immaterial to observe that the damage done to ships is confined in the first Act to one cause, viz., damage by collision, while the last Act (sect. 4 enacts that the 3rd section of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 shall extend and apply to all claims for damage to ships, whether by collision or otherwise, when the amount claimed does not exceed 300*l.* In this matter of damage to ships, therefore, the jurisdiction of the County Courts is indefinitely enlarged as to the cause of damage, while the pecuniary limitation is expressly continued as to the amount of the damage. This observation is in aid of the contention that not only a new jurisdiction is given to the County Courts, but a jurisdiction which is not possessed by the High Court of Admiralty. For the same object I notice the use in this statute of the broader term "maritime" in lieu of the narrower term "Admiralty," as applied to the jurisdiction, and also what appears to me the significant introduction for the first time of "mercantile assessors" expressly in addition to the merely "nautical assessors" appointed by the former County Court Act. It has been ingeniously argued on the other hand that the first County Court Act gave no jurisdiction as to delay in delivery of the cargo, but merely as to damage of the goods; that the second Act supplied this deficiency, and thereby for the first time made the jurisdiction of the County Court co-extensive with that of the Admiralty Court. It is not, and could not be, denied that the language which it is said confers for the first time this jurisdiction on the County Court is totally different from that which conferred the same jurisdiction on the Admiralty Court (Admiralty Court Act 1861, s. 6). I am unable to assent to this argument as to the construction of the statutes. Sect. 3 of the first Act throughout uses the epithet "any salvage," "any wages," that is to say, whether originally inherent in the court or conferred by the statute. I think that the words "any damage to cargo" must be considered as used in their technical sense, and so conveyed to the County Court the whole jurisdiction given to the Admiralty Court by the 6th section of the Admiralty Court Act. Moreover if the second County Court Act was intended to supply this alleged deficiency in the first, the words "any agreement made in relation to the use or hire of any ship," are very greatly wider than the supply of any such deficiency required. The more I have considered this case the stronger has been my opinion that the Legislature both intended to convey, and did in plain language convey, a jurisdiction to the County Court which the Admiralty Court did not originally possess while it gave an appeal nevertheless, to that court. As I observed during the argument of the first of these cases, it would not be the first time that such a result has been effected deliberately by statute. Not long ago the Admiralty Court had appellate jurisdiction in revenue cases from the colonial Admiralty courts, as to which it had no original jurisdiction. Moreover I think that in conferring from time to time new jurisdiction upon the County Court, the Legislature had not in view so much, if at all, the character of the subject matter, as the pecuniary amount which was at stake in the litigation. It appears to me to have acted more and more in each successive statute upon the principle (with the soundness of which I have nothing to do) of making all commercial or civil transaction within a certain amount subject to the jurisdiction of these local tribunals. This is my opinion, but am I at liberty to act upon it? The Court of Common Pleas has very deliberately and after hearing arguments come to the opposite conclusion: (Simpson v. Blues, sup.). They say, "the words of the section read apart from the context are undoubtedly large enough to create a new jurisdiction in respect to the claim as for a breach of charter-party;" but they are of opinion from the context that the general intention was only to distribute the existing jurisdiction by allowing suits of a limited amount to be instituted in inferior courts, and they appear to have been affected by the fact that, upon any other construction, the Admiralty Court would have appellate where it had not original jurisdiction; and they state other reasons relating to the inconvenience which they think would result from the jurisdiction being given to the County Courts. It seems to me indeed that the practical result of this judgment must be that this last County Court Act was altogether superfluous. At least I do not find in the judgment any such attempt as has been made in argument before me to show that the new Act was necessary to confer some jurisdiction which the Admiralty Court possessed, but which was not conferred on the County Court by the previous statute, nor any attempt to satisfy the words of the new statute otherwise than by their relation to a new jurisdiction over a new subject matter. It has been argued that this judgment is not binding upon me, because unlike the usual cases of prohibition there is no appeal from it. But after much consideration I am satisfied that I ought not, in the matter of the construction of a statute, to make a decision which would be in direct conflict with that of a full court in Westminster Hall. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council may think themselves justified in pursuing a different course; and having regard to the principles laid down by me in the Sammel Laing (L. Rep. 3 Adm. & Ecc. 284; 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 891; 3 Mar. Law. Cas. O. S. 453), I shall grant an appeal to that court, but I must dismiss both these suits without costs.

and gave the master an opportunity of obtaining an advance on the owners' personal credit elsewhere by refusing such an advance.

A bottomry bond can only hypothecate something which is in danger of perishing by maritime risk during the time that the bond is running, and therefore cannot validly pledge freight, to be earned on a voyage after that maritime risk is ended and the bond is forfeited.

Where in a bottomry suit bail has been given generally to cover ship and freight, but the ship only is held to be pledged by the bond, the bail is only liable to the extent of the value of the ship at the time of release from arrest, and an inquiry will be directed to ascertain that value.

The S. put into M. requiring repairs. She was consigned by her mortgagee, who managed the ship's affairs, but was not in possession, to ships' agents in M. Her master was part owner to the extent of one-third. The ship was under charter to proceed to Callao, and thence with a cargo of guano to England. She was repaired, and the cost of the repairs exceeded the funds in the ship's agents' hands. The agents refused to advance the money on the personal credit of the owners, and subsequently, the shipwrights having threatened to seize the ship, the master applied to the agents for an advance on bottomry, which they made.

The bond pledged the ship from Melbourne to Callao, and for seven days after arrival there, and the freight to be earned from Callao to England. It was agreed that the master should draw bills on the mortgagee, and that if these bills were honoured in England the bond should not be enforced. The master did not communicate with his owners. Three months were required for an answer, and the charter would have been lost. The ship sailed and arrived in Callao, and, after loading a cargo, sailed for England. The bills on arriving in England were presented at the mortgagee's office; but he was dead, and the executors named in his will would not act, and had not taken out probate. The bills were not presented to them, and were not accepted. Orders were thereupon sent to Callao to enforce the bond, but the ship had sailed. After these orders were sent out the bondholders offered to pay the bills if the bondholders would indemnify them from any loss from the seizure of the ship; but this the bondholders declined. The ship was seized in Queenstown, and bail given for both ship and freight:

Held, first, that the repairs were necessary; secondly, that the money could not have been borrowed on the mortgagee's credit as the master had no authority to pledge it, and that the shipowners had no credit, and the bond was therefore necessary; thirdly, that there was no necessity, under the circumstances, for communication with the owner; fourthly, that the agents having given the opportunity to the master of borrowing elsewhere, could validly lend money on bottomry; fifthly, that the bills were sufficiently presented to entitle the bondholder to enforce the bond; sixthly, that the bond did not validly pledge the freight from Callao to England; seventhly, that the bail was only liable for the value of the ship.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the High Court of Admiralty of Ireland (a), pronounced in a cause of bottomry, instituted in that court by the respondents, a bank, carrying on business in London, and having a branch in Melbourne, as holders of a bottomry bond upon the Staffordshire and her freight. The appellant, who defended the suit, was a merchant in London, and owner of 42-64ths. of the vessel. The master, who died before the institution of the suit, was the owner of the remaining 22-64ths.

In Jan. 1869, the appellant and the master had mortgaged the vessel to Mr. Charles Gumm, a shipowner and merchant in London, and had assigned to him as further security for his advances all the freights and earnings of the ship, had appointed him their attorney to receive freight and insurance moneys, had constituted him ship's husband, and sole agent at home and abroad. Mr. Gumm was not, however, mortgagee in possession. The ship sailed from London in Jan. 1869 for Melbourne with a general cargo, and arrived in Melbourne on 4th June 1869. She was under charter to proceed from Melbourne to Callao, and there load a cargo of guano for the United Kingdom; but the charter was conditional on her arriving at Callao before 30th Sept. 1869. The ship was consigned by Mr. Gumm to Messrs. Dickson and Williams, of Melbourne, as ship's agents at that port, and this arrangement was confirmed by the appellant. On her voyage to Melbourne the vessel was much injured by bad weather, and it became necessary to dock and repair her on the patent slip. The master did not know, and could not have ascertained what repairs would be required until she had been put on the slip, but the amount of freight in his or the agent's hands, 2100*l.*, was thought sufficient for all disbursements. The ship did not get on to the slip until after July 16th the next English mail day, and it was then found that the repairs ordered by the surveyors of the Chamber of Commerce would come to about 3007*l.*; and by the next mail (13th Aug.) the master wrote to the appellant and also to Mr. Gumm stating the probable amount of the repairs, and telling the appellant that he did not know how he was to raise the money for the repairs and disbursements; but he did not mention bottomry. No reply to these letters could have been received for upwards of four months. The exact cost of the repairs became known on 24th Aug. and was 3000*l.* 13*s.* 1*d.*, and there were other disbursements which had to be paid. At that time a reply to a communication from Melbourne to England could not have been received much before Christmas, as there was no telegraphic communication between Australia and Point de Galle, the nearest telegraph station. The master applied to Messrs. Dickson and Williams the ship's agents, to advance the money over and above the freight in hand. They refused at first; but on the shipwrights threatening to put the ship in the Admiralty Court in Melbourne and sell her, they agreed to advance the money on a bottomry bond on ship 31 and 32 Vict. c. 114 (The Admiralty Court Act Ireland), s. 90, the former appeal to the Court of Delegates is abolished, and by sect. 91 appeals lie to the Irish Court of Chancery and thence to the Privy Council, or direct to the Privy Council in the first instance. Sect. 105 provides that all the Acts in force relating to the appellate jurisdiction of the Privy Council in England shall apply to the appeals under this Act, and that the appeals shall be conducted as far as possible in the same manner as appeals from the High Court of Admiralty of England.—ED.

and freight. They would not have done so except on bottomry. If the ship had been arrested she would have lost her freight from Callao to London. After it was agreed that the bond should be given, the ship's agents suggested that they should take the master's draft on Mr. Gumm for the amount of the bond without premium, charging simply the usual commission, and that if the draft was honoured in London instructions should be given that the bond should not be enforced. This was done to serve Mr. Gumm and to release the ship, and the master consented. The bond was executed on 7th Sept., 1870, for the sum of 3285*l.* Before the ship sailed the ship's accounts were made out, and the master drew a bill at ten day's sight on Mr. Gumm in favour of Messrs. Dickson and Williams for the amount due to them, viz.. £3586 10*s.* 1*d.* Afterwards the master drew another bill for 19*l.* 7*s.* 5*d.* for some small accounts. The bills were negotiated by the ship's agents with the respondents' branch bank at Melbourne, and the bond was assigned to the bank as security. The bond bound the vessel and her freight to be earned on her then intended voyage from Melbourne to Callao, and the freight thence to any other port or ports, and it was made payable with 50 per cent. premium within seven days after the arrival of the ship at Callao. The ship's agents delivered to the branch bank a duplicate of the bonds, and with the consent of the bank sent the original bond to Messrs. Gibbs and Co., merchants at Lima, instructing them to follow the instructions they might receive from the respondents in London as to enforcing the bond. The bond went by the ship itself. These arrangements were communicated to Mr. Gumm by the ship's agents by a letter dated 11th Sept. 1869, which reached Mr. Gumm's office on the 1st Nov. 1869, and this was the first intimation received in England about the bottomry. On the same day the ship sailed for Callao, where she arrived in safety. Mr. Dickson, one of the agents, left Melbourne on 12th Sept. and arrived in London on 30th Oct. On 9th Oct. 1869 Mr. Gumm died. The drafts reached the respondents' bank in London on 1st Nov. 1869, and were presented for acceptance at Mr. Gumm's office on the same day, but were returned to the manager of the bank with the message that they could not be accepted as Mr. Gumm was dead. The executors appointed by that gentleman's will, one only, a Mr. Hallet, being in England at the time, had refused to act, and no probate or letters of administration had been taken out. The secretary to the bank called again at Mr. Gumm's office and saw Mr. Ford, who had managed Mr. Gumm's business for some years, but he refused to accept. The bills were then presented through a notary, and "no advice" was marked upon them and they were then formally protested. They were not presented to the executors. The respondents then wrote by the next mail (Nov. 6th) to Messrs. Gibbs and Co., at Lima, instructing them to enforce the bond, but before the latter were able to do so, the vessel had sailed for Queenstown, where she arrived, and was arrested on 13th July 1870, on this suit. On 5th Nov. 1869, the protest of the bills was sent out to Melbourne. On 11th Nov. 1869, and again on 16th Nov. the appellant offered to the respondents to take up and pay the bills, but this the respondent refused unless the appellant would indemnify them for any loss that might occur through seizure of the ship at Lima

The facts as to the presentation of the bills are fully set out in the judgment.

The cause came on for hearing in the High Court of Admiralty of Ireland, on 28th April 1871, and the learned judge of that court pronounced for the validity of the bottomry bond, holding that the bond was not invalid by reason of its including the freight to be earned after the sea risk had ended; that the premium was not excessive; that under the circumstances there was no duty of communication with the owner; that the mortgagee could not be considered as owner for that purpose; that there was necessity for the bond; that there was no fraud between the master and the ships agents at Melbourne; that the money was advanced on the security of the ship, and not on the personal security of the mortgagee, and that although a bottomry transaction cannot be based on personal security, bills may be given as collateral security, which is the usual course; that the agreement to hold over the bond until after the presentation of the bills did not make the bills the primary security; that the bills were presented within the meaning of that agreement. The appellants were condemned in the general costs of the suit. The judgment will be found in the report of the case below (ante p. 101; 25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 137).

From this judgment the appellants appealed to the Privy Council. Their grounds of appeal are as follows:

A. Because no attempt was made to procure the money, which was absolutely necessary to enable the ship to leave Melbourne; on the credit of Mr. Charles Gumm, or the appellant.

B. Because no communication was made to Mr. Charles Gumm or the appellant, leading to the inference that it would be necessary to hypothecate, and no opportunity was given to either of them of supplying Messrs. Dickson and Williams with the requisite credit or funds as they would have done.

C. Because no advertisements for tenders were published at Melbourne.

D. Because all the above-mentioned reasons apply with especial force in the present case, on account of Messrs. Dickson and Williams being agents for the ship, and being aware of the mercantile position of Mr. Charles Gumm.

E. Because Messrs. Dickson and Williams, as agents for the ship, were or ought to have been cognisant of the amount which was being expended on the repairs of the vessel.

F. Because the terms of the bond, the items for which the same was given, and the maritime premium thereby made payable, were such as to make the bond, under all the circumstances stated in the case, void against Messrs. Dickson and Williams, as agents for the ship, and against the respondents, who can have no better title.

G. Because the bottomry bond was void by reason of Messrs. Dickson and Williams having taken the bill drawn by Captain Barrett on Mr. Charles Gumm, or become void or incapable of being put into suit by reason of Messrs. Dickson and Williams having negotiated the bill.

H. Because the agreement and condition upon which the bond was given was violated by Messrs. Dickson and Williams and the respondents.

I. Because the bill was never duly presented nor dishonoured.

K. Because before the maturity of the bill the amount of the bill was offered to the respondents, who refused to accept the same, except on the fulfilment of conditions which they had no right to impose.

L. Because the respondents, who have no better title than Messrs. Dickson and Williams, acted unjustly and inadequately in giving directions on the 5th Nov. that the bond should be enforced, and by refusing to revoke those directions when the amount of the bill was offered to them.

M. Because, for the reason stated in the answer, the bond could not attach on the freight which was arrested in this cause.

Sir G. Honyman, Q.C. and Cohen for the appellants.—The premium was excessive; the money might have been obtained at a lower rate. The bond is invalid as respects freight not accruing due during the sea risk over which the bond ran. The forfeiture of the ship and freight began seven days after the arrival of the ship at Callao, and the bond hypothecated freight from Callao to England which was then non-existent. The amount expended was not for necessities. The ship was entirely rebuilt. The effect of the bond and the bills being both given to secure the debt is, that both property and personal credit of the owner are bound; and this cannot validly be done.

Stainbach v. Fenning, 11 C. B. 51;

Stainbach v. Shephard, 13 C. B. 418, 441.

This at least indicates that the personal credit of the owners or the mortgagee was good. Independently of the bills the bond is invalid. There was no effort on the part of the ship's agents at Melbourne to ascertain that a necessity for the loan existed, and that the ship could not have proceeded without the loan. The money was advanced at once and without sufficient inquiry: (Maude and Pollock's Law of Merchant Shipping, 438). Unusual care and vigilance is required in ascertaining the necessity for the loan when the advance is made by the ship's agent: 1 Parsons on the Law of Shipping, 156, 157.) Where the amount which it will cost to repair the ship is uncertain, the master ought to communicate with the owner so as to give the latter an opportunity of making the choice of paying for the repairs or of leaving the master to raise money as he chooses: (The Panama, 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 461; L. Rep. 3 P. C. 199; 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 73.) The lender is bound to know that the master's authority to bind the ship and freight by bottomry is founded on necessity alone, and because the advance could not have been obtained on personal credit, and he is bound to make due inquiry as to the necessity for the bond: (Soares v. Rahn, The Prince of Saxe Cobourg, 3 Moo. Priv. Co. Cas. 1.) If there had been communication with England there would have been no difficulty as to obtaining this money on personal credit. This advance was made by the ship's agents, and ought, therefore, to be looked upon with suspicion. A ship's agent is not entitled to derive the same large profits as a stranger from transactions entered into without the assent of his principal, unless he or the master can find no other person who will enter into the transaction: (The Hero, 2 Dods. 139, 143.) It was the agent's duty to disburse the ship and therefore, to advance such moneys as were necessary for the repairs, and he is estopped from now saying that he did not consider he had sufficient security in the personal credit of the owner or the mortgagee. His undertaking the agency implied that he gave credit to the owners. Even if the bond be held valid it cannot be enforced. The bond was given on the express agreement that it should not be enforced unless the bills were dishonoured. If the bills when sent over to England had been presented to, and accepted by, the executors, or had been paid to them, the bond could not have been enforced: (The Ariadne, 1 W. Rob. 411.) The bills were never duly presented. They should have been presented to the personal representative, that is to the executors of Mr. Gumm, for acceptance.

[Lord Justice MELLISH.—Can this be requisite where the executors have not taken out probate?] The executors would have paid in any case rather than that the ship should be seized. The offer to pay the bills after the refusal to accept was a compliance with the terms of the agreement. There is a distinction between presentation for acceptance and presentation for payment: (Byles on Bills (ubi sup.) A refusal to pay would have been a breach of the contract, but there was no such refusal. The refusal to accept took place because there was no presentation to the executors. The mere presentation at the office of the deceased mortgagee was not sufficient: (1 Parsons on Notes and Bills, 363.) The Court of Admiralty acts on equitable principles with regard to bottomry questions, and should hold that there having been no due presentation of the bills, the bond could not be enforced.

The Jacob, 4 C. Rob. 245.

A master has no power to hypothecate freight, to be earned after the sea risk is ended. The Jacob (sup.) is the only case where the freight of a subsequent voyage was made to contribute towards the payment of a bottomry bond, and it is submitted that that decision is wrong. At any rate, Lord Stowell gave the decision on the ground that the owners themselves had prevented the bondholders from taking the freight earned on the voyage during which the ship and freight were hypothecated, and the case is therefore distinguishable.

—As to the necessity for the loan: These repairs were necessary. The ship could not have completed her charter-party without them. The master was the owner of one-third of the vessel, and was the best judge of the necessity. Moreover, the repairs were ordered by surveyors of the Chamber of Commerce, the most competent judges of such a question. To pay for these repairs an advance was required. If they had not been paid for, the ship would have been arrested, and her charter home lost. There was a lien on the ship for these repairs, and that gave the master a right to obtain money on bottomry if it could not be raised elsewhere:

As to the want of communication: The master communicated all he knew at the time he wrote. He himself was not aware of the actual cost of the repairs. Moreover, the difficulty of communication and the length of time which was required to

As to the money being lent by the ship's agents: It is no part of an agent's duty to advance money without a fair expectation of being reimbursed. If he chooses to secure his repayment by a bottomry bond, he may do so, so long as he announces that he will not advance as agent, and so gives an opportunity to the master to get the money elsewhere, and this was done in this case:

The Oriental, 3 W. Rob. 243; 7 Moore P. C. C. 398.

Although the ship and personal credit of an owner may not be pledged by the same instrument, a bond may be given as a collateral security with bills of exchange:

Stainbach v. Shephard (ubi sup.);

The Tartar, 1 Hagg. Adm. Rep. 1;

The Huntcliff, 2 Hagg. Adm. Rep. 281.

As to the presentation of the bills: First, there was no necessity for presentation at all. The executors, the personal representatives, had refused to act, and there was, therefore, no one to whom to present.

Chitty on Bills, 10th edit. 192;

1 Parsons on Bills and Notes, 363.

Secondly, if such presentment was necessary, it was made. The bill was presented at the place of business of Mr. Gumm, and his clerk refused to accept. This must have come to the knowledge of those who were acting for him, and it was again presented. If a bill is refused acceptance, the holder is not bound to present again for payment: (Hickling v. Hardey, 7 Taunt. 312.)

The subsequent offer to pay the bills was too late, and, moreover, it was subject to an unreasonable condition. The bill not having been originally accepted, it was upon the appellant that any risk of expense should have fallen by reason of the seizure of the ship. The respondents could not be expected to undertake such a risk. As to the freight from Callao to England; The appellant is precluded from now saying that the bond is invalid in this respect. He gave bail generally, and the ship was released, and there can be no inquiry now into the value of the ship and freight, as it was thereby admitted. Moreover the ship was under a charter for a round voyage from Melbourne to Callao, and thence to England, at the time the bond was given, and the freight was in respect of the whole voyage. The master has power to bind freight whether he has earned it or not for the whole voyage:

Sir G. Honyman, Q. C. in reply.

The judgment of the court was delivered by Lord Justice MELLISH.—This is an appeal from a decree of the Court of Admiralty in Ireland, which decreed in favour of a bottomry bond. There is a very elaborate judgment of the learned judge of the court below, and their Lordships do not think it necessary to go minutely into the facts of the case, as far as regards those parts of the case in which they thoroughly agree with the learned judge in the court below. The general facts were that the ship, the Staffordshire, which was the ship bound by the bottomry bond, had been mortgaged to a gentleman of the name of Gumm, and the freight to be earned on the voyage to Melbourne and round from Melbourne to Callao and back, taking a cargo of guano from the Chinchas to England, had also been pledged by a letter to Mr. Gumm, and Mr. Gumm was to have the appointment of the different persons to whom the ship was to be consigned, the different ship agents, so that he might have a control over the freight. He consigned it to Dickson, Williams, and Co., of Melbourne. The part owner Mr. Smith (Barrett the master being also a part owner) wrote confirming that appointment, but as there was a considerable sum, more than 2000*l.*, to be received at Melbourne for the freight on the outward voyage, it was evidently anticipated at first by all parties that that sum would be sufficient to pay the disbursements in Melbourne. The ship wanted some repairs, and the repairs were commenced; but in the letters which were first written, it appeared clearly to have been anticipated that the freight would be sufficient. Then the repairs proceeded, and in August the parties were acquainted that a considerably larger sum was being expended than was anticipated, as much as 2000*l.* Even at the time when they wrote by the mail in August, they do not appear to have made up their minds that any bottomry was necessary; but when the repairs of the ship were finished at the beginning of September, and they amounted to upwards of 3000*l.*, then the agents said that they really could not pay off that large sum, which the persons who had repaired the ship were entitled to receive; in respect of which they threatened to put the ship into the court of Admiralty; they could not pay off that large sum, unless they got a security on bottomry, and on that the bottomry bond was given. The first question to be considered is, whether that bottomry bond was generally good with reference to the rules which are well established in the court respecting bottomry. First it was said that it was not sufficiently proved that it was given for necessities, that a large sum appeared to have been expended in repairing the ship. It was said that the ship had been entirely rebuilt, and that you can only expend in bottomry a sufficient sum for the repairs that were necessary for the particular voyage. When it is considered that the voyage is to go to Callao, and then to the Chincha Islands, and take a cargo of guano for England, which is notoriously one of the heaviest cargoes that can be obtained and carried by a ship, it is very difficult, to suppose that more repairs could have been effected than what would be necessary for the purpose of the voyage. But however that might be, it is quite clear that a very large portion, if not the whole of that sum, must have been for necessary repairs. The question of amount is to be referred to the registrar, and therefore it is clear the bond cannot be held bad, because it was not taken for necessary expenses. It is next said that there was not sufficient evidence that the money could not have been borrowed on the personal credit either of Gumm or the shipowner Smith, and that there was not sufficient evidence that the master attempted to borrow money on their personal credit. The answer to that appears to be, that there was no power in anybody to pledge the personal credit of Mr. Gumm. He was not the owner, only the mortgagee of the ship. He had, no doubt, put the ship into the hands of Dickson, Williams, and Co., the ship agents, but it appears very doubtful whether his credit would have been pledged even to them, and certainly there is no evidence that he gave Dickson, Williams, and Co. any authority to borrow money on his credit from anybody else. Therefore it is wholly immaterial that Mr. Gumm was a person in good credit, because money could not be borrowed on his credit. As respects Smith, the shipowner, there is not the slightest reason to suppose that he was a person in any credit at Melbourne, and it really appears to their Lordships it would have been perfectly idle to advertise for anybody to lend money on his personal credit, because it was plain that nobody would lend money on his personal credit. It was next said that the master ought to have communicated to Mr. Gumm and Mr. Smith in England, before he borrowed the money on bottomry. The answer to that appears to be, that there was really no opportunity of doing it. They did not know certainly before the mail went out in August that it would be necessary to borrow money on bottomry, and it appears very doubtful whether they really knew it then, and whether they fairly knew it before September. But even if it be assumed that they knew it in August, there was no direct communication by telegraph. The message would have had to be sent to Galle by steamer, and by telegraph from Galle to England. Sending in that doubtful way, first writing a letter to the people to frame the telegram at Galle, and then to send it by telegraph, it would have been very difficult to give any thorough account of the state of things; and even if it could be done, it would have taken certainly more than two, and probably full three months before the answer could have been got back. Under the circumstances it appears to their Lordships that it was necessary; it would have been, in fact, very unadvisable to have kept the ship at Melbourne all that time, more particularly as Barrett was himself a part owner, and therefore quite as able to judge as Smith was, what was desirable to be done; and more particularly also it is to be taken into account, that after all the parties were not pledged to the bottomry bond because a bill was drawn on Mr. Gumm, and which is very material in another part of the case, it was agreed at the time when the bottomry bond was given, that if that bill was accepted and paid when it became due, then the bottomry was not to be enforced. But then it was urged very strongly by Mr. Cohen that the law looks with great suspicion upon a bottomry bond given in favour of the ship's agents, and that on that account, even although this might have been good if it had been given to some other person, it was not good considering it was given to the ship's agents; and some passages were cited from Lord Stowell's judgment in the case of The Hero, (ubi sup.), in which he says with respect to an agent, "Cases may possibly arise in which an agent may be justified in so doing. It can be no part of his duty to advance money without a fair expectation of being reimbursed, and if he finds it unsafe to extend credit to his employers beyond certain reasonable limits, he may then surely be at liberty to hold hard, and to say, 'I give up the character of agent,' and as any other merchant might, to lend his money upon bond to secure its payments with maritime interest. If, in such a case, he gives fair notice that he will not make any further advances as agent, and affords the master an opportunity of trying to get money elsewhere, and the master is unable to do so, but is obliged to come back to him for a supply, then he is fairly at liberty, like any other merchant, to advance the money on a security that is more satisfactory to himself." It appears to their Lordships that practically the agents in this case did really act and do everything that they were required to do as laid down by Lord Stowell, because they did give fair notice to the master that they would not make any further advance. They told the master, "this bill is so very large that we shall not be able ourselves to advance the money to pay it;" and they did give the master the opportunity of borrowing money elsewhere, which does not appear to mean as was argued, to borrow money upon bottomry elsewhere, but to borrow money elsewhere on the personal credit of the owners. It is perfectly plain that the master could not borrow money on the personal credit of the owners. Then he comes back to the agents. The great reason why the law looks with suspicion on money advanced by the agent is, that the agent to some extent, at any rate in most cases, agrees that he will make some advances on the personal credit of the shipowner. The shipowner in ordinary cases has put the ship into his hands and he is dealing with him; but in the present case it would be very difficult to say that the agents, Messrs. Dickson, Williams, and Co., at Melbourne, agreed to advance one farthing on the credit of Smith, the shipowner, the ship really being put into their hands by Mr. Gumm, the mortgagee. They would have been quite willing apparently to advance money on the credit of the mortgagee, Mr. Gumm, but then it was doubtful whether Mr. Gumm's credit was really pledged. As to Mr. Smith, they looked upon him as a person of no credit, and never intended or held out the least in the world that they would advance money to him. It appears to their Lordships that under these circumstances it was a perfectly fair transaction for them to say to the master, "you must give us a bottomry bond; but you shall draw a bill on Mr. Gumm, who is a person in good credit, and who has put the ship into our hands, and who may be desirous to prevent the bottomry premium being incurred, and so, his security on the ship being lessened, he may prefer to pay these expenses rather than to have his security lessened by the bottomry bond being enforced against the ship. Still draw a bill on him, and if he pays that bill well and good; then there will be no bottomry." It appears to their Lordships that under the circumstances that was a perfectly fair mode of dealing on the part of the agents, and that it would be wrong to hold that the bottomry bond was bad on the ground that it was given to agents. Neither does it appear that there was the least reason to suppose that anybody else would have advanced money on bottomry on the same conditions. Other parties very likely might have been found to advance money on bottomry for the voyage. They would have expected to have obtained their bottomry premium at all events if the ship arrived, and it is not likely that anybody else would have been content to draw a bill on Mr. Gumm and take the chance of that being paid, and say, if that is paid, then the bottomry bond is not to be enforced. Therefore, on this part of the case, their Lordships agree with the judgment of the learned judge in the court below, that the bottomry bond was originally perfectly valid. The next, and a very important part of the case is this:—It is said that the bills of exchange

SMITH v. THE BANK OF NEW SOUTH WALES; THE STAFFORDSHIRE.

were never properly presented, and never properly dishonoured, and that the Court of Admiralty, as a court of equity, ought to prevent the bonds being enforced, and ought to decree that all that the parties are entitled to is to have the bills paid. The circumstances on that part of the case were these:—The bill was drawn at ten days' sight on Mr. Gumm, and there appears to have been a reason why it was drawn on a few days' sight, and why it was important that it should be accepted immediately, namely, that it was known that the voyage to Callao would probably not last very much longer than the time it would take for the bill to arrive in England, and that if the ship was to be seized, and the bottomry bond was to be enforced at Callao, there would be very little time left after the bill arrived before it would be necessary to send out orders from England to seize the ship at Callao. The bill arrived in England on the 1st Nov., and, unfortunately Mr. Gumm had died some weeks before, which has caused the whole difficulty in this part of the case. The bill had been sold to a bank in Melbourne, and the bottomry bond had been also deposited with the bank as a security for the payment of the bill, and the bill with the bond had been sent over to the bank's agent's in London. The bill was sent to Mr. Gumm's office to be presented in the ordinary way, Mr. Currie, the manager of the bank not being aware that Mr. Gumm was dead. When the person sent comes there he finds Mr. Ford, who had been manager of the business during Mr. Gumm's lifetime. Mr. Gumm had been for some time apparently confined to his bed, and Mr. Ford had had the entire management of his business, and Mr. Ford is found there. The evidence of the different persons did not very accurately agree as to what took place. At any rate Mr. Ford would not accept the bill, but he was the person who first gave information that Mr. Gumm was dead, and that he had left some executors. They came a second time, and a third time, and Mr. Currie came himself and then notice was given that one of the executors was abroad. He does not appear to have been told who the other executor was, neither did Mr. Currie ask. The bill certainly was not accepted, and Mr. Ford says that he had no authority to accept, and he says he did not lead them to believe that he dishonoured the bill on the part of the executors. Their Lordships cannot help thinking that there must have been an impression given to Mr. Currie that Mr. Ford did profess to ask for the executors, and did tell him that the bill would not be accepted. He told them on one of the occasions that he repudiated the transaction altogether, and thought the bottomry was altogether invalid. This having taken place, a notary is sent. The notary appears not to have been told that Mr. Gumm was dead, and therefore he merely presented the bill and caused it to be protested in the ordinary way. Then Mr. Hallett, one of the persons who had been named in the will of Mr. Gumm as executor, was living in London, and Mr. Ford communicated with him; therefore Mr. Hallett certainly had information that this bill had been presented. He referred them to the solicitors who had acted for Mr. Gumm, and were apparently acting for the executors. What precisely passed with the solicitor does not appear, but then communications were had by Mr. Ford with Mr. Smith, or persons acting for Mr. Smith, for the purpose of endeavouring to raise money for paying the bills, and Mr. Ford called on Mr. Currie on the 5th and left a letter which, whether he had authority from the executors or not, professed to be written by the authority of the executors, and asked that the bill should be presented again when it became due. But they did not hold out or make any promise that it would be paid. Then Mr. Currie told them that the bill would be sent out on the 6th, which was the day when the French mail left, which would take the orders to Callao; and he told them that unless the bill was paid that night, unless they produced the cash, he should send out the bond to Callao for the purpose of being enforced; and it appears to their Lordships that there was no distinct promise that the money should be paid prior to the time when the bond was sent out. The main question to be decided really is, whether the bond was sent out too soon. After the bond had been sent out there were a variety of negotiations, and before the time when the ten days and the days of grace would have elapsed, assuming the presentment to have been good, there was a promise that if the bond and the bills were given up, the amount of the bills would be paid; but then, the bond having gone out that could not be done, and a claim was made for indemnity that was refused; and further negotiations went on, and the result was that the parties never agreed. The first question is, was the bill presented? Their Lordships think that it is hardly necessary in deciding this case to say whether the bill was presented, or that it would have been a good presentment of the bill for the purpose of giving notice of dishonour to prior parties to the bill. There appears to be very little authority indeed as to what is to be done to present a bill under these circumstances. It is laid down in Mr. Justice Byles' book on bills that if the drawee of a bill is dead the party ought to inquire for his personal representative. But in the present case no administration had been taken out, and no will had been proved. Then if a party who presents a bill is informed that there has been a will, and somebody named in the will as executor, but who has not taken out probate, who has not determined whether he will act or not, is he bound to present it to such a person who may or may not afterwards take out probate, or may or may not afterwards turn out to be the executor? There is very great difficulty in that. There seems great difficulty in saying that a person would be bound to take the acceptance of anybody whose authority to give that acceptance, and whose authority as executor had not been recognised by probate being granted. Their Lordships do not think it necessary to give a decisive opinion on that question, because they agree with the argument that they have heard that the real question here is, did the parties do under all the circumstances what was reasonable for the purpose of getting the bill accepted and paid? Their Lordships are of opinion that it is pretty clear that if the bill had been presented to Mr. Hallett, who was the only person named as executor in England, it would have had no effect; that he would have refused to accept it, and that presentment to him would not have really made any difference in the case. Look at what the position of Mr. Hallett was. Mr. Gumm was not liable for this amount. It would have been a very serious thing indeed for any executor to accept a bill drawn upon his testator for a debt for which his testator was not actually liable. Mr. Hallett was informed by Mr.

Ford of the bill having been drawn and presented. He referred to his attorney, who afterwards appeared in some of the negotiations, and was present at them. If Mr. Hallett had really intended to accept it there was ample opportunity for them to have seen and informed Mr. Currie that the bill would have been accepted; but before the bond was sent out the executor never offered to accept, neither did anybody offer to accept for honour, nor did anybody offer to promise to pay; but all that was said was, "We desire that you should keep this bill for some more days, until in the ordinary course it becomes due, and then present it again." Was Mr. Currie bound to wait under these circumstances? Their Lordships think he was not, and for this reason: The time was very material. It was known that even if they sent out by that mail it was very doubtful whether the bond would arrive out in time at Callao in order to stop the ship. If the ship left Callao, the consequence would be that it would go to the Chinchas, take in a cargo of guano, and there would be all the risk of the voyage from the Chinchas to England; and moreover, though possibly the parties did not know that such was the law, the bond having become due, and being forfeited seven days after the arrival of the ship at Callao, the law appears to be that the bottomry holders would have had no insurable interest to insure the bottomry bond on the subsequent voyage. Under these circumstances it was very material that they should send out the bond by the first mail, and the other parties must have been, or at any rate ought to have been, aware of that. Therefore, on the whole, it appears to their Lordships that the bond was not sent out too early, that there was no violation of the agreement which Messrs. Dickson, Williams, and Company had made, at the time the bond and the bills of exchange were taken, that they would give the opportunity to Mr. Gumm of accepting and paying the bill before they would enforce the bond. No doubt it was a misfortune for which nobody was answerable, that Mr. Gumm happened to be dead. But still their Lordships think that the bill having arrived, and there being several days during which the bank could get neither acceptance nor payment before the next mail went out, they were justified in sending out orders by that mail with the bond, to have the bond enforced. The next question to be decided is this: the bond was so drawn as to hypothecate any freight which might be earned between Callao and England, and though the bond was made payable at Callao, and it is objected that though the bond may be generally good, yet it is bad as respects that freight. And their Lordships are of opinion that the bond does not validly hypothecate that freight, although it was admitted that the bond being bad in that respect does not make it entirely bad, but that it is still good as respects the ship. An ordinary bottomry bond beyond all question only pledges the ship, and sometimes the cargo and the freight to be earned on the voyage, which is to be accomplished before the bottomry bond becomes payable; and their Lordships have not been referred to any case in which freight to be earned on a subsequent voyage has been included in a bottomry bond. It was held in the Jacob (ubi sup.), that the subsequent freight under very peculiar circumstances might be liable, but there is no form of a bottomry bond produced which on the face of it professes to charge and hypothecate the subsequent freight; and their Lordships are of opinion that subsequent freight cannot be hypothecated, for this reason: That by the very nature of a bottomry bond the parson who takes it is to become liable for the maritime risk, and therefore nothing can be hypothecated, except something which is in danger of perishing by maritime risk during the time that the bond is running. But here that freight was not begun to be earned, the cargo was not loaded on board until after the bond was forfeited, and when no maritime risk was being run by the person who had advanced his money on bottomry, because, the bond being forfeited, he already had got the personal security of the master. And, moreover, if there can be a valid pledge of the subsequent freight, it does not appear why there should not be a valid pledge of the freight for ever and ever, until the bottomry holder chooses to seize the ship. It is difficult to see where the end of it would be. The only case which has been cited was the case of the Jacob (ubi sup.); it is unnecessary to say whether that was rightly decided, but it hardly appears to be an authority on the question, for there the subsequent freight had not been hypothecated; but Lord Stowell came to the conclusion that by deviating from the proper voyage, and from going away too early, the shipowner had wrongfully deprived the bottomry holder of the freight which really was pledged, namely, the freight to be earned in the current voyage, and that therefore it was right, the ship having got away before it could be seized, to hold that the subsequent freight could be seized. Their Lordships give no opinion whether that was right or wrong, but that case does not appear to be an authority for giving a pledge of the subsequent freight. Their Lordships have come to the conclusion that there was no valid pledge of the subsequent freight. The question then arises, what ought to be done? Both ship and freight were seized when the ship arrived at Cork. Bail was given generally, and the ship was released, and earned the freight subsequently. Then it was said that because the bail had been given generally, and ship and freight had been released, there could be no subsequent inquiry into the value of the ship and freight; but, practically, the parties by giving bail must be considered to have agreed that if the bond was held to be valid in any part then the bail would pay the amount of the bottomry bond, which was the amount for which they had given bail. Their Lordships find that that is not the rule in the Admiralty, but that after bail has been given, on a proper case being made out, the Court of Admiralty will go into the question whether the res which was seized,—the whole of the property which was attached,—was of more or less value than the amount for which bail was given, and if it is found that it is of less value, then the parties will only be obliged to pay the amount of that. That appears to have been decided by Dr. Lushington in the case of The Duchesse de Brabant (Swab. 264). That was a case of collision. The note is, "the bail is only liable to the extent of the value of the ship and freight, and not for the full amount of the damage done, even although as in the present case, bail may have been given for a sum beyond the value of the ship and freight;" and there it was decided that on a proper case being made out, a subsequent inquiry may be made into the value of the ship and freight, notwithstanding bail has been given for a larger sum. If that may be so when both ship and freight are held to be liable, a fortiori, their Lordships are of opinion that it would be the case if the court comes to the decision that though the ship is liable the freight is not; and therefore they are of opinion that the decree of the court below ought to be varied by declaring that the bottomry bond was not a valid hypothecation of the freight earned by the vessel on the voyage from Callao to England, and operated only as a hypothecation of the ship, and by referring it to the Registrar to ascertain what was the value of the ship when released. Subject to that variation, the decree of the court below will be affirmed, but the decree having been varied in a substantial part of the case, their Lordships will humbly report to Her Majesty that it should be affirmed with that variation, but without cost to either side. Their Lordships understand that it will be for the convenience of both parties that the cause should be retained in this court, and that the questions remaining to be determined should come before Her Majesty's Registrar in Maritime Causes. This course may therefore be pursued.

V.C. BACON'S COURT.

Reported by the Hon. ROBERT BUTLER and T. H. CARSON, Esq., Barristers-at-Law.

April 17 and 19, 1872.

ALEXANDER v. CAMPBELL,

Marine insurance—Mutual society—Policy—Deposit of—Misrepresentation—Arbitration—Pleading—Evidence.

By the rules of a mutual insurance association which were incorporated in their policies, no member, mortgagee, or assignee having a ship insured in the association which should be mortgaged or assigned to any person, should have any claim by virtue of the policy, nor should any assignee of the policy have a claim for any loss or damage which might be sustained by the ship, unless previous to the occurrence of such loss or damage such member, mortgagee, or assignee shall have given an undertaking to pay and discharge all sums which might become due from such member in respect of such ship and her insurance, and of the insurance underwritten on his behalf in the association.

The plaintiff was deposit of a policy for valuable consideration. He did not give the required undertaking, but in fact paid and discharged all payments in respect of the ship and her insurance. The ship was lost:

Held that the plaintiff was entitled to the proceeds of the policy.

In a proposal for a policy the ship-owner in answer to the question "When and where last metalled?" stated "Liverpool, 1867." It appeared from Lloyd's registrar that the ship was last metalled in 1865, but it was proved that in 1867, amongst other repairs, the metal sheathing was overhauled, thoroughly repaired, and replaced with new where necessary.

Held, that there had been no such misrepresentation as to vitiate the policy.

By the rules of the association all matters in dispute relative to any claim in respect of an insurance were to be referred to arbitration as a condition precedent to any action at law or suit in equity. Held, that questions of law were not affected by the arbitration clause, and that the jurisdiction of the court was not excluded.

This suit was instituted to recover the money due on a policy of insurance on the ship Pilgrim, which had been lost. The ship had been insured in a mutual society called the Alliance Ship Insurance Association, and the plaintiff sued as equitable mortgagee by deposit of the policy. The defendants were the committee and managers of the association.

By the rules of the association, which were incorporated in the policy, it was provided (rule 15), that

No member, mortgagee, or assignee, the whole or any part of whose share in a ship insured in this association shall, at the time of entering or afterwards, be mortgaged or assigned to any person or persons, shall have any claim by virtue of this policy, nor shall any assignee of such policy have a claim for any loss or damage which may be sustained by such ship unless previous to the occurrence of such loss or damage such member, mortgagee, or assignee shall have delivered to the manager an undertaking approved of by the mortgagee or assignee, whereby he shall covenant with the manager to pay and discharge all sums of money which are or may become due from such member in respect of such ship and her insurance, and in respect of the insurances underwritten on his behalf in this association. Nevertheless, such member shall still be liable for, and shall pay his contributions and demands the same as if such mortgage or assignment had not been made. Any member who may prefer to pay the quarter's premium by cash in advance, and on the 20th Jan. deposit a further sum equal to a quarter's premium towards meeting any additional calls, shall have the option of so doing, instead of providing the above-named guarantee.

The rules also provided that

If a difference shall arise between the committee and any member relative to the settlement of any loss or damage, or to any claim for average or any other matter relating to the insurance, such member shall, within twenty-eight days after such difference shall have arisen, select an average-stater of Lloyd's, as arbitrator on his behalf, and the committee shall select another, which two shall have power to appoint a third, which three, or any two of them, shall decide upon the claim or matter in dispute, according to the rules and custom of this association, to be proved on oath by the managers, such decision to be finally binding on each party, but the committee and assured may, by mutual consent, refer such claim on dispute to one person only, whose award or decision shall be final and conclusive; the costs of such reference and of the award shall be at the discretion of the said arbitrators. And it is hereby expressly declared that no member who shall refuse to accept the amount of any loss as settled by the committee in full satisfaction of his claim, shall be entitled to maintain any action at law or suit in equity on his policy until the matter in dispute shall have been referred to and decided by arbitration as hereinbefore specified, and then only for such sum or sums as the said arbitrators shall award; and the obtaining the decision of such arbitrators on the matter in dispute is hereby declared to be a condition precedent to the right of any member to maintain any such action or suit.

The plaintiff paid and discharged all sums of money which became due in respect of the ship and her insurance.

The defence raised by the pleadings was that there had been a material misrepresentation made at the time of obtaining the policy by the ship-owner, who in answer to the question "When and where last metalled?" had replied, "Liverpool, 1867," whereas it appeared from Lloyd's Register that the ship was last metalled in 1865, and that she was only overhauled, and new metal put where required, in 1867. The defendants also contended that the matters in dispute ought to have been referred to arbitration as a condition precedent to recovering on the policy. It appeared that previous to the filing of the bill, negotiations had been entered into with the object of referring the matters in dispute to arbitration, but as the plaintiff refused to submit questions of law to the decision of the arbitrators, and the defendants insisted that their award should be final on all points, the present proceedings were instituted.

At the bar a certificate of the ship's register was produced, from which it appeared that the plaintiff was a mortgagee of the ship, and it was contended that as he had not complied with the requirements of the 15th rule of the Association he was not in a position to make any claim by virtue of the policy,

Kay, Q.C. and A. G. Marten for the plaintiff.—The statement that the ship was remetalled in 1867 is substantially true. Misrepresentations to vitiate a policy must be substantial and material: (Gandy v. The Adelaide Marine Insurance Company, ante, p. 101; 25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 742; L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 746; 40 L. J. 239, Q. B.) If there was any misrepresentation, the defendants must prove it strictly: (Mowatt v. Blake, 31 L. T. Rep. 387.) The clause in the articles of association as to arbitration does not apply to questions of law, and does not exclude the jurisdiction of the court. The members of the association are sufficiently represented by the defendants:

Pepper v. Green, 2 H. & M. 478;

Harvey v. Beckwith, 2 H. & M. 429; 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 632;

Pepper v. Henzell, 2 H. & M. 486; 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 63;

Swanston, Q.C. and A. E. Miller, Q.C. for the defendants.—The plaintiff, as appears from the ship's register, is the mortgagee of the ship, and, not having complied with the rules of the society, he cannot recover on the policy. This case is on all fours with the case of Turnbull v. Woolfe (2 Mar. Law. Cas. O S. 63; 7 L. T. Rep. N. S. 483; 9 Jur. N. S. 57), except that in that case the owner of the ship was plaintiff, and here the mortgagee is plaintiff. There has also been such misrepresentation as to vitiate the policy:

Marshall on Marine Insurance, 4 edit. p. 356;

Kisch v. The Central Railway Company of Venezuela (Limited) 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 801; 34 L. J., N. S., 545, Ch.;

Haywood v. Rodgers, 4 East, 590, 597;

Carter v. Boehm, 3 Burr, 1905;

Barber v. Fletcher, 1 Douglas, 306;

The evidence as to whether the matter not communicated were material is not admissible: (Campbell v. Richards, 5 B. & Ad. 840), arbitration being a condition precedent, the plaintiff cannot sue until an award has been made.

Scott v. Avery, 5 H. L. Cas. 811;

Kay, Q.C. in reply.—I claim as deposittee of the policy. There is no evidence of any mortgage of the ship except the register, and that cannot be admitted, as no such defence was raised by the pleadings:

Phillips v. Phillips, 5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 108, 655; 4 Do G. F. J. 208.

In Turnbull v. Woolfe (ubi sup.), a deed was required to be executed by the mortgagee; here it is merely an undertaking. I have paid all the money which the 15th rule is intended to secure, and, although I have not given any undertaking, I have performed all the conditions required thereby.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said: In this case, which is not entirely without difficulty, the only safe guide I can follow is furnished by the record. The case of the plaintiff is very simple and plain as stated on his bill. Being interested as deposittee in a policy of insurance on a ship, and a loss having arisen, he asked for payment from the insurance company. No question turns upon the policy of insurance. The only important question which arises is upon the 15th rule of the regulations and rules affecting the society. The defendants by their answer raise only two objections to the plaintiff's claim, as I understand it. The first is that upon the original acceptance and execution of the policy, a material misrepresentation was made which has the effect of vitiating the policy and releasing them from the obligations contained therein, and the other, that the regulations having provided for a settlement by arbitration of all questions which should arise under the policy, this court has no jurisdiction to deal with the subject, because the plaintiff has refused to concur in an arbitration. That there is no other objection raised by the answer I think is not only apparent upon the whole answer itself, but by the concluding paragraph in which the defendant states "That the plaintiff's remedy, if any, is at law only, and not in this honourable court, and we claim the same benefit of this objection as if we had demurred to the bill, or pleaded the same objection in bar of the further prosecution of this suit." The objection as to the materiality of the representations is contained in the first paragraph in which it is alleged that "The defendants have discovered since the date of the policy that the proposal for the insurance contained a material misstatement as to the condition of the ship, and the ship had not, in fact, been metalled so lately as is alleged in such proposal, and we submit for the judgment of this honourable court, whether by reason of such misstatement as aforesaid the policy has or not been avoided or otherwise, and how affected." Now throughout the answer there is no suggestion whatever that the plaintiff's claim can be defeated upon any other than the two grounds I have mentioned. There is no suggestion of infirmity of title on his part. The plaintiff alleges that he was equitable mortgagee by deposit of the policy of insurance; the defendants say only that they know, nothing about that. They raise no other objection to the plaintiff's title than that which is contained in the passage which I have referred to, in which they simply say that they do not know whether he has the interest which he claims. Then at the hearing a totally new issue is raised, one not to be found in the pleadings, not having any necessary connection with the facts as they appear in the pleadings, but which acquires very great importance and weight, because of the reference which is made to the case of Turnbull v. Woolfe (ubi sup.), which did in some respects resemble the present, and in which it was decided that a man who was not the true owner of a ship, but who had mortgaged it, having effected an insurance, and not having disclosed that fact, was incapacitated from suing in respect of a loss which had happened. The argument there turned upon a clause which is similar in most respects to the 15th clause and regulation existing here. The only material difference is that in the case before the court in Turnbull v. Woolfe, the important term was that upon some interest being acquired either by a mortgagee, assignee, or any other person in the policy, a deed should be executed by that person which would impress upon him the obligation of performing all the conditions which the assured ought to perform under the original policy. In the present case the regulation only requires that there shall be an undertaking given to that effect. The obvious meaning of this regulation is that, inasmuch as this is a mutual insurance company, and as each of the members is liable to contribute according to his proportion for any loss which may occur during the year for which the policy is to exist, it should not be in the power of the persons effecting an insurance to deal with the interest created, under the policy, and at the same time to escape from the burdens or leave the society without the security they have a right to expect from the terms of the policy. If the assured parts with his interest, then he is to substitute some other person, who at the time of acquiring his interest will undertake the business, and that in the case of Turnbull v. Woolfe was to be effected by means of a deed. In the present case it was to be effected by means of an undertaking, and although no doubt much has been said about a certain obscurity of expression contained in the 15th regulation, the general meaning of it is that which I have endeavoured to express. In this case Mr. Alexander, the plaintiff, alleges and proves that at a time subsequent to effecting the policy he became depositor of the policy for a valuable consideration, that he became entitled therefore to all the benefits that might result from the policy. He does not suggest that he was not also bound by all the obligations which attached to the insured, because it is a fact alleged and proved, and not contradicted, that for the whole period for which the policy was effected, all the calls and payments which ought to be made on the part of the assured have been made by him, so that if he had given an undertaking it would not have carried the matter any further. He has, in point of fact, without any such undertaking, performed all the conditions. Then the ship goes to sea and an accident happens, in consequence of which a loss is sustained. Now, consider what are the circumstances of the parties at the time of that loss. Vivian, the insurer, was there and then entitled to demand payment of the amount of the loss. If he had gone to Mr. Alexander he might or might not have procured from him the policy which had been deposited with him. Whether he did or not, either for Mr. Alexander or for himself, at that time he had a right to receive the moneys insured by the policy. Then, has anything happened to change that state of circumstances? Mr. Alexander has a right to all that Vivian could have demanded, and Vivian beyond all question could have demanded the amount of the loss which he had sustained by reason of the accident to the ship. But it is said that Turnbull v. Woolfe decided that a man who has insured his ship and who has before mortgaged the ship cannot enforce the insurance against the company unless he has complied with the requirements in that respect, in the case of Turnbull v. Woolfe executing a deed, and in this case giving an undertaking. If that case had been raised upon the pleadings it would have been necessary to examine it much more closely and minutely than I have the means of doing at present. It cannot be said that according to the practice of this court, or any other of the rules by which the proceedings of the court are conducted, that parties should come to the court with plain issues joined between them, the subject of their dispute clearly ascertained, and that at the hearing a question totally different from anything to be found in the pleadings should be raised, and the court should be asked to determine it. That was not the case in Turnbull v. Woolfe, where the whole of the facts upon which the court decided were clearly upon the pleadings and in the evidence. Now in this case, bound as I am by the record, and bound as I am not to regard any other circumstances, I find it impossible to engage in any consideration of the point which Mr. Swanton has mainly relied upon, and which nobody can deny would have been of vital importance if it had been raised. For although I agree that there is no evidence of the existence of any mortgage, at the same time I cannot help feeling that the production of those registers gives rise to a sort of presumption that at the time when this insurance was effected there was an existing mortgage in favour of Mr. Alexander. That was a mortgage of a most notorious kind, as mortgages of ships always are, and without saying that this company were bound before they effected the insurance to ascertain or even to inquire whether the ship had been mortgaged, I say that they have to explain and to account to me now, before I can listen to their defence upon that ground, why in their answer they did not state that plain and important fact. If that had been done, I cannot tell what might have been the result of it. I cannot tell what the plaintiff would have had to say as to the existence of the mortgage, or as to its discharge, or as to any other circumstances that might be relative to it. The defendants have chosen not to raise that question by their pleadings, but rely upon this which I have mentioned, namely, that there was a material misrepresentation, and that the remedy is not in this court. How am I at liberty to go beyond the limit of this record? If I thought, as I do not, that the evidence was conclusive as to the existence of the mortgage, I could not possibly adopt it here, because it is a case which the defendant has not upon his pleadings tendered to the judgment of the court. Nor can any injustice be done by it, because I find that all the terms in the strictest manner have been complied with by the plaintiff in this suit, and that no wrong has been done to the defendants (unless indeed they succeed upon the misrepresentation), no infraction of their rules, except only the verbal non-compliance with the stipulations that upon a change of interest an undertaking should be given that the original owner's obligation should be performed. I think, therefore, that being bound, as I feel I am, by the issues raised here, I cannot entertain that question which was so plainly and conclusively decided in Turnbull v. Woolfe, and which I should not have ventured in the slightest degree to depart from or suggest any question respecting the propriety of. Then if the case is reduced to a question of material misrepresentation, in that I think that the defendants have plainly failed in their contention. In the course of the argument a good deal has been said about retelling, an expression not to be found in the pleadings, but the meaning of which is perfectly obvious. The insurance company, in the ordinary course of their business, sent a set of interrogatories to the person proposing to effect the insurance, requiring answers to them, and no fault is found with the answers except that which relates to the metalling. The question upon the subject is—how it was metalled? and the answer to it is—at Liverpool, in 1867. Upon that subject the evidence of the person by whom the repairs were executed is exceedingly clear and distinct. Mr. Clover says: “My firm received instructions in the month of March 1867, from the plaintiff to do certain repairs and alterations to the ship Pilgrim, in the plaintiff’s amended bill of complaint mentioned; amongst other repairs, the metal sheathing of the said ship was completely overhauled and thoroughly repaired, and replaced with new where necessary.” What I am asked to decide is, whether the answer I have read stating that the ship was metalled at Liverpool in 1867, is a material misrepresentation. It has been suggested that repairing a ship is not metalling a ship. I have no reason to think, and considering the ordinary expression which you apply to a house, I do not know why repairing is not a very proper mode of describing the metalling of a ship, because it cannot be necessary when a part of a ship’s metalling has become defective, and only a part of it is to be renewed and replaced, that in order to metal a ship you should scrape off every inch of her sheathing, and it is said that you cannot answer the question when the ship was metalled, unless you are able to prove that every square inch of her metalling was new upon that occasion. It is not suggested on the part of the defendants, there is no evidence whatever upon the subject. It is said that in Lloyd’s Register—the admission of which as evidence is of course not to be taken without grave consideration—it is described as having been done in 1865, and then only partially done. But how does the fact that in Lloyd’s Register the ship is stated to have had something done to her in 1865, interfere with or diminish the weight of the statement by a competent witness, who says that the ship was completely overhauled and thoroughly repaired and remetalled with new where necessary, that all was done in a workmanlike and substantial manner? Then follows this passage, “And in my opinion made the said ship as good a risk for insurance as if the said ship had been entirely remetalled.” There is great difficulty, no doubt, in admitting the evidence of experts without qualification. Nobody is more reluctant than I am, I think, to adopt implicitly what experts say upon all occasions. But I do not read this in the sense of the cases which were referred to as expressing an opinion to supersede the judgment of a jury, which has sometimes been attempted. But here an artisan, a man accustomed to the business of mending, repairing, and building ships, and knowing that the state and condition of a ship is the material thing to be considered by an insurance company, says that after he had overhauled and thoroughly repaired the ship in question, she was as good risk for insurance as if she had been entirely remetalled. That is not an expression of mere opinion, but the expression of a fact founded upon personal professional knowledge. He says that no ship which had been entirely remetalled would have been better worthy of insurance than that was after he had finished her. The other witness on this subject is an underwriter in London, who having read the affidavit that I have just mentioned, says, “In my opinion, if the ship was repaired and overhauled in the manner mentioned in the said affidavit of the said George Robert Clover, the statement in the said exhibit, D, is substantially correct and true, and it would be immaterial for the purpose of affecting insurances upon her, whether or not the said ship had then been entirely remetalled, or that the metal of the said ship had been completely overhauled, and thoroughly repaired, and replaced with new where necessary.” Then he adds that which is objected to, “the statement that under such circumstances the ship had been remetalled would not have any substantial effect upon the premium which would be required for effecting such insurance.” There again he is speaking of that which is within his own personal knowledge, and his own daily avocations made him acquainted with. He being an underwriter says with the other witness that thoroughly repairing a ship’s bottom is as good a thing as putting new sheathing upon the ship’s bottom. Against that evidence there is not a suggestion that these witnesses are mistaken. It is true that is in reply, but that would not have prevented the defendant endeavouring to give evidence if he could. But there is no suggestion in the answer that the remetalling was not sufficient, unless I refer to that in the eleventh paragraph, where there comes another faint suggestion, “that having regard to the time which had in fact elapsed since the ship had been metalled, as appears from the entries in respect thereof in the books kept for that purpose at Lloyd’s, we think it highly probable that such metal on the bottom was, quite irrespective of any damage sustained on the particular occasion in question, much wrinkled.” There is as faint a suggestion as can be made, but quite as much as the gentlemen thought it right and safe to make. But losing sight entirely of the fact that in 1867 the ship had been thoroughly overhauled and repaired, and what was defective supplied by new materials, they adopt the date of 1865, as a reason why they say it is no wonder some of the metal was wrinkled because nothing had been done to it since 1865. Looking at it as a matter of evidence upon this subject of material misrepresentation, I think the plaintiff’s case is proved in the most distinct manner, without any attempt to meet it. Excepting some of the comments which I have listened to from Mr. Swanston and Mr. Miller as to the terms in which the evidence is given, I think the evidence is very clear and distinct, and I think the answer that the ship was metalled in 1867 is proved to have been a true representation. Upon the question about the arbitration, I do not read the arbitration clause as meaning that if such a question as this arose it must of necessity be referred to arbitration. If a question arose between the parties about the state of the ship, as it did, and the plaintiff was ready to go to arbitration upon that and a variety of circumstances belonging to and not going beyond the subject of the policy entered into, that might very properly be and ought to be disposed of by arbitration. It is a cheaper and more satisfactory mode of settling any such disputes, and the arbitrators are better, perhaps, qualified than any other tribunal that could be selected for the purposes of determining such disputes. But the question of law which is here raised is not a question which, under the arbitra-tration clause, it was intended to submit to ship-owners or underwriters. I think the plaintiff's conduct in that respect was exceedingly reasonable and fair. He was willing to go to arbitration upon the only point which he thought was to be concluded by the arbitration. The insurance company seem also at one time to have been inclined to go to arbitration. But they insist as a term that the arbitrator shall decide this legal question raised between the plaintiff, and then I do not think that that was on their part at all reasonable, and I am satisfied that it does not exclude the jurisdiction of this court. I am of opinion, therefore, that the plaintiff has established his claim upon these pleadings, upon which alone I decide, and that he is entitled to that relief which by the bill he asks.

ALEXANDER v. CAMPBELL.

ALEXANDER v. CAMPBELL.

[V.C.B.]

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Reported by H. H. HOCKING and B. A. KINGLAKE, and H. F. POOLEY, ESQs., Barristers-at-Law.

DE MATTOS v. SAUNDERS.

Policy of insurance—Stranding—Partial loss—Mutual credit of premiums—Set-off.

Insurance was effected on a cargo of salt from Liverpool to Calcutta. From stress of weather the ship put into the Bristol Channel for safety. She lost both her anchors and her mainmast, and not being able to reach a harbour was, with the assistance of two steam tugs, towed on to a bank outside Cardiff.

The salt was much damaged and stained, part of the cargo being destroyed.

The salvors having instituted proceedings in the Admiralty Court to obtain payment for the services rendered by them, the cargo was sold by auction, but only fetched enough to pay the salvors and the expenses of suit. The plaintiff had assigned the bill of lading and the policy of insurance for an advance, and he now sued on behalf of the assignee thereof. The plaintiff had since become a bankrupt, and executed a deed under the Bankruptcy Act 1861.

The defendant denied that any sufficient notice of abandonment had been given him, and also assuming his liability claimed to set-off the money due on account of other premiums unpaid by the plaintiff.

Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover for a partial loss.

Also, that there was a stranding of the ship.

Held, also, that the defendant was not entitled to set-off the premiums by way of mutual credit.

THIS was an action brought by the plaintiff against the defendant on a policy of insurance effected upon a cargo of salt shipped on board the Margaret Quale, and the increased value thereof by prepayment of freight.

The defendant pleaded, first, that the ship was totally lost; secondly, that the plaintiff did not prepay the freight; thirdly, an equitable plea of mutual credit, alleging that the plaintiff duly executed a deed for the benefit of his creditors, under the Bankruptcy Act 1861, and that at the time of his making such deed he was indebted to the defendant, and that at the time of the defendant giving the plaintiff credit he had no notice of any act of bankruptcy committed by the plaintiff.

The cause was tried before Erle, C.J., at the sittings in London after Michaelmas Term, 1865, when a verdict was found for the plaintiff for the amount claimed, subject to the opinion of the court upon the following case:

1. The plaintiff is a merchant carrying on business in Leadenhall-street, and was until lately engaged in shipping coals and salt to India and elsewhere.

2. On the 25th Sept. 1863, the plaintiff entered into a charter-party with one William Quale, the owner of the Margaret Quale, and thereby chartered that vessel to proceed from Liverpool or Calcutta.

3. In pursuance of the charter-party the Margaret Quale was loaded with 1059 tons of stoved salt and 259½ tons of butter salt, for which on the 29th Oct 1863, the master signed a bill of lading.

4. On the 29th Oct. the plaintiff in accordance with the terms of the charter-party, gave to the owner of the ship two acceptances, one at two months for one-third of the freight, and the other at six months for one-third of the freight, making together the sum of 992l. 19s., and the following receipt was endorsed on the bill of lading, "Received in advance of the within freight, 992l. 19s., being two-thirds payable as per charter-party, Liverpool, 1863, 29th Oct.—W. Quale." These acceptances were dishonoured when they became due.

5. The following is the invoice made out by the plaintiff, showing the cost of the cargo, and the increased value thereof, by the aforesaid prepayments of freight:

6. On the 30th Oct. 1863, the plaintiff effected the policy of insurance now sued on, on 1418 tons of salt, and increased value thereof by prepayment of freight valued at 1700l.

7. The defendant underwrote the said policy for 85l.

8. On the 30th Oct. the plaintiff arranged with Messrs. Ogle and Co. of London, for an advance of the sum of 1446l. 4s. 2d. against the said bill of lading and policy of insurance, and agreed to consign the cargo to their Calcutta correspondents. The bill of lading and the policy of insurance were accordingly handed to Messrs. Ogle and Co. by the plaintiff, who procured Messrs. Mollur, March, and Co. of London, merchants, to advance to them the sum of 1446*l.* 4*s.* 2*d.* upon their delivering to them the bill of lading and policy of insurance as well as other securities. This sum so obtained by Messrs. Mollur, March, and Co. was, on the following day, paid by Messrs. Ogle and Co. to the plaintiff in pursuance of the aforesaid arrangement.

9. On the 20th Nov. 1863, the Margaret Quale left the Birkenhead docks in tow of a steam tug, and shortly afterwards encountered severe weather. On the 27th Nov. the steam tug left the Margaret Quale, and she then proceeded under sail on her outward voyage. From the 27th Nov. the weather continued very bad, and on the 2nd Dec. she sprung a leak, and the master of the ship finding soon afterwards that the pumps were choked, made for the Bristol Channel in order to put into some port.

10. On the 4th Dec., at 8 p.m., the master finding it impossible to weather Hartland Point, both anchors were let go, but as they did not hold the ship, the mast's head had to be cut away, and on the same day the mate and four of the crew were dispatched for assistance.

11. Between the 4th and 7th Dec. the ship's anchors were slipped and the vessel encountered a variety of disasters not necessary to describe. During that time salvage services were rendered to her by the smack Ranger, of Clovelly, and the Pilot and Iron Duke steam tugs of Cardiff.

12. The said tugs shortly afterwards towed her on to the east bank in the Penarth Roads, where she lay right on her port side for several tides. Whilst she was so lying there she sustained injury by straining in consequence of the strong current, her want of anchors and the damage she had previously sustained.

13. It is usual for vessels to bring up to anchor on the said east bank, there to take the ground and wait at anchor for sufficient water to enable them to enter the Cardiff Docks.

14. On the 10th Dec. the two tugs towed the Margaret Quale into Cardiff East Dock, where she was at once taken possession of by Mr. Millar, receiver of wreck of that port. A few days afterwards the ship and cargo were arrested in two salvage suits which had been instituted in the Court of Admiralty in the sums of 1500*l.* and 3000*l.* on behalf of the smack and two steam tugs in respect of the salvage services so rendered by them as aforesaid. In these salvage suits the plaintiff did not put in bail, and the cargo consequently remained under arrest.

15. On the 26th Dec. Mr. Millar, who was also Deputy Marshal of the Admiralty Court, proceeded to discharge the cargo in pursuance of a decree of delivery made in the said salvage suits. The discharge was completed on the 21st Jan. 1864, when the salt, which weighed 1227 tons, was warehoused in the Bute Dock, the residue of the cargo having been washed or pumped out of the ship during the voyage.

16. In the said two salvage suits it was agreed between the proctors for the salvors, and Mr. Elmslie, the solicitor for the plaintiff, that the value of the cargo salvaged should for the purpose of those suits be taken to be 8000*l.* At the time when this agreement was come to Mr. Elmslie had not however informed himself of the actual value of the cargo.

17. On the 28th May 1864, the Court of Admiralty awarded in the two salvage suits the sums of 133*l.* 6*s.* 3*d.*, and 66*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* to the two tugs respectively as the remuneration payable to them in respect of the salvage of the cargo.

18. When the cargo was discharged at Cardiff it was found to be in a very damaged condition, arising in the following manner from perils of the seas. Sea water which after having come in contact with the iron bolts of the ship fell upon or otherwise reached the salt, had caused it to be coloured with brownish and yellowish specks. A cargo of salt so discoloured is not so merchantable at Calcutta, and in order to have made any part thereof available for sale at that port, it would have been necessary to have picked out such portions as were perfectly clean, or only very slightly discoloured, and to have collected the same for shipment. It would have been possible in this manner to have picked out and collected 300 or 400 tons of salt sufficiently clean to be saleable at Calcutta. This operation, however, would have been attended with great difficulty, and it is doubtful whether the salt so collected would have fetched at Calcutta a price exceeding the import duty payable at that port. Such import duty was about 9*l.* 2*s.* per ton, and the price of perfectly clean salt at Calcutta was, including duty, about 12*l.* 10*s.* per ton.

19. The plaintiff, who had abtained as aforesaid from putting in bail in the said Admiralty suits, did not in any way interfere with the salt, and in Aug. 1874, Mr. Millar, in pursuance of a commission of appraisement and sale, issued by the Court of Admiralty, caused the salt to be appraised and valued, and the same was accordingly appraised and valued at the sum of 245*l.*

20. Shortly afterwards, in pursuance of the same commission of appraisement and sale, Mr. Millar having advertised the sale in the usual manner, put up the salt to auction. There was, however, only one bid for the salt, viz., a bid of 2*s.* per ton. This bid was not accepted by Mr. Millar, who in the following Sept. sold the salt by private contract for the sum of 240*l.*

21. The expense of discharging, weighing, and placing the salt in the warehouse amounted to 76*l.* 14*s.* 3*d.*, and the warehouse rent up to the time of the sale amounted to 158*l.* 11*s.* These expenses, which were paid by Mr. Millar, amounted together with his ordinary fees and proper expenses as deputy marshal to the sum of 240*l.*

22. As regards the ship, she was placed in a dry dock at Cardiff on the 13th Feb. 1864, and was there surveyed a few days afterwards. All the damage she had sustained might have been repaired in three or four months at an expense of 6700*l.*, and when so repaired she would have been worth 8000*l.*, and would have been as good a vessel as she was at the commencement of the voyage, and perfectly seaworthy for carrying any dry and perishable cargo. She was, however, actually repaired at a cost of 13,331*l.* These repairs, which were completed in Feb. 1865, made her a much better ship than she was at the commencement of the insured voyage, although her value when so repaired was less than the said sum of 13,331*l.*

23. In March 1865 the said ship, under the name of the Rockingham Castle sailed with a cargo from Cardiff.

24. Certain correspondence passed after Jan. 1864 between the following persons, the plaintiff, Mr. Quale, the owner of the said ship, Mr. Sercombe, the broker, who effected the policy sued on and who communicated to the underwriters the information he received in the letters contained in the said correspondence, Mr. Elmslie who acted as solicitor for the plaintiff, and also for Messrs. Ogle and Co., Messrs. Duncan, Squarey and Blackmore, the solicitors for Mr. Quale and Messrs. Mollur, March, and Co., the merchants already mentioned in this case.

25. On the 4th Jan. 1864, the plaintiff executed a deed of inspectorship in accordance with the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act 1861, and was at that time indebted to the defendant in the sum of 47l. 15s. 7d. The defendant has assented to the said deed, and has received thereunder two several dividends upon the said debt amounting together to the sum of 2l. 13s. 9d.

26. The said sum of 1446l. 4s. 2d. has not been repaid by the plaintiff to Messrs. Ogle and Co., nor by the latter to Messrs. Mollur, March, and Co., and this action is brought in the name of the plaintiff by and on account of Messrs. Mollur, March, and Co., in whose hands the bill of lading and policy of insurance still are.

27. The court is to be at liberty to draw all such inferences of fact as a jury would be justified in drawing. The question for the consideration of the court is, whether under the circumstances stated in this case, the plaintiff is entitled to recover on the aforesaid policy from the defendant. If the court shall be of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to recover for a total loss, then judgment shall be entered for the plaintiff for such sum as the court shall direct, together with the costs of suit.

If the court shall be of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to recover for a partial loss only, then judgment shall be entered for the plaintiff for such sum and upon such terms as to costs and otherwise as the court shall think fit, the court being at liberty to direct any further inquiry it may think proper for the purpose of ascertaining the sum which in such case the plaintiff is entitled to recover from the defendant. If the court shall be of opinion that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover in this action then judgment shall be entered for the defendant with costs of the defence.

Butt, Q.C. (C. Russell with him) for the plaintiff.—First, there was an absolute total loss of the salt though it existed in specie in a damaged condition, in consequence of the Admiralty proceedings, and the plaintiff could not reasonably have been expected to bail it.

Roux v. Salvador, 3 Bing N. C. 266;

Mullett v. Shedden, 13 East, 304;

Stringer v. English and Scottish Marine Insurance Company, L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 676; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 440;

Phillips, on Insurance, cap. 17, sect. 12.

[On this point the COURT intimated their opinion that there was no total loss.] Secondly, there was a stranding: (Corcoran v. Gurney, 22 L. J. 113, Q. B.) In Kingsford v. Marshall (8 Bing. N. C. 458), where upon the ebbing of the tide a vessel took the ground in a tide harbour in the place it was intended she should, but in so doing struck against some hard substance by which two holes were knocked in her bottom, and the cargo damaged, it was held there was no stranding, but I cite it as an example that taking the ground is not a stranding within the meaning of the policy; but when she is put aground in consequence of sea peril then it is a stranding. The other side rely on the 13th paragraph, but this ship had no anchors, and she did not therefore take the mud bank in the ordinary way. [WILLES, J., Taunton puts the case well in Wells v. Hopwood (3 Barn. & Adol. 20), where he says that although it is most difficult to reconcile the cases this distinction appears to be deducible, viz., that in instances where the event happens in the ordinary course of navigation, as from the regular flux and reflux of the tide, without any external force or violence, it is not a stranding, but where it arises from an accident, or out of the common course of navigation, it is. The difficulty consists in the application of the rule.] Thirdly, the defendant cannot set-off premiums because the plaintiff is suing as trustee.

Sir G. Honyman (J. C. Mathew with him) for the defendant.—There was no stranding, because the vessel was beached intentionally, and in an ordinary place. The onus is on the plaintiff; there is no allegation of loss by stranding. [The COURT.—That is not necessary: it is sufficient to aver a loss by the perils insured against.] He cited.

Bishop v. Pentland, 7 B. & C. 219.

As to the mutual credit plea he relied on sect. 197 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134. [WILLES, J.—No doubt it is within the clause if it is the plaintiff's debt, or one which would have passed to the assignee. You must consider whether De Mattos had equitably assigned, for the bankruptcy law only attaches to that which is a debt at law and in equity. He referred to Turner v. Thomas (L. Rep. 6 C. P. 610; 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 879.) There was an inspectorship deed, and no assignment was made. At that time the debts was not due to plaintiff. He also cited

Wilson v. Gabriel, 4 B. & S. 242; 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 502.

WILLES, J.—After the full argument and discussion that has taken place on each point raised in the present case, it seems unnecessary that we should at all hesitate as to the judgment to be pronounced, although the case is undoubtedly one of very great importance. Our judgment must in my opinion, be for the plaintiff for a partial loss. It has been contended that the partial loss was converted into a total loss by the seizure of the salvors and by the proceedings taken in the Court of Admiralty; but that contention cannot hold good. The proceedings in question are not at all the necessary consequences of sea damage, although in this case they were the natural and necessary consequence of the particular sea damage which occurred; and the assured is entitled to recover, not in respect of the proximate consequences of the particular sea damage, but in respect of the consequences of sea damage in general. There is, however, in the present case a link wanting between the damage and the seizure by salvors, and the subsequent proceedings in the Court of Admiralty. If these facts be taken as having the effect of converting a partial loss into a total loss, we arrive at the absurd conclusion, that, if proceedings are taken for a false salvage claim, that circumstance alone would suffice to make a total loss. There is nothing here to convert the sea damage and the proceedings by salvors, so as to constitute a total loss. The cases cited by Mr. Butt, and on the authority of which he founds his argument, are easily distinguishable. In those cases there was a hostile seizure, the natural consequence of which is that the ship is taken into a foreign prize court and condemned. In such a case you have a hostile seizure to begin with, and all that follows is accessory to the fact. Those cases, therefore, do not apply to the present. Although, however, there is no total loss, there is a partial loss, or a total loss of part—whichever you may please to call it. It is, therefore, not within the policy, unless it is a general average loss (which it is not) or a loss occasioned by the stranding of the ship. It becomes, therefore, necessary to consider the question whether there was a stranding of the ship. [After stating the facts, his Lordship continued.] By reason of the distress to which the ship was reduced, she had to be laid in a place out of the ordinary course, and in a position in which she would not ordinarily be placed. It is contended on behalf of the underwriters, that upon the facts we ought to conclude that this happened in the ordinary course of things, and reliance is placed on the 13th paragraph of the case; but, considering the dangerous position the ship was in under the circumstances stated in the preceding paragraph of the case, we come to the conclusion that she was lying in an unusual place, and had been brought there under unusual circumstances; for it is not to be supposed that under ordinary circumstances a ship would take the ground in such a way as to sustain severe straining. I feel bound to concur in Sir G. Honyman's contention that the mere fact of injury having been sustained, if the ship had been beached in the ordinary course of things, would not convert a purposed settling down into a stranding; but it is impossible to help considering such damage as an element to be dealt with whether the stranding was in the ordinary course of things or not. Adopting the principle laid down by Lord Tenderden, C.J., in Wells v. Hopwood, I come to the conclusion that the beaching did amount to a stranding within the meaning of the policy. The remaining question to be dealt with is whether the defendant can set-off sums due to him for premiums. Now it is clear that this claim could not be established under the statutes set-off, nor under the ordinary law applicable to compensation; because it is a rule universally recognised that you cannot set-off liquidated against unliquidated damages, unless in a case where both arise out of the same transaction. But it is on the bankrupt laws that the defendant relies, and if the plaintiff or his assignee had been suing in his own right, the claim to a set-off would doubtless, under sect. 197 of the Bankruptcy Act 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 134), be a good one. But the plaintiff is here suing in the right of a third person, who had made advances, and therefore the bankrupt law is clearly inapplicable, because the assignee of a bankrupt only takes property of which the bankrupt can dispose, and to which he is entitled both at law and in equity. The claim, however, on which the plaintiff in this case relies is one which would not pass to the assignee in bankruptcy. It is, however, unnecessary to consider this matter further as the law is clearly laid down in Scott v. Willes, 400; and the case of Turner v. Thomas decides that the mutual credit clause only applies to the winding-up of the estate as between the bankrupt and his creditors. Our judgment must be for the plaintiff.

THE LIVER ALKALI COMPANY (LIMITED) v. JOHNSON.

Common carrier—Owner of barges—Letting same to anyone for particular voyages—Liability.

The defendant was the owner of several barges, which he was in the habit of letting out to hire to any one of the public to convey goods from the Liverpool docks to different places on the river under his own care, but he was in the habit of carrying for only one party at a time for the same voyage, and under no special contract. Under these circumstances the defendant let a barge to the plaintiffs at Liverpool to proceed some miles up the river Mersey, to a place called Widnes, and there take in a cargo of salt cake for the plaintiffs, and bring it back to Liverpool. Upon its voyage back with the cargo it was wrecked in consequence of a fog, without any negligence on the part of the defendant, and the cargo was lost:

Held, that the defendant was a common carrier, and as such liable to the plaintiffs for the value of the cargo.

This was an action brought to recover the value of a cargo of 60 tons of salt cake, of the value of 179*l.*, which was lost whilst in the barge of the defendant in the river Mersey. It appeared that the defendant was the owner of several barges, which he was in the habit of letting out to hire to anyone who chose to engage them to convey goods from the Liverpool docks to different places on the river under his care, and that he never carried the goods of more than one party at a time. There was no special agreement upon the subject between the plaintiffs and the defendant; but the defendant in the ordinary way let one of his barges to the plaintiffs to proceed to a place some miles up the river called Widnes, to take in there a cargo of salt cake and bring it back to Liverpool. Upon its voyage back to Liverpool the barge was wrecked and the cargo lost in consequence of its being run ashore during a fog. At the trial at the last summer assizes for Liverpool, before Martin, B., the jury found that there was no agreement that the defendant should be a common carrier, and also that there was no negligence on his part. A verdict was taken for the plaintiffs, with leave for the defendant to move to enter it for himself if the court should be of opinion that there was no evidence of his being "a common carrier."

A rule nisi having been obtained accordingly. Aspinall, Q.C. and T. H. James, showed cause.—The question is, whether or not the defendant was a common carrier, for if he were such he would be liable, the loss not having occurred either by the act of God or the Queen's enemies. It is not necessary to constitute a party a common carrier that he should carry to or from any fixed termini: (Lyon v. Mills, 5 East. 428.) The defendant held himself out to carry goods for anyone, though he took the goods of only one party in his barge at a time. The true criterion is laid down in Ingate v. Christie (3 Car. & Kir. 61). In that case Alderson, B., said, "Everybody who undertakes to carry for anyone who asks him is a common carrier. The criterion is, whether he carries for particular persons only, or whether he carries for everyone? If a man holds himself out to do it for everyone who asks him, he is a common carrier; but if he does not do it for everyone, but carries for you and me only, that is a matter of special contract;" and in summing up he says, "If a person holds himself out to carry goods for everyone as a business, and he thus carries from the wharves to the ships in harbour, he is a common carrier." They referred also to Bull, Q.C. and C. Russell in support of the rule.

—The facts do not show that the defendant was a common carrier; he did not hold himself out as such. In this case there was a hiring for a particular job. The defendant did not carry for the public generally. [MARTIN, B.—He carried for one person at a time, certainly, but he carried for anyone.] That is opposed to the idea of being a common carrier. The court will not fix a liability unless the evidence is clear. [BRAMWELL, B.—A common carrier is bound to carry goods for anyone if a proper sum is tendered. Would the defendant have been liable for refusing to carry?] It is submitted that he would not be liable. There is really no difference between a charter-party and this agreement. He agrees for each voyage. The defendant was to take his barge to Widnes for a particular cargo. A contract was made at Liverpool to bring down goods from a distant place. That does not constitute him a common carrier. [CLEASBY, B.—In Maving v. Todd (1 Star 72) it was held that the liability of a wharfinger who undertakes to carry goods from his wharf to the vessel in his own lighter is similar to that of a carrier. That, in principle, is very like this case.] They cited also

Pope v. Nickerson, 3 Story, 465;

Cave v. Tirrell, 9 Allen, 299 (American).

KELLY, C. B.—I must say that this is a case by no means free from difficulty; the court, however, have bestowed upon it all the consideration which it deserves, and we accede to the neat and able argument of Mr. James, and, looking at the mode in which the defendant was employed, we think that his character of a common carrier is established. It seems to be perfectly well settled that a hoyman, ferryman, and masters of ships, are, as a general rule, common carriers, and here certainly the defendant was a master of ships, and therefore comes within the definition and meaning in Coggs v. Bernard (2 Ld. Raym. p. 218.) So far then, he comes within the definition of the common law as "a common carrier." Then comes the next question: whether he came within the doctrine that to be liable, he must exercise a public employment as a carrier? and here we come to the important definition applicable to all common carriers that they must hold themselves out to be ready to carry for all such persons as may be willing to employ them. Now it does not appear that the defendant ever objected to carry for anyone who was willing to employ him, and therefore he comes within this definition. What in this case appears to be the difficulty arises from the fact that he never was in the habit of contracting to carry for more than one party at a time for the same voyage, and that such voyage was in respect of one of the public alone, and there is no instance of his having contracted to carry the goods of the public generally upon any one voyage, and the question is, whether that takes from the defendant the character of a common carrier? If the hiring of the vessel were in the nature of a charter-party, this liability would not arise, but, looking at the nature of the employment, we do not see that there is any single matter which can be assimilated to a charter-party. When the plaintiffs engaged the defendant to bring down the salt-cake, there was nothing to specify what vessel was to be employed, and in fact the cargo may have been put upon any one of the vessels belonging to the defendant. Taking, therefore, all the facts into consideration, we are of opinion that the defendant was in this instance a common carrier, and that this rule should be discharged.

IONIDES v. PENDER.

Marine policy—Unseaworthiness—Plea of—Particulars—Barratrous master—Leave to plead.

An action having been brought on a marine policy against an underwriter, the defendant obtained a Master's order granting leave to plead several matters, inter alia "That the vessel when she set sail on the insured voyage was not seaworthy for the same," upon condition that particulars of the plea should be delivered. The defendant consequently gave the following particulars, viz., "That the master of the B. when she set sail intended to scuttle the said ship on her said voyage."

Thinking that these particulars did not fulfil the condition, the Master of the court discharged his order.

Held, that, as the evidence offered in support of the plea would be limited by the particulars, the plea should be allowed.

But quære, whether the fact stated in the particulars would be admissible as proof of unseaworthiness.

RULE to show cause why an order of a Master, by which a former order giving leave to plead several matters was discharged should not be rescinded.

An action having been brought against the defendant, an underwriter, upon a marine policy of insurance on goods, commission, and profits, an application was made to a Master for leave to plead several matters, inter alia unseaworthiness, fraud, and concealment; and the required order was granted, upon condition, however, that particulars should be delivered with the plea of unseaworthiness, which was "that the vessel when she set sail on the insured voyage was not seaworthy for the same." The defendant in consequence delivered the following particulars of the plea, viz., that "the master of the B. when she set sail intended to scuttle the said ship on her said voyage."

These were, however, deemed by the Master of the court to be no such particulars as would satisfy the terms of the order, which he accordingly dismissed, and his second order discharging the first was upheld by Keating, J., at chambers; whereupon the above rule having been obtained,

F. M. White shown cause.—The particulars mean that the master had a design in his mind to scuttle the ship on the voyage. The plea limited thereby could only be good on the assumption of a warranty against a barratrous master. [HANNEN, J.—But may they not give all the particulars they can under the plea?] “Seaworthiness” includes a competent master for the ship, but not necessarily one who is free from criminal intent. Moreover, this man may have repented directly he left the port.

Watkin Williams in support of the rule.—The defendant will be bound by his particulars, and he surely has a right to put a plea of unseaworthiness on the record in case the plaintiff himself should prove that the ship was unseaworthy. It is laid down in Tait v. Levy (14 East, 481) that the master must be a fit and competent person. He would not be such if, for instance, he did not know a particular well-known port by sight, or was an habitual drunkard. And it is a breach of warranty if he is not fit and competent, for the underwriters do not undertake the risk of his unfitness. They never meant to insure a ship with this vice, which existed at the commencement of the voyage. It alters the risk entirely. [QUAIN, J.—I want some authority to show that a plea of unseaworthiness is proved by evidence of a criminal intention in the mind of the master.] There is no case supporting that precise proposition.

HANNEN, J.—We are of opinion that this rule should be made absolute. Certainly this is a case in which it makes very little difference to the real question at issue which way we decide. But I am bound to say that the view I should have taken of the matter at chambers would have been this, viz., that the defendant could not make use of the plea for any other purpose than to give evidence under it of the fact mentioned in his particulars. The plaintiff could not be damaged from its remaining as it is. Then it remained for the judge at the trial to say whether the evidence tendered would be admissible or not. The only hesitation I have in acting on that impression is that my brother Keating has affirmed the Master's order; but still I think that I, sitting here, am bound to act upon my own view of the case, which is that these particulars should be allowed to stand, leaving it for the judge at the trial to determine whether the proposed evidence is admissible. The penalty of being compelled to give particulars is that you shall not be allowed to give other evidence than of the matters contained therein. Therefore I am of opinion that the order should be rescinded.

QUAIN, J.—I am of the same opinion. Although the plea appears frivolous, yet the moment we understand that a real question is intended to be raised, it is always best that a fair plea should be allowed, which has the aspect of raising a material question. Here the case really is that there was a conspiracy to scuttle the ship. That may afford a defence to the underwriters under various aspects—loss by perils of the sea, barratry of master, &c. I think, therefore, that, under the circumstances of the case, the order should be rescinded.

Rule absolute.

NEW YORK COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

ATKINSON AND HEWITT v. THE GREAT WESTERN INSURANCE COMPANY.

Barratry—What it is—Mere negligence—Intention—Stowing cargo on deck—Jettison.

Ninety bales of cotton, insured against barratry of the masters and mariners, were stowed upon deck, and were jettisoned in a storm. Before the ship sailed, one of her agents discovered that the captain was stowing cotton on deck, and opposed it, and desired him to send the cotton by another vessel. He advised the captain of the responsibility he was assuming, and told him substantially that, as he had signed clear bills of lading, he was bound, either to carry the cotton under deck, or to provide for it on deck by extra insurance, and that the insurance taken on a clear bill of lading would not cover cotton on deck. The captain, notwithstanding this remonstrance, continued to stow the cotton upon deck. This, it was contended, amounted to barratry, as “an act of wrong done by the master against the ship and goods.” But the court Held that it did not amount to barratry.

All the authorities on the law relating to barratry elaborately reviewed (a).

DALY, C.J. delivered the judgment of the court.—Among the risks insured against was a barratry of the master and mariners, and the question presented in this case is, whether the ninety bales of cotton were lost through an act which the law would denominate barratry on the part of the master. These ninety bales were stowed upon deck, and were jettisoned in a storm. They were a part of 202 bales covered by the policy, which, by the plaintiff's order, were shipped from Augusta, Georgia, to Charleston, South Carolina, by railroad, thence to be shipped to Liverpool by the barque Victoria, the master giving a clear bill of lading for the 202 bales, the plaintiff's agent having engaged freight for the whole by that vessel. For want of room in the Victoria the captain sent seventy-seven of the bales by another vessel, the Albert, which arrived safely in Liverpool. Thirty of the bales were stowed in the hold of the Victoria, and the remaining ninety were carried upon her deck, and in a violent storm were thrown overboard for the preservation of the vessel. Before the Victoria sailed, a merchant in

(a) There can be little doubt that the word barratry must be taken to include dishonesty, embracing in that term a wilfully wrongful act which does not amount to crime. We should state the principle thus:—Barratry is the unlawful, fraudulent, or dishonest act of the master or mariners by whatever motive induced causing damage to the owner of the ship or goods. According to the French law the term includes fraud, negligence, unskillfulness, and mere imprudence. The German law holds the underwriter responsible for “risk of dishonesty or default of any member of the crew so far as a loss may thereby be entailed upon the insurer: (Germ. Merc. Code, Art. 824, cl. 6). The Americans consider that barratry covers non-feasance, as in failing to prevent an act injurious to the owners, gross and culpable negligence, and gross misconduct. It is hardly possible, in view of the decisions, to say that barratry in the English law covers negligence, even though it be gross, although it would be easy to put cases in which gross neglect amounts to dishonesty as against the insured. The tendency of our law is, however, in favour of the American and Continental interpretation.

AMERICAN REPS.] ATKINSON AND HEWITT v. THE GREAT WESTERN INSURANCE CO. [AMERICAN REPS.]

Charleston, whose firm was acting as agents for the vessel, discovered that the captain was stowing cotton on deck, opposed it, and wanted him to send the cotton by another vessel. He advised the captain of the responsibility he was assuming, and told him substantially that, as he had signed clear bills of lading, he was bound either to carry the cotton under deck, or to provide for it on deck by extra insurance,—that the insurance taken on a clear bill of lading would not cover cotton on deck; but the captain, notwithstanding this remonstrance, continued to stow the cotton upon deck. This, it is claimed, amounted to barratry on the part of the master, within the legal meaning of that term, in the comprehensive sense in which it has been defined by Lord Hardwicke, as “an act of wrong done by the master against the ship and goods.” Lewin v. Suasso, Portleth Dict. Assurance, which is commended by Arnould as the tersest and perhaps best definition of the word. (Arnould on Insurance, 821, note h.) This definition of Lord Hardwicke is too general to be of much practical value in determining whether the act of the captain in stowing the ninety bales of cotton upon deck, without providing for the increased peril by extra insurance, was or was not barratry. It was an act of negligence for which he or the owner of the ship may have been responsible, and in that sense was a wrong to the goods or the ship within the language of Lord Hardwicke; but it does not necessarily follow from this that it was what the law denominates barratry. What was said by Lord Hardwicke, moreover, has not the weight of a decision. It was but a general observation. The question in the case was, not whether barratry had been committed, for the captain there was the general owner of the ship, which he had bottomried and mortgaged, but of which he had the control and navigation, and the point determined by the court, so far as can be gathered from the imperfect report of the case in an elementary work, was that the owner of a ship could not, either at law or in equity, be guilty of a barratry concerning the ship. In the solution of the question before us, therefore, we must look beyond this definition to get a clear idea of the exact legal meaning of barratry, and the inquiry is by no means an easy one, for the question is one that has greatly perplexed the courts, and from what has been said respecting it, in comparatively recent cases, the meaning of it has become nearly as uncertain now as when the question was first agitated in Westminster Hall one hundred and fifty years ago. It was first considered by the English courts in 1724, in the case of Knight v. Cambridge, reported in 8 Modern Rep. 230, afterwards in 2 Ld. Raym. 1349, and again in Strange, 841. In the first report, in 8 Modern Rep., the court is put down as saying that “Barratry is a word of more extended signification than only to include the master’s running away with the ship; it may well include the loss of his ship by his fraud or negligence;” but in the second edition of the volume it is stated in the margin, that fraud or negligence would not have been good; but this was afterwards omitted in the fifth edition, known as the corrected and standard one of the Modern Reports. In Lord Raymond’s report of the case, which is a very brief one, he states that the ground was taken that, as the owner of the goods has his remedy against the owner of the ship for any prejudice he receives through the fraud or negligence of the master, there is the less reason that the insurer should also be liable to him for the act, as an act of barratry, and that if barratry imports fraud, it does not import neglect; the allegation having been that the ship was lost through the fraud and neglect of the master; a point which the court met by saying, “Barratry imports fraud, and he that commits a fraud may properly be said to be guilty of a neglect, viz.: of his duty:” “to which the court added the general observation that barratry was not confined to the running away with the ship “because it imports any fraud.” The report in Strange is still more brief, but if correct, more important, because it states that the objection taken was, that the allegation fraud and negligence of the master was more general than the word barratry, and was, therefore, not within the policy, and that the court said: “The negligence certainly is not but the fraud is.” . . . It further appears in respect to this case, from the argument of Buller, J., and the statement of Lord Mansfield in Vallejo v. Wheeler, Cowp. 143. that the act of the master in Knight v. Cambridge was sailing without paying the port duties, which Buller argued might have been by accident as well as by design, but which, as it subjected the ship to forfeiture, was held to be barratry. Lord Ellenborough afterwards referred to a manuscript note of Mr. Ford, in respect to the question in this case of Knight v. Cambridge, which, after stating that fraud was barratry, added: “If the master sail out of the port without paying port duties, whereby the goods are forfeited, lost or spoiled, that is barratry.” This, Lord Ellenborough thought, was probably the question decided upon the trial, and at the argument, (Earle v. Rowcroft, 8 East, 126), and the act of the captain may possibly have been regarded as coming under the category of fraud, upon the ground that the design or effect of it was to defraud the government of the port duties. The next case was Stamma v. Brown (Strange, 1173), on which it was held, that a deviation from the voyage by the master for the benefit of the owners was not barratry, although it led to the destruction of the ship and the loss of the goods insured, the court holding, according to the report in Strange, that to make it barratry, there must be something of a criminal nature, as well as a breach of contract. In a further account of this case, it is stated that Lee, C.J., defined barratry to be “some breach of trust in the captain, ex maleficio,” and said (it being a policy upon goods) “barratry must be ex maleficio with intent to destroy, waste, or embezzle the goods,” per Lord Ellenborough in Earle v. Rowcroft (sup.). The next case was Elton v. Brogden (Strange, 1264), in which the crew compelled the captain to return contrary to his orders. It was held that this was not barratry for two reasons. 1. That the act of the master was excused by the force which he could not resist. And 2. Because the ship was not run away with to defraud the owners. This was followed in 1774, by Vallejo v. Wheeler, reported in Cowp. 143, and more fully in Lofft. 631, in which the legal meaning of the word was elaborately discussed; the argument of Alleyn for the plaintiff, as reported in Lofft, being especially distinguished for its research and learning. In the first case (Knight v. Cambridge, sup.) the court said that barratry came from barat, signifying fraus and dolus (fraud and deceit), for which it would seem, from the marginal note, the court relied upon the glossary of Dufresne and Du Cange, and the French dictionary of Furetiere

In the succeeding case of Stamma v. Brown, sup., the plaintiff's counsel cited in support of the same meaning the Italian and Spanish dictionaries, respectively, of Florio and Minshew, and in support of these lexicographers, Alleyn, in Vallejo v. Wheeler, cited this definition from Ferriere's Dictionnaire de Jurisprudence. "Barratrie en terme de marine est un tromperie ou une malversation qui se commet par patron ou capitaine d'un vaisseau, pour faire perdre les marchandises à ceux à qui elles appartiennent." The following from Savary's Dictionnaire de Commerce: "Barratrie de patron en terme de commerce et marchandise veut dire les larcins, les desguisemens et alterations, des marchandise, qui peuvent causer le maître et l'equipage d'un vaisseau, et generalement tout les supercheries et malversations qui si mettent souvent en usage, pour tromper les marchand, chargeur et autres qui out intérêt au vaisseau," and gave this definition of this word from Denisart's Collection de Decisions Nouvelles, etc., relatives a la Jurisprudence; a work which had been published but some two or three years before in Paris: "Ce mot signifie malversation et tromperie par un capitaine ou patron de navire marchand, dans ce que a rapport a la qualité et a la quantité des marchandises." He also claimed that it meant deceit or malversation in the master, in the Ordinances of Louis XIV., article 28, and showed that the Ordinances of Rotterdam, number 43, and of Copenhagen, number 38, distinguished between barratry and neglect. Lord Mansfield, in delivering the judgment of the court, declared that the previous English cases did not afford any precise definition of what barratry was; that the nature of it had not been judicially considered or defined in England with accuracy, and then undertook to inquire into the etymology of the word, which ended by his leaving that inquiry no farther advanced than he found it. Aston, J., however, so far from agreeing with Lord Mansfield, expressed his astonishment that there should then be any doubt as to what was meant by barratry, and declared, as his language is reported in Cowper, that it "comprehended every species of fraud, knavery, or criminal conduct, in the master, by which the owners or freighters are injured," and still more strongly as his words are given in Lofft: "I think it (barratry) has always been the same in idea and general meaning, though differing in terms and not always settled in practice, deceit, villainy, knavery, and fraud," and the entire court united in the opinion that it is barratry where a master goes out of his course for the purpose of smuggling for his own benefit, in the course of which deviation the vessel and cargo are injured. The authorities referred to in this case by Mr. Alleyn show that as barratry was then understood in France, it meant, in general terms, fraud and malversation. But Emerigon, whose work was published some few years after this case was decided, gives it, at least in France, a much more extended signification. He says that it commonly implies the crime of which a captain is guilty in being faithless or treasonable to his office; that every fault into which a captain falls is not barratry, unless accompanied by deceit or fraud; but then, as contradistinguished from this general rule, he adds, still, among us (the French), it comprises the case of simple faults, as well as that of fraud, and relies upon Valin and Pothier for the statement that in addition to all kinds of fraud, it embraces simple imprudence, want of care or unskilfulness, either in the master or the crew (Emerigon by Meredith, p. 292). Boulay-Paty, in his edition of Emerigon, t. 1, p. 370, says, that the commissioners of the French Commercial Code intended by barratry only wilful infidelity, or treason to his duty, on the part of the master, or the seaman, but that the Cour Royale of Rennes decided that custom had given the word a more extended meaning, and that it included simple faults. If such a change has been brought about in France by custom since the adoption of the Code de Commerce in 1807, it has not been the case in this country nor in England, and with us the inquiry as to the meaning of the term is embarrassed by no such consideration. On looking into the authorities, moreover, to which Emerigon refers, I doubt if the question has ever been examined as carefully in France as it has been in England, and the custom referred to has probably grown up from the impressions conveyed by the observations of Valin, Pothier, and Emerigon, writers who gathered their idea of barratry chiefly, if not exclusively, from what is found respecting it in Le Guidon de la Mer, ch. V., § 6, ch. IX., the unknown author of which compilation had not very clear ideas about it, as Pardessus has pointed out (Us. et Coutumes de la Mer, t. 2, p. 406, a 1, 3, edit. 1847). Pardessus' criticism of the first and third articles of the ninth chapter of Le Guidon being, that the author considers as barratry accidents or events (evenements) in which there is not and cannot be any fault in the master, by drawing a distinction between barratry on his part, which is obligatory (forcé) or voluntary (volontaire), a distinction which the learned commentator declares to be absurd, and as demonstrating that the author did not himself understand the subject on which he was speaking. The passages in Le Guidon respecting barratry, upon which Emerigon, Valin, and Pothier rely, are, even in the amended text of Pardessus, exceedingly obscure. They may be rendered in English substantially as follows: "Barat or Baraterie; changes or alterations by the master; changes which he makes in the vessel or the voyage; deviations, by going to other ports, places, or havens; malversations, robberies, larcenies, alterations, disguising the merchandise, all proceeding from the negligence of the master, or the crew; of which the insurer takes the risk, and indemnifies the insured; with the understanding, however, that if the owner, or his factor, is in a place where he can have justice, it shall be his duty, in the first instance, to proceed against the master, that the damage may be lessened out of the freight before he addresses himself to the insurer" (Ch. IX.) "On the other hand, if it is found that the loss or injury was caused from defects in the ship, as if the stays or hatches were not well fastened or caulked; or the vessel was not staunch from the want of repair, and through that cause the water entered and destroyed or injured the merchandise, the master bears the loss, which is to be deducted from the freight, without the insurer or the merchandise contributing. And, generally, the master is answerable for all which arises from his fault, or that of the ship, if he have wherewith to pay, or where the loss did not exceed the freight. If it exceeds, and he has not the means to make restitution, the insured is held to diligence by the law of Baraterie of the Master, and must make it appear that he did all in his power before he can come upon the insurer" (Ch. V, § 6; Cleuiac, Rouen, 1671, pp. 213, 244). In the early commerce of the Mediterranean and the Baltic, as will appear from numerous passages in the Consolato del Mare and in other primitive maritime codes, the master and the ship were answerable for loss or injury to goods, arising from negligence or other culpable cause. And where he was not an owner of the vessel, which he commonly was, in whole, or in part, he was answerable for injuries to it through his fault. After the practice of marine insurance came into use in the thirteenth century, it was, in some of the maritime cities, customary to hold the insurer responsible for such losses, and in others it was not. And where the insurer was responsible, the practice was, no doubt, as stated in Le Guidon, that he was answerable only where the owner, after due diligence, was unable to obtain indemnity from the master. Magens, the author of the earliest English treatise upon the law of insurance, published in 1755, after referring to a policy made in Florence in 1523, and another made in Ancona in 1567, under which the insurer was answerable for the barratry of the master, and after pointing out the regulations upon the subject in the ordinances of Stockholm and Amsterdam, and that such a liability existed in the policies which were then, in 1755, made in London and in Antwerp, gives it as his opinion that the insurers are not answerable, under a barratry clause, for the small pilferings or extraordinary leakages proceeding from bad casks, or where the injury to the goods arises from bad stowage, or by their being put in a place exposed to wet, or from a deficiency in caulking of the decks, or otherwise (1 Magens, p. 75, 76, 50), showing that, at that time, negligence of this description was not barratry. In this connection, however, he refers (p. 51, vol. 1), to an ordinance of Florence, in 1523, which declared, that if the goods are stowed on deck with the permission of the insured, then the insurers are not answerable for the damages; but if the master stowed them on deck without the leave of the owner, or of the person who made the insurance, then the insurers shall be obliged to pay, and may have their redress against the master; which is substantially the case now before us. He refers also to another provision in the same ordinance, which he says declares that the insurer shall first pay and afterward go to law. The liability of the insurer in this early Florentine ordinance is predicated upon the remedy which it is therein recognised he had against the master, after paying the insurance; but the existence of any such remedy, under the system of law prevailing at the present day, there being no privity of contract between the insurer and the master, is denied by the elementary writers upon the law of insurance: (2 Phillips on Insurance, 2003.) Lord Kenyon, in a Nisi Prius case (Bird v. Thompson, 1 Esp. 339), thought that the insurers might maintain an action against the master when the loss paid by them was occasioned by his barratry. He admitted, however, that he "knew of no action of that sort ever having been brought," and it has been decided in several well-considered cases, that no such action can be maintained by the insurer against the incendiary, to recover for the loss paid upon a fire policy, or to recover from the person whose negligence caused the death, the loss paid upon a life policy, cases certainly analogous in principle: (Rockingham Insurance Co. v. Boshier, 39 Me. 253; Connecticut Ins. Co. v. The New York and New Haven R. R. Co., 25 Conn. 265.) Valin, in his commentary upon the ordinance of Louis XIV, infers that loss or injury arising from any fault or negligence in the master is barratry, and there is certainly a foundation for that construction in the very general language of the twenty-eighth article of that ordinance, and the opinion of Pothier is to the same effect. But it is to be borne in mind that when Valin wrote his commentary, the maritime law in France had fallen into great neglect (Reddie's Historical View of the Law of Maritime Commerce, part 4, ch. 4, § 6), and that Pothier, by his own admission, had given but little attention to maritime law, indeed, so little, that his inexperience, in the opinion of his editor, Estrangin, involved him in gross and palpable errors: (Meredith's Introduction to Emerigon, XIII, XXII, XXVI.) When the full meaning of a word is obscure, and the extent to which it can be applied doubtful, the proper course is to inquire into its origin and history, which, if ascertainable, will disclose its exact and full meaning; for, etymology frequently sheds light where all other sources of inquiry fail. This no one of these eminent French writers attempted. Indeed, Emerigon knew so little respecting the term, that he speaks of it as a barbarous word, unknown to antiquity. In fact, such an inquiry at that time was difficult. Park, writing at the close of the last century said: "The derivations of barratry have rather tended to confound than to throw any light upon the subject; for its root has been so frequently altered, according to the caprice of the particular writer, that it is impossible to decide which is the true one:" (Park on Insurance, ch. 5.) This is rather an exaggerated statement. The previous inquiries in England had mainly been in the right direction, and the embarrassment was not so great as Park supposed, while the advances that have since been made in philological inquiries will enable us to trace the word to its origin, and to show that the English tribunals have been right in the construction they have put upon it, and that the French jurists have expressed opinions upon insufficient information. It came into use in England after the Conquest, as an Anglo-Norman word, signifying strife, contention or wrangling; being in that sense, as I infer, directly derived from an old French word barrate, signifying the tossing up and down of the contents in a churn (Cotgraves' French and English Dictionary, London, 1632), and was used in that sense by early English writers in several forms, barratt, barret, barrette: (Boucher's Glossary; Coleridge's Dictionary of Old English Words; Kelham's Norman Dictionary; Wright's Provincial Dictionary. It had also the further meaning of deceit and fraud, from another old French word barat, signifying deceit, trickery, or cheating, and which, like the other French word barrate, came from a common origin. From these sources, two words came ultimately into use in England, barratry and barrator, and Coke, in defining barrator, has left us a very clear idea of the legal meaning of both words. He is, says Coke, "a mover, stirrer up and maintainer of strife in three ways: 1. In disturbing the peace. 2. In taking or detaining the possession of houses, lands, or goods, which are in controversy, by craft or deceit. 3. By sowing calumnies, etc., whereby discord ariseth between neighbours:" (Case of Barratry, 8 Co.

366.) We have here both meanings, strife and contention, and deceit or fraud, growing out of the compound origin and synonymous use of the word. Indeed, in the sense of strife and contention, it was used in connection with policies of insurance as late even as the middle of the last century. Kersey, in his edition, in 1707, of Phillips' New World of Words, gives, as the sole definition of barratry, "a word that is used in policies of insurance for ships, signifying dissensions and quarrels among the officers and seamen," and Martin, in his English Dictionary of 1748, says, barratry "in insurance, signifies dissensions and quarrels among officers and seamen." But Kersey, who published a dictionary of his own between these periods, incorporates it simply as a law term as follows: "Barratry (L. T.), when the master of a ship cheats the owners or insurers, either by running away with the ship or embezzling their goods:" (Kersey's Dictionary, 3rd edit. 1721.) In the succeeding and fuller work of Bailey, it is given as a term in commerce, thus: "Barratry, barretry (in commerce), is the master of a ship cheating the owners or insurers, either by running away with the ship, sinking of her, or embezzling the cargo" (Bailey's Dictionary, folio of 1736), and this exposition of its meaning has been substantially followed by the lexicographers to the present time. Ash, in his dictionary of 1755, succinctly defines it as "the crime of the shipmaster who cheats the owners," and Webster, in a more elaborate definition, limits it to a fraudulent breach of duty, a wilful act of illegality or breach of trust, with dishonest views, by the master or mariners, to the injury of owners of the cargo or ship, without the consent of the party injured: (Webster's Quarto Dictionary, 1864.) How the same words came to express things so distinguishable from each other, as strife or quarrelling, and deceit or fraud, is explainable by its origin and history. The root or parent is to be found in the Sanscrit Bharat, meaning war (Haughton's Sanscrit Dict., Lond. 1833.) From this was formed in the Sanscrit another word Bharatar, meaning an act which is a trespass against morals or justice, or an unjust or immoral action (id.), probably used in its first formation to designate an unjust war, and which afterwards acquired in the Sanscrit a more general signification; both of which words have survived and are now in use in modern Hindustani; the latter slightly modified in form, bhaari, barhi, burai, and with other words formed from it, as bharam, bharamani, but retaining in their various forms the same general signification, which may be illustrated by a word now in very general use in India, barakat, evil (Forbes' English and Hindustani Dict.; Shakespear's Hindustani and English Dict.). These two primitive words, Bharat and Bharata, with significations more or less equivalent, are to be found in some form or other, in the tongues of all the nations of the Indo-European group, that derive their language from this parent source. Thus barathrum, both in the Greek and in the Latin, was the name of the pit into which the condemned criminals were thrown, and, as a word for pit, dungeon, or the infernal regions, became barathro in the Spanish, and the Portuguese, and baratro in the Italian. In the Latin barratus was the tumultuous shout of the Roman or German armies when about to engage (Cole's Latin and English Dict., London, 1679; Andrew's Latin Lexicon, baritus.) In the earliest forms of the tongues that prevailed in France barat was the word in general use for deceit, cheating, decoying, finesse, and trickery, and in this sense was incorporated in the form of the prayer used by the penitents in the churches in asking forgiveness (Du Cange and Dufresne's Glossarium, Paris, 1773; Menage Dict. Etymologique de la Langue Française, Paris, 1750). In old Armorican it meant perfidy (Necot. Dict. François Latin, Paris, 1573; Menage id.). In old Breton, barad was the word for treason (Pelletier Dict. Breton, Paris, 1752.) In Provençal barat, baratel, and baratie, are all words signifying deceit or deception (Roquefort Glossaire de la Langue Romane, Paris, 1808; Honnorat, Dict. Provençal, Paris, 1846). The same word in many forms, was in extensive use throughout Europe in the middle ages, at the fairs, and in the rude commerce of the Mediterranean. In the Basque it was barata; in the old Castilian baraja; in the Spanish barato and barata; in the Portuguese barata, barateria, and in the Italian baratta. In all these languages barat or some word formed from it by a change in the termination, meant strife, contention, or quarrelling, confusion or disorder, intentional wrong, deceit, cheating, maliciousness, and also bartering and selling. It was used in the fairs, as a word descriptive of the strife, noise and contention that existed in bartering and trying to get the advantage in exchanging one commodity for another, which was the early mode of trading, and as these noisy marts gave rise to a great deal of the deception, trickery, and cheating, that may be practised in trade, this word came to be applied also to denote dishonesty in dealing. Thus, we have in the Italian of the period a series of words, expressing a like to struggle, to contend, to cheat, to deceive, to barter, to exchange, &c., such as barratta, barare, baratto, baratare, barateria, baramento, &c., and the same peculiarity existed in the Spanish, in the Portuguese, and in the French. Menage relates that there was a cattle fair near Lyons in France, called the fair of Char-Barat, char denoting dear or high-priced, and barat to cheat; which name, he says, was applied to it because those who cheated at that fair were not obliged by its regulations to return the animals. (Menage, Dictionnaire Etymologique, &c., barat.) The Italian abounds in offshoots of this word of like import, such as barattiere, corruption barratare, a briber or bribe taker; baratator, an impostor, barro, one who cheats at cards; baro, a knave, and the Spanish is equally fruitful of words from it of the same kind (Taboado, Dic. Espagnol, &c. Paris, 1838; Velasquez Spanish Dictionary; Baretti's Italian Dictionary). In fact, the curious result of this inquiry is, what has frequently been proved in the history of language, that this word, with an origin so remote, has, during so many ages, in the different countries through which it has passed, and amid the many changes in its form, tenaciously adhered to the general signification of the two parent words out of which it sprung. It was first used as a marine term in the Basque; at least the first form of it in that sense, which I have been able to discover, is in that tongue now one of the oldest languages in Europe. In the Basque bara-baratu signified delaying a vessel, abandoning her, seizing and giving her over, together with all that followed therefrom, and baratugaldu, stranding, sinking, or scuttling her (Don

Pio De Zuaga Dec, by De Larramendi, San Sebastian, 1853). In the Basque, the original word was barata, very little, if at all, changed from the original word in the Sanscrit bharata, and the above compounds were formed from it. The Basque or Biscayans were, from a very early period, distinguished as a maritime people, whose power and whose language, at one time, extended across the whole of the north of Spain, from the Bay of Biscay to the Mediterranean, and the Spanish word barar, which has the same general marine signification, was, according to the Spanish lexicographers, derived from these compound Basque words (De Zuaga, id.). From barar, therefore, and from barata, which has long been and still is in use in Spanish, came, as I suppose, the Spanish word barateria, the meaning of which is best expressed in the Spanish definition of it. La perdida causada á los duenos de un barco, ó sus aseguradores por dolo ó malicia del capitán ó tripulacion (Velasquez)—the loss or damage sustained by the owners of a ship, or insurers by the fraud, deceit, artifice, or wickedness of the captain or the crew. It was probably formed and first used in Catalonia, in connection with insurance, for the Catalan and the Castilian, the languages of Catalonia, have an admixture of Basque words, and the earliest laws respecting insurance that we know of are found in the ordinances of Barcelona, a Catalonian city, that carried on an extensive maritime commerce with the south of France and with the countries of the east, from the tenth to the sixteenth centuries; having a judicial tribunal exclusively devoted to the consideration of questions of maritime law and usage (Reddie's Historical View of the Law of Maritime Commerce). And the word, in its marine sense, does not appear, as far as I can find, to have been in the early Italian or French dictionaries. In Lockyer v. Offley (1 T. R. 269), Willes, J. who delivered the unanimous opinion of the court, after stating that many definitions of barratry were to be found in the books, said: "Perhaps this general one may comprehend all cases. Barratry is every species of fraud or knavery in the masters of ships by which the freighters or owners have been injured." In the succeeding case of Nutt v. Bourdieu (1 T. R. 323) Lord Mansfield declared that barratry must partake of something criminal, and that it must be committed against the owner of the vessel either by the master or the mariners. In Havelock v. Hancill (3 T. R. 277). Lord Kenyon simply held that when the master in defiance of his duty took on board certain commodities which subjected the ship to seizure, it was barratry, and in Ross v. Hunter (4 T. R. 35), it was decided that it was barratry where the master, after having deviated from his course, left the vessel for a fraudulent purpose and was never heard of afterwards; there being ground for believing that the vessel had been lost. Buller, J. in that case said "barratry was a question of law arising out of facts," that it was well settled, and was in one sense of the word "a deviation by the captain for fraudulent purposes of his own," and that that was "the distinction between deviation, as it was generally used, and barratry." This observation of Buller, J. is important, if the distinction made by him is a correct one, as it tends to show that negligence merely is not barratry. Deviation in the law of insurance, in its general sense, is any change or varying of the risk, without necessity or just cause, by which the risk is enhanced (Phillips on Insurance, sects. 977, 979, 460, 984.) It means voluntary acts or acts of neglect, not arising from necessity or just cause, and if it does not come within this exception, it is wholly immaterial with what motive the act is done, which is a deviation or a departure; for if, after the risk is assumed, it is enhanced, or varied, the deviation discharges the policy. This is what Buller, J. refers to when he speaks of "deviation as it is generally used," and the case now before us is a familiar illustration of deviations of this kind, which discharges the policy; for it is well settled that the exposure of the goods in a greater degree to the perils of the sea, by stowing them upon the deck, is an enhancement of the risk which discharges the underwriter, unless he is notified of it before the risk, or it is provided for in the policy, or the article is one that is generally so carried, or must be from its character: Lennox v. United States Insurance Company, 3 Johns. Ch. 178; Taunton Copper Company v. Merchants' Insurance Company, 22 Pick. 108; Smith v. Mississippi Fire and Marine Insurance Company, 11 La. 142; Brooks v. The Oriental Insurance Company, 7 Pick. 259; Blackett v. The Royal Exchange Assurance Company, 2 Crompt. & Jer. 250; Crechy v. Holly, 14 Wend. 25; Phillips on Insurance, ss. 460 and 985) Now the stowing of the cotton upon deck by the master of the Victoria, would not within Buller, J.'s distinction, be barratry, unless it was done by him for some fraudulent purpose of his own, and of this there is no pretence, nor anything at least in the evidence that would warrant us in assuming it. In Moss v. Byron (6 T. R. 379), cruising by the master of an armed merchantman for prizes contrary to the orders of his owner, was held to be barratry for the reason that, if any loss or accident had happened to the ship during that time, the owners would have been liable to the freighters. It is not, however, a very satisfactory case, nor very well reasoned. A much more important one is Phyn v. The Royal Exchange Assurance Company (7 T. R. 505), for there the entire Bench, Lord Kenyon and Ashurst, Gorse, and Lawrence, J.J., held, that there must be fraud to constitute barratry. Each judge expressed himself to that effect, and the point may be said to have been directly involved, for it was a deviation from the vessel's course, either from ignorance, negligence, or other cause, which led to her capture, and Lord Kenyon told the jury, that it could not be barratry without a fraudulent purpose in the captain at the time, and he left that question, the existence or not of a fraudulent purpose, to the jury, who found that the deviation was owing to ignorance or something else, but that it was not fraudulent; and the court unanimously refused to disturb the verdict. Lord Ellenborough, in the case already cited (Earle v. Rowcroft, 8 East-126), gave as the result of the preceding cases, and what he evidently meant to be a definition, "that a fraudulent breach of duty by the master in respect to the owners, or a breach of duty in respect to his owners with a criminal intent or ex maleficio, is barratry," and in a subsequent case said, "that the term was large enough to include every species of fraud or malus dolus committed by the master." (Boehm v. Combe, 2 M. & Selw. 172.) While in Todd v. Ritchie (Stark, 240). in which the vessel having sprung a leak, put into the Bay of Gospie, where the master, before any survey had taken place, broke up her ceiling and bows with crowbars, by which the ship was much injured and weakened—an act relied upon as having been done to procure the condemnation of the vessel, and therefore amounting to barratry, Lord Ellenborough said: "In order to constitute barratry, which is a crime, the captain must be proved to have acted against his better judgment," and added "as the case stands there is a whole ocean between you and barratry." This, however, was a Nisi Prius case. The facts are not very fully reported, and, without knowing how the case stood upon the evidence, it is not possible to know the exact reasons upon which he relied for nonsuiting the plaintiff. This discrimination is the more necessary, as there are two other cases decided by this eminent judge which can scarcely be reconciled with this case in Starkie. In Heyman v. Parish (2 Camp. 140), the captain, contrary to his orders, sailed in a foul wind having before refused to sail when the wind was fair. He disobeyed the instructions of the pilot, and an anchor having been got out, to prevent the ship from going on shore he cut the cable and allowed the vessel to drift upon the rocks. Lord Ellenborough said, "that, upon this evidence, it was a clear case of barratry," and Parke, for the defendant, having suggested that there did not appear to be any fraud, Lord Ellenborough replied that that was not necessary; that it had been decided that a gross malversation by the captain in his office is barratrous. In the other case (Pipon v. Cole, 1 Camp. 434), the vessel was seized in consequence of the mariners smuggling goods on board; and although this was done without the knowledge of the master, Lord Ellenborough held that it was a clear case of gross negligence on his part; that it was his duty to have prevented the repeated acts of smuggling by the seamen; that, by neglecting to do so, he had allowed the risk to be materially enhanced, and, by doing so, had discharged the underwriters. This case would seem to have given rise to the impression that, if the loss arises through an act of gross negligence on the part of the captain, it is barratry: (The Patapsco Insurance Company v. Coulter, 3 Pet. U. S. 234; Lawton v. The Sun Mutual Insurance Company, 2 Cush. 500; Park on Insurance, 84, 2 Am. edit.), and as the correctness of this will be hereafter considered, it may be well here to distinguish precisely what was decided in this case which was this: that a master of a vessel cannot recover the insurance under a policy containing a barratry clause, where the loss arose through barratrous acts of the mariners, which might have been prevented by a proper exercise of vigilance on his part. It will not be necessary to follow consecutively the succeeding English cases, for they all conform substantially to the exposition of barratry given in the decisions that have been examined. The last of these, however, is a very important one (Grill v. General Iron Screw Collier Company, 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 362; 3 Id. 77; Eng. L. Rep. 1 C. P. 600; in error, 3 Id. 476; 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 711; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 485), for there a collision arose from the steersman of a vessel starboarding the helm, contrary to the regulations of the Merchant Shipping Act (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), although the statute declared that if any damage should arise from the non-observance of the regulations, it should "be deemed to have been occasioned by the wilful default of the person in charge of the deck of the ship," the court held that this was not a loss arising from barratry. That it did not appear what was the extent of the default in improperly starboarding the helm, which may have been anything from simple negligence to actual malfeasance; that there was therefore no proof of barratry but for the statute, and that the statute was not passed to decide such questions, but merely to regulate ships and the rights of shipowners, as between themselves. This case may be regarded as distinctly excluding from barratry what the law denominates negligence, for the judge, at the trial, left it to the jury to say whether the collision which caused the loss of the goods was occasioned by the negligence of the defendant's crew, and the jury found specially that there was negligence on the part of the defendant's vessel. As barratry was among the excepted perils in the bill of lading, the defendants insisted that it was error in the judge not to distinguish in this case between ordinary and gross negligence, upon the assumption, as I infer, that if the collision arose from gross negligence it was barratry, a loss for which the defendants were not answerable. But the court refused to disturb the verdict upon any such ground, holding that gross in connection with negligence was a mere word of description and not a definition, and that no meaning could be attached to it in connection with the case before the court. Lloyd against the same defendants (3 H. & Colt. 284), was a case arising also out of the same collision, which came before the Court of Exchequer upon the pleadings. The averment in the declaration there was that the collision and consequent injury was caused by and through the gross carelessness, negligence, mismanagement, and improper conduct of the defendants, their servants and mariners; an averment upon which the defendants replied, avowing that the loss was within the excepted perils, one of which was "barratry of masters or mariners;" but the court held in effect, that it was an averment of a loss by negligence and not by barratry. Bramwell, J. distinguishing that there might be wilful negligence and yet not barratrous: that barratry implies a secret and fraudulent act against which the shipowner cannot guard; whereas negligence may be prevented by employing a skillful master and proper mariners. The cases in our own State are to the same effect. In Grimm v. The Phoenix Insurance Company (13 Johns. 451), the vessel being, as the case now before us, fully laden, thirty-six kegs of gunpowder were stowed in the cabin, close up to the companion way, the plank of which toward the binnacle being but half an inch thick, and the plank of the binnacle but an inch thick. The candle in the binnacle, having burnt down to the socket on a stormy night, and the socket being too hot to put another candle in it immediately, a seaman, as it was blowing hard at the time, stuck the candle temporarily against the side of the binnacle, which, within twenty minutes, set the binnacle on fire, and before the fire could be extinguished, the vessel blew up, killing every one on board, except one passenger. Here there was negligence on the part of the master in stowing the gunpowder close up to the companion way adjoining the binnacle, where a lighted candle was kept constantly throughout the night, and gross carelessness in the seaman, whose act was the proximate cause of the destruction of the vessel. The negligence of the master in that case was of the same general character as the negligence of the master in this. It was an act of improper stowage, and was, like the negligence in this case, the remote, though not the direct, cause of the loss; the direct cause here being the jettison, and there the fire. Barratry was one of the perils insured against, and it was claimed that the negligence there established, as it is claimed that the negligence here establishes, a loss by barratry. Indeed, that case was even stronger than this, for there the negligence of the mariner co-operated with the previous negligence of the captain in bringing about the loss. But the court said that it was "impossible to consider the negligence by which the loss was occasioned as amounting to barratry;" that it was "well settled that an act to be barratrous must be done with a fraudulent intent or ex maleficio. In The American Insurance Company v. Bryan (26 Wend. 578), Senator Verplanck said, that barratry must mean, and include all fraud, knavery, breach of trust, or other criminal conduct of the master or mariners, whereby the owner or freighter suffers loss or the subject insured is destroyed;" and Chancellor Kent, in his Commentaries, defines it, to the same effect, but more precisely, as meaning "fraudulent conduct on the part of the master, in his character as master, or of the mariners, to the injury of the owner, and without his consent, and includes every breach of trust committed with dishonest views;" (3 Kent's Com. 4th edit. 305). It is clearly deducible from these cases that a loss arising from what in law is denominated negligence, is not barratry. But Johnson, J. declared, in The Palapso Insurance Company v. Coulter (3 Pet. U. S. 234), that negligence itself, when gross, is evidence of barratry. Park, in his work on insurance, says that any act of the master or mariners, which is grossly negligent, tending to their own benefit to the prejudice of the owner of the ship, and without their consent and privity, is barratry: (Park on Insurance, 2nd Am. edit. 84) Show, C.J. says, in Lawton v. The Mutual Insurance Company (2 Cush. 500), that the act must be wilful, and not caused by negligence, unless the negligence be so gross as to amount to fraud, and Phillips includes in the general definition of barratry very gross and culpable negligence in the master or mariners, contrary to their duty to the owners, and that might be prejudicial to him or to others interested in the voyage or adventure (1 Phillips on Insurance, 1062). This had led to a renewed misapprehension of barratry, by coupling negligence with it. The effect of referring to or using the term "gross negligence" is to mislead; for in the science of the law there is no such thing as degrees of negligence. There may be degrees of care, as more care is required in certain cases than in others, and it has become the habit to distinguish between slight, ordinary, and great care; but, whatever may be the degree or amount of care demanded in the particular instance, it is the neglect to bestow it which is expressed in the law by the word "negligence." The legal meaning by negligence has, in a recent elementary work, been comprehensively and very accurately defined, as including every breach of trust not clearly intentional, as signifying the want of care, caution, attention, diligence or discretion in having no positive intention to injure; consisting either in the careless performance of obligations assumed by contract, or the neglect of those which are imposed by law: (Shearman and Redfield on Negligence, cap. 1.) And barratry, as has been shown, means much more than this. As a marine term it means an intentional injury to the vessel or to the cargo; or some unlawful, fraudulent, or criminal act, whereby, or in the prosecution of which, loss or injury arises to the owners of the vessel, or of the cargo, or to the insurers, and does not embrace what in the law is denominated negligence. So far, therefore, as the plaintiffs seek to recover under the policy for a loss arising from barratry, this action cannot be maintained. It is now settled in the law of insurance that if the proximate cause of the loss was the peril insured against, and the remote cause was some act of negligence on the part of the master or the mariners, the underwriters are liable, as where fire is one of the perils insured against, and the fire which produced the loss is attributable to an act of negligence in the master or any of the crew: (See the cases collected in Phillips on Insurance, sect. 1096.) Here the proximate cause was the jettison, and the remote one the negligence of the master in stowing the cotton upon deck, and a loss by jettison was one of the perils insured against. But I do not understand that this rule applies where there has been a deviation or departure, producing a change of risk so material as to discharge the underwriters from the policy, or where they insure goods upon a clear bill of lading, there is an implied warranty that the goods are or will be stowed in the usual and ordinary manner, which is in the vessel's hold, and if this is not done, but the goods are carried on deck, except in a case where that is justifiable, the policy never attaches, for the reason that it is a greater risk than the underwriter agreed to take: (1 Phillips on Insurance, sects. 460, 686, 704; 1 Arnold on Insurance, 213, Am. ed.; Lennox v. The U. S. Ins. Co., 3 Johns. Ch. 178; Smith v. Wright, 1 Car. 44; Wolcott v. Eagle Ins. Co., 4 Pick 429.) Goods carried upon deck are not within the protection of the policy, nor can there be any claim for contribution upon a general average, if they are jettisoned, except in the cases where they are generally or must necessarily be so carried; or where it is done with the knowledge and implied consent of the underwriter (Phillips id., cap. 15, sect. 2), which was not the case here. The plaintiffs therefore have no cause of action against the underwriters upon the policy. The only remedy is an action against the master or his principal for the damages sustained through the negligence of the master in carrying the cotton upon deck. The verdict should be set aside and a new trial ordered.

IRELAND AND OTHERS v. LIVINGSTON.

Principal and agent—Ambiguous instructions—Less quantity than that ordered by principal purchased and skipped by agent—Construction.
The defendant, a merchant in Liverpool, wrote to the plaintiffs, commission agents at Mauritius, directing them to purchase for and ship to him,

500 tons of sugar, at a certain limit to cover cost, freight, and insurance. The letter also contained this clause: "50 tons more or less no moment if it enables you to get a suitable vessel." The plaintiffs used all diligence, but from the circumstances of the trade in Mauritius were unable to procure more than 400 tons, without exceeding the limit fixed by the defendant. The plaintiffs having bought and shipped this quantity, the defendant refused to accept the sugar on the ground that the plaintiffs had not followed the instructions given to them:

Held (reversing the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber), that the defendant was bound to accept the cargo; for that, whatever might be the proper construction of the terms of the defendant's letter, the plaintiffs, having bona fide adopted a construction of which the document was fairly capable, were not to be held responsible for the loss arising out of the transaction.

ERROR from a judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, upon a special case stated for the opinion of that court.

The material facts were as follows:—

The plaintiffs were commission agents in the Mauritius; the defendant was a merchant at Liverpool.

In July 1864, the defendant sent to the plaintiffs the following letter:

Liverpool, July 25, 1864.

Dear Sir,—My opinion is that should the beet crop prove less than usual, there may be a good chance of some thing being made by importing cane sugar at about the limit I am going to give you as a maximum, say 26s. 9d. for Nos. 10 to 12, and you may ship me 500 tons to cover cost, freight, and insurance; fifty tons more or loss of no moment if it enables you to get a suitable vessel. You will please provide insurance and draw upon me for costs thereof, as customary, attaching documents, and I engage to give same due protection on presentation. I should prefer the option of sending vessel to London, Liverpool, or the Clyde, but if that is not compassable, you may ship to either Liverpool or London.

After the above letter had been written, Mr. Maitland, the plaintiffs' agent at Liverpool, called at defendant's office, and, having been shown a copy of the letter, suggested, though without instructions from the plaintiff to do so, that it would be prudent for the defendant to send the following telegram to Mr. Ireland:—

In writing to Mauritius, say Mr. Livingston's insurance is to be done with average, and, if possible, the ship to call for orders for a good port in the United Kingdom.

The defendant accordingly sent this telegram, which was forwarded by Mr. Ireland to the plaintiffs at Mauritius.

On 6th Sept. 1864, the plaintiffs wrote to the defendant as follows:—

We are in receipt of your esteemed favour of July 25, and take due note that in the hope of some good being done by importing sugar, you authorise us to purchase and ship on your account a cargo of about 500 tons, provided we can obtain Nos. 10 to 12 D.S., at a cost of not exceeding 26s. 9d. per cwt., free on board, including costs, freight, and insurance; and your remarks regarding the destination of the vessel have also our attention, &c.

When the letter of 25th July reached the plaintiffs at Mauritius the price of sugar and rate of freight were too high to admit of the plaintiffs purchasing and shipping at the limit prescribed by the defendant in his letter. In the course of September the plaintiffs obtained an offer of freight at 2l. 10s. per ton by the ship Ilma, that freight being lower in consequence of the ship's agents being anxious to complete her cargo and despatch her, as her time charter had not much longer to run. The plaintiffs then succeeded in purchasing from several brokers, in fourteen distinct lots, nearly 400 tons of sugar, of the specified quality, and shipped that quantity in the Ilma by Sept. 27. The plaintiffs, though using all due diligence, were unable to obtain any more sugar of the specified quality, except at a price which would have exceeded the defendant's limit.

On Oct. 26 the plaintiffs received from the defendant a letter, dated Sept. 24, in which was this passage:—

It escaped me to write to you in August, but I am hoping that the tenor of my letter in giving you limits will have prevented your acting for me until I have further written to you, i.e., conjecturing that your advices from other correspondents would supply the information as to a fuller supply of beet. The large receipt from Cuba, &c., has completely upset our prices for sugar, and it is difficult to form any opinion as to the future of the article. I would prefer for the present to do nothing, and am satisfied that low rates must rule for some time. . . . I will write to you further by the French steamer, on Oct. 7; but I fear your prices are not likely to fall to a point commensurate with our probable rates."

This letter did not, of course, arrive till after the Ilma had sailed.

The plaintiffs duly insured the sugar, and the cost price, together with other expenses, amounted to 9468l. 11s.; for this sum the plaintiffs drew a bill on the defendant, and remitted it to him, with the usual shipping documents, in letters of Sept. 20 and 30.

The bill became due in Feb. 1865, but the defendant refused to pay it, and to accept the sugar, on the ground that the sugar was not bought in accordance with his instructions, the quantity being less than he had directed, viz., 400 tons instead of 500 tons.

The sugar was then sold, the sale realizing 7065l. 7s. 3d., after deducting expenses of the sale.

This action was then brought for the difference between this amount and that of the bill.

To the pleas, alleging that the instructions of the defendant were not followed by the plaintiff, the plaintiffs demurred, and on these demurrers the Court of Queen's Bench gave judgment in favour of the plaintiffs: (15 L. T. Rep. N.S. 206; 39 L. J. 50, Q.B.)

On the trial of the issues before Cockburn, C.J. the verdict was entered for the plaintiffs, subject to the opinion of the court on a case stated; and in Nov. 1869 judgment was given for the plaintiffs.

The Court of Exchequer Chamber, however, reversed this judgment (Kelly, C.B. Martin and Channell, B.B. and Keating, J.; Smith J. and Cleasby, B. dissentientibus): (L. Rep. 5 Q.B. 516; 30 L. J. 282 Q. B.)

Thereupon the present appeal was brought.

The following judges were present at the hearing: Martin, B. Byles, Blackburn, Smith, and Hannen, J.J. and Cleasby, B.

Giffard, Q.C. and Raymond, for plaintiffs in error.

Sir J. B. Kerslake, Q.C., Butt, Q.C., and Crompton, for defendant in error.

The following cases were cited:—

Bellingham v. Freer, 1 Moo. P. C. 333;
Johnston v. Kershaw, 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 485; L. Rep.
 2 Ex. 82.

The following question was proposed to the judges: Whether judgment ought to be entered for the plaintiffs or the defendant in error?

Feb. 15.—CLEASBY, B.—My Lords, the question put to the judges in this case is, whether judgment ought to be given for the plaintiffs or for the defendant; and I answer it by saying that in my humble opinion the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment. I have already expressed my opinion to that effect when the judgment in this case was given in the Exchequer Chamber. Upon further consideration I adhere to the judgment and reasons then given, and I am unwilling to occupy unnecessarily the time of your Lordships by repeating what is there expressed. It may be summed up in a few words. The answer to the question put depends upon the proper construction of two letters (the 25th July 1864, from defendant to plaintiffs, and 6th Sept. 1864, from plaintiffs to defendant), with an addition to the first contained in a telegram. The second letter is only an acceptance of the instructions contained in the first, and the last sentence in the first letter gives a decisive key to its proper construction. It is in these words: "I should prefer the option of sending vessel to London, Liverpool, or the Clyde, but if that is not compassable you may ship to either Liverpool or London." There are two events contemplated, because there is a preference. The preference is given to having a vessel at the disposal of the defendant as regards its destination. This involves necessarily that the whole cargo should belong to the defendant. He could not give a destination to a vessel containing cargo of other persons. The other alternative is shipping to one of two designated ports, London or Liverpool; and this can be as well done whether what is shipped is part of a cargo or a full cargo. As the first alternative of engaging a vessel to call for orders could not be had, the other alternative only remains, viz., to procure and ship 500 tons (fifty tons, more or less) to London or Liverpool. And the question raised is, whether, though the defendant's cargo need not occupy the whole ship, it is not essential that it should form one shipment on board one ship. Independently of any consideration founded upon the customary and necessary mode of executing such an order at the Mauritius, it would be a reasonable construction of the instructions to say that if a vessel bound for one of the designated ports was ready to take 400 tons at an easy freight it would be right for the agent and his duty to take the opportunity afforded of acting upon the order; for the plaintiffs at that time had by this letter of 6th Sept. accepted the employment of the defendant for the usual commission and reward, and were his agents, and bound to use due and reasonable care and diligence as such. It was not a mere contract between vendor and vendee (like the case of Kreuger v. Blanck, which will be shortly noticed), although after the goods were shipped a relation like that of vendor and vendee might arise. But when an order of this description is given to be executed at the Mauritius (not an order of an unusual nature, but, as appears from the case, a customary one), it seems to me it would be unreasonable in dealing with the conduct of the agent to exclude from consideration the usual and customary mode of executing such orders. And one statement appears to be conclusive of the case. For it is found as a fact that, supposing the instructions not to be limited to the engagement of an entire ship to call for orders, the plaintiffs in shipping the 392 tons acted in conformity with the usage, as it was, I submit, their duty to do. One case was referred to in the course of the argument, and much relied upon by the learned counsel for the defendant: (Kreuger v. Blanck, 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 470; L. Rep. 5 Ex. 179; 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 128). The decision in that case has really no bearing upon the present, for the following reasons: First, the propriety of executing the order by more than one shipment (which is the real question in the present case) was never under consideration; secondly, in that case the question did not arise between principal and agent. The plaintiffs were timber merchants at Calmar in Sweden, and the defendant had ordered of them a certain cargo of laths. It was a case between vendor and vendee; there was one indivisible contract for a certain quantity, which the vendee was entitled to have executed before he could be called upon; thirdly, in that case the plaintiff had shipped a cargo much larger than the cargo ordered by the defendant, and upon the defendant refusing this larger cargo, the plaintiffs, when the vessel arrived at the port of discharge, selected out of the cargo a quantity corresponding with the defendant's order, and tendered it to him. There was no shipment made of the defendant's order, and the defendant thereby lost the benefit of giving a destination to the vessel; for the charter was to the Penarth Roads, to call for orders in the Bristol Channel, and the defendant could not give these orders without accepting the whole cargo. As this case has no bearing upon the present, I express no uncalled-for opinion as to the correctness of the judgment. In my humble opinion the plaintiffs are entitled to succeed, and the judgment of the Queen's Bench to that effect ought to be upheld.

BLACKBURN, J.—My Lords, I will, with your Lordships' permission, deliver along with my own the answer of my Brother Hannen, who authorises me to say he agrees in the reasons I am about to give to your Lordships. In answer to your Lordships' question, I have to say that in my opinion the judgment ought to be entered for the plaintiffs. The question depends almost entirely on the true construction of the letter of the 25th July 1864, from the defendant to the plaintiffs. In that letter, as set out in the pleadings and case, occurs the following passage: "The limit I am going to give you as a maximum one, 26/9 for numbers 10 to 12, and you may ship say 500 tons, to cover cost, freight, and insurance, 50 tons more or less, of no moment," &c. Probably if we had access to the original we should find that this is miscopied, and that what was written was: "The limit I am going to give you as a maximum, say 26/9, to cover cost, freight, and insurance, for Nos. 10 to 12, and you may ship me 500 tons, 50 tons, more or less of no moment," &c. Perhaps the words, to cover costs, freight, and insurance, were interlined in the original, and the copyist has inserted the interlineation in the wrong place. At all events the letter must be construed as if the words were placed as I have suggested. The terms at a price, "to cover cost, freight, and in-insurance payment by acceptance on receiving shipping documents," are very usual, and are perfectly well understood in practice. The invoice is made out debiting the consignee with the agreed price (or the actual cost and commission, with the premiums of insurance, and the freight, as the case may be), and giving him credit, for the amount of the freight which he will have to pay to the shipowner on actual delivery, and for the balance a draft is drawn on the consignee which he is bound to accept (if the shipment be in conformity with his contract) on having handed to him the charter-party, bill of lading, and policy of insurance. Should the ship arrive with the goods on board he will have to pay the freight, which will make up the amount which he has engaged to pay. Should the goods not be delivered in consequence of a peril of the sea, he is not called on to pay the freight, and he will recover the amount of his interest in the goods under the policy. If the non-delivery is in consequence of some misconduct on the part of the master or mariners, not covered by the policy, he will recover it from the shipowner. In substance, therefore, the consignee pays, though in a different manner, the same price as if the goods had been bought and shipped to him in the ordinary way. If the consignor is a person who has contracted to supply the goods at an agreed price, to cover cost, freight, and insurance, the amount inserted in the invoice is the agreed price, and no commission is charged. In such a case it is obvious that if freight is high the consignor gets the less for the goods he supplies, if freight is low he gets the more. But inasmuch as he has contracted to supply the goods at this price he is bound to do so, though owing to the rise in prices at the port of shipment making him pay more for the goods, or of freight causing him to receive less himself, because the shipowner receives more, his bargain may turn out a bad one. On the other hand, if owing to the fall in prices in the port of shipment, or of freight, the bargain is a good one, the consignee still must pay the full agreed price. This results from the contract being one by which the one party binds himself absolutely to supply the goods in a vessel such as is stipulated for, at a fixed price, to be paid for in the customary manner; that is, part by acceptance on receipt of the customary documents, and part by paying the freight on delivery, and the other party binds himself to pay that fixed price. Each party there takes upon himself the risk of the rise or fall in price, and there is no contract of agency or trust between them, and therefore no commission is charged. But it is also very common for the consignor to be an agent, who does not bind himself absolutely to supply the goods, but merely accepts an order by which he binds himself to use due diligence to fulfil the order. In that case he is bound to get the goods as cheap as he reasonably can, and the sum inserted in the invoice is the actual cost and charges at which the goods are procured by the consignor, with the addition of a commission; and the naming of a maximum limit shows that the order is of that nature. It would be a positive fraud if, having bought the goods at a price including all charges below the maximum limit fixed in the order, he, the commission merchant, were instead of debiting his correspondent with that actual cost and commission, to debit him with the maximum limit; nor can I doubt that in an action brought against him as an agent for not accounting properly, this extra sum would be disallowed. The contract of agency is precisely the same as if the order had been to procure goods at or below a certain price, and then ship them to the person ordering them, the freight being in no ways an element in the limit. But when, as in the present case, the limit is made to include cost, freight, and insurance, the agent must take care in executing the order that the aggregate of the sums which his principal will have to pay does not exceed the limit prescribed in his order; if it does the principal is not bound to take the goods. If by due exertions he can execute the order within those limits he is bound to do so as cheaply as he can, and to give his principal the benefit of that cheapness. The agent, therefore, as is obvious, does not take upon himself any part of the risk or profit which may arise from the rise and fall of prices, and is entitled to charge commission because there is a contract of agency. I should apologise for stating so precisely what your Lordships doubtless know already, if it were not that I think one of the learned judges in the court below has fallen into a fallacy from not recollecting what I am sure he well knew. It is quite true that the agent who in thus executing an order ships goods to his principal is in contemplation of law a vendor to him. The persons who supply goods to a commission merchant sell them to him and not to his unknown foreign correspondent, and the commission merchant has no authority to pledge the credit of his correspondent for them. There is no more privity between the person supplying the goods to the commission agent and the foreign correspondent than there is between the brickmaker who supplies bricks to a person building a house, and the owner of that house. The property in the bricks passes from the brickmaker to the builder, and when they are built into the wall, to the owner of that wall; and just so does the property in the goods pass from the country producer to the commission merchant; and then, when the goods are shipped, from the commission merchant to his consignee. And the legal effect of the transaction between the commission merchant and the consignee who has given him the order is a contract of sale passing the property from the one to the other; and, consequently, the commission merchant is a vendor, and has the right of one as to stoppage in transitu. I therefore perfectly agree with the opinion expressed by Martin, B. in the court below, that the present is a contract between vendor and vendee; but I think he falls into a fallacy when he concludes therefrom that it is not a contract as between principal and agent. My opinion is, for the reasons I have indicated, that when the order was accepted by the plaintiffs there was a contract of agency by which the plaintiffs undertook to use reasonable skill and diligence to procure the goods ordered at or below the limit given, to be followed up by a transfer of the property at the actual cost, with the addition of the commission; but that this super-added sale is not in any way inconsistent with the contract of agency existing between the parties, by virtue of which the plaintiffs were under the obligation to make reasonable exertions to procure the goods ordered as much below the limit as they could. If this view be correct, it shows that the point raised at your Lordships' bar as to whether the evidence received was that of a custom does not really arise. A commission merchant using reasonable exertions to get the goods as cheap as possible ought to buy them in small parcels if the state of the market in the country is such that it is the reasonable way to get them. If the merchant would get the goods cheaper by giving a wholesale order to the manufacturer, which probably would be the case in England, where Manchester goods are ordered from a London or Liverpool commission agent, he ought to give the wholesale order. The evidence shows the circumstances under which the plaintiffs acted, and that the course they pursued was a reasonable one under those circumstances. Having said thus much, I now come to what I take to be the real question, namely, what is the construction of the letter of 25th July, 1864? One question is, whether the order required the plaintiff to procure a vessel which should carry the defendant's sugar and no other goods? I am of opinion that it does not. The letter expresses a wish that, if possible, the defendant should have the option of sending the vessel to London, Liverpool, or the Clyde. It is rarely possible to obtain a ship which is to call for orders unless the whole ship is chartered, and, therefore, it is probable that in order to give the defendant this option the plaintiffs would have required to charter the whole of a vessel. If a vessel could have been procured willing to obey the defendant's orders, and deliver his goods as required, I do not see what harm it would do the defendant if that ship was larger than was required, and the superfluous space was utilised in any way consistent with his contract. And, therefore, if necessary, I should advise your Lordships to reconsider the decision of the Court of Exchequer in Kreuger v. Blanck (L. Rep. 5 Ex. 179; 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 128). But it is not necessary to reconsider it, for the defendant gave the plaintiffs the alternative of shipping either to Liverpool or London; and there is no reason at all why the shipper of goods direct to a port should take up the whole of the vessel. The second question is, whether the order for 500 tons, fifty more or less no object, and which, therefore, clearly required the plaintiffs, if practicable, to procure the defendant at least 450 tons, is complied with by procuring about 392 tons, and shipping them in one vessel with the intention, if practicable, to procure the remaining quantity required to make up the order and ship them by another. As the defendant countermanded the order before the plaintiffs could procure the other sixty tons, the case must be considered as if the plaintiffs had actually procured and shipped the remaining sixty tons. This I have felt to be a more plausible objection than the other, according to the view which I take of the law the plaintiffs, having accepted the defendant's order, were not only entitled but bound to fulfil it in any reasonable way which they could. In Story on Agency, sect. 170, it is said, "The principal is not bound by the authorised acts of his agent, but is bound where the authority is substantially pursued, or so far as it is distinctly pursued. But the question may often arise whether in fact the agent has exceeded what may be deemed the substance of his authority. Thus, if a man should authorise an agent to buy 100 bales of cotton for him, and he should buy fifty at one time of one person, and fifty at another of a different person, or if he should buy fifty only, being unable to purchase more at any price, or at the price limited, the question might arise whether the authority was well executed. In general it may be answered that it was; because in such a case it would ordinarily be implied that the purchase might be made at different times of different persons, or that it might be made of a part only, if the whole could not be bought at all, or not within the limits prescribed." In the case of Johnston v. Kershaw (L. Rep. 2 Ex. 82; 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 435), the Court of Exchequer acted on this doctrine. In that case the order was from a Liverpool merchant to one at Pernambuco for 100 bales of cotton, and though the order does not expressly say so, it is clear (from the usage of trade and the facts) that the 100 bales were to be shipped to Liverpool. The plaintiff purchased and shipped ninety-four bales only, and yet recovered their price, my brother Channell saying, "I may add that the observation of Story, J. seems to me replete with common sense, and I take it the basis of my judgment. I am, therefore of opinion this order must not be taken as an order to buy 100 specific bales of cotton at one time, but that the plaintiff by purchasing ninety-four bales has executed it with due and reasonable diligence." This case was not noticed in the judgments in the Exchequer Chamber, but it is impossible to suppose that the three judges, Kelly, C. B., and Martin and Channell, B. B., who decided it, either overlooked their own decision, or intended to overrule it. I must, suppose, therefore, that they distinguished it on the ground that in the order in the case at bar there was enough to show that the defendant required one shipment, and one only, of the whole of what he ordered, so as to prevent that which would ordinarily have been due and reasonable diligence in the fulfilment of an order from being so in this special case. I do not doubt that the defendant might, by the use of proper terms, have so limited the plaintiffs' authority, but I do not think he did so in fact. On this part of the case, my brother M. Smith, J. has, in his judgment in the Court of Exchequer Chamber, accurately and clearly expressed what is my opinion. I cannot improve on what he has said, and, therefore, I refer to it without repeating it. It will be for your Lordships to decide whether the letter has the effect of so limiting the plaintiffs' authority. For the reasons I have given, I think it had not, and I am, therefore, of opinion that the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber is wrong.

IRELAND AND OTHERS v. LIVINGSTON.

IRELAND AND OTHERS v. LIVINGSTON.

BYLES, J.—My Lords, I think judgment ought to be entered for the plaintiffs in error. The decision turns mainly on the construction of the letter of the 25th July, 1868; which letter seems to show that the relation existing between the parties was not that of vendor and vendee, but of agent and principal. The following expressions appear to me to indicate the relation of principal and agent; some of them more clearly, others less clearly; but all of them to be more naturally and easily reconcilable with the relation of principal and agent, than of buyer and seller. Without fatiguing your Lordships with separate observations on every one of these expressions, I would call attention to the words "circulars," "orders," "limit," "maximum," the expression "to cover cost," "draw upon me for costs." Moreover the words, "50 tons more or less are of no moment, if it enable you to get a suitable vessel," are, as it seems to me, very strong to show that this was an order from a principal to his agent: for otherwise the buyer would have put it into the power of the seller and exposed him to the temptation, should the price rise or fall, to vary the quantity sold to the extent of 20 or 25 per cent. to the disadvantage of the buyer. From the plaintiffs' answer of the 6th September it is plain that they understood the defendant's letter as an authority to purchase and ship. I see nothing in the letter or telegram to make it an implied condition in the order that the whole quantity should be shipped in one ship, although that may have been and probably was contemplated by the defendant as the more probable event.

MARTIN, B.—My Lords, the question in this case is whether the defendant in error was bound to accept a bulk of 392 tons of sugar which was brought to London from the Mauritius in a vessel called the "Ilma." It depends almost entirely, if not altogether, upon a letter by the defendant to the plaintiffs, dated the 25th July, 1864. The material part of the letter gives a limit as a maximum of 26s. 9d. per cwt. for certain qualities of sugar, and continues thus: "You may ship me 500 tons, to cover cost, freight, and insurance, 50 tons more or less of no moment, if it enables you to get a suitable vessel. You will please provide insurance and draw upon me for costs thereof as customary, attaching documents, and I engage to give same due protection on presentation. I should prefer the option of sending vessel to London, Liverpool, or the Clyde, but if that is not compassable you may ship either to Liverpool or London." About the same date a telegram was sent to one of the plaintiffs, by the authority of the defendant, viz.: "In writing to the Mauritius, say Mr. Livingston's (the defendant) insurance is to be done with average, and, if, possible, the ship to call for orders for a good port in the United Kingdom." The question is, whether this order must be performed by one bulk of sugar in one ship and conveyed to one port, or whether it may not be performed by two or more bulks of sugar in two or more ships. I do not think there can be any doubt as to the relation created between the plaintiffs and the defendant upon the former accepting the order contained in the letter. The plaintiffs were merchants and commission agents, not planters, and upon accepting the order undertook to use due diligence to carry it out. When they bought the sugar they did so on their own account; and when they had collected a sufficient quantity to enable them to perform the order, and thought fit to appropriate it for or to the defendant, the relation of vendor and vendee would arise: Fieze v. Wray, 3 East, 93.) A priori, I should think it likely that a Liverpool merchant ordering 500 tons of sugar from abroad to the United Kingdom would desire that it should constitute the entire cargo of one ship; this would give him greater facility for selling the cargo afloat, or for having the ship call for orders at Cork or Falmouth, and other advantages. I also think there is nothing more unlikely than that a merchant giving an order for 500 tons of sugar should intend that it was to be forwarded to him in several bulks, viz., 100 tons in one ship to London, another 100 tons in another ship to Liverpool, a third 100 tons in a third ship to Glasgow, and so on, or indeed in several separate bulks to one and the same port. I cannot think that a man of sense and intelligence would intentionally subject himself to be so dealt with. A merchant or agent abroad could not perform such an order by sending the 500 tons in bulks of a ton each in 500 different ships; and if he can forward it in more than one ship it must of necessity (in case of litigation) be a question for a jury whether the shipments were in reasonable bulks—a question, upon the result of which no man could form a judgment beforehand, and which would have to be decided by what is called the discretion, or, in other words, the caprice of a jury, and much more likely by their prejudices. I do not believe that any sane man would intentionally give such an order or subject himself to such a litigation. The question, however, must be decided by the letter and telegram. A similar question arose in the Court of Exchequer in the case of Kreuger v. Blanck (ubi sup.), and my Brother Cleasby there stated in substance, as applicable to this case, and I think correctly, "that the order is contained in the letter, that the question turns on the construction of it, and that the court ought to abide by the natural meaning of the word used, unless exceptional circumstances were found to the contrary." There are no exceptional circumstances in the present case, and the question is, what is the natural, grammatical, fair, and reasonable meaning of the letter? "Vessel" in the singular number is twice used. First, "a suitable vessel to carry 450 to 550 tons of sugar;" secondly, the defendant states his preference of the option of sending "the vessel" to London, Liverpool, or the Clyde. Again, the telegram states "if possible, the ship" is to call for orders for a good port in the United Kingdom. To me this seems to indicate in the clearest manner that there was to be one ship, one port, and one bulk. I have repeatedly read and considered it, and I could understand, if the plaintiffs had bought all the sugar that could be procured at the Mauritius within the defendant's limits, and had shipped it in one vessel for one of the named ports, it might have been contended that the defendant was bound to accept it as a fulfilment and completion of the order, but I cannot understand why it should be deemed the essential part of the order that 500 tons should be forwarded, but a non-essential part of the order that it should be forwarded in one vessel to one port. I do not desire to occupy your Lordships' time by further verbal criticism, but beg to refer you to the considered judgment of the Chief Baron and my brothers Channel and Keating, whose reasoning is, in my opinion, conclusive in favour of the defendant. As I have already said, I think the case depends upon the letters of the 25th July, and I think the custom stated in the case has no bearing upon it, but I desire to call attention to the letter of the plaintiffs to the defendant of the 6th Sept. 1864, which to my mind clearly shows that the plaintiffs understood the defendant's letter of the 25th July in the sense in which I understand it. The plaintiffs there write: "By the arrival of our packet of the 25th ultimo, we are in receipt of your esteemed favour of the 25th July, and take due note that in the hope of some good being done by importing sugar, you authorise us to purchase and ship on your account a cargo of about 500 tons, provided we can obtain Nos. &c., at a cost not exceeding 26s. 9d. per ton free on board, including cost, freight, and insurance; and your remarks regarding the destination of the vessel have also our attention."

IRELAND AND OTHERS v. LIVINGSTON.

Now, here it is to be observed that the plaintiffs twice indicate their understanding of the defendant's letter; first they speak of a "cargo" about 500 tons, which clearly indicates one bulk, the full loading of a ship; and, secondly, they speak of the destination of the vessel in the singular number. This to my mind speaks as clearly as words can speak, that they were to provide one cargo, and forward that cargo to England in one ship; and I cannot but think any intelligent practical man would understand it in the same sense. I therefore think that the defendant was under no obligation to accept the 393 tons shipped in the "Ilma," and in my opinion the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber was right; and my answer to your Lordships' question is that judgment ought to be entered for the defendant in error.

April 30.—Lord CHELMSFORD.—My Lords, the difference of opinion which has prevailed amongst the judges in this case, shows that the order given to the plaintiffs by the defendant in his letter of 25th July 1864 (upon which the question principally turns), is of doubtful construction; and this, in my mind, is a sufficient ground in itself for bringing me to the conclusion at which I have arrived. I would preface what I have to say by stating my opinion that the question is to be regarded as one between principal and agent, though the plaintiffs might, in some respects, be looked upon as vendors to the defendant, so as to give them a right of stoppage in transitu. But the transaction began as a contract of agency, and in that light I am disposed to consider it. Now, it appears to me that, if a principal gives an order to an agent in such uncertain terms as to be susceptible of two different meanings, and the agent bona fide adopts one of them and acts upon it, it is not competent to the principal to repudiate the act as unauthorised because he meant the order to be read in the other sense, of which it is equally capable. It is a fair answer to such an attempt to disown the agent's authority, to tell the principal that the departure from his intention was occasioned by his own fault, and that he should have given his order in clear and unambiguous terms. This view of the case will, in my opinion, dispense with the necessity of determining which is the more correct construction of the contract, that which was adopted unanimously by the court of Queen's Bench, and by two of the judges of the Exchequer Chamber, or that which the four other judges of the Exchequer Chamber considered to be the right interpretation of it. It is sufficient for the justification of the plaintiffs, that the meaning which they affixed to the order of the defendant is that which is sanctioned by so many learned judges. It would be most unjust, after the plaintiffs have honestly acted upon what they conceived to be the wishes of the defendant, as expressed in his order, that he should be allowed to repudiate the whole transaction, and throw the loss of it upon the plaintiffs, in order (as his correspondence shows) to escape from a speculation which had become a losing one in consequence of the market prices of sugars having fallen. The short ground upon which I think the case may be disposed of, renders it unnecessary for me to express my opinion as to the proper interpretation of the letters upon which the courts below have proceeded. I own that if I were called upon to do so I should have great difficulty in arriving at any satisfactory conclusion upon the subject, though, after much hesitation, I should have been inclined to adopt the opinion of the majority of the judges as to the construction of the contract. But this very difficulty confirms me in the view I have taken of the mode in which the case ought to be dealt with, for all the doubt and perplexity which hang over it have been occasioned by the defendant failing to express clearly and precisely how he wished the plaintiffs to act. The plaintiffs have construed the meaning of the defendants' language in a manner for which there is a reasonable excuse, if not a complete justification, and with an honest desire to perform their duty to him, and have obeyed his order according to their understanding of its meaning. In determining who is to bear the loss arising out of the transaction, it would be hard and unjust to make it fall upon the plaintiffs, the innocent agents, who have followed what they honestly considered to be the directions of their principal, and it ought, in justice, to be borne by the defendant, who has brought it upon himself by his want of precision and certainty in the language employed by him in communicating his order to the plaintiffs. I submit to your Lordships that the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber ought to be reversed.

Lord WESTBURY.—My Lords, this is a case which depends entirely on its own peculiar circumstances. There is hardly any principle involved in it. The question turns on the construction of a certain letter. So far as it is necessary to express my opinion, I am of opinion that the conclusion arrived at by the majority of the judges on that question of construction is right. But whether it be right, or whether it be open to question, I concur entirely in the principles of the decision which has just been enunciated. I therefore come to the conclusion that the four judges in the Exchequer Chamber were wrong, and that judgment ought to be given for the plaintiffs in error.

Lord COLONSAY.—My Lords, I have only a few words to add. I do not know that we are compelled to fix absolutely the construction to be put on these documents. I am certainly of opinion that the construction put upon them by the Court of Queen's Bench is the true construction. I think that, in the position in which the plaintiffs were placed as agents for the defendant, they were, in the circumstances which occurred, perfectly entitled to send the goods as they did. But I also think that the view taken by my noble and learned friend who first addressed the house is very conclusive of the case, and that it is unnecessary for us to go farther than to arrive at that conclusion. The agents who sold the goods are not to be held responsible for having adopted one of the constructions of which the document, as transmitted to them by their principal, was fairly capable.

Judgment reversed.

JOYCE v. THE REALM MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Marine insurance—Re-insurance—“To commence from loading at as above”—Outward cargo to be homeward interest after a certain time.Declaration upon a policy of insurance underwritten by defendants for 1000l., declared to be upon cargo, being a re-insurance subject to all clauses and conditions of the original policy, in the ship D., at and from any port or ports in any order on the West Coast of Africa to the vessel's port or ports of call and discharge in the United Kingdom, the insurance to commence “from the loading” of the goods at as above; that it was a clause and condition of the original policy that the insurance made by it should be for 1000l. upon the cargo valued at 3500l. of the said vessel D., at and from Liverpool to any ports in any order backwards and forwards and forwards and backwards on the coast of Africa, and thence back to a port of discharge in the United Kingdom, with leave to increase the valuation of the cargo on the homeward voyage; “outward cargo to be considered homeward interest twenty-four hours after her arrival at her first port of discharge;” that goods were shipped at Liverpool, and the vessel, with goods on board, departed from a port on the West Coast of Africa, and in the course of the voyage in the original policy described, and more than twenty-four hours after she had arrived at her first port of discharge, the goods were lost by perils insured against in the original policy.Demurrer on the ground that it appeared from the declaration that the goods were not loaded at any port on the West Coast of Africa.Held, that the goods, though shipped at Liverpool, were within the policy of re-insurance after the lapse of twenty-four hours from the vessel's arrival at her first port of discharge on the West Coast of Africa. As the policy was declared to be a re-insurance, subject to all clauses and conditions of the original policy, and by the original policy outward cargo was to be considered homeward interest twenty-four hours after the vessel's arrival at her first port of discharge, the words “from the loading” were not to be construed strictly.

DEMURRER to a declaration.

Declaration stated.—That the plaintiff on the 13th Sept. 1871 caused to be made a policy of insurance with certain memorandum thereunder written in the words and figures following, that is to say: Whereas J. H. Joyce, Esq. (meaning the plaintiff), agent, has represented to the Realm Marine Insurance Company Limited (meaning the defendants), that he is interested in, or duly authorised as owner, agent, or otherwise, to make the assurance hereinafter mentioned and described with the said company, and has promised or otherwise obliged himself to pay forthwith for the use of the said company, at the office of the said company, the sum of 30l. as a premium or consideration at and after the rate of 60s. per cent. for such insurance. Now this policy of insurance witnesseth that, in consideration of the premises, and of the said sum of 30l. the said company promises and agrees with the said J. H. Joyce, as above, his executors, and administrators, and assigns, that the said company will pay and make good all such losses and damages hereinafter expressed, as may happen to the subject matter of this policy, and may attach to this policy in respect of the sum of 1000l. hereby insured, which insurance is hereby declared to be upon cargo, being a re-insurance subject to all clauses and conditions of the original policy, and to pay as may be paid thereon general average and salvage charges to be settled as per foreign statement, if so made up, in the ship or vessel called the Daybreak, whereof—is at present master, or whoever shall go for master of the said ship or vessel, lost or not lost, at and from any port or ports, place or places, in any order on the West Coast of Africa, to the vessel's port or ports of call and discharge in the United Kingdom; and the said company promises and agrees that the insurance aforesaid shall commence upon the freight and goods or merchandise aforesaid from the loading of the said goods or merchandise on board the said ship or vessel, at as above, and continue until the said goods or merchandise be discharged and safely landed at as above; and that it shall be lawful for the said ship or vessel to proceed and sail to, and touch and stay at, any ports or places whatsoever in the course of her said voyage, for all necessary purposes, without prejudice to this insurance; and touching the adventures and perils which the capital, stock, and funds of the said company are made liable unto by this insurance, they are of the seas, men-of-war, fire, enemies, pirates, rovers, thieves, jettisons, letters of marque and countermarque, surprisals, and takings at sea, arrests, restraints and detainments of all kings, princes and people, of what nature, condition, or quality soever, barratry of the masters and mariners, and of all other perils, losses and misfortunes that have or shall, to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the aforesaid subject-matter of this insurance, or any part thereof, and in case of any loss or misfortune, it shall be lawful to the insured, their factors, servants and assigns, to sue, labour, and travel for, in, and about the defence, safeguard, and recovery of the aforesaid subject-matter of this insurance, or any part thereof, without prejudice to this insurance, the charges whereof the said company will bear in proportion to the sum hereby insured, &c., and thereupon, in consideration that the plaintiff paid the defendants 30l. as a premium for the insurance of 1000l. upon the said goods in the said policy mentioned, the defendants became and were insurers to the plaintiff as aforesaid, and duly subscribed the said policy and affixed their common seal thereto as such insurers to the said 1000l. upon the said goods to be carried in the said ship on the said voyage; and the plaintiff says that it was a clause and condition of the said original policy in the first-named policy mentioned that the insurance made by the said original policy should be for 1000l. upon the cargo, valued at 3350l., of the said vessel Daybreak, at and from Liverpool to any port or ports, place or places, in any order backwards and forwards and forwards and backwards on the coast of Africa and African islands during her stay and trade, then and thence back to a port of call and discharge in the United Kingdom, with leave to call at or off any ports or places for any purpose, and to discharge, exchange, and take on board goods wherever she might call at or proceed to, and to transship, sell, or barter all or any goods or property on the coast of Africa and African islands with any vessels, boats, factories, and canoes, and to transfer interest from this vessel to any other vessels, and from any other vessels to this vessel in port and at sea without being deemed a deviation; outward cargo to be considered homeward interest twenty-four hours after her arrival at her first port of discharge: and divers goods being the goods in the said first-named policy mentioned were shipped at Liverpool aforesaid in and on board of the said ship to be carried therein on the said voyage, and A. Boyd, H. D. Pickford, &c., or some or one of them then and thence until and at the time of the loss hereinafter mentioned were or was interested in the said goods to the amount of all the moneys insured thereon by the said first-named policy, and the said first-named insurance was made for the use and benefit and on the account of the person or persons so interested; and the said vessel with the said goods on board thereof departed from a port or place on the West Coast of Africa, to wit, Cabenda, on and in the course of her said voyage in the said original policy described as aforesaid, and afterwards while the said ship was proceeding on her said voyage within the meaning of both the said policies, and more than twenty-four hours after she had arrived at her first port of discharge within the meaning of the said original policy, and during the continuance of the said risk, the said goods being then on board of the said ship, were, by the perils insured against by the said original policy, wholly lost, and the sum of 1000*l.* became payable, and was paid by the aforesaid interested person or persons on the said original policy, in respect of such loss, and otherwise thereon, and all conditions were fulfilled, and all things happened, and all times elapsed necessary to entitle the plaintiff to be paid the said sum of 1000*l.* by the defendants, yet the defendants did not pay the same.

Demurrer on the ground that it appears from the declaration that the goods were not loaded at any port or place on the West Coast of Africa.

Joinder in demurrer.

Wood Hill in support of the demurrer.—The policy is one of re-insurance, subject to all clauses and conditions of the original policy, from any port or place on the West Coast of Africa to any port in England, the insurance to commence “from the loading.” The goods never having been, in fact, loaded, the policy never attached. The argument will turn on the effect of the words in the original policy, “outward cargo to be considered homeward interest twenty-four hours after her arrival at her first port of discharge,” the goods having been lost more than twenty-four hours after the vessel had arrived at her first port of discharge. [BLACKBURN, J.—The question seems really to be reduced to a comparatively narrow one—whether the stipulation in the original policy, by which the cargo, although loaded at Liverpool, was, a certain time after the ship’s arrival at Africa, to be considered as home cargo, is to be incorporated in the present policy?] The ground of demurrer is that the goods were not loaded at any port or place on the West Coast of Africa. [LUSH, J.—If the goods had been discharged on the West Coast of Africa and immediately after taken on board again, you would have been out of court.] That is so. If there had been anything amounting to a substantial re-loading of the vessel the defendants would have no ground for resisting the action.

The words at the beginning of the policy show that the time at which the risk was to commence was “from the loading of the said goods or merchandise on board the said ship or vessel, &c.” that is from the loading on the West Coast of Africa. [BLACKBURN, J.—But we must not omit to notice that it is stated to be a re-insurance, “subject to all clauses and conditions of the original policy.” one of which is that the outward cargo from Liverpool, twenty-four hours after it has got to Africa, is to be treated as homeward interest, which means, I suppose, that it should to all intents and purposes, be considered as loaded there.] It is submitted that the words “from the loading” determine the time at which the risk is to commence. The authorities decide this. [BLACKBURN, J.—This would not, I think, be disputed unless there is something to show that these words do not really mean what they prima facie would import. Herschell, Q.C.—Rickman v. Carstairs (5 B. & Ad. 651), is conclusive on that point.] There the policy was on ship and goods, at and from the coast of Africa to the ship’s port of discharge in the United Kingdom, with liberty to load at all ports and places whatsoever and wheresoever, to trade backwards and forwards in any order, &c., beginning the adventure on the goods from the loading thereof aboard the said ship twenty-four hours after her arrival on the coast of Africa, including the risk in boats in loading and unloading, with liberty to load, unload, sell, barter or exchange with any ships or factories wheresoever she might call. It was held that the policy did not protect an outward cargo shipped before the vessel’s arrival on the coast of Africa. [BLACKBURN, J.—It was doubtless because of that case that the persons who prepared this policy have inserted the phrase “outward cargo to be considered homeward interest twenty-four hours after her arrival at her first port of discharge.”] It is submitted that these words were inserted merely for the purpose of value, to determine what was the amount of interest to be included in the risk—the meaning being, directly the vessel arrives on the coast of Africa, and discharges its cargo and takes any small portion of cargo on board, from that moment, the risk having commenced, the defendants would consider that as the value of the plaintiffs’ interest. These words affect only the value of the homeward interest when the policy has once attached; but they cannot have the effect of accelerating the time at which the risk was to commence, i.e., from the loading. [BLACKBURN, J.—We have not got the whole of the policy set out. There may be something in it which would throw light on this.] In the margin of the policy are written the words “with leave to increase the value of the cargo on the homeward voyage.” Then follow the words about outward cargo being considered homeward interest twenty-four hours after the vessel’s arrival; and the re-insurance is on a valued policy. [BLACKBURN, J.—The addition of these words might make an important difference as to your argument that the other words were inserted for the purpose of value. Is it not desirable in order to decide upon the real matter that the declaration should be amended by setting out the actual words of the policy?]

By consent the declaration was amended by inserting before the words “outward cargo to be deemed homeward interest, &c.,” the words “with leave to increase the valuation of cargo on the homeward voyage."

Hill, in continuation.—The only clause in the policy which relates to the time at which the risk is to commence, fixes it at the time of the loading of some goods, however small the quantity may be. [LUSH, J.—If the policy had said in terms, as it does say in effect, that the goods forming part of the outward cargo shall be deemed to be goods put on board on the coast of Africa, if they are not removed within twenty-four hours after the vessel's arrival, that would be "from the loading thereof" within the meaning of the policy.] If it had said both on outward and homeward cargo. [BLACKBURN, J.—I conjecture that the parties did not notice, or that they forgot the existence of, the printed words "shall commence upon the freight and goods or merchandise aforesaid from the loading of the said goods or merchandise on board the said ship or vessel as above." LUSH, J.—Do not these words mean from the time the goods are reloaded on the West Coast of Africa?] It does not say so. [LUSH, J.—But you must admit that if the cargo had been unshipped on the West Coast of Africa, and put on board again the next day, the policy would have attached. Why should they not have agreed to dispense with that unnecessary term?] If that had been done, there would then have been a substantial reloading of the cargo, as pointed out by Cockburn, C. J. in Carr v. Montefiore (5 B. & S. 422). The insurance in that case was at and from port or ports in the River Plate to the United Kingdom, &c., "beginning the adventure upon the said goods and merchandise from the loading thereof aboard the said ship at as above." The cargo had been shipped in Patagonia on board the ship, then bearing another name, destined for England. She arrived at Monte Video, in the River Plate, in a damaged state, and a portion of her cargo was taken out for the purpose of repairing her, and then reloading. On being repaired, she and her cargo were purchased by parties at Monte Video, who changed her name, and the above insurance was afterwards effected. An average loss of the ship and cargo having taken place, it was held that the underwriters were liable. "It is true," said Cockburn, C. J. "there has not been an actual loading on board this ship at Monte Video: and if the authorities establish the conclusion that an actual loading must take place in the port mentioned in the policy, no doubt the defence of the underwriter would be sufficient. But I think Nonnen v. Kettlewell (16 East, 176) establishes sufficiently for the present purpose that there may be a constructive loading at a particular place so as to satisfy the language of such a policy as this. In that case, the cargo having been put on board at a port, the vessel came to that from which she was insured, in order to have the amount of duties ascertained, and the cargo was examined with that view. A portion of it was taken out for the purpose, and when the custom house officers discharged their functions it was put back again; and this was held a sufficient loading of the whole cargo at the second port to satisfy the terms of the policy. According to the authority of that case, therefore, a constructive loading will suffice." In that case there was some loading and unloading; in the present there was none whatever. There must be an actual loading as to part in order that there should be a constructive loading as to the whole. In Rickman v. Carstairs (ubi sup.), Lord Denman, C. J., referring to the memorandum which declared the insurance to be "on the cargo, valued at 4800*l.*," said: "it occurred at one time, to a part of the court, that this raised a presumption that the parties contemplated such a cargo to be the subject of the assurance, as was capable of being valued at the full amount insured, when the policy had attached, i.e., when the ship had arrived twenty-four hours on the coast of Africa, and that the entire cargo, consisting of outward and homeward goods, would alone answer that description. If this were clearly the meaning of this clause, we agree that we might reject or qualify the words "from the loading thereof aboard the said ship," as we certainly might have done if it had been said expressly in the memorandum that the insurance was on the cargo, both outward and homeward, valued at 4800*l.* But the difficulty is to make out that this is clearly the meaning of the memorandum in question." [BLACKBURN, J. referred to Bell v. Hobson (16 East, 240), where the policy was on goods at and from G. to any port in the Baltic, beginning the adventure from the loading thereof on board the ship, and the policy was declared to be in continuation of a former policy, which was a policy from V. to her port of discharge in the United Kingdom, or any ports in the Baltic, with liberty to take in and discharge goods wheresoever, to return 12 per cent. if the voyage ended at G. It was held that the assured were entitled to recover, although the goods were not loaded on board at G., but at V., and although the defendant was not an underwriter on the former policy. Lord Ellenborough, C. J., said: "A very strict, and certainly a construction not to be favoured, and still less to be extended, was adopted in the case of Spitta v. Woodman (2 Taunt. 416), where it was held that the words "beginning the adventure from the loading on board," were to be confined to the place from whence the risk commenced. But if there be anything to indicate that a prior loading was contemplated by the parties, it will release the case from that strict construction. Then can there be anything more indicative of such an understanding between the parties than the statement made at the foot of this policy, that it was in continuation of former policies, which was distinctly upon a voyage from Virginia? This was taking up the voyage from a period in the former policies. The conclusion, therefore, which was drawn in Spitta v. Woodman is completely rebutted by the reference in this policy to an antecedent loading." Is there not the same indication of intention in the present case?] The intention of the parties in that case was to keep the goods continuously insured. There was no continuation here of a former insurance, but a mere getting rid of part of the original insurer's liability.

Herschell, Q. C. (with him Gully), for the plaintiff, were not called upon.

BLACKBURN, J.—I do not think we need trouble Mr. Herschell. Mr. Hill has no doubt, said everything that could be said, but notwithstanding that, I think that his contention is wrong. The ordinary and general rule in the case of a policy of insurance of course is, that we are to take the policy itself; it is in a printed form, with written parts introduced into it, and we are to take the whole together, both the written and the printed parts. Although it has sometimes been said that we ought to bestow no more attention on the written parts than on those printed parts that are uniform in all policies of insurance, there is no doubt that we do, and ought to, make a difference between them. The part that is specially put into a particular instrument is naturally more in harmony with what the parties are intending than the other parts, although it must not be used so as to reject another part, or to make it have no effect. One of the printed parts of a policy, and here it has not been struck out, is that the insurance "shall commence on the freight and goods and merchandise, from the loading of the said goods and merchandise on board the said ship or vessel at as above," which would refer to the voyage as above. That means that the underwriter is not responsible for the goods until they are put on board the vessel for the voyage that is insured, unless there is something stated to the contrary, and so it has been decided. But then in Bell v. Hobson (ubi sup.), which rather derogates from this rule, Lord Ellenborough says it had been held that the words "beginning the adventure from the loading on board" were to be confined to the place from whence the risk commenced; but he adds, "If there be anything to indicate that a prior loading was contemplated by the parties, it will release the case from that strict construction." That I understand to mean that if there be anything on the face of the written instrument (we cannot construe it as importing other matters) to show that the loading was to commence at a prior time, or that the word "loading" was used in a sense different from the mere putting on board, then such a sense should prevail. In the particular case of which Lord Ellenborough was speaking there was a policy on the goods "from the loading at as above," which would mean, apparently, goods loaded at Gottenberg; but it was stated to be in continuation of a policy which was on goods from Virginia to Gottenberg inter alia, and it being so stated, Lord Ellenborough says, "Can there be anything more indicative of such an understanding between the parties than the statement made at the foot of this policy, that it was in continuation of former policies, which were distinctly upon a voyage from Virginia. This was taking up the voyage from the period in the former policies. The conclusion, therefore, which was drawn in Spitta v. Woodman" (that is, that they were to be loaded during the voyage) "is completely rebutted by the reference in this policy to an antecedent loading." Now what is there in that reasoning—which seems to me to be very good and sound sense—which does not apply here? The insurance here is an insurance of 100*l.* "which insurance is hereby declared to be upon cargo, being a re-insurance subject to all clauses and conditions in the original policy, and to pay as may be paid thereon general average and salvage charges to be settled as per foreign statement;" and then the policy proceeds immediately after to say, "lost or not lost, at and from any port or ports, place or places, in any order on the West Coast of Africa to the said vessel's port or ports of call and of discharge in the United Kingdom. And the said company promises and agrees that the insurance aforesaid shall commence upon the freight and goods or merchandise aforesaid, from the loading of the said goods or merchandise on board the said ship or vessel, as above, and continue until the said goods or merchandise be discharged and safely landed at as above." There was nothing to show that the parties contemplated beginning earlier or taking up a prior loading. The goods would appear to be goods shipped on the coast of Africa, and not the outward cargo. But when we look at the policy of re-insurance, which is said to have all the clauses and conditions of the original policy included in it, we find a policy of insurance which, no doubt, began upon cargo at and from Liverpool to any port or ports in Africa, and backwards and forwards to the United Kingdom, with liberty to discharge, &c., valued at 3350*l.*, and "with leave to increase the valuation of the cargo on the homeward voyage, outward cargo to be deemed homeward interest, twenty-four hours after arriving at her first port of discharge." From this it appears that the original policy was to cover the goods that were put on board at Liverpool, to cover the cargo whilst at Africa, and to cover the cargo homeward from Africa. I quite agree with Mr. Hill, that it was quite necessary for the insured, who had leave to increase the valuation of the cargo on the homeward voyage, to say which of these it was; and they say that the cargo loaded at Liverpool, when it had been twenty-four hours on the coast of Africa, and going backwards and forwards, was to be considered as on the homeward voyage; so that the insurance, we may presume, was made after the ship had arrived on the coast of Africa, and does not cover, or propose to cover, any portion of the risk out to Africa. But the case does appear to show, quite as distinctly as was shown in Bell v. Hobson, an indication on the face of the policy that it was intended to cover goods as, in that sense, loaded at Africa, which were on board the ship twenty-four hours after her arrival there, which were, in the former policy, declared to be considered between the parties as part of the homeward interest. It seems to me to be clearly shown that the parties did mean this; that the underwriters meant to say: "We run the risk whilst the ship is at Africa, on all the cargo that is on board at Africa, although it may have been put on board at Liverpool; for such was the prior policy that we are undertaking to re-insure." Taking this view of the matter, I think the plaintiffs are right in their declaration, and that our judgment should be for them.

JOYCE v. THE REALM MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the case of Bell v. Hobson (ubi sup.) is an abundant authority on the question that has arisen.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The policy in question reinsures. It is an agreement by way of indemnity to the plaintiffs, the underwriters on the original policy, for the risk which they had incurred on the homeward voyage. They had insured outward and homeward; and this policy undertakes to guarantee and indemnify them against the risks which they had incurred upon the homeward voyage. The policy says that it shall be subject to all the clauses and conditions of the original policy. The risk was to commence from the loading of the goods on board the ship at some port or place on the coast of Africa. Now by one clause in the original policy the plaintiffs, the other underwriters, had agreed, in effect, that whatever portion of the outward cargo might remain on board for twenty-four hours after the arrival of the vessel on the coast of Africa, that portion should be deemed to have been shipped upon the homeward voyage. That I take to be the meaning and effect of the word "outward cargo to be deemed homeward interest twenty-four hours after her arrival at her first port of discharge." The parties had agreed therefore, that whatever remained of the outward cargo should be just in the same position, as to the liability of the underwriters, as if it had been shipped on the coast of Africa on the homeward voyage. The defendants say, "we will reinsure, and subject to all the claims and conditions of that policy." That, I think, at once enables us to put a meaning upon the terms which express the time when the risk was to commence. It was to commence upon the goods "from the loading thereof on board the said ship." It shows that what was meant by the parties was not the actual loading, but a constructive loading, which was what the original underwriters had agreed to treat as a loading on board for the purpose of the homeward voyage.

reported by J. P. ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

THE WARRIOR.

Collision—Sailing vessel and tug with tow—Duty of tug—Sailing rules—Articles 15 and 19. The fact that a steam tug is towing a vessel against the wind involves no such danger of navigation, and no such special circumstances within the meaning of Article 19 of the Regulations for Prevention of Collisions at Sea, as will justify a departure from the rule (Art. 15) that a steamship shall keep out of the way of a sailing vessel.

THIS was a cause of collision instituted on behalf of the owners of the schooner Triumph against the steam tug Warrior, and her owners intervening. The collision occurred off the Skerries, at about 5.30 a.m. on 17th Feb. 1872. The Triumph was closehauled on the starboard tack, heading S.S.W., and going above knots when she sighted the two mast head lights and starboard light of the Warrior, which was heading due west, and was towing a vessel of about 800 tons burden. The wind was west and blowing a strong breeze, and the tide was flood about three-quarters of an hour before high water, but not running strong. The remaining facts are fully stated in the judgment. The question was whether it was the duty of a steam tug towing a vessel head to wind to give way to a sailing vessel.

Myburgh (Butt, Q.C. with him) for the plaintiffs.

—The tug and tow are to be considered as one vessel, and as the motive power was in the steam tug, the two together are to be considered as a steamer, and it was their duty to get out of the way of the schooner: (The Cleadon, 4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 157; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 41.) The two vessels were approaching, and it would have been an improper manœuvre on the part of the schooner to go about under the bows of the steamer. If the schooner was right in assuming that the steamer would give way, and go under her stern, going about would necessarily have brought the vessels together more rapidly. The master of the tug was bound to have stopped or slowed his engines earlier than he did.

W. C. Gully (Aspinall, Q.C. with him) for the defendants.—The schooner might have avoided the collision by going about when she sighted the steamer a mile off. A steam tug towing a ship cannot be considered as a free ship; and it is much less inconvenient for a sailing vessel close hauled to change her course than for a steam tug. It is the duty, therefore, of a sailing vessel to get out of the way of a tug and her tow: (The Independence, The Arthur Gordon, 4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 563; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 88; Lush. 270) In that case a sailing vessel close hauled was held liable for not getting out of the way of a tug and tow; but the tow was also held liable for not taking measures as soon as the danger became imminent. Here, however, the tug stopped and reversed as soon as she saw the schooner persisted in holding on her course, and is, therefore, not to blame. By law we were not bound to do anything until that time.

Butt, Q.C. in reply.—The Independence (sup.) is distinguishable, as that collision took place in the daylight, and the vessels could see each other; whilst here there was no means of knowing the steamer's course. Moreover, that case was decided in 1861, and the new sailing rules were made in 1862; and by Art. 18, where one of two ships is to keep out of the way, the other shall keep her course. A steamer is bound to make way for a sailing vessel, and therefore the schooner was bound to keep her course. There was no peculiar danger at the time which qualified the rule so as to bring the tug within art. 19.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is a case of collision between a vessel called the Triumph, of 82 tons, with a crew of three hands, and laden with coal, going from Queen's Ferry, in Flintshire, to Dundalk, in Ireland, and the Warrior, a steam tug of 72 tons register, with engines of 80-horse power, and manned by a crew of eight hands. The Warrior, at the time of the collision, was towing a ship called the Woosung, of about 800 tons. The place of collision was four or five miles off the Skerries—to the east of the Skerries. The wind at the time was W., and the tide was flood, about three-quarters of an hour before high water. The night was what is called dark but clear, a description which we are very familiar with in this court. Now the schooner was close hauled on the starboard tack, and heading S.S.W., and, according to her evidence and her narrative, she saw a starboard light and two towing lights of a steamer three points on her port bow about a mile off. The schooner deliberately, as her master has told us this morning, kept her course, conceiving that she lay under an obligation to do so according to the sailing rules. The steamer struck her on the port quarter abaft the main rigging, and she sank soon afterwards. The steamer was towing, as I have said, a ship of 700 or 800 tons, and she saw the port light of the schooner on her starboard beam about a mile off. Now she says that she did nothing till within a hundred yards, continuing to approach the schooner, and when she had come within that distance the schooner hailed her to go astern, which she attempted to do, but she did not quite succeed, and struck the schooner as I have said. The rules applicable to this case are the 15th which is—"If two ships, one of which is a sailing ship and the other a steam ship, are proceeding in such direction as to involve risk of collision, the steam ship shall keep out of the way of the sailing ship;” the 18th, “Where, by the above rules, one of two ships is to keep out of the way, the other shall keep her course subject to the qualifications contained in the following article,” and the 19th, “In obeying and construing these rules due regard must be had to all dangers of navigation; and due regard must also be had to any special circumstances which may exist in any particular case, rendering a departure from the above rules necessary in order to avoid immediate danger.” The steamer’s contention is that her case falls under the 19th rule; that there were dangers of navigation and particular circumstances which justified her in expecting that the schooner would get out of her way, and she alleges that the schooner might safely have done so by tacking or by going under the stern of the vessel in tow, I presume. I have of course taken the opinion of the Elder Brethren on these points, and they are of opinion that there were no dangers of navigation, and no special circumstances which justified a departure from the ordinary rule that a steam ship shall keep out of the way of the sailing vessel, on the contrary, they think that the Warrior might have avoided the collision, according to the evidence of her own master, either by starboarding or by porting at an earlier period than she did, or that she might have stopped at an earlier period, in which case again there would have been no collision. I have considered the case of The Arthur Gordon and The Independance (Lush. 270), but it does not appear to me to affect the conclusion at which I have arrived. I pronounce the Warrior alone to blame for the collision.

Salvage—Collision—Salvor to blame—Right of owners to recover in respect of another vessel—Employment of salvor.

A vessel rendering assistance to another which she has injured in collision cannot claim salvage reward if the collision takes place by her default. The owners, master, and crew of a vessel which renders assistance to a vessel injured by collision are not deprived of their right to salvage reward by the fact that some of the owners are also owners of another vessel by whose misconduct the collision takes place.

A vessel rendering salvage assistance is not deprived of her right to reward by the fact that she is employed by a vessel whose misconduct renders her employment necessary.

Salvage services were rendered by four steamers; one of the steamers had come into collision with the vessel salvaged, and was found to blame, and she rendered the principal services. The value of the property salvaged was 22,200*l*.

Held, that the three vessels not to blame were entitled to reward. The court awarded 410*l*.

Two causes of salvage were instituted against the ship Glengaber, her cargo and freight; the one on behalf of the owners, masters, and crews of the steamtugs Black Prince, Sir George Grey, and Warrior, the other on behalf of the steam ferry-boat Bee. The two causes were heard at the same time before the learned judge, assisted by Trinity Masters.

The Black Prince was a tug of 101 tons register, and had disconnecting engines of ninety-five horse-power nominal, working up to 650 actual. The Sir George Grey was a tug of forty-nine tons register, and had a single engine of fifty horse-power nominal, working up to 150 actual. The Warrior was a tug of seventy-two tons register, with disconnecting engines of ninety horse-power nominal, working up to 360 actual. The Glengaber was an iron ship of 658 tons register, and was at the time of the services rendered laden with a cargo of wheat and flour. The value of the ship cargo, and freight was 22,200*l*.

At about 10.15 p.m. on the 8th April, 1872, the Black Prince was engaged in towing the barque Strathmore up the river Mersey past Monk’s Ferry. Soon afterwards her master who was on the bridge perceived what he described as a black object, which afterwards turned out to be the Glengaber, carrying, as he alleged, no lights, about sixty or seventy yards distant. He immediately stopped his engines and reversed full speed and hailed the Strathmore to starboard her helm and slipped the hawser. The Black Prince brought up short of the port bow of the Glengaber, but the Strathmore going past the tug struck the Glengaber on her starboard bow. The Glengaber dragged her anchors and drifted to the southward with the Strathmore laying across her bows. The Strathmore soon afterwards sunk. The Glengaber came into collision with the barque Indus and set that vessel adrift, and both vessels went away to the southward. The Glengaber was considerably damaged by the collision. The Bee, which was a double-ended steamer working up to about 200 horse-power, took hold of the Indus, and afterwards made fast to the Glengaber, and towed to the westward to take the strain off the Indus; she towed thus for twenty minutes, and then, at the request of the mate of the Glengaber, went to fetch the master of that vessel from Rock Ferry. In the meantime the Black Prince came up and made fast to the Glengaber and checked their drifting. The Sir George Grey then came up and offered her services to the master of the Glengaber, but according to the defendants’ evidence they were refused; by the plaintiffs’ account, however, they were accepted—whether by the Black Prince or by the Glengaber was uncertain—and she made fast ahead of the Black Prince, and towed ahead. They stopped the drifting, and held her steady for a short time. The weather was then blowing a moderate gale. The Bee meanwhile had returned, and was made fast along the port side of the Glengaber and went ahead full speed to hold her against the tide, and continued to do so until high water, about midnight. The hawser of the Sir George Grey was then cut, and the Black Prince went alongside, her hawser also being cut. The Black Prince was made fast to the starboard side, and the Sir George Grey to the port side of the Glengaber; the Bee being lashed to the stern to cant her head to the eastward. At 1 a.m. of the 9th, the Black Prince again got her hawser out ahead; the Sir George Grey let go and went away; the Bee was again lashed alongside, and with the ebb tide the Glengaber was got clear of the Indus. The Glengaber was then towed down the river to the entrance of the Alfred Dock. The Warrior then came up and offered her services, and she was lashed alongside the Glengaber and assisted in holding her up. The Bee run short of coal about 9 a.m., and went away. The wreck was then cleared away with the assistance of some shipwrights and another tug. The Black Prince then let go, and the Warrior and the other tug towed the Glengaber into the Alfred basin, and after some delay into the Alfred Dock, where she was moored in safety at about 2 p.m. It was admitted that Edward and William Griffiths were registered owners of thirty and sixteen sixty-fourth shares respectively in the Black Prince, and also of thirty-two and twenty-six sixty-fourth shares in the Warrior. A cause of collision was instituted against the Black Prince, by the owners of the Glengaber, in respect of this collision, and another cause by the same persons against the owners of the Strathmore. The first cause came on for hearing before the present salvage suit, and the Black Prince was held to have failed in her defence, although the question of the extent to which she was to blame, was reserved until after the cause against the Strathmore was heard. The present salvage suit came on for hearing after the cause against the Black Prince, and before the cause against the Strathmore.

Aspinall, Q.C. and Gully, for the plaintiffs, owners, masters, and crew of the Black Prince, the Warrior, and the Sir George Grey.

Pickering, Q.C. and Potter, for the plaintiffs, owners, master, and crew of the Bee.

Milward, Q.C. and Myburgh, for the defendants, submitted that the Black Prince was not entitled to salvage reward, on the ground that she was a wrongdoer, having been found to blame for the collision; that the Warrior came under the same rule as her owners were also owners of the Black Prince, and could not therefore benefit by their own wrong; that the Sir George Grey having been employed by a wrongdoer could not recover. The services of the Sir George Grey and the Warrior were small.

Aspinall, Q.C. in reply.

June 14th.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The inconvenience which arose in the preceding collision case (against the Black Prince) from the absence of the evidence in the Strathmore, follows to a certain extent these cases of salvage, which were the consequences of that act of collision, and it is very much to be regretted, though it cannot be helped, owing to the exigencies of the case, that the court has not before it the evidence with regard to the Strathmore, so as to be enabled to deal with the whole of the question; for, although it is divided into a variety of suits, in reality it is impossible to make a fair decision with respect to the case now before me without remembering the previous history of the case. There are some points of law upon which the court must express an opinion before it proceeds to assess the quantum of award which it thinks due to the salvors in this case. I have already decided that the Black Prince failed in her defence as defendant in the suit of collision brought by the Glengaber against her, and I must now decide that the Black Prince, which was towing the vessel which ran into the Glengaber, and which, to some extent at least—to what extent may depend hereafter when the case of the Strathmore is fully examined—must be considered with the Strathmore as one vessel, and, as the cause of the collision, cannot recover in this court, as a ship rendering salvage service, the necessity of which her own misconduct has occasioned. I must, however, remember that although the Black Prince is not in my judgment entitled, for the reason that I have stated, to be considered as a salvor, I must carefully bear in mind her power in rendering the services which were performed subsequently to the collision, because that power which she possessed must very much affect the judgment of the court with respect to the other salvors. I shall dismiss the claim of the Black Prince with costs. With regard to the Warrior, it has been contended in limine that that vessel is not entitled to be considered as a salvor because upon cross-examination it appeared that some of her owners were also owners of the Black Prince. I am not inclined to allow that objection to prevail. I foresee very grave consequences which might result from it, and a very great deal of expense in the conduct of these suits. But, on principle, I do not think the objection can stand: certainly, it could only stand with regard to those owners themselves, and could not in any way affect the claim of those who were not joint owners of the Black Prince, and could not affect the crew who assisted as salvors; but I know of no precedent for saying that because a vessel belongs to the same owner as the vessel which has done the mischief (being wholly unconnected with the act of mischief itself, and their being no suggestion of any conspiracy—which, of course, would create a totally different state of circumstances—no suggestion of any conspiracy between the two vessels, the one to cause the mischief and the other to assist in remedying it), such a vessel cannot recover salvage reward. I know of no case in which such a suggestion has been put forward, and therefore know of no instance in which it has been sustained, therefore I do not uphold it in the present case; and I think the Warrior, if entitled to salvage, is not disentitled to it because some of her owners are also owners of the Black Prince. I must also say a word with regard to the Sir George Grey, which is said to be disentitled to be a salvor, because she was employed by the Black Prince, an objection I must also decline to uphold. The Black Prince's misconduct cannot extend beyond herself. The Sir George Grey appears to me to have reasonably supposed in these circumstances, though the communication was more directly with the Black Prince, that she was in fact employed on behalf of the Glengaber. And then I must say a word with respect to the Bee. Now the Bee, it is admitted, and very properly admitted, has conducted herself from first to last in a manner which entitles her to a considerable salvage remuneration in proportion to her efforts, and also to the value of the property which she saved. That value appears to amount to 22,000*l.* It is quite true, as has been observed, that there was no risk of life or property in any of these services, not even in the services of the Bee, which seem to have extended over eleven hours, during half of which time, without entering into the details of the petition, which has been read by Mr. Pickering, and which is assented to with a trifling alteration by the defendants, her services in the opinion of the court supported by that of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House, are to be considered as of great value in the preservation of the property. I shall award the Bee 300*l.* I think, as I have already said, that the Warrior or the Sir George Grey were both salvors, but I quite assent that their services were comparatively of a trifling character. I shall award to the Sir George Grey, which I think is entitled to a somewhat larger amount of remuneration than the Warrior, as she seems to have been of more service in keeping the Black Prince in position at the time the Black Prince was rendering assistance, I shall award to the Sir George Grey 60*l.*, and to the Warrior 50*l.*; and with regard to their costs I think they are entitled to their costs, because I think the case has been properly brought in this court, for various reasons; amongst others, the principal cause itself being here, it was more convenient to the suitors, and probably a great saving of expense, that all the other suits connected with that cause should also be dealt with by this court, and that is the award I now make.

Limitation of liability—Collision—Two vessels damaged—Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), s. 54.

A shipowner, whose vessel injures two other vessels in a collision on one occasion and by one act of improper navigation, does not incur in respect of each of those vessels a separate liability beyond the limitation of liability provided for by the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, s. 54, and is entitled to have his liability limited as for one collision.

THIS was a cause of limitation of liability instituted on behalf of George Elliot, the owner of the steamship Rajah, against the owner of the tug Admiral and her master and crew, and the owner of the ship William Davie, and all other persons having any interest in the said tug and ship, or in the cargo, &c., on board of them, with reference to a collision between the Rajah, the Admiral, and the William Davie, on the 11th Feb. 1872. On that date, according to the plaintiff's petition, the Rajah, at one and the same time, came into collision with the Admiral and the William Davie, and the Admiral sank and the William Davie was much injured. The cargo of the latter vessel was not injured. The owners of the William Davie and the owners of the Admiral respectively instituted suits of collision against the Rajah in this court, and the owner intervened as defendant, and bail was given. The owner of the Rajah admitted his liability, and by his petition prayed the court, there being no loss of life, to limit his liability to an aggregate amount not exceeding 8*l.* per ton on the gross tonnage of the Rajah, and to stay proceedings in the collision suits on payment into court of that aggregate amount. The defendants filed separate answers alleging that the Admiral was in the mouth of the river Thames, about to take hold of and tow the William Davie, which was then lying at anchor; that the Admiral was a short distance off the starboard bow of the William Davie, and, with her engines working a head, was being kept in position to enable those on board her to obtain the tow rope of the William Davie; that "under these circumstances the Rajah, which was coming down the river under steam, ran into and damaged the William Davie, and then ran into and sank the Admiral." This allegation, which was intended to raise the point that these were two separate collisions, was admitted by the plaintiffs to be true.

Butt, Q.C. (Pritchard with him) for the plaintiffs.—The defendants are going to contend that these were separate collisions, and that the plaintiffs are, therefore, liable for 8*l.* per ton twice over. I submit that, although the blows doing damage were, perhaps, at different moments, it was substantially on one occasion and one collision. Their contention arises on the wording of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), sect. 54, (a) which only deals with damage to "any other ship or boat" in the singular number. The real test is, whether this is to be considered as two distinct collisions, or, as being on the same occasion, only one collision. If the latter, then the plaintiff is entitled to his limitation. The Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), sect. 506, (b) shows that collisions must be on distinct occasions to create a separate liability.

Clarkson for the defendants.—Sect. 506 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 was not enacted for the benefit of the shipowner but for the benefit of those injured by collision, and in order to prevent this defence being set up by shipowners where their vessels had injured several other vessels on the same voyage. The Admiral and the William Davie were separate, and the injury done was to two vessels by improper navigation under sect. 54 of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862. The plaintiffs are, therefore, not entitled to the limitation prayed.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I take a different view of the construction put upon this section from that put forward by Mr. Clarkson. I think that the true construction to be put upon the statute is that the liability there limited has reference to one and the same accident, if it may be so called, and that it is not intended that where a vessel and a tug lying close to each other are struck almost at the same time, and as a result of the same act of improper navigation, that there should be a double liability. I am of opinion that this claim for limitation of liability is founded upon a just conception of the meaning of the statute, and I shall grant the prayer of the petition.

(a) The section, as far as material, is as follows:—The owners of any ship, whether British or foreign, shall not, in cases where all or any of the following events occur without their actual fault or privity, that is to say,

4. Where any loss or damage is by reason of the improper navigation of such ship as aforesaid, caused to any other ship or boat, or to any goods, merchandise, or other thing whatsoever on board any other ship or boat;

Be answerable in damages in respect of loss or damage to ships, goods, &c., to an aggregate amount exceeding 8*l.* for each ton of the ship's tonnage, &c.

(b) That section is as follows:—The owner of every sea-going ship, or share therein, shall be liable in respect of every such loss of life, personal injury, loss of, or damage to, goods as aforesaid, arising on distinct occasions to the same extent as if no other loss injury, or damage, had arisen.

Sect. 54 of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 13, is substituted by that Act for sect. 504 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854.

Proctors for the plaintiffs, Pritchard and Sons.

Solicitor for the Admiral, Thomas Cooper.

Proctor for the William Davie, Cyrus Waddlove.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT OF MICHIGAN.—IN ADMIRALTY.

THE SCHOONER MARQUETTE.

Salvage—Agreed compensation—Proceedings in rem and in personam.

A salvor by contract is not an agent of the owners, and has no claim against the property saved beyond the contract price.

A contract by salvors with owners for an agreed amount to be paid in any event, creates only a personal obligation on the part of the owners.

A wrecking company which had agreed to raise a sunken schooner for a certain proportion of her value, hired of the libellant a diver and certain apparatus.

Held, that the libellant, having knowledge of the contract, could not maintain a libel in rem.

LONGYEAR, J., delivered the opinion of the court.—The Marquette was sunk in the Straits of Mackinaw, by a collision, and abandoned by her owners to the underwriters, and there lay then sunken in about fifteen fathoms of water. The underwriters contracted with the North-Western Wrecking Company, a corporation organised under the laws of Ohio for the raising of sunken vessels, to raise the Marquette and place her in Clark's dry dock in the city of Detroit, for six-tenths of the vessel. The North-Western Wrecking Company entered upon the performance of their contract, under the charge and supervision of Milo Osborne, and after working at the wreck for several days found that on account of the great depth of water in which the wreck lay, the services of a diver were necessary. The libellant, who was also in the wrecking business, was then engaged in raising a wreck in Beaver Harbour, near Beaver Island, a few miles distant from the wreck of the Marquette. He had divers in his employ, and owned and had in use the necessary diving armour and apparatus, a hand pump, a steam pump, etc., adapted to the purposes of wrecking. He was also the patentee of a new invention for raising sunken vessels, which consisted mainly in sinking casks filled with water, and then, after being fastened to the vessel, inflating them with air by the use of a steam pump and connecting tubes or pipes, and thus expelling the water and giving the casks a lifting power. Osborne, who was in charge of the work for the North-Western Wrecking Company, applied to and obtained of the libellant a diver and the necessary armour and apparatus, including a hand pump. After working a short time it was found that the hand pump was not sufficient for the divers to operate with safety in so great depth of water, and Osborne returned the hand pump and obtained libellant's steam pump. After working a few days longer, and not making much progress, Osborne returned to libellant the diver, apparatus and pump, and had a settlement with him up to that time, and paid libellant what was then found to be his due at the rate of 50dols. per day with the hand pump, and 75dols. per day with the steam pump, less a small deduction made by libellant at the request of Osborne. Osborne desired the use of the diver, etc., longer, but complained that they could not afford it at the price charged by libellant. A new arrangement was then entered into, and Osborne returned to the Marquette with two divers who were in the employ of the libellant, the necessary armour and apparatus, and the steam pump, and taking with him also some of libellant's casks to be used on his patented plan, and had the same for use in raising the wreck thirty-four consecutive days, and until the vessel was finally raised. The divers, &c., were actually used twenty-eight, and were idle six days out of the thirty-four days. It is for this use, under the new arrangement, that the libellant brings this suit against the vessel. During this time the libellant came along where the company were at work, on his way to Cleveland, with the vessel he had been raising, and left a small vessel, called the Barbour, and his chains, anchors, additional casks, &c., and the same were used by the company to some extent, but no additional claim is made for such use. On the Marquette being raised she was taken to Detroit by the North-Western Wrecking Company, and placed in Clark's dry dock, in complete fulfilment of their contract with the underwriters, and its interest of six-tenths in the vessel, her boats, &c., thereupon accrued to them, and the company has intervened and put in its claim and answer for the protection of that interest. The libellant and Osborne, both of whom were sworn as witnesses and testified in the case, agree that the divers were in the employ of the libellant, and that he was to be paid for their services, as well as for the use of the armour, apparatus, pump, &c. They also agree that libellant's compensation was not dependent upon success, but that he was to be paid at all events, whether the vessel was raised or not. It is true they do not say this in so many words, but the version which each gives of what the contract was under the new arrangement admits of no other construction. They are also agreed as to the time, viz., thirty-four days, and that twenty-eight of those were working days, and six of them they were idle. The main facts upon which there is any disagreement, are, as to whether there was a fixed rate of compensation agreed upon, or whether it was left to a quantum meruit, and as to whether the libellant knew, or was informed of the character or capacity in which the company was operating, that is, that they were operating as contractors, and not as owners. The libellant claims that the rate of compensation agreed upon was 75 dols. per day when working, and half-price, or 37.50 dols. per day, when idle. On this basis, he claims as follows:

6 idle days at 37.50 dols.	225
Total	2325
Less payment conceded.....	310

lant claims a decree in his favour against the vessel. On the other hand, the company claims that no fixed rate of compensation was agreed upon; but on the contrary, that when Osborne complained that they could not afford to pay 75 dols. per day, that libellant told him to take the divers, &c., and use them, and he would be reasonable with them, or words to that effect, and that that was the agreement as to compensation. But without pursuing this disputed point further now, I will proceed to the other disputed fact. And here I must hold that libellant had notice of the character or capacity in which the company was operating. Libellant, in his testimony, says: "I understood the North-Western Wrecking Company had taken the job to raise the vessel, and had failed. I did not know how much they had taken the job for." He understood, then, that the company was not operating as owner, but had undertaken the raising of the vessel as a "job," and the only point as to which he professes not to have been informed, was, how much they were to receive for the service. This is sufficient alone to settle this point. But there is further testimony, which I think places it beyond all doubt that libellant knew, not only that the company was operating as contractor, but also the terms of the contract. Osborne, after producing in evidence the contract (which was in writing), between the North-Western Wrecking Company and the underwriters, testifies positively and explicitly, as follows: "I made known to Captain Falcon that we had such a contract; that I deemed it a good one, and that I wished him to go in with me and share in the results," &c. That was at the time we were at Beaver Harbour. He replied that he wanted nothing to do with the wreck—that he wanted the money. He said they were slow things to realise from. I told him that we were to have six-tenths, and that they ought to be raised in a very short time—we deemed it a good contract." In this Osborne is not contradicted. On the libellant being re-called to the witness stand, and asked if any such conversation took place, says, "none that I recollect;" and this is all the denial he makes, which in fact is no denial. But it is contended on behalf of libellant, that the North-Western Wrecking Company were in fact part owners of the vessel to the extent of the six-tenths which they were to have under their contract with the underwriters in case of success, and which finally accrued to it. I cannot agree to this. The company was operating precisely the same as any salvors under contract, and the agreement as to the six-tenths was simply fixing the quantum of compensation in lieu of leaving it for after consideration between the parties, or to be determined by the court. Besides that, it was wholly conditional upon success, and it accrued to it only from the time the contract was fully performed. By no known principle of law or in reason, can it be held to relate back to any previous period, so as to affect the interests of those who were owners of the vessel at the time the contract was entered into. The company must, therefore, be held to have sustained the relation of contract merely, at the time the agreement between libellant and Osborne was entered into. The case, then, is that of a person having rendered a service to salvors for a compensation to be paid at all events, who were themselves operating under a contract with the owners known to such person claiming and seeking to enforce a lien upon the vessel saved, independently and irrespectively of such latter contract, and of the compensation as fixed by it. The learned advocate for the libellant has referred the court to no adjudicated case in which this was allowed to be done, and to no authority or even dictum to that effect; and after a most careful and searching investigation, the court has been able to find none. On the contrary, the authorities are all the other way. The case of The Whittaker (Sprague's decision, 229, and same case at p. 242), and that of one hundred tons of iron (2 Benedict's D. C. Reps. 21), are quite analogous to the present case. Both cases were, in fact, more favourable to the libellant than the present. In the case of The Whittaker, Holbrook, the original contractor, after vain efforts to get the vessel off, gave the job over entirely to one Otis, at an expense largely beyond the contract price, succeeded in getting the vessel off, and then libelled her for his pay. Judge Sprague dismissed the libel, for the reason that Holbrook, the original contractor, was not made a party. Afterwards, upon a new libel, in which Holbrook was joined, the court granted a decree to Holbrook and Otis, jointly, limiting them to the original contract price, although it was less than half what Otis had expended. In that case, also, Otis' compensation was dependent upon success, while, in the present case, as we have seen, libellant was to be compensated at all events. In the case of one hundred tons of iron, libellant had hired to the owners seven large blocks, to be used by them in endeavouring to get their vessel off the beach, at 5 dols. per day, with an express stipulation that the vessel should be responsible for hire and damage, and for the return of the blocks. The hire not having been paid, and the blocks having been lost, libellant brought his suit, in rem, against one hundred tons of iron which was of the cargo and had been recovered from the vessel. Judge Blatchford dismissed the libel, not only on the ground that a pledging of the vessel was not a pledging of the cargo, but mainly on the broad ground that the libellant had no claim whatever as a salvor, giving as a reason that the hire of the blocks was for a fixed compensation which was to be paid at all events whether the vessel was saved or not, which is exactly the present case according to the libellant's own theory. In that case also, it is to be observed, the contract was made with the master of the vessel, and it purported to pledge the vessel for its fulfilment, and yet the court held that the libellant could not recover in the Admiralty, either in rem or in personam. In this case, not only was the contract not made with master or owner, but the libellant expressly refused to have anything to do with the wreck. I think both of these cases are sustained by authority as well as on principle. The case of the Whittaker was decided on the principle that a salvor by contract, like the North-Western Wrecking company in this case, is not an agent for the owners, and cannot create against the owners, or the property saved, any obligation or liability beyond the contract price, or, it may be added as applicable to this case, a different mode of payment than that expressed in the contract; and I think there can be no dispute as to the soundness of that doctrine. The most that the court could do in any event, would be to let the libellant in to share the contract price with the original contractor. But the court cannot do that in this case without making a new contract for the parties, because, as we have seen, libellant expressly refused to share the contract price or have anything to do with the wreck at the time the agreement between him and the company was made. The case of one hundred tons of iron was decided on the principle that the hiring, as in the present case, was for a compensation to be paid at all events, whether the vessel was saved or not. The same principle was also stated and acted on by Judge Sprague, in the case of the Whittaker, in deciding another branch of the case than that above alluded to. See also the Independence (2 Curtis Circuit Court Reps. 350, 355), where the same doctrine is enunciated by Judge Curtis in the following language: "In my judgment, a contract to be paid at all events, either a sum certain, or a reasonable sum, for work, labour, and the hire of a steamer or other vessel attempting to relieve a vessel in distress, without regard to the success or failure of the efforts thus procured, is inconsistent with a claim for salvage, and when such a contract has been fairly made, it must be held binding by a court of admiralty, and any claim for salvage disallowed." It must be understood that the nature of the claim as a salvage claim is not changed simply because the service was rendered by contract. It is well settled that the nature of the service as a salvage service is not changed for reason alone. It is because that by the contract the compensation is to be paid at all events, whether the property is saved or not, that a claim for salvage cannot be maintained; such a contract creates a mere personal obligation, and no lien attaches on account of it. I hold, therefore, that the libellant in this case cannot maintain a suit in rem in this court, for the reasons, first, that the services having been so rendered under an agreement with a contract, itself operating for a specific compensation, and not with the owner or master of the vessel, he cannot, in any event, maintain a suit against the vessel except by joining with such original contractor and sharing with him the compensation so agreed upon between him and the owners; secondly, that he could not maintain such suit in this case, because by the very terms of his agreement he was not so to share; thirdly, that he was to be paid at all events, whether the vessel was saved or not. The libellant undoubtedly has a remedy against the North Western Wrecking Company, in some form of action, but not in this. Having arrived at these conclusions, it is unnecessary to determine the specific compensation the libellant was to receive, whether a per diem, or a quantum meruit, or how much. The libel must be dismissed with costs; but, inasmuch as the merits of the case as between the libellant and the North-Western Wrecking Company are not decided, it must be without prejudice as between them.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

December Term, 1871.

HALL et al. v. THE NASHVILLE AND CHATTANOOGA RAILROAD COMPANY.Marine and fire insurance—Carrier and underwriter—Respective liabilities—Subrogation.Where goods upon which an insurance has been effected are delivered to a common carrier, he is primarily liable for any loss which may occur,but is entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the assured as against the insurer.The principle of subrogation applies equally in the case of fire and marine insurance.Where a loss arises by the fault of the carrier, the insurer who pays the amount of it to the assured is entitled to use his name in a suit to recover damages against the carrier.

STRONG, J. delivered the opinion of the court.—It is too well settled by the authorities to admit of question that, as between a common carrier of goods and an underwriter upon them, the liability to the owner for their loss or destruction is primarily upon the carrier, while the liability of the insurer is only secondary. The contract of the carrier may not be first in order of time, but it is first and principal in ultimate liability. In respect to the ownership of the goods, and the risk incident thereto, the owner and the insurer are considered but one person, having together the beneficial right to the indemnity due from the carrier for a breach of his contract or for non-performance of his legal duty. Standing thus, as the insurer does, practically, in the position of a surety, stipulating that the goods shall not be lost or injured in consequence of the peril insured against, whenever he has indemnified the owner for the loss, he is entitled to all the means of indemnity which the satisfied owner held against the party primarily liable. His right rests upon familiar principles of equity. It is the doctrine of subrogation, dependent not at all upon privity of contract, but worked out through the right of the creditor or owner. Hence it has often been ruled that an insurer who has paid a loss, may use the name of the assured in an action to obtain redress from the carrier whose failure of duty caused the loss. It is conceded that this doctrine prevails in cases of marine insurance, but it is denied that it is applicable to cases of fire insurance upon land, and the reason for the supposed difference is said to be that the insurer in a marine policy becomes the owner of the lost or injured property by abandonment of the assured, while in land policies there can be no abandonment. But it is a mistake to assert that the right of insurers in marine policies to proceed against a carrier of the goods after they have paid a total loss, grows wholly, or even principally, out of any abandonment. There can be no abandonment where there has been total destruction. There is nothing upon which it can operate, and an insured may recover for a total loss without it. It is laid down in Phillips on Insurance (sect. 1723), that "a mere payment of a loss, whether partial or total, gives the insurers an equitable title to what may afterwards be recovered from other parties on account of the loss," and that "the effect of a payment of a loss is equivalent in this respect to that of abandonment." There is then no reason for the subrogation of insurers by marine policies to the rights of the assured against a carrier by sea which does not exist in support of a like subrogation in case of an insurance against fire on land. Nor do the authorities make any distinction between the cases, though a carrier may, by stipulation with the owner of the goods, obtain the benefit of insurance. In Gales v. Hailman (11 Penn. St. 515), it was ruled that a shipper who had received from his insurer the part of the loss insured against, might sue the carrier on the contract of bailment in his own right, not only for the unpaid balance due to himself, but as trustee for what had been paid by the insurer in aid of the carrier, and that the court would restrain the carrier from setting up the insurer's payment of his part of the loss as partial satisfaction. So in Hart et al. v. The Western Railroad Company (13 Met., Mass.), it was held that where underwriters had paid a loss by fire caused by a locomotive of a railroad corporation, the owner might recover also from the corporation for the use of the underwriters, and that he could not release the action brought by them in his name. There is also a large class of cases in which attempts have been made by insurers who had paid a loss to recover from the party in fault for it, by suit in their own right, and not in the right of the assured. Such attempts have failed, but in all the cases it has been conceded that suits might have been maintained in the name of the insured party for the use of the insurers: (Rockingham Mutual Fire Insurance Company v. Bosher, 39 Maine, 253; Peoria Ins. Co. v. Frost, 37 Ill. 333; Conn. Mu. Life Ins. Co. v. New York and New Haven R. R. Co. 25 Conn. 265.) And such is the English doctrine settled at an early period: (Mason v. Lainsburg, 3 Dougl. 60; Yates v. Whyte, 4 Bing. N. C. 272; Clark v. Blything, 2 B. & C. 254; Randall v. Cochran, 1 Ves. sen. 98.) It has been argued however, that these decisions rest upon the doctrine that a wrongdoer is to be punished; that the defendants against whom such actions have been maintained were wrongdoers; but that, in the present case, the fire by which the insured goods were destroyed was accidental, without fault of the defendants, and therefore that they stood, in relation to the owner at most in the position of double insurers. The argument will not bear examination. A carrier is not an insurer, though often loosely so called. The extent of his responsibility may be equal to that of an insurer, and even greater, but its nature is not the same. His contract is not one for indemnity, independent of the care and custody of the goods. He is not entitled to a cession of the remains of the property, or to have the loss adjusted on principles peculiar to the contract of insurance; and when a loss occurs, unless caused by the act of God, or of a public enemy, he is always in fault. The law raises against him a conclusive presumption of misconduct, or breach of duty, in relation to every loss not caused by excepted perils. Even if innocent, in fact, he has consented by his contract to be dealt with as if it were not so. He does not stand, therefore, on the same footing with that of an insurer, who may have entered into his contract of indemnity, relying upon the carrier's vigilance and responsibility. In all cases, when liable at all, it is because he is proved, or presumed to be, the author of the loss. There is nothing, then, to take the case in hand out of the general rule that an underwriter who has paid a loss is entitled to recover what he has paid by a suit in the name of the assured against a carrier who caused the loss. The judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded for further proceedings.

JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

Reported by DOUGLAS KINGSFORD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

March 22 and May 10, 1872.

(Present: The Right Hons. Sir JAMES W. COLVILLE, Lord Justice JAMES, Sir MONTAGUE E. SMITH, and Sir R. P. COLLIER.)

THE AUSTRALASIAN STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY v. MORSE.

Ship—Authority of master to sell cargo—Necessity for sale—Communication with owner—Telegraph—General cargo.

The authority of the master of a ship to sell the goods of the absent owner is derived from the necessity of the situation in which he is placed; and, consequently, to justify his thus dealing with the goods he must establish (1) a necessity for the sale; and (2) inability to communicate with the owner and obtain his directions.

Under these conditions, and by force of them, the master becomes the agent of the owner, not only with the power but under the obligation (within certain limits) of acting for him; but he is not entitled to substitute his own judgment for the will of the owner in selling the goods if it is possible to communicate with the owner and ascertain his will.

There is a "necessity" for the sale, if, under the circumstances of the case, a sale is the best and most prudent thing to be done for the interest of the owner.

The possibility of communicating with the owner depends on the circumstances of each case, involving a consideration of the facts which create the urgency for an early sale; the distance of the port from the owners, the means of communication which exist, and the general position of the master in the particular emergency.

Such communication only needs to be made where an answer can be obtained, or there is a reasonable expectation that it can be obtained, before sale; where, however, there is ground for such an expectation, every endeavour, so far as the position in which he is placed will allow, should be made by the master to obtain the owner's instructions.

The master is bound to employ the telegraph as a means of communication, where it can usefully be done; but the state of the particular telegraph, the way in which it is managed, and the possibility of transmitting explanatory messages, are proper subjects to be considered in determining the question of the practicability of communication.

The fact that the master cannot communicate with all the owners of a general cargo, does not of itself justify him in selling without communication with any of the owners; but this fact, increasing the embarrassment of the master, is to be considered when an estimate of his conduct has to be formed.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Court of New South Wales, bearing date 7th March, 1870, whereby a rule nisi to set aside the verdict for the defendants obtained in this case, and to grant a new trial, was made absolute, with a direction that the costs of the first trial and of making the said rule absolute should abide the event.

The action was commenced by the respondents against the appellants. The declaration alleged, in the first count, the conversion by the appellants of certain bales of wool, the property of the respondents, and in the residue of the declaration sued for money had and received, and for money due on accounts stated.

The appellants pleaded to the first count that the wool was shipped on board of a vessel of the appellants, called the Boomerang, to be carried from Rockhampton, in the colony of Queensland, to Sydney, and there (excepting certain perils and casualties of the sea and navigation) delivered to the plaintiffs; that the ship in the course of her voyage stranded, and the wool became saturated with sea water, and that the appellants were compelled to take it back to Rockhampton, and then, after survey, sold it, as the only proper course to pursue in its then state, for the benefit of the plaintiffs.

To the residue of the declaration the appellants pleaded payment into court of 124*l.* 1*s.* 6*d.*

The plaintiffs replied to the first plea:—First, joinder of issue; secondly, that the wool might, at small expense, have been dried and re-packed, and forwarded to Sydney; and thirdly, as to the second plea, that the money paid into court was not sufficient.

Issue was joined on these replications.

Five other similar actions were about the same time commenced in the said Supreme Court against the appellants by other parties, owners of wool shipped on board the Boomerang.

The case was tried in the said Supreme Court before Sir Alfred Stephen, Chief Justice of the said court, on the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd March 1869, when evidence (part of which had been obtained on commissions to examine witnesses in England, and in Queensland, in one of the said other actions, and was, by consent of the parties, read as evidence in this action), was given to the following effect:—

The plaintiff was a wool producer in Queensland, at a station 120 miles inland from Port Mackay, and in the month of December 1865, nineteen bales of wool were sent by him to Rockhampton, a distance southward of about 250 miles, and at the latter port were transhipped by his agent on board the steam vessel Boomerang, belonging to the appellants, for conveyance from Rockhampton to Sydney, in the colony of New South Wales, a further distance of above 900 miles. The bales were consigned to Messrs. Willis, Merry, and Lloyd, merchants in Sydney, for the purpose of shipment to England.

The said nineteen bales formed portion of a cargo comprising 260 bales of wool, or thereabouts, consigned to nineteen separate consignees in Sydney aforesaid (including the plaintiffs in the said other five actions), and four parcels deliverable to order.

The Boomerang on her voyage, about forty-five miles from Rockhampton, struck upon a rock and filled, and the whole of her cargo became submerged and more or less damaged by sea water. The cargo was thereupon with great labour taken out of the Boomerang, transhipped in a steam vessel, the Yaamba, sent from Rockhampton for the purpose, and brought back to Rockhampton. In the course of transshipment from the Boomerang many of the bales of wool unavoidably burst open, and the wool belonging to different consignees became mixed, and the wool on its return to Rockhampton, to which place it was conveyed with reasonable dispatch, was dirty and stank and was heated and in danger of ignition. The weather was rainy, and there were no stores in the town of Rockhampton in which the wool could have been unpacked and dried, and the wool was in immediate peril of increased and serious damage. Under these circumstances, at the instance of the appellants' agent at Rockhampton, the wool brought back there was surveyed by Charles Haynes Morgan, Lloyd's agent there, together with Capt. Robert Millar Hunter, of the same place, merchant, who reported to the appellants' agent that the wool was becoming rapidly heated, and was in such a condition that it could not be re-shipped with safety, and recommended that it should be sold immediately; whereupon and owing to the urgency of the case, the cargo, with the exception of two or three parcels, was, with the approval of the captain of the Boomerang, sold at public auction by the appellants' agent.

At the said trial the Judge proposed the following questions for the determination of the jury:

First, Was the wool in such a state that it could safely be conveyed to Sydney? Secondly, Could the defendants, with the means obtainable by them, have dried, repacked, and forwarded the wool to the port of its destination? Thirdly, If they could have done this at all, could they have done it without incurring an expense considerably exceeding the amount of freight? Fourthly, Did the defendants, time and circumstances considered, act for the best and as wise and prudent men for the interest of the plaintiffs? Fifthly, Had the defendants, considering all the circumstances of the case, time and opportunity to obtain instructions from the owners? Sixthly, Was the master of the vessel a participator in the proceedings thus taken, or a consenting party to such proceedings?

The jury answered the first, second, third, and fifth of the above questions in the negative, and the fourth and sixth in the affirmative, and thereupon a verdict was entered for the appellants.

On the 11th March 1869, the respondents obtained a rule nisi to set aside the verdict and for a new trial, which was made absolute on the 7th March 1870, Sir Alfred Stephen, the Chief Justice of the said court who tried the case, dissenting from the opinion of Hargrave and Cheeke, JJ., who formed the majority of the court.

The appellants then presented a petition to the Supreme Court, praying for leave to appeal to the Queen in Council; but the petition was refused with costs, on the ground that the rule did not involve directly or indirectly any claim respecting property of the value of 500*l.* sterling. The total amount, however, which the respondents sought to recover as damages from the appellants was for the value of 103 bales of wool, estimated at 1750*l.* and upwards.

The appellants subsequently obtained special leave to appeal, on the ground that, though under the appealable value, the case involved an important point of mercantile law.

March 22 — Sir R. Palmer, Q.C. and Archibald for the appellants.—The jury were properly directed by the Chief Justice, and their findings upon the several questions put to them are conclusive as to the matters of fact involved. The findings of the jury were in accordance with the evidence. Having regard to the state of the cargo, and the means at the appellants' disposal, and all the circumstances of the case, the appellants were justified in selling the cargo of the Boomerang without communicating with the consignees.

Sir J. Karslake, Q.C. and Thesiger for the respondents.—The verdict was against evidence and against law. The questions submitted to the jury, as the sole questions of fact for their determination, were calculated to mislead; especially the fourth of those questions, which omitted all reference to “urgent necessity,” or “necessity” as the sole ground for any sale of the wool by the appellants; thus putting it to the jury as merely a question of expediency. The attention of the jury was not directed to the state of the specific bales of wool belonging to the respondents, as distinguished from those belonging to other consignees. The cases cited for the appellants show that an absolute necessity for sale must be proved. The judge ought to have told the jury that the master of the Boomerang was bound to use reasonable exertions to dry the wool; and that the wool ought not to have been sold, unless nothing better could reasonably have been done to preserve it from destruction; whereas the questions submitted to the jury presented other and difficult considerations on this point. The owners or consignees of the cargo might have been communicated with, within a time not inconvenient under the circumstances of the case. The questions put to the jury tended to give them the impression that the appellants, or agents at Rockhampton, were not bound, if possible, to make such communication previously to sale.

May 10.—Judgment was delivered by Sir MONTAGUE SMITH.—This action was brought to recover the value of nineteen bales of wool shipped by the plaintiffs at a port in Queensland, on board the defendants’ vessel, to be carried to Sydney, and which were sold by the master at an intermediate port. The defence is that the sale was justified by the necessity of the situation in which the master was placed with reference to the cargo. The plaintiffs, who were the owners of the wool, shipped it at Port Mackay in a general ship of the defendants, called the Williams, for Sydney, via Rockhampton, and consigned it to Messrs. Willis, Merry, and Co., who were their agents at Sydney. At Rockhampton the wool was transhipped in usual course into another steamship of the defendants the Boomerang. The cargo consisted in all of about 260 bales of wool, belonging to different owners, consigned to nineteen different consignees at Sydney; besides some parcels deliverable to order. On her voyage from Rockhampton, and about forty-five miles from that port, the Boomerang struck on a rock, and filled; the whole of the cargo was submerged and damaged. The ship stranded on Thursday, the 21st Dec., and the cargo was taken out of her and brought back to Rockhampton. The greater part of it was landed on the 22nd and 23rd. On the latter day the wool was examined by surveyors. After the survey, the master determined to sell, and on Saturday, 23rd, headvertised the sale for Tuesday, the 26th. These general facts do not seem to be disputed, and it is not alleged that the master did not use proper care and diligence in discharging the wool, and in having it examined and surveyed. The complaint is that he was not justified by any necessity in selling the wool, and in taking on himself to do so without communication with the owners. The case was tried at Sydney before the Chief Justice and a special jury, and the verdict passed for the defendants. There was conflicting evidence at the trial to the extent and nature of the damage done to the wool, and its condition. It appeared from the evidence that many of the bales had burst, and the wool had become intermixed; that a great number of bales were heated; that in some fermentation had begun, which, if unchecked by speedy treatment, would destroy the staple of the wool in a few hours, or at most in two or three days. Evidence was also given that, to save wool in this condition from destruction, various processes were necessary—viz., unpacking, washing in fresh water, drying, pressing, and repacking in fresh packs, and that facilities could not be obtained by the master in the small town of Rockhampton for this treatment; and, in fact, that no person could be found to undertake the work, even if he had been disposed to pay the heavy expense of it. There was some opposing evidence on these points; but, after the verdict, it may be taken that the jury gave credit to the case of the defendants, which was, in substance, that the sea damage had brought the cargo into a state in which it could neither be carried on or stored, and that it would in two or three days have lost nearly all value, unless it could at once be treated in the way above described; that such treatment could not practically be obtained on a large scale, and that, consequently, there was no other course to be taken for the benefit of the owners, than to sell the wool in parcels to numerous purchasers, who might be able individually to apply the proper treatment to their small lots. The verdict having passed for the defendants, a rule nisi was granted to set it aside, and for a new trial on the ground of misdirection, and that the verdict was against the evidence. This rule was made absolute by two judges of the Supreme Court of New South Wales, the Chief Justice, who tried the cause, dissenting; and this judgment is the subject of the present appeal. The general principles of law are not in dispute, viz., that the authority of the master of a ship to sell the goods of the absent owner is derived from the necessity of the situation in which he is placed; and, consequently, that to justify his thus dealing with the goods he must establish (1) a necessity for the sale; and (2) inability to communicate with the owner and obtain his directions. Under these conditions, and by force of them, the master becomes the agent of the owner, not only with the power, but under the obligation (within certain limits), of acting for him; but he is not in any case entitled to substitute his own judgment for the will of the owner in the strong act of selling the goods, where it is possible to communicate with the owner and ascertain his will. The summing up of the Chief Justice was impugned on the ground that the learned judge did not bring these principles with sufficient distinctness to the attention of the jury; and it was alleged that they were misled by the way in which the case was left to them. The first specific objection was to the Chief Justice's explanation of the word "necessity," and it is referred to in the judgment of Mr. Justice Hargrave, who says that he considered the jury to have been misled by two circumstances; first, by the explanation of "necessity" as being only equivalent to a "high degree of expediency," "highly expedient," &c.; and, secondly, by the fourth written question, viz., whether the defendants had acted "as wise and prudent men." It appears that the Chief Justice did use the expressions thus quoted: but to ascertain in what sense they were used the other parts of his summing up must be looked at. The Chief Justice, after stating the circumstances which would create a necessity for selling, goes on thus: "But it is only in cases of the most pressing necessity that the master can thus take upon himself to act for the owners of the cargo; and if he does this without such a pressing necessity, he and his owners will be responsible, even though he may have acted in a perfect good faith." Then follow the passages complained of: "This necessity is equivalent, for the purposes of the present inquiry, to a high degree of expediency; in other words, that course which was clearly highly expedient will be considered to have been pressingly necessary." And, at the conclusion of his summing up, he says, "the master cannot dispose of it in any way unless under such a necessity as that already mentioned, and where he can hold no correspondence with the owner." The learned judge, after these observations, left some specific questions on the facts, which the jury found for the defendants, and added the question (No. 4), to which objection is made. "Did the defendants, time and circumstances considered, act for the best, and as wise and prudent men, for the interest of the plaintiffs?" which the jury answered in the affirmative. The learned judges of the Supreme Court, who criticised the Chief Justice's explanation of "necessity," did not attempt themselves to define it. It has, undoubtedly, been employed in these cases to express the urgency of the occasion which must exist to justify the act of the master; but the word "necessity," when applied to mercantile affairs, where the judgment must, in the nature of things, be exercised, cannot of course mean an irresistible compelling power; what is meant by it in such cases is, the force of circumstances which determine the course a man ought to take. Thus, when by the force of circumstances a man has the duty cast upon him of taking some action for another, and, under that obligation, adopts the course which, to the judgment of a wise and prudent man, is apparently the best for the interest of the person for whom he acts in a given emergency, it may properly be said of the course so taken that it was, in a mercantile sense, necessary to take it. The Chief Justice appears to have directed the jury substantially to this effect:—He repeatedly told them that they must be satisfied of the "necessity," "the pressing necessity," for the sale. In adding "which means that the course taken must be clearly highly expedient," it cannot be presumed that he intended the jury to understand that, if the sale was merely expedient, the master would have been right in resorting to it, nor can it be supposed the jury so understood the charge. It could not properly be predicated of the sale that it was "clearly highly expedient" if a better course could have been found. Considering, therefore, the language of the charge as a whole, and the terms of the fourth question, their Lordships think the jury were led to consider the right question (so far as the point now under discussion is concerned) viz., whether there existed a necessity for the sale as the best and most prudent thing to be done for the interest of the owner of the goods. A sale of cargo by the master may obviously be necessary in the above sense of the word, although another course might have been taken in dealing with it; for instance, if in this case the wool, which had no value but as an article of commerce, could have been dried and repacked, and then stored or sent on, but at a cost to the owner clearly exceeding any possible value of it to him when so treated, it would plainly have been the duty of the master to sell, as a better course, for the interest of the owner of the property, than to save it by incurring on his behalf a wasteful expenditure. In other words, a commercial necessity for the sale would then arise justifying the master in resorting to it. It was further objected, on the argument at this bar, that the attention of the jury was not sufficiently directed to the condition of the specific bales of wool of the plaintiffs as distinguished from the rest: but it seems to their Lordships that their attention must have been directed to the plaintiff's wool, although, no doubt, from the circumstances of the case, the trial took very much the shape of an inquiry into the state of the entire cargo as a mass. Both sides appear to have gone into the whole matter, and the evidence of witnesses taken in another action with reference to another part of the cargo was by consent read on this trial. It is plain that the facts that the ship was a general ship; that the wool belonged to numerous owners; that all of it was more or less damaged, and some of it intermixed, rendering it difficult within the time at the master's disposal and the small resources of the port to deal with the bales separately, must, properly, have had great weight with the jury, when they came to consider what it was practicable for the master to do with such a cargo, and the different parcels of which it was composed. Their Lordships have now to consider the objections made to that part of the direction of the learned judge which related to the obligation of the master to communicate with the owners. It is not disputed that the Chief Justice pointedly called the attention of the jury to this obligation. He told them that the master could not sell the goods, "unless under such a necessity as that already mentioned, and where he could hold no communication with the owners." And after this explanation he puts as the fifth question to the jury, "Had the defendants, considering the circumstances of the case, time and opportunity to obtain instructions by the owners?" telling them their verdict must be for the plaintiffs, if they found that question in the affirmative, whatever their opinion on the other parts of the case might be. The possibility of communicating with the owners must, of course, depend on the circumstances of each case, involving the consideration of the facts which create the urgency for an early sale; the distance of the port from the owners; the means of communication which may exist; and the general position of the master in the particular emergency. Such a communication need only be made when an answer can be obtained, or there is a reasonable expectation that it could be obtained before the sale. When, however, there is ground for such an expectation, every endeavour, so far as the position in which he is placed will allow, should be made by the master to obtain the owner's instructions. (See the judgment of this board by the Lord Justice Knight Bruce in the case of The Bonaparte (8 Moo. Priv. Co. 459); the corrected passage is given in the report of The Hamburg (Br. & Lush. 273.) In the present case the sale if justifiable at all, must have taken place speedily, for the perishable condition of the wool, which alone justified the master in selling, made it necessary there should be an immediate disposition of it; and the jury, in affirming the necessity of the sale, must be taken so to have found. The plaintiffs themselves were the owners of the wool. They had shipped it on their own account for Sydney, where it was to be transhipped to England. They lived at an inland station, and no means existed for communicating with them before the sale; and upon these facts it was scarcely contended by the learned counsel at the bar that the owners themselves could have been communicated with. The master did apply to Messrs. Rea & Co., who acted for some purposes as the agents of the plaintiffs at Rockhampton, to take the wool on their behalf, but they declined to interfere with it, or with the master's discretion. The principal contention on this part of the case was, that the master ought to have communicated with Messrs. Willis and Co., the consignees at Sydney, or used some endeavours to do so. In the absence of evidence to the contrary, the presumption would properly arise that the consignees named in a bill of lading had an interest in the goods, and ought to be communicated with; but in the present case it is clear that Messrs. Willis and Co. had no interest in the wool, and were to act only as the agents of the plaintiffs at Sydney. The obligation, therefore, to communicate with them, appears to Lordships to depend on two questions of fact: First, whether, from the nature of their agency, they were such agents as ought to have been communicated with; and, if so—secondly, whether there was time and opportunity, under the circumstances, to consult them before the sale. With regard to the first of these questions, it is certainly strange, if the obligation to consult Messrs. Willis and Co. was intended to be relied on, that although Mr. Morse (one of the plaintiffs), and Mr. Willis (the agent) were both examined vidæ voce at the trial, no information whatever was given by them of the nature and scope of this agency. The fair inference arising from this abstinence, and from the evidence afforded by the letters of Messrs. Willis, showing what they actually did in the subsequent part of the transaction, as well as from the general course of business with regard to wool consignments, seems to be, that Messrs. Willis and Co. were shipping agents, employed to forward the wool to England, and that they were not the general agents of the plaintiffs, nor clothed with any authority to act for them in dealing with the wool before its arrival at Sydney, and on an emergency of this kind; but at all events, the nature and character of the agency was, in their Lordships' view, a question of fact for the jury; and it may be assumed, that a special jury of merchants of Sydney were thoroughly competent to deal with it. On the second question, viz., whether communication with Messrs. Willis and Co. was practicable, some of the circumstances to be considered, were—that the wool was landed and surveyed on Saturday, the 23rd Dec., and that, on its state being ascertained, an immediate sale was resolved upon, as being necessary, and fixed for Tuesday, the 26th (the intervening days being Sunday and Christmas Day), and at once advertised. The ship was a general ship; there were twenty-three consignees, most of them at Sydney, each having an equal right to the time and consideration of the master. Sydney is 900 miles from Rockhampton. No letter could have reached that place. There was, however, telegraphic communication between the two towns; and much conflicting evidence was given as to the possibility of corresponding by means of it, especially on Sunday and Christmas Day. There can be no doubt that the master is bound to employ the telegraph as a means of communication, where it can usefully be done; but in this case the state of the particular telegraph, the way it was managed, and how far explanatory messages could be transmitted by it, having regard to the time and the circumstances in which the master was placed, were proper subjects to be considered by the jury, together with the other facts, in determining the question of the practicability of communication. It was contended for the respondents that, although the above two questions of fact may have arisen on the evidence, yet that the attention of the jury was not sufficiently directed to them. Their Lordships have not had the advantage of seeing the whole of the summing up of the learned judge; but it is apparent from the course of the trial, the jury must have been led to consider them. A great deal of evidence was given, both as to the state of the telegraph, and the habits of business of the merchants of Sydney, with the sole object of showing the practicability of communication with Messrs. Willis and Co. It appears, also, from the record, that, at the very end of the case at the trial, the counsel for the defendants objected to the Chief Justice, that if the plaintiffs insisted that it was the master's duty to have consulted "the consignees or the plaintiffs," the facts out of which the duty arose should have been specially replied. The Chief Justice overruled the objection, holding that a special replication on the record was not necessary. This discussion clearly shows that the question as to communication with the consignees was an issue, not only raised, but regarded by the Chief Justice as one to be decided by the jury. In truth, they must have had the point present to their minds during most of the trial, and must have considered it as involved in the question submitted to them. Undoubtedly, if the Chief Justice ought to have told the jury that, in point of law, the master was bound to communicate with the consignees, his direction might be successfully assailed; for he did not so direct them; but their Lordships think that in this case the learned judge could not properly have taken upon himself so to rule, as a matter of law, and, on the contrary, that the questions of fact before referred to were within the proper province of the jury. A further objection is made to the judge's summing up, on the ground that he told the jury "in effect" that, if the master could not communicate with all the owners of the cargo, he might sell without communicating with any. If the learned judge had really so directed the jury as a matter of law, their Lordships would have considered that his direction was erroneous; because, undoubtedly, each owner has a right to the consideration of the master, and, acting as his agent, he should do his best to communicate with him. In the case of an owner who might be near, and easily got at, it certainly would not, alone, be a sufficient excuse for not communicating with him, that others at a greater distance could not be consulted. But it has not been shown to their Lordships that the Chief Justice did lay down any such proposition of law. He, certainly, directed the attention of the jury to the facts that the cargo was a general one, belonging to numerous owners, and the difficulty of communicating with all, as circumstances which would, in fact, increase the embarrassment in which the master was placed. Their Lordships consider that the learned judge was justified in so doing. A merchant knows when he embarks his goods in a general ship that they cannot have the undivided care and attention of the master. It is obvious that, when such a ship is in distress at a distant port, from whence communication with all the owners is impossible, and with any of them difficult—the task of selecting (where all are entitled to consideration) those with whom he can and should communicate must add greatly to the master's labours, and might, in some cases, require an amount of time and attention which he could not give, unless he neglected more pressing duties connected with saving and dealing with the goods. Such a state of things, when it exists, is clearly within the range of the circumstances which the jury may properly be directed to consider in estimating the conduct of the master. On the whole, therefore, their Lordships have come to the conclusion that the misdirections imputed to the Chief Justice have not been established, and that the rule for setting aside the verdict ought not to have been made absolute on that ground. The Chief Justice who tried the cause reports that he is satisfied with the verdict, and therefore with regard to that part of the rule which seeks to set aside the verdict on the ground that it is against the weight of evidence, their Lordships, in accordance with the ordinary rule, would not be disposed to disturb the verdict on that ground unless it appeared to them to be clearly wrong. Their Lordships need only say that they have not been led by the discussion of the case to this conclusion; and, in the result, they will humbly advise Her Majesty to allow this appeal, and to order that the rule making absolute the rule nisi for a new trial be set aside, and the original rule be discharged, with costs. The appellants will have the costs of this appeal, and the deposit made by them as security for costs will be returned to them.

ON APPEAL FROM THE HIGH COURT OF ADMIRALTY.

Tuesday, June 18, 1872.

(Present: Right Hons. Sir J. W. COLVILLE, Sir M. SMITH, and Sir R. P. COLLIER.)

THE MARMION.

Collision—Vessel close hauled—Luffing—Deviation from course.

A close hauled vessel is justified in luffing so as to bring her, after she has sighted another vessel, as close to the wind as she can get so as to remain under command, and such luffing is not a deviation from her course that will relieve the other vessel, having the wind free, from the duty of getting out of her way.

THIS was an appeal from a decree of the High Court of Admiralty of England in a suit instituted by the owners of the barque Oceola against the ship Marmion. The Oceola was a barque of 898 tons register, and on the 25th Nov. 1871 was, whilst on a voyage from Quebec to Liverpool, on the 25th Nov. 1871, at 4 A.M., about thirty-five miles S.W. by W. of the Tuskar Light in the Irish Channel. The wind was E.S.E., and the Oceola was close hauled on the starboard tack, heading about N.E. The Marmion was a ship of 783 tons register, bound from Liverpool to Calcutta, and at the time in question was heading S.W. by W., with the wind free. Both vessels had their regulation lights burning brightly. The Marmion was sighted by the look-out of the Oceola a little on the starboard bow, and by him reported to the master who was in charge of the deck. The master of the Oceola thereupon gave an order to the helmsman to luff, and immediately after saw the Marmion's red light over the port bow. The master of the Oceola gave a second order to the helmsman to keep his luff, and about two minutes after the green light of the Marmion was sighted, and the red light shut in. The Oceola's sails were then lifting; the Oceola's helm was thereupon put hard apart to deaden the blow.

The Oceola was sighted from the Marmion two or three points over the port bow, and about two miles off, and soon after her green light was seen. Upon the green light being seen the helm of the Marmion was starboarded until the green light of the Oceola was brought a couple of points on the starboard bow of the Marmion, when her helm was ordered to be steadied. According to the statement on behalf of the Marmion, "shortly afterwards the red light of the Oceola opened on the starboard bow of the Marmion, whereupon the Marmion's helm was put hard apart, notwithstanding which the two vessels came into collision, the Marmion with her stem striking the Oceola amidship on her port side." The Oceola was sunk.

The master of the Oceola, in his statement before the receiver of wreck, stated, that after the Marmion was sighted, he gave the man at the wheel the three following orders, viz.:—"To keep her luff;" "to keep a close luff;" and "to luff;" and in cross-examination stated that before the collision the Oceola's helm was put hard down. It was submitted in the appellant's case, that these orders brought the Oceola closer to the wind than she was when first sighted by the Marmion, and that this was a deviation from her original course, and therefore that she was not keeping her course as required by law.

The learned judge of the Admiralty Court pronounced the Marmion solely to blame, holding that the Marmion should have continued her course, and not have starboarded, and that the Oceola was justified in keeping as close to the wind as possible. From this judgment the owners of the Marmion appealed, mainly on the grounds that the Oceola did not keep her course, as she was bound to do, and that she improperly ported.

Milward, Q.C. and Myburgh (Phillimore with them), submitted that the luffing of the Oceola was a deviation from her original course, and that a vessel has no right to come so much into the wind that her sails are lifting.

Dr. Deane, Q.C., and Clarkson for the respondents were not called upon.

The judgment of the court was delivered by Sir J. W. COLVILLE.—This is an appeal against the decision of the Court of Admiralty, which has found the ship Marmion solely to blame for a collision which took place between her and the barque Oceola in the Irish Channel on the 25th Nov. 1871. There is, for a nautical case, unusually little difference or dispute as to the circumstances under which the collision took place. The parties, by their preliminary acts and their evidence, are all agreed, or very nearly agreed, as to the time and place of the collision; as to the direction of the wind, and as to the state of the weather and the tide. Nor is there any very great difference between them—in fact it has been contended by the appellants that they are pretty well agreed as to the position of the two vessels when they sighted each other. There seems to have been a question raised on the part of the Oceola as to whether those on board the Marmion should really, when the vessels sighted each other, have seen the green light of the Oceola; but their Lordships are disposed to assume that such was the case, and it seems to be consistent with what both parties state in their preliminary acts. It is, however, to be observed that, according to the Marmion, at the time when she sighted the green light she was two miles distant, and two to three points on the portbow, and assuming that the position of the other vessel was then such that she might have sighted the green light, their Lordships have come to the conclusion, assisted as they are by the nautical assessors, that the Marmion was still correctly found to be to blame. The Oceola being close hauled upon the starboard tack, and the other vessel going free, it would of course be the duty of the Marmion to keep out of the way of the Oceola. That was her prima facie duty under the twelfth Article of the Regulations for preventing Collisions at Sea. The contention of the appellants is, that she took the proper measures for the purpose, but that those measures were defeated by those on board the Oceola, who by luffing in the way she is admitted to have done, failed to keep her course within the meaning of the eighteenth Article. The case was, no doubt, made in the court below, and the parties there failed to convince the learned judge that such was the case. They have equally failed to convince their Lordships here that there was the improper luffing on board the Oceola which can be said to have amounted to a deviation from her course, or to have been one of the causes contributing to the accident. It appears to them, as they are advised by the nautical assessors, that it was the duty of a vessel in that position to keep close to windward, and that she does not appear to have failed in her duty or to have done anything which can be said to throw her out of her proper course until the final porting, which the learned judge in the court below found—and it seems to their Lordships properly found—was a justifiable thing, in order to weaken the blow and to diminish the consequences of the collision then imminent. That being the state of the case, the grounds that have been taken by the appeal must fail. Their Lordships certainly, as has often been ruled here, are not in the habit of disturbing the judgment of the court below in cases of collision, unless it is clearly shown to their satisfaction that the decision under the appeal is wrong. It appears to their Lordships, assisted as they have been, that the Marmion really was in fault; that admitting that the original position was as stated in the preliminary act, she may have mistaken the precise heading of the other vessel, a supposition which is rather confirmed by the cross-examination of the mate, who was in charge of the deck when the two vessels came in sight of each other, and also by what is said of its being the intention of the Marmion in starboarding her helm to pass astern of the other vessel, an expression which is not very easy to explain upon any other hypothesis than that of supposing that the Oceola was heading rather more to the west than is described. However that may be, it seems to their Lordships, assisted as they have been by their nautical assessors, that it was not right, in the circumstances in which the Marmion found herself placed, to execute the manœuvre of starboarding, the effect of which was to pass to the windward of the Oceola; that she ought rather, if there was any doubt on the subject, to have given way to the vessel, and that at any rate she should have become clearly satisfied, before she took the step, that the other vessel was not keeping close to the wind, or she might have been satisfied if she had waited until she had seen the red light. On these grounds their Lordships think that no sufficient ground has been shown for disturbing the decision of the court below, and they must therefore advise her Majesty to dismiss this appeal, with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

ROBEY AND COMPANY'S PERSEVERANCE IRONWORKS
(LIMITED) v. OLLIER.

Consignor and consignee—Bills of exchange drawn against cargo—Lien on cargo—Appropriation of proceeds of sale.

*B. consigned a cargo to the defendants for sale at the joint risk and profit of himself and them, and sent them the bill of lading, with a letter, advising them that he had drawn upon them on account against the cargo six bills of exchange for sums amounting to 1500*l., which he requested them to protect on presentation. In reply, they wrote saying that the drafts should be duly honoured. B. afterwards indorsed three of the bills to the plaintiffs. The bills were in due course presented to the defendants, who refused to honour them:

Held (affirming the decision of the Master of the Rolls), that there was no appropriation of the proceeds of the cargo to meet the bills, and that the plaintiffs had no lien on the cargo in priority to the claim of the defendants in respect of their general lien as consignees.

ROBEY AND COMPANY'S PERSEVERANCE IRONWORKS (LIMITED) v. OLLIER.

[CHAN.]

De G. F. & J. 409; 7 L. T. Rep. N. S. 271 distinguished.

THIS was an appeal from a decision of the Master of the Rolls.

The plaintiffs were a joint-stock company carrying on the business of engineers in the City of Lincoln.

In the year 1869, Mr. Frederic Calder Brown was employed by the plaintiffs as their agent at Ibraila, in the Danubian Principalities, for the sale of engines and machines forwarded to him by the plaintiffs, and he from time to time received moneys on account of the plaintiffs. In November 1869, an account was stated between the plaintiffs and Brown, and a sum of 830*l.* and upwards was found to be due from Brown to the plaintiffs upon the balance of the account.

In the same month, Brown purchased with his own money at Ibraila a cargo of maize at the price of 155*3l. 7s. 10d.* and consigned it to the defendant Messrs. Ollier and Co., of London, by the ship Acacia for sale at the joint risk and profit of himself and them.

On the 9th Nov. 1869, Brown wrote to Ollier and Co. informing them that the Acacia had set sail with the cargo, and after stating that he enclosed the bill of lading, he proceeded thus:

Against this cargo I beg to advise having drawn to account on your good selves as follows under this day's date:

No. 779.....	£200	} 3 months date, order myself.
781.....	240
782.....	250
783.....	280
784.....	300
	£1500

Which please protect on presentation. This includes 150*l.* cash advanced to master on account of freight.

This letter did not really contain the bill of lading, Brown having accidentally omitted to inclose it. On receiving the letter, Messrs. Ollier and Co. wrote, on the 15th Nov. 1869: "Your next will doubtless hand us bill of lading for the maize Your drafts on account of this cargo shall have due protection."

On the 19th Nov. 1869, Messrs. Ollier and Co. received a subsequent letter from Brown inclosing the bill of lading, and on the same day they wrote acknowledging the receipt, and saying, "Your six drafts against this cargo (1500*l.* total) shall be duly honoured."

On the 23rd Nov. 1869, Brown endorsed and sent the three bills of exchange, numbered respectively, 782, 783, and 784, for sums amounting to 830*l.*, to the plaintiffs, in payment of the amount due to them on the balance of the account, with a letter in these words:

I beg to enclose herewith three drafts for:
 £250 } Order myself on Messrs. Ollier
 280 } and Co., of London, at 3m.
 300 } date from 9th inst.

£830 sterling, which, at maturity, please pass to my credit.

The following is a copy of one of these bills:

First.—Ibraila, 9th Nov. 1869.—Exchange for £250 sterling. At three months date of this first of exchange, second and third not paid, pay to the order of myself the sum of two hundred and fifty pounds sterling, value which place to account, cargo per A. (i.e., Acacia) as advised by this day's post.

(Signed)

FRED. C. BROWN.

To Messrs. Ollier and Co., 9, East India Chambers, Leadenhall-street, London.
 No. 782.

The other two bills sent by Brown to the plaintiffs were in the same form, and each of the three bills was endorsed by Brown as follows: "Pay to the order of Messrs. Robey and Co. (Limited), value received. Ibraila, November 23, 1869. (Signed), Fred. C. Brown."

On the 6th Dec. 1869, these three bills were received by the plaintiffs, who, on the same day forwarded them by letter to Messrs. Ollier and Co. for acceptance. On the following day Messrs. Ollier and Co. returned the three bills unaccepted, stating that they were sorry to have to do so in consequence of telegraphic communication they had had from Brown since the date on which he sent two bills to the plaintiffs.

Messrs. Ollier and Co. subsequently received the cargo of maize and sold it for upwards of 1258*l.*

The plaintiffs claimed to be entitled to a charge on the proceeds of sale for the amount of the three bills and interest thereon, while Messrs. Ollier and Co. claimed to be entitled to retain the whole of the proceeds of sale in part payment of a larger sum due to them from Brown upon a general account current.

The plaintiffs instituted the present suit against Messrs. Ollier and Co. to enforce the charge which they claimed upon the proceeds of sale of the cargo.

The Master of the Rolls dismissed the bill with costs.

After stating the facts of the case his Lordship, in delivering judgment, said:—"Upon a full review of the circumstances of this case, I am of opinion that the ordinary rule which establishes that where a consignee only obtains a cargo on the faith of accepting bills drawn against it he must either give up the cargo or apply the proceeds to honour the bills, and where in consequence the bills are a charge on the proceeds of the cargo in his hands, does not apply to this case. On the facts I have detailed the cargo of maize was clearly a part of the joint adventure between Brown and Ollier and Co., and no party to the adventure has a right to anything until the proceeds are realised and ascertained. It is clear also that the plaintiffs cannot stand in any better position in relation to the bills than Mr. Calder Brown himself. In ordinary cases, where a shipper consigns a cargo to his agents, he may impose on the consignees the terms that they shall not accept the consignment without also accepting the bills drawn against it, and he may require the cargo or the proceeds to be applied to meet those bills drawn against it if he please, but in that case, as it was well observed in argument, the cargo belongs to the shipper, who might consign it to any other house or any different agent; but this is not so where the transaction forms part of a joint adventure. There the cargo must be consigned to the person agreed on for the purpose, by the persons who are the partners in the joint adventure, and when the affairs are all wound-up no party to this joint adventure is bound to pay more than the balance of profit or loss due from him on taking the account of it, and assuming that there is the sum of 138*l.*, as the defendants allege, that is all that the other party, namely, Calder Brown, is entitled to receive. In addition to which, by being a joint adventure, the whole character of the transaction is altered, and Calder Brown has no power to pledge the cargo to pay a separate debt of his own. This is obvious if simply stated in this form ; Two persons, A. and B., agree to buy abroad a cargo of corn or cotton to be consigned to C. in England. C. receives and realizes the cargo, and finds a profit of 100*l.* each to be due to A, and B. With this share of profit each may do what he pleases, but he cannot charge the cargo of C. for a debt of 300*l.* or any other sum due by him to another person, for instance, to E. If he could he would be throwing the payment of his own debt on his partner. This is exactly the case which arises here. It does not in the slightest degree alter the case that the consignee, instead of being a stranger, is one of the partners to the joint adventure. His duties and functions in such a case are distinct from his right as a partner in the joint adventure. He must realise the cargo in the best way he can, and he then must divide the proceeds fairly among the joint adventurers, including himself, however numerous or few they may be, but he is not to bear the loss sustained by any of the other joint adventurers in any other transaction, nor is anything forming part of the adventure to be dealt with by any of them, but his own share of the surplus or loss whichever it may be. No doubt if the bills drawn against the cargo are part of the joint adventure they must be paid either out of the proceeds of the cargo or by contributions from the other co-adventurers, but that is merely matter of account, and the defendants admit their liability to account, and allege they have done so fairly, and that the money in court is the result of that account, and the amount due from them in taking it. If that is correct, the money in court is due to Calder Brown or the persons entitled to the amount coming to him out of the joint adventure. If his letter to the plaintiffs gave them the lien on the amount, it ought to be paid to them, but that is a matter between them and the other creditors of Calder Brown not represented here. All that arises here is the right of the plaintiffs to claim against the cargo of maize in the hand of the defendants, and as to that I am clearly of opinion that the bill fails, and that it must be dismissed with costs."

From this decision the plaintiffs appealed.

Sir Richard Baggalay, Q.C., and Speed, for the appellants.—On sending the bill of lading to the defendants, the consignor informed them that he had drawn the bills against the cargo. They accepted the cargo, subject to the charge for the amount of the bills, and they promised that the bills should be duly honoured. They are therefore bound to pay us, out of the proceeds of the cargo, the amount of the bills indorsed to us. That is the effect of the decision in Frith v. Forbes (1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 253 : 2 L. T. Rep. N. S. 271 ; 4 De G. F. & J. 409), where it was held that the general lien of a consignee cannot be set up against the express direction of the consignor given to him at the time when the cargo is accepted, and, accordingly, the holder of bills drawn against a cargo was held to have a lien on it in priority to the consignee.

Miller, Q.C. (with him Southgate, Q.C.).—This case is quite distinguishable from Frith v. Forbes. There the bills were drawn against the cargo in favour of Frith and Co., and the consignor advised the consignees of that on sending them the bill of lading of the cargo. Moreover, there the cargo was not, as in this case, consigned on a joint speculation between the consignor and the consignees.

Without calling for a reply.

Lord Justice JAMES said : It is quite clear that this case is distinguishable from Frith v. Forbes (sup.). I do not think that that case is to be extended beyond its own particular circumstances, and I am not prepared to say that every bill of exchange purporting to be drawn against a cargo carries with it in the hands of every person a special equitable right against the cargo in favour of the holder of the bill. In this case the cargo appears to have been nothing but the consideration for the drawing of the bills. In Frith v. Forbes, the letters mentioned that the cargo which was consigned was the property of the consignor ; the bills were drawn against it in favour of a certain firm, and it was held that that firm had an interest in the cargo. In this particular case the cargo was not the cargo of Brown alone. The defendants had no doubt written to Brown, saying that they would meet his drafts, but those letters were not communicated to the plaintiffs, and the plaintiffs cannot make a case upon private communications which passed between Ollier and Brown, and about which the plaintiff knew nothing. Therefore the case stands as if no such letters had been written. A man says, I send you a cargo against which I draw bills, and those bills are in the hands of a man who says, I have a special right on the cargo. This case is distinguishable from Frith v. Forbes, the decision in which case can only be applied to its own particular circumstances.

Lord Justice MELLISH.—I am of the same opinion. It is clear that the simple indorsement of a bill of exchange only gives a right to the bill of exchange itself, and I cannot see that anything took place between Brown and the plaintiffs except this, that Brown, being indebted to the plaintiffs, indorsed to them certain bills of exchange. I certainly cannot agree that the mere fact of a bill of exchange stating, "Place to account cargo per A, as advised by this day's post."—I cannot think that any mercantile man receiving a bill of exchange worded like that would suppose that because those words were in it he had an equitable assignment of the cargo or any security upon it. The mercantile usage is perfectly plain. If you intend to get the security on the cargo, you expect the bill of lading to accompany the bill of exchange, and to get them both together ; and if you get the bill of exchange simply, and take the bill of exchange simply in payment of a debt, all you would expect to get would be the security of the bill of exchange. Then, as to the case of Frith v. Forbes, the Lords Justices seem to have come to the conclusion that all the letters taken together amounted to an equitable assignment of the cargo, that there was such a communication between the parties as amounted to an equitable assignment. In the present case I quite agree that Brown had no right to make an equitable assignment of the cargo, and did not purport to do so. All that he did was to endorse the bills of exchange to his creditors, who got the ordinary right of any indorsee. I am of opinion that the decision of the Master of the Rolls was quite right and that the appeal must be dismissed.

JONES AND ANOTHER v. THE NEPTUNE MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.Reported by J. SHORTT and M. W. MCKELLAR, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Monday, June 10, 1872.

JONES AND ANOTHER v. THE NEPTUNE MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Marine insurance—Policy on freight—Construction of policy—Inception of risk—“From B. to port of discharge”—Goods not on board—“Insurance beginning from loading”—Meaning of “loading.”
Plaintiffs having underwritten a policy on chartered freight on a cargo of guano, effected a re-insurance with the defendants, “lost or not lost, in the sum of 800l., upon the freight, payable to them in respect to this present voyage, to be performed between as below, by the vessel Napier, &c., from Baker’s Island to port of discharge in the United Kingdom, the insurance on the said freight beginning from the loading of the said vessel.” The vessel arrived at Baker’s Island and proceeded to load, but before taking in the whole of the cargo was driven on a reef and became a complete wreck. The plaintiffs having brought an action to recover from the defendants for a total loss:

Held, that the defendants were not liable, the policy not having attached:

Per Blackburn, J., because the liability of the underwriters was not intended to begin until the vessel had departed from Baker’s Island, the words “the insurance on the said freight beginning from the loading of the said vessel,” not extending the insurance beyond the previous words “from Baker’s Island.”

Per Mellor and Lush, JJ., because, though the words “the insurance on the said freight beginning from the loading of the said vessel,” do extend the insurance beyond the words “from Baker’s Island,” the words “from the loading,” mean from the completion of the loading, and as the loading was not completed the risk had not attached,

DECLARATION stated that the plaintiffs, on the 21st Feb. 1871, caused to be effected with the defendants, by Messrs. T. Patton, jun., and Co., the plaintiffs’ agents in that behalf, a policy of insurance, with certain memoranda written in the margin thereof, which said policy was signed and subscribed by two of the directors of the said company, on behalf of the said company, and was in the words and figures following, that is to say:—

Freight Policy.

W. H., No. 263. Neptune Marine Insurance Company, £500.Limited.
Capital £12,500.

This policy witnesseth that Messrs. J. Patton, jun., and Co., as well in his own name, as and for in the name or names of all and every other person or persons to whom the same doth or shall appertain, in part or in all, doth make insurance, and cause him and them, and every of them, to be insured by the Neptune Marine Insurance Company, Limited, lost or not lost, in the sum of 500l., upon the freight payable to him or them in respect of this present voyage, to be performed between, as below, by the vessel Napier, whereof — is master, or whoever else may go as master in the said ship from Baker’s Island to a port of call ^{and} _{or} discharge in the United Kingdom, the insurance on the said freight beginning from the loading of the said vessel, and terminating when the said vessel shall be moored as above at a safe anchorage. And it shall be lawful for the said vessel in this voyage to proceed and sail to, and touch and stay at, any ports or places whatsoever for refuge or any necessary purpose, without prejudice to this insurance. The said freight for the purposes of this insurance is hereby declared to be valued at the actual amount payable to the insured by the charterer of this vessel for the above voyage. Touching the adventures and perils, &c. And the plaintiffs say that the said memoranda, written in the margin of the said policy, were and are in the words following, that is to say, “Warranted free from risk of explosion by coal gas whilst in the harbour. Being a re-insurance, and to pay as may be paid on original policy.” And the plaintiffs say that the defendants, in consideration of the premises, and that the plaintiffs paid to the defendants the said sum or premium of nine guineas per cent. upon the said sum of 500l., became and were insurers to the plaintiffs of the said sum of 500l. upon the said freight in the said policy mentioned, according to the tenor and effect thereof, and of the said memoranda. And the plaintiffs say that certain goods at Baker’s Island aforesaid were shipped and loaded in and on board of the said ship to be carried therein, for freight upon the said voyage, and other goods were then there ready to be and about to be shipped and loaded in and on board of the said ship, to be carried therein for freight upon the said voyage; and if it had not been for such a loss of the said ship as hereinafter mentioned, would have been shipped and loaded in and on board of the said ship, to be carried therein for freight upon the said voyage. And the plaintiffs say that they were then and thence until and at the time of the loss hereinafter mentioned, interested in the said premises insured in and by the said policy herein declared on to the value and amount of all the moneys by them ever insured thereon. And the plaintiffs say that afterwards and during the continuance of the said risk, the said ship, by perils so insured against as aforesaid, became and was damaged and lost, and was rendered incapable of carrying the said goods upon the said voyage, whereby the said freight became and was wholly lost, and by means and in consequence thereof the plaintiffs were obliged to pay and paid a large sum, to wit the sum of 500l., on the said original policy, and all conditions were fulfilled, and all things happened, and all times elapsed necessary to entitle the plaintiffs to be paid by the defendants the said sum so insured by the plaintiffs as aforesaid in and by the said policy herein declared on, &c.

Pleas: First, that the plaintiffs did not cause such policy to be effected, nor did the defendants become such insurers as alleged; secondly, that at the time of the alleged loss of the said ship, the said ship had not been loaded within the meaning of the said policy, nor had the insurance on the said freight begun as alleged.

The defendants also demurred to the declaration, alleging, as a matter of law to be argued, that the partial loading of the vessel was not a total loading within the meaning of the policy.

The amended declaration contained a count for money payable by the defendants to the plaintiffs, for money received by the defendants for the use of the plaintiffs, and for money found to be due from the defendants to the plaintiffs, on accounts stated between them. Under this count the plaintiffs claimed to recover 47l. 5s., the premium paid upon the policy declared on in the first count, in the event of the plaintiffs not recovering on such policy.

To the amended declaration the defendants pleaded the three former pleas. And as to the residue of the declaration the defendants brought into court the sum of 47l. 5s., and said that the said sum was enough to satisfy the claim of the plaintiffs in respect of the matter therein pleaded to.

Replication—first, taking issue on the defendants' first and second pleas respectively; secondly, demurring to the second plea, a matter of law intended to be argued being that under the circumstances stated in the declaration the risk had commenced, and the loss was a loss within the terms of the policy; thirdly, joining in demurrer to the first count; fourthly, accepting the sum paid into court in full satisfaction and discharge of the cause of action in respect of which it had been paid in.

Rejoinder that the second plea is good in substance.

At the trial, which took place before Blackburn, J. and a special jury, at the Winter Assizes 1872, holden at Liverpool, for the West Derby Division of the County of Lancaster, the following facts were agreed upon by the parties:

Messrs. William Henry Jones and Edw. Stewart Jones are underwriters and insurance brokers, carrying on business at Liverpool. The defendants carry on business at West Hartlepool. The Napier, a vessel of 1400 tons burthen, was chartered by Messrs. De Wolf and Co. of Liverpool, on the 20th and 22nd Aug. 1870, to proceed to Melbourne, and thence to Baker's Island, in the Pacific Ocean, where she was to load a full cargo of guano and take it to Liverpool or Birkenhead. The vessel arrived at Baker's Island on the 1st April 1871, in order to take in her cargo. The policy of insurance was effected on the 21st Feb. 1871, a premium of £9 9s. per cent. being paid.

Baker's Island is a small place, only visited by ships for the purpose of loading guano. There is no harbour, and ships have to stand off the Island and anchor to buoys, the guano being brought to the ships in lighters.

The Napier began loading the guano on the 4th April, and loaded several tons a day up to the 16th April. The weather then got so bad that the vessel was obliged to slip anchor and stand out to sea. She got back to the island on the 19th April and recommenced loading, the loading continuing to the 24th April, when the weather again got very bad, and notwithstanding the exertions, the vessel ran on a reef and became a total wreck, after having loaded 1130 tons of guano.

The plaintiffs claimed from the defendants for a total loss of freight. The defendants refused payment on the ground that the vessel was lost before the risk commenced.

The policy sued on was a re-insurance, and the plaintiffs settled as for a total loss. The original policy and the charter-party were put in evidence.

A verdict was directed to be entered for the plaintiff for 452l. 15s., leave being given to the defendants to move to enter the verdict for them.

A rule nisi having been obtained to enter the verdict for the defendants on the ground that the risk had not attached, or to reduce the verdict to 250l. 7s. 8d., or such other sum as the court should think fit, on the ground that the defendants were only liable to a loss in proportion to the freight on cargo actually loaded.

Butt, Q.C., and Trevelyan now showed cause against this rule.—There are two points in this case: First, did the risk attach before the vessel sailed from Baker's Island? secondly, what is the meaning of the word "loading?" The risk attached at the commencement of the loading. The words of the policy are used merely to describe the voyage, not to state the time at which the risk was to attach. Because the words are "from Baker's Island," instead of the ordinary words "at and from Baker's Island," it cannot be held that the policy did not attach until the vessel sailed from Baker's Island, when we find in the margin of the policy these words: "the insurance on the said freight beginning from the loading of the said vessel." It is contended by the other side that the word "loading" here means "complete loading," but it is submitted that it has not necessarily that meaning. Mellish v. Allnutt (2 M. & S. 106) was referred to. [BLACKBURN, J.—Is there any reported case in which the words "at and" are left out?] In Richards v. The Marine Insurance Company (3 Johns. N. Y. Rep. 307) goods were insured from Nevitas in the island of Cuba, "beginning the adventure, &c., from and immediately following the loading thereof on board of the vessel at Nevitas, in Cuba." The vessel sailed with a cargo of goods from New York, and arrived at Nevitas, but not being allowed to land the goods there, except a few trifling articles, she sailed again from Nevitas with the outward cargo on board for Jamaica; and while proceeding to that place was wholly lost by perils of the sea. It was held that the policy did not attach to the outward cargo which continued on board at Nevitas and until the vessel was lost, and that the insured could only recover back the premium paid. This case, however, touches only the question whether the words "on the loading of goods" are mere description or amount to a warranty that the goods shall be loaded at the port named. Actual sailing of the vessel cannot be held to have been intended in the present case, unless we strike out altogether the words "from the loading." "As a contract of indemnity to the assured," says Duer (On Marine Insurance, vol. i., p. 161) "the policy is to be liberally construed in his favour, not only because this mode of construction is most conducive to the interests of commerce, but because, for the reasons that have been stated, it is probably most consonant to the intentions of the parties. It is certain that the assured desires as ample an indemnity as he can obtain, and it is probable that the insurer means that he shall understand the indemnity given, to be as extensive as its terms, upon any fair interpretation, import. For the same reasons, and not in obedience to a mere technical rule, an exception from the risks of the policy is to be construed, strictly against the insurer. Such an exception is a modification of the promise of indemnity, and as that promise is to be liberally construed, it is a necessary consequence that the exception cannot be permitted to abridge its operation to a greater extent than the terms used plainly require." There is the further question whether the words "from the loading" mean from the completion of the loading, as contended by the defendants, the vessel being only partially loaded in the present case. [LUSH, J.—The meaning must be either at the commencement of the loading or at its completion. His Lordship referred to Montgomery v. Egginton (3 T. R. 362), where it was held, where the freight was valued at 1500*l.* and goods had been put on board, of which the freight would have been 500*l.*, the rest of the cargo being ready to be shipped, when the vessel was driven from her moorings and lost, that the insurable interest in the whole freight had accrued, and that the assured was entitled to the whole sum insured.] In Foley v. The United Fire and Marine Insurance Company of Sydney (3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 352; L. Rep. 5 C. P. 155; 39 L. J. 206, C. P.; 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 108), by a policy of insurance, chartered freight on board a certain vessel was insured "at and from Mauritius to rice ports," and thence to a port in the United Kingdom. The vessel was chartered to proceed on her voyage from Calcutta to Mauritius, and having discharged her cargo there, to proceed to Akyab, to load there or at Rangoon a cargo of rice for a port in the United Kingdom. She safely arrived at Mauritius, but whilst she was there, and before she had finished discharging her cargo, she was driven ashore and totally lost. It was held, nevertheless, that the risk on the policy had attached at the time of the loss. In Gordon v. American Insurance Company of New York (4 Den. N. Y. 360), cited Phillips, s. 944, under a policy on freight, "beginning the adventure on said freight from and immediately following the loading thereof on board said vessel," the risk was held not to commence until the vessel had begun to load. So it is submitted the risk attached in the present case at the beginning of the loading. It is further submitted that it attached step by step, pro rata, as the cargo was put on board. "If the word 'loading,'" said Lord Ellenborough, C. J., in Mellish v. Allmutt (ubi. sup.), "is to be understood in a grammatical sense as descriptive of an act to be done, and not of the goods being in a loaded state, it can only be applied to one specific place, viz., where the cargo is to be taken on board, whereas, if it is to be understood as being loaded, it will be descriptive of a loading at every place. The former is the more obvious and strictly grammatical construction." That is the meaning which the plaintiff desires to put on it here.

JONES AND ANOTHER v. THE NEPTUNE MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY.

[Q. B.]

Bell v. Hobson, 16 Elst. 240;

Hunter v. Leathley, 10 B. & C. 858;

Hastie v. Depeyster, 3 Caines N. Y. Rep. 190;

Beckett v. The West of England Marine Insurance Company (Limited), ante, p. 185; were also referred to.

Manisty, Q. C. and Aspinall, Q. C., in support of the rule.—The defendants are not liable, for the risk never attached. The risk is expressly made to commence "from the loading" of the vessel. And the insurance is effected not as in ordinary cases, "at and from," but simply "from" Baker's Island. In Beckett v. The West of England Marine Insurance Company (Limited) (ubi. sup.) a ship was chartered to carry a cargo from Liverpool to Lagos on the west coast of Africa, there discharge and reload another cargo for the United Kingdom, in consideration of a lump sum by way of freight, payable half before sailing from Liverpool, half on delivery of the homeward cargo. The plaintiff, the shipowner, effected an insurance on freight "at and from Lagos," and the policy contained a clause whereby the defendants, the insurance company, agreed that the insurance should "commence upon freight and goods or merchandise aforesaid from the loading of the said goods or merchandise on board the said ship or vessel at as above." The ship being lost before she had shipped any of her homeward cargo, it was held that this clause precluded the plaintiff from recovering against the underwriters, although the freight was chartered freight. "What the words really mean," said Mellor, J., "is, the commencement of the risk shall be when the goods and merchandise are on board at Lagos, and not when the ship merely arrives there. Once let that construction be put to the policy, and the case is perfectly clear." Hannen, J., said, "we cannot reject operative words in a sentence merely because there may be a reason for a suggestion that one of the parties may not have contemplated the effect they would have. It must be remembered that they are the words of the underwriters as well as those of the assured." And Cockburn, C. J., refers to a reason, which is equally applicable to the circumstances of the present case, why the risk was made to commence "from the loading." "I think," said his lordship, "that Mr. Williams has given a second very good reason for the insertion of the words by the underwriters, viz., the peculiar difficulty of loading vessels on the West Coast of Africa, where they are exposed to dangers of tempests and other perils during the process of loading. That being so, one can quite understand the underwriters saying, 'we do not take upon ourselves, without requiring extra premium, the risk of the vessel loading at the coast under these circumstances. Though it may be,' they said, 'when the loading is completed, and the vessel is over the bar with a full cargo on board, we will undertake it.' But even independently of that, I cannot see any possible means of getting over the precise language used in the policy. I think, therefore, that this vessel having been lost before the loading was completed, the risk under the policy never attached, and that the defendants are entitled to judgment."

BLACKBURN, J.—In this case we are all agreed upon the result. We think the rule must be made absolute to enter the verdict for the defendants, but I believe we are not perfectly agreed upon our reasons. I will, therefore, proceed to state the reasons which influence me in coming to the conclusion I do. This is a reinsurance on chartered freight, the original voyage of the ship being from Melbourne to Baker's Island, and from Baker's Island to the port of discharge in the United Kingdom. There was of course the ordinary covenant to furnish a full cargo, and the freight was to be paid for according to what was the quantity of cargo delivered at the end of the voyage, more or less, according to the goods delivered; any residue arising from not shipping a full cargo to be a separate matter of damage. The ship then sailed on this voyage, and she was insured from Melbourne to Baker's Island, and it was during her stay at Baker's Island that this disaster occurred. The underwriters, under the policy, executed a reinsurance, on which reinsurance it is that the present question arises. The object was—as they had insured during the voyage, as I have said, from Melbourne to Baker's Island, and during her stay there and on her voyage home—to cover themselves during a portion of the risk, and the question is, what portion of that risk have they undertaken herein in the present form of policy? The policy is a peculiar policy. It is not one of those ordinary Lombard-street policies—ordinary Lloyd's policies, which have been modified of late, but it is an entirely new one from beginning to end, and applicable to freight only. That being so, we must consider what the ordinary policy of insurance is. In every case where there is an insurance against a marine loss the undertaking by the underwriter is this: "I will be responsible for such accidents as happen to the subject matter of the insurance during some particular voyage," which is there described. The question then is. What is that voyage? If the perils happen during that time he may be responsible for those consequences so far as they affect the subject-matter of the insurance. An ordinary Lombard-street form of policy is a very inartificial one, which is very old and long-established, and which has acquired a meaning which it is very difficult to put on it at first, but which has now been long-established; and the way that is done is by making it applicable to everything; and when they mention the voyage there is a blank for the freight, and then come these further words, "the beginning of the adventure on the said goods and merchandise to be from the loading thereof on board the said ship," &c.; and then there is left a blank which is generally filled up with the words, "this being a voyage from Baker's Island to England," or as the case may be, and "shall continue and endure," and so on. In that form of policy there is nothing whatever said, but it is always understood to refer to the time when the risk is to commence on the freight; and the consequence of that construction of the policy is this, that the underwriters are to be responsible for damage in the particular thing, the subject matter of the insurance being goods, &c., during the voyage, but it is not to be applicable to anything further than the particular goods, until the goods are loaded on board the ship. As to the freight there is nothing specified, and where that is so, as I understand the construction of it, it is this, if the freight be in existence, and thereby a peril may happen which destroys the ship during the specific period of the voyage over which the policy is intended to apply—if the freight be in existence and the ship is lost, then the underwriters are responsible for it, although the goods are not put on board. It is enough to prove the freight to be in mere expectancy and possibility. Taking that to be the correct view of the matter, the question we have to decide on this policy is, in the first place, what voyage was it during which the underwriters said "we will be responsible for any damage arising to this freight from perils occurring during the voyage?" and secondly, during what period of it the freight was to be in such a state and condition that if the peril happened during the voyage the freight was capable of sustaining damage from it. As to that the policy is worded in a peculiar way. It begins thus: "shall cause themselves to be insured in the sum of 500*l.* on the freight payable to him or them in respect of the present voyage." That being printed, then come in writing the words "on the vessel Napier, whereof ——— is master, or whoever else may go as master in the said ship from Baker's Island to any port of call and discharge in the United Kingdom." Then come the words, which are again printed, "the insurance on the said freight beginning from the loading of the said vessel, and terminating when the said vessel shall be moored at a safe anchorage." Construing that as best I can, I think it amounts to this: "We the underwriters, say we will be responsible for any perils in consequence of anything that may happen during this period—during the voyage from Baker's Island to a port of call or discharge." But I look in vain for words in that part of it that say "or during her stay at Baker's Island." These words, if the parties had intended to expose themselves to that risk under the insurance during her stay at Baker's Island, could easily have been inserted; but I look and look in vain for those words, and they are not there. The argument that struck me as the great argument for the plaintiff was that the printed words that follow—and the printed words are intended to apply to all cases—are "the insurance on the said freight beginning from the loading of the said vessel and terminating when the said vessel shall be moored at a safe anchorage." and so, of course, the goods were intended to be loaded before the voyage began, because they could not be loaded during the period of the voyage from Baker's Island to the United Kingdom. If I understand Mr. Butt's argument, it comes to this: that the risk was to commence earlier—that it was to commence during the stay at Baker's Island as soon as the goods were loaded. That raises the other question of the amount whether it was to be whole or partial. That seemed to me to be the argument for the plaintiff, and I pause to see whether any effect can be given to it; and I come to the conclusion that the matter is not as so put. What was meant to be said is, "We will be responsible for any peril that happens during the voyage described, but whether it happen then or not, we will not be responsible for the freight and insurance on it until the goods are actually on board." I take it that the printed words do not amount to an extension of the former words, that they will be responsible for the risk and peril during the voyage. They really say, "We limit it to the perils which may happen during the voyage, that is from Baker's Island forwards; yet nevertheless, we say, as a general rule for freight we shall not be responsible, unless the goods be on board." Taking that view—and that is the ground on which I go—the meaning is that "We will be responsible for damage to the freight after the goods shall be put on board, and during the voyage from Baker's Island to any port of the United Kingdom." This loss happened before the voyage from Baker's Island to the United Kingdom had commenced; and in that view of the matter I consider the loss is not covered by the policy, and consequently, that the defendants are entitled to the verdict. Now, a good deal of argument has been addressed to us upon the supposition that if you could imply words to say that during her stay at Baker's Island the ship should be covered, that then it was not necessary that the ship should be completely loaded before the risk attached. It is unnecessary to decide that at all, but I will say that my present impression, without going further than that, is, that inasmuch as the freight would depend on the quantity of goods ultimately delivered, if a portion of the cargo had been shipped, there would have been a portion of freight at risk, and the other portion would not be covered, and consequently it would be apportionable. But it is unnecessary to decide that in the view I take of the case; and I do not mean to decide it, but only to say that such is the impression on my mind, valeat quantum. The ground I decide the case upon is, that I think the words of this policy express the intention of the underwriters not to be liable for the perils that happened before the ship had gone from Baker's Island, but only on the voyage from Baker's Island, and that voyage had not commenced.

JONES AND ANOTHER v. THE NEPTUNE MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY.

MELLOR, J.—I come to the same result as my brother Blackburn, although I differ from him as to one portion of his judgment, doing so with the utmost possible hesitation; still I cannot quite yield to the reasons which he has alleged for his judgment. This is a reinsurance for a part of a risk, and the words are not "at and from Baker's Island," but "from Baker's Island to a port of call or discharge in the United Kingdom; the insurance on the said freight beginning from the loading of the said vessel, and terminating when the said vessel shall be moored and safely anchored." I cannot but think that the written words (there being no word "at,") if they stood alone, would certainly have the meaning which my brother Blackburn ascribed to them. They would only cover the risk from the time of the sailing of the vessel from Baker's Island to some port of the United Kingdom; but then, follow words which I cannot give any real or satisfactory meaning to unless I say that they extend the risk further than my brother Blackburn supposes; because the words are, "insurance on the said freight beginning from the loading of the said vessel." I think these words would not be satisfied by holding them to apply merely to the state in which the loading was, so as to make the matter apply to freight where there had been a partial loading of the vessel; I cannot help thinking that they do extend the risk of the loading of the vessel, and this is not inconsistent, as it appears to me, with the words "from Baker's Island to a port of discharge in the United Kingdom." Therefore, they must be read, "from the loading of the vessel at Baker's Island to a port of call and discharge in the United Kingdom." Then there are certain other words, such as "until the ship sails," which seem to give full effect to those words. I say I differ in this view, from my brother Blackburn, with the greatest possible respect. I may have made a mistake, but I cannot help expressing the conviction at which I arrive, namely, that, according to the meaning of the policy, it does extend the risk from the time of the loading of the vessel at Baker's Island to the arrival at a port of call or discharge in the United Kingdom.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion, that our judgment ought to be for the defendants; but I arrive at that conclusion for reasons different from those which my brother Blackburn has expressed, and which, although not material in this case, may be material in other proceedings on the same form of policy. Now, in my view, the words in writing here, descriptive of the voyage, were intended, in this policy, to define the risk. The words are, "Lost or not lost, the sum of 500*l.* upon the freight payable to him or them in respect to the present voyage, to be performed as below," referring to the words "to be performed from Baker's Island to a port of call and discharge in the United Kingdom." Now those words, in my view, are descriptive of the subject of insurance, namely, the freight which is to be earned on that voyage, and are not intended to define when the risk was to commence. Nevertheless, if there had been no other words defining the period when the risk was to commence, the risk, by implication, would only commence when this voyage commenced; and until the ship had sailed on that voyage the policy would not have attached. Then come the words that are expressly put in to define the commencement of the risk that had not, in my view, been defined before, and they are these namely, "the insurance on the said freight beginning from the loading of the said vessel." I could only read those words as qualifying and rebutting the inference which would have been drawn from the previous description of the voyage, and making the underwriters liable from the time when the vessel was loaded; meaning, that is, that they would be liable although the voyage had not commenced, if the vessel had been loaded. Then what does that loading mean? Does it mean the commencement or the completion of the loading? In this particular case the loading had been partially finished, not completed. The vessel had perished before the cargo was all put on board. Now if these words mean "the insurance being from the beginning of the loading," then, in my view, the plaintiff would be entitled to the whole amount, because there would have been a total loss; for although all the cargo was not on board, all the cargo necessary to complete the loading was ready to be put on board, and would have been put on board had not the vessel been unable to receive it by one of the perils insured against. If the words had been "from the beginning of the loading," then the plaintiff would have been entitled to our judgment. I am of opinion they do not mean that. I take into account that the underwriters do not intend to be responsible for the vessel during the time she lay at Baker's Island, because the ordinary words are omitted. It is not "at and from Baker's Island," but "from Baker's Island." Therefore the underwriters intended not to incur that liability which is ordinarily incurred in policies of this description; "at and from," but only to insure the voyage; and these words, in my view, must be read so as to give them their fullest sense as qualifying the previous description of the risk. Then, to what extent are they to be qualified? According to my view, the only reasonable construction is, that the underwriters, in insuring that voyage, in effect say, "We are willing to become responsible from the time the vessel has taken in her loading cargo, and is ready to commence the voyage, although it has not, in fact, actually commenced." That reading appears to me to make the whole of the policy consistent, and inasmuch as in this case the loading was not complete, the policy had not attached, and the plaintiff can recover nothing. This reading seems to dispose of the second branch of the rule. The second branch of the rule asks for what is called pro rata sum, namely, such proportion of the policy as would cover the amount of the cargo actually put on board. That seems to be disposed of by the same reasoning. If the policy had not attached, then the underwriters are not liable at all. If I am right in my view of it, that this loading means the complete loading of the vessel, the policy had not attached. If I could read it, on the other hand, as saying that the insurance was to begin at the time when the loading began, then, for the reasons which I have already given, I should have thought the plaintiff entitled to the whole. It seems to me that in this case the plaintiff is entitled to all or nothing; but, for the reasons given, I think the plaintiff entitled to nothing, on the ground that the policy had not attached.

FRASER AND OTHERS v. THE TELEGRAPH CONSTRUCTION AND MAINTENANCE COMPANY.

"Steamship"—"Auxiliary screw"—Bill of lading—Sailing voyage.

When a vessel by which goods are forwarded is described as a "steamship," simpliciter, in the bill of lading forming the agreement between the freighter and the owner of the vessel, the contract is that the goods shall be transported in a ship whereof the primary and principal propelling power is steam, and the terms will not be satisfied by an auxiliary screw steamship making a sailing voyage with the occasional aid of her steam power.

DECLARATION that in consideration that the plaintiffs would at the defendants' request cause to be shipped on board a certain steamship of the defendants called the Hibernia, which was then possessed of such motive and propelling powers as steamships of the class of the Hibernia ordinarily are possessed of, certain goods, to wit, black pepper and coffee, for reward to the defendants, the defendants promised that they would carry the said goods in the said steamship from Singapore to London, and would during the voyage use and employ the motive and propelling powers belonging to the said steamship; that the plaintiffs accordingly shipped the goods. Breach, that the defendants did not use and employ the motive and propelling powers of the steamship in the manner in which such powers are employed by steamships in the usual course of navigation, whereby the goods were delayed on the voyage, and the plaintiffs lost their market.

Second count: That the plaintiffs delivered to be carried in the Hibernia the goods as in the first count mentioned, and it became the duty of the defendants to use the motive powers as in the first count mentioned. Breach, that they did not do so.

Third count: That in consideration that the plaintiffs would ship goods on board the steamship Hibernia, to be carried in the said steamship as in the first count, the defendants promised that they would carry within a reasonable time. Breach, that they did not carry within such time.

In a fourth count, a duty on the part of the defendant to carry within a reasonable time was alleged; and a fifth count stated that the goods were delivered to the defendants as carriers, to be carried within a reasonable time, but were not so carried.

Pleas (inter alia): traverses of the promise, the duty alleged, and breaches.

Issue thereon.

The cause was tried before Mellor, J., and a special jury in the sittings after last Michaelmas term, at Guildhall, when it was proved that the plaintiffs, merchants of Singapore, had shipped a quantity of pepper and coffee on the defendant's auxiliary screw steamship Hibernia, under bills of lading dated Nov. 1870, as follows: "Shipped in good order and condition in the steamship Hibernia, laying off the port of Singapore, and bound for London, having liberty to call at any port or ports in or out of the customary route in any order to receive and discharge coals, cargo, and passengers, and for any other purpose, or to tow and assist vessels, and to tranship the goods by any other steamer, 1796 bags black pepper, to be delivered in like good order and condition at the port of London, inter alia, damage from machinery, boilers, or steam, however caused, or from explosions, heat or fire on board, default of engineer excepted, at 2*l.* per ton of 16 cwt." This freight was not much above the then ordinary freight for a sailing vessel. Five hundred tons of coal were on board when the ship left Singapore, but this quantity would not have sufficed if the homeward voyage had been made under steam. Acting, however, by the directions of the owners, the captain made the passage by means of sails, and used the steam power only in the China sea, at St. Helena, when coming up the English channel, and during occasional calms. No more coals were taken in, and the whole stock was not exhausted. Thus the voyage, which a ship propelled constantly by steam usually completes in 65 days, lasted 135 days, being longer than the ordinary voyage of a sailing ship.

The plaintiffs virtually abandoned their first two counts, and relied on the contention that as the vessel was only an auxiliary screw steamer, she was not bound to steam the whole distance.

The learned judge asked the jury to take into consideration the kind of vessel and the nature of the voyage, and to say whether the duration of the voyage was or was not reasonable.

Verdict for the defendants.

A rule having been obtained to set this verdict aside, and for a new trial on the ground that the learned judge had misdirected the jury in not telling them that the contract was for carriage in an ordinary steamship; and that the verdict was against the evidence.

Pollock, Q.C. and Cohen showed cause.—The Hibernia came no doubt within the category of steamers, and so was fairly described in the bill of lading. But she belonged to a perfectly well-known class of vessels which are designed to use steam as an auxiliary motive power only; and the plaintiffs inspected her and were aware of her character. There was no warranty that she should steam during the whole voyage. [BLACKBURN, J.—It is not a warranty, but part of the contract. LUSH, J.—A description of a ship as "A 1" has been held to be a warranty that she is so classed.] A certain quantity of coals are taken on board an auxiliary steamer, as in the present case, and it becomes the duty of a prudent master to economise them. Nor is any unfavourable inference to be drawn from the fact of a little coal being unused at the close of the voyage. The captain was not bound to do more than was usual, nor to go into intermediate ports to coal.

Sir John Karslake, Q.C. (A. L. Smith with him) was not required to argue.

Q. B.] FRASER AND OTHERS v. THE TELEGRAPH CONSTRUCTION AND MAINTENANCE COMPANY. [Q. B.]

COCKBURN, C.J.—I think this rule should be made absolute. The miscarriage at the trial, I think, has arisen from the abandonment of the first two counts in the declaration, although it is undoubtedly, a fact when the matter is looked into a little more closely, that the same questions are involved in the third count, which alleges an absence of navigating the vessel with reasonable expedition. But the present point is whether it was necessary that this vessel should be a steamship. It is expressly so called in the bill of lading, and that instrument also contains a provision not at all unimportant, viz., that “the vessel shall be at liberty to call at any port or ports in or out of the customary route in any order to receive and discharge coals, cargo, and passengers, and for any other purpose, . . . to tow and assist vessels, and to transship the goods by any other steamer.” Now the effect of the whole of that is, I think, to make it incumbent on the shipowner to see that the vessel by which these goods are to be shipped, and on the shipping of which a bill of lading is given, shall be a vessel propelled by steam. I am, however, far from saying that when it would be convenient for a steamship to use sails she should nevertheless at all times steam, but I mean that her principal means of propulsion shall be steam and not sails. Such, in my opinion, is the true meaning of the contract here, and it should have been left to the jury to say whether the vessel satisfied that condition, and I must adhere to what I have already said in the case that, even supposing the true construction of this agreement to be that an auxiliary steamship would satisfy the terms of it, still I consider that would involve the condition that the auxiliary power should be as far as possible employed, not of course if the ship were driven out to sea far away from a coaling station, but under ordinary circumstances. But I think the contract appears to be different by the bill of lading, for notwithstanding a case referred to by Mr. Cohen, decided in the Court of Common Pleas, but not reported, I must hold that the bill of lading is itself the contract under which the goods were carried and is conclusive, and that the master would not be able to say, “I, in the interests of the owners, make this a sailing voyage.” If a new trial takes place, it will, I think, be expedient to go into that question and make the evidence on the subject more complete. But it is enough now to say that, according to the right construction of the contract, it means that the ship shall be a vessel, the primary and principal propelling power of which is steam.

BLACKBURN, J.—I also think there should be a new trial. The first two counts which have been abandoned laid down the duty alleged much more strongly than the two before us, and averred a promise that the goods should be delivered in reasonable time, and that the defendants did not deliver within such time. These counts also stated that the goods were put on board the steamship Hibernia. Now, on that I understand the plaintiff to say that the reason why defendants are liable is because they did not use reasonable exertions on the voyage. If the delay had been caused by storms, or other incidents of navigation, I think the plaintiff would not go so far as to say the goods had been delayed for want of reasonable exertions, and, when we once reach that point, the kind of ship becomes most important in ascertaining the sort of contract really made, because the reasonableness of the expedition would vary according to the kind of ship. If the contract was, “We will carry these goods on board a vessel having an auxiliary screw, and using it when necessary to do so,” then the exertions would be reasonable; if the contract was to carry by steamer, although when with favouring winds she might go as a sailing vessel only, yet the vessel in the latter case would use much more steam than that in the former. Now, the view my brother Mellor took of the matter was that the contract was to carry by an auxiliary screw, and that only, and in that view his direction to the jury would have been right, viz., “Say if they were using coal in such quantities as was proper during the voyage,” but unfortunately, on looking into the bill of lading, the contract, I think, appears to be different. Notwithstanding the case referred to by Mr. Cohen, decided in the Court of Common Pleas, I must hold that the bill of lading is itself the contract under which the goods were carried, and is conclusive; and the bill of lading is as follows: [His Lordship read the material parts.] Now, I can in no way construe that clause, allowing transshipment, &c., as meaning anything else but this, viz., “The goods shall be shipped on another such steamer,” viz., a vessel whose motive power is principally steam power, although not requiring that during every moment of the voyage she should be worked by it. Then if we take that to be the contract, there can be no doubt in the matter, if the defendant avowedly only used the steam as auxiliary to canvas, and the vessel in reality sailed. On that view the plaintiff is right and the defendant wrong, but taking my brother Mellor’s reading of the contract, I cannot say whether the jury were right or wrong in their finding; at all events the evidence on the new trial will be more ample than before, and at present we can and need only say that the proper direction was not given, and that the plain iff was, under the agreement, entitled to have reasonable exertion made by the ship, a steamer, worked as a steamer.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the proper construction was not put on the bill of lading at the trial, and that it is not a contract that steam shall be used merely to supplement sails, but as a primary motive power, so as to keep the ship going at the rate of speed at which she would go if she were a mere steamer.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion, for I do not think that I put the true construction on the contract which has now been put on it by the court. And on the other point I should not be prepared to say decisively that I was dissatisfied with the verdict if my first interpretation of the agreement had been correct. But it is not necessary to give my opinion upon that question now, although I may state my own impression to be that I myself should have been disposed to have found the verdict the other way.

SEYMOUR v. LONDON AND PROVINCIAL MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY.

[C. P.]

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Reported by H. H. HOCKING, H. F. POOLEY, and E. A. KINGLAKE, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

June 1 and 3, 1872.

SEYMOUR v. LONDON AND PROVINCIAL MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Marine Insurance—War risks—Warranted no contraband of war—Real destination.

During the continuance of the war between the United States of America and the Confederate States, and while the coasts of the territory of the latter States were strictly blockaded, certain persons in this country shipped a cargo of goods on board a ship which was to proceed to Matamoras, a Mexican town on the Rio Grande, which river separates it from Texas, one of the Confederate States. The shippers reserved to themselves the option of disposing of their goods as they saw fit on arriving at Matamoras, but the real intention of all parties was that at Matamoras the goods should be transhipped into lighters and proceed thence to a point in Texas, there to be delivered to the Confederate Government in pursuance of a contract made between that Government and one M. The goods were insured on their voyage to Matamoras by a policy which contained a warranty against contraband of war. While on its way to Matamoras the ship was seized by a United States cruiser and condemned. In an action on the policy by the insurance agent on behalf of the shippers,

Held, that the goods being from the time they left this country really bound to Texas, were contraband of war, so that the warranty was broken and plaintiff could not recover.

SPECIAL CASE.

This was an action brought to recover 3000*l.* and interest upon a marine policy of insurance, subscribed by the defendants. In the policy the insurance was declared to be "upon goods warranted no contraband of war," and the policy was declared "to cover the risks excepted by the clause," warranted free from capture, seizure, and detention, "and all the consequences thereof or attempts thereat," only part of an interest of 7500*l.* in the ship Peterhoff, at and from London and Matamoras, including risk of craft to and from the ship.

The principal pleas relied upon were the seventh and ninth. The seventh plea alleged that the defendants were induced to make the said insurance by the misrepresentation of the plaintiff and his agents, and the wrongful and improper concealment by the plaintiff and his agents from the defendants of certain material facts then known to the plaintiff and his agents, and unknown to the defendants, and which ought to have been communicated by the plaintiff and his agents to the defendants.

The ninth plea alleged that the said warranty against contraband of war was not complied with.

The case came on for trial before Bovill, C.J., at the London sittings after Michaelmas Term 1866, when a verdict was taken by consent for the plaintiff for 3000*l.* and interest, subject to the opinion of the court upon a special case.

The facts may be briefly stated (so far as they were material) as follows:

During the war between the United States of America and the Confederate States, and when the ports of the latter were strictly blockaded by the cruisers of the former, an agreement was made between the Confederate Government, and one Bellot des Minières by which the States agreed to take all military stores and supplies, which Bellot des Minières might furnish to them, and pay for them (in cotton if desired) to the value of 100 per cent. on the invoice prices. The goods were to be inspected and approved previous to shipment by the agents of the Confederate Government. Bellot des Minières accordingly appointed Gustavus Harding his agent to procure persons to ship goods in pursuance of this contract. It was arranged between all parties concerned, that it would be safer not to try and run the blockade, but to send the goods to the Rio Grande, a river which divides Mexico from Texas, one of the Confederate States. There is a bar at the mouth of this river, and it was accordingly arranged that the goods should be unshipped at the mouth of the river into lighters and taken in them to Matamoras, a town in Mexico, and thence forwarded across the river into Texas. A ship, the Peterhoff, was accordingly chartered by Gustavus Harding to go to the Rio Grande. Gustavus Harding then issued a circular, in which he set forth the contract that had been made between Bellot des Minières and the Confederate Government, and the arrangements that had been made for sending goods, in fulfilment of that contract, by way of Matamoras into Texas, and invited the persons addressed to ship goods on their own responsibility in fulfilment of the contract. The shippers were to have 50 per cent. out of the 100 per cent. which, by the contract, Bellot des Minières was to receive from the Confederate Government, and the rest was to be divided between Bellot des Minières and Harding. Various persons were induced by this circular to ship goods on board the Peterhoff. The goods were of the description mentioned in the agreement between Bellot des Minières and the Confederate Government, viz., cloth, flannel, and other material for clothing; and also, inter alia, artillery harness. None of these persons entered into any agreement by which they became bound to dispose of their goods, either to Bellot des Minières or the Confederate Government, but they were all of them induced to ship their goods on board the Peterhoff by the hope of realising the stipulated share in the profits of the contract between Bellot des Minières and the Confederate Government, and they shipped them with the intention and in the expectation that they would be disposed of in fulfilment of that contract. The goods were inspected and passed, previous to shipment, by an agent of the Confederate Government. A cotton press was taken on board the ship for the purpose of pressing the cotton, which was expected to be received from the Confederate Government in payment of the goods. In order to retain the goods in their control, the shippers made out the bills of lading to one Bowden, who sailed in the ship as supercargo, and who had power, in case he deemed it advisable in his sole discretion to do so, to sell the goods to the agent of Bellot des Minières at Matamoras, in which case Bellot des Minières was to be bound to take them upon the terms of the above-mentioned circular. But Bowden was not bound to sell to Bellot des Minières' agent, but was to be at liberty on arriving at Matamoras, to sell to anyone and at any price he thought fit. Nevertheless, it was found in the case as a fact, that it was intended by all parties that the goods should be disposed of to the agent of Bellot des Minières at Matamoras, in pursuance of the above arrangement. The above-mentioned agreement was bonâ fide, and the Peterhoff was regularly cleared for Matamoras, which was her true destination. Plaintiff, an insurance broker, insured the goods shipped with the defendants to the extent of 3000*l.*, against war risks only, and warranted them "no contraband of war." The Peterhoff was seized on her way to Matamoras by the United States cruisers, and with her cargo condemned in the American Prize Court.

Chief Justice Chase, the judge in the American Prize Court, in dealing with the case divided all goods seized on the seas into three classes, the first class comprising such articles as were manufactured and primarily and ordinarily used for military purposes in time of war; the second, such as were used for purposes of war or peace, according to circumstances; and the third, such as were exclusively used for pacific purposes. Merchandise of the first class destined to a belligerent country, or places occupied by the army or navy of a belligerent was, he said, always contraband. Merchandise of the second class was contraband only when actually destined to the military or naval use of a belligerent; merchandise of the third class was not contraband at all. The artillery harness in this case he considered as belonging to the first class, and condemned it accordingly.

Field, Q.C. (Murphy with him) for the plaintiff. The goods, even if rightly decided to fall under what Chief Justice Chase calls the first class, were really intended for sale at Matamoras. That was their destination, and therefore they were not liable to seizure. They cannot be said to have been destined for Texas in such a way as to make them contraband of war. He cited

Sir George Honyman, Q.C. (J. C. Mathew with him) for the defendants.—The goods were from the beginning destined for Texas, so as to make the cargo contraband of war. [BRETT, J.—The voyage to Matamoras was in reality the commencement of a transit, which, unless something new intervened, was to terminate in the Confederate States.] Yes. Field, Q.C. in reply.

WILLES, J.—This was an action on a policy of insurance on goods from this country to Matamoras, a Mexican town on the Rio Grande. The goods were described in the policy as warranted no contraband of war. The goods were to proceed by ship to the Rio Grande, where there is a bar, thence by lighters to Matamoras. The Rio Grande divides Mexico from Texas, one of the States then known as the Confederate States. The river at Matamoras is some sixty yards wide. The war was at the time of the making of the policy raging between the United States and the Confederate States. Whether the war which subsequently broke out between France and Mexico had then commenced does not clearly appear. The date of the policy is the 10th Dec. 1862. In the agreement of the 17th Dec. 1862 between Bellot des Minières, Harding, and the shippers, there is a remarkable provision that one party was to be bound to get the leave of the French for the importation of the goods to Matamoras in the event of the Mexican ports being blockaded by France. If war existed between France and Mexico at the time the policy was made, the task of putting a construction on the policy would be easy. But the only war judicially under our notice is the American war, and the argument on the part of the underwriters is that the warranty "no contraband of war" must include goods of the first class, viz., goods of a distinctively warlike character, even though it appeared that the goods in question were not going to a part of the country at war, so that an enemy might legally seize them on the way. It is, however, unnecessary to enter into that question. It may well be argued as between the underwriters and the assured that the warranty "no contraband of war," being expressed generally, must include goods which, there being a war between any two countries, would from their nature be specially liable to be seized by either of them; i.e., that the warranty would include goods of an undoubtedly warlike character, even though such goods, not being intended for one of the countries at war, might not be legally seizable. The policy was against war risks only. It therefore extended to any seizure by any country at war made in a hostile manner, even though such seizure might subsequently, in a prize court, be declared contrary to the laws of war, and even though the prize court might direct restoration of the goods with costs and damages. An insurance against war risks is an insurance against all seizures made in a hostile manner, and assuming that the goods were unquestionably intended for Mexico on a contract binding between the parties who shipped them and persons in Mexico, and had been seized by a United States cruiser, that would have been a seizure within the policy. The seizure would have been mistaken, and it might have been made perversely, or even capriciously; but it would still have been within the policy, if it had been made in a hostile manner. It might, therefore, be fairly, if not conclusively, open to argument, that the warranty was to be read in like fashion, i.e., as including goods which in their character are contraband of war, and consequently likely to be seized by any country whose interest it might be to watch for ships carrying contraband of war, and whose interest it might be to seize a cargo of that description on suspicion that it might be intended for the country with which it was at war. Looking at the matter from that point of view, the warranty would exclude goods of a doubtful character (I will refer only to the artillery harness)—goods whose character could only be determined by their destination—as such goods, no matter what their destination, would be specially liable to be seized on suspicion, even though it might afterwards turn out that the suspicion was unfounded. That is the first question raised, but it is unnecessary to express an opinion upon it. Passing that by, then, I take it as undoubted that the warranty applies to the case of any goods going to such a place as would render them liable to be seized. The question, therefore, arises, whether the goods in question had such a destination, that they were legally seizable as contraband of war. It appeared that the intended course of the goods (I am thinking especially of the artillery harness) was, unless some obstacle interposed, or some change of purpose altered the destination, to go to Matamoras (whether they were to be landed there or not seems doubtful); but, assuming that it was intended that the goods should be landed at Matamoras from the lighters, they were then to be re-shipped on other lighters and taken to some place in Texas. The course which the goods were taking by the desire and according to the intention of all parties, was to go to Texas, there to be delivered to the agents of the Confederate Government. A great many steps were to be taken before the goods were to reach Texas; but it appears to me that, from the time they left this country, the place they were bound to was Texas. If that is so, it appears clear that the goods were legally seizable on the sea at the time they were seized by the United States cruisers. The main question that has been argued has been whether the goods were in point of fact so bound to Texas that they were legally seizable on the sea by the United States, and we ought, therefore, in order to show what our view of the case is, to consider the facts more closely. It appears that one Besbie was employed by the Confederate States to procure a cargo for them, and through his agency an agreement was made between the Confederate Government and Bellot des Minières, by which the former agreed to receive certain military stores and supplies, and it was arranged that these goods should be delivered at some safe place within the Confederate territory. They were to be inspected previous to shipment and not afterwards. The Confederate Government agreed to pay for the goods at 100 per cent. on the invoice price, payable in cotton, if desired. This cotton was to come from the Confederate states. That was the first step in the transaction. The cargo that was ultimately sent out was to enable Des Minières to fulfil this contract. Des Minières appointed Gustavus Harding to get a shipment of the goods, and Harding introduced the matter to Messrs. Bennett and Wake, ship-brokers in London. Thereupon it was agreed that the safest way was not to try and run the blockade which applied only to the seaports, but to send the goods to Matamoras, a Mexican town, whence, without fear of interruption, the goods might be transported across the river to the Confederate territory. It was open, therefore, to Des Minières to ship the goods directly to some Confederate port; but instead of doing so it was thought the safest way to ship them to Matamoras. The next step was to procure a ship, which was done by a charter-party between Besbie and Harding of the one part, and the owners of the other. The next thing to be done was to get shippers, and to do that it was arranged between Des Minières and G. Harding that the goods which should be shipped by the latter and his friends for the execution of a portion of the contract should be to the amount of 150,000*l.*, and that the 100 per cent. profit should be distributed between the parties in certain proportions then mentioned. It was also arranged that Robert Harding, the brother of Gustavus, should be the agent of Des Minières to dispose of cotton which should be received in payment, and to hold the proceeds and distribute them in accordance with the terms of the agreement. The terms, therefore, on which anybody was to ship any of the goods were to be found in this agreement, and persons were to receive their share of 50 per cent. profit, part of which was to be delivered to them through the hands of Des Menières, who was to receive the return made by the Confederates for the goods which were to go out. In furtherance of this design, Besbie and Bennett and Wake proceeded to distribute information as to the adventure. The substance of this was that Besbie was to deliver, in pursuance of his contract, in the Confederate States, through the agency of persons who were to have the conduct of the matter. The goods were to be sent to some person in Mexico, and by him to be put in course to arrive in Texas. It was further provided (and this is the option that has been spoken of) that "if the goods can meet with a better market, shippers by our vessel may avail themselves of the said contract or not." It was thus arranged, that any person sending out goods to Matamoras, where it does not appear that there was any market for goods of the description sent out, should have the option of giving up his share of the 100 per cent. profit, which had been promised by the Confederate Government, and of trusting to a chance market elsewhere. It is now contended that the option thus reserved is sufficient to change the character of the transaction, and to prevent it from being said that the goods were bound for Texas. The notice of Messrs. Bennett and Wake which I have just quoted goes on to provide for the contingency of peace. It is impossible to believe that the option I have just alluded to was anything more than colourable to make the goods possibly exempt from seizure as going to Mexico, so that a prize court might hold that the voyage to Texas was not continuous with the voyage to Matamoras, and that the goods were not bound to go to Texas, but that it was intended that they should go to a neutral port, to be sent on to Texas if it was thought, on arrival at Matamoras, expedient that they should go there—in other words, that, as far as the prize court might be concerned, the goods should be regarded as bound for a neutral port, and that there was only a possibility of their being sent thence to Texas. I think that the option thus reserved was a mere colour or blind, through which it was thought the real character of the transaction might possibly be concealed. I have thought it necessary to dwell on the terms of the contract, because, when we come to look at the contract between the parties it will be found that it is merely an expansion of the notice. I look then at the option reserved to the shippers as a simple blind. It is to be regarded just as if a man shipped goods for Charleston with a suggestion that the goods were to stop at St. Thomas's, where possibly there might be a better market for the goods, and that he reserved to himself the option of disposing of the goods at St. Thomas's if he chose to do so, and of not going to Charleston at all. Induced by the notice just referred to, various persons shipped goods on board the Peterhoff, and all the goods that started on that voyage were goods shipped under this contract with the Confederate Government. Other goods were shipped by Harding on the chance

SEYMOUR v. LONDON AND PROVINCIAL MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY.

SEYMOUR v. LONDON AND PROVINCIAL MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY.

that the Confederate Government might accept them. Lastly, a cotton mill was put on board, to press the cotton when received. Having given that account of the transaction, let me proceed to deal with the shipment. The goods were shipped on the strength of the information received as to the profit. The shippers were not to be bound to sell to the Confederates when they got out there, but they were all induced to ship in order to share in the profit promised by the Confederate Government. It was intended to sell the goods to the Confederate Government through Bellot des Minières. The parties had taken care to ascertain that the contract with the Confederates was genuine, and they also assured themselves that the Confederate Government had made proper provision for the transit of the goods and the return of the cotton. It is impossible to construe the warranty in the charter-party as merely limiting the liability of the underwriters to such goods as were not contraband of war; the warranty was introduced to save the underwriters in the event of a vessel of war seizing the ship, and, on finding some contraband on board her, taking her into port to a prize court. The effect of the presence of contraband of war on board a ship is, not that the contraband alone is forfeited, but to make the contraband itself, and all the goods of the same owner on board the ship, forfeitable to the captor, and the result would be that the cargo would be taken to a prize court to determine whether the actual contraband only should be forfeited, or whether any and how much of the rest of the cargo should be forfeited. That is the law as it was frequently laid down by Lord Stowell. To proceed with the facts of the case. It appears that a supercargo—one Robert Bowden—who was appointed by Gustavus Harding to assist in bringing the adventure to a successful conclusion. He was the person to whom the bills of lading were to be made out. Certain of the shippers entered into the agreement which has been relied on—which is an agreement between Des Minières of the first part, Robert Harding of the second, and the shippers enumerated in the schedule of the third. After reciting the agreement with the Confederate States, it goes on to recite an agreement with the parties of the third part, that in any case they shall send out goods to the port of Matamoras, Brown, Fleming, and Co. as the agents of Bellot des Minières will purchase the same. That is not true; 100 per cent. was to accrue to Des Minières on the goods that might arrive in the Confederate States, and, by the agreement with Harding, the latter was to receive that and divide it into three parts. To speak of the option reserved to the shippers is idle. The 4th article of the agreement is that the ship shall not carry contraband of war; that is a mere blind. There was to be contraband on board the ship, and that that was contemplated from the beginning is certain. We must take this agreement, so far as we can, to be bonâ fide between the parties; but no amount of bonâ fides can alter the facts. The 6th paragraph gives power to Bowden to sell the goods at Matamoras, and provides what he is to do in the event of his not selling them to Brown, Fleming and Co. Then comes the 7th paragraph, by which if Bowden, in his sole discretion, chooses to sell to Brown, Fleming and Co., he is to be at liberty to do so, and Brown, Fleming and Co. are to be bound to accept the goods, and, by the 8th paragraph, to pay at the rate of 100 per cent. over and above the invoice price. Thus all the persons who shipped goods put them in the hands of a person who was in direct communication with the Confederate Government, and payment for the goods, together with the expected profit—all was to come from the Confederate Government. The next finding in the case is that the agreement was made bonâ fide; but it is added, that "the parties thereto intended by means of the stipulations in the agreement relating to the alleged sales to Brown, Fleming and Co., or their nominees, that the goods should be disposed of and delivered to the agents of the Confederate Government." Thus the design from beginning to end (unless an unanticipated obstacle intervened) was that the goods should go to the Confederates. That being so, before I proceed to refer to the case of Hobbs v. Henning (sup.), I think it right to show how prize courts have from time to time dealt with the case of cargoes sent to be landed in neutral ports, with the intention that they shall ultimately reach a hostile port. The question in such case arises as to the continuity of the voyage. In such cases great stress has been laid by prize courts on the question, whether the goods, sent in the first instance to the neutral port, have been sent with the real intention of being landed at that port, so as to become part of the common property of the neutral country, or whether they have been sent there only as a blind, so as to alter the character of the subsequent voyage. The law has been decided, that a mere transshipment at the neutral port, or a sale there without landing the goods, or a putting of the goods ashore and reshipment of them in the same or in a different vessel—all circumstances of that kind are insufficient to break the continuity of the voyage, and to prevent it from being illegal from the beginning. The court is to look at the real intention of the parties, and not to give them credit for what I may term the operose manner in which they may have tried to conceal the true design. If, then, the court disregards the masks, and look at the real design of the parties; if they find the real design to be, by doing such acts as I have described, only to mask the original and continuous design, the court will strip off the mask and view the matter in its true light. It is unnecessary to refer at length to the cases that have been cited. The case of The Thomryis (1 Edw. Adm. Rep. 17) may be summed up by saying, in the words of Lord Stowell, "that the mere transshipment of a cargo at an intermediate port will not break the continuity of the voyage, which can only be effected by a previous actual importation into the common stock of the country where the transshipment takes place." In that case, Lord Stowell had to consider whether certain goods originally shipped at a port in Spain had been since that shipment on their way to a hostile country. If they had, then they might be seized on the high seas by any nation who had an interest in seizing them. A sale effected on the way was not held sufficient to change the character of the voyage. The suggested importation to Lisbon was held to be no importation at all. Some stress was laid on the question, whether they were actually put on shore at Lisbon; and there are some passages in the judgment which seem to say that if they had been actually landed there it might have made a difference. In the case before us there is nothing to show that the cargo was to be actually landed at Matamoras. Even if it was to be put on shore there, if such landing were only colourable, it will be seen that Lord Stowell did not think that sufficient, unless they became part of the common stock of the country. At any rate, a mere transshipment is not sufficient to break the continuity of the voyage, which can only be broken by a landing into the country, so as actually to become part of its common stock. Another case that has been referred to is The William (5 C. Rob. Adm. Rep. 385). It is obvious from that case that what a judge has to do is to look at the real character of the transaction. In the case before us he must satisfy his mind that there was a real intention to import these goods into Matamoras; and applying my mind to the question, with every charity towards the shippers, I find it impossible to arrive at a conclusion that it was intended to import this cargo into Matamoras, so as to make it part of the common stock of Mexico. I must guard myself against being supposed to express any opinion upon the controverted point whether neutrals can sell arms to belligerents; whether, in short, what is prima facie contraband can be sold to them. I do not wish to throw any doubt upon the power to sell. I call it a controverted point, because though the weight of authority allows such sales by neutrals, the learned judge of the Admiralty has, in a recent work on international law (3 Phillimore's International Law), adverted to principles of justice as showing that neutrals ought not to be allowed to sell to belligerents under any circumstances. If it were necessary to express an opinion on the point, this court might arrive at a different conclusion. For myself, I have no doubt upon the point, but I think it would be wrong to pronounce a distinct judgment on the point, as the question does not arise. I only wish to say that I take the part of the minority in that controversy. The present case was one in which the entire adventure was to be completed in the country where the goods were to go and the profits, in which the sellers were to share, were to arise only on the entry of the goods into the belligerent country. A neutral may no more lawfully import arms into a hostile country without rendering them liable to seizure on the way, than a neutral government can do so without giving rise to a casus belli. It is a case of private war by the individual; an act of a hostile character. The mere act of selling to a belligerent has not that character. I now come to consider the case of Hobbs v. Henning (sup.), which was much relied on by the plaintiff. It is true that in that case the plea did not allege that there was in the policy there, as there is here, a warranty that the goods insured were not contraband of war; but it was founded on the allegation that the goods were contraband, and that they had been shipped to Matamoras for the purpose of being sent on to Texas. The plea was held bad, because it not being alleged that any warranty had been given, it became necessary to show that the goods were contraband, and liable to be seized as such; and it was further held that the averment that it was the intention of the sellers that the goods should go to the Confederate States, did not indicate that the goods were bound to go there; and on that ground it was decided that the state of things which we have now decided to have existed in the present case not having been averred in the plea, the plea was not sustainable. That appears from the judgment. The case of Lightfoot v. Tennant (1 Bos. & P. 551), was there distinguished at p. 819 in the Common Bench Report N. S., and that part of the judgment accords with the law that we lay down to-day. "If goods," says Erle, C.J., "fit for immediate use in war, and therefore of the quality denoted by the term 'contraband of war,' are passing between neutrals, it seems that they are not liable to seizure by a belligerent. The right of capture, according to Sir W. Scott's opinion, expressed in the case of The Imina (3 C. Rob. Adm. Rep. 167), attaches only where they are passing on the high seas to an enemy's port. They must be taken in delicto, that is, in the actual prosecution of a voyage to an enemy's port." It is right to mention that by the word "voyage" is meant the real destination of the goods; and, as is pointed out by Lord Stowell, the character of the voyage is not altered by a mere transshipment. The word "voyage" is simply equivalent to the old English word "bound." Thus, Erle, C.J., in Hobbs v. Henning, at p. 818, says: "The allegation that the goods were shipped for the purpose of being sent to an enemy's port is not an allegation of a mental process only." I will not stop to criticise this passage. I will bow to the authority of the late Chief Justice of the court; but I take that passage in connection with what follows, viz.: "We are not to assume, therefore, either that the plaintiff had made any contract, or provided any means for the further transmission of the goods into the enemy's state, or that the shipment to Matamoras was an unreal pretence. If the goods were in a course of transmission, not to Matamoras, but to an enemy's port, the voyage would not be covered by the policy, and that defence is raised in direct terms by the third plea. Here the allegation does not deny the destination to the neutral port to which the insurance relates, but introduces a purpose existing in the mind of the assured after the termination of the voyage insured for, as to the ulterior disposition of the cargo and ship. It is consistent with that purpose as here alleged, that the plaintiff made the consignment for mercantile profit as the end to be attained by him; in other words, that he knew of an effective demand for warlike stores at Matamoras, and was induced to send a supply by the expectation of a high price, and that he expected that the purchase would probably be made on behalf of the Confederate States, and in this sense had the purpose that the goods should pass into those states. In this sense price was the ultimate end which he purposed to attain, and Federal and Confederate were alike indifferent as means, provided he attained that end, and in a neutral territory he might lawfully sell to either." In the present case, the plaintiff may be said not to have made any contract. I exclude the notion of any contract having been made by the shippers. But there was a certain contract existing on the one hand between Bellot des Minières and the shippers. The latter was just the same sort of contract as is entered into by a person who offers a reward. It was binding on the promisor. It was a contract of which the shippers might avail themselves, if they liked. In Hobbs v. Henning the plea was held insufficient, as it showed that there was to be a sale by a neutral in a neutral port. Here we find as a fact that the goods were shipped with the intention that there should be only a temporary stoppage at the neutral port, and that the goods, in the course of the same transaction, should go on to Texas, and that the shippers should be paid by a share of the profits to be obtained on the delivery in the Confederate States. The case of Hobbs v. Henning is, therefore, an authority for the defendants. Erle, C.J., in his judgment, goes on to say, "The distinction between a mere mental process that an unlawful act should be done and a participation in the unlawful act itself, is made more clear by referring to the cases of Holman v. Johnson (Cowp. 341) and Lightfoot v. Tennant (1 Bos. & P. 551). In the first, the plaintiff, in a foreign country, sold goods to the defendant, knowing that he purposed to smuggle them into England, and in one sense the plaintiff there sold them with the purpose that they should be so smuggled; but as he did not participate in any way in the unlawful transaction, the mere mental process did not avoid the contract of sale. In the second case, Lightfoot v. Tennant, the plaintiff sold goods to the defendant, to be delivered abroad, in order that they should be sent unlawfully to the East Indies. After a verdict for the defendant on a plea alleging this fact, on motion for judgment non obstante veredicto, the objection was raised that the mere mental purpose of the vendor did not avoid the contract of sale; but the objection was answered by suggestion of the fact that the plaintiff's participation in the unlawful transaction went beyond the mere mental purpose; that he was to be taken to be a party to the whole project, and to be acting in the execution thereof in the sale which was the cause of action; and upon those facts the contract was held void." In a work which has been of the greatest advantage to the law, "Benjamin on Sale," at p. 380, all the cases on this point are collected. Those cases prove that it is sufficient to show that goods have been delivered with a knowledge that they are being bought with an illegal purpose, and for the purpose of being so used. I think that is all I need say upon the case. Other points have been argued, but it is unnecessary that I should advert to them. I think our judgment should be for the defendants.

SEYMOUR v. LONDON AND PROVINCIAL MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY.

EXCHEQUER CHAMBER.

Reported by H. LEIGH and T. W. SAUNDERS, Esqrs.,
Barristers-at-Law.

APPEALS FROM THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Saturday, June 22, 1872.

JAMES v. THE SOUTH-WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10, s. 13)—Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 514—Jurisdiction of Admiralty Court—Prohibition.

The plaintiff, a passenger by the steamer N., which, after negligently colliding with another ship, had been utterly lost at sea, brought an action in the Court of Exchequer against the defendants, owners of the N., for personal injuries and loss of baggage occasioned to him thereby. Cross causes of damage were also instituted by the owners of both vessels in the Court of Admiralty, and 5000*l.* paid in by the defendants in lieu of bail. The latter then began a suit under 24 Vict. c. 16, s. 13, for limitation of their liability to the plaintiff and similar claimants. The Admiralty judge held that he had jurisdiction, entertained the suit, and ordered that the sum of 6376*l.*, the amount of possible liability calculated at 15*l.* per ton of the N., should be paid into court.

The defendants, having accordingly paid in that sum, and admitted their liability, prayed for an injunction restraining the action of the plaintiff, who thereupon declared in prohibition:

Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Exchequer), that as the Admiralty Court, although in some respects a Superior Court, is one of limited jurisdiction, and, as it had not jurisdiction, because neither the ship nor "the proceeds thereof," were "under arrest," within the terms of 24 Vict. c. 10, s. 13, prohibition would lie, and might issue.

ERROR from the Court of Exchequer.

The pleadings and points of argument are fully set out in the report of the case below (ante, p. 226), where judgment was given for the plaintiff on demurrer to a declaration in prohibition to the Court of Admiralty.

Sir J. B. Karstake, Q.C. (C. W. Wood, Q.C. and Cohen with him) for the defendants.—24 Vict. c. 10, s. 13 enacts that "Whenever any ship or vessel, or the proceeds thereof, are under arrest of the High Court of Admiralty, the said court shall have the same powers as are conferred upon the High Court of Chancery in England by the ninth part of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854." By sect. 514 of the last-mentioned Act power is given to the Court of Chancery to entertain proceedings at the suit of any shipowner who has incurred liability in respect of loss of life or goods, for the purpose of determining the amount of such liability and for the distribution of such amount, with power for such court to stop all actions and suits pending in any other court in relation to the same subject-matter. The present question, as to the jurisdiction depends upon the construction of the section first cited. Here the vessel, being lost, could not be "under arrest." She was, however, represented, as it were, by a sum paid into court instead of bail. In The Northumbria (3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 316; 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 681; L. Rep. 3 Ad. & Ecc. 24), it was held that, where proceedings in rem have been instituted in the Court of Admiralty against a vessel, and bail has been given for the vessel, the court has jurisdiction to entertain a suit instituted by the owners of the vessel for limitation of liability, although the vessel may not actually have been under arrest of the Court of Admiralty. Moreover the maximum amount of the owner's liability was paid into court previously to the injunction, and that is surely enough to give jurisdiction to stay the action. Under such circumstances, an order to stay all actions was granted by the Court of Admiralty in The Normandy (3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 519; 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 631; L. Rep. 3 Ad. & Ecc. 152.) [WILLES, J.—I have had to consider this matter at chambers, and there the plaintiff's counsel contended that the Admiralty Court had no jurisdiction, summing up his argument thus: "The ship is gone. She is lost, and for all practical purposes, is nil; but 'proceeds' must mean proceeds of something, and ex nihilo nihil fit."] The assumed value of the vessel may be regarded as the "proceeds" within the spirit of sect. 13, although, as the ship has perished, no "proceeds" strictly speaking can issue from her. [BRET, J.—The payment into court in the collision suit cannot in any possible way be regarded as proceeds of the ship. The money was brought into court under the Admiralty Court Act 1861, sect. 34, as security in a cross cause where the defendant's ship could not be arrested within the meaning of that section, and not to prevent the arrest of the vessel, as in those cases where a præcipe for a caveat warrant is filed, and the defendant or his proctor undertakes to give bail in any suit that may be instituted against the ship; (Williams and Bruce's Admiralty Court Practice, pp. 189, 197.)] The money paid in to procure the release of a ship represents the ship; so also money paid in to prevent her arrest. Sect. 34 of the Admiralty Court Act shows that the legislature intended to give jurisdiction in all cases, even where the ship could not be arrested, and that the security given under that section is substituted for the money paid into court or bail given to prevent the arrest of the ship. Although there must be an admission of liability, as stated by Wood, V.O. in Hill v. Audus (1 Kay & J. 267), it is "not indispensably requisite that the owner of a ship preferring a claim in the Court of Admiralty under this statute, to limited liability should begin by acknowledging that his vessel is to blame;" (per Dr. Lushington in The Amalia (Bro & L. 156; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 359). The Court of Admiralty is a Superior Court, and therefore prohibition will not lie: (Place v. Potts, 5 H. L. Cas. 583). A distinction is drawn in The Mayor of London v. Cox (L. Rep. 2 H. L. Cas. at p. 259) by Willes, J., between the statutes affecting the Mayor's Court and the Admiralty Court, he says, "In this local Act (the Mayor's Court) there are neither express words nor necessary implication to produce the prerogative effect of creating a Superior Court . . . Far different was the language used in the public Act of 20 Vict. c. 65, to put the Admiralty Court on the footing of the Superior Court." [WILLES, J.—That point cannot be maintained. Some spiritual courts are superior, and yet prohibition lies to them if they exceed their jurisdiction. Ricketts v. Bodenham, 4 A. & E. 433.]

W. G. Harrison for the plaintiff.—There could be no proceeds of the ship, which, for all practical purposes, had ceased to exist. Money deposited in court instead of bail cannot be considered as proceeds. The purpose for which it was paid in, was to enable the defendants under the Admiralty Court Act 1861, s. 34, to further litigate their cause of damage, and had no reference to the suit for limitation of liability. [Stopped by the Court.]

Sir J. B. Karlake replied.

WILLES, J.—Speaking for myself, and apart from judicial duty, I am sorry the cause has arrived at its present stage, and that the plaintiff has not been persuaded to allow the sum which has been paid by the defendants into the Court of Admiralty to be distributed there. However, a judge is bound not to follow his own view as to what is a convenient course. He must measure the rights of the plaintiff not by "the crooked record of private discretion, but by the golden metewand of the law;" and the question is whether the plaintiff, against his will, is to be compelled to submit to the jurisdiction of the court of Admiralty. In considering it we must remember that it is for the defendants to make out that there is some law which authorises the Court of Admiralty in preventing the plaintiff from pursuing his ordinary remedy. Unless such a law exists, then, as the Admiralty is acting beyond its jurisdiction, prohibition will go, for the court is one of a limited jurisdiction. I do not call it an inferior court, but, treating it as a superior Court with a limited jurisdiction, it is subject to prohibition though superior in name; like many other courts, nominally superior but still liable to prohibition, their jurisdiction being limited. The defendants rely upon 24 Vict. c. 10, s. 13, giving to the Court of Admiralty, under certain conditions, the same jurisdiction as to limitation suits as is possessed by the Court of Chancery under sect. 514 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854. This power of limiting liability dates from 53 Geo. 3, c. 159, by which, following a rule which is very general abroad, a shipowner can abandon his vessel, and only be answerable to the extent of the interest which he embarked in the voyage. The law of France upon this point is stated in Lloyd v. Guibert (2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 283; 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 602; L. Rep. 1. Q. B. 119). And the rule has been embodied in the various Merchant Shipping Acts. With regard to the mode in which the Court of Chancery exercises its jurisdiction, I may note that in Hill v. Audus (1 K. & J. 263) the bill does not seem to have been actually dismissed, though the Vice-Chancellor seems to have been ready to dismiss it, because there was no admission of liability. The decision of the court, however, simply was, that no injunction ought to be granted to restrain the trial of a particular action which had been brought against the plaintiff, and which he sought to restrain. And that is intelligible, because the Court of Chancery would have had no ordinary jurisdiction to try the subject matter of that action. But this is not equivalent to dismissing the bill, because it contained no general admission of liability. Serious consequences might ensue if such a bill were dismissed, simply because, in the first instance, there was no admission of liability as to all the persons who might be interested in the matter; seeing that, except through the intervention of the Court of Chancery, there is no mode of arriving at the amount to which liability is to be limited, and no mode of distribution provided. But whatever may be the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery is really not material here, because the defendants are bound to show that jurisdiction existed in the Court of Admiralty. Now it seems that in a collision which occurred between the defendants' vessel Normandy and the Mary, the Normandy went to the bottom, and for all useful purposes ceased to exist. These proceedings were taken against the defendants, which we must assume to be in personam as well as in rem. (a) True, the de-

(a) Some confusion seems to have existed in the learned judge's mind as to the distinction between proceedings in rem and proceedings in personam. Proceedings in rem can only be instituted against property in respect of which a claim has arisen, or the proceeds of such property when in court, and when such property or proceeds can be made available to answer the claim. In fact the property must be capable of arrest by the officers of the Admiralty Court: (See Williams and Bruce's Admiralty Court Practice, p. 136). In the pre-defendants are a corporation, but I do not stop to consider whether the Court of Admiralty, any more than a court of quarter sessions, has jurisdiction in personam in the case of a corporation; for the plaintiffs in error submitted, and paid into court a sum representing the sum they would, if guilty of negligence, be bound to pay to all persons who might have claims against them. The sum did not at first represent the entire amount of pecuniary responsibility; but, assuming that it did, were the conditions of jurisdiction prescribed by 24 Vict. c. 10, s. 13, fulfilled? Was "the ship or the proceeds thereof" under arrest? The ship was certainly not arrested. She was a nonentity, and as much lost as if she had been destroyed by fire, because she was so deeply buried in the sea that human art could not extricate her, or, at all events, not without an expense not worth incurring. There was no actual arrest, therefore, of the ship, nor was there any constructive arrest, as in the case of The Northumbria (sup.), where bail was put in, not, as I understand, to answer a particular claim, but to represent the whole value of the ship to the extent of the shipowner's liability. If bail was of the first kind, I do not think it could be said that the ship or her proceeds were under arrest. But with regard to the second kind of bail, the judge might not improperly say that the ship—not the proceeds, but the ship itself—was under arrest; just as a person who is out on bail is under arrest, because he is delivered to his bail, as constables, who can render him whenever they are tired of the obligation of being his sureties. The analogy is not quite perfect, because the bail here is given, not to give up the ship, but for the whole sum to which the shipowners can, by any possibility be, by any means, liable. However, I do not quarrel with the decision in The Northumbria (sup.); but it does not govern the present case. The vessel cannot be taken, and the money paid into court is certainly not "under arrest," as her proceeds. The money does not represent the ship, nor was it paid in to save the ship from arrest. Then can it in any way be considered as the "proceeds thereof"? The passages referred to by my brother Brett from Williams and Bruce's Admiralty Court Practice, pp. 189, 197, throw much light on this word "proceeds," which is a technical expression, and primâ facie, means the proceeds of the sale of the ship when it becomes necessary to resort to sale, in which case the Admiralty Court holds the proceeds as representing the ship; and that primâ facie meaning is strongly confirmed by the argument in The Neptune (3 Knapp, 97), which case decided that "materialmen have no lien for supplies furnished in England on the proceeds remaining in the registry of the Court of Admiralty, sent case the defendant's ship was at the bottom of the sea, and there could, therefore, be no arrest and no proceeding in rem. The proceeding against the defendants was a proceeding in personam only, and it was such a case as the present, for which the Admiralty Court Act 1861 provided when it enacted (sect. 35) that the proceedings might be either in rem or in personam, and (sect. 34) that in case, in a principal cause, the ship of the defendant has been arrested, and in the cross cause the ship of the plaintiff cannot be arrested, and security has not been given to answer judgment, the court may suspend judgment in the principal cause till such security has been given. Here the Normandy was lost and the Mary was arrested, and security was given in the cross-cause against the former.—ED.

of a ship sold under a decree of that court for the payment of seamen's wages." In the course of that case the expression "proceeds" was used as meaning proceeds arising from the sale of the ship under the order of the court. In the reply this construction was insisted on by counsel, who referred to Burton v. Snee (1 Ves. 154), where Lord Hardwicke held that there was no lien for repairs (except for those done during the voyage) upon the body of the ship, and "if," he says "the body of the ship is not liable, or hypothecated, how can the money arising from the sale be effected or followed, the one being consequential on the other?" And there was no difference, the counsel argued, as to conversion, between the Courts of Admiralty and Chancery, both holding that the proceeds of a thing sold must be subject to the same equities as the thing itself previous to the sale. It will be seen, therefore, that the question of conversion was dealt with. The same line was followed in the delivery of the judgment of the Judicial Committee where (at p. 114) the Admiralty judge is stated to have rested his opinion upon the principle that when a ship has been arrested and sold under process from the Court of Admiralty, that court, after satisfying the immediate object of the sale, holds the balance of the proceeds in usum jus habentium; that the jus habentes are to be ascertained according to the law of the court in which the fund is administered; that the law of the Court of Admiralty is the civil and maritime law—a strange confusion, I may observe, as the civil and maritime law are notoriously diverse and often opposed to each other—and that by that law the material men had a lien on the ship and proceeds. The Judicial Committee reversed this decision, and established the principle already stated. From this case, therefore, and the books, we find that the expression "ship, or proceeds thereof" was one already perfectly understood, and not introduced for the first time into 24 Vict. c. 10, s. 13. It means the ship, or the money proceeding from her sale; and if there were any doubt about the meaning, when we find these words joined with the words "under arrest," no room is left for doubt. Here the arrest was impossible, both in law and fact; and the circumstances which have happened were not contemplated by the section. Several other points were raised, but they do not require consideration. To one or two I have referred as bearing, by way of illustration, on the point before us. I express the conclusion I have arrived at with hesitation, because it is to some extent inconsistent with the reasons of the court below. But, after fully considering the matter, I think that the judgment ought to be affirmed on the ground I have mentioned. I think the Court of Admiralty had no jurisdiction, because there was no arrest of the vessel, and because the money paid into court was in no sense the proceeds of the vessel.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The first question is whether prohibition now lies to the Court of Admiralty. I find it laid down in Bacon's Abr. tit. Prohibition, that it formerly lay, and I do not see that there is anything in the modern statutes, which have enlarged the jurisdiction of the court, to prevent it still lying. The Admiralty may be, and probably is, entitled to the designation of a "superior" court, but still its jurisdiction is limited; and the question is, whether on the present occasion that jurisdiction has been exceeded. Now its exercise depends upon whether the "ship or the proceeds thereof," were under arrest. Here the ship was not under arrest. She was at the bottom of the sea. And the "proceeds thereof" mean the proceeds of the sale thereof, or the sum realised thereby. A sale is impossible. Upon these grounds I concur with my brother Willes, that the judgment of the Court of Exchequer ought to be affirmed.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. On the first point I have nothing to add; I can see nothing in the recent statutes as to the Court of Admiralty to take away our power of issuing a prohibition. But upon the main question I will say a few words. The jurisdiction claimed here is a particular one, and depends upon the conditions precedent to its exercise enacted by sect. 13 of 24 Vict. c. 10. The intention of the Legislature was probably to obviate the hardship of a person whose ship, or the proceeds thereof, was under arrest in the Admiralty Court being obliged to go to the Court of Chancery to get protection from suits which had been or might be instituted against him. No doubt the Court of Chancery could, if they thought fit, relieve him and entertain his suit for limitation without insisting upon his paying money into court or giving security. But the course of practice was the contrary, and therefore the result was that a shipowner might find himself with his ship arrested in one court, and under the necessity of paying a sum equal to its value into another. To obviate this inconvenience the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery was conferred on the Court of Admiralty, when the ship, or proceeds thereof, are under arrest; by direct implication there is no jurisdiction, except when those conditions are fulfilled. Here I am of opinion that in no sense could the ship or the proceeds thereof, be considered under arrest. The defendants, it appears, had instituted a principal damage suit against the Mary, and the owners of the Mary instituted a cross-damage suit against them, and by sect. 34 of 24 Vict. c. 10, the court has power to say that where the ship cannot be arrested the principal suit shall be suspended until security is given to insure the judgment in the cross-suit. The court exercised this power in the present case, and the defendant did give security by paying 5000*l.* into court. This sum, however, is not the proceeds of the ship, but a collateral sum brought into court, not instead of, or as representing the vessel, but as security so as to enable the defendants to continue to prosecute the principal suit. With regard to The Northumbria (sup.) I at first thought it rightly decided, but I feel bound to say that Mr. Harrison's argument has shaken my opinion, and I have considerable doubt now whether the learned judge arrived at a correct conclusion. I had thought that when a suit was commenced money paid into court in lieu of bail might well be regarded as "proceeds." But, as Mr. Harrison pointed out, the money is simply paid in by way of security to pay the sum claimed in the particular suit. The difference is very material. Because if the ship were under arrest, or the proceeds of the ship, another claimant might attach them, but he could not attach a sum paid in lieu of bail to answer a particular claim. I therefore feel much doubt about that case, but I do not decide the question, because it is not necessary to do so. As to the case of Hill v. Audus (sup.), I feel a difficulty in concurring with what the Vice-Chancellor is reported to have said in the course of his judgment. But I concur with my brother Willes that the Vice-Chancellor did right. The bill was not, as was supposed, dismissed; but the injunction applied for, which was to restrain an action which could not have been brought in the Court of Chancery, was properly refused.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. Neither the ship nor the proceeds thereof were under arrest. I remark that the learned judge of the Admiralty Court himself had doubts as to his jurisdiction, but eventually, looking to the language of the 13th and 34th sections of 24 Vict. c. 10, he decided that he had jurisdiction. Now, where it is sought to give jurisdiction to a court of limited jurisdiction, which the Admiralty Court—even though it be, as it probably is in some senses, a "superior" court—undoubtedly is, the words conferring jurisdiction should be clear and unambiguous; and the words of the 13th section make jurisdiction depend upon the ship, or the proceeds thereof, being under arrest. Here the ship was certainly not under arrest, and I incline to think that the word "proceeds" means proceeds of the sale of the ship. But I am not prepared to say that where a sale is possible, if the full value of the ship is paid into the registry in order to prevent the sale, that that sum would not be proceeds. But no sum was so paid in here. What was done was the voluntary payment by the defendants of 5000*l.* into court for the purpose of enabling them to continue their suit against The Mary. That amount is not in any sense proceeds of the ship. I therefore think the prohibition should go.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. To give the Court of Admiralty jurisdiction the vessel must be under arrest, either in specie or by its representative; and I agree that in the present case the court was not in possession of either. The words "proceeds thereof," in sect. 10 of 24 Vict. c. 10, clearly mean, in my judgment, "proceeds of the sale," or money resulting from a sale. Here the money was in no sense "proceeds," because it was paid in under sect. 34 voluntarily, to enable the defendants to continue their damage suit against The Mary. And it was because the ship Normandy could not be arrested that the order was made under sect. 34 to bring the money into court to answer the judgment in the cross suit against her owners.

BRETT, J.—The question in this case—assuming as I do that prohibition still lies to the Court of Admiralty—is whether, under the circumstances alleged on this record, the Court of Admiralty had jurisdiction under 24 Vict. c. 10 s. 13, to entertain a suit for limitation of the defendant's liability, a suit such as the Court of Chancery may entertain under the 514th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854. Now the Court of Admiralty has no such original jurisdiction; it has it only by virtue of sect. 13 of the first-named Act, which enacts that "Whenever the ship or vessel, or the proceeds thereof are under arrest of the High Court of Admiralty," that court shall have jurisdiction, and I am of opinion that this condition must exist at the commencement of the suit. "The ship, or the proceeds thereof," are to be "under arrest," and the real point to be decided is what is the right meaning to put upon the words "proceeds thereof." The phrase, it must be remembered, is used in an Admiralty Court Act, and that being so, we must ask whether in Admiralty proceedings any technical signification belongs to it. And it does appear to have a definite and well-understood meaning. In a suit in rem the jurisdiction of the court depends on the possession of the res, or of the proceeds of the res. Either the res or the proceeds must be under arrest" that is the proceeds must be paid into the registry of the court; and they are the proceeds of the sale of the res, or else a sum of money paid in to represent the proceeds and to prevent the sale. Such is the statement of the practice in Williams and Bruce's Admiralty Court Practice, p. 197. The owner may enter a caveat against the warrant to arrest the ship, and for this purpose must file a præcipe undertaking to enter an appearance in any cause which may be instituted against the property to give bail or to pay money into court; and the rules of practice (Williams and Bruce's Admiralty Court Practice, pp. 189, 197n) give the form of præcipe, which in describing the property contains the words, "Proceeds arising from the sale of, &c." though, in fact, there was no sale, and the money is paid in to prevent a sale. It would seem, therefore, that in the word "proceeds" something more may be included than the proceeds of an actual sale, and it may be that where the res on which the maritime lien attaches is of greater value than 15*l.* a ton, which is now the maximum of the shipowner's liability, the 15*l.* a ton might be regarded as "proceeds" if the ship was where she could be seized. But it is impossible to say that this sum can be the proceeds of the sale, where the ship could not be seized, or where as here, she had ceased to exist. Still less can the ordinary bail paid in in a damage cause be regarded as "proceeds" because that is paid in after suits instituted i.e., after the court has had possession of the res. Nor can the bail given under sect. 34 of 24 Vict. c. 10, be "proceeds" in any sense. It is money paid in, not instead of the res, but "to answer judgment" in the cross cause. With regard to the decision in The Northumbria (sup.) if the construction placed upon it by my brother Willes be correct, I think it a sound decision. But if the money paid in there was only in lieu of ordinary bail, then with great deference to the learned judge of the Admiralty Court, I must express great doubt whether his ruling can be supported.

IONIDES v. PENDER.

[NISI PRIUS.]

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH, GUILDHALL.

Thursday, July 4. 1872.

(Before HANNEN, J., and a Special Jury.)

IONIDES v. PENDER.

Barratry—Over valuation—Concealment of material fact—Expected profits—Connivance of shipowner in fraud of the captain—Innocence of owner of goods—Evidence.

V., the owner of the ship, and D., shipped goods on a voyage from Hamburg to a port in Asiatic Russia. The adventure was expected to be enormously profitable. The whole cargo shipped was *valued at 8000*l.*, but the total insurance effected amounted to 20,000*l.*, the profits being variously estimated at from 80 to 125 per cent. To secure these profits, it was admitted that the goods had been overvalued to the extent of 25 to 30 per cent., and there were heavy insurances of commissions. Amongst the cargo was a shipment of spirits costing 1000*l.*, but valued at 2800*l.* The ship went down in fine weather in mid-ocean without any known cause.*

*D. brought an action to recover commission, profits on charter, and 1800*l.* of the 2800*l.* insured on spirits. It was pleaded that the loss was not the consequence of perils of the sea; that the concealment of the over insurance was concealment of a material fact, and that the goods were shipped with the fraudulent design of sinking the ship.*

Held, that an insurance on profits must be taken to mean possible profits.

Held, further, that scuttling a ship with the knowledge of V., the shipowner, but without the knowledge of D., the freighter was barratry, in respect of which D. might recover against the underwriters.

Excessive valuation is almost conclusive evidence of a fraudulent intent.

The slips mentioned that profits were to be insured "however high they might be." No further notice of the over insurance was given to the underwriters.

The jury found that the over valuations were excessive and material, and were concealed from the underwriters.

An action on policies to recover commission, profits, and value of goods insured on a voyage from Hamburg to a port on the coast of Asiatic Russia.

The real plaintiffs (the nominal plaintiffs being their brokers) were some German merchants at Hamburg, who professed to have discovered a new and extensive market for European commodities in the ports of Eastern Siberia, and had for some years carried on commerce there. This commerce until lately had been carried on at a port called Nicolaiefesk, at the mouth of the Amoor, and it was represented that enormous profits had been realised there, especially upon spirits and tobacco, but also to a great extent upon European manufactures, woollen goods, and other articles. It was represented that upon tobacco a profit of 1000 per cent. and on spirits 500 per cent. had been realised, and on general goods 25 or 30 per cent. Particular instances were adduced in evidence. In 1886 240 cases of spirits, the cost price of which was 400*l.*, had realised a net profit of 2000*l.* In 1868 some cases of goods which cost 480*l.* realised 1338*l.* and in 1870 150 cases of goods which cost 365*l.* realised net 1339*l.* It was also stated by a witness that he had sold cases of cigars in that region at a profit of 1000*l.* per cent. On the other hand, there was evidence that these instances were exceptional, and that the average rate of profit was 25 per cent.; and while one of the adventurers in this case estimated the profits on spirits at 150 per cent. another of them was content with less than 80 per cent. It appears, however, that the Russian Government had discovered this commerce, and desired to share in the profits of it, and with this view imposed excise and customs duties at Nicolaiefesk. Partly in order to avoid these duties, and partly to obtain a better harbour, the trade had of late years drifted to another port some 700 miles to the south in a bay called Victoria Bay, opposite the centre of Japan. At this place there is a splendid harbour, and a town has sprung up called Wladiowstock, and the trade there has been gradually increasing. As early as 1871 the German merchants alluded to, who had already been engaged in trade at Nicolaiefsk, Messrs. Diekmann being the principal, proposed an adventure to the new port of Wladiowstock, and a ship belonging to one of them (M. Vernicke) was chartered for the purpose, and loaded with a mixed cargo, composed largely of spirits and tobacco, but comprising also a variety of woollen and other manufactured goods. Both Diekmann and Vernicke shipped goods in the adventure, the former chiefly spirits, the other spirits and other goods. In their correspondence they spoke of 25 per cent. profit, but in their insurance they valued it at 80 per cent. and 150 per cent. Insurances were effected upon ship, cargo, freight, profits, commission, and everything else that was insurable, to the total amount of 20,000*l.* Some of these insurances were effected at Hamburg, and some through brokers in London, including those now sued upon. The ship was insured for 4000*l.* at Hamburg; the goods were insured for nearly 13,000*l.* in several policies, some in Hamburg and some in London. Freight was insured to the amount of 11000*l.* commission was insured for 1500*l.*, in more than one policy, one of which was now sued upon; and, in addition, there was a policy for 1000*l.* on safe arrival of the vessel. The English policies were not all effected in the same office. Instructions were given to insure 2000*l.* in the London and Provincial, 1000*l.* in the Globe, 4000*l.* in the North China, and 1000*l.* at Lloyd's. This latter was one of those now sued upon. Out of the 4000*l.* directed to be insured in the North China, 3000*l.* upon spirits had been transferred to Lloyd's, and was one of those now sued upon, leaving 1000*l.* still insured in the North China. The insurances which were questioned were those upon the goods and commission. It was alleged that the goods were enormously over-insured; and that as most of them belonged to the adventurers, the commission was for the most part either fictitious, or included in the profits, which were added to and included in the value of the goods insured. It was admitted on the part of the plaintiffs that there had been a considerable addition to the cost price of the goods on account of the profits, the object being, they said, to secure the large profits they expected to realise. This addition, however, on the whole did not exceed 25 or 30 per cent. and though it was admitted that there was a larger addition to the value of the spirits and tobacco, this, it was said, was partly on account of the higher profits and partly on account of duties which it was expected would be imposed, but which would not apply to goods previously shipped. This duty, it was said, would, at four roubles on sixteen quarts, amount upon the quantity of spirits shipped to 2000*l.*, the whole of which would be bonus to the adventurers. In this way it was that they valued spirits which cost 1000*l.* at 2800*l.*; but on the other goods generally the addition was said to be only 25 per cent. The parties did not differ greatly as to the cost value of the goods shipped, which one side made a little under, and the other a little over 8000*l.* Adding 25 per cent. for profit, this would come to 10,000*l.* The freight would bring it to 11,000*l.* and the addition for anticipated duties, reckoned as bonus, would bring up the amount to 12,000*l.* above the amount of the insurance on goods. The captain himself had a small venture of cigars not over-insured. This was the plaintiff's case.

The defendants pleaded that the goods insured were not lost by perils of the sea; that they were excessively over-valued; that there was concealment of the over-insurance; and that the goods were shipped with a fraudulent design that the vessel should be sunk and lost.

To negative the alleged over-insurance, evidence was given that the merchants sent through their brokers their valuations (in German), and the "slip" or proposal, stated that the insurance was to be on profits, however high they might be. All the policies on goods were valued. According to the defendants, the alleged additions to value on account of anticipated profits were grossly excessive, the profits being really imaginary, and the case as to the supposed bonus arising from remission of anticipated duties was visionary and illusory. It was insisted that there was an addition, not of 25 per cent., but of nearly 80 per cent. to the real value of the goods; and as to the profits and commission and freight, it was insisted that the same thing was insured over and over again, the profits being added to the price, as well as the freight and charges, and the commission being really only a mode of charging the profit over again; and, finally, it was said that the insurance of 1000*l.* for "safe arrival" of the vessel—already abundantly insured—was in reality a repetition of the insurance. In these various ways, it was urged, the over-insurance amounted to several thousands of pounds, and the adventurers had an interest to that amount in the vessel going down. The vessel sailed, thus insured, in April, and on the 18th May went down in mid-ocean, in fine weather, without any apparent cause. Suddenly the ship began to leak, and in an hour or two had eight or nine feet of water in the hold. The captain said he thought he had felt a shock, but no one else had felt it, and he himself said he thought no more of it, especially as he saw nothing to cause it, and he thought it was a mere stroke of the sea. The sea, however, was quiet, with only a "swell," and there was no apparent cause for the catastrophe. However, the ship rapidly filled, and the captain came on deck, and said the ship was sinking, and ordered out the boats, and he and the crew escaped. They were picked up; he and some of the crew went to Hamburg and others to Liverpool. Those who came to London made no secret of their belief that the ship had been scuttled. An inquiry was held at Hamburg, but the captain was absolved and the Hamburg insurers paid. The English underwriters, however, were not satisfied. The Globe paid; but the North China, the London and Provincial, and the underwriters at Lloyd's resisted, and evidence was taken at Hamburg under a commission, where the captain and the mate were witnesses for the plaintiffs. Neither of them, nor any of the crew, was called as witness at the trial, and two of the crew were called as witnesses for the underwriters. They disproved any "shock," and nautical evidence was given to show that any blow which could have caused a serious leak must have given such a shock to the vessel as must have made all its timbers quiver and knocked every one down.

HANNEN, J., summed up the case to the jury. He observed that, notwithstanding the length to which the case had run, he thought their verdict would turn upon certain broad points on which the facts were not materially disputed. The questions for their decision were:—First, whether the valuations, were excessive, especially as to profits? secondly, whether, if so, they were fraudulent? thirdly, was it material for the underwriters to know if the valuations were excessive? fourthly, were they concealed from the underwriters? fifthly, was the vessel lost through the “perils of the seas” insured against? sixthly, was it intended by the assured that the vessel should be lost? As to the question whether the goods were excessively overvalued, no doubt in “valued policies,” in which the value of the goods was stated, it was to be taken generally that disputes as to the value were precluded. But this was a question mainly as to expected profits, as on both sides the cost value was agreed at about 8000*l.* Now as to the profits, the question was whether the estimate was above what could be reasonably contemplated under the circumstances. It was not because the estimate was high that therefore it was excessive, provided it was not beyond what might not unreasonably be expected; but there was a limit, and it was not because Whittington got 1000*l.* for a cat that therefore a cat could be insured for 1000*l.* Here it was spirits which were insured, and instances had been given in evidence of enormous profits realised on spirits—as much as 170 per cent. But, on the other hand, it was said that these instances were exceptional, and other parties had insured spirits to the very same place, at a profit of 25 per cent. As to this the jury must judge and decide in their own minds whether the assured could reasonably have expected such a profit as would justify an insurance of spirits which cost less than 1000*l.* for 2800*l.* As to commission, a man could hardly earn commission on his own goods, and to a great extent these goods were Diekmann’s own, though he was to receive commission on the goods of others. As to the ship it must be admitted by the underwriters that there was no excess of valuation, and the insurance was for the real value. The ship belonged to another merchant, Vernicke, who had valued his profits at 79 per cent., including spirits. And it was a remarkable fact that while one of the supposed partners in the fraud rated his profits on spirits at 150 to 160 per cent., another of them was satisfied with less than 80—that is, with about half the amount claimed by the other. This was accounted for by the plaintiff Diekmann in this way—that he had been to East Siberia, and knew the market better than his co-adventurer. And if so, then it went to negative the concert which was presupposed in a case of conspiracy. On the other hand, it must not be lost sight of that these parties had, in their correspondence, spoke of valuing their profits only at 25 per cent. On the whole, was the valuation so excessive that it could not be deemed to have been reasonable? If so, was it fraudulent? If there was a clear case of excessive valuation, it was difficult to conceive how it could be otherwise than fraudulent. Even if not fraudulent, was it material that the underwriters should know of it? As to this, assuming the valuation to be excessive, the assured was for some reason so certain that there would be a loss as to be content to pay an excessive premium; and was it not material that the underwriter should know of it? If so, had it been concealed? As to this the merchants, through their brokers, had certainly laid before the underwriters their valuations, and the slip or proposal for the policy stated that the insurance was to be on profits, “however high they may be.” Still this meant possible profits, not such as were impossible, or could not reasonably be expected. Next, was the vessel lost through “the perils of the seas” insured against? As to this the facts were that the vessel, a good stout ship, went down suddenly in fine weather, in mid-ocean, without any known cause. And on the other hand, there was the opportunity and there were the means of scuttling the ship. The captain had access to the hold from his cabin, and he had, with other tools, an auger, by which he could have made holes in the sides of the vessel, and he was in his cabin at the time when the ship began to fill. Then there was the conduct of the captain. He had, he said, felt the shock so slight that he took no notice of it, and no one else on board felt it, and it was suggested that this was the cause of the disaster. Nautical men had given evidence to show that it could not have been so, and though a floating wreck might perhaps have caused such damage as might sink a ship, it was difficult to understand how this could be, and yet the shock be so slight as scarcely to be felt. And if so, then there was nothing to account for the vessel going down as it did. Indeed, the men all denied that there had been any shock at all, and though the crew had been separated they concurred in this denial. There was certainly an absence of evidence of motive in the captain to scuttle the vessel, and he had been relieved from the imputation after an investigation at Hamburg. That, however, was a criminal charge against him, and a criminal charge required full proof; whereas here the onus was on the plaintiffs to satisfy the jury that the vessel was lost by the “perils of the seas.” If that was not made out to their satisfaction then they must consider whether the captain scuttled the ship. And if he did, then they must consider whether it was done with the knowledge and privity of the real plaintiffs—that is, they knowing beforehand that he was to do it. For if he had done it of his own head, or at the instigation of Vernicke, the shipowner, but without the knowledge of the real plaintiff, Diekmann, then it would be barratry—that is, a loss caused by the misconduct of the crew or the captain, and that would be a loss covered by the policy, for a policy of insurance included a loss by barratry. He left to the jury the questions above stated, and they at once retired to consider their verdict.

Watkin Williams objected that the latter part of the direction as to barratry was erroneous, as it was laid down that if the captain sunk the ship at the instigation of Vernicke, the shipowner, without the knowledge of Diekmann, it would be barratry. He submitted that barratry must be a crime against the employer, the owner of the ship.

HANNEN, J., said he adhered to his ruling, intending to lay down that a loss might be barratry as regarded one party which was not so as to another (a).

The jury found that the valuations for the insurances were excessive, and that, though they could not say whether the valuations were fraudulent, they were of opinion that they were material, and were concealed. They further found that the vessel was not lost by the perils of the seas, but they could not say whether or not it was intended by the assured that it should be lost.

(a) This is a resuscitation of the question whether, notwithstanding the fact of barratry being committed with the knowledge and consent of the shipowner, the freighter may recover against the underwriters. We certainly thought it firmly settled that there cannot be barratry except as against the owner of the ship, and a charterer cannot recover unless he is owner pro hac vice. In Nutt v. Bourdieu (1 Term Rep. 323), Lord Mansfield said: “The point to be considered is, whether barratry can be committed against any but the owners of the ship? It is clear, beyond contradiction, that it cannot.” The reason he gave was this: “Barratry is something contrary to the duty of the master and mariners, the very terms of which imply that it must be in the relation in which they stand to the owner of the ship. An owner cannot commit barratry; he may make himself liable by his fraudulent conduct to the owner of the goods, but not as for barratry”—“not as for barratry,” meaning, of course, for the purpose of giving the owner of goods a right to recover in respect of it as against the underwriters. Phillips (Insurance s. 1079) notices the case of the charterer navigating the ship at his own risk, and having the appointment of the master, who deviated with the privity of the owner, but without the knowledge of the charterer. That was held barratry, to use Mr. Phillips’s words, “in respect of others than the owner:” but it must not be taken as extending beyond the charterer, for Darwin, who was recovered in Vallejo v. Wheeler (1 Cowp. 143)—the case referred to—was found by the jury to be owner pro hac vice. Unless, therefore, in the above case, Diekmann can be said to have been owner pro hac vice, the ruling of the learned judge is clearly wrong: (Stamma v. Brown, 2 Str. 1173.)—F. O. C.

pieces of silk broadstuff delivered to the defendants to be carried by them as carriers from Boulogne to London.

The first count of the declaration stated “that in consideration that the plaintiffs would deliver to the defendants as and being carriers of goods for hire certain goods, to wit, silk broadstuffs, to be by the defendants carried from Boulogne to London, and there delivered according to the directions of the plaintiffs, certain perils and casualties only excepted for, freight to be paid by the plaintiffs to the defendants in that behalf, the defendants within the jurisdiction of this court promised the plaintiffs to carry the said goods from Boulogne to London aforesaid, and there deliver the same according to the directions of the plaintiffs in that behalf, except as aforesaid, and the plaintiffs within the jurisdiction aforesaid, delivered the said goods to the defendants, and the defendants received the same for the purpose and on the terms aforesaid, and the plaintiffs directed the defendants to deliver the said goods at a certain place in London aforesaid, and the defendants were not prevented from delivering the said goods by any of the perils and casualties so excepted, and all conditions were fulfilled, and all things happened, and all times elapsed necessary to entitle the plaintiffs to have the said goods delivered by the defendants, yet the defendants did not deliver the said goods to the plaintiffs as aforesaid, but a portion thereof only, and the residue of the said goods was by default of the defendants wholly lost to the plaintiffs.”

The second count stated “that in consideration that the plaintiffs delivered to the defendants certain goods to be safely kept and taken care of by the defendants, and to be redelivered by the defendants to the plaintiffs on request for reward to the defendants, the defendants within the jurisdiction aforesaid promised the plaintiffs to safely keep and take care of the said goods, and to redeliver the same to the plaintiffs on request, and afterwards the plaintiffs requested the defendants to redeliver to them the said goods, and a reasonable time for the redelivery thereof elapsed after such request, yet the defendants did not redeliver the said goods to the plaintiffs, but a portion thereof only, whereby the residue of the said goods was and is lost to the plaintiffs. To the plaintiffs, damage of 18l. 11s. 1d., and therefore they bring suit,” &c.:

The pleas were: first, that they did not promise as alleged; secondly, that they deny the alleged breaches; thirdly, that the plaintiff did not deliver the said goods for the purpose and on the terms alleged; fourthly, that the alleged agreements were made subject to the terms and conditions, amongst others, that packages containing silk should be specially notified to the master of the defendants’ vessels, and, further, that a declaration of separate marks and numbers, and weights of each package should be left at the office of the defendants before delivery on board the defendants’ vessel, and that in default of the observance by the plaintiffs of the aforesaid terms, or any of them, the defendants should not be liable for any loss or damage to any such packages, and the defendants say that the plaintiffs did not observe the said terms, but wholly failed so to do.

Replications—first, issue; secondly, to the 4th plea: That the said goods in the declaration mentioned were not nor did they consist of packages containing silk, nor were they silk within the meaning of the said terms and conditions therein mentioned, or any of them.

The following were the particulars of demand :

To two pieces of silk broadstuffs delivered to the defendants on board their steamer Cologne, on the 25th Oct. 1871, in a case marked C., and numbered 1146, and S. N. 274, for carriage to, and warehousing at London, but which said pieces of silk broadstuffs defendants have failed, neglected, and refused to re-deliver to plaintiffs, 18l. 11s. 1d. Above are the said particulars.

Dated, 27th March 1872.

It was proved at the trial in the Mayor's Court that the case containing the silk broadstuffs was sent from the plaintiffs' Paris house to Boulogne railway station, where it arrived on the morning of the 25th June 1871. It was weighed at the railway station, and carted thence down to the quay, and afterwards put on board the defendants' steamship Cologne at 4 or 5 o'clock p.m. The case was marked at Boulogne L. 1146. A bill of lading of which the following is a copy was signed by the master of the Cologne.

Shipped in good order, and well conditioned, by Lebeau and Co., as agents in and upon the good steamship or vessel called the Cologne, whereof is master for this present voyage Freeman, and now riding at anchor in the port of Boulogne, and bound for London.

Lebeau, and Co., or to their assigns. Freight paid in Boulogne, with primage and average accustomed. In witness whereof the master of the said vessel hath affirmed to three bills of lading, all of this tenor and date, one of which bills being accomplished, the others to stand void. Dated in Boulogne-sur-Mer, 25th Oct. 1871.—H. FREEMAN.

The goods to be taken out within six hours after arrival, or the same will be transhipped into lighters and warehoused or landed on the quay, all at the consignee's risk and expense.

Ship not accountable for leakage or breakage, deterioration in value, or from the wrong delivery of goods caused by error or insufficiency in marks or numbers.

Value, weight, and contents unknown.

Consignees are to consider as null and void any mention added to the bill of lading, stating that the goods have been shipped, wet, damaged, or in any bad condition, unless approved of by Lebeau and Co.

(Endorsement.) L. C. 1139 to 1146, thirteen packages, books, woodwork, whalebone, Dutch clocks, shoes, and linen goods.

The words "value, weight, and contents unknown" were stamped on the bill of lading by the master, at the time the goods were received by him. On the arrival of the ship in London the case was warehoused in a part of defendants' warehouse usually set apart for goods consigned to the plaintiff, and on its being opened by the plaintiffs it was found that two pieces of silk stuff were missing. It was proved that the freight charged for silk was much heavier than that for linen goods. The jury found as a fact that the description "linen goods" on the face of the bill of lading was a misstatement, but that the misdescription was inadvertent and not wilfully made in order that the goods might be carried at a lower rate. They found a verdict for the plaintiff for 18l.

A rule having been obtained on the motion of

Mr. Finlay to set aside the verdict for the plaintiff and enter a nonsuit, on the ground that there was no evidence to go to the jury of the contract set out in the declaration and in the particulars, and also on the ground that the plaintiffs were estopped from proving the delivery of goods other than linen goods to the defendants.

Field, Q.C., and Waddy, showed cause.—They contended that the words "linen goods" amounted to a representation only, and not a warranty, and (the jury having negatived the evidence of fraud) did not avoid the contract. Moreover these words were overridden by the words "value, weight, and contents unknown," stamped by the defendants on the bill of lading, and the effect was that the defendant had contracted to deliver the goods contained in the package whatever they were. They cited Jessel v. Bath (L. Rep. 2 Ex. 270). If this were the true construction of the contract, there could be no estoppel.

Talfourd Salter and Finlay in support of the rule.—There was no contract by the defendants to carry silk broadstuffs. The misstatement in the bill of lading amounts to legal fraud, which does not necessarily imply moral fraud: (Polhill v. Walter, 3 B. & Ad. 122). The defendants having been deceived by it, are not responsible for the loss.

M'Canse v. London and North Western Railway Company, 7 H. & N. 477.

By having the bill of lading proffered to them, the defendants were put off making any inquiry as to what were the contents of the package. The only question that the defendants could have asked was whether the statement contained in the bill of lading was correct. There being then no contract to carry silk stuffs the defendants were merely involuntary bailees. They cannot be held liable for the value of goods the freight for which was much higher than that charged for linen goods, and the loss of which would entail upon them a larger payment.

The words "weight, value, and contents unknown," may be read so as to be consistent with the description "linen goods" as meaning linen goods—value, weight, and description unknown." The true question is, what was the effect of the representation on the carrier ?

Belfast and Ballymena Railway Company v. Keys, 9 H. of L. 556 ;

Walker v. Jackson, 10 M. and W. 161.

Secondly, on the point of estoppel. By representing that the goods were linen, the plaintiffs induced the defendants to alter their position and incur risk. If the freight had been paid as for silk the defendants would have had a larger sum in hand to meet their liabilities :

Foster v. Colby 3 H. & N. 705 ;

Howard v. Tucker, 1 B. & Ad. 712 ;

BOVILL, C. J.—In this case the jury have negatived the existence of any fraud or misconduct on the part of the defendants, with reference to the description and nature of the goods, and we are precluded from going into the question of the proper amount of damages. The only question before us is whether the learned judge at the trial was bound to direct the jury in favour of the plaintiffs. The contract declared upon is contained in the bill of lading, and upon that it must be taken that the plaintiffs represented to the defendants that the package in question contained linen goods, but that the defendants refused to contract upon the footing absolutely that it contained linen goods, and declined to assent that the goods were of the description mentioned by the shippers. The effect of this state of things is, that it was no part of the contract that the case contained linen goods, and I am of opinion that the defendants were not bound to deliver linen goods to the plaintiffs. They expressly repudiate any contract as to the nature or contents of the package. The memorandum, "value, weight, and contents unknown," was to prevent their being liable, inasmuch as they had not in fact ascertained, and did not assent that the contents were linen goods. This was the view taken by the learned judges of the Court of Exchequer in Jessel v. Bath (L. Rep. 2 Ex. 267.) Now, this being the contract, it lies upon the defendants to get rid of it, and how do they attempt to do so? Simply by alleging the statement made to them that the goods were linen. But that was a mere declaration which appears to have been made innocently, inadvertently, and without fraud. If there had been a fraudulent misstatement made by the plaintiff in order to induce them to carry at a lower rate of freight, then the case would fall within the doctrine of M'Cance v. London and North-Western Railway Company (7 H. & N. 477), and similar cases referred to by Mr. Finlay and by Mr. Salter in his able argument. But in the present case fraud has been negatived by the finding of the jury, and the contract therefore remains valid, and it having been broken the plaintiff has a right of action. I do not say that looking at the evidence which has been brought before us, I am satisfied that the verdict might not with propriety have been delivered the other way, but that is a matter not before us. With regard to the argument of hardship to the defendants, there is a simple mode by which persons in their position may protect themselves. They may require that the bill of lading shall contain not merely a representation, but a warranty of the nature and quality of the goods, and they may insert stringent conditions requiring positively a statement of the value and declaration of the contents. Most of the cases on the subject have turned on the ground of fraud. With regard to estoppel, if the view I have taken be correct, I see no ground upon which it can be argued that there was here an estoppel. The parties did not agree on the footing that the packages contained linen goods only, but that they might contain other goods. The proper mode would have been for the defendants to contend for a reduction of damages, but that question is not open to us now. In my opinion the defendants have failed to show that they are absolved from their contract to carry.

BRETT, J.—In this case the plaintiffs, acting as forwarding agents for other persons, ship as shippers certain goods for carriage by the defendants. The shippers in the bill of lading represent the goods as linen goods, whereas in fact they were silk broadstuffs. At the time that the plaintiffs so shipped the goods and presented the bill of lading, they did not know to the contrary, for the jury have found that the misrepresentation was innocent. And the defendants did not sign the bill of lading as presented to them, but stamped it with the words "value, weight, and contents unknown." There was evidence that the goods were stolen, but no evidence of positive negligence on the part of the defendants or their servants, except the fact that the goods were not delivered. The action is brought by the plaintiffs, charging the defendants on the ground of their liability as carriers, and not on the ground of negligence, and the question is whether there was any evidence to go to the jury that the defendants had undertaken to be liable, as carriers, in respect of the silk broadstuffs. Now, this is an action between shippers and shipowners, and if the bill of lading had not been stamped with the words, "value, weight, and contents unknown," there would have been the fact that the goods were carried by persons who assumed to carry as carriers, yet I incline to think that as between shippers and shipowners that misrepresentation could make only a prima facie case for the defendants, and that the mis-statement would not have avoided the contract, being as it was merely an innocent misrepresentation of a material fact. In order so to operate it must be wilful, and therefore fraudulent. I should have thought such a bill of lading would be open, as between the shipper and the shipowner, and that the shipper would not be concluded by the bill of lading, if the goods were described in it as of a less weight or a different kind. But it was argued that here was a representation made which would lay a larger liability on the defendants, and that it must be taken that that became the basis of the contract, and that, as in M'Cance v. London and North-Western Railway Company, it was a representation which bound the plaintiffs, and that the plaintiffs were not entitled to show that the goods were silk. It is material to know what the stamp meant. Did the shipowner act upon the representation? The cases which have been cited, and especially the American case of Clark v. Barnwell (12 How. 272; see Parsons on Shipping, vol. 1, 198, note) show the real meaning. The package is offered to the shipowner closed up, with the representation contained in the bill of lading, "linen goods." The shipowner may accept the bill of lading, without alteration or not. If he alter it by adding the words, "contents unknown," it shows that he declines to assent to the representation, and that his meaning is, "I accept this case as it appears on the outside, but accept no statement you make as to its contents." The statement thus made by the shipowner wipes out that of the shipper. The bill of lading with the stamp affixed thus constitutes a contract by the shipowner to carry as a carrier whatever goods are in the case, and therefore he becomes liable in respect of such goods. Whether he is liable only for the value which such goods would have possessed if they had been linen, as was at first represented, is a question not before us, and upon which I express no opinion. Then it was said that this representation created an estoppel. But an innocent representation creates no estoppel. Lord Wensleydale, a master in the art of laying down propositions of law in mercantile cases, said in Walker v. Jackson (10 M. & W., at p. 168), "I take it now to be perfectly well understood according to the majority of opinions upon the subject, that if anything is delivered to a person to be carried, it is the duty of the person receiving it to ask such questions about it as may be necessary; if he ask no questions and there be no fraud to give the case a false complexion on the delivery of the parcel, he is bound to carry the parcel as it is. It is the duty of the person who receives it to ask questions; if they are answered improperly so as to deceive him, then there is no contract between the parties; it is a fraud which vitiates the contract altogether." I have omitted to say that in the case before us no question was asked by the shipowner as to the contents of these packages. I am of opinion, upon these grounds, that the learned judge was right in refusing to nonsuit the plaintiff.

GROVE, J.—I have had some doubts upon this case which are not yet entirely removed, but which are not strong enough to induce me to differ from my learned brethren. Had the words "value, weight, and contents unknown" not been added, the case would, of course, have been much stronger in favour of the defendant. But it struck me that Mr. Salter's argument had some weight, that the construction of the whole document is, "I take the goods for what they are represented to be, but must not be responsible as if I knew what were the contents." The case of Jessel v. Bath might be distinguished from the present on the ground that there the protective words were put in for the protection of a person who had no opportunity of examining the goods. On the whole, the balance of my mind is with the rest of the court, but I still feel some doubt. On the point of estoppel I agree entirely with the rest of the court.

DENMAN, J.—After hearing the able argument on both sides, I feel no doubt that the rule should be discharged. I think the true effect of what took place was that there was a contract to carry case No. 1146, whatever goods it might contain. I threw out a suggestion, which was followed up by Mr. Salter, and more elaborately by Mr. Finlay, that the words, "value, weight, and contents unknown," might be taken as meaning "linen goods—value, weight, and nature unknown;" but after hearing the American case of Clark v. Barnwell, cited in Parsons on Shipping, I prefer the construction adopted by the Chief Justice and my brother Brett. I think, therefore, that the case falls within the principle of Jessel v. Bath, and the general doctrine laid down by Lord Wensleydale in Walker v. Jackson. On the question of the amount of damages, I altogether abstain from giving any opinion.

Salvage—Dissolution of seaman's contract—His right to salvage—Expenses paid by salvors. The abandonment of a vessel in distress by her master (accompanied by the majority of the crew) operates a dissolution of the contract between the owners and seamen, and if one of the crew voluntarily remains on board and renders salvage services, he is entitled to salvage reward.

Expenses incurred in salvaging a vessel, such as pumping, watching, &c., which strictly ought to be paid by the marshal, will, if paid by the salvors, be deducted by the court from the value of the salvaged vessel in assessing the salvage reward.

THIS was a cause of salvage instituted on behalf of the Goole Steam Shipping Company, the owners of the steamship Colletis, and on behalf of the master and crew of that vessel against the barque Le Jonet, and her cargo and freight, and against her owners intervening.

The Le Jonet was a barque of 422 tons register, and was on the 3rd April 1872 bound on a voyage from Torrobiga to Gefle, with a cargo of salt. Between 8 and 8.30 p.m. on that day, whilst about twenty-five miles S.E. by S. of Lowestoft, she was run into by a Spanish barque, which, with her starboard side, struck the Le Jonet's stem and port bow, cutting down the bowsprit and damaging the stem and port bow. The port anchor of the Le Jonet dropped into the Spanish barque, and held the vessels together for some time, during which the master and all the crew of the Le Jonet, except the mate, went on board the Spanish barque. The mate of the Le Jonet, however, remained on board his vessel. According to his evidence he could have got on board the Spanish barque if he had wished, but seeing that the man at the wheel of the Le Jonet had abandoned it, he went aft to take the wheel. He then looked for a maul to cut away the chain that held the two vessels together, but before he found it the ships parted. He determined to remain on board, as he thought the vessel might be saved. He was not sure that there was not greater risk in going on board the Spanish barque. He got the ship before the wind, which was N. by E., and set the course S.S.E. to ease the seas on her bow. About midnight, the foretopmast was carried away, and the wind shifted to the N.W., and moderated, and the mate laid the Le Jonet by the wind, and in the morning hoisted a signal for assistance. The Le Jonet ran about eighteen miles S.S.E. after the collision. In the mate's opinion she would have floated for another day. He was in the track of vessels.

The Colletis, running between Hull and Ghent with cargo, sighted the Le Jonet about 5.30 a.m. on 4th April about forty miles distant from West Capelle, which bore S.S.E. The Colletis ran down to the Le Jonet and found her rolling heavily. The master of the Colletis boarded the Le Jonet in his life boat with some difficulty. He found the mate alone on board, and that the Le Jonet was making water fast, and had six feet of water in her. The mate of the Le Jonet requested the master of the Colletis to save the Le Jonet. The master of the Colletis returned to his own vessel and dispatched two of his officers and four seamen to the Le Jonet. They cleared away the wreck, and made fast a hawser from the Colletis, which proceeded to tow the Le Jonet towards Lowestoft. They then set to work at the pumps. The mate of the Le Jonet took the helm for a considerable time. At 6 p.m. Lowestoft was sighted at a distance of seven miles, but the master of the Colletis, finding that the draft of the Le Jonet would not allow of her entering that port in safety, bore away for Hull, where the two vessels arrived in safety at about 3 p.m. on April 5th, and the Le Jonet was there placed in dock. She then had eight feet of water in her hold. The weather was fine and moderate during the services. The men had been constantly engaged in pumping, and after their arrival in Hull pumpers were engaged. The pumps sucked on April 7th, and then two men were sufficient to keep the vessel dry. The plaintiffs claimed 108*l.* 14*s.* for pumping, dock dues, and other expenses. Part of this money was paid for pumping after the marshal had taken possession of the barque in this suit.

The Colletis was 318 tons gross register, had engines of 50-horse power, and a crew of thirteen hands. Her value was 7000*l.*; that of her cargo 6500*l.*; of her freight 113*l.* The value of the Le Jonet, her cargo and freight, when saved was about 899*l.* The services lasted thirty-three hours.

When the case was called on the learned Judge called the attention of counsel to the services of the mate of the Le Jonet, saying that on the pleadings he appeared to have rendered salvage services and that "the principle which I consider should be applied to such a case as that, where a sailor has not only stuck to his ship as it was his duty to do, but has also rendered further services of a meritorious character, he is entitled to salvage reward and that this court is competent to deal with the matter;" and he suggested that in order to save the expense of another suit that the mate should be considered as before the court in the present suit. It was agreed by the defendants' counsel that the owners of the Le Jonet should pay to the mate whatever the court might award to the mate. It was admitted that salvage services had been rendered by the Colletis.

Clarkson for the owners, master, and crew of the Colletis.—The mate of the Le Jonet stayed on board his vessel to save his own life, and was not even in the same position as a passenger, who can have no claim for salvage, being bound to assist in saving himself and the ship. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The abandonment of the vessel by the master was a dissolution of the contract between the owners and the crew.] He stopped only because there was greater risk in the other ship and, therefore, he was saving his own life and not the ship. The Le Jonet was practically a derelict when picked up by the Colletis.

Gainsford Bruce for the defendants.—The barque was no doubt in need of assistance, but the danger really consisted in not having sufficient hands on board to pump. The service was little more than towage. The vessel cannot in any way be recognised a derelict, as she was never actually abandoned, and the mate contributed materially to her safety: The Beavor, (3 C. Rob. 292.) The contract was at an end when the master and crew abandoned the ship, and his services were, therefore, salvage services.

The Neptune, 1 Hagg. 227;

The Warrior, 6 L. T. Rep., N. S. 133; 1 Mar. Law. Cas. O. S. 204.

The claim for pumping is exorbitant. The plaintiffs are not entitled to costs. The value of the Le Jonet is under 1000*l.*, and the case should have gone before the magistrates.

Clarkson in reply.—Before seamen can claim salvage for services to their own ship, there must have been a severance between them and their ship: (The Florence, 16 Jur. 572). In that case they were placed in safety before they volunteered to render services.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is a salvage suit for services rendered to a vessel injured by collision. The barque Le Jonet was run into by the Spanish barque Isabellita Blanca, on 3rd April 1872, between 8 and 8.30 p.m., about twenty-five miles south-east by south of Lowestoft. The consequence of this collision was that serious damage was inflicted upon the barque Le Jonet, and her captain and all her crew, except one man, the mate, went on board the Spanish vessel. The mate, however, remained on board the Le Jonet up to the time of the rendering of the salvage service, and until the vessel was placed in safety. The salvaging vessel, the Colletis, is an iron screw steamship navigated by a crew of thirteen hands, and at the time of the collision in question, was on a voyage from Ghent to Hull. She sighted the Le Jonet on the morning after the collision at about 5.30, and immediately went up to her. Some of the crew of the Colletis went in their life boat on board the Le Jonet and found her in great distress, making water, and with her foretopmast and her jibboom gone. There can be no doubt that she had been kept by the exertions of the mate from drifting like a log upon the water. She was in a condition of great peril, and there is some reason to doubt whether, if the weather had been bad, they could have saved the vessel at all. After clearing the wreck the salvors took the Le Jonet in tow, and brought her in safety into the port of Hull, after about thirty-three hours' service. In the first place the salvors claim for a sum of 108*l.* 14*s.*, which was paid by them for pumping and other expenses incurred in dock at Hull. That sum must either be paid as part of the salvage reward or independently of that reward. It cannot be paid in both ways. I consider that it must be paid independently of salvage, and that it must be paid to the plaintiffs as expenses. It ought, strictly speaking, to have been defrayed by the marshal, and must, therefore, be added to the expenses incurred by him, and will consequently reduce the net sum with which I have to deal to the sum of 790*l.* Now it has appeared that there is in this case a salvor who is not, strictly speaking, before the court. I intimated that this was the opinion of the court upon the facts as they appeared by the pleadings, and the evidence produced before me has greatly strengthened this opinion. I adhere, as Dr. Lushington did in the Warrior (6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 133; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 204), to the doctrine laid down by Lord Stowell in the Neptune (1 Hagg. 227, 236), that a crew of a salvaged vessel cannot, under ordinary circumstances, have a persona standi as salvors as against their own vessel. That principle I consider should be maintained in its integrity, but the crew of a salvaged vessel may, by the acts of their master, be placed in such a position that the engagement into which they have entered is at an end. Dr. Lushington, in the Warrior (sup.) said, "Such a contract may be dissolved either by the occurrence of circumstances which would operate as a dissolution of the contract, or by the act of the master dismissing the sailors from his employment, if he thinks fit, and there are reasons in his judgment for so doing." In this case the master abandoned his vessel with all his crew, except his mate, who voluntarily stayed on board, and the mate's contract with the master to serve in that capacity must be considered at an end. There are two questions which I have to decide: Was the seaman's contract at an end; and, if it was at an end, and the mate stayed on board voluntarily, did he render salvage services? As to the first question, I decide in the affirmative; and as to the second, I think he did render salvage service, not only in working for the safety of the ship during the night after the collision, and in showing the signal of distress on the morning after, but also in taking the helm after the crew of the Colletis came on board. This, I consider, was a very meritorious service indeed, and if the example of courage he set had been followed by the rest of the crew it is probable that there would have been no need of the salvage services of the crew of the Colletis. Although the mate is not technically before the court, the owners of the Le Jonet have undertaken to give him such sum as I may award. It would be a great waste of money for another suit to be instituted, and I shall, therefore, recommend that he should receive a certain sum. Bearing that sum in mind, I shall award salvage reward to the owners, master, and crew of the Colletis as the merit of the case deserves. To the Colletis I award 210*l.* I recommend that the owners give 40*l.* to the mate of the Le Jonet, making the total sum awarded 250*l.* The expenses paid by the salvors will be paid out of the fund in court, and I shall certify for costs, as I consider it was a proper case to be brought in this court.

THE MIRANDA.

Salvage—Salving and salvaged vessels belonging to the same owner—Claim against cargo.

Where a screw steamship, carrying a general cargo under bills of lading, containing the exception "accidents from machinery," becomes disabled through her machinery breaking down, and another vessel belonging to the same owners renders salvage services, and brings the disabled vessel into safety, those services, being over and above the contract to carry safely and deliver in like good order and condition as shipped, entitle the shipowners to salvage reward as against the cargo of the salvaged vessel. The master and crew of the salvaging vessel are entitled to reward as against ship, cargo, and freight.

This was a claim for salvage. Two causes were instituted, the one on behalf of the London Steamship Company (Limited), the owners of the steamship Roxana, and on behalf of her master and crew, against the cargo lately laden on board the steamship Miranda, and against the owners of that cargo intervening; the other, on behalf of the master and crew of the Roxana against the Miranda and her freight, and the owners intervening. The causes were consolidated by order of the court. The Miranda and the Roxana belonged to the same owners, the London Steamship Company (Limited).

The facts are set out in the petition of the plaintiffs, which was as follows:

1. The Roxana is a screw steam vessel of 674 tons register, and 160 horse-power, and at the time when the services hereinafter stated were rendered was manned by a crew of twenty-three hands, including her master, and was proceeding on a voyage from London to Genoa with a cargo of general merchandise. She was at such time of the value of 13,000*l.*; her cargo was of the value of 220,000*l.*; and her freight was of the value of 2557*l.*

2. The Miranda is a screw steam vessel of 735 tons register, and 140-horse power; and at the time when the said services were rendered was on a voyage from Patras to London with a cargo of dried fruit. She was at such time of the value of 15,000*l.*; her cargo was of the value of 18,775*l.*; and her freight in course of being earned, amounted to 1875*l.*

3. At about six p.m. on the 13th Oct. 1871, the Miranda, whilst proceeding on her said voyage under steam, was about from eighteen to twenty miles to the south-east of Cape St. Vincent, when in consequence of her engines making an extraordinary noise, they were stopped; and it was found that the crank shaft of her after-engine was so nearly broken in two pieces that another turn or two of her propeller would have separated it.

4. The master of the Miranda, after consulting with his officers and engineers, determined, for the general preservation of his ship and cargo, to request the assistance of the said steamship Roxana, which was in sight and prosecuting her said voyage.

5. The Miranda accordingly signalled to the Roxana, and the Roxana was thereupon turned round and came up under the stern of the Miranda.

6. The master of the Miranda informed the master of the Roxana that the Miranda's screw shaft had just broken, and requested the master of the Roxana to take the Miranda in tow, and tow her back to Gibraltar, and this the master of the Roxana agreed to do.

7. A hawser was then passed from the Miranda to the Roxana, and made fast; and the Roxana proceeded to tow the Miranda towards Gibraltar. At about 7.20 p.m. the hawser broke, owing to the heavy strain on it; and the Roxana's 10-inch hawser, 90 fathoms long, was then got up, and passed to the Miranda, and the Roxana towed therewith until the morning of the 15th of the said month, when another hawser, with about 30 fathoms of stream chain bent to it to prevent chafing, was passed from the Miranda to the Roxana, and the Roxana then towed with the two hawsers.

8. On the morning of the 16th of the said month the wind, which had been light, freshened from the eastward, and blew hard from that quarter, with a high sea; and the ships in consequence laboured heavily, and but little progress was made. At about 8.30 p.m. the light on Europa point was seen, bearing N. by E. $\frac{1}{2}$ E., distant about seventeen miles. The Roxana was kept in mid-channel throughout the night, steering alternately to the eastward and westward, with the Miranda in tow.

9. Shortly after seven a.m. on the 17th day of the said month the ships rounded Europa Point; and at 8.30 a.m. the Miranda cast off and anchored in Gibraltar Bay, and the Roxana, after coaling, left Gibraltar on the same day, and resumed her voyage to Genoa.

10. The Miranda, which was built, fitted, and rigged with a view to depending principally on her steam power, was, by reason of the aforesaid accident to her machinery, deprived of the use thereof, and rendered to a great extent unmanageable; and in case of bad weather coming on, especially from the southward, she would, with her cargo, have been exposed to imminent risk of being lost.

11. By reason of the premises, the plaintiffs rescued the cargo of the Miranda from a position of danger, and rendered a salvage service thereto.

12. In effecting the said services to the Miranda and her cargo, the towing hawser of the Roxana (which was of the value of 245*l.*) was so chafed and strained as to be rendered useless. She consumed about 25 tons of coal, at a cost of 238 2s. 6d.; and she incurred about 23*l.* for port charges; and she was delayed on her voyage for about forty hours.

The answer filed on behalf of the defendants admitted the allegations contained in articles 1 to 9 of the petition inclusive, and the allegations in article 12 to be true. It denied articles 10 and 11, but evidence was produced by the plaintiffs at the hearing in support of those allegations, and was not rebutted. The answer further pleaded:—

ADM.]

THE MIRANDA.

3. The sole owners of the vessel Miranda are and were, at the time mentioned in the petition, the plaintiffs, the London Steamship Company (Limited), and the said plaintiffs are and were at the same time the sole owners also of the vessel Roxana.

4. The cargo laden on board the Miranda, at the time mentioned in the petition, was so laden by the several owners thereof, on the terms of certain contracts then entered into between them and the plaintiffs, the London Steamship Company (Limited), whereby the said plaintiffs contracted with the several owners of the said cargo to carry the said cargo to London for freight, to be by them earned on the usual terms. The act of the plaintiffs, the London Steamship Company (Limited), in towing the Miranda to Gibraltar, was done only in fulfilment of their contract to carry the said cargo to London as aforesaid, or for the purpose of enabling their own vessel to earn the freight on the said cargo, or for the sake of bringing their own vessel safe into port, and was in any case an act done for the sole behalf and advantage of the said plaintiffs, and was not, so far as the said plaintiffs are concerned, a salvage service.

5. The cargo laden on board the Miranda, as aforesaid, was so laden on the implied condition and warranty that the Miranda was stout, staunch, and strong, and well equipped and fitted and in all respects seaworthy for the voyage; whereas, in fact, the crank shaft of the after-engine was not sufficiently strong, or there was some other improper fitting in the said after-engine, or otherwise the said implied warranty was not complied with. Wherefore, and for no other cause, the said crank shaft of the after-engine of the Miranda was broken, or nearly broken, as in article 3 of the petition stated, and the Miranda came in need of and received the assistance of the Roxana, as in the said petition stated.

6. In the circumstances aforesaid the plaintiffs, the London Steamship Company (Limited) are not entitled to any salvage remuneration.

7. The defendants submit to pay such remuneration to the plaintiffs, the master and crew of the Roxana, for the services rendered by them as to this court shall seem just and equitable; but they contend that they contend that such remuneration should in the circumstances be of small amount.

The reply filed on behalf of plaintiffs was as follows:—

1. The cargo laden on board the Miranda, at the time mentioned in the petition, had been laden on board her by the respective shippers thereof, under certain bills of lading, which were in one or other of the three forms annexed hereto, and marked respectively A, B, and C. No other contract had been entered into with respect to the carriage of the said cargo by the plaintiffs, the London Steamship Company (Limited). Save as herein appears, the defendants deny the truth of the several allegations contained in the 4th article of the answer filed in this cause.

2. As to the 5th article of the said answer, the plaintiffs submit to the judgment of this honourable court, whether any such warranty, as is alleged in such article, was implied or existed, regard being had to the terms of the said bills of lading. The plaintiffs further say, that at the time when the Miranda sailed from her respective ports of loading she was in all respects seaworthy for her intended voyage to London; and they deny the truth of the several allegations contained in the said answer.

3. The plaintiffs further say that the Miranda and her freight on the said voyage were respectively fully insured at the time of the said services rendered by the Roxana.

The bills of lading referred to in the answer and the reply were in three different forms. The first (A) was as follows:

Shipped in good order and condition by [name of consignor] and upon the steamship called the Miranda, whereof Dilly is master for this present voyage, and now lying in the port of Zante, and bound for London, with liberty to call at any port or ports, in any rotation, in the Mediterranean or Adriatic, or on the coasts of Spain, Portugal, France, Great Britain, or Ireland, for the purpose of receiving and delivering coals, cargo, or passengers, or for any other purpose whatsoever, to sail with or without pilots, to tow and assist vessels in all situations, and to carry goods of all kinds [here followed the description of the goods], being marked and numbered as per margin, and to be delivered from the ship's deck, where the ship's responsibility shall cease, in the like good order and condition, at the aforesaid port of London, or so near thereunto as she may safely get (the Act of God, the Queen's enemies, pirates, robbers, thieves, restraint of princes and rulers, fire at sea or on shore, accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation, damage by vermin or from other goods by sweating or otherwise, barratry of master and mariners, damage or loss from collision, or from any act, neglect, or default of the pilot, master, or mariners in the navigation or management of the ship, accidents or damage from machinery, boilers, and steam, of whatever nature or kind soever excepted), unto [name of consignee], or to his or their assigns, he or they paying freight for the said goods, in cash free of interest, on ship's arrival, at the rate of 35s. per ton of 20cwt. gross weight delivered, with 10 per cent. primage and average accustomed; and a proportion of 10 guineas gratuity.

In witness whereof the master or agent of the said ship hath affirmed to three bills of lading, all of this tenor and date, the one of which bills being accomplished, the others to stand void.

Dated in Zante this 22nd Sept. 1871.

The second form (B) related to goods shipped at Cephalonia, which were thereby to be similarly delivered at the port of London, "the act of God, the Queen's enemies, &c., accidents from machinery, boilers, steam, or any other accidents of the seas, rivers, and steam navigation, of whatever nature or kind soever, &c., excepted. The third form (C) related to goods shipped at Patras, and was identical with the first (A).

The Miranda was insured at the time of the accident for 12,500*l.*, and her cargo for 2040*l.* Shortly before that voyage she had been fitted with new boilers, and her engines had been thoroughly overhauled, but no perceptible flaw had appeared in the shaft to which the accident happened. This was proved by the plaintiffs.

It was admitted that the master and crew of the Miranda were in both suits entitled to salvage reward.

Butt, Q.C. and E. C. Clarkson for the owners, master and crew of the Roxana.—This was a salvage service giving to the owners of the Roxana a right to reward from the owners of the cargo of the Miranda. Our clients contracted to carry the goods safely so long as they were not prevented by any of the excepted perils. They were prevented by "an accident to machinery," and any act done after that was not part of their contract, and therefore a salvage service. Dr. Lushington lays down the true principle in The Maria Jane (14 Jur. 857), where he says, "The true test by which to try the right to salvage is, whether the service be within the contract or not." It was no part of the contract to save the cargo. [Sir R. J. Phillimore.—The same principle was also applied by me in the recent case of The Le Jonet (ante, p. 438; 27 L. T. Rep. N.S. 387), where a seaman, who remained by his ship after she had been abandoned by her master and the rest of the crew, was held entitled to salvage. His contract was at an end.] That is the same principle, and that was the ground of the decision of the Privy Council in The Sappho (ante, p. 65; L. Rep. 3 P. C. 690, 694; 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 795). The defendants set up in their answer (par. 5) that there existed in the contract an implied warranty that the Miranda was seaworthy, and that there was a breach of this warranty by reason of the weakness or improper fitting of the crank shaft. This is no defence to this suit, because even if such a warranty exists where the rights of parties are governed by a written instrument such as a bill of lading or a charter-party, that warranty clearly has not the same effect as a warranty of seaworthiness in a policy of insurance where non-compliance with it would vitiate the policy altogether, and where even a latent defect, although not contributing to the loss of the vessel, is sufficient to prevent the policy attaching: (2 Arnould on Marine Insurance, 591, 4th edit.) The effect there is to make the contract entirely null and void, unseaworthiness being a condition precedent to its performance. In charter-parties and bills of lading, on the other hand, such a warranty is not a condition precedent, and an action may be brought by the shipowner for his freight after delivery, even though his ship may have been unseaworthy, or for any other non-performance of the contract by the owner of the goods. This supposed warranty not being a condition precedent, and the contract contained in the bills of lading not being, therefore, void ab initio, the exceptions in the bills of lading apply, and the performance of the contract is excused by the words "accidents from machinery." In case of total loss through the breaking of the shaft, the plaintiffs would not have been liable to the owners of cargo for their goods, and as their only contract was to carry the goods safely in the Miranda, unless prevented by certain exceptions, any services rendered by them with another steamer, on the happening of one of these excepted perils, were over and above their contract, and entitled to reward. Moreover, if any such latent defect existed, it lies upon the defendants to show that it did exist, as the breakdown of the machinery did not happen until some time after her departure from port: (2 Arnould on Marine Insurance, 618, 4th edit.) and the defendants have given no evidence on this point. These services being over and above the contract, were not rendered by the plaintiffs solely for their own benefit. If any independent vessel had rendered assistance, the plaintiffs would not have been liable to pay salvage in respect of the cargo, but the owners of cargo would have been liable to that independent vessel. The plaintiffs, therefore, are equally entitled to reward in the present case.

THE MIRANDA.

Milward, Q.C. and W. G. F. Phillimore for the owners of cargo on board the Miranda.—The services rendered by the owners of the Roxana were for the purpose of enabling them to carry out their contract to deliver the cargo of the Miranda, and to earn their freight. They were not excused from the performance of their contract by the happening of any peril excepted in the bills of lading. The accident which happened was not included in those perils. "Accidents from machinery" are not an excuse where the ship only is injured and stopped, but are intended to operate in favour of the shipowner only where the cargo has received actual damage from the machinery itself: (Czech v. The General Steam Navigation Company, 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 246; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 5; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 14.) The shipowners contracted to carry safely as common carriers (Abbott on Shipping, 417 note 1, 5th American edit.; Redhead v. The Midland Railway Company, 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 485; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 628; L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 412; L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 379), and to deliver "in like good order and condition" as shipped; in such a contract there is an implied warranty of seaworthiness and that the vessel was in a fit condition to carry the cargo safely at the time of shipment. If a latent defect existed in her machinery she was not in that condition.

Patman v. Wood, 3 Massachusetts Rep. 481; Redhead v. The Midland Railway Company (sup.) Abbott on Shipping, 5 American Edit. 417, note 2.

There is nothing to explain the breaking down of the shaft of the Miranda, and it is to be presumed that it was caused by a latent defect existing at the commencement of the voyage; this breakdown happened soon after the commencement of the voyage and it lies upon the shipowners and not upon the owners of cargo, to rebut the presumption (Arnould on Insurance, 4th edit. 618). Where a shipowner sets up the exceptions in his contract as an excuse for non-performance it lies upon him to show their existence: (The Freedom, 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 175; 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 452; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 359; ante, p. 28; L. Rep. 2 Adm. & Ecc. 346; L. Rep. 3 P. C. 594.) This the shipowners have not done, and the vessel must be considered to have been unseaworthy. The shipowner being thus guilty of a breach of warranty, the exceptions in the bills of lading, even if they apply to such a case, cannot excuse the shipowner, as the performance of the warranty must be considered as a condition precedent to the attaching of those exceptions. The shipowners, having by their default in not providing a seaworthy vessel placed the cargo in jeopardy and saddled it with the lien of the master and crew of the Roxana for salvage reward, are not entitled to salvage as they would thereby profit by their own wrong:

The Cargo ex Capella, 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 800; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 552; L. Rep. 1 Adm. & Ecc. 356.

Butt, Q.C. in reply.—Even in contracts of affreightment in which a warranty of seaworthiness is expressly given, that warranty is not a condition precedent: (Tarrabochia v. Hickie, 1 H. & N. 183.) There is no express warranty here, nor can it be implied as the contract is contained in the written terms of the bills of lading to which nothing can be added.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The facts are not in controversy, and those which it is material to mention are as follows: The Miranda, a screw steamer vessel, having a valuable cargo on board, received salvage services from the Roxana. The Miranda was bound to London on a voyage from Patras, while the Roxana was proceeding on a voyage from London to Genoa. When the vessels were in sight of each other, and about fifteen or twenty miles to the south-east of Cape St. Vincent, the master of the Miranda signalled to the Roxana, and requested her assistance. The damage the Miranda had sustained was this: The crank shaft of her after-engine was so nearly broken that another turn or two of her propeller would have broken it. The Miranda wished to be towed back to Gibraltar, and she was accordingly taken in tow by the Roxana, and was towed into Gibraltar, the service beginning between six and seven o'clock on the evening of 13th Oct., and ending at about half-past eight on the morning of 17th Oct. The weather was fine at the time, and the service was performed without danger either to the Roxana or her crew, but apart from the peculiar circumstances to which I am about to advert, the service was a service for which the court would be disposed to award a considerable sum, the value of the property being high, that is about 36,000*l.* The court, however, cannot award, and indeed, it is not asked to award any salvage remuneration to the owners of the Roxana either on the value of the Miranda, or on the value of her freight. But the master and the crew can, according to the decision in The Sappho (ubi sup.), a decision which has been affirmed on appeal by the Privy Council (ante, p. 65; L. Rep. 3 Priv. Co. 690; 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 795), claim on the entire sum, that is on the value of the Miranda, her cargo and freight. The defences raised by the owners of the Miranda to the claim preferred by the owners of the Roxana, are the following: First, that the owners of the Roxana were bound by their contract with the owners of the cargo laden on board the Miranda to carry the cargo of the Miranda to London, and that they would not have fulfilled this contract unless they had rendered assistance to the Miranda, which assistance is to be considered as an act done for the sole benefit and advantage of the owners of the Roxana. Secondly, it was said that implied in the contract between the owners of the Roxana, and the owners of the cargo of the Miranda there was warranty of the seaworthiness of the Miranda; that the accident arose from the breach of such warranty; and that the owners of the Roxana were, therefore, liable for all the consequences of such breach, and so were not entitled to salvage remuneration for averting a loss which if it had happened, would have fallen upon themselves. It is replied to these defences that the contract is to be found in the bills of lading, admitted to have been made between the parties. If I am to decide the question whether the owners of the Roxana are entitled to salvage reward, I must first determine whether they are so entitled apart from the question of their being the owners of the vessel saved. I think, unquestionably, they rendered a service entitling them to salvage remuneration, unless peculiar circumstances have rendered it impossible for them to recover that remuneration. It becomes necessary, therefore, to decide the question of law. The contract set out in the bills of lading is, that the Miranda should take her cargo on board and deliver it at the port of London in the like good order and condition as shipped. Then follow many exceptions, which are to be considered as affording a justification for the non-performance of the contract, and among these exceptions is included one about which there has been much discussion. This exception, which is contained alike in all the bills of lading, though not expressed in precisely the same words, is as follows: "accidents from machinery." If I had to determine this case upon the point raised with reference to the alleged implied warranty of seaworthiness, I should rule that the burden of proving such warranty rests with the defendants, and that sufficient evidence as to the vessel's state and the state of her machinery has not been given to lead the court to find that she was in an unseaworthy condition at the time the cargo was shipped. But I think the true question in the case is, does the exception, "accidents from machinery," include the present case? I must come to the conclusion that the accident in question finds its place among the excepted perils; it is, therefore, unnecessary for me to discuss the able argument which has been addressed to the court with respect to a warranty of seaworthiness being implied in the contract. I have now to consider the amount of the sum to be awarded. I must remember that the Miranda was owned by the owners of the Roxana, and that the owners of the Roxana were earning freight for the carriage of the cargo of the Miranda, and that no material deviation from her voyage occurred to the Roxana, as she towed the Miranda in the direction of the port to which she herself was bound. I must also bear in mind that the weather was fine, and that there was no danger. In the peculiar circumstances of the case, I shall award to the owners of the Roxana 350*l.* to be paid out of the proceeds of the cargo. Remembering that the ship was the principal agent in rendering the salvage service, I shall award to the master and crew the sum of 120*l.*, to be paid out of the proceeds of the ship, freight and cargo.

On application being made to his Lordship, he apportioned the sum awarded to the master and crew as follows: 70*l.* to the master and the residue to the crew, according to their rating.

THE IDA.

Bottomry—Unliquidated claim—Ship under arrest—Personal debt.

A bottomry bond on ship, given by a master to a creditor in satisfaction and as a compromise of an unliquidated claim for breach of contract in non-delivery of goods on a previous voyage, is bad, and will not be upheld by the Court of Admiralty, even where the ship is arrested at the suit of the creditor in a foreign port, and the bond is necessary to obtain her release.

THIS was a cause of bottomry instituted on behalf of Robert Wilson and Ebenezer Campbell Stevenson, of Liverpool, merchants, the holders of a bottomry bond upon the schooner Ida, her tackle, apparel, and furniture, and against her owners intervening.

On 12th Feb. 1871, the Ida was at Monte Video, in Uruguay, South America, and was on that date chartered by the plaintiff, Robert Wilson, to load a cargo of coals and other merchandise, and to carry the same to Corrientes, Paso de la Patria, or Cerrito, in the river Parana, and "deliver the same agreeably to bills of lading, on being paid freight as follows, 40*s.*—forty shillings sterling in full (the act of God, &c., excepted). The cargo to be brought to and taken from alongside at merchant's risk and expense, as customary at ports of loading and discharge, and to be stowed away on board at vessel's expense. The master to sign bills of lading at any rate of freight the charterer or his agents may require, but without prejudice to this charter-party, it being understood that he shall have an absolute lien on the cargo, for the recovery and payment of all freight, dead freight, and demurrage. The vessel to be consigned to charterer's agents at port of discharge . . . The freight to be paid after true and right delivery of the cargo, as customary at port of discharge. . . . And lastly, for the true performance hereof, the said master doth hereby bind himself, his heirs and assigns, the said vessel her freight and appurtenances, and the said charterer doth in like manner bind himself, his heirs and assigns, and the cargo to be laden on board the said vessel, each unto the other in the penal sum of estimated amount of freight." Under this charter-party Wilson loaded the Ida with a cargo consisting of 202 tons of coals and 940 bags of bran, both on his own account. Before the Ida left Monte Video, the master being utterly without funds, and applying to Wilson for a loan, Wilson made an advance to the master on account of the freight of the coals, by giving the master his bill at two or three months' date for 404*l.* This sum represented the total amount of freight on the 202 tons of coals at 40*s.* per ton. The master was unable to get the bill cashed, and Wilson thereupon cashed it for the master, deducting 6 per cent. for interest and insurance, and 2½ per cent. commission on the freight of the coal.

The Ida proceeded to Corrientes, and was ordered to Paso de la Patria, and there discharged about half her cargo of coals, but the plaintiff's agents not appearing to receive any more, the master, after due notice to them of his intention, sold the remainder of cargo of coals to pay, as he alleged, demurrage and expenses incurred by the delay. The facts as to this part of the transaction are fully set out in the judgment.

The Ida then made other voyages, with other cargoes, after the completion of which she proceeded to Buenos Ayres, in pursuance of a charter, which had been obtained for her by her master, to load a cargo for carriage thence to Liverpool. She arrived at Buenos Ayres on 10th Feb. 1868, and commenced to load her cargo. Whilst the Ida was at Buenos Ayres, a suit was instituted in the National Court at that place to compel the master to refund the value of the coals he had disposed of, to pay the damages caused by the non-delivery, and the costs and charges incurred; and by order of the judge of that court, notice was served upon the master, and an order was issued to the harbour master to prevent the departure of the Ida, which was done by showing the judge's order to the master of the Ida, and getting the latter to sign the order. By the law (Code of Commerce, Nos. 1028, 1070) in force at Buenos Ayres, a person claiming damages for breach of charter may institute a suit in rem against the ship for the damages, and the National Court has jurisdiction to entertain such a suit, and that court may order the arrest of the vessel at the instance of creditors presenting their claims in due form.

Before the arrival of the Ida in Buenos Ayres the British Consul at that place, Mr. Parish, had received a letter from the defendants, the owners of the Ida, expressing dissatisfaction with the master's proceedings, and requesting the consul to order him home at once, stating that they had written to the same effect to Rosario and Corrientes, and asking for information about the vessel. On her arrival the consul communicated with the master, and made inquiries as to his proceedings, but just at this time the above suit was instituted, and the consul took upon himself, on behalf of the owners, to ascertain the merits of the case instituted against the ship, and, as he said in his evidence, "being thoroughly satisfied that it would have been next to useless resisting a claim of that nature, and that the master had no power to sell the cargo on any plea whatever," he determined to use his "influence with Mr. Wilson to obtain as satisfactory an arrangement of the case as possible," and the captain, accepting his advice, recognised the proceedings he took to this effect.

After some correspondence with Mr. Wilson, I persuaded that gentleman to accept as a compromise, for the payment of all claims, the sum of 450*l.*, which was the estimated value of the coal sold, with some additional expenses thereon. Captain Coleman, acting on my advice, accepted this arrangement, and by so doing the parties who were loading his vessel desisted from their intention to withdraw the charter. Captain Coleman, having no money, was unable to pay the amount due to Mr. Wilson, and I had no alternative but to advertise for the money on bottomry, and no person tendering for the same, I induced Mr. Wilson to accept the risk, and to accept payment of his claim in this form. On his agreeing to do so, bottomry bills for the amount of 450*l.*, with an additional premium of 90*l.*, were drawn up and signed in the Consulate, and Mr. Wilson withdrew the law proceedings, by a formal act, which I recommended him for his better security to enter into. The prohibition which had been placed upon the sailing of the vessel was removed, and the ship proceeded to sea.

The bond referred to was drawn up at the consul's office on a common printed form, and as far as material is as follows:—

Premium	90
Total	£540

Ten days after my arrival at the port of Liverpool I promise to pay to the order of Messrs. Wilson and Stevenson this my first bill of bottomry, second and third of this tenor and date not paid, upon the schooner Ida, under my command, and bound on a voyage to Liverpool, being for amount of expenses incurred in this port; which sum of 540*l.* sterling, excepting 90*l.* sterling for premium, was actually laid out in disbursements and charges for the use of the said schooner, to enable her to proceed on her present voyage, and for the payment of which sum of 540*l.* sterling, in lawful money of Great Britain ten days after my arrival at Liverpool as aforesaid, I do hereby bind myself, my heirs, executors, administrators, firmly by these presents, and particularly the said schooner, with all her tackle, apparel, and furniture, and it is hereby declared that the same are thus assigned over for the security of the said 540*l.* sterling, and shall be delivered to no other use or purpose whatever until payment of this bill or bond is first made with the premiums due thereon. Now the condition of this obligation is, &c. (the usual form.)

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal at Buenos Ayres, this 11th day of April 1868.

HENRY P. COLEMAN, Master (L. S.).

Signed sealed and delivered in the presence of FRANK PARISH, British Consul at Buenos Ayres.

No money was passed upon the making of the bond which was given by the master solely to secure the sum of 450*l.* as agreed.

According to the defendants' evidence, at the time of making the bond the plaintiff Wilson was indebted to the owners and master of the Ida in a large sum of money by way of demurrage and expenses in respect of the aforesaid detention of the Ida, and had not discharged that debt at the time of this suit.

July 31.—Butt, Q.C. and W. G. F. Phillimore for the plaintiffs.—There was an absolute necessity for this bond. The ship was liable to arrest for the payment of the sums due to Wilson in consequence of the master's default, and she was under arrest at the time the bond was given by process of the local court. To obtain her release the master was forced to give the bond, he having no credit, and unless released she could not have proceeded on her homeward voyage for which she was under charter. It is objected that the liability was incurred in respect of a voyage anterior to that during which the bond was to run, but such

The anxiety of the owners to get the ship home, and the necessity for completing her charter, were circumstances which made it more prudent to compromise Wilson's claim than to risk loss of charter and expense by defending the suit in the foreign court. Moreover, all that was done at Buenos Ayres was done under the sanction of the consul who was instructed by the shipowners to send the ship home with all dispatch. It was true that no money actually passed between Wilson and the master on the bond being signed ; but that, it is submitted, does not affect the question, because in substance the transaction was an advance by Wilson for the benefit of the ship. Wilson had advanced the whole of the freight on the coals, and the master had not afterwards earned this freight, and so had given Wilson a claim upon the ship by the lex loci for breach of contract. Releasing the ship from this claim was substantially advancing money for the ship. Even if this advance is to be considered as money already advanced when the bond was given, it must be presumed that the release took place on condition that a bond should secure the advance, and the consideration was, therefore, bottomry, and was valid :

The Karnak (ubi sup.)

Milward, Q.C. and Clarkson for the defendants, —The very essence of a valid bottomry transaction is, that it must be for actual advances of money for the necessities of the ship on the voyage during which she is pledged. In this case there was no advance of money for the necessities of the ship ; there was nothing beyond a settlement of accounts between the parties. The master had no authority to give the bond for that purpose ; his character as master gave him no right to turn an unliquidated into a liquidated claim, and to secure the payment of that claim by a bond with a bottomry premium. Even supposing Wilson's claim to have been maintainable at all, the defendants' claim for demurrage and expenses would have exceeded it and should have been set off against it. The defendants' claim arose out of the default of Wilson in not receiving the cargo, and it was in consequence of this default that the sale took place, and he was in fact not entitled to make any claim. Again Wilson's claim was in respect of a previous voyage, and had nothing to do with the voyage on which the ship was engaged when the bond was given. This alone would invalidate the bond.

The conduct of Wilson and his relation to the ship renders it impossible for the court to uphold the bond. The fact that by the lex loci the ship could be and was arrested, is not in itself sufficient to render the bond valid :

The arrest could not alter the nature of the transaction, which was not a good ground for bottomry.

Phillimore, in reply.

Aug. 3rd.—SIR R. PHILLIMORE.—In this case a question arises as to the validity of a bottomry bond. The material facts are as follows : The Ida being an English vessel lying at Monte Video, was chartered by the plaintiff Wilson to receive a cargo of coals and to proceed to Corrientes, Paso de la Patria, or Cerrito, and deliver the same agreeably to bill of lading on being paid freight, 40s. sterling in full. The master was to have "an absolute lien on the cargo for the recovery and payment of all freight, dead freight, and demurrage ; freight to be paid after true and rightful delivery of the cargo as customary at port of discharge." 202 tons of coals were loaded. Wilson advanced on account of the freight, under conditions certainly not unfavourable to himself, and on a bill at two or three months date, 404l. This bill Wilson afterwards cashed. The Ida proceeded to Corrientes with a letter to Don Candido Gomez, consignee, and with instructions from Wilson to deliver it. The Ida arrived at Corrientes on the 1st June, 1867. The letter was duly delivered, but Gomez seems not to have appeared ; at all events, he referred the captain to one Reis as his agent. Reis said the Ida must go on to Paso de la Patria, but the communication between Reis and the captain was not satisfactory, and the captain, after waiting six days and consulting the captain of the port, advertised in a newspaper. About the 16th June the brother of Gomez appeared, but gave no orders, and on the 19th June the captain entered a protest. On the 25th June this Gomez again appeared with the bills of lading. Gomez gave the bills of lading to Reis, and told the captain to take his orders from the latter. Reis ordered the captain to go to Paso, and he sailed next day, arriving there on the 27th June. Three or four days afterwards he met Reis there, and began to discharge ; he went on slowly till the 25th July. An arrangement had been made between the captain and Reis by which the former was to be allowed eighteen days for discharging the cargo, and forty-eight hours waiting for orders. The rate of demurrage was to be 5l. per day. The consignees had received about 107½ tons, when on the 26th July the captain wrote the following letter to Reis : "To Victor Reis. Dear Sir,—As you are acting agent of Candido Gomez, consignee of the above vessel, cargo of coal and bran, I now inclose you my bill for demurrage and expenses up till Monday next, and trust to have an immediate settlement of the same, or I shall place the cargo into other people's hands, and sell it to defray expenses. Your humble and obedient servant, Henry P. Coleman." Then there follows the bill for demurrage, &c., which amounted to 1238 paticoms, I think they are called. Reis never came again for coals. On the 30th July, Captain Coleman wrote another letter to Reis : "Dear Sir,—I wrote to you on Friday last, the 26th inst., and sent you my bill for demurrage and expenses ; you thought proper not to answer that letter, therefore I am obliged to send you another bill inclosed with this for the said demurrage and expenses, and if you fail in coming to a settlement before forty-eight hours after the delivery of this letter, I shall, after the expiration of the said forty-eight hours, sell the remaining cargo of coals to the highest bidder. Trusting you will come to an immediate settlement, I remain, dear sir, your most humble and obedient servant, Henry P. Coleman." No answer was returned to these letters. On the 1st, 2nd, 5th, and 14th Aug. the captain sold the remainder of the coals, having returned on the 5th to Corrientes. The money obtained by the sale the captain says was applied towards the payment of balance of freight and claims for demurrage, and expenses caused by his detention, and the refusal of the consignees to receive the cargo. The Ida then made divers other voyages with other cargoes, and on the 10th Feb. 1866 arrived at Buenos Ayres, having previously obtained a charter for Liverpool. While loading her cargo the captain was summoned before the national tribunal, and an embargo was laid upon the Ida. The captain found himself in a great difficulty, the charterers threatening to withdraw their cargo, and he having no funds. The aid of the British consul, Mr. Parish, was invoked, and he thinking the claim of Wilson on the whole maintainable, advised a compromise of the conflicting claims for 450*l.*, and that the captain should raise this sum by bottomry, and so procure the release of the ship. Mr. Parish says in his evidence—[His Lordship here read the passage of the consul's evidence, before set out.] The bottomry bond was as follows—[His Lordship read the bond down to the words "I do hereby bind"—and the usual conclusion follows; it is signed by Coleman, master, and Mr. Parish, British consul at Buenos Ayres. The recital as to the money being actually laid out in disbursements and charges, is untrue, this recital is indeed part of the printed form of the bond, but nevertheless I regret to see it, and I am somewhat surprised that it escaped, as it must have done, the notice of the consul. The fact is, that no money passed at all between Wilson and the captain, and that the bond was not for disbursements or charges, but to obtain the release of the ship seized or detained on what was in truth a matter of account between the parties to it. Was such an instrument drawn in such circumstances a legal bottomry bond? In the case of The Karnak I reviewed at length and carefully considered all the decisions of this court bearing upon the subject of bottomry bonds, granted for the purpose of raising money to obtain the release of a British ship detained in a foreign port on account of a lien allowed by the municipal law of that port. I adhere to the principles of law laid down in that case with the greatest confidence because they were subsequently proved by the Privy Council (21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 59; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 276; L. Rep. 2 P. C. 505). I think it expedient to refer to two of the authorities cited and relied on by me in The Karnak (sup.). In the case of The Prince George (4 Moore P. C. C. 25), before the Privy Council, their Lordships said: "If it had been proved that the law of New York gave the lien upon the ship as suggested, we should have thought, upon the general principle, that where the master cannot in any other way raise money, which is indispensably necessary to enable the ship to continue her voyage, he may hypothecate the ship; this power would extend to a case where the ship might be arrested and sold for a demand for which the owner would be liable. It seems immaterial whether the necessity for funds arises from such a demand or to pay for repairs, stores, or port duties." I do not know, however, that the law upon this subject has as yet been carried farther than to uphold an hypothecation on account of a lien by a creditor in a foreign port for the necessary expenses and charges in respect of the ship, and even then only for those in that port. It is not necessary to decide whether the principles laid down in The Prince George (sup.), and The Karnak (sup.) might be considered to cover the case of a bottomry bond given for the purpose of raising money not to be raised in any other way, and to repeat the language to which I have just adverted, "which was indispensably necessary to enable the ship to continue her voyage," without reference to the character of the expenses to be defrayed by the money so raised. I say it is not necessary to make a decision upon this point, because the case before me presents a circumstance which raises another principle of the greatest importance relative to instruments of this peculiar character, namely, the capacity of the particular person to become the obligee of such a bond, or, in other words, the capacity of the captain to grant the bond to Wilson. It is contended by the defendants that the failure of Wilson to fulfil his contract with respect to receiving the cargo by himself or his consignees within a reasonable time at the proper port, caused the expenses, in order to defray which the sale of the coal became necessary, and which act subsequently necessitated the bottomry bond, and now it is not denied that such default was made by Wilson. His contention is that, nevertheless, on a balance of the accounts between him and the captain, the latter is still his debtor, and, therefore, he arrested the vessel. In The Karnak (sup.) I cited a decision bearing on this point of Story, J., which I will now read. That very learned judge said, "It is undoubtedly true that material men, and others who furnish supplies to a foreign ship, have a lien on the ship, and may proceed in the Admiralty Court to enforce that right; and it must be admitted that in such a case a bonâ fide creditor, who advances his money to relieve the ship from an actual arrest on account of such debts may stipulate for a bottomry interest, and the necessity of the occasion will justify the master in giving it, if he have no other sufficient funds or credit to redeem the ship from such arrest. But it would be too much to hold, as was contended for by the counsel for the appellants, that a mere threat to arrest the ship for a pre-existing debt would be a sufficient necessity to justify the master in giving a bottomry interest, since it might be an idle threat which the creditor might never enforce, and until enforced, the peril would not act upon the ship itself; and if, supposing a just debt might in such a case be a valid consideration to sustain a bottomry interest in favour of a third person, such an effect never could be attributed to a debt manifestly founded in fraud or injustice. Nor does it by any means follow, because a debt sought to be enforced by an arrest of the ship might uphold an hypothecation in favour of a third person, that a general creditor would be entitled to acquire a like interest. It would seem as against the policy of the law to permit a party in this manner to obtain advantages from his contract for which he had not originally stipulated. It would hold out temptations to fraud and imposition, and enable creditors to practise gross oppressions, against which even the vigilance and good faith of an intelligent master might not always be a sufficient safeguard in a foreign country." That is the case of The Aurora (1 Wheaton's Rep. 96, 104). Now, by accepting this bottomry bond Wilson has not only converted a personal debt into a bottomry transaction, but he has, as Mr. Clarkson clearly and forcibly said, turned an unliquidated into a liquidated claim with a bottomry premium. I am of opinion that it was not competent to him to take this step. I agree with the opinion of my predecessors in this chair, that bottomry bonds ought to be, so to speak, favoured by this court; that is, that the interests of commerce require that they should not be invalidated upon technical or minute grounds. But to pronounce for the validity of this bond in the circumstances which I have stated, and in the hands which now hold it, would be to introduce a new principle into the law relating to these instruments, which would be, I think, contrary to the foundation on which they rest, and not conducive to the interests of commerce. I must decree in favour of the defendants, with costs.

COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY.

Reported by E. STEWART ROCHE and H. PEAT, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Tuesday, July 23, 1872.

(Before the LORDS JUSTICES.)

ALEXANDER v. CAMPBELL.

Marine insurance — Mutual society — Policy — Depositee—Rule requiring undertaking by mortgagee or assignee—Condition precedent.

One of the rules of a mutual insurance association, which was incorporated in their policies, was in these words: "No member, mortgagee, or assignee, the whole or any part of whose share in a ship insured in the association shall, at the time of entering or afterwards, be mortgaged or assigned to any person or persons, shall have any claim by virtue of this policy, nor shall any assignee of such policy have a claim for any loss or damage which may be sustained by such ship unless previous to the occurrence of such loss or damage such member, mortgagee, or assignee shall have delivered to the manager an undertaking approved of by the mortgagee or assignee, whereby he shall covenant with the manager to pay and discharge all sums of money which are or may become due from such member in respect of such ship and her insurance, and in respect of the insurances underwritten on his behalf in this association."

A member of the association deposited a policy of insurance on his ship with a creditor to secure payment of his debt. This creditor was also a mortgagee of the ship prior to the assignment. The depositee did not give the undertaking required by the rules, but he, in fact, paid and discharged all sums payable in respect of the ship and her insurance. The ship having been lost, the depositee filed a bill against the association to recover the money due on the policy:

Held (reversing the decision of Bacon, V.C.), that as the depositee, who was an assignee within the meaning of the rule as well as a mortgagee, had not given the required undertaking, he was not entitled to recover the money due on the policy, and that his bill must be dismissed with costs.

This was an appeal by the managers of the Alliance Ship Insurance Association from a decision of Bacon, V.C.

The hearing in the court below is reported ante, p. 373, where the facts of the case are sufficiently stated.

The Vice-Chancellor having held that the plaintiff was entitled to receive the money due on the policy, the association appealed.

Swanston, Q.C., Miller, Q.C., and Maidlow for the appellants.—Turnbull v. Woolfe (2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 63; 2 L. T. Rep. N. S. 483; 9 Jur. N. S. 57), where Lord Westbury overruled the decision of Stuart, V.C. (3 Giff. 91), shows that the rule requiring a mortgagee to give an undertaking, will be strictly enforced by this court. In that case there was a rule almost identical with the rule of the association in the present case; and the only difference between the two cases is that in that case the owner of the mortgaged ship was the plaintiff, while here the assignee is plaintiff. For that the plaintiff is an assignee within the meaning of the rule is clear from Dufaur v. The Professional Life Assurance Company (25 Beav. 599), where a policy was to become void in certain cases, except it should have been legally assigned; and it was held that this meant validly and effectually assigned, and that an equitable charge by mere deposit came within the exception. So, too, in Jones v. The Consolidated Investment Assurance Company (26 Beav. 256), where one of the conditions of a life policy was that it should be void if the assured died by his own hand, except it should have been assigned to other parties for valuable consideration, six months before his death, it was held that a letter to a creditor charging it with a floating balance due to him, and made three years previous to the death of the assured by his own hand, was within the exception. But at all events the plaintiff is mortgagee of the ship, as appears from the ship's register, and on that ground his non compliance with the rule precludes him from recovering. Then there was such misrepresentation on the insurer's part as to vitiate the policy altogether, and Campbell v. Rickards (5 B. & Ald. 840), shows that the underwriter's evidence as to the insurability of the ship is not admissible. Then the rules provide that all disputes as to claims shall be referred to arbitration; and the obtaining the decision of arbitrators on the matter in dispute, is by the rules declared to be a condition precedent to the right of any member to maintain any action or suit on his policy, and that being so, Scott v. Avery (5 H. L. Cas. 811), shows that the plaintiff cannot sue until an award has been made. They also referred to

Hughes v. Tindall, 18 C. B. 98;
31 & 32 Vict. c. 86.

Kay, Q.C. and Marten, for the plaintiff, were not called upon as to the alleged misrepresentation, or as to the necessity of a previous submission to arbitration.—The defence that the plaintiff had not complied with the rule by giving the required undertaking, and therefore was not entitled to recover, was not raised by the answer, but was raised for the first time by affidavit at the hearing. Phillips v. Phillips (5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 655; 4 De G. F. & J. 203) shows that such a defence cannot be set up by affidavit at such a stage of the case. There is no evidence of any mortgage of the ship except the ship's register, and that evidence is inadmissible, no such defence having been raised by the answer. Then the plaintiff is a mere depositee of the policy, and cannot be considered an assignee within the meaning of the rules.

Without calling for a reply.

Lord Justice James said that the plaintiff clearly was an assignee of the policy. He came to this court as equitable assignee of the policy which had been granted to someone else, and he had no title to sue for the money secured by the policy unless he was in equity the owner of it. He was an assignee of the policy within the meaning of the 15th rule; and, that being so, the words of the 15th rule which was incorporated in the policy made it quite clear that he could not recover upon the policy unless he had given the undertaking mentioned in the rule. He had also been proved by the evidence to have had a mortgage of the ship prior to the equitable assignment of the policy to him. Therefore, even if he was not an assignee of the policy, he was still subject to the 15th rule, for the fact that he was mortgagee of the ship brought him equally within that rule. His Lordship was, therefore of opinion that the defendants had made out their case. The Vice-Chancellor's decree must accordingly be reversed, and the bill be dismissed with costs.

Lord Justice MELLISH was of the same opinion.

TANNER v. PHILLIPS.

Mortgage of ship and freight—Charter-party—Advances for ship's disbursements—Account.

By the terms of a charter-party it was provided that the charterers should advance necessary funds for the ship's disbursements, not exceeding a specified amount at the port of lading. Previously to entering into the charter-party the owner had mortgaged the ship and freight. The charterers made advances for the ship's disbursements, considerably in excess of the amount specified in the charter-party. Before the freight became due the mortgagee took possession of the ship, and stopped the cargo for freight.

Held that the charterers were not entitled to deduct from the amount due for freight the advances made by them in excess of the sum provided by the charter-party.

THIS suit was instituted by the assignees of the freight against the charterers of the ship Pharamond for the purpose of having an account taken of the freight earned by the ship while chartered by the defendants.

In Sept. 1862, H. J. Hall, being the owner of the Pharamond, mortgaged her to the plaintiff Tanner, and by a deed of even date assigned to him the freight to become due on account of the ship.

In Nov. 1863, Hall, without the knowledge of the plaintiff, chartered the Pharamond to the defendants Phillips and King, who had no notice of the assignment to the plaintiff.

By the terms of the charter-party the ship was to load at Algoa Bay, and proceed from thence to London, the freight to be paid on unloading and right delivery of the cargo as customary. "Necessary funds for ship's disbursements, not exceeding 150*l.*, to be advanced the master at port of loading, free of interest and commission, but subject to insurance," and the owners of the ship were to have an absolute lien on the cargo for all freight. The ship was duly loaded at Algoa Bay, and while there the defendants advanced sums amounting to 289*l.* 9*s.* 1*d.* to the master of the ship, the receipts for which sums were endorsed on the charter-party.

The ship arrived in the London Docks on the 1st Sept. 1864, and on the 6th Sept. the defendants advanced a sum of 350*l.* to pay wages due to the sailors and other disbursements of the ship.

On the 8th Sept. the ship began discharging her cargo. On the 26th Sept. the plaintiff took possession of the ship, at which time the whole of the cargo had not been delivered, and on the 30th he stopped the cargo in the hands of the London and St. Katherine's Dock Company. The cargo was, however, released upon a sum of money being paid into court on account of the freight.

The question now was whether, in taking the accounts, the defendants were to be allowed to deduct from the amount due for freight the total amount which they had advanced, or only the 150*l.* as provided by the charter party.

E. K. Karlake Q.C. and W. W. Karlake, for the plaintiffs, submitted that the advances made by the defendants, in excess of the 150*l.* which they were authorised to advance, were mere personal loans, which they were not entitled to charge against freight. They referred to—

W. F. Robinson, for the defendants, contended that the mortgagee could not be in a better position than the owner of the ship, and that, therefore, the sums which had been advanced for the ship's disbursements must be allowed out of freight.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said that the defendants' contention could not be sustained. The terms of the charter-party were quite distinct and clear that 150 and no more was to be deducted from the amount of the freight. When the mortgagee took possession of the vessel the whole amount of the freight, minus the 150*l.* authorised by the charter-party to be deducted, became payable to him. The advances in excess of the 150*l.* were mere personal loans, and had nothing to do with freight, and could not therefore, be deducted out of it.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

STANTON v. RICHARDSON; RICHARDSON v. STANTON.

Charter-party—Ship unfit for cargo—Refusal to provide cargo—Warranty of seaworthiness—Reasonableness of cargo.

The obligation imposed upon a shipowner who has entered into a charter-party is to supply a ship that is reasonably fit to carry the cargo stipulated for in the charter-party. The respective duties of charterer and shipowner are that the charterer must offer a reasonable cargo of the kind specified in the charter, and the shipowner must provide a ship reasonably fit to carry such a reasonable cargo. (a)

If the shipowner commits a breach of charter such as to justify the charterer in not putting the cargo stipulated for on board at the moment of the breach, and it cannot be remedied within such a time as not to frustrate the object of the voyage, the charterer is altogether absolved from performance of the charter. (b)

The shipowner contracted with the charterer to load a full and complete cargo of sugar in bags, hemp in compressed bales, ^{and} ^{or} measurement goods, always sufficient dead weight to ballast the vessel at Yloilo, and to sail to Cork for orders to discharge at same point in the United Kingdom.

The rates of freight for wet sugar were specified in the charter-party as higher than those for dry sugar.

Before taking cargo on board the ship was surveyed and reported to be a first-class risk, and fit to carry a dry and perishable cargo to any port of the world.

(a) The question of what is a reasonable cargo has been considered in the United States in several cases. It has been there laid down that the usual stipulation in a charter-party to take a cargo of lawful merchandise implies that the articles composing the cargo shall be in such condition, and put up in such a form, that they can be stowed without injury to each other; and that a master of a ship, therefore, may refuse to take goods offered for shipment, if in his honest judgment they are in such a condition or of such a character that they cannot be carried without injury to the rest of the cargo, without violating a charter-party containing the condition mentioned: (Boyd v. Moses 7 Wallace's (U. S. Supreme Court) Rep. 316; see also Weston v. Foster, 2 Curtis' (U. S. Circuit Court, First Circuit) Rep. 119; and Weston v. Minot, 3 Woodbury and Minot's (U. S. Circuit Court, First Circuit) Rep. 436.)—ED.

(b) This rule has been more broadly stated in America thus: "Where the whole consideration for any stipulation fails, or if it becomes impossible of being performed substantially as the parties intended, by the voluntary act of one of the parties, the other is not bound to proceed, but may decline performance on his part": (Kleine v. Catara, 2 Gallison's (U. S. Circuit Court, First Circuit) Rep. 60-74 (per Story, J.)). So in another case it was held that a stipulation in a charter-party that the chartered vessel, then in distant seas, would proceed from one port named (where it was expected she would be) to another port named "with all possible dispatch" is a warranty that she will so proceed, and goes to the root of the contract. It is not a representation that she will so proceed, but a condition precedent to a right of recovery. Accordingly, if a vessel go out of the direct course, the charterer may throw up the charter-party: (Lowber v. Bangs, 2 Wallace's (U. S. Supreme Court) Rep. 728.) The reason of this is manifest. The delay caused by the deviation frustrated the object of the voyage, and the voyage becomes impossible of being performed as the parties intended, time being an essential element of the contract.—ED.

VOL. I., N. S.

A cargo of wet sugar in bags was then shipped by the charterer, but when the bulk had been put on board it was discovered that there was such an accumulation of molasses in the hold, the result of drainage from the sugar, that the ship would not be seaworthy in her then state; nor could the pumps, in consequence of being clogged, get rid of the drainage, although they were in every respect sufficient for ordinary purposes; nor could any pumps be obtained sufficient to deal with the drainage in a less time than six or seven months.

The ship was ultimately unloaded, and the cargo went to Europe in another vessel, when the charterer refused to load another cargo.

Cross actions were brought—one by the shipowner against the charterer—for refusing to load a cargo, and also for loading a cargo in such an unfit condition that the ship could not prosecute her voyage. The other action by the charterer against the shipowner for his not taking proper precautions to keep his ship fit for the voyage, and to recover damages for injury to the cargo.

The jury found at the trial, in answer to the judge, that the cargo was a reasonable cargo to be offered; that the ship was unfit to carry the cargo offered to her, or any cargo of wet sugar; that the damage to the sugar was caused by the ship not being reasonably fit to carry a reasonable cargo of wet sugar; and that the ship would not have been seaworthy without new pumps and with a cargo of wet sugar on board:

Held, that the shipowner was bound to provide a reasonable ship to carry reasonable cargo of the kind specified in the charter party, that the charterer was bound to offer such a cargo, and that by reason of the unfitness of the ship the charterer was entitled to recover; also, as the jury had found that the shipowner could not remedy the defects in his vessel within such a reasonable time as not to frustrate the object of the voyage, the charterer must be taken to be absolved altogether.

THESE were cross actions between the owner and charterer of a ship called the Isle of Wight upon a charter-party.

In the action by the shipowner Stanton against Richardson the charterer of the ship, the declaration set out the charter-party in full, and then alleged as breaches that the defendant neglected and refused to load a full and complete cargo on board the ship, and that he neglected and refused to pay the freight.

The second count alleged that the defendant loaded a large portion of the cargo, to wit, sugar in bags, and the same was afterwards properly and necessarily for the safety of the ship and cargo landed by the master at the port of lading, on account of a part thereof being in a damaged state in the hold of the vessel; and that all conditions were performed and all times elapsed, and all things were done necessary to entitle the plaintiff to reload the said portion of the said cargo, and to have the residue of the cargo supplied; yet the defendant refused to allow the said portion to be reloaded, and to have the residue of the cargo supplied, &c.

The third count was similar to the second. The fourth count set out the charter-party, alleging as breaches of the said charter-party, that though a large portion of the cargo, consisting of sugar in bags, was loaded on board the ship by the defendant, a portion of it was in such a bad, dangerous, and unfit state for conveyance in the ship, that the same damaged and injured the ship and her pumps and also the residue of the sugar, so that the ship could not safely set sail and proceed on her voyage whereby the plaintiff was injuriously affected and suffered damage, &c.

The fifth count was an ordinary money count. The defendant by his pleas traversed all the allegations in the declaration, and further pleaded that the ship was not light, staunch, and strong, or fit to receive and carry a cargo as she was required to be according to the true intent and meaning of the charter-party; and that the defendant could not, although he was ready so to do, safely or securely load on board the ship a full and complete or any cargo, and by reason of the condition of the ship was prevented from deriving any benefit from the charter-party, and the consideration for the same wholly failed.

The plaintiff took and joined issue on all the defendant's pleas.

In the second action by the charterer (Richardson) against the shipowner (Stanton) the first count of the declaration after setting out the terms of the charter-party, alleged as a breach, that the master did not take all proper means to keep the ship tight, staunch, and strong, well manned and sound, and in every way fitted for the voyage, and that the ship at the time of receiving the cargo on board was not a good risk for insurance, and did not load and carry a full and complete or any cargo according to the charter-party; whereby the plaintiff lost the benefit of the charter, and was put to great expense in landing the cargo, and warehousing the same, and was compelled to ship the cargo by another vessel, and a section of the cargo which had been loaded on board the ship was either lost or much damaged and injured, &c.

The second and third counts respectively alleged bailments of certain goods to the defendant to carry in his ship, and alleged damage to the goods through the negligence of the defendant and his servants, and through the defective and unseaworthy condition of the defendant's ship.

The fourth count contained the money counts in the usual form. The defendant by his pleas traversed all the material allegations. Upon which pleas issue was joined.

The material facts of the charter-party, as far as is sufficient to understand the present case, were as follows: It was agreed between the master of the ship called the Isle of Wight for and on behalf of himself and the owner of the said vessel of the one part, and the Borneo Company (Limited) as agents for and on behalf of the charterer of the other part, that the said master should, after having discharged his inward cargo with all proper dispatch, "sail for Manilla, or as near thereunto as he might safely get for orders to load within, there or at Yloilo or at Zabu, the following cargo of lawful merchandise, &c., a full and complete cargo of sugar in bags, hemp in compressed bales, ^{and} measurement goods, always sufficient dead weight to ballast the vessel;" and that the vessel, being so loaded, should sail to Cork or Falmouth for orders to discharge in a port in the United Kingdom or in Europe, between Havre and Hamburg. The provisions concerning rate of freight specified that the rate should be 4*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.* for dry sugar, 4*l.* 5*s.* for wet sugar, and 4*l.* 15*s.* for hemp and measurement goods. The charter did not commence with the usual clause as to the vessel being tight, staunch, and strong, but contained the following provision: "The master engages that the vessel, before and when receiving cargo, shall be a good risk for insurance; and he will when required, provide a survey report declaring her to be so; and during the voyage the master shall take all proper means to keep the vessel tight, staunch, and strong, well manned and provided, and in every way fitted and provided for the voyage."

These cross actions were tried at the sittings in London after Hilary Term, before Brett, J. and a special jury, when the following facts were proved: The Isle of Wight proceeded to Manilla, and thence in consequence of orders received from the charterer's agent, to Yloilo, a port in the Philippine Islands. In pursuance of the terms of the charter party, wherein it was agreed she should be surveyed at Yloilo, she was overhauled, and reported to be a first-class risk, and fit to carry a dry and perishable cargo to any part of the world. A cargo of what is known as wet sugar in bags was provided for her by the charterer. It appears that a very large quantity of moisture drains from cargoes of wet sugar, and when the bulk of the cargo had been loaded it was found that there was such a large accumulation of molasses in the hold, the result of the drainage from the sugar, that the ship would not be seaworthy for the voyage if she proceeded in the condition she then was. Efforts were made to get rid of the drainage from the sugar by pumping the ship. The pumps were in good repair, and of the usual kind for a ship of the character of the Isle of Wight, and quite sufficient for all ordinary purposes; but owing to the depth of the ship's hold, and the nature of the material, they were unable to deal with the drainage of the sugar. The ship was perfectly seaworthy, except with respect to this particular cargo of wet sugar, and the incapacity of the pumps to deal with it. Eventually it became necessary to unload the cargo again, and warehouse it at Yloilo, whence it was afterwards, by arrangement between the parties, sent to Europe in another ship called the Milton. The charterer refused to provide another cargo. It appeared that there was no means of obtaining any other pumps for the purpose of pumping out the drainage from the sugar, except by sending for them to Manilla, and it would have taken a very considerable period (six or seven months) before they could be procured. At the trial the learned judge left the following fourteen questions to the jury, but the jury gave the replies thereto appended.

1. Did the charterer in the first place offer a full cargo?—Yes.
2. Did the charterer refuse to allow the cargo to be re-shipped, or any cargo, after the first was discharged, to be shipped and carried in the Isle of Wight?—Yes.
3. Was the sugar shipped on board the Milton by mutual consent?—Yes.
4. Was the sugar which was offered to the captain a reasonable cargo to be offered?—Yes.
5. If not, was the defect such, and so apparent, that a captain of ordinary care and skill, if he meant to object to it, ought to have objected to it.
6. Was the ship reasonably fit to carry a reasonable cargo of Yloilo wet sugar?—No.
7. Was the ship fit to carry the cargo that was offered to her?—No.
8. Did the captain use reasonable skill and care in the treatment of the cargo delivered to him?—No.

9. Was the damage suffered by the sugar the result of its own defective condition, without any defect in the ship or any default in the captain?—No.

10. Was the damage to the sugar caused by the unfitness of the ship to carry the cargo offered to her, or by the ship being unreasonably unfit to carry a reasonable cargo of Yloilo wet sugar, or by want of reasonable care or skill of the captain in treating the cargo delivered to him?—Yes.

11. If the ship was defective, was the captain willing and able to make her fit within a reasonable time?—Willing, but not able.

12. Was he willing and able to make her fit within such a time as would not have frustrated the object of the adventure?—Willing, but not able.

13. Would the ship, without new pumps, and having the sugar that was offered to her on board, have been seaworthy?—No.

14. Would the ship, without new pumps, and with a reasonable cargo of Yloilo sugar on board, have been seaworthy?—No.

The learned judge, upon these findings of the jury, directed the verdict to be entered for the charterer in both actions, and reserved leave to the shipowner to move to enter a verdict for him; the court to be at liberty to make all amendments that the judge ought to have made. It was agreed that the damage in both actions should be referred.

Upon a former day Henry James, Q.C., obtained a rule nisi to enter the verdict, pursuant to the leave reserved, on the ground that Richardson, the charterer, had no right to throw up the charter-party and refuse to load a cargo; and that upon the finding of the jury, Stanton the shipowner, was entitled to have the verdict entered for him, and also for a new trial, on the ground of misdirection on the part of the judge in directing a verdict to be entered for Richardson upon the findings of the jury, and in telling the jury that there was a warranty on the part of the shipowner that the ship was fit to carry a reasonable cargo of Yloilo wet sugar; and that there was an obligation on the part of the shipowner and master of the ship to have the ship in a state fit for such a cargo, and that the master should possess the necessary knowledge enabling him to deal with and manage such a cargo; and in telling the jury that the shipowner was bound within a reasonable time to make the ship fit to take such a cargo, and to do so within such a time as would not frustrate the objects of the adventure, or upon the ground that the verdicts were against the weight of evidence; first in the answers given by the jury to the sixth, seventh, and fourteenth questions; secondly, in the answers to the eighth, ninth, and tenth questions; and, thirdly, in the answers to the eleventh and twelfth questions.

Sir John Karlake, Q.C., Butt, Q.C., and J. C. Mathew, showed cause.—There is no doubt, looking at the words of the charter-party, that wet sugar may be loaded if it is a reasonable cargo, and the jury have found that wet sugar is a reasonable cargo. There is an express provision in the charter-party that the ship shall be a good risk for insurance at the time she received her cargo, so that it was intended that the ship should be seaworthy with regard to the particular cargoes specified; but the jury by their findings prove that the ship was not fit, and that she could not within a reasonable time have been made fit for the purpose for which she was chartered; and where such is the fact it is established by the cases that when the default on the shipowner's part goes to the whole consideration, that is an answer to the charterers refusing to provide a cargo. In Tarbochia v. Hickie (1 Ex. N. S. 186; 21 L. J., Ex. 26) it was held the stipulations in a charter-party that "the vessel being tight, staunch, and strong, and shall sail with all convenient speed," are not conditions precedent to the charterers' obligation to load, unless by the breach of such stipulations the object of the voyage is wholly frustrated. Pollock, C.B., says: "The question is whether the fact of the vessel not being tight, strong, and watertight is a condition precedent to the performance by the defendant of his contract. I think not." In like manner it is not a condition precedent that the vessel should sail with convenient speed or in a reasonable time. Where, indeed, the charter-party provides that the vessel should sail on a particular day, that is a condition precedent. The distinction is obvious. In Abbot on Shipping, part 4, c. 1, s. 5, it is said: "Whether or not a particular covenant by one party be a condition precedent, the breach of which will dispense with the performance of the contract with the other, or an independent covenant, is a question to be determined according to the fair intention of the parties to be collected from the language employed by them." An intention to make any particular stipulation a condition precedent should be clearly and unambiguously expressed. The general rule laid down by Lord Ellenborough Davison v. Gwynne (12 East. 381) is, "that unless the non-performance alleged in breach of the contract goes to the whole root and consideration of it, the covenant broken is not to be considered a condition precedent, but as a distinct covenant for the breach of which the party injured may be compensated in damages." See also Behn v. Burness (1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 178, 329; 3 B. & S. 751; 32 L. J. 204, Q. B.). In McAndrew v. Chapple (2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 339; L. Rep. 1 C. P. 643; 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 556) Willes, J. says, "It is settled that a delay or deviation which goes to the whole root of the matter, deprives the charterer of the whole benefit of the contract, or entirely frustrates the object of the charterer in chartering the ship is an answer to an action for not loading a cargo; but that loss, delay, or deviation short of that gives an action for damages, but does not defeat the charter." This case nearly resembles a contract for the supply of goods which shall answer a certain description, and be fit for a specific purpose for which they were ordered. In Redhead v. The Midland Railway Company (L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 433; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 485), there was a distinction drawn between the two classes of carriers who convey goods by sea and by land. The shipper of goods has a right to expect a seaworthy ship, and may sue the shipowner if it is not, and if the obligation on the part of the shipowner to provide a ship reasonably fit for the voyage is absolute, a failure on his part to fulfil that obligation is enough to put an end to the liability of the charterer to load a cargo. It would be absurd to say that the charterer is to load a cargo on board an unseaworthy and unfit ship—for instance to put silk into a leaky ship—and therefore the charterer was not bound to reload; and, according to the learned judge's finding, he was totally absolved from the obligation of providing a cargo, and was entitled to recover damages for the breach of contract on the part of the shipowner:

Henry James, Q.C., Watkin Williams, and Cohen in support of the rule.—One of the questions for the court to decide is whether the shipowner was bound to provide a ship to carry such a cargo as was offered him. The ship was seaworthy, and fit to carry any ordinary cargo, but the wet sugar choked her pumps, and rendered her unseaworthy only so long as the wet sugar was on board. On the removal of the cargo, the ship was at once fit to take goods of any other quality on board. It cannot be said that the shipowner is to go to the expense of altering his ship for the purpose of carrying a particular cargo; for although the charter-party specifies that the charterer may load various cargoes of lawful merchandise, the intention must be taken to be such cargoes, as are suitable for the ship. The charterer must be satisfied that the ship which he chartered is fit for the purpose for which he employs her, and if he chartered a ship which is unsuitable for the cargo, that is not the shipowner's fault; and it would be hard indeed on the shipowner if he were to be called upon to adapt his ship to suit the nature of a cargo the character of which must naturally be more within the knowledge of the charterer than of the shipowner. The specification of a cargo as it appears in the charter-party refers only to a cargo of ordinary description, and not to an extraordinary cargo as this was. For instance, if the specification was for machinery, and no measurements were given, would the charterer be at liberty to offer, and would the shipowner be bound to accept, machinery of such a size that it would be impossible to get it into the hold without taking up the decks? The shipowner is bound to do what he can, I admit, to carry the cargo, but not to go to such extraordinary length as to alter the structure of the ship. As to the finding of the jury, that the captain did not use reasonable skill and care in the treatment of the cargo delivered to him, it is contended that the obligation is to bring reasonable skill and care to the case of an ordinary cargo; but he cannot be expected to have any special knowledge necessary to the management of an exceptional cargo. If the charterer could show that the ship could not be of any use whatever to him, he might repudiate the contract; but if he cannot show such to have been the case, the whole consideration has not failed, and his remedy is by cross-action for any damage he may have suffered: (Behn v. Burness, 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 178, 329; 3 B. & S. 752; 32 L. J. 204, Q. B.) Any other cargoes specified in the charter-party, except the one in question, could have been taken by the ship, and even this could have been carried with considerable delay. The cases lay it down that the whole purpose of the adventure must be rendered impossible to exonerate the charterer.

Even if the charterer would have been entitled in the first instance to refuse to load a cargo, on the ground that the ship was not fitted with sufficient pumps for a cargo of wet sugar, having loaded the sugar he had waived the condition precedent, and could not reject the ship, because the parties could not be placed in their former position.

BOVILL, C.J.—The verdict in both these actions was for the charterer, the defendant in the first action and the plaintiff in the second. A rule was obtained on behalf of the shipowner to enter a verdict for him in both actions on the findings of the jury or for a new trial, on the ground of misdirection, and that the verdict was against the evidence. After hearing the evidence given at the trial read over, I have come to the opinion that the findings of the jury were in accordance with the verdict. My brother Brett is not dissatisfied with the verdict; and, on the whole, it does not appear to me that there is any sufficient ground for disturbing the verdict on any of the questions that were left to the jury. With regard to the motion to enter the verdict, or for a new trial on the ground of misdirection, the matter depends upon the relative obligations of the shipowner and the charterer. The facts with reference to this question are not in dispute. The ship was good and sound enough for all ordinary purposes, and the cargo was a proper cargo for a ship that was suitable to carry it. The charter-party into which the parties entered was not quite in the ordinary form with regard to the fitness of the ship. The usual terms do not occur in the beginning; but the contract which is between the master of the one part on behalf of the owner, and agents of the charterer of the other part, is that the master, after having discharged his inward cargo, shall sail for Manilla for orders to load within there or at Yloilo, the following cargo of lawful merchandise, namely, a full and complete cargo of sugar in bags, hemp in compressed bales, and measurement goods. In that part of the charter nothing is said as to the nature of the sugar, but in the clause relating to the rate of freight it is provided that the rate shall be 4l. 2s. 6d. for dry sugar and 4l. 5s. for wet sugar. Towards the end of the charter is this engagement by the master "that the vessel before and when receiving cargo shall be a good risk for insurance, and he will when required, provide a survey report declaring her to be so; and during the voyage the master shall take all proper means to keep the vessel tight, staunch, and strong, well manned and provided, and in every way fitted and provided for the voyage." Under this charter the charterer was clearly at liberty to offer a cargo of wet sugar. He was clearly at liberty to load the ship at Yloilo. It appears to be well understood that the sugar, which at that port is wet sugar, is of such a description that there is a considerable drainage from its molasses and moisture. Under such a charter there is no doubt that the cargo offered must be a reasonable cargo of the description specified; but I am not aware of any authority to support the proposition that the charterer is bound to offer a cargo suitable to the particular ship in the state in which she is at the time of loading. The only limit with respect to the nature of the cargo which the charterer may ship appears to be that of reasonableness. Mr. James suggested, as an illustration of his contention, the offer of exceptionally large pieces of machinery or heavy guns under a charter which simply provided for a cargo of merchandise. The answer to the argument derived from that illustration appears to be that in such a case the jury would probably say that such a cargo was not a reasonable cargo to offer. That seems to me to be the only mode in which such a case can be disposed of. Another illustration may be taken. Suppose the charter provided for a cargo of cattle, could it be said that the charterer was bound to offer a cargo of cattle suitable to the ship in the state she was at the time? If the ship was not properly fitted to receive a cargo of heavy cattle, is the charterer to be bound to provide a cargo of light cattle? I think the ship must be fit to receive any reasonable cargo of the nature that the shipowner undertook to carry. The jury in the present case found that the sugar offered was a reasonable cargo to be offered. They have also found that the ship was not reasonably fit to carry a reasonable cargo of Yloilo sugar. There is a further finding that the captain, though willing, was unable to make the ship fit to carry the cargo within a reasonable time, or within such a time as not to frustrate the object of the venture. The reason of the unfitness of the ship arose from the nature of the sugar and the character of the pumps. If the cargo had remained on board, or had been reloaded, the pumps being wholly unequal to dealing with the accumulation of the drainage from the sugar, the safety of the vessel would have been endangered and the cargo wholly ruined and rendered unmerchantable. The jury having found that the vessel was not only unfit, but that she could not have been made fit in such time as not to frustrate the object of the adventure, the question arises, what is the obligation of the shipowner with reference to a ship chartered to carry a particular sort of goods? It seems to me that he is bound to furnish a vessel fit to carry the cargo that the charterer has undertaken to put on board. There are additional terms in this charter, viz., as to what is to be done during the voyage, and that the vessel is to be a good risk before and at the time of receiving the cargo. The jury found that the vessel at such time was unfit to receive the cargo. Is there any obligation, under such circumstances, on the charterer to load, or if, having been loaded, the cargo is obliged to be immediately discharged, as here, to reload? The question appears to me to answer itself. The charterer is not bound to load or reload unless the ship is fit to receive the cargo and to carry it. It is said there was an absence of authority as to the exact obligation of the shipowner in relation to these questions. This may arise from the absence of doubt as to the nature of such obligation. There seems to me, however, to be sufficient authority for the propositions for which I am now contending. Lord Ellenborough, in the case of Lyon v. Mells (5 East. 429), said, "In every contract for the carriage of goods between a person holding himself forth as the owner of a lighter or vessel ready to carry goods for hire, and the person putting goods on board, or employing his vessel or lighter for that purpose, it is a term of the contract on the part of the carrier or lighterman, implied by law, that his vessel is tight and fit for the purpose or employment for which he offers and holds it forth to the public." It is true that these observations apply chiefly to persons following a public employment, and are made on the footing that the nature of such employment will be a guide to what the contract must be between the parties. But in a late case before Lord Ellenborough, a similar question arose under a charter-party. That case is Havelock v. Geddes (10 East. 564); and there Lord Ellenborough says, "Had the plaintiff's neglect precluded the defendants from making any use of the vessel, it would have gone to the whole consideration, and might have been insisted as an entire bar." That was because then the consideration would have wholly failed. Here the jury found that what occurred did wholly frustrate the objects of the voyage, and so this case comes distinctly within the doctrine laid down in the passage I have cited. It was argued by Mr. Williams that this doctrine about frustrating the objects of the voyage was a new doctrine introduced by the case of Tarrabochia v. Hickie (1 H. & N. 183; 26 L. J. 26 Ex.) This is not really so, in my opinion. Several other cases, establishing the same principle, have been referred to in the argument, which are much older than Tarrabochia v. Hickie, and especially the case of Freeman v. Taylor (8 Bing. 124). The question there was one of deviation. Tindal, C.J. laid it down to the jury that if the deviation was so long and unreasonable as that in the ordinary course of mercantile business it would frustrate the whole object of the voyage, the contract was at an end. He left the case to the jury precisely as my brother Brett left the present case, and the court, after taking time to consider, upheld his ruling. The same doctrine may be traced back as far as the case of Constable v. Clobberie (Palm. 397), where the covenant was to sail with the first wind. It appears to me, therefore, in the present case, that the object of the voyage being frustrated the charterer was not bound to load a cargo. It is true that he did load a cargo in the first instance, but after it was so loaded it had to be removed from the vessel, because she was unfit to carry it. It appears to me that the same reasoning applies to the question whether he was bound to reload as applies to the question of his obligation to load. The question may be regarded from another point of view. When there are concurrent acts to be performed on each side, as for instance, where one is to receive cargo and the other to deliver it, the party who claims for a breach of the contract must have been ready and willing to do his part. The jury having found that the ship could not have been made fit within a reasonable time, or such a time as that the object of the voyage would not be frustrated, that finding appears to me to amount to a finding that the shipowner was not ready and willing to receive the cargo offered. For these reasons I think the verdict must stand, and the rule be discharged.

BYLES, J.—I am of opinion that in these cross actions the charterer is entitled to the judgment of the court, and to hold his verdicts. In other words, that the ship was to blame, and not the sugar. The charter-party provides in express terms that wet sugar may be shipped, but at a higher rate of freight than dry sugar. The evidence shows that the ship's pumps wore of such a size, diameter, and description that they would not and did not discharge the water mixed with the drainage of the wet sugar; the ship, therefore, was not, in respect of the pumps, reasonably fit to carry the goods, that is to say, the wet sugar she had contracted to carry. The charterer knew nothing of the existing pumps, neither their power or capacity. The shipowner or captain was bound to know, and did know. The charterer, perhaps, knew nothing of the disproportion of the thick drainage to the power of the pumps. The jury have found the negligence to be in the shipowner. My brother Brett's directions, which were in accordance with this view of the case, seem to me to be unassailable. The learned judge is not dissatisfied with the verdicts in these cases, therefore they must stand.

BRETT, J.—It seems to me that three questions arise in this case. First, whether the correct questions were left to the jury; secondly, if so, and they were properly answered, what is the effect of such answers on the rights of the parties? thirdly, whether they were properly answered. The answer to the first question seems to depend on what the rights and obligations of the parties are. It appears to me they must be decided by the written contract, the construction of which is for the court, without regard to any consideration as to the knowledge of either party, and with respect to the charterer of the ship and cargo. Such considerations are immaterial with respect to a written contract. The contract is a charter-party, by which the charterer is to have the option of loading a full and complete cargo of sugar in bags, hemp in compressed bale, ^{and} _{or} measurement goods. This stipulation, giving an option as to the nature of the cargo, is in favour of the charterer. Amongst the things which the charterer has the option of shipping is a cargo of wet sugar; the shipowner undertakes to carry such a cargo. In addition, the shipowner took on himself the obligation to provide a vessel that should be a good risk for insurance, and procure a survey report proving her to be so. It was urged that by virtue of that stipulation the shipowner was bound to provide a ship that was seaworthy when the cargo was on board or whilst loading. I should be sorry to rest my decision on that express undertaking. I think the question turns on another undertaking, not express, but implied. I admit that some of the questions that were put to the jury may not, in point of form, define with perfect strictness the obligations of the shipowner, and the rights of the charterer; but it appears to me that, taking all the questions together, in substance the case was correctly presented to the jury. It is found that the cargo offered was a reasonable cargo; and therefore the answers to questions six and seven become in the event equivalent to one another. What then is the effect of these findings, considered with regard to the reciprocal duties arising between the charterer and shipowner from the mere fact of their having entered into an ordinary charter-party? It seems to me that the obligation of the shipowner is to supply a ship that is seaworthy in relation to the cargo which he has undertaken to carry. I do not think, however, that this proposition completely expresses his liability, though the proposition I am about to state with regard to such liability in many cases may amount to the same thing only in effect. I think the obligation of the shipowner is to supply a ship reasonably fit to carry the cargo stipulated for him in the charter-party. This appears to be the measure of his liability, as stated in the case of Lyon v. Mells (5 East, 427), and by Lord Wensleydale in the case of Gibson v. Small (4 H. L. Cas. 353), and again by Lord Ellenborough in Havelock v. Geddes (10 East, 536). The same rule is adopted in the edition of Abbott on Shipping, by Shee, J., and by my brother Blackburn in the case of Redhead v. The Midland Railway-Company (16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 485; L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 412), and affirmed on appeal (20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 628; L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 379). It is argued that the charterer is bound to ship a cargo that is suitable for the particular ship. That would be to destroy the option that is expressly reserved by the charter-party to him. With all the assistance rendered to me by counsel, I can find no more decisive mode of stating the true proposition with regard to the duties of charterer and shipowner than that the one must offer a reasonable cargo of the kind specified in the charter, and the other must provide a ship reasonably fit to carry such a reasonable cargo. In truth, it often happens in jurisprudence that the law can lay down only such general rules, leaving the application of them to the particular facts to be determined by the findings of the jury. If such be the rights and duties of the parties, what is the effect as to these two actions? With respect to the action by the charterer, he sues for damages for not providing a ship according to the charter. For the purposes of that action, it is sufficient to hold that by reason of the unfitness of the ship there was a breach of contract, and all damages necessarily occasioned by such breach of contract ex. gr. damage to the sugar, and expenses are recoverable. With regard to the action for not loading or not reloading, the further question arises whether under the circumstances the charterer had a right to refuse to load or to reload. In this action we must decide whether there was not only a breach of contract, but such a breach of contract as entitled the charterer to refuse to load or to reload. The question in such cases is said to be whether the warranty was a condition. I apprehend that a stipulation amounting to a condition is necessarily also a warranty, and there may be circumstances preventing its being treated as a condition, and then it is only available as a warranty; as, for instance, when the stipulation is that the ship shall be ready to load within a fixed time, or a reasonable time, and the cargo is loaded and carried. Though before loading this might be a condition precedent, inasmuch as the charterer has loaded and derived benefit from the charter, he cannot rely on it as a condition, but must treat it as a warranty. The question, therefore, here is: Whether the unfitness of the ship may be treated as a breach of a condition precedent; that is to say, whether it amounted to a breach of contract entitling the charterer to refuse to load or to reload. I think the questions as to loading and reloading are the same, for in my opinion the effect of the agreement between the parties was that the matter should be treated as if the charterer had a cargo ready to load and refused to load it. Now, assuming that to be so, and the findings to be correct, the jury have found that the ship was not reasonably fit to carry the cargo, and that she was so unfit as to be unseaworthy with the cargo on board. But it is not necessary to decide whether the charterer would be entitled on account of such unfitness and unseaworthiness to reject the ship at once, for the jury have gone further, and found that not only was the ship unfit and unseaworthy, but also that she could not be made reasonably fit and seaworthy, not only within a reasonable time, but within such a time as would not entirely frustrate the whole adventure. It seems to me that the conclusion to be drawn from all the cases analogous to this is, that if the breach of contract by the shipowner be such as to justify the charterer in not putting the cargo on board at the moment of the breach, and it cannot be remedied within such a time as not to frustrate the object of the voyage, this absolves the charterer altogether. It would be a gross injustice if it were otherwise. The charterer must be taken to have entered into the contract with the usual mercantile objects of such a contract, which objects must be taken to be known also to the shipowner, and it cannot be that the shipowner is to hold the charterer to his bargain if these objects are frustrated. If in such a case as the present he were bound to put the cargo on board in the first instance, he clearly was not bound to reload after what occurred. The only remaining question is whether the findings of the jury were against the evidence; and with regard to this question, I cannot say that after the case was fully gone into, there appeared to me to be much difficulty with regard to the facts. It seems to me that the verdicts ought not to be disturbed, and for these reasons the rule must be discharged.

THARSIS SULPHUR COMPANY v. LOFTUS.

Arbitration—Average adjuster—Liability for want of care.

Declaration that the plaintiffs were owners and consignees of cargo on board a vessel, and that it became necessary to adjust certain average and other losses, and thereupon the master of the vessel, on behalf of the owners and of the plaintiffs, retained and employed the defendant as an average adjuster to investigate vouchers and accounts and settle and adjust an average statement; that the defendant accepted and entered upon the retainer and employment, and thereupon it became his duty to take due and proper care and use proper skill and diligence, &c. Yet the defendant did not take due and proper care, but conducted himself so carelessly that the statement made up by him was erroneous, whereby, &c.

Plea, that before the making of the said average statement by the defendant, it was agreed between the plaintiffs and the shipowners that it should be referred to the defendant to ascertain and adjust the amount to be paid by the plaintiffs in respect of such losses, and the plaintiffs agreed to abide by his decision, and the defendant, acting in good faith, made the said erroneous statement.

Demurrer.

Held, that the plea was good, for the defendant came within the protection afforded by the law relating to arbitrators and was not liable for negligence.

DECLARATION in the following terms:—

“Whereas Henry M. Loftus was summoned to answer the Tharsis Sulphur and Copper Company, Limited, in the Court of Passage of the Borough of Liverpool, in the County of Lancaster, by virtue of a writ of summons duly issued on the first day of September in the year of our Lord 1871 out of the last mentioned Court, and by a writ of certiorari duly issued on the third day of October in the year of our Lord 1871 out of the Court of Common Pleas at Lancaster, Liverpool District, and directed to the judge of the said Court of Passage, the said action with all things touching the same were sent into the said Court of Common Pleas at Lancaster. And hereupon the said Tharsis Sulphur and Copper Company, Limited, by William Grandy Bateson, their attorney, declare against the said Henry M. Loftus, for that before and at the time of the retainer and employment of the defendant, and of his committing the grievances hereinafter mentioned, the defendant carried on and exercised the business of an average adjuster; that before the said retainer and employment, and before the committing of the said grievances, a vessel called the Emma, having on board a large cargo of copper ore of which the plaintiffs were the consignees and owners, whilst on her voyage from Huelva to Liverpool, met with tempestuous weather and sustained injuries, and her said cargo became damaged, and she was thereby compelled to put into a port of distress for repairs and other necessary purposes, and incurred certain general average and other losses, charges, and disbursements, which said losses, charges, and disbursements, upon the arrival of the said vessel at Liverpool aforesaid, it became and was necessary to adjust and apportion in manner by usage and custom used and approved, and thereupon the master of the said vessel on her arrival at Liverpool aforesaid, as well for and on behalf of the owners of the said vessel as for and on behalf of the plaintiffs as such consignees and owners of the said cargo as aforesaid, at the request of the defendant, and for reward to him in that behalf, retained and employed the defendant as such average adjuster as aforesaid to investigate and examine the vouchers and accounts of the said losses, charges, and disbursements, and to settle, adjust, make up, and prepare a statement showing the proportion of the said losses, charges, and disbursements to be contributed and borne by the said ship her freight and cargo respectively, according to the usage and custom of Lloyd's, and the defendant then accepted and entered upon such retainer and employment, and thereupon it became and was the duty of the defendant, as such average adjuster as aforesaid under the said retainer and employment, to take due and proper care, and to use and employ proper skill and diligence in and about the investigation and examination of the vouchers and accounts of the said losses, charges, and disbursements, and in and about settling, adjusting, making, and preparing a statement showing the proportions of the said losses, charges, and disbursements to be contributed and borne by the said ship, freight, and cargo respectively, according to the said usage and custom. Yet the defendant, not regarding his duty in that behalf, would not take due and proper care, and would not use and employ due and proper skill and diligence in and about the investigation and examination of the said vouchers and accounts, and in and about settling, adjusting, making, and preparing the said statement, and conducted himself so carelessly, negligently, and unskilfully in that behalf that by and through the carelessness, negligence, and unskilfulness of the defendant in that behalf, the said statement so settled, adjusted, made up, and prepared by him was incorrect, erroneous, and imperfect, and was incorrect, erroneous, and imperfect in this, that the proportion of the said losses, charges, and disbursements to be contributed and borne by the said cargo of the plaintiffs was stated, adjusted, and settled at a much larger amount than the same ought to have been stated, adjusted, and settled at, according to the said usage and custom; and in this, that certain special charges were stated, adjusted, and settled as payable by the said cargo of the plaintiffs which were not so payable according to the said usage and custom, whereby and by reason of the premises the plaintiffs confiding in the defendant's performance of his said duty, and not knowing of the breach of the same as aforesaid, and believing that the said statement so settled, adjusted, made up, and prepared, was accurate and correct, and properly made up, adjusted, and prepared according to the said usage and custom, and that the proportion of the said losses, charges, and disbursements in and by the said statement stated, adjusted, and fixed as payable by the said cargo of the plaintiffs was the correct and proper portion payable by the said cargo, and that the said other charges were properly payable by the said plaintiffs' cargo according to the said usage and custom, paid to the owners of the said vessel the said incorrect and excessive proportion of the said losses, charges, and disbursements stated, adjusted, and settled by the defendant in the said statement and the said special charges. And by reason of the premises the plaintiffs have lost and been deprived of the moneys so paid by them over and above what they would otherwise have paid."

Fourth Plea: And for a fourth plea the defendant says that before the making of the said statement by the defendant, an agreement in writing was made between Edward James Brown, master of the said vessel, of the one part, and a certain firm under the style of Messieurs Tennants and Company, as and being the agents of the plaintiffs in that behalf, of the other part, which said agreement was in the words and figures following, namely:—

This agreement made the twenty-eighth day of April, 1871, between Edward James Brown, master and owner of the English schooner or vessel, the Emma, of the first part and Messieurs Tennants and Company (which includes all members of that firm), of 20, Red Cross Street, Liverpool, in the County of Lancaster, merchants, being the owners or consignees of cargo by the said vessel, of the second part. Whereas the said vessel, the Emma, laden with a cargo of copper ore, sailed from Huelva on the nineteenth day of December, 1870, on a voyage for Liverpool, and on such voyage she encountered a series of heavy storms and seas, and was obliged to put back to Cadiz, and thereby and in consequence thereof considerable damage or loss has been occasioned or sustained to the cargo, and various expenses and disbursements have been incurred, and it will be necessary to have a general average or contribution in respect thereof, to which the said parties hereto of the second part are liable to contribute. Now these presents witness that in consideration of the engagements and agreements of the said parties hereto of the second part, the said Edward James Brown doth hereby engage and agree with the said parties hereto of the second part that he, the said Edward James Brown, will deliver or cause to be delivered at reasonable request and time the said cargo laden on board the said vessel unto the said parties hereto of the second part, their factors, agents, and assigns, and permit them to receive and take possession and remove the same according to their rights, possession, and ownership in respect thereof, on their paying freight and other charges, and performing conditions as per bill of lading, charter-party, or agreement, in consideration whereof the said parties hereto of the second part do hereby for themselves jointly engage and agree with the said Edward James Brown to pay to the said Edward James Brown or his agents not only the freight and charges of the said goods, but also the proper proportion of the general average loss, general contribution, charges, and expenses in respect of the said cargo, and all legal charges and other contribution, loss, and expenses to which they are or shall be liable, or for or on assurances of which in the judgment of the parties hereinafter named contributions ought to be made by the said parties hereto of the second part, or which the cargo ought to bear under the aforesaid circumstances. And for the better computing as well the question of contribution as the amount which the said parties hereto of the second part will have to pay in respect thereof, and that the same may be more readily ascertained, the said parties hereto of the second part do hereby further agree that the same shall be ascertained and adjusted by Mr. Henry M. Loftus, of Liverpool, average adjuster (meaning the defendant), whose decision they, the said parties of the second part, do hereby agree to abide by and perform, the average to be adjusted in accordance with the usage and custom at Lloyd's. As witness the hands of the parties hereto of the second part the day and year first above written.

TENNANTS & Co.,

Agents for the Tharsis Sulphur and Copper Co.
Witness the signing:

Thomas Barrett, 20, Red Cross Street, Liverpool.

And the defendant says that his retainer and employment to investigate and examine the said vouchers, and to settle, adjust, make up, and prepare the said statement in the declaration mentioned, was under and by virtue of the said agreement and not otherwise, and the defendant, acting in good faith, and under such retainer and employment as last aforesaid, took upon himself the burthen of the said inquiry, and investigated and examined the said vouchers, and made the said erroneous statement.

Demurrer to the above plea, and joinder.

The following were the plaintiffs' points for argument: First, that under the defendant's retainer and employment as an average adjuster, the defendant is not relieved from liability for making up an erroneous statement merely by reason of his having acted in good faith; secondly, that the defendant's fourth plea, admitting as it does a breach of duty on the part of the defendant in this, that the defendant conducted himself carelessly, negligently, and unskilfully in the performance of his duty arising from his retainer and employment as an average adjuster, and not showing any excuse for such a breach of duty in fact, is bad in law; thirdly, that the defendant, as an average adjuster, is not, like an arbitrator irresponsible in damages for negligence or carelessness in the discharge of his duties; fourthly, that the defendant must be taken to have held himself out to the plaintiffs as possessed of the skill requisite for the performance of his duties as an average adjuster, and there was an implied undertaking on his part arising from his retainer and employment, as in the case of any other person doing work for reward, that he would perform his duties with skill and care; fifthly, the defendant's fourth plea does not show that there is anything in the relation between the plaintiffs and the defendant created by the said retainer and employment to take the case out of the rule which makes a party to a contract, which creates a duty, liable for the negligent performance of such duty.

C. P.]

THARSIS SULPHUR COMPANY v. LOFTUS.

The defendant's points for argument were: First, that the matters mentioned in the plea show that the defendant acted as an arbitrator in the investigation and adjustment mentioned in the declaration; secondly, that the defendant, acting under the agreement set out in the plea, was not liable in damages for any error made in good faith and without fraud.

Myburgh for the plaintiffs.—The defendant was not acting as an arbitrator or quasi arbitrator, and is therefore not within the protection afforded by the law to persons in that capacity. The ground of the decision in Pappa v. Rose (25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 466, and 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 348 in error; L. Rep. 7 C. P. 32, and 525 in error) was that the defendant was within that protection. But the facts here are different. It does not appear upon the face of the plea that there were any disputes or differences between the parties at the time when the defendant was called in. His position was more like that of a valuer or appraiser.

Leeds v. Burrows, 12 East, 1;

Collins v. Collins, 26 Beav. 306;

Bos v. Helsham, 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 481; L. Rep. 2 Ex. 78 (judgment of Kelly, C.B.)

In Pappa v. Rose there was a dispute going on at the time. Further it does not appear clearly on the face of the plea that the shipowner agreed to be bound by the defendant's decision. Lastly, it would be against public policy that persons carrying on a public employment, such as that of an average-broker, should be exempt from liability. In Pappa v. Rose the broker was not acting in the usual course of his employment. It is difficult to see any reason why a defendant's liability should be less because he is employed by two persons, and they agree with one another to accept his decision.

Russell on Arbitration, 3rd. edit. p. 42.

And even an arbitrator is liable for misconduct.

Gully for the defendant. The word "misconduct" used by Blackburn, J. in the Court of Exchequer Chamber in the case of Pappa v. Rose must be taken to be positive misconduct, and not mere want of care. The case of Re Hall and Hinds (2 M. & G. 847) incidentally shows that an action will not lie against an arbitrator for misconduct, though the award may be set aside. He also cited:

Batterbury v. Vyse, 2 Hurls. & C. 42;

Clarke v. Watson, 11 L. T. Rep. N. S. 679; 18 C. B. N. S. 278.

BOVILL, C.J.—Upon the principal question which has been argued before us, I am of opinion that the present case is wholly undistinguishable from Pappa v. Rose. It was agreed between the plaintiffs and the shipowners that the amount to be paid by the former for freight, general average, and other charges, should be referred to a particular person, the defendant, to settle. It must be taken that the defendant accepted and entered upon the employment, and acted in good faith, and that being so it is clear that he is not responsible for want of skill. A distinction may, however, be drawn between want of skill and want of care or negligence. If the arguments and judgments in Pappa v. Rose, both in this court and in the Exchequer Chamber, be studied, it will be seen that the question of want of care or negligence was not raised. It is material to notice this, because the distinction is not apparent in the head-notes of the case as reported in the Law Reports (a). Several observations were thrown out by the judges of the Court of Exchequer Chamber as to the defendant's liability if there had been misconduct on his part, but no opinion was expressed. There is, however, no authority for holding that persons called upon to act as arbitrators, to settle disputes, or adjust accounts, are liable for negligence. In Watson on Arbitration and Awards 3rd edit. p. 112, there is the following passage:—"It has been said that an arbitrator is liable to an action if he misconduct himself; but I cannot find any case in which such an action has ever been brought. In two cases at different times, it was decreed in equity that an arbitrator should pay costs where he had declared he would make one party pay the costs." And a few lines farther on "Also if combination be proved against an arbitrator, a court of equity will decree him to pay costs. Indeed, if a party be guilty of misconduct in making his award, he is liable to be made a defendant to a suit in equity, which, generally speaking, would be punishment enough for any ordinary delinquency. The court, however, will always be disposed to view an arbitrator's conduct in the most favourable light; and, unless a clear case of corruption and partiality be made out against him, they will order his name to be struck out of a bill to which he has been made defendant." In the case there referred to in 3 Atk. p. 644, Lord Hardwicke said "Unless there is corruption or partiality in an arbitrator, the party cannot set aside his award; and if it should be allowed to make arbitrators defendants, and give them all this trouble to set forth the particular reasons upon which they founded their award, it would introduce very great inconvenience, and be a discouragement to any person to undertake a reference; if there was any palpable mistake made by an arbitrator, or miscalculation in an account that had been laid before him, the party aggrieved might bring his bill against the party in whose favour the award is made, to have it rectified, and not against the arbitrator." As far as my experience reaches, I have never known such an action brought against an arbitrator. The case of a person acting as arbitrator is one which occurs from day to day, yet though there must be every day disputes between parties and arbitrators, we never hear of their being advised to attempt such an action. Speculative actions for negligence are constantly brought, but there is no authority for such an action as this against an arbitrator. Therefore both from authority and according to the principle of Pappa v. Rose, I think it would be very inconvenient to maintain such an action against an arbitrator for negligence, and I am not disposed to lay down a rule that such an action can be maintained. It would be most inconvenient that such persons should be liable to be molested by actions. I am therefore of opinion that the defendant is entitled to our judgment.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. It would be extremely dangerous to say that a party in the position of an arbitrator is to be liable for negligence, and if such were the doctrine it would be extremely difficult to say what amounted to negligence. The Court of Exchequer Chamber has affirmed the principle that such a person is not bound to bring a particular degree of skill to the performance of his duty, and the most frequent ground of negligence is the not bringing due skill. Here the ground alleged is that the defendant conducted himself carelessly, negligently, and unskillfully. It seems clear that he was in the position of an arbitrator, inasmuch as he was the person by whose opinion two persons having differences agreed to be bound. And persons so agreeing must be bound by their agreement for better or for worse, and if the person appointed act honestly and without corruption, they must take him as he is. In the present case the pleadings show that the defendant was in the position of an arbitrator, and discharged his duty in good faith, although erroneously. For this reason I am of opinion that the plea is good.

BRETT, J.—The pleadings show an agreement between the parties thereto to accept the decision of the defendant on the particular points submitted to him, if he would give it, and that he accepted the position offered, and gave his decision. The duty alleged by the declaration is that the defendant would “take due and proper care, and use and employ proper skill and diligence” in and about the business. The question seems to be whether there is such a duty so binding upon the defendant that for the breach of it he is liable to an action. It is urged that it is so, first, because he has undertaken the office of an arbitrator; secondly, because, though not an arbitrator, he is a person who has undertaken to give a decision on the questions submitted to him; and thirdly, because he holds himself out as an average adjuster, and therefore as a person having skill, and bound to exercise due care. As to the first point, a distinction has been suggested between want of skill and want of care. But the allegation of want of care might have been made in a thousand cases, and yet there is no case in the books of an action brought against an arbitrator on such a ground. On the second point, Pappa v. Rose shows that although the defendant, who had undertaken to give a decision between two parties, did not come strictly within the definition of an arbitrator, so as to exercise judicial functions, yet that such a person is not liable for want of skill. And the reasoning in that case goes further and points to non-liability for the want of care. Thirdly, as to his liability, even although he was an arbitrator, because he held himself out as a professional average adjuster, and therefore as a person having skill and exercising care, I apprehend that the resolution of the law not to inquire into the conduct of an arbitrator is as applicable to a professional arbitrator as to any one else, and that the fact of his being in a particular business does not affect his liability. I am of opinion therefore that no such duty as alleged was imposed upon the defendant, and therefore that his neglect did not make him liable.

DENMAN, J.—I am of the same opinion. The only reason why Pappa v. Rose is not expressly in point is that there the liability sought to be attached was for want of skill. In this case the further point arises of want of care, and therefore we are perhaps extending the doctrine a little further than in Pappa v. Rose. The reasoning however, in that case went beyond what was necessary for the decision, and is applicable in the case now before us.

STEPHENS v. THE AUSTRALASIAN INSURANCE COMPANY.

Open policy—Clean bill of lading given by mistake—Insurable interest—Alteration in declaration after loss known.

An agent acting in a foreign port for shipowners, gave by mistake a clean bill of lading for certain cotton shipped on deck, the cotton having been directed to be received and having been received to be shipped on deck at the shipper's risk. Open policies had been effected by the plaintiff for the shipowners, and declarations made on them by the plaintiff; but the cotton in question had not been declared, as it was supposed to be carried at shipper's risk. The vessel encountered heavy weather, and the cotton was jettisoned. After notice of the loss the plaintiff altered the declarations by striking out certain amounts on cotton shipped subsequently to the cotton in question, and substituting the cotton in question according to the ordinary usage in such a case:

Held, first, that the shipowners had an insurable interest, the bill of lading signed by their agent being equivalent to a contract made by themselves, and making them liable for a loss of the goods by jettison, the result of their being carried on deck.

Held, also, that a usage having been proved which the court did not consider unreasonable, such a declaration might be altered even after the loss was known, and that in the present case the alterations were legally made.

SPECIAL CASE.

1. The plaintiff in this action is an insurance broker, who carries on business in Lime-street-square, London, under the firm of Thomas Stephens and Co. The defendants are an insurance company, having their head office in Australia, and a branch office for marine insurance in Old Broad-street, London.

2. The questions which this action has been brought to settle have arisen in consequence of the loss by jettison of a number of bales of cotton shipped per steamer Behera from Alexandria, in Egypt, to Liverpool, which cotton, the plaintiff alleges, was insured under two floating policies, dated respectively the 29th March 1864 and the 12th Jan. 1865, or under one or other of them.

3. In March 1864, Messrs. Chapple and Co. were the owners of a line of steamers plying between Alexandria and other ports in the Levant and Liverpool. They carry on business at Liverpool under the firm of Chapple, Dutton, and Co., and in London under the firm of Frederick Chapple and Co. They had an agent in Alexandria (Mr. Charles Grace), who conducted all their business there. The plaintiff was their insurance broker in London.

4. During the American war, Messrs. Chapple and Co. were extensively engaged in carrying cotton from the Levant to Liverpool.

5. During that time it usually happened when a vessel bound upon the voyage referred to was laden with cotton, that part of the cargo was carried on deck.

C. P.]

6. When cargo is loaded on deck it is shipped either by the request and at the risk of the merchant who prefers shipping on deck on account of the saving on freight, which is then charged at a low rate, or for the convenience and at the risk of the shipowner, who being desirous of receiving all the freight he can, puts on deck cotton which he has contracted to carry below. When cotton is shipped on deck at the merchant's request, a bill of lading stating that it is so shipped, and is at the merchant's risk, should, according to the usual practice, be made out. When cotton is shipped on deck by the shipowner for his convenience, a clean bill of lading should be given. When shipowners carry deck loads for their own convenience, they often protect themselves from all risk of loss by jettison, by keeping on foot an open policy of insurance especially effected to cover the risk. In case such policy is effected, the course of business is for the agent of the shipowner as soon as he ascertains that a deck load has been shipped at the risk of his principal, to inform such principal of the fact, and he then by his broker declares the value of the deck cargo upon the policy of insurance.

7. According to the usage of the insurance business when a policy is effected "on goods by ship or ships to be thereafter declared," the policy attaches to the goods as soon as, and in the order in which they are shipped, and directly the assured knows of the shipment of the goods, he is bound to declare them to the underwriter on the policy, and to declare them in the order in which they are shipped. He is not entitled to declare some of the risks and remain his own insurer as to others. In case, by oversight or otherwise, the goods are declared on the policy in an order different from that in which they were shipped, the assured is bound to rectify the declarations, and make them correspond with the order of shipment. The underwriter would require to see the bills of lading, and insist on the declarations being made to follow the sequence of the bills of lading. The declarations are often thus rectified, and sometimes even after loss. The witness by whom this usage was proved stated that he was speaking of the ordinary case of policies opened by shippers "on goods by ship or ships to be thereafter declared;" that he had known no instance in which the application of the usage had been enforced in the particular case of a policy relating to goods deck-borne at the shipowner's risk, but that he had known no question raised as to whether the usage applied in such a case. Such policies would not differ in form from the ordinary policies opened by shippers.

8. On the 29th March 1864, Messrs Chapple and Co., through the plaintiff, their broker, effected policies to the amount of 25,000*l.*, on cotton on deck, per steamer or steamers from Asia Minor and Syria to Liverpool. The 25,000*l.* was distributed amongst several insurance companies, the defendants insuring to the extent of 3000*l.*, as appears by the policy entered into by them, which bears date the 29th March 1864. It will be seen that this policy, as it originally stood, only applied to shipments from Asia Minor and Syria to Liverpool. The reason of this was that the season for shipping from Alexandria does not commence until late in September or early in October, and it was thought when the policy was taken out it would be exhausted by declarations of shipments from the former places before September.

9. In Aug. 1864, however, before any declarations had been made on this policy, it appeared to Messrs. Chapple and Co. to be desirable to make the policy extend to shipments from Smyrna and Alexandria, as well as to the rest of the Levant. They accordingly communicated through the plaintiff, their broker, with the defendants and other insurers, and an arrangement for making the necessary alteration was come to. The agreement for the extension of the policy is endorsed thereon, and the terms upon which it was made will be gathered from the endorsement.

10. It will be observed that the endorsement states that it was agreed to annul the warranty of 1st Aug. This agreement was come to by the parties whilst they were under the idea that the policy contained the usual warranty, that the goods should be shipped before the 1st Aug. It does not however contain such a clause, and therefore the part of the endorsement just referred to is not applicable to the facts.

11. After the policy had been extended as above mentioned Messrs. Chapple and Co. began to take shipments on deck at their risk from Alexandria, and these shipments were from time to time declared on the policy. The declarations down to the 10th Dec. 1864 are as follows:

29th Oct. £3400, on 68 bales valued thereat, per Lybia steamer.

29th Nov. £7000, on 102 bales valued thereat, per Ayah steamer.

10th Dec. £2500, on 44 bales valued thereat, per Ocean King steamer.

12. In the month of Dec. 1864 the Behera steamship was loading at Alexandria for Liverpool.

13. Amongst the cargo a quantity of cotton was put on board, some in the hold, some on deck. It is necessary to draw attention to two shipments of cotton, viz., twenty bales consigned to Messrs. Duckworth and Rathbone, of Liverpool, and 102 shipped by Messrs. Choremi, Mellor, and Co., merchants, carrying on business at Alexandria and Liverpool.

14. With respect to the twenty bales belonging to Duckworth and Rathbone these were contracted to be placed below, but were shipped on deck for the convenience of the shipowners.

15. Clean bills of lading were given in respect of this cotton, and Mr. Grace, the agent for Messrs. Chapple and Co., at Alexandria, forthwith sent instructions to have this risk declared on the open policy.

16. This was done by endorsement on the policy of the 29th March 1864. The endorsement is as follows:

31st Dec. £1200 on twenty bales valued thereat, per Behera steamer.

17. As to the 102 bales shipped by Messrs. Choremi, Mellor and Co. Before this cotton was put on board the owners engaged with Mr. Celi, the clerk in Mr. Grace's office, for the shipment of ninety bales of cotton by the Behera as deck cargo, to be carried at the shipper's risk; the terms of this engagement were entered in a book kept by Grace for the purpose, and called an engagement book. This having been done, Mr. Celi, whose duty it was to attend to the matter, handed to the clerk of Messrs. Choremi, Mellor and Co. (in the usual course of business), a memorandum or shipping note, of which the following is a copy :

To the S. S. Behera, Captain Childs.

Please receive on board from Messrs. Choremi, Mellor and Co., for Liverpool, the undersigned goods.

No. and Marks.

Description.

On deck at shippers' risk. About ninety bales of cotton. Alexandria, 20th Dec., 1864. G. CELI, P. Agent.

18. This note mentions the number of bales as about ninety. The explanation is that after the engagement for ninety had been made out, Messrs. Choremi and Mellor mentioned to Mr. Celi that they would probably have a few more than the ninety bales to ship on the same terms, and accordingly the word "about" was introduced into the shipping note in pencil. As will be seen they really shipped 102 bales. The shipping note first referred to was, according to the usual practice, handed by Messrs. Choremi, Mellor, and Co., to their lighterman, who took it, together with the goods, to the ship, delivering the note up when the goods were on board. Upon delivering up the note the lighterman obtained a receipt from the mate for the quantity put on board, viz., 102 bales.

19. The receipt given on this occasion was by mistake of the mate a clean receipt, that is, it did not mention that the goods were to be shipped on deck at shippers' risk. The following is a copy of this receipt :

Alexandria, 20 Dec., 1864.

HENRY ARCHER, Chief Officer.

20. It was the duty of the mate to give a receipt for the goods corresponding with the note or order, and he had no authority to deviate from the order.

21. The 102 bales of cotton was stowed on deck, and the Behera, being so loaded, left Alexandria for Liverpool on the 29th Dec. 1864.

22. After she had sailed on the voyage, a bill of lading for the 102 bales in question was prepared by the shippers, and presented by them to Mr. Grace for signature; such bill of lading did not contain the words purporting that the cotton was carried on deck at shipper's risk, as it ought to have done according to the arrangement before mentioned. Except as aforesaid no agreement was made by Mr. Grace in reference to the carriage of these goods.

23. The practice of Mr. Grace when bills of lading are handed to him is to refer to the engagement book before mentioned, and see that the bill of lading corresponds with the terms agreed on; but in the present instance, owing to press of business, it being post day, he neglected to do so.

24. During the voyage the Behera encountered very heavy weather, so much so that it became necessary on Sunday, the 15th Jan., whilst the vessel was off the coast of France, to throw overboard the whole of the cotton shipped on deck, with the exception of eleven bales. The cargo thus jettisoned comprised the twenty bales consigned to Messrs. Duckworth and Rathbone, and also 100 out of the 102 bales shipped by Messrs. Choremi, Mellor, and Co.

25. As Messrs. Chapple and Co.'s agent at Alexandria, supposed that the arrangement with the shippers was that the 102 bales were to be shipped on deck at shippers' risk no advice of the risk was sent to them at the time of the shipment, and consequently this risk was not declared upon the policy of the 29th March 1864 at that time.

26. On the 9th Jan 1865, Messrs. Chapple and Co., through the plaintiff, their broker, declared 7000*l.* on 115 bales per Nyanza. The endorsement is as follows: "9th Jan. 7000*l.* on 115 bales valued thereat per Nyanza steamer." After this declaration 3900*l.* remained to be declared on the policy of 29th March 1864.

27. On the 12th Jan. 1865, Messrs Chapple and Co., in anticipation of further deck shipments at their risk, effected a further open policy for 25,000*l.*

28. This 25,000*l.* was also distributed amongst several insurers, the defendants' company taking the risk to the extent of 2500*l.* as appears by the policy entered into by them, which bears date the 12th Jan. 1865, and is annexed to this case.

29. On the 16th Jan. 1815, Messrs. Chapple and Co., by their broker, declared on the two open policies 5500*l.* on eighty-one bales by the Nyanza, and 10,300*l.* on 156 bales by the St. Lawrence. These declarations were distributed between the two policies, viz., on policy of 29th March 1864, as follows :

16th Jan. 3900*l.* on eighty-one bales valued at 5500*l.*, per Nyanza steamer, and on policy of 12th Jan. 1865.

16th Jan. 10,300*l.* on 156 bales valued thereat, per St. Lawrence steamer.

30. The loss of the Behera deck load became known to Messrs. Chapple and Co. on the 18th Jan 1865, and not before.

31. The vessel arrived in Liverpool on the 19th Jan. and on the 23rd of that month Messrs. Mellor and Co., as the owners of the clean bill of lading, claimed payment of the value of the 102 bales.

32. This was the first suggestion that Messrs. Chapple and Co. received of the cotton being at their risk.

33. At the time they received this claim they were not aware that the shipment was intended to be made at the risk of the shipper, but they assumed that their agent in Alexandria had, through some oversight, omitted to advise them of the risk.

34. Upon receiving the information just referred to, Messrs. Chapple and Co. communicated with the plaintiff, their broker, and he, upon the receipt of their letter, deemed it advisable to alter or rearrange the declarations upon the two policies, so that all the shipments might appear in the order in which they would have stood had the plaintiff received instructions to declare the 102 bales shipped by Messrs. Choremi, Mellor, and Co. at the same time as he received instructions with reference to the twenty bales consigned to Duckworth and Rathbone.

35. This he did by striking out of the declarations on the first policy the two last of the 9th and 16th Jan. 7000*l.*, and 3900*l.*, which left 10,900*l.* to be declared on that policy. This sum the plaintiff made up by inserting 6000*l.* on the 102 bales per Behera, as of the 9th Jan., and 4900*l.* only of the 7000*l.* per Nyanza. These alterations in the first policy rendered it necessary to make alterations to correspond on the second policy, which the plaintiff effected as follows: The 1600*l.* balance of 5500*l.* on eighty-one bales per Nyanza, 3900*l.* of which had been originally declared on the first policy, and the 10,300*l.* on 156 bales per St.

Lawrence, were struck out, and the balance of 115 bales per Nyanza, 2100*l.* inserted; and this was followed by the whole of 5500*l.* on eighty-one bales by the same vessel, and the 10,300*l.* on 156 bales per St. Lawrence.

These alterations will be clearly understood upon an inspection of the declarations upon the two policies.

36. After the above arrangement of the declarations, 7100*l.* remained to be declared on the policy of Jan. 1865.

37. On the 27th Jan., plaintiff declared 2400*l.* on thirty-six bales per Lybia, following 10,300*l.* per St. Lawrence. After this was done, 4700*l.* only remained to be declared on this policy. Subsequently the plaintiff considered it advisable again to alter the declarations, and insert them in the order in which the information was received that the goods were at the ship's risk. He accordingly again adjusted the declaration, and put them in the form in which they now stand.

38. Messrs. Chapple and Co., when they first received the claim of Messrs. Mellor, were disposed to allow it, as at that time they were in ignorance of the fact that the original engagement note had on it the words, "on deck at shippers' risk," but having ascertained the real facts of the case, they declined to pay the claim on the ground that by the original arrangement the cotton in question was to be taken on deck at Messrs. Mellor's risk.

39. An action was then brought by Messrs. Mellor and Co. against Messrs. Chapple to recover damages for the loss of the shipment of cotton. This action was tried at the Liverpool Summer Assizes 1865, when evidence was given on behalf of the then plaintiff that the original agreement between the firm at Alexandria and the above-named Mr. Celi was that the cotton should be shipped on deck at the shippers' risk, and carried at the deck rate of 1*d.* per lb., that afterwards, and before the shipment of the cotton, in consequence of instructions received by them from Liverpool, it was arranged with Mr. Celi that the cotton should be shipped under deck, and not on deck as originally intended, and evidence was given that Mr. Celi thereupon stated that a clean bill of lading would be made out at the under-deck rate, and that a clean receipt was accordingly given, and a clean bill of lading was made out at the under-deck rate. The evidence on behalf of these defendants was that the original arrangement as to the shipment of the Behera being on deck never was altered, but that the mate's receipt and bill of lading were made out clean and the under-deck rate inserted by mistake, it being alleged that the instructions with reference to deck shipments were not received by the then plaintiffs' Alexandria firm until after the shipment on the Behera. It was left to the jury to say whether the cotton was shipped on deck by agreement with the then plaintiffs, and a verdict was found by them for the then plaintiffs for 4330*l.*, the alleged value of the cotton jettisoned, less the freight.

40. The jettison of the deck load of cotton of the Behera occurred off the coast of France, as has been mentioned, and a considerable portion of it was washed ashore in the neighbourhood of Brest. Part of this cotton came from the 112 bales shipped by Messrs. Mellor and Co. The cotton which was picked up and saved was sold, and, after deducting charges and expenses, the amount realised by the portion belonging to Messrs. Mellor and Co. was 600*l.* Under the above circumstances the plaintiff alleges that he is entitled on behalf of Messrs. Chapple and Co. to recover from the defendants, under the said policies of insurance, or one of them, the proportion payable by the defendants of the loss by the jettison of the said cotton.

41. If the plaintiff is entitled to recover against the defendants on the policy of 29th March 1864, the proportion payable by them will be somewhat greater than if the plaintiff is entitled to recover under the policy of the 12th Jan. 1865. The plaintiff also contends that in case he is not entitled to recover on the said policies or either of them, he is entitled to a return of premiums paid in respect of the value of the 120 bales declared as hereinbefore mentioned.

42. The action was brought to recover the proportion of the value of the twenty bales of cotton belonging to Messrs. Duckworth and Rathbone which were shipped on board the Behera. The defendants have, however, paid into court a sum sufficient to satisfy this part of the claim, and this amount has been accepted by the plaintiff.

The pleadings in the cause, and copies of the two policies of insurance with the declaration thereon, are annexed to this case and intended to be taken as part thereof.

The question for the court is, whether the plaintiff is entitled under the circumstances to recover the amount of the said premiums.

If the court shall be of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to recover, then the damages are to be assessed in accordance with the judgment of the court, by the arbitrator by whom the case is stated, and the verdict entered for the plaintiff is to be reduced accordingly. If the court shall be of opinion that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover, then the verdict entered for the plaintiff is to be set aside, and instead thereof a verdict is to be entered for the defendants.

[It is unnecessary to set out the documents annexed.]

Nov. 20, 1871, Nov. 14, 1872.—Holker, Q. C. (Watkin Williams with him), for the plaintiff.—The goods were carried on deck at the shipowner's risk, and the shipowner having signed an open policy was bound to make good the loss to the shipper caused by the jettison to his goods. The fact that it was the intention of the shipper that the goods should be at his own risk makes no difference; a clean bill of lading having been given the shipowner is responsible. The three bills of lading were given at the shipowner's risk at an increased freight, and the case shows as a fact that the 102 bales of cotton were not at the shipper's risk. There was no necessity for declaring the goods as soon as they were shipped, for the alteration could be made at any time, even after the loss, and this alteration the plaintiff made in accordance with the acknowledged custom of underwriters in such cases. By the usage of insurance business, the plaintiff was not only entitled, but bound, to rectify the declarations and to insert the 102 bales in the policy. In the case of Harman v. Kingston (3 Camp. 150), which was an action on a policy of insurance on goods, the insurance was declared to be on sugar and cotton, as might be thereafter declared and valued. It was held that the declaration of interest to be available must be communicated to the underwriters, or someone on their behalf, before intelligence is received of the loss; but the declaration of interest is not a condition precedent, and if none is made, the policy is then open instead of valued, and upon proof of interest at the trial the assured will be entitled to recover. There the declaration was not communicated until after intelligence received of the loss. Messrs. Chapple did not know that the goods were at their risk until after the loss had happened, so could not rectify the mistake. The shipowners could not tell what amount of goods were coming by the several ships, and the successive policies constituted one continuous insurance, and the risk would attach on each ship as she sailed.

Gledstanes v. The Royal Exchange Assurance Company, 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 142; 5 B. & S. 797; 11 L. T. Rep. N. S. 305.

Sir George Honyman, Q.C. (with him Gainsford Bruce), for the defendants.—The goods were shipped at the shippers' risk, and not at the shipowners'. This was a policy for the purpose of securing Messrs. Chapple against loss by jettison; but here they had no insurable interest in the goods. They were not bound by the act of their agent, who through mistake or negligence, and without any authority, signed a clean bill of lading, notwithstanding the circumstance that the goods were shipped by the desire of the shippers at their own risk. Also the policy for 25,000*l.* having been filled up, the plaintiff cannot turn round and strike out the declarations in the policies, and replace them by others, which completely alter the insurance. In Gledstanes v. Royal Exchange Assurance Company (2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 142; 11 L. T. Rep. N. S. 305; 5 B. & S. 797), Cockburn, C. J., says: "The policy gives the assured the right to appropriate the policy to goods on board any ship, but the ship is to be declared to the underwriters. If the declaration must be made to the underwriters it is sufficient if made and communicated to them at the earliest convenient opportunity, and then the underwriters are protected, because it would be a fraud on them if an appropriation were made to a vessel after knowledge of its loss; or if after the appropriation to one vessel there were an attempt to shift the policy to another." The declaration in some shape or other must be made in such a manner that the vessel shall be covered by the policy in the interval between the appropriation and the declaration to the underwriters.

Ionides v. Pacific Insurance Company ante, p. 141; 25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 490; L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 675.

Holker, Q.C., in reply.—The shipowners have been obliged to make good the loss to the shipper, so that it cannot be said they have no insurable risk.

Kewley v. Ryan, 2 H. Black, 343.

Nov. 21, 1872.—BRETT, J. delivered the judgment of the court (Keating and Brett, JJ.), as follows, stating that Willes, J. had concurred therein:—In this special case the facts stated, which seem to be material, are, that the plaintiff acted in London as insurance broker for Messrs. Chapple and Co., shipowners; that they were owners of a line of steamers plying between Alexandria and Liverpool; that their agent at Alexandria was Mr. Grace; that during the American war Chapple and Co. were extensively engaged in carrying cotton from the Levant to Liverpool; that part of the cotton was frequently carried on deck; that some cotton was so carried by the request and then at the risk of the shipper, and for a less freight; that in such case it was the practice that it should be stated in the bill of lading that the cotton was on deck by the shipper's request and at his risk; that some cotton was carried on deck by the shipowner in order to enable him to carry a larger cargo; that in such case it was at the shipowner's risk; that in such case he gave a clean bill of lading; that shipowners who carried deckloads for their own convenience, and therefore at their own risk, often protected themselves against probable loss by jettison, by keeping on foot open policies, especially effected to cover the risk, and by declaring upon them. The case then contained the following statement as to usage: [The judgment set out paragraph 7 down to the words "even after loss"] He is not entitled to declare some of the risks and remain his own insurer as to the others. In 1864 and in 1865 Messrs. Chapple and Co., through the plaintiff, their broker, effected in London, with the defendants and others, certain policies on cotton on deck per steamer or steamers from Asia Minor to Liverpool. The first set of such policies were made on the 29th March 1864, to the amount of 25,000*l.*, and the second set were made for a further sum of 25,000*l.*, to follow on the 12th Jan. 1865. In the autumn of 1864, and at the beginning of 1865, Messrs. Chapple and Co., by Grace, their agent at Alexandria, shipped thence in various steamers cotton on deck, at their risk, and cotton below. Declarations were made on the cotton shipped on deck on the policies before-mentioned in the order of shipments, in respect of all the cotton shipped on deck, except in respect of one parcel shipped on board the Behera. Such declarations were made in London by the plaintiff, upon information of the shipments forwarded by Grace to Chapple and Co. The declarations on the policies of the 29th March 1864 were made as follows:

29th Oct. 1864	£3400	on	68	Bales,	per	Lybia .
29th Nov. "	7000	"	102	"	"	Ajax .
10th Dec. "	2500	"	44	"	"	Ocean King .
31st Dec. "	1200	"	20	"	"	Behera .
9th Jan. 1865	7000	"	115	"	"	Nyanza .
16th Jan. "	3900	"	81	"	"	Nyanza .

£25,000

Declarations were also made, but not to the full amount on the policy of the 12th Jan. 1865. It afterwards appeared that under the circumstances stated in the case, Messrs. Choremis, Mellor and Co. had shipped 102 bales of cotton on board the Behera at Alexandria on the 20th Dec. 1864, that is to say, before the shipment on board the Behera of twenty bales on the 31st Dec. and before the shipments on board the Nyanza of the 9th Jan. and the 16th Jan. 1865. The 102 bales were directed to be received, and were in fact received to be shipped on deck at shippers' risk; but by mistake a clean receipt was given for them by the mate, and a clean bill of lading by Grace; he, however, supposing always that the 102 bales had gone at shippers' risk did not advise the defendants to declare them, and they were not declared. The Behera sailed from Alexandria, and encountered heavy weather, and on the 15th Jan. 1865, the twenty bales and the 102 bales were jettisoned. The loss became known to Chapple and Co. on the 18th Jan. 1865. The vessel arrived in Liverpool on the 19th Jan. On the 25th Jan. 1865, Messrs. Mellor and Co., of Liverpool, claimed payment of the value of 102 bales as being owners of a clean bill of lading given in respect of them. The plaintiff on the 27th Jan. 1865, altered the declarations on the policies of the 29th March 1864, as follows; he struck out the 7000*l.* on 115 bales per Nyanza, and 3900*l.* on 81 bales per Nyanza, and replaced those declarations as follows: 9th Jan. 1865, 6000*l.* on 102 bales per Behera; 9th Jan. 1865, 4900*l.*, part of 115 bales per Nyanza. He at the same time altered the declarations to correspond on the policies of the 12th Jan. 1865. A portion of the policies of the 12th Jan. 1865, sufficient to cover the loss on the Behera deck cargo, remained still undeclared, and the plaintiff, on the 27th Jan. 1865, filled up the said policies by declaring, amongst other declarations, 6000*l.* on 102 bales per Behera. On these facts it was argued before us on behalf of the plaintiff that Chapple and Co. had an insurable interest; that although the intention of the shippers at the time of shipment was in fact that the goods should be carried on deck at their risk, and although at the same time it was the intention of the defendants' agent, Mr. Grace, to receive them to be carried on deck at shipper's risk, yet inasmuch as Grace had by mistake or negligence given a clean bill of lading, Messrs. Chapple and Co. could not protect themselves against the holders thereof in respect of the loss by jettison, even though such holders might be identical with the shippers; that Chapple and Co., therefore, stood to lose by a jettison by reason of perils of the sea, and were, therefore, so far interested as to be entitled to insure against such loss. It was further contended on behalf of the plaintiff that Chapple and Co. were insured against the loss which had occurred on and by virtue of the policies of the 29th March 1864; that by the usage of insurance business they were not only entitled, but bound to rectify the declarations on that policy as they had done, and that the declarations were to be read as if the shipment of the 102 bales on the 20th Dec. 1864 had been declared in due order, and that the declarations might be properly altered after the loss was known. It was contended on behalf of the defendants that the shipowners, Messrs. Chapple and Co., were not bound by the mistake or negligence of Grace in signing a clean bill of lading; that under the circumstances he had no authority to sign any but a bill of lading expressing that the goods were shipped by the request of the shippers, and at their risk; that Messrs. Chapple and Co., not being bound by the clean bill of lading, were at no risk, and therefore had no insurable interest; that if they had such interest, it was not insured, for that by the recognised law of insurance the assured were not bound to declare the goods which they shipped in the order of their shipment; that they were not bound to declare all shipments; that they could not, after they had once declared, alter such declarations; that even if they could at some time alter such declarations, they could not do so after the loss and their knowledge of it; that they were bound to declare within a reasonable time after shipment; that if they did not, a subsequent declaration was void; that no declaration could be properly made after loss and knowledge; that consequently in this case the loss which had occurred was not insured by either policy. The first point raised by these arguments is whether Messrs. Chapple and Co. had an insurable interest. We are of opinion that they had. It may be true that Grace was not in one sense authorised to sign a clean bill of lading under the circumstances, but it is in the sense that his duty to his principals required him not negligently to sign in that form. He had the authority so frequently given to agents in his position, that to sign bills of lading as or for the master of the ship, and therefore his signature was equivalent to that of his principals, Messrs. Chapple and Co., and made the bill of lading their contract, and a contract in writing applicable to the goods shipped under it, the effect of which, according to the legal construction of the written contract contained in it to be declared by the court, could not at law be varied by evidence that it was signed in its existing form by negligence or mistake. The bill of lading, according to its legal construction, made Messrs. Chapple and Co. liable for a loss of the goods by jettison, the result of their being carried on deck; it follows that Chapple and Co. had an insurable interest. The next question raised is, whether Chapple and Co. were insured in respect of the risk on the 102 bales of cotton on board the Behera. Now the usage stated in the case is a large usage, more comprehensive we believe, than it has been proved or assumed to be in any of the cases which are in the books relative to this matter; but if it is not unreasonable it is binding on the court in this case. We are not prepared to say that it is unreasonable. It follows that it is binding. Then it seems clear that Chapple and Co. were insured by the policies of the 29th March, for the 102 bales on board the Behera was shipped on board on the 20th Dec. 1864, when the policies were not exhausted by prior shipments to which they were applicable, and Messrs. Chapple and Co. were bound to rectify the declarations, and make them correspond with the order of shipment. It seems to us that the usage as now stated makes the cases of Gledstones v. The Royal Exchange Assurance Company (ubi sup) and Ionides v. The Pacific Insurance Company (ubi sup) inapplicable. But if that be not so we still think that the plaintiff, on the statements made in this case, is entitled to recover. The doctrine to be deduced from those cases is that according to the usage of merchants and underwriters as recognised by the courts without formal proof in each case, a declaration of this kind, which it is the right of the assured to make without the consent of the underwriter, may be altered even after the loss is known, if it be altered at a time when it can be and is altered innocently and without fraud. If that be a true proposition, and we think it is, and if it be applicable in this case, we think that the alterations made on the 27th Jan. 1865, in the declarations on the policies of the 29th March 1864, were legally made. At that time the loss of the goods by jettison was known to the assured, but the state of things at the time of shipment was not known to them. They seem to have made the alteration in the bonâ fide belief that their agent had neglected to inform them of the shipment by the Behera, and with a bonâ fide intention of rectifying that mistake according to the custom. There is no finding in this special case that they acted otherwise than innocently and without fraud. The judgment must therefore be for the plaintiff, as upon a loss upon the policies of the 29th March 1864, in respect of the loss by jettison of goods loaded on board the Behera.

COURT OF ADMIRALTY.

Reported by J. P. ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

July 26 and 31, 1872.

THE ALEXANDRIA.

THE OCEANIC STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY
(LIMITED) (apps.) v. JONES (resp.).Collision—Suit against pilot—Admiralty jurisdiction.The High Court of Admiralty has no jurisdiction to entertain a suit in personam against a pilot for damage occasioned to a ship by his negligence whilst in charge of another ship.The Court of Passage and the County Courts, having no larger Admiralty jurisdiction than the High Court, cannot, therefore, entertain such a suit (a).

THIS was an appeal from an interlocutory decree of the Court of Passage of the borough of Liverpool (admiralty jurisdiction), in a cause of damage instituted on behalf of the owners of the steamship Atlantic (in personam) against Owen Jones, a licensed pilot of the port of Liverpool. The Atlantic was on the morning of the 23rd Nov. 1871, moored alongside the Prince's pierhead in the river Mersey in a thick fog. The Alexandria, a screw steamer, was going down the river in charge of the respondent (the defendant), and ran into the Atlantic, and did her considerable damage. A suit was instituted in rem. against the Alexandria, but it was dismissed on the ground that she was in charge of the respondent as pilot, by compulsion of law, and that he alone was to blame for this collision. The present suit was thereupon instituted against the pilot by the usual præcipe, whereupon the court issued a summons in the following form :

ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION.

In the Court of Passage of the Borough of Liverpool.
No. 152.

(a) A curious question may arise in consequence of the above decision. By sec. 5 of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 71 it is enacted: "From and after the time specified in each order in council under this Act appointing a County Court to have Admiralty jurisdiction within any district as the time from which this Act shall have effect in and throughout that district no County Court, other than the County Court so appointed, shall have jurisdiction within that district in any Admiralty cause." The whole of the coast line of England has now been placed for the purposes of the Act within the jurisdiction of certain County Courts, and considering the restrictions placed upon instituting suits in County Courts, every "Admiralty cause" must arise within a district framed under the Act. If, then, these County Courts alone have jurisdiction in Admiralty causes, is there any way whatever in which a proceeding can be taken against a pilot in a County Court? This decision holds that the County Courts have no jurisdiction on their Admiralty side, and the 5th section seems to say that no County Courts can try a cause of "damage by collision" against a pilot on their common law side, as such a cause is an Admiralty cause within the meaning of those words as used in sect. 3 of the Act. Sect. 3, it should be noticed, gives jurisdiction "in the following causes (in this Act referred to as Admiralty causes):" it does not expressly say that the County Courts are to have an Admiralty jurisdiction, and it therefore would seem reasonable to suppose that "damage by collision" did not refer only to such damage as is cognizable by the High Court of Admiralty. The only way out of the difficulty, however, would seem to be to take the words "Admiralty cause" as meaning such a cause as the High Court has jurisdiction over, and considering all other causes, although of an exactly similar nature, as common law causes. Such a cause as this would then be cognizable by any County Court.—ED.

The Oceanic Steam Navigation Company (Limited), of No. 10, Water-street, Liverpool, in the County of Lancaster, Plaintiffs.
Owen Jones, of 31, Thomaston-street, Everton, in Liverpool, aforesaid, pilot, Defendant.

Whereas a cause for damage to a ship had been instituted in this court on behalf of the plaintiffs, the Oceanic Steam Navigation Company (Limited), in the sum of 300l. you are summoned to enter an appearance in the said cause within four clear days of the service hereof. You are also warned that if you do not enter an appearance as aforesaid, the assessor of this court will proceed to hear and determine the said cause or to make such orders therein as to him shall seem fit.

Dated this 15th Jan. 1872.

JOHN FLEET, Deputy Registrar.

To the Defendant, Owen Jones.

To this suit an appearance was duly entered on behalf of the respondent (the defendant below), and preliminary acts were filed; but there were no further pleadings. The 14th article of the respondents' (the plaintiffs') preliminary act alleged that "The Atlantic was by compulsion of law in charge of a duly licensed pilot. The Alexandria was also by compulsion of law in charge of a duly licensed pilot, to wit, the above-named defendant, and the plaintiffs say that the said collision was occasioned by the negligence, unskillfulness, and improper conduct of the said defendant whilst so in charge of the said vessel as aforesaid."

Mersey pilots do not, like Trinity House pilots, give a bond for the due performance of their duties.

The suit came on before the Assessor of the Court of Passage on a motion to dismiss it on the ground that the court had "no jurisdiction to entertain a claim in personam against a person who is not the owner of the ship or vessel causing the damage."

After hearing counsel, the learned assessor dismissed the suit on the above ground, holding that: "The question turned upon the construction of recent statutes to extend the jurisdiction and improve the practice and procedure of the High Court of Admiralty, for the Act which conferred admiralty jurisdiction on this court was not intended to give it a more extensive jurisdiction than the High Court possessed. The first provision which affected the question was the 6th section of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, and he was of opinion that the construction of this section contended for by the defendant's counsel was correct, that it was intended only to remove the restriction imposed by 13 Richard 2 c. 5, forbidding the Admiralty Court 'to meddle with anything done within the realm, but only things done upon the seas,' and to give the court cognizance of suits for damage when the damage was received on a navigable river within the body of a county, and the section did not enlarge the jurisdiction in any other respect. The question mainly depended on 24 Vict. c. 10. The 7th section of that statute gave the Court of admiralty jurisdiction over any claim for damage done by a ship. What was the meaning to be given to these words? On a consideration of the statute, and especially the 5th, 6th, and 11th sections, the only conclusion was that, in respect of such damage, the ship itself, and the owners, master, and persons identified in interest with the ship, were alone answerable to the Admiralty Court. The 35th section gave a choice of proceeding either against the ship or against persons, but only persons identified with the ship; and it was not applicable to a pilot who was on board by compulsion of law without the consent of the owner—a stranger who could not be identified with the ship. This view was strongly confirmed by the 13th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 78), which, in giving a jurisdiction in personam to the court, limits such jurisdiction to proceedings against the owner of the ship. Moreover, the case of the Urania (5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 402; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 156; 10 W. R. 97) was a distinct authority in favour of this view. In that case, after the passing of the Admiralty Court Act 1854, Dr. Lushington declined to issue a citation in personam against a pilot for damage done to a ship by the ship of which he was in charge by compulsion of law, on the ground that such jurisdiction was not given to the court by the Act. The motion must therefore be allowed, and the suit dismissed." Leave to appeal was given.

Gainsford Bruce for the appellants.—The learned assessor assumes in his judgment that the question turns upon the statutes extending the jurisdiction of the High Court whereas it really depends upon the construction of the County Court Admiralty Jurisdiction Acts (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71; 32 & 33 Vict. c. 51.) For, although I cannot contend, after the decision in The Hewsons (ante p. 360; 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 64), that the County Court has a more extended jurisdiction than the High Court over the subject matter, it is otherwise as to procedure. This is a cause strictly of damage by collision over which the High Court clearly has jurisdiction. Apart from the question of the extent of the jurisdiction in the County Courts, the mode of procedure may differ in those courts from that of the High Court, or in other words whenever the subject matter is within the jurisdiction of the High Court, then the County Court on its Admiralty side may proceed not only in rem but also in personam against any person who has committed a tort which renders him in any way liable to be sued in the court. This is shown by the provisions in the County Court Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 as to costs. By sect. 3, any County Court having admiralty jurisdiction has jurisdiction to try "the following causes (in this Act referred to as admiralty causes); (3) as to any claim for damage to cargo or damage by collision, any cause in which the amount does not exceed 300*l.*" By sect. 5 no County Court other than a County Court duly appointed under the Act to have admiralty jurisdiction, has jurisdiction in these causes. By sect. 9, if a suit is instituted in any superior court and the plaintiff fails to recover a sum exceeding 300*l.* in a cause of collision, he fails to recover costs. This suit is instituted in the sum of 300*l.* in a County Court. It is a cause of collision, and must therefore be on the admiralty side of the County Court. If it were instituted in a superior court the plaintiff could recover no costs, and would therefore be practically without a remedy. This indicates that it was intended that all questions of damage by collision should be exclusively heard in the County Courts appointed under the Act, and upon the admiralty side of those courts, irrespective of the persons against whom they are instituted. These Acts have transferred the power, which formerly existed to try such a suit as this on the common law side, to the admiralty side of the County Courts, and if it is held that this power does not now exist on the admiralty side, the County Courts can have no jurisdiction to try this suit in any way—a result which cannot have been contemplated by the Legislature.

But, assuming that the County Courts have only jurisdiction in personam over the same causes as the High Court of Admiralty, then the High Court itself has jurisdiction to try this case, and therefore the Court of Passage. It is assumed below that a suit can be brought in this court in personam only against a person against whose property a suit in rem might be instituted; that the jurisdiction in rem is the foundation of all suits in this court: and that the jurisdiction in personam exists only where that in rem also exists, being only an alternative form of procedure. In Olerke's Praxis, tit. 1, et seq., it is shown that the ordinary form of procedure in the time of Queen Elizabeth was in personam. That was the original jurisdiction. The jurisdiction in rem was only exercised when the debtor was not to be found (Ib. tit. 28). The procedure in rem was only thoroughly recognised as a distinct proceeding from that in personam for the first time in the Bold Buccleigh (7 Moore, P. C. C. 267) in the year 1851. Formerly this court clearly had jurisdiction on questions of pilotage, and could make pilots answerable for any damages caused by their negligence or unskilfulness. This will be seen on reference to "The Laws of Oleron," art. 33; to "The Inquisition of Queenborow," arts. 16, 23; and to "De Officio Admiralitatis" of Thomas Rowghton, art. 26, as contained in the black book of the Admiralty (published by the Master of the Rolls, edited by Sir Travers Twiss, Q.A.; A.D. 1871). In the "De Officio Admiralitatis" it is said (art. 26): "Inquiratur, si quis susceptus in eum onus sive curam alicujus navis sive vassali ducendi de loco in locum, ut lodismanus, cujus ignorancia, culpa, vel desidia incidit navis in jacturam vel in dampnum quovismodo cum mercandis, bonis et rebus in ea existentibus. Pena est, indicatus et convictus per duodecim super hoc, dampna navis possessoribus ejusdem restituere, et mercatoribus jacturam et perditionem mercandiarum bonorum, et rerum hujusmodi, si habeat unde, &c." Although American admiralty courts have succeeded in obtaining a wider jurisdiction than this court, their decisions illustrate this question of personal jurisdiction. [Sir R. J. PHILLIMORE refers to De Lovio v. Boit, 2 Gallison's (Amer.) Rep. 398.] That case shows that the admiralty courts have always exercised jurisdiction over all marine torts, and this was also decided by Dr. Lushington in The Sarah (Lush. 549), where it was held that the court had jurisdiction over a cause instituted against a barge propelled by a pole for damage done on the high seas. The American cases also show that the admiralty court has jurisdiction over a person committing a tort at sea, even though there may be no property identified with that person that could come within the jurisdiction of the court, as in the case of a suit instituted against a person who had forcibly taken money from on board a ship at sea: (Mauvo v. Almeida, 10 Wheaton's Supreme Court, U.S., Rep. 474.) In that case Johnson, J., in delivering the judgment of the Supreme Court, said (p. 489): "The ground of complaint is a maritime tort, the violent seizure on the ocean of a sum of money, the property of the libellants. That the libellants would have been entitled to Admiralty process against the property if it had been brought within the reach of our process, no one has yet questioned. The only doubt on this part of the subject is whether the remedy in personam, for which this is a substitute (or, more properly the form of instituting it) can be pursued in the Admiralty. On this point we consider it too late to express a doubt. This court has entertained such suits too often, without hesitation, to permit the right now to be questioned. Such was the case of Maley v. Shatlock (3 Cranch's Supreme Court U. S. Rep. 458.) Such is the principle recognised in Murray v. The Charming Betsy (2 Cranch, 64), where the court decrees damages against the libellant. Such also was the principle in the case of The Apollon (9 Wheaton, 362), in which the libel was directly in personam, and damages were decreed. We consider that the question, therefore, ought not to be stirred." In the case of The Sloop Merchant (1 Abbott's Adm. Rep. 1) a joint libel was filed by seamen against the vessel, in rem and against the master and owner in personam, to recover wages and moneys paid for the use of the vessel, and Betts, J., in giving judgment, drew a distinction between proceedings in rem and in personam, saying: "The method of instituting suits in the English Admiralty Court by arrest of the vessel is declared to be of ancient usage: (The Dundee, 1 Hagg. 109, 124; 2 Chitty's Practice, p. 536); but at what point of antiquity it became a remedy of the court is not traceable from the published decisions or rules. Evidently it must have been posterior to the compilation of Clerke's Praxis, in the reign of Elizabeth, and which was first published in 1679 (Brevoor v. The Fair American, 1 Pet. Adm. Rep. 87, 94), because that form of action is not treated of by Clerke. Title 28 of his work has reference to proceedings against property to compel the appearance in personam of the respondent. There is certainly no clear authority showing that actions in rem preceded those in personam, as the general means of exercising the jurisdiction of the court. Far less is there anything to prove that the latter class of actions derived their qualities from the processes or rules of pleading employed in the former. Each form of action is distinct and independent of the other in respect to the methods of procedure employed, and (with a few exceptions) in respect to jurisdiction over the subject matter upon which they may act. Suits in rem and suits in personam are by no means convertible terms, and if in some instances they are concurrent, there are numerous cases in which one must be employed to the exclusion of the other." Moreover, it has been decided in America, that although a master, having no lien for his wages, cannot in that country proceed in rem against his ship, he may, nevertheless, proceed in personam in the Admiralty Court against the owner: Willard v. Dorr (3 Mason's Rep. 91.) Story, J., in that case, after pointing out that all prohibitions in suits by masters had been in cases where the proceedings were in rem, says, "the judges of the Common Law Courts seem to have been ignorant that a seaman could maintain a suit in personam in the Admiralty Court for wages (though that is now familiar), as well against the owner as the master. In ancient times the principal mode of proceeding in the Admiralty was by process in personam. My opinion is that the admiralty has jurisdiction in cases of this nature in personam, though not in rem. The contract is maritime, and the service is maritime; and I can perceive no principle upon which the court can entertain a suit in personam for the seamen, which does not apply to the master. This point has, in fact, been repeatedly ruled in this court." In Abbot's National (U. S.) Digest (vol. 1, p. 46, par. 242) under the title of "Jurisdiction without Lien," it is said, on the authority of Marshall v. Brown (7 New York Legal Observer, 392), that "the jurisdiction of the court in personam in matters of contract does not necessarily depend on the question of lien. The person is proceeded against upon his personal liability by process of arrest or citation. And this remedy, if suspended by taking a bill or note, is restored when the note is surrendered to the debtor or produced in court or cancelled." In cases of damage by Queen's ships, the proceeding is against the commander, although there is not jurisdiction over the ship. Over suits for assaults committed on board ship this court has had undoubted jurisdiction in personam: (See the cases cited in The Sylph 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 519; 3 Mar. Cas. O. S. 37; L. Rep. 2 Adm. & Ecc. 24.) [Sir R. J. PHILLIMORE.—These cases seem to have been always cases where the master of the ship was the person proceeded against.] The assaults were illegal acts on the part of the master not within his authority, for which the owner could not be liable, and it was a personal jurisdiction. Again, persons could be proceeded against for wearing illegal colours. These were suits in personam, and not against the ship. In cases of bottomry this court may pronounce a master liable for the amount of the bond where he has signed it: not because he is master, but on account of the personal liability he has contracted. This case is distinguishable from the Urania (5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 402; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 156; 10 W. Rep. 79), because the decision in that case proceeded on the ground that the Court of Admiralty had no power to enforce a bond given by a Trinity House pilot under the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), sect. 372. This court cannot enforce a contract under seal (Howe v. Nappier, 4 Barr. 1944), and therefore not a Trinity House pilot's bond: (The Carolus, 3 Hagg. 343, note.) A Trinity House pilot's liability is expressly limited by the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, sect. 375, to the amount of his bond, whilst here there is no bond and no limitation. This court has original jurisdiction apart from statute. [Sir R. J. PHILLIMORE.—Can you not give an instance of such a suit?] It has not been worth while to institute them, as pilots are usually unable to pay for damage done—hence the necessity for the bond. By the statutes giving jurisdiction to this court, however, ample jurisdiction is given to try this suit. The 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6, gives "jurisdiction over "all claims or demands whatsoever in the nature of . . . damage received by any ship or sea-going vessel . . . whether such ship may have been within the body of a county or upon the high seas," &c. By the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), sect. 7, the court has "jurisdiction over any claim or damage done by any ship." These words are wide enough to confer jurisdiction in any case, and the 35th section of the Act expressly provides that it "may be exercised either by" proceedings in rem or by proceedings in personam. Even if it should be considered that the 13th section of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 78 (the Admiralty Court Act 1854) gave only a limited jurisdiction by way of monition in cases within the original jurisdiction of the court; yet the 35th section of the Admiralty Court 1861 must be taken to have extended the jurisdiction in personam to all cases of which the court has cognizance.

H. H. Bremner for the respondent.—The real question here is whether this court has jurisdiction to entertain a suit in personam against a pilot for damage occasioned by his negligence in navigating a ship of which he is in charge by compulsion of law. If this court has no such jurisdiction, the County Court or Court of Passage cannot have it.

Simpson v. Blues, ante p. 236; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 697;

Cargo ex Argos; The Hewsons, ante p. 360; 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 14.

The appellants allege the jurisdiction, and it is for them to establish its existence. It exists in this court either as inherent in its constitution, or it has been conferred by statute. If claimed as part of the original jurisdiction, it must be proved by showing cases in which it has been exercised, or at least by reference to works of authority which treat it as well settled. The American cases referred to on the other side to establish the jurisdiction in personam do not appear to show that admiralty courts have ever exercised it over other than masters or owners, persons subject to the maritime law, and identified in interest with the ship. This court seems to have claimed a general jurisdiction over masters of ships, though except in the case of Queen's ships which rest on special grounds, there are no cases reported in which a suit in personam in a cause of damage has been brought against a master. In The Sylph (ubi sup.) it is said that "this court has always had jurisdiction over personal injuries committed on the high seas, and has entertained actions in personam against captains of merchant vessels for inflicting, whilst on the high seas, excessive punishment upon seamen. In The Agincourt (1 Hagg. 271), Lord Stowell condemned the captain of an East Indiaman in 100l. damages with costs. In The Lowther Castle (1 Hagg. 384), he entertained a similar action, but held the charge against the captain not proved. In The Ruckers (4 C. Rob. 73), Lord Stowell went a step farther, and allowed a civil suit by a passenger against a master for ill-treatment on the high seas. Reports of cases (both of the Admiralty and Ecclesiastical Courts) were then of recent date, but the registrar, on searching the records back to 1730, found many instances of such suits." In a suit for damage caused by a queen's ship, the proceeding is, no doubt, against the commander, on whose behalf the Lords of the Admiralty direct the Admiralty proctor to enter an appearance, but the submission to the jurisdiction is voluntary:

The Athol, 1 W. Rob. 374;

The Volcano, 2 W. Rob. 337.

In The Volant (1 W. Rob. 383, 389), Dr. Lushington thus explains the ancient jurisdiction of the court: "By ancient maritime law, the owners of a vessel doing damage were bound to make good the loss to the owners of the other vessel, although it might exceed the value of their own vessel and the freight. For the purpose of enforcing this obligation, the owners of the damaged vessel might resort either to the courts of common law or to the Court of Admiralty; and if they preferred the latter, they had the choice of three modes of proceeding, viz., against the owners, or against the master, personally, or by a proceeding in rem against the ship itself; but the learned judge does not refer to any case in which the proceeding in personam against the master or owner, in a case of damage, had been resorted to. In the Trelawney, reported in a note to The Hope (3 C. Rob. 215), a cause of salvage was allowed to be instituted in personam against the owners of the vessel saved, they having removed their vessel from the jurisdiction.

The Meg Merrilies, 3 Hagg, 346;

The Rapid, 3 Hagg, 419.

It is clear, then, that the maritime law regards the owner of a vessel only as liable to pay for damage done, and each of the three methods of procedure has for its object to enforce payment by him, the proceeding against the master being against one who is his recognised agent in all matters connected with the ship. As the proceeding in rem afforded the most efficient remedy, the proceedings in personam practically became obsolete, or so doubtful that it was deemed necessary to revive it in the Admiralty Court Act 1854, as against owners only in those cases in which a right of action existed against the property. (a) From this it is to be presumed that the court now has jurisdiction only over those persons who are identified in interest with the property, namely, the owners. It has been alleged that the court, having jurisdiction over the subject matter of damage, must have jurisdiction to enforce a claim for damages against the person whose wrongful act occasioned it. The proposition is based on an erroneous assumption as to the province of a court; a court enforces obligations which are imposed by the system of law it administers, but cannot create obligations, and no inference as to jurisdiction over persons can be drawn from a consideration of its jurisdiction over the subject matter. The maritime law administered in courts of admiralty imposes no obligation on a pilot to pay for damage done by his negligence, and this court cannot, because it entertains a suit for damage, acquire a jurisdiction to make a pilot pay for it. Has this jurisdiction been conferred by the operation of sects. 7 and 35 of the 24th Vict. c. 10? The construction put upon this Act by the appellants, that this being a claim for damage done by a ship the court has jurisdiction over it by the 7th section, and that by the 35th section, the jurisdiction may be exercised by a proceeding in personam, is merely verbal, and does not regard the object of the enactment. Before the Act a ship and her owner were responsible in the Admiralty Court for damage done by the ship, only when the damage was done to a ship or seagoing vessel (The Bilbao, 3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 338; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 5; Lush, 149). It was obviously unreasonable that the jurisdiction of the court should be so circumscribed, and the 7th section removed the limitation and allowed a suit to be maintained against a ship in any case of damage done by it, irrespective of the thing that received the damage. That this was the operation of the Act is shown by several cases in which suits were allowed to be instituted against ships for damage done by them, not merely to vessels not seagoing, but even to things fixed and immovable in the sea.

The Uhla, 19 L. Rep. N. S. 89; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 148; L. Rep. 2 Adm. & Ecc. 29;
The Excelsior, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 87; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 151 L. Rep. 2 Adm. & Ecc. 269;
The Clara Killan, 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 277; L. Rep. 3 Adm. 161; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 463;
The Minna, L. Rep. 2 Adm. & Ecc. 97.

In all these cases the proceeding was in rem against the ship. The section was not intended to alter the remedies or procedure of this court, but only to apply them to claims for damage formerly not within the jurisdiction of the court. Still less can it be said that the section has the effect of creating the entirely novel remedy of giving to the owner of a ship receiving damage by collision a right to proceed in personam against a pilot in charge of the ship in fault. The 7th section was discussed in Smith v. Brown (ante p. 56; 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 808; L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 729), and there received even a stricter interpretation. The 35th section applies in terms only to "the jurisdiction conferred by this Act," and these cannot be taken to enlarge the jurisdiction, except in matters there expressly enacted: it refers to procedure only. The 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6, only extended the territorial jurisdiction of the court to causes arising in the body of a county. Again, independently of principle, it has been expressly decided on precisely similar facts, that the court had no power to grant a monition against a pilot to appear in a cause of damage (The Urania sup.) In that case the jurisdiction was claimed as conferred by 24 Vict. c. 10, and not as belonging to the court by virtue of its original constitution, and the court even refused to issue a monition. It was contended that the ground of the decision in The Urania (ubi sup.) was the inability of this court to enforce the bond of a Trinity House pilot given under the 373rd section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 105), but Dr. Lushington expressly says that the Admiralty Court Act 1861 gives him no jurisdiction in such a case. The section of the Merchant Shipping Act recognises the liability of the Trinity House pilots, but they should be proceeded against in a court of common law. Lastly, the jurisdiction is not called for by necessity or expediency. To hold that this remedy existed would be to deprive the respondent of the right to have his liability tried by a jury. Moreover, as this court, in case both parties are found to blame, divides the damage between them, the respondent might be forced to pay damages for which he could not be held responsible in a court of Common Law where a plaintiff, against whom contributory negligence is established cannot recover.

Gainsford Bruce in reply.

July 31.—Sir R. PHILLMORE.—This is an appeal from the Court of Passage at Liverpool. The question raised is whether that court, exercising Admiralty jurisdiction, had power to entertain a suit brought by the owner of a ship, which had been injured by collision on the high seas, against the pilot in charge of the wrong doing vessel at the time of the collision. The court below held that it had no power to entertain such a suit. The contrary position was argued before me with considerable learning and ability by Mr. Bruce, and I think it right to state that if the question were res integra I should be of opinion that under the provisions contained in the sects. 7 and 35, 24 Vict. c. 10, the court had jurisdiction in this suit, but it appears to me that this very question was distinctly raised before my predecessor, who in The Urania (sup.), without doubt, decided the contrary. The case, I must observe, is reported (in 10 W. R., p. 97) by Dr. Tristram, the counsel who argued it. In these circumstances, and in the absence of any precedent, and remembering that the plaintiff has a remedy at common law, it would, I think, be wrong in me to reverse this judgment. But in accordance with the principles laid down by me in The Samuel Laing (22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 891; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 463; L. Rep. 3 Adm. & Ecc. 284), I will give leave to appeal to the Privy Council. I must dismiss this appeal with costs.

THE PALATINE.

Collision—Vessel in stays—Going about in the river Thames—Duty of steamer to avoid sailing vessel.

Where a sailing vessel is beating up the river Thames on a flood tide against the wind, and has gone over towards the south shore to the edge of the tide, and as near to that shore as she can safely go, so as to avoid collision with vessels at anchor on the south side of the river, she is entitled to go about without warning vessels of her intention, and a steamer coming up astern of her ought to know from her position and the state of her sails that she is going about, and is bound to take measures, by stopping or otherwise, to avoid a collision (a).

(a) THE PRISCILLA.—The case of the Palatine illustrates the duty of a steamer coming up behind a sailing vessel when about to tack. The duty of a sailing vessel under similar circumstances is laid down in The Priscilla (3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 503; L. Rep. 3 Adm. & Ecc. 125), which holds that where two vessels are sailing in company and beating to windward on the same tack, the following vessel, as soon as she sees the other go about, is bound to go about also, if by not doing so she incurs risk of collision. In giving judgment, however, the learned judge of the Admiralty Court found as a fact that the Priscilla had gone about and was standing towards the Victory, (the other vessel) at the time the Victory saw the Priscilla's green light. This caused an appeal to the Privy Council, not reported. The facts were shortly as follows: The schooner Priscilla was standing close hauled on the starboard tack across the Gull stream towards the Goodwin Sand; she was followed on the same tack by the schooner Victory at the distance of from a quarter to a half mile, and about four points on the starboard quarter of the Priscilla. When the Priscilla had approached as near to the Goodwin Sand as her master deemed it prudent to go, he gave orders to go about on the port tack. The owners of the Priscilla alleged that as she was coming round with her helm to port, and before she had got any steerage way on her, the Victory stood across her bows, and with her port main rigging caught the jibboom and bowsprit of the Priscilla,

THIS was a cause of collision instituted on behalf of the owner of the brigantine Douglas, the owner of her cargo, master, waterman and crew, against and the Victory fell alongside of her. The owners of the Victory alleged that the crew of the Victory saw first the green light and afterwards both lights of the Priscilla about a point and a half on their lee (port) bow, distant about half a mile, so that the Priscilla had gathered way when they met; that the Victory kept her reach close hauled, and the Priscilla came into collision with her. In fact, the important question between the two vessels was whether the Priscilla had gathered way after she had gone about; and the Admiralty Court finding that the Priscilla had gathered way, and yet that it was the duty of the Victory to keep out of her way, the owners of the Victory appealed to the Privy Council, on the ground that, as the Priscilla had way on her, the two vessels were crossing vessels within the meaning of the sailing rules, and that it was, therefore, the duty of the Priscilla, as being on the port tack, to avoid the Victory, which was close hauled on the starboard tack. The judgment of the Privy Council has not been reported, and is therefore given below.

Dr. Deane, Q.C. and Pritchard appeared for the appellants.

Butt, Q.C. and E. C. Clarkson appeared for the respondents.

The judgment of the Judicial Committee (the Right Hons. Sir James W. Colville; James, L.J.; Mellish, L.J.), delivered 30th Nov. 1870, is as follows: Their Lordships, in the course of the argument, intimated that if the learned judge of the Admiralty Court had found as a fact upon this conflicting evidence that the Priscilla had not completed her manœuvre of tacking—or perhaps it would be more correct to say had not gathered way after tacking—they would not have interfered with or questioned that finding, which must have proceeded entirely upon the credit to be given to the witnesses on either side; and that they would also have thought that the conclusion which the learned judge drew from such a state of facts was justified—namely, that the Victory ought to have observed what the Priscilla was about, and ought to have avoided this collision by tacking herself. It unfortunately happens that though their Lordships might have inferred from the second paragraph of the printed judgment that this was what the learned judge intended to find, the last paragraph makes this somewhat doubtful. The learned judge is made to say that the Victory must have known that the Priscilla had gone about, and was “standing towards her at that time.” Finding those expressions in the judgment, their Lordships therefore thought it lay upon them to examine closely the evidence given on either side as to the whole transaction, and to draw their own conclusions from that evidence, because, if the Priscilla had really gathered way, and was standing towards the Victory, then it seemed to their Lordships that the case would probably fall within the 12th Article, and that the 17th article would not apply to such a case. They are by no means prepared to say that the learned judge did mean to find that the vessel had gathered way. They are inclined to think, upon a view of the whole of the circumstances, that that expression which has been quoted may have been inaccurately used, and that it did not really express what might have been in the learned judge’s mind. In any case, after considering the evidence, their Lordships are disposed to give more credit to the case sworn to by the Priscilla than to the case made on the part of the Victory which, it is to be observed, rests very much on theory, whereas, if their Lordships reject the case made by the witnesses for the Priscilla, they must impute wilful perjury to three or four witnesses who have sworn to the actual state of the rigging, the steering, and the other manœuvres of the Priscilla, their evidence being inconsistent with the notion that that vessel, though she might have almost completed the manœuvre of tacking, had really gathered way, so as to bring the two within the category of crossing vessels, under the 12th Article. Their Lordships have had the benefit of consulting their nautical assessors, and that is the view that those gentlemen also take. The nautical assessors think that the vessel had not gathered way, and, that being the case, they concur with those who advised the learned judge in the court below; and as their Lordships concur with the

the screw steam yacht Palatine and her owner, the Right Honourable Thomas Egerton, Earl of Wilton, intervening. The collision took place in Erith Rands, in the river Thames. Both vessels were proceeding up the river. The wind was about W.N.W., and the tide was flood and running about two or three knots an hour; it was daylight. The Douglas was working up the river with several vessels in company, and just before the collision was standing over to the south shore, close hauled on the starboard tack. When she got to the edge of the tide upon the south shore, and (according to the evidence produced on her behalf) as near to the vessels anchored off Erith as it was prudent to go, her helm was put down to go about from the starboard to the port tack. Her master, who was at the helm, alleged that he looked round but saw nothing to prevent him going about, and he gave no signal or warning of any kind of his intention to alter his course. Whilst the Douglas was in stays the Palatine ran into her, striking her on the starboard side amidsthips with such force that she sank as soon as the Palatine backed out of her. The petition in the cause alleged that the Palatine “improperly neglected to take in due time proper measures for keeping out of the way of the Douglas, and improperly neglected to keep out of the way of the Douglas,” that “those on board the Palatine did not duly observe and comply with the provisions of article 16 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions:” and that “those on board the Palatine improperly kept their vessel under a starboard helm.”

On behalf of the Palatine it was proved that she was proceeding up Erith Reach at less than half speed with the tide, making not more than four knots an hour. On entering the Reach those on board the Palatine observed the Douglas with two other sailing vessels about a mile ahead, beating up the reach on the starboard tack. As the Palatine drew nearer to them the two other vessels put about from the starboard to the port tack, and thereupon the Palatine starboarded her helm to go under the stern of those two vessels. She was then about half a mile below them. When learned judge in thinking that, under the circumstances, the fault was the fault of the Victory, they must humbly recommend her Majesty to dismiss the appeal with costs.

Proctors for the appellants, Pritchard and Sons.

Proctors for the respondents, Deacon, Son and Rogers.

The effect of this decision is that the following vessel is bound to avoid the vessel ahead, and that the court below was right in the main; but that if it meant to find that the Priscilla had gathered way after going about, and that that vessel had therefore ceased to be upon the same course, the finding was erroneous. The rule as laid down is that a vessel is entitled to go about in such a place as is ordinary and usual, and a following vessel must be prepared for such a manœuvre. Several American cases have decided this question in the same way. As to sailing vessels, it has been held as a general rule that one vessel following another is bound to keep out of the way of the latter: (Whitridge v. Dill, 23 Howard’s (U. S. Sup. Court) Rep. 44.) A case very similar to the Priscilla is The Nellie D. (5 Blatchford’s U.S. Circuit Court (Second Circuit) Rep. 245); see also The Morning Light (2 Wallace (U. S. Sup. Court) Rep. 550), where it was held that a following vessel was not to blame, on the ground that the night was so dark that the crew could not see that the vessel ahead had gone about. As to steamers following one another, see The Rhode Island (Olcott’s Adm. Rep. 505; 1 Blatchford’s U.S. Circuit Court (Second Circuit) Rep. 363); The Governor (Abbott’s Adm. Rep. 108); Portevant v. The Bella Donna (Newberry’s Adm. Rep. 510); vs. Columbia (10 Wallace (U. S. Sup. Court) Rep. 5)—Ed.

the Palatine,^s stem was about level with the stern of the vessel on the port tack which was lowest down the river, the Douglas, which had up to that time continued on the starboard tack, suddenly ported her helm and came across the bows of the Palatine at the distance of about two ships lengths. The helm of the Palatine was instantly put hard-a-starboard, and her engines were stopped and reversed full speed astern, but the vessels notwithstanding came into collision. The master of the Palatine stated in his evidence that he was shaping his course to go between the Douglas and the other two vessels as soon as they should have opened out sufficiently to allow him to go through; that if the Douglas had held on a minute longer he should have gone clear, and that there was room for the Douglas to have gone further to the southward. The defendant's answer alleged "that a good look-out was not kept on board the Douglas;" that "the Douglas, in the time and circumstances in which she ported her helm improperly ported," and that "the Douglas, in the circumstances, improperly neglected or omitted to give any intimation that she was to go about from the starboard to the port tack."

The cause was heard before the Judge, assisted by Trinity Masters.

Butt, Q.C. (Clarkson with him) for the plaintiff.—The Palatine is to blame for not having stopped her engines when her helm was starboarded to get out of the way of the two coasters on the port tack. She was not justified in attempting to run the risk of getting through the narrow space between the Douglas and those coasters. They ought not to have depended on the Douglas holding on.

Milward, Q.C. (W. G. F. Phillimore with him) for the defendant.—A vessel has no right to put about in a crowded river without looking out for vessels near them, and giving notice of their intention. The Douglas was bound to take precautions. She improperly placed herself in stays.

The Sea Nymph, Lush, 23;

The Leonidas, Stuart's Vice-Admiralty Reports for Lower Canada, 229.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is a cause of damage arising out of a collision between a sailing vessel and a steam yacht in Erith Rands, about eleven o'clock in the morning of July 22nd last. The direction of the wind at the time was about north-west, and the weather was fine and clear. The vessels which came into collision were the Douglas, a brigantine of 168 tons register, bound on a voyage from Guernsey to London, with a cargo of granite, and manned by six hands all told, and the Palatine, a screw steam yacht of 192 tons, and having a crew of twenty-three hands, from Cowes to London. The tide was flood, of about the force of three and a-half knots, and both vessels were going up the Reach. According to the case set up by the Douglas, she was working up the reach with other vessels in company, and was under all plain sail except her royal and topgallant sails and flying jib and gaff-topsail; she stood over to the southward close hauled on the starboard tack to the edge of the tide upon the south shore; her helm was then put down that she might go about. According to the plaintiff's evidence, if she had gone any further she would not only have come into slack water, but into collision with the yachts anchored off Erith; it was also proved that when she was in stays and had come up into the wind, and four or five points round from the wind, the stem of the Palatine struck her amidships, and it is not unimportant to remark that the violence of the blow was such as to cut through her deck planks. At any rate we had it proved in evidence that the steamer went so far into her deck that she had to be backed out. Before, however, we consider whether the Palatine is or is not to blame for the collision, I must observe that it has been contended that the Douglas is primâ facie to blame on her own showing, on the ground that under the circumstances she was wrong in going about at the time she did; at least without having given any warning of the manœuvre she was about to execute. It was contended that she could have gone further inshore, and that if she wished to put about in the place she did, she was bound to inform vessels astern of her that such was her intention, and also that her master ought to have looked round before he tacked, so as to see if he would be likely to cause danger of collision by putting his vessel about. We are of opinion that some craft may have been in the way which intercepted the view of the steamer, though her master says that he took a look round before going about; but anyhow she was in the exercise of her right in tacking as she did, and her position and the state of her sails would under the circumstances be sufficient notification to other vessels. She had every reason to expect that the Palatine would do her duty and keep out of her way. Now the Palatine says that she was coming up the Reach about mid-channel, and was waiting for an opportunity of going under the stern of two vessels which were beating up the reach in company with the Douglas, but on the other tack, and that the Douglas, which was sailing on the starboard tack, suddenly ported her helm and came right across the bows of the Palatine at the distance of about two ship's lengths off. The helm of the Palatine was put hard a-starboard, and her engines were stopped and reversed, but she did not succeed in clearing the Douglas, though it is in evidence that the Palatine had got so far round that in another minute she would have done it, and her master has told us, "If we had stopped then (when he first starboarded), there would have been no collision." We think, therefore, the Palatine ought to have stopped; she ought to have seen from the position of the Douglas that the Douglas was about to tack, and according to the evidence of the mate, if she had stopped there would have been no collision. We are of opinion that the Palatine was unquestionably to blame, and, moreover, that the blame is in no degree shown to have been shared by the Douglas. We consider that there was nothing improper in her navigation or in her manœuvre, and I must accordingly pronounce that the Palatine is alone to blame for this collision.

registry in lieu of bail (after payment of the plaintiff's claim and costs) and the defendant, wishing to dispute the registrar's report on the plaintiff's claim, to which he had previously submitted caused a second appearance to be entered for him by other solicitors without previously paying his original solicitors' costs, the court ordered the second appearance to be set aside, and the original solicitor's costs to be paid out of the fund after payment of the plaintiff's claim and costs, leaving the other solicitors to apply to enter an appearance after this had been done (a).

This was an application to the court on behalf of the solicitors for the defendant in a wages suit against the ship Oneiza. The cause was a consolidated cause in which the mate and seamen of the vessel were plaintiffs, and William Styles Morton, the owner, was the defendant. Messrs. Ingledew, Ince, and Greening had acted throughout on behalf of the defendant, and on his personal instructions. The defendant admitted at an early stage of the cause that wages were due, and thereupon the question of amount was referred to the registrar, assisted by a merchant, and was heard by them, counsel appearing for the defendant. After the reference had proceeded for some time, the defendant instructed his counsel and solicitors to withdraw any further defence and to submit to the decision of the registrar, and this was done by the defendant's counsel before the registrar and in the presence of the defendant. The registrar reported the amount of wages due.

In order to obtain the release of the vessel, the sum of 900*l.* had been paid into court in lieu of bail. The fund in court was the only available property of the defendant in this country, as he was a British American, and did not reside here. Messrs. Ingledew, Ince, and Greening had become entitled to costs in defending the suit to the amount of 150*l.* or thereabouts. The amount reported due for wages was 51*l.* 1*s.* 1*d.* After paying this out, together with plaintiff's costs, there would be still sufficient in court to pay Messrs. Ingledew, Ince, and Greening's costs, no part of which had been paid to them.

On 5th Nov. 1872, after the registrar's report had been made, the defendant being dissatisfied with the report and wishing to appeal to the court, which Messrs. Ingledew, Ince, and Greening refused to do as they advised him that they were precluded from so doing by the submission to the report, consulted other solicitors, Messrs. Thomas and Hollams, and they, giving notice to Messrs. Ingledew, Ince, and Greening, filed an appearance in the cause on behalf of the defendant, purporting to be an appearance entered by them "on behalf of William Styles Morton and others, the owners of the ship or vessel Oneiza, in lieu of Messrs. Ingledew, Ince, and Greening," and filed notice of objection to the registrar's report. No offer was made to pay Messrs. Ingledew, Ince, and Greening's costs in consideration of their consenting to a change of solicitors. Thereupon Messrs. Ingledew, Ince, and Greening filed the following notice of motion and served it upon Messrs. Thomas and Hollams.

We, Ingledew, Ince, and Greening, solicitors for the defendant in this cause, give notice that we shall by counsel, on the 19th day of Nov. 1872, move the judge in court to set aside the appearance entered by Messrs. Thomas and Hollams in this cause on behalf of the defendant, and to direct payment out to us, as defendant's solicitors, of the balance which will remain in court after payment thereof of the amount reported to be due to the plaintiffs, and their costs to be taxed, and to further order that defendant be not allowed to change his solicitors in this suit until our costs against him are paid, and to condemn defendant in the costs of this motion.

Kemp, in support of the application, submitted that the court would protect the solicitors, and would not allow a change of solicitors without payment of previous costs. This is the practice of the Courts of Common Law and Chancery. The second appearance entered should be set aside, as otherwise the original solicitors would lose their control over the fund in court, and would not be able to secure payment of their costs.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I think Mr. Kemp is entitled to have his application granted, and I shall make an order according to the terms of the notice of motion. Messrs. Thomas and Hollams have had notice of this motion, and therefore an opportunity of being here to-day. If they are desirous of entering an appearance they will be able to do so upon application after the taxed costs due to Messrs. Ingledew, Ince, and Greening, have been paid out of the registry. This apparently is the course of the practice in the Courts of Chancery and Common Law.

County Court appeal—Collission—Admission of fresh evidence at the hearing of the appeal.

The Court of Admiralty is very cautious as to admitting fresh evidence at the hearing of an appeal from the County Court, and will not do so unless the principles of justice require the admission of such evidence.

Semble, surprise is a ground for the admission of fresh evidence. An application for admission of evidence refused on the ground that there was no surprise shown.

This was an application on behalf of the appellants in an appeal from the County Court of Durham, holden at Sunderland, to admit fresh evidence at the hearing of the appeal. The cause was instituted (in personam) in the County Court by the respondent, Pietro Giacomo Cosulich, the owner of the Austrian barque Genio, under the County Court Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), sect. 3, sub-sect. 3, against James Laing of Sunderland, the owner of the steamship Moorsley, for damage by collision. The collision took place in the river

(a) This decision assimilates the practice of the Court of Admiralty to that of the Courts of Common Law and Chancery, and it would be still better if a rule of court were made that no change of solicitors could be made without the consent of the court. A solicitor has an undoubted lien on the fund in court, and the court will retain possession of the thing proceeded against until this lien is satisfied. (See The Heinrich, ante, p. 260; Haymes v. Cooper, 33 L. J. 438, Ch.; The Jeff Davis, L. Rep. 2 Adm. & Ecc. 1.) The same rule prevails in American Admiralty Courts: (See The Sarah Jane, Blatchford and Howland's Adm. Rep. 401; The Victory, J.C. 443; Gaines v. Travis, Abbott's Adm. Rep. 297, 301.) And in that country it is clear that a solicitor cannot be changed without the consent of the court: (See Sloo v. Law, 4 Blatchford's U. S. Circuit Court (Second Circuit) Rep. 268).—ED.

Tyne, and the County Court Judge held that the Moorsley was alone to blame, and condemned the appellant (the defendant below) in damages and costs. At the hearing in the County Court the evidence was taken down by a shorthand writer, and a transcript was brought up on the appeal. The County Court Judge was assisted by nautical assessors; but the opinions of these assessors differed on almost every question put to them by the judge. From affidavits filed by the appellant it appeared that two important witnesses had not been examined at the hearing in the County Court; one of them was not summoned by the neglect of the appellant's servants; the other, although summoned, was unable to attend. The affidavits alleged that if the witnesses had been present, there was reason to believe that the judgment would have been different. An affidavit filed by the respondents alleged that the appellant consented to try the cause without these witnesses; that the evidence was taken down by the shorthand writer sufficiently for the purposes of the appeal; and that the appellant knew that these two witnesses would not be present. These allegations were denied by the appellant's affidavits.

Clarkson, for the appellant, in support of the application.

Kemp, for the respondent, contra.—The appellants have shown no ground for the admission of this evidence. The decision in The Busy Bee (ante, p. 293; L. Rep. 3 Adm. & Ecc. 527; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 590) proceeded on the ground that the evidence was not taken down by a shorthand writer. Here it was. The appellants might have applied to the County Court judge to adjourn the case for the production of these witnesses. There was, therefore, no surprise on the appellants.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I am of opinion that I ought not to grant the motion. I say now as I said before, that I cannot be too cautious as to admitting fresh evidence on appeal. Before I can do so in any case, the circumstances must show that the principles of justice require the admission of such evidence. In this case I cannot find that there is any surprise on parties making this application owing to the absence of these witnesses. Moreover, the fact that this was such a doubtful case that the nautical assessors differed in their opinions is an additional reason why I should refuse this application. Now that this fact has appeared, it has become more clear where the pinch of the case was, and a great temptation exists to supply what was wanting by fresh testimony. Looking at all the circumstances of the case, I reject the motion.

Bottomry—Necessaries—Merger—County Court Admiralty jurisdiction—Transfer—Jurisdiction.

An instrument, drawn in the form of a bill of exchange for the payment of necessary disbursements for a ship, but which is payable after the arrival of the ship at her destination, and pledges the ship, "except in case of total loss," is, although not stipulating for maritime interest, a bottomry bond. (a)

A claim for necessaries, to secure the payment of which the master has given a bottomry bond on his ship, is merged in the bond, and cannot be enforced by the material men on the simple contract. (b)

Where a cause of necessaries is instituted in a County Court under the County Courts Admi-

(a) In considering what is a good bottomry bond, both American and English Admiralty Courts are agreed in holding that maritime risk is an essential element, and that unless the lender takes upon himself that risk, he can have no claim as for bottomry; he can only recover his money under that head on the safe arrival of the ship at the end of the voyage or at some defined place: (see The Atlas, 2 Hagg. 65; Simmonds v. Hodgson, 6 Bing. 114; The Brig Draco, 2 Sumner's U. S. Circuit Court (First Circuit) Rep. 157). In the last mentioned case Story, J., elaborately reviews the whole law of bottomry bonds. With regard to whether maritime interest is equally an essential, the authorities are not quite so clear. In the United States it has been said expressly in two cases that such interest is essential: (see Leland v. The Medora, 2 Woodbury and Minot's Circuit Court (First Circuit) Rep. 92; Greely v. Smith, 3 Id. 236, 248). In those cases, however, this is laid down on the authority of former English and American cases which scarcely bear out the doctrine. In The Atlas (ubi sup.), there quoted, it was not so held, and in The Emancipation, (1 W. Rob. 124, 130), Dr. Lushington said that it was not absolute necessary that a bottomry bond should carry maritime interest, but that the parties may be content with ordinary interest. In The Brig Draco (ubi sup.), Story, J., although defining bottomry to be a contract for the loan of money on the bottom of the ship at extraordinary interest upon maritime risks, does not lay great stress on the necessity for the great interest, but seems to consider the risk as the more important element; in that case the interest on the marine risk was 5 per cent. only, and therefore could hardly be called extraordinary, and yet the bond was not bad on that account. The case will repay a careful perusal, as it contains almost every authority on the subject existing at the time. In a later American case (The Sloop Mary, 1 Paine's U. S. Circuit Court (First Circuit) Rep. 671) no interest was claimed by the bond, and yet it was held good, the court saying that the interest was probably included in the amount secured, and that it ought to be so presumed. There can be no doubt that where the words indicating that the bond is subject to maritime risk are of doubtful construction, it becomes of importance to see whether maritime interest is secured, because as such interest is a usual stipulation in a bond, the fact that it is secured by the bond is evidence that the parties intended the bond to be a bottomry bond; on the other hand it is submitted that where the bond expresses clearly and unambiguously that the lender makes the loan subject to maritime risk, it is immaterial whether the bond stipulate for interest or not: (See The Royal Arch, Swab. 269, 280, 281.) If the lender is content to take the risk without interest, it is not for the Court of Admiralty to say that his security is bad on that account. He cannot be bound to claim more than he chooses, and if he waives his claim for interest that is his concern only. So long as the bond clearly expresses the maritime risk the question of interest ought to be immaterial. In the present case the money could not be recovered in case of total loss of the ship, and the loan was therefore subject to maritime risk, which the court held to be sufficient, without interest, to make the bond valid.—ED.

(b) There can be no doubt that this ruling is in accordance with true principles of law. Although the question has not arisen before in the Admiralty Court in this country, it has been considered in the United States, where it has been held that a bottomry bond given to cover money advanced for necessary repairs excludes and is inconsistent with the lien implied by maritime law to secure such advances—that is to say, the simple contract debt for the advances is merged in the bond: (See The Brig Ann C. Pratt, 1 Curtis Circuit Court (1st Circuit) Rep. 340; Bray v. Bates, 9 Metcalfe's (50 Massachusetts) Rep. 237.)—ED.

rality Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), and is transferred under sect. 8 to the High Court of Admiralty, and the petition of the plaintiff shows the claim to be based on a bottomry bond (the County Court having no jurisdiction over bottomry bonds), the High Court will reject the petition.

Semble, that where a suit is instituted in a County Court over which that court has no jurisdiction, the High Court of Admiralty cannot acquire jurisdiction by transfer, even if it has original jurisdiction in such a suit.

THIS was a motion to reject the petition filed in a cause of necessities against the owners of the brig Elpis. The petition was as follows:

Hillyer, Fenwick, and Stibbard, solicitors for the plaintiffs in a cause on behalf of Luigi Descabzo and Vittorio Brosinovitch, against the owner or owners unknown of the brig Elpis, say as follows:—

1. The above-named brig Elpis belongs to the port of Syra in Greece. In the year 1869 she was called by the name of the Carlos Primos, and was lying in the river Tyne, bound for Syra, and required certain necessary repairs to enable her to prosecute her voyage from Newcastle to Syra.

2. Vassiglio Colucoridis, the master of the said brig, being without funds and credit at Newcastle, and being unable to obtain money to enable him to get the said repairs executed and to pay the expenses necessary to be incurred to enable the said brig to prosecute her said voyage, applied to the said Messrs. Descabzo and Brosinovitch and Co., of North Shields, the plaintiffs in this suit, for the loan of 35*l.* sterling, which sum they lent him, to enable him to get the repairs executed and to pay the said expenses, upon the security of the following instrument, which was duly executed by the master of the said vessel:

“35*l.* sterling. North Shields, 20th Sept. 1869.

“Except in case of the total loss of my vessel, the Carlos Primos, of Syra, on her now intended voyage from Newcastle to Syra, I promise to pay, seven days after arrival there, to the order of Messrs. Descabzo, Brosinovitch, and Co., this first of exchange (second and third unpaid) the sum of 35*l.* sterling, at the course of exchange in London, value received in disbursements for the use and on account of my vessel Carlos Primos, and owners; and I hereby pledge myself and vessel and her owners for the payment of the above sum in the manner aforesaid. (Signed) V. COLUCORIDIS.”

3. In consequence of the said advance of money, the said brig was enabled to proceed on her said voyage and arrived safely in the port of Syra, and seven days after her arrival there, default was made in payment of the said instrument, which remains, and still is wholly due and unpaid.

When the vessel arrived at Syra as stated in the petition, she changed owners, and coming again to this country, a suit was instituted on Feb. 23rd 1872, in the County Court at Swansea, where she was lying, for these necessities. The summons in that suit was as follows:

Admiralty Jurisdiction, No. 26.

In the County Court of Glamorganshire, holden at Swansea.

Whereas a suit for money advanced for necessary expenses has been instituted in this court on behalf of Luigi Descabzo, of Williams-street-west, North Shields, shipbroker, against the owner or owners unknown of the brig called the Elpis, whereof Vassiglio Colucoridis is now or lately was master, in the sum of 35*l.*

You are hereby summoned to enter an appearance in the said suit within four clear days of the service hereof.

You are also warned that if you do not enter an appearance as aforesaid, the judge of this court will proceed to hear and determine the said suit, or to make such orders therein as to him shall seem fit.

Dated and sealed this 23rd Feb., 1869.

LEWIS MORRIS, Registrar of the court.

To the owner or owners of the brig Elpis, and all persons who have a claim to have any right, title, or interest in the said vessel.

An appearance was entered, and subsequently, on an affidavit that the vessel was about to leave the port, the vessel was arrested under sect. 22 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), and thereupon the sum of 35*l.* was paid into the County Court as security, and the vessel was released, and left the country. It then appearing that it was necessary to examine witnesses abroad, and the County Court having no power to issue a commission, the County Court judge, under sect. 8 of the above Act, transferred the cause into the High Court of Admiralty. A præcipe was thereupon filed in the latter court as follows:—

In the High Court of Admiralty of England.

The Elpis.

We, Hillyer, Fenwick, and Stibbard, hereby institute a cause of necessities (by transfer) on behalf of Luigi Descabzo and Vittorio Brosinovitch, against the owner or owners unknown of the brig Elpis, belonging to Syra in the kingdom of Greece, in the sum of 200*l.*

The plaintiffs then moved to re-arrest the ship for the sum of 200*l.*, to secure the costs of the commission, whereupon it was admitted by the defendants that the Elpis was the Carlos Primos; that Colucoridis was the master, and signed the bill or instrument above referred to; and that default was made in payment of the bill on the safe arrival of the ship at Syra. The commission was thereupon abandoned, and the plaintiffs filed their petition.

The defendants' solicitors thereupon gave the following notice of motion:

We, Ingledew, Ince, and Greening, solicitors for the defendants in this cause, give notice that we shall by counsel on the 10th Nov. 1872 move the judge in court to reject the admission of the petition filed in this cause, or order it to be amended on the following grounds:

As to rejecting the admission—

1. That the petition discloses a cause of action over which the County Court had no jurisdiction.

2. That the action is a personal action, and the petition does not allege personal liability in the present defendant.

As to the amendment of the petition—

That the petition does not in the heading correspond with the præcipe to institute.

Clarkson, for the defendants, in support of the motion.—The power given by the 8th section of the Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 is not to reject a cause and give leave to institute another in this court, but to transfer a cause already pending. This cause was instituted below in the sum of 35*l.*, but a præcipe has been filed in this court in a “cause of necessities by transfer in the sum of 200*l.*” The nature of the cause is omitted in the heading of the petition, but the whole of the petition discloses a cause of bottomry. The County Court has no jurisdiction over bottomry bonds, and prohibition would lie if such jurisdiction were exercised. By sect. 8 the court has before it the suit instituted in the County Court; the præcipe in the court below was in a suit “for money advanced for necessities.” It now appears that the money was advanced on the security of an instrument which was a bottomry bond. A claim for necessities is a claim which must be paid in any event; but a bottomry bond is payable only on the safe arrival of the ship pledged. Here payment was only to take place on the safe arrival of the ship at Syra, and this therefore is clearly a bottomry transaction. Different considerations arise in cases of bottomry and in cases of necessities. Foreign ships are subject to a lien for necessaries supplied in England, and that lien is enforceable in this country; whereas when money is advanced here on bottomry the money is payable, not here, but on the arrival of the ship at her port of destination. Again, this is not a proceeding in rem, although the suit was instituted after the passing of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51), by which proceedings may be in personam or in rem. The suit was instituted against "owner or owners unknown;" the summons was served on the ship; and, lest the ship should have been removed from the jurisdiction, the plaintiff compelled the payment into court of the money under sect. 22 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868. That is clearly a proceeding in personam; and, if so, then the defendants are not liable. If this is a bottomry bond there is no personal liability on the part of the defendants, as they were not parties to it. This is clearly a bottomry bond, there being maritime risk: (The Nelson, 1 Hagg. 169.) If this is not a bottomry bond, then the court has no jurisdiction, and there is no claim enforceable here; for this is a bond of some sort, and this court has no power to enforce bonds other than bottomry bonds: (The Indomitable, Swab. 446, 451.) This is not a bill of exchange, as such an instrument is payable in all events, whilst this is only payable on the safe arrival of the ship. The uncertainty which makes it not a bill of exchange makes it a bottomry bond depending on maritime risk. Again, the suit having been instituted in the County Court, the Admiralty Court cannot acquire jurisdiction by reason of a mere transfer. If this is a suit de novo in this court, then it is not rightly instituted, because it appears that the suit was originally for necessaries, and now the face of the petition discloses a cause of bottomry.

Gainsford Bruce for the plaintiffs, contra.—Admitting for the sake of argument that this instrument is a bottomry bond, there still exists, apart from the bond, a claim for necessaries. At common law no doubt a rule exists that any simple contract claim is merged in an instrument under seal. In this court, however, there is no such decision, and there is no reason why the plaintiff, because he chooses to take an instrument of this character, may not also proceed to recover his money in a suit for necessaries, using the instrument as evidence of the supply of the necessaries, always supposing that the ship arrives safe. He may claim on his simple contract, which is not merged in the bond, and can enforce it before a competent court without falling back on his bottomry security. If he can do this in a court competent to enforce both contracts, then in the inferior court he can enforce the simple contract, and the County Court therefore has jurisdiction. But this is not a bottomry bond, because the fact that the bill is payable after arrival is not sufficient bottomry security, nor is there any maritime interest stipulated: (The Indomitable, ubi sup.) [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—There is in this instrument the very essence of a bottomry bond, namely, maritime risk, and I cannot consider it otherwise, although there is no maritime interest.] Then the court has a greater jurisdiction in a transferred suit than the original court, and, if the suit turns out to be a bottomry suit, the court can take cognisance of it. The fact that the nature of the suit is not set out is of no consequence, as the plaintiff has a claim either on the instrument or on his simple contract. There is no rule of practice in this court requiring the nature of the suit to be set out in the heading of the petition, and it is usual in the registry to enter causes without placing them under any specific heading as to the cause of action. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE: That, no doubt, is the practice of the court; I am so informed by the registrar. But if you wish to claim in this suit for necessaries, you ought to strike out of your petition this instrument to put yourself in order.] That I am willing to do, using it as evidence. The defendant says that the claim for necessaries is merged in the bond, and yet that he, not being a party, is not bound by it. This is inconsistent. The plaintiff's claim for necessaries is against the owners, but the suit is in rem, within the meaning of that term as used in this court. The form of summons used is the only one in such a case provided by the rules and orders. The right to arrest the vessel only existed when she was about to leave the jurisdiction. There are only two forms of summons under the rules established for the County Courts: (See General Orders for regulating the practice and procedure of the Admiralty Jurisdiction of the County Courts 1869; Forms.) No. 3 form is directed to all persons interested in the property, and is served on the ship, and calls upon all such persons to come in and defend, and therefore the proceeding is in rem. No. 3 form is the in rem summons; No. 4 form is the in personam summons. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE: You must elect whether you will proceed in a cause of necessaries, and, if so, whether you will amend by striking out the instrument.] I elect to proceed in a cause of necessaries, and will amend if the court permits it.

Clarkson in reply.—If this is a claim for necessaries, it is improperly instituted, and the court has no jurisdiction; it cannot acquire jurisdiction by consent. The cause of action is on a bottomry bond, and nothing else. The plaintiff might have sued in this court in the first instance. He would then have been in a court of competent jurisdiction, with an appeal to the Privy Council as of right. If this case proceeds, there will be no appeal except by leave of the court. This is a hardship on the defendants. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I agree that the County Court, having no jurisdiction, could not give this court jurisdiction by transfer; but, as this court has jurisdiction in both bottomry and necessaries, cannot the court entertain the cause on the plaintiff waiving the claim for bottomry, and proceeding on his claim for necessaries?] The plaintiff has pleaded that the money was advanced on the security of this instrument. If he withdraws it from his petition, the defendant can give it in evidence to show that his claim was on a bond, and not on simple contract. Then it will appear that there was a merger, because if the ship had been lost the debt would have been extinguished. If there is an independent claim for necessaries, that could not be so extinguished. The necessaries claim must therefore be taken as merged in the bond, there being no claim on the loss of the ship. The proper course for the plaintiff is to abandon his suit, and recommence in this court.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I have entertained very considerable doubt during the argument as to the course I should pursue in this case; but upon the whole I am inclined to think that my decision must be adverse to the petition. Now, the case which was transferred to this court under the authority of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), sect. 8, is a cause of necessities in a certain suit, entitled Luigi Descabzo and Vittorio Brosinovich v. the Owner or Owners unknown of the brig Elpis. This being a cause of necessities, the case disclosed on the petition of the plaintiffs, filed in this court, is a case of bottomry. The words in the petition which set forth the plaintiff's claim are as follows: (The learned judge then read the second paragraph of the petition as far as the instrument.) Then the petition sets out the instrument, which is as follows: (The learned judge then read the instrument, set out in paragraph two of the petition.) Now, it is clear to me that this is in substance and effect, having regard to the fact that maritime risk is there introduced, a bottomry bond; and, looking to the precedents in this court, it must be so considered. There is great force in the observation of Mr. Clarkson, that the rule of merger must be applied in this case, because it is admitted that the simple contract debt for necessities could not exist in case of the ship not reaching her destination, and therefore the only contract which the plaintiff could enforce was a contract arising out of a bottomry bond. It is quite clear that this petition cannot be sustained, and, although I am very reluctant in a question involving so small a sum to put the parties to further expense, I must not only refuse to allow the petition to be amended, as I suggested to Mr. Bruce in the course of the argument, but I think I must reject the petition, leaving the plaintiffs to bring a bottomry suit in this court, and to begin de novo. I am also afraid that I must reject it with costs. I shall make no order as to other costs in the cause, but only as to the costs incurred in respect of this petition. I do not interfere with this suit further than by rejecting the petition.

THE ADA; THE SAPPHO.

Collision—Crossing vessels—Taking pilot—Regulations for preventing collisions at sea—Arts. 14 and 19.

The fact that two steamers, upon crossing courses, are bearing down at the same time upon a well-known pilot station to take pilots on board, is not such a special circumstance within the meaning of Art. 19 of the Regulations for preventing Collisions at Sea, as will justify a departure from Art. 14 requiring the ship, which has the other on her own starboard hand, to keep out of the way of the other.

THESE were cross causes of collision, instituted respectively on behalf of the owners of the Sappho, against the owners of the Ada, and on behalf of the owners of the Ada and the owners of cargo laden therein against the Sappho and her owners intervening. The Sappho was a screw steamship of 895 tons register and 120 horse-power, manned by a crew of twenty-two hands all told, and at the time of the collision was bound on a voyage from Dantzic to Hull with a cargo of grain and shoddy. The Ada was a screw steamship of 560 tons register, manned by a crew of twenty hands all told, and at the time of collision was bound from Ibraile to Hull with a cargo of barley. The collision occurred at the entrance to the river Humber, about a mile and a half S.S.W. of the Spurn light vessel, between that light vessel and the Sand Haile buoy. Near the place of collision a Hull pilot cutter was lying at anchor, waiting to supply vessels with pilots, this being a usual place for pilot cutters to be in fine weather. She lay with her head to the N.E. The tide at the time was running S.W. at the rate of about a knot and a half an hour, and the weather was clear and the sea calm.

The case on the part of the Sappho was that shortly before 5 p.m. on 11th Jan. 1872 she arrived about a quarter of a mile to the north-east of the Spurn Light vessel; she was then heading about south-west, with the light vessel on her starboard bow, and with her regulation lights burning brightly. As she generally got a pilot below the Spurn Light, when abreast of it her engines were eased and a blue light was burned as a signal for a pilot, and immediately after, in making out the pilot cutter, her engines were stopped. The pilot cutter was then about a mile off. The Sappho's engines were not set on ahead again until after the collision. About the same time that the Sappho's crew made out the pilot cutter, the mast-head and green light of the Ada were seen at the distance of about one or two miles from the Sappho, bearing three or four points on her port bow. The Sappho drifted down towards the pilot cutter, with the tide and the way she had on her. She had steerage way on her all the time. When she came abreast of the pilot cutter, a pilot boat, containing both the Sappho's and the Ada's pilots, came alongside of her to put a pilot on board, and made fast to her. According to the evidence of the senior pilot on board the cutter, the Sappho was going with the tide past the port side of the cutter, at the rate of three knots an hour; this speed was, as said by one of the pilots in the boat, such that he could easily have got on board. As the Sappho passed the stern of the pilot cutter her master ordered her engines to be reversed, which was done. The Ada, with her masthead and green lights only open to the Sappho, came on past the pilot cutter, and although the Sappho's engines were reversed full speed astern, and the Ada was hailed to go astern, the two vessels came into collision. The Sappho's stem struck the Ada's starboard-bow. The collision occurred about one hundred yards astern of the pilot cutter. The master of the Sappho said in his evidence that he acted upon the rule that the Ada, having the Sappho on her starboard hand, was bound to keep clear of the Sappho. The Ada was charged by the owners of the Sappho without neglecting "to take proper measures to go astern of the Sappho" and with neglecting "to stop and reverse in due time."

The case on the part of the Ada was, that at the time mentioned, she arrived at the mouth of the Humber, and was steaming slowly in the usual course for vessels entering the Humber from the S.E. till she got within a mile to the S. of the Spurn Light, and about two hundred yards from the pilot cutter. Her engines were then stopped to receive her pilot, and her head lay about N.W. by N. She had her lights burning brightly and also a signal light for a pilot. Those on board her then observed the three lights of the Sappho about three-quarters of a mile off on the starboard beam. At this time it was alleged that the Ada had no headway on her, but only going with the set of the tide, and the pilot cutter was also on her starboard beam. The Ada passed the cutter at right angles to the cutter's stern, and when she had got past about her own length, the Sappho struck her although the engines of the Ada were reversed full speed. The Ada sank about half an hour after. The Sappho was charged by the owners of the Ada with "proceeding at an improper rate of speed," with not complying "with the 16th and 19th articles of the regulations for preventing collisions at sea," and with improperly neglecting "to keep clear of the Ada."

The main question of fact in the case was as to which of the two vessels came up first to the pilot cutter, the Ada alleging that she was there at the time that she first saw the Sappho three-quarters of a mile off. Several pilots from the cutter were called by the defendants, and from their evidence it appeared that the two vessels arrived about the same time, but that as the Sappho was the vessel most inside the cutter, the pilot boat was first sent to her. The evidence of the senior pilot on board the cutter, which was relied upon in the judgment of the court, was as follows:

Q. To the best of your judgment, knowing the Sappho was coming down with the tide, bringing her straight to your cutter, must not the Ada have more headway through the water than the Sappho had?—A. At the first time we see her she must have been—I can't say at the time of the collision; she must have been coming faster.

Q. But the Ada must have had more headway than the Sappho; do you understand me?—A. Yes, I understand you.

Q. Must not the Ada have more headway on her than the Sappho?—A. The tide was in favour of the Sappho; the Ada was coming across it.

Q. That being so, and seeing they arrived at your cutter at nearly the same time, must not the Ada have more headway on her through the water than the Sappho?—A. I can't say what she had at first; she had very little at the last.

Q. You did mean to send the first pilot?—A. To the Sappho.

Q. Did you order the pilots into the boat, or what?—A. I said, "Hold on astern, to see which is first."

Q. What did you do next?—A. Ordered the boat to pull away to the Sappho; I did not know it was the Sappho—they were both Sapphos to me.

Q. Was that because the Sappho was up first?—A. The nearest.

Q. The Sappho was inside of your cutter, was not she?—A. Inside of her.

Q. When you ordered the boat away to the Sappho, which was inside your cutter; was the Ada then outside?—A. Outside—on our outside quarter.

Q. If the Ada had stopped where she was at that time, would there have been a collision?—A. No, that there would not.

Q. Now, I must put it to you: was it not this that caused the collision, the Ada coming on after that? now, to the best of your judgment?—A. I don't wish to have anything to do with that; if the Ada had stopped there she would not have been in collision.

Q. Was there anything to prevent the Ada stopping there?—A. No, nothing.

The cause was heard before the judge, assisted by Trinity Masters.

Butt, Q.C. (E. C. Clarkson with him) for the Sappho.—The vessels were crossing vessels, and therefore the Ada, having the Sappho on her starboard hand was bound to keep out of the Sappho's way under Rule 14. The only ground on which this rule can be held not to apply is that both vessels were on the look-out, for the pilot cutter, and that the Sappho should have known that the Ada must take the course she did. If, however, the Sappho arrived first, this is no excuse, as the Ada would then have been bound to avoid her. The Sappho did arrive first; this is clear from the fact that the pilot boat containing both pilots went to the Sappho first. The Ada was bound to have ported and gone under the Sappho's stern, or to have stopped till the Sappho had passed.

Milward, Q.C. (W. G. Phillimore with him) for the Ada.—The Sappho knowing that the Ada was stopped to get a pilot, had no right to attempt to run across the Ada's bows. This case is not within rule 14, but rather within rule 19 which provides that, "in obeying and construing these rules due regard must be had to all dangers of navigation; and due regard must also be had to any special circumstances which may exist in any particular case rendering a departure from the above rules necessary in order to avoid immediate danger." Is it within the ordinary rules of prudence and navigation that a steamer, seeing another lying in wait for a pilot close to a pilot station well known to both, should cross the course of that other steamer? The necessity for taking a pilot at that place was a special circumstance rendering a departure from rule 14 necessary. The Sappho should have slackened speed and allowed the Ada to pass ahead of her.

Butt, Q.C., in reply.

Sir R. J. PHILLIMORE.—This is a disastrous case of collision between two screw steamers, the Sappho and the Ada. It took place on the 11th Jan. 1872, at about 5 p.m. near the Spurn Light at the entrance of the River Humber. The weather at the time was fine, it being according to the evidence of one of the witnesses a beautiful evening, the sea was smooth and lights were plainly visible. The collision was caused, therefore, by the misconduct or negligence of one of the two vessels or of both. The Sappho was heading S.W. with her Spurn Light on her starboard side, and the Ada was heading N.W. by W. a short distance off and southward of the Spurn Light. Close to that light was the pilot boat which both vessels were seeking for the purpose of taking on board a pilot. From this statement of the facts it will appear that the Ada had the Sappho on her starboard bow, and that the vessels were crossing vessels within the meaning of Rule 14 of the Sailing Regulation, and that it was therefore prima facie the duty of the Ada to get out of the way of the Sappho. It has, however, been submitted that the question which the court has to consider is whether any circumstances have been shown on the part of the Ada to take her out of the operation of this rule, and it was contended that the latter portion of the 19th rule which provides that "due regard must also be had to any special circumstances which may exist in any particular case, rendering a departure from the above rules necessary in order to avoid immediate danger," applies. It was contended that the circumstance that both vessels were bearing down upon a well-known pilot station in search of a pilot, made it right that the Sappho should have taken some step to avoid the Ada, and that the Sappho ought to have supposed that the Ada would stop at or near the place at which she did actually stop. Now it appears that the lights of the Sappho were first seen from the pilot boat, and she being the inside vessel, the senior pilot ordered that she should be the first vessel to which the pilot should be sent; and accordingly the boat was first sent to her. It may be observed here, with reference to another point in the case, that after the boat got alongside, and was being towed by the Sappho, her speed was such that she could easily have been boarded by the pilot. I may as well deal in passing with that part of the defence which was advanced for the purpose of showing that the 16th sailing rule as to slackening speed applied, and that the Sappho was to blame for not doing so, and that he was therefore, at least partly to blame. The court is satisfied that the speed of the Sappho was not more than three knots when the pilot boat got alongside of her. The effect of the tide would not be to bear the Sappho down upon the Ada but to carry the Ada away from the Sappho. The Elder Brethren are of opinion the speed of the Sappho was not an improper speed for her to be going at at the time, and that it was not such as to involve risk of collision if the Ada had fulfilled the duty imposed upon her by obligation of law. The evidence satisfies us that the Sappho was not to blame for the collision in this respect. It has not been very distinctly stated beyond this what the Sappho ought to have done. On the other hand, the best witnesses in this matter are from the pilot cutter, and the Elder Brethren think with me that no witnesses are so competent to give evidence on the point, more especially the senior pilot. There is no answer to a portion of the evidence. It is true that this witness was produced by the Ada, but he had no bias on behalf of either the Ada or the Sappho, and meant to give his evidence for the information of the court, as it was his duty to do. He was examined as follows: [His Lordship read the passage from his evidence before set out.] The last question and answer I have just read are very pertinent to the question at issue. I confess that from the time that evidence was brought to the notice of the court that the task to overcome it was too great even for the ability of the learned counsel for the Ada. Having given my best attention to the evidence, and consulted the Elder Brethren, I have arrived at the conclusion that there were no special circumstances requiring a departure from rule 14, and that the Ada is, therefore, alone to blame. There is a cross action, and the usual result will follow in that action.

Salvage—Two suits in different courts—Amount in which suits are instituted—Evidence—Practice. In a salvage suit evidence of the amount in which another suit has been instituted in another court for services rendered at the same time is not admissible.

THIS was a cause of salvage instituted on behalf of the owners and crews of three luggers and a smack against the French screw steamship the Antilope, and her cargo and freight, for services rendered to that vessel whilst ashore in Dungeness Bay.

The case was heard before Sir R. Phillimore at Westminster, and, during the examination of one of the defendants' witnesses (one of the defendants' solicitors), it appeared that another suit had been instituted in the High Court of Admiralty on behalf of a steam tug called the City of London in respect of services rendered at the same time.

Phillimore, for the defendants, then asked the witness who were the plaintiffs in the High Court of Admiralty, the names of their solicitors (the same solicitors appearing for the plaintiffs in both suits), and then proposed to ask the amount in which the suit was instituted in the High Court.

R. E. Webster, for the plaintiffs, objected to the question.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE refused to allow the question to be put, upon the ground that the court would not allow the amount at which other persons value salvage services to be brought to its notice.

Collision—Regulations for preventing collisions at sea applicable to English and United States vessels in the high seas—Rule as to not rendering assistance after collision not applicable—Merchant Shipping Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 68, ss. 33), 58, 61.

The law administered by the Admiralty Courts of

(a.) Vice-Admiralty Courts have been in existence in the different British possessions from a very early date, and now there are Vice-Admiralty Courts in nearly all our principal colonies. Their jurisdiction was originally co-extensive with that of the High Court of Admiralty of England, but certain other powers were given from time to time by statute. Nor was their jurisdiction extended at the same time as that of the High Court; for in 1859 the Privy Council held that their powers were only those of the High Court before the passing of the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65: (The Australia, 13 Moore P.C.C. 132; Swab. 480). There was even doubt as to this jurisdiction; for in 1832 an Act (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 51) was passed to give power to the King in council to make regulations for the practice and fees in the Vice-Admiralty Courts, and to remove doubts as to the jurisdiction. By that Act, sect. 6, the Vice-Admiralty Courts were declared to have jurisdiction over suits for seaman's wages, pilotage, bottomry, damage to a ship by collision, contempt or breach of the regulations and instructions relating to his Majesty's service at sea, salvage, and droits of Admiralty. This was the same as the then existing Admiralty jurisdiction. As to prize matters there seems to have been no doubt. Rules for the courts were made by the Privy Council in the same year, and were printed and published by the Government in 1842. They will also be found at the end of Stuart's Vice-Admiralty Decisions, Lower Canada. The last-mentioned Act was repealed by the Vice-Admiralty Courts Act 1863 (26 & 27 Vict. c. 24) except as to the rules, which are still in force. This Act now regulates the jurisdiction of the Vice-Admiralty Courts (see sects. 10, 11, & 12). The appointment of vice-admirals and judges is made by commission issued

Great Britain and the United States, relating to all rules of navigation and rules concerning lights in case of collision on the high seas, is the same.

In British Admiralty Courts, decisions in cases of collision between British and American ships rest directly upon the rules, as accepted expressions of law; because her Majesty having, by the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), s. 58, the power, by order in council, to order, on it appearing that a foreign country is willing that the British rules should apply to the ships of that country when beyond British jurisdiction, that the rules shall so apply, did, on an Act of Congress of the United States being passed, enacting that identical rules should apply to United States ships order that the British rules should apply to United States ships beyond British jurisdiction, the Act of Congress being considered as the required consent; and because, by sect. 61, whenever such order in council is issued, foreign ships are to be treated in British Admiralty Courts, with respect to such rules, as if they were British ships. In the United States Admiralty Courts, the decisions are founded upon the general law and usage of the sea, as evidenced by written rules or statutes identical in the two countries, there being no such provision in the Act of Congress as sect. 61 of the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act 1862.

The steamer Scotia (20, L. T. Rep. N. S. 375; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 223), followed.

The rule contained in the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act 1862, sect. 33, that the omission by any ship, after a collision, to render all practicable assistance to another, shall be presumptive evidence against the former that she is in fault, does not apply to United States ships, because that rule has not been adopted by the United States.

A steamer is bound, both by British and United States law, to keep out of the way of a sailing vessel, and to keep a good look-out. The duty to keep a look-out is especially incumbent upon a steamer going at a rapid pace in hazy weather, in an ordinary track of vessels trading from one port to another.

THIS was a cause of damage instituted by the owners of the English barque A. H. Badger against the American steamship Nevada. The facts and arguments are sufficiently set out in the judgment, which was a considered written judgment.

Sir ALFRED STEPHEN.—This is a case of collision on the high seas on the 15th Oct. last, occurring between this colony and New Zealand—the Badger (as I shall throughout call her) being on a voyage to Auckland from the port of Newcastle, in New South Wales, heavily laden with coals and maize, out of the High Court of Admiralty of England; but the governor of a British possession is ex-officio Vice-Admiral, and the Chief Justice, or principal judicial officer, is ex-officio judge of the court, on a vacancy occurring, until a formal appointment is made. The form of the commissions will be seen by reference to the appendix of Stuart's Vice-Admiralty Decisions. Powers are given to appoint deputy and assistant judges by 30 & 31 Vict. c. 45, and provision is there made for the appointment by similar commissions of these courts in any possession already possessing legislative powers. The list of Vice-Admiralty Courts will be found in the schedule to the Vice-Admiralty Courts Act 1863; but, in addition to those there mentioned, there is a similar court at the Straits Settlements, and by their charters of 1865 the High Courts of the three Presidencies of India have vice-admiralty powers: (See The Portugal, 6 Bengal Law Rep. 323.)—ED.

and the Nevada, proceeding from Auckland to Sydney on her usual mail trip, with letters and passengers. The Badger was an English barque of 337 tons register, but had on board on that voyage about 480 tons. The Nevada is a steamship of 2400 tons, belonging to citizens of the United States. The wind, on the night in question, was from the north-west, or about N.N.W.—a seven or eight knot breeze; and the Badger's course was east half north true, or east by north half north, according to compass. Her spanker boom was over the quarter—she being on the starboard tack, with main and foresail set, and making about six knots an hour. The Nevada was steering nearly due west by compass, or west quarter south true; and her speed, at the time of the collision, was about ten knots—rather more than less. The night was confessedly dark and hazy; and the accident occurred between ten and eleven o'clock; somewhere about a quarter before eleven—although some of the witnesses say it was past that hour. According to the evidence on both sides, neither vessel was seen by any one on board the other until a very few minutes before the striking. The Badger, indeed, was seen scarcely a minute before it. There is the usual amount of conflicting testimony as to what then took place or was seen and heard on board the vessels respectively. It is certain however, that at or about the time named, in that dark night, the two vessels came in contact with each other; the Badger, with her helm recently put hard to port, and her head thus turned slightly to the south, being struck by the Nevada's bow violently on the port side, near the mizen chains, and thereby receiving fatal injuries, which the next day led to her destruction and abandonment. An attempt to reconcile the evidence to which I refer would, as in almost every case of the kind, be hopeless. But, on a careful review and consideration of the whole, assisted previously as we were by the able and elaborate comments of the counsel on both sides, Cheeke J. and myself—his Honour having been good enough to sit with me in the case—have satisfied ourselves as to the more material facts; and the following are our conclusions on them: We think that the Badger had lights at the time of the collision, but we doubt if they were properly placed; and we do not believe that the starboard light, considering its state and the probable state of the wick, although both lights appear to have been still burning, could have been seen by the Nevada except at a short distance—in the relative position of the two vessels. We do not find, consequently, that both lights of the Badger were in a proper condition at the time. On the other hand, it is proved that all the lights of the Nevada were burning, and we believe in perfectly good order. But we cannot resist the conclusion that there was an insufficient look-out on board that vessel; and that had there been a proper and vigilant watch kept by her, the collision would not have happened. We are unable to say, notwithstanding the imperfect state of the Badger's lights, that she contributed to her misfortune; within the rule, at all events, which would render the liability for the damage divisible between these vessels. It appears to us, that the Nevada would equally have run into her, whatever the state of the Badger's lights. The evidence satisfies us that the Nevada's people gave no thought whatever, or no sufficient thought, to the probability or the chances of meeting another vessel in that wide sea; and that, as no vessel was looked out for, so until too late for safety none was in fact seen. It was not until close upon the Badger that an order was given on board the Nevada to port her helm, or, as alleged by one witness, to stop her. But she certainly was not stopped; and, if the other order was obeyed (the collision being almost instantly afterwards), there is no evidence that she diverged from her course for a moment. It is a matter merely of opinion, not of deduction from evidence, whether in the state of the atmosphere, and at night, in that part of the ocean which she was traversing, the Nevada ought to have maintained so high a rate of speed. On that point our opinions differ. But we entirely agree in this—that, considering all those circumstances, and that she was in the ordinary track of vessels trading between this colony and New Zealand, the Nevada, steaming along at that rate, was bound to have observed an unusual degree—to have exhibited in short the highest degree of vigilance. And assuredly, as we conceive, had that degree of care and watchfulness been manifested, or even, we think, an ordinary amount of care, the Nevada's people, notwithstanding her speed and the state of the weather, might have discerned the Badger in sufficient time to avoid the catastrophe. According to the known and accepted rules, recognised almost universally among the nations for the guidance of vessels at sea, it was especially the duty of the Nevada, as a steamer, to keep out of the way of the Badger, and, if both had been sailing vessels, the Nevada's duty (the Badger being on the starboard tack) would have been the same. Lastly, we must express our regret that the striking ship did not stop after the collision to ascertain whether any and what injury had been done, and to render assistance if required. It is due to her captain to say that he could scarcely have been aware, if at all, of the violence which attended the collision; for he was not on deck at the time, although he came up immediately afterwards and saw the Badger at a short distance astern. He was told, it seems, that his ship had “come near running down a barque,” and that it was thought they (the Nevada, as I understand it), had fouled her boom. It is very difficult to believe that the officers on deck really supposed this to have been the extent of the mischief; but if they did, the fact would strengthen our conclusion that their observation of the occurrence throughout was a most imperfect one. Tothill, a passenger on board the Nevada, though he calls the shock a slight one, was awakened from sleep by it; and Hutton, the engineer, heard “the crash,” and thought that they “had run over” a schooner. Maddock, another passenger, was awakened by a noise as if all the machinery had got loose and fallen. Watson, another passenger (all these being called for the defence), described as a seafaring man, says that there was “certainly neglect somewhere”—which we understand to mean neglect on board the steamer—and that he thought the mate ought to have stopped her. But, however this may be, we do not found any inference on the fact of the Nevada's not stopping, in aid of our conclusion that she is to blame for the collision. The English enactment, indeed, that the omission shall be presumptive evidence against the striking vessel, appears not to have been yet adopted in the code of the United States. That presumption, however wisely established in the interests of humanity, as well as for the preservation of property endangered by collision at sea, is clearly an artificial one, and cannot be made in the absence of express legislative provision. As matter of inference, or legitimate deduction naturally, the fact of pursuing her voyage without stopping to inquire or render assistance furnishes in itself no evidence, on the question of legal culpability, against the striking vessel. The evidence as to the Badger's lights is, that they were fastened to the mizen rigging, nearly 4ft. (or between 3ft. and 4ft.) above the rail; not projecting beyond the sides, but, on the contrary, a little distance in board—about 14in. or perhaps 16in. But there appear to have been side screens, sufficient probably to prevent the confusion of colours. The witnesses for the respondents, however, all declare that they saw no light whatever except on their own ship; whilst the chief mate, helmsman, and seaman (Thorop) on the look-out in the Badger, swear that they saw no light on the Nevada. Two other sailors of the Badger, Kennedy and Allahorn, say the same; and that, in fact, there was no light exhibited by the steamer. We nevertheless are persuaded, from the overwhelming testimony on the other side, that they are either perjured or mistaken. The Badger's lights would, of course, to a vessel approaching in nearly the same line, be considerably obscured by the sails. With respect to the look-out, and the circumstances at the time of and immediately preceding the collision, the evidence of the principal witnesses is in substance as follows: [The learned judge then set out this evidence, the effect of which was that the weather was very hazy, that those on board the Badger hailed the Nevada to stop before and after the collision, so as to be heard on board the Nevada by some persons, but not by the crew, who declared that they heard no cries from the Badger; that there was only one man on the look-out on the Nevada; that although the blow occasioned great injury to both vessels, the crew of the Nevada, as they declared, felt no shock; but it appeared that several persons on board the Nevada, the captain among the rest, were awakened by the collision.] Can we believe, on such testimony, that a proper look-out was kept that night—even if we could hold, that one man alone in such hazy weather, with a ship steaming along at such a rate, was enough for the duty. As to the loss, it remains only to say that after pumping great part of that night, throwing portions of the cargo overboard, and making sundry ineffectual efforts to patch over the hole, the captain and crew were fortunate enough, soon after daybreak, to fall in with the barque Alice Cameron, on her way from Auckland to Sydney. The master (Peter Carter) and the carpenter of that vessel state, that they carefully examined the Badger's injuries, and considered her state to be such that she could not possibly prosecute her voyage, or the crew remain in her with safety. They say that she could not in their opinion be repaired; that she was cut down to the water's edge, through eight or ten planks, which were splintered along about fifteen feet; that her mizen rigging was gone, her main topmast backstays were broken, one of the yards was hanging in two pieces, sundry chain plates and bolts were drawn, and there was a hole in her side two feet and a half square. The master and crew were accordingly taken on board the Alice Cameron; and afterwards the injured vessel was scuttled and sunk—that, as Captain Carter states, she might not by floating about do mischief to other vessels in that track. It is not our intention to comment on any of the numerous cases cited on the argument before us—or to mention others which we have consulted. But, as doubts were suggested at an early stage of this suit, respecting the adoption of the English (or, as we may legitimately call them, the European) Rules of the Road at Sea, by the United States, it may be well to show exactly how the law stands touching that matter. And we prefer to do this by citations from the exhaustive judgment of an American judge, Blatchford, J., presiding in the United States District Court at New York, in Admiralty, on the 8th May 1869. The judgment was originally reported by R. D. Benedict, a practitioner in that court, and will be found in 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 375-380 (see also 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 223). It was the case of the British steamer Scotia, sued by the owners of the American sailing ship Berkshire, for a collision in the Atlantic Ocean, whereby the latter vessel was wholly lost. The learned judge decided that the Berkshire was solely in fault, because of her not only not carrying the lights prescribed alike by the British and American law, but carrying solely the light appropriate (under those laws) to a steamer, and thus misleading the Scotia. In so deciding, he cites and reviews several recent English cases, particularizes the enactments of the two countries, and explains the principle on which he in effect applied them. He held, first, that as enactments merely, each binding separately the country in which it was passed, the laws in question could not govern the case; since they were not international, or mutually operative in both countries—our statute, or the rules made in pursuance of it, not (as such) affecting American subjects, nor any Act of Congress or rules under the latter affecting British subjects. But, secondly, inasmuch as the rules framed under each statute, embracing lights, fog signals, and navigation, and having for their object the preventing of collisions at sea, were in substance, if not in terms identical, and as rules to the same effect had been adopted by nearly every State (if not every State) in Europe, and by several States elsewhere, including the United States, he held that those rules constituted or had become, by the consent or recognition of the same States, the law maritime or general law of the sea. According to that law, therefore, so evidenced, in other words, according to “the rules of navigation and usages of the sea, usually prevailing and observed,” the learned judge adjudicated in the case. After reciting the English Act of 1862 (the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act, 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), and the regulations for preventing collisions promulgated under it on the 9th Jan. 1863, Blatchford, J., specifies the Act of Congress, and the “steering and sailing rules” thereby established, as having been passed on the 29th April 1864. He then quotes sect. 53 of the English Act, by which, whenever it shall be made to appear to Her Majesty that the government of any foreign country is willing that the regulations for preventing collision for the time being in force under that Act, or any provision of the Act relating to collisions, shall apply to the ships of such country when beyond the limits of British jurisdiction, Her Majesty may, by order in Council, direct that such regulations, and all such other provisions as aforesaid, shall apply to the ships of such foreign country, whether within British jurisdiction or not. The judge proceeds as follows:—“The Act of Congress of April 1864, was regarded, and properly, as an expression by the United States Government of a willingness that the British regulations made in Jan. 1863,—which were substantially identical with those contained in the Act,—should apply to ships of the United States when beyond the limits of British jurisdiction. Her Majesty, therefore, by an Order in Council published on the 30th Aug. 1864, directed that such regulations should apply to all sea-going ships of the United States, whether within British jurisdiction or not.” He then enumerates the countries which had, in the year 1863, signified a like willingness—proclaimed in like manner by order in council; and others which had acceded to the regulations subsequently. And finally he refers to sect. 61 of the English statute; by which it is enacted that, whenever an Order in Council has been issued applying any such regulation, or any provision of the Act, to the ships of any foreign country, such ship shall in all cases arising in any British court be subject to such regulation or provision,—and for the purpose of such regulation or provision, be treated as if they were British ships. Practically, therefore, in respect of all rules of navigation, and rules concerning lights, the law administered in the Admiralty Courts of Great Britain and the United States, in cases of collision on the high seas, is the same. The simple difference is this: that in the United States, there being no clause in the Act of Congress corresponding with sect. 61 of our Act, the decisions are founded on the general law or usage of the sea, evidenced by written rules or statutes identical in both countries, whereas in the British courts the decisions rest directly on the rules, as the accepted expression of that law and usage. With respect, however, to sect. 33 of the English Act, enacting that the omission by any ship after a collision to render assistance to the other, as far as may be practicable, shall be presumptive evidence against the former that she is in fault, we do not find any adoption of it by the United States, or, indeed, any other foreign country. That provision, therefore, is clearly not applicable to foreign vessels. Even if adopted, however, the principle established by the case of the Scotia, and those there cited (The Wild Ranger more especially, in the High Court of Admiralty, Lush. 565), would seem to preclude its application to a British vessel in an American Court, although it might (under sects. 58 & 61 of the Act of 1862) be applied to an American ship in a British court. With one more citation, directly bearing on the case before us, we take our leave of Mr. Justice Blatchford’s elaborate and able judgment. He states the general law of navigation to be, as held by the Supreme Court of the United States irrespective of any statutory regulation, that when a steamer is meeting a sailing vessel, whether close hauled or having the wind free, the latter has a right to keep her course; and that it is the duty of the steamer to adopt such precautions as will avoid her. “When a steamer approaches a sailing vessel,” he says, “the former is required to exercise the necessary precaution to avoid a collision. If this be not done, the steamer is prima facie chargeable with fault; and the excuse, to exempt her, must be clearly established by strong circumstances.” He adds citing in proof the regulations of each country, "The duty thus imposed on a steamer is the same, in character and extent, with that prescribed by statute in both Great Britain and the United States." The grounds of the decision in the District Court would, however, appear more in consonance with English decisions. Other American Admiralty Courts have held that the British law is not to be applied to a British ship meeting an American vessel on the high seas: (The Brig Belle 1 Benedict District Court (S. Dist. of N. Y.) Rep. 317). —Ed.

(b) In addition to the rules regulating the practice of the Vice-Admiralty Courts mentioned in the foot-note to The Nevada (ante, p. 477), several rules amending and altering the former rules have been brought into operation mainly through the instrumentality of the present learned Registrar of the High Court of Admiralty, Mr. Rothery. By an order in council bearing date the 25th of June 1851, the 25th sect. of the rules and regulations of 1832, which related to "Prosecutions for a Breach of the Laws for the Abolition of the Slave Trade," was expunged, and new rules and regulations for that purpose were substituted, and were ordered to be observed in all such cases by all the Vice-Admiralty Courts then established; and a Vice-Admiralty Court having been established at St. Helena on the 24th Dec. 1840, the rules of 1832 as amended by this order were applied to the court at St. Helena, and tables of fees were also established for that court. By an order in council of 6th July 1859 additional rules and regulations were established for the several Vice-Admiralty Courts. These rules assimilated the practice of the Vice-Admiralty Courts to the practice of the High Court of Admiralty as established by Dr. Lushington in 1855. They provided for the bringing in of preliminary Acts in collision causes, and for pleading; they ordered that no witnesses should be examined till the pleadings were concluded; that witnesses might be examined viva voce in court, by the registrar or an examiner in chambers, or by a specially appointed commissioner; that the proctors or their substitutes might be present at the examination before the registrar, &c., but not the parties except for the purposes of pointing out the several witnesses. In an examination before the registrar, examiner, or commissioner, the question must be put by the registrar, examiner, or commissioner. The rules further provided for the employment of a shorthand writer, for the production of witnesses on a reference before the registrar, and for the printing of pleadings and proofs. An order in council of the 11th Feb. 1852 applied the then existing rules and regulations to the Vice-Admiralty Court of Hong Kong, which was established on the 4th Feb. 1846, and provided for that court a table of fees, and also a table of fees for all Vice-Admiralty courts then existing in cases of prosecution against vessels captured on the ground of being engaged in the slave trade. By an order in council of the 22nd Oct. 1859 rules, orders, and regulations touching the practice to be observed in Vice-Admiralty courts in proceedings instituted on behalf of Her Majesty's ships came into force. These rules were passed to carry out the provisions of the Navy Pay and Prize Act 1854. By an order in council of the 9th Sept. 1865 these rules were abolished, and new rules, which were rendered necessary by the passing of the Naval Agency and Distribution Act 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 24), were made, under the powers conferred by the latter Act and by the Vice-Admiralty Courts Act 1863 (26 Vict. c. 24). This completes the list of rules applicable to the practice of these courts; but the rules are at present under revision, and will probably be materially altered.

It would appear that prohibition will lie to a Vice-Admiralty Court from the Superior Court of common law of the colony or dependency in which the Vice-Admiralty Court is established, to restrain the latter court from exceeding their jurisdiction in instance causes: (Key and Hubbard v. Pearse cited in LeCauw v. Eden, Dougl. 584, 606, 609; Lindo v. Rodney, Dougl. 613, 619). The power to grant prohibition seems to belong to the courts of common law of the colonies, because they, on their establishment, carry with them the common and statute law of the mother country, and by the law of England the Superior Courts may prohibit the Admiralty, and consequently the courts of the colonies have the same right: (Lindo v. Rodney, ubi sup.). No prohibition, however, can issue to the Vice-Admiralty Courts in prize matters: (Key and Hubbard v. Pearse, ubi sup.). That case was an appeal from a prohibition issued by the Court of King's Bench of the province of New York to the Vice-Admiralty Court of the province in a prize matter, and Chief Justice Lee, sitting in the Court of Delegates, expressly holds that no prohibition will go in such a case, the question being merely that of prize or no prize, which is purely for the prize court to determine. There are several instances in which prohibitions have issued to Vice-Admiralty Courts in instance causes: (See Hamilton v. Fraser, Stuart's Reports of Lower Canada Cases, 21, where the power to grant prohibition is discussed; Ritchie v. Orkney, Ib. 618; The Margaret and Isabella, Select Cases in the Supreme Court of Newfoundland, 548). The commissions by virtue of which the judges sit in prize cases are totally distinct from those by which their jurisdiction is conferred in instance matters.

In the case of a war between this country and any foreign State it may be a matter of importance to consider what Vice-Admiralty Courts have prize jurisdiction. This jurisdiction is not conferred on the High Court of Admiralty and each Vice-Admiralty Court by a separate commission, but a commission is issued under the Great Seal of the United Kingdom to the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty at the commencement of each war authorising and enjoining them "to will and require the High Court of Admiralty of England and the lieutenant and judge of the said court and his surrogate or surrogates, and also the several Courts of Admiralty within our dominions, possessions, or colonies, which shall be duly commissioned, and they are hereby authorised and required to take cognizance of and judicially to proceed upon all manners of captures, seizures, prizes, and reprisals of all ships, vessels, and goods already seized and taken, and which hereafter shall be seized and taken, and to hear and determine the same, and according to the Court of Admiralty and law of nations to adjudge and condemn all such ships, vessels, and goods as shall belong to "the Sovereign of the State against which war is declared or his subjects. The Lords of the Admiralty thereupon issue their warrants to the judges of the several courts requiring them to exercise the prize jurisdiction. Now owing to abuses of power by certain courts in the West India Islands, and in the American Colonies in the beginning of the present century, and owing also to the fact that these courts claimed to exercise the prize jurisdiction by virtue of their constitution, and without a warrant being issued at the commencement of a war, the prize jurisdiction was taken away (in A. D. 1801) from all these courts, except those of Martinique, Jamaica, and Halifax, Nova Scotia, and an Act (4 Geo. 3, c. 96) was passed providing salaries for the judges of those three courts, which were given power over all the West India Islands and the Continent of America in prize matters. Martinique being afterwards ceded to the French, a Vice-Admiralty Court with prize jurisdiction was established in Barbadoes: (see preface to Stewart's Vice-Admiralty Rep., Halifax, Nova Scotia).

that is the British possession, in which the court is established.

A master can only claim against his ship for disbursements from the date on which he is placed on the ship's register as master.

After the year 1801, nearly all commissions establishing Vice-Admiralty Courts in the different colonies were issued, empowering the Lords of the Admiralty to give other Vice-Admiralty jurisdiction, "but withholding, however, from the said court the usual authority to try prize causes." These commissions may be seen in the Admiralty Registry at Doctors' Commons in the Munitment Books. The first with that clause inserted is that of Trinidad on 26th June 1801. The Act 41 Geo. 3, is repealed by 27 & 28 Vict. c. 23; but by 27 & 28 Vict. c. 25, regulating the proceedings with respect to prize in time of war, the High Court, and every Court of Admiralty, or of Vice-Admiralty or other court exercising Admiralty jurisdiction in Her Majesty's dominions, "for the time being authorised to take cognisance of and judicially proceed in matters of prize, shall be a prize court within the meaning of that Act." Now the Lords of the Admiralty are empowered by the commission to require those Courts of Admiralty in the British possessions and colonies, "which shall be duly commissioned," to take prize jurisdiction, and as by the Act just quoted only those courts are prize courts which are duly authorised, it would seem that only those Vice-Admiralty Courts to which the Lords of the Admiralty may choose to issue their warrants would be duly commissioned to hear prize causes; and in practice the power to hear such causes is given only to a limited number of courts, a list of which is furnished to the commanders of Her Majesty's vessels in order that they may know where to take prizes for adjudication. It is clear that without the warrant of the Lords of the Admiralty no Vice-Admiralty Court would have jurisdiction in prize cases.

In addition to the Vice-Admiralty Courts mentioned in the note (ante p. 477), a Vice-Admiralty Court was established at Aden by a commission to the Lords of the Admiralty dated the 30th May 1861, but its powers were limited to the adjudication of slave trade cases. The first judge of this court was appointed by letters patent of 2nd July 1861, under the great seal of the High Court of Admiralty. On the 10th May 1865 a further commission was issued giving to this court all the powers conferred by statute upon Vice-Admiralty Courts in slave trade cases, and providing that the political resident for the time being should be vice-admiral and judge in default of a special appointment. The political resident for the time being has since exercised the powers, there having been no special appointment. By various orders in council Vice-Admiralty jurisdiction has been conferred upon Her Majesty's Consuls at Zanzibar, Muscat, and Madagascar. The order in council for Zanzibar is dated 9th Aug. 1866; for Muscat, 4th Nov. 1867; for Madagascar, 1st July 1869. The words conferring the jurisdiction are the same, mutatis mutandis, in each order, and are as follows: "And it is further ordered, that Her Majesty's Consul within the dominions of the Sultan of Muscat (Sultan of Zanzibar, or Queen of Madagascar) shall, for and within the said dominions, and for vessels and persons coming within those dominions, and in regard to vessels captured on suspicion of being engaged in the slave trade within those dominions have all such jurisdiction as for the time being ordinarily belongs to courts of Vice-Admiralty in Her Majesty's possessions abroad." These orders in council confer a very extended jurisdiction on the consuls, but it has been commonly supposed that the words above given confer only slave trade jurisdiction; they are, however, wide enough to confer all Vice-Admiralty jurisdiction. The propriety of instructing such an extended jurisdiction to consuls, not being lawyers, may be questioned. The restricted construction hitherto put upon these words probably arose from the fact that in 1869 an Act of Parliament (32 & 33 Vict. c. 75) was passed to remove difficulties which had arisen as to the granting slave bounties for vessels condemned at Zanzibar. No Act has been passed with reference to Muscat or Madagascar. In the case of Muscat the bounties could probably be granted under 11 & 12 Vict. c. 128, which confirmed the treaty with the Imaum of Muscat as to the slave trade.—ED.

A master is not deprived of his lien for wages and disbursements by the fact that he has taken a mortgage on the ship for the balance of his wages and disbursements, more especially if the shipowner has concealed from him the fact that there was a prior mortgage. (a).

THIS was a suit in rem by the late master of the steamship Albion, to recover his wages and certain disbursements for necessaries made on account of the ship. The case was heard in June 1872, and judgment was now given.

The Attorney-General (Stephens) and Fellows for the respondent (the shipowner).

Sir WILLIAM STAWELL,—This was a suit by the master of the steamer Albion for wages, and for disbursements for necessaries, on account of the ship. A question has been raised whether necessaries can be recovered in this court. The jurisdiction of the court has been conferred by the Imperial Act 26 Vict. c. 24. That statute enacts, by sect. 10, that the courts shall have jurisdiction over claims for necessaries supplied in the possession in which the court is established, to any ship of which no owner or part owner is domiciled within the possession at the time of the necessaries being supplied. "Possession" there means British possession; and as the necessities in this case were not supplied in a British possession, the suit, as merely one for necessities, cannot be entertained. The suit must therefore be limited to wages and disbursements. At the outset difficulty arises as to the time when the petitioner really became master. It is a singular circumstance that there should be a dispute upon such a point, but so it is; and there are peculiar circumstances on this point which bear on the whole of the suit. In Sep. 1868, the petitioner applied to be appointed master of the Albion, and, hearing that the vessel was for sale, he accompanied his offer with a proposal that he should be allowed to purchase an interest in the ship. That offer was entertained, and it was arranged that he should be master at 200 dols. per month; and that, as regards the purchase, he should pay a certain sum down, and the remainder should be secured. After the arrangement was made the owner declined to complete it, but at the same time expressed a wish that the petitioner should become master. Petitioner refused the offer unless his salary was raised to 250 dols. per month. According to his version it was then agreed that he should be master, and I agree with him, and for this reason, that afterwards and before he became formally master he advanced 5000 dols. to pay off the crew, and for that amount he merely got a note of hand. I do not think he would be so unwise as to advance 1000*l.* of our money, merely secured by a promissory note or piece of paper from a person who was not in particularly affluent circumstances, unless he had some other position than the prospect of his becoming master. It was in October that the petitioner became master by arrangement; but he was not placed on the registry until the December following. In the meantime another person was on the registry as master. Now, wages can only be paid by the master, and disbursements made by the master. There cannot be two masters to pay wages and make disbursements. Although I believe that there was an arrangement that the petitioner should be master, it does not follow that I have jurisdiction to recognise wages and disbursements by a person whose name does not appear on the registry. I am, therefore, obliged to limit the time from which the amount for disbursements is to be taken to Dec. 1868. I leave the wages an open question at present. I shall discuss it on the registrar's report coming up, for prima facie the petitioner is entitled to a reference to the registrar and merchants from Dec. 1868 to June 1870. It is said, however, that his maritime lien on which his rights are founded has been abandoned by him, in consequence of his taking a mortgage for the amount of the balance of wages and disbursements due to him, and the sum of 500 dols. which he had first advanced, and another sum of 2000 dols., which he had subsequently advanced. That argument is founded on the case of The William Money (2 Hagg. Ad. 136), where it was held that a seaman, who had elected to take at Calcutta a bill of exchange on the owners instead of cash, in payment of his wages, could not sue the ship on payment of the bill being refused, the owners having become bankrupt. That is the only case I can find directly bearing upon the subject, and upon careful examination it appears to be sui generis. I do not think that a maritime lien is disposed of because the holder pursues one of two courses that may be inconsistent with the lien.

(a) If fraud and concealment had not been found by the learned judge it is, to say the least, doubtful whether the master could have retained his lien after taking a mortgage on the ship for the amount of his wages and disbursements. It is quite true that in the case of a seaman it is very difficult indeed to induce a court to hold that he has divested himself of his lien; but that is upon the ground that sailors, who are uneducated men, have to deal in respect of their wages with merchants who are much their intellectual superiors, and the Court of Admiralty will not allow any advantage to be taken of a sailor's act by which he gives up his lien, unless it clearly appears that the sailor understood at the time that he accepted any other security, that he was abandoning his right to claim against the ship. This, however, is scarcely applicable to a master, who is more able to look after his own interests. In the Betsy and Rhoda (Davies, Adm. (District of Maine) Rep. 112), it was held that the acceptance of a negotiable promissory note by a sailor in payment of his wages did not destroy his lien, unless it was so expressly agreed. This does not conflict with Lord Stowell's decision in The William Money (3 Hagg. Adm. Rep. 136), because the ground of the decision in that case was that the sailor, having taken the bill as an accommodation to himself, must abide by the risk. Another similar case is The Eastern Star (Ware's Adm. (Dist. of Maine) Rep. 184). Even a release under seal given by seamen is no absolute bar to a claim for wages against the ship, so long as it is proved that they have not been paid: (The David Pratt, Ib. 509; see also Jackson v. White, Peters Adm. (Pennsylvania Dist.) Decisions 179; Whiteman v. The Neptune, Ib. 180.) It seems to be a recognised rule that so long as a sailor does not alter the nature of his security, that is to say, so long as the additional security taken by him remains a simple contract, he does not lose his lien. It is, however, intimated in The Betsy and Rhoda (ubi. sup.), that if a seaman were to take a higher security, such a deed under seal giving something in pledge for the debt, his simple contract debt would be merged in the deed, and he could no longer enforce his lien. This would appear to be the reasonable doctrine, and would accord with the doctrine that bottomry bonds given to secure advances for necessaries put an end to the lien for necessaries: (see The Elpis, ante, p. 472, and note thereto.) The only answer to this would be that, as a lien for wages takes precedence of a mortgage, the mortgage is not a better security than the lien, and, therefore, the master's lien would not be destroyed, but the mortgage treated as an additional security. This might be a good answer in the case of seamen, but could scarcely apply to a master who must know his own interests. An Admiralty Court would scarcely go so far as to say that the mortgage deed did not absorb the simple contract debt.—ED.

In the case cited, the seaman was offered his wages, and refused to take them. Here the respondent swears he offered petitioner the money. The petitioner swears he did no such thing; that he would only have been too happy to receive it had it been tendered. After giving the matter my best attention, I believe the petitioner, and think that however glad he was to lend the money in the first instance, he was then willing to get it back. There is no doubt that the respondent would have been glad to get rid of the petitioner and take the steamer away; still I think that he did not tender him any money. In the case of The Simlah (15 Jur. 865) it was held that a master who took a bill of exchange was still entitled to sue for his wages. But there is another reason why I think that the master has not abandoned his lien. The master agreed to take a registered mortgage, it is true, and this mortgage was registered, but it was registered subsequently to another one given by the respondent. It is admitted that the existence of this last-mentioned mortgage was concealed from the petitioner; and not only was it concealed, but the respondent told an untruth about it. He was particularly asked if there was a mortgage to any other person, and he said there was not. I do not think that the respondent acted fairly in the matter; he granted another to a relative of his for a larger amount than to the petitioner, and he acted in such a way that that relative was able to register his mortgage before the petitioner. In my opinion there was fraud of such a character that even if the petitioner would have otherwise abandoned his lien on the vessel, the respondent is not entitled to take advantage of it. As to the 5000 dollars, it is said that although they are not disbursements made by a person in the position of master at the time, they are to be regarded in the light of necessities, because they were advanced to pay off the crew that was in a state of insubordination. I do not think, however, that the facts go so far as to justify me in regarding them as necessities. There remains, however, another view of the matter which has not been presented by counsel, but in which I think this case is to be regarded. The respondent has put in a counter claim to the master's, and I think that enables the master to go into the whole account current between him and the ship. The point was not taken during the argument, and I do not wish to decide it until the report of the registrar has been brought up, and counsel have had an opportunity of addressing themselves to it. I shall direct accounts to be taken in three different ways. Refer to Registrar and merchants to take an account; First, of all wages whether before or after, and of the disbursements between 4th Dec. 1868, and 15th June 1870; secondly, of payments made specifically on account of such wages or disbursements, or appropriated by the petitioner thereto; thirdly, of amount due to petitioner on account current between him and the steamship Albion, including wages, disbursements, and necessities on one side, and all payments on the other; with power to report special circumstances. JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

ON APPEAL FROM THE HIGH COURT OF ADMIRALTY.
Reported by J. P. ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Dec. 4 and 5, 1872.

(Present: Sir JAMES W. COLVILLE, Sir BARNES PEACOCK, Sir MONTAGUE E. SMITH, Sir ROBERT P. COLLIER.)

THE RANGER; THE COLOGNE.

Collision—Navigation of the River Thames—Practice of the river—Pleading.

There is a practice for steam vessels, going down Greenwich Reach in the river Thames on a flood tide, to keep the north side of the river in rounding the point.

Where a steamer is going up Greenwich Reach, and sights, two points on her starboard bow, the red lights of another vessel coming down the reach along the north shore, the vessel going up being further to the southward of the channel than the vessel coming down, the two vessels are not to be considered as crossing vessels, within the meaning of Art. 14 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at sea. The vessel going up the river has no right to suppose that the vessel coming down is crossing from one side of the river to the other, but is bound to suppose that the vessel coming down the river, will, in accordance with the practice of the river and her consequent right, keep along the north shore. The vessel going up should keep to the southward of the vessel going down; and if the former ports, so as to attempt to pass to the northward of the vessel coming down, and so brings about a collision, she is alone to blame (a). An allegation in a petition that the vessel proceeded against in a collision cause was "considerably further out to the north side of the river than" the other vessel, and improperly ported, and so brought about a collision, is sufficiently proved, to entitle the owners of the vessel making the allegation to recover, by showing that the vessel proceeded against was further over to the south side of the river than the other, and improperly ported. The word "considerably" need not be proved to the full extent.

THESE were appeals from decree of the High Court of Admiralty of England, in cross causes of damage instituted in that court, the one on behalf of William Malcolmsen and others, the owners of the steamship Ranger, against the steamship Cologne, and her owner intervening; the other on behalf of the General Steam Navigation Company, the owners of the steamship Cologne, against the steamship Ranger, and her owners intervening.

(a) It has been laid down in a long series of United States decisions that where there is a well ascertained usage in ascending or descending a river, the omission to comply with that usage, if such omission contribute to a collision, is a fault for which the offending vessel and her owners must be responsible: (See The Vanderbilt, 6 Wallace (U. S. Supreme Court) Rep. 225; Goslee v. Shute, 18 Howard's (U. S. Supreme Court) Rep. 463; The Relief, Olcott's Adm. (S. Dist. of N. Y.) Rep. 104; The St. John, 7 Blatchford's Circuit Court (2nd Circuit) Rep. 220). But these decisions apply only to steamers meeting; where a steamer, pursuing a usual course down or up the river, meets a sailing vessel, the fact that the steamer is in such a usual course does not alter the general rule that the steamer must get out of the way of the sailing vessel: (See The E. C. Scranton, 3 Blatchford's Circuit Court (2nd Circuit) Rep. 220.)—ED,

There were pleadings in the Admiralty Court in the latter suit only, and these pleadings contained the main facts of the case. The petition filed on behalf of the Cologne was as follows:—

1. Shortly before midnight on the 5th Jan. 1871, the paddle wheel steam vessel Cologne, 324 tons register, and 120 horse power, whilst on a voyage from London to Ostend, was proceeding down the river Thames, and rounding the Isle of Dogs on the north side of the said river.
2. The tide at such time was about one hour and a half before high water, the weather was fine and clear, and it was bright moonlight, and the Cologne was proceeding under steam at the rate of about from seven to eight miles an hour, with her proper regulation lights duly exhibited and burning brightly, and with a good look-out being kept.
3. The Cologne, under her starboard helm, proceeded to round the point, keeping over to the north side of the said river, and when a little below the lower end of the Millwall ironworks the above-named steam vessel Ranger was seen with her green lights open at the distance of about from one-half to three quarters of a mile from the Cologne, and slightly on her starboard bow.
4. The Ranger was considerably further over to the south side of the said river than the Cologne, and the Cologne was kept under a starboard helm along the north shore; and the Ranger, with her green and masthead lights only open, appeared for some time to be intending to pass to the southward of, and on the starboard side of the Cologne, as she could and ought to have done, but instead of so passing the Cologne, the Ranger improperly ported her helm, and caused immediate danger of collision, and although the helm of the Cologne was thereupon put hard a-starboard, and her engines were ordered to be stopped and reversed, the Ranger with her stem struck the Cologne on her starboard paddlebox and sidehouse, and did her a great deal of damage.
5. Those on board the Ranger did not keep a proper look-out.
6. Those on board the Ranger neglected to take proper measures for avoiding a collision with the Cologne.
7. The helm of the Ranger was improperly put to port.
8. The said collision was occasioned by the improper navigation of the Ranger.
9. The said collision was not in any way occasioned by the Cologne.

The answer on behalf of the Ranger was as follows.—

1. The screw steamship Ranger, of the burthen of 308 tons register, or thereabouts, propelled by engines of 40-horse power, being tight, staunch, strong, substantial, and well found, and navigated by her said master and crew of twenty-three hands, left the port of Waterford, in Ireland, on the 31st of Dec. 1870, laden with a general cargo, bound to the ports of Plymouth and London.
2. Shortly before 11.50 p.m. on the 5th Jan. following (1871), the wind was about N.W., and the tide was flood, and of the force of about two knots an hour. The weather was fine and clear, and it was moonlight; and the said steamship, in the prosecution of her said voyage, was proceeding up Greenwich Reach of the river Thames, upon the north shore, and steaming at the rate of about four and a half to five knots an hour. The Ranger had the Admiralty regulation lamps, to wit, a bright white lamp at the foremast head, a green lamp on the starboard side, and a red lamp on the port side, duly exhibited and burning well and brightly and a good look-out was being kept from on board her.
3. Whilst the Ranger was thus proceeding, a steamship (which afterwards proved to be the Cologne) was seen at a distance of about three-quarters of a mile, and bearing about one point and a half on the starboard bow. The Cologne came on down the river, exhibiting her masthead and port lights only to those on board the Ranger, and in a direction to pass the Ranger upon her port side, and the Ranger was kept on her course along the north shore. The Cologne kept on as if intending to pass the Ranger on her port side, until she neared the Ranger, and then suddenly altered her course and attempted to pass to the northward of the Ranger, and rendered a collision between the said two vessels inevitable, and although the helm of the Ranger was put hard a port, and her engines were stopped and reversed full speed, the Cologne ran into, and with her starboard fore sponson struck the Ranger upon her stem, and did her considerable damage, and forced the Ranger aground on the north side of the river.

4. Save as herein appears, the defendants deny the truth of the several averments in the plaintiff's petition.

5. The said collision was occasioned solely by the improper navigation of the Cologne.

6. The said collision was in no degree occasioned by the Ranger, or those on board of her.

The pleadings were thereupon concluded.

The collision occurred in Greenwich Reach, about 150 feet from the edge of a wharf belonging to the Thames Conservancy, and about 150 feet below a dumb barge, moored to the north shore, and used for the purposes of a ferry called Potter's Ferry. The tide at the time was last quarter's flood, and the barge, being moored to and from shore according to the tide, was in shore at the time.

According to the case set up on behalf of the Cologne, those on board that vessel first sighted the green light of the Ranger when the Cologne was opposite Deptford Creek. The Cologne at this time was to the northward of mid-channel, coming down the north side of the river under a starboard helm, and the green light of the Ranger bore about half a point on the Cologne's starboard bow. On seeing the Ranger, the master of the Cologne starboarded his helm about a point. Before passing Potter's Ferry no other light of the Ranger became visible to those on board the Cologne, but just before the collision the Ranger opened her red light. As the Cologne passed the ferry, her master noticed that the Ranger was porting, and hailed her to keep her helm to starboard, and ordered the Cologne's helm hard a starboard, and her engines to be stopped and reversed; his orders were obeyed. Before these orders the Cologne was heading straight down the north shore, but at the time of collision she was heading in towards the north shore. The master of the Cologne, who had been in the employ of the same owners for thirty years, and for ten years a master mariner, and constantly during that time navigating the river Thames, alleged that there was a practice for steamers coming down the Thames in a flood tide to keep along the north shore. As to this practice, Capt. James, the chief harbour master of the river Thames for twenty years, was called on behalf of the owners of the Cologne; his evidence was as follows:—

Your jurisdiction extends from where to where?—At present it extends from Greenwich to London Bridge.

Well, it was formerly from Yantlet Creek?—Yes, from Yantlet Creek. [THE COURT: Does that include the place of this collision?—Butt, Q.C.: Yes, my Lord.]

Butt, Q.C.—Where do you live?—I live at Greenwich.

You say from Greenwich to London Bridge. Where does it cease; at what part in the river—your jurisdiction, do you know exactly?—Opposite Child's Coal Wharf; you will find them at East Greenwich.

That is below the hospital?—Below the hospital.

How far below?—A short quarter of a mile.

You were in attendance here yesterday?—Yes.

Now you, I suppose, being harbour master, know this reach pretty well—Greenwich and Limehouse Reach both?—Yes.

Now, is there any practice as to which side of the river vessels coming down—steamers coming down are to keep in—coming down from Limehouse Reach into Greenwich Reach through Blackwall Reach with the flood tide?—They generally keep on the north shore.

THE COURT.—Vessels coming down with a flood tide generally keep on the north shore?—Keep on the north shore out of the track of vessels coming up in the tide which would be on the south shore.

That would be the reason of the practice?—I suppose so.

Butt, Q.C.—Is there any practice for vessels coming up with the flood tide going on the south shore?—Yes; they generally keep in the tide; but this reach is a very circuitous reach, a form of horseshoe, so that there cannot be any absolute rule made for that reach.

When you speak of the practice, do you speak of an invariable practice, or a practice sometimes followed?—An invariable practice by all ships when they possibly can navigate upon the north shore going down with the flood tide.

Cross-examined.—That is to say they keep well over, according to your notions; keep well into the north shore?—Yes.

Not rather to the northward of mid-channel?—Well over to the north shore.

You say they keep well over to the northward of mid-channel?—Well over to the north shore, as close as they can go.

Not rather to the northward of mid-channel?—Over to the north shore.

Not over?—Not over, no; over to the north shore. There's only 900 feet of navigation there.

When you get out of Limehouse Reach; Limehouse is very circuitous, is it not?—No; that is straighter than in Greenwich Reach.

How far could two vessels see one another clear of the land in Greenwich Reach?—A ship at the lower part, where my office is, would see a ship coming out of Limehouse Reach.

How far off is that—what distance?—I should think about half a mile clear.

Examined by the COURT.—You say vessels go down on the north shore when they can; what do you mean by when they can?—When there is nothing else working up on that shore.

Then vessels would not go down on the north shore if a vessel was working up on the north shore?—No, could not go down then; but at nearly high water no ship would be working there, there would be no tide for her.

The case set up on behalf of the Ranger was, that when she was off Cubitt's Town Church, a little below Greenwich Hospital, and well over on the north side of the river, the mast head and red light of the Cologne were sighted, the latter vessel being about opposite Deptford Creek. The Cologne's lights bore about two points on the Ranger's starboard bow. The Ranger's helm was then ported to round the point, and to bring her nearer in to the north shore. It was alleged that the Cologne was to the southward of mid-channel; that she starboarded, and so brought about the collision. The vessels came together about three minutes after they first sighted each other, and when there was actual danger of collision, the helm of the Ranger was put hard a port, and her engines stopped and reversed, so that by the action of her screw her head might be thrown to starboard, but it was then too late. Her master, who had had twenty years' experience, denied that there was any practice for vessels to come down on the north shore, and alleged that the ordinary rule of the road applied. Whilst he was under examination on this point, the learned judge of the Admiralty Court said; "As at present advised, I should not be influenced by this, as the Elder Brethren say there is no practice, no river regulation; it is no use pursuing it;" but he gave leave to the owners of the Cologne to produce evidence as to the practice of the river, which was afterwards done, and is before set out. The master of the Ranger said that it was his practice to keep along the north shore coming up the river, so as to pass vessels port side to port side.

The main fact in dispute between the parties was, as to which of the two vessels was farthest over to the southward when they sighted each other. The causes were heard at the same time before Sir R. Phillimore, assisted by Trinity Masters, and he held that both vessels were navigating along the north shore, and that both were to blame. His judgment is set out in the judgment of the Judicial Committee. From these decrees the owners of the Ranger appealed, and the owners of the Cologne adhered to the appeal.

The appellants' reasons for appeal were (amongst others), as follow:—

3. Because the evidence proved that the Cologne, when she first saw the Ranger, must have seen that the Ranger was proceeding in her course up the river upon the north shore, and therefore the Cologne ought not to have starboarded her helm so as to place herself across the course of the Ranger.

4. Because the evidence proved that the Ranger followed the proper course of navigation by keeping along the north shore, and took all proper measures to avoid the collision.

Milward, Q.C. and Gainsford Bruce, for the appellants (the owners of the Ranger).—Both vessels ought to have ported their helms, according to the ordinary rule of navigation. This the Ranger did, and she is therefore not to blame. According to The Esk and Niord (ante, p. 1; 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 167; L. Rep. 3 P. C. 436), vessels are free to navigate either side of the river so long as they take proper measures to avoid collision. The Ranger had a right therefore to be on the north side of the river, and the Cologne was wrong, according to the same case, in attempting to cross from south to north of mid-channel, if such crossing caused danger of collision. In The Velocity (21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 686; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 308; L. Rep. 3 P. C. 44), it was held that vessels navigating the river Thames are not to be treated as crossing vessels, when pursuing a course up or down the river, and in so doing rounding a point in the river; but, at the same time, it was held that they might navigate on either side. Since the decision in that case, there has been no settled rule of navigation in the river. There should be some rule laid down. The only known rule is that of port helm. It is not enough to say that one vessel must get out of the way of another; but it ought to be pointed out how this is to be done. In a reach of a river, vessels should be treated as meeting, not crossing, vessels, if they are following the course of the river. The reach ought to be considered for the purposes of the course they should pursue as straightened out. The Regulations for preventing collisions at sea do not apply (The Velocity, ubi sup.), and the only rule that can be applied is, that both should port their helms. The only ground that the Cologne had for starboarding was, that the Ranger was south of mid-channel when sighted; but the court below found that the Ranger was to north of mid-channel. The Cologne, even if her contention is right on other points, is not entitled to recover on the pleadings, as it is alleged in her petition that the Ranger "was considerably further over to the south side of the said river than the Cologne;" whereas, in fact, both vessels were on the north side. There is no allegation as to the practice of the river. The only allegation charging the Ranger with blame is, that she "improperly ported." The Ranger was right in porting, and therefore there is no allegation entitling the Cologne to recover, which is true in fact.

Butt, Q. C. and Clarkson, for the respondents (the owners of the Cologne).—The question is as to the duty of two vessels rounding a point in opposite directions. On this point the judgment of the court below does not find sufficient facts; it overlooks the question of the practice of the river. Since the case of The Velocity (ubi sup.), the Admiralty Court has declined to give effect to any practice in the navigation of the river. There is such a practice in the navigation of Greenwich Reach, viz., that vessels coming down should keep along to north shore, and others going up should keep to the southward. If there is a practice to that effect, then the presumption is against the vessel that violates it. In The Velocity (ubi sup.), such a practice was proved, and such a practice is reasonable, considering that sailing vessels coming up must keep over to the southward to keep in the tide, and that steamers must therefore keep over to the northward to keep out of their way. The case of The Esk and Niord (ubi sup.), is not applicable to the present facts, as there the points which the vessels were rounding was on the south side of the river, and not on the north, as here. The rule of port helm cannot apply, as these vessels were not in any way within the rule as to meeting vessels, as explained by the Order in Council of 30th July 1868. They were not meeting end on. The Ranger never ported for the Cologne, but to go round the point. If, then, the port helm rule does not apply, and the vessels are not to be treated as crossing vessels, that is, if none of the statutory rules apply, then the ordinary rules of navigation applicable in the particular place must be applied, and if there is a well ascertained course for vessels coming down the river and another for vessels going up, that course should be followed. The Ranger should have kept to the south, and the Cologne to the north; the Cologne did so, and is not to blame, if the Ranger had held on her original course there would have been no collision. On the question of pleading, we submit that the 4th and 7th articles of the petition substantially raise the issue in the case. The effect of these allegations is that the Ranger was further to the southward than the Cologne, and that she ported, and so brought about the collision, and this is supported in fact. We are not bound to show that she was "considerably further" to the south. Moreover, the duty of the Ranger to go to the southward is sufficiently alleged. Plaintiffs are not bound to do more in their allegations than to allege facts which, if found, will show the defendants' vessel to blame, and a mistake in a fact not material will not disentitle them to recover.

Milward, Q.C. in reply.

The judgment of the court was delivered by Sir BARNES PEACOCK.—This was a suit for collision between two steam vessels; the steamer Cologne, a vessel of 324 tons register and 120 horse-power, was one, and the other was the screw steamship Ranger, of 308 tons register and 40 horse-power. Each of the vessels complains of the other. Each says that the other was in fault, and each states that the other ran against her. The Ranger says that the Cologne ran with her starboard paddle box against her stem. It appears that the Cologne was going down the river, and the Ranger was going up. The accident happened on the 5th Jan. 1871, between half-past eleven and twelve o'clock. It was a fine night and moonlight. The tide was running up about the last quarter flood at the rate of about two knots an hour. It seems that the waterway in that part of the river was about 900 feet, and that the collision took place about 150 feet from the north shore, at a short distance from a barge called the dumb barge. The question to be considered is, whether both the vessels were in fault, and if not, whether either, and which of them, was in fault. The learned judge of the Admiralty Court found that they were both in fault, and divided the damages. Each of the vessels was a suitor in the Admiralty Court, each complains of the decision, and each appeals to this court. The Cologne, by adhering to the appeal of the Ranger, is substantially appealing. The learned judge says.—“The Cologne was proceeding down the river Thames, and the Ranger was proceeding up the river, and in my judgment there is no question of practice or usage as to the navigation of one side of the river or the other, which can govern or affect this question; nor is there any rule of the regulations for preventing collisions applicable to this case. I am bound to say that the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House do not themselves agree with each other as to the vessel which was to blame in this case. The opinion, therefore, I am about to deliver is the opinion of one of the Elder Brethren and myself; and I think it fair to make that statement to counsel. I will read the language of the Elder Brother whose opinion I am inclined to assent to, and I will read the words we have agreed to use. The words are these:—“These vessels were rounding the point between Greenwich and Limehouse Reaches in opposite directions, the one under a starboard helm and the other under a port helm, and rapidly altering their respective bearings from each other. They seem to have been both navigating on the north shore, and at about the same distance from the shore. The vessel coming down, the Cologne, would see the other vessel's green light, and might be induced to conclude that she intended to pass on her starboard side, and the Cologne would subsequently keep on under her starboard helm. As the vessels were approaching each other at the rate of about thirteen knots and only three minutes had elapsed from their first sighting each other, there was no time for the Cologne to have done anything to avoid a collision, after seeing the Ranger's light had changed from green to red. The vessel coming up, the Ranger, would see the other vessel's red light, and might also suppose that she intended to pass on her port side, and would therefore keep under a port helm. When the Cologne's light changed from red to green” (it is not stated at what time that change took place), “which it would naturally do, there was no time or room for clearing each other, even by the Ranger putting her helm hard aport, which was done;” and then the learned judge says, “In these circumstances it seems most probable that both vessels were to blame for the collision.” Now, let us consider, was the Cologne to blame according to this finding? The learned judge says, “The vessel coming down, the Cologne, would see the other vessel's green light, and might be induced to conclude that she intended to pass on her starboard side, and the Cologne would consequently keep on under her starboard helm.” It appears to their Lordships that the Cologne was not guilty of any negligence in so acting upon that conclusion. Then, was there any fault or negligence on the part of the Ranger? The learned judge says, “The vessel coming up, the Ranger, would see the other vessel's red light, and might also suppose that she intended to pass on her port side, and would therefore keep under a port helm.” Now, when the Ranger saw the Cologne's red light, she saw it two points over her starboard bow, and therefore the Cologne must have been nearer to the north side at that time than the Ranger. If the Cologne was nearer to the north side than the Ranger at that time, the Ranger, if she thought that the Cologne would pass her on her port side, must have supposed that the Cologne would cross her path. Was she right in that supposition? It is stated that there is a practice for vessels going down to keep on the north side. If the Cologne had gone much to the south she would have got where the tide against her was the strongest. There was no good reason therefore for the Ranger's supposing that the Cologne would cross her path and pass on her port side. On the other hand, the Cologne saw the Ranger's green light, and she might naturally suppose that, looking to the practice of navigating that part of the river by vessels going down, the Ranger would pass her upon her starboard side, giving green light to green light. In the case of The Velocity, which has been referred to, it was held that vessels meeting under circumstances like these did not fall within the 14th rule of the regulations for preventing collisions. That rule is, “If two ships under steam are crossing so as to involve risk of collision, the ship which has the other on her own starboard side shall keep out of the way.” If the two vessels were within that rule, the Ranger, seeing the red light of the Cologne on her starboard side, was the one to keep out of the way. In the case of The Velocity, it was held that vessels under similar circumstances were not crossing vessels within the meaning of the 14th rule. But the very circumstances which prevent the vessels from being deemed crossing vessels within the meaning of the rule, ought to have led the Ranger to suppose that the Cologne was not about to cross from her starboard side, and to pass her on her port side. Lord Chelmsford, in giving judgment in the case of The Velocity (L. Rep. 3 P. C. 44), referring to the remarks of the Judge of the Admiralty Court in that case, said, “The learned judge in delivering his judgment, says: ‘We’ (that is, himself and the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House by whom he was assisted) ‘think that the evidence establishes that the Carbon saw the masthead and port light of the Velocity alone.’” The case of the Carbon there is like the present case of the Ranger. “‘The vessels were therefore crossing under the rule to which I have referred’ (the 14th), ‘and it was therefore the duty of the Carbon to get out of the way of the Velocity. The course which the Carbon adopted was to port, and the Elder Brethren think that this was the only mode of getting out of the way in the circumstances.’ But,” said Lord Chelmsford, “the fact of the Carbon having seen the port light of the Velocity does not necessarily prove that the Velocity was crossing the river, as the learned judge and his assessors seem to have thought. The relative position of the two vessels when they first came in sight of each other must not alone be regarded, but also the bend of the river in the part where the collision took place

A vessel rounding the curve of the north shore would necessarily, during some part of her course, have her head slightly inclined towards the south shore, so as to exhibit her port light to a vessel in mid-channel coming in a contrary direction, and in fact the Velocity was not crossing or intending to cross the river when she was seen by the Carbon, but was pursuing the regular course along the north shore, keeping as near to that shore as it was convenient under a starboard helm." The Velocity in that case was very much in the position of the Cologne in the present case. His Lordship proceeded, "The appellant alleged that this was the well-known customary track for vessels going down the river; and to establish their case in this respect they called Capt. James, the principal harbour master of the river, who said, 'It is the custom that vessels going down, whatever be their tonnage or their cargo, and whether at flood or ebb tide, invariably keep on the north side, and vessels coming up invariably keep on the south side.'" Then he referred to the statement of the quartermaster of the Dreadnought, who gave similar evidence, and said, "That there has been a practice for vessels going down the river to prefer the north to the south side is proved by the above evidence; but that there was any custom of this kind, in the strict sense of the word, to which all vessels would be bound to conform, is certainly not the fact." In another part, at page 51, he says, "But, putting the regulations aside, their Lordships are at a loss to discover what possible blame can be imputed to the Velocity. She had a perfect right to be where she was, and she was pursuing a usual course of navigation down the river, from which she never deviated until forced to do so by the peril of a collision, into which she was brought by the sudden change of course of the Carbon. On the other hand, the Carbon appears to their Lordships to be wholly to blame. She knew, or ought to have known, that a vessel coming down the river had a right to run down on the north shore; and in the position in which she was, the appearance to her of the red light of a vessel on that side of the mid-channel was no indication that the vessel was in the act of crossing the river; and yet, there being nothing else to justify the belief, she acts at once upon her hasty and erroneous conclusion, and so occasions the collision." Now, the Ranger, seeing the red light of the Cologne on her starboard bow, ported her helm and endeavoured to pass the Cologne on her port side, between her and the north side of the river. Was she right in doing that? If, as in the case of The Velocity, she ought not to have supposed that the Cologne was crossing, she ought to have kept to the south of the Cologne, and then the accident would not have occurred. But instead of that she endeavoured to pass the Cologne on her port side, and brought herself into that position in which the danger of a collision became imminent. It appears to their Lordships that the Ranger was wrong in porting and endeavouring to pass on the larboard side of the Cologne. Their Lordships think that the Ranger was going up the river to the north of the mid-channel where she would get the tide, but that when the vessels first sighted each other she was not so near to the north side of the river as the Cologne. It is clear that when the vessels first sighted, a collision was not inevitable. They were at least half a mile (some say three-quarters of a mile) distant from each other at that time; and according to the rate at which the two vessels were approaching each other, taking the velocity of each, it took about two minutes and a half, or three minutes, before the vessels could reach each other. There was, therefore, ample time, and there was ample room in the river, for each to have kept clear of the other. There was no danger of a collision if the vessels had adopted a proper course when they first saw each other. No doubt the danger became imminent at last, but that was in consequence of the vessels being in a wrong position; and it appears to their Lordships that the danger arose from the Ranger's adopting a course which she ought not to have adopted. Then, again, did the Ranger act properly when the collision became imminent? Could she have done anything to avoid it? Was she right in porting her helm? At page 45 of the evidence the master is asked—"Q. Then what did she do?—A. Altered her helm." This is speaking of the Cologne. "Q. Which way?—A. To starboard, and I saw his green light, and I said to our pilot, 'Good God, he has got his helm to starboard.' Q. Which way was she going then, or trying to go then?—A. Trying to come to the northward of us when she starboarded. Q. You say she opened her green light: what became of her red?—A. Shut it in, and we lost sight of it. Q. Well, now, if she had kept on her course?—A. The collision would not have occurred. Q. If she had not starboarded?—A. If she had not starboarded. The Court. You ascribe the collision in fact to her starboarding?—The Witness. Entirely. By Milward. What did you do with your engines?—A. Helm to be put hard-a-port, and stopped and reversed the engines. Q. When did you do that?—A. As soon as we found the Cologne had starboarded." Well, now the pilot says, that in putting the helm hard to port he did not mean that the vessel should act as in the ordinary case of a helm being put hard a port, because he reversed the engines, and when he put the helm hard to port he meant it, by reversing the engines, to have the effect of starboarding. But it did not have that effect, because the way upon the vessel had not been taken off by reversing the engines, and it was proved that the Ranger altered her course two or three points to starboard under the port helm. If she had not altered her course under a port helm, in all probability she would have gone clear of the Cologne; so that the accident appears to have been caused by the fault of the Ranger, first in endeavouring to pass the Cologne on her port side, and, secondly, in putting her helm hard-a-port, when the vessels were in almost a state of collision. The 13th rule was not then applicable to the vessels: (See the case of The Velocity, above referred to.) It may be, as remarked by the learned judge, that when the Cologne's light changed from red to green, there was no time for clearing each other. But it was by the fault of the Ranger that the vessels were in that position. Their Lordships, therefore, think that the accident was not caused by the fault of both, but solely from the fault of the Ranger. But it has been said that the Cologne is not entitled to recover against the Ranger, inasmuch as she must recover according to the allegation in her petition. Now, in the petition she says that "the Ranger was considerably further over to the south side of the said river than the Cologne." The word "considerably" is not necessarily to be proved to the full extent. When the vessels first came in sight, the Ranger was further over to the south side of the river than the Cologne; the master of the Ranger proved that he saw the Cologne's red light two points to his starboard bow. He certainly did say the port bow in the first instance, but he corrected himself afterwards, and it is not necessary now to inquire whether his first statement was made by mistake or not. The fact is that he saw her over the starboard bow. Then the Ranger was further over to the south side of the river than the Cologne. The allegation proceeds:—"The Cologne was kept under a starboard helm along the north shore, and the Ranger, with her green and masthead lights only open, appeared for some time to be intending to pass to the southward of and on the starboard side of the Cologne, as she could and ought to have done; but, instead of so passing the Cologne, the Ranger improperly ported her helm, and caused immediate danger of collision; and although the helm of the Cologne was thereupon put hard starboard, and her engines were ordered to be stopped and reversed, the Ranger with her stem struck the Cologne on her starboard paddle-box and side house, and did her a great deal of damage." Their Lordships think that the case really comes within this allegation, that the Ranger was more to the south than the Cologne, and that the damage arose from her porting her helm and attempting to pass the Cologne on her port side. Under these circumstances, their Lordships think that the decision ought to be reversed. They find that there was no fault on the part of the Cologne, and that the Ranger was wholly to blame; and they think it right to say that the sailing masters, of whose experience and assistance their Lordships have had the benefit, are both of that opinion. Their Lordships will, therefore, humbly advise Her Majesty that the decision be reversed, and that the Ranger be condemned in all the damages done to the Cologne, with costs of the court below and the costs of this appeal. Appeal allowed.

Dec. 5 and 6, 1872.

THE FRANKLAND; THE KESTREL.

(Present: The Right Hon. James W. COLVILLE, Sir BARNES PEACOCK, Sir M. E. SMITH, and Sir ROBERT P. COLLIER.)

Collision—Fog—Regulations for preventing collision at sea, article 16—Steamships.

A steamship going at a moderate speed in a fog, on hearing a steam whistle sounded many times, indicating that another steamer is approaching, and has come so near, that if the vessels then stopped they would be within hailing distance, is bound under the terms of Article 16 of the regulations for preventing collisions at sea, not only to stop, but to reverse her engines, and ought not to wait until the vessels sight each other, when such reversing would be too late.

THIS was an appeal in cross cases of collision instituted by the owners of the Kestrel against the Frankland, and by the owners of the Frankland against the owners of the Kestrel. The appellants were the owners of the Frankland.

The collision occurred at about 9.30 p.m. on the 23rd April, off the Norfolk coast, near Cromer, Dudgeon light vessel. The tide at the time was flood, and was running to the southward at the rate of about two knots an hour. The Kestrel was an iron screw steamer of 362 tons register, manned by a crew of twenty hands, and was proceeding from Rotterdam to Hull with a general cargo and passengers. The Frankland was a screw steamer of 541 tons register, manned by a crew of eighteen hands, and was proceeding from Sunderland to London with a cargo of coals.

The case set up on behalf of the Kestrel was that she was heading N.N.W. against the tide, which was upon her starboard bow. The wind was light. It was the mate's watch, and he was on the bridge with an able seaman, who was on the look out, and also a Dutch pilot; a second man was on the look out forward. About 9 p.m. the weather became thick with fog, whereupon the mate ordered the engines to be eased and the master to be called. The master immediately came on deck, and ordered the engines to dead slow, so that the speed of the vessel was reduced to five and a-half knots through the water and about three or three and a-half knots over the ground, just enough to keep way on the vessel against the tide. The master and the mate remained on the bridge till after the collision. From the time when the fog came on until the collision the steam whistle of the Kestrel was regularly sounded about every half minute. About 9.30 p.m. two whistles were heard, one on the port bow and the other right ahead. The Kestrel's steam whistle was thereupon sounded and her helm ported until her head was about N., when the helm was steadied. After a short time the green and white lights of the Frankland were seen about three or four points on the Kestrel's bow, and distant about two ships' lengths. The Kestrel's engines were reversed full speed, and the Frankland was hailed, but the two vessels came into collision. The stem of the Frankland struck the port side of the Kestrel with such force as to penetrate into the middle of the ship, and to nearly cut the Kestrel in two. The Kestrel sank three hours after the collision.

The case on the part of the Frankland, was that she was steering S.S.E. in a dense fog, and was making about two knots an hour through the water, the tide running with her about two knots; that her steam whistle was sounded at intervals; that her lights were burning brightly, and a good look out was kept; that the steam whistle of another steamer was heard apparently on the starboard bow, and that the engines were stopped, and the steam whistle sounded. The following statement from the evidence given by the master of the Frankland before the receiver of wreck, set out the facts of the case:

12. That on Sunday, the 23rd April, at 7.40 p.m., the tide at the time being flood, the weather clear, and the wind in the N.E., blowing a light breeze, the said ship arrived off the Dudgeon light ship; the light ship bearing about S.S.E., three miles distant. At 7.45 p.m., a dense fog came on, which completely obscured all objects. Deponent, who was on deck and in charge of the vessel, ordered the engines to be slowed, and the steam whistle to be sounded, which was instantly done, placed two hands at the wheel, and proceeded at slow speed for about twenty minutes. (The regulation lights were burning brightly; they are attended to by the second officer.) After proceeding slowly for about twenty minutes, and passing several steamers on the port and starboard side—the steamers could not be seen, but deponent could hear their whistles—at 8.5 deponent ordered the engines to be put dead-slow, and so proceeded until about 9.25 p.m., moving very slowly with the tide through the water. At 9.25 deponent heard a steamer's whistle, which he judged to be about two points on the starboard bow, and hearing the whistle coming closer, ordered the engines to be stopped. Deponent's whistle was at this time kept going at intervals, and replied to the steamer's whistle, who also appeared to answer. Deponent's vessel was on her proper course, her head being S.S.E. At 9.30, deponent suddenly saw a steamer's masthead light, and immediately afterwards saw the red light, and estimated the steamer to be about a ship's length distant, and apparently crossing deponent's bow. Deponent seeing that a collision was inevitable, deponent ordered the engines to be put full speed astern, which was instantly done, but the collision took place, the coming steamer striking deponent's vessel across the stem with her port bow, and with considerable force.

In the Admiralty Court the owners of the Kestrel charged the Frankland with proceeding at an improper rate of speed, and with not stopping and reversing. The owners of the Frankland charged the Kestrel with improperly porting, with not complying with 16th article of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, that is with not stopping and reversing.

The case came on for hearing before the learned judge of the Admiralty Court, assisted by Trinity Masters, on the 31st Jan. 1872, and he pronounced the Kestrel and the Frankland both to blame, saying that "the vessels were going at pretty much the same rate—that is two-and-a-half knots through the water. It was absolutely impossible to decide absolutely by the mere sound of the whistle the exact direction in which each vessel was proceeding, although the sound would help to decide the position of the vessels, as the vessels could not be seen at a greater distance than that which I have stated (200 or 300 feet); it is evident to us that the helm could not have been put one way or the other with any positive certainty of its being available at the time when the vessels were seen, to prevent the collision. Therefore I do not decide this case with reference to any alteration of the helm of the Kestrel." The learned judge then pronounced the vessels to blame on the ground that they did not stop and reverse. This part of his judgment is set out in the judgment of the Judicial Committee.

From this judgment the owner of the Frankland appealed, mainly on the grounds that the Frankland having stopped her engines as soon as she heard the whistle of the Kestrel, and reversed on seeing the lights on the Kestrel, so complying with the 16th Article of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at sea; that the judgment of the Admiralty Court was wrong in holding, as they alleged, that the engines of the Frankland ought to have been reversed before those on board her had ascertained the position of the Kestrel, and further that the Kestrel improperly ported. The owners of the Kestrel did not adhere to the appeal.

Milward and Clarkson for the appellants.—Article 16 only applies when there is a continuous approaching of two steamships: (The Earl of Elgin and The Jesmond, ante, p. 150; L. Rep. 4 P. C. 1; 25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 514). The Frankland had stopped, and therefore had taken measures to put an end to the continuous approaching. The Kestrel ported and held on. If one vessel does enough on her part to avoid the risk of collision, taking for granted that the other vessel will obey the rules also, she has fulfilled the obligation imposed by those rules. The Kestrel ported, whereas if she had held on without porting there would have been no collision.

Butt, Q.C. and Pritchard for the respondents.—The master of the Frankland heard the whistle of the Kestrel continuously approaching, but did not reverse till he saw the Kestrel. There was risk so long as the Kestrel was approaching, and he should have reversed sooner.

Milward, Q.C. in reply.

The judgment of the court was delivered by Sir ROBERT P. COLLIER.—This is a case of collision between two steamers, the Kestrel and the Frankland, somewhere off the coast of Norfolk. The judgment of the Admiralty Court found that both were to blame. From this judgment the Frankland appeals, but the Kestrel has not adhered to the appeal. The main facts—which appear not to be in dispute—are these: the Kestrel was steering about north-north-west, the Frankland in a precisely opposite direction, south-south-east. The weather was calm there being scarcely any wind. There was a dense fog, and the tide was flowing southward about two knots an hour. It has been contended that the judgment of the court below is vitiated by an erroneous finding on a question of fact as to the speed at which the Kestrel was going, and on the other side it has been said that the court was wrong in estimating the speed of the Frankland. Their Lordships, after carefully considering the evidence, are of opinion that, whatever opinion they might have been disposed to form as a court of first instance, there was sufficient evidence in the case upon which the judge of the Court of Admiralty, who had the advantage, which their Lordships have not, of hearing the witnesses, might reasonably find as he has done; namely, that the speed of both vessels was from two to two and a half knots through the water. It has been, indeed, suggested that the learned judge left out of consideration a difference well known to nautical persons, between the rate of a vessel going through the water and the rate of that vessel going over what is called the ground; but their Lordships see no reason to suppose that the learned judge can have overlooked a distinction which appears so clear and obvious. The finding of the court upon the question of negligence is in these terms: "Both vessels were going, in truth, in the most absolute uncertainty as to the proceedings of the other; and in such a state of circumstances I have had to ask myself this question,—Could anything have been done to avoid this collision which was not done? And the opinion of the court, fortified by that of its nautical assessors, is that upon hearing the whistles of each other so near and approaching each other, each vessel ought not only to have stopped but to have reversed until its way was stopped, when it could have hailed and ascertained with certainty which way the head of the other vessel was, and which way she was proceeding, and by that means the collision would or might have been avoided. And this being the opinion of the court it will enforce the application of Article 16 of the Regulations for preventing Collisions at Sea, which it is always the object of this court to see carried into due and proper execution, for the due and proper execution of that rule would tend very much to prevent both loss of life and property, of which there are so many melancholy instances every week in this court." Their Lordships entirely concur with the learned judge of the Court of Admiralty as to the importance of enforcing this rule. The rule is: "Every steamship, when approaching another ship so as to involve risk of collision, shall slacken her speed, or, if necessary, stop and reverse; and every steamship shall, in a fog, go at a moderate speed." As far as the latter part of the rule is concerned, both vessels would appear to have obeyed it. The question is as to the application of the first part of the rule. The Kestrel not having adhered to the appeal must be assumed to have been in fault; and their Lordships do not think it necessary to determine the precise extent to which she was in fault. It has indeed been argued that part of her fault was in porting her helm. Their Lordships do not think it necessary to decide whether or not she was in fault in so doing, but the inclination of their opinion is that the porting of her helm under such circumstances cannot be properly considered as negligence on her part. The only question in the cause is whether or not there is sufficient evidence to justify the finding of the Court of Admiralty that there was negligence on the part of the Frankland materially contributing to the accident? It has been argued that the effect of the decision is that every steamship in a fog hearing the whistle of another steamship approaching her, ought immediately, without reference to the distance at which the ships may appear to be from each other, or to any other circumstances, to reverse her engines. But their Lordships do not understand the Court of Admiralty to have laid down any such general proposition. They understand the finding to have been confined to the circumstances of the case, and those circumstances they understand, in the opinion of the court, to have been these, as far as the Frankland is concerned: That she was navigating in a fog at a moderate speed, that she heard a whistle sounded many times, indicating that a steamer was approaching her, and had come very near to her—so near indeed that if the vessels had then stopped they would have been within hailing distance—that at that point of time it was necessary for the captain of the Frankland, under the terms of the rule, not only to stop the motion of the engines, but to reverse them, so as to stop the motion of his vessel, and that he ought not to have waited until the vessels sighted each other, when such a manœuvre would have been too late. That being the view which their Lordships take of the decision of the Court of Admiralty, they are of opinion that it is right; and for these reasons they will humbly advise Her Majesty that that judgment be affirmed, and this appeal dismissed, with costs.

ON APPEAL FROM THE VICE ADMIRALTY COURT OF LOWER CANADA.

Dec. 3 and 17, 1872.

(Present—Sir JAMES W. COLVILLE, Sir R. J. PHILLIMORE, Sir BARNES PEACOCK, Sir MONTAGUE SMITH, Sir R. P. COLLIER.)

THE HIBERNIAN.

Collision—Compulsory pilotage—What amounts to compulsion—Colonial statutes binding upon Admiralty courts—Power of selection—Canadian Statutes (27 & 28 Vict. c. 13, sect. 14; 27 & 28 Vict. c. 58, sects. 2 and 10).

Colonial statutes, imposing compulsory pilotage upon vessels navigating in the waters of the colony, and relieving owners from liability for the negligence of pilots taken under such compulsion, are binding equally upon the High Court of Admiralty and the Vice-Admiralty Courts (a).

A statute enacting that certain vessels "shall take on board" a pilot to conduct such vessels in certain waters "under a penalty equal in amount to the pilotage of the vessel," which penalty goes to a fund for the relief of decayed pilots, renders the taking of a pilot compulsory upon such vessels, on the ground that when a statute inflicts a penalty for not doing an act, the penalty implies that there is legal compulsion to do the act, whatever may be the destination of the penalty.

The two Canadian statutes enacting that (27 & 28 Vict. c. 58, sect. 10) masters of certain vessels leaving Montreal for a port out of the province "shall take on board a branch pilot for and above the harbour of Quebec, to conduct such vessel, under a penalty equal in amount to the pilotage of the vessel, which penalty shall go to the Decayed Pilots' Fund," and that (27 & 28 Vict. 13. sect. 14) "no owner, &c., shall be answerable to any person whatever for any loss or damage occasioned by the fault or incapacity of any qualified pilot acting in charge of such ship, within any place where the employment of such pilot is compulsory by law," are to be read and construed as in pari materia, and the owner of a ship navigating the River St. Lawrence (Canadian waters) under the direction of a pilot taken on board under the provisions of those statutes, employs the pilot so taken on board by compulsion of law, and is, therefore, exonerated, according to the law of Canada, from all liability for damage inflicted upon another vessel by the pilot's negligence.

A power of selection given to shipmasters, &c., by a statute (27 & 28 Vict. c. 58, sect. 2, Canadian), by which they may choose "such pilot or pilots as they may think fit" from among certain licensed pilots, there called "branch pilots," gives only a restricted power of selection out of a particular class, and therefore does not create the relation of master and servant between the shipowner and pilot.

(a) Although the decisions of American courts cited in the arguments have been adverse to the English doctrine that compulsory pilotage exempts, even without express statutory exemption, from liability for the acts of a pilot, yet they have held that where an English statute renders pilotage compulsory and an American ship takes a pilot on board under that statute in English waters, she is entitled in a suit brought in an American court to the exemption given by English law: (Smith v. Coultry, 17 Peters' (U. S. Supreme Court) Rep. 20; 1 Howards' Id. 28). See also Camp v. The Ship Marcellus, 1 Clifford's U. S. Circuit Court (1st Circuit) Rep. 481; and The Alabama, 1 Benedict District Court (S. Dist. of N. Y.) Rep. 477.—Ed.

THIS was an appeal from a decree of the judge of the Vice-Admiralty Court of Lower Canada, now the province of Quebec, in action brought by the appellants, as promoters, against the respondents in that court to recover damages for the loss of certain sugar through a collision which took place on the river Lawrence, on the 16th June 1868. The Court of Vice-Admiralty of Canada was established, immediately after the cession of that country to England, by a commission issued out of the English Court of Admiralty, which has been renewed from time to time down to the present time (a). A Court of Vice-Admiralty had previously existed there when the province was under French rule. The river St. Lawrence at the place where the collision occurred is a large navigable river below bridges.

The action was commenced on the 19th June 1868 by an affidavit to base proceedings, and the defendants (the now-respondents) duly appeared and gave bail.

On the 6th Oct. 1868, the promoters (the now appellants) filed on their preliminary Act, and on the 20th Oct. they filed their libel, which in effect stated that on the 16th June 1868 they were the owners of 2237 bags of sugar, which were laden on board two barges named the A. McFarren and the Dora; that the barges were proceeding up the river St. Lawrence in tow of a steam tug called the Canada; that the steamship Hibernian was proceeding down the river, and instead of altering her course so as to keep her own side of the river and pass the barges, she ran into them and caused them to sink, and the sugar was wholly lost. The libel further alleged that the collision took place entirely through the want of proper care and through the unskilful management of the persons on board the Hibernian.

On the 27th Oct. the respondents filed their preliminary act, and on the 2nd March 1869 filed responsive allegations, which in effect alleged that on the 16th June 1868 the Hibernian, which was a mail steamship of 1391 tons burden, trading between Montreal and Liverpool, left the port of Montreal on her outward voyage bound for Liverpool; that "according to law she left Montreal under the charge of a duly licensed branch pilot for the river St. Lawrence, between Quebec and Montreal (one Adolphe Lisée), whose duty it was to pilot her to Quebec;" that "all orders of this pilot were instantly obeyed by the people of the Hibernian," and that the collision occurred through the Canada and the boats in tow keeping too much to the south side of the channel, and by the negligence of the persons on board the Canada and the barges in tow.

The promoters filed, on the 4th March 1869, a rejoinder, which alleged—

1. That if, on the said 16th June last, the said steamship, the Hibernian, left the port of Montreal under the charge of a duly licensed pilot for the river St. Lawrence, between Quebec and Montreal (as the respondents allege), one Adolphe Lisée, whose duty it was to pilot her to Quebec, the said pilot was and had been employed by the respondents for many years, and specially during the summer of 1868, as the pilot of the said steamship Hibernian, and that on the said occasion the said pilot was the special choice and selection of the said respondents.

2. That by law the said respondents were not bound to take the said Adolphe Lisée to pilot the said steamship from Montreal to Quebec, but that they are, and were at the time of the collision, allowed to choose from amongst the duly licensed branch pilots their own pilots, to be exclusively employed by them in piloting the steamships forming the Montreal Ocean Steamship Line, belonging to the said respondents, of which the said Hibernian is one; and that the pilots employed by the said respondents are their own servants and employés, and the respondents are responsible for their acts.

3. That the accident and collision on the 16th June last, in question in this case, did not occur, nor do the respondents allege it to have occurred through the negligence or want of skill of the said licensed pilot, but was owing to the negligence and want of skill and fault exclusively of the said respondents.

6. That the said accident and collision was not the fault of the pilot alone.

On the same day the respondents filed a sur-rejoinder alleging—

2. That as owners of the Hibernian they were by law compelled, on the occasion in question in this cause, to engage a branch pilot between Montreal and Quebec to pilot the vessel from the former to the latter port, and that Adolphe Lisée, who actually piloted the ship, was a duly licensed branch pilot.

3. That the collision in question was entirely owing to want of care and unskilfulness on the part of the Canada and her tow.

The pleadings were thereupon concluded, and evidence was produced by both parties, a great portion of which is immaterial to the present appeal, the sole question raised by the appeal being, whether the owners of the Hibernian were responsible for damage done by the fault of the pilot.

The facts proved with respect to the employment by the respondents of the pilot are as follows: The pilot, Adolphe Lisée, who was admitted by the appellant to be a duly licensed branch pilot between Quebec and Montreal, had been in the employment of the respondents since the year 1860, and took his turn with two other branch pilots, who were also in the respondents' employ, in piloting the mail steamers belonging to the Montreal Ocean Steamship Company, of which the respondents are owners, and of which the Hibernian is one, between Montreal and Quebec. The pilots so engaged were free from the duty imposed on other pilots for the part of the St. Lawrence between Montreal and Quebec, of piloting any vessels whose owners engaged them with the consent of the master, deputy master, or registrar of the Montreal Trinity House, but being duly qualified branch pilots, they occasionally piloted other vessels when not employed in piloting the mail steamers. For piloting the mail steamers these pilots received only the ordinary tariff rates; but as these steamers were of very large tonnage, and consequently of considerable draught of water, and they were paid in proportion to the draught, their employment was more lucrative than that of the other pilots. They were selected from among the other pilots for their superior skill.

By a Canadian statute (12 Vict. c. 117), entitled, "An Act to Repeal a certain Act and Ordinance therein mentioned, relating to the Trinity House at Montreal, and to Amend and Consolidate the Provisions thereof," the master, deputy master, and wardens of that Trinity House were empowered (sect 5) to make bye laws for certain purposes, and amongst others, "for the government and regulation of pilots for and above the harbour of Quebec, and the same to revoke, alter, and amend, &c.," and to enforce the execution of the bye laws so made, provided that such bye laws were sanctioned and confirmed by the Governor-General of the Province in Council. By sect. 14 of the above Act, no person can be appointed as a pilot for and above the harbour of Quebec until duly examined and certificated, as therein provided. By a bye law made under the provisions of the Act, on the 18th March, 1869, and afterwards approved by the Governor-General in Council, it was ordained that it should be lawful for the master, deputy master, and wardens of the Trinity House of Montreal to appoint by branch or warrant fit and proper persons to be branch pilots for and above the harbour of Quebec, provided that such persons had been duly examined and certificated under the 14th section.

Sect. 18 of the same Act provided for the annual publication by the registrar of the Trinity House of a list of the branch pilots for and above Quebec, and the number of pilots in the list for the year in which the collision happened was twenty-seven, among them being Adolphe Lisée, the pilot in question. By the 23rd section of the same Act, and by another Canadian statute (20 Vict. c. 127, s. 1), the Trinity House of Montreal are empowered to make a bye law establishing a tariff of rates to be paid for the pilotage of vessels between Quebec and Montreal, upwards and downwards, and penalties are imposed upon any person demanding, receiving, paying, or offering higher rates of pilotage. Such a bye law was made by the Trinity House, and approved by the Governor-General in Council on the 5th May 1866, and it was there provided that the tariff for sea-going steamers between Montreal and Quebec should be 2dols. 50c. for each foot of draught of water. By sect. 24 of the same (the former) Act, a fund known by the name of, the "Montreal Decayed Pilots' Fund," which has for its object to assist pilots, and the widows and children of pilots who have fallen into distress, and which had been placed under the control of the Trinity House by a former Act (2 Vict. c. 19, s. 20), was continued in their hands.

By a Canadian statute (27 & 28 Vict. c. 13), entitled, "An Act to amend the Law respecting the Navigation of Canadian Waters," it is enacted :

Sect. 14 :

No owner or master of any ship shall be answerable to any person whatever for any loss or damage occasioned by the fault or incapacity of any qualified pilot acting in charge of such ship within any place where the employment of such pilot is compulsory by law.

By another Canadian statute (27 & 28 Vict. c. 58), entitled, "An Act to amend the Act passed in the twelfth year of Her Majesty's reign, relating to the Trinity House at Montreal," after reciting that doubts had arisen as to the construction of that Act (12 Vict. c. 117), it is enacted :

Sect. 2 :

The registrar of the said Trinity House of Montreal shall record in a register, to be kept by him for that purpose, the name and residence in Montreal of all such branch pilots as shall report themselves, from amongst whom it shall be competent for all shipmasters and others requiring branch pilots to select such pilot or pilots as they may think fit, other than those actually engaged to pilot the ocean mail steamers, or any of them, and to indicate to the said registrar the name or names of such pilot or pilots as they may select ; and on such selection being approved by the master, deputy master, or registrar of the said Trinity House of Montreal, it shall be the duty of the said registrar immediately to record such selection and approval in a register to be kept by him for that purpose, and thereupon and not otherwise, such pilot or pilots shall be held and considered to all intents and purposes as engaged.

Sect. 3 :

When so engaged, every branch pilot who shall refuse, decline, or neglect to take charge of any ship, steamer, or other vessel for which he shall have been so selected as aforesaid, upon being required so to do by the master, or any officer belonging to such ship, steamer, or vessel, or by any officer of the said Trinity House of Montreal, unless (in any of the cases in the said Act mentioned) it shall be unsafe, &c., . . . shall forfeit for each such offence any sum not exceeding ten pounds currency, and shall be liable to be dismissed from being a branch pilot, or suspended from acting as such at the discretion of the master, deputy master, and wardens of the said Trinity House of Montreal, or any of them.

Sect. 10 :

The master or person in charge of such vessel over 125 tons, leaving the port of Montreal for a port out of this province, shall take on board a branch pilot for and above the harbour of Quebec, to conduct such vessel, under a penalty equal in amount to the pilotage of such vessel, which penalty shall go to the Decayed Pilots' Fund.

By a Canadian statute (12 Vict. c. 14), entitled "An Act to consolidate the Laws relating to the Powers and Duties of the Trinity House of Quebec, and for other purposes," powers are given to that Trinity House to make bye laws for the regulation and government of pilots for the port of Quebec, which is there defined (sect. 11) to be all that part of the St. Lawrence between the basin of Portneuf and the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and that part of the Gulf which is in the province, and all rivers, &c., where the tide flows in that part (the harbour of Quebec being (sect. 12) that part of the river St. Lawrence between St. Patrick's Hole, inclusively, to the Cap Rouge River, inclusively, and that part of the rivers Montmorency, St. Charles Etchemin, Chaudière, Cap Rouge, and others, where the tide ebbs and flows); to license pilots (sect. 15); and (sect. 53) vessels going outwards to sea from the port are compelled to take a pilot under a penalty of the pilotage amount, which is to go to the Decayed Pilots' Fund; and (sects. 54 and 55) inward bound vessels must hoist a signal for a pilot, and must wait for a pilot boat if there is one within a reasonable distance; must take on board a pilot, and give him charge of the ship, without power of selection, under a penalty over and above the pilotage, which does not go to the Decayed Pilots' Fund.

The cause was heard before the Hon. Henry Black, C.B., the Judge of the Vice-Admiralty Court, assisted by nautical assessors, on 22nd Nov. 1872; and on 2nd Dec. 1870 the judge pronounced against the damage proceeded for, on the ground that the Hibernian was at the time of the collision under the charge of a duly licensed pilot. The judgment of the learned judge (after setting out the facts), and the questions put to the nautical assessors, and their answers (those which are material to the present appeal) are as follows :

"Each of the parties charges the other with negligence and with want of proper skill and care; and the owners of the Hibernian further allege that, even if there had been any fault on the part of that vessel, which they deny, yet that they would not be liable, inasmuch as she was in charge of a duly licensed branch pilot for and above the harbour of Quebec, as by law required, and whose orders were exactly obeyed and carried out by her officers and crew, who were sufficiently numerous and in every respect well qualified, the ship being in perfect order and thoroughly sound and equipped. In answer to this, the opposite parties say, that the Montreal Ocean Steamship Company, owners of the Hibernian, were not at the time of the accident under any legal obligation to take the pilot, Adolphe Lisée, to conduct their vessel, but were by law allowed to choose from among the duly-licensed branch pilots their own pilots, to be exclusively employed by them in piloting the ships of the company, and that the pilots so employed by them are their servants, for whose acts they are responsible. The owners of the Hibernian deny the validity of their plea; at the same time that they allege that there was no fault on the part of the said Adolphe Lisée, and that the sole responsibility for the accident rests with the opposite parties, who might have avoided all risk of collision by proper care and precaution, and more especially by stopping below Eagle Island when they first saw the Hibernian, or by keeping further to the north or starboard side of the channel, or by passing on the other side of Eagle Island, any of which courses, they say, could easily have been taken.

"The liability or non-liability of the owners of the Hibernian for any fault on the part of Adolphe Lisée, under the circumstances of the present case, is a purely legal question for the court to determine, and it might have been determined at an earlier stage of the proceedings if the admission of the pleading by which the question is raised had been objected to. It is right that I should dispose of it in the first instance. The rule has always been that if it be compulsory on the vessel to take a pilot, and, à fortiori, if this obligation be enforced by a penalty, then neither the owner nor the master will be liable for injury occasioned by the fault or incapacity of the pilot, and this rule is and was at the time of the collision part of the statute law upon the subject. The question then is, whether this rule is affected by the fact of the pilot's having been selected by the owners of a vessel and constantly or frequently employed by them in piloting their vessels, and whether he may be on this account considered rather as a servant voluntarily engaged by them, than as an ordinary pilot taken under the compulsory provisions of the law.

"The question has, fortunately for us, arisen in England, and has been decided by the High Court of Admiralty in the case of The Batavier (2 W. Rob. 407). In that case it was held that the exemption from liability under the Pilot Act was not taken away from the owner of the damaging vessel by the constant employment of the same pilot to pilot their vessel up and down the river Thames for a period of fifteen years. Dr. Lushington in pronouncing judgment said, that the contrary position would be highly detrimental to the interests of navigation, and he considered it highly advantageous not only to the owners of vessels but to the public at large, that the same pilot should be constantly employed on board a vessel, inasmuch as he becomes thereby well acquainted with the master and crew, and is consequently more likely to conduct the vessel amicably and properly. I not only feel bound by this decision as a precedent, but I agree perfectly in the opinion expressed in it. I may further remark that the Act of 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 58) relating to the Trinity House of Montreal expressly recognises the right of shipmasters and others requiring branch pilots to select such of them as they may think fit, other than those engaged to pilot the ocean mail steamers, or any of them. The master is bound to take a qualified pilot under a penalty, though he may select from such as are so qualified; the case would be different if it were optional with him to take or not to take a branch pilot at his pleasure.

"The question whether the accident was or was not occasioned solely and exclusively by the fault of the pilot, as well as the other questions of fact in the case, are of a purely nautical and technical character. The case is either one in which there is plainly no fault on either side, or in which there must have been fault which cannot be specifically ascertained and assigned, or in which the fault not only exists but can be ascertained; and this last head is subdivided into the cases in which both parties are to blame, and those in which the party inflicting the injury, or the suffering party, is alone in fault. These questions must be determined by reference to the rules of navigation and seamanship as applied to the facts disclosed in the evidence in the cause. The questions submitted to the gentlemen by whom the court will be assisted will therefore be the following:—

"1. Whether the accident arose from unavoidable circumstances, without fault being attributable to any of the vessels or their people, or proceeded from the fault of any of the vessels or their people; and if so, then from the fault of which of them?"

"4. If there was any fault on the part of the Hibernian, was it attributable solely and exclusively to the pilot Lisée, or did it arise from any neglect or want of skill on the part of her officers or crew?"

"8. Did the collision arise from any other fault of the Canada, the barges, or their people, or any error on their part, by reason whereof they are not free from blame?"

"Upon these points the nautical assessors, who have fully considered the evidence and the facts, are of opinion as follows: First, that the collision did not arise from unavoidable circumstances; it appears to us that the barges were sunk without any fault or defect attributable to them or their crews, or to the Canada, by which they were towed, and the blame rests with the Hibernian alone; fourthly, that the collision did not arise from any fault of the officers or crew of the Hibernian, but solely and exclusively from that of her pilot; eighthly, the Canada, her tows and their crews are not to blame for the collision, as it is known that a tug steamer with so many vessels in tow cannot alter course readily. The Hibernian, having seen her so far off, ought to have known this, and taken proper precautions in time to prevent collision.

"Captain Armstrong and Captain Ashe exempt the master and crew of the Hibernian from blame, and attribute the fault which gave occasion to the damage to the pilot. Concurring in this opinion, I must dismiss the owners of the Hibernian from this suit, solely upon the ground that the master was bound to take a pilot on board and place him in charge in conformity with the requirements of the law, and the collision having been occasioned entirely by the fault of that pilot, the owners are entitled to exemption from liability."

From this decree the appellants asserted an appeal; having failed to present a petition of appeal within six months, they filed a petition in the registry of the Privy Council for leave to appeal, and on Feb. 5, 1872, leave was given to prosecute the appeal. Their reasons for reversing the judgment are as follow :

1. Because the Vice-Admiralty Court of Canada should administer the law of the High Court of Admiralty of England, and not Canadian law, and the rights of suitors in that court cannot be taken away, or affected, by a Canadian statute.

2. Because the provisions of the Canadian statute 27 & 28 Vict. c. 13, s. 14, exempting the owners of vessels from liability for the acts of pilots compulsorily taken, if applicable at all, apply only to cases in which the particular pilot was necessarily taken on board under the provisions of the law, and not where the pilot is selected by the owner of the vessel.

3. Because by the law of nations a vessel wrongfully doing damage to property on the high seas is liable to be detained until the damage has been made good, and no sufficient grounds have been shown for exempting the Hibernian from this liability in the present case.

Sir J. Karstake, Q.C., and Bompas, for the appellants.—First, the Canadian statutes do not impose compulsory pilotage upon vessels navigating above Quebec. The 27 & 28 Vict. c. 58, s. 10, provides for the employment of pilots, but does not expressly make them compulsory; it requires the payment of a sum of money equal to the pilotage in case of the non-employment of a pilot, for the benefit of the Decayed Pilots' Fund. Such a provision does not amount to compulsion, it gives masters the option whether they will take a pilot or pay a fine. The Liverpool Pilot Act (37 Geo. 3, c. 78), s. 37 provided that any master of a ship proceeding to sea from that port, and refusing to employ a pilot, should "pay or cause to be paid to the pilot who first, or who only, shall offer his services as aforesaid, and shall be so refused, the full pilotage," &c., and it was held that this imposed no penalty, and therefore no obligation to take a pilot on board whilst proceeding to sea, as the consequence of refusing was only a liability to pay the same wages as if a pilot had been taken: (Attorney-General v. Case, 3 Price 302, 318, 321.) An Act of Assembly of Pennsylvania (the 29th March 1803), entitled, "An Act to establish a Board of Wardens for the Port of Philadelphia, and for the Regulation of Pilots and Pilotage," &c., provided (sect. 29) that certain vessels "shall be obliged to take a pilot; . . . and if the master of any ship or vessel shall refuse or neglect to take a pilot, the master, owner, or consignee shall forfeit and pay to the wardens aforesaid a sum equal to half pilotage of such ship or vessel to the use of the society for the Relief of Distressed or Decayed Pilots, their Widows and Children," &c.; and it was held that this did not compel owners to employ a pilot, but permitted them, if they pleased, to compound by paying half pilotage for the relief of decayed pilots; that it was an inducement, not a compulsion, to employ pilots; that pilots were provided for the benefit of the shipowners, and that the assessment of such a tax upon them did not create compulsion merely because it is called a penalty :

jun. (U.S. Circuit Ct., 3rd Circuit) Rep. 485.

To make pilotage compulsory there must be a penalty over and above the pilotage amount, as there is in the Canadian statute relating to pilotage below Quebec (12 Vict. c. 114, ss. 54, 55): (The Lotus, 11 Lower Canada Rep. 342.) The American authorities are in conflict with the case of The Maria (1 W. Rob. 95) as to what amounts to compulsion; but that case, even if rightly decided, turns upon a statute (41 Geo. 4, c. 86, s. 6) by which ships "shall and they are hereby obliged and required to receive, take on board, and employ in piloting, &c., such pilots," or pay the full pilotage to the pilots; whereas the Canadian Act only says "shall take on board," or pay a penalty to a charity: this cannot be called compulsion. The Batavier (2 W. Rob. 407) was decided under the General Pilot Act (6 Geo. 4, c. 125), which clearly and positively rendered pilotage compulsory under the circumstances. Where a person is in the same position if he takes a pilot or not, there is no obligation imposed upon him; his taking a pilot is a voluntary act.

Secondly, even if pilotage should be held to be compulsory above Quebec, still that in itself does not exempt the owner from liability, apart from express statutory provision. In no English case, except The Maria (ubi sup.), has it been expressly decided that, on general principles, apart from a statutory provision, a shipowner is exempt from liability for the acts of a pilot taken under compulsion, and in that case it was unnecessary to base the decision on the ground that there was no relation of master and servant, as the General Pilot Act expressly exempted owners for the acts of pilots taken under the Act: (6 Geo. 4, c. 125, s. 55.) In all other English cases there has been an express statutory exemption. In America it has been held that where a statute compels pilotage, but does not expressly exempt from liability, the owners are liable for the neglect of the pilot, as his services are rendered for the benefit of the owners, and his being appointed by law cannot destroy the maritime lien which accrues to the owners of the vessel injured by the negligent act of the pilot: (The China, 7 Wallace U. S. Sup. Ct. Rep. 54). That case reviews all the English decisions and dissents from them, pointing out that Lord Stowell in The Neptune the Second (1 Dodson 467) held that the true rule, apart from statute, was that the owners were liable for the act of the pilot although compulsory. It has also been held that a pilot is the agent of the shipowner as much as any other person placed in charge of a ship, and that the shipowner is therefore liable for injuries caused by his ship when a pilot, who is appointed by the state, has the sole control, is on board: (Yates v. Brown, 8 Pickering (25 Massachusetts) Rep. 23). Moreover, the English Pilot Acts did not require pilotage to be compulsory as a condition precedent to giving exemption from liability for the acts of the pilots; so long as the statute gave exemption it did not signify how the pilot was taken on board. Even where a pilot's duty had ended and his services were no longer compulsory, the ship was held exempt from the consequences of his acts :

It is submitted that Admiralty Courts are not bound by the rules of common law as to master and servant, and that the liens enforced in those courts cannot be set aside by anything less than express statutory enactment binding upon an Admiralty Court.

Thirdly, there is no express statutory exemption binding upon the Vice-Admiralty Court, because the 27 & 28 Vict. c. 13 is an Act of the Colonial Legislature, and although it may bind Canadian local and municipal courts, it cannot bind the Vice-Admiralty Court, which holds its power by virtue of a commission issued out of the High Court of Admiralty of England. A Vice-Admiralty Court is bound to administer the same law as the High Court. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The common law of the two courts, so to speak, is the same; but can you say that, this question being governed by a Canadian statute, the Court of Vice-Admiralty of Lower Canada is not bound by that statute?] All British Admiralty Courts administer the same system of law, and it is immaterial whether this suit is instituted in the High Court of Admiralty or a Vice-Admiralty Court. Either court is affected by a local law precisely in the same way. The High Court of Admiralty will not take cognizance of colonial Acts without any proof (The Peerless, Lush 30, 103), but treats them rather as foreign laws that must be given in evidence, although perhaps not requiring the same strict proof as required by other courts. Where a foreign statute provides that pilotage shall be compulsory, but that such pilotage shall not exempt from liability for the acts of the pilot, this court or the Admiralty Court holds that although it must take into consideration the first part of the statute making the pilotage compulsory, it cannot hold that the second part, as to exemption, can be carried into effect in a suit in a British court, as it is against the rule of English law: (The Halley, L. Rep. 2 P. C. 193; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 879; 3 Mar. Law Cas., O. S., 131). The same rule should be applied to a Canadian statute. The Admiralty Court would examine the statute to see if there was compulsion, but would not hold that it was bound by the statute as to the effect of such compulsion. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—But the court would be bound to take notice of the statute.] But not of the whole of it. The Canadian law is to be disregarded in so far as it conflicts with the rule of maritime law, that a lien exists upon a ship for damage done by that ship. The High Court of Admiralty and, therefore, the Vice-Admiralty Courts, may be obliged to administer British statute law, but the High Court is not subject to the jurisdiction of Colonial Legislatures, and laws there made cannot bind the High Court, and therefore cannot bind the Vice-Admiralty Courts. [Sir BARNES PEACOCK.—Can their Lordships advise Her Majesty to refuse to give effect to a statute to which she has given her consent?] The Vice-Admiralty Judge in Canada holds his court not because he is in Canada and depends upon the Canadian Legislature for his jurisdiction, but because he has by the very nature of his appointment jurisdiction over all matters arising on the high seas and other places within Admiralty jurisdiction, and administer the same law in his court which is administered in the High Court of Admiralty. The Vice-Admiralty Court is not a Canadian court. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Could you not, in answer to an action in the High Court, set up that the act complained of had been done by the law of Canada?] A British subject suffering injury abroad at the hands of another British subject may sue in the English courts for the wrong, irrespective of the law of the foreign country: (Scott v. Seymour, 1 H. & C. 233). But such a case is distinguishable from the present, because here the act is unlawful by the law of every state, and it is the ordinary consequences of that act which the local law seeks to alter. Assuming that there was one statute only, the court would read it for the purpose of ascertaining whether there was compulsory pilotage and no further; and where there is one general statute and another local statute, the court will not, because one imposes pilotage, take the other into consideration to give exemption. A foreign or local law may be considered on the question of compulsion, but, as to the consequences of such compulsion, the governing law must be the law administered by Courts of Admiralty, which does not, as we submit, give exemption from liability from the acts of pilots, apart from express statutory enactments.

Fourthly, there was a selection by the owners or master of this particular pilot, and therefore, even if the pilotage was compulsory, there could be no exemption, as the relation of master and servant existed between the shipowners and the pilot. The pilot was a man selected by the owners without any compulsion or obligation out of a considerable number of pilots. To preclude liability there must be no power of selection, the limitation of a defendant's power of choice cannot deprive a plaintiff of his remedy if there is a power of selection: (Martin v. Temperley, 4 Q. B. 293.) The English Pilot Acts as a rule require the first pilot who offers to be taken; so also the Act as to pilotage below Quebec (12 Vict. c. 114). In such cases there is no power of selection.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 17.—The judgment of the court was delivered by Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is an appeal from a decree of the Judge of the Vice Admiralty Court of Lower Canada, in a cause of damage brought by the owner of a certain cargo laden on board of two barges, against the steamship Hibernian. The collision happened in the River St. Lawrence, between Pointe aux Trembles and Varrennes, off Isle à l'Aigle. The Hibernian was a large mail steamer, proceeding with cargo and passengers down the St. Lawrence, on a voyage from Montreal to Liverpool: the barges were proceeding up the river, in tow of a steam tug. The Hibernian ran into the barges, and sank them. The court below found that the Hibernian was alone to blame for this collision, and the justice of this decision has not been controverted; but the court below also found that the Hibernian was at the time of the collision under the charge of a pilot, taken on board by compulsion of law; and that therefore her owners were exempt from the liability which the ship would otherwise have incurred. It is from this part of the decision that the appeal has been prosecuted. It is not disputed that a proper pilot was on board; that he took charge of the vessel; gave the orders for her navigation; that they were obeyed; and that the collision ensued in consequence. It has been contended by the appellants nevertheless that the Hibernian is not relieved from her liability. This contention is founded upon this position, that the general and maritime law is alone applicable to the case, by which law the wrong-doing vessel is bound to make full compensation to the suffering vessel for the damage inflicted upon her. In order to sustain this position, it has been asserted,—first, that the Canadian Statutes presently to be mentioned on which the learned Judge relied are without authority in the Vice-Admiralty Court. It has been said at the bar that this suit might, and so far this statement is correct, have been instituted in the High Court of Admiralty, which, it is also said, would not have taken cognisance of the statutes, and in support of this startling proposition the case of the Halley (ubi sup.), decided by this tribunal, was cited. Their Lordships are wholly unable to follow the reasoning of counsel upon this point. In the case of the Halley (ubi sup.) the judgment turned upon a question as to the partial or entire adoption or rejection of the law of a foreign country. In the present case, the law invoked is contained in an Act of the Legislature of a colony belonging to the Crown, and ratified by the express sanction of Her Majesty. Their Lordships have no doubt whatever that this law, in every case to which it is applicable, is of binding authority, equally in the Queen's High Court of Admiralty and in the Vice Admiralty Court of Canada, from which, it is to be observed, their Lordships are now sitting as a Court of Appeal. Secondly, it was argued that the Canadian statute (27 & 28 Vict. c. 58) did not make the taking of a pilot compulsory upon the Hibernian. The 10th section of that statute is as follows: (His Lordship then read the section as given above.) It is contended that, by the language of this section, no compulsion is put upon the master to take a pilot, but that for not doing so merely a penalty is imposed. That, though the term "penalty" is used, it is only meant in the sense of an order to contribute to a particular fund, the support of which is a matter of public policy. But their Lordships are of a different opinion; they hold that when a statute inflicts a penalty for not doing an act, the penalty implies that there is a legal compulsion to do the act in question, and that this principle is not affected by the fact that a penalty has a particular destination. Various decisions in the courts of the United States of North America, and especially one of very high authority in the Supreme Court, were cited for the purpose of showing that such an order, with respect to taking a pilot, as is contained in the section referred to, does not release the ship from the liability, the obligatio ex delicto, which, by the general maritime law, attaches to the wrong-doer; and it certainly does appear that upon this point the decisions of the American courts are at variance with the later decisions of the High Court of Admiralty, affirmed by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. This variance is certainly much to be regretted; but, if it were necessary to decide the present case upon this point alone, their Lordships would think themselves bound to follow the precedents of the English courts. It is to be observed, however, that no decision has yet been given by the American courts upon the effect of a statute releasing in express terms a wrong-doing vessel from liability upon the ground of compulsory pilotage. In the case of the China, decided by the Supreme Court, Swayne, J., observed: "The New York Statute creates a system of pilotage regulation. It does not attempt in terms to give immunity to a wrong-doing vessel. Such a provision in a state law would present an important question, which in this case it is not necessary to consider." (7 Wallace's Rep. (Sup. Court), p. 67.) The other Canadian statute, to which reference must now be made, is 27 & 28 Vict. c. 13, entitled, "An Act to Amend the Law respecting the Navigation of Canadian Waters," in which waters, it is to be borne in mind, this collision took place. By the 14th section it is enacted that "no owner or master of any ship shall be answerable to any person whatever for any loss or damage occasioned by the fault or incapacity of any qualified pilot acting in charge of such ship, within any place where the employment of such pilot is compulsory by law." Their Lordships entertain no doubt that these two Canadian statutes are to be read and construed together as being in pari materia, and that the owner of a ship navigated in Canadian waters under the directions of a pilot taken on board in compliance with the provisions of these statutes, employs the pilot so taken on board by compulsion of law, and, therefore, except in circumstances of special exception, which it is not necessary to enumerate, is expressly exonerated, according to the law of Canada, from all liability to compensation for damage inflicted upon another vessel in consequence of obedience to such directions. It remains only to notice the argument that the pilot in this case was selected by the master, and therefore that the relation of master and servant subsisted between the pilot and the captain, representing the owners. We think this argument is unsound. The second section of the former Canadian Act enacts that "the registrar of the said Trinity House of Montreal shall record in a register, to be kept by him for that purpose, the names and residence in Montreal of all such branch pilots as shall so report themselves, from amongst whom it shall be competent for all shipmasters and others requiring branch pilots to select such pilot or pilots as they may think fit, other than those actually engaged to pilot the ocean mail steamers, or any of them, and to indicate to the said registrar the name or names of such pilot or pilots as they may select," &c. It is plain that the epithet "such," here applied to pilot, refers to the particular qualified class out of which the master is obliged to select one person, and their Lordships are of opinion that this restriction operates to destroy the relation of master and servant which would arise in the case of a free choice made by the master. Their Lordships will humbly recommend Her Majesty to affirm the decree of the Vice-Admiralty Court, and to dismiss this appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

GILBERT v. GUIGNON.

Holders of bills of lading—Priority—Notice.

K., a miller in England, agreed with F. and Co., a firm in California, that they should send him cargoes of wheat, he accepting bills of exchange against the bills of lading. A cargo was sent, and bills of lading, with bills of exchange annexed, were sent to the agents in England of F. and Co., and by them the acceptance of K. to the bills of exchange was obtained. The bills of exchange had been negotiated, and bills of lading deposited by F. and Co. with a Californian bank as security for advances. It appeared that six bills of lading were drawn, and one of them was inadvertently, as F. and Co. alleged, sent to K., who deposited it with a bank at Exeter by way of security. K. failed, and a bill was filed by the English bank, claiming the cargo as against the holders of the other bills of lading.

Held (affirming the decision of the Master of the Rolls) that F. and Co. had full right to negotiate the bills of exchange with the bills of lading annexed, and that the English bank must at the time when they made an advance on the bill of lading have known that there would be several bills of lading, and that one could not be negotiated without the other. The English bank had therefore no priority.

THIS was an appeal by the plaintiffs from a decision of the Master of the Rolls.

A bill was filed by the representative of the West of England and South Wales Bank claiming to be entitled to a cargo of wheat under the following circumstances: Messrs. Forbes, Knight, and Co., carrying on business at Glasgow and San Francisco, received a large order from a miller in Devonshire named Kemp for wheat to be shipped from San Francisco. On the 11th Sept. 1868, 10,769 bags of wheat were shipped on board the Theodor Ducos, to Kemp's order, and six duplicate bills of lading were signed by the master, all bearing that date; six corresponding bills of lading each for the price of the cargo were drawn by Forbes, Knight, and Co. on Kemp; three of these bills were annexed to the same number of bills of lading, and were deposited on 12th Sept. 1868, with the bank of British Columbia as security for advances then made, and on the same day Forbes, Knight, and Co. sent Kemp a letter of advice enclosing, by mistake or inadvertence, an original bill of lading indorsed in blank. This was the first cargo shipped under the order. It appeared that the mode of dealing adopted between Forbes, Knight, and Co., and Kemp, was for Forbes, Knight, and Co. to draw on Kemp against shipments by bills at sixty days' sight, and that Kemp intended to deal with the cargoes before they arrived. The three bills of exchange deposited by Forbes, Knight, and Co., with the bank of British Columbia were on the 13th Oct. following presented by their agent in England to Kemp, who accepted them, but failed to pay them when they became due; and they were ultimately taken up by the drawers, Forbes, Knight, and Co. On the 13th Oct. 1868, Kemp assigned the bill of lading, which had been sent to him by mistake, to the West of England and South Wales Bank as a security for advances. Kemp subsequently became bankrupt, and the cargo on its arrival was claimed by the plaintiffs' bank, as assignee of the bill of lading, and by the Bank of British Columbia as purchasers for value of the bill. Similar proceedings had taken place with reference to other cargoes, and in one case Kemp had objected to accept the bills of exchange unless the bills of lading were deposited with him, but Forbes, Knight, and Co., declined this, as if they did so their lien would have been of no avail. On 14th Dec. 1868, the bills of exchange on the first cargo were protested, and Forbes, Knight, and Co., then learning for the first time that Kemp had used the bill of lading, deposited the price of the cargo with the Bank of British Columbia, and that bank agreed to take proceedings in respect of the cargo on being indemnified by Forbes, Knight, and Co. The Bank of British Columbia obtained possession of the cargo on its arrival in this country. By an order of the court the cargo was sold, and the proceeds of the sale paid into court. It was held in the court below that Kemp was well aware of the mode of dealing pursued by Forbes, Knight, and Co. in their transactions with him, and that this mode was adopted with his consent, and the mistake of Forbes, Knight, and Co. in sending an original bill of lading, instead of a copy, had occasioned the suit. Lord Romilly was of opinion that the Bank of British Columbia was the first transferee of the bill of lading, and that the letter of advice of the 12th Sept. 1868, amounted to notice of the claim of the Bank of British Columbia, both to Kemp and to the plaintiff's bank. The Bank of British Columbia had sold their claim to Forbes, Knight, and Co., who stood in the shoes of the bank, and were entitled to enforce all the legal rights and equities of the bank. Forbes, Knight, and Co., were held to be entitled to the proceeds of the sale of the cargo, and the bill was dismissed with costs as against all the defendants except Kemp.

Fry, Q. C. Ince, and Murch (of the Common Law Bar) for the appellants, contended that the words of the contract were controlled by the custom of merchants as shown by the ruling of Lord Cairns in Berndtson v. Strang, and that Kemp had a perfect right to deal with the cargoes. If Forbes and Co. did not intend Kemp to use the indorsed bill of lading, at all events, they had not given any satisfactory explanation of how they came to send it to him.

Sir R. Baggallay, Q. C. and Kekewick, for the Bank of British Columbia.

Benjamin, Q. C. and Bradford for Messrs. Forbes and Co., submitted that under the particular circumstance, Kemp had no right whatever to use the bill of lading. Where a man, holding a bill of lading under a promise not to use it, did part with it, his assignee would not thereby acquire any right against the person who entrusted him with the bill. It was also clear on the evidence that Kemp understood that Forbes and Co. were to raise money on the cargoes. The following cases were referred to:

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord Selborne).—In this case I only called upon counsel for the defendants, Messrs. Forbes and Co., to address the court upon one branch of it, and after hearing the very able argument of Mr. Benjamin, and the light thrown upon the facts, and the evidence in the course of that argument, I have come to a very clear conclusion that the decision of the Master of the Rolls is right. The case made by the bill really and truly is that the plaintiffs have a legal priority by the first indorsement of one of a set of bills of lading, and that their right to that was in accordance with the contract between the vendor and purchaser of the cargo to which the bills of lading related. Now in the view I take of the case it is not really necessary to dwell much, if at all, upon the question of mercantile understanding in contracts of this kind, which occupies a considerable part of the bill, and which occupied a considerable part of the argument; but I think it well to say a very few words upon it by way of introduction to what I regard as the only question requiring serious consideration in the cause. This contract for the purchase of wheat at San Francisco on the order of the miller in Devonshire was according to the original letter of 3rd May 1868, upon the terms that reimbursement was to be made by the purchaser's acceptance originally at ninety days' sight, afterwards altered to sixty, against the bill of lading; and it seems to have been argued that it was wrong for the unpaid vendor before acceptance of the bills of exchange, by means of which his reimbursement was to be paid, to negotiate those bills of exchange, and to document them in the usual manner by annexing the bills of lading, and so sending them forward in the hands of the person discounting the bills of exchange. I apprehend, on the contrary, that that course is perfectly regular and perfectly right and proper, unless indeed in a particular case where there is an express contract that the bills of exchange are not to be negotiated. In no other way can the vendor protect himself against the contingency, under these circumstances, of the acceptance even of the bills of exchange being refused. The contract that he is to be reimbursed by acceptances against bills of lading cannot possibly disable him from dealing in the ordinary course of mercantile business with the bills of lading for his own protection, and to protect himself against liabilities upon the bills that he draws, at all events before they are accepted. Therefore, in negotiating these bills of exchange with the Bank of British Columbia, or with those from whom the bank took them, it appears to me Forbes, Knight, and Company merely followed the proper and ordinary course of mercantile usage. It might be quite consistent with that, that the purchaser—in other words, Mr. Kemp—might have a right, when the bills of lading were presented to him for acceptance, to say he would not accept the bills under this contract unless the bills of lading were at the same time delivered up to him; and if they had been refused, and he offered acceptances according to his contract on those terms, it may be that he would have had a right to bring an action for breach of contract as against Forbes and Co. That may be the case, though I apprehend, as to that, much would depend upon the particular course of dealing between the parties, which might vary the mode in which, as between themselves, the contract in that respect might be performed. But the real substance of the contract in such a case is this, that the purchaser is to be under the obligation to accept, only when the bills of lading come forward to and are seen by him in the proper course of the transaction; and if he, having the bills of exchange presented to him for acceptance with the bills of lading annexed to them, does not think fit to take measures to claim the delivery of the bills of lading to him, if he has a right to do it—if he is content that they should remain in the hands of the person who is the holder of the bills of exchange, and makes no objection to it, it is exactly the same thing as if he had previously and originally authorised that transaction, and himself adopted that mode, as it is expressed, of "financing the bills of exchange." And that, according to my view of the evidence, is what actually happened in the present case. There can be no doubt whatever that the bank of British Columbia sent forward these bills of exchange with the bills of lading—the three parts of the bills of lading annexed to the three parts of the bills of exchange—that these documents came, in the ordinary course of business, into the hands of their agents in London, Messrs. Smith, Payne, and Co., and then we have got from Mr. Johnson, a witness, who is the clerk of Messrs. Saunders, bankers of Exeter (which firm in Exeter are the agents of Smith, Payne, and Co.) this statement, which he positively swears to—that he received from his employers, Messrs. Saunders, this bill of exchange to be presented for acceptance with these documents annexed to them which are now annexed to them as the documents have been produced in court. If he speaks the truth nobody can for a moment doubt that Mr. Kemp knew and understood that he was accepting bills of exchange secured by bills of lading in the hands of the owners. Not only were the annexed documents so large that nobody could overlook them, but on the face of the bills of exchange which he accepted, it was expressed in words that they were secured by the deposit of the bills of lading. Now Mr. Kemp swears that that is not true; and that he did not know that they were annexed to the bills of exchange, and did not read the document which he signed. I simply disbelieve him, because in the ordinary course of business Messrs. Smith, Payne, and Co., who certainly received these documents would, as a matter of duty, send them forward for acceptance; and the clerk, doing his duty, would present them as he received them; and every man who signs a document must, in a court of justice, unless under very special circumstances of fraudulent means being used to deceive him, be taken to have read the document which he signs; and not the less so if it be relating to a transaction of business of some importance. Therefore, in my judgment, it is clearly and unquestionably established that Mr. Kemp, with perfect knowledge that the bills of lading were held by the Bank of British Columbia, assented to that, and not demanding that they should be delivered up, and not refusing acceptance, accepted the bill of exchange. In that state of things, of course there could be no possible doubt of the right of the Bank of British Columbia, or of the right of the vendors (in this sense unpaid,

GILBERT v. GUIGNON.

that when the bills of exchange came to maturity they were not paid by Kemp, on paying the Bank of British Columbia, to hold the cargo against Kemp or his assignees in bankruptcy. On that point I apprehend there can be no conceivable doubt whatever. Well, but then comes the competition with the present plaintiffs, which arises thus: It appears that on the 12th of Sept., contemporaneously, or nearly so, with the negotiation of the bills of exchange with these three parts of the bills of lading annexed to them, with the Bank of British Columbia, Forbes and Co., the Californian firm, wrote a letter of advice to them, and, as a matter of fact sent to them in that letter of advice another part of the bill of lading endorsed, and that bill of lading, under circumstances to which I shall presently have to advert, was deposited with the present plaintiffs, who are bankers at Exeter and at Bristol. It is admitted now, and cannot be controverted, that the legal right to the cargo passed by the prior endorsement for value to the Bank of British Columbia, in whose shoes Forbes and Co. now stand, unless the plaintiffs have an equity to take from them, the bank, the benefit of that right. Have the plaintiffs that equity? Now, what are the facts? In the first place, I think it is perfectly clear that Forbes and Co. speak the truth so far as this, that there must have been some inadvertence or error in substance in sending that endorsed part of the bill of lading to Mr. Kemp. I do not say that any such inadvertence or error would relieve them from equitable liabilities if circumstances raised those equitable liabilities; but, as a matter of fact, it must have been so, for this reason: that the contract, in any conceivable view of it, was only for acceptances against bills of lading, which of course means bills of lading against acceptances, and to send this endorsed bill of lading to Mr. Kemp when he had not given any acceptance at all was manifestly an inadvertence, and, beyond all question, could not entitle him, or be meant to entitle him, to deal with the bill of lading when he had not actually accepted the bills of exchange and performed the condition upon which alone it was to be dealt with. Now, if I thought it material to determine the question whether that was the error of some copying clerk, or the substantial error of the firm in California, I should say that I am by no means satisfied that it was a clerk's error; and upon the evidence I should come to the conclusion that it was the act of the firm; but I have no doubt it was an act done through some confusion of thought or temporary inadvertence—perhaps in the hurry of business—and certainly not intended to lead to any fraud whatever. Still if a fraud upon a third party dealing bonâ fide, without any notice whatever of the facts, was committed by reason of the signature of the firm of Forbes and Co. to a bill of lading, which they ought not to have signed, and which they sent forward to a person to whom they ought not to have sent it forward in the ordinary course of business, and who was so enabled to deceive somebody else. It would take a long time to convince me that the principles of this court would not, in the circumstances of the case, oblige me to hold them bound. But then in order to establish such an equity the case must really be a case of that nature upon the facts; and here I must observe that I find no such case in the present bill. The plaintiffs do not allege that they are the holders for valuable consideration without notice of the transactions with other people, or of the real state of the facts, and that they have been misled into believing that this was what I may call a clear bill of lading with which Kemp was entitled, as against all the world to deal, by the signature of Forbes and Co., which they found upon it. That case, if it is to be made at all, must be collected only by inferences from facts which appear in the bill, and here I must say that I cannot agree with Mr. Fry that it is a technical thing to examine how the bill states the substance of the plaintiff's case. Here the bill was twice amended, and the whole case of the defendants was open and known before these amendments, or at least the last of them, was made. I must take it that the party knows very well what case he makes in substance; why he makes it; what case he omits to make in substance; and why he omits to make it. And to the last these plaintiffs have chosen to adhere to their original position; that they have legal priority; and that there was some sort of concert between the defendants to deprive them of that priority. The equitable case of an equitable estoppel as against the prior legal owner, or the original vendor taking part in it, is not really at all to be found in this bill. That perhaps might be enough to dispose of the case, but it is always more satisfactory when one is enabled to say that one finds in the state of the evidence a good and consistent explanation of the reason why a case not distinctly pleaded in the bill is not there. I conclude from the evidence that the agents of the bank, the plaintiffs in this case, could not truly and honestly have said that they had not knowledge of the real facts, whatever they were. What is this particular transaction, and how do the bankers bring it forward? They had an account with this miller, Kemp. It is said he was in very good credit, though he failed not very long afterwards; and I assume that as far as the external world was concerned his credit at that time had not been impeached. It is quite plain that he had considerably exceeded the margin of overdraft allowed to him by the bank in his account; but the manager of the bank at Exeter, Mr. Marshall, was so anxious as to the state of that account, that he pressed him to have it reduced, and it was then considered of so much importance—Mr. Marshall and Mr. Kemp knowing probably much better than anybody else where the shoe pinched—to deal with this matter, that the whole of Sunday the 11th of Oct. was devoted apparently to this business as between the bank manager and Mr. Kemp. The bank manager opens his letters on a Sunday morning, and finds various pressing liabilities on Kemp coming forward which should be provided for. He goes to Kemp at his house and talks it over, and I have not the smallest doubt that Kemp showed him that letter of advice which says (whether it was delivered over or not), "We have drawn on you our draft, No. 294, in favour of the Bank of British Columbia in accordance with your instructions through Messrs. Knight and Co." The bank manager no doubt asked him what he had got, and I assume that Kemp, not intending fraud, told him, "I have received this letter of advice. It covers this bill of lading and this invoice, and that is what I will give you." Well; but I shall assume more. I shall assume that Marshall, as a man of business, and an honest man, went on to inquire, "What are the instructions? Have you accepted these bills of exchange? Is this bill of lading conditional on the acceptance?" And I shall assume that he is told the whole truth—namely, that Kemp had not accepted the bill of exchange; that the bill of exchange had not come forward because it was not until the next day that it did, and that Marshall knew perfectly well that on the day when he took that bill of lading Kemp had no right to negotiate or deal with it. Marshall does not say one word inconsistent with that, because both Marshall and Gilbert in their affidavits, deny notice, which had only been denied in the bill argumentatively and, so as to mix up assumptions of law with questions of fact in a manner inexplicable, and making it wholly impossible to assign perjury upon an indictment if they knew the facts, but misapprehended the law. But it does not rest there, because Marshall admits that he knew there were six parts of the bill of lading, and that that was an unusual thing. It had been stated expressly and sworn to in the answer of Forbes and Co., which they had made evidence long before, that that number of parts of bills of lading is only drawn when it is intended to "document" the bills of exchange with the bills of lading. The bills of exchange being drawn in several parts it is necessary to have so many parts of the bill of lading that each part of the bill of exchange may be documented with the corresponding part of the bill of lading. That is said to be known mercantile usage in the evidence of the defendants, and not a word of evidence is there to the contrary. The fact was also alleged in the concise statement upon which these gentlemen were examined, and although I do not see that there was an interrogatory upon that point of mercantile usage expressly, yet, of course, they had their attention called to it, and they had an opportunity of saying that it was not a mercantile usage, or that they did not know that it was. But the matter does not rest there. I am not at all inclined to use hard words where they are not necessary; to speak especially as against gentlemen in the position of the agents of this bank of "conspiracy, perjury, and spoliation;" words a little stronger even than used by Mr. Benjamin in his argument. I do not enter into those points at all, but I am bound to give Forbes and Co. the benefit of every reasonable presumption, consistent with the other evidence in the cause, as to the contents of documents which have been and ought now to be in the possession of the plaintiffs, and which it was the plaintiff's duty to preserve and to produce. On the Sunday when this transaction took place, and when I assume that Kemp told Marshall everything which it was his duty to tell him, Marshall writes to the manager, Mr. Gilbert, at Bristol, to know whether he may make the advance desired; and I assume that in the letter which he then wrote he also did his duty, and told everything which he ought to have, and had ascertained by inquiry from Kemp; and Mr. Gilbert receiving this letter, writes back from Bristol to Exeter to Marshall, expressing his opinion of the transaction, and authorising the advance. Those two letters passed between Bristol and Exeter within three months of this dispute, and of this bill being filed; but neither of them is produced, and no account of a satisfactory kind given of their kind. I assume that the proper inquiries were made, that they were truly answered, and that the whole of the facts as they really stood at the time were within the knowledge of the plaintiffs when they made this advance. That being so, it is quite plain that they could not have been and were not deceived by reason of the inadvertent endorsement of the bill of lading on the part of Forbes and Co., and that the Master of the Rolls has come to a perfectly just and right conclusion in dismissing the bill with costs.

TAPSCOTT AND OTHERS v. BALFOUR AND OTHERS.

Charter-party—"Load in the usual and customary manner"—Demurrage—Commencement of lay days.

By a charter-party a vessel was to proceed direct to any Liverpool or Birkenhead dock as ordered by the charterers, and there load in the usual and customary manner a full and complete cargo of coal. The vessel was ready to enter the dock named by the charterers some days before her actual admission into that dock, and a particular coal agent was selected by them to load her. Owing, however, to his having other vessels waiting to load, a considerable delay took place before, in accordance with the dock regulations, her turn came for admission into the dock, and after she had entered the dock there was a further delay before she could get under the tips.

Held, that, there being no evidence that the charterers had acted unreasonably in selecting the particular coal agent, the charterer was not liable for demurrage before the ship entered the dock, as this was caused by the dock regulations, over which he had no control, and that the lay days commenced at the time of the arrival of the vessel in the dock, and not at the time of her arrival at the particular berth or tip where she was to load.

THIS was an action for demurrage brought in the Court of Passage, Liverpool. By a charter-party dated the 11th June 1872 the plaintiffs, Messrs. Tapscott and Co., as shipowners, agreed with the defendants, Messrs. Balfour, Williamson and Co., as charterers, that their ship, the Emerald Isle, "should with all possible dispatch proceed direct to any Liverpool or Birkenhead dock as ordered by the charterers, and there load in the usual and customary manner a full and complete cargo of coal. The vessel to load at the rate of 100 tons per working day, and the loading not to commence until the 1st July. Demurrage to be at the rate of 4*d.* per ton register per diem." The defendants accordingly named the Wellington dock; and on the 3rd July the plaintiffs gave notice that the Emerald Isle was ready for loading. At this time she was lying in the Sandon dock, not being able to enter the Wellington dock for the reason that Messrs. Brancker, who had been selected by the defendants as the coal-agents who were to load the vessel, had already three vessels loading at the tips or spouts in the Wellington dock, and two more waiting outside, and by the dock regulations the Emerald Isle had to wait until her turn came for admission.

The following are extracts from the dock regulations:

2. No vessel to be allowed to enter the Bramley Moore or Wellington docks to load coals from the High Level Railway, except upon the production of a jerque note or a certificate from the master of the dock in which the vessel is lying at the time, showing that she is ready to commence loading, and also a certificate from the coal agent that she is to load coal at the High Level. No coal agent to be allowed to load more than two flats at the cranes at the same time, nor to have more than three vessels in the Bramley Moore or Wellington docks (both inclusive) loading, and to load coal at the crane at one time. No flat to be admitted until a certificate is produced from the coal agent that she is to load coal at the High Level.

4. No vessel to be entered in the application or berthing book before she is either in the Bramley Moore dock or the Wellington dock; each vessel to be berthed in regular turn as entered, if the specified quantity of coal is at the Sandhills station, if not the next vessel on turn having sufficient coal ready to take the berth; any vessel losing her turn in consequence of coal for her not being at the Sandhills station to be considered first on turn when the coal is ready. Flats and vessels to follow the same order as to turn for loading, whether entered for the cranes or the shoot.

5. When a crane is idle from want of coal, and a vessel not in dock has the whole of her cargo of coal ready at Sandhills (as proved by a certificate from the coal agent and the agent for the vessel) such vessel may at the discretion of the dock master be admitted into dock out of the regular turn, as shown in the application book.

On the 9th July the Emerald Isle took on board 100 tons of coal at the Sandon dock, and on the 11th July she went into the Wellington dock. No further coal was loaded until the 18th or 19th July, when a small quantity was taken on board. Between the 29th July and the 2nd Aug. a considerable quantity was loaded at Messrs. Branker's tips; and on the 6th Aug., in order to avoid being "neaped," the Emerald Isle went out into the river, where the loading was completed by lighterage on the 15th Aug. The plaintiffs at the trial contended that the lay days commenced on the 3rd July when the ship was ready to go into the dock named. A verdict was entered for the defendants, leave being reserved by the learned assessor to the plaintiffs to move to enter the verdict for the plaintiffs on the ground that there was evidence of the defendants' liability. The court to have power to draw inferences of fact.

A rule having been obtained accordingly,

Holker, Q.C. and Gully showed cause.—The words "load in the usual and customary manner" showed that the shipowners contemplated the probability of their having to wait their turn, according to the ordinary rules and regulations of the docks. The lay days, therefore, did not commence until the vessel was actually under the tips. It is the same as if the custom had been incorporated in the charter-party. The stipulation is similar to "in regular turn."

Robertson v. Jackson, 2 C. B., N. S., 412.

Herschell, Q.C. and Myburgh, for the plaintiffs.—We submit that the lay days commenced on the 3rd July, that being the day when the plaintiffs were ready to go into the Wellington dock, and when they would have entered it but for the selection by the defendants of the particular coal agent. It is more reasonable that the delay caused by the selection of a particular coal agent, who may have say twenty vessels waiting for their turn to enter the dock, should fall on the charterer, than on the shipowner who has not the selection.

Lawson v. Burness, 1 H. & C. 396.

At all events the lay days commenced on the 11th

July, when the vessel got into the Wellington dock.

Brown v. Jackson, 10 M. & W. 331.

Then it is argued that if we had remained in the dock we should have completed the loading by the 8th August. The answer is that we went out of dock and completed our loading at Birkenhead by lighterage for the benefit of both parties. If we had not gone out we might have been detained till the next spring tides.

BOVILL, C.J.—The question in the present case really turns upon the construction of the charter-party. Its material clauses were to the effect that the vessel should with all possible dispatch proceed direct to any Liverpool or Birkenhead dock as ordered by the charterers, and there load in the usual and customary manner a full and complete cargo of coal. The vessel was to load at the rate of 100 tons per working day, and the loading was not to commence until the 1st July. Demurrage was to be at the rate of 4*l.* per ton register per diem. The question then arises when were the working days to commence. The charter-party contains no stipulation as to when the lay days are to commence; and therefore, according to the ordinary rule, we should endeavour to ascertain the meaning of the charter-party as to the place to which the vessel is to proceed. Here no place is distinctly named. Where the port is mentioned, the rule is that the lay days commence at the time of the vessel arriving at the usual place of loading, by which is meant, not the actual berth but the dock or roadstead. The shipowner has done all that is required when the vessel is at the port, and at the usual place of loading in the port. Here the agreement is that the vessel shall proceed direct to any Liverpool or Birkenhead dock as ordered by the charterers. The charterers had the selection of the dock, and they accordingly selected the Wellington docks. After notice to the shipowners of this selection, I think it was exactly the same as if the stipulation had been that the vessel should proceed direct to the Wellington dock. Great stress has been laid on the words "load in the usual and customary manner." But these are ordinary words occurring in every charter-party, and apply, I think, to the mode of loading, and not to the place of loading. In Lawson v. Burness (1 H. & C. 400) Pollock, C.B. said: "It appears to me that the word 'customary manner' means the mode of loading, whether by a lighter or at the wharf, and whatever was the customary manner was to be pursued on this occasion." We should be giving a very extended construction to them if we were to say that these words imposed a greater liability on the shipowner. The cases relied on by the defendants are distinguishable from the present, because in each of them there was a clear and express stipulation in the charter-party beyond the words "ordinary and customary manner." In Robertson v. Jackson (2 C. B. 412) the stipulation was that the lay days "should reckon from the time of the vessel being ready to unload and in turn to deliver," and the whole stress of the argument was on those express words. So in Leidemann v. Schutz (23 L. J. 17, C. P.) the express words were "taking on board coal and coke in regular turns of loading;" and in Lawson v. Burness "to be loaded in regular turn," so that in these cases, where responsibility was eventually cast on the shipowner, it depended on the express terms of the charter-party. In the present charter-party there are no such words. If the stipulation had been that the ship should proceed to the Wellington Dock, at Liverpool, and there load, then the difficulty arising from the state of things at the dock would affect the charterer and not the shipowner. In this view of the case, therefore, the lay days would not commence till the vessel was in the Wellington Dock. The right of selection was in the charterers, and they having selected the Wellington Dock, if the regulations of the dock did not allow the vessel to have access to the dock at once, that was no fault of the charterer, and he is not to be made responsible for it. On this point this case is not very dissimilar to Kell v. Anderson (10 M. & W. 498). Then it is further contended that whatever was the right of selection of the dock, the charterers had no right to select the particular agent. But who is to determine what agent is to be employed? The usual course is to employ a coal agent, and the charterer did what was usual. In Leidemann v. Schultze, a question much the same as the present was raised as to whether the vessel might not have loaded earlier, had she been allowed to go to another spout, and Jervis, C.J. said, "Yes, but with different coke, and at a higher price. If the captain may choose at what spout he will load, he may next choose what articles he will load with. It was not left to the jury to say whether the charterer had sent the ship improperly to an encumbered spout." So here, if the plaintiffs wished to contend that the agent was improperly chosen, that should have been left to the jury. There was no evidence that the agent was unreasonably selected, and, therefore, the claim for demurrage from the 3rd to the 11th July cannot be sustained. There is no subordinate question whether the defendants are responsible for the time which elapsed between the vessel's leaving the Wellington Dock for Birkenhead, and completing her loading at the latter place. If the shipowner took this course for his own convenience he could not make any claim for it. But, drawing inferences, I think it was done for the convenience of both parties, in order to prevent a more serious loss, and, therefore, the shipowners are entitled to demurrage for the whole period. The rule must be absolute to enter a verdict for the plaintiffs for 339l. 4s., the amount due for twelve days' demurrage, the lay days being calculated to commence on the 11th July.

DENMAN, J.—I am of the same opinion. This case turns on the proper construction of the words of the charter-party, and I think that on the 11th July the plaintiffs, according to that construction, had done all that lay on them and in them to do. I had at first disposed to think that the words "usual and customary manner" had a larger construction than I think, after argument, they can bear. It was argued that they gave a different interpretation to that part of the contract by importing that the loading could only be done at a particular spout, and that no liability could attach to the defendants until the vessel arrived at the particular spout. But there is evidence that the loading might have been done in another way, and it was not found unusual to do it in another way. I think it within the terms of the charter-party that the loading should be effected by lighterage: and, if so, the words are not so specific that they need be construed to mean that no liability should attach to the defendants until the vessel got to a particular spout. The verdict must be for the plaintiffs for twelve days' demurrage.

Rule absolute.

MORRISON v. THE UNIVERSAL MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY (LIMITED).

Marine insurance—Initialling of "slip"—Concealment of material fact—Subsequent execution of policy by underwriters with knowledge of concealment—Election—Lloyd's List—Underwriters' knowledge of—Misdirection.

The plaintiff, the owner of the ship C., effected, on the 12th Oct., through P. his broker, an assurance upon the chartered freight of the ship, with underwriters, the defendants, who thereupon initialled the slip, and debited the plaintiff's broker with the premium, the defendants being at the time in ignorance of the fact, known to the plaintiff and to P., that a telegram had arrived from which it appeared probable that the C. was lost. On the 13th Oct. the defendants became aware of the telegram, and mentioned it to P. the broker, but raised no objection to the insurance on account of it; and on the following day (the 14th) a stamped policy, in accordance with the terms of the slip, was drawn out by the defendants, without protest of qualification of any sort. On the 19th Oct. news arrived confirming the total loss of the C., and the defendants thereupon repudiated their liability, upon the ground of the concealment from them of the above-mentioned telegram; and the plaintiff at once brought this action against them upon the policy.

It was admitted that the plaintiff's broker, P., acted honestly and in good faith, and refrained from communicating the fact of the telegram, because of his conviction, after inquiry, that the C. was not the ship referred to. It was conceded also, that in effecting marine insurance, until the slip is initialled, the matter is considered merely in negotiation, and that when it is initialled, the matter is considered concluded; and it was proved to be the custom of underwriters to issue a stamped policy in accordance with the slip, no matter what may happen after the slip is initialled.

Blackburn, J. directed the jury that, when the underwriters became aware of the concealment, they were bound, within a reasonable time after its coming to their knowledge, to elect whether they would adopt and go on with the contract, or repudiate it on that ground, and the question was left to the jury, without the expression of any opinion on the part of the judge, whether the defendants had after knowledge of the concealment elected to treat the policy as a subsisting one, to which the jury replied in the negative. The verdict was entered for the defendants.

Held (Cleasby, B., dissentiente), by Martin and Bramwell, B.B., making absolute a rule for a new trial, that this was a misdirection.

[Ex.]

MORRISON v. THE UNIVERSAL MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY (LIMITED).

[Ex.]

Per Martin, B.—The proper direction would be, that if what the underwriters did, or did not do, would naturally lead the broker to suppose that the policy was delivered to him as a binding contract, then it was a binding contract, and the defendants were estopped from denying it.

Per Bramwell, B.—The proper direction would be that the act of the defendants in delivering out the policy without protest, after the concealed fact had come to their knowledge, was conduct which, unexplained, showed that they were treating the contract as subsisting, and was prima facie evidence of an election on their part not to avoid it, and that it was for them to show, by some accompanying circumstances, that the broker had no right so to understand their conduct in the matter.

Per Martin and Bramwell, BB.—There is no rule or presumption of law, either in principle or upon authority, that underwriters are acquainted with the contents of Lloyd's List so as to relieve a person proposing to insure from the duty of communicating to them a material fact known to him before the completion of the insurance, and published in Lloyd's Lists.

Sed contra, per Cleasby, B.—There was no misdirection. The effect of giving out the policy ought not to be regarded of itself as in the nature of an election at all. The only contract is made by the slip, and no fresh one is made by the policy, which, whenever it is given out, whether an hour, a day, or two days after the slip, must be taken as made, uno flatu, at the time the contract is entered into, and is nothing more than the formal conclusion and completion of the contract. The doctrine of election, therefore, does not apply.

Xenos v. Wickman, in the House of Lords (16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 800; L. Rep. 2 Eng. & Ir. App. 296; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 527), and Cory v. Patton (26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 161; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 304; ante, p. 225) discussed and acted upon.

THIS was an action by a shipowner against underwriters upon a policy of marine insurance upon chartered freight.

The declaration was in the usual form, setting forth the policy effected by the plaintiff through his brokers, Messrs. Previté and Greig, with the defendant company on the 12th Oct. 1870, upon chartered freight of the plaintiff's ship Cambria, at a premium of 8 guineas per cent., and averring the total loss of the said ship and freight insured as aforesaid; and assigning as breach the nonpayment by the defendants of the sum insured or any part thereof.

The defendants pleaded—first, that they were induced to subscribe the said policy by the fraud of the plaintiff; secondly, that at the time the defendants became such assurers to the plaintiff, and subscribed and executed the said policy, the plaintiff and his agents misrepresented to the defendants, a fact then material to be known to the defendants, and material to the risk of the said policy; thirdly, that at the time of the defendants subscribing and executing the said policy, and becoming such assurers to the plaintiff, the plaintiff wrongfully concealed from the defendants certain facts then known to the plaintiff and unknown to the defendants, and material to the risk of the policy.

The particulars of the fraud and concealment relied on by the defendants under the above pleas were that the ship had met with a disaster on the coast of America, and that the plaintiff and his agent had received news relating to the accident, and that the plaintiff and his agents represented that the Cambria was not the ship to which the accident had happened, and concealed from the defendants the news they had received relating, or supposed to relate, to the said accident.

At the trial at the winter assizes, 1871, at Liverpool, before Blackburn, J., and a special jury, the following were the facts proved:

The plaintiff was a merchant trading at Liverpool under the firm of Charles Morrison and Co., and the defendants were an assurance company, carrying on business in London. The plaintiff was the sole owner of the ship Cambria, which sailed from Bahia on the 18th Aug. 1870, for New Orleans, with the intention of stopping, in pursuance of directions, at the South West Pass, for orders. On 9th Sept. 1870, the plaintiff entered into a charter-party with McMahon and Co., of Galveston, by which the ship Cambria, John Owen master, and described as then on a voyage to the South West Pass, was to proceed to the South West Pass for charterers' orders, and thence to Galveston, in Texas, or to New Orleans, or Mobile, and there take a full cargo of cotton for Liverpool. The South West Pass is one of the passes into the Mississippi river, and is some distance below New Orleans, and is an usual place of call for orders by vessels going to load cotton at any of the ports in the Gulf of Mexico. Galveston in Texas and Mobile are, as well as New Orleans, ports in the Gulf of Mexico, from which cotton is exported.

On 3rd Oct. 1870, the Cambria arrived at the South West Pass aforesaid, where the master received orders from the charterers to proceed to Galveston for a cargo of cotton, and on the next day he sailed for that port, and on the 6th Oct. the vessel arrived off the harbour of Galveston, and got ashore on the North Breaker, off the entrance of the harbour, and there was totally lost. On the same day, to wit, 6th Oct. 1870, the master went ashore, and dispatched a telegram to the plaintiff as follows: "To C. Morrison and Co., Liverpool.—Ship Cambria ashore near here, full of water, lost."

On 6th Oct., E. P. Hunt, the agent at Galveston of Lloyd's Liverpool and London underwriters' Association, dispatched a telegram from Galveston to the agent for Lloyd's at New York, in the following words: "Ship Cambria, Owen master, of Jersey, from Bahia, South America, ballast, ashore North Breaker, probably lost."

On 7th Oct. 1870, the above telegram from Owen to the plaintiff was received in London, at 3.40 p.m. A telegram was also received at an earlier hour on the same day, addressed to Lloyd's, London, from the agent for Lloyd's at New York, in consequence of which an announcement was made in Lloyd's List, that the Cambria (probably Cameo) from New Orleans, was grounded on North Breaker.

As soon as the aforesaid telegram addressed to the plaintiff was received in London, it was handed over to the post office for transmission to the plaintiff at Liverpool, where it was received at 5.30 p.m. The plaintiff denied having received this telegram, and the issue, tendered by the defendants on this point, was decided by the jury in favour of the plaintiff. The telegram from Lloyd's agent at New York was received by Lloyd's in London, in time for transmission and receipt of the news at Liverpool at 38 minutes past noon on the 7th Oct., and was entered on the loss-book at the rooms of the Underwriters' Association at Liverpool, at 39 minutes past noon on the same day. The telegram as received at Liverpool was as follows: "Cambria, query Callao, from New Orleans, aground North Breaker." The plaintiff was not a member of, or a subscriber to, the Underwriters' rooms, to which only subscribers or members were admitted.

After making the above entry in the loss book, the secretary to the Liverpool Lloyd's Association searched Lloyd's List, and about one hour after making the entry he added at the foot of it, in the loss book aforesaid, the following words in parenthesis: ("memorandum, Cambria, Owen, 1177 tons, left Bahia 18th Aug. for New Orleans.") The said secretary not being able to find anything about a ship named Callao, telegraphed to the London Lloyd's on the same 7th Oct. to inquire into the meaning of the words "qy. Callao," and received an answer the same day at 5.50 p.m., after the rooms were closed, in the following words, "Cameo, from New Orleans, is supposed to be the name of the ship aground on the North Breaker." On the evening of the 7th Oct., at the hour for closing the room to subscribers, the secretary, according to his custom, sent for publication to the Liverpool Mercury, a daily journal published in Liverpool, a copy of the despatch first received from Lloyd's, but added the word "qy." after the words "New Orleans," so that in the Mercury of Saturday, 8th Oct. the publication among the shipping news was in these words "Cambria (qy.), Callao from New Orleans (qy.), aground North Breaker." After the above telegram had been sent to the Mercury for publication, the secretary having received the telegram from London Lloyd's in answer above mentioned, searched Lloyd's List, in order to ascertain something about the ship Cameo, and then made the following entry in the loss-book:

"The vessel on the North Breaker, reported yesterday as the Cambria is stated to be the Cameo, from New Orleans. Memorandum—The ship Cameo from Antwerp, arrived at New Orleans on the 26th Sept." and this entry was also sent to the Mercury on the morning of Saturday, the 8th, and was published in the paper on Monday, 10th Oct.

The secretary stated in his evidence, on cross-examination, that he added the above memorandum, relative to the ship Cameo from Antwerp, as being, in his opinion, tantamount to a statement that the ship on the North Breaker could not be the Cameo, because "the Cameo, having arrived on the 26th Sept., could not have got her cargo discharged and loaded, and came out again to be lost on the 6th." He did not however communicate with Lloyd's, in London, that he had come to this conclusion.

On Saturday, 8th Oct. the plaintiff, who up to that time had no insurance on the Cambria or her freight, wrote from Liverpool orders to Previté and Greig, London insurance brokers, to effect insurance for 5000*l.* on the ship, and 5000*l.* on chartered freight. The plaintiff bought a copy of the Liverpool Mercury of 8th Oct. but he swore that he did not see the entry above mentioned until his attention was called to it at his own house, late in that afternoon, after the letter of the 8th had been posted. The 8th Oct. was a Saturday. The plaintiff also bought a copy of the Liverpool Mercury of 10th Oct., on his way to his office, where he went earlier than usual in consequence of the announcement in the Mercury of the 8th. Immediately on his arrival at his office, on the 10th Oct., the plaintiff telegraphed to his brokers, Previté and Greig, as follows: "Since writing Saturday, paragraph in Mercury, Cambria, query Callao, from New Orleans, grounded on North Breaker. To-day's Mercury says, The vessel on North Breaker reported yesterday as the Cambria is stated to be the Cameo from New Orleans. Can you find out at Lloyd's and let me know by wire before acting;" and later on the same day he also wrote to them a letter stating that he did not think it could be the Cambria, as the master "would certainly have telegraphed," and he had received none, but that, if the Cambria were not lost, he should wish her to be insured. No information was given to the underwriters of the memorandum published in the Mercury of 10th Oct. at the end of the telegram as above-stated. The letter of the plaintiff of 8th Oct., and the telegram of the plaintiff of the 10th Oct., were received together, on Monday, 10th Oct., by the brokers when they reached their office in the city on that morning, and Previté, a member of the firm, went to Lloyd's for the purpose of searching the books, and endeavouring to ascertain whether the vessel reported to be lost was the Cambria or the Cameo.

At the London Lloyd's there are in an inner room, known as the reading room, to which brokers and underwriters have free access, index-books, which are very heavy volumes, containing an index to the entries in Lloyd's List. In these index-books, the said Previté discovered an entry relating to the Cambria, and this entry referred him to Lloyd's List of Saturday, 8th Oct., where he looked and found the announcement of the Cambria (probably Cameo), from New Orleans, grounded on North Breaker, published as having been received from New York as above-mentioned. Lloyd's List, to which the broker was referred by the said index-books, is a daily shipping gazette, containing several hundreds of entries, giving shipping news from all parts of the world, and these gazettes are received every morning by underwriters, and were actually received by the defendants. The entries in Lloyd's List are indexed by clerks at Lloyd's into the index-book above described. The said broker also searched at Lloyd's for information about the ship Cameo, and found that there was news of her arrival at New Orleans on the 26th Sept., and not finding any news of the arrival of the Cambria at New Orleans, or at the South West Pass, as was to be expected if she had arrived there, he concluded that the vessel reported to be ashore on the breakers must be the Cameo and not the Cambria. Upon cross-examination by the defendants' counsel, he admitted that, when coming to that conclusion, it did not occur to him to think how a ship that had arrived at New Orleans on the 26th Sept. could have loaded there and been lost on the North Breaker on the 6th Oct.

The said broker, however, having come, in good faith to a conclusion, as above stated, that the vessel reported ashore on the North Breaker could not be the Cambria, applied on behalf of the plaintiff to various underwriters on the 10th, 11th, and 12th Oct. for insurance as directed by the plaintiff in his letter of the 8th Oct. He stated to them when, and from where the vessel sailed, and what was the voyage, but, beyond this he gave no information to the underwriters, and made no communication to any of them of the telegrams relative to a ship ashore on the North Breaker, or of his searches and the inference which he had drawn in his own mind that the vessel reported ashore was not the Cambria. He admitted, on cross-examination by the defendants' counsel, that he did not intend to insure the Cambria, if it should turn out that she was the vessel that was on the North Breaker, and that he refrained from communicating anything on that subject to the underwriters, because of his conviction that the vessel ashore was the Cameo and not the Cambria. It was not suggested, by either party, that the broker was acting otherwise than in good faith, and it was conceded that, in making the insurance hereinafter mentioned, he had no dishonest intention.

On the 10th Oct., after making the examination above described, the said broker applied for insurance, by making out a slip in the ordinary form used by insurance brokers, and he effected, on that day, with underwriters other than the defendants' insurance on the freight for 1350*l.* at a premium of 6*l.* 6*s.* per cent.; and on the same day he exhibited to the defendants' underwriter, Mr. J. L. Fisk, the slip, initialed at a premium of 6*l.* 6*s.* per cent., and proposed that the defendants' company should take a line on the freight at the same rate. Fisk, after hearing from the said broker that insurance on the vessel was also desired, declined to insure the ship at all, but offered to take a line on the freight at 8 guineas premium. On Tuesday, 11th Oct. the said broker effected further insurance, on behalf of the plaintiff, on the freight of the Cambria, at 8 guineas per cent., and on Wednesday, 12th Oct., plaintiff proposed to the defendants' assistant underwriter, H. T. Pritchett (Fisk being then away for a short holiday), to take a line on the freight at 8 guineas per cent., stating that Fisk had given him a quotation at that rate; and Pritchett, without asking for or receiving any information from the broker, beyond the date of the sailing of the vessel, and the facts stated in the slip, initialed the slip, on behalf of the defendants, for a line of 500*l.* on the chartered freight. The same day, and soon after having initialed the slip, the said Pritchett had occasion to visit Lloyd's rooms, and there saw, on entering the room, the loss-book, lying open on the stand on which it is always kept open for the information of all visitors to the rooms. In it there had been entered that morning, for the first time, the announcement from the agent at New York, above mentioned, that is to say, "The Cambria, probably Cameo, from New Orleans, had grounded on North Breaker." This entry should, in ordinary course, have been made in the loss-book on the same day as it appeared in Lloyd's List, namely, on the 8th Oct., but owing to some negligence at Lloyd's, it had been omitted. Immediately on seeing this entry in the loss-book, Pritchett saw the broker Previt  in the room, and drew his attention to the loss-book, saying, "This looks uncommonly like the Cambria which I have just written for you." To which, according to Pritchett's evidence, Previt  replied, "I know all about this; this is the Cameo," or words to that effect. Previt , however, said his reply was, "I have known about that some for some days. I don't think anything of it." Pritchett then went with Previt , and was shown by him the entries which he (Previt ) had previously examined.

It was conceded that, in effecting marine insurances, until the slip is initialed, the matter is considered as merely in negotiation. When initialed, the contract is considered concluded. It was proved to be the usage of underwriters to issue a stamped policy in accordance with the slip, no matter what might happen after the slip was initialed.

On 13th Oct. Fisk returned to London, and was immediately informed by Pritchett of all that had taken place between himself and Previt . Fisk stated that he was the person whose duty it would be to determine, on ascertaining that there had been a concealment, whether the defendants would carry out the insurance.

The course of business as to issuing policies in the defendants' office is as follows:—The business of the office is conducted in two departments, one of which is the underwriting department, and the other that of the Secretary and Adjuster of claims. After slips are initialed in the underwriter's department, they are passed into the secretary's department, and thenceforward the underwriter's department has nothing further to do with them. All the slips taken are forthwith given to the policy-writers, and the head of the policy-writers obtains the necessary stamps, and the policies are then filled up on the proper stamped forms. This work usually occupies about two days; that is to say, on the day but one after the slips are initialed, the policies are signed by the directors, and are then placed in pigeon holes, under the letters of the alphabet, in the outer office for delivery. The policies are always dated as of the day of the date of the slip, no matter what delay may occur in filling up the policies.

In this case a policy was filled up according to the terms of the initialed slip. It was dated on the 12th Oct. 1870, but was not executed by the directors until the 14th or 15th, and, having been deposited in the pigeon holes, was taken away by a clerk of Previt , the broker, on the 14th or 15th of that month. On the 19th Oct. 1870, a telegram was received and posted on the loss-book at Lloyd's, showing, unquestionably, that the vessel lost on the North Breaker was the Cambria. The defendants made no objection nor protest, in respect of the insurance effected with them as aforesaid, between the date of initialing the slip and the 20th Oct., when notice was given by them to the plaintiff that they declined to be bound by the policy. No premium for insurance had been received by the defendants, prior to the 20th Oct.; the premium, though debited at once to the broker, would only become payable on the 8th Nov. It was tendered by the broker, on behalf of the plaintiff, to the defendants in due time after the 20th Oct., but the defendants refused to receive it.

At the trial, various defences were set up, a principal contention being that the plaintiff had received a telegram from his captain, announcing the loss before directing his brokers to insure on the 8th Oct.

The learned judge directed the jury in his summing up as follows: "When he hears that there has been concealment, the underwriter is not bound to say, 'I will put an end to the policy,' but he has a right at his election to say, 'You have been guilty of a concealment which would entitle me to determine the policy, but I prefer to go on with it; he has what lawyers call the right of election, but he cannot say, 'I elect to go on,' and then when he hears that there is a loss say, 'Now I hear there is a loss I will not recognise the policy.' . . . Then comes the third and last question which I pointed out to you before. I told you that when a man discovers that there has been misrepresentation of that sort, he cannot keep the contract and get rid of it too. He has a right to say, 'Take back your premium and make the contract a nullity.' He has also a right to say, 'You have done what has entitled me to get rid of the contract, but I will keep the premium and go on.' He has a perfect right to do either of those things, and when he has got notice of the concealment he is bound to make his election within a reasonable time; he is not bound to do it with desperately hot speed. A man cannot wait to take his chance, he must elect within a reasonable time."

The learned judge then reviewed the evidence, and proceeded: "Now Mr. Fisk is the man who determines on these returns of premiums. He knows on the 13th Oct. of all this, as far as this non-disclosure goes. He was aware of the fact, and that he might have returned the premium, or had a right to say he would return the premium; and returning the premium would say he was not liable. No doubt if he had offered to return the premium Mr. Previté's answer would be, 'I will not take it,' but still Mr. Fisk had no right to continue to hold the premium; he could not play fast and loose; he must either adopt it or refuse it. A great deal has been said about the slip and the stamped policy. I think as regards this part of the case it makes no difference whatever. I believe (you know better than I do) it has been correctly stated that the putting it on the slip is considered in fair dealing and mercantile understanding, as being the contract, as if it were made on that day. This would equally apply if the contract had actually issued as a stamped policy. . . . The defendants knew the fact, and did not do anything or take any step, until news of the loss came. Then the third question of this defence comes to be, do you think that they, having this opportunity (taking into account that they should make an election within a reasonable time) had elected to go on with the contract? If so, that puts an end to the defence. On this I express no opinion at all. I leave this entirely to you."

Four questions were left to the jury by the learned judge, which were answered by them as follows:—First, whether the plaintiff had received the telegram addressed to himself from Galveston by the master, John Owen, and to this the jury answered, No; secondly, whether it was material to the underwriters in calculating the premiums or determining whether to take the risk, to know of the telegram which arrived, and was in Lloyd's Lists and the Mercury, and to this the jury answered, Yes; thirdly, whether the broker had a right to suppose that the underwriters were acquainted with the contents of Lloyd's List, and to this the jury answered, No; fourthly, did the defendant company, after knowledge that the broker had not disclosed this fact, elect to treat the policy as subsisting, and to this the jury answered, No. The learned judge thereupon directed the verdict to be entered for the defendants upon all the pleas except that of fraud.

A rule nisi was subsequently obtained by Holker, Q.C., on behalf of the plaintiff for a new trial on the ground of misdirection, in that the learned judge ought to have told the jury that the defendants were to be presumed to know the contents of Lloyd's List, and the plaintiff was not bound to communicate information contained in them; and also that, on the facts proved with reference to the execution of the policy without protest, after knowledge of the alleged concealment, the learned judge ought to have directed the jury to find for the plaintiff; and that on the question of election, the verdict was against the weight of evidence; and against this rule.

Feb. 4, 6, and 7.—Bull, Q.C., J. R. Mellor, and Benjamin, for the defendants, showed cause, and contended in substance, that the initialling of the slip was, in fact, the contract, and that the policy when executed, had reference to the date of the slip, and that the policy ought to be considered as having been executed at that time, and that it was avoided by any concealment prior to that date. The memorandum in the Liverpool Mercury was a material fact within the knowledge of the plaintiff, which he ought to have communicated to his broker, and that the broker himself concealed facts within his knowledge from the underwriters. They urged also that the underwriters merely issued the stamped policy as a formal act, because they were bound in honour to place the assured in a position to bring an action, in which the question of liability or non-liability might be determined, and also that the underwriters were not bound to be acquainted with the contents of Lloyd's List, and that in all cases it was a question for the jury whether they were or not. Neither party intended to insure the Cambria if she was lost at the time of the insurance. They cited and relied on the following cases and authorities:

That even if the plaintiff's broker, Previté, ought to have informed the defendants of the facts which had come to his knowledge, still, if the defendants were fully informed of these facts aliunde, before they issued the policy, they must be taken, by issuing it with such knowledge without any protest, to have elected to go on with the insurance, and they could not afterwards resist the claim of the assured on the ground of the concealment of the facts referred to. Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 8.—There being a difference in opinion amongst the members of the court the following judgments were delivered:—

MARTIN, B.—In this case, the majority of the court are of opinion that there should be a new trial. Three points were made in answer to this action, the principal one being that there was a material concealment made by the plaintiff (the assured) himself, namely, the concealment of a memorandum or notice which appeared in the Liverpool Mercury, of Monday, the 19th Oct. 1870; and my impression is that, if established, that was a material concealment; but I do not think it was fully or distinctly brought before the jury. It seems, I think, to have been considered at first, both by the learned judge and the counsel on both sides, as rather of a secondary character to the other defence to the action. But, upon consideration, both my brother Bramwell and I think that it is clearly a serious matter, and that it is not right to allow an obviously momentous question to be determined unless it be quite clear that the real point has been distinctly brought to the consideration of the jury. There is strong reason to believe that the jury did themselves take this into their consideration; but it was certainly not laid before them by the learned judge; nor was their attention called to it in the way in which it is desirable that such an important question should be determined. Upon that point, therefore, my brother Bramwell and I think that the verdict was at least doubtful. The concealment next alleged was a concealment by the broker, and the plaintiff's counsel admitted that, no doubt, that was a concealment; but it was said that, inasmuch as the fact which was alleged to be concealed appeared in Lloyd's Register, or some book or publication at Lloyd's, the underwriter was not in a condition to take advantage of the concealment. That I think was disposed of in the course of the argument by our being satisfied that it was a question of fact; and that it could not be assumed, as a matter of law, that the underwriter saw every notice that appeared in the paper (which was handed up to us), a copy of which it was alleged, was on a desk in his room. It must necessarily be a question of fact, and upon that, as I have already stated, the question was, in the opinion of the majority of the court, left rightly to the jury, and, were it the only question left in the case, we should feel bound by it. But there is a serious question behind. The facts were as follows: There were certain telegrams published at Lloyd's. The brokers who effected the policy knew of them; and, as already stated, we think, and, indeed, it is admitted, that it was material that they should have been, though they were not, communicated to the underwriters; and the reason given by the broker at the trial is probably true, that he really had satisfied himself that the ship which was stated to be ashore was not the Cambria, and that he honestly believed that it was a different ship. However, that fact became known to the underwriter shortly afterwards, who was then possessed of exactly the same knowledge as the broker, and he then, without any intimation to the broker of an intention to dispute his liability, delivered a signed policy, stamped, to the broker, or to the plaintiff; and the question is whether or not he is now at liberty, after the loss has occurred a few days afterwards, to say he is not bound by that policy on the ground of concealment. I confess that my impression is that, having thought fit without notice to give out a policy as if it were binding on him, and which would induce anyone to suppose that he so considered it, and especially after having received the premium, he is, to use an intelligible but much misused expression, estopped, and cannot be allowed to wait until the loss has occurred, and then elect to return the premium or to rescind the contract for its payment, and put the assured in the position of being prevented from insuring elsewhere in the interval between the payment of the premiums and the discovery of the loss. I cannot but think that the manner in which this question was viewed by the Lord Chief Baron at the former trial in the summer of 1871, as read to us from the shorthand writer's notes, is the more correct mode of dealing with the case. My own impression is that the proper direction to the jury would be that if the underwriter did deliver the policy, and if the delivery of the policy and the retention of the premium, or the non-rescinding of the contract for the premium, would naturally lead the plaintiff to suppose that it was delivered to him as a binding contract, then it was a binding contract, and the underwriter is estopped from now denying it. That is my view of this case, and therefore, in my opinion, there must be a new trial.

BRAMWELL, B.—I think that there must be a new trial in this case, although I come to that conclusion with great reluctance, as I cannot help thinking that substantial justice has been done by the verdict of the jury. I agree with my brother Martin, that we cannot rely upon what may be called the plaintiff's concealment, that is to say, the suppression of that memorandum. I will not go over the ground that he has gone over, but may mention that I have spoken to my brother Blackburn upon the subject, and that his view is the same as that expressed by my brother Martin, namely, that that matter was not left to the jury, nor can they be taken to have expressed an opinion upon it. Therefore the verdict cannot be supported on that ground. Then the remaining questions arise upon the broker's concealment. Now, the broker did conceal that which, undoubtedly, was material, and which should have been communicated to the underwriter (the defendants), and it is certain that the underwriter did not know it. The plaintiff's first point was that there was no occasion to communicate it, upon the ground that the underwriter was, in some way or another, bound to take notice of Lloyd's List. I do not know exactly how it should be phrased, but it was suggested either that the underwriter was to be assumed to know what was in Lloyd's List, or at all events that there was no duty on the broker to communicate a matter upon which the underwriter could inform himself, if he thought fit. I do not agree with that. It is impossible to say that there is any rule of law, either on principle or upon authority, which binds the underwriter, and affects him, as it were, with notice of whatever may be in Lloyd's List. I can well understand that there are certain things which they must take notice of. I am not going to attempt to define or describe them; but I concur in the opinion indicated by my brother Cleasby, that what the underwriters must notice, as well as the assured, may be described somewhat thus: those things which are matters of general knowledge, and which are not applicable to the particular ship. But, to hold that the underwriter is bound to carry in his head all that has appeared in Lloyd's List for an indefinite period of time, he not being particularly interested to remember more of one ship than another, rather than to hold that the owner of the ship shall inform him of the particulars, which relate, or which may relate to that ship, or affect ships of a similar name, seems to me to be a monstrous proposition; and would put a difficult and endless burden on the underwriter, when there would be no difficulty at all in the shipowner's making the communication. I think, therefore, that this was material to be known; that the defendants (the underwriters), did not know it; that it was the duty of the broker to state it; and that therefore there was concealment. The next question was this: The underwriters became aware of the existence of this fact, and consequently of this concealment after the slip had been initialled, and before the policy was issued, and the question was whether we could look to the time of the initialling of the slip as the time at which the rights of the parties were fixed. Independently of authority I should entertain a strong opinion that we could do so. I confess I am strongly inclined to think that we could do so whatever might be the condition of the Stamp Laws, because we are not talking of any particular document, but of the time, viz., the time when the document was initialled. There seems to me to be no repugnance to the actual contract in holding this to be the case, for, without using the doubtful term condition, it is certain that the obligation of the underwriters on the policy is affected by something which does not appear in the policy; that is to say, if there had been a concealment at some time or another of a material matter not known to him, he may elect to avoid the policy. That is not mentioned in the policy in any way, and therefore the written obligation contained in the policy is controlled by something not appearing on its face. That being once admitted to be the case, the time of epoch at which the parties are to date their rights may, as it appears to me, be put at two, twenty, or any other number of days before, or at the instant of the policy. There is no contradiction of the policy or adding to it terms in one case more than in another. But independently of these considerations of principle it seems to me that the case of Cory v. Patton in the Queen's Bench (ubi sup.) is decidedly in point. It was there held that the assured was not bound to communicate material that came to his knowledge after the initialling of the slip. The grounds upon which the court so held were, that the initialling of the slip was the time at which the rights of the parties in relation to this matter were fixed. If that were true in that case, it is equally true in the present case, and consequently the defendants here were at liberty to show that, although before the execution of the policy they knew of this matter, they did not know of it before the slip was initialled, at which time their rights and obligations were fixed. There is no difficulty upon that point, as far as I can see, either upon principle or upon authority. But now comes a matter upon which I have a great difficulty, and as to which I cannot concur with the ruling of my brother Blackburn at the trial. After the slip had been initialled, I believe on the same day, the underwriters became aware of the concealment, that is to say, they became aware of the two telegrams in Lloyd's List; they became aware that those telegrams were known to the broker, and they were also aware that they were not previously known to themselves. In my judgment they then had a right (and in that I am confirmed by my brother Blackburn's opinion, for he has told me that he so said at the trial), even if the policy had been delivered at the moment the slip was initialled, to say, "Here is a material concealment." But they would have had a duty also cast upon them, if they chose to avail themselves of that material concealment for the purpose of avoiding the contract of saying within a reasonable time after they became aware of the circumstance that the contract was not binding upon them, although they had executed the policy. They then had a right to say to the assured, "We have found out a material concealment; we elect to avoid the policy and not be bound by it; we return the premium, or we release you from any obligation to pay it, and we give you notice that we shall treat it as a non-enforceable insurance." That is what they would have had a right to say and to do if they had delivered out the policy. If they had not so done within a reasonable time, the policy would have been binding upon them. It seems to me to be clear that this is the law. It is consistent with reason, common sense, justice and authority that, where a man has notice of any matter which gives him the right to continue a contract between himself and another, or (it being voidable) to treat it as void, for the reason that has come to his knowledge, he must within a reasonable time intimate that he determines not to go on with the contract. That would have been the state of things if the policy had been given out. It is, of course, equally the state of things if the policy had not been given. If it be true, supposing the policy to have been given out, that the underwriter must have decided to avoid it within a reasonable time after notice of the circumstances that warrant him in so electing, it must equally be the law that he must do so within a reasonable time, although the policy was not given out. If it were not so, a man would, as was forcibly argued by Mr. Herschell, have greater power under an innocent concealment of this sort than under a fraudulent concealment. It appears to me that, when the time arrives for the next step in furtherance of the contract, then is the time for the party who is to take the next step to declare his election; thus, when the time arrived for the second step to be taken by the underwriter in the present case in furtherance of the engagement which he had entered into upon the initialing of the slip, he should then have declared his election, and that if he took a step in furtherance of the contract without at the same time intimating to the assured, "You are not to understand that I waive or that I elect not to exercise the right to declare this contract void;" if he took that step in silence it seems to me that the assured is entitled to treat it as a notification that the underwriter has elected not to avoid the contract, but to go on with it. In my judgment, therefore, at the time when this policy was given out, the underwriter ought to have said, "I will not give you a policy; I elect to avoid this contract on the ground of concealment." If the assured (the plaintiff) had said to him, "Well, but that is not fair, because I deny the materiality of the concealment;" or, "I propose to contest the question with you;" then I think the underwriter might have said, "Well, I give you the policy, but I will give it to you with a protest that it is subject to my right to avoid the contract, on the ground of concealment." If he did not do that, and did not refuse to give the policy, or did not give it in those terms, I think that it was such an election by him, or such an act done by him, that the assured would be entitled to treat it as an election not to avoid the contract on the ground of concealment. But it is said in answer to that, that the giving out the policy was a thing which the underwriter could not avoid, because the case of Xenos v. Wickham (ubi sup.), in the House of Lords, shows that the policy is the property of the assured from the time it is executed. In the first place Xenos v. Wickham did not show that the policy was the property of the assured if it was voidable on the ground of concealment. In the next place, it only alters the form of the objection, because instead of saying that the policy ought not to have been given out, it only comes to this, that it ought not to have been executed. It is in fact the same thing. I know it has been said, "Well, those who prepared and executed this policy had no authority so to do." It appears to me that that is not so. No doubt they were clerks in the office who had nothing to do with underwriting, and had not of themselves, power to elect not to rely upon this objection; but they were clerks who were told to make out the policies in accordance with the slips, and therefore had authority given them by virtue of their office and duty so to make them out; and if it was intended to revoke that authority, the clerks should have been told not to make out the policies in conformity with the particular slips. Therefore I say that they had authority to make out these policies. But, farther than that, the policy was signed by the directors, and surely they would have had authority, or a sufficient number of them. It comes in truth to this: if the underwriting officials of the establishment below had the power to elect to avoid this insurance, and had been inclined to do so, they should have told the clerk not to make out the policy, or the directors not to sign it; and if, by the effect of the case of Xenos v. Wickham (ubi sup.) the policy vested in the assured from the time it was executed, then, as I have said, precisely the same question presents itself in a different form. It should either not have been executed without a protest to the assured, or it should not have been executed at all. Then it is said, and this I understand (though I am not sure I am right) to be my brother Cleasby's difficulty, and it is one therefore which I approach with great respect, not only because he entertains a doubt upon the question, but also on account of its own intrinsic difficulty, namely, that the delivering out the policy was a thing which the underwriters could not help doing in the sense that they had engaged to do it, and how can a man exercise any election in a matter which he does under compulsion? A proposition so stated is no doubt a difficult one to deal with; but in truth, in one sense, it is not done under compulsion, though in another sense no doubt it is. As men of honour they must do it. But as men of honour they must do it with a qualification. They may either say "Understand, we refuse to deliver this out to you in furtherance of the contract unless you insist upon it with a view to try the question between us, and then we will deliver it with a protest." And another answer to that argument seems to me to be this: that it is not binding upon them in point of law, and that therefore if they do it as a matter of honour, they may do so, but doing it as a matter of honour under such circumstances will not cause them to lose any right which they may have. It seems to me, therefore, that when the time arrives for the giving out the policy, or if it be so, as in Xenos v. Wickham, for the execution of the policy, it ought either to have been refused, or if, upon the refusal, the assured had insisted upon his right against them for the purpose of trying the question, and had called upon them as honourable men to give him the policy, it should then have been given with an intimation that they elected to avoid the contract. I think, therefore, that there was a misdirection in that respect. But I do not feel so confident upon that point as that I would either myself, or would advise any other judge, to rule in that way. What I should prefer would be to give the defendant leave to move, and to put the question to the jury in this way: "Here is an act which unexplained shows that the defendant was treating the contract as a subsisting one; but if in the surrounding circumstances, or in any way, you can come to the conclusion that the assured was not warranted in so treating it, then you may find for the defendant. But prima facie it is an election by the defendant not to avoid the contract, and it is for him to show some accompanying circumstances making out that the plaintiff had no right so to understand it, or to give some evidence to show that the plaintiff had no such right. I deprecate the notion of being hypercritical in dealing with a summing up at Nisi Prius. I make that remark because it might be said that it is nearly what my brother Blackburn did. But it is, in truth, not quite what he did. I think that the proper thing to have done would have been to leave it to the jury as a case in which the burden of proof was upon the defendant, for the purpose of showing that the plaintiff did not understand that as an affirmation of the contract. I really cannot help saying that I am in this case impressed with the feeling of a sort of hardship on the plaintiff (without saying anything to indicate that I view his case very favourably), and that I would grant a new trial upon the ground of the verdict being against evidence. I cannot but think that the underwriters intended to go on with this insurance. I do not think that they cared for the telegrams of which they had notice, and I doubt extremely whether the verdict was not against the evidence upon that score. However, that is not a matter which is strictly before us now, and the only reason for which I mention it is for the purpose of showing the reasonableness of the proposition for which I have been contending, because if the underwriters entertained the notion, which I think they did, how reasonable it is to suppose that the plaintiff's broker might have entertained it also, and how hard it is upon the assured that reasonably, and under the circumstances probably, entertaining that notion, he should be deprived of the power which otherwise would have existed, or be induced not to exercise the power which he had of going elsewhere and making an insurance in lieu of this one which the defendants have sought to declare to be void; for that he could have done so is abundantly manifest upon the evidence. I think, therefore, upon that ground, that there was a misdirection, and that there ought to be a new trial.

(a) On that occasion the Lord Chief Baron told the jury that the slip constituted the contract; but that having after signing it, and before issuing the policy, become aware of the undisclosed telegram, the defendants ought immediately to have declined to issue the policy. The jury, being unable to agree, were discharged without giving any verdict; see ante, p. 100, where the case is reported at Nisi Prius.

CLEASBY, B.—If the only question in this case was whether there was a sufficient finding of the jury that there was a material concealment in the matter of the memorandum, which has been referred to, I think that if my learned brothers were of opinion that it was not sufficiently put before the jury, it would not be a matter upon which I should differ from them. It is, I think, to a certain extent a matter of opinion, and one in which I might well be influenced by their opinion and judgment to the extent of not insisting upon my own. But as there is another question of vast general importance, namely the effect of giving out the policy by the underwriters, when the slip has been executed and the risk taken, I feel myself bound, having regard to the general importance of that question, to differ from them in that matter, and equally bound to state my real opinion on the matter. Now it appears to me that the finding of the jury that there was a material concealment is warranted by the evidence, and not only so, but there is sufficient to satisfy me that the jury came to that conclusion upon the evidence of the memorandum being concealed. I do not think that any opinion expressed by my brother Blackburn on the matter ought to influence me, seeing what took place before and after, for I should implicitly take his opinion as to what he left to the jury if it bears upon what took place in reality, and the jury entertained it, although the opposite party might suppose that the learned judge had not left it to the jury. The question is, is there a finding upon sufficient evidence of this materiality applied to this particular matter? I have looked carefully through what took place at the trial, and the conclusion produced upon my mind is that the learned judge attributed very little importance to the slip; that the learned counsel attributed great importance to it, in considering whether there was a material concealment; and that the jury took up and acted upon this very matter of material concealment in the verdict which they gave. Now it is plain from what took place, that the learned counsel intended to put this forward as a matter involving very material consideration; and although the learned judge did not so put it to the jury, yet he had the matter brought before him because he expressed his opinion distinctly, with regard to this memorandum, that "the difference between Lloyd's List and the Mercury was rather light and shadowy." That was his opinion of it as a matter of fact. Therefore it was brought before him and entertained by him, and the whole question of concealment went to the jury. What influences me is the question asked by the jury after the conclusion of the summing up, "Did Mr. Morrison know; and secondly, did the underwriters know?" The learned judge appears to have supposed that this referred to the private telegram, which was the principal question in the cause, and with which we have nothing to do, because there was no evidence of it, or that the underwriters knew of it. The jury may have said, that Mr. Morrison was bound to give all the information which he actually had. That satisfies me that what was passing in the juror's mind was what had been pressed upon him before, the fact that the plaintiff had not communicated this information. The plaintiff might not have had the private telegram; but this information he did have, namely, the memorandum which tended directly to show that the alternative case of the Cameo being upon the rock did not arise at all; and, therefore, if one of the other vessels was there it must have been the Cambria. That is the view which I take of the result of the whole matter, and it certainly leaves me at this conclusion, that the jury found the materiality of the concealment, and founded their judgment upon that concealment of this memorandum which seems to be considered now by everybody as material. That being so, I do not think that, because the matter was not distinctly left by the learned judge to the jury, it is a case in which we ought to interfere. If I am not wrong in supposing that to be the case, I should be quite satisfied that the jury did deal with this evidence, and did find that it was material, and so arrived at their verdict, which is a conclusive verdict upon the matter, and that we ought not to interfere, whatever may have taken place as regards the dealing with that matter by the learned judge. The only thing which we have to see is this: Is there a finding in the matter? If there is, does it lead to the conclusion that the defendants are entitled to defend the action? I think that there is a finding of the materiality of this. But, however, the great question of importance in this case is the question of election, namely, as to the effect of delivering out the policy without saying anything. Does that, as a matter of law, operate as a waiver of a matter of defence which was in the knowledge of the underwriter, or to be assumed to be within his knowledge? I quite agree that a man may elect to waive any objection which there may be to a voidable contract by agreement or by his conduct. If he does it by his conduct in any way he cannot afterwards set up that defence. Now the contract here is, as I understand, the giving out the policy without at the time giving any intimation or indication that he reserved any right to insist upon the objection which he now raises. That depends upon what the effect of giving out the policy is. I think myself that its effect ought not to be regarded of itself as in the nature of an act of election at all. But before I re-examine that I wish to draw attention to what appears to me to be the real position of the parties when that information was communicated, because I cannot bring myself for a moment to think that there was any intention or idea of insisting against the contingency of the Cambria being the vessel on the rock. That was entirely out of the question. I think what the plaintiff's broker, Mr. Previte stated afterwards in his letter, and the whole nature of the case, show that that must be so. This insurance had been taken before there was the least idea of the state of things existing at all of any vessel being on the rock. The premium of 8 guineas was attributed to the class of vessel, its character, which could be easily ascertained, and to the fact of a very considerable period having elapsed. The sum of 8 guineas was fixed upon that footing; and not as a sort of wager upon the ambiguity and effect of the telegram, and it cannot be supposed that this policy was to be regarded as directed to the contingency of the Cambria or the Cameo being upon the rock. I do not think that the conversation which took place between Mr. Previte and the underwriter in the room on the 12th Oct., after the slip had been initialled, is a matter which can influence in the least degree the slip which had then been executed. The transaction, it appears to me, goes on upon the old footing; and if that be so, it is conclusive against anything which took place afterwards operating as an election, which would introduce a new idea altogether, namely that of the Cambria being the vessel upon the rock. That seems to me to throw the case out of the area of election altogether. But, supposing it to come within the area of election, and supposing it to be a real disclosure of something which, in the ordinary way, becomes a material fact if concealed, then what is the effect of giving out the policy? The contract, and the only contract, is made by the slip. It may be said, of course, that a written contract is afterwards made out by the policy; but there is no fresh contract thereby made, and as was said by Lord Chief Justice Tindal, a contract is the concurrence of intention in two parties, one promising something to the other, who, on his part, accepts such promise, and the contract itself is made, and is, in one sense, binding at the time the parties separate with the idea in the mind of each, come to conclusively; the one says, "I promise to do a thing," and the other, "I promise to do such and such a thing," or "I accept your promise." Thus the Statute of Frauds in requiring a note in writing says, "No contract for a sale shall be binding, or shall be allowed to be good, except it be in writing." What has taken place by word of mouth is spoken of as the contract. When it comes to the question, is it good in point of law? or, is it capable of being enforced? then it is a different matter altogether. This contract was made, and was binding in this sense. I rather object to the word "honour" which was made use of in the argument. That seems to me to be a word applicable to a different class of thing. It is a matter of right and conscience, and is equally binding everywhere. It is not a matter in which it can be supposed that there is one law in one country and another law in another. It is universal, and exercises an influence upon all the transactions of life; as, for instance, where there may be acts which may be consecutive, which are intended and supposed to be contemporaneous, for which we use the expression that they are taken as being done uno flatu, as indicative of what the effect of the transaction is. It appears to me, and I cannot divest my mind of that conclusion, that, if the slip be taken, and the promise made, and the premium be paid or engaged to be paid, then what took place is within it; and whenever the policy is given out, whether it be an hour afterwards or the next day, or the day after again, and whether given out to the assured or placed in some place of deposit, it is as between the parties to be taken as done uno flatu at the time when the contract was entered into, and it will operate in that way. It might be done by merely going from one room to another, when everyone would say it was one act. This seems to me to be agreeable to the view taken of this matter both by the Court of Queen's Bench in Cory v. Patton (ubi sup.), and by the House of Lords in Xenos v. Wickham (ubi sup.) The Court of Queen's Bench in the former case regarded the policy as given out, I may say, uno flatu with the slip, because, although something remained to be done between the execution of the slip, and the giving out of the policy, and the assured ought to have communicated it, yet it was held that he was entitled to consider the matter as concluded and fixed by the slip, and was under no obligation whatever to communicate it, so as to place the underwriters in the position of making an election, or anything of the sort; and therefore they held that, although the assured were unaware of a material fact between the slip and the giving out of the policy, yet it was a perfectly immaterial matter, and that the policy and the slip must be taken to be one and the same document, so far as regards the time when they were agreed to. The House of Lords in Xenos v. Wickham dealt with the question in a manner which I think justifies the conclusion which I have arrived at, because they treated the giving out of the policy as quite an exceptional matter when considered with reference to the effect of delivering such a deed. It was obviously considered by them as really not requiring the actual delivery, but the exercise of the mind or the intention to deliver. They thought that if the policy were placed in a pigeon hole it would have the same effect, being nothing more than the formal conclusion and completion of the contract entered into previously. That being so, considering that the contract is the whole matter, and that what follows is merely an act done, and having reference to the time of the contract, it does not appear to me that it is a case in which the doctrine of election applies at all. I think that the mind is not at that time directed to any other idea whatever than giving the formal document for the purpose of carrying out the previous contract. That is the idea to which the mind ought to be, and I believe it is the only one to which it is, directed and drawn, and the doctrine of election has no application to this case. The evidence in this case warrants this conclusion, because there is no contradiction of it. The policy is delivered out as a matter of course; but that which is done as a matter of course cannot be regarded as an act which is to operate as an election, whether the contract is good or not. That is the difficulty which I have. That being so, it appears to me that the learned judge was quite right in the direction that he gave to the jury upon this part of the case, in not telling them, which he did not (and I suppose he was of that opinion) that the giving out of the policy was not of itself an election, under the new state of things, to keep the contract going; that is, not to avoid it: but leaving the question generally to the jury whether the contract had been adopted within a reasonable time by taking the proper course; and upon that the verdict of the jury was right. There is another matter upon this question of election which appears to me to be by no means an unimportant one—namely, that when we are dealing with an act which is to operate in this way as an election not to avoid a contract which is voidable, we ought to take into consideration the position in which the person supposed to make the election is, with regard to the knowledge of all the facts. Now, independently of the ground which I first referred to, as to which I unfortunately differ from my learned brothers—namely, the materiality of this memorandum as a concealment, which, it is said, was not left to the jury, and would have been a defence if it had been left to and found by them, I consider there is a material matter, which if this question were to be gone into fully, ought to have been put forward as a matter influencing the consideration of the question, whether the defendants did or not elect; because they might have elected under the impression that there was nothing known to the persons effecting the insurance. But upon the fact of their being barred by an election, I should doubt whether there had been a concealment by the assured which would have entirely influenced and changed any election which they might have been disposed to make, if they were disposed to make any. This would be going into the matter rather more fully than it was necessary to do. I believe that other reasons might be given in favour of the conclusion at which I have arrived, which is that the delat very of the policy by itself is a formal act, and operates not in the slightest degree as an election, and I think that the objection taken to the summing-up upon that ground fails. I think therefore that there should not be a new trial.

MORRISON v. THE UNIVERSAL MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY (LIMITED).

[Ex.]

THE ANTILOPE.

[ADM.]

COURT OF ADMIRALTY.

Reported by J. P. ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Jan. 14 and 16, 1873.

THE ANTILOPE.

Salvage—Pleading—Amount awarded to other salvors in another court—Labour in shifting cargo to lighten a ship salvage service.

Where two suits of salvage were instituted by different sets of salvors in respect of salvage services rendered to the same property on the same occasion, the one suit in the Admiralty Court of the Cinque Ports, the other in the High Court of Admiralty, and the salvors in the former suit recovered salvage reward, the High Court allowed the amount of such reward recovered to be pleaded by the defendants in their answer in that Court for the purpose of informing the Court of the value of the property against which it would have to make its award; that value being the net value less all proper deductions, and an award previously made by a competent court being a proper deduction.

Work done by labourers in shifting the cargo of a vessel that has been damaged by collision and so forced to run ashore, for the purpose of lightening her and of enabling her to be sufficiently repaired to get to the nearest port, is in the nature of salvage service and entitles the labourers to salvage reward; such a service is, however, of a small character, and does not merit large reward. A sum of 570l. awarded on a value of 4500l. to several sets of salvors.

THIS was a cause of salvage instituted on behalf of the owners, master, and crew of the steam-tug City of London, against the French screw steamer the Antilope, her cargo and freight, and against the respective owners intervening. The petition filed on behalf of the plaintiffs alleged that the Antilope was damaged by collision off the East Bay of Dungeness, and with the assistance of the City of London was got ashore in that bay to prevent her sinking; that part of her cargo was landed by the City of London, and certain luggers and smacks, and various other services were rendered by the tug. The answer of the defendants admitted some and denied others of the allegations in the petitions, alleged services by the chief boatmen and crews of the coastguard and by labourers, and further pleaded;

5. A small portion of the cargo of the Antilope was placed on board the City of London. The City of London was unable to take any more cargo on board, and such of the rest of the cargo as was taken out of the Antilope was placed in certain smacks or luggers named The Galatea, Friend of All Nations, Three Sisters, and General Blucher, whose owners, masters and crews instituted suits to obtain rewards for their services in the Court of Admiralty of the Cinque Ports.

12. The defendants in this suit have been decreed by the judge of the Court of Admiralty of the Cinque Ports, to pay to the plaintiffs in the suits in the 5th Article mentioned the sum of 240l.; and they are further under liability to the said chief boatmen of the coastguard and their crews, and to the labourers in the 6th Article mentioned for their services, as hereinbefore stated.

The defendants in the cause instituted in the Admiralty Court of the Cinque Ports, and in the present cause were the same (see The Antilope, ante p. 477; 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 663). The cause now came on upon motion to the court "to direct that the 12th Article of the answer filed herein may be struck out."

Jan. 14.—R. E. Webster, for the plaintiff, in support of the motion. In the Due Checchi (as reported in L. Rep., Weekly Notes, May 4th, 1872, p. 100), the court refused to allow the plaintiffs in a cause of salvage against cargo to plead in their petition the amount they had been paid in settlement of their claim against the ship and freight, holding that it was bound to fix the amount of salvage reward payable by the owners of the cargo without reference to the terms of the settlement made between them and the owners of the ship. In the present case the judgment of the court should proceed without reference to the decision of any court, and as the 12th article is pleaded for the purpose of affecting its decision, it should be struck out. If this sort of allegation is allowed it will let in inquiries as to what was the nature of the suit in which the sum was awarded, and what the nature of the services. Facts only should be stated, and on those facts this court only should judge of the quantum of reward. Such an article will lead to a counter plea as to what is the nature of the services. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Then you only ask for the amount recovered to be struck out, leaving the fact that an award has been made?] That is all.

W. G. F. Phillimore, for the defendants, contra. The only question is whether this pleading is good. Whatever result the 12th article may have cannot affect that question. The Due Checchi (as reported in 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 293; also 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 593), proceeded upon the ground that the court would not allow itself to be governed by what other persons, not a court, may think proper remuneration for salvage services; and moreover, in that case the settlement out of court was in respect of ship and freight only, and the same salvors were proceeding against the cargo, so that the reason for pleading the amount there was to suggest to the court the amount it ought to award. The reason for the pleading in this case is different. Here the question is whether the court has, without such a plea, the means of knowing the value of the property against which it has to make its award. In the case cited, the plaintiffs were the same, but the defendants were different, whereas in the present case the plaintiffs are not the same as in the case in the Cinque Ports Court, whilst the defendants are the same and the property proceeded against is the same as in that court. The plea is for the purpose of pointing out to the court that all the salvors are not before the court and that, one set of salvors having already taken proceedings and recovered against the property, the salvaged property against which this court will have to give its award is thereby reduced in value. The property against which the court will make its award, is the net value of the ship freight and cargo, less all proper deductions; and a proper deduction is the amount already recovered by other salvors.

R. E. Webster in reply.—The fact that the salvors are not the same is an additional reason for rejecting the amount, because the court should give its award against the whole of the property irrespective of what others have recovered.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I cannot accede to this application to strike out the 12th article of the answer, nor do I think that in retaining it I shall run counter to my decision in the Due Checchi (ubi sup.) In that case it was pleaded that a certain sum had been paid to the salvors out of court, in respect of the ship and freight only. In this case, some of the salvors have instituted a suit in another court, and have recovered salvage reward in that court. I think it has been correctly stated by Mr. Phillimore in the course of his argument, that when the time comes for me to consider what award I must make to the salvors, if any, I must take into account only the net value of the property salvaged, after all proper deductions have been made from that value; and it is therefore quite proper, and I must hold, that I ought to know that a certain sum which has been awarded, not by arbitration, but by a competent court, is to be deducted from that net value. On that ground I must allow the article, which I consider as pleaded for the purpose of informing the court out of what sum of money the salvage remuneration is to be paid. The motion will be dismissed with costs.

Jan. 16th.—The cause now came on for hearing. Another cause had been instituted on behalf of a Captain Groves and a diver and some labourers in his employ for services rendered at the same time. This cause had been ordered by the court to be heard without pleadings immediately after the cause instituted by the City of London. The City of London was a large steam tug of 140-horse power nominal of the value of 8000L., and manned by a crew of eight hands. After the collision before mentioned, which occurred about 1 a.m. of Sept. 30 1872, the City of London went alongside the Antilope and found she was making water fast, and that her screw was nearly out of water. The City of London then accompanied the Antilope towards the shore, and the Antilope was put ashore on the west end of the Roar Bank in the east Bay of Dungeness, and the master of the City of London went on board the Antilope, and at the request of the master and pilot of the Antilope agreed to stop by her. About 5 a.m. it was discovered that the bows of the Antilope were crushed in below the water-line. The master of the City of London advised that the cargo should be shifted aft and part transferred to the City of London, and to some luggers which had come up. About 6 a.m. a clerk to the French Consular agents at Dover, came on board, and also the plaintiffs in the second suit mentioned. There were some coastguard men and the crews of the luggers already on board. The cargo was thereupon taken from the forehold and partly shifted aft and partly transferred to the City of London, and to the lugger. When this had been done, the City of London was made fast to the Antilope, the tug's rope being fast forward and the Antilope's rope fast aft. The City of London then forced the Antilope over the Roar Bank on to the Swatchway, dividing the bank from the main land, and steamed with her across the Swatchway towards the main land. When the Antilope touched the main land her rope broke, and the flood tide swung the tug round and the head of the Antilope to the eastward. The tug again made fast, but the rope again broke. They made fast a third time, and got the Antilope's head round to the northward, and the engines of the Antilope forced that vessel into the main land. The tug thereupon left and went to Dover for cement, which she obtained and brought back about four o'clock. The cement was used to stop the leak, and at 7 p.m. the City of London made fast to the Antilope and towed her off the shore. Having got clear, the two vessels bore away for Dover, where they arrived in safety soon after midnight. The master and crews' effects had been removed on board the tug, and a portion of the crew also went on board the tug, being in fear of the Antilope sinking. It was admitted that it would have been dangerous for the Antilope to have gone to Dover by herself whilst newly cemented.

The plaintiffs in the second suit came on board the Antilope about 6 A.M., whilst the vessel was on the Roar Bank. They had been employed by Captain Groves, who was acting on behalf of the Salvage Association, to recover the wreck of another vessel in Dungeness Bay, but he brought them down to the Antilope on learning her danger. He did nothing himself, and left as soon as he had got alongside. The men were ordered by the clerk to the French Consular agents to assist in shifting the cargo, which they did. They also took out an anchor in their own boat to hold the ship up against the tide. The clerk took down the names, but made no arrangement with any of them as to the manner in which they were to be paid. These plaintiffs were twenty in number. It appeared that the labourers were paid by Captain Groves at the rate of 5s. a tide for their work in the wreck, and that the diver was paid at a higher rate. The clerk said that the ordinary pay for men for such work as they did on board the Antilope was 4s. 2d. a tide, and that he had paid that amount to other men who had been on board that vessel. He offered this sum to these plaintiffs, but they refused to take it. They were at work from about 7 A.M. till noon. The weather throughout the services was fine.

The Admiralty Advocate (Dr. Deane, Q.C.) and R. E. Webster for the City of London.

R. E. Webster for the other plaintiffs.

W. G. F. Phillimore for the defendants.—There is a customary rate at which such services are paid, and there was a tacit agreement between the parties that this customary rate should be paid. If there is such a custom the court will find that these plaintiffs can recover only on their agreement. This agreement was for work and labour only, and not for salvage services, and the suit should, therefore, be dismissed. There were no circumstances to make this labour salvage, which is the real test of the way in which they are to be paid.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—In the case on behalf of the City of London, considerable salvage services have been shown to have been performed. I must bear in mind that the sum of 240l. has already been awarded to other salvors in the Court of Admiralty of the Cinque Ports. The agreed value of the property salvaged was 4500l. I shall award 300l. to the City of London with costs. In the case on behalf of Captain Groves and the labourers the court has to consider two questions; first, whether their services can be considered as in the nature of salvage services; second, the amount to be awarded in respect of those services. Whilst considering the first question the court must bear in mind the nature of the damage sustained by the Antilope in the collision, in consequence of which the work of these men was required. There is no doubt that the ship was in need of salvage service. These men went on board to do an act which contributed to the salvage of the ship. They were employed in shifting the cargo aft, and also in taking out an anchor for the purpose of holding the ship against the tide.

Such services undoubtedly came within the category of salvage services. It was suggested that there was an agreement made with these men as to the mode in which they were to be paid which deprived them of the character of salvors, but the evidence failed to support any such agreement. However, their salvage services were of a very slight character. I do not see how Captain Groves is entitled to any reward himself as he apparently did nothing but take the men on board the Antilope, and I therefore exclude him. I shall award to the others the sum of 30l. As there have been no separate pleadings in this case, and it was not prudent, perhaps, to consolidate this latter cause with the others whilst it was right that it should be heard in this court, the other cause being here, I consider that the plaintiffs are entitled to their costs.

Salvage—Consolidation of causes—Application by plaintiffs.

The Court of Admiralty will consolidate causes of salvage instituted on behalf of several sets of salvors on the application of the plaintiffs.

THIS was an application to the court to set aside an order of the Registrar of the Liverpool District Registrar, made at the instance of the plaintiffs, consolidating two causes of salvage instituted respectively on behalf of the owners, masters, and crew of the steam tug Fiery Cross, and on behalf of the owners, master, and crew of the steam tug Resolute. The owners of the two tugs were the same persons. The suit on behalf of the Fiery Cross was first instituted, and from affidavits filed by the plaintiff's solicitors, it appeared that when that suit was instituted, the owners were not aware that services had been rendered by the Resolute, but that as soon as this fact became known to them, they instituted the second suit, but did not re-arrest the Melpomene, nor require any further bail than that already given in the first suit. The plaintiff's solicitors thereupon applied to the District Registrar to consolidate the two suits, and the Registrar, after hearing the solicitors on both sides, made an order that the suits should be consolidated, or that the plaintiffs should be at liberty to amend the præcipe in the first suit by increasing the amount in which that suit was instituted. Affidavits filed on behalf of the defendants alleged that the second suit was not a bonâ fide suit, no services having been rendered by the Resolute, and that the plaintiffs had applied for consolidation only for the purpose of enabling them to make a salvage claim under the protection of the first suit without running the risk of being condemned in costs.

Clarkson, for the defendants, in support of the application.—It is wholly unusual to consolidate causes at the instance of plaintiffs, and when defendants object to consolidation it should not be done. If the cause of the Resolute is bonâ fide no harm can come to the plaintiffs, as they will recover their costs without consolidation, whilst if the consolidation takes place and the cause is not bonâ fide costs will be incurred in respect of the Resolute, which the defendants will be compelled to pay under cover of the cause of the Fiery Cross, and it will be impossible to discover accurately in which cause these costs have been incurred. The suit on behalf of the Resolute was afterthought, and not bonâ fide. The proper course for the plaintiffs to have taken would have been to have applied to amend their proceipe at once.

Butt, Q.C., for the plaintiffs, contra.—The court will not inquire now into the merits. The registrar's order only has the effect of placing the defendants in the same position as if one suit had been instituted on behalf of the two tugs by their owners, which might have been done, the owners being the same. If the Resolute should turn out not entitled to recover there can be no difficulty in separating the costs in the two suits when they come before the taxing officer of the court.

Clarkson in reply.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is an application to the court to reverse an order of the Registrar of the Liverpool district. The order is that two causes of salvage should be consolidated or that the plaintiffs should be at liberty to amend the proceipe. It is the recognised practice of the court to encourage and enforce consolidation of salvage causes. It is quite true, as stated by Mr. Clarkson, that applications for consolidation are usually made on the part of defendants, whilst in the present case the application is on behalf of the plaintiffs. I consider, however, that it is a reasonable application from whatever motive it may be induced, as it has for its effect to secure the defendants from the payment of the larger costs that might be incurred if both suits were prosecuted separately. The reason stated for reversing the order is that the second suit is a trumpery suit, which will be sheltered behind the substantial suit, and costs will be so incurred in the second suit that the defendants will have no remedy. Now, I am informed by the registrar that there is no difficulty in revising costs in such a suit and in making the second set of salvors pay the costs incurred in respect of their suit if it should be necessary. It is a thing that happens every day, and the registrar can easily separate the different sets of costs. Moreover, it is competent to the court to sever the claims and award a sum nomine expensarum if there is any difficulty. I shall, therefore, allow the consolidation and affirm the registrar's order.

Salvage—Taking out anchor and chain to a vessel in distress—Pilot claiming as salvor—Waterman acting as pilot.

Taking out during bad weather an anchor and chain to a vessel, which is compelled to slip her cable to get away from a dangerous position and run for a place of safety, is, although the anchor and chain in the result are not needed, a salvage service; 280l. awarded to two luggers and their crews on a value of 40,000l.

A waterman acting as a pilot is subject to the same disabilities as a licensed pilot in respect of claiming salvage reward against a vessel which he has been engaged to pilot.

A pilot entering into an engagement to pilot a vessel undertakes to supply local knowledge and the peculiar skill of his class, and will not be allowed, even though he contribute to the safety of the vessel, to change the character of his service from pilotage to salvage, except where the vessel was in distress before he went on board to render the service, or where such circumstances of extreme danger and personal exertion supervene, which exalt his service into a salvage service. (a)

THIS was a cause of salvage instituted on behalf of Henry Caspell and George Porter, of Deal, mariners, and others, the owners and crews of the luggers Seaman's Glory and Tiger, against the Dutch barque Æolus, her cargo and freight, and the owners intervening. The salvage services consisted in carrying a letter to the Dutch consul at

(a) The principle which would seem to be laid down in this case is that where a person not a pilot enters into an agreement to render pilotage services, he can only claim salvage reward where a duly licensed pilot could claim such reward: (See The Jonge Andries, Swab. Adm. Rep. 226, 303.) Where, however, a person without such an agreement renders pilotage service in a place where there are no licensed pilots, it may be a question whether he would not be entitled to a reward in the nature of salvage, the amount varying according to the risk of the service: (See The Rosehaugh, 1 Spinks, 267.) In the United States pilots stand on a somewhat different footing as to claiming salvage. There is no doubt that the Admiralty law is there precisely the same as in England; but certain statutory provisions have placed pilots on a peculiar footing as to salvage reward. The regulations of commerce is by the Constitution in the hands of Congress; but by an Act of Congress of 1789, c. 9 (1 U. S. Statutes at Large, 53) it is enacted that pilots are "to be regulated in conformity with the existing laws of the States respectively whereever pilots may be, or with such laws as the States may respectively hereafter enact for the purpose, until further legislative provision shall be made by Congress." Under this provision various enactments of the different State Legislatures are in force regulating pilots and pilotage in the United States waters. The greater number of these enactments impose upon pilots the duty of assisting vessels in distress, and give for such additional services a specific rate of compensation, or provide that the amount shall be settled by a named tribunal, usually the Commissioners of Pilotage or other pilotage authority. The effect of these enactments is to take services rendered by pilots to vessels in distress out of the category of salvage services in the view of the United States Admiralty Courts, and to make them mere extra pilotage services: (See Dulany v. The Schooner Pelagio, Bee's Rep. 212; Schooner Wave v. Hyer, 2 Caine's Circ. Court Rep. 131; Callahan v. Hallett, 1 Caine's Rep. 104); and the principle that a pilot is bound to render assistance to a distressed vessel has been applied even where there is no statute law binding him to do so: (Love v. Hinkley, Abbott's Adm. Rep. 436.) Some extra services rendered by pilots are, however, held to be salvage, and even where the pilot could recover the extra compensation under the State statute: (The Elvira, Gilpin's Rep. 60; The Brig Susan, 1 Sprague's Rep. 499; Hobart v. Drogan, 10 Peter's U.S. Sup. Court Rep. 108.) The question of salvage or no salvage by pilots would seem to depend very much upon whether the service was rendered whilst the vessel was in a navigable condition. As it is only the duty of a pilot to navigate a vessel when she is afloat or not so damaged that she is unnavigable, a pilot rendering service to a vessel by getting her off a shoal or bringing her into port after she had lost her rudder, will be entitled to salvage reward; but he will be entitled only to pilotage if although damaged the vessel can be navigated in the ordinary way: (See Lea v. The Ship Alexander, 2 Paine's Circ. Court Rep. 466; Schooner Wave v. Hyer, Ib. 131; Hope v. The Brig Dido, Ib. 243).—Ed.

Deal, ordering an anchor and chain to replace an anchor and chain slipped to enable the vessel to get away from the vicinity of the Brake Sand, where she was in danger; in bringing out the anchor and chain ordered; and in assisting in navigating the ship to a place of safety in Margate Roads. George Porter had been engaged to act as pilot from the Downs to Beachy Head before the barque was in danger, and his claim was for advising measures to be taken which resulted in releasing the ship from her danger; for navigating and steering her to Margate Roads in safety during weather much worse than when he had come on board. Caspell claimed, as one of the crew of the lugger Seaman's Glory, for coming out to the barque for the letter, and for assisting Porter, who alleged that he wished to have somebody on board who understood English thoroughly and knew the locality, in navigating, by steering and looking out for buoys; he was hauled on board the barque from the lugger by a rope, as the weather rendered it difficult for the lugger to get alongside. When the anchor was slipped, the barque was taken between the South Brake buoy and the sand, as the only practicable way of extricating her from her position. The rest of the crew of the Seaman's Glory claimed in respect of the letter carried ashore. The claim on behalf of the Tiger was for bringing out the anchor and chain to the barque when she had arrived in Margate Roads; for assisting in getting them on board; for damage done to the lugger by the anchor swinging about whilst being hauled on board the barque, in consequence of the steady rope being broken by the lurching of the vessels; for injuries done to two of the lugger's crew; also for remaining alongside the barque during the night after the anchor was put on board, as the wind had then increased, and there was danger of a ship driving down upon her. The work of putting the anchor and chain on board lasted from 7 p.m. till 11 p.m. The anchor and chain were let go as soon as they were got on board, although they afterwards turned out unnecessary. Porter afterwards piloted the ship to Beachy Head, in pursuance of his agreement. The crew of the lugger Seaman's Glory consisted of Caspell and five men; the crew of the Tiger of the same five men and eleven additional hands. There were six men among the barque's crew who understood English. The circumstances under which the services were rendered are fully set out in the judgment.

The Admiralty Advocate (Dr. Deane, Q.C.), (R. E. Webster with him), for the plaintiffs.—The service rendered in taking off the anchor and chain was a great service, and is entitled to large reward. As to the pilot, he assisted in rendering the services under circumstances of considerable danger. More service was rendered by him than is usually required from a pilot; the ship received at his hands greater skill and labour than could be expected in return for the remuneration stipulated for. He was not a licensed pilot, and therefore not bound by a licensed pilot's rules. In entering into the arrangement as to pay, he did not undertake to give more than ordinary pilotage service. Where a man is technically a pilot he may not be entitled to recover more than his pilotage, except in extraordinary circumstances; but this man being only a waterman cannot be bound by any such rule: if he rendered services over and above those strictly stipulated for, he is entitled to salvage reward. The service he stipulated for was to pilot the ship from the Downs to Beachy Head; he actually took her from the Downs to Margate Roads, for which he had not contracted, and in so doing saved her from great peril.

Butt, Q.C. (E. C. Clarkson with him), for the defendants.—The service rendered by the luggers and their crews, and by Caspell, were not great, and in the event turned out unnecessary. The ship could have been taken to Margate Roads without their assistance, and the anchor and chain, although useful for the purposes of the subsequent voyage, were not actually needed to save the ship from any danger. The pilot's orders would have been perfectly understood by the crew. Porter's services were those of a pilot only, and he was entitled only to his pilotage. If a licensed pilot could not recover salvage, he could not. The test is, whether the court or the Trinity House would hold that it was not the duty of a licensed pilot, as a pilot, to take the ship to a place of safety. There can be no difference arising from the fact that he was not licensed, because a waterman acting as a pilot stands, with respect to his right to salvage, upon the same footing as a licensed pilot; (The Columbus, 2 Hagg. Adm. Rep. 178 n.) The court will not allow pilots to exaggerate their services from pilotage into salvage, unless the services rendered by them are very different from those which pilots are bound to render. Where the service rendered is something which from its nature a pilot would not be bound to do, he would be entitled to salvage reward; but if it is only ordinary pilotage service, he is not entitled. Even towage by a pilot boat does not entitle to salvage reward: (The General Palmer, 2 Hagg. Adm. Rep. 178.) [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—At present I am inclined to think that the man must be considered as a pilot, and as taken on board for a particular act, namely, pilotage; and that he is therefore under the same disadvantages, as to claiming salvage, as a regular pilot.] His remuneration was sufficient, and unless it should appear that he rendered greater service than could be called for from a pilot, he has no claims. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—There was a considerable deviation from the ship's course, requiring no small knowledge of locality to accomplish.] To assist in effecting that, if necessary, was part of his duty; and, moreover, he was paid for delay. It is a matter of importance not to encourage pilots trying to turn pilotage into salvage. It is because the court does not encourage such attempts that pilots do not often make such claims, although they are often subjected to greater danger than existed in this case.

The Admiralty Advocate in reply.—The ground upon which The General Palmer (ubi sup.) proceeded was, that a licensed pilot has an express privilege to charge a high rate of pilotage, and cannot therefore be easily allowed to claim a larger remuneration. No such ground exists in this case, as Porter was not a licensed pilot; his remuneration was of a totally different character, as licensed pilots are paid by the draught of water of the ships which they pilot; he was a waterman hired for a specific purpose, and he performed extra labour. In The Columbus (ubi sup.) no extra services, beyond the pilotage, were rendered. In The Enterprise (2 Hagg. Adm. Rep. 178 n.), additional pilotage was given for extra services.

case of salvage, the merits of which were heard before me on Friday last. The vessel to which services were rendered was a large Dutch barque, the Æolus, of considerable value; the agreed value of ship, freight, and cargo was 40,000*l.* On the 16th Jan. 1872, the vessel was riding in a good berth close to the Deal Bank buoy, and about a mile from the South Brake buoy. At that time she had need of a pilot to take her to Beachy Head, and her master obtained the services of George Porter, one of the claimants in this cause, who came on board and made an arrangement to take the barque down the Channel, and he was to be paid for his services at the rate of 7*s.* a day whilst on board, and the sum of 5*l.* in addition. Porter was not a duly licensed Trinity House pilot, but he was a waterman who often acted as pilot. Another of the claimants claiming to be a salvor is Henry Caspell, who also, under circumstances to be afterwards stated, came on board the barque from one of the luggers, whose crews are the other plaintiffs in the cause. The history of the case is very narrow, and the main facts are admitted. Porter came on board on the 16th Jan. 1872, and on the 17th the wind came on to blow a whole gale, from S. to S.S.W., and the vessel began to drive, dragging her starboard anchor. Her port anchor was not down. She was commanded by a master, who was examined before the court, and appeared to be a very competent person to be in charge of a vessel of this character. He conferred with Porter, and they agreed that the best course to pursue was to slip their anchor, there being a difficulty in weighing it, on account of the vicinity of another vessel called the Sea Breeze, which was also driving, and the risk of going on to the Brake Sand. They also agreed that a signal should be made for a boat to come off to the ship to take a message ashore for an anchor and chain, to supply the place of the one they were about to slip. The lugger Seaman's Glory accordingly came off, and one of her crew, Henry Caspell, was put on board the barque with some difficulty, but not, I think, with that amount of danger which would have caused peril to life. He was put on board, because Porter naturally wished, although there was one seaman among the crew speaking English, to have some one on board who knew English thoroughly, so that he might be sure that his orders were understood, and also to have somebody on board with him who had that local knowledge of the buoys which would be found of great use in directing the course about to be taken. Caspell, accordingly, at first went to the helm, and, the anchor having been slipped, Porter took his place, and Caspell was sent forward to note the buoys, and the vessel was brought through the Gull Stream into Margate Roads. On the evening of the 17th she brought up with her port anchor off the North Foreland, in seven fathoms of water. In the meantime the lugger Seaman's Glory went to Deal and gave the order for the anchor and chains, but, being herself too small to bring them off to the ship, another lugger, called the Tiger, and of a larger size, was employed. This lugger arrived safely alongside the barque, and delivered the anchor and chain. This service was rendered with some peril to those on board the Tiger, and considerable damage was done to the lugger herself. This damage was proved to have amounted to 40*l.*, a fact which shows the extent of the danger to which the lugger was exposed. Two of the lugger's crew were injured, one on the head and the other on the knee, by the anchor, which was of a large size and swinging about. I have no hesitation in pronouncing, and in fact it was admitted by the counsel for the defendant, that Caspell and the crew of the two luggers are entitled to recover as salvors—and it appears to me a very meritorious service. It is, however, a more difficult question whether Porter is entitled to be considered as a salvor; it would be extremely dangerous to allow the general rule, that pilots cannot claim as salvors, to be too easily violated. The exceptions to this general rule, should be few and clearly defined; this is my view, and the authorities go a long way to strengthen my opinion. Looking at the state of the weather, the dangerous vicinity of the Brake Sand, and the manner in which the anchor was brought out, I am of opinion that the services rendered were such that the court ought to reward them with a liberality proportionate to the value of the vessel. This is the principle on which the court always proceeds in awarding salvage remuneration. At the same time, it must be remembered that there was no absolute necessity, as the circumstances really happened, for the services of the two luggers. The total sum that I shall award is 280*l.*, the distribution of which leads the court to consider the legal question, whether the services of Porter are to be considered, not those of a pilot, but rather those of a salvor. There is one point preliminary to the decision of this question which I must now consider. It was strongly pressed upon me in the first instance that Porter was not a licensed pilot, but only a waterman. I think that on principle this fact can make no difference. Porter took upon himself to discharge the duties of a pilot, and can only claim as a pilot. My opinion on this point is confirmed by the decision of Lord Stowell in the cases of The Columbus and of The Michael (2 Hagg. Adm. Rep. 178*n.*). That learned judge there refused to consider fishermen, taken on board in the Channel as pilots, entitled to be rewarded as salvors, observing that they were engaged as pilots, and if they assumed that character they ought to adopt the rules, and he remunerated according to the rates of that service. On this case I conclude that, whatever the law is as to pilots, that law is applicable to the plaintiff Porter. As I have said, the exceptions to the general rule that a pilot cannot recover as a salvor ought to be few and well defined, and it ought to be well understood that the services of a pilot cannot easily be converted into those of a salvor. I find my opinion strengthened by other cases decided in this court. In the case of The Frederick (1 W. Rob. 17), Dr. Lushington said:—"It has been urged in the argument for the owners that pilots are not to convert their duties into salvage services. This may be a correct position under ordinary circumstances; at the same time it is to be observed, that it is a settled doctrine of this court that no pilot is bound to go on board a vessel in distress, to render pilot services, for mere pilotage reward. If a pilot, being told he would receive pilotage only, refused to take charge of a vessel in that condition, he would be subjected to no censure; and if he did take charge of her, he would be entitled to salvage remuneration." That case is an instance of one class of cases where a pilot might claim as a salvor. Another class of cases where a pilot may recover is also mentioned in the books namely, where he has been employed as a pilot, but circumstances supervene which so alter the character of his services that he becomes a salvor. In the present case, the vessel was not in distress at the time when the pilot went on board, and there was no supervening distress which required him to act as a salvor. He displayed local knowledge and the peculiar skill of a pilot. Such knowledge and skill, showing themselves in proper directions, the pilot tacitly contracted to apply; and it was the application of these qualities which brought the ship in safety to Margate Roads. This, which was strictly contracted for and within the scope of his contract, really constituted the service rendered by him. Before leaving this point, I will call attention to the case of The Joseph Harvey (1 C. Rob. 306). Lord Stowell there said: "It may be in an extraordinary case difficult to distinguish a case of pilotage from a case of salvage properly so called, for it is possible that the safe conduct of a ship into a port, under circumstances of extreme danger and personal exertion, may exalt a pilotage service into something of a salvage service. But in general they are distinguishable enough, and the pilot, though he contributes to the safety of the ship, is not to claim as a legal salvor." That seems to me the sound doctrine, to which I mean to adhere. After thus reviewing the facts and the law, I am bound to pronounce that they do not bring Porter's case within those exceptions which would give him the right to claim salvage in this court, and I therefore reject his claim. I shall distribute the sum I have awarded as follows:—To the Seaman's Glory I award 70*l.*; to Caspell 30*l.*; to the owners of the Tiger for the damage sustained, 40*l.*; and in respect of the salvage services of the Tiger I award 140*l.*, out of which sum double shares must go to the two injured men.

County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction—Agreements made in relation to the use or hire of any ship or in relation to the carriage of goods in any ship—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51) sect. 2—Admiralty Court Act 1861, (24 Vict. c. 10) sect. 6.

The County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869, sect. 2, conferring upon certain County Courts, having Admiralty Jurisdiction under the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), power to try "any claim arising out of any agreement made in relation to the use or hire of any ship or in relation to the carriage of goods in any ship," confers upon those County Courts a more extensive jurisdiction in relation to such agreements than that possessed by the High Court of Admiralty, under the Admiralty Court Act 1861, sect. 6.

Although the High Court of Admiralty has under the Admiralty Courts Act 1861, sect. 6, only jurisdiction "over any claim by the owner or consignee or assignee of any bill of lading of any goods carried into any port in England or Wales, in any ship for damage done to the goods or any part thereof, by the negligence of, or for any breach of duty or breach of contract on the part of the owner, master, or crew of the ship, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court at the time of the institution of the cause no owner or part owner of the ship is domiciled in England or Wales," County Courts having Admiralty Jurisdiction have, under the County Court Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869, sect. 2, jurisdiction to try causes instituted in rem by shipowners against goods laden or lately laden on board their ships to recover freight, demurrage, and expenses, and also causes instituted in rem by charterers against ships, which they have chartered, for breach of charter-party, irrespective of any damage to, or breach of contract or duty in respect of, goods carried on board such ships, even though the owners of the goods or ships may be domiciled in England or Wales.(a)

(a) This decision is likely to revive a difficulty which, it was hoped, was ended by the decision in Simpson v. Blues, and which has been the source of considerable anxiety to practitioners when advising their clients as to the court in which they should take proceedings in respect of breaches of charter-party or against shippers of goods. By the 9th section of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, if proceedings are taken in the High Court of Admiralty or in any Superior Court, which might have been taken in a County Court, that is, which are in respect of a claim below the limit of the County Court jurisdiction, except by order of a Judge, and a sum is not recovered exceeding the amount to which the jurisdiction of the County Court in that Admiralty cause is limited by that Act, the party so proceeding is not entitled to costs, and may be condemned in costs, unless the Judge of the High Court of Admiralty or of a Superior Court certifies that the cause was a proper cause to be tried in the High Court of Admiralty or in a Superior Court. The Act of 1869 is to be read as one with the Act of 1868; and as the 2nd section of the Act of 1869 gives jurisdiction to the County Courts in cases where the claim does not exceed 300*l.*, it is often an important question to consider in advising proceedings whether the plaintiff has a chance of recovering a larger sum. If he has not, it is a risk bringing proceedings in a Superior Court, as he may lose his costs. There are, perhaps, few cases of breach of charter-party apart from damage to the cargo where the claim would exceed 300*l.*, and yet these are sometimes questions of mercantile law of the greatest importance, and should undoubtedly be brought before a Superior Court. It is not right that in such matters a plaintiff should run the risk of losing his costs, nor should his legal adviser be placed in the difficult position of having to decide whether the importance of the question is such as to justify the risk. It may be probable that in such cases the Judges would certify; but something more than a mere probability is required. There should be a certainty.

It is possible, however, to put a construction on the 9th section above quoted which will avoid the difficulty. The section only provides that costs shall not be given where the plaintiff does not recover the requisite amount in an Admiralty cause. The more important part of the jurisdiction given by the Act of 1869 (sec. 2) is not in respect of Admiralty causes, but of another class of causes over which the Admiralty has no jurisdiction, and this would appear to be one result of the decision in the present case. If this be so, then the Act of 1869 only permits such causes to be brought in the County Courts, but does not require that they shall be so brought,

Simpson v. Blues (ante, p. 326; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 697; L. Rep. 7 C. P. 290) dissented from.

THESE were appeals from decrees of the High Court of Admiralty in cases coming before that court on appeal from the City of London Court and the County Court of Durham (Admiralty jurisdiction). The question in Cargo ex Argos (on appeal from the City of London Court) was whether that court had jurisdiction to entertain a suit in rem against goods to recover freight, demurrage, and expenses on behalf of a ship-owner in whose ship the goods had been carried. The question in The Hewsons (on appeal from the County Court of Durham) was whether that court had jurisdiction to entertain a suit in rem against a ship on behalf of a charterer to whom the ship was chartered for successive voyages, where her owners had refused, after four voyages had been made, to complete the charter by making other voyages. In this latter case the claim did not arise in respect of any goods carried in the ship. The High Court of Admiralty has no jurisdiction under the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), sect. 6, or otherwise, over such suits, but it was contended in that court that such a jurisdiction was given to certain County Courts by the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51), sect. 2. The learned judge of the High Court of Admiralty (Sir R. Phillimore) held that, although he was of opinion that the Act conferred the jurisdiction on the County Courts, he was bound by the decision of the Court of common Pleas in Simpson v. Blues (ante, p. 360; L. Rep. 7 C. P. 290; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 697) to decide that the County Courts had no jurisdiction and to dismiss the suits. The facts and judgments are set out in the report of the case below (ante, p. 360; 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 64), and the sections of the Acts relied upon are set out in the judgment of the Judicial Committee. From this judgment of the Admiralty Court the plaintiffs in both suits (the respondents in the Admiralty Court) appealed to Her Majesty in Council on the ground that their claims were claims arising out of agreements made in relation to the use or hire of a ship, or in relation to the carriage of goods in a ship or were claims in tort in respect of goods carried in a ship within the meaning of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869. The two appeals were heard together.

Milward, Q.C., and Gainsford Bruce for the appellants in Cargo ex Argos.—The intention of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Acts (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71; 32 & 33 Vict. c. 51), was to give to certain County Courts jurisdiction over certain causes on their admiralty side only, and to put an end to the difficulty arising from common law and admiralty jurisdiction existing in the same court. They provide that those causes over because the 9th section of the Act of 1868 does not apply to causes brought under the 2nd section of the Act of 1869, not being Admiralty causes; and if in such causes a plaintiff recovered in a Superior Court a sum exceeding 20*l.* in an action of contract, or 10*l.* in an action in tort, he would be entitled to his costs. There can be little doubt that the Judges would be inclined, if any conclusion can be drawn from recent decisions, to put such a construction upon this section as would most favour a plaintiff proceeding in a Superior Court in one of the class of causes over which it is now held that the County Courts have jurisdiction.—ED.

which common law and admiralty courts have concurrent jurisdiction shall be in the County Courts admiralty causes only. The new jurisdiction under the first Act was co-extensive with that of the High Court of Admiralty up to a certain amount. The jurisdiction over "any claim for necessities" given by the first Act (sect. 3, subsect. 2) has been held to be the same as that possessed by the Admiralty Court.

Everard v. Kendall, 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 408; L. Rep. 4 C. P. 428; 3 Mar. Law Cas. L. S. 391;

Then in order to ascertain the meaning of the words "any claim for damage to cargo" in the Acts of 1868, giving jurisdiction to the county courts over such claims, the jurisdiction of the High Court must be considered; this jurisdiction is conferred by the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10) sect. 6, and if it appears that in that Act the words "damage to cargo" have a larger meaning than their ordinary sense would imply, that meaning must be applied in construing the County Court Admiralty Jurisdiction Acts. Now "damage to cargo" is understood in the Admiralty Court as including all the claims over which the Admiralty Court has jurisdiction by sect. 6 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861. The marginal note to that section is "as to damage to cargo imported," and this has come to mean, rightly or wrongly, all the class of claims in sect. 6, and some effect is to be given to a marginal note, although it may not be absolutely binding: (Clayden v. Green, L. Rep. 3 C. P. 511; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 607.) Such causes are referred to by Dr. Lushington as causes of damage to cargo: (The Danzig, Bro. & Lush. 102; 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 236; 1 Mar. Law Cas. 392), and that was a case of damage to cargo by short delivery. If the "damage to cargo" jurisdiction of the County Courts were confined to cases of actual damage done to goods, only part of the Admiralty Court Act, sect. 6, would be imported into the County Court Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, and the County Courts would have no jurisdiction in cases of breach of duty or breach of contract given by the former Act to the Admiralty Court. These latter claims can only be made in the Admiralty Court in respect of goods imported; (The Kansan, Bro. & Lush. 1), and are therefore included in the general term "damage to cargo." In The Princess Royal (L. Rep. 3 Adm. & Ecc. 27), which was a claim for breach of contract and duty, the suit was first instituted as a cause of "damage to cargo," and was afterwards amended to one of "breach of duty," but this was done at the instance of the plaintiffs, not of the defendant. We therefore submit that claims for breach of duty and breach of contract within the meaning of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, sect. 6, are included in the words "damage to cargo," and jurisdiction over such claims is given to the County Courts by the County Court Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, and that it was unnecessary to pass the Amendment Act 1869 to give such jurisdiction. Now, assuming that full admiralty jurisdiction was given to the County Courts by the former Act, the second Act must have extended the jurisdiction to some extent. Sect. 4 of that Act gives jurisdiction over all claims done to any ship by collision or otherwise, whilst the first Act gives only jurisdiction over claims for damage by collision. This is an extension of jurisdiction, and to extend the jurisdiction is the whole object of the second Act. There is no attempt in Simpson v. Blues (ubi sup.) to distinguish between the two Acts, or to show that the second Act confers a different jurisdiction from the first. That ease proceeds wholly on the ground of the inconvenience of the new jurisdiction. The decision expresses an opinion conflicting with that of this court, where it holds that the word "damage," as used in the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (sect. 7) does not confer jurisdiction over damage to persons, but only over damage to things. It approves of Smith v. Brown (ante, p. 56); but that case does not necessarily conflict with the case of The Beta (L. Rep. 2 P. C. 447), as the former related to a claim by the relatives of a person killed, the latter to a claim by a person injured claiming himself. Now, the whole course of Legislation with respect to County Courts has been to give to these courts a variety of limited jurisdictions, with appeals to those superior courts which have unlimited jurisdiction over the various subjects matter. The method of procedure is immaterial, the real object being to give jurisdiction over the subject matter. It is not material to consider where the appeals go, but in this case it is more convenient that all maritime questions should be brought before the Admiralty Court. [Sir M. SMITH.—If these are cases over which the Admiralty Court has no original jurisdiction, how do the appeals in them lie to that Court? They are not admiralty causes, and the Act of 1868, sect 26, gives the right of appeal in admiralty causes only.] The two Acts are to be construed as one, and there is only one appeal; and as soon as a cause named in the second Act arises it becomes an admiralty cause, over which the County Court has jurisdiction within the meaning of the first Act. The distinction between admiralty and maritime causes in the second Act is only for the purpose of making the distinction between two sets of causes of one class. The term "maritime cause" is well known in the Admiralty Court, where causes are usually styled "civil and maritime." Recent legislation has had a tendency to give jurisdiction over all small claims to the County Courts, and the argument as to the injury sustained by shipowners by this enactment must be considered with the remembrance of this tendency. It must also be remembered that there is no appeal from a prohibition to a County Court by 18 & 20 Vict. c. 108, s. 42. (The rest of the appellant's argument was the same as that given in the court below. See ante, p. 360; 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 64.

W. G. F. Phillimore (A. Cohen with him) for the appellants in The Hewsons (see argument below, ubi sup.).

The Admiralty Advocate (Dr. Deane, Q.C.), (J. P. Murphy with him) for the respondents in Cargo ex Argos.—If this extended jurisdiction is conferred in the County Courts then by sects. 6, 7, and 8 of the Act of 1868, these causes over which the Admiralty has no original jurisdiction, may be transferred to that court, so that, although the Admiralty Court has no original jurisdiction over breaches of charter-party apart from damage to cargo, yet by an order of transfer from a County Court it may hear and decide such claims. This is giving the Admiralty Court jurisdiction in a way never intended by the Legislature. The words of the Act of 1869, can be satisfied without giving to the County Courts a more extensive jurisdiction than that possessed by the High Court under the Admiralty Court Act 1861, sect. 6. That sect. gives jurisdiction in two separate matters viz.: "Negligence and breach of duty or contract. The Kasan (ubi sup.) was a claim for damage done to the plaintiff in respect of goods, not for actual damage to the goods. The corresponding section of the Act of 1868, as to damage to cargo, contains no words which will embrace claims for breach of duty or breach of contract. The Act of 1869 can be satisfied by holding that the words of sect. 2 give jurisdiction to the County Courts over such claims. In the Admiralty Court Act, 1861, sect. 6, the jurisdiction is limited by allowing claims to be made in that court only where the owner is not domiciled in England or Wales, but in these Acts there is no such limitation. If the larger construction is put upon the Acts of 1869, the County Courts will have a more extensive jurisdiction than the Admiralty Court; and the greatest inconvenience will arise to shipowners. If the same narrow construction be put upon this section as put upon the section of the Act of 1868, the inconvenience does not arise, and the jurisdiction accords with that of the Admiralty. The second Act deals with a new class of causes called maritime causes, but an appeal is given only in Admiralty causes. This must either be an Admiralty cause, and therefore to be restrained within the limit of Admiralty jurisdiction, or it is a maritime cause, and then there is no appeal to the Admiralty Court. (See also argument below: ubi sup.)

Clarkson (E. G. Gibson with him) for the respondents in The Hewsons, after arguing as reported in the court below (ubi sup.).—A right of action on a bill of lading may be a right of action arising out of an agreement made in relation to the use or hire of a ship. Again there is a right of action in the Admiralty Court for a breach of duty on behalf of the vendor of goods against the master for refusing to deliver where the vendor stops in transitu: (The Tigress, Bro. & Lush. 38; 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 117; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 323); and this is a breach of an agreement for the use and hire of a ship. Again, the wrongful sale of goods by the master of a ship is a breach of such an agreement: (Schuster v. McKellar, 7 E. & B. 704). The Admiralty Court often considers the terms of a charter-party in adjudicating on claims by owners of goods, as in the case of The Norway (Bro. and Lush. 226; 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 40; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 17), which was a claim by the assignee of a bill of lading; but cases may arise where claims could be made by the owners or consignees of goods on the charter-party itself, apart from the bill of lading. As the Act of 1868 did not confer all this jurisdiction, the Legislature in the Act of 1869 used words of general character in order to give the same jurisdiction as that possessed by the Admiralty Court, but not to give more. The jurisdiction as to damage to ships given to the County Courts is not so extensive as that of the Admiralty Court, as they have only jurisdiction by the two Acts over damage by collision and damage to ships by collision or otherwise, so that they cannot entertain claims against ships for damage done by them to other things: (see The Clara Killam, 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 27; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 463; L. Rep. 3 Ad. & Ecc. 161). It is improbable that a more extensive jurisdiction was intended to be given to the County Courts in these causes when in other causes over which the Admiralty Court has jurisdiction, no jurisdiction has been given to the County Courts.

Gainsford Bruce, in reply.—In attempting to satisfy the words of the 2nd section of the Act of 1868, by giving to the County Courts the admiralty jurisdiction, the respondent runs counter to the judgment in Simpson v Blues (ubi sup.), where it was held that the Admiralty Court has no jurisdiction over claims arising under a charter-party. In that case the judges adopt the construction put upon the Admiralty Court Act 1861, sect. 6, by Dr. Lushington, in The St. Cloud (Bro. & Lush. 4; 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 54; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 309). [Sir M. SMITH: In The St. Cloud Dr. Lushington was only concerned with the definition of the term "assignee," and moreover he draws a distinction between "owners" and "assignees." In The Tigress (ubi sup.) it is distinctly shown that an owner of goods has a separate claim, and in many instances the claims of an owner of goods can arise only from his rights under a charter-party. The Court of Admiralty would have jurisdiction under the Admiralty Court Act, 1861, to entertain a claim by an owner of goods, although he did not claim under a bill of lading.] In The Tigress (ubi sup.) the plaintiff claimed in a bill of lading, which he had not parted with, and had presented to the master. A bill of lading is a contract for the carriage of goods, and a charter-party is an agreement for the use or hire of a ship; they are totally distinct, although they may refer to one another. The Admiralty Court has only jurisdiction over contracts for the carriage of goods, and therefore only over bills of lading. It is impossible to satisfy the words "use or hire of a ship" without holding that they refer to charter-parties, which are not within the admiralty jurisdiction. The restriction contained in the Admiralty Court Act 1861, sect. 6, as to domicile of the shipowner, cannot be applied to cases arising under the Act of 1869, as actions may be brought under that Act either against the shipowner, or owner of goods, or charterer; and as a charterer not resident here could not, unless he had goods on board the ship, be effectively sued in the County Courts, it would be absurd to limit the jurisdiction as to domicile.

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the court was delivered by Sir MONTAGUE SMITH.—These are appeals from the judge of the High Court of Admiralty in two cases brought before him on appeal from the City of London Court and the County Court of Durham, in which, contrary to his own opinion, and in deference to the decision of the Court of Common Pleas, in the case of Simpson v. Blues (ante, p. 326; D. Rep. 7 C. P. 290) he reversed the judgments given by the courts of first instance in favour of the plaintiffs, on the grounds that these courts had no jurisdiction to entertain the suits, granting at the same time leave to appeal to her Majesty in Council. The two appeals involve substantially the same question upon the constructions of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869, and were argued together. In the first case (Cargo ex Argos) the plaintiff instituted a suit for freight, demurrage, and expenses in the City of London Court by proceeding in rem against the goods, viz., 147 barrels of petroleum, which had been shipped by the defendant in London on board the plaintiff's ship, the Argos, under a bill of lading making them deliverable at Havre to order or assigns. It was alleged that the French authorities at Havre having refused to allow the petroleum to be discharged at that port, the Argos endeavoured to land it at Honfleur and Trouville, but not being permitted to do so, took it back to London. The claim was for freight, back freight, demurrage, and expenses. Various defences were made, but it is sufficient, having regard to the advice which their Lordships propose to tender to Her Majesty, to indicate the nature of the suit without entering further upon the facts. The suit was heard upon the merits in the City of London Court, and also on appeal in the Court of Admiralty, without any objection on the ground of want of jurisdiction; but, pending the consideration of the judgment on appeal, the case of Simpson v. Blues was decided. The learned judge then directed the question of jurisdiction to be argued before him, and ultimately, in deference to the opinion of the Court of Common Pleas, whilst declaring his own opinion to be otherwise, reversed the judgment without giving any decision upon the merits. In the other case (The Hewsons) the parties were reversed. The suit was instituted by the plaintiff, the charterer, against the owner of the ship by proceeding in rem for a breach of the charter. The plaintiff had chartered the ship for successive voyages from Hartlepool to the Elbe during a definite period. It was complained that after the ship had performed four voyages her owners refused to complete the charter by making others pursuant to its terms. In this case an objection to the jurisdiction was made in the County Court but overruled, and judgment given for the plaintiff upon the merits against one of the defendants. The question turns upon the proper construction of the County Court Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869, by which jurisdiction is given to County Courts (appointed to have admiralty jurisdiction) to try and determine causes (amongst others) "as to any claim arising out of any agreement made in relation to the use or hire of any ship, or in relation to the carriage of goods in any ship," provided the amount claimed does not exceed 300*l.* The broad contention on the part of the respondent, is that this statute has given to the County Courts no more than a portion or branch of the existing jurisdiction which the Court of Admiralty then possessed; and if this be the scope and true meaning of the statute, the objection made to the competency of the County Courts to entertain these suits must prevail, because it is plain that the Court of Admiralty itself had not, in virtue of any authority derived either from the Crown or from Parliament, any original jurisdiction over such suit. This last proposition was not controverted on the part of the appellants; but it was contended that the Act of 1869 has intentionally given a new and enlarged jurisdiction to the County Courts appointed to have admiralty jurisdiction, over subjects of claim beyond those cognizable by the Court of Admiralty. It was not, on behalf of the respondents, denied that the language of the statute is large enough to include the present claims; but the contention at the bar was, that it may be collected from the Act itself, when read with the first statute conferring on the County Court admiralty jurisdiction, that the Legislature intended no more by the second Act than to give the County Courts a further part of the existing jurisdiction belonging to the Court of Admiralty which had been omitted from the first Act; and that the wide language of the enactment must be so construed as to limit its operation to this object. The question is thus raised, whether, by the legitimate application of recognised rules of interpretation, this intention can be collected from the statutes with such distinctness as to justify a construction so greatly at variance with the ordinary and natural meaning of the words employed by the Legislature. The County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, for the first time gave any admiralty jurisdiction to the County Court. That Act empowered the Queen in Council to appoint any County Court to have admiralty jurisdiction, and to assign districts to such courts within which it might be exercised. It then enacts that any County Court having admiralty jurisdiction shall have jurisdiction to try and determine certain causes, which in the Act are referred to as "admiralty causes," and among them in the words of the statute:—"As to any claim for damage to cargo, or damage by collision . . . in which the amount claimed does not exceed 300*l*." The 6th clause of the Act authorises the Court of Admiralty to transfer any admiralty cause pending in a County Court to itself, and the 8th clause enables the County Court judge so to transfer causes. By the 26th section an appeal from the judgments of the County Courts in Admiralty causes is given to the High Court of Admiralty. A further provision is made by the 7th section directing the judge of the County Court, in case, during the progress of an admiralty cause, it should appear that the subject-matter exceeded the limit of amount, to transfer the cause to the Court of Admiralty, which is empowered either to retain or remit it to the County Court. It appears to be agreed that this Act gave to the County Court no more than a portion, limited as to subject-matter and amount, of the jurisdiction then actually possessed by the High Court of Admiralty. The provisions above referred to are all consistent with what appears to be the scheme of the Act, viz., to confer on selected County Courts certain portions of the jurisdiction then belonging to the High Court of Admiralty to be exercised by them subordinately to the High Court. The original jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty (using that term to distinguish it from that given to the court by modern statutes) as it was understood to stand after the long and memorable conflicts with the Courts of Common Law, which virtually closed in the reign of Charles II, did not extend to claims arising upon charter-parties, bills of lading, or other agreements relating to the use or hire of ships, or the carriage of goods. Before, however, the passing of the County Court Acts of 1868 and 1869, the Court of Admiralty had, by statute, acquired a partial and limited jurisdiction over certain contracts relating to the carriage of goods. "The Admiralty Court Act 1861" (24 Vict. c. 10), which was passed "to extend the jurisdiction and improve the practice of the High Court of Admiralty," enacts (section 6) "that the court shall have jurisdiction over any claim by the owner or consignee or assignee of any bill of lading of any goods carried into any port in England or Wales, in any ship, for damages done to the goods, or any part thereof, by the negligence or misconduct of, or for any breach of duty or breach of contract on the part of, the owner, master, or crew of the ship;" unless it was shown to the satisfaction of the court that, at the time of the institution of the suit, any owner or part owner of the ship was domiciled in England or Wales. The Court of Admiralty thus acquired jurisdiction over some claims arising out of contracts relating to the carriage of goods in ships, but in a very partial and limited manner. The jurisdiction is confined to claims by the owners, &c., of goods, and to cases where the goods are brought into an English port, and no owner or part owner of the ship is domiciled in England. No jurisdiction is given in the converse case of claims by the owner of the ship against the owner of the goods, and no jurisdiction whatever is given in the case of claims arising out of charter-parties or other agreements for the use or hire of ships. This was the state of the jurisdiction of the High Court of Admiralty in relation to claims arising upon contracts for the carriage of goods when the County Courts Acts of 1868 and 1869 were passed. It has already been shown that the Act of 1868 gave to County Courts only a partial and limited jurisdiction to try and determine "Admiralty Causes," relating to "any claim for damage to cargo," in which the amount did not exceed 300*l*. Their Lordships now come to the consideration of the Act of 1869. They will, in the first place, examine the enactment itself which is to be construed. It was enacted (sect. 2) "that any court appointed to have admiralty jurisdiction" (these words are descriptive only of the court) "shall have jurisdiction . . . to try and determine the following causes—as to any claim arising out of any agreement made in relation to the use or hire of any ship, or in relation to the carriage of any goods in any ship." This enactment, taken by itself, is certainly plain and intelligible, and the language is free from ambiguity. The described courts are to have jurisdiction to try and determine causes relating to certain claims. The first head of claims is, "any claim arising out of any agreement made for the use or hire of any ship." These words plainly and in apt language describe contracts for the use or hire of ships, e.g., charter-parties, and not agreements for the mere carriage of goods, which are described and provided for in the next branch of the enactment thus: "or in relation to the carriage of goods in any ship." Now, if the contention is allowed to prevail that no jurisdiction was conferred on the County Courts by this Act beyond that belonging to the Court of Admiralty, the consequence would be that no operation would be given to the first branch of the enactment relating to claims arising out of agreements for the use or hire of any ship, for the Court of Admiralty had no jurisdiction, either originally or by statute, over such claims. There appears to their Lordships to be great difficulty in an interpretation which would nullify this first and important branch of the enactment, and practically cut it out of the statute; and if this cannot legitimately be done, it would follow that some new jurisdiction beyond that possessed by the Court of Admiralty was given to the County Courts; and if any were so given, the whole contention of the respondent, which rests on the hypothesis that no such new jurisdiction was conferred, necessarily fails. The words which describe the second head of claim, viz., "any claim arising out of any agreement in relation to the carriage of goods in any ship," are clearly wide enough to comprehend claims, as well on the part of the owners of ships as the owners of goods; thus again, in terms at least, going far beyond the partial jurisdiction given to the Court of Admiralty by the Admiralty Court Act 1861, in favour only of the owners of goods. It cannot be denied that it was intended by the Act of 1869 to give to the County Courts some new jurisdiction over claims arising out of agreements between shipowners and merchants beyond that bestowed on them by the Act of 1868, which gave jurisdiction only over "any claim for damage to cargo," but it was contended for the respondents that these last words, not being sufficiently large to include all the jurisdiction given to the Court of Admiralty by the Admiralty Act 1861, in favour of the owners of cargo, the Act of 1869 was passed merely to supply this deficiency. If this were really meant to be the limited scope of the second Act, it is reasonable to suppose that the language of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, would have been followed, or at all events that some words would have been used to indicate this limited intention. It seems scarcely conceivable, if the only object of the County Courts Act 1869 had been to give the County Courts so much of the partial and limited jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, as had not been included within the Act of 1868, and no more, that the wide language actually found in it should have been employed—language which describes with accuracy entirely new heads of claims, viz., those arising from agreements relating to the use and hire of ships, and claims by shipowners in relation to the carriage of goods, which had no place in the Admiralty Court Act 1861. It was contended for the appellants that, besides these considerations, the context of the Statute of 1869, really supported, or was at the least consistent, with the presumption of an intention to give the new jurisdiction, which the language of the enactment, taken by itself, would undoubtedly confer. Differences in the language and provisions of the Acts of 1868 and 1869 were relied on in support of this contention which appear to be deserving of consideration. The causes described in the Acts of 1869 are referred to as "admiralty causes," whereas in the 2nd section of the Act of 1869, which gives the new jurisdiction, the descriptive word is "causes" only. Again, the 5th section of the Act of 1869 empowers the judge to appoint "mercantile assessors," in any admiralty or maritime cause. In a technical sense, admiralty causes are no doubt maritime causes, but the latter word (maritime) is introduced for the first time in the second Act, as if to designate causes which could not be strictly referred to as admiralty causes. The power itself to appoint mercantile assessors, given for the first time, may not unreasonably be regarded as an indication that the Legislature really intended to confer enlarged mercantile jurisdiction upon the County Courts, in which the experience of merchants would be useful to the judges. On the other hand, their Lordships have felt the full force of the contention that, having regard to the general tenor and provisions of the two County Courts Acts, it ought not to be presumed that the Legislature intended to give these courts a large jurisdiction over mercantile causes not possessed by the Court of Admiralty itself, under the guise of maritime jurisdiction. Very strong grounds certainly exist against making such a presumption, if the construction of the Act depended on an implication from language capable of two meanings. The second County Court Act is directed to be read and interpreted with the first; and the first, so far at least as it relates to claims arising out of contracts for the carriage of goods, did not confer more, if so much, jurisdiction, on the County Courts as the Court of Admiralty possessed under its own Act of 1861. The Act of 1869 is, in some respects, a supplement to that of 1868, and it might not be unreasonable to suppose that the Legislature only intended to give by the second Act further admiralty jurisdiction, properly so called. The new mercantile jurisdiction in question, if conferred, certainly established an eccentric system of procedure, calculated, in its operation, to lead to anomalous and inconvenient results. In the first place, it confers on the County Courts appointed to have admiralty jurisdiction, power to determine important mercantile causes up to the value of 300*l.*, which are not within the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty itself, and properly belong to the domain of the Common Law Courts. The appeal is given not to the courts which have jurisdiction over such causes when they exceed 300*l.* in value, but to the Court of Admiralty, which has not; and power is conferred on that court to transfer the causes to itself, and determine them, although possessed of no original jurisdiction to try them. One consequence of this legislation must obviously be to increase the risk of conflicting decisions on important questions of mercantile law, inasmuch as the determination of these questions when the value is above 300*l.* will belong to the Queen's Superior Courts of Law and Equity and to the Courts of Appeal from them; and when below that amount, to the County Courts and to the special appellate jurisdiction provided by the Act. A further anomaly, which may lead to practical inconvenience, arises from the fact that claimants within the limit of 300*l.*, may seize the ship or cargo (as the case may be) by proceeding in rem, whilst those above the limit have no such power. This difference in remedy involves much more than a distinction in procedure, and may, among conflicting claimants, lead to inconvenience, if not to undue advantage to some, and prejudice to others. It is, however, to be observed that some of these anomalies must still exist, even if the construction of the Act be limited. The County Courts would still have jurisdiction over claims by owners of cargo in certain cases, and over claims of damage caused by collision up to 300*l.*, with the power of proceeding in rem. and with an appeal to the Court of Admiralty; although, no doubt, the great anomaly of giving admiralty procedure to the County Courts in causes which the Court of Admiralty itself could not entertain, does not exist in these cases. Their Lordships, whilst fully appreciating the effect of the anomalies and inconvenience above referred to, and of others which are pointed out with great force in the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in the case of Simpson v. Blues, still feel the difficulty of limiting, by judicial construction, the plain and unambiguous words of the statute, especially when one of the consequences of the limitation must be, to leave without operation the important branch of the enactment relating to agreements for the use and hire of ships. Even in case where words are ambiguous and capable of two constructions, the rule is to adopt that which would give some effect to the words rather than that which would give none. The rule declared by the judges in delivering their opinion to the House of Lords in the Sussex Peerage case (11 Cl. & Fin. 143) appears to be applicable to the present statute. It is as follows: "The only rule for the construction of Acts of Parliament is that they should be construed according to the intent of the Parliament which passed the Act. If the words of the statute are in themselves precise and unambiguous, then no more can be necessary than to expound these words in their ordinary and natural sense. The words themselves alone do in such case best declare the intention of the law-giver." The words of the present statute are precise and unambiguous, and, in spite of the anomalies pointed out, it would be difficult to say that, when construed in their natural and ordinary sense they lead (to use the words of Parke B., 2 M. & W. 195) "to manifest absurdity," and must therefore be qualified. The Legislature, having regard to the convenience of speedy remedy and decision, when witnesses were on the spot and available, may have considered that the County Courts which in maritime districts were appointed to have admiralty jurisdiction, and which under the first statute possessed a partial jurisdiction over mercantile agreements relating to cargo, might be entrusted to determine, with the aid of mercantile assessors, other mercantile and maritime causes relating to charter-parties, bills of lading, and similar agreements up to the value of 300*l.*; and they may further have thought that, as these County Courts were invested with admiralty procedure, the new causes should be dealt with as admiralty causes, and the appeal should go to the Court of Admiralty. If such really was the intention of the Legislature, however it may be regretted by those who value the symmetry of legal procedure, it has certainly used apt, precise, and unambiguous words to define the new causes it meant to add; and their Lordships find themselves unable to affirm that the Legislature did not mean what it has plainly said. The cases which were cited, with the exception of Simpson v. Blues, throw little light upon the construction of this peculiar statute. The rule that the generality of the words of a statute may in some cases be restrained by evidence of intention to be collected from other parts of it, has been indeed applied to the construction of statutes in pari materia with the Act in question: (See The St. Cloud, The Dowse, Everard v. Kendall, Smith v. Brown, cited supra.) But in all these cases there were subjects to which the words were properly applicable, and which would satisfy them, when construed in a limited sense. It should be observed that in The Dowse (ubi sup.) the present learned judge of the Admiralty distinguished the second County Court Act from the first in the same way as he had done in the judgments now under appeal, and that in the case of Smith v. Brown (ubi supra) Mr. Justice Blackburn doubted as to the correctness of the decision, although the words in that case were much more capable of receiving, properly and without violence, a limited construction than those of the Act now in question. Their Lordships have felt that the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in Simpson v. Blues (ubi sup.), is entitled to great consideration, from the authority due to the court, and the force with which the reasons for the decision are stated; and they would have been glad to have been able to rest upon it. The Queen's ordinary courts of law, which hold the power of prohibition, must in the end decide the questions of jurisdiction; and when their opinion has been fully declared, it must and ought to be acquiesced in; but if, when the question has been brought before them on appeal, their Lordships now yielded to the decision of the Court of Common Pleas, they would in effect conclude an important question of jurisdiction in a manner contrary to the opinion of the judge of the High Court of Admiralty, and, as at present advised, their own, upon the authority of the judgment of one only of the Common Law Courts, pronounced on a summary application, from which there was no appeal. They think, before this conclusion is reached, an opportunity should be given for further consideration of the statute. They will therefore think it right to advise Her Majesty to remit the causes to the judge of the Court of Admiralty, to be disposed of on the merits. The parties will be enabled, if so advised, to make proceedings which may lead to pleading in prohibition. It was suggested in the argument that, "if maritime" causes in the Act of 1869 meant suits different from admiralty causes, such suits were not within the Appeal Clause (Section 26) of the Act of 1868, which gave an appeal only in "admiralty causes." The word "maritime" is very vaguely used in the second Act, possibly to indicate causes other than admiralty causes properly so called, and probably with no reference to the fact that admiralty causes are technically styled "maritime." However this may be, it certainly seems to have been intended, by the scheme of the Act, to treat these new maritime causes as admiralty causes, and that the appeal should be to the Court of Admiralty. Indeed, the fact that the appellate jurisdiction would belong to that court has been strongly relied on to support the limited construction contended for by the respondents. It is unfortunate that a statute dealing with important questions of jurisdiction largely affecting commercial disputes, should be so framed as to afford ground for doubt and conflicting interpretations; and the Legislature may perhaps think it right to remove, by some explicit declaration, the inconvenience thus created. In the result, their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty to reverse the judgments appealed from, and to remit both causes to the High Court of Admiralty. They think the parties should bear their own costs of these appeals.

CARGO ex ARGOS—THE HEWSONS.

Appeals allowed and causes remitted.

THE LONDON AND SOUTH-WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY v. JAMES.

[CHAN.]

COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY.Reported by E. STEWART BOCHE and H. PEAT, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Wednesday, Dec. 4, 1872.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Selborne) and the LORDS JUSTICES.)THE LONDON AND SOUTH-WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY
v. JAMES.*Limitation of liability—Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), s. 54—
Loss at sea—Railway company also shipowner—Carriers—Contract—Injunction.A passenger took a through ticket at a railway station from London to Guernsey. The sea part of the journey was performed in a ship belonging to the railway company, which came into collision with another ship during the passage, causing a considerable delay, and the loss of the passenger's luggage:Held (reversing the decision of the Master of the Rolls), that the company, as shipowners, were within the protection of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, sect. 54, which limits the liability of shipowners.Injunction accordingly granted to restrain an action at law by the passenger against the company on the contract for the loss of his luggage.Other actions had been brought against the company for damage to goods, for damage done to another ship which was run into, and for compensation for loss of life under Lord Campbell's Act (9 & 10 Vict. c. 93):Held (affirming the decision of the Master of the Rolls), that the company was entitled to injunctions to stay these actions.*THIS was an appeal from a decision of the Master of the Rolls.On the 17th March 1870, the Normandy, a ship belonging to the London and South-Western Railway Company, came into collision with the ship Mary, when the latter was sunk, and nine of the crew and passengers lost their lives, and the luggage and cargo were lost, as was also some of the luggage in the Normandy, including that of the defendant James.The Court of Admiralty held that the Normandy was to blame for the collision, but decided, on the petition of the company, that it was only answerable in damages to an amount not exceeding 6376*l.*, or 15*l.* per ton on the registered tonnage of the ship, as provided by the 54th section of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), and that amount was accordingly paid into court by the company: (See 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 519.)The defendant James, who had taken a through ticket from Waterloo Station to Guernsey, and had lost his luggage in the collision, brought an action (in which he obtained judgment) against the company, in respect of the breach of contract to carry him and his luggage from Waterloo Station to Guernsey, and he contended, that as the company had entered into that contract as carriers, their liability could not be limited under the Merchant Shipping Acts.Actions were also brought against the company by the defendants, Messrs. Millburne and Co., and others, for loss of goods; by the owners of the Mary, who were defendants to this suit, for damage to that ship; by the defendant CatherineJackson, as widow and administratrix of her husband, who lost his life in the collision, for compensation under Lord Campbell's Act (9 and 10 Vict. c.
93), and by several other persons. In some of these actions judgment had been recovered.On the application of the company, the Court of Admiralty granted an injunction to restrain all these actions, but the Court of Exchequer decided that the Court of Admiralty had no jurisdiction to restrain them, and issued a prohibition: (See Milburn v. The London and South-Western Railway Company, 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 491; *James v.
The London and South-Western Railway Company*, ante, pp. 226, 428.)Thereupon the company instituted the present suit to restrain the defendants from proceeding with their actions until the liability of the company had been ascertained under the Merchant Shipping Acts.On a motion for an injunction, the Master of the Rolls held, with regards to James's actions, that as the company filled the double character of carriers by land and also owners of the Norman-dandy, the contract in respect of which he sued was distinct from any question of damages to which the company might be liable as shipowners; that the Merchant Shipping Acts did not apply to his case, and that the motion, as against him, must be refused, and that he should be at liberty to proceed with his action. With regard to the other actions, his Lordship granted an injunction to restrain execution.

From this decision the company appealed.

The appeal motion came on for hearing before the Lords Justices before last Long Vacation, but feeling some difficulty about the case, they desired it to be heard before the full Court of Appeal.

It accordingly now came on for hearing.

Sir R. Baggallay, Q.C., Wood, Q.C. (of the Common Law Bar), and Locock Webb, for the appellants.—The appellants are entitled to an injunction against James as well as against the other defendants. They are shipowners, and entitled to the protection of the 54th section of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act. If the company had issued two tickets, one from Waterloo Station to Southampton, and another from Southampton to Guernsey, there could be no doubt that the company would have been entitled as shipowners to have their liability limited, in accordance with the provisions of the 54th section. What difference can it make that, for the convenience of their passengers, they issued a through ticket for the entire journey? They re-

Sir R. Baggallay, Q.C., was heard in reply.

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Selborne).—We all think that the proper course will be to grant the injunction as asked in this case, upon the terms that have been mentioned—the payment of costs, including the costs of appeal, but only one set of costs to the bankrupts, who, perhaps, strictly speaking, ought not to have appeared at all, but as their trustee did not appear, we think it right to give them one set of costs. With regard to the main question in the case, of course it will be understood that, so far as Mr. James is concerned, it relates only to that particular kind of loss and damage which is within the language of the Act, that is, the loss of his luggage, but the principle applies to all goods lost by any persons whose goods were being carried on board this vessel. It has been faintly, if at all, argued that the limitation of liability, by the 54th section of the Act, has no application to the cases of persons and goods carried by the shipowner as a carrier in his ship. Mr. Harrison did indeed suggest the possibility of putting so very limited a construction as that which would exclude every case in which the shipowner was a carrier, but he was not in that respect followed by Mr. Simpson, and we think with very good reason, because it is manifest that the ordinary case—or at least one of the most ordinary cases in all contracts of affreightment is that the shipowner carries on board his ship, and the very language occurring in the Act, appears to me to show that the ordinary case—was not excluded, and every case, whether the owner was carrier or not, where the owner would be liable, was intended to be within the relief given to the owner by this Act. Supposing that to be so, then I do not understand that it was intended at all that, if this particular contract had been in terms to carry by railway to Southampton, and from Southampton by the ship Normandy, belonging to the railway company, to Jersey or Guernsey, the limitation of liability should not apply. But, as has been said by Lord Justice Mellish, in the course of the argument, it is not the ordinary course in a contract of affreightment, or in a bill of lading, to state upon the face of the instrument to whom the ship belongs. It cannot, therefore, possibly have been the intention of the Legislature to make that applicable in order to give the remedy to the shipowner, when the shipowner was in fact the carrier, and the person liable. In this particular case the shipowner was in fact the carrier and the person liable; and, not only so, but if it be material to go further, and see whether the persons, who were or whose goods were conveyed, actually with their own knowledge entered into a contract for conveyance by one of the company's own vessels, it appears to me to be the just and proper inference from the facts, which are not in dispute in this case, that it was so, because for a long course of years the company, under lawful authority, had been carrying passengers from the port of Southampton by their own steam vessels, of which this was one; nor is it suggested that they ever carried in any other manner; and when they issue public advertisements for many years, as to a regular communication, with the times and places of departure of their steam vessels, and so forth, although it might be possible that they might fulfil their contract otherwise, yet primâ facie, and in the natural course of things, it was rather to be presumed that they would do it by their own ships than otherwise; and anyone dealing with them in that course of dealing is, I think, rather to be taken as believing and knowing that which they actually knew, and that which is the actual course of business. Add to that fact that the terms, "The Royal Mail Steamships," are, as I understand, proved by the evidence, as they are stated in the bill, to be the terms by which the company's steam vessels, which carry the mails of the Crown, were called and commonly known, this being one of them, and upon the face of the ticket, in this particular case, the words "Royal Mail" occur, showing that the contract is to carry the passengers by the mode of conveyance known by that term, it seems to me to be exactly the same thing as if the particular ship had been mentioned. It is hardly necessary to carry it the next step further, which is this—if it were supposed to be left uncertain how the contract was to be fulfilled, as a matter of fact both the passenger and the company concur in the fulfilment of it by one of the company's own vessels. It appears to me, therefore, that this is a case of a claim against the carrier or owner, and that within the plain meaning of the Act. For this reason, I am of opinion that, as far as the principle is concerned, the appeal is right, and that as far as the particular case of the loss of life is concerned, the 54th section shows plainly that it was intended to give this court full jurisdiction in such cases, and not only where there had been an ascertained liability in respect of loss of life, but where one is alleged to have been incurred, and again where it might be not only known, but apprehended, that other claims of the same sort might come; for the power is given to the court in all these cases to determine the amount of liability, and also to suspend all questions and suits pending in any other court in relation to the same subject matter, and to do this in such manner, and subject to such regulations and so forth, as the court may think fit. Is there any reason of practical convenience which makes it better to direct that nine actions shall proceed in these cases of loss of life—is there any reason which makes that more convenient than to refer the whole matter for inquiry to chambers, where it will be ascertained in how many of those cases there is a real contest which may require a decision, it may be with a jury or it may be without? Upon that subject I say nothing at present. But the experience of the case that has already taken place I understand, of Glaholm v. Barker (2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 200, 298, 380; 34 Beav. 305), shows that where about the same number of cases of the same kind existed, they were all in fact settled in chambers without incurring further expense. It appears to me that the wiser and better course would be to refer the whole matter for inquiry to chambers, it being entirely in the power of the court, if it should eventually appear necessary, to determine any question of that kind by the opinion of a jury.

Lord Justice JAMES.—I am of the same opinion. I think it right to add that the difficulty which pressed on me when the matter was partly argued before the Lords Justices alone, was satisfactorily answered, by the observation of Sir Richard Baggallay, that it was a difficulty arising from suggesting a number of hypothetical cases in which it might be difficult to apply the law; and I agree that it is not the legitimate mode of dealing with a case which is clearly within the words and meaning of the Act of Parliament, by suggesting that there may be other cases in which it might be difficult or impossible to apply the Act. The Act does clearly apply, both in words and in spirit, to the case actually before us.

Lord Justice MELLISH.—I am also of the same opinion. The case clearly comes directly within the words. The London and South-Western Railway Company were owners of the ship Normandy, and they are sued by Mr. James to recover damages in respect of the loss of goods which were being carried on board that ship. The case being directly within the words, it ought to be held to be governed by them, unless it is clearly not within what was the scope and intention of the Legislature in passing the Act. But what was the scope and intention of the Legislature in passing the Act? Ever since the reign of George II. there has been a limitation on the liability of the owners of ships. It has been thought a matter of public policy to encourage persons of capital to embark their capital in ships by limiting the liability that they might incur by the loss of goods, which I think previously to Lord Campbell's Act was the principal liability. It was thought expedient to limit their liability, because a ship may carry goods of enormous value; it may carry gold, for instance, from California, to the value of a million of money, and then, from some trifling act of neglect on the part of the master, or on the part of the man steering the vessel, the shipowner might be made liable to that enormous liability. On that account the Legislature thought it was for the public advantage that there should be this limit on their liability. Why does that not apply to the case before us? The London and South-Western Railway Company are encouraged by that limitation of liability to embark in the trade of carrying passengers and goods between Southampton and Jersey as shipowners. I do not understand what the grounds are upon which it is said that they are not to have the benefit of the provisions of this Act. The ground put by the Master of the Rolls is simply this, that the passenger takes a through ticket from London to Jersey. It is admitted on all hands that if the passenger had taken a ticket from London to Southampton, instead of from London to Jersey, and then when he got to Southampton had walked on board the ship, and had gone as a passenger to Jersey, then he would be subject to this limitation of liability. What possible object can there be in holding that in order that the company may avail themselves of this limitation of their liability, they must deprive all their passengers of the benefit of paying for their tickets at one time, instead of paying on two different occasions? In my opinion, the case is both within the words and within what I think was the spirit of the Act.

STEWART v. WEST INDIA AND PACIFIC STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

General average—Loss to cargo by water let into ship to extinguish fire—British custom—Agreement to be bound by custom.

A vessel, having loaded a cargo, was about to sail to her port of destination, when a fire broke out in the forehold. Every effort was made to extinguish the fire by playing water down the hatchways and through holes cut in the forecastle deck; and this not being sufficient to subdue the fire, a hole was cut in the side of the ship, and her fore compartment was thereby filled with water. The fire was in this manner extinguished, and if this course had not been taken the remaining cargo (a portion having been discharged into lighters) would in all probability have been destroyed, and the ship most seriously damaged, if not rendered a total wreck. The water poured into the ship having destroyed certain bark (part of the cargo) shipped on behalf of the plaintiff under bills of lading containing the words "average, if any, to be adjusted according to British custom."

Held, that the loss of the plaintiff's bark was properly the subject of a general average contribution, being a voluntary and intentional sacrifice of the bark, made under the pressure of imminent danger, and for the benefit and with a view to secure the safety of the whole adventure then at risk; but, it having been hitherto the practice of British average adjusters to treat a loss occasioned by water in the manner above described as not a general average loss, the plaintiff in the present case was precluded from recovering by the words of the bills of lading providing that average, if any, should be "adjusted according to British custom."

Nimick v. Holmes (25 Pennsylvania St. Rep. 366) followed and approved.

THIS was an action brought in respect of the loss of certain bark shipped on board the defendants' steamship Venezuelan, and consigned to the plaintiff; and by consent of the parties the following special case, without pleadings, was stated for the opinion of the court:—

1. The plaintiffs are merchants carrying on business at Manchester under the style or firm of Robert Barbour and Brother. The defendants are a company and registered pursuant to the provisions of the Companies' Act 1862, and are the owners of vessels trading regularly between the United Kingdom and the West Indies and South America, and amongst others of the steamship Venezuelan.

2. On the 19th Sept. 1871 the defendants' steamship Venezuelan left Liverpool with a general cargo of merchandise on a voyage to the West Indies. She arrived on the 8th Oct. at St. Thomas, and after discharging her cargo for that port proceeded on her voyage to the ports of Curacoa, Santa Martha, Savanilla, and Colon, and having called at Curacoa and there delivered her cargo for that place, came to an anchor in the port of Santa Martha on the 16th Oct. The Venezuelan after discharging at Santa Martha all her cargo for that port took on board there a general cargo of produce and merchandise for Savanilla, Colon, London, and Liverpool.

3. The general cargo so taken on board the Venezuelan at Santa Martha consisted of goods shipped by various persons, and amongst these goods were 180 serons of bark which were shipped on behalf of the plaintiffs for carriage to London under the terms of two bills of lading, one for 100 and the other for 80 serons. These bills of lading were in the same form, and the following is a copy of the one comprising the 100 serons:—"Shipped in good order and condition by Mr. Ide Mier, of Santa Martha, in and upon the good steamship or vessel called the Venezuelan, whereof Bremner is master for this present voyage, or whoever else may go as master, now lying in or off the port of Santa Martha, 100 serons bark covered by consignee's open policy of insurance, being marked and numbered as per margin, and to be delivered in the like good order and condition, subject to the terms and conditions stated in this bill of lading which constitutes the contract between the shippers and the company, unto Messrs. Robert Barbour and Brother, of Manchester, or to his or their assigns, at the port of London or so near thereunto as steamers may safely get; freight to be paid at the port of destination of the goods (without any deduction, and before the delivery if required) upon the gross weights or measurements taken on the landing of the goods from the above-named steamer as per present tariff issued by the West Indian and Pacific Steamship Company (Limited) unless otherwise specially stipulated in the margin hereof; average, if any, to be adjusted according to British custom. The company reserves to itself liberty for the steamers to sail with or without pilots, to tow and assist vessels in all situations, to proceed to the port stated in this bill of lading via any other port or ports in any order or rotation, whether in or out of the customary or advertised route, without the same being deemed a deviation, whatever may be the reason for calling at or entering such port or ports, to transship or land and reship by lighter or otherwise the goods at the port of shipment and transshipment or at any port or ports, or into any other steamer or steamers, or to forward them from any port or ports by railway and land and water conveyance to port of destination; also to discharge the goods from the steamer as soon as she is ready to unload into hulk or temporary depot or lighter, or on a wharf at the shipper's or consignee's risk and expense after they leave the ship's deck. The company is not liable for any loss or detention of or damage or injury to the goods or the consequences thereof occasioned by any or several of the following causes, viz.: the act of God, enemies, pirates, theft on land or afloat, vermin, barratry of master or mariners, restraint of princes, rulers or people, fire on board, in hulk or in craft, or on shore, or wagons, stranding, collisions, explosions or straining; perils of the seas, rivers, navigations, land, transit, lighterage, storage afloat or ashore, interruption to navigation by ice, transshipments, any act, neglect or default of the pilot, master, mariners, engineers, servants or agents of the company; accidents from machinery, boilers, steam or defects in hull, engines or boilers, sweating, leakage, breakage, rust, decay, rain, spray, contact with or smell or evaporation from other goods, effects of climate or heat of holds, absence, obliteration or inaccuracies of marks, numbers, destination or address on the packages (in such cases the consignees to accept the goods as allotted by the agents of the ship), injury to wrappers, want of strength of packages, detention on board or ashore, however caused, at the ports of transshipment or at other port or ports. The shipper or consignees to be responsible for the proper description of the goods, and due compliance with all regulations imposed by the authorities at ports of shipment and discharge, and to be liable for any fines, expenses, loss, or damage. The company is not liable for gold or silver—manufactured or trinkets—watches, clocks, timepieces, mosaics, bills, bank-notes of any country, orders, notes or securities for payment of money, stamps, maps, writings, title deeds, paintings, engravings, pictures, statuary, silks, furs, lace, hats, cashmere, manufactured or unmanufactured, made up into clothes or otherwise contained in any parcels or packages, unless the value thereof be expressed in the bill of lading, and such extra freight paid as may be agreed upon weights, contents, and description unknown."

4. While the Venezuelan was at Santa Martha so loaded as aforesaid, and about to sail, a fire broke out at about 11 p.m. of the 18th Oct. in the forehold. Every effort was at once made to extinguish the fire by playing water down the hatchways by means of the fire-hose, and by cutting holes in the fore-castle deck and pouring water down on the cargo stowed in the forehold. This was continued to be done until about 4 a.m. of the next day, when the men at work near the forehold were driven out by the heat and smoke. The steamship was then turned stern on the wind to keep the fire forward, and portions of the cargo stowed in the afterholds of the vessel were discharged into lighters. The fire-hose was kept continually playing down the fore hatch and the fore-castle skylights, but it did not subdue the flames, and at about 8 a.m. the fire reached the upper deck. A hole was then cut in the side of the vessel, and her fore compartment was thereby filled with water. By this means the crew ultimately succeeded in extinguishing the fire. If this had not been done, the remaining cargo would in all probability have been destroyed, and the ship most seriously damaged, if not rendered a total wreck.

5. The whole of the contents of the forehold were entirely destroyed by fire, and a great part of the cargo stowed in the adjoining holds was damaged or destroyed by water which was poured or let into the vessel as aforesaid in order to extinguish the fire.

6. It is admitted for the purposes of this case that 152 of the 180 serons of bark shipped on behalf of the plaintiffs were destroyed by the water poured or let into the said steamship in the manner above described.

7. It has been the practice of British average adjusters in adjusting losses to treat a loss occasioned by water in the manner above described as not a general average loss.

8. The Venezuelan, after discharging and reloading cargo and undergoing temporary repairs at Santa Martha, subsequently proceeded on her voyage, and delivered the various portions of the cargo to the respective owners or consignees thereof.

9. The court is to be at liberty to draw such inferences of fact as a jury would be justified in drawing.

The question for the opinion of the court is: Whether the plaintiffs are entitled to recover from the defendants any sum of money by way of general average contribution or otherwise in respect of the aforementioned loss of the said 152 serons of bark. If the court shall be of opinion in the affirmative, then the court is respectfully requested to direct on what principle such sum is to be ascertained, and judgment shall be entered for the plaintiffs for such sum as shall be ascertained in accordance with the said directions of the court by the parties themselves, or, if they cannot agree by Messrs. Bailey, Lowndes, and Streakley, of Liverpool, average adjusters, together with costs of suit. If the court shall be of contrary opinion, then judgment is to be entered for the defendants, with costs of defence.

Butt, Q.C. (with him Cohen), for the plaintiff, contended that the rule hitherto followed by British average adjusters in treating a loss occasioned by water in the manner described in the case as not the subject of a general average contribution was erroneous. There is no decision in favour of the rule, and all the writers who have dealt with the question have disapproved of it. Benecke (on Average, p. 243) says; "Damage by fire, whether occasioned by lightning, by the intrinsic quality of the goods, or by other accidental causes, is doubtless particular average. But if sacrifices be made in order to extinguish the fire, if masts, or cables for instance, be cut away, or the vessel be run ashore, I am of opinion that the damage ought to be a general average, although an instance of a decision to the contrary is quoted by Emerigon. If water be thrown down the hatches to stop the progress of an accidental fire in the hold, or between the decks, this must be conceived to be done with the double intention of saving the articles which have already caught fire from utter destruction, and of extracting the vessel and rest of the cargo from an imminent danger. The effect of the water upon the former goods is, therefore, particular average; it is not an injury but is a real advantage done to them. But the damage done by the water to the other goods is, I conceive, of the nature of general average, upon the same principle on which the occasional damage done to goods during a jettison is considered as such. In the Ordenanzas de Bilbao it is ordered that when a vessel catches fire in a river or harbour, and an adjoining vessel is sunk in order to save the others, the damage must be made good by a contribution from all the other ships and cargoes." The view that such a loss is not a general average, is also condemned by Baily on General Average (p. 40, who states his tenth practical rule thus: "Damage done to a cargo by pouring water down upon it in order to extinguish a fire which has not touched the goods injured by the water is excluded from general average," adding "the principle upon which this rule is based is erroneous, and the rule is clearly inequitable." In the second place it is submitted that on the true construction of the bill of lading the English law should govern, and that it is not competent to the average adjusters to determine the question whether there was or was not a general average loss. By the words of the bill of lading, "average if any, to be adjusted according to the English custom" it could not be intended that the average adjuster should determine whether there was any average. [COCKBURN, C.J.,: If there is an existing practice which has become known as the English practice, and reference is made to a specific practice, we must assume that the parties intended to refer to that practice alone.] Persons must be presumed to know the law of the country, but not an erroneous practice opposed to the fundamental principles of the law of average. Persons are only bound to know customs which are legal. The meaning of the words of the bill of lading above referred to is that if there is, by law, to be any average adjustment, then such average adjustment is to be stated according to English custom; but before such statement it must be first determined whether there is any general average, and that must be determined according to law. [COCKBURN, C.J.: Is there nothing but the authority of text writers for holding a loss of this kind not to be general average?] There is no English decision. Johnson v. Chapman (19 C. B., N. S. 563; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 404) has an indirect bearing on the question. It was a case in which deck cargo (timber) lawfully laden pursuant to charter-party, having broken adrift in pursuance of stormy weather, and impeding the navigation and endangering the safety of the vessel, having been necessarily thrown overboard, it was held that the shipper was entitled to claim general average in respect thereof, as against the shipowner. In that case it was admitted "that hitherto it has been the practice of average adjusters not to allow as general average the jettison of such portion of the deck load as is immediately before the jettison in a state of wreck; but this admission is to be taken without prejudice to the right of the defendant to contend that such practice cannot affect the law. The words in the present bill of lading, "according to British custom," must be taken to mean according to British custom so far as such custom is consistent with law: a custom inconsistent with it being an unreasonable one, and therefore bad. [HANNEN, J.: Perhaps this stipulation was put in to avoid the question which sometimes arises as to which of two foreign average adjustment systems should be applicable, but not to bind the parties to abide by the mala praxis of the English system.] The law as to this is stated in 2 Arnould Mar. Ins., 4th edit., p. 811, thus: "As a general rule the place for the adjustment of general average is the ship's port of destination or discharge; when this happens to be a foreign port, the general average loss is adjusted there, according to the law and usage of the country to which such foreign port belongs: and the adjustment so made is called a foreign adjustment. If the adventure be broken up at an intermediate port, the ship and the cargo entirely quitting company with each other, that port becomes in effect the port of discharge, and the place, therefore, for adjusting the general average." The same doctrine is laid down in Parsons on Shipping, book 1, ch. 9, s. 21: "The proper place for the making of an adjustment is the home port, or the port of final destination. . . . The practical rule may be stated thus: the adjustment may be delayed as long as all the contributory interests continue together, and should be delayed until the vessel reaches her port of final destination, if they are to continue together so long. But if those interests are to be separated, then the adjustment should be made at the place where the separation first takes place." The American case of Nimick and Co. v. Holmes and Co. (25 Pennsylvania St. Rep. 366) is a distinct authority as to the general law. It was there held that where a vessel or its cargo takes fire without the fault of the crew, the damage done by the application of water or steam in extinguishing the fire and by tearing up part of the vessel to gain access to the fire, is general average; and it makes no difference how the water is applied, whether by the aid of fire-engines from the land, or in the form of steam, or by scuttling the vessel. "An analysis of the cases," said Lowrie, J. delivering the judgment of the court, "very plainly reveals three things as the elements of general average: a purpose, a means, and a result; a design to avert a common danger by a sacrifice voluntarily made, and a successful issue. The first and the last are perfectly definite in their character, while the means must always remain to be defined by the rule of prudence when the danger arises": (see also The brig Mary, 1 Sprague (Amer.) 17). The same view is taken by all the text writers. Thus Stevens on Average, p. 12, reckons under the head of general average "damage done to the cargo by cutting holes in the ship, or by opening the hatches for the purpose of effecting a jettison, or by getting the goods on deck to heave overboard." So Arnould (Marine Insurance, vol. 2, p. 779, 3rd edit.) gives us an instance of a general average loss: "where water is thrown down a ship's hatches to extinguish an accidental fire and other goods are damaged thereby," referring to Stevens, p. 42, and Benecke, p. 243.

STEWART v. WEST INDIA AND PACIFIC STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

Honyman, Q.C. (with him R. G. Williams) for the defendants.—The meaning of the stipulation in the bill of lading, "average, if any, to be adjusted according to British custom," is that if the cargo should sustain any loss, the question whether such loss should be general or particular average should be determined by the average adjusters according to the actually existing English custom; because by the practice of some countries that is treated as general average which the practice of another country treats as particular average. Arnould says (4th edit. p. 813): "There is a great diversity in the practice of different countries with regard to what shall or shall not be included in general average; sometimes losses are included and charged for which are general average in the country where the adjustment is settled, but not in the country where the charter-party was entered into and the policy of insurance effected; and sometimes a different proportion of contribution is assessed in the foreign port from that which is chargeable in the home port." It was for the purpose of excluding all disputes as to which system was to govern that this stipulation was inserted in the bill of lading. [HANNEN, J.: Lord Tenterden (Simmonds v. White, 2 B. & Cress. 805) says of the case of Power v. Whitmore that it could not govern the case before him for two reasons, one being "because in the opinion of the court the facts there stated did not show that the average had been adjusted according to the established law and usage of the country where the adjustment was made." That, however, would not apply to a case where there is an express stipulation. If nothing is said by the parties about a particular custom, and that custom is an unreasonable one, it cannot bind them; but the case is different where the parties expressly agree to be bound by it. There is no doubt as to what the actually existing custom in this case is, Baily (on Average, p. 40), though strongly disapproving this rule, states distinctly that "damage done to cargo by pouring water down upon it, in order to extinguish a fire which has not touched the goods injured by the water, is excluded from general average." So Hopkins (Handbook of Average, p. 59): "The last species of voluntary sacrifice to be named here relates to damage done to goods in a ship's hold by throwing water down the hatches to extinguish a fire. Here again an act is performed manifestly for the common good. Either the fire must be extinguished, or a total destruction of ship, freight, and cargo will ensue. The means taken to rescue the conjoined interests from that destruction damage a portion of the cargo—one of the interests. This damage, then, it follows, should be made good in general average. By English custom, however, it is not so. This is another instance wherein our reasoning is set at fault by the present practice, which decides that the damage occasioned to the cargo in this manner must be borne by the goods themselves." A somewhat similar question arose in Harris v. Scaramanga (ante p. 339; 41 L. J. 170, C.P.). There the policy of insurance on goods on a voyage from Taganrog to Bremen contained a marginal note "to pay general average as per foreign statement, if so made," and certain warranties as to being free from particular average, and capture and seizure. It being necessary, owing to stress of weather, to put into ports of distress and charge the ship, freight, and cargo by bottomry bonds, the purchasers, B. and Co., of the cargo had to pay the bonds on the ship's arrival at Bremen in order to get the cargo; and a foreign adjustment was made, apportioning this charge between ship, and freight and cargo. The shipowner and master, being unable to pay the part apportioned to the ship and freight, and the ship on sale realising only part thereof, and a supplemental adjustment having been made, including the residue as against cargo, the plaintiffs, as trustees for B. and Co., sought to recover payment thereof from the defendants, and it was held by Bovill, C.J. and Keating, J. that they were entitled to recover because the defendants had bound themselves to repay whatever had to be paid by the owners of the cargo and was general average according to the foreign statement, whether or not it were really general average by English or Bremen law, or arose from perils (not being those specially excepted) insure against. So here, it is submitted that the parties have bound themselves to abide by the English practice as to general average. COCKBURN, C.J.: The question seems to me to depend a good deal on the meaning to be given to the word "adjusted." If the meaning is that in case of damage occurring, then the question whether it is general or particular average shall be determined by the English custom, your contention would be correct. But if the meaning is that if a case of average does exist, the apportionment of the average contribution shall be according to English custom, the case would be different.] The word "adjustment" means here settling the different heads of damage; the meaning of the parties, it is submitted, is that in case of damage being done, the liability of the parties to contribute was to be determined according to the actually existing British custom. In Harris v. Scaramanga (ubi sup.) Bovill, C.J., referring to the memorandum on the margin of the policy, said: "it seems to me that the general effect of the memorandum is to make the underwriters liable as for general average for whatever the assured owner of the goods might be called upon to pay on that account by the foreign statement of adjustment. This memorandum was probably introduced in order to avoid all questions, not only as to the propriety of particular claims being treated as the subjects of general average, but also as to the correctness of the apportionment, and I find it difficult to place any other reasonable construction upon the terms of the policy and memorandum. If it be open to this court to consider and determine the question whether the 663l. 2s. 10d. claimed in this action, or any part of it, was properly the subject of general average according to the law of England, I should be of opinion that it was not, and that this was not a loss covered by an ordinary policy in the usual form. . . . It seems to me, however, that under the terms of this policy the underwriters and the assured have both agreed to accept the adjustment and statement of the average stater in the foreign port, if and when made, as conclusive between them, both in principle and in details as to the loss which the underwriters are to undertake in respect of general average, subject to the exception of any matters such as capture or seizure, which are excluded by the express terms of the policy." This reasoning is strictly applicable to the circumstances of the present case. In fact, it is not open to the court to determine what the parties have settled for themselves. In the case last referred to, Bovill, C.J. said: "How then is the question to be determined of whether the claim in this case is to be considered as general average for which the underwriters are liable? Is it to be determined by this court, or by the statement of the foreign average stater? It seems to me that by the express agreement of the parties contained in the memorandum it is not open to us to determine it, and that we have only to see whether the foreign adjustment, which gives rise to this claim, has been in fact made or not."

Butt, Q.C. in reply.—The parties agree to be bound, in case of any average, by British custom, not practice; and a custom cannot exist unless it be reasonable. [COCKBURN, C.J.: It cannot exist so as to be taken judicial notice of; but there is nothing to prevent the parties, by express contract, agreeing to be bound by it, because there is nothing unlawful in it.] A custom is a general thing; the practice of average staters may differ in different towns. The average adjustment binds only where it is rightly settled according to the law of the country.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 25, 1873.—The judgment of the court (Cockburn, C.J., Mellor, Hannen, and Quain, JJ.) was now delivered as follows by QUAIN, J.—This is an action brought by the plaintiffs as the owners of 152 serons of bark shipped on board one of the vessels of the defendants, to recover a general average contribution in respect of the loss of the bark on a voyage from Santa Martha to England. The first question argued before us was whether the loss in question was a loss which properly formed the subject of a general average contribution according to the law of England. The manner in which the loss was occasioned is described in the fourth, fifth, and sixth paragraphs of the special case. It appears that while the ship was lying at Santa Martha, and just when she was about to sail, a fire broke out in the forehold. Every effort was made to extinguish it by playing water down the hatchways, and through holes cut in the fore-castle deck. This not being sufficient to subdue the fire, a hole was cut in the side of the ship and her fore compartment was thereby filled with water. In this manner the fire was extinguished; and it is found and admitted in paragraph 4 that if that course had not been taken, the remaining cargo (a portion having been discharged into lighters) would in all probability have been destroyed, and the ship most seriously damaged, if not rendered a total wreck. It is admitted in paragraph 6 that the plaintiff's bark was destroyed by the water poured or let into the ship in the manner described in order to extinguish the fire. On these facts, we are clearly of opinion that the loss was, according to the general law, properly the subject of a general average contribution. It was a voluntary and intentional sacrifice of the bark made under the pressure of imminent danger, and for the benefit and with a view to secure the safety of the whole adventure then at risk. No case has been cited in which the exact point to be decided has arisen in our courts, but we have been referred to an American case in which the question was considered and decided. That case is Nimick v. Holmes (25 Pennsylv. St. Rep. 366) decided in the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. There Lowrie, J. in delivering the judgment of the court, says: "Guided by the light of the rule and its instances, we feel constrained to say that when a vessel or its cargo takes fire without the fault of the crew, the damage done by the application of water or steam in extinguishing the fire, and by tearing up part of the vessel in order to get at it, is general average. The danger is a common one, and the cost of the remedy must be common. It makes no difference how the water is applied, by the aid of fire-engines on the land, or in the form of steam, or by scuttling the vessel. . . . It was a sacrifice for the common safety, for it was intentionally injuring or destroying all that part of the cargo that could be thus affected by water in order to save the rest." We quite agree with this conclusion, and if the present case depended wholly on the common law applicable to general average losses, we think the plaintiffs would be entitled to recover. But it is contended for the defendants that the general law, as we have just expounded it, is excluded in this case by the express terms of the bill of lading, which contains these words, "average, if any, to be adjusted according to British custom," inasmuch as "British custom" can only mean the practice of British average adjusters; and it is admitted in paragraph 7 of the case to be the practice of British average adjusters to treat a loss occasioned by water in the manner above described as not a general average loss. It appears from the works of Mr. Stevens and Mr. Baily (Stevens on Average, p. 41, 5th edit.) that the practice, as stated in paragraph 7, does prevail among British average adjusters, though it is condemned by both writers as unjust. "The damage done to cargo," says Mr. Baily (on Average, pp. 81, 82, 2nd edit.), "by pouring water upon it to extinguish a fire, or by water admitted into a vessel's hold when she is scuttled to extinguish a fire, is excluded from general average. In defence of this practice no valid reason can be urged. It is based on an erroneous idea that a general average cannot arise when the degree of danger is so great that it amounts to a moral certainty of total loss, and on a fanciful distinction between the degree of danger existing in cases of fire and the degree existing when a vessel is on her beam ends or on the point of foundering—a distinction which the ingenuity of argument may draw, but which will not bear the test of common sense." The question in this case, however, is, whether the parties have not by the words used in the bill of lading made this practice a part of their contract, for, if so, they are bound by it, though the practice may be, according to the best opinions, vicious and unreasonable. On the other hand, it is argued for the plaintiffs that it was not intended by the expression used in the bill of lading to draw any distinction between British law and British custom, and that the words were inserted solely in order to prevent the average being adjusted by different laws, according to the different ports of destination at which the ship stopped in the course of her voyage. But we are only entitled to infer the meaning of the parties from the language which they have used; and as it appears on the face of the case, and also from the authorities above cited, that a practice prevails among British average adjusters not to allow a loss like the present as a general average loss, we can only construe the expression "British custom" as intended to apply to that practice, as the mode of adjusting the average by which the parties have agreed to be bound. It follows, therefore, that as the parties have agreed to make this custom a part of their contract, the case must be decided in accordance with the custom, and the result is that our judgment must be for the defendants. It is to be hoped, however, that in future there will be no difference between law and custom on this point, and that average adjusters will act on the law as now declared, and that bills of lading will also be framed in accordance with it.

Re THE CHARKIEH.

Prohibition—Jurisdiction of Court of Admiralty—Vessel belonging to a foreign state. The Charkieh, a steam vessel belonging to the Khedive of Egypt, and employed in the mail service between Alexandria and Constantinople, was sent to England for repairs, and, for the purpose of lessening the expense, carried a cargo to England, and, after being repaired, was advertised for the carriage of passengers and goods or freight from England to Alexandria. On a trial trip in the Thames she came into collision with another vessel, the owners of which commenced proceedings against the Charkieh in the Court of Admiralty, and had her arrested. A rule having been obtained for a prohibition, on the ground that the Charkieh was a public vessel belonging to a foreign state:

Held, that the rule must be discharged, the question whether the Charkieh, under the above circumstances, was exempt from the jurisdiction of the courts of this country being one which the Court of Admiralty was competent and peculiarly fitted to decide.

IN this case Butt, Q.C. had obtained a rule nisi for a prohibition to the Court of Admiralty, to restrain that court from proceeding in a cause of collision instituted in rem against a vessel called the Charkieh, on the ground that the vessel was a public ship, the property of the Khedive of Egypt, and therefore not amenable to the British Court of Admiralty.

From the affidavits it appeared that on the 19th Oct. 1872 the steamship Charkieh came into collision, in the river Thames, with another steamship called the Batavier, which had cargo and passengers on board, and was at the time on a voyage from London to Rotterdam. The Batavier, the property of the Netherlands Steam Boat Company, sunk after the collision and became a total loss. The Charkieh, partly laden, was, at the time of the collision, coming up the river on a trial trip to try her engines at the measurement mile. On the 21st Oct. a suit was instituted in the Court of Admiralty on behalf of the owners, master, crew, and passengers of the Batavier against the Charkieh and her freight, and the Charkieh was arrested by warrant of the court. On the 22nd Oct. a notice was sent to the registrar of the Court of Admiralty by the solicitors for the Khedive of Egypt that the Charkieh was the property of His Highness the Khedive in his capacity of sovereign of Egypt, and a ship of the Egyptian Government or State, and was engaged in the public and national service of the Egyptian Government and State, and requiring the registrar immediately to withdraw the warrant of arrest on the Charkieh. In reply to a communication addressed to the Foreign Office, a letter was sent to the proctors for the Batavier, on the 4th Nov., informing them that the Charkieh had been claimed by the Turkish Government as belonging to the Imperial Ottoman Navy, and that she must, therefore, be released from arrest. To this letter a reply was returned that evidence had been obtained of the fact that the Charkieh was a vessel employed in mercantile trade and enclosing an ordinary broker's card advertising the ship Charkieh, being classed A1, for the carriage of passengers and goods or freight on her return voyage to Malta and Alexandria, which she was about to make after the trial trip upon which she was engaged at the time of the collision with the Batavier; also enclosing official copies of the Customs entries, showing that the Charkieh paid dues as an ordinary merchant vessel, whereas no such dues would have been paid had she been a public ship of a foreign government, and expressing the view that even if the ship were owned wholly or in part by the Khedive or the Imperial Ottoman Government, yet that being engaged as an ordinary trader, she was, whilst in British jurisdiction, and not engaged in any national service, accountable to British laws in the same manner as any other trader, and liable therefore to be arrested by the High Court of Admiralty, or at any rate that the matter ought to receive judicial investigation and decision.

An affidavit of Federico Maria Fedrigo Pasha, rear-admiral in the imperial Ottoman Navy, in the naval service of his Highness the Khedive of Egypt, stated that the Charkieh is the property of his Highness the Khedive, as sovereign of Egypt, and is a ship of the Egyptian branch of the Imperial Ottoman Navy, and is a public ship of the state of Egypt, and an Egyptian government vessel; that it is entitled to and in fact does carry and use the Ottoman naval pendant and the Ottoman naval ensign, as distinguished from the flags which are used by Egyptian merchant vessels, all the ships of the Egyptian navy carrying the Ottoman naval colours; that all the officers of the Charkieh are Egyptians, and hold commissions from his Highness the Khedive, and are in the naval service of the Egyptian government, with the exception of the acting commanders, the sailing master and the engineers, who are Europeans, not commissioned by the Khedive but under contracts to serve the Government of Egypt; that the officers and crew of the Charkieh are appointed by and under the control of the Egyptian Minister of the Marine, the said steamship being also ordinarily under the orders and control of the said Minister of the Marine; but for some time prior to the Charkieh leaving Egypt for England, she was under the control and at the orders of the Egyptian Minister of the Interior, and was employed by him as a Government packet, carrying the mails and passengers and cargo between Alexandria and Constantinople; that all freights and passage money earned by the Charkieh are ultimately received and accounted for to the said Minister of the Interior, and form part of the public revenue of Egypt; that certain cargo was brought by the said steamship Charkieh from Alexandria to England for the purpose of lessening the expense occasioned to the Egyptian Government by sending the said steamship to this country; that with the same object the said steamship had been advertised as about to sail from London to Alexandria, carrying a cargo; that the Charkieh had, since her arrival in this country, been recognised by the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty of her Majesty as an Egyptian Government vessel, and had been repaired under the supervision of a surveyor appointed by the said Lords Commissioners, to whom application for such appointment had been made on behalf of his Highness, the Khedive; that the Charkieh, until the year 1870, belonged to an Egyptian trading company; that this company was dissolved in 1870, and the Charkieh and other vessels belonging to the said company were, in 1870, purchased by the Egyptian Government, and had ever since been public vessels of the Government of Egypt; and that the Charkieh had not since 1870 been in any way employed as a trading ship, nor was it intended that she should for the future trade between Egypt and the United Kingdom, but would resume the packet service above-mentioned.

Nov. 23, 1872, and Jan. 23, 1873.—Milward, Q.C. and E. C. Clarkson, for the owners of the Batavier, showed cause against the rule, and contended that the Charkieh was not entitled to the exemption granted to vessels of state, as it was not employed by the Ottoman government for purposes of state, but by the Khedive for purposes of trade. Wheaton (International Law, part II., §§ 33, 96, et seq.) mentions the cases in which every sovereign is understood to waive the exercise of a part of that complete exclusive territorial jurisdiction which is the attribute of every nation, viz., first, the exemption of the person of a foreign sovereign from arrest or detention within a foreign territory; secondly, the case of foreign ministers; thirdly, where a sovereign expressly permits the troops of a foreign prince to pass through his dominions. The permission in the latter case must, according to Wheaton, be express; "but the rule which is applicable to armies, did not appear to be equally applicable to ships of war entering the ports of a friendly power. The injury inseparable from the march of an army through an inhabited country, and the dangers often, indeed generally, attending it, do not ensue from admitting ships of war without special reserve into a friendly port. A different rule, therefore, with respect to this species of military force had been generally adopted. If, for reasons of state, the ports of a nation generally, or any particular ports, be closed against vessels of war generally or against the vessels of any particular nation, notice is usually given of such determination. If there be no prohibition, the ports of a friendly nation are considered as open to the public ships of all powers with whom it is at peace, and they are supposed to enter such ports and to remain in them while allowed to remain under the protection of the Government of the place;" and such vessels are considered exempt from the local jurisdiction. But all this applies to vessels belonging to the fleet of another nation, and not at all to vessels of another nation engaged for purposes of trade, between which two classes of vessels Wheaton clearly distinguishes: "When private individuals of one nation spread themselves through another as business or caprice may direct, mingling indiscriminately with the inhabitants of that other; or when merchant vessels enter for the purposes of trade, it would be obviously inconvenient and dangerous to society, and would subject the laws to continual infraction, and the Government to degradation, if such individuals did not owe temporary and local allegiance, and were not answerable to the jurisdiction of the country. Nor can the foreign sovereign have any motive for wishing such exemption. His subjects, then, passing into foreign countries, are not employed by him, nor are they engaged in national pursuits. Consequently, these are powerful motives for not exempting persons of this description from the jurisdiction of the country in which they are found, and no motive for requiring it. The implied licence, therefore, under which they enter can never be construed to grant such exemption. But the situation of a public armed ship was in all respects different. She constitutes a part of the military force of her nation, acts under the immediate and direct command of her Sovereign; is employed by him in national objects. He has many and powerful motives for preventing those objects from being defeated by the interference of a foreign State. Such interference cannot take place without seriously affecting his power and his dignity. The implied licence, therefore, under which such vessel enters a friendly port, may reasonably be construed as containing an exemption from the jurisdiction of the sovereign within whose territory she claims the rites of hospitality." Further, this writer distinguishes between the private property of a foreign sovereign and that which supports his sovereign power. "It might safely be affirmed that there is a manifest distinction between the private property of a person who happens to be a prince and that military force which supports the sovereign power and maintains the dignity and independence of a nation; a prince by acquiring private property in a foreign country may possibly be considered as subjecting that property to the territorial jurisdiction, he may be considered as so far laying down the prince and assuming the character of a private individual; but he cannot be presumed to do this with respect to any portion of that armed force which upholds his crown and the nation which he is intrusted to govern." The Charkieh came to this country, not as a vessel of a foreign state, but as an ordinary merchant vessel carrying a cargo: and as such also she has been advertised to return, being in the advertisement classed A 1, and treated as one of a regular line of vessels trading to Malta and Alexandria. [COCKBURN, C.J.—The principle is that an armed ship duly commissioned is within the rule as to exemption from the territorial jurisdiction. I do not think that the rule includes any other ships.] That the rule is not understood to extend to a vessel employed, as the Charkieh has been between Alexandria and Constantinople as a mail packet, is shown by the express insertion of a provision to that effect in treaties, where such an object is desired to be attained. Thus, in Art. 9 of the Treaty between Great Britain and Belgium, relative to the conveyance of letters between the two kingdoms, made in 1834 (7 Hertslet's Commercial Treaties, p. 82), we find a provision that, "The packets of Her Britannic Majesty, being Government vessels, shall be exempt from all duties and port charges in the ports of Belgium. They shall be considered and treated as vessels of war, and entitled to all the consideration and privileges which the interest and general importance of their functions demand." So in the convention regulating the communication by post with the same country made in 1844 there is a provision in Art. 7 that "these vessels should be considered and treated, in the two ports above mentioned, and in all other ports of the two countries at which they may accidentally touch, as vessels of war, and be there entitled to all the honours and privileges which the interest and importance of their service demand." These express provisions furnish evidence that in their absence the exemption granted to vessels of war would not extend to mail packets. There is also a clause in Art. 9 of the convention last referred to, prohibiting the packets "from carrying goods, or merchandise, or freight." If they did so, it may be presumed that they would lose the exemption given by the convention. [COCKBURN, C.J.—It is a question which goes to the root of the matter, whether the Court of Admiralty would not have jurisdiction to decide that very point.] The proper course would then be for the owners of the Charkieh to appear under protest to the jurisdiction, and the Court of Admiralty would then decide the question: (The Santissima Trinidad, 7 Wheat. Rep. 234, was referred to.) [COCKBURN, C.J.—In the present case one ship runs down another. This would be a case, therefore, clearly within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court. If the ship in fault is one not amenable to the jurisdiction of that court, that could be set up by plea; and it has never been held that the Court of Admiralty has not jurisdiction to decide upon that plea.] The court here called on Butt, Q.C., Cohen, and Gibson, in support of the rule.—Wherever, in a case in which a court would have jurisdiction under ordinary circumstances, a fact appears which deprives that court of jurisdiction, a prohibition will go. The cases on the subject are all collected in the opinion of the judges given by Willes, J. to the House of Lords, in The Mayor, &c., of London v. Cox (L. Rep. 2 H. of L. Cas. 225, et seq.): "The law upon the question of discretion," said his Lordship, "is thus stated in the judgment of the Queen's Bench, in Burder v. Veley (12 A. & El. 263): 'If called upon, we are bound to issue our writ of prohibition as soon as we are duly informed that any court of inferior jurisdiction has committed such a fault as to found our authority to prohibit, though there may be a possibility of correcting it by appeal. . . . The question then remains, what are the defects that authorise and require us to issue the writ of prohibition? The answer, is, that they are in every case of such a nature as to show a want of jurisdiction to decide the case before them' (Gardner v. Booth, 2 Salk. 548.) In whatever stage that fact is made manifest to us, either by the Crown or one of its subjects, we are bound to interpose.' The writ, however, although it may be of right, in the sense that upon an application being made in proper time, upon sufficient materials, by a party who has not by misconduct or laches lost his right, its grant or refusal is not in the mere discretion of the court, is not a writ of course, like a writ of summons in an ordinary action, but is the subject of a special application to the court upon affidavit, which application, and the proceedings thereupon, are now regulated by the Act of, Will. 4, c. 21. Before that Act the proceedings were commenced by mere suggestion, which, with exceptions that do not include the present case, need not have been verified by affidavit. The proceeding was qui tam, and it supposed a contempt in disobeying an imaginary precedent writ of prohibition. To that course of proceeding only were the decisions relied upon, to the effect that the court will not interfere upon 'mere suggestions' before plea, applicable. They may amount to this, that before plea the court in its discretion, would not interfere upon a bare suggestion without an affidavit; and they have become inapplicable since the statute which substitutes a motion upon affidavits in all cases for a suggestion. . . . The jurisdiction, therefore, does not, it seems, depend (for in the case of the Crown or a stranger it cannot depend) upon the course of the pleading." Further on the learned judge says, "The rule is that where want of jurisdiction is apparent upon the proceedings, prohibition goes at any time after service of the process, and even before articles 'because it is much better for the party to apply for prohibition in the first stage than after expense is incurred:

(Francis v. Steward, 5 Q. B. 994)." [COCKBURN, C.J.—Suppose the plaintiff says that the defence set up is in fact only a pretence, that the Charkieh is not the property of the Khedive, is not this a question for the Admiralty Court to determine?] But then the question of law will arise as to its jurisdiction over a vessel belonging to a foreign sovereign. [BLACKBURN, J.—Is there any case of a prohibition being granted where the facts of the case were triable in the inferior Court?] In Dilke v. Brown (2 Ld. Ray. 835), upon a motion for a prohibition, the case was, the defendant libelled in the spiritual court for tithes of faggots made of loppings of trees, and the suggestion for a prohibition was that these loppings were cut from the stumps of timber—trees above the growth of twenty years; and it was alleged that sentence was given in the Superior Court, and therefore that the plaintiff came too late to have a prohibition; but Holt, C.J., said, "the sentence will not hinder the having a prohibition in any case, but in case of prohibitions grounded upon 23 Hen. 8, c. 9, for citing out of the diocese," but the prohibition was denied because the plaintiff had not pleaded that matter in the spiritual court, which had jurisdiction of tithes, and if any special matter deprived them of their jurisdiction, it must be pleaded there. The application here was after sentence in the spiritual court, and upon suggestion only. In De Haber v. The Queen of Portugal (17 Q.B. 171), it was held that property in England belonging to a foreign sovereign prince in his public capacity, cannot be seized under process in a suit against him in this country on a cause of action arising here; and therefore, where a suit had been brought in the Mayor's Court against the Queen of Spain, upon bonds of the Spanish Government, bearing interest payable in London, and moneys belonging to her as the sovereign of that country had been attached in the hands of garnishees in London, to compel her appearance, the Court of Queen's Bench granted a prohibition, although the action was not in form brought against the Queen as Sovereign, it appearing sufficiently by the pleadings that she was charged with liability in that character. It was also held in this case that the motion might be made by the Sovereign Prince who is defendant in the Mayor's Court, though such defendant had not appeared and the garnishee had not pleaded. [COCKBURN, C.J.—It was manifest on the face of the proceedings in that case that the person against whom the suit was instituted, was one who could not be proceeded against in our courts.] In the case of The Prins Frederik (2 Dods. 451), a ship of war belonging to the King of the Netherlands, having suffered damage off the Scilly Islands' was brought into Mount's Bay by the assistance of the master and crew of a British brig, and a cause of salvage was instituted against the foreign vessel, the captain appearing under protest to the jurisdiction of the court: after argument the case was directed to stand over until a memorial on behalf of the salvors should be presented to the ambassador of the Netherlands, who, after communicating with his own Government, requested that the amount of the recompence due to them might be submitted to the award of the judge of the Court of Admiralty, as an arbitrator; and in that capacity the learned judge made his award. In the case of the Lord Hobart (2 Dods. 100), the case of a post-office packet, the vessel was owned by a private individual, though employed by the post-office; and the learned judge having adverted to the objection, "certainly not immaterial, that the vessel was employed as a packet in the service of the General post-office," the deputy registrar stated that notice had been given to the post-office authorities in other cases of the same kind, and that their reply was that no objection existed on the part of the Post-office to the exercise of the jurisdiction of the court; whereupon Sir Wm. Scott proceeded: "That, I think, disposes altogether of the objection, and leaves me at liberty to decide upon this question precisely in the same way as I should in the case of any other ship. I could not be alarmed at the danger which I apprehended might have arisen to the public service from the detention of vessels of this kind, but the information which I have now received relieves me from the difficulty which I should otherwise have felt." That it is not necessary to enter an appearance before taking objection to the jurisdiction was distinctly laid down in De Haber v. The Queen of Portugal (ubi sup.): "We have now to consider," said Lord Campbell, C.J., delivering the judgment of this court, "whether we can grant the prohibition on the application of the Queen of Portugal before she appears in the Lord Mayor's Court. The plaintiff's counsel argue that before she can be heard she must appear and put in bail in the alternative to pay or to render. It would be very much to be lamented if, before doing justice to her, we were obliged to impose a condition upon her which would be a further indignity, and a further violation of the law of nations. If the rule were that the application for a prohibition can only be by the defendant after appearance, we should have had little scruple in making this an exception to the rule. But we find it laid down in the books of the highest authority that where the court to which the prohibition is to go has no jurisdiction, a prohibition may be granted upon the request of a stranger as well as of the defendant himself: (2 Inst. 607; Com. Dig., "Prohibition, (E).") The reason is that where an inferior court exceeds its jurisdiction, it is chargeable with a contempt of the Crown, as well as a grievance to the party: (Ede v. Jackson, Fort. 345). Therefore this court, vested with the power of preventing all inferior courts from exceeding their jurisdiction, to the prejudice of the Queen or her subjects, is bound to interfere when duly informed of such an excess of jurisdiction." BLACKBURN, J.—There is a great difference between a suit against a ship and a suit against a foreign sovereign himself. In the latter case the sovereign must have come in and given bail to prevent arrest of the person—which would be an insult to him; but it is no insult or personal indignity to seize property. The sovereign is only required to give bail and to appear. There is no personal indignity. He may possibly enjoy the privilege of doing damage by his ships to other ships without paying for it; but he must show that such a privilege exists.] There is no practical distinction in this respect between proceedings in rem and proceedings against the person. Wheaton (Ed. Dana, sect. 228, note) speaking of the property of foreign ambassadors: "The same objection exists to allowing process in rem against such property, as to requiring his appearing in court as a party or witness. If his property is proceeded against he must become a litigant to defend or regain it, and be subjected to rules controlling his time and movements, even if he secures exemption from other obligations and liabilities of common suitors. The decision of this question ought not to depend, as most writers seem to make it, on the character of the property seized as official or unofficial; for the seizure is but a step in the litigation. The owner is to have notice to appear and litigate, and must either lose his property or become a party to the litigation. The balance of convenience is in favour of the exemption from seizure of all the property of an officer whom it is right to exempt from being compelled to appear as a defendant in a strictly personal suit." These remarks apply equally to the property of sovereigns. [COCKBURN, C.J.—Ambassadors derive their rights from being the representatives of foreign sovereigns, and the same rule must therefore apply to their sovereigns.] In Valthasen v. Ormsby (3 T. Rep. 315) a prohibition was granted to prevent the Court of Admiralty from proceeding in a suit, on a suggestion merely that the collision happened in the river Thames within the body of the County of Kent. The Court of Admiralty might in that case have tried the fact whether the collision had or had not taken place within the County of Kent; still this court granted a prohibition. So in Clay v. Snelgrove (1 Ld. Ray. 576), in a suit of wages instituted in the Admiralty Court, a prohibition was granted on a suggestion that the contract had been made upon land, though the Court of Admiralty could have tried the truth of a plea setting up that defence. [BLACKBURN, J.—In that case there was prima facie no jurisdiction. In the present case you claim an exemption by special privilege. Surely the Court of Admiralty is the proper court to dismiss the suit on the existence of the facts constituting the privilege being proved before it.] On the face of the present proceedings the Court of Admiralty has undoubted jurisdiction and is bound to exercise it unless we can satisfy this court that it ought, on a suggestion of the facts of the case, to prohibit. In the cases against the Mayor's Court it was always alleged on the proceedings that that court had jurisdiction. The rule as to suggestions, as laid down in Cox v. The Mayor of London (ubi sup.), seems to be that if the defect of jurisdiction is not patent in the proceedings below, and the defendant suffered judgment, no prohibition will go; but if the defect is patent then prohibition goes after judgment; but upon suggestion made prohibition will go before judgment. It is optional to plead in the inferior court, or before doing so, to apply for a prohibition. [BLACKBURN, J.—In all the cases cited the courts have decided that the foreign sovereign is not liable—not that they have no jurisdiction.] If a foreign sovereign is not amenable to the jurisdiction of any court in England, surely a prohibition should be granted to prevent proceedings against him. In Howe v. Napier (4 Barr. 1944) a prohibition was granted to prevent the Court of Admiralty proceeding in a suit for wages, on a suggestion that the contract was under seal, though the matter alleged in the suggestion might as well have been tried in that court. In Argyle v. Hunt (1 Str. 187), where a prohibition to the spiritual court was refused after sentence, though the word "whore" appeared to have been spoken in London, on the ground that it should have been pleaded in the court below, the decision proceeded on the custom of the city of London, where an action lies for the word "whore." In Buggin v. Bennett (4 Burr 2035) a suit in the Court of Admiralty for seamen's wages, application for a prohibition on the ground that the contract was by deed made on land, was not made till after sentence, and it appearing only on the proceedings in the Admiralty Court that "it was covenanted and agreed, &c.," but was not expressly alleged to be by deed, and the application was refused on that ground; Lord Mansfield, C.J., saying: "If it appears upon the face of the proceedings that the court below have no jurisdiction, a prohibition may be issued at any time, either before or after sentence; because all is a nullity; it is a coram non judice. But where it does not appear upon the face of the proceedings, if the defendant below will lie by and suffer that court to go on under an apparent jurisdiction (as upon a contract made at sea) it would be unreasonable that this party, who, when defendant below has thus lain by and concealed from the court before a collateral matter, should come hither after sentence against him and suggest that collateral matter as a cause of prohibition, and obtain a prohibition upon it, after all this acquiescence in the jurisdiction of the court below . . .

Where the want of jurisdiction appears upon the face of the proceedings, an affidavit is not necessary, though every suggestion, that does not appear upon the face of the proceedings but is collateral and out of the proceedings, ought to be verified by affidavit." [BLACKBURN, J.—Is there any authority for the proposition that a person setting up a personal privilege, as in the present case is entitled to a prohibition?] Wadsworth v. The Queen of Spain (17 Q. B. 171) was referred to. In Sewell v. Jones (1 L. M. & P. 525), it was held that the defendant upon showing that the title to land was bonâ fide in dispute in an action in the County Court was entitled to a prohibition, and that he was not bound to wait till the County Court had proceeded to hear the case. In delivering judgment Wightman, J., observed, "It is said that this application is made too early, and that the defendant should have waited until the plaintiff came on for hearing in the County Court, and then have made the objection to the jurisdiction, which the County Court Judge would probably have entertained, and refrained from trying the case. If, however, the judge had decided otherwise, the application, on the same grounds as the present, must have been made; and yet the defendant might not have been able to make it on account of the Long Vacation. I therefore think he may come to the court for a prohibition, upon showing that the title is bonâ fide in question." Re Ackroyd (1 Ex. 479) was also referred to. [BLACKBURN, J.—I don't think it is put against you that it is necessary that you should have pleaded before coming for a prohibition; but that you should put the exemption which you claim as a matter of defence. COCKBURN, C.J.—I thought it was put that, if pleaded, it was an answer to the suit—not that it was a mere plea to the jurisdiction. BLACKBURN, J.—Just as if any other point of law were raised as a defence which the Court of Admiralty could decide.] It is a question for this court to decide whether a case falls within or without the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty to decide.

Re THE CHARKIEH.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—Suppose that the Court of Admiralty should find as a fact that this vessel does not belong to the Khedive, would not that be an answer to your objection?] Yes; but not if the Court of Admiralty should find as a fact what is not the fact, in order to give itself jurisdiction. It is stated on affidavit that the Charokieh is the property of a foreign sovereign, and it is part of the general law of the land that no English court has jurisdiction in such a case. [BLACKBURN, J.—Is it not rather a question of maritime and international law on which the Court of Admiralty is peculiarly qualified to pronounce?]—It is submitted that the exemption of the property of foreign sovereigns is part of the general law of the land, and not a question of maritime law peculiarly. [COCKBURN, C.J.—I doubt whether this court can interfere unless it sees clearly that there is an excess of jurisdiction on the part of the inferior Court. All the facts relied on to establish the exemption of this vessel can be determined in the Court of Admiralty. If a foreign ship which is not a ship of State in the strict sense is seized, I entertain great doubt whether the Court of Admiralty would not have jurisdiction. Here the ship is found in the hands of private individuals, and is applied not to purposes of state but of commerce. Whether, under such circumstances, the case comes within the ordinary principles applicable to ships of State of foreign sovereigns is a question which the Court of Admiralty may well entertain. BLACKBURN, J.—It seems to me that such a question is one which the Court of Admiralty is the tribunal best fitted to decide, subject, of course, to appeal to the Privy Council.] Where there is no right of action in the Court of Admiralty against the owner of a vessel, it has been decided that the court has no jurisdiction to proceed against the vessel itself.

Milward, Q.C., in reply, referred to sect. 4 of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 64, which enacts "that the said Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction to decide all questions as to the title to or ownership of any ship or vessel, or the proceeds thereof remaining in the registry, arising in any cause of possession, salvage, damage, wages, or bottomry, which shall be instituted in the said court after the passing of this Act." The substantial point which the Court of Admiralty will have to decide is whether the Khedive of Egypt does occupy such a position as entitles his ships to the same privileges as those of foreign sovereigns. There might be some ground for the application for a prohibition if the Court of Admiralty were proceeding in a suit after it had been shown that the vessel did belong to a foreign sovereign, but whether it does so belong or not is a question for the Court of Admiralty to decide. [QUAIN, J.—But may not the same thing be said in every case where the question of fact is disputed on which the jurisdiction arises? COCKBURN, C.J.—I think the law on the subject cannot be better expressed than it is by the Court of Exchequer in Bunbury v. Fuller (9 Ex. 140); "Now it is a general rule that no court of limited jurisdiction can give itself jurisdiction by a wrong decision on a point collateral to the merits of the case upon which the limit to its jurisdiction depends; and however its decision may be final on all particulars, making up together that subject matter which, if true, is within its jurisdiction, and however necessary in many cases it may be for it to make a preliminary inquiry, whether some collateral matter be or be not within the limits, yet upon this preliminary question its decision must always be open to inquiry in the Superior Court. Then to take the simplest case: suppose a judge with jurisdiction limited to a particular hundred, and a matter is brought before him as having arisen within it, but the party charged contends that it arose in another hundred, this is clearly a collateral matter independent of the merits; on its being presented the judge must not immediately forbear to proceed, but must inquire into its truth or falsehood, and for the time decide it, and either proceed or not with the principal subject-matter, according as he finds on that point; but this decision must be open to question, and if he has improperly either forborne or proceeded on the main matter in consequence of an error, on this the Court of Queen's Bench will issue its mandamus or prohibition to correct his mistake." This seems to me to be applicable to the present case. The matter here is a collateral one, and if the Court of Admiralty decides it in favour of the ship there is an end of the case; but if the Court of Admiralty decides it wrongly in order to give itself jurisdiction, we can still grant a prohibition.] The Ticonderoga, Swa. Rep. 215, was referred to.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I think we need not trouble you further, Mr. Milward. We are of opinion that this rule for a prohibition should be discharged, and I conceive it would be mainly, from the view I take of it, upon the ground that, assuming the facts of the case to be entirely as stated on the part of the applicant for the prohibition, a question of law is raised which is a matter of international law—I do not say it is not also a matter of law of this country; because the law of this country adopts the leading rules of international law as part of our own. One of those undoubtedly is that you cannot sue a foreign sovereign and make him appear and answer in the municipal courts of this country; and, if that were the case here, it would, in my opinion, raise a question whether the vessel in the present case was a vessel of the State. But this is not a proceeding against a foreign sovereign. The ship here is found apparently prosecuting a mercantile voyage; she is loaded with a cargo, and a collision takes place, which the parties suffering attribute to this ship, and she is seized under the ordinary process of the Court of Admiralty. It is alleged that she belongs to the Khedive of Egypt. But if she belongs to the Khedive—which, for the purpose of the argument, we assume to be the case—she is found in the hands of other persons and under circumstances which certainly lead to the inference, in my opinion, that she is not a vessel of war, nor a vessel at the time of the collision, in the employment of the State or the Khedive as a sovereign prince. Then there is the question of law—namely, whether or not a vessel belonging to a foreign potentate, but not used as a vessel of state, or a vessel of war, or for state purposes, is entitled to the immunity which ships of war and ships used for the purposes of government are entitled to. That is a question which it is peculiarly within the province of the Court of Admiralty to decide. Why are we to decide that the Court of Admiralty is not to deal with it? If that court does deal with it, there is an appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council—a court of appeal of the highest authority. But, beyond that, I should be very much disinclined to grant a writ of prohibition in a case where the facts are in doubt—in a case which the court whose jurisdiction is sought to be impeached is just as competent to determine as we are. If the court chooses to find contrary to the evidence in order to give itself jurisdiction, this court would not be bound by its authority, or if it was a manifestly erroneous decision, although not made for the purpose of giving jurisdiction to the court whose jurisdiction was challenged; still I say this court would be entitled to look into the circumstances, and I do not say that a prohibition would not be granted. In this case, which is within the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty, and which that court is perfectly competent to decide, I do not see any reason for granting a prohibition.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am also of opinion that this rule should be discharged. The case in which a prohibition is granted by this court is where the other court is inferior to it, and is exceeding its jurisdiction—when it is taking on itself to interfere and to decide on some matter which it has not jurisdiction to decide. Now, taking every fact brought before us on the part of the persons applying for the prohibition to be true, they would raise the case to this, that the Khedive of Egypt, whom I am inclined to hold at present to be a sovereign prince—but of course that may be disputed hereafter—is the owner of this vessel, and sent her here for repairs. A collision takes place in the Thames at the time the vessel was his property, and his officers were on board in possession of her. Now, supposing that to be so, the Court of Admiralty, having jurisdiction over ships within the general jurisdiction for that purpose to administer the maritime law and international law against foreign vessels, if these were the facts, the Court of Admiralty could not proceed, because it is a rule of international law that such a ship is privileged. The Court of Admiralty could not, then, proceed in rem against the ship. I think there is a good deal of authority for saying that the Court cannot proceed against a sovereign or a state; and I think there is also a good deal of authority for saying that it ought not to proceed against a ship of war or a national vessel, as one may call it. And it is obviously desirable that this should be so, because otherwise we might have wars brought about between two countries on account of proceeding in that way. But, then, comes a question where a vessel such as this, which is the property of a foreign state, causes a collision in this way, the vessel not being a ship of war, but a vessel which happens to belong to the state—whether this is a matter which goes to the jurisdiction. The case most favourable to the owners of the vessel is that of the Prins Frederik (ubi sup.), which came before Lord Stowell, and was argued at great length; and he most cautiously abstained from committing himself to any opinion on this point. But the foreign Government, which was the owner of the ship seized by the Admiralty in that case, very sensibly and properly agreed that they would refer the matter to Lord Stowell to decide as an arbitrator. The Khedive has in the present case, as I understand, made an offer to refer the matter to arbitration, but for some reason or other the offer went off, and the matter now stands upon the question whether or not it is, under the circumstances stated, a defence to the claim against the vessel that it is the property of the Khedive. On that point Lord Stowell, as I before stated, entertained an argument at great length, but avoided expressing any opinion; and when the arbitrator had made his award, he deliberately stated that the persons who wanted to get the salvage should have at first applied to the ambassador, when they would have got it as a matter of course, and that, in that respect, the proceeding was a very indecent one. Then he proceeds—I am quoting from memory—that a very nice question arose as to the international law in this country. Now we are called upon, in the present case, to prohibit the Court of Admiralty from entertaining that which Lord Stowell—perhaps the highest authority on these matters that ever was—declared to be a very nice question of international law. It seems to me that on a nice question of international law, it would be rather presumptuous in the Court of Queen's Bench to say that we are a better authority than the Court of Admiralty—a court whose peculiar province it is to administer matters of this sort. However, it appears to me that whether the defence set up in this case is a defence or not is a matter which the Court of Admiralty has jurisdiction to determine—that to determine the facts and to see whether the international and maritime law makes this a matter of defence is a matter for that court, and if it is wrong the Privy Council can set it right. The decision of the latter court being final, there would be no further appeal; but there must always be some finality somewhere. I do not see how it can be said that the Court of Admiralty is exceeding its jurisdiction in entertaining the matter as a question of international law; and, taking this view, I think that court cannot be prohibited from determining it. It may be that the Court of Admiralty will decide that this is a clear defence, or that it is no defence at all; I do not myself express any opinion upon the matter. The judge of the Admiralty Court, and, if necessary, the Privy Council will decide it for themselves.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. I do not think it necessary to add anything to what has been said by my Lord and my brother Blackburn, except that if the learned counsel who have applied for a prohibition think we are wrong in our decision, they can apply to some other court and see what their fortune may be there.

QUAIN, J.—I give no opinion in this case, not having heard all the arguments in it.

Milward, Q. C., applied that the rule should be discharged with costs.

BLACKBURN, J.—I think you should have done what Lord Stowell said—first ask the sovereign or his ambassador in a civil manner what he would do.

Milward, Q. C.—I think we shall be able to show that we did all we could.

COCKBURN, C. J.—Was there not some suggestion that the matter should be referred?

Butt, Q. C.—We offered to refer the whole matter to the judge of the Admiralty Court.

BLACKBURN, J.—Did not the judge of the Admiralty Court decline to enter it?

Bottomry—Bond given as collateral security for bills of exchange—Duty to communicate with owners of cargo—Sufficiency of communication—Agency of master—His power to bind cargo for repairs of ship.

Where a bottomry bond on ship, freight, and cargo has been given by the master of a ship as collateral security for a bill of exchange drawn by him upon the bondholders, on the understanding that if the bill is properly met by funds being placed in the hands of the latter, the bottomry bond will not be enforced, but the master or shipowners, having placed no funds in the bondholders' hands, give notice that they do not intend to meet it, the bottomry bond is not bad as against the cargo, merely upon the ground that the bondholders have conditionally accepted the bill, and have neither presented it to the masters for payment nor protested it.

The master of a ship, being only the agent of the cargo in special cases of necessity, is bound, when the circumstances permit, to communicate with the owner of the cargo before he does any act which seriously affects the value of the cargo. A master, therefore, putting into Port Louis, Mauritius, for repairs to his ship, and intending to raise money for those repairs upon bottomry, not only on ship and freight, but also upon cargo of an imperishable nature and belonging to one firm residing in Great Britain, is bound to communicate with them before having recourse to bottomry; otherwise the bond is invalid.

To justify a master in giving a bottomry bond on cargo where communication with the owners is necessary, a mere statement of injuria sustained by the ship and of the consequent necessity for repairs entailing considerable expense, unaccompanied by a statement that a bottomry bond is proposed, is not a sufficient communication; the law does not require the owners from such premises to draw the conclusion that the ship and cargo must be bottomried; although it may not be required that the words "bottomry of cargo" should be used in the communication, the fact itself should be stated, or at least the necessity for a bottomry bond should be an obvious and irresistible inference from the circumstances stated.

A communication detailing the disasters to the ship, and the probable expense of repair, but not expressing the intention to bottomry the cargo, and requesting the owners of cargo to wait for further information, is not, where any communication is necessary, sufficient; more especially where the information as to the bottomry has been given to the shipowners, but withheld from the owners of cargo; and under such circumstances the owners of cargo are not bound to conclude that the master will resort to bottomry, or to reply to the communication.

The Oriental (3 Moore P. C. C. 398) followed; The Bonaparte (8 Moore P. C. C. 459) distinguished. Semble, that a master, being, as agent for the cargo, as well as for the ship, bound to do his best for the whole adventure, and therefore not being entitled to bind the cargo for repairs of the ship at the sole expense of and without reasonable possibility of benefit to the cargo, cannot bottomry the cargo for repairs to the ship when the outlay for the repairs falling on the cargo would be so great that a reasonable and prudent owner, if present, would not have allowed his cargo to be bottomried, but would rather have paid the freight, and transhipped the cargo.

THIS was a cause of bottomry instituted on behalf of Messrs. Baring Brothers and Co., of London and Liverpool, merchants and bankers, the legal holders of a bottomry bond on the United States ship Onward, her cargo, and freight, against that vessel and the cargo lately laden therein, together with the freight due for the transportation thereof, and against Messrs. Thomas Dunlop Findlay and James Findlay, trading under the style of J. D. Findlay and Co., of Glasgow, the owners of the cargo intervening.

The plaintiffs' petition was as follows:—

1. The Onward, a ship of 933 tons register or thereabouts belonging to the United States of America, whilst on a voyage from Moulmein to Queenstown or Falmouth for orders, and from thence to a port of discharge in the United Kingdom or on the Continent between Bordeaux and Hamburg, both ports inclusive, laden with a cargo of teak timber, was compelled to put into port Louis, in the island of Mauritius, in order to repair and refit.

2. The master of the Onward being without funds and credit at Port Louis, and being unable to pay the expenses of the said repairs, and the necessary disbursements of the said ship at Port Louis, so as to enable the said ship to resume and prosecute her voyage, was compelled to resort to a loan of 24,369 dollars and 69 centimes of a dollar on bottomry of the said ship, her cargo, and freight for the purpose of enabling him to pay the said expenses and disbursements, which said sum Messrs. Houdlette and Co., of Port Louis, at the request of the said master by public advertisement, lent and supplied the said master at and after the rate of 128 dollars for every 100 dollars advanced, and accordingly the said master by a bond of bottomry dated the 13th Oct. 1870, by him duly executed, in consideration of the sum of 24,369 dollars and 69 centimes of a dollar Mauritius currency paid to him by the said Messrs. Houdlette and Co., bound himself and the said ship, and her cargo then laden on board her, namely, about 940 tons of teak timber and her freight, to pay unto the said Messrs. Houdlette and Co., their assigns or order or indorsees, the said sum of 24,369 dollars and 69 centimes of a dollar Mauritius currency, with the aforesaid maritime premium thereon, within twenty days next after the arrival of the Onward at her port of discharge from the said intended voyage; the said payment to be made both in capital and interest in British sterling money at and after the rate of 4s. for every dollar so advanced, with a condition that in case the said ship and cargo aforesaid should be lost, miscarried, or should be cast away during her voyage from Port Louis to Queenstown or Falmouth for orders and thence to her port of discharge in the United Kingdom or on the Continent between Bordeaux and Hamburg, both ports inclusive, then the said sum of 24,369 dollars and 69 centimes of a dollar, and the aforesaid maritime premium thereon should not be recoverable.

3. The Onward subsequently proceeded on her said voyage, and on the 7th Feb. 1871 arrived with the said cargo on board at the port of Liverpool, which was her port of discharge, and the said bottomry bond afterwards became due and payable.

4. The said bond was duly indorsed and assigned to the plaintiffs, Messrs. Baring Brothers and Co., of

London and Liverpool, merchants and bankers, and they became and were the legal holders of the said bottomry bond before and at the time of the institution of this suit.

5. The said ship has been sold by order of this court, and the proceeds of the sale thereof have been brought into court, and the said freight has also been paid into court.

6. The said sum of 24,369 dollars and 69 centimes of a dollar Mauritius currency as aforesaid, with the maritime premium thereon, still remain due and owing to the plaintiffs. By a decree made on the 10th May 1871 the Right Honourable the Judge pronounced for the force and validity of the said bond so far as regarded the said ship and freight, and condemned the proceeds of the said ship and freight in the amount due on the said bond. The said principle and premium still remain owing to the plaintiffs, and the proceeds of the said ship and her freight available for payment thereof are very insufficient for such payment, and the plaintiffs are compelled to have recourse to the said cargo.

The answer of the defendants as originally filed was as follows:

1. The several averments in the 1st, 3rd, 4th, 5th, and 6th articles of the said petition are respectively true, except such of the said averments (if any) as may be inconsistent with the allegations hereinafter contained.

2. The several averments in the 2nd articles of the said petition contained are respectively untrue, except the averment that the bottomry bond therein mentioned was given and executed, which fact is admitted to be true.

3. The Onward proceeded on the voyage in the 1st article of the petition mentioned under a certain charter-party made by and between the defendants and the owners of the vessel, who resided at New York. And the cargo in the said article mentioned belonged to the defendants, and was shipped at Moulmein on board the said vessel by Messrs. Tod Findlay and Co., of Moulmein, on behalf of the defendants.

4. When the Onward put into Port Louis, as in the said 1st article of the petition mentioned, the master placed his ship in the hands of Messrs. Houdlette and Co., the persons in the 2nd article of the petition mentioned, and the repairs and disbursements in the 2nd article mentioned were made, directed, and expended under the orders, management, and on the credit of the said Messrs. Houdlette and Co., who at the outset contemplated the necessity of securing themselves by the hypothecation of the ship, freight, and cargo.

5. The master of the Onward and the said Messrs. Houdlette and Co. did not communicate to the said shippers of the said cargo, or to the defendants, the intention of hypothecating the ship, freight, and cargo, or the circumstances which might render such hypothecation advisable or necessary, but, on the contrary, without reasonable cause or excuse, abstained from so doing, although the comparatively small value of the ship and freight to be earned rendered it all the more important that such communication should have been made.

6. A reasonable and proper time was not allowed to elapse between the advertisements for the bottomry loan and the acceptance of Messrs. Houdlette and Co.'s offer to make such loan.

It is submitted that by reason of the premises, or some of them, the said bottomry bond is void as against the defendants, who had no opportunity of opposing, and did not oppose, the decree in the 6th article of the petition mentioned.

To this answer the plaintiffs replied originally as follows:—

1. The defendants since the 31st Dec. 1868 have been the only persons forming the firm of Tod Findlay and Co., of Moulmein, mentioned in the 3rd article of the said answer.

2. After the master of the Onward put into Port Louis as aforesaid, he employed Messrs. Houdlette and Co., in the petition mentioned, as his agents, and by his directions they by letter communicated to the defendants' firms at Moulmein and Glasgow the circumstances of the ship's distress, and the estimated amount of her repairs.

3. The defendants on a former occasion when the said ship, whilst in the performance of the said charter-party, was in distress at Bombay had refused to make to the said master advances of more money than they were bound by the said charter-party to advance for the ship's ordinary disbursements, although the said master required much larger advances for the ship's necessary repairs and extraordinary expenses.

4. The said Messrs. Houdlette and Co., shortly after the said ship was put into their hands at Port Louis, offered the said master, in case he should require them to do so, to make the necessary advances for the ship's repairs, and to take his draft at 90 days' sight on Messrs. Baring Brothers and Co., of London, at the rate of 5 per cent. discount for the amount of the advances, together with a bottomry bond on ship, cargo, and freight, as collateral security; the bond to be void should the draft be accepted. The said master and the said Messrs. Houdlette and Co. by letter communicated to the owners of the Onward the circumstances of the said ship's distress and the aforesaid offer of the said Messrs. Houdlette and Co., and the said master by his letter requested the said owners to give him their directions on the subject. The said owners, shortly after, receiving such letters, by letter communicated with the defendants at Glasgow, and forwarded to them copies of the said lastly mentioned letter of the said master and of the said Messrs. Houdlette and Co.

5. The defendants' houses at Moulmein and Glasgow respectively received the letters referred to in the 2nd article of this reply in time to have communicated with the said Master at Port Louis before the giving of the said bottomry bond.

6. The defendants received the said copies of letters referred to in article 4 of this reply in time for them to have communicated thereon with the said master at Port Louis before the giving of the said bond.

7. The defendants did not at any time answer the said communications of the said Messrs. Houdlette and Co. or in any way communicate or attempt to communicate with the said master, or to direct him not to give or to prevent him from giving the said bottomry bond on the said cargo.

8. The said bond was duly advertised for sale, and was subsequently, and after a proper interval had elapsed, sold by auction in the usual way. There were several bidders at the sale, and the said Messrs. Houdlette and Co. were the lowest bidders in premium, and the said bond was knocked down to them. The said bond was not advertised for until the said ship was ready for sea, and up to that time the master of the said ship had expected to hear from her owners, and had hoped to be put in funds, and had not finally determined to resort to bottomry of the said ship or her cargo or freight.

9. There was every reason to believe that the said ship and her freight to be earned would be sufficient, or nearly sufficient, to meet the said bond, and a large portion of the sum advanced on bottomry was raised for the purpose of, and was expended in, defraying charges incurred on the said cargo at the Mauritius for discharging, storing, and otherwise.

10. Save as herein appears, the plaintiffs deny the truth of the seven allegations contained in the said answer.

To this reply the defendants rejoined as follows:—

1. The averments contained in the 1st and 3rd articles of the reply are respectively true. The moneys, however, which the master required, as stated in the said 3rd article of the reply, were supplied to him by the owners of the ship, and he was under no necessity of borrowing, and did not borrow, them on bottomry.

2. Messrs. Houdlette and Co. did communicate to the defendants' firm at Glasgow as mentioned in the 2nd article of the reply.

3. The said Messrs. Houdlette and Co. did not inform the defendants' firms at Moulmein or at Glasgow of any intention on the part of the master of the Onward to have recourse to bottomry, nor intimate to the defendants that there would be any necessity for so doing, and it was after the vessel had left Port Louis that they communicated to the defendants for the first time any information whatsoever relating to the advance of money to the master of the Onward on bottomry.

4. The first intimation which the defendants received of any intention or proposal on the part of the master of the Onward to have recourse to bottomry was received by the defendants in Sept. 1870. It was contained in a copy of a letter dated the 29th June 1870, and written by the said master to Messrs. C. and R. Poillon, of New York, the owners of the ship, being the letter mentioned in the 4th article of the reply. The said copy was enclosed in a letter dated the 25th Aug. 1870, and written by the said Messrs. C. and R. Poillon to the defendants, and received by them in the following Sept., being the letter of the owners referred to in the 4th article of the reply.

5. On the reply of the letters in the last article mentioned, the defendants reasonably inferred that the vessel would have left Port Louis before any communication from them could have reached the said Master, and that it would consequently have been useless to have attempted to make any such communication.

6. Save as herein admitted, all the several averments in the said reply contained are untrue.

7. It is submitted that under the circumstances stated in the defendants' answer, and in the 3rd, 4th, and 5th articles of this rejoinder, the several averments in the said reply contained would, if true, be immaterial and irrelevant.

The pleadings were thereupon concluded, but at the hearing, the facts showing that the bond had been given as collateral security for a bill of exchange, the defendants, at the suggestion of the court (a) amended their answer by adding the following article:—

2a. The bond in the petition mentioned was given only as a collateral security for the payment of a bill of exchange for 5130l. 9s. 3d. drawn by the master of the ship on Messrs. Baring Brothers and Co., and the said bill of exchange was accepted and paid, or if not accepted and paid was not duly presented, or if presented and dishonoured the said bill was not protested, and due notice of dishonour of the said bill was not given to the drawer or to these defendants.

To this additional article of the answer the plaintiffs replied by pleading in lieu of article 4 of their reply the following article:—

4. The said Messrs. Houdlette and Co. shortly after said ship was put into their hands at Port Louis, offered the said master in case he should require them to do so, to make the necessary advances, and to take his draft at 90 days' sight on Messrs. Baring Brothers and Co., of London, at the rate of 5 per cent. discount, for the amount of the repairs of the Onward, together with a bottomry bond on ship, cargo, and freight as collateral security, and accordingly the arrangement and terms upon which the said bill and bond were respectively drawn and executed were at the time of such drawing and execution put into writing and embodied in a letter from the said Messrs. Houdlette and Co. at such time handed to the master of the Onward, which letter was and is in the words and figures following, that is to say:—

Port Louis, Mauritius.
13th Oct. 1870.

Captain J. H. Hewitt, Ship Onward.

Dear Sir,—We beg to acknowledge the receipt of your bills at 90 days' sight on Messrs. Baring Brothers and Co., London, in our favour for (5130l. 9s. 3d.) say five thousand, one hundred and thirty pounds, nine shillings, and three pence sterling. These bills we take with a bottomry bond on your ship, freight, and cargo as collateral security, with the express understanding and agreement that the bond should be cancelled on the prompt payment by the owners of the vessel to Messrs. Baring Brothers and Co. of the amount of the above bills, together with their charges; otherwise the bond to be enforced, principal and interest. We remain, Dear Sir, your obedient servants,
HOUDLETTE AND CO.
The said master and the said Messrs. Houdlette and Co.

(a) The learned judge on the defendants wishing to raise the defence that the bond was given as collateral security to bills of exchange, which they alleged had been accepted and paid, pointed out that such a defence ought to be raised on the pleadings, so as to give the plaintiffs notice on the defence. He quoted The Bonaparte (8 Moore P. C. C. 459) as showing the practice of the court, and gave leave to the defendants to amend their pleadings.

by letter communicated to the owners of the Onward the circumstances of the said ship's distress and the aforesaid offer of the said Messrs. Houdlette and Co., and the said master by his letter requested the said owners to give him their directions on the subject. The said owners, shortly after receiving such letters, by letter communicated with the defendants at Glasgow, and forwarded to them copies of the said last mentioned letters of the said master and of the said Messrs. Houdlette and Co. The said owners of the Onward did not promptly (and in fact never did) pay to the said Messrs. Baring Brothers and Co. the amount of the said bills, and their charges, as provided by the said agreement, and never in any way provided for the payment of the said bills or bond, but on the contrary refused to pay or provide the amount, and elected and determined that the said bond should not be cancelled, but should be left to be enforced. The said bills were accepted by the said Messrs. Baring Brothers and Co. under an arrangement between themselves and the said Messrs. Houdlette and Co., but not in payment of the amount secured by the said bond, and was paid by the said Messrs. Baring Brothers and Co. in pursuance of the said arrangement and not otherwise, and not on account or in satisfaction of the said bond. The said master of the Onward had not at the time of the drawing of the said bills, or at any time afterwards, any funds whatever in the hands of the said Messrs. Baring Brothers and Co., and upon the arrival of the Onward at Liverpool, as in the petition mentioned, refused to take up the said bills, and the defendants never offered, and never were ready or willing, to provide funds for the said bills. The plaintiffs further say that the additional article numbered 2A to the answer filed in this case is immaterial and irrelevant.

On the 7th Jan. 1868 the Onward, which was then the property of one B. J. Trask, of New York, was chartered to Messrs. T. D. Findlay and Co., of Glasgow, to carry a cargo of coals to a port in India or China, and thence proceed to Amherst for orders to load at Moulmein, Rangoon, Bassein, or Akyab, one port only, a cargo of rice in bags, or teak timber, or planks, and thence proceed with such cargo to Queenstown or Falmouth for orders for a port of discharge in the United Kingdom, or on the Continent between Hamburg and Bordeaux, both inclusive, or to a safe port in the Baltic; the charterers paying a freight 6l. 5s. for teakwood per load of fifty cubic feet for the United Kingdom or the Continent, such freight to be paid as follows: 3000l. to be advanced in England by the charterers' acceptances at three and six months, sufficient cash at current rate of exchange for necessary disbursements of ship abroad, not exceeding 700l., say not over 300l. at port of discharge of outward cargo, and the balance at port of loading of homeward cargo; and after deducting previous advances from gross estimated freight, one-third of balance to be paid in cash to the shipowners' agents on arrival at final port of discharge, and the remainder on right delivery of the cargo by approved bills or in cash, at charterers' option; should the ship be ordered to Shanghai to discharge the outward cargo, the charterers to advance 700l. additional for disbursements there; the master to sign bills of lading as presented but not below current rate of freight, without prejudice to the charter-party. There was a second clause in the charter-party by which it was agreed that on the arrival of the ship at her loading port, the charterers should have the option of employing the ship for one, two, three, or four intermediate voyages from Rangoon or Moulmein to Calcutta with a cargo of teakwood; freight to be paid at specified rates, and sufficient cash for the ship's ordinary disbursements to be advanced to the master by the charterers; balance of freight to be paid on receipt of discharge from master, less 500*l.* to be retained by charterers till advice of ship having sailed on her homeward voyage.

The Onward sailed under this charter-party from Liverpool with a cargo of coals, and proceeded to Shanghai, and there discharged; she then proceeded to Amoy for orders, and was there ordered to go to Moulmein; she went to that port, and there loaded a cargo for Bombay under the second clause in the charter-party. On her voyage to Bombay she met with bad weather, and was damaged. At Bombay the master attempted to raise funds from the charterers' agents, William Nicholls and Co., to pay for the ship's repairs. The agents, however, declined to advance more than ordinary ship's disbursements; they communicated by telegram at the end of June 1869 with the defendants at Glasgow, and the defendants directed them by telegram, afterwards confirmed by letter, not to exceed ordinary disbursements, as they had already advanced beyond what had been earned on the outward voyage. The defendants on 22nd July 1869 again wrote to their agents in Bombay, acknowledging their agents' letter of 22nd June 1869 as to the damage to the Onward and saying that they thought "it not improbable that the master will be unable to raise sufficient funds on bottomry to pay the repairs, in which case it may be necessary to bring her to a sale," and again declining to make further advances if the ship was unable to complete her voyage. The agents actually advanced, with the consent of a member of the defendants' firm who was at Bombay at the time, 7500 rupees, and the master obtained 1000*l.* from his owners, who authorised him to draw for that amount upon the plaintiffs. This enabled him to complete the repairs of his ship. On the 5th Sept. 1868 the Onward had become the property of Messrs. C. and R. Poillon, wealthy merchants in New York, and on 5th Aug. 1869 Messrs. Poillon wrote to the defendants, informing them of the change of ownership, and that the plaintiffs would act as agents of the ship in Europe. The ship again went to Moulmein, and there loaded a cargo of teakwood and carried the same to Calcutta, where she discharged; she then returned to Moulmein, and there loaded for Europe a cargo of teakwood, for which the master signed bills of lading at the then current rate of freight, 3*l.* 5*s.* per load of 50 cubic feet. She was loaded by Tod, Findlay and Co., who were the representatives of the defendants' firm at Moulmein. The master had from the charterers' agents at Moulmein about 592*l.* for disbursements. The charterers advanced altogether 7380*l.* 14*s.* 2*d.*, leaving a balance due for freight on the ship's arrival in England of 2338*l.* 6*s.* 6*d.*

The Onward left Moulmein for Europe on 1st April, 1870, but at the mouth of the Mozambique Channel she encountered bad weather, and was compelled to put into Port Louis, Mauritius, where she arrived on 11th June 1870. The mails leaving Mauritius for Great Britain between the 29th June and 24th Oct. 1870 were as follow:—

Leave Port Louis.	Delivered in Glasgow.
1st July	30th July.
29th July	30th Aug.
26th Aug.	29th Sept.
23rd Sept.	24th Oct.
21st Oct.	26th Nov.

The only means of communication between Mauritius and Great Britain or the United States was by French mail between Port Louis and Aden, and thence via Marseilles or Southampton. There was no direct telegraphic communication from the Mauritius, but messages could be sent to Aden by the mail steamer, whence they would be forwarded by telegraph. The time required to send a message to Glasgow from Port Louis, or vice versa, by steamer and telegraph was from twelve to fourteen days, i.e., from ten to thirteen days by mail steamer between Aden and Port Louis, and ten to fourteen hours by telegraph between Aden and Glasgow. The mails from England to Aden and Port Louis during the same period were as follow:—

Leave England.	Leave Aden.	Arrive at Port Louis.
8th July.	23rd July.	6th Aug.
5th Aug.	20th Aug.	4th Sept.
2nd Sept.	17th Sept.	1st Oct.
28th Sept.	23rd Oct.	3rd Nov.

By the first mail after the Onward put into Port Louis, 1st July, the master wrote to his owners in New York as follows:—

Port Louis, Mauritius, 29th June, '70.

Messrs. C. and R. Poillon,
224, South Street, New York.

Hon. Sirs,—After greeting, I beg to inform you that by circumstances most unfortunate I have been compelled by stress of weather to seek this port for repairs, arriving on the 12th of this month too late for the last mail.

The casualties of the voyage are as follows. Left Moulmein, or mouth of the Salween, on the 1st April last with a full cargo of teak timber and planks, about 990 tons, and 60 bags of guano, or about 5 tons. [The letter then set out the first part of the voyage, which is immaterial.] At noon on the 15th May sighted the Roderigos Islands, and passed to the southward of them. Nothing further occurred worthy of note until the 31st May, 6h. 30m. p.m., after a day of continued squalls and varying winds a heavy gale broke upon the ship from the westward with a continual increase for thirty-six hours, during which time the seas were fearful in abruptness. The ship laboured and plunged heavily throughout the night. By 9h. a.m. we were making 950 strokes per hour of Adair's double-action pumps, and both main and mizen masts badly sprung. The bowsprit had wrought so much during the gale that the cutwater is quite drawn from the stem, and I subsequently found that the pall-bit beam supporting its heel also carried away, and all the woodwork about the night-heads started. At 10h. 30m. a.m. 31st May, sea account latitude 29° 40', longitude 43° 49' east, after a consultation with the officers and crew, it was found expedient for the benefit of all concerned to deviate from the proper course of the voyage and seek this, our nearest port, for repairs. On the 13th ult. was towed into the harbour and moored safely. On the 15th surveyors came on board and recommended to discharge until the leak should stop. On the 16th called for tenders for the discharge and storage of the cargo, one of which was accepted, and began to discharge on the 17th ult. We are now a little more than half discharged, the ship still making water about four inches per hour, and will have to go in dock by all probability. Tenders for the work have been duly sent in, and, as near as can be estimated, it will take from $15,000 to $17,000 to place her in repairs. Messrs. Houdlette and Co. agree to take my draft at 90 days' sight on Messrs. Baring Brothers and Co., of London, at the rate of 5 per cent. discount, for the amount of repairs on my vessel, together with a bottomry bond on ship, freight, and cargo as collateral security. Should you not approve of this, please advise by wire through Messrs. Baring Brothers and Co., of London, being the readiest mode in which intelligence can be conveyed to this island. It will take at least ten days more to discharge, and probably twenty to twenty-five days in repairing, and at least one month to reload. You will therefore have ample time for advising me by letter. In the mean time a faithful and proper attention shall be paid to all the work and expenditure as far as lays in the power of your humble servant,

JAMES H. HEWITT.

[ADM.]

THE ONWARD.

[ADM.]

The tenders referred to in the letter for the discharge and storage of the cargo, and for the repairs of the ship were procured through the United States Consul and Messrs. Houdlette and Co., who were employed by the master to act as the agents of the ship, and the repairs were afterwards executed on the credit of Messrs. Houdlette and Co. Although an estimate was made of the cost of the repairs before they were commenced, no estimate was made of what the value of the ship would be after the repairs had been done. When the repairs were completed the ship was, as appeared from her subsequent sale in England, actually of less value than the amount which had been expended on her for repairs. By the same mail, 1st July, Messrs. Houdlette and Co. wrote to the shipowners, and also by the master's directions to the shippers at Moulmein and to the defendants at Glasgow. The letters were as follows:—

Mauritius, 29th June 1870.

Messrs. Tod Findlay and Co., Moulmein.

Dear Sirs,—We hereby beg to advise you that the American ship Onward, Captain Hewitt, from your port with timber for Europe, put in here on the 11th instant in the southern port of Madagascar and the African coast.

She has been surveyed and found making four inches of water an hour, her main and mizen masts badly sprung, and pall-bit beam broken.

Her cargo is now nearly discharged, and she will go into dock in a few days where she will have to be stripped, caulked, and re-coppered, and her broken masts and beam replaced by new.

By next opportunity will be able to give you further particulars, and thanking you for your fortnightly circulars regularly received from Rangoon, remain, dear Sirs, your obedient servants,

HOUDLETTE AND CO.

Mauritius, 1st July 1870.

To T. D. Findlay, Esq., Glasgow.

Dear Sir,—We hereby beg to advise you that the American ship Onward from Moulmein with timber for Cork or Falmouth for orders put in here on the 11th instant for repairs, she having experienced bad weather between the southern point of Madagascar and the African coast.

She has been surveyed and found making four inches of water per hour in still water, and her main and mizen masts found sprung, and pall-bit beam broken, and was recommended by the surveyors to discharge for further examination, and she is now nearly discharged, and will be obliged to go into dock and be stripped, caulked, and re-coppered, and broken masts and beams replaced by new.

We think that she will be detained here about two months longer to finish discharging, make the necessary repairs, and reload, and her expenses here will amount to about 4000l.

By next opportunity we shall be able to give you more particulars, and in the mean time remain, dear Sirs, your obedient servants,

HOUDLETTE AND CO.

Mauritius, 1st July 1870.

Messrs. C. and R. Poillon, New York.

Dear Sirs,—We hereby beg to advise you that your ship Onward, Captain Hewitt, from Moulmein with timber for Cork or Falmouth for orders, put in here on the 11th ultimo in distress, having experienced heavy weather on the 31st May in latitude 29° 49' south, longitude 43° 49' E. causing her to spring a leak.

She has been surveyed and found to be making about four inches of water an hour in our harbour, her main and mizen masts badly sprung, and pall-bit beam broken, and some of her sails gone. The surveyors recommended her cargo to be discharged in order to lighten the ship for further examination, and now that the cargo is nearly out, the leak continues the same as when she was first surveyed, and she has, therefore, been recommended to go into dock and be stripped, caulked, and re-coppered, and her masts and beams broken to be replaced by new, which we think will detain the ship about two months longer with the reloading of the cargo, and will cost about (4000l.) say four thousand pounds sterling, and for the purpose of procuring funds for the payment of these repairs we have proposed to Capt. Hewitt to take his draft on Messrs. Baring Brothers and Co., of London, drawn at 90 days' sight at 5 per cent. discount, with a bottomry bond on ship, cargo, and freight as collateral security, with the understanding that the bond shall be null and void provided the draft be accepted, and should you approve of this proposal, you will please place in the hands of Messrs. Baring Brothers and Co. sufficient funds to meet the drafts upon presentation.

Captain Hewitt will write by this opportunity, and give you all the particulars of his case, and by the mail leaving on the 29th instant we shall be able to inform you of further progress, and in the mean time remain, dear Sirs,

HOUDLETTE AND CO.

On 9th July, after the discharge of the cargo, a second survey was held, and the ship ordered into dry dock. She went into dock on 11th July. By the mail leaving 29th July the master again wrote to his owners in New York, announcing what had been done, and the repairs recommended by the surveyors, and saying that he hoped to leave dock on 30th July and to commence reloading in another week, which he hoped to finish in a month. By the mail leaving on 26th Aug. the master again wrote to his owners in New York, saying that the repairs were not yet finished, that he had begun to reload, but that it would still take thirty or forty days, again saying that he hoped to have advices from them "by next mail in regard to raising of funds, of which I mentioned in my letter of 29th June last, namely, Messrs. Houdlette and Co. agree to take my draft at 90 days' sight on Messrs. Baring Brothers and Co., of London, at the rate of 5 per cent. for the amount of repairs on my vessel, together with a bottomry bond on ship, freight, and cargo as collateral security. Should you not approve of this, please advise by wire through Messrs. Baring Brothers and Co., of London, being the readiest mode in which intelligence can be conveyed to this island." No communication was sent to the shippers at Moulmein or to the defendants at Glasgow by either of the last mentioned mails.

On 25th Aug. 1870 Messrs. Poillon, the shipowners of New York, wrote to the defendants at Glasgow as follows:—

C. AND R. POILLON,

Shipbuilders, Shipwrights, Caulkers, and Spar Makers,
224, South Street, New York,

25th Aug. 1870.

Messrs. T. D. Findlay and Co.,
Glasgow, Scotland.

Gentlemen,—By the enclosed copies of letters received from Captain Hewitt and Messrs. Houdlette and Co., you will perceive that the ship Onward under charter to yourself has been compelled to put into Mauritius in distress, and will probably be detained there for two months or more for repairs. The information contained in the letters is all the particulars we have of the disaster. If we should obtain anything further of importance, will advise by first opportunity after receipt. Your obedient servants,

C. AND R. POILLON, per E. H. GIBBS.

The enclosures referred to in the letter were the letters of 29th June and 1st July 1870 before set out, and the above letter and enclosures were delivered to the defendants at Glasgow on 8th Sept. 1870.

By the mail leaving Port Louis on 23rd Sept. the master again wrote to his owners in New York, saying that he had not yet completed reloading, but that he hoped "by the 8th of next month to be loaded." By the same mail Messrs. Houdlette and Co. wrote to the defendants at Glasgow as follows:—

THE ONWARD.

[ADM.]

Mauritius, 18th Sept. 1870.

T. D. Findlay, Esq., Glasgow.

Dear Sir,—Since writing you on the 30th June the Onward has come out of dock, and has now finished her repairs, but the stevedores do not appear to understand the work of stowing timber, and the labour of taking in the cargo seems to drag, but the captain hopes to have finished in about two weeks, and we hope to see the vessel away soon after.

The Onward has been very thoroughly repaired, and we believe her to be a good strong ship, and Captain Hewitt has left nothing undone to push forward the work as fast as possible.

With nothing of importance to add, we remain, dear Sir, your obedient servants,
HOUDLETTE AND CO.

Messrs. Houdlette and Co. also wrote under the same date to the shippers at Moulmein to the same effect. The master having received no communication as to raising funds, advertised on 5th Oct., through the United States Consul, in the Mauritius Commercial Gazette for a loan on bottomry. The bond was sold by auction at the United States Consulate, and three bids were made. The advertisement and the result, as certified by the United States Consul, are as follow :—

Captain Hewitt, of the American ship Onward, will receive offers at the United States Consulate to-day, 5th Oct., at 11 a.m., for the loan of about ($25,000) twenty-five thousand dollars, required to defray the necessary disbursements of his vessel at this port. The loan to be secured by a bottomry bond on ship, cargo, and freight.

The Onward is bound for Cork or Falmouth for orders, and the bond will be made payable twenty days after safe arrival at her port of discharge.

Consulate of the United States of America for Port Louis, Mauritius.

5th Oct. 1870.

I, Nicholas Pike, Consul of the United States for Port Louis, Mauritius, do certify that the annexed advertisement in English was published in the Commercial Gazette on the 5th Oct. 1870.

I further certify that, agreeably to said advertisement, proposals of Houdlette and Co., merchants, of Port Louis, to advance the amount required by the captain for repairs and outfit, to enable the said vessel to proceed to sea, of twenty-eight per centum, were the lowest proposals received, and they are, therefore, best entitled to advance the same.

NICHOLAS PIKE,
United States Consul.

The Onward on 13th Oct. 1870 completed re-loading, with the exception of 77 logs of teak wood which the stevedores at Mauritius were unable to get into her. On the same day the master signed a bottomry bond on ship, freight, and cargo, the substance of which is set out in the second article of the plaintiffs' petition. The master also signed bills of exchange in favour of Messrs. Houdlette and Co. for 5130*l.* 9*s.* 3*d.*, and Messrs. Houdlette and Co. gave the master an acknowledgment in the form of the letter set out in the amended article of the reply (article 4). The Onward sailed for Europe on 15th Oct. 1870. The 77 logs not shipped on board the Onward were sent by a British barque bound for London at a freight of 2*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* per load of fifty cubic feet. Evidence given on behalf of the defendants showed that freights were very low in the Mauritius in 1870, and that there was a greater amount of tonnage there than there was demand for.

By the mail leaving Port Louis 21st Oct. 1870 Messrs. Houdlette and Co. wrote to the defendants at Glasgow as follows :—

Port Louis, Mauritius, 19th Oct. 1870.

T. D. Findlay, Esq., Glasgow.

Dear Sir,—We last had this pleasure on the 18th ultimo, and now beg to inform you that the Onward got away on the 15th instant, having taken all of her original cargo outward, with the exception of 77 pieces which were shut out for want of room, and have been shipped on board the ship Warren Hastings bound for London.

The disbursements of the Onward amounted to about $25,000, and we have taken the captain's draft on Messrs. Baring Brothers and Co. at 5 per cent. discount for the amount of same, and a bottomry bond on ship, freight, and cargo as a collateral security, which will be made null and void upon payment of the draft.

Trusting that this vessel will arrive at her port of destination in safety, we remain, dear Sir, your obedient servants,
HOUDLETTE AND CO.

By the mail and under the same date Messrs. Houdlette and Co. wrote to the shippers at Moulmein precisely to the same effect. By the same mail Messrs. Houdlette and Co. forwarded to Messrs. Baring Brothers and Co. the master's drafts and the bottomry bond. The bond was endorsed by Messrs. Houdlette and Co. "Pay to the order of Messrs. Baring Brothers and Co., London, Houdlette and Co." The bill of exchange drawn by the master was as follows :—

First Exchange for 5130*l.* 9*s.* 3*d.*
Port Louis, Mauritius.

13th Oct. 1870.

Ninety days after sight of this first of Exchange (second and third of same tenor and date unpaid) Pay to the order of Messrs. Houdlette and Co. the sum of five thousand, one hundred and thirty pounds, nine shillings, and three pence sterling, value received, and place the same, with or without advice, to account of ship Onward and owners for necessary disbursements at this port.

London.

JAMES H. HEWITT,
Master of ship Onward.

To Messrs. Baring Brothers and Co.

On receipt of the bond and bill of exchange Messrs. Baring Brothers and Co. accepted the bill by writing across it "Accepted 26th Nov. 1870, at Messrs. Martin and Co. B. B. and Co." One of the plaintiffs' witnesses, Mr. Theobald, partner and manager of Baring Brothers and Co. in London, explained that this was their ordinary mode of accepting bills when sent privately and not intended to go out of their hands into the market; otherwise they signed "Baring Brothers and Co." The bill was indorsed to them especially as obligees of the bond, "Pay to the order of Messrs. Baring Brothers and Co., London. Houdlette and Co." It never left the hands of Messrs. Baring Brothers and Co. Baring Brothers and Co. had acted for some years as agents for Messrs. Houdlette and Co., and had annually supplied the latter with a letter of credit for 10,000*l.* for the purpose of advances on bottomry bonds, agreeing with Messrs. Houdlette and Co., as well as with bonâ fide holders, that Messrs. Houdlette and Co.'s drafts for such advances at 90 days' sight should be duly honoured, provided that when the drafts were presented for acceptance Messrs. Baring Brothers and Co. should have received the bottomry bonds made out to their order; and also it was agreed that if the bonds were promptly paid the commission to be charged to the owners should be only 2½ per cent. and ½ per cent. for effecting insurance. Such a letter of credit had been sent to Messrs. Houdlette and Co. on 7th Feb. 1870 for that year. Messrs. Houdlette and Co. had kept Messrs. Baring Brothers and Co. advised of the proceedings in reference to the Onward by every mail leaving Mauritius while the vessel was there. On receipt of the bill of exchange and bond (26th Nov. 1870) Baring Brothers and Co. opened an account headed "Dr. The ship Onward and owners in account with Baring Brothers and Co. Cr.," and debited the vessel with the amount of the bill of exchange, the cost of insurance, commission and interest.

On 21st Sept. 1870 the shipowners in New York wrote to Messrs. Baring Brothers and Co., as follows :

C. AND R. POILLON,
Shipbuilders, Shipwrights, Caulkers, and Spar Makers,
224, South Street, New York,
21st Sept. 1870.

Messrs. Baring Brothers and Co., London.

Gentlemen,—We are in receipt of a letter from Capt. Hewitt of the ship Onward, dated Port Louis, Mauritius, 29th July, copy of which is enclosed, to which please refer ; we are not desirous of advancing the money spent at Mauritius, unless by doing so we can make a saving, and for that reason would thank you on receipt of the documents, and before you accept or pay the bond, to get your average stater to make a rough estimate that will show how much the ship will have to pay after deducting from the total amount due under the bond (if promptly paid) such sums as the cargo and underwriters on freight will have to pay, and telegraph the result by cable ; and we would like the amount also due from the ship classified so as to show how much the underwriters on vessel would have to pay, and how much would fall on the owners. With these two items before us, we can determine whether or not it is desirable for us to advance the money, or let the vessel be sold to pay the bond. If on the receipt of this information we conclude to pay, we will immediately deposit the amount required with the Messrs. Ward, and have them advise you by cable, so that you may then pay the bond for us ; otherwise we shall let the ship be sold.

The freight will amount to say	£	s.	d.
About 990 tons teakwood at £6 5s. per ton	...	6	18 10 0
.. 5 tons guano, price not named, say
£4 15s. per ton	23	15 0

from which to get at the average, an estimate for the outward freight value of the coals will probably have to be deducted to ascertain the amount that the cargo will be liable for on the homeward voyage ; the quantity of coals we do not know, but it can be obtained from the charterers, Messrs. Findlay and Co. Your obedient servants,
C. AND R. POILLON.

On 26th Sept. the shipowners again wrote to Baring Brothers and Co., sending further information as to the ship's voyages and cargoes, and again asking for an average statement. On 13th Oct. Messrs. Baring Brothers and Co. replied to the letter of the 21st Sept. informing the shipowners of their terms as to bottomry bonds ; promising the average statement as soon as they knew the amount of the bond, and saying that they would place the shipowners on the footing described (as to the terms of payment) if the bond was taken up, but if the bond was enforced the maritime premium would also be enforced.

No correspondence passed between Baring Brothers and Co. and the defendants.

On 27th Jan. 1871 Messrs. Poillon wrote to the master at London as follows :—

C. AND R. POILLON,
Shipbuilders, Shipwrights, Caulkers, and Spar Makers,
224, South Street, New York,
6th Jan. 1871.

Captain Jas. H. Hewitt, London.

Dear Sir,—We have received your letters from Mauritius, and we have also received the letter from Messrs. Houdlette and Co., and after full examination have concluded not to take up the bottomry bond on the ship Onward, and we have so informed Messrs. Baring Brothers and Co. Will you communicate by telegraph to us yourself immediately on the arrival of the ship at port of discharge and oblige your obedient servants,
C. AND R. POILLON.

They also wrote under the same date to Messrs. Baring Brothers and Co. to the same effect. At the end of Jan. 1871 the Onward arrived in Liverpool, and, the master having no funds to take up his bill, the ship was arrested in this suit ; the freight was paid into court, and the ship afterwards sold. The master and crew also instituted suits of wages against the vessel, and the proceeds of the sale of the ship and her freight were insufficient to satisfy the bond.

Nov. 29 and 30, Dec. 7 and 9, 1872.—Milward, Q.C. and Clarkson (Butt, Q.C. with them), for the plaintiffs.—First, as to the defence set up of want of communication, we submit that there was no necessity for communication, and, even if there were, that the communication made was sufficient. The English rule as to communication differs from the law of all foreign European states, and also from American law. In The Bonaparte (8 Moore P. C. C. 459) it was held that where a cargo belongs to a single individual known to the master, communication ought to be made to the owner of cargo before taking up a bottomry bond on the cargo, if it is reasonable to expect that the master might obtain an answer within a time not inconvenient with reference to the circumstances of the case, and that where the ship is in a port of a country near to that in which the owner of cargo resides, such communication ought to be made. Now Mauritius and Great Britain are not near, and it required two months at least to get an answer to a communication by letter, and as the master hoped to get away before that time he was not bound to communicate. But independently of this, there was sufficient communication. Houdlette and Co. wrote to the owners of cargo by the first mail after the ship put into Port Louis, and again by the mail of 23rd Sept., informing the owners of cargo that the ship was in distress. The first letter gave them sufficient information for them to conclude that it would be necessary to have recourse to bottomry. The communication was as explicit as that made in The Bonaparte (ubi sup.). The letter of 22nd July 1860 from the owners of cargo to their agents shows that at that time they contemplated that the necessity for bottomry might arise, and they were à fortiori bound to conclude on receiving the letter of 30th June 1870 from the Mauritius that bottomry was necessary. Houdlette and Co. communicated not only with the defendants, but with the shippers at Moulmein. If the defendants objected to bottomry they ought to have telegraphed to the master at Port Louis. In fact, if they had written by the mail leaving England on 5th Aug., they might have stopped the bond. On 8th Sept. they received copies of the letters from the master and agents to the owner in New York announcing the intention to bottomry, and even then they might have communicated with the Mauritius by telegraphing before 18th Sept. in time to catch the mail leaving Aden on that date, which reached the Mauritius on 1st Oct before the bond was given. Moreover, the defendants were aware that Baring Brothers and Co. were the shipowners' agents, and they could have communicated with them, but did not do so. The defendants, knowing the facts, did nothing, but held their hands. This must be taken as a consent that the master should do as he saw fit for the benefit of all concerned : (The Bonaparte, ubi sup.) The defendants declined or neglected to take means for the protection of their interests, and so admitted the sufficiency of the communication within the authority of that decision. The principles as to the duty of communication are laid down in the following cases:—

Secondly, as to the defence that reasonable and proper time did not elapse after the bond was advertised. The advertisement appeared in a proper way, and the bond was sold to the lowest bidder. Moreover, the bond was not given till the last moment, so that if remittances had been received from the owners it would not have been given. Thirdly, as to the plea that the bills were paid by the plaintiffs—that is—that the bond was void on payment by Baring of their own acceptance. It cannot be contended that the plaintiff's qualified acceptance of the master's drafts was an acceptance in a mercantile sense. The real agreement was that the bond was to be void, if the shipowners put money into the plaintiffs' hands to meet the bills. This appears from the letter of the agents to the shipowners of 1st July 1870. This was not done, and therefore the bond must be enforced. The bill was duly presented within the meaning of the agreement. Where the parties upon whom the duty of providing funds to meet a bill devolves refuse to supply the necessary money, presentation in the strict sense is not necessary for the purpose of obtaining the right to enforce a bottomry bond : (The Staffordshire, ante, p. 365 ; L. Rep. 4 P. C. 194 ; 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 46. It is no objection to a bottomry bond that it was given as collateral security to bills of exchange.

Stainbank v. Shepard, 13 C. B. 418. 443 ;
The Emancipation, 1 W. Rob. 124.

The offer made to release the owners from the maritime premium on payment of the bills of exchange is a meritorious act, and deserving of the consideration of the court. The owners of cargo if they are compelled to pay this bond will not ultimately suffer, as they can recover over against the shipowners.

Benson v. Duncan, 3 Ex. 644 ; 18 L. J. 169, Ex.

Benjamin, Q.C. and Cohen, for the defendants.— Before the ship was discharged, before knowing what the repairs would cost, before an attempt was made to raise money on the credit of the shipowners, Houdlette and Co. secured to themselves the right of disbursing for the repairs, and stipulated a bottomry bond on the defendants' cargo as security. There was not even an attempt to raise money on the security of ship and freight alone. Houdlette and Co. knew the position of Messrs. Poillon, as shown by their letters. The master never communicated with the defendants, but with his owners alone. By the mail leaving Mauritius on 1st July Houdlette and Co. wrote both to the shipowners and to the defendants, and although in the letter to the former they mentioned bottomry, in the letter to the latter no mention of it is made. In effect the letter to the defendants says that there is nothing to communicate with regard to the cargo. The letter indicates that the ship will be gone in two months, and practically tells the defendants not to write, as they will get further particulars by the next mail, and requests them to wait for full information. No reason is suggested for not giving the information, although they are challenged to do so by our answer (par. 5). The letter was not calculated to cause any disquietude to the defendants as they knew that Poillons were rich, and that the plaintiffs were their agents, and the defendants might reasonably expect that funds would be provided by them. The cargo was put completely into the hands of Houdlette and Co. by the master and shipowners. If there had been any one at the Mauritius authorized to draw, the money would have been forthcoming on the shipowners' personal credit. A communication with owners should be made before spending money; it is no good to communicate after the res is bound. Houdlette and Co. did not write again for two mails, and then again said that there was nothing of importance to communicate, and said nothing about bottomry. The first communication from them as to bottomry is on the 19th Oct. 1870. The advertisement as to the auction of the bond was issued on the same day as the sale. This shows that the putting the bond up to auction was only a pretence, whereas an arrangement had been made months before that Houdlette and Co. were to take the bond as security to bills of exchange. This was the first public attempt to raise money, and proves our answer (par. 6). Nobody in the Mauritius could have known that there was to be a bottomry bond, and all the repairs had already been done on Houdlette and Co.'s credit. A communication by telegraph would have reached the defendants in the middle of July, and this was within the master's knowledge. The first communication as to bottomry was by the shipowners' letter reaching the defendants on 8th Sept., and then the shipowners say nothing about what they are going to do, but that they will communicate further, which they did not. The shipowners did not intimate that they would not meet the bills, and no request was made to the defendants to take care of their own cargo. The defendants could only suppose that the shipowners being rich would take up the bills on Barings. Especially in view of The Bonaparte (ubi sup.) we submit that in no letter to the defendants from the owners of the ship, their master, or agents, was the defendants' advice asked as to what was to be done; nor was any intimation given that their help was needed; and it was not until Jan. 1876 that the shipowners determined that they would not pay. At that time there was every reason to expect that the bills would be taken up, and that the bottomry bond would not be enforced. Even if the defendants had telegraphed after hearing on 8th Sept. 1870 of the proposal to bottomry, the telegram would have arrived before the bond was signed, but not before the bargain to give it had been made; it was this bargain that bound our cargo, and at that time the ship was reloaded. Moreover, the defendants had reason to believe that on 17th Sept., the date of the next mail leaving Aden, the vessel had left Port Louis, as the letters said she would be gone in two months from 1st July. The plaintiffs contend, that on the authority of The Bonaparte (ubi sup.) their communication was sufficient. In that case, however, the owners of cargo had a letter three months before the bond was given, requesting advice from them, and they gave no answer, but left the cargo to be dealt with by those in charge of it. In The Lord Cochrane 2 W. Rob. 320-333 it was found as a fact that the shippers were aware of the transactions as to bottomry, but chose not to interfere; and that the shippers' indifference was a virtual acquiescence in the master's proceedings; but Dr. Lushington said: "The shippers, it is to be noticed, were resident on the spot; and it is perfectly true that if they had been kept in ignorance of the intended bottomry transaction, that it would have been a strong argument against the bona fides of the master, that he had not put himself into communication with them." Then how much stronger is the inference against the bona fides of this transaction, where the agents put themselves into communication with the owners of cargo but said nothing about bottomry, whilst they spoke of it to the shipowners. An owner is entitled to receive notice of the intention to bottomry, in order to enable him to raise money for the purpose of rescuing his vessel or cargo from its difficulties at a smaller amount of premium than the maritime premium would necessarily entail: (The Panama, L. Rep. 3 P. C. 199, 203; 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 12; 3 Mar. Law. Cas. O. S. 461, 463). The intention to hypothecate must be made known, not merely the delay. Such is the communication required, whilst here the defendants were led to suppose that there would be no need to bind the cargo. As to the defendants having refused to make advances at Bombay, they then supposed Trask was the shipowner, and his credit was not good. On the defendants refusing, Poillons, who were then owners, send through Barings the necessary money, and so inform the defendants. The defendants had, therefore, good reason in the succeeding year to suppose that the letters were merely intended to give information about the cargo, and that the shipowners would advance the necessary funds. The master of a ship is the chosen agent of the shipowner, but he is not the agent of the owner of cargo, except where necessity compels him to deal with it; his authority with regard to the cargo is strictly limited by the necessity which gives rise to the exercise of that authority: (The Gratitude, 3 C. Rob. 250.) In the absence of the owners, the master must deal for each owner as if he were present. The master cannot deal with the ship or cargo to the detriment of the other. He should ask himself what the owner of cargo would do if present to act for himself. Before any disbursements were made, this cargo was discharged. There were vessels ready to carry it on at a low rate of freight. If the master had let the defendants know that he required assistance to earn his freight, the first inquiry the defendants would have made would have been as to the value of the ship after repairs. This the master was bound to do as their agent, but no such estimate was ever made, and the master, therefore, did not act as an honest agent of the cargo. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The practice in these cases seems to be that where surveys are made it is not usual to estimate the value after repairs; but it seems reasonable that they should ascertain whether that which they are going to repair is worth the expenditure.] That is the principle where a claim is made under a policy of insurance in the case of a constructive total loss. The master was bound to ascertain what the vessel after repairs would have sold for in Port Louis. It was alleged that after repairs she was a better ship than when the master took her; in fact they made her practically a new ship, and that without any knowledge of her ultimate value. There was no necessity for dealing with the cargo without orders. The cargo was imperishable, and was in safety and discharged at Port Louis. There was, therefore, an absence of the necessity which creates a master's authority. The master might have transhipped or left the cargo; it was not for the interest of the defendants to hypothecate it. The law requires communication in order that the owner may determine what he will do with his cargo, and that he may not be in the hands of an agent appointed by necessity. If the defendants had had the opportunity of communicating, and had forbidden bottomry, the master's authority would have been taken away and his agency destroyed; but here the bargain was made under his pretended agency two months before the bond was signed. A master has no right to incur expense on the cargo owners' credit except he cannot communicate. Although bottomry bonds on ship and freight may be encouraged, bonds on cargo should be carefully watched, as they are usually given not so much for the benefit of the owners of cargo as for the benefit of the shipowners, more especially where the money is advanced by the agents of the ships: (The Hero, 2 Dods. Adm. Rep. 139.) Bottomry bonds given under the law of foreign countries stand on a different footing from bonds given under English law, but the law of the United States as to these bonds is the same as English law.

Parsons on Shipping, pp. 143, 144, n.;
The William and Emmeline, Blatchford & Howland's Adm. Rep. 66, 71

Then as to the bills of exchange. The arrangement for taking up the bond was made exclusively for the benefit of the shipowners. We submit that no bond on ship, freight, and cargo can be valid where a secret benefit is reserved for the shipowners which is not also allowed to the owners of cargo. The shipowners were to be relieved from the maritime premium on prompt payment of the bills of exchange, but no such offer was made to the defendants. The bills were charged by the plaintiffs to the account of "Ship Onward and owners," and not to the ship, cargo, and owners. By the terms of the bills they were to be placed to the credit of the ship and owners. By law the master cannot make any agreement in which there is any difference as to the terms of reimbursement between the owners of ship and cargo. Being agent of both, he is bound to stipulate for the same benefit to both. By their letter of credit the plaintiffs intended the benefit to be applied to both sets of owners. The bond is therefore void as against the cargo. Moreover, the plaintiffs were under no obligation to accept the master's drafts, having no funds in their hands for the purpose. They did honour them, and the drawer is, therefore, discharged. This release of the master and shipowners releases the owners of cargo. The owners of cargo were only sureties for the shipowners for the repayment of the amount of the repairs, as argued for the plaintiffs, and can recover over against the shipowners. Now by the Mercantile Law Amendment Act 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 97), sect. 5, a surety who discharges his principal's liability is entitled to have assigned to him all the securities held by the creditor, and to sue the principal in the name of the creditor. Before the date of accepting the bills the plaintiffs had been informed that the shipowners reserved to themselves the option of taking up the bills or not, and yet the plaintiffs chose to accept, and so paid the bill and discharged the bond. Again, the bills were never presented. Before a bond given as collateral security to bills of exchange can be enforced, there must be proof of presentation: (The Staffordshire, ante, p. 365; L. Rep. 4 P. C. 194; 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 46). The defendants, if they had paid this debt, would have been entitled to the bills of exchange. If the plaintiffs had protested the bills of exchange instead of discharging the drawer by accepting them, the drawer would still be responsible. As it is, the master has a claim against the ship for his wages which takes precedence over the bond: (The Daring, L. Rep. 2 Adm. & Ecc. 260). He is discharged from his bill, and can now come upon the ship for an amount which the defendants' cargo, if the bond is enforced, will have to supply towards the payment of the bond. The plaintiffs have thus destroyed one of the sureties to which we should have been entitled if they had protested that bill. The creditor who releases any of the securities which he holds for the payment of his claim, without the consent of another surety, releases that surety.

Milward, Q.C. in reply.—The plaintiffs are charged with fraud, but their mercantile position is sufficient to rebut any such presumption; moreover, the fact that any communication was made at all is inconsistent with such a charge. Then, first, was any communication necessary? Considering the difficulty of sending to Aden by telegraph, there was no necessity: (The Australasian Steamship Co. v. Morse, ante, p. 407; L. Rep. 4 P. C. 222; 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 357). Secondly, did the master or agents communicate sufficiently? There was no necessity to communicate the intention to bottomry in express terms; it was not done in The Bonaparte (ubi sup.), and yet the bond was there upheld. The defendants were not entitled to stand by and do nothing; they should have acted on the communication. The letter of 30th June mentions probable expenses, and where was the money to come from except from bottomry. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE: The letter to the defendants stops short at a particular point. Mr. Benjamin contends that it is a singular thing that the same information was not given to the owners of ship and of cargo.] Unless there was fraud, this conduct avails nothing. They then must have known of the intention to bottomry, and if the first letter was not answered the others would not have been. If there was no fraud, the communication was ample. Moreover, however strong these arguments press against the shipowners, they cannot affect the innocent holders of the bond. The Panama (ubi sup.) carries the law as to communication no farther than The Bonaparte (ubi sup.). It does not touch the question whether notice of the condition of the vessel is sufficient. In The Lord Cochrane (ubi sup.) Dr. Lushington said: "It appears, however, that only one or two of these individuals, and those possessing the slightest degree of interest, in any way interfered or took any share in the matter. In my opinion, this indifference was a virtual acquiescence in the master's proceedings, and is much the same thing as if a communication had taken place between the master and themselves, and their answer had been 'we will have nothing to do with the matter; you must act according to your own discretion.'" In the same way the defendants practically said in this case the same thing. As to transshipment, if the defendants had transhipped they would have been compelled to pay full freight to the shipowners, as well as freight home for another vessel, whereas if they had taken up the bills they would have paid only 2½ per cent. interest, and could have recovered over from the shipowners. The defendants were not bound to transship, but they were at least bound to write and stop the bottomry of the cargo. As they did nothing the master had authority to bottomry. The defendants were aware of the terms upon which the bond was given, and could have advanced funds to take up the bills. The master had no funds in the plaintiffs' hands, and, therefore, their conditional acceptance did not discharge him. The master cannot recover his wages in priority to the bond, as he himself is personally bound by it. They can sue the master on the bond, a better security than his bills.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 28, 1873.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is a case of bottomry instituted on behalf of Messrs. Baring Brothers, the legal holders of a bottomry bond on the ship Onward, her freight, and cargo, against the owners of the cargo, Messrs. Findlay and Co., of Glasgow. The Onward is a large ship of 933 tons belonging to the United States of North America, and whilst on a voyage from Moulmein to Queenstown or Falmouth for orders, and from thence to a port of discharge in the United Kingdom or on the Continent between Bordeaux and Hamburg, both ports inclusive, laden with a cargo of teak timber, was compelled to put into Port Louis, in the island of Mauritius, in order to repair and refit. The plaintiffs allege that the master of the Onward was without funds or credit at that port, and was compelled to raise, for the purpose of repairs and necessary disbursements, a sum of 24,369 dollars and 69 centimes, being 5130l. 9s. 3d.; and it appears in the amended pleading that this bond was given as collateral security for a bill of exchange drawn for the same amount on Messrs. Baring Brothers and Co. The Onward arrived in London on the 7th Feb. 1871. The ship was sold by order of the court; the proceeds of the sale and the freight were paid into court. By a decree of the 9th May 1871 the court pronounced for the validity of the bond as far as regarded the ship and freight, and condemned the proceeds of them as the amount due on the bond. From a memorandum supplied to me from the registry, it appears that the vessel was appraised on the 11th April at 2000l.; she was offered for sale on the 19th April 1871, but no bid could be obtained; she was again appraised on 23rd April at 1700l. and sold on 26th April 1871 for 1870l.; the market for ships was in a very depressed state at that time. The statement of account of the proceeds of sale, of the payments thereout, and of the claims thereon, is as follows:—

In respect of the two claims marked thus (*) the bondholders have been given a prior lien on the proceeds by order of the court. It is said that the master's claim amounts to 1200*l.*, and the result will be that nearly the whole amount of the bond, if valid, will have to be paid by the owners of the cargo. The defendants, the owners of the cargo, contend that the bond is invalid, as relates to the cargo, on various grounds which may be classed as follows: (1) that the bond was given as collateral security for the payment of the bill of exchange, which bill was accepted and paid, or if not accepted and paid was not duly presented, or if presented and dishonoured the said bill was not protested, and due notice of the dishonour of the said bill was not given to the drawer or to the defendants; (2) that the bond was entered into with undue haste, and before it was ascertained that the money could not be raised upon the credit of the owners of the ship; (3) that the bond was given on the cargo without due communication—that is practically without communication—to the owners of the cargo; (4) that if the communication made to the owners of the cargo was sufficient, the bond was given before sufficient time had elapsed to enable the owners of the cargo to send their answer; lastly, that all the facts disclose that from first to last there was a fraudulent intention of throwing upon the owners of the cargo the obligation which ought to have been borne by the owners of the ship; and that for one, or several, or all these reasons, the owners of the cargo ought to be dismissed from this suit. I will endeavour first to state the facts, admitted or proved, and then to state what I conceive to be the law in relation to them, and to the positions which I have adverted to as being set up in defence. First as to the facts: It appears that on the 5th Sept. 1868, Messrs. Poillon became the owners of the ship, and announced that fact on 5th Aug. 1869 to Messrs. Findlay and Co., the defendants. Messrs. Poillon dwelt at New York. The charter-party was dated the 6th Jan. 1868. Messrs. Findlay and Co., the owners of the cargo, are merchants at Glasgow, and have a house or agents of the same name at Moulmein, and the Onward set sail from Moulmein on 1st April 1870 (it is not necessary to go into the earlier history of the vessel) with a cargo of teak put on board by the Findlays' house at Moulmein for Calcutta, but bad weather and considerable damage consequent thereupon compelled the ship to put into the Mauritius on the 11th June. On the 13th she was towed into harbour. On the 14th or 15th surveyors recommended the captain to discharge the cargo. On the 17th the discharge began; on the 29th the captain wrote a letter to his owners (Messrs. Poillon) at New York, in which he set forth the misfortunes which had befallen the ship, and added that on 31st May, "after a consultation with the officers and crew, it was found expedient, for the benefit of all concerned to deviate from the proper course of the voyage and seek this, our nearest port, for repairs." It then set out what had taken place on the 13th, 15th, 16th, and 17th June, and continued: [His Lordship then read the remainder of the letter of the master to the shipowners of 29th June 1870, before set out.] On the same 29th June Messrs. Houdlette and Co. wrote to the Findlays' house at Moulmein as follows: [His Lordship then read the letter of 29th June 1870 from Houdlette and Co. to Messrs. Tod, Findlay, and Co., Moulmein, before set out]; and on the 30th June Messrs. Houdlette and Co. wrote to the Findlays at Glasgow pretty much to the same effect. It was as follows: [His Lordship then read the first part of the letter of 30th June 1870 from Houdlette and Co., to T. D. Findlay, Esq., Glasgow, before set out.] The letter is pretty much the same as the other, and ends in this way: "We think that she will be detained here about two months longer to finish discharging, make the necessary repairs and reload, and her expenses here will amount to about 4000*l.*"; and then follows these words: "By next opportunity we shall be able to give you more particulars, and in the mean time remain, &c." On the 1st July, that is the day after, and practically by the same post, I suppose, Messrs. Houdlette and Co. wrote to Messrs. Poillon as follows: [His Lordship then read the letter of 1st July 1870 from Houdlette and Co. to Messrs. C. and R. Poillon, New York, before set out, down to the words "four thousand pounds sterling" inclusive.] What follows it will be seen was not inserted in the letter to Messrs. Findlay, of Glasgow, on the 30th June; "and for the purpose of procuring funds for the payment of these repairs we have proposed"—these words deserve attention—"to Captain Hewitt to take his draft on Messrs. Baring Brothers and Co., of London, drawn at 90 days' sight, at 5 per cent. discount, with a bottomry bond on ship, cargo, and freight as collateral security, with the understanding that the bond shall be null and void provided the draft be accepted, and should you approve of this proposal you will please place it in the hands of Messrs. Baring Brothers & Co. sufficient funds to meet the draft on presentation, &c." [His Lordship read the letter to the end, as before set out.] It may be observed here that the first mail for Glasgow left the Mauritius on the 1st July, and would arrive at Glasgow about the 30th July, so that in fact the letter of 30th June to Messrs. Findlay at Glasgow, and that to Messrs. Poillon on the 1st July left the Mauritius on the same day. On the 25th Aug. Messrs. Poillon wrote to Messrs. Findlay, of Glasgow, as follows: [His Lordship then read the letter of 25th Aug. from Messrs. C. and R. Poillon to Messrs. T. D. Findlay and Co., of Glasgow, before set out.] The inclosures referred to were the letters of 29th June and 1st July from Houdlette and Co. to Poillon and Co. at New York, and from the master to Messrs. Poillon and Co. That letter of the 25th Aug. would be delivered at Glasgow on the 8th Sept. By the inclosures Findlay was, for the first time, apprized that it had been proposed to the master to take a bottomry bond affecting the cargo—this being recited in the passage of the letter which was omitted in the letter of 30th June from Houdlette and Co. to Findlay, the post could have brought no answer from Glasgow to the Mauritius which could arrive before the 3rd Nov.—the communication by telegraph would, if no obstacle had occurred, have occupied from twelve to fourteen days—that is, ten or fourteen hours by telegraph to Aden, and ten to thirteen days by mail steamer to the Mauritius. The Onward sailed from the Mauritius on the 15th Oct. Two mails elapsed before Houdlette and Co. wrote again to Findlay at Glasgow. On the 18th Sept. they sent the following letter:—"Dear Sir,—Since writing you on the 30th June"—there is all that interval—"the Onward has come out of dock," &c. (see the letter of 18th Sept. from Houdlette and Co. to T. D. Findlay, Esq., Glasgow, before set out), and the letter ends as follows: "with nothing of importance to add, we remain, &c." (as before set out). They wrote to the same effect to the Findlays at Moulmein on the same 18th Sept. There is no mention in this letter of any intention to bottomry the cargo. On the 19th Oct. they wrote the following letter to Findlays at Glasgow and Findlays at Moulmein. [His Lordship then read the letter of 19th Oct. 1870 from Houdlette and Co. to T. D. Findlay, Esq., Glasgow, before set out]; and in this letter, for the first time, the Findlays were apprized by Houdlette and Co. that their cargo had been bottomried, though even then as a collateral security to the draft on Messrs. Baring—the ship having sailed, as I have already stated on the 15th Oct. No intimation was conveyed either in this letter or in that of 1st July, inclosed in that of 25th Aug., that the Poillons had not placed (as it had been suggested by Houdlette and Co. in the letter of 1st July) in the hands of Messrs. Baring Brothers and Co. sufficient funds to meet the draft on presentation: and indeed they had not made up their minds not to do so until the 6th Jan. 1871. In their letter to Messrs. Baring from New York, of the 21st Sept., they say: We are not desirous of advancing the money spent at Mauritius, unless by so doing we can make a saving, and for that reason would thank you on receipt of the documents, and before you accept or pay the bond, to get your average-stater to make a rough estimate that will show how much the ship will have to pay after deducting from the total amount due under the bond (if promptly paid) such sums as the cargo and underwriters on freight will have to pay, and telegraph the result to us by cable; and we would like the amount also due from the ship classified so as to show how much the underwriters on vessels would have to pay, and how much would fall on the owners; with these two items before us, we can determine whether or not it would be desirable to advance the money, or let the vessel be sold to pay the bond." And on the 6th Jan. they wrote as follows: [His Lordship then read the letter of 6th Jan. 1871 from C. and R. Poillon to Capt. James H. Hewitt, London, set out in the pleadings.] It was admitted by the counsel for the bondholders that the conduct of Messrs. Poillon in this matter was very reprehensible, but it was at the same time contended that with this conduct the bondholder had no concern, and ought not to suffer on account of it. To these facts I will now endeavour to apply the law. And first as to the objection to the validity of the bond on the ground that it was a collateral security only to the bill of exchange, which had not been presented or protested. In support of this proposition the case of The Staffordshire (ubi sup.), recently decided by the Privy Council, was cited. I have considered that case, and I am of opinion that it does not warrant the conclusion sought to be derived from it. The bond in this case was to be cancelled, as the evidence shows, on the prompt payment of the bill—and, otherwise, to be enforced—there was no prompt payment. The Poillons never provided the Messrs. Baring with the requisite funds; the bills came home and were in fact duly presented—they were not protested because the drawer, the captain, had no money in the hands of Messrs. Baring, and no notice of dishonour was necessary, therefore, to be given. In the case of Stainbank v. Shepard (ubi sup.), decided by the Exchequer Chamber in 1853, the judges, referring to the cases in Admiralty Court, say: "We must not be supposed to intimate a doubt that a bottomry bond may not be given at the same time with and as a collateral security for bills of exchange drawn on the owner." It was argued that the Messrs. Baring took up these bills, but the evidence of Mr. Theobald with respect to their mode of transacting business of this kind satisfies me that this statement was incorrect. Upon the whole, I am clear that the bottomry bond is not invalid upon the ground that the bills of exchange have not been presented or protested. According to the law the master is always the agent for the ship, and in special cases of necessity the agent for the cargo also. He is the appointed agent of the former, the involuntary agent of the latter. From these principles of jurisprudence two important consequences flow. First, that when the circumstances permit the master must communicate with the owner before he does any act which seriously affects the value of the ship in the one case, or of the cargo in the other. This is a doctrine at which the English court have slowly but steadily arrived. That communication was necessary in the circumstances of this case, I have no doubt whatever, notwithstanding the argument to the contrary which has been addressed to me. The cargo was timber, not of a perishable character; it belonged to one firm. The owner might well have thought it for his interest to advance the requisite funds for the repairs, or to pay the full freight and to embark it in another vessel; the rate of freight for such timber was low at the Mauritius. As it is, he will if the bond be pronounced for, when demands having claims of priority have been satisfied, have to pay nearly, if not the whole, sum of 5130*l.*, his liability for freight being 2338*l.* It has been said that he is not really injured, for by another action in another court he may recover from the shipowner what he now pays to the bondholder. This operation, however, is not unattended with expense and delay where the shipowner is solvent and dwells in this country; but in the present case, though there be no reason to doubt his solvency, he is domiciled at New York, and I cannot discover that the doctrine of the English decision in Duncan v. Benson (ubi sup.) has ever been judicially recognized in that country. A communication was, therefore, in my opinion indispensable in the circumstances of the case to the validity of a bottomry bond on the cargo. It has been argued, however, that a communication, though not necessary, was in fact made, and this is the next point to consider. Connected with this consideration is the allegation that Findlay was negligent, that he chose to fold his hands and do nothing. It does not seem to me that he was negligent. The master, his agent from the necessity of the case, never wrote to him at all. The agent of the ship wrote indeed on the 1st July to the owner of the cargo, suppressing in the letter the fact that he urged a bottomry bond on the cargo, which he revealed to the owner of the ship. The letter of the 25th Aug. from Poillon, which the defendant received on the 8th Sept., contained the first intimation of the bottomry bond, and then Findlay was informed that the ship would probably be detained only two months, dating from the 1st July. As it happened, by the use of telegraph and mail a message might have arrived before the vessel sailed on the 15th Oct. But even this was matter of uncertainty, and if such message had arrived, the bond, though not literally signed, had been determined upon, and a bargain made upon the faith that it would be duly executed. It is not impertinent to the question of sufficiency of communication to remember that in this peculiar class of cases, in which the interest of absent principals may be so seriously affected, the law has considered that the lender, as well as the borrower, has some duty to discharge. He is bound to make a reasonable inquiry as to the necessity which authorizes the master to hypothecate. Now the lenders in this case, Houdlette and Co., were the agents of the ship. "They represented me," the master said, when asked if the repairs were not done on their credit: and it appears to me from the correspondence to which I have already adverted that, from a very early period, before the cargo was fully discharged, before the expenses necessitated by the repairs were accurately known, before an attempt had been made to raise funds on the personal credit of the owners of the ship—whom they knew to be affluent merchants at New York—before any attempt had been made to raise money on the ship and freight, Houdlette and Co. suggested to the master, and advised him to give a bottomry bond on the cargo as well as on the ship and freight as a collateral security, indeed, to his draft on Messrs. Baring and Co. And here I must observe that the name of this great and much esteemed commercial firm, the present bondholders, was put before me as if of itself an argument against any want of bona fides in this transaction, but I am of opinion that I must consider this case as if Messrs. Houdlette and Co. were still the holders of the bond which has been transferred to Messrs. Baring. Whatever legal infirmities were incident to the instrument while possessed by the former belong to it in the hands of the present owners. Not only did Messrs. Houdlette and Co., as has been already observed, omit in their letter to the owners of the cargo the passage as to the bottomry bond inserted in their letter to the owners of the ship, but they state that "by next opportunity we shall be able to give further particulars"; that is, they suggest that Findlay should wait before he answers their letter. Findlay says in effect that this letter did not raise any alarm as to a bottomry bond on the cargo and accordingly Mr. Findlay says in his evidence: "We did not answer, as we expected to receive further information as to the position of the ship by the following mail. We received no further letters for the next two mails." They did not answer the letter of the 25th Aug. because they had no time—he says—to write to the Mauritius; and writing to New York would have been of no avail to stop the proceedings at the Mauritius. Moreover, he assumed that Poillon would pay the money into the hands of Messrs. Baring, because he knew that Poillon was a rich man. Indeed, Poillon's letter of the 6th Jan. 1871 shows that it was not from want of means that he refused to pay the money. As to Houdlette and Co., they allow two posts to go out without further communication to Findlay. On the 18th Sept. they write that the vessel "has been thoroughly repaired," and they say they have "nothing of importance to add." They are still silent as to the bottomry bond. On the 19th Oct. after the ship had gone to sea—which she did on the 15th Oct.—they make the first communication from the Mauritius to Findlay that the cargo had been bottomried. If a communication was necessary and a proper communication was not made, I do not think that the absence of it can be excused on the ground of the laches of the owner of the cargo. In the case of The Oriental (3 Moore P. C. C. 398) the owner of the ship resided at St. John's, New Brunswick; the ship was at New York when the necessity for repairs arose. New York was distant 600 miles from St. John's, and between the cities there was a communication by electric telegraph. The agent of Wallace at New York telegraphed to him that his ship had been ashore, was leaky, and was discharging her cargo; an answer came by telegraph acknowledging the receipt of the message, saying he should be glad to hear by telegraph when necessary. Three days after, the agent wrote by post a general description of the injuries sustained by the ship, that a survey was to be holden, and he would report what injury she had sustained, that the expenses would be considerable, but, as the cargo was valuable, would not fall so heavily on the ship; about a week after this the captain wrote to Wallace particulars of the damage, and about a week after that the agent wrote again to Wallace. In none of these communications was it directly said that a bottomry bond would be necessary; about the time of the last letter, however, the agent spoke to the captain about a bottomry bond, to which the captain at first objected, but afterwards agreed on the agent saying that he would write to Wallace. The captain made no communication to the owner as to the proposed bottomry bond. Some days after the agent wrote to Wallace by post to say that he had taken a bottomry bond, which he appears to have done three days before Wallace could have received the letter in due course of post. The owners of the ship and the cargo opposed the validity of the bond. Dr. Lushington (3 W. Rob. 243; 7 Notes of Cases, 476), however, pronounced for it, holding that the evidence established the necessity for it, and that the agent was not bound to have telegraphed before he took the bond. The Privy Council reversed this sentence on the ground that there had not been communication with Wallace, the owner. Sir John Jervis said: "There was not only the power of communication, but an absolute communication made. It was made, and properly made, at the moment of the accident, communicated and received within a few hours, and by a means of communication in existence, which must be taken to be the proper channel of communication; not to send money, as suggested, because the electric telegraph will not carry money, but to send a communication on the one hand and receive an answer on the other. Why, here being the means of communication, and the authority of the master being founded on the impossibility of a communication, their Lordships are of opinion that there was no authority in the master to raise money on bottomry." In the opinion of this appellate court, whose decisions are binding upon me, a mere statement of injuries done to the ship, and of the consequent necessity of repairs, which would entail considerable expense, unaccompanied by a statement that a bottomry bond must be had recourse to, was not a sufficient communication to the owners; the law did not require them, from these premises, to draw the conclusion that the ship and cargo must of necessity be bottomried." It may not require that the words "bottomry of cargo" should be used, but it requires that the fact itself should be stated, or at least that it should be an obvious and irresistible inference from the circumstances stated; the owner, as the Privy Council said in The Panama (L. Rep. 3 P. C. 204; 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 12; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 461), "should duly receive notice of the intention to raise money by bottomry." Now in the present case the circumstances relating to the state of the ship, recited in the communication to the owners of the cargo, were certainly not stronger—I should say they were less strong—than those which existed in the case of The Oriental. In both cases the owner was led to expect further communication, and, in the case before me, there is this further fact continually presenting itself, namely, that the necessity for the bottomry bond, stated by the lender in the communication to the owner of the ship, was suppressed in that which was made to the owner of the cargo, to whom the master never wrote at all. On the other hand the case of The Bonaparte (8 Moore P. C. C. 459, 477) was cited to establish the proposition that if owners of cargo had ample information of the disasters which had befallen the vessel there was a sufficient communication. But an examination of the communications made in that case to the owners enables me to reconcile the judgment in it with the preceding case of The Oriental. In that case the owners of the cargo were specially apprised of the injury done, not only to the ship but to the cargo; and, moreover, their advice was specially requested as to what in the circumstances it would be best to do; and it was holden that as they chose to pass by the whole matter in silence, and gave no instructions, which had been particularly and immediately requested, the communication was sufficient. In the case of The Lord Cochrane (2 W. Rob. 320, 333), decided in 1844 before the law as to the necessity of communication had been distinctly laid down, Dr. Lushington said: I now come to another point in the case which has been much commented upon, viz., the conduct of the master with reference to the shippers of the cargo. It has been said that it was the duty of the master, before he gave a bottomry bond upon the cargo in this case, to have communicated with the shippers in the first instance, and to have taken their directions; this observation, it is obvious, must be subject to great limitations under the circumstances of the case. The shippers, it is to be noticed, were resident on the spot; and it is perfectly true that if they had been kept in ignorance of the intended bottomry transaction, it would have been a strong argument against the bona fides of the master, that he had not put himself into communication with them. It is obvious, however, in the present instance, from the facts spoken to in the affidavits, that these shippers must have been cognizant of the transaction in question; and if they had deemed it expedient for their interests to interfere for the protection of the cargo, they had the opportunity, and were at perfect liberty so to do. It appears, however that only one or two of these individuals, and those possessing the slightest degree of interest, in any manner interfered or took any share in the matter. In my opinion this indifference was a virtual acquiescence in the master's proceedings, and is much the same thing as if a communication had taken place between the master and themselves, and their answer had been: 'we will have nothing to do with the matter, you must act according to your own discretion.'" Having regard to the principle upon which communication is required, and the authorities upon the subject, and applying them to the particular facts of this case, I am of opinion that the communication was insufficient, and did not satisfy the law, and here I might end my judgment, but I desire to say a few words upon the remaining question of law which arises in this case. The next consequence from the doctrine of agency is that the master must sustain to the best of his power the interests of the absent owner. This is a principle of general maritime law, and not like the former one of English law only. "Il est le représentant des chargeurs absents; il doit faire ce qu'ils feraient eux-mêmes s'ils étaient sur les lieux," Boulay-Paty observes (Cours de Droit Commercial Maritime, vol. 2, p. 404); that is, he must do that which there is fair reason to suppose the owner if present would do. "Il est donc," Emerigon says, "obligé de faire ce que feraient les chargeurs s'ils étaient présents" (Emerigon, par Boulay-Paty, vol. 1; Traité des Assurances, chap. 12, sect. 16, p. 423). The master is to remember the foundation of his authority to bottomry the cargo is the prospect of benefit, direct or indirect, to the proprietor of it. This principle limits the authority of the master in this matter; he may sell a part of the cargo, but not the whole. Why? Because the former act may be, the latter cannot be, for the benefit of the proprietor. The interests of which he is respectively guardian may be conflicting, and in this case he must do that which is best for the whole adventure; he must endeavour to accomplish the contract between the two parties, whom for the occasion he represents, for the common benefit of ship and cargo, and, therefore, as in the case of the sale of the cargo, he may not sell the whole cargo; so neither may he do that which is in effect the same—repair the ship at the sole expense of, and without reasonable possibility of benefit to, the cargo. "It is therefore true," Lord Stowell says, "that if the repairs of the ship produce no benefit or prospect of benefit to the cargo, the master cannot bond the cargo for such repairs": (The Gratitude, 3 C. Rob. 250 261.)

C. P.] LISHMAN AND OTHERS v. THE NORTHERN MARITIME INSURANCE CO. (LIMITED).

The prospect of benefit must be such as a man of ordinary prudence and knowledge of the subject would in the circumstances entertain. The master must endeavour to hold the balance evenly between his two principals; he must not sacrifice the ship to the cargo, or the cargo to the ship. In this case the outlay on the ship which the cargo is to pay was very great; the master is asked whether by the repairs she was "made as good a ship as she was at the outset"; he answers: "Better ship than she was the day I took her." I do not think upon the evidence before me that a reasonable and prudent owner, if present, would have allowed his cargo to be bottomried for such very extensive repairs. He would rather have paid the freight and transhipped the goods. I do not, however, decide the case on this ground alone; but having regard to the circumstances already mentioned, and to the fact that the agent of the ship, being also the lender, while he communicated to her owners the intention to take a bottomry bond affecting the cargo, omitted that fact in the contemporaneous letter which he wrote to the owner of the cargo, in which letter, telling him only of the disasters to the ship, he promised further information, which he himself never sent till the vessel had sailed, and which through no channel reached the owner of cargo till too late; I decide that there was not in this case such a communication to the owners of the cargo as the law in these circumstances would require. And I pronounce, therefore, against the validity of the bond, with costs.

LISHMAN AND OTHERS v. THE NORTHERN MARITIME INSURANCE COMPANY (LIMITED).

Marine Insurance—"Slip"—Policy—Concealment of facts material to the risk.

On the 11th March the plaintiffs, shipowners, agreed with the defendants, underwriters, for the insurance of freight, and a slip or proposal containing all the necessary terms for a complete insurance was drawn up without any question being asked as to the amount of insurance upon the hull of the vessel, and was accepted by the defendants on that day. On the 16th March the ship was lost, and the plaintiffs became aware of the loss on the 17th. They sent on that day to the defendants for a stamped policy, in pursuance of the terms of the slip, and then for the first time the defendants inquired to what amount the hull of the ship had been insured. The plaintiffs' clerk gave the required information, and a stamped policy, which, with the amount insured on the slip inserted in it as a warranty, was delivered to the plaintiffs. No communication was made by the plaintiffs to the defendants of the loss of the ship before or at the time of the delivery of the policy. The plaintiffs sued upon the policy, and at the trial the jury found that the risk was accepted by the defendants on the 11th March, and that it was not material to make known the loss to the defendants upon the 17th. Leave having been reserved to the defendants to move to enter a verdict for them, if the judge ought to have directed the jury as matter of law that the omission to communicate the loss on the 17th was a concealment of a material fact which avoided the policy:

Held that such omission was not a concealment of a material fact so as to avoid the policy:

Held, also, that the addition in the policy on the 17th of a term for the benefit of the underwriters, and not affecting the risk insured, did not prevent the policy from being one drawn up in respect of the risk accepted on the 11th March, and therefore the case was the same in principle with Cory v. Patton (ante p. 225; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 161; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 304.)

This was an action upon a policy of insurance upon freight, whereby the defendants became insurers to the plaintiffs at and from the Tyne to Argasteria in the sum of 400*l.* upon freight in respect of goods laden on board the ship Mayflower, in consideration of the payment of a premium of 65*s.* per cent. The first count of the declaration was upon the policy, and alleged the loss of the ship and goods during the continuance of the risk and the non-payment of the sum insured. The second count alleged that the defendants, in consideration of the premium, promised to execute a valid and binding policy of insurance upon the terms mentioned, and that before the execution of the policy the ship was lost and the plaintiff applied to the defendants to execute such a policy, but the defendants refused to do so, whereby the plaintiffs lost the 400*l.* agreed to be insured.

To this the defendants pleaded, inter alia, fourthly to the first count, that at the time of making and subscribing the said policy, and becoming such insurers as alleged, the plaintiffs and their agents misrepresented to the defendants a fact then material to be known to the defendants, and material to the risk of the said policy; fifthly, that at the time of the defendants making and subscribing the policy and becoming insurers the plaintiffs and their agents wrongfully concealed from the defendants a fact then known to the plaintiffs and their agents and unknown to the defendants and material to the risk of the said policy, that is to say that the said ship and goods had been and then were lost; tenthly, the defendants pleaded the fifth plea to the second count, which was abandoned at the trial.

The case came on for trial before Brett, J. and a special jury at the Liverpool Summer Assizes, 1872, when the following facts were proved:—The plaintiffs, trading under the name of John Hall and Co., were the owners of the ship Mayflower. That vessel on the 11th March 1871 left the Tyne on a voyage with cargo for Argasteria. On the same day the plaintiff Lishman, who resided in Newcastle, sent one of his clerks to the office of the defendants, also in Newcastle, to inquire as to the rate of insurance on freight. The clerk was then instructed to effect an insurance at the rate mentioned. He accordingly filled up at the defendants' office a proposal or slip in the following form:

Sailed.

This slip was handed by Robson, the plaintiffs' clerk, to the defendants' clerk, and at that time nothing more was said about the matter. When a slip is handed in as described, it is usual to make out and send the policy in accordance therewith in a few days. On 16th March the ship was lost off Harwich, and the same day a telegram arrived at the plaintiff's (Lishman's) office, announcing the loss. This telegram, however, was not opened by anyone until the morning of 17th March, when the plaintiff (Lishman) first learnt the loss. Lishman, after reading the telegram, sent Robson to the defendants' office to ask for the policy. Robson there saw Mr. Mitcalfe, the defendants' managing underwriter, and asked him for the policy. Mitcalfe said he would not give the policy until he knew what was insured upon the ship's hull. Robson thereupon returned to the plaintiff's office, and referred to the plaintiff's policy-book, and returning to the defendants' office, informed Mr. Mitcalfe that the ship's hull was insured for 2700*l.* Mitcalfe thereupon promised to send the policy, on freight in the ordinary form, but containing the words, "Hull warranted not insured for more than 2700*l.*" The plaintiff's (Lishman's) attention was called to this warranty inserted in the policy, and he sent a clerk (Alsopp) to the defendants' with the policy. Alsopp informed Mitcalfe that the plaintiff considered the insertion of such a clause unusual in a policy on freight, that the amount insured on the hull of the ship was practically 2700*l.*, as there was a policy on ship with the National Mutual Shipping Assurance Association of Teignmouth, which did not expire till 20th March, but that notice had been sent to the association that the policy would not be renewed. By the rules of that association it was provided "that the managers, unless they receive ten days' notice to the contrary, shall renew each policy on its expiration, except in cases where it may be deemed expedient not to renew the same, when the managers shall cause notice to be given to the owner." Notice had been given to the managers in writing about 20th Feb. 1871, not to renew the policy. On being informed of these facts, Mr. Mitcalfe consented to alter the policy by making the warranty read: "Hull warranted not insured for more than 2700*l.* after 20th March 1871." This alteration was made, and the policy was handed back to the plaintiff's clerk. It was admitted by the defendants at the trial, that on the 17th March a stamped policy was made out in accordance with the copy returned to the plaintiff's clerk, Alsopp, with the addition to the warranty in the copy, and that the defendants accepted the alteration in the policy. The learned judge thereupon allowed the defendants to add a plea of breach of warranty, as the defendants objected that the policy with the Teignmouth Association was a continuing policy unless notice was given to discontinue, and there was no evidence of notice. The learned judge directed the jury that the accepting of the slip by the defendants as given, was an intimation to the plaintiffs that they accepted the risk; that there was at that time no mention made of the warranty; if the Teignmouth Association policy expired on 20th March, then there was no breach of warranty, that if the defendants accepted the risk before 17th March, and the introduction of the warranty was a mere alteration in the policy, the fact of the loss need not have been communicated, but that if the risk was not accepted until after 17th March, the fact was material and ought to have been made known to the underwriters. The jury found that the warranty was complied with, that the risk was accepted on 11th March, and that the loss of the ship was not on 17th March a material fact necessary to be made known to the defendants. A verdict was entered for the plaintiffs with leave to move to enter a verdict for the defendants, on the ground that the judge ought to have directed the jury as a matter of law that the warranty was not complied with, and that the omission to communicate the loss on the 17th March was a concealment of a material fact which avoided the policy. A rule having been obtained.

Holker, Q.C. and Gainsford Bruce, for the plaintiffs, showed cause.—They contended that the case was governed by Cory v. Patton (ante, p. 225; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 161; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 304) and Ionides v. The Pacific Fire and Marine Insurance Company (ante, p. 330; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 738; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 517, in the Exchequer Chamber), and, therefore, the jury having found that the risk was accepted by the defendants on the 11th March, the slip which was drawn up at that time constituted a complete and final contract, binding upon them in honour and good faith, whatever event might subsequently happen, and that the plaintiffs were not bound to communicate to the defendants the fact of the loss of the vessel which subsequently became known to them.

Herschell, Q.C. and Crompton, for the defendants, sought to distinguish the case from those of Cory v. Patton and Ionides v. The Pacific Insurance Company. They admitted that notwithstanding 30 & 31 Vict. c. 23, ss. 7 and 9 (a), the real bargain between the assured and the underwriters took place when the slip was accepted. They argued, however, that in the present case negotiations were going on between the parties until the 17th March, and that there was no complete contract of insurance until that date, when the policy containing the added warranty as to the amount of insurance upon the hull was drawn up and delivered. The question was When was this contract of insurance made, and when did the defendants undertake to insure upon these terms? It could not be maintained that a contract, about which the parties were not at one until the 17th, was entered into on the 11th. And, further, the plaintiffs received a policy on which they could not have recovered, because the amount in which the ship was insured was incorrectly stated to be 2700*l.*, and this amount had afterwards to be altered. The defendants had a legal right to refuse to give the plaintiffs a stamped policy. They cited

(a) 30 & 31 Vict. c. 23, s. 7.—No contract or agreement for sea insurance (other than such insurance as is referred to in the 55th section of The Merchant Shipping Amendment Act 1862) shall be valid unless the same is expressed in a policy; and every policy shall specify the particular risk or adventure, the names of the subscribers and underwriters, and the sum or sums insured; and in case any of the above-mentioned particulars shall be omitted in any policy, such policy shall be null and void to all intents and purposes.

Sect. 9.—No policy shall be pleaded or given in evidence in any court, or admitted in any court to be good or available in law or in equity, unless duly stamped, &c.

Morrison v. The Universal Marine Insurance Company, 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 791; 42 L. J. 17, C. P.

Feb. 8.—The following judgments were delivered:

KEATING, J.—This was an action on a marine policy of insurance upon freight, and was tried before my brother Brett at the last Liverpool Summer Assizes, when a verdict was found for the plaintiffs for 400*l.* as upon a total loss of freight. It appeared that the plaintiffs, shipowners, being desirous of insuring the freight in question, on the 11th March 1871 sent to the defendants, who were underwriters at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, to inquire the terms of insurance, and ultimately an agreement was made at 65*s.* per cent., and a slip or proposal drawn up and accepted by the defendants at that rate. The slip contained all the necessary terms for a complete insurance at the above rate, and was drawn up without any question whatever being asked as to the amount of insurance upon the hull of the vessel. On the 16th March the ship was lost, and the plaintiffs knew of the loss on the 17th. They sent on that day to the defendants for a stamped policy in pursuance of the terms of the slip; and then, for the first time, the defendants required to know in what amount the hull of the ship had been insured. The plaintiffs had in fact effected insurances upon the ship amounting to 2700*l.*, and a further policy for 500*l.* with the National Mutual Shipping Assurance Association at Teignmouth, of which they were members, by which the insurance was to be for a year from the 20th March preceding, with renewal from year to year unless determined at the end of a year by notice from either party. Upon the requirement of the defendants' clerk, the plaintiffs' clerk gave the amount insured on ship at 2700*l.*, when the defendants inserted that amount as a warranty in what they stated to be a copy of the policy. The plaintiffs, however, sent it back in consequence of its not including the amount insured by the policy for 500*l.* on ship; and the words "after the 20th March" were added, and a stamped policy with that warranty given out. No communication was made by the plaintiffs to the defendants of the loss of the ship before or at the time of the delivery of the policy. Upon the policy the plaintiff sued; and the defences set up were a noncompliance with the above warranty, and, also, the concealment of a material fact, viz., the loss of the ship. At the conclusion of the plaintiff's case, the defendants objected that the warranty was not complied with, because the policy for the 500*l.* was a continuing policy beyond the 20th March unless notice to terminate it at that time were proved, and there was no evidence of such notice. They also objected that inasmuch as the real and only legal contract between the parties was the stamped policy of the 17th March declared on, and the loss having occurred on the 16th, and being known to the plaintiffs on the 17th the omission to communicate it on that day constituted the concealment of a material fact, and avoided the policy. The learned judge asked the jury whether the warranty was complied with, and they found it was; and in answer to other questions they found that the risk was accepted by the defendants on the 11th March, and that it was not material to make known the loss to the defendants upon the 17th. The verdict thereupon passed for the plaintiffs, with leave to the defendants to move to enter a verdict for them if the judge ought to have directed the jury as matter of law that the warranty was not complied with and that the omission to communicate the loss on the 17th was a concealment of a material fact which avoided the policy. A rule was obtained upon that ground, with the alternative of a new trial on the ground of misdirection on the part of the learned judge in not so directing the jury, and also that the verdict was against the weight of the evidence. That rule has been argued, and the questions raised were those insisted on at the trial. Mr. Herschell, for the defendants, argued, first, that the policy for the 500*l.* was a policy to continue beyond the 20th March unless notice was given; and, secondly, that there was no proof of notice. But it seems that according to the terms of the Teignmouth Mutual Shipping Insurance Association's rules, and the words of the statute, 30 & 31 Vict. c. 23, that policy was not a continuing policy, and that in this case no new effective policy could have been made on the 20th March, the ship having been lost before that day. This renders it unnecessary to consider whether the evidence to prove the notice would have been sufficient if such notice had been necessary. The great question argued was, however, whether there was a concealment of a material fact so as to avoid the policy, and we are of opinion that there was not. It was admitted by Mr. Herschell, in accordance with the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, in Cory v. Patton (ante, p. 225; 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 161; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 304), referring to Ionides v. Pacific Insurance Company (ante, p. 330; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 738; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 517), in the Exchequer Chamber—that, notwithstanding the provisions of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 23 ss. 7 and 9, the real bargain between the assured and the underwriters takes place when the slip containing the terms of the intended policy is accepted; and that, although such slip does not constitute a contract enforceable at law, yet it may be looked at for the purpose of discovering at what time the risk was undertaken by the underwriters, and that a material fact coming to the knowledge of the assured between the date of the slip and that of the policy need not be communicated. Admitting this, however, Mr. Herschell contended, with considerable force, that in this case the slip on the 11th March could not show the terms of the bargain, as a negotiation between the parties was going on up to the 17th, when the policy containing the added warranty was issued, which contained the only complete contract of insurance between the parties, and, therefore, the case was distinguishable from Ionides v. Pacific Insurance Company and Cory v. Patton. In my opinion, however, the jury having found as a fact that the risk was accepted by the underwriters on the 11th March, it cannot be said that the addition of a term for the benefit of the underwriters, and not affecting the risk, prevented the policy from being one drawn up in respect of the risk accepted on the 11th; therefore the case is the same in principle with that referred to, and the occurrence of the loss subsequently to the 11th, though before the issue of the stamped policy, did not render it incumbent on the plaintiff to communicate it, inasmuch as it could not affect the risk already accepted or the premium already agreed to and paid. I think, therefore, there was no misdirection on the part of the learned judge, and the evidence justified the verdict of the jury, and their answers to the questions put to them, and that the rule must be discharged.

GROVE, J.—I entirely agree with the judgment pronounced by my brother Keating and I have nothing to add.

BRETT, J.—I also entirely agree; and I will only add that when I allowed a plea to be added I did so upon the understanding that the question was to be left to the jury on the evidence as it then stood.

Crompton asked for leave to appeal if necessary upon the main point.

Holker, Q.C., suggested that the plaintiff should be at liberty to reply equitably to the added plea.

BEARD AND ANOTHER v. RHODES.

Charter-party—Demurrage—Meaning of the words "at the expiration of" and "a reasonable time after."

The declaration was for money due in respect of the demurrage of a ship. The defendant pleaded that the charter-party contained the following stipulation "that the said merchants (meaning the defendant) are to be allowed (a certain number) of clear working days for loading and discharging the said vessel each voyage, and in the event of that number being exceeded, a statement shall be furnished to the said merchants at the expiration of this charter, in which they shall be credited with the above number of clear working days for each voyage performed by the said vessel, and debited with those actually occupied in loading and discharging as aforesaid, and all the days so occupied in excess (if any) shall be paid for by the said merchants at the rate of 2*l.* per clear working day as demurrage," and that no statement was furnished to the defendant at the expiration of the said charter as required by the terms thereof. The plaintiffs replied "that a statement was furnished to the defendant in accordance with the said charter within a reasonable time in that behalf and before the commencement of this suit." To this replication the defendant demurred on the ground that the replication alleged a performance in terms other than those of the contract set out in the plea.

Held, that the replication was good, for that the words "at the expiration of" were synonymous with the words "a reasonable time after."

THIS was a demurrer to the plaintiff's replication. The declaration stated that the plaintiffs sued the defendant for money payable by him to them for the demurrage of a ship of the plaintiffs kept on demurrage by the defendant, and for money due on accounts stated.

The defendant pleaded, first, never indebted; secondly, that before action he satisfied and discharged the plaintiff's claim by payment; thirdly, to so much of the declaration as claimed money payable in respect of demurrage, that the said money so alleged to be payable was payable under and by virtue of certain charter-parties, by which a certain ship or vessel called the Susanna was hired out to the defendant from time to time for certain divers long periods, and was payable under and by virtue of the following stipulation only, and none others, that is to say: "And it is hereby further agreed that the said merchants (meaning the defendant) are to be allowed a certain number of clear working days for loading and discharging the said vessel each voyage, and in the event of that number being exceeded, a statement shall be furnished to the said merchants at the expiration of this charter, in which they shall be credited with the above number of clear working days for each voyage performed by the said vessel, and debited with those actually occupied in loading and discharging as aforesaid, and all the days so occupied in excess, if any, shall be paid for by the said merchants at the rate of 2*l.* per clear working days as demurrage." And the defendant says that no statement was furnished to the defendant at the expiration of the said charters, or any of them, as required by the terms thereof.

The plaintiffs joined issue on the defendant's pleas respectively; and for a second replication as to the third plea of the defendant they said that a statement was furnished to the defendant in accordance with the said charters within a reasonable time in that behalf, and before the commencement of this suit.

The defendant demurred to the second replication.

The following were the defendant's points: First, that the replication confesses the breach of the contract alleged in the plea, and does not excuse or avoid the same; second, that the replication alleges a performance in terms other than those of the contract set out in the plea; third, that the replication does not allege any waiver of the condition set out in the plea.

The plaintiffs' points were: First, that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover the demurrage sued for, notwithstanding that no statement of days was furnished immediately upon the expiration of the charters, provided that such statement was furnished before action, and not before the expiration of the charters; second, that, at all events, it is sufficient if such statement was furnished within a reasonable time in that behalf; third, that the third plea is bad, because the furnishing the statement at the expiration of the charters is not a condition precedent to the plaintiffs' right to recover; fourth, that the replication is good, because it alleges performance of so much of the stipulation in the charters as is a condition precedent; fifth, that the replication, if not otherwise good, is good as a traverse of the allegation in the plea that a statement was not furnished as required by the charters; sixth, that the statement in the third plea, and the replication thereto, taken together, do not show non-performance of any condition precedent.

Milward, Q.C. (Patchett with him), for the defendant, in support of the demurrer.—The plaintiffs by their replication seek to raise a different issue for the jury to that tendered by the defendant's third plea. The allegation in the plea is that a statement is to be furnished "at the expiration of this charter," but in answer to that the plaintiffs' reply, that a statement was furnished "within a reasonable time in that behalf." Now, "a reasonable time" is an indefinite time, and may extend over a fortnight or more. [KELLY, C.B.—What is a reasonable time under the circumstances is for the jury. "At the expiration" must mean "a reasonable time after."] "A reasonable time" is surely something different from "at the expiration of a certain time." [KELLY, C.B.—What do the words "at the expiration of" mean, but "a reasonable time after?"] They mean directly after; before anything else is done. Upon the pleadings as they now stand, we shall go before the jury to try not whether the statement was furnished at the expiration of the charter, but whether it was furnished within a reasonable time. That will be a false issue. If, in fact, the two mean the same thing, then there was no occasion for the replication. [MARTIN, B.—I say that of necessity "at the expiration of" means "within a reasonable time." The replication says exactly what the plaintiffs were required to do by the charter party.] If there is no difference in the expressions no harm will be done.

G. Williams, for the plaintiffs, was not called upon.

THE COMPANY OF AFRICAN MERCHANTS (LIMITED)
v. THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY (LIMITED).

Marine policy—Insurance of ship during her "stay and trade" on African coast—Meaning of words "stay and trade"—Deviation—Change of risk—Time or voyage policy—Total loss.

An insurance on a ship "at and from L. to the coast of Africa and during her "stay and trade there," means that she is to go to the coast of Africa, and stay there for any purpose which properly falls within the description of African trade, and the ship cannot, under the terms of such insurance, be used for any other than trading purposes.

It is not necessary to a deviation or change of risk, whereby the underwriters are discharged, that the degree or period of the risk should be thereby increased. The assured has no right to substitute a different risk.

An insurance at a premium of 4 guineas per cent. was made on a ship and cargo of the plaintiffs "at and from Liverpool to the coast of Africa, during her stay and trade there, and back to a port of discharge in the United Kingdom," returning an increasing proportion of the premium for the risk ending in ten, eight, or six months respectively, but to be "held covered at 13s. 4d. per cent. per month, if longer than twelve months out," and with liberty for the ship to touch and stay at any ports or places whatsoever (without prejudice to the insurance. The vessel arrived and discharged her outward cargo at Kinsembo, on the African coast, in due course, and there took in a part of her homeward cargo, and then proceeded to other places on the coast, at each of which she took in more cargo, and on the 21st Nov. she arrived at Cabenda Bay, a roadstead on the same coast, where she lay at anchor, in the usual course, taking in more cargo. On the 24th Nov. her loading was completed, and she was made ready to sail homewards on the following day, the 25th Nov. Instead, however, of so doing she was detained by her owners, the plaintiffs, at her anchorage in the Bay, in order to enable her master and crew to assist in the salvage of the cargo of another vessel which had been wrecked and lay in the bay, and which had been purchased by the plaintiffs. While being so detained she was driven from her moorings by a tornado on the 5th Dec., and the damage was thereby done to her which eventually resulted in her total loss during her subsequent voyage to England.

In an action by the plaintiffs, the assured, against the defendants, the underwriters, to recover the amount of the insurance as on a total loss, the defendants pleaded a plea of "deviation," and it was Held, in error upon a bill of exceptions to the ruling of Kelly, C.B. (by Cockburn, C.J., and Blackburn Keating, Mellor, Grove, and Honyman, JJ.), that the learned judge was right in ruling on the above-mentioned facts, that the plea of deviation was proved, and in directing the jury to find a verdict for the defendants upon the issue raised by that plea.

THIS was an action against the defendants, an insurance company, to recover as for a total loss upon two policies of marine insurance.

The declaration contained two counts; in the first of which was set out a policy, dated 19th July 1869, whereby, in consideration of a premium of 84*l.* being at the rate of 8 guineas per cent.) the company took upon itself the burden of an insurance to the amount of 1000*l.*, and agreed with the insured, the plaintiff, that the insurance should be an insurance

Held covered at 13s. 4d. per cent. per month, if longer than twelve months out.

And it was agreed (inter alia) that "it should be lawful for the said ship or vessel in the voyage so insured as aforesaid to proceed and sail to and touch and stay at any port or places whatsoever without prejudice to this insurance." The perils insured against were expressed in the usual clause.

The first count further alleged performance of conditions precedent necessary to make the said policy valid and binding on the defendants, and a total loss within the true intent and meaning of the said policy whereby the defendants became liable, &c., of all which premises the defendants had notice, and non-payment by them.

The second, count upon the other policy dated the 2nd Aug. 1869, upon the same vessel for the same amount, was similar in terms and form to the first count.

Pleas 16 and 17 (to the first and second counts respectively).—That, after the commencement of the risks in the said policies mentioned, and before any of the said losses or misfortunes, the said ship, without sufficient cause or excuse, did not proceed on the said voyage and deviated therefrom. (a)

Issue thereon.

The cause was tried on the 10th Dec. 1870, at Guildhall, before Kelly, C.B. and a special jury, when the plaintiffs gave in evidence the facts stated in the following bill of exceptions, which was afterwards signed and sealed:

1. That on the 19th July 1869 the defendants subscribed, executed, and delivered to the plaintiffs the policy of insurance set out in the first count of the above declaration.

2. That on the 2nd Aug. 1869, the defendants subscribed, executed, and delivered to the plaintiffs the policy of insurance set out in the second count of the above declaration.

3. That the plaintiffs' ship the William Dent, being the ship mentioned in the said policies, sailed in July 1869 from Liverpool, bound to the west coast of Africa, with a general cargo, and arrived at Kinsembo on that coast on the 28th Sept. 1869, where she discharged her outward cargo and took in a cargo consisting of nuts, palm kernels, bees' wax, and copper ore and some ivory.

4. That the ship left Kinsembo on the 8th Nov. with the said cargo, which was not, however, a full cargo, and then proceeded to several places on the coast of Africa, taking in more cargo at those places respectively.

5. That the ship arrived about the 21st Nov. at Cabenda, which is an open roadstead or bay on the south-west coast of Africa, and at times exposed to heavy seas which roll into the bay. There are no ports at that part of the coast, and vessels load and discharge there. A chart of the coast was put in evidence and may be referred to.

The plaintiffs' mate stated that it is considered one of the best bays on the south-west coast. He said that he had never been at Cabenda before, but that he was otherwise well acquainted with the south-west coast.

That the William Dent was anchored in 3½ fathoms of water about half a mile from the shore, which was as near the shore as she could properly

(a) There were fifteen other pleas to the said two counts respectively, but as the jury were discharged from giving any verdict upon the issues thereby severally raised, it is unnecessary to notice them further.

get, and that vessels are always laden from lighters in Cabenda Bay.

6. That on the ship's arrival at Cabenda as aforesaid, the before-mentioned ivory, which had been put into her at Kinsembo, was discharged into the Pioneer, a steamer which belonged to the plaintiffs, and was then at Cabenda, and which was to take the said ivory and other goods to Bonny on the coast of Africa, for the purpose of being shipped by steamer to England.

7. That the said ship then proceeded to take in more cargo at Cabenda, at about a distance of half a mile from the shore, and was on the 24th Nov. completely loaded with a full cargo, consisting principally of pea nuts and palm kernels, which belonged to the plaintiffs. On the same day the hatches were battened down, and secured, and the ship was then ready to sail on the homeward voyage to Liverpool.

8. That it was in fact intended by the plaintiffs agent at Cabenda, and by the captain of the William Dent, that the vessel should, so fully loaded as aforesaid, sail homeward either that day or the next.

9. That about the 25th Nov., after the said ship had completed her cargo as aforesaid, and was ready to proceed to sea, a vessel called the Robert Jones struck on the rocks at a distance of about four miles, and close to the entrance of the bay; with the aid of the Pioneer the Robert Jones was got off the rocks and was towed towards the shore, but she sank in about three and a half fathoms of water and about two or three cables' length from the William Dent. The Robert Jones and her cargo (consisting of coals), were afterwards, about the 25th Nov., purchased by the plaintiffs' agent at Cabenda for a small sum, and the said agent wrote to the plaintiffs as follows: "I completed the loading of the William Dent to-day, and she is now ready for sea, but I think it advisable to detain her for a day or two in order that she may haul alongside the wreck of the Robert Jones to remove the spars, and, if possible, some of the cargo. I write you at length, via Bonny, of my purchase of the wreck, which I expect will turn out a very profitable transaction. I beg herewith to enclose one copy of a bill of lading, per William Dent." The agent, in the same letter, adds that he had promised the captain of the William Dent some remuneration for his special services touching the wreck; again, afterwards the same agent, writing from St. Thomas to the plaintiffs, says: "The William Dent is loaded and at Cabenda, but I have left instructions to Capt. Salt (captain of the William Dent) to remain at Cabenda as long as there is a prospect of his saving sufficient of the cargo and spars of the brig Robert Jones to warrant the detention. I instructed Capt. Salt to haul the William Dent alongside the brig, and in that position he will be able to save a vast quantity of cargo and gear."

The William Dent was not moved from her first place of anchorage until driven therefrom as hereinafter mentioned, nor was she in any way employed in salvaging the wreck of the Robert Jones but her master and crew, with the exception of one or two left on board as a watch, were so employed.

10. That the William Dent remained in Cabenda Bay with her full cargo on board until the 26th Dec., and her detention there was solely for the purpose of employing her master and crew in saving portions from the wreck of the Robert Jones and her cargo. On the 24th Dec. the plaintiffs said agent wrote from Cabenda to the plaintiffs, "I was extremely sorry to see the William Dent here when I returned, as although Capt. Salt has saved a great deal from the wreck of the Robert Jones, still I am sure you will not be pleased at the great detention of the ship."

11. That on the 5th Dec. there was a heavy tornado from the S.E., which parted the cable of the William Dent, and before the ship could be brought up with the second anchor, drove her athwart the above-mentioned ship Robert Jones, thereby causing some of the copper of the William Dent to be torn off, and also part of her bulwarks and rails to be carried away. The winds generally prevalent on the coast near Cabenda in November and December are southerly winds.

12. That the bulwarks and rails were repaired and the copper, as far as it could be, the vessel being afloat, and on the 26th Dec. the William Dent, loaded with her aforesaid full cargo as aforesaid, left Cabenda Bay bound for Liverpool. The plaintiffs' mate stated that according to his judgment and opinion the William Dent left in a perfectly seaworthy condition. He added that in his opinion the planking underneath was not injured, but he would not on his oath say that it was not injured. He further stated that the ship's bottom was examined by a diver, and that a stage was let down the side of the ship on which the ship's carpenter worked, standing in water up to his middle.

13. That during her said voyage to Liverpool the William Dent encountered bad weather and was stranded at the Island of Anna Bon, and during her said voyage events occurred, in respect, and on account of which the plaintiffs claim in this action a total loss in the above declaration mentioned. The defendants deny that there was any total loss. (A copy of the log was given in as an appendix and might be read as part of the case.)

14. And the Lord Chief Baron, after the above mentioned facts were proved by the plaintiffs' witnesses, expressed to the counsel for the parties his opinion that the pleas of deviation were proved. He proposed thereupon to nonsuit the plaintiffs, to which the learned counsel for the plaintiffs objected, and asked his Lordship instead thereof to direct the jury according to his opinion, and that they should find a verdict for the defendants on the issues 16 and 17 above joined between the parties, and thereupon his Lordship expressed his said opinion to the jury accordingly, and they gave their verdict against the plaintiffs on the said last mentioned issues, the jury being thereupon, by the consent of the parties, discharged from giving their verdict upon any other of the issues so joined between the parties.

15. Whereupon the counsel for the plaintiffs, conceiving that the defendants were not by law entitled to have the verdict entered for them in manner aforesaid, on the said issues, made their exceptions to the directions so given by the Lord Chief Baron, who thereupon sealed this bill of exceptions according to the statute in that behalf.

The grounds of error assigned were, first, that the pleas of deviation were not proved; secondly, that the evidence did not show any such delay or deviation as would determine the risks insured against by the policies; thirdly, that there was no implied warranty in the policies not to deviate.

The plaintiffs' points for arguments: First, that the pleas of deviation were not proved; secondly, that, considering the form of the policies, and the nature of the insured voyage, and of the African trade, it was a question of fact for the jury, whether the delay at Cabenda was unjustifiable or unusual, and that the jury were wrongly directed; thirdly, that the policies were to some extent time policies, and that what would be a deviation, such as to avoid an ordinary voyage policy, would not avoid the policies in question.

The defendants' points for argument: First, that there is no error in law in the record and proceedings herein: secondly, that there was in the policies of insurance declared on, of the 19th July 1869, and the 2nd Aug. 1869 respectively, an implied warranty by the assured not to deviate; thirdly, that the facts set forth in the bill of exceptions herein show such a deviation as avoided the policies respectively; fourthly, that the sixteenth and seventeenth pleas respectively were proved; fifthly, that the ruling of the learned Lord Chief Baron was right; sixthly, that the judgment entered for the defendants ought to be affirmed.

Cohen (with him Butt, Q.C.) appeared to argue on the part of plaintiffs in support of the bill of exceptions to the ruling of the Lord Chief Baron, and contended that the learned judge was not justified in directing the jury, as he had done, that on the pleas in question the defendants were entitled to the verdict; but that he should have left it as a question of fact to the jury whether or not there had been, under the circumstances, a deviation such as to avoid the policy. Though it might possibly be admitted that, in the case of an ordinary voyage policy, delay might constitute deviation, on the ground that delay adds to the risk, the duration of the risk being thereby extended, yet that principle does not apply to a policy like that in the present case. On the negotiation for the policy it was considered probable that the vessel would be absent for a period of twelve months, and the premium was calculated on that footing; and there was to be a specified reduction in the amount of the premium if she happened to return within ten months, a further reduction if she returned in eight months, and a still further reduction if she should return in six months. But then, if she should remain at sea beyond twelve months, there is a distinct provision for the payment of 13s. 4d. per cent. per month, without any limit as to time, which sum, if worked out, will be found to amount to a premium of 8 guineas per cent. The policy therefore was in one sense a time policy, with a premium increased in proportion to the extension of the time, so that it was immaterial to the underwriters how long she remained abroad. A variation of risk sufficient to avoid the policy must be a variation which involves the possibility of increasing the risk; a mere change in the risk does not, unless the risk is increased, discharge the underwriters. The mere fact of a vessel, while remaining at a port, being occupied in other ways than was originally contemplated, does not discharge the underwriters, unless the risk be increased; and whether the risk be increased or not is essentially and especially a question for a mercantile jury. In Arnould's Marine Insurance, vol. 2, 4th edit., p. 446, it is said, "We come now to the consideration of those causes which establish the position that, if the ship, under the terms of the policy, was justified in originally visiting the port, any trading during her stay, although foreign to the main purposes of the venture, is not a deviation, unless it causes additional delay, or otherwise substantially varies the risk. Formerly this was not so." It is not sufficient, I submit, for the defendant to show a mere scintilla of variation. Arnould then cites and comments on the cases of Raine v. Bell (9 East, 195), and Laroche v. Owen (11 Ib. 121). In the last-mentioned case, where goods were insured from Gottenburg to a port or ports in the Baltic, with liberty to unload at Carlsmann, after the ship had sailed from Gottenburg with convoy, and was lying in Melmoe Roads, under the commodore's order, a boat came alongside with boxes of indigo, no part of the original cargo, but which were all got on board without any delay to the ship; and it was held there was no deviation, for the risk incurred was neither enhanced nor varied; but merely something was done in the course of the voyage, which made no difference in either, and, therefore, was no discharge of the underwriters' liability. So it was in the present case. And at p. 449, Arnould proceeds to say: "The line of distinction between those cases and the class of cases, of which Hammond v. Reid (4 B. & Ald. 72) is the leading authority, though not at first sight obvious, is, nevertheless, clear and intelligible. In Hammond v. Reid, and cases of that class, the ship would not have touched at the port at all, except for some purpose totally unconnected with the main object of the voyage insured, and the execution of which purpose was itself the sole cause of the delay. In Raine v. Bell (ubi sup.), and the cases decided on its authority, the ship had originally put into, and was actually staying at the port for some purpose connected with the voyage; and while so being there for a justifiable and necessary purpose, some act was done which, though in itself it might be unconnected with the adventure, and not originally contemplated by the parties to the policy, was yet held not to amount to a deviation, because it caused no material variation of the risk." Now there was, it is contended, no increase of the risk here at all and no deviation. The ship was in a safe and good roadstead, where she was bound to be under the policy; and, whether "trading" or not, the premium was calculated according to the time of her stay. [BLACKBURN, J., refers to Mount v. Larkins (8 Bing. 108; 1 L. J., N. S., 20, C. P.), where Tindal, C.J., cites with approbation the judgment of Lord Mansfield, C.J., in Hartley v. Buggin, (3 Doug. 39; 2 Park Ins. 460) in which that learned judge says, that it is not material in order to constitute a deviation that the risk should be increased, the question being whether it has been varied.] That may be so in a voyage policy. But this is a time policy, and the increase of the premium is proportioned to the increase of the time. There has, therefore, I contend, been no increase of risk, and so no deviation. But at all events, a jury was the proper tribunal to decide that question as one distinctly of fact, and on that ground alone the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment.

Milward, Q.C. (with him was C. Russell, Q.C.) for the defendants, contra.—It is admitted that, if the instrument sued upon be a voyage policy, the plaintiff must fail. The words used therein are the ordinary ones found in such a policy. It is a voyage and not a time, nor a mixed voyage and time, policy. In a time policy the limits of the risk are defined "by points of time, only without any designation of local termini at all": (1 Arnould on Insurance, 3rd edit., p. 361.) So here, if the parties had intended this to be a time policy, they would have stated the periods of risk only without local termini. The conditions, even in time policies, continue the same as in voyage policies. The substantial question to be determined is whether the ship was, within the time covered by the insurance, trading. There was, however, no pretence of trading during this month in which she lay alongside the wreck. She was, as is found in the case, loaded and ready to sail for England on the 24th Nov., and would have departed next day but for this improper detention; and if she had sailed in ordinary course she would have escaped the tornado. The case of Hartley v. Buggin (ubi sup.), to which Blackburn, J., has referred, is an authority directly in favour of the defendants. It is cited by Arnould at p. 460, and shows that an unreasonable delay in performing the voyage insured is equivalent to a deviation, and was so expressly ruled by Lord Mansfield. In that case the ground of defence was the detention of the ship as a floating slave depot on the African coast, and his Lordship said, "The single question in this case is, whether there has not been what is equivalent to a deviation, whether the risk has not been varied. It is not material to constitute a deviation that the risk should be increased" (3 Doug. 640; 2 Park Ins. 469). In the present case a different risk has been run to that undertaken by the defendants. The vessel was kept for a month in an open roadstead while the crew were employed on the wreck alongside which she was laid. If there for purposes of salvage only, she could not be said to be "trading." Where a vessel engaged in the African palm oil trade, with liberty to act as a tender to other ships in the same employ, was kept thirteen months in the Benin river, this was held an unreasonable delay, though during part of such time she was employed as a tender (Hamilton and others v. Shedden, 7 L. J., N. S., 1, Ex.; 3 M. & W. 49). The plaintiff wishes to read the words "stay and trade" as "stay ^{and} or trade." [He was here stopped by the court.]

Cohen in reply.—It is not contended by the plaintiffs that this is a time policy in the ordinary sense of the word; but, having regard to the whole document, it is clear that it was to be in the discretion of the assured whether they were to let their ship remain a shorter or longer period on the coast of Africa, and the underwriters did not care how long the risk lasted, as they would receive an extra premium. Then the decided cases show that, if a policy be so framed that the ship is allowed to stay a certain time, the purpose for which she stays matters not. An intention to deviate is not deviation. This ship might undoubtedly have remained in the bay for a month—say while she exchanged cargo with the Pioneer. Can it be said that if she stayed there a month, although for the purposes of trading, the underwriters would be discharged? Yet they must go that length. The words "stay and trade" give the shipowner greater latitude than the phrase "touch and stay" would do. In the case of Hartley v. Buggin the policy was a pure time policy.

EX. CH.] CO. OF AFRICAN MERCHANTS v. BRITISH AND FOREIGN MARINE INSURANCE CO. [EX. CH.]

COCKBURN, C.J.—I am of opinion that the ruling of the Lord Chief Baron was right, and that this bill of exceptions cannot be sustained. I agree that this is not a voyage policy simpliciter, but on the other hand neither do I think it a time policy simpliciter. It is a combination of the two. It is a policy for the purposes of a voyage to the coast of Africa, subject to this, viz., that it is, in one sense, a time policy, by reason of the assured being entitled under it to keep the ship out there for any time he thinks proper, on paying certain stipulated premiums proportioned to the length of time he detains the vessel abroad. The purpose of the voyage, as specified, is that the vessel is "to go to the coast of Africa, to stay and trade there" for a certain period, according to the object of the ship-owner. The question turns on the meaning of the words "stay and trade." Mr. Cohen ingeniously argues that those words mean stay and something more. But it occurs to me "stay" might be sufficient without more; but when the words "and trade" are added, I think the meaning of the phrase is this, "to go to the coast of Africa and stay there for any purpose which properly falls within the description of African trade. In my opinion, under the terms of this policy, the ship cannot be used for any other purposes than trading purposes. No doubt, if, with a view to trade, the captain after loading the cargo were uncertain as to whither it was most advantageous to send it, thinking that although the original destination was port A., it might be better to send it to port B., and if he stayed during such uncertainty for a month at the place of loading, I quite agree that that would be staying for the purposes of trade. And the same principle is applicable to any part of the world, where the vessel could be used for other purposes than trade; can it be said that, under the terms of the policy, the vessel might be used for any other purposes? In the case cited from Douglas (Hartley v. Buggin) the question was, whether the stay of a vessel used as a factory ship on the coast of Africa was a deviation—that was a question of fact. Now, if it could be shown that vessels sent to the coast of Africa were, by the custom of trade there, capable of being employed for some purpose other than those generally understood by the term "trade," that might have made a difference; but we have no evidence of that kind. No evidence before us shows that vessels, insured and sent out to that coast under such circumstances as in the present case, could be employed for the purpose of saving wreck, which is using her for the purpose of salvage and not of trade, and cannot come within the terms of the policy. Whether this is a generous or honourable defence to set up is not the question here. It seems to me that this voyage was for such purposes as fell within the definition of "African trade." This stay of the ship was not for such purposes, and, therefore, the Lord Chief Baron's direction to the jury was right. I agree that if any such evidence whatever had been adduced, which could have been properly left to the jury, to show that this stay was for the purpose of the "African trade," then there should be a venire de novo, but there was none.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I take the law to be very accurately stated in 1 Phillips on Insurance, p. 564, sect. 983: "It is not necessary to a deviation or change of risk, whereby the underwriters are discharged, that the degree or period of the risk should be thereby increased. The assured has no right to substitute a different risk." And that, although Mr. Cohen endeavoured to make an exception from it, is, I conceive, the principle running through all these cases. The underwriters bargain for a particular risk, and the assured has no right to subsequently change or otherwise differentiate it. Now, in order to find the risk the parties intended to cover, we must look at the terms of the policy. [His Lordship here read them, and then proceeded as follows.] Undoubtedly therefore the parties knew that this voyage might be longer or shorter, and regulated the premium accordingly; but, for all that, it is obvious that they were covering the risk during the vessel's voyage to and stay and trade in Africa, and return to Liverpool, and if there was any deviation from that, whether such deviation increased or diminished the risk or not, the assured did change the risk to the underwriters. Now, in the African trade many things, in process of time, have become customary which were formerly not so. From my experience I remember that it used once to be a very common thing upon the African coast to employ a vessel as a tender or floating warehouse, and I am by no means sure that if some such custom were shown to exist, whether, under the words "stay and trade," used in this policy, the ship might not "stay and trade" for the customary purposes for which a ship is there used. So, although it is unnecessary to decide the point, I am inclined at present to think that, if the ship were used as a floating warehouse by that shown custom, there would not be any deviation. But if there is any change from the ordinary course of the voyage, then it does change the risk, because the underwriter takes on himself to say, "I know perfectly well what is ordinarily done on the coast of Africa, and the risk run." But, if the vessel stays, and does something different, that risk is changed—which is enough to free the underwriter from liability on the policy. He may say, "You never asked me to take this risk; if you had done so I might have accepted it, charging higher premiums, or I might have declined it altogether, non in hæc fœdera vent," and so discharge himself. That is thrown out in Hartley v. Buggin (ubi sup.), where, on the question of granting a new trial, Lord Mansfield says, "The single question in this case is, whether there has not been what is equivalent to a deviation. It is not material to constitute a deviation, that the risk should be increased. The voyage is to the coast of Africa, and thence to the West Indies, which includes an insurance on the ship while she stays and trades in Africa, and it is with liberty to exchange goods and slaves; but that exchange is for the benefit of the ship, one slave for another. If a ship insured for a trade is turned into a factory ship, or a floating warehouse, the risk is different; it varies the stay, for while she is used as a warehouse no cargo is brought for her." Then the case was sent down for a new trial, whereat Eyre, C.B., left to the jury the question, "If the use made of the ship had the voyage for its object?" A verdict was found for the defendant which was never questioned. Now, true, the direction here would be "On this evidence do you, the jury, think that the stay of the ship, whilst she was waiting in the bay during this month was staying and trading in the ordinary course of an African voyage," if there was any evidence at all to show that it was in the ordinary course of an African voyage to keep the ship there with the object of salvage.^(a) But there was no evidence of that kind at all, so that the doctrine in the case of Ryder v. Wombwell in the Exchequer Chamber (19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 491; L. Rep. 4 Ex. 32; 38 L. J. 8, Ex.), does not come in, for there was no scintilla of evidence here at all of that, and consequently nothing to leave to the jury. This stay of the vessel for the purpose of salvage clearly varied the risk whether it increased or diminished it, and, therefore, the ruling of the Lord Chief Baron was right and the judgment below should be affirmed.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion.

MELLOR, J.—I quite agree with the construction put upon this policy by my lord and my brother Blackburn.

GROVE, J.—I have had some doubt in this case—not with respect to the law as expressed by my brother Blackburn and the decided cases—that in the case of an ordinary policy it is not necessary to a deviation liberating the underwriter, that the risk should be increased; but I understand Mr. Cohen's argument not to be founded on that class of cases or reasoning, but to be this, viz., that it was not other than the contemplated voyage here because of the terms of the policy stipulating for the payment of an extra premium for an extended time, and that the words "stay and trade" might be read disjunctively "stay or trade." But looking more closely into the policy, I find that the word "or" is used correctly in other places, where the parties intended such disjunction, which shows clearly that they knew the difference between "or" and "and." I read the words "stay and trade" to mean "stay trading." Now, it is evident that there was no stay of this kind here. This vessel had loaded a cargo, the hatches were battened down, she was ready and just about to sail homewards, and then there was what may be termed a capricious delay, and consequently one not within the terms of the policy. The risk was altered, and therefore our judgment must be for the underwriters.

HONYMAN, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion, and only wish to add that Mr. Cohen has dealt with the case in his argument as if the words "stay and trade" were written "stay ^{and} or trade." Had they been so, his argument would have had much weight. But that is not the wording of this policy.

Priority—Master's wages—Bottomry—Mortgage—Reference to registrar and merchants.

Maritime liens, being in the nature of rewards for services rendered, rank against the fund out of which they are to be paid in the inverse order of their attachment on the res, and the last in time should be the earliest in payment.

The claim of a master for his wages earned and disbursements made subsequently to a voyage, during which a bottomry bond has been given on his ship, takes priority over the claim of the bondholder.

A bottomry bondholder is entitled to priority over the claim of a master for wages earned on voyages previous to that during which the bond is given.^(a)

A master's claim for wages and disbursements, whenever earned or made, takes priority over the claims of mortgagees.

THIS was a question of priority between a master suing for his wages, a bottomry bondholder, and mortgagees. The court pronounced for the various claims and referred them to the registrar and merchants to find the amounts, and to decide in the first instance as to the order in which the claims ought to be paid. The facts and arguments are fully set out in the report of the registrar.

W. G. F. Phillimore, appeared before the registrar and merchants for the master.

E. C. Clarkson, for bondholder.

Cohen and Wood Hill, for the mortgagees.

The report of the registrar (Mr. H. C. Rothery) was as follows:—

"These cases came before myself and one of the merchants on the 21st and 27th Nov. ult. The main question at issue, and which the parties agreed should in the first instance be decided by myself, was one of very considerable difficulty and importance—as to the relative rights of a bondholder, a mortgagee, and the master of the ship to priority of payment out of a fund in court, which is sufficient to pay all, or indeed any two, of the claims. And as the view, which I have found myself obliged to take of this question, is at variance with the generally received opinion on the subject, and would even at first sight appear to be opposed to some of the reported decisions, I propose to state my reasons in detail, so that I have erred in the conclusions at which I have arrived, that error may readily be corrected by the court.

(a) It is remarkable that this question seems never to have been previously formally raised and decided. In The Mary Ann (9 Jurist, 94), Dr. Lushington expressed an opinion that wages earned on an outward voyage before the bond was given, could not take precedence of the bond, but it was not so expressly decided. In the United States the priority of all seamen's wages seems to have been taken for granted, but the question arising in this case has not, so far as can be gathered from reported cases, arisen: (See Blaine v. Ship Charles Carter, 4 Cranch's U. S. Sup. Ct. Rep. 328; The Virgin, 8 Peter's U. S. Sup. Ct. Rep. 538; Furness v. The Brig Indogum, Olcott's Adm. Rep. 55; The Hilarity, Blatchford and Howland's Adm. Rep. 90.) As a subsequent bottomry bond is given to secure advances for repairs, which enable the ship to reach her home port, and the crew thus to earn their wages, it seems only equitable that the general rule of maritime liens should be applied in such a case as in all others, and that the bondholder should have priority.—ED.

"The circumstances of the case are briefly as follows:—

"On the 14th June 1869, George Henry Webber was appointed to the command of the Hope, by his brother Charles Shilston Webber, of Bristol, who was the sole owner. No written agreement was entered into between them as to the rate of wages which he was to receive; but he informed us that it was verbally agreed between himself and his brother that he should have 15*l.* per month. The vessel, which was at the time at Bristol, shortly afterwards proceeded to Cardiff, and, having taken in a cargo, sailed therewith on the 18th Aug. 1869, bound to Monte Video. Thence she proceeded to Rosario, and, having discharged her cargo at Bordeaux, ultimately returned to Cardiff, where she arrived on the 24th June 1870. It should here be stated that, whilst the vessel was away on this voyage, the owner, by an indenture dated the 6th Dec. 1869, mortgaged her to a person named Pooley, who a few days afterwards transferred his interest under that mortgage to the persons who are now suing the vessel as mortgagees in cause No. 5954.

"On the 22nd Aug. 1870, the Hope again left Cardiff under the command of George Henry Webber, and proceeded to Barcelona; from thence she sailed to Port Mahon and Tarragona, and thence to Buenos Ayres. From Buenos Ayres she went to Cape Town, and, having taken on board a return cargo, arrived therewith at Falmouth on the 9th Sept. 1871.

"On the 17th of the same month the master, being, as he says, seriously ill, with the consent of the owner, was discharged; and a new master, one Robert Bruce, was appointed in his place, and under his command the Hope proceeded to Hamburg, and there discharged her cargo. Whilst the vessel lay at Hamburg, it was deemed necessary to do some repairs to her; and the balance of freight, which had been received at Hamburg, being found insufficient to pay for these repairs, as well as for the necessary outfit and provisions to enable her to return to this country, the master, Robert Bruce, borrowed a sum of 60*l.* from the persons who are now suing as bondholders in cause No. 5969, and as security for the repayment gave them a bottomry bond upon the ship for that sum, with a bottomry premium of 9*l.*, payable within three days after the safe arrival of the vessel at Londonderry, to which port she was bound on leaving Hamburg. The Hope arrived at Londonderry towards the end of Nov. 1871; and there the master Bruce, and the greater part if not the whole, of the crew left her; and on the 30th of the same month George Henry Webber, having, as he states, recovered his health, resumed the command, and with a mate and six runners engaged especially for the run, brought her to Newport, where she arrived on the 28th Dec. 1871.

"On the 5th Jan. 1872, the mortgagee entered his action, and on the following day the vessel was arrested. This was followed on the 11th by an action by the bondholder, and on the 16th of the same month George Henry Webber entered his action for the wages and disbursements due to him. On the 20th Feb. 1872, the court pronounced for the bond, and ordered the vessel to be appraised and sold; and on the same day it also pronounced for the mortgage, with interest to the time of payment. The vessel was accordingly sold, and on the 19th April following the gross proceeds of the vessel, amounting to the sum of 540*l.*, were brought into court by the marshal. On the 23rd of the same month the court pronounced in favour of the master's claim, but on the joint application of the bondholder and mortgagee referred it to the registrar to report thereon.

"It should here be observed that the claim of the master is for a sum of 539*l.* 3*s.* 4*d.*, besides a supplemental claim of 35*l.* for expenses incurred at Newport; the claim of the bondholder is for a sum of 69*l.* and interest: and that of the mortgagees is for 569*l.* 11*s.* 7*d.*, with 26*l.* 9*s.* 8*d.* for interest to the 31st Oct. 1871, and interest that has since accrued. And as the whole fund in court, after payment of the charges thereon, is only 410*l.* 10*s.* 9*d.*, it is clear, as has been already said, that it is wholly insufficient to pay any two of the claimants.

"The case came before us, as I have said, on the 21st and 27th ult.; Mr. Phillimore was counsel for the master, Mr. Clarkson for the bondholder, and Mr. Cohen and Mr. Wood Hill for the mortgagees. There were four witnesses examined, the master and his accountant, and two other witnesses who were produced on behalf of the bondholder and mortgagees to prove the rate of wages usually paid to masters of vessels such as the Hope, a point, however, on which, as will be seen in the result, nothing turned.

"The evidence of the master, however, was of great importance. He stated that on his return from his first voyage he had given all the vouchers which he had to his brother, and that a statement of account had been agreed upon between them, but that his brother being in difficulties he could not obtain a settlement from him, and that the whole of his wages and the balance of his disbursements for that voyage consequently remained unpaid. He stated that the same thing had occurred on his return from the second voyage; that a statement of account had been made out between them, but that he could get no settlement from his brother, and that the whole of his wages and the balance of his disbursements for that voyage also were still due to him. He stated that, when he left her at Falmouth, he ceased to be her master; that Bruce was not his deputy; and that his (Webber's) services in her had terminated when he left her at Falmouth. He admitted that he had gone to Hamburg during the time that Bruce was in command of her; that he had stayed there a week; that during that time he had been almost constantly with Bruce the master, but that they had never on any occasion spoken about the ship's affairs; and that, although he knew that a sum of about 400*l.* had to be received at Hamburg as the balance of freight, and that there was then due to him for his wages and disbursements between 500*l.* and 600*l.*, he never applied to have any part of it paid over to him, for that, not being any longer her master, he considered that he had no right to interfere; he added that he did not know, and had never troubled himself to inquire, how the freight had been disposed of. He stated also that he knew nothing of any bottomry bond being required at Hamburg, nor of the intention of Bruce the master to give one. As to the accounts which had been filed in the case, he stated that, not being able to obtain payment of his claim, he had gone, without his brother's knowledge, to the box which contained the papers relating to the Hope, had opened it, and had abstracted therefrom all the vouchers which he could find; that he had handed them to his accountant, together with such rough notes as he had kept of his expenditure on the two voyages, and that the accountant had, from these materials, and from the explanations which he had given him, made out the accounts in the form in which they had been given in; that when the accounts had been made out, the accountant had given him back the rough notes of his expenditure which he had kept on the two voyages, and that, thinking that they were of no further use, he had destroyed them after the institution of these suits, and although he was at the time aware that his claim would be disputed, and that he would be required to prove every item of it. He stated that he could not say what had become of the statements of account, which he alleged had been agreed upon between himself and his brother at the termination of each voyage, nor could he obtain any information on the subject, as his brother had died, about three months since, bankrupt.

"The accountant in his evidence stated that he had drawn up the accounts from the materials and explanations furnished by the master; that he had then handed the accounts, with the vouchers, to the master's solicitors, and the rough notes of expenditure he had given back to the master himself. He had never seen the alleged statements of account agreed upon by the two brothers. He stated further, that he had had great experience in the adjustment of masters' accounts with their owners; that as a rule they were generally very irregularly, or rather informally, kept; and that it was not usual to require masters to produce vouchers for all their payments. He added that many of the items in the master's account were unvouched, but that he did not consider the expenditure on the two voyages to be either excessive or unreasonable.

"With such evidence before us, it was impossible not to look with some suspicion on the claim of the master. The fact that, knowing his brother to have been in difficulties, he had allowed the account of his wages and disbursements to run on without obtaining a settlement of his claim; that he should, after institution of the suit, have destroyed the only evidence which he possessed of many of the unvouched items of his account; that he should have gone to Hamburgh, stayed there a week, and during that time have been in constant communication with the master, Bruce, and yet never have said one word to him about the ship's affairs, or asked for any payment out of the freight, which he knew was to be received, although there was then due to him, according to his own account, between 500*l.* and 600*l.*; the near relationship of the parties, and the very convenient arrangement by which the bond was given, at a time when Webber had temporarily given up the command of the vessel, and when possibly it might have been thought that the money could be raised on bottomry, without invalidating his claim; all those circumstances tend to throw some suspicion upon the master's case; and although perhaps they do not amount to a positive proof, as was contended, that the claim is a fraudulent one, it is clear that the master can ask for no special indulgence, and that he is entitled only to what the law will give him, and to no more.

"I now proceed to consider the question of priority; and, first, as to the relative rights of the master and the bondholder.

"Formerly, as is well known, a master had no remedy for his wages or disbursements, either against the ships or against the freight. By the 191st section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, however, it was enacted, 'that every master should have, so far as the case permits, the same rights, liens, and remedies for the recovery of his wages, which by this Act, or by any law or custom, any seaman, not being a master, has for the recovery of his wages.' The same section further provided that, if a counter-claim was set up by the owner, the master was entitled to have all the accounts between them gone into. This provision was further extended by the 10th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, which gave the court jurisdiction 'over any claim by the master of any ship for wages earned by him on board the ship, and for disbursements made by him on account of the ship;' and it was held by Dr. Lushington, in the case of The Mary Ann (13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 384; L. Rep. 1 Adm. & Ecc. 8; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 294), that the effect of these statutes has been to convert the master's claim for his wages and disbursements into a 'maritime lien.' This decision has been since frequently acted upon by this court; and it must, therefore, now be taken to be settled law that the claims of a master of a ship for his wages as well as for his disbursements is a 'maritime lien,' enforceable in this court. But if the claim of a master is a 'maritime lien,' so also is that of a bottomry bondholder, and one too, of a very high and sacred character. Bottomry bonds being, as has been said, 'for the benefit of ship-owners and the general advantage of commerce,' have always been regarded with peculiar favour in Courts of Admiralty. Both these claims then being, in the words of Mr. Maclachlan, in his work on Merchant Shipping, p. 596, 'liens in the nature of rewards for benefits conferred,' are, as such, 'maritime liens' of the first class; and, according to that learned authority, the general principle in regard to all such liens is, that they are entitled to 'rank against the fund in the inverse order of their attachment on the res,' or, in other words, 'the later in time is the earlier in payment;' 'the sole reason of this,' as he elsewhere remarks, 'being that the later benefit preserves the res to satisfy the earlier claims, and earns thereby a superior equity in respect of the common fund.' Nor, as he rightly says, are wages any exception to the rule, although they 'might be supposed, from the language of judges, to have attained to a special and inviolable precedence.' But 'the language alluded,' he observes, 'is fully justified by the circumstances to which it is applied, being those of the usual case when liens have attached in the course of the voyage; but seamen's wages not accruing until the end of it, become, in fact, the later lien.' Thus, he says, 'a bottomry bond gives precedence to subsequent salvage, that again to subsequent bottomry; all taking rank before prior wages, all yielding priority to wages subsequently earned.'

"If, this, then, is to be the principle by which I am to be guided in the present case, there can be no doubt whatever what ought to be my decision. Webber's wages for the first voyage accrued when that voyage was terminated at Cardiff, in June 1870. His wages for the second voyage accrued when he left her at Falmouth, on the 17th Sept. 1871, or, at all events, when she terminated that voyage by the discharge of her cargo at Hamburg. Subsequently to this, and to enable her to perform a new voyage from Hamburg to Londonderry, the bond, which bears date the 7th Nov. 1871, was given. It is clear, therefore, upon this principle, that, except for the small amount of wages and disbursements due to him after he resumed the command at Londonderry, the master's claim must take rank after that of the bottomry bondholder. To hold that the resumption of the command by the master at Londonderry would revive his claim for the wages and disbursements due to him for the two previous voyages, so that they could be deemed to have accrued only at the final termination of his services in the vessel, is a position which could hardly be maintained. But it was contended by Mr. Phillimore that there are certain reported cases, which give a master priority over a bottomry bondholder for the amount of his wages and disbursements, no matter when they may have accrued; and I propose, therefore, to examine these cases, and to see how far they support the position which have been contended for; for if there be any such decision, it is, of course, binding upon me.

THE HOPE.

"The first case then to which I will refer is that of The Janet Wilson, reported in Swabey, p. 261. In that case the application was for payment out of the proceeds in court of a sum of money, which had been paid for seamen's wages pilotage, and other necessary disbursements, in priority to the claim of a bondholder. The court, however, rejected the application, and in doing so said, 'It is perfectly true that under certain circumstances the mariner has a claim for wages which will take precedence of a bottomry bond, but I do not think it is universally true that in all cases the mariner is entitled to come to this court and say, "I shall have my wages in preference to a bottomry bond." I have very great doubt in my own mind whether, where wages have been earned prior to the time when a bottomry bond has been given, a mariner has a right to come to this court and say, "Let me have a preferential payment over the person who holds the bottomry bond;" and for the obvious reason that the payment of those wages out of the proceeds of the ship is conditional upon the arrival of the ship in this country; and that event was brought about by the bond having been given, and the money having been advanced.' So far, therefore, as this case goes, it is an authority rather for preferring the claim of the bondholder to that of the master, as well in respect of the latter's wages as of his disbursements.

"The next case is that of The Jonathan Goodhue, reported in the same volume of reports, p. 521. In that case the learned judge rejected the claim of the master for the payment of his wages in priority to that of the bondholder, mainly on the ground that the master had by the bond rendered himself personally liable for the payment thereof; at the same time observing: 'As to wages, seamen no doubt are generally entitled to a priority of payment, but even here difficulties might arise, and the court has guarded itself against expressing any opinion in case of wages earned before the execution of a bond or on a previous voyage.'

"The next case to which it is necessary to call attention is that of The Union, reported in Lush.

p. 128. In that case the court no doubt held that seamen's wages, earned as well before as after the giving of the bond, were to be preferred to the claim of the bondholder; but that case differs essentially from the present, in that the wages had been earned on the voyage in which the bond had been given, and not, as in the present case, in two previous voyages; and, secondly, that they were wages due to seamen, and not wages and disbursements due to the master of the ship. Moreover, it is to be observed that in that case the question was rather one of marshalling the assets, for it appeared that the proceeds of ship, cargo, and freight, all of which were liable for payment of the bond, were amply sufficient to cover the claims both of the bondholder and of the seamen; whereas the ship and freight alone were not sufficient even to pay the bond. If, therefore, the bondholder's claim had been preferred to that of the seamen, the latter would have lost all remedy; whereas, by preferring the seamen to the bondholder, there were sufficient funds to satisfy both claims.

"A very similar case will be found in the same volume of reports, p. 69, The William F. Safford. In that case the learned judge preferred the claim of seamen for their wages to that of a bottomry bondholder. But then the wages had accrued subsequently to the giving of the bond; so that that case comes strictly within the principle laid down by Mr. Maclachlan, namely, that liens in the nature of rewards for benefits conferred rank in the inverse order of their attachment on the res.

"The next case to which I will refer is that of The Salacia, reported in the same volume of Lushington's Reports, p. 545 (see also 7 L. T. Rep. N. S. 450; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 261). In that case there was a claim by seamen for their wages, amounting to 681*l.*; by the master for wages, 285*l.*; and for disbursements, 84*l.*; and besides these there was a bottomry bond on the ship, freight, and cargo. To meet these claims the proceeds in court were only 471*l.* The master claimed to share rateably with the seamen, on the ground that under the 191st section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, he had the same rights, liens, and remedies for the recovery of his wages as they had; but the court held that his claim was not entitled to rank with that of the seamen, and that the seamen were to be preferred to the master. The court then went on to say that, as the claims of the seamen would more than consume the proceeds of the ship, there was no other question at that time before it, but it intimated its opinion that, as between the master and the bondholder, the claim of the master upon the freight was to be preferred. I apprehend, however, that this, strictly speaking, was no more than an obiter dictum; it was not the question before the court, and, for all that appears to the contrary, the words may be those of the reporter, and not of the learned judge. But, at the utmost, to what does it amount? Merely to this, that wages will take precedence of a bond arising in the same voyage; for the claim in that case was for wages earned during the last voyage, and not, as in the present case on two previous voyages.

"The last case to which I need refer is that of The Edward Oliver (16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 575; L. Rep. 1 Adm. & Ecc. 379; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 507). In that case the ship, freight, and cargo, being amply sufficient to cover the claims of the master and of the bondholder, the question was, whether the ship and freight were first to be exhausted in payment of the bond, which would have left nothing for the master; but the court held that, there being funds amply sufficient to pay both, the master's claim should be first satisfied out of the ship and freight, and the balance thereof applied towards the payment of the bond, any deficiency being made good from the cargo. It was a question of marshalling the assets, and was very similar to that of the Union, referred to above.

THE ROSE.

"I have now, I think, examined all the reported cases bearing upon the question of the relative rights of a bondholder and a master to priority of payment out of a common fund, and I have come to the conclusion that there is not one which meets the circumstances of the present case. There are, no doubt, obiter dicta that wages are entitled to precedence over other liens; and there are instances also of priority having been given to seamen over a bondholder for wages earned during the voyage in which the bond was given; as well as priority to masters, where the only fund against which the master could claim was insufficient to satisfy both his claim and that of the bondholder, and where there was another fund amply sufficient to satisfy the bondholder's claim. But I do not find any case in which it has been held that a master is entitled to priority over a bondholder for wages and disbursements incurred on voyages prior to that in which the bond was given. This being so, I must adhere to the general rule, as stated by Mr. MacLachlan, that liens in the nature of rewards for services rendered rank against the fund in the inverse order of their attachment on the res, and that the last in time should be the earliest in payment. I must therefore hold that except in respect of the comparatively trifling sum which is due to the master for his services after he had resumed the command of the vessel at Londonderry, the bondholder is entitled to priority.

"Lastly, as to the claim of the mortgagees, relatively to that of the master. If, indeed, I had any doubt upon the point, but which I have not, the cases the The Chieftain (Brown & Lush. 212); of The Mary Ann (ubi sup.); of The Feronia (17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 619; L. Rep. 2 Adm. & Ecc. 65; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 54), and other cases would be absolutely binding upon me, that the claim of a master for his wages and disbursements is to be preferred to that of a mortgagee. It was, however, attempted to be shown that in the present case the master's claim was fraudulent, and that there had been a conspiracy between the two brothers to defraud the just claims of the bondholder and the mortgagees. No doubt a claim preferred as this master's has been is open to very grave suspicion, but fraud must not be presumed, and I do not think that the facts of this case go so far as to establish a charge of fraud. But it was said that the master had forfeited his claim by laches; and that, even assuming the claim to be a genuine one, he had no right to lie by and by not availing himself of the many opportunities which had offered of enforcing it, create a secret lien on the property to the prejudice of the mortgagees. I think, however, that the case of The Chieftain (ubi sup.), which has been already referred to, is conclusive on this point; in that case the learned judge held that a delay of even ten months after his discharge would not bar the master's claim for his wages and disbursements, so far, that is, as a mortgagee is concerned. Nor must it be forgotten that, if the master has been guilty of laches, so also have the mortgagees; they knew of the embarrassed circumstances of the owner; of the close connection between him and the master; and yet, so far as appears from the evidence in this cause, not only do they allow the interest on their mortgage to run on, but they take no steps to ascertain whether the accounts between the master and the owner on the previous voyages had been settled, nor do they appear to have made any attempt to secure any part of the freight towards the payment of the interest or principal of their mortgage. I think, therefore, that I cannot, on the ground of the master's laches, give the mortgagees priority. At the same time I think that, under all the circumstances of the case, the mortgagees were fairly entitled to have the master's claim investigated, and I shall therefore allow them their costs.

"My report will therefore be that, except in regard to the small sum that may be due to the master for his wages and disbursements, after he resumed the command of the vessel at Londonderry, the bondholder is entitled to priority of payment out of the fund in court, both for the amount of his bond and interest, and for his costs; that the cost of the master and of the mortgagees should then be paid; and that any balance that may remain, and which can hardly be very considerable, the available proceeds being only 410*l.* 0*s.* 9*d.*, shall be paid to the master, in part satisfaction of his claim. This will obviate the necessity of inquiring whether or not 15*l.* a month wages was or was not too high a rate for a vessel of this class and description, and for such a voyage; as well as whether the sums charged in the master's accounts, for which no vouchers have been produced, are to be allowed.

Mortgage—Possession—Sale by mortgagee—Discharge by mortgagee indorsed on mortgage—Refusal of Custom House authorities to register the bill of sale—Jurisdiction.

Mortgagees in possession sold under their power of sale a ship, and at the request of the purchaser indorsed on the back of the mortgage a discharge, which by mistake was registered at the Custom House. The registrar at the Custom House afterwards refused to register the bill of sale of the ship, on the ground that by the discharge the property in the ship had passed to the original owner. The mortgagees and purchaser thereupon instituted a cause of mortgage and possession against the ship. The original owner had died intestate and bankrupt; no letters of administration had been taken out, and notice of the cause was served on his personal representatives and his trustee in bankruptcy. The purchaser sought a decree, declaring the property of the ship to be in him:

Held, that the court had jurisdiction to declare the property to be in the purchaser, and that the plaintiffs were entitled to a decree.

THIS was a cause of possession and mortgage instituted on behalf of Christopher Dove Barker and William Winship against the ship Rose, her tackle, apparel, and furniture, under circumstances set out in the petition filed in the cause, which is as follows:—

1. Before and at the time of the execution of the mortgage security hereafter mentioned, Thomas Gibson was the sole owner of the British ship Rose, belonging to the port of North Shields.

2. In Oct. 1867, the said Thomas Gibson, being indebted to Messrs. Woods and Co., of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, bankers, in the sum of 1000*l.*, it was agreed by and between the said Thomas Gibson and the said Messrs. Woods and Co., that the said Thomas Gibson should execute a mortgage of the said ship to Christopher Dove Barker, one of the plaintiffs in this cause, who was and is one of the partners in the said firm of Woods and Co., as security for the repayment of the said sum of 1000*l.*, and such further advances as might be made by the said Messrs. Woods and Co. to the said Thomas Gibson.

3. Accordingly, on the 3rd Oct. 1862, the said ship was mortgaged by the said Thomas Gibson to the said Christopher Dove Barker to secure the repayment of the sum of 1000*l.* and such further advances as aforesaid together with interest thereon, to be paid at the rate of and in the manner therein mentioned.

The Exhibit A hereto annexed is a true copy of the said mortgage. (The mortgage is immaterial, and not set out.)

4. The said mortgage was duly registered at the port of North Shields on the 7th Oct. 1867.

5. The said Thomas Gibson died in June 1872, and at the time of his death there remained due and owing on the said mortgage security the principal sum of 1,000*l.*, together with a large sum of money for further advances, and interest.

6. The said Christopher Dove Barker being unable to obtain payment of the principal money and interest so due as last aforesaid, in the month of July 1872, sold the said ship, under the power of sale contained in the mortgage deed, to William Winship, one of the plaintiffs in this cause, for the sum of 800*l.*

On or about the 20th July 1872, the said William Winship paid to the said Christopher Dove Barker the said sum of 800*l.*, and the said Christopher Dove Barker, by the direction of the said Messrs. Woods and Co., executed a bill of sale of the said ship to the said William Winship.

The Exhibit B hereto annexed is a true copy of the said bill of sale. (The bill of sale is immaterial, and not set out.)

8. On the 24th July 1872, the said William Winship signed a declaration such as is required by the 56th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, the said declaration is true, and the said William Winship has always been ready to declare to the truth of the same in the manner by law required.

The Exhibit C hereto annexed is a true copy of the said declaration. (The declaration is immaterial, and not set out.)

9. The said William Winship, believing that, in order to complete his title to the said ship, it was necessary that a discharge of the said mortgage should be endorsed on the back of the original mortgage, and signed by the said Christopher Dove Barker, requested him to make such endorsements and to sign the same.

10. Accordingly the said Christopher Dove Barker, in pursuance of such request as aforesaid, endorsed and signed the said discharge on the back of the said mortgage, on the 26th July 1872, as appears by the said Exhibit A. And the said mortgage was given by the said Messrs. Woods and Co. to one of their clerks.

11. The said clerk by mistake took the said mortgage to the Custom House at North Shields on the 27th July 1872, and produced the same to the registrar, who recorded the said discharge.

12. The said William Winship afterwards presented the said bill of sale and declaration, mentioned in the 7th and 8th articles of this petition, to the registrar at the Custom House at North Shields, and requested him to register the said bill of sale, but the said registrar refused to register the said bill of sale, upon the ground that the property in the said ship had passed to the representatives of the said Thomas Gibson.

13. The said Thomas Gibson died intestate and insolvent, and no administration of his estate and effects have been taken out.

14. The execution and registration of the said discharge is wholly void at law in equity.

15. The said William Winship is entitled to be registered as the legal owner of the said ship, but owing to the said mistake he is unable to be registered as such legal owner without the assistance of this honourable court.

The petition concluded by praying the judge "to pronounce the said William Winship to be the lawful owner of sixty-four sixty-fourth shares of and in the said ship Rose, and to decree the possession of the said ship, her tackle, apparel, and furniture, be given to the said William Winship as such lawful owner, and that all things may be done necessary to complete his title to the said ship."

No appearance had been entered in the suit, but from affidavits filed in support of the petition, which proved the facts therein stated, it appeared that the mortgagor had died intestate; that before his death he had become a bankrupt; that no administration had been taken out; and that notice of the suit and of the arrest of the vessel had been served both upon his trustee and his next of kin, and upon all persons having any interest in the matter.

Gainsford Bruce for the plaintiffs, the mortgagee and purchaser.—This suit is rendered necessary by the refusal of the customs officer to enter the purchaser as the owner of the ship. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Have I jurisdiction in such a suit?] This is a cause of mortgage and possession, and by 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 3, the court has jurisdiction over all causes of action of any person in respect of any mortgage, when the ship is under arrest, by process of the court; and by sect. 4 the court has jurisdiction to decide all questions as to the title and ownership of any ship or vessel arising in any cause of possession, &c. Also, by the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (74 Vict. c. 10, s. 11), the court has jurisdiction over any claim in respect of any mortgage duly registered, whether the ship is arrested or not. It is necessary that some court should declare the purchaser entitled to the ship, and these enactments give this court jurisdiction.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is a novel exercise of jurisdiction on the part of this court, but after giving careful attention to the statutes cited, I am of opinion that the court has jurisdiction, and that the plaintiffs are entitled to a decree in the terms of their prayer. I shall make a decree accordingly.

THE CHANONRY.

Collision—One vessel overtaking another—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea—Lights and signals.

Where two steamships, bound in the same general direction, but on courses differing by one point, are steaming one behind the other, and one is overtaking the other, they are not crossing vessels within the meaning of Article 14 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, but the vessel which is behind the other is a vessel overtaking another within the meaning of Article 17 of the Regulations, and is bound to keep out of the way of the leading vessel.

Where one vessel during the night time is overtaking another within the meaning of Article 17 of the Regulations, although the leading vessel may be in such a position that the following vessel cannot see the regulation lights of the leading vessel, the latter is not bound, under ordinary circumstances, to give a signal, or to show a light to the following vessel.

*In a collision cause, where the plaintiffs establish a prima facie case that the defendants' vessel was overtaking their vessel within the meaning of Article 17 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, the onus of showing excuse for the collision is thrown upon the defendants. (a) This was a cause of collision instituted on behalf of the owners of the screw steamship Leverington, against the screw steamship Chanonry and her owners intervening. The collision occurred in the*

(a) The question of what is to be considered a following vessel may be of extreme importance. There have been few decisions on this point in this country. In the United States it has been in one case held that where two vessels were coming out of the Hudson River, their courses differing by nearly eight points, the hindmost vessel was to be considered a following vessel within the meaning of the rule: (The Columbia, 10 Wallace U. S. Sup. Ct. Rep. 246.) Perhaps the true principle of the rule is that wherever a vessel, by reason of her superior speed, is overtaking another, she cannot divest herself of the obligation to get out of the way of the foremost vessel because her superior speed must necessarily place the vessels at some period on crossing courses. It would not even be unreasonable to suppose that where the courses of two vessels are such that they would intersect each other at any angle less than a right angle, the hindmost vessel if going at a greater speed than the other would be bound to keep out of the way. There has, however, been no decision on this point, as vessels at sea, whose courses vary with eight points of the compass, having no common starting point, are usually treated as crossing vessels, unless their courses are almost identical, and vessels navigating a narrow channel are usually, if not meeting, going in the same general direction. Cases illustrating the application of the rule will be found in Holt's Rule of the Road, 207 and seq. (See also The Rhode Island, Olcott's U. S. Dist. Ct. (Southern Dist. of N. Y.), Adm. Rep. 505; affirmed on appeal, 1 Blatchford's U. S. Circuit Ct., 2 Circ. 563; The Governor, Abbott's U. S. Dist. Ct. (Southern Dist. of N. Y.), Adm. Rep. 108; Porterant v. Rep. 448; The Palatine, ante p. 468.)

On the question of whether a vessel seeing another overtaking her is bound to show a light, it was held in the United States that a sailing vessel seeing a steamship approaching her in such a direction that her regulation lights were not visible to the steamship, was bound, in a thick and hazy night, to show a light so as to indicate her presence to the steamer: (The Steamship Louisiana, Benedict's (U. S. Dist. Ct., Southern Dist. of N. Y.) Repts. 371.)—ED.

Bristol Channel between the Flatholm and Laver-nock point, about a mile and a half N. W. by W. of the Flatholm Light. The Flatholm Light is a fixed light showing from different points a red and a white light; to vessels coming down the channel from the northward and eastward it shows a red light, whilst it bears from them any point between S.W. and S. by E. $\frac{1}{2}$ E.; from other points it shows a white light. The Leverington, a steamer of 679 tons register and 99-horse power, and manned by a crew of twenty-seven hands, left the docks at Newport on the evening of 4th Dec. 1872 at about a quarter to nine, in charge of a licensed pilot. When she got out of the river Usk and into the channel, the Leverington went ahead full speed at the rate of six or seven knots an hour on a S.W. by W. course which kept the Flatholm white light nearly ahead, but a little on the port bow. When her pilot sighted the Monkstone Beacon, her helm was starboarded a little, and her head brought to S. S. W., and she passed outside to the southward of the Monkstone Beacon. On clearing the Beacon the helm of the Leverington was ported, and she was put upon a W.N.W. course: she almost immediately lost the white, and sighted the red, light of Flatholm at the distance of about a mile. The pilot then sighted the red and white lights of the Chanonry bearing about N.E. from the Leverington. The Leverington held on her W.N.W. course for about twenty minutes, and had again got out of the red sector of the Flatholm Light, and into the white sector, and had just passed the Wolves when the Chanonry appeared to be approaching the Leverington's starboard quarter very rapidly, apparently under a starboard helm. The Leverington's helm was thereupon put hard-a-starboard, and the Chanonry was hailed to port, but no answer was given, although it was admitted the hailing was heard, and she came on and struck the Leverington on her starboard side just before the bridge. At the time of the collision the Leverington's head had been brought under her starboard helm to about W. The weather was clear, and the ships and the land could be seen at a distance of a mile without lights.

The Chanonry, a screw steamship of 578 tons register, 95-horse power, and manned by a crew of twenty hands all told, left Newport the same evening, laden with a cargo of railway iron, and bound for Genoa. She was in charge of a licensed pilot; and she was the fourth vessel to leave the docks after the Leverington, so that, as found by the court, she left about twenty or twenty-five minutes after that vessel. On entering the Channel the Chanonry's head was put S.W. by W., and her pilot soon afterwards sighted the white light of the Flatholm. The Chanonry was kept on this course, passing the Monkstone Beacon to the northward and westward and sighting the red light of the Flatholm. When the red light of the Flatholm bore S. by E. $\frac{1}{2}$ E. or thereabouts, her helm was starboarded, and her head brought to W. by N., the proper channel course. The Leverington was not seen by the pilot or crew of the Chanonry till six or seven minutes after the latter vessel's helm was starboarded. The pilot thought the Leverington was a ship at anchor without lights, he having already passed two vessels at anchor without lights. The two vessels were then about two ships' lengths from each other. Her helm was immediately put hard a port, and she came up about a point, but she then struck the Leverington as described. The look-out on board the Chanonry did not come on duty until about five or six minutes before the collision.

The petition filed on behalf of the owners of the Leverington pleaded that "a good look-out was not kept on board the Chanonry," and that "those on board the Chanonry improperly neglected or omitted to comply with the 17th Article of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea." The answer filed on behalf of the owners of the Chanonry pleaded that "those on board the Leverington improperly neglected to keep the Leverington out of the way of the Chanonry"; that "some time before the said collision, the helm of the Leverington was improperly ported"; that "before the said collision, the helm of the Leverington was not duly and promptly starboarded;" that "those on board the Leverington improperly omitted to blow the whistle of the Leverington, or to show a light, or to take any proper measures for warning those on board the Chanonry of the position of the Leverington, although from the relative position of the two ships the regulation lights of the Leverington were not visible from the Chanonry."

There was a cross cause instituted by the owners of the Chanonry against the Leverington, and both causes were heard at the same time before the Judge assisted by Trinity Masters.

Butt, Q.C. (W. G. F. Phillimore with him), for the plaintiffs.—These vessels were not crossing. They were bound practically in the same direction, and therefore came within Article 17 of the Regulations. The Chanonry was overtaking the Leverington within the meaning of that rule. The Leverington was heading W.N.W., and the Chanonry W. by N. just before the collision. There was only one point difference between their courses. That difference cannot take them out of the rule. If they were crossing vessels, the Chanonry should not have ported; they should have starboarded and gone under our stern. Even three or four points' difference in the courses of two vessels ought not to make them into crossing vessels if one is going faster than the other, and overtakes the other. One vessel coming up behind another ought not to be allowed to rely upon her greater speed for the purpose of bringing the two vessels within the operation of the crossing rule. The real test is whether, if their speed had been equal, would their courses have intersected. The greater speed of the one cannot relieve her from the responsibility cast upon her by the rule as to following ships.

The Judge and Trinity Masters here retired to consult, and on their return

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—After conference with the Elder Brethren, I am of opinion that the two vessels are within the following rule, namely, that one vessel overtaking another shall get out of the way of the other. A prima facie case has been made out on behalf of the plaintiffs, the owners of the Leverington, and the defendants have therefore the onus thrown upon them of showing excuse for the collision as in the case of a ship at anchor.

Clarkson (Milward, Q.C. with him), for the defendants.—The vessels could not have been following one another. At the time of the collision we, according to the evidence, were W. by N., and the Leverington was heading W. If this is true, there could have been no collision. The Chanonry must have starboarded or the Leverington ported to have caused a collision at all. The Chanonry did not port, and the Leverington must therefore have starboarded. The Leverington ought to have whistled, or shown a light over her stern. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Is there any authority requiring a vessel to show a light under such circumstances?] No. But by the common law, apart from any statutory provisions, such a precaution ought to have been taken when our vessel was seen approaching from such a direction that we could not see any of the lights of the Leverington. Such a precaution is required by the ordinary rules of the sea under Article 19; these were special circumstances calling for a departure from the ordinary rules as to ships' lights.

Butt, Q.C. for the plaintiffs.

Clarkson in reply.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is a cause of collision instituted on behalf of the owners of the Leverington against the Chanonry. The collision occurred on 4th Dec. of last year in the Bristol Channel between the Flatholm and Lavernock Point. The Leverington, a screw steamer of 679 tons register and 99-horse power, manned by a crew of twenty-seven hands, left the docks at Newport in Monmouthshire on the evening of 4th Dec. with a cargo of railway iron, bound for Odessa. The Chanonry was a screw steamship of 578 tons register and 95-horse power manned by a crew of twenty hands all told, and also left Newport on the same evening, bound for Genoa with a cargo of railway iron. There was a considerable difference in the evidence as to the actual time when the two vessels left Newport, but I think the fair inference from the whole of the evidence on this point is that the Leverington left twenty-five or thirty minutes before the Chanonry. Both vessels were bound in the same direction, but the Leverington steered a course outside the Monkstone Beacon; the Chanonry went inside the Beacon. Whilst steering that course the Leverington was heading S.S.W.; she kept on this course till within three quarters of a mile of the Flatholm Light, when she ported eight points, which brought her to W.N.W.; she remained on this latter course till just before the collision, when she starboarded, bringing herself to W. at the time of the collision. The Chanonry was aware of the fact that the Leverington was ahead of her; and at the same time the Leverington knew that the Chanonry was following, and in fact the Leverington saw the Chanonry from the time she left the river Usk. The Chanonry steered S.W. by W. until she changed the Flatholm light from red to white, then she altered her course to W. by N. The first question the court has to decide is whether the Chanonry is to be considered a following vessel within the meaning of the 17th Article of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, which article is as follows: "Every vessel overtaking any other vessel shall keep out of the way of the said last-mentioned vessel." It was contended on behalf of the Chanonry that the vessels must be considered as crossing vessels within the meaning of the 14th Article, and on the part of the Leverington that the 17th Article applied. After consultation with the Elder Brethren, I have no hesitation in saying that the Chanonry must be treated as a following vessel. I agree with the remark made by Mr. Butt that she cannot evade the obligation imposed upon her as a vessel overtaking another by going so much faster than the Leverington that at some period she got on a course, which would, if continued, have carried her across the course of the Leverington. Another contention, strongly pressed by Mr. Clarkson, was that even if the Chanonry was to be considered as a following vessel, it was still incumbent upon the Leverington by the common law of the sea—not by statute law, but by the common law as founded upon common sense applied to nautical matters—to give some signal to warn vessels of her position, either by sounding her whistle, or showing a light to vessels astern. Although I am not disposed to hold that under no circumstances must the followed vessel give some such signal, yet I am bound to say that this is a course which should be rarely adopted, because it must be remembered that if fancy lights or signals, other than those provided by the regulations, are used they may mislead following vessels, and may occasion great difficulty in judging of the position or course of the vessel making the signal. I am of opinion that the necessity for exhibiting such a signal depends entirely upon the character of the night, and upon the circumstances of each particular case. After a careful survey of all the evidence I have come to the conclusion that vessels without lights could have been seen at the distance of half a mile on the night in question. According to the preliminary acts—which are documents affording most valuable information to the court on such subjects, because they are filed before the pinch of the case is known—it is stated on the part of the Leverington that the weather was “fine and tolerably clear,” and on the part of the Chanonry that it was “slightly hazy, frosty.” This makes it quite evident that the night was not dark; and this is supported by the Chanonry's evidence that those on board her saw the Leverington at the distance of half a mile. Other evidence bearing on this point is the question of speed. The Chanonry was going at full speed in a channel where there were many vessels at anchor, and, according to his evidence, her pilot actually thought that the Leverington herself was at anchor. Vessels must have been easily distinguished from on board the Chanonry to have justified her in going at such a speed in that place. The Leverington's evidence is consistent with this, as at no time could the Chanonry have seen her lights. On the whole I am quite clear that there were no special circumstances requiring the exhibition of a light as a peculiar signal on the part of the Leverington. It is also to be remarked that the Chanonry was not very carefully navigated; there was no look-out on the fore-castle till seven minutes before the collision, and, moreover, it was admitted that the hailing by the Leverington's crew to the Chanonry to put her helm to port and hard a port was heard on board the Chanonry, but that no answer was given to it. It was argued with great force that the Leverington must have ported or that the Chanonry must have starboarded to have brought them into the position in which they were at the moment of collision, and that, whereas the evidence of the Chanonry proves that she never starboarded, the Leverington must have ported. Now, looking to Article 17, and to the fact that I do not consider that the evidence on the part of the Chanonry has proved her case—that the Leverington ported—I am of opinion that the Chanonry is not discharged from the obligation cast upon her in this case, viz., that as the following vessel she was bound to keep out of the way of the Leverington. This being so, I pronounce the Chanonry alone to blame.

Collision—Fishing vessel attached to her nets—Onus of proof—Practice.

In a cause of damage on behalf of a fishing smack, injured by collision whilst attached to her nets, an allegation in the defendants' answer, that the plaintiffs neglected to comply with the provisions of the Sea Fisheries Act 1868, as to lights, throws upon the plaintiffs the onus of proof and the obligation to begin, contrary to the usual rule that a fishing vessel attached to her nets, being in the same position as a vessel at anchor, has the right to require a vessel coming into collision with her to begin and show excuse for the collision.

THIS was a cause of damage instituted on behalf of the fishing yawl York, against the billyboy sloop Bottle Imp, and her owners intervening. The petition of the plaintiffs alleged that on the 27th Aug. 1872, about 2 a.m., the York was riding head to wind attached to her nets, and stationary, about fifteen miles off the mouth of the river Humber, with the Spurn Light bearing W.N.W.; that she, in accordance with the regulations for preventing collisions at sea, duly exhibited a bright white light, and that a good look-out was kept; that the Bottle Imp, although hailed from the York, came into collision with that vessel and sank her. The petition charged the Bottle Imp with neglecting to keep clear of the York, and with not taking in due time measures for that purpose.

The defendants' answer, after setting out that the Bottle Imp had become unmanageable by the loss of her headsails through the violence of the wind, alleged that “the York improperly neglected to exhibit the lights required by the Sea Fisheries Act 1868.”

This was denied by the plaintiffs' reply.

The Sea Fisheries Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 45), which is an Act to carry into effect a convention between Her Majesty and the Emperor of the French concerning the fisheries in the seas adjoining the British Isles and France, and to amend the laws relating to British fisheries, enacts (sect. 20) that Articles 13 & 14 of the Convention shall have the same force as if they were regulations respecting lights within the meaning of the Acts relating to Merchant Shipping. Article 13 provides that “boats fishing with drift nets shall carry on one of their masts two lights, one over the other three feet apart. These lights shall be kept up during all the time their nets shall be in the sea between sunset and sunrise.”

E. C. Clarkson (Gibson with him), for the plaintiffs, submitted that the defendants ought to begin, as the York was attached to her nets and stationary, and therefore in the same position as if she was at anchor. The allegation in the answer does not say that the neglect contributed to the collision.

Butt, Q.C. (Gainsford Bruce with him), for the defendants.—Proven if the York was practically in the same position as if she were at anchor, the defendants' answer charges her crew with neglecting to exhibit proper lights. This is a specific charge against the plaintiffs, and they must therefore show that this neglect did not contribute to the collision. There was no need to aver in the answer that the neglect caused the collision; it is implied.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—As the plaintiffs are charged with neglect in not exhibiting the lights required by the Act, and the answer must be taken to imply that the neglect to exhibit those lights contributed to the collision, I think the plaintiff must begin. But it must be understood that I do not mean in any way to imply that, in the absence of such a charge, I should not hold that, inasmuch as the plaintiffs' vessel was attached to her nets, and in a similar position to a vessel at anchor, the plaintiffs were entitled to call upon the defendants to begin.

HART v. HERWIG.

Foreign contract—Purchase of foreign ship—Specific performance—Injunction.

The court has power to grant specific performance of a contract to purchase a ship.

A., an Englishman, entered into a contract at Hamburg to purchase from B., a foreigner, a foreign ship, then on her homeward voyage to Cork, possession to be given on discharge of the cargo at any port whither she might be ordered.

The vessel was ordered to Sunderland and discharged her cargo.

The court granted to A. specific performance against B., who was out of the jurisdiction, and restrained the removal of the vessel from Sunderland.

THE plaintiff Henry T. Hart, was a shipowner, and the defendant, Herwig, who was a German, living at Hamburg, was the owner of a foreign vessel called the Hertha, which, at the time of the agreement mentioned below was on a voyage from San Francisco to Cork. On the 16th Jan., the plaintiff and defendant entered into an agreement at Hamburg, for the purchase by the plaintiff of the vessel, the material part of which agreement was as follows:

Agreement made this day between C. W. Herwig, of Hamburg, as vendor, and H. T. Hart, of London, as purchaser, that the former, being the owner of the barque Hertha, agrees to sell, and the latter agrees to purchase, the said vessel, with her stores, provisions, and materials for the sum of 4750*l.* The vessel is expected from San Francisco, having left 11th October last, on or before, 25th or 30th April in Channel for orders to port of discharge, but the purchaser takes possession of the vessel immediately after the delivery of the homeward cargo at any place whither she may be ordered, the seller paying all expenses and charges that may be incurred up to the date of delivery of the ship. In case of the vessel arriving at her port of discharge in a damaged state, over and above ordinary wear and tear, or under average the seller to make corresponding allowance for the same.

HENRY THOMLINSON HART.
C. W. HERWIG.

Hamburg, 16th January, 1873.

The Hertha duly arrived at Cork, and on the defendant's order proceeded to Sunderland as her port of discharge, where she arrived in the month of March 1873.

The plaintiff thereupon claimed to have the vessel delivered up to him on payment of his purchase money, after making a deduction in respect of damage which she had sustained above ordinary wear and tear, but the captain, on the defendant's instructions, refused to hand over the vessel except on payment by the plaintiff of the full purchase money. The captain also refused to allow the plaintiff to inspect the vessel, with a view of ascertaining the amount of the damage.

On the 5th April 1873 the plaintiff filed the bill stating that the defendant intended to move the vessel from the port of Sunderland to some port out of the jurisdiction, or otherwise to sell or dispose of her, and prayed specific performance of the agreement, and directions for ascertaining the damage the vessel had suffered, and that the defendant and his servants might in the meantime be restrained from removing or disposing of her. An interim order having already been granted, the plaintiff now moved for the injunction.

*Cotton, Q.C. and Daune*y for the motion, cited De Mattos v. Gibson (4 De G. & J. 276; 32 L. T. Rep. O. S. 268; 33 L. T. Rep. O. S. 193.) They also relied upon the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act 1862, sect. 3.

Sect. 3 is as follows:

It is hereby declared that the expression "beneficial interest," whenever used in the second part of the principal Act, includes interests arising under contract and other equitable interests; and the intention of the said Act is that, without prejudice to the provisions contained in the said Act for preventing notice of trusts from being entered in the register book or received by the registrar, and without prejudice to the powers of disposition and of giving receipts conferred by the said Act on registered owners and mortgagees and without prejudice to the provisions contained in the said Act relating to the exclusions of unqualified persons from the ownership of British ships, equities may be enforced against owners and mortgagees of ships in respect of their interest therein in the same manner as equities may be enforced against them in respect of any other personal property.

Cozens-Hardy (Glasse, Q.C., with him) for the defendant.—The question turns upon sect. 3. of the Act. No contract can prevent the registered owner of a British ship from disposing of it to another person. Can it be otherwise where the owner is a foreigner and the ship a foreign vessel? If specific performance will not be granted, then the injunction will be refused. The jurisdiction of the court is purely personal, and the defendant is out of the jurisdiction. He cited—

THE VICE CHANCELLOR.—This is a motion to restrain the defendant from taking a ship from the port of Sunderland. The plaintiff, who is an Englishman, enters into a contract at Hamburg with the defendant, who is a German, in these terms. [His HONOUR read the contract.] I desire to be understood to say that wherever you enter into a contract to purchase a particular thing, whether it is a jar, or a horse, or a ship, and the purchaser attaches a particular value to it, he may have specific performance. It is argued that this court has no jurisdiction. According to our law, after the contract the plaintiff became the owner of the ship, and I shall assume that that is the law also of Germany until the contrary is shown. I am at a loss to see why the court may not grant specific performance of a contract to sell a ship as well as of any other thing. The plaintiff is entitled to sustain the injunction.

WAUGH v. MORRIS.

Ship and shipping—Charter-party—Illegality—Order in council—Cargo to be taken from alongside—Cargo of hay—The Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 70), s. 78.

By a charter-party made in France between the master of a ship and the agent of the defendant, the charterer, it was stipulated that the ship should proceed to Trouville, a port in France, there load a cargo of pressed hay, and proceed therewith direct to London, and that all cargo should be brought and taken from the ship alongside. At the time the charter-party was entered into there was in existence an order in council, made under the authority of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, sect. 78, prohibiting the landing in any port or place in Great Britain of hay brought from France. Neither party, however, knew, at the time, of the existence of this order in council, but the master of the ship was told by the defendant's agent that the consignees would require the hay to be delivered to them at a particular wharf in Deptford Creek. On arriving in the Thames the master of the ship heard of the existence of the order in council, and could not therefore proceed to the wharf and deliver the cargo. After some delay the defendant received the hay from alongside the ship into another vessel, and exported it. The shipowner having brought an action against the charterer to recover damages in respect of the detention of the ship,

Held, that there was no such illegality in the voyage as entitled the defendant to resist the claim.

Where a contract is to do a thing which cannot be performed without a violation of the law, it is void, whether the parties know the law or not; but in order to avoid a contract which can be legally performed, on the ground that there was an intention to enforce it in an illegal manner, it is necessary to show the existence of a wicked intention to break the law.

THIS was an action brought by a shipowner against the charterer of his vessel, to recover damages for the detention of his vessel.

Declaration that the plaintiff was the owner of a certain ship called the Castor, lying at Trouville, whereof one W. Chappell was master, and thereupon a charter-party was made and entered into by and between the said W. Chappell and one W. Jacques, whereby it was, among other things, provided that the said W. Chappell should let to the said W. Jacques, who accepted the same, the said ship (except the cabin, the lodgings of the crew, and the room necessary for the provisions, and spare store), in good and due condition, staunch, and supplied with all the things necessary to navigate in safety, to load at Trouville (without exceeding what she could reasonably stow and carry), a full and complete cargo of pressed bales of hay, and that ten working days were to be allowed in full for loading and unloading, and the days on demurrage were to be paid day by day at 50s. per day, and that the lay days should begin on a certain day, to wit, on the 7th Oct. 1871; and the plaintiff says that the said W. Jacques shipped on board the ship, under the said charter-party, a certain cargo to be carried on board the said ship from Trouville aforesaid to London, and there delivered upon and according to the terms of a certain bill of lading, which was in the words and figures following, that is to say,

Shipped in good order and well conditioned, by W. Jacques, in and upon the good ship or vessel called the Castor, whereof is master for this voyage W. Chappell, and now riding at anchor in Trouville, and bound for London, about 17 tons of hay in bundles; 11 cases and hamper of wine and spirits; 3 boxes of clothes, being marked and numbered as in the margin, and are to be delivered in the like good order and well-conditioned at the aforesaid port of London; the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all every other danger and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation of whatsoever nature or kind soever excepted, unto order or to assigns, paying freight for the said goods, all conditions as per charter and disbursements, with primage and average accustomed. In witness thereof the master of the said vessel hath affirmed to three bills of lading, all of this tenor and date, one of which bills being accomplished, the others to stand void.

Six days employed for loading the ship in Trouville.

Dated in Trouville, the 13th Oct. 1871. Weight and conditions unknown; ship not accountable for condition of hay.

WILLIAM CHAPPELL.

And the plaintiff says that after the said cargo had been so received on board the said ship, the said W. Jacques indorsed the said bill of lading to the defendant, and upon and by reason of such indorsement, the property in the said cargo passed to the defendant, and the plaintiff says that divers, to wit, six of the ten lay days, were employed in loading the said ship at Trouville aforesaid, and the said cargo was carried on board the said ship from Trouville to London aforesaid, in accordance with the said charter-party and bill of lading, and all conditions were fulfilled, and all things done and happened, and all times elapsed necessary to entitle the plaintiff to have the said ship loaded and discharged within the said ten working days, according to the said bill of lading and charter-party, and to sue the defendant for the breaches hereinafter mentioned. Yet, the said ship was not loaded and discharged within the said ten working days, but was kept and detained for divers, to wit, eighteen days beyond the said ten days, contrary to the said charter-party, whereby the plaintiff lost the use of the said ship, and was put to great expense in providing food and wages for the crew thereof. And the plaintiff says, that though the said ship was kept and detained for divers, to wit, for eighteen days beyond the said ten days, whereby a large sum, to wit, the sum of 45l., became due and payable by the defendant to the plaintiff for and in respect of the demurrage of the said ship; yet the defendant did not pay the same, to wit, the sum of 45l., nor any part thereof, contrary to the said charter-party and bill of lading.

2. And for a second count, the plaintiff sues the defendant for that, before the making of the promise hereinafter mentioned, a certain cargo had been carried into a certain ship of the plaintiff, called The Castor, whereof one W. Chappell was master, from Trouville to London, to be delivered according to the terms of the bill of lading and charter-party in the first count mentioned, and at the time of the making of the promise hereinafter mentioned, the said ship with the said cargo on board was lying in the port of London, and thereupon, in consideration that the plaintiff, at the request of the defendant, would deliver to the defendant the said cargo, and would suffer the defendant to receive the same according to the terms of the said bill of lading and charter-party, the defendant promised the plaintiff that he would discharge the said cargo from the said ship, and receive the same within the time by the said bill of lading and charter-party provided, and the plaintiff says that he did deliver the said cargo to the defendant, and allowed him to receive the same, and all conditions were fulfilled, and all things done and happened, and all times elapsed, necessary to entitle the plaintiff to have the defendant perform his said promise, and discharge the said cargo from the said ship, within the said time, and to sue for the breach hereinafter mentioned; yet the defendant did not discharge the said cargo from the said ship, within the said time, but the said ship was detained for divers, to wit, eighteen days beyond the said time; whereby the plaintiff lost the use of the said ship, and a large sum, to wit, the sum of 45*l.*, became, and is due and owing to the plaintiff for the demurrage thereof. There were also the usual common counts.

Amongst other pleas the defendant pleaded seventh; as to so much of the first count of the declaration, as concerns the hay, parcel of the cargo in the said count mentioned; that Trouville, in the said charter-party and bill of lading in that count mentioned, is a place in the territory of the French Republic, and that the hay agreed on under and by virtue of the aforesaid charter party and bill of lading to be loaded on board the said vessel of the plaintiff, was hay to be loaded at Trouville aforesaid, into a port or place in Great Britain, to wit, into the port of London, and to deliver the same there in accordance with the usage and custom of the said port; that is to say, to land the said hay at a proper landing place within the port of London, and to deliver the same when so landed there; and the defendant says that the hay, in respect of which the claim of the plaintiff in the said count for demurrage and damages for the detention of his ship is made, was the hay so agreed on by the said charter party and bill of lading, to be loaded at Trouville aforesaid, and to be brought as aforesaid, for the purpose aforesaid, into a port or place of Great Britain, to wit, into the port of London, and the defendant says that before and at the time of the making of the said charter party and bill of lading in the said count mentioned, and during all the time the said ship, with the said hay on board, was detained in the said port of London, as in the said count is alleged, there was in full force and unrepealed, a certain Act of Parliament, entitled the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act 1869, and under and by virtue of the said Act a certain Order of Council, made by the Lords of Her Majesty's most honourable Privy Council, bearing date the 9th March 1871, and being in the words and figures following, that is to say, Order of Council (321).

At the Council Chamber, Whitehall, the 9th March, 1871.

By the Lords of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council.

Present: Lord Privy Seal, Mr. Secretary Bruce, Mr. Forster.

The Lords and others of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council, by virtue and in exercise of the powers in them vested under the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act 1869 (in this order referred to as the Act of 1869), and of every other power enabling them in this behalf, do order, and it is hereby ordered as follows:—

1. This order shall take effect from and immediately after the 13th March, 1871, and words in this order to have the same meaning as in the Act of 1869.

2. Cattle brought from any place in the territory of the French Republic, or from any place in Belgium, shall not be landed at any port or place in Great Britain.

3. Cattle, sheep, or goods being, or having been, on board any vessel at the same time with any cattle brought from any such place, as aforesaid, shall not be landed at any port or place in Great Britain.

4. The following articles brought from any such place as aforesaid shall not be landed at any port or place in Great Britain.

Fresh meat, fresh hides, unmelted fat, horns, manure, or hay.

(Signed) ARTHUR HELPS.

And the defendant says that, at the time of making the said charter-party, and during the performance thereof, by loading at Trouville aforesaid the said hay, and bringing the same in the plaintiff's ship into the said port of London, for the purpose of landing the same within the said port according to the custom and usage of the said port, the plaintiff was a British subject owing allegiance to Her Majesty Queen Victoria, and was bound by the provisions of the said Act of Parliament and of the aforesaid order of council. Eighthly, The defendant as to so much of the first count of the declaration as concerns the hay, parcel of the cargo in the said count mentioned, repeats the seventh plea, leaving out all averments as to the usage and custom of the port of London, and instead thereof avers that the plaintiff, by the said charter-party and bill of lading in the said sixth plea mentioned, undertook and agreed in respect of a certain place in Great Britain, to wit, of the port of London, to bring the hay loaded, as in that plea is averred, into the said port, and to deliver the same there, which in respect of the port of London, is an agreement to land the said cargo in the said port, and to deliver it when so loaded.

On these, as well as the other pleas, issue was joined.

The case was tried at the sittings after Michaelmas Term, 1871, before Cockburn, C.J., at Guildhall. From the evidence it appeared that the charter party was made in France, between Wm. Chappell, the master of the Castor, and W. Jacques, the agent of the defendant, the charterer; that by the charter party it was stipulated that the cargo should be brought and taken from the ship alongside; that both Chappell and Jacques were ignorant, at the time the charter party was made, that the Privy Council had made the order prohibiting the landing of hay at any port or place in Great Britain; that Jacques told Chappell that he was, on his arrival in London, to proceed to the Tramway Wharf, in Deptford Creek, where the consignees would require the cargo of hay to be delivered to them; that Chappell promised to go there on his arrival in London, but learned on his arrival in London of the existence of the order in council prohibiting the landing of hay, and therefore did not proceed, as originally intended, to the Tramway Wharf in Deptford Creek; that the vessel was consequently detained for eighteen days in the river Thames, after which period the defendant took the hay from alongside the vessel, and exported it to Belgium. On proof of these facts a verdict was entered for the plaintiff, leave being given to the defendant to move to set aside the verdict and to enter the verdict for the defendant, if the court should be of opinion that the facts were sufficient to establish the defence of illegality set up by the pleas above set out. A rule nisi having been obtained to set aside the verdict and to enter a verdict for the defendant.

Bull, Q. C., and R. E. Webster, showed cause against the rule, and contended that the contract under the charter-party was a perfectly legal one. It is admitted that neither party to the contract knew of the existence of the order in council at the time the contract was entered into. If a contract is capable of being performed without the commission of an illegal act it is valid; and it is submitted that the present was capable of being so performed, as, in fact, it ultimately was. The order in council only prevents the landing of hay, and the contract was not to land, but only to bring and take from alongside. There was nothing in the order of council to make even a licence necessary in the case of transshipment: the licence actually given being merely a Custom House regulation for the protection of the revenue. In Haines v. Busk (5 Taunt. 521) it was held no answer to an action by a broker for commission for procuring freight that the charter-party procured was such that, if the charterer failed to obtain certain licences, the voyage would be illegal; and there are many other cases to a similar effect. In Lewis v. Davison (4 M. & W. 657) Lord Abinger, C.B., said: "I fully assent to the general proposition which has been urged, that an agreement to do an unlawful act cannot be supported in law. But it does not appear to me that that is necessarily the effect of the agreement in the present case; and when the act which is the subject of the contract may, according to the circumstances, be lawful or unlawful, it will not be presumed that the contract was to do the unlawful act, the contrary is the proper inference." In The Teutonia (ante, p. 214; L. Rep. 4 P. C. App. 171; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 48), a Prussian vessel shipped a cargo of nitrate of soda which was contraband of war, under a charter-party by which she was to proceed to Cork, Cowes, or Falmouth, at the option of the master, where he was to receive orders to proceed to any one safe port in Great Britain, or on the Continent between Havre and Hamburg, both included, and there deliver the cargo. The vessel duly called at Falmouth, and received orders on the 11th July for Dunkirk, a French port, for which he at once set sail. On 16th July, off Dunkirk, he was informed by a French pilot, in official uniform, that war had been declared. The master thereupon put back to the Downs to make inquiries, and arrived there on 17th July, a Sunday, and could get no information. He was ordered by his owner not to go to Dunkirk, and on 19th July put into Dover. On the 19th July war was actually declared by France against Prussia; and 23rd July the master refused to go to Dunkirk. On the 1st Aug. the consignors demanded the cargo at Dover without offering freight, but the master refused unless paid freight. It was held by the Privy Council that as there was no improper deviation or delay in not putting into Dunkirk in the first instance, the case was the same as if war had broken out when the vessel first arrived off Dunkirk, and, there being no breach in putting into Dover, the contract was not, under the charter-party, impossible of performance or dissolved by the outbreak of war, but was capable of being substantially performed. "The argument for the appellant," said Mellish, L.J., delivering the judgment of the Privy Council, "assumes that the breaking out of the war rendered the performance of the charter-party illegal, and that, therefore, the contract between the parties was dissolved; and there can be no doubt that the breaking out of the war did render it illegal for the Teutonia to enter any French port, but the question is whether, under the terms of this charter-party, the contract might not still have legally been performed by delivery of the cargo at such other of the ports mentioned in the charter-party as ports at which the cargo might be delivered. The substance of the contract between the parties is that the cargo may be delivered at any one of a great number of ports; that the consignee is to have the selection of the particular port, but that he is bound to select a safe port, i.e., a port at which the master can deliver the cargo and earn his freight; and the question is whether that contract is completely performed by the naming of a port at which it turns out in the event to be impossible to deliver," &c., even supposing that there was some kind of impossibility in the contract that would not necessarily exempt the defendant. In Hill v. Idle (4 Camp. 327) it was held that the consignee of a particular parcel of goods by a general ship, is liable to the owner for not taking them from the ship in a reasonable time, although the delay arose from the necessity for an order from the Treasury to land these goods, which the consignee used the utmost diligence to obtain.

Milward, Q. C., and Maclachlan in support of the rule.—The question is as to the intention of the parties, whether that was to do an illegal act; and their intention is to be collected not from the charter-party alone, but also from the evidence. Now the intention obviously was that the hay should not only be brought to London, but should be landed. In Collins v. Blantern (1 Smith's L. C. 310), the leading case on this subject, the contract was good on the face of it, the illegality being shown by evidence collaterally. In the notes to that case it is said: "The principle established in Collins v. Blantern, viz., that illegality may be pleaded as a defence to an action on a deed, has been so often recognised, and is so well settled as law, that it would be useless to enter upon any long discussion respecting it." [BLACKBURN, J.—In that case there was a wicked intention to frustrate the law; there was none such here.] Ignorantia legis neminem excusat. Sect 78 of 32 & 33 Vict. c. 20, enacts that "the Privy Council may from time to time by order make such regulations as they think expedient for prohibiting or regulating the landing of any hay, straw, fodder, or other article brought from any place out of the United Kingdom, whereby it appears to the Privy Council contagion, or infection may be conveyed to animals, or for causing the same to be destroyed if landed. If any person lands, or attempts to land, any hay, straw, fodder, or other article in contravention of any such order, the same shall be forfeited in like manner as goods, the importation whereof is prohibited by the Acts relating to the customs, are liable to be forfeited, and the person so offending shall be liable to such penalties as are imposed on persons importing or attempting to import goods, the importation whereof is prohibited by the Acts relating to the Customs, without prejudice to any proceeding against him under this Act," &c. Under this power the Privy Council made an order prohibiting the landing of hay at any port or place in Great Britain, and this order was made before the charter-party was entered into, so that the contract contained in the charter was wholly illegal. [BLACKBURN, J.—But there was no intention to break the law of England, neither was there any contract which could be enforced to land the hay in Deptford Creek. COCKBURN, C.J.—If one of two innocent parties is to suffer, it would be rather hard that the shipowner should have to do so, who has performed his part of the contract.] If the charter-party is taken along with the direction to the master of the ship to take it to the wharf, and the master's assent, one must perceive the existence of a clear intention to land a cargo which was prohibited by the order in council. The contract was to put the hay over the ship's side in the river, i.e., to put it into lighters. Now any such attempt to land the hay would have been a cause of forfeiture. [BLACKBURN, J.—The agreement to deliver the hay into lighters does not show that the plaintiff knew what would be done with it afterwards. I see nothing illegal in transshipping the hay, so long as it was not landed.] In Brereton v. Chapman (7 Bing. 559) it was held that the lay days allowed by a charter-party for a ship's discharge are to be reckoned from the time of her arrival at the usual place of discharge, and not at the port merely, though she should for the purposes of navigation, discharge some of her cargo at the entrance of the port, before arriving at the usual place of discharge. In Muller v. Gernon (3 Taunt. 393) it was held that an order of council permitting the consignee of goods coming from an enemy's country without a licence, to land them here, on condition of immediately re-exporting them, does not so legalise the voyage as to enable the master of the ship to recover his freight. [COCKBURN, C.J.—The contract in that case was to land the goods, which was clearly illegal. BLACKBURN, J.—Such an illegality would no doubt make the contract void.] In Forster v. Taylor (5 B. & Ad. 887), in an action by a farmer to recover the price of fifteen firkins of butter sold by him to defendant, it appeared that the firkins were not branded with the Christian and surname of the cooper who made the vessel, or of the dairyman who sold the butter, as required by 36 Geo. 3, c. 88, and the court held that the provisions which required the vessel to be branded with the name of the cooper, seller, &c., being intended for the protection of the public against fraud, indirectly prohibited any sale of butter in vessels not properly marked; that the subject matter of this contract was in such a state, from the vessels not being properly marked, that the sale of it was forbidden by Act of Parliament, and consequently that the contract of sale was void, and the plaintiff could not recover. [BLACKBURN, J.—That does not support your contention as to the parties in the present case, who innocently entered into a contract which it afterwards turned out could not be performed.] To perform the contract in the present case, as that contract was intended to be performed by the parties, was illegal. Why put a construction upon the contract which the parties never intended? In Stevens v. Gowley (7 C. B., N. S. 99), a contract for the erection of a building in contravention of the provisions of the Metropolitan Building Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 122) was held void. Cunard v. Hyde (29 L. J. 6, Q. B.) is an authority to the same effect. In that case, it being provided by 16 & 17 Vict. c. 107, ss. 170, 171, and 172, that before any clearing officer permits any ship, wholly or in part laden with timber or wood goods, to clear out from any British port in North America or Honduras for any port in the United Kingdom, at any time after the 1st Sept. or before the 1st May in any year, he shall ascertain that the whole of the cargo is below deck, and shall give the master a certificate to that effect, and no master of such ship shall sail without such certificate; and the master is forbidden to place upon the deck any part of the cargo after he has received such certificate, and if he does so, or sails without such certificate, he is to pay a penalty; the plaintiffs, who were interested in the cargo of a ship, coming within the above provisions, about to set sail to the United Kingdom, gave orders for the insurance of the cargo after the 1st Sept., knowing at the time that part of the cargo was on deck, and intending that the vessel should sail after the 1st Sept. and before the 1st May with such cargo on deck, and the insurance was effected by the plaintiffs for the purpose of covering the said cargo, and the freight thereof, including the portion above deck. The ship having been lost, and an action having been brought upon the policy, it was held that the whole voyage was illegal, and that the plaintiffs could not recover. In Elliott v. Richardson (5 L. Rep. P. C. 744) an agreement by a shareholder in a company which was being compulsorily wound up, that in consideration of a pecuniary equivalent, he would endeavour to postpone the making of a call, or would support the claim of a creditor was held to be illegal as contrary to the policy of the Winding-up Acts. Staines v. Wainwright (6 Bing. N. C. 174) is an authority to the same effect. The master of the ship would have been bound to go to the dock named on his arrival in London: (The Felix, 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 100; L. Rep. 2 Adm. 273.)

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 24, 1873.—The judgment of the court (COCKBURN, C.J., BLACKBURN and MELLOR, JJ.), was now delivered as follows by BLACKBURN, J.: This is an action brought by the owner of a ship against the charterers for detaining the ship, in which the plaintiff has obtained a verdict subject to leave to move to enter the verdict for the defendant, if the facts proved establish a plea of illegality. On the trial before the Lord Chief Justice, the material facts appeared to be that the charter-party was made in France, between the agents of the defendant and the master of the ship. By this charter-party it was stipulated that the ship should proceed to Trouville, a port in France, and there load a cargo of pressed hay, and proceed therewith direct to London, and a term in the charter-party was to the effect that all cargo should be brought and taken from the ship alongside. The defendant's agent verbally told the master that the consignees would require the hay to be delivered to them at a particular wharf in Deptford Creek, and that he should proceed there on his arrival in London, and this the master promised to do. On arriving in the Thames, the master proposed to proceed to the wharf, but then for the first time learned that by an order in Council, made under the authority of the Cattle Diseases Acts, France was declared to be an infected country, and it was made illegal to land in Great Britain any hay brought from that country. He could not, therefore, proceed to the wharf and there deliver the cargo, for that would have been landing the hay, and illegal. After some delay, the defendants received the cargo from alongside the ship in the river, into another vessel, and exported it. There was no legal objection to this being done, but during the interval, eighteen days beyond the lay days elapsed, and it was for this detention that the plaintiff recovered. It appeared that the order in council had been made and published before the charter-party was entered into, but that, in fact, neither the master of the ship nor the defendant's agents were aware that it had been made. A rule was obtained which was argued in Michaelmas Term before the Lord Chief Justice, my brother Mellor, and myself, when the court took time to consider. We are of opinion that the rule should be discharged. The charter-party provides that the cargo was to be taken from alongside; and that being so, the consignee might select any legal and reasonable place within the port, at which to take it from alongside. He by his agent in France named this wharf, which he supposed, erroneously, to be a legal place, and the master under the same mistake, assented to this, as indeed he would have no right to refuse if it had really been a legal place. But when it turned out that the defendants had named a place for the performance of the contract, where the performance was impossible because illegal, that did not put an end to the contract, if the performance of any other way was legal and practicable. In the present case the performance, by receiving the cargo alongside in the river without landing it at all, was both legal and practicable. See The Teutonia (ante, p. 214; L. Rep. 4 P. C. 172), a case which would have been precisely in point if the order in council rendering the landing illegal, had come into operation after the contract was made instead of before. It was on the fact that the order in council existed at the time the contract was made that the argument for the defendant was mainly grounded. It was said that the intention of both parties was that the hay was to be landed; that, therefore, they intended to violate the law, and that it may be shown by extraneous evidence that a contract on the face of it perfectly legal is void, because made with intent to violate the law; and that ignorance of the law makes no difference. But we think, in the first place, that it is a mistake to say that the plaintiff intended that the hay should be landed. He, no doubt, contemplated and expected that the hay would be landed, for, except under very unusual circumstances, hay is not brought into the Thames for any other object; but all that the shipowner bargained for, and all that he can properly be said to have intended, was that on the arrival of the ship in London, his freight should be paid, and the hay taken out of his ship. If, unexpectedly, there had arisen a great demand for hay abroad, like that which existed when our army was in the Crimea, the consignee might have transhipped the hay, and exported it without the shipowner having the slightest ground for complaining that his intention was frustrated. We agree that a contract, lawful in itself, is illegal, if it be entered into with the object that the law should be violated; if, as it is expressed in Pearce v. Brooks (L. Rep. 1 Ex. 213), it is done for the very object of satisfying an illegal purpose; or as it is expressed in McKinnell v. Robinson (3 M. & W. 442), "for the express purpose of the violation of the law." But in the present case the shipowner never did contemplate or believe that the defendant would violate the law. He contemplated that the defendant would land the goods, which he thought was lawful; but if he had thought at all of the possibility of the landing being prohibited, he would probably have expected that the defendant would in that case not violate the law. And he would have been right in fact in that expectation, for the defendant did not attempt to land the goods. We quite agree that where a contract is to do a thing which cannot be performed without a violation of the law, it is void, whether the parties knew the law or not. But we think that in order to avoid a contract which can be legally performed on the ground that there was an intention to perform it in an illegal manner it is necessary to show that there was the wicked intention to break the law. And if this be so, the knowledge of what the law is becomes of great importance. No one could for a moment contend that if everything happening in France had happened within the jurisdiction of our country the plaintiff and defendant's agent could have been successfully indicted for a conspiracy to violate the law by landing these goods; for there would have been a want of mens rea. And it seems to us that the mens rea is as necessary to avoid a contract, which can be legally performed, because when it was made it was with the object of satisfying an illegal purpose, as it is to render the parties criminally responsible.

THE ANNETTE.

COURT OF ADMIRALTY.

THE ANNETTE,

Salvage—Appeal from the Cinque Ports Commissioners—Tender—Pleading—Practice.

On appeal by the owners of a salvaged ship from a salvage award made by the Cinque Ports Commissioners, the appellants may, without filing pleadings, place upon the file of the court a tender, although no tender was made before the commissioners, and the respondents are bound to accept or reject a tender so made.

An appeal from an award of Cinque Ports Commissioners being in the nature of a rehearsing, pleadings may be filed and new evidence given by the appellants, although at the imminent risk of costs; and, consequently, the question of the value of the salvaged property, although agreed before the commissioners, may be reopened on appeal.

This was an appeal from an award of the Cinque Ports Salvage Commissioners, made by them in a claim of salvage on behalf of the master and crew of the lugger Victoria, of Walmer, for services rendered to the French brig Annette. The value of the ship and cargo agreed upon before the commissioners was 8500*l.*; no tender was then made, and the commissioners made an award of 800*l.* From this award the owners of the Annette and her cargo instituted a cause of appeal in the High Court of Admiralty, and on Jan. 13, 1873, their proctor filed in the registry of that court, and served on the respondents' solicitors, the following notice of tender:—

Take notice, that I have this day paid into the Bank of England, to the credit of the Registrar of the High Court of Admiralty of England in this cause, the sum of 100*l.*, which sum I hereby tender to your parties for their services proceeded for in this cause, together with costs due by law, thereby meaning taxed costs in this cause. Dated this 13th day of January, 1873.

H. G. STOKES.

It had been agreed between the parties that the appeal should be heard without pleadings or further evidence, and upon the record of the proceedings before the commissioners. On the 21st Jan., the respondents having taken no notice of the tender, the appellants' proctor moved the judge in Chambers to direct the respondents either to accept or reject the tender, but on the respondents' solicitors objecting that there was no power to make a tender under the circumstances the judge refused to make any order requiring the respondents either to accept or reject the tender, and intimated that any further question as to the tender should be argued in court. Thereupon the respondents' solicitors filed the following notice of motion:—

We, Lowless, Nelson and Jones, solicitors for the respondents in this cause, will move the judge in court, by counsel, on Tuesday, 28th Jan. 1873, to direct that the tender of the appellants may be taken off the file of proceedings in this cause, on the ground that the appellants have no right to make such a tender, having the judgment of a competent court in their favour for an amount with which they are satisfied.

This motion now came on before the court.

E. C. Clarkson, for the respondents, in support of the motion. The appellants have no right on appeal to make a tender which was not made at the hearing before the commissioners. Payment into court and tender is in the nature of a plea, and can only be made in the court below. The court has refused to compel the plaintiffs to accept or reject the tender, and it is a question whether the tender should be allowed to remain upon the file, to act as a matter of prejudice in the mind of the court in considering whether the amount awarded is a proper salvage remuneration.

W. G. F. Phillimore, for the appellants, contra.—There is no dispute as to a salvage service having been rendered. The tender is made for the purpose of avoiding condemnation in costs. When a salvage award is reversed, the court will not ordinarily give costs.

The Thomas and William, 10 Id. 215.

A tender has been made in a similar case on appeal to this Court: (Pritchard's Admiralty Digest, p. 107, note 16.) The argument as to appeals does not apply. This appeal is not from the magistrates but from the commissioners of the Cinque Ports, and is rather in the nature of a new trial, with certain facts already found, than an appeal (see 1 & 2 Geo. 4, c. 76, s. 4). (a) As to the argument that the appellants cannot tender because a tender is in the nature of a plea, it has been decided that in these appeals pleadings may be filed and fresh evidence may be adduced, although at the peril of costs. (The Thomas Wood, 1 W. Rob. 18.) In appeals from magistrates, the court refuses to admit fresh evidence, except for strong reasons, but can do so in its discretion (The Generous, 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 552; L. Rep. 2 Adm. & Ecc. 57; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 40), and there is also a discretionary power to admit fresh evidence on objection to the registrar's reports: (The Flying Fish, 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 619; Lush. 436; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 221.) These cases show the distinction between the different classes of appeals. In the Caledonia, (b)

(a) Sect. 4. And be it further enacted, that in case the party or parties so claiming to be entitled to salvage or compensation for services rendered as aforesaid, or the party or parties who are to pay the same or their agents, shall be dissatisfied with such award and decision of the commissioners, it shall and may be lawful for either of them respectively, within eight days after such award is made, but not afterwards, to declare to the commissioners his or their desire of obtaining the judgment of some competent Court of Admiralty respecting the said salvage or compensation, &c.

(b) THE CALEDONIA.

THIS was an appeal from the Cinque Ports Commissioners (not reported). Salvage services were rendered on the 16th Jan. 1869, by the lugger Seaman's Glory, of Kingsdown, in the county of Kent, to the British barque Caledonia, whilst in distress near the Goodwin Sands. At the hearing before the commissioners, it was agreed on the statement made by the owners of the Caledonia, that the value of that vessel, her cargo and freight, were to be taken at 6370*l.* The commissioners heard the case on the written statements of the claimants and of the master of the Caledonia. Upon the deposition of the master of the Caledonia, made before the receiver of wreck, and upon oral evidence given before them, the commissioners awarded to the claimants the sum of 130*l.* From this award the salvors appealed to the High Court of Admiralty, filed in that court the certificate of proceedings before the commissioners, and on the 13th Feb. 1869, filed a petition, setting out the facts, and pleading inter alia:

"17. The aggregate value of the Caledonia, her cargo and freight, at the time of the aforesaid services, were represented by the owners thereof or their agents to be the sum of 6370*l.* and upon such representation the values thereof were agreed before the said commissioners at the sum of 6370*l.*, but they largely exceeded that sum."

The practice of the court up to this time had been for the appellants, by leave of the judge, to file proceedings subject to a condemnation in costs, should the court be of opinion at the hearing that such a course had been taken unnecessarily. About the time this appeal was instituted, however, the present learned judge had intimated that he should not allow pleadings to be filed or further evidence adduced on appeals, unless he was satisfied that such a course was absolutely necessary for doing justice to the parties. The respondents' proctors having, on this ground, given notice to the appellants' solicitors that they should oppose the admission of the petition, the appellants' solicitors filed a notice of motion that they should "by counsel, on the 23d Feb. 1869, move the judge in court to direct that the plaintiffs may be at liberty to file a petition and to go into evidence in this cause." In support of this notice of motion, the appellants' solicitors filed an affidavit, stating that "the facts attending the salvage services of the appellants, and which form the subject of this cause, are not stated in such a full and sufficient manner in the said copy proceedings (before the commissioners) as to enable this it was held, that in an appeal from the Cinque Port Commissioners, it was competent to parties to file pleadings and give evidence, although evidence had been taken below. If pleadings can be filed a tender may be made. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Do you not introduce a new element into the case so that you may escape costs?] The procedure below renders it impossible to make a formal tender. The parties are summarily brought before the commissioners, and the proceedings are of the shortest nature. Moreover, a tender below would not affect the question of costs, as the commissioners would, even if they did not exceed the tender in their award, give the amount of the tender with costs. There is a distinction between these appeals and those from County Courts, as in the latter cases a tender can be made formally below.

E. C. Clarkson, in reply.—If the tender is one which the parties need neither accept nor refuse, then it is nugatory. A tender below need not be made in court, but to the parties, and such a tender should have been made. The respondents have a right to maintain the award, and it is unjust to force upon them a new issue in the appellate court.

James P. Aspinall, as amicus curiæ, referred the court to The Lord Goderich (10 Monthly Law Magazine, 217).

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 11.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—A not unimportant question of practice has been raised in this honourable court properly to determine the amount to be awarded to the said appellants in respect of their said salvage services."

The respondents' solicitors thereupon filed a counter notice of motion, that they should "by counsel, on the 23rd Feb. 1869, move the judge in court (in the event of admitting the petition), to direct the 17th article thereof to be struck out."

The two motions came on for hearing at the same time, on the 23rd Feb. 1869.

E. C. Clarkson, for the appellants, cited The Thomas Wood (1 W. Rob. 18), and contended that on the authority of that case pleadings might be filed and evidence given.

R. A. Pritchard, for the respondents, objected to the petition, and also to the question of values being reopened, as they had already been agreed upon.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE held, that he was bound, on the authority of The Thomas Wood (ubi sup.), to admit the petition, but that the appellants adopted the course of causing pleadings to be filed at the imminent risk of costs; and, as to the 17th article of the petition, that, as he was bound to admit the petition, and so to allow a rehearing of the whole case, he was also bound to allow the plaintiffs, if they required it, to reopen the question of values.

June 8, 1869.—The appeal came on for hearing, and on the appellants tendering new evidence to be taken orally in court.

Butt, Q.C. (Pritchard with him) for the respondents, objected to the evidence being received on the appeal, unless it were shown that it was noviter perventum.

Dr. Deane, Q.C. (Clarkson with him) for the appellants, submitted that the question had already been decided on the motion on the 23rd Feb. 1869; that appeals from Cinque Port Commissioners differed from other salvage appeals, and that, therefore, the law laid down in The Generous (17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 552; L. Rep. 2 Adm. & Ecc. 18; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 40), did not apply, but that on the authority of The Thomas Wood (ubi sup.), such evidence must be admitted in these appeals.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE held that he had already decided the matter, considering himself bound by the Thomas Wood, and the evidence must be admitted.

The case was heard upon the evidence taken below, and upon new evidence given orally and by affidavit, and the award below was reversed, and 250*l.* awarded.

case, both in chambers and in court before me—namely, whether in an appeal from the salvage commissioners a tender, not made before them, can on appeal be made in this court. The case of The Lord Goderich (10 Monthly Law Mag. 217), to which Mr. Aspinall, jun., as amicus curiæ, was so good as to refer the court, seems to show that Dr. Lushington allowed such a tender to be made. I have looked at some other cases on the same subject, reported a long time ago in the Monthly Law Magazine during the interval in which the regular reports of the court were for a while superseded. It appears, therefore, that there is a precedent for such a tender, and on principle it is not objectionable. The object of making a tender is to affect the decision as to costs. The respondent is in possession of the judgment in the court below, and has a right, if he pleases, to rely entirely upon it. On the other hand, the appellant is entitled to contend that the court below has erred, not in awarding salvage at all, but in the amount of the award and to tender, as a corrective of their judgment, a smaller amount, and the appellate court, if it should be of opinion that the lesser sum is sufficient, may consider that the rejected proposal should affect the question of costs in the case before it. I therefore allow the tender to remain upon the file, and in future, overruling my decision in Chambers, I shall require the tender to be accepted or rejected, but in the present case I shall give no costs.

THE MURILLO.

Collision—Interrogatories before petition—Disputed ownership—Practice.

The Court of Admiralty has power to order interrogatories to be administered to a defendant before the plaintiff has filed his petition.

When a cause of collision was instituted in personam against a defendant as owner of a ship, and the defendant entered an appearance, alleging himself to be "improperly sued as one of the owners" of the ship, the Court of Admiralty allowed interrogatories to be administered by the plaintiff to the defendant for the purpose of ascertaining the ownership before the plaintiff's petition was filed.

THIS was a cause of collision instituted on behalf of the owners of the ship Northfleet, and of certain of the owners of cargo lately laden on board that vessel, in personam, against "Robert McAndrew and others," the owners of the Spanish steamship Murillo. An appearance had been entered in this cause on behalf of Robert McAndrew, "improperly sued as one of the owners of the Murillo." No petition was filed, and the plaintiffs moved the court to direct the defendant Robert McAndrew to answer the following interrogatories:—

1. When did you first become connected with the steamship Murillo, and what was the nature of your first connection with that vessel?
2. Did not you or your firm, on and previous to the—Jan. 1873, act as managers or brokers in London for the steamship Murillo, and what was the nature of your connection with the said steamship at the aforesaid date?
3. Was not the steamship Murillo built by or purchased from Messrs. Randolph, Elder, and Co., under orders or directions from you or your firm; and, if not by whose orders and under whose directions was she built by and purchased from Messrs. Randolph and Co.? Was any contract entered into between you or your firm, or any person on your behalf, or on behalf of your firm, with the builders of the said ship or with any other person with reference to the building or purchase of the said ship? Give the state of every such contract or contracts. State fully your connection with the building or purchase of the said vessel?

4. Did you order or purchase the Murillo on your own account, or on account of yourself, or any other person, or entirely on account of persons other than yourself? State fully on whose account the Murillo was ordered to be built or purchased; and in case you allege that she was ordered, or built, or purchased, on account of persons other than yourself, state fully what instructions with reference to the building or purchasing of the vessel you received from such persons, or any persons on their behalf, and the date of such instructions, and whether the same or any of them, and if so which, by date, were in writing?

5. By whom, and through whom, and in what manner, was the Murillo paid for? State the date and amount of every payment made by you, or through your agency, to the builders of the Murillo, or any other person on account of the price of the Murillo.

6. State who provided the funds for the building or the purchase of the Murillo; and if the same were provided by more than one person, state the amounts provided by each person? Did you or your firm, either alone or in conjunction with any other person or persons, pay or advance any, and if any what part of such funds?

7. Have you or your firm been repaid the moneys so advanced by you or your firm respectively, or any and if any what part thereof, and if so how and when, and by whom and in what manner was every such payment made?

8. Had you, on or at any time before the—Jan. 1873, any beneficial interest in the said vessel? Are you still beneficially interested in the said vessel; and if not when did you cease to be beneficially interested in her?

9. Have not you or your firm, from time to time during the four years immediately prior to the aforesaid date, received or been credited with a proportion of the net earnings or profits made by the Murillo, or with sums of money in respect of or arising out of the said net earnings? Set forth an account of all moneys received by you or your firm to the use of yourself, either solely or together with other persons during the said period on account of or in respect of the earnings of the Murillo, and state under what agreement or arrangement you became entitled to such moneys, and if any such agreement or arrangement is contained in any letter or letters, or other written document or documents, set forth the date of such letters or documents respectively, and state the names of the parties to such agreement or arrangement. Have you not, or has not your firm, from time to time, received freight for goods carried in the Murillo, either in advance or on the delivery of such goods? Set forth a full account of the freight so received, with dates and items, and state to whom such freight was paid or credited by you or your firm. Set forth the names of the persons to whom you or your firm accounted for the said freight, and the sum paid or credited to each such person. Was any part of such freight paid or credited to you or retained by you to your own use?

10. Set forth to the best of your knowledge, information, and belief, the names and addresses of the persons who were, on the—Jan. 1873, the registered owners of the Murillo, and also the names and addresses of every person who was on the same date a beneficial owner of the said vessel, or who had any beneficial interest therein, or who on the said date was entitled to any interest in or proportion of the net earnings or profits from time to time made by the said vessel.

11. Have you not in your possession, or under your control or under the control of your firm, certain books of account containing entries relating to the building, purchase, cost, and enjoyment of the Murillo, and to the subsequent disbursements made on account of the vessel, and to the profits and earnings of the vessel, and to the division and apportionment of such profit and earnings? Set forth a list of such books, and of all ship's accounts and other documents in your possession relating to the Murillo or her earnings, and of all letters written by you or your firm to any of the registered or beneficial owners of the Murillo, or to any of their agents, with reference to the purchase, sale, ownership, or earnings of the Murillo, or to your interest in the said vessel.

In support of their motion the plaintiffs filed an affidavit of one of the plaintiffs and of their solicitor, which stated that they had reason to believe that the collision and loss of the Northfleet had been caused by the Murillo; that the Murillo was registered as a Spanish vessel in the names of Spanish owners, and none of the registered owners had appeared in the cause; and their agents had refused to enter an appearance for them; that they had reason to believe that the defendant Robert McAndrew was scarcely a beneficial owner of the Murillo, or beneficially interested in her in such a way as to be liable as an owner for the collision, but that the defendant Robert McAndrew denied that he was an owner, having appeared, as before stated, thus raising a preliminary objection apart from the question of collision; that they considered it of importance that this preliminary question should be settled at once, and before the expense of the trial incurred; that in consequence of the Spanish registration of the Murillo, which they believed to be nominal only, the facts as to the real ownership were difficult to ascertain, but that these facts were well known to Robert McAndrew, who was concerned in the building and purchase of the Murillo.

In answer to the plaintiff's affidavit, the defendant's solicitor filed an affidavit, stating that the plaintiff's solicitor was well aware, before instituting the cause, that the defendant denied that he was owner of the Murillo, as shown by a letter from the plaintiff's solicitor to the defendant; that from his, the defendant's solicitor's experience, there was no difficulty in obtaining the particulars of the ownership of any Spanish vessel, and that the assertion that the Spanish registration was nominal only, was a mere assumption.

W. G. F. Phillimore, for the plaintiffs, in support of the motion.—The defendant, by entering such an appearance, had raised the question of ownership, and these interrogatories are for the purpose of obtaining information on that point only. The defendants' affidavits give no reason why the plaintiffs should not have such information. The court has the same power to administer interrogatories as that possessed by any of the Superior Courts of common law. By the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), sect. 17; and by the Common Law Procedure Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 125), sect. 51: "In all cases in any of the Superior Courts, by order of the court or a judge the plaintiff may with the declaration, and the defendant may with the plea, or either of them by leave of the court or a judge, may at any other time deliver to the opposite party or his attorney interrogatories in writing upon any matter as to which discovery may be sought," &c. This gives power to the court to order interrogatories at any time, and therefore before petition. In The Mary (L. Rep. 2 Adm. & Ecc. 319; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 891; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 136), the court declared that it would rather follow the practice of the Court of Chancery than that of the courts of common law, as to the form in which the interrogatories were to be framed, and these interrogatories are clearly such as would be allowed by the Court of Chancery.

R. E. Webster, for the defendant, contra.—The objection to these interrogatories is, that their main object is to obtain information so as to enable the plaintiffs to institute a suit against other parties, if it should become necessary. This the courts always discourage. This suit is practically against McAndrew alone, the names of the others not being set out. According to The Mary (ubi sup.), only such interrogatories should be allowed "as tend bonâ fide to support the case of the plaintiff, and to favour a complete inquiry into the truth of the issue which the court has to decide." These are not for the purpose of the suit against the present defendant, but for the purpose of grounding a suit against others. It is contrary to principle that interrogatories should be allowed before petition, because before petition the nature of the cause is not known, and the defendants are entitled to know it before they can be compelled to answer. The first and second interrogatories ought not to be allowed, as they seek information to which the plaintiff is not entitled. The others are objectionable, because they are of a "fishing" character, and are not directed only to the one question in the case, viz., who is the owner of the ship?

Sir R. PHILLMORE.—If I could see that the defendant, who must be presumed to have knowledge upon the subjects about which he is to be interrogated, would be injured by the administration of these interrogatories, I should order them to be curtailed or refuse to allow them. I cannot see that such is the case. I cannot see that the interrogatories have any other object than that of ascertaining the truth as to the facts. The test to be applied is, whether the interrogatories are for the purpose of ascertaining certain facts which the plaintiff has a right to be informed about. If these interrogatories were put in general or technical language, or in other words, if the only question asked was, whether the defendant was the owner of the Murillo, the defendant might find some way of evading the question; whereas, as the questions are here put, they cannot be evaded, and must elicit information. As I have said, if I could see that these interrogatories had any other object than that of obtaining proper information, I should order them to be amended, but I cannot think that they have any such object. I am also of opinion that it is entirely competent to the court to order interrogatories to be administered before a petition is filed, so long as the court shall be of opinion that such interrogatories are necessary to elicit facts in the cause, and are within the scope of the object for which interrogatories are allowed. Looking at the mode in which these are framed, I am of opinion that on the whole these interrogatories are within the scope of that object. Nor are they in the category of fishing interrogatories. I cannot, therefore, see how I can refuse to admit them.

THE CHARKIEH.

Collision—Jurisdiction—Ship belonging to Khedive of Egypt—Position of Khedive—Rights of sovereigns—Exemption from process—Proceeding in rem—Trading—Waiver of rights.

The Khedive of Egypt is not a sovereign prince, and is, therefore, not entitled to claim the exemption for himself and his property from the ordinary process of the courts of this country, which is, by international law founded upon the comity of nations, awarded to foreign sovereigns.

A sovereign prince is exempted from the jurisdiction of the tribunals of a state in which he happens to be, absolutely so far as his person is concerned, and, with respect to this property, at least so far as that is connected with the dignity of his position, and the exercise of his public functions; no proceeding in rem can be instituted against the property of a sovereign prince if the res can in any fair sense be said to be connected with the jus coronæ of the sovereign, but other property of a sovereign may be proceeded against in rem.

A sovereign prince by engaging in trade may waive the privilege which he otherwise possesses of being exempt from the jurisdiction of the tribunals of a state in respect of the property so engaged.

A ship belonging to a foreign sovereign, but used by him as a merchant vessel for trading purposes, is liable to be proceeded against in rem in the Admiralty Court for damage done to another ship by collision.

Semble, that mail packets, although the property of a government, are not exempt from the ordinary process of the tribunals of a foreign state, unless expressly exempted by treaty.

This was a cause of collision instituted in rem against the steam ship Charkieh on behalf of the Netherlands Steamship Company, the owners of the steamship Batavier, and on behalf of the master, crew and passengers thereof, proceeding for their money, clothes and private effects. The cause was instituted and the ship arrested on Oct. 21, 1872. No appearance having been entered, the plaintiffs applied to the court on Nov. 12 for leave to file a petition in general terms; but it having been suggested to the court that the Charkieh formed part of the navy of the Ottoman Empire, the judge ordered the motion to stand over, and directed the registrar to write to the Turkish Ambassador the letter set out in the judgment. To this letter no reply was sent. On Nov. 19 the application for leave to file a petition was renewed; but, in the meanwhile, the Charkieh, being the property of His Highness Ismael Pacha, the Khedive of Egypt, an application was made to the Court of Queen's Bench to restrain the High Court of Admiralty from proceeding in the cause on the ground that no cause could be instituted in a municipal court against the property of a sovereign prince, as the Khedive was alleged to be, and the learned judge of the Admiralty Court refused to allow the cause to proceed until the result of the proceedings in the Court of Queen's Bench were known. The Court of Queen's Bench, however, refused to grant the prohibition, holding that the High Court of Admiralty should decide in the first instance whether it had jurisdiction or not: (see ante p. 533; L. Rep. 8 Q. B. 197; 28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 190.) An appearance was thereupon entered in the High Court of Admiralty, under protest, for the Khedive and for Admiral Latiff Pacha, Minister of Marine of the Government of Egypt. The petition on protest filed on behalf of the defendants was as follows:

1. The Charkieh is an iron screw steamship of 1615 tons gross measurement, with engines of 350 horse-power, and is manned by a crew of about ninety men.

2. Before and until the year 1870 the Charkieh was the property of an Egyptian Trading Company. In the said year 1870 the said company was dissolved.

[ADM.]

THE CHARKIEH.

3. At the time of the dissolution of the said company, and in the said year 1870, the Charkieh was purchased by the Egyptian Government. From the time of the said purchase, until, and at the time of the collision hereinafter mentioned, and thence until and at the time of the institution of this suit and the arrest of the said steamship therein, the Charkieh has always been and still is the property of His Highness Ismael Pacha the Khedive of Egypt, as reigning sovereign of the State of Egypt, and during all the time aforesaid has been and still is a public vessel of the Government and semi-sovereign state of Egypt.

4. From the time when the Charkieh became the property of His Highness the Khedive, as sovereign prince of Egypt, as hereinbefore alleged, the said steamship has been and still is a ship of the Egyptian branch of the Imperial Ottoman Navy, and is entitled to carry and does use and carry the Ottoman naval pendant, and the Ottoman naval ensign, which are used by all the ships of the Egyptian Navy, as distinguished from Egyptian merchant vessels.

5. The Charkieh is officered by Egyptians, with the exception of an acting commander, sailing master, and engineers, who are Europeans. The said Egyptian officers hold commissions from His Highness the Khedive, and are in the naval service of the Egyptian Government. The said European officers are respectively under contracts to serve the Egyptian Government.

6. All the said officers and crew of the Charkieh are appointed by, and are under the control of the defendant under protest, Latif Pacha as Minister of Marine of the said Government of Egypt, and the said steamship ordinarily and was at the time of the said arrest, under the orders and control of the said Minister of the Marine. For some time before the Charkieh left Egypt for England as hereinafter mentioned, the said steamship was under the control and orders of the Egyptian Minister of the Interior, and was employed by him as a government packet, carrying the mails and passengers and cargo between Alexandria and Constantinople.

7. In the month of September, 1871, the Charkieh was despatched from Alexandria to England, for the purpose of being repaired, and the defendant under protest, Latif Pacha, as such Minister of Marine, issued under his seal proper credentials as to her ownership and the service upon which she was engaged. The said credentials are contained in a document in the Arabic and French language, of which a copy and translation is annexed hereunto.

8. For the purpose of lessening the expense occasioned to the Egyptian Government, by sending the Charkieh to England as aforesaid, certain cargo was brought by the said steamship to England. With the same object the said steamship had, before her arrest in this suit, been advertised as about to sail from London to Alexandria carrying cargo.

9. All freights and passage money whatever which the Charkieh has earned in the aforesaid employment as a packet of the Egyptian government or on her voyage to England have been and are ultimately received by and accounted for to the said Minister of the Interior of Egypt, and from part of the public revenues of Egypt. Any freight earned by the said steamship on her said return voyage to Alexandria will be in the same way received on account of the said Minister of the Interior.

10. On or about the 19th day of October, 1872, this Charkieh which had completed her repairs and was returning from a trial trip of her machinery, came into collision with the said steamship Batavier in the River Thames.

11. On or about the 21st day of October, 1872, this Cause of Damage, No. 6200, was instituted in this honourable court on behalf of the Netherlands Steamship Company, the owners of the said steamship Batavier, and others against the said steamship Charkieh. On the same day the Charkieh was arrested by virtue of a warrant issued out of this honourable court, and has since remained and still remains under such arrest.

The petition concluded by praying "the right honourable the judge to declare that this honourable court has no jurisdiction to entertain this suit, and that the plaintiffs cannot prosecute the same therein, and that the said steamship is not liable to the arrest and process of this honourable court, and to order the said ship to be released from such arrest, and to dismiss the said suit and to condemn the plaintiffs therein in the costs of these proceedings."

The translation of the document, referred to in the seventh article of the petition on protest, was as follows:

Egyptian Ministry of Marine.

NOTICE.

The steamship Charkieh belonging to the government of the Khedive, of the burden of 1615 tons, and of 350 horse-power, with two masts, leaves this day Alexandria for London, under the command of captain Jovani Anderlich, by the order of his Highness the Khedive, for the purpose of being repaired there, and in obedience to the orders given to us we give notice to the public of the departure of the said ship under the flag of the Ottoman empire.

We request all officers, civil and military, of every state, whether friendly or allied, all officials and all others whom it may concern, to render help and assistance wherever they may be, as the rules of the sea require, during the voyage to London and back, and during the time while the said ship shall remain in London.

Alexandria.

Thursday, 29 Gamed Arer, 1288,
or 14 September, 1871.

Signed LATIFF PACHA,
Minister of the Marine of Egypt.

The plaintiffs filed the following answer:

1. They deny the truth of the several allegations contained in the petition on protest filed in this cause, save the allegations contained in the 10th article thereof, which they admit to be true.

2. The steamship Charkieh proceeded against in this cause is built, fitted, and equipped solely for the purpose of carrying cargo and passengers, and not in any way as a ship of war, and before and until the year 1870 and whilst she is alleged by the defendant to have belonged to an Egyptian trading company, she was used for the purpose of trade and profit as a merchant vessel, and the said ship was from the time she is alleged by the defendant to have been purchased by the Egyptian government and until she was despatched from Alexandria in the month of September, 1871, used in like manner by her owners whomsoever for the purpose of trade and profit as a merchant vessel.

3. Before the Charkieh was despatched from Alexandria in the month of September, 1871, for this country, she was put up at Alexandria by the owners whomsoever in the ordinary way as a general ship to carry cargo to London, and a large quantity of cargo was shipped on board her at Alexandria by divers persons, and accepted by her master and owners whomsoever for carriage to London for freight to be paid for such carriage, and bills of lading for such cargo of an ordinary mercantile character, containing provisions and stipulations for the protection as well of the shipowner as of the owners of the goods, were in the ordinary way signed and delivered by or on behalf of her owners whomsoever.

4. The Charkieh came to England with her said cargo as and upon the footing of an ordinary merchant vessel, and neither the master of the Charkieh nor her owners whomsoever at any time until after she was arrested in this suit claimed that she should be treated otherwise than as an ordinary merchant vessel, and she was in fact treated, and by her master and owners whomsoever without objection suffered to be treated in all respects as an ordinary merchant vessel, and on her said arrival she received on board a British custom-house officer in the usual way as a merchant vessel, and was reported inwards by her master, and paid light and tonnage and other dues in the ordinary way as a merchant vessel.

5. At the time of the collision between the Charkieh and the Batavier in the said petition mentioned the Charkieh had been entered outwards at the custom-house in the ordinary way as a merchant vessel, to load cargo for Malta and Alexandria as a merchant vessel, and had been put and publicly advertised with the authority of her owners whomsoever as one of a regular line of vessels to carry goods and passengers to Malta and Alexandria. The exhibit hereto annexed, marked A, is a true copy of such advertisement. The Charkieh had on board at the time of the said collision a quantity of cargo which had been laden on board her for carriage to Malta or Alexandria on her said then proposed voyage, and which was being used to ballast her on her trial trip in the said petition mentioned.

6. The plaintiffs submit that even if the Charkieh was at the time of the said collision the property of the Khedive or the Government of Egypt, yet that she is subject to the jurisdiction of this honourable court, and liable to process in this suit.

7. The plaintiffs further allege and submit that His Highness Ismael Pacha, the Khedive of Egypt, as reigning sovereign of the semi-sovereign state of Egypt is not such a reigning sovereign as to entitle him or the Government of Egypt to have accorded to the Charkieh, by the comity of nations or otherwise, the privileges or immunities of a public vessel of war of an independent sovereign or state, or the privilege of freedom from arrest and process in this suit.

The exhibit referred to in Art. 5 of the answer is the handbill printed by the charterer of the Charkieh, and is set out in the judgment.

The following reply was then filed on behalf of the defendants under protest:—

1. Save as appears by the petition on protest filed in this cause, they deny the allegations contained in the paragraphs 2, 3, 4, 5, and 7 of the answer of the plaintiffs thereto.

2. Referring to paragraph 4 of the said answer, they say that after the arrival of the Charkieh in England in the year 1871, and long before the collision between the Charkieh and the Batavier in the petition mentioned, application was made on behalf of His Highness the Khedive of Egypt to the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty of our Sovereign Lady the Queen to appoint a surveyor to supervise the repairs of the Charkieh, as being an Egyptian Government vessel, and not an ordinary merchant ship, and that the said Lords Commissioners, recognising the Charkieh as a vessel of the Egyptian Government as aforesaid, appointed such a surveyor, and the repairs of the Charkieh were effected under his supervision.

3. They submit that the allegations in paragraphs 2, 3, 4, and 5 of the said answer of the plaintiffs in this suit do not, if they are true, show that this honourable court has jurisdiction to entertain this suit, or that the said plaintiffs can prosecute the same therein.

The plaintiffs concluded by denying the truth of the allegations contained in the 2nd article of the reply, and saying that such article was irrelevant and immaterial.

The facts as stated in the pleadings were substantially proved. The additional facts will be found set out in the judgment, except as follows. The Charkieh was not fitted as a man-of-war, but only as a mail steamer carrying goods and passengers. She had been in the Egyptian mail service since 1870. Previous to that year she had been the property of a trading company called the Azeeziah Mussriah Company. The Khedive had held shares in this company, which then carried the mails from Alexandria to Constantinople. In 1870 the Khedive purchased all the steamships and material of the company, and continued to carry on the line. The Charkieh, whilst the property of the company, had carried the flag of the Imperial Ottoman Navy, and also a pennant, and continued to do so after she became the property of the Khedive. The Ottoman Empire has only two flags, one for Government ships, the other for merchant ships. Egypt has only the flag of the Ottoman Empire.

March 18, 19, 20, 21, 1873.—Butt, Q.C. (Cohen and Gibson with him) for the Khedive.—There are five propositions for the consideration of the court; first, the Khedive of Egypt is a sovereign prince, and, as such, is entitled to the privileges accorded to sovereign princes in the courts of foreign countries; secondly, the rights, privileges, and immunities accorded in this country to a foreign sovereign prince are not less than those accorded to a foreign ambassador; thirdly, foreign ambassadors are not liable to be sued in this country, and their goods are not liable to seizure; fourthly, no difference arises because the sovereign or ambassador engages in trade; fifthly, no difference arises because this proceeding is in rem and not in personam.

As to the first point, it is the duty of the judge in every court to take notice of public questions which affect the Government of this country, and one of those questions is whether the Government of this country has recognised Egypt as a sovereign state. The court must take the fact as it really exists, and, if necessary, can inform itself of the fact by application to the Foreign Office: (Taylor v. Barclay, 2 Sim. Ch. Rep. 213, 220.) The status of the Khedive of Egypt is not a matter of evidence. In Taylor on Evidence (4th edit., vol. 1, p. 3) it is said, "every sovereign recognises, and, of course, the public tribunals and functionaries of every nation notice, the existence and titles of all the other sovereign powers in the civilized world." In very recent times applications (June 12, 1866, and Jan. 16, 1867) have been made to the Court of Common Pleas for prohibitions to restrain the Lord Mayor's Court from proceeding in a suit entitled Melandis v. Ismael Pacha (a), who is the present Khedive. The prohibitions went on the ground that he was a sovereign prince. In Wheaton's International Law (8th edit., by Dana, Part I., Chap. II., §§ 36, 37) after pointing out that several semi-sovereign or dependent states are recognised by the public law of Europe, it is said, "Egypt had been held by the Ottoman Porte, during the dominion of the Mamelukes, rather as a vassal state than as a subject province. The attempts of Mehemet Ali, after the destruction of the Mamelukes to convert his title as a vassal prince into absolute independence of the Sultan . . . produced the convention concluded at London the 15th July 1840 . . . to which the Ottoman Porte acceded. In consequence of the measures subsequently taken by the contracting parties for the execution of this treaty, the hereditary Pachalick of Egypt was finally vested by the Porte in Mehemet Ali, and his lineal descendants, on the payment of an annual tribute to the Sultan as his suzerain . . . (§ 37.) Tributary states, and states having a feudal relation to each other are still considered as sovereign, so far as their sovereignty is not affected by this relation." An action brought against Mehemet Ali, formerly Khedive of Egypt, by a M. Solon, for services in founding a school at Cairo was dismissed by the Tribunal Civil de la Seine, on the ground that the French tribunals have no jurisdiction over foreign governments, thus clearly recognizing him as a sovereign: (See Phillimore's International Law, vol. ii., p. 138, 2nd edit.) [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—One test of sovereignty has always been the power to send and receive ambassadors.] Not an absolute test. There may be states which would be considered sovereign and yet send no ambassador. I submit that the status of the Khedive is such that the court is bound to treat him as a sovereign prince.

(a) In these suits the plaintiff attempted to attach moneys in the hands of persons in the City of London but belonging to the Khedive, to satisfy a claim made by the plaintiff against the Khedive, for the breach of a contract by which the Khedive, in consideration of a certain sum paid by the plaintiff, undertook to allow the plaintiff to receive the taxes of Egypt. The contract was made in Egypt, and the prohibitions went, no cause being shown, on the two grounds that the contract was not within the jurisdiction of the Mayor's Court, and that the Khedive was a sovereign prince, and could not be sued in the courts of this country. See the judgment in the present case.

Then, secondly, are the rights of a sovereign in a foreign country as great as those of his ambassador? and, thirdly, what are the rights of a sovereign or of his ambassador? In Vattel's Law of Nations (by J. Chitty, p. 486, § 108) it is laid down that a sovereign has at least the same rights as his ambassador and the same immunity from process. In Wheaton's International Law (by Dana, § 95) it is said, "the person of a foreign sovereign, going into the territory of another state, is, by the general usage and comity of nations, exempt from the ordinary local jurisdiction . . . he is not amenable to the civil or criminal jurisdiction of the country where he temporarily resides." So also it is said that an ambassador is exempt from the local jurisdiction, and that "his residence is considered as a continued residence in his own country, unmixed with that of the country where he locally resides." The law of this country is stated in Stephens' Blackstone (vol. 2, p. 320, 6th edit.), where it is said that an ambassador, as he represents the person of his master, owes no subjection to any laws but the laws of his own country, and his actions are not subject to the control of the private law of the state in which they are appointed to reside; and, further, that in respect to civil suits, neither an ambassador nor any of his train, or comites, can be prosecuted for any debt or contract in the courts of that kingdom to which he is sent. If, then, this ship had been the property of an ambassador, no proceedings could have been had against him in respect of this vessel, and no proceeding can, therefore, be had against a sovereign prince. See also, Grotius, De Jure Belli et Pacis, Lib. ii. c. 18, sects. 4 & 5; Fœlix, Traité du droit International Privé, Lib. ii. Tit. ii. chap. 2, sect. 4. In The Duke of Brunswick v. The King of Hanover (6 Beavan 1; affirmed on appeal to the House of Lords, 2 H. of L. Cas. 1), it was decided that a sovereign prince was not amenable to English courts of justice, although he was also a peer of England, provided that the act complained of was not done by him in his capacity of a British subject. Lord Langdale, in delivering judgment, draws an analogy from the rights of ambassadors, and holds that a sovereign, like an ambassador, is, with regard to acts connected with his function, exempt from suit. In De Haber v. The Queen of Portugal (17 Q. B. 171; 20 L. J. 488 Q. B.) it was forcibly said by Lord Campbell, that a sovereign is to be considered as entitled to the same protection, immunity, and privileges as the minister who represents him, and it was held that a sovereign cannot be cited in a municipal court for any complaint against him in his public capacity; moreover, in that case, it was held that the awarding of a foreign attachment by the Lord Mayor's Court against the goods of the defendant was an excess of jurisdiction, on the ground that the defendant was a foreign potentate. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The authorities cited show that a sovereign is entitled to the same privileges as his ambassador; but do they put his position any higher?] I submit it is clear that a sovereign is entitled to all these privileges, and also that a sovereign is, equally with his ambassador, entitled to freedom from any suit in our municipal courts.

Fourthly, I proceed to show that ambassadors, and therefore sovereigns, may trade without being liable to process. On this the statute of 7 Anne, c. 12, is conclusive; it makes all process against ambassadors or other public ministers of foreign princes absolutely null and void. (a) If the Charkieh had been an ambassador's yacht she would have been part of his goods and chattels, and the seizure of her would have been a contravention of the statute. No distinction can be drawn between an ambassador's yacht and vessels possessed by him for the purposes of trade. They are all goods and chattels within the words of the statute. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—If an ambassador were to institute a suit, you would contend that under the statute his goods could not be seized for costs if he lost.] Certainly, because he could be compelled to give security before being allowed to proceed. The terms of the section would cover his goods even if he were a trader. Sect. 3 says nothing about an ambassador who trades being out of the operation of the statute, but sect. 5 expressly says that his servant may not trade and claim exemption. Hence it may be fairly contended that the Legislature intended an ambassador to be exempt from process even if trading. In Barbuit's case (Cas. Temp. Talbot, 281) the person claiming exemption had a commission as agent of commerce for the King of Prussia, which was accepted by the Government; the commission was not directed to the King, but empowered Barbuit to assist Prussian subjects in their commerce; the defend-

"Sect. 3. And to prevent the like insolences for the future, be it further declared by the authority aforesaid that all writs and processes that shall at any time hereafter be sued forth or prosecuted, whereby the person of any ambassador, or other public minister, of any foreign prince or state, authorised and received as such by her Majesty, her heirs or successors, or the domestick, or domestick servant of any such ambassador or other public minister, may be arrested or imprisoned, or his or their goods or chattels may be distrained, seized, or attached, shall be deemed and adjudged to be utterly null and void to all intents, constructions, and purposes whatsoever."

Sect. 4 provides for the punishment of persons issuing process against ambassadors, &c.

"Sect. 5. Provided, and be it declared, that no merchant or other trader whatsoever, within the description of any of the statutes against bankrupts, who hath or shall put himself into the service of any such ambassador or public minister, shall have or take any manner of benefit by this Act; and that no person shall be proceeded against as having arrested the servant of an ambassador or public minister, by virtue of this Act, unless the name of such servant be first registered in the office of one of the principal secretaries of state, and by such secretary transmitted to the sheriffs of London and Middlesex for the time being, or their under-sheriffs or deputies, who shall upon receipt thereof hang up the same in some public place in their offices whereto all persons may resort and take copies thereof, without fee or reward."

ant was a trader and did not claim exemption for 10 years after his suit had been instituted. Lord Talbot said: "Though this is a very unfavourable case, yet if the defendant is truly a public minister, I think he may now insist upon it; for the privilege of a public minister is to have his person sacred and free from arrests, not on his own account, but on account of those he represents; and this arises from the necessity of the thing, that nations may have intercourse with one another in the same manner as private persons, by agents, when they cannot meet themselves. And if the foundation of this privilege is for the sake of the Prince by whom an ambassador is sent, and for the sake of the business he is to do, it is impossible he can renounce such privilege and protection; for by his being thrown into prison the business must inevitably suffer." [Sir R. PHILLIMORE:—The ground of the decision, as you read it, is that he, if an ambassador, would be free from personal arrest as his services would be required.] The decision goes beyond that, as the whole question turns upon the fact that bringing a suit at all against an ambassador is a coactio independently of arrest. But I rely mainly on this case to show that ambassadors may trade without being liable to process for it further said: "Then the question is, whether the defendant is such a person as 7 Anne c. 12 describes, which is only declaratory of the ancient universal jus gentium; the words of the statute are (ambassadors or other public ministers) and the exception of persons trading relates only to their servants, the parliament never imagining that ministers themselves would trade." This clearly shows that the defendant would have been exempt though trading if he had been held a minister and not a consul. See also Triquet v. Bath, 3 Burrows, 1478.

Heathfield v. Chilton, 4 Burrows, 2016.

In Taylor v. Best (14 C.B. 487, 519) it is expressly laid down that "if the privilege does attach it is not, in the case of an ambassador or public minister, forfeited by the party's engaging in trade, as it would, by virtue of the proviso in the 7 Anne c. 12 sect. 5 in the case of an ambassador's servant." The minister there, however, was held to have attained to the jurisdiction. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE: I do not understand the reasoning. How is that consistent with the argument that, his privilege not being personal but being that of his sovereign, he cannot waive it, or with the argument that he is exempt for the purpose of enabling him to do his duty as ambassador? If he can attend, he is subject to all process of the court.] There must be some cases in which an ambassador ought to be able to waive his privilege, as where he commits a personal wrong upon another. But the case is an authority for the proposition that an ambassador does not affect his privilege by trading. In the Magdalena Steam Navigation Company v. Martin, (2 Ell. & Ell. 94; 28 L. J. 310, Q. B.) it is laid down that the public minister of a foreign state, accredited to and received by the sovereign of this country, having no real property in England and having done nothing to disentitle him to the general privileges of such public minister, cannot while he remains such public minister, be sued against his will in this country in a civil action; although such action may arise out of commercial transactions by him here, and although neither his person nor his goods be touched by the suit. This decides in effect that a suit may not even be instituted against an ambassador as no suit can take place without a violation of the maxim of Grotius: "Omnis coactio abesse a legato debet" (De Jure Belli et Pacis, lib II, c. 18 sect. 9.) An imperial ship of war cannot be proceeded against in this court. The Prins Frederik (2 Dods. Adm. Rep. 451) is an authority neither way, but if a royal yacht could not be proceeded against, à fortiori a ship of war is exempt. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE: This ship is not recognised as the property of the Ottoman Government. The Turkish Ambassador has not objected to my jurisdiction.]

Cohen followed on the same side.—On the fifth point, no suit in any court can be maintained against a foreign sovereign for any delict or tort committed by him or his servants. It can make no difference whether the proceeding is in rem or in personam. When there is a lien upon the property of a foreign sovereign in this country which is in the possession of a British subject, then, for certain reasons distinct from the considerations in the present case, the Court of Chancery will restrain the British subject from parting with the property till the claim is satisfied, and will under certain circumstances declare the plaintiff entitled to relief out of a fund in the hands of British subjects if placed there for the specific purpose of paying the claim. But no arrest of property is allowed when it is in the possession of the sovereign or his servants, nor will the courts interfere to control the acts of a foreign sovereign.

Glástone v. Ottoman Bank, 1 H. & M. 505; 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 162; 32 L. J. 228, Ch.;

Larivière v. Morgan, L. Rep. 7 Ch. App. 550; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 339, 859.

In The United States v. Wilder (3 Sumner's U. S. Circuit Ct., First Circ., Rep. 308) Mr. Justice Story held that a lien for general average existed against U. S. goods, but that again proceeded upon the ground that it was property not in the possession of privileged persons. If the status of the Khedive is such that he could not be arrested, that is a test, and shows him a sovereign, as there is no other case in which a person is always privileged from arrest. It has been shown that the Khedive has Ministers of Marine, Interior, and Finance, and levies taxes; he issues commissions, and has a legally established government. This in itself is conclusive, but it would be improper for us to go further into the question of his status. A summary of the relations of Egypt to foreign powers is given in Phillimore's International Law (vol. 1, p. 129, 2nd edit.) A state may be sovereign although tributary: (Vattel's Law of Nations, by J. Chitty, Book I., §. 7.) The true test is whether its head is the sovereign to whom the obedience of the nation is habitually owing. Now, as to the liability of a sovereign prince. In Phillimore's International Law, vol. 2, p. 135, it is said: "The practice of English courts, both of equity and common law, has been in favour of the privileged exemption of sovereigns in all matters of private contract"; and the cases of The Duke of Brunswick v. King of Hanover (ubi sup.) and De Haber v. The Queen of Portugal (ubi sup.) establish the proposition that by the practice of our courts where property, as in this case, is used for the purposes of the state, and is in possession of the state, foreign sovereigns are exempted from all legal process. Lord Campbell, in his judgment in the latter case, disapproves of the doctrine laid down by

THE CHARKIEH.

Bynkershoek (De Foro Legatorum, chap. 4; Opera Omnia, vol. 2, p. 151, Leyden 1767) that the goods of a sovereign may be seized in a foreign country; and he also says that the same view as the court then took was held by Lord Stowell in The Prins Frederik (ubi sup.) In Gladstone v. Musurus Bey (1 H. & M. 495; 32 L. J. 155, Ch.; 7 L. T. Rep. N. S. 477) it was held that the Courts of Chancery could not make an order against an ambassador, and in Munden v. The Duke of Brunswick (10 Q. B. 656) a plea to the jurisdiction was held bad because it did not allege that the Duke was reigning sovereign at the time of action brought or plea pleaded; hence on it being shown to a court that the person sued is a sovereign prince, he cannot be proceeded against. In the United States it has been held that the exemption from process extends not only to men-of-war but to all vessels which are national property:

The Schooner Exchange v. McFaddon, 7 Cranch U. S. Sup. Ct. Rep. 116; Briggs v. Light Boats, 11 Allen's (93 Massachusetts) Rep. 157, 185, 186.

In the latter case it was said (p. 186) that "the exemption of a public ship of war of a foreign Government from the jurisdiction of our courts depends rather upon its public than its military character." As post vessels are clearly used for state purposes they would be within the exemption.

Now judgment, or even a writ of summons, is in the nature of a command given by the Sovereign of the State in whose court the suit is instituted to a subject. Can Her Majesty command a foreign sovereign who is not a subject? The court cannot enforce judgment against or even summon a foreign sovereign. No action or proceeding consequently lies against a sovereign prince for delicts or torts, or even crimes. If a delict is committed by a sovereign prince, it becomes a political question. As no action lies on contract in respect of private transactions, no action for a tort will lie. If the Charkieh had been chartered so as to be demised to the charterer, perhaps there would have been no defence; but the real question is: whose servants are the crew? If the shipowner continues to have control over those who navigate the ship and so retains possession of the ship, he alone is responsible if he can be proceeded against.

MacLachlan on Shipping, p. 310;
The San Cloud, Bro. & Lush, 4, 15.

These ships belong to the Khedive in his public capacity, and are Government vessels as much as if they were men-of-war. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I do not remember any case where mail packets have been distinctly held to be Government vessels.] Vessels of a Government used for carrying mails are used for a public purpose. There might have been a question of estoppel if the action had been in contract, on the ground that the ship was held out as a trader; but there can be no estoppel in an action in tort. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Then in a salvage suit you would contend that salvors could proceed against the cargo only? No doubt; no claim could be made against the ship. If the trading even were for the benefit of the Khedive, the old cases holding that he would be liable are over-ruled by The Magdalena Steam Navigation Company v. Martin (2 Ell. & Ell. 94; 28 L. J. 310, Q. B.). Here, however, there was no trading, even in the sense of those cases, because the trading was only incidental to the ship coming here for repairs. Her real employment was that of a Government mail-packet, and it is a rule that the accessory follows the principal. There is no real distinction between men-of-war and other Government vessels. The only distinction drawn by the best writers on international law is between public and private vessels.

Ortolan, Regles, Internationales, et Diplomatie de la Mer, Vol. I., pp. 207, 209, 293.
Wheaton's Int. Law, by Lawrence, pp. 208-9.

Salvage suits are not instituted against men-of-war, because the court has no jurisdiction over Government ships. The property of Government cannot be arrested. Nor are salvage suits ever instituted against post-vessels. (Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Does not that arise because it is so stipulated in the various treaties on postal conventions? You have given me no authority for saying that a Government ship chartered to a private individual does not lose the privilege.) That depends upon the question whether a suit in rem will lie. The object of the charter-party is to provide for the carriage of goods from port to port; it does not transfer the property in and gives no control over the ship. The charterer acquires no right of action for breach of the charter party, but he ought if he mistrusts the Khedive, to obtain security for its fulfilment.

There is no distinction between proceedings in rem and in personam where a Government is concerned: (Briggs v. Light Boats, ubi sup.) Assuming that no action lies in personam, then no action lies in rem. The right to proceed in rem is only a right to enforce an obligation for which the ship is considered a security: (The Bold Buccleugh, 7 Moore, P. C. C. 267). But here the obligation itself is not enforceable. An action in rem only lies where the owners themselves are liable; unless the owners are personally liable no suit can be brought in rem against the ship.

Milward, Q. C. for the plaintiffs.—The facts clearly show that the vessel was used for trading purposes. To establish exemption the defendants must show that any government may set itself up as a trading corporation and yet not be responsible for salvage claims, nor under the bills of lading they may issue. In The Magdalena Steam Navigation Company v. Martin (2 Ell. & Ell. 94; 28 L. J. 310, Q. B.) there was no trading in the right sense. The company were trading, but not the shareholder. The action was to recover a call due on the winding-up of the company, and the objection was taken on demurrer; there was, therefore, no waiver of privilege. The object, moreover, in that case was to arrest the person of the foreign minister if he did not pay; that was an interference with the dignity of an ambassador. The judgment turns upon his having no real property in this country, and being considered as out of the country. Lord Campbell practically adopts the exception given by Bynkershoek (De Foro Legatorum, chap. 14) that the goods of an ambassador who is engaged in commerce are liable to seizure, only such being exempted as belong to him in his character of ambassador. This shows there is an exception to the rule of exemption, and the present case, I submit, falls within that exception. In Taylor v. Best (14 C. B. 489) the only decision was that the foreign minister, having appeared to the action, and allowed the proceedings against him to continue through several stages, could not at that period raise the question of privilege. Moreover, the judgment there leaves it doubtful whether the privilege of an ambassador extends to prevent his being sued in the courts of this country, or only to protect him from process, which may affect the sanctity of his person or his comfort and dignity; a proceeding in rem clearly does not affect his person, and that is there shown to be allowable in all courts where the civil law prevails.

THE CHARKIEH.

[ADM.]

Kent's Commentaries, vol. 1, p. 45, 11th edit.;
Wicquefort, L'Ambassadeur et ses fonctions, vol. 1,
Book 1, § 28, p. 426.

There is nothing in Barbuit's Case (Cases Temp. Talbot 281) which affects the question, as the doctrines there laid down about ambassadors are mere obiter dicta, the proceeding being against a consul. In none of the cases cited was there any act on the part of the sovereign or ambassador which could be construed into a waiver of his privilege before the cause of action arose. Here the Khedive had abandoned his privilege, if it existed, by becoming a trader. The result of all the authorities is that the act of trading per se would allow the arrest of all the property of an ambassador which does not belong to him in his status as ambassador. The statute 7 Anne c. 12 does not alter the law, it is merely declaratory. Melanidis v. Ismael Pacha (ubi sup.) is no authority, as the rules were made absolute by consent, and moreover the cause of action was not within the jurisdiction of the Mayor's Court, even if the proceeding was against a sovereign. The French case cited from Phillimore's International Law (vol. 2, p. 138) only shows the extritoriality of a sovereign government, and not that Egypt is a sovereign state.

I submit that the Khedive is not a sovereign. He holds his rights in consequence of an European convention, on the basis of which the Sultan afterwards issued a firman constituting the Pashalick of Egypt: (see Convention concluded between the Courts of Great Britain, Austria, Prussia, and Russia, and the Sublime Ottoman Ports for the pacification of the Levant. Signed at London the 15th July 1840; 5 Hertslet's Treaties, pp. 535, 544). Thereby all the laws of Turkey are to be applicable to Egypt, and the taxes are to be collected by the Khedive as delegate of the Sultan; the army and navy are to be considered part of the forces of the Ottoman Empire. Recently the Khedive was prevented by the Sultan from raising a fleet or borrowing money without leave: (see The Annual Register, 1869, p. [273]. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The English Government has entered into treaties with the Barbary States, which are much in the same position. See Martens et De Cussy, Recueil de Traités, vol. 2, pp. 311, 401.] No doubt. That was ex necessitate on account of the difficulty of enforcing rights through Turkey at that time. A sovereign state is a nation or people which governs itself independently of foreign power, or whose government is not so bound by express compact with another state that the government is legally affected by its connection with the other: (Wheaton, by Lawrence, chap., Part I., 2, § 12). The Sultan has reserved to himself the power of life and death over his Egyptian subjects:

(Phillimore's International Law, vol. 1, p. 130, 2nd edit.), and Egypt could not even be classed among semi-sovereign states. It has become a mere hereditary pachalick, paying an annual tribute to the Sultan as suzerain. This vessel carries the Turkish flag, and yet her owner claims that he is a sovereign prince. The fact of the Turkish ambassador not interfering shows that the vessel is not considered in Turkey as used for Government purposes.

The Duke of Brunswick v. The King of Hanover (ubi sup.) clearly recognizes the principle that the status of a ruler does not determine the quality of his acts, but that the quality of his acts must be examined to determine the question of liability. If an act is done by a sovereign out of the scope of his authority as prince, he is liable as a private person. Here, the act of the Charkieh was the act of the Khedive as a private person. Theratio decindendi in Briggs v. Light Boats (11 Allen's Massachusetts Reps. 186) was that the vessels were used for public purposes, and the case does not therefore apply, nor for the same reason is the passage from Ortolan, Regles Internationales et Diplomatie de la mer (vol. i., p. 209), of any avail. Postal vessels are never considered as Government vessels, nor entitled to the same exemption as vessels of war, except when it is so expressly provided by treaty, and the numerous treaties on this subject show that Government vessels employed for other than man-of-war purposes are considered by all nations as subject to the jurisdiction of the courts of every country. (See Postal Treaties with Belgium of Oct. 17 and 24, 1834, par. 9, and Oct. 19, 1844, par. 7; 7 Hertslet's Treaties, p. 81; Postal Treaty with France of Sept. 24, 1856, par. 5; 10 Hertslet's Treaties, pp. 108, 110). Vattel speaking of ambassadors says (by Chitty, Book 4, chap. 8, § 113), "Everything, therefore, which directly belongs to his person in the character of a public minister,—every thing which is intended for his use, or which serves for his own maintenance and that of his household,—every thing of that kind, I say, partakes of the minister's independency, and is absolutely exempt from all jurisdiction in the country. Those things, together with the person to whom they belong, are considered as being out of the country. (§ 114.) But this exemption cannot extend to such property as evidently belongs to the ambassador under any other relation than that of minister. What has no affinity with his functions and character, cannot partake of the privileges which are solely derived from his functions, and character. Should a minister, therefore (as has often been the case) embark in any branch of commerce, all the effects, goods, money, and debts, active and passive, which are connected with his mercantile concerns,—and likewise all contests and lawsuits to which they may give rise—fall under the jurisdiction of the country. And, although, in consequence of the minister's independency, no legal process can, in those law-suits, be directly issued against his person, he is, nevertheless, by seizure of the effects belonging to his commerce, indirectly compelled to plead in his own defence."

THE CHARKIEH.

[ADM.]

This doctrine is clearly applicable to a sovereign also. In Wheaton (p. 199) it is said, "A prince by acquiring private property in a foreign country may possibly be considered as subjecting that property to the territorial jurisdiction; he may be considered as, so far, laying down the prince and assuming the character of a private individual; but he cannot be presumed to do this with respect to any portion of that armed force which upholds his crown and the nation he is intrusted to govern." This proposition, for which I contend, shows that if a prince trades he cannot claim exemption in the same way as for his armaments of war. The Schooner Exchange v. McFaddon (7 Cranch, U. S. Sup. Ct. Rep. 116) and The Prins Frederik (2 Dods. 451) both proceed upon the ground that the vessels were men-of-war, and the distinction drawn between public armed ships and private trading vessels, although possessed by a sovereign, is clearly apparent by the arguments and judgments. In The Santissima, Trinidad (7 Wheaton's U. S. Sup. Ct. Rep. 283) an attempt was made to show that foreign prize vessels were exempt from the jurisdiction of the courts on the ground that they were captured for a foreign sovereign, and that no sovereign is answerable for his acts to the tribunals of another state; but it was held that such a claim could not be sustained except for the public capturing ship herself, and her armament, and munitions of war. Mr. Justice Story there said (p. 353) that if a sovereign "happens to hold a private domain within another territory, it may be that he cannot obtain full redress for any injury to it, except through the instrumentality of its courts of justice" and that the exceptions to the rule that all persons and property are subject to the jurisdiction, "are such only as by common rule and public policy have been allowed in order to preserve the peace and harmony of nations, and to regulate their intercourse in a manner best suited to their dignity and rights." Comity and usage of nations have never given exemption to the property of a sovereign used in trade, and a ship coming to British ports for such a purpose does not enter on the implied understanding (which creates the privilege), that she shall be exempt from the jurisdiction of the courts.

Clarke v. New Jersey Steam Navigation Co., 1 Story's U. S. First Circuit Rep. 531, 542;
The Ticonderoga, Swabey's Adm. Rep. 215;
Hodgkinson v. Fernie, 2 C. B., N. S., 415.

E. C. Clarkson followed on the same side.—First as to the status of the Khedive; he has no power to send ambassadors nor to levy war; the Porte grants the exequatur to foreign consuls at Alexandria and Cairo, and gives operation to treaties of commerce which concern Egypt by its firman addressed to the Pacha: (see Twiss on the Law of Nations, part I, p. 94, § 66). Unless the Khedive can show that he would not be amenable to the jurisdiction of the Sultan's courts at Constantinople, he has failed to establish his privilege against being sued personally here, and he holds no better position than any other Turkish pacha; his position is analogous to that of Lord Baltimore, who was by letters patent proprietor and hereditary governor of Maryland, and yet could be sued on a contract relating to his possessions in Maryland in the English courts: (Penn v. Lord Baltimore, 2 White and Tudor's L.C. in Equity p. 923, 4th edit.) Assuming the Khedive, however, to be a sovereign there is no analogy between his position and that of an ambassador. An ambassador holds his rights not as his own, but for and on behalf of the sovereign whom he represents, and cannot, therefore, without the consent of his sovereign, waive those rights. A sovereign, on the other hand, having rights as his own, may waive them and submit to the jurisdiction of local tribunals.

2 Phillimore's International Law, 2nd edit. p. 180, par 143, 144;

Woolsey, on International Law, p. 152, 157.

A court in this country will order security for costs to be given by a sovereign who has been engaged in commercial transactions, and who, residing abroad sues here, but will not so order against an ambassador residing here:

The Duke of Montellano v. Christin 5 M. & S. 503;

The Emperor of Brazil v. Robinson, 5 Dowl. 522.

If an ambassador had licence from his sovereign to trade, he would be in an analogous position to his sovereign, and it could not then be contended that he would not be amenable to the jurisdiction. Suppose an ambassador accredited to England were whilst passing through France to stay and trade, would he not, despite the rule which ordinarily would exempt him, be subject to the French tribunals?

Wheaton's International Law, by Dana, § 246;

Twiss, on the Laws of Nations, part I, § 205.

A sovereign by entering into trade, contracts that he will submit himself and his property to the jurisdiction of local tribunals, and he has no cause of complaint if the jurisdiction is exercised. If there had been damage done to the cargo of the Charkieh by the negligence of her master or crew, an action would have lain, as I submit, under the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10) sect. 6, against the ship. If, again, instead of sending this ship, the Khedive had forwarded a cargo by another vessel, and had attempted to stop in transitu, he could have been made a defendant to an interpleader summons. Under the Supplemental Customs Consolidation Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 96) sect. 25, this vessel might have been boarded by a custom house officer four leagues from the English coast, and no complaint could have been made, as she was ostensibly a trader. If she had carried passengers elsewhere than to the Mediterranean, she would have required a clearance under the Passenger Acts; (18 & 19 Vict. c. 119, s. 50; 26 & 27 Vict. c. 51, s. 13.) A foreign trading ship comes to this country not as of right, but under an implied licence, granted upon condition that she will submit to the jurisdiction of the authorities here. This ship must have come here under such a licence and under such terms because she was a trader. A state is only recognized in international law as a political body, not as a trading corporation, and if it undertakes the latter capacity, it cannot be considered as entitled to greater privileges than other trading corporations.

Butt, Q.C., in reply.—The object of the postal treaties cited was not to give exemption from arrest, but to prevent cargo being carried into ports free of duty. The exemption arises not from the packets carrying mails, but from their being Government property. As to the question of waiver, all the authorities cited have treated a waiver by a sovereign and by an ambassador as the same thing. The Duke of Montellano v. Christin (ubi sup.), shows that an ambassador may waive his privilege, but a sovereign stands on a different footing. He may enforce a contract, but it cannot be enforced against him. The fact that the Khedive, if a sovereign prince, would have no just cause of complaint, does not affect the question, as his privilege is a right, which he may claim, and which cannot be abandoned except by his express consent. In the Prins Frederik (ubi sup.) and in the Swift (1 Dods. Adm. Rep. 320, 339) there was trading, but that did not take away the privilege. The question of how much trading will destroy the privilege cannot be tried in an English court. The sovereign is the sole judge of his own acts. Moreover, it is by no means clear, that at the time of the collision that there was any trading. She was not earning freight, but was here for the purpose of repairs. Her ordinary employment of carrying the mails was no more trading than the carrying of mails by English Government packets. The postal charges of this country are part of the revenue of the Crown, and yet it could not be said that her Majesty was a trader by reason of her vessels carrying the mails. The right to exemption depends not upon the opinion of jurists, but upon the statute of 7 Anne, c. 12, and that statute is imperative in the exemption it gives to the goods of ambassadors, and consequently of sovereigns. The mere want of power to send an ambassador is not conclusive of the non-sovereignty of the Khedive, it is only one of the criteria of his position.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 7.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is a cause instituted on behalf of The Netherlands Steamship Company, the owners of the steamship Batavier, and on behalf of the master, crew, and passengers thereof, against the screw steamship Charkieh and her freight, for damages arising out of a collision between the Batavier and the Charkieh in the river Thames, on the 19th Oct. 1872. This cause was instituted and the Charkieh was arrested by a warrant from this court on the 21st Oct. No appearance was at that time entered on behalf of the owners of the Charkieh, but in the month of November an application was made on behalf of his Highness Ismael Pacha, Khedive of Egypt, to the Court of Queen's Bench for a prohibition to restrain this court from proceeding further in the suit, and a rule nisi was granted, which rule was, after argument, on the 23rd Jan. 1873, discharged. It appears from the report that the Court of Queen's Bench expressed no opinion upon the question which it was sought to raise on the application for a prohibition, deciding only that the question was one upon which the court was specially qualified to adjudicate. Since this decision an appearance has been entered under protest for his Highness Ismael Pacha, the Khedive of Egypt, the owner of the Charkieh, and Admiral Latif Pacha, Minister of Marine of the Government of Egypt. The pleadings on protest have been filed; they consist of a petition on behalf of his Highness the Khedive, an answer on behalf of the owners of the Batavier, a reply, and a conclusion. The petition concludes with a prayer to this court, to declare that it "has no jurisdiction to entertain this suit, and that the plaintiffs cannot prosecute the same therein, and that the said steamship is not liable to the arrest and process of this honourable court, and to order the said ship to be released from such arrest, and to dismiss the said suit, and to condemn the plaintiffs therein in the costs of these proceedings."

The principal averments of fact and law in the petition are the following: That the Charkieh is the property of his Highness Ismael Pacha, the Khedive of Egypt, as reigning sovereign of the State of Egypt, and is a public vessel of the government and semi-sovereign State of Egypt. In support of this proposition certain matters of fact connected with the history of this vessel are set forth in the succeeding articles. It is alleged that "from the time when the Charkieh became the property of his Highness the Khedive, as sovereign prince of Egypt," she has been "a ship of the Egyptian branch of the Imperial Ottoman Navy," entitled to carry and carrying "the Ottoman naval pendant and the Ottoman naval ensign, which are used by all the ships of the Egyptian navy as distinguished from Egyptian merchant vessels." The designation "Egyptian navy" appears to me, for reasons hereafter to be stated, inaccurate. It is further alleged that the Charkieh is officered by Egyptian officers holding commissions from the Khedive "in the naval service of the Egyptian government;" that the officers and crew are appointed by the Minister of Marine of the Government of Egypt, and the ship was under his control at the time of her arrest. That some time before she left Egypt for England she was "under the control and orders of the Egyptian Minister of the Interior, and was employed by him as a government packet, carrying the mails and passengers and cargo between Alexandria and Constantinople." That in September, 1871, she was sent to England to be repaired with proper credentials. That for the purpose of lessening expense she brought cargo to England, and, at the time of her arrest, was advertised to carry cargo back to Alexandria. That all freights and passage money carried by her were received and accounted for by the Egyptian Minister of the Interior as part of the public revenues of Egypt. That she had completed her repairs and was returning from a trial trip when the collision happened; and I may observe here that she had a small portion of the cargo which she was to carry to Alexandria then on board. The answer, in substance, sets up that the Charkieh came to England on the footing of an ordinary merchant vessel, and was so treated without objection in all respects by the proper public authorities in England. That she was regularly advertised as a merchant vessel when about to leave Alexandria for England, and when again about to return, on the former occasion carrying cargo on the terms of ordinary bills of lading. It appears from the evidence that she was chartered to an English subject for the voyage to Alexandria. The answer further submits that the Khedive "is not such a reigning sovereign as to entitle him or the Government of Egypt to have accorded to the Charkieh by the comity of nations or otherwise the privileges or immunities of a public vessel of war of an independent sovereign or state, or the privilege of freedom from arrest and process in this suit."

Not much oral evidence has been given in this cause. The first witness had the rank of a Pacha and held a commission as rear-admiral, granted by the Porte. He had been sent to England by the Khedive to superintend the repairs of this vessel. I collected from him that there is at present a fleet of six or seven vessels belonging to the Khedive, all engaged in ordinary commerce, "taking" (to use the words of the witness) "cargo, specie, passengers, everything," and all employed in the same service, mail vessels between Alexandria and Constantinople. It appears that the same vessels belonged before to a private merchant company, and were sold to the Khedive. The Charkieh carried the flag of the Imperial Ottoman navy. It appears that there is a flag used for Egyptian merchant vessels, but no flag of the Egyptian navy, as pleaded. A person of the name of Anderlich is acting commander, with no naval rank, and not a subject of the Khedive. The Khedive appoints to no higher rank than that of captain in the navy, the Sultan appointing all higher officers, and similarly in the army. Mr. Jackson deposed that his firm acted as brokers for the Charkieh; that he chartered the Charkieh back to Alexandria, and caused handbills to be printed, of which the following is a specimen:—

Regular line of screw steamers to Malta and Alexandria. Will be promptly despatched to follow the MAHALLA, the remarkably fine first-class screw steamer, CHARKIEH, A 1, for Malta and Alexandria. Has excellent accommodation for passengers. 1167 tons register. 1200 horse power. Loading in Millwall dock.

All goods received by special agreement, and must be sent alongside at least two clear days before the date of clearing, and must be distinctly marked with the name of the port for which they are destined, or the ship will not be responsible for the delivery of the same. Barges will be unladen as quickly as possible to suit the convenience of stowage; but if delay occurs, from any cause whatever, the owners will not be responsible for detention of craft. Engagement of goods are subject to there being room in the vessel when they come alongside.

He said that the Charkieh on the arrival here was entered by him at the custom-house, like an ordinary merchant vessel; that he stated that, as the ship belonged to the Khedive, he had no register to produce, and the excuse was admitted; that he paid light, pilotage, and tonnage dues. O'Connor, a custom-house officer, was examined. He boarded the Charkieh at Gravesend, and went up with her to the docks, where he left her in charge of the custom-house authorities.

From these averments in the pleadings, and these facts in the evidence, the following questions arise:—(1.) Is the international status of the Khedive that of a sovereign prince of Egypt? (2.) Is he entitled by virtue of that status to claim the exemption of this ship from the jurisdiction of this court? And (3.) If he be entitled to this privilege, has he waived or forfeited it? I proceed to consider these questions in their order, and, first, as to the international status of his Highness the Khedive. Very scanty evidence as to this status of the Khedive was produced before me at the hearing of the case. I was told by the counsel for his Highness that it was considered improper to offer evidence upon this subject: that it was my duty to take official cognizance of that status, and to obtain, by reference to the Foreign Office, any information which I might think necessary. Whether this was, or was not, the right course on the part of the counsel to adopt, I do not now stop to inquire. I have endeavoured to inform myself, and have had recourse to the following sources of knowledge: (1.) The general history of the government of Egypt. (2.)

The firmans which contain the public law of the Ottoman empire on this subject. (3.) The European treaties which concern the relations between Egypt and the Porte. (4.) The answer which the Foreign Office has furnished to an inquiry which I thought it my duty to make.

In the first place, some reference to the past as well as the present political history of Egypt seems necessary in order to ascertain whether, at any time since the Mahomedan conquest, that country has possessed the character of an independent state; because, in weighing the effect of doubtful facts and circumstances arising out of the vicissitudes of national life, it might fairly be considered that such a character once possessed might more easily revert, than, having had no previous existence, be for the first time created. The conquest of Egypt was effected by Amer, the general of the Caliphs, in 638 A.D., and from the death of Caliph Omar, in 644 A.D., it continued to be a province of the Arab empire under a governor appointed by the Caliphs. This nominal subordination to the Caliphs appears to have continued while the government de facto was in the hands of various dynasties, who reigned under the title of Soldan or Sultan of Egypt. The last sultan of the Memlook dynasty of Egypt, which had been established about 1250 A.D., was overthrown in 1517 A.D., by Selim I., the Ottoman Sultan of Constantinople. About this time the last of the Caliphs in Egypt died; and the caliphate of Egypt came to an end, and the title of Caliph was thenceforward assumed by the Sultan of Constantinople. Although Selim I. abolished the dynasty of the Memlooks, he preserved an aristocracy of that race under the authority of the Viceroy, nominated by the Porte and designated Pacha of Egypt. By this new constitution, twenty-four Beys were created; and the obligation was imposed of sending tribute to Constantinople, and of furnishing 12,000 men in time of war. This quasi-republic, composed of a Memlook aristocracy, was not wholly abolished till after the period of the French invasion at the close of the last century. During this interval, however, successful chieftains continually revolted from the Porte, and the more powerful of the Beys exercised absolute dominion over the country. In 1747, A.D., Ibrahim Kehia seized upon the supreme authority and declared the independency of Egypt. In 1758, A.D., Ali Bey, not the least remarkable of those warriors who rose to the surface in these troubled times, possessed himself of the Government of Egypt, and ruled over that country some time with an appearance of deference to and a recognition in the abstract of the sovereignty of the Porte, up to the period of 1774, A.D., when his eventful career was ended. In 1798, A.D., the invasion of Egypt by Bonaparte took place under the pretext of delivering Egypt from the Memlooks. In 1801, A.D., the victories of England once more restored Egypt to the dominion of the Porte. In 1806, A.D., an important epoch begins. In that year Mahommed Ali obtained from the Sultan a legal nomination to the Pachalic of Egypt, the actual authority of which he was already exercising. After the departure of the English from Alexandria and the massacre of the Memlook Beys, Mohammed took the command of forces, previously sent by him into Arabia, to subdue the sect of the Wahabees. During the interval between this period and 1831, A.D., he possessed an army of 60,000 men, a considerable navy, established a de facto empire from Senaar and Kadofan over all Syria to Adana, a part of Cilicia at the foot of Mount Taurus, and ruled over the island of Candia. The Porte, struggling with the rebellion of the Pacha of Janina, not subdued till 1822, A.D., and the uprising of the Greeks, whose liberties were established by the battle of Navarino in 1827, A.D., opposed a fitful, underhand, and feeble opposition to the continued practical aggression, however disguised in language, of its great subject. Between the Battle of Navarino (1827 A.D.), and the treaty, presently to be mentioned, of 1833, A.D., an important portion of Egyptian history intervenes, having a more immediate and direct bearing upon the question of public and international law, which I am called upon to decide. Mohammed Ali, on being refused the Pachalic of Acre by the Porte, found various pretexts for the invasion of Syria, on the actual possession of which, it was manifest, the supremacy of the Porte or of the Khedive of Egypt would depend. In 1831, A.D., the Egyptian army and Ibrahim Pacha passed the frontier. As soon as the Porte was apprised of this event, an order was immediately despatched to Mohammed Ali to recall his troops. To these and other orders he turned a deaf ear. An official declaration of war against him, preceded by a religious anathema or public declaration, that he and his sons were rebels, and out of the pale of Mussulman law, did not stop his course. In May 1832 Acre was captured by his troops. Not long afterwards all Syria was conquered for him by Ibrahim, his general and son. The armies of the Porte were routed and destroyed, and the advance of the conqueror upon Constantinople was only prevented by the intervention of the great European Powers. Nevertheless by a kind of convention usually called the treaty of Kutaieh, (a) between the Sultan and Mohammed, the latter obtained a great addition of power and territory; for he retained possession of Syria and the passes of Mount Taurus or the district of Adana. He undertook indeed to pay tribute for Syria, as well as for Egypt; but with his army and navy untouched, and with these possessions, the Pacha of Egypt was allowed to remain, in fact, more powerful than his nominal master at Constantinople.

Here I will pause a moment to consider the law applicable to the facts as now stated. What were the relations at this epoch existing between the Khedive and the Porte, and what was the nature and character of the authority of the former, so far as foreign states are connected with these considerations? Did they entitle the Khedive to the privilege of the sovereign of an independent state? These are questions which must be answered, like all others appertaining to international jurisprudence, by a reference to usage, authority, and the reason of the thing. Many accredited writers and jurists have drawn a distinction, which seems not to have escaped the framer of the Khedive's petition on protest now before me—between a sovereignty absolute and pure, and that less complete and perfect dominion to which the name of half sovereignty (demi-souverain) has been given. I am inclined to think that the sovereign of a state in the latter category may be entitled to require from foreign states the consideration and privileges which are unquestionably incident to the ruler of a state who is in the former category. There are also certain acts of feudal homage, or, as jurists say, servitutes juris gentium, which do not disentitle the state obliged to them to an international existence as a separate state. Some examples of half sovereignties are to be found in history. Some of the smaller states (halb souverain) of the German confederation, before it was virtually destroyed by Napoleon's confederation of the Rhine, and formally extinguished by the abdication of the Emperor Francis in 1806, also furnished examples of states cum imminutione imperii—to borrow the expression of Grotius (De Jure Belli et Pacis, Lib. 2, c. 15, s. 7-1)—but entitled to be treated as states by foreign powers. The old feudal relations of the Dukes of Burgundy, Normandy, and Brittany to France did not, I believe, prevent these princes from being considered as sovereigns at home and abroad, and from being entitled to be represented by ambassadors at foreign courts. Other instances might be mentioned, in which neither the payment of tribute, as in the cases of the kingdom of the Two Sicilies to the Pope, continued till 1818, A.D., or of the King of Hungary to the Sultan, from the reign of Ferdinand the First till the treaty of Silvastorok in 1606, A.D., nor other acts of purely feudal homage, such as the presentation of the white palfrey presented to the Pope by the King of the Two Sicilies, disentitled the representative of a state in these conditions to the enjoyment abroad of the privileges usually accorded to a foreign sovereign or his representatives. It has been well said by a commentator on Marten's work:—"La souveraineté extérieure n'est autre chose que l'indépendance de l'état vis-à-vis des autres" (Notes on l. 1, ch. iii. § 23, of "Martens' Precis du droit des Gens," 2nd ed. Vergé, t. 1, p. 103). It may, however, be that, if such a status existed de facto, it would not be the province of the tribunals of a foreign state to look beyond the fact, or to inquire minutely or at all into the history of its establishment. International law has no concern with the form, character, or power of a state: if, through the medium of a government, it has such an independent existence as to render it capable of entertaining international relations with other states. An apt illustration of this position is furnished by the status accorded by European Powers in more modern times to what were once commonly called the Barbary States. They had practically shaken off the Ottoman dominion. Bynkershoek describes them as "civitates quæ certam sedem atque ibi imperium habent, et quibuscum nunc pax est nunc bellum, non secus ac cum aliis gentibus, quique propterea ceterorum principum jure esse videntur." (Quæst. Jur. Pub. B. 1, c. 17.) And in the year 1801 Lord Stowell fully adopted this position, and asserted that the African States had long ago acquired the character of established governments, with whom we have regular treaties, acknowledging and confirming to them the relations of legal communities; and he remarked that, although their notions of international justice differ from those which we entertain, we do not on that account venture to call in question their public acts—that is to say, that although they are perhaps on more points entitled to a relaxed application of the principles of international law, derived exclusively from European custom, they are nevertheless treated as having the rights and duties of states of the civilized world: (The Helena, 4 C. Rob. Adm. Rep. 5.) It is to be observed, however, that the court proceeded upon the principle that a nation with whom we had regular treaties, was de facto acknowledged without a formal recognition to have what jurists have termed the right of a political personality (Klüber, Droit des Gens moderne de l'Europe, § 21), that is the position of a state in the great commonwealth of nations.

If, at this period, I had been obliged to decide whether the Pacha of Egypt was entitled to the privilege of a sovereign in this country, my decision would have been influenced by a regard to the de facto sovereign rights apparently exercised at this period by his Highness; and perhaps the analogy of an European state having absolute dominion over its own subjects with feudal subordination to another state might have been cited with effect. Though, even in this crisis of the history of Egypt, when the independence of that country was so nearly established, it must be observed that no attempt appears to have been made on behalf of the Pacha to exercise the principal international attribute of sovereignty, namely, the ius legationis, to be represented by an ambassador or diplomatic agent at the court of foreign sovereigns, nor is there any reason to believe that such an attempt, if made, would have been successful.

But in the interval between 1833, A.D., and 1841, A.D., the scene is greatly changed. The actors remain, but play very different parts. Nor is it unimportant to observe, with reference to the question immediately before me, that the stream of Egyptian political history, however immiscible the characters of the individual Mahommedan and Christian may be, has ever since this epoch been greatly affected by the currents of European diplomacy. I pass by earlier treaties and the treaty of Urkiar Skelessi in 1833, A.D., (a) which placing Turkey under the protectorate of Russia, has been superseded by a later treaty. Mohammed Ali and Ibrahim in 1834, A.D., pursued the scheme of uniting all the provinces belonging to the Caliphate under their Government; but discontents arose among the natives of Syria, which were not appeased by the disarmament of the Druses and of the population generally. These discontents revived the hopes of the Sultan, and in 1839, A.D., he sent another army into Syria, which was defeated at Nezib. But in 1840, A.D., Mohammed Ali was made aware that the European powers would not allow an Arab empire to be established on the ruins of the Ottoman state. England sent an agent to warn the Pacha of his danger, and in answer to a statement of his rights, the following language was used. "I have to instruct you," said Lord Palmerston (in a despatch bearing date Feb. 25, 1840) to Colonel Hodges, the agent employed, "on the next occasion on which Mohammed Ali shall speak to you of his rights, to say to his Highness, that you are instructed by your Government to remind him that he has no rights except such as the Sultan has conferred upon him; that the only legitimate authority which he possesses is the authority which has been delegated to him by the Sultan over a portion of the Sultan's dominions, and which has been entrusted to him for the sole purpose of being used in the interest and in obedience to the orders of the Sultan; that the Sultan is entitled to take away that which he has given; that the Sultan may probably do so if his own safety should require it; and that if in such case the Sultan should not have the means of self-defence, the Sultan has allies, who may possibly lend him their means."—(Correspondence relating to the affairs of the Levant, presented to Parliament in 1841. Part I., p. 592.) And on the 18th July 1840, Lord Palmerston wrote to Colonel Hodges as follows: "You will see that orders have been given to the British fleet to act at once, by cutting off the communication between Syria and Egypt, and by helping the Syrians. If Mehemet Ali should complain of this, and of its being done without notice, you will remind him civilly that we are the allies of the Sultan in maintaining their allegiance, and to assist the Sultan against those of his subjects who are in revolt against him, as Mehemet Ali is; and that Mehemet Ali, not being an independent sovereign with whom the Four Powers have any political relations, these powers are not bound to give him any notice of their intended proceedings": (Ibid, pt. II., p. 5). And again, on the 14th Sept. 1840 Lord Palmerston wrote, "with reference to your dispatch of the 17th Aug., I have to instruct you to state in writing to Mehemet Ali, if the state of things should render it necessary to do so, that Egypt is a portion of the dominions of the Sultan; that British subjects have certain rights and privileges as to the security of their persons, property, and commerce in all parts of the Ottoman Empire, by virtue of treaties concluded between the British Crown and the Porte; and that any subject of the Sultan, whether in a state of obedience to, or of revolt against, the authority of the Sultan, who should take upon himself in any way or in the slightest degree to molest British subjects, or to interfere with the exercise of their rights and privileges, would incur a heavy and most serious responsibility" (Ibid, pt. 2, p. 137). These passages from the despatches of the English Secretary for Foreign Affairs were not adverted to in the argument of counsel, I suppose, however, that, after such reference, it could not be contended that if at this epoch the question now before me as to the claim of the Khedive to be treated by England as a sovereign prince had arisen, such a claim could have been maintained in this court.

Have events subsequent to this epoch made this claim, then untenable, capable of being sustained? Surely not; for the principles of international policy enunciated in these despatches were fully carried into execution by the convention of 15th July 1840, (a) by which Austria, England, Prussia, and Russia concurred in the determination to protect the Porte by coercive measures, if necessary, against the Pacha. Whether the Pacha should be a sovereign prince or a subject, however powerful, of the Porte, seems to have depended on the result of this war. But the consequence of this European intervention was the rapid overthrow of the Pacha's power in Syria; after which the Sultan issued to the Pacha the firman of 13th Feb. 1841, to which I will presently refer, and which, with the other firmans bearing on this subject, will be found in the appendix to this judgment. In 1849 Mohammed Ali, having ceased to rule on account of imbecility in the preceding year, died, and was succeeded by Abbas, who died in 1854; to him succeeded Saed, who died in 1863, and to him succeeded the present Khedive. In 1866, 1867, 1869, circumstances induced the Porte to issue additional firmans: (See appendix to judgment.) In these documents, as well as in the firman of 1841, are to be found the existing relations between the Porte and the Pacha of Egypt, now called the Khedive. The principal and most important of these relations may be said to form part of the present public law of Europe.

The first firman of 13th Feb. 1841 (of which I have only the French translation) begins by reciting the act of submission (l'acte de soumission) by the Pacha (see Annual Register, 1841, p. 285), and the experience which he has acquired during this time he has occupied the position of "Gouverneur de l'Égypte," and proceeds:—"Je t'accorde le gouvernement de l'Égypte dans ses anciennes limites, avec le privilège additionnel de l'hérédité." Certain conditions are added as to the succession of his heir in the direct male line, on the failure of which the Porte is to confer the government on some other person: (Correspondence relating to the affairs of the Levant, pt. 3, pp. 436, 437). And then follows this important qualification (p. 437): "Bien que les Pachas d'Égypte aient obtenu le privilège de l'hérédité ils doivent cependant être considérés quant à la préséance comme étant sur un pied d'égalité avec les autres Vizirs, ils seront traités comme les autres Vizirs de ma Sublime Porte, et recevront les mêmes titres que l'on donne aux autres Vizirs quand on leur écrit." All the treaties concluded, or to be concluded, between the Porte and friendly powers "seront complètement mis à l'exécution dans la province de l'Égypte aussi"; so also the fundamental laws contained in the Hatti-Sheriff of Gulhané: (3 Nov. 1839. State Papers, vol. 31, p. 1239). All taxes are to be imposed and received in the name of the Sultan, and "attendu que les Égyptiens aussi sont les sujets de ma Sublime Porte," certain regulations are to be made to prevent their being harassed by the manner of their imposition. The amount of annual tribute is to be fixed. The army is not to exceed 18,000 men, "mais vu que les troupes de terre et de mer de l'Égypte sont instituées pour le service de ma Sublime Porte, il sera permis en temps de guerre de les porter au nombre qui aura été jugé convenable par ma Sublime Porte." The troops are to carry the same colours as those of the Porte. In the firman of 27th May 1860, which settled the mode of succession to the Pachalic, the Sultan speaks of the acts of the Viceroy "depuis ta nomination au gouvernement général de l'Égypte, qui est l'une des provinces les plus importantes de mon Empire." In the firman of 15th June in the same year the Sultan settled the mode of appointing a Regency in case of the Viceroy dying before his son had attained the age of eighteen years. The firman of 8th June 1867 is addressed "to my illustrious Vizier Ismail Pacha, who now holds the rank of Grand Vizier, with the title of 'Khiveh' of Egypt." It again refers to the fundamental laws which are to be observed in Egypt as well as in other parts of the dominions of the Porte, but allows the Viceroy to frame certain regulations, and then proceeds (here I have only the English translation):—"In like manner, whilst all the treaties of the Sublime Porte must be respected in Egypt, an exception is made only as regards the customs duties, and as regards foreigners, in matters relating to the police, postal and transit services, for which full powers are given to thee to enter into special arrangements with foreign agents. But such arrangements must not take the form of treaties or conventions having any political signification or purport. And in the event of their being inconsistent with the principles laid down above, or opposed to my original sovereign rights, it will be necessary to note them as null and void." On 29th April 1861 a treaty of commerce and navigation between Her Majesty and the Sultan was signed at Kanlida. (a) By the 20th Article it is provided that "The present treaty shall receive its execution in all and every one of the provinces of the Ottoman empire; that is to say, in all the possessions of his Imperial Majesty the Sultan, situated in Europe or in Asia, in Egypt and in the other parts of Africa belonging to the Sublime Porte, and in Servia, and in the United Principalities of Moldavia and Wallachia:" (See Hertslet's Treaties, vol. xi., pp. 561, 567.) I have been informed that the British Consul General in Egypt does not obtain an exequatur from the Viceroy, but on his appointment obtains the berat or exequatur from the Porte. The result, then, of the historical inquiry as to the status of his Highness the Khedive is as follows: That in the firmans, whose authority upon this point appears to be paramount, Egypt is invariably spoken of as one of the provinces of the Ottoman empire. That the Egyptian army is regulated as part of the military force of the Ottoman empire. That the taxes are imposed and levied in the name of the Porte. That the treaties of the Porte are binding upon Egypt, and that she has no separate jus legationis. That the flag for both the army and navy is the flag of the Porte. All these facts, according to the unanimous opinion of accredited writers, are inconsistent and incompatible with those conditions of sovereignty which are necessary to entitle a country to be ranked as one among the great community of states. Against this array of negative proof is to be set the solitary circumstance that the office of the Khedive is hereditary. It requires but little consideration to see that this peculiarity cannot affect the question. Egypt remains a province of an empire, and does not become an empire, because her Viceroy is hereditary. The Viceroy does not become a sovereign prince because his sovereign permits him to transmit the viceroyalty to his descendants in the direct male line. The hereditary character does not confer on the holder, in this case, the right of making war and peace, of sending an ambassador, or of maintaining a separate military or naval force, or of governing at all, except in the name and under the authority of his sovereign. The hereditary character of the viceroyalty may make the viceroy the chief subject of the Porte, but he is still a subject prince, and not a sovereign prince or reigning sovereign" even "of a semi-sovereign state," according to the terms of the petition on protest. (a)

I have one more observation to make before I leave this branch of the subject. It cannot be urged in favour of the exemption of the Charkieh, that, though she may have been erroneously claimed as a public vessel of the Egyptian government, it is substantially the same thing if she be a public vessel of the Ottoman government, of which the government of Egypt is a part; because at the very beginning of these proceedings I directed the Registrar to write the following letter to the ambassador of the Porte:—

Admiralty Registry, Doctor's Commons,
12th Nov. 1872.

Your Excellency,—I am directed by the Judge of the High Court of Admiralty to apprise you that a cause of damage on behalf of the owners of a vessel called the Batavier has been instituted in this court against a vessel called the Charkieh or Charkieh. The Judge, having received an intimation that the vessel so proceeded against is alleged to belong to the royal navy of the Ottoman Empire, and therefore not amenable to the jurisdiction of this court, desires that your Excellency should be informed of the institution of the suit in question, in order that the proper legal steps may be taken for establishing the fact that the vessel does belong to the Ottoman navy, if such be the case.—I have the honour to be, &c., H. A. BATHURST,

Assistant Registrar.

His Excellency Musurus Pacha, Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary from the Ottoman Empire,
1, Bryanstone Square.

No answer has been sent to this letter, and no intervention of any sort has taken place on behalf of the Porte.

Thereupon this argument occurs:—It cannot be denied that for the abuse of the privilege of the sovereign or the ambassador some remedy must be found. It has been shown that the Khedive has six or seven ships acting as merchantmen, for whom he claims the same privilege as for the Charkieh; and the number may be indefinitely increased. It has been said that the remedy is to be found in the application to the sovereign to abate the abuse. Any such application must be made in the present instance to the Porte. But the ambassador of the Porte asserts no such claim. It is the governor of a province of the state that insists upon the privilege. To communicate directly with the governor in this matter would be to derogate from the dignity of his Sovereign, and to place in the rank of a Sovereign a governor whom his own sovereign has placed in the rank of a subject.

Lastly, no treaty ever having been made with

His Highness, no ambassador ever received from or sent to him, British consuls in Egypt receiving no exequatur from him, there being, in other words, no de facto recognition of His Highness as a sovereign by our Government, has there been any recognition de jure of him in this capacity? The Court of Chancery, when a plaintiff averred in his bill that a certain republic in Central America had been recognised as an independent government, put itself in communication with the Foreign Office, and after such communication declared itself authorised to state that the republic in question had never been recognised by the Government of this country, and on the ground that what was pleaded was "historically false" allowed a demurrer to the bill: (Taylor v. Barclay, 2 Sim. 221.) I have communicated with the Foreign Office, and have received the following answer to my questions, viz.: "That the Khedive has not been and is not now recognised by Her Majesty as reigning Sovereign of the State of Egypt." "He is recognised by Her Majesty's Government as the hereditary Ruler of the Province of Egypt under the supremacy of the Sultan of Turkey."

Upon all these facts I have arrived at the conclusion that, independently of any other consideration, His Highness the Khedive has failed to establish his claim to exempt his vessel from the process of the Court. I am not deterred from arriving at the conclusion by the alleged precedents which have been cited to me. The first is a French decision, which was cited to me from Phillimore's International Law, Vol. II., p. 138. It was delivered by the Tribunal Civil de la Seine, which tribunal carries with it a respectable though not an overwhelming authority. That tribunal declined to entertain an action against Mehemet Ali, as Viceroy of Egypt, for 100,000 francs, alleged to be due to M. Solan for his services respecting a school at Cairo. The defence was conducted principally upon the ground that a foreign government (gouvernement étranger) could not be sued in an action of this description, which appears to have been founded on an attachment of goods belonging to the Egyptian Government, and I observe that the principal ground on which the judgment is rested is as follows: "Attendu que toutes les expressions de la demande lui donnent le caractère personnel et révèlent qu'elle est dirigée contre le gouvernement Egyptien, et non contre un particulier." The judgment does not seem to me to go beyond the principles that an action will not lie against a foreign government in a matter of state policy; and it may well be that the Egyptian Government in this matter were exercising functions coming within the scope of the authority which the Porte has delegated to the Viceroy. Some other judgments (three apparently) were cited from cases not reported before the Common Pleas in 1866 and 1867. (Melanidis v. Ismael Pacha, ubi sup.) An application was made to the court on behalf of the Pacha of Egypt to prohibit proceedings in the Mayor's Court. This case appears to me clearly to have turned upon a question relating to the authority of the Mayor's Court. A rule nisi having been obtained, and no cause subsequently having been shown, the rule was made absolute as a matter of course. In the other cases prohibition was applied for upon two grounds—want of jurisdiction in the Mayor's Court, and the Pacha's being a Sovereign Prince; and in these cases, as in the other, no opposition having been made, the rule was granted as a matter of course, without any argument or appearance on the other side. I cannot find anything in these alleged precedents which ought to obstruct the conclusion at which I have arrived and which I have stated.

(a) If a newspaper telegram is to be relied upon, the Sultan, on June 11, 1873, granted to the Khedive a new firman, which confirms all the former privileges extended to the Egyptian Government respecting the interior administration of Egypt; and further gives power to the Khedive to conclude commercial treaties with foreign Powers, to conclude conventions for settling the relations between foreigners and the Egyptian Government, to provide by every means for the defence of Egypt, and to maintain as many troops as he may deem necessary for the purpose; the Khedive is only required to obtain the authority of the Porte before acquiring any iron-clad war vessels. (See the Times, June 16, 1873.) How far this will alter the position of the Khedive is too large a question to discuss here, but it seems probable that one result will be that the Khedive will acquire, to some extent at least, the ius legationis for the purpose of concluding the treaties and conventions mentioned. If so he would acquire a condition of sovereignty upon which great stress is laid by the learned judge in the admirable judgment now reported.—Ed.

But I am unwilling to leave the elaborate argument which has been addressed to me on the other parts of the case without the expression of my opinion; and I will proceed to consider in the second place whether, assuming the Khedive to be entitled to claim exemption as a Sovereign Prince, he is entitled by virtue of that status to claim the exemption of this ship from the jurisdiction of this court. In order thoroughly to examine this question as to the immunity of Sovereign Princes and their representatives from the jurisdiction of the tribunals of the state in which they happen to be, and to avoid the consequences of a false theory on this subject, it is expedient to state with precision the foundation upon which this privilege rests. Upon principles of general jurisprudence the presence of a person or of property within the limits of a state founds the jurisdiction of the tribunals of that state, "Subjectio autem," as Bynkershoek says, "duplex est, altera personæ, altera rei, in imperio quo de agitur sitæ, et ex utraque forum sortitur." (De Foro Leg. c. 2, Opera Minora, edit. 1730, p. 435). The sovereign prince or his representative is exempted from the operation of this principle, absolutely so far as his person is concerned, and with respect to his property at least so far as that property is connected with the dignity of his position and the exercise of his public functions. Upon what grounds is this exemption allowed? Not upon the possession on behalf of the sovereign of any absolute right in virtue of his sovereignty to this exemption; such a right on his part would be incompatible with the right of the territorial sovereign; and not, as is sometimes carelessly said, upon the ground that he and his property are to be considered as still remaining in his own territory. This is indeed the fiction of law expressed in the term "extritoriality," by which the nature of the immunity is illustrated; but it is illogical and inaccurate to consider it as the ground of that immunity. The true foundation is the consent and usage of independent states, which has universally granted this exemption from local jurisdiction in order that the functions of the representative of the sovereignty of a foreign state may be discharged with dignity and freedom, unembarrassed by any of the circumstances to which litigation might give rise. Bynkershoek says:—"Quod legati fori præscriptione n'antur, una ratio est, ne impediatur legatio, hoc est, ne legati persona principi suo fiat inutilis; at inutilis non erit, bonis detentis, inutilis non erit, quamvis in foro nostro litiget, quamvis vincatur, quamvis ea ipsa bona, pignori capta, in causam judicati, distrahantur, et inde satisfiat creditoribus. Non ex personæ, sed ex bonorum subjectione id iudicium subsistit, idque perinde ægetur, atque si legatus apud nos legatus non esset." (De Foro Leg. c. 16, p. 512.) The same doctrine is laid down in the case of The Schooner Exchange v. McFaddon (7 Cranch, U. S. Sup. Ct. Rep. 116), decided in 1812 by the Supreme Court of the United States, and the case of the The Santissima Trinidad (7 Wheaton, U. S. Sup. Ct. Rep., p. 352) decided by the same tribunal in 1822. As far as my researches have extended, I cannot find any country in which this immunity has been carried to a greater length or more favourably considered than in England, from the time at least of the passing of the statute 7 Anne, cap. 12, in the year 1708, to the decision of the Queen's Bench in 1859 in the case of The Magdalena Steam Navigation Co. v. Martin (2 Ell. & Ell. 94; 28 L. J., Q. B. 310). The cases principally relied on before me have been Barbuit's case in 1734, decided by Lord Chancellor Talbot (Cas. temp. Talb., 281), as to which it is enough to state the observation of C. J. Erle, in the Magdalena Steam Navigation Co. v. Martin: "All that is said about an ambassador in the judgment in that case is extra-judicial. The decision was that the applicant, being only a consul, was not entitled to the privilege, whatever that might be of an ambassador." The cases of Triquet v. Bath, decided by Lord Mansfield in 1764 (3 Burr. 1478), Heathfield v. Chilton, decided by the same authority in 1767 (4 Burr. 2016), are, both of them, remarkable for Lord Mansfield's observations upon the statute of Anne. In the first case he observes: "This privilege of foreign ministers and their domestic servants depends upon the law of nations. The Act of Parliament of 7 Anne, c. 12, is declaratory of it. All that is new in this Act is the clause which gives a summary jurisdiction for the punishment of the infractors of this law." And in the second case he says: "The privileges of public ministers and their retinue depend upon the law of nations, which is part of the common law of England; and the Act of Parliament of 7 Anne, c. 12, did not intend to alter, nor can alter, the law of nations." But, in truth, the whole law upon this subject, so far as English decisions are concerned in it, will be found completely exhausted in the arguments and decisions in the cases of Taylor v. Best, decided by the Court of Common Pleas in 1854 (14 C. B. 487) and the Magdalena Steam Navigation Co. v. Martin (2 Ell. & Ell. 94), decided by the Court of Queen's Bench in 1859. In the former case the court held that a secretary of Legation might voluntarily abandon his privilege, and that in a case where he was sued jointly with others and appeared to the process, and allowed the suit to go on to an advanced stage without offering any objection, and where there did not appear to be any intention on the part of the plaintiff to interfere with either the person or the property of the ambassador, and where the action might proceed to its ultimate termination without any such molestation or interference, they could not give effect to a claim of privilege. In the second case the defendant pleaded his privilege as envoy, and, among other things that he had not waived or disentitled himself to the exemptions appertaining to a public minister. He had been a shareholder in a certain company, at the winding-up of which he was called upon to contribute in respect of his shares. Lord Campbell delivered an elaborate judgment, which concluded in these words: "It certainly has not hitherto been expressly decided that a public minister duly accredited to the Queen by a foreign state is privileged from all liability to be sued here in civil actions, but we think that this follows from well-established principles, and we give judgment for the defendant." The judgment was mainly founded upon the principle laid down by Grotius (De Jure Belli et Pacis, lib. 2, c. 18, § 9), Omnis coactio abesse a legato debet; and it was holden that the service of process upon him and the necessities of a defence could not take place, to use Lord Campbell's words, "without coactio." Bynkershoek agrees with the opinion of Grotius expressed in the general terms just cited, but appears to differ from Lord Campbell as to what would amount to coactio, and to say the least of it to doubt very much whether the in jus vocatio could be so considered. The result of these decisions appears to me to be that the ambassador is personally exempt from the service of all process in a civil cause and from any action which renders such service necessary. I should observe here that the argument in behalf of the defendant has been conducted upon the principle that the law as to the privileges of the ambassador applies with equal force to the sovereign, and I agree with the proposition. "Major non est sanctitas," says Bynkershoek, "mandatarii quam mandantis, si res suas ipse velit agere." (De Foro Leg. c. 3 p. 445). But how is the argument to be applied to this case, in which the person claiming the rights of a sovereign can neither send nor receive an ambassador?

The conclusion, however, to which I have come, as to the privileges of an ambassador by no means disposes of the question now before me. It remains to be considered whether there may not be a proceeding in rem (a mode of proceeding which courts of Admiralty have adopted from the civil law) against property of the sovereign or ambassador, which is free from the objections fatal to the other modes of procedure which I have mentioned. It is worthy of observation that the counsel for the ambassadors in the cases both of Taylor v. Best and The Magdalena Steam Navigation Company v. Martin were careful to guard themselves from saying that such a suit might not be instituted. "All the authorities," says Mr. Wiles, who certainly would have omitted no point in favour of his client, "cited on the other side may be explained by observing the distinction between our laws and the laws of those countries where the civil law obtains. There is nothing in this country analogous to the proceeding of those courts ad fundandam jurisdictionem, except the proceeding by what is called foreign attachment in the Lord Mayor's Court of London. Where the civil law prevails, the proceeding may be had against the person of the defendant if within the jurisdiction, or, if not, against his goods or his lands, if any, and the suit may go on without in any way touching the person; the proceeding is in rem." And Sir Fitzroy Kelly, counsel for the ambassador in the last case, seems to have admitted that proceedings taken in rem would stand upon a different principle. So Bynkershoek, "Scilicet in regionibus, ubi ob bona convenimur, et ex eorum arresto forum sortimur, nullus dubita, quin et legatorum bona arresto detineri, et per hoc ipsi in jus vocari possint. Bona dico, sive immobilia, sive mobilia, dummodo neque ad personam ejus pertinent, neque tanquam legatus possideat, uno verbo, sine quibus legationem recte obire potest. Hoc tamen, ob personæ sanctitatem, temperamento, ne quid plus capiatur quam legatus debet, et ne quid quod ille non civiliter possidet, et si quod captum est, quaratur, ad legati personam minusve pertineat, necne semper pro legato benignior fiat interpretatio." (De Foro Leg. c. 16, p. 510.) In the judgment in Taylor v. Best, Jervis, C.J. uses this language: "It is said—and perhaps truly said—that an ambassador or foreign minister is privileged from suits in the courts of the country to which he is accredited, or, at all events, from being proceeded against in a manner which may ultimately result in the coercion of his person, or the seizure of his personal effects necessary to his comfort and dignity, and that he cannot be compelled in invitum, or against his will, to engage in any litigation in the courts of the country to which he is sent. But all the foreign jurists hold that if the suit can be founded without attacking the personal liberty of the ambassador, or interfering with his dignity or personal comfort, it may proceed. Various passages have been cited to show that in countries where the civil law prevails, and where jurisdiction can be founded by a proceeding in rem in the first instance, where there are houses or lands which are immovable, that may be taken to found the jurisdiction, the suit may proceed. Movable goods, too, which are unconnected with the personal comfort and dignity of the ambassador may be taken for the same purpose." And in The Magdalena Steam Navigation Company v. Martin, Lord Campbell, after quoting the authority of Bynkershoek, says: "In countries where there may be a citation by seizure of goods, if an ambassador loses his privilege by engaging in commerce, he not only may be cited, but all his goods unconnected with his diplomatic functions may be arrested to force him to appear, and may afterwards, while he continues, be taken in execution on the judgment." I think, therefore, that I am not prevented from holding, what it appears to me the justice of the case would otherwise require, that proceedings of this kind in rem may, in some cases at least, be instituted without any violation of international law, though the owner of the res be in the category of persons privileged from personal suit.

In the passage from Bynkershoek which I have already cited, it will appear what kinds of property cannot, in the case of a sovereign or ambassador, be subject to a proceeding in rem; and the principles to be collected from various other passages in his great work, De Foro Legatorum, combine to establish this proposition of international law, namely that a proceeding in rem cannot be instituted against the property of a sovereign or ambassador if the res can in any fair sense be said to be connected with the jus coronæ of the sovereign, or the discharge of the functions of the ambassador. Upon these principles ships of war cannot be seized by a creditor of the sovereign to whom they belong; and we learn from Bynkershoek that three vessels belonging to the King of Spain, having been seized by his creditors in the port of Flushing in 1668, were ordered to be released by the States-General, it being suggested that the remedy of the creditors was to obtain an order for reprisals from the state: (De Foro Legatorum, c. 4, p. 448.) It is, however, by no means clear that a ship of war to which salvage services have been rendered may not jure gentium be liable to be proceeded against in a Court of Admiralty for the remuneration due to such services. It is very remarkable that Lord Stowell declined to pronounce any opinion upon this point in the case of The Prins Frederik (2 Dods 451), though it appears that he had upon principles of English law previously declined to entertain a suit of this kind attempted to be instituted by a British subject against a British man-of-war: (The Comus,

2 Dods. 464.) On the same principle the American Court has holden that a lien allowed by the law against a private person cannot be enforced against a vessel the title of which has vested in the United States: (Briggs v. Light Boats, 11 Allen, 93 Massachusetts Rep. 157.) Upon the same principle, in Wadsworth v. The Queen of Spain (17 Q. B. 171) and De Haber v. The Queen of Portugal (17 Q. B. 196), proceedings in foreign attachment instituted against property belonging to these sovereigns in their public capacity by the holders of Spanish and Portuguese bonds were stayed by prohibition. In The United States v. Wilder (3 Sumner's U. S. First Circ. Rep. 313) a question arose whether property belonging to the government was liable to make contribution in a case of general average. Mr. Justice Story said: "It is said that in cases where the United States are a party, no remedy by suit lies against them for the contribution; and hence the conclusion is deduced that there can be no remedy in rem. Now, I confess that I should reason altogether from the same premises to the opposite conclusion. The very circumstance that no suit would lie against the United States in its sovereign capacity would seem to furnish the strongest ground why the remedy in rem should be held to exist." And again, "I cannot therefore but think that the circumstances that the United States can in no other way be compelled to make a just contribution of its share in the general average, so far from constituting a ground to displace the lien created by the maritime law, does in fact furnish a strong reason for enforcing it." The learned judge then referred to the cases of The Comus (2 Dods. Adm. Rep. 464) and The Prins Frederik (2 Dods. Adm. Rep. 451), and observed: "A distinction was taken in that case, which indeed has been often taken by writers on public law, as to the exemption of certain things from all private claims; as, for example, things devoted to sacred, religious and public purposes; things extra commercium et quorum non est commercium, that distinction might well apply to property like public ships of war, held by the sovereign jure coronæ, and not be applicable to the common property of the sovereign of a commercial character, or engaged in the common business of commerce." And again he says: "In the case of The Schooner Exchange (7 Cranch Rep. 116) it was considered by the court that the ground of exemption of the ships of war of a foreign sovereign coming into our ports from all process was founded upon the implied assent of our government. But it was not decided that the other property of a foreign sovereign, not belonging to his military or naval establishment, was entitled to a similar exemption." A strong illustration of the distinction between the jurisdiction in rem and in personam is supplied by the decision of Mr. Justice Story in the case of Clarke v. New Jersey Steam Navigation Company (1 Story's U. S. First Circuit Rep. 528). "The real point of controversy," he says, "whether the respondent, being a corporation created by and having its corporate existence and organisation in the state of New Jersey, is, as a foreign corporation, liable to a suit in personam in the Admiralty in this district, not directly, but indirectly through its attachable property here, so as to compel the appearance of the corporation to answer the suit, or at all events to subject the property attached to the final judgment and decree of the court. The whole argument turns upon this proposition, that there is a distinction between the case of a private person and that of a corporation. The former is suable in the Admiralty by process of attachment, in a suit in personam, against his property found in the district, although he may not personally be found within the district; whereas a corporation is liable to be sued only in the state where it has its corporate existence, and from which it derives its charter, and not elsewhere, although its property may be found in the district where the suit is brought." Then follow these significant words: "If the present were a suit in rem against the property to enforce a right of property or a lien, or to subject it, as the offending thing"—the expression is remarkable—" (as in cases of collision), to the direct action of the court, the case could not admit of any real doubt; for in all proceedings in rem, the court having jurisdiction over the property itself, it is wholly unimportant whether the property belongs to a private person or to a corporation, to a citizen or to a foreigner, to a resident or to a non-resident, to a domestic or to a foreign corporation. In each and in every such case the jurisdiction is complete and conclusive."

I am disposed to hold that, within the ebb and flow of the sea, in the case of salvage the obligatio ex quasi contractu attaches jure gentium upon the ship to which the service has been rendered, and in the case of collision the obligatio ex quasi delicto attaches jure gentium upon the ship which is the wrong-doer, whatever be her character, public or private, and such, I think, was the inclination of Lord Stowell's mind in the case of the Prins Frederik, and in the case of the Swift (1 Dods. Adm. Rep. 339), to which I will presently advert. But it is not necessary in the present case to travel to this goal, because a nearer one is at hand. This ship cannot claim exemption as a ship of war. She carries indeed the flag of the Porte, but she is not equipped in any sense for war, nor does she pretend to be so. Apart from the question of liability jure gentium, to which I have adverted, I am not prepared to deny that the private vessel, for instance, the yacht of the Sultan, though equipped for pleasure and not for war, would be entitled by international comity, operating (at least so long as it is not withdrawn by the State conceding it) as international law, to the same immunity as a ship of war; though dicta to the contrary may be found in some of the writings of some jurists. But it seems to me idle to contend, in the face of the evidence before me, that these six or seven ships are not trading vessels, to all intents and purposes, though they carry mail bags. But again I am not obliged to predicate this character of all these vessels; the one before me is actually chartered to a British subject, and has been by him publicly advertised like any other merchant vessel to carry cargo, for which he is to receive the freight. That this cargo is liable to a lien for salvage has not been denied; but suppose under the 24 Vict. c. 10 the owners of the cargo were to bring a suit in rem against the ship for damage to the cargo, must that suit be dismissed, and justice so far denied, because the ship was only chartered, and was not, according to the technical term of English law, demised to the British subject, and therefore remains the property of the Khedive? Such has been necessarily the contention of the counsel for the Khedive. I cannot assent to it; the mere statement appears to me to carry with it a refutation of the argument.

It was ingeniously argued by Mr. Cohen that it mattered not whether the suit was in rem or in personam; because the object of the jus in rem was to enforce the jus in personam and the cases of The Druid (1 W. Rob. 399) and The Thetis (3 Mar. Law Cases, O.S., 358) were cited in support of this proposition. But this argument in its relation to the present case appears to me fallacious. The object of international law, in this as in other matters, is not to work injustice, not to prevent the enforcement of a just demand, but to substitute negotiation between Governments, though they may be dilatory and the issue distant and uncertain, for the ordinary use of courts of justice in cases where such use would lessen the dignity or embarrass the functions of the representatives of a foreign state; and if the suit takes a shape which avoids this inconvenience, the object both of international and of ordinary law is attained;—of the former, by respecting the personal dignity and convenience of the sovereign; of the latter, by the administration of justice to the subject.

The universally acknowledged exceptions to the general rule of the sovereign's immunity when examined prove the truth of this proposition. For instance, the exemption from suit is admitted not to apply to immovable property. One reason may be that the owner of such property has so incorporated himself into the jural system of the state in which he holds such property, that the argument of general inconvenience to states from allowing the exemption outweighs the argument from convenience on which the exemption in other matters is bottomed. But another reason surely is that which seems to be suggested by Jervis C. J., in Taylor v. Best, that such a suit can be carried on without the necessity of serving process upon the sovereign, or of interfering in any way with such personal property as may be requisite for the due discharge of his functions. The exemption must be taken away for one of three reasons, either those which I have suggested, or, a third, that the acquisition of immovable property amounts to a waiver of privilege. Take another instance: the sovereign who is plaintiff in a suit cannot escape from the necessity of answering interrogatories, and being subject to the service of process, and to counter-demands, such as the reconventiones of the Roman law; which law justly says, "Qui non cogitur in aliquo loco judicium pati, si ipse ibi agit, cogitur excipere actiones et ad eundem judicem mitti:" (Dig. l. v. t. 1-22.) So the Court of Chancery has decided that, though it will not make an order against an ambassador who does not submit to its jurisdiction, yet it will restrain a third party from giving to him a fund, the right to which is in dispute, notwithstanding his title to the fund may be absolute in law: (Gladstone v. Musurus Bey, 32 L. J., N.S., Ch. 155; 7 L. T. Rep. N. S., 477.) So, quite recently, in 1872, in the case of Larivière, v. Morgan (L. Rep. 7 Ch. App. 550), Lord Chancellor Hatherley decided that where a foreign government has made a contract in this country, and has lodged money in the hands of agents in this country for payment of the sums to become due under the contract, he would not refuse relief to the contractor because the contract was with a foreign government, nor because the foreign government would not appear before him; and he ordered the agents to bring the money into court, to be paid out to the contractor on his proving that he had performed his part of the contract. All these instances of exception from the general rule of the Sovereign's immunity seem to be founded upon the principle which I have stated: and, if so, why should not such proceedings in rem as have been instituted in this case be in accordance with international law? For it must be remembered that this is the law which I have to apply to this suit. No disrespect is shown, no injustice is done to the sovereign, while justice is done to the private suitor.

Thirdly, assuming again that the Khedive has a status which entitles him to the privilege claimed, has he by his conduct waived or forfeited that privilege? In the case of The Swift (1 Dods. Adm. Rep. 339), Lord Stowell had to consider whether the king was bound by the Navigation Acts; and after stating some of the difficulties attending the solution of this question, he says:—"The utmost that I can venture to admit is, that if the king traded, as some sovereigns do, he might fall within the operation of these statutes. Some sovereigns have a monopoly of certain commodities, in which they traffick on the common principles that other traders traffick: and, if the King of England so possessed and so exercised any monopoly, I am not prepared to say that he must not conform his traffick to the general rules by which all trade is regulated." Bynkershoek, when he wrote his celebrated treatise "De Foro Legatorum," complained (cap. xiv. de legato mercatore) that in his day the privilege of the ambassador had been greatly abused to cover the trade of the merchant. I must say that if ever there was a case in which the alleged sovereign (to use the language of Bynkershoek) was "strenuè mercatorem agens," or in which, as Lord Stowell says, he ought to "traffick on the common principles that other traders traffick," it is the present case: and, if ever a privileged person can waive his privilege by his conduct, the privilege has been waived in this case. It was not denied, and could not be denied, after the evidence, that the vessel was employed for the ordinary purposes of trading. She belongs to what may be called a commercial fleet. I do not stop to consider the point of her carrying the mails, for that was practically abandoned by counsel. She enters an English port and is treated in every material respect by the authorities as an ordinary merchantman, with the full consent of her master; and at the time of the collision she is chartered to a British subject, and advertised as an ordinary commercial vessel. No principle of international law, and no decided case, and no dictum of jurists of which I am aware, has gone so far as to authorise a sovereign prince to assume the character of a trader, when it is for his benefit, and when he incurs an obligation to a private subject to throw off, if I may so speak, his disguise, and appear as a sovereign, claiming for his own benefit, and to the injury of a private person, for the first time, all the attributes of his character; while it would be easy to accumulate authorities for the contrary position (see especially Klüber, Europ. Völkerrecht, § 210, and authorities cited in note).

Upon all grounds therefore, namely, First, that his Highness the Khedive, however exalted his position and distinguished his rank, has failed to establish that he is entitled to the privileges of a sovereign prince, according to the criteria of sovereignty required by the reason of the thing, and by the usage and practice of nations as expounded by accredited writers upon international jurisprudence. Secondly, that on the assumption he is entitled to such privilege, it would not oust the jurisdiction of this court in the particular proceeding which has been instituted against this ship. And, thirdly, that assuming the privilege to exist, it has been waived with reference to this ship by the conduct of the person who claims it. I pronounce against the protest, and I think I must in justice to the suitor give him the cost of these proceedings. Having regard to the importance of the case, if any leave of the court be required in order to appeal from this decision, I will readily give the requisite permission.

Protest overruled.

Firman du 13 Février 1841. (a)

L'acte de soumission que tu viens de faire, les assurances de fidélité et de dévouement que tu as données, et les intentions droites et sincères que tu as manifestées tant à mon égard que dans les intérêts de ma Sublime Porte, sont parvenues à ma connaissance souveraine et m'ont été fort agréables. En conséquence, et le zèle et la sagacité qui te caractérisent, ainsi que l'expérience et les connaissances que tu as acquises dans les affaires de l'Egypte pendant le long espace de tems que tu as occupé le poste de gouverneur de l'Egypte, donnant lieu à croire que tu auras acquis des droits à la faveur et à la confiance que je t'accorde, c'est-à-dire, que tu en connaîtras toute la portée et toute la reconnaissance que tu devras en avoir, que tu t'appliqueras à faire en sorte que ces dispositions passent à tes fils et à tes neveux, je t'accorde le gouvernement de l'Egypte dans ses anciennes limites telles qu'on les trouve dans la carte qui t'est envoyée par mon Grand Vizier actuellement en fonctions, munie d'un cachet, avec le privilège additionnel de l'hérédité et avec les conditions suivantes :

Désormais, quand le poste sera vacant, le gouvernement de l'Egypte écherra en ligne droite, de l'aîné à l'aîné, dans la race masculine parmi les fils et les petits-fils. Quant à leur nomination, elle se fera de la part de ma Sublime Porte. Si jamais le destin voudra que la ligna masculine soit éteinte, comme dans ce cas ma Sublime Porte devra conférer le gouvernement de l'Egypte à une autre personne, les enfans mâles nés des filles des gouverneurs de l'Egypte n'auront aucun droit, aucune capacité légale à la succession au gouvernement. Bien que les Pachas d'Egypte ayant obtenu le privilège de l'hérédité, ils doivent cependant être considérés, quant à la préséance, comme étant sur un pied d'égalité avec les autres vizirs, ils seront traités comme les autres vizirs de ma Sublime Porte, et recevront les mêmes titres que l'on donne aux autres vizirs quand on leur écrit. Les principes fondés sur les lois de sûreté de la vie, de la sûreté de la propriété, et de la conservation de l'honneur, principes consacrés par les ordonnances salutaires de mon Hatti Sheriff de Gulhane (b); tous les traités conclus et à conclure entra ma Sublime Porte et les puissances amies, seront complèment mis à exécution dans la province de l'Egypte aussi; et tous les réglemens faits et à faire par ma Sublime Porte seront aussi mis en pratique en Egypte, en les conciliant le mieux qu'on pourra avec les circonstances locales et les principes de la justice et de l'équité. En Egypte, tous les impôts, tous les revenus, seront perçus et recueillis en mon nom souverain; attendu, cependant, que les Egyptiens aussi sont les sujets de ma Sublime Porte, et afin qu'un jou ils ne soient pas vexés, la dime, les droits, et les autres impôts qui seront perçus, le seront conformément au système équitable adopté par ma Sublime Porte, et l'on prendra soin de payer, dès que le tems du payement sera venu, sur les droits de douane, sur la capitation, sur les dîmes, sur les revenus et les autres produits de la province de l'Egypte, le tribut annuel dont le quantum est inséré et précisé dans un autre firman impérial. (a) Etant d'usage d'envoyer tous les ans d'Egypte des vivres en nature aux deux Villes Saintes, on continuera à envoyer à chaque endroit séparément les vivres et les autres objets, quels qu'ils puissent être, qui y ont été envoyés jusqu'à présent. Comme ma Sublime Porte a pris la résolution d'améliorer la monnaie, qui est l'âme des opérations de la société, et de le faire de manière à ce que désormais il ne puisse y avoir de la variation ni dans l'aloï, ni dans le prix, je permets que l'on batte monnaie en Egypte; mais les monnaies en or et en argent que je te permets de battre porteront mon nom, et seront tout-à-fait semblables, sous les rapports du titre, des prix et de la forme à celles que l'on frappe ici.

En tems de paix, 18,000 hommes suffiront pour le service intérieur de la province de l'Egypte; il ne sera pas permis d'en augmenter le nombre. Mais vu que les troupes de terre et de mer de l'Egypte sont instituées pour le service de ma Sublime Porte, il sera permis, en tems de guerre, de les porter au nombre qui aura été jugé convenable par ma Sublime Porte. On a adopté le principe que les soldats employés dans les autres parties de mes états serviront pendant cinq ans, au bout duquel terme ils seront échangés contre des recrues. Cela étant, il faudrait qu'à cet égard l'on suivit le même système en Egypte aussi. Mais par rapport à la durée du service, on s'adaptera aux dispositions des habitans, en observant à leur égard ce que l'équité exige. Il sera envoyé chaque année à Constantinople 400 hommes pour remplacer d'autres. Il n'y aura aucune différence entre les marques distinctives et les drapeaux des troupes qui seront employés là, et les marques distinctives et les drapeaux des autres troupes de ma Sublime Porte. Les officiers de marine Egyptienne auront les mêmes marques distinctives de grades, et les Egyptiens auront les mêmes pavillons que les officiers et les bâtimens d'ici.

Le Gouverneur d'Egypte nommera les officiers de terre et de marine jusqu'au grade de Colonel. Quant aux nominations aux grades supérieurs à celui de Colonel, c'est-à-dire de Pachas Miri Iivi (Généraux de Brigade) et de Pachas Férik (Généraux de Division), il faudra absolument en demander la permission, et prendre mes ordres là-dessus. Dorénavant les Pachas d'Egypte ne pourront pas faire construire des bâtimens de guerre sans en avoir demandé la permission de la Sublime Porte, et en avoir obtenu une autorisation claire et positive.

Attendu que chacune des conditions arrêtées comme ci-dessus est adhérente au privilège de l'hérédité, si une seule d'elles n'est pas exécutée, ce privilège de l'hérédité sera aussitôt aboli et annulé. Telle étant ma volonté suprême sur tous les points ci-dessus énoncés, toi, tes enfans et tes descendans, reconnaissez de cette haute faveur souveraine, vous vous presserez toujours à exécuter scrupuleusement les conditions établies, vous vous garderez bien d'y contrevenir, vous aurez soin d'assurer le repos et la tranquillité des Egyptiens en les mettant à l'abri de toutes injures et de toutes vexations, vous ferez des rapports ici, et demanderez des ordres sur les affaires importantes qui concernent ces pays là, étant à ces fins que le présent firman Impérial qui est orné de mon rescrit Souverain a été écrit et vous est envoyé adressé, en date du mois de Rebiul-Akhir, 1257, (a) à ton sieul Mehmed Ali Pacha pour lui conférer le Gouvernement à titre d'hérédité de la Province d'Égypte, et revêtu de mon Hatt Impérial, et la transmission de succession de père en fils en ligne directe et par ordre de primogéniture seraient favorables à la bonne administration de l'Égypte et au développement du bien-être des habitants de cette Province : Appréciant d'autre part, dans toute leur étendue, les efforts que tu as faits dans ce but depuis ta nomination au Gouvernement-Général de l'Égypte, qui est l'une des Provinces les plus importantes de mon Empire, ainsi que la fidélité et le dévouement dont tu n'as cessé de faire preuve à mon égard, et voulant te donner un témoignage éclatant de la confiance pleine et entière que je t'accorde, j'ai décidé que dorénavant le Gouvernement de l'Égypte, avec les territoires qui y sont annexés et qui en dépendent, et avec les Caïmacamies de Sévakin et de Moussawa, sera transmis à l'aîné de tes enfants mâles, et, de la même manière, aux fils aînés de tes successeurs : Que si, en cas de vacance, le Gouverneur-Général ne laisse aucun enfant mâle, la succession sera transmise à l'aîné de ses frères, et à défaut des frères à l'aîné des enfants mâles du plus âgé parmi ses frères défunts. Telle sera désormais la loi de succession en Égypte.

En outre, les conditions contenues dans le Firman susmentionné sont et demeurent à tous jamais en vigueur comme par le passé ; chacune de ces conditions sera constamment observée, et le maintien du privilège qui découle de ces conditions dépendra de l'observation intégrale de chacune des obligations qu'elles impliquent. Les immunités accordées plus récemment par mon Gouvernement Impérial, concernant la faculté du Gouvernement-Général d'Égypte de porter jusqu'à 30,000 hommes l'effectif de ses troupes, de maintenir la différence entre le titre des monnaies frappées en Égypte en mon Gouvernement Impérial, et celui des autres monnaies de mon Empire, et de conférer les grades civils de mon Gouvernement jusqu'à celui de Sanîé (second rang de la première classe), sont également confirmées. La règle qui interdit la succession des descendants mâles des filles des Gouverneurs est maintenue comme par le passé. Le tribut de 80,000 bourses payé par l'Égypte au Trésor Impérial est porté à 150,000 bourses, à partir du mois de Mars de l'année 1866, à raison de 100 piastres la livre Ottomane, c'est-à-dire à 75,000 livres Ottomanes par an. Mon Iradé Impérial étant émané à l'effet de mettre à exécution les conditions qui précèdent, le présent Firman, portant en tête mon écriture Impériale, a été rédigé par ma chancellerie Impériale, et t'a été délivré.

Tu dois, de ton côté avec la loyauté et le zèle qui te caractérisent, et en profitant des connaissances que tu as acquises des conditions de l'Égypte, consacrer tes soins à assurer à ces populations une tranquillité et une sécurité entières ; et, reconnaissant la valeur du gage que je viens de te donner de ma faveur Impériale, t'attacher à l'observation des conditions établies ci-dessus. Écrit le douzième jour du mois de Moharem de l'an de l'Hégire, 1283 (May 27, 1866).

Imperial Firman to the Viceroy of Egypt, settling the Mode of appointing a Regency on his dying before his Son has attained the age of 18 years.

(15th June, 1866.)

Dans le but de garantir, de toutes manières, le nouvel ordre de succession au Gouvernement de l'Égypte, ainsi qu'il fut établi par un autre Firman Impérial, il est mentionné ci-dessous le mode d'après lequel l'on est tenu de procéder à l'institution de la tutelle du Gouvernement de l'Égypte, lorsque dans l'éventualité de la mort de son Gouverneur, son fils aîné et héritier se trouverait être encore en bas âge.

Dans l'éventualité de la vacance du Gouvernement, et lorsque l'héritier du Gouvernement serait en bas âge, c'est-à-dire, qu'il aurait moins que 18 ans, le Firman d'investiture sera toute de même émané. Cependant, jusqu'à ce qu'il arrive à l'âge de 18 ans, si le Gouverneur se trouverait avoir déjà établi un tuteur et un conseil de tutelle pour le Gouvernement moyennant un testament cacheté par lui, et par deux hauts fonctionnaires de l'Égypte en service actif, comme témoins, ce tuteur et ce personnel de tutelle saisiront immédiatement les rênes de l'administration, et procéderont à diriger le Gouvernement. En même temps, comme ils en référeront à ma Sublime Porte, un Firman Impérial en sera émané, les confirmant à leur place. Si, d'un autre côté, survient une vacance du Gouvernement susdit sans qu'il soit pourvu à l'institution d'une telle tutelle, le Conseil de tutelle étant composé des Chefs de l'Administration de l'Intérieur, de la Guerre, des Finances, des Affaires Étrangères, de la Justice, du Chef des Troupes et des Commissaires des Provinces Égyptiennes, on procédera à l'élection, parmi les susdits fonctionnaires, d'un Conseil de tutelle de la manière suivante :—

Les susdits fonctionnaires réuniront immédiatement, et choisiront parmi eux-mêmes un tuteur à l'unanimité, ou à la pluralité des voix. Si, cependant, les voix se partagent entre deux candidats, la préférence sera donnée à celui des deux qui occuperait les plus importantes fonctions dans le Gouvernement. Le degré d'importance est établi dans l'ordre indiqué ci-dessus. Ainsi, vient d'abord le Chef du Département de l'Intérieur, après celui de la Guerre, et ainsi de suite. Le tuteur étant ainsi élu, et les autres Membres s'étant constitués en Conseil de tutelle, ils prendront en mains le Gouvernement, et ils s'empresseront de rapporter à ma Sublime Porte l'institution du tuteur et l'institution du Conseil de tutelle. Ce choix sera confirmé de notre part par un Firman Impérial.

Dans le cas qu'il arrive que l'ex-Gouverneur ait nommé un tuteur et un Conseil de tutelle, ce tuteur et ce Conseil ne saurait être changés avant que le terme de tutelle ne soit expiré. De même dans la seconde alternative, c'est-à-dire, lorsque l'institution du tuteur a lieu par la réunion des hauts fonctionnaires du Gouvernement, l'on ne pourra non plus changer le tuteur ainsi nommé. Lorsqu'un Membre du Conseil du tuteur vient à mourir, on choisira un autre à sa place parmi les hauts fonctionnaires du Gouvernement, et si le tuteur lui-même vient à mourir, on choisira un à sa place de la manière susindiquée, dans le Conseil de tutelle, substituant à celui-ci un des hauts fonctionnaires du Gouvernement. Lorsque l'héritier arrive à l'âge de dix-huit ans étant alors majeur, il saisira les rênes de l'Administration et gouvernera comme son prédécesseur. Ceci étant confirmé par ma volonté Impériale et revêtu de mon Hattî-Sheriff, le présent Firman fut conséquemment émané le 2 Safer 1283 (15 Juin 1866).

Firman addressed to the Viceroy of Egypt, dated 5 Sefer 1284 (June 8, 1867). (a)

(Translation.)

To my illustrious Vizier Ismail Pasha, who now holds the rank of Grand Vizier, with the title of "Khdivé" of Egypt, and who is decorated with the orders of the Medjidîé and Osmanîé of the First Class in diamonds. May God perpetuate his glory, and increase his power and prosperity (b).

Be it known on the arrival of this my Imperial Firman, that, as is also mentioned in my Firman granting the privilege of hereditary succession to the Vice-royalty (Kidiviet) of Egypt, those fundamental laws which are in force in other parts of my dominions shall be maintained and respected in Egypt. Now by fundamental laws are meant all those principles laid down in the Imperial Rescript of Gulhaneh (c). But, inasmuch as the internal administration of the Province, and consequently its financial, material, and other interests, are confided to the Government of Egypt, in order to preserve and extend those interests, it is permitted to that Government to frame such regulations as may seem necessary in the form of "special Tanzimat for the interior." In like manner, whilst all the treaties of the Sublime Porte must be respected in Egypt, an exception is made only as regards the customs duties, and as regards foreigners in matters relating to the police, postal, and transit services, for which full powers are given to thee to enter into special arrangements with foreign agents. But such arrangements must not take the form of treaties or conventions having any political signification or purport. And in the event of their being inconsistent with the principles laid down above, or opposed to my original sovereign rights, it will be necessary to hold them as null and void (a). Wherefore the question of conformity or non-conformity to these principles in matters where a doubt exists as regards Egypt must be referred to my Sublime Porte previously to such arrangements being concluded. And when in the manner explained above any special arrangements are entered into concerning the customs duties in Egypt, information thereof must be transmitted to my Sublime Porte. Also, when any conference respecting commercial treaties takes place between my Government and other powers, in order that the commercial interests of Egypt may be attended to, the opinions of the Egyptian Administration shall be consulted thereon. In proclamation of which this my Imperial Firman, dated 5 Sefer 1284, is now addressed to thee.

Firman addressed to the Viceroy of Egypt, November 29, 1869.

Il est superflu de dire combien ma sollicitude est grande pour la prospérité de l'importante Province d'Egypte, et pour l'accroissement du bien-être et de la sécurité de ses habitants. Tout en consacrant une attention sérieuse au maintien intact des privilèges intérieurs accordés à l'Administration Egyptienne, il est de mon devoir de surveiller en même temps le strict accomplissement des obligations de cette administration, soit envers ma couronne, soit envers les habitants de la province. En conséquence, j'ai accepté les éclaircissements que tu as donnés et les engagements que tu as pris relativement aux armes et aux bâtiments de guerre, ainsi qu'à l'égard des relations extérieures de la province, par la lettre que tu as écrite, (b) sous la date du 10 Djémazi-ul-Ewel, 1286, en réponse à celle que mon Grand Vizir t'avait adressée, par mon ordre souverain, le 18 Rébi-ul-Akhir, 1286. (c) Seulement la question financière étant un point vital pour tous les pays, si la quotité des impôts est supérieure aux moyens des contribuables, ou si les produits de ces impôts, au lieu d'être affectés aux besoins réels du pays, sont absorbés par des dépenses infructueuses, on s'expose incontestablement à des pertes et à des dangers incalculables. Il en résulte pour le Souverain du pays le droit sacré et imprescriptible de surveiller avec sollicitude cet important objet; et, pour qu'il ne subsiste plus aucun doute ni malentendu à cet égard, j'ai décidé de te donner les éclaircissements suivants, qui seront également portés à la connaissance de tous.

Ainsi, suivant les conditions fondamentales que servent de base à l'Administration Egyptienne, tous les impôts et redevances doivent être repartis et perçus en mon nom. Je ne saurais donc consentir en aucune manière à ce que les sommes provenant de ces impôts soient employées autrement qu'à ses besoins réels du pays, et à ce que les habitants soient chargés de nouveaux impôts sans une nécessité légitime et reconnue. Ma volonté absolue est donc que tes soins et ton zèle les plus incessants soient dirigés vers ces deux importants objets, aussi bien que sur la nécessité que mes sujets d'Egypte soient toujours traités avec justice et équité. De même, les emprunts à l'étranger engageant pour de longues années les revenus du pays, je ne saurais admettre que, sans que tous les détails des raisons qui peuvent y faire recourir n'aient été soumis à mon Gouvernement Impérial, et sans que mon autorisation n'ait été préalablement obtenue, des sommes prélevées sur les revenus de l'Egypte soient affectées à un service d'un emprunt. ADMIRALTY COURT OF THE CINQUE PORTS.

Reported by J. P. ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Friday, Feb. 14, 1873.

(Before Sir R. J. PHILLIMORE.)

THE VIDIV.

Collision—Ships moored—Foul berth.

Where a vessel, taking up a berth to discharge, gives another a foul berth, the former vessel has no right to require that the latter shall take more than the ordinary and usual precautions against bad weather, and the latter having taken such precautions, will not be responsible for the damage to the former resulting from a collision which might have been prevented by further, but unusual, precautions.

THIS was a cause of collision instituted on behalf of the owner of the schooner Victor, against the schooner Vivid, and her owner intervening. The plaintiffs' petition stating the facts was as follows:—

1. On the 4th Aug. 1872, the Victor, a schooner of seventy tons' register, belonging to the port of Folkestone, manned by a crew of four hands all told, left West Hartlepool laden with a cargo of coals, and bound for Hythe, in the county of Kent.

2. The Victor arrived in safety off Hythe about midnight on the night of the 8th Aug., and brought up, the wind being light from the W.S.W., and the weather very fine. About 6 a.m., on the morning of the 9th Aug., William Deerham, the acting pilot, came on board, and the Victor's boat having been got out, she was towed to within a quarter of a mile of the beach, and about a mile to the westward of Hythe, at which spot she was brought up about 9 a.m.

3. Vessels discharging coals at Hythe come in at high water, and as the tide falls they take the ground, and the coals are discharged into carts alongside as long as the tide will permit. The carts when loaded are drawn up by a stationary steam engine. There is a sea wall facing the beach, opposite the place where the vessels discharge, and there are two gaps or openings in this sea wall, through which the loaded carts are so drawn up as aforesaid.

4. When the Victor had been towed into the position in the second article mentioned, the said William Deerham left the vessel and put down a buoy to mark the spot where the anchor should be let go. On beaching the vessel the buoy was placed opposite the easternmost gap or opening.

5. The Vivid, the vessel proceeded against in the said cause mentioned, arrived at Hythe, laden with a cargo of coals, on the morning of the said 9th Aug., at about 10 a.m., and brought up at about a quarter of a mile from the beach. Both the Victor and the Vivid weighed anchor at the same time, about 1 p.m., for the purpose of beaching, and the Vivid took up the berth which had been assigned for the Victor, namely, that opposite to the easternmost gap or opening, and thereupon those on board the Victor were compelled to beach the vessel opposite to the western gap or opening, but at the request of Joseph Tibbe Horton, the owner of the Vivid, the Victor was hauled off again and beached nearer to the Vivid, a little to the westward of the easternmost gap or opening, so that the steam engine could work the coals from both vessels at the same time.

6. The Victor was duly and properly moored with her head towards the beach, having a warp fastened to a capstan on the sea wall, an anchor out astern on the port side with eighty fathoms of chain, running from the port hawsepipe, and a spring chain, forty-five fathoms in length, from the port quarter, and a kedge anchor and warp from her starboard quarter. The Vivid was also moored with her head towards the beach, and during the 9th Aug. coals were worked from the vessels in the usual way.

7. On the night of the 9th Aug., at low water, the wind began to freshen from the south-west, and on the morning of the 10th Aug., the wind being south, and increasing in force, and the tide flowing, those on board the Vivid neglected to take due and proper precautions to keep that vessel in her proper berth, and about 3 a.m. the stern of the Vivid swung round to the westward, and she came into collision with the Victor, the port counter of the Vivid striking the starboard quarter of the Victor, carrying away the main rail, quarter piece, bulwarks, stanchions, chain plates covering, board, and inflicting other serious damage. The Victor filled with water and grounded, and as the tide ebbed, the Vivid set upon her and inflicted further damage.

8. At low water, holes had to be bored in the sides of the Victor for the purpose of letting the water out, and her cargo was discharged. She was temporarily repaired on Hythe beach, it being impossible properly to repair her there, she was then taken to Folkestone harbour, where some repairs were effected, and she was subsequently properly repaired at Whitby. The Victor was detained for fifty-six days during the completion of the said repairs.

9. Those on board the Vivid neglected to take sufficient means properly to moor and secure the Vivid.

10. The aforesaid collision, and the damage thereby occasioned, was solely occasioned by the matters herein-before stated, or otherwise by the negligence and improper management of those on board the Vivid, and those on board the Victor in no way contributed to the same.

The defendant's answer admitted the truth of the allegations in article 3 of the petition, and the other facts, except as to the mooring of the Vivid, were substantially proved. The defendants' answer alleged that the Vivid was "duly and properly moored," and it was proved that she had a warp from her bows to a capstan in the sea wall, and her starboard anchor out with ninety fathoms of chain. The chain led aft, and her anchor lay off her starboard quarter, and she also had a spring from her starboard quarter to the chain. At the high tide, before the collision, the warp of the Vivid was removed to another capstan further away from the Victor, and her ropes were all hauled taut. The wind was proved to be about S. by E. The answer pleaded inevitable accident, and further alleged

The Victor was not moored in a proper place, having regard to the Vivid, or at a proper distance from her.

The defendants, in their preliminary act, had omitted to answer paragraph 7, as to the course and speed of the other vessel when first seen; paragraph 8, as to the lights of the other vessel; and paragraph 9, as to the distance and bearing of the vessel when the other was first seen.

Witnesses were called for the plaintiffs to prove that if the Vivid had had a rope from her starboard quarter to the shore, it would have kept her from swinging round, and that an anchor and chain carried out in a line perpendicular to the Vivid's starboard side, and leading from her starboard quarter, would have had the same effect. The witnesses for the plaintiffs also alleged that it was customary in bad weather to so moor a vessel discharging at Hythe. This, however, was denied by defendant's witnesses, who alleged that the Vivid was moored in the manner usual at that place. Evidence was also given by the plaintiffs to show that if the Vivid had hoisted her mainsail it would have had the effect of keeping her away to the eastward, and from the Victor.

The sea wall at Hythe runs nearly east and west. The collision occurred by the Vivid being driven round to the westward by the force of the wind.

R. E. Webster, for the plaintiffs.—I cannot contend that the Victor acquired any prior right to the berth by laying down a buoy, but I submit that the Vivid was not properly moored, in accordance with the usual custom of the place. She ought to have been better secured. When the weather became worse she was, even if sufficiently moored in the first instance, bound to have taken further precautions by hoisting her mainsail and letting out another anchor or a rope to the shore.

W. G. F. Phillimore, for the defendants.—The Victor, in the first instance, gave the Vivid a foul berth, and was, therefore, not entitled to call upon her to take more than the usual precautions. These were taken according to the evidence.

R. E. Webster, in reply.—The defence as of giving a foul berth is not sufficiently raised in the pleadings. The defendants did not answer the articles of the preliminary acts as to this point.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The court has in this case good reason to regret the absence of nautical assessors; the more particularly as here the collision took place between two vessels moored or at anchor, and as there is all the greater difficulty arising from the contradictory evidence as to the local customs. It is unnecessary to reiterate the facts as they have been practically admitted. The action is brought by the owners of the schooner Victor against the Vivid, and is founded upon charges which may be classed under three heads; first, that the Vivid ought not to have been placed in the berth which had been preoccupied by the Victor's buoy; secondly, that the Vivid's mooring was insecure; thirdly, that a want of care was suggested, inasmuch as the Vivid ought to have taken further precautions when the state of the wind and weather materially altered. As to the first point, it was not insisted on, and was rightly abandoned by Mr. Webster in his argument. In fact, there was no evidence that a buoy was sufficient to retain possession of a berth by the local custom, and I know of no authority for such a proposition according to the general maritime law. Secondly, as to the insecurity of the mooring of the Vivid, it was very properly admitted by Mr. Webster, with his usual candour, which does not in any way detract from his merits as an advocate, that the Vivid was securely moored, so far as ordinary precautions were concerned. There was a rope from forward to a capstan on shore, and she had an anchor out with eighty fathoms of chain, and a spring from her starboard quarter to the chain, according to the usual custom. By the evidence of those who were in the habit of unloading ships in the port, and had experience of the general character of the place, and of the wind and weather there, such a precaution was ordinarily sufficient. Another anchor might have been useful, but the question remains whether it was necessary. It has been said that the change of wind to S.E. necessitated a second anchor, and it has been suggested that if another anchor had been used, the collision would not have occurred. That question I shall further have to consider under the third charge; but at present I must hold that a second anchor was not originally necessary. Thirdly, as to the charge of subsequent want of precaution, I will first dispose of the question of the mainsail. I have no warrant for concluding that the use of the mainsail would have been an efficient precaution, and indeed the evidence tends to show the contrary. There is little doubt, however, that the letting go of a second anchor would have been a useful, although not in the first instance a necessary precaution. Then comes the question, was the Victor in a condition to require from the Vivid the usual precaution? This is to be answered by the answer to this previous question, viz.: Did or did not the Victor give the Vivid a foul berth? On this point I have no hesitation, and I am of opinion, without doubt, that the Victor did give the Vivid a foul berth. The only other question with regard to this is, whether there is a sufficient statement of that fact in the pleadings? And, first, with regard to the defendants' preliminary act, there was perhaps no necessity to answer articles 7 and 8, but I am of opinion that article 9 ought to have been answered. If I could see that any injury had arisen to the plaintiff through this omission, I should have been inclined to have given him the full benefit of my decision, but it was fairly admitted that it made no difference to the plaintiffs. The answer filed on behalf of the defendants gives full notice to the plaintiffs that this important question will form part of their defence. The facts stated in the answer not only indicate the defence, but in article 9 of the answer it is distinctly stated that the Victor was not moored in a proper place, having regard to the Vivid. The plaintiffs therefore were well apprised of the nature of the defence, and must therefore be supposed to have made the best case in their power to meet the charge against them. I am of opinion that it is substantially proved by the evidence that the Victor gave the Vivid a foul berth. I cannot think that a vessel which has given another a foul berth can, if by being in the way of that vessel she receives damage by the swinging of that vessel, properly complain. Unless ordinary precautions have been neglected, I consider it to be a sound proposition of law that a man who has, by placing his vessel too near another, given the latter a foul berth, has no right to demand that extraordinary precautions should be taken. Taking this to be a sound proposition of law, I must hold that the Vivid having taken the ordinary precautions in the first instance, was not afterwards bound to take extraordinary precautions, and I must dismiss the Vivid from this suit with costs.

JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

ON APPEAL FROM THE HIGH COURT OF ADMIRALTY.
Reported by J. P. ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Tuesday, Feb. 4, 1873.

(Present: The Right Hons. Lord Justice JAMES, Sir BARNES PEACOCK, Lord Justice MELLISH, and Sir MONTAGUE SMITH.)

THE SAN ROMAN.

Damage to cargo — War — Fear of capture — Reasonable delay.

An apprehension of capture by enemies' cruisers in time of war, founded on circumstances calculated to affect the mind of a master of ordinary courage, judgment, and experience, will justify him in delaying his ship in port during the continuance of the risk of capture, and the ship is not responsible in a suit in rem in the Admiralty Court for damage to the cargo caused by such reasonable delay, if the voyage is ultimately completed and the cargo is delivered.

Semble, that if the voyage were abandoned, and the cargo not delivered according to the contract, the shipowners would be bound to show that they had been actually prevented from performing the voyage.

This was an appeal from a decree of the High Court of Admiralty in a cause of damage to cargo instituted in that court on behalf of Messrs. Anderson, Anderson, and Co., merchants of London, against the North German ship San Roman and her freight, and against her owners intervening. The San Roman was chartered to carry a cargo of timber from Vancouver's Island to a port in the United Kingdom, or on the Continent, and the cargo was consigned to the plaintiffs. On her voyage from Vancouver's Island, the vessel put into Valparaiso in distress, and her master there learned of the existence of war between France and North Germany, and, as there were French men-of-war frequently entering and leaving the port of Valparaiso, he remained in that port from 23rd Sept. 1870, till 23rd Dec. 1870. The question in the Admiralty Court was whether the master, by English or North German law, which was shown to be practically the same in such a case in both countries, was justified in his delay. The learned judge of the Admiralty Court (Sir R. Phillimore) held that the master, acting on a reasonable apprehension of capture, was justified in remaining in port. From this decree the plaintiffs appealed. (The facts and judgment of the learned judge of the Admiralty Court are reported 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 948; ante p. 347.)

Butt, Q. C. (Cohen with him) for the appellants.—The facts show no such risk of capture as justified this delay. There must be an actual operative restraint to justify a master remaining in port. If the state of things during a war is such that the probabilities are greatly in favour of capture if the ship puts to sea, no doubt the master is bound to stay in port; but if the probabilities are in favour of escape, the master ought to go to sea. It is a question of what a reasonable man would do under the circumstances. Even if the North German Government had made it illegal for North German ships to put to sea during the war, on the ground that so doing would give the enemy greater means of carrying on the war by capturing their property, this would be no justification in the case of a ship carrying English goods, and would not be recognised by English courts. There is no evidence that French men-of-war were cruising off Valparaiso. It is not shown that when they left that port, they did not go right away from it. Moreover, there is a peculiarity about the North German law as to delay in port, which should make the court cautious in allowing a master to justify his delay too easily. By the North German code (see report of case below) where a master remains in port through fear of capture, the owners of cargo are compelled to contribute towards the wages of the crew and expenses as for general average. If the master had gone on, he would have had no more employment during the war, whilst by delay in port he continued to receive wages, and expenses were incurred; and this does not fall exclusively on the shipowners. This he could claim by the law of his flag.

[PRIV. CO.]

Milward, Q. C. and Clarkson for the respondents, were not called upon.

The judgment of the Court was delivered by Lord Justice MELLISH.—The only question which their Lordships have to determine in this case is whether a German vessel called the San Roman was justified in staying at Valparaiso from the 23rd Sept. 1870 up to the 23rd Dec. in the same year, on account of the alleged risk of capture in consequence of the war which then existed between France and Germany; this being a claim of the English charterers to recover compensation on account of what they allege to be an unreasonable delay. The learned judge in the court below has laid it down that "an apprehension of capture founded on circumstances calculated to effect the mind of a master of ordinary courage, judgment, and experience, would justify delay;" and their lordships are of opinion that that is a correct statement of the law of England. It has been admitted in the argument of the appellants that it is necessary to determine whether this case ought to be decided according to the law of England, or according to the law of Germany, because there is no practical distinction on the subject in the law of the two countries. Therefore, the question their lordships have to determine is entirely a question of fact, namely, whether the German master had during the time such an apprehension of capture founded on circumstances calculated to effect his mind, he being a man of ordinary courage, judgment, and experience, as would justify delay; and their lordships agree with the learned judge in the court below, that there was a sufficient risk of capture to justify this delay. This is not a case where the master has refused altogether to perform the contract. No doubt if the voyage had been abandoned, then it would have been necessary to show that he had been actually prevented from performing it; but this is merely a question whether there was a reasonable cause for delay. The evidence on the subject really is that it was reported at Valparaiso and generally known that French vessels of war were continually, during the months, at any rate, of September and October, and for a part of November, sailing in and out of the harbour of Valparaiso, Valparaiso being the great harbour on that coast, and if French vessels intended to capture German vessels, they were more likely to find prizes coming out of Valparaiso than from any other harbour on the coast. There is one particular ship that seems to have come in and gone out, and in ten days more to have come in again. It appears to their lordships that the German captain in Valparaiso could come to no other reasonable conclusion than that the principal object of these French war vessels, of which at one time there were as many as five, in Valparaiso, must have been to capture German vessels. Besides that, it appears that the newspapers at Valparaiso published reports, correct or incorrect, of captures that had actually taken place, and in addition to that it appears that the master went and consulted the consul of his own nation, and the consul advised him in the strongest language, in fact almost ordered him, not to go, and told him that if he would go, he must give him a certificate that he had received due warning not to leave Valparaiso. There were other German ships in that harbour, some loaded and some unloaded, and the captains of all of them came to the conclusion that it would be improper and unsafe to leave Valparaiso at that time. It also appears that the master was far from being the last to leave when the French vessels had for a time departed, but that, on the contrary, he was among the first who went to the consul and required his papers for the purpose of leaving, and left accordingly. Therefore, there is nothing to show that he was at all neglecting or wishing to violate his duty towards the owners of the cargo. Their lordships agree with what was said before in the judgment in the case of the Teutonia (L. Rep. 4 P. C. 171; ante, p. 214), that the owner of an English cargo on board a foreign ship cannot expect that the foreign master of the foreign ship will take greater precautions with respect to his goods, or will run greater risk in their defence, then he would with respect to goods owned by one of his own nationality. If their lordships were to look upon this case as one in which the cargo was German as well as the ship, or a case in which both ship and cargo belonged to the same person, and then were to ask the question, Would a man of reasonable prudence, under such circumstances, have set sail or waited? it appears to their lordships most clearly that a man of reasonable prudence would have waited. Then again, when it is remembered that the owners of the cargo are Englishmen, it must be a matter of mere guesswork whether the cargo would have arrived in England sooner than it did if it had started before; because, in the first place, there would be a great risk of capture, and secondly, whether the vessel were captured or not, the captain of the German ship during the whole of that voyage from Valparaiso to Cork or Falmouth, and from Cork to Falmouth to its port of discharge, would have been justified in taking reasonable precautions to avoid French vessels. Again, if the ship were captured, nobody could tell how long it would have been kept before it was sent to France for the purpose of being condemned, or how long it would have taken before the cargo arrived. Therefore it is by no means certain that if the master had gone to sea before he did the cargo would have arrived any sooner. With regard to the last part of the delay, that after the 13th of Nov., nobody could tell for a time whether the last French vessel would come back or whether it was cruising about. The delay between the 11th and the 23rd Dec. is too short a delay to be a matter of any importance, yet that appears to be accounted for by his being engaged in procuring money to pay his expenses. On the whole, their lordships are of opinion that the judgment of the court below is perfectly right, and they will humbly advise Her Majesty that this appeal ought to be dismissed with costs. (a)

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: for the appellants, Thomas and Hollams; for the respondents, Ingledeu, Ince, and Greening.

(a) The judgment in this case bears out an opinion expressed in a note to the report of the case in the court below (ante, p. 347), that the right of a master to stay in port for a reasonable time was not dependent upon the exceptions in the contract of affreightment. The excepted perils operate only as an excuse where the voyage is absolutely put an end to, and a master, whether he carries under a contract containing exceptions or not, is justified in delay where it is for the purpose of avoiding a peril, the effect of which would be to put a practical termination to the whole adventure.—Ed.

MORS-LE-BLANCH v. WILSON.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Reported by H. F. POOLEY and JOHN ROSE, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Saturday, Feb 8, 1873.

MORS-LE-BLANCH v. WILSON.

Refusal of consignee at foreign port to accept cargo—Demurrage—Power of master to land cargo and yet keep a lien upon it—Misdirection.

When the consignee of a cargo refuses to receive it, the master of the vessel may, at common law, land and yet preserve his lien upon it for the freight, provided that he retain dominion over the goods.

Semble, that if he deposit the cargo in the warehouse of an independent warehouseman, his lien for the freight is gone.

The plaintiffs had shipped for, and consigned to, the defendants at Buenos Ayres, a small quantity of coal. The bill of lading stated that the "coal was to be taken from the ship as soon as the master was able to deliver, or was to be landed at the expense and risk of the consignees." When the ship reached Buenos Ayres, the consignees refused to take the coal. The master kept the vessel waiting 28 days, and then discharged it to the order of the consignees of the ship, who afterwards sold it to pay freight.

The plaintiff having sued the defendants for demurrage and other expenses, caused by the detention of the ship, the jury were told by Brett, J., in answer to a question from their foreman, that the master "could not land the coal and keep his lien."

Held, that this direction was insufficient, as the cargo might under certain circumstances be landed without loss of the lien. (a)

(a) The question of a master's lien for freight and other expenses is one of extreme importance, and in this country, at least, is in a very extraordinary condition. Of the existence of such a lien there is no manner of doubt; but hitherto it has always depended upon the goods remaining in the master's possession or under his control. If he once parted with the goods, he lost all claim against them for his freight, although he, or his owner, still had their personal action against the shipper or consignee. The master's rights over the goods, however, went no further than this, according to the law of this country. He could not proceed in rem in the Admiralty Court against them for his freight, although that court, being the only court which has such a process, would seem the natural court to have jurisdiction to enforce a lien of this description. In the United States, on the other hand, the master's lien may be enforced in the Admiralty Court: (See Parsons on Shipping, vol. 1, p. 173, note, and the cases there cited.) At the same time it has been held in that country that if the master delivers up the goods to the consignee unconditionally, the master loses his lien, and cannot enforce it in the Admiralty Court: (Bags of Linseed, 1 Black's U. S. Sup. Ct. Rep. 108.) Recently, however, this power of enforcing a lien of freight, &c., by Admiralty process has been conferred upon shipowners to a limited extent in this country. By the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Acts Amendment Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 57), sect. 2, certain County Courts have jurisdiction over claims arising out of all agreements relating to the carriage of goods in any ship; and in Cargo ex Argos (decided by the Privy Council on appeal, which will be reported in the next volume of these reports) a master's lien for freight, &c., was enforced in a County Court by a proceeding in rem against the goods carried. It is noticeable that in that case the master did not part with the control of the goods, having warehoused them in the port of London, until the suit had been instituted and bail given. If he had parted with them to the owner of the goods it is, to say the least, doubtful if he could have enforced his lien by the Admiralty pro-

THIS was an action for not accepting a certain quantity of coal, bought by the plaintiffs for the defendants, and shipped for the defendants by the plaintiffs in two vessels which the plaintiffs had chartered. The plaintiffs were merchants carrying on business in Liverpool and London, the defendants were merchants carrying on business at Liverpool and Buenos Ayres.

The first count of the declaration stated that, in consideration that the plaintiffs, at the request of the defendants, would receive in the Thames, in a ship called the Pitho, a large quantity, to wit, 47½ tons of coal, and would carry the same from thence to Buenos Ayres, and there deliver the same to the defendants or their assigns, on certain terms, the defendants agreed with the plaintiffs, that the said coal should be taken by the defendants or their assigns as soon as the master of the ship was ready to deliver; and averred that the coal was received on board the ship in the Thames by the plaintiff, and was carried thence to the port of Buenos Ayres, and that the plaintiffs and the master were ready and willing to deliver the coal to the defendants upon the said terms, and that although all conditions (except such as the plaintiffs were prevented by the defendants from performing) were performed by the defendants, and all things happened, and all times elapsed necessary to entitle the plaintiffs to have the coal taken from the ship by the defendants or their assigns, yet the defendants did not, nor did their assigns, take the coal from the ship, whereby the ship was necessarily detained, and the plaintiffs, who had chartered the ship, incurred a liability to the ship-owners for and on account of the detention of the ship.

The second count stated that, in consideration that the plaintiffs, at the request of the defendants, would receive in the Thames in a certain ship called the Pitho, a large quantity of coal, to wit, 47½ tons, and would carry the same from thence to Buenos Ayres, and there deliver the same to the defendants or their assigns, on certain terms, the defendants promised that, in the event of the said coal not being taken by the defendants or their assigns from the ship when the master was ready to deliver the same according to the contract, the master might land the coal, and that the defendants would pay to the plaintiffs the expense incurred in and about such landing; and averred, that the said coal was received on board the said ship in the Thames by the plaintiffs and carried thence by them to Buenos Ayres, and that the plaintiffs and the master were ready and willing there to deliver the coal to the defendants or their assigns upon the said terms and according to the contract; but that the coal was not taken cess. This new power, however, goes only to a limited extent, as the Act only gives jurisdiction over claims not exceeding 300*l*. This creates a great anomaly, for above that sum there is no means of enforcing the lien except by warehousing the goods under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment Act 1862, sect. 67, et seq., or by retaining possession of the goods; there is no sufficient remedy against the goods themselves for the costs and charges to which the master is put by the delay of the consignee or his refusal to accept the goods. It is most extraordinary that the Legislature, in extending the remedy by giving jurisdiction to the County Courts, did not go further and give original powers, unlimited as to amount, to the Admiralty Court, which by the same Act acquires jurisdiction over these causes either by way of appeal or by transfer.—Ed.

from the ship by the defendants or their assigns, although a reasonable time on that behalf elapsed before the coal was landed as thereinafter mentioned, and that the coal was landed, and in and about the landing thereof the plaintiffs incurred great expense, and that, although all conditions were fulfilled, and all times elapsed, and all things happened necessary to entitle the plaintiffs to land the coal and to incur the said expenses, and to be paid the said expenses by the defendants, yet the defendants had not paid the same or any part thereof.

The third and fourth counts were similar to the first and second, save that they were in respect of 80 tons of coal shipped by the ship Majestic for Monte Video. The fifth count was a money count for freight.

The defendants pleaded five pleas to each of the special counts: first, that the defendants did not promise or agree, as alleged; secondly, that the plaintiffs did not receive or carry the coals, as alleged; thirdly, that the plaintiffs were not nor was the master, ready or willing to deliver the goods, as alleged; fourthly, that the said agreement in the count mentioned was made for certain coal called "smithy coal," and no other different coal, and not the coal so received or carried, as in the count mentioned; and that the plaintiffs put and received on board an entirely different coal from the said smithy coal, as the plaintiffs then well knew, and as the defendants did not know, until the time of the alleged breach, and carried the same to Buenos Ayres (Monte Video), and that the plaintiffs and the master were only ready and willing to deliver the said different coal as in the count mentioned, where the defendants or their assigns did not accept the said coal; and that the defendants did not promise otherwise than as in the plea above mentioned, and there was no receipt of coal otherwise than as above mentioned; fifthly, a similar plea alleging that the plaintiffs bought the coal for the defendants, but that the coal was not according to contract. To the money count there was a plea of never indebted. The plaintiffs joined issue thereon.

The action was tried before Brett, J., at the Liverpool Summer Assizes, 1872, when the following facts appeared in evidence:

The plaintiffs had chartered the ships Majestic and Pitho from London to Monte Video and Buenos Ayres respectively, and agreed to sell to, and to ship for, the defendants, deliverable to them at each of those ports, a small quantity of coal along with their own cargo—namely 47½ tons by the Pitho and 80 tons by the Majestic. The bills of lading contained this clause: "The coal to be taken from the ship as soon as the master is able to deliver, or to be landed at the expense and risk of the consignees."

The Pitho reached Buenos Ayres on the 28th Nov. 1869, and was ready to discharge the coals on the 23rd Dec. The consignees of the coals did not appear. The captain advertised for them, and kept the vessel waiting till the 20th Jan., when he landed the coal to the order of the consignees of the ship, who sold it to pay the freight and expenses.

The Majestic reached Monte Video on the 8th Dec. 1869, and was ready to discharge the coal on the 24th Jan. 1870. The consignees not appearing, the captain advertised for them. One of the defendants then came to the ship, and, having examined the coal, refused to take delivery on the ground that it was not of the quality agreed upon. The local commercial court was then consulted, and the coal was landed and sold under a decree of that court, on the 8th Feb., and the ship was detained by the proceedings till March 12. There was no evidence of the existence of a privileged warehouse either at Buenos Ayres or Monte Video. The owners of the Majestic afterwards sued the plaintiffs for demurrage, and recovered damages from the plaintiffs. There was no stipulation in the charter-party as to demurrage. The plaintiffs gave notice to the defendants of that action, but they declined to interfere, and the jury found a verdict against the now plaintiffs for fourteen days' detention, at 4*l.* per day, 56*l.*; and the verdict was upheld by the court. The costs and damages of that action, amounting to 208*l.*, were claimed as damages in the present action, and there was also claimed demurrage at 4*l.* a day in respect of the Pitho, the other particulars of damage being on account of freight, wages, and sustenance of crew, &c. The learned judge left it to the jury to say whether the defendants had caused the delay of the vessels at Monte Video and Buenos Ayres, and what they were entitled to for that delay; secondly, whether it was a reasonable thing for the plaintiffs to defend the action brought against them by the owners of the Majestic; thirdly, whether the action was defended in a reasonable manner.

After the learned judge had summed up the case, one of the jury asked whether the captain, "after he stored the coal at the port still retained his lien," to which the learned judge answered, "He cannot land the coal and keep his lien. He cannot take the cargo out of the ship and keep his lien." The jury then, without retiring, found for the plaintiff, damages 499*l.*, which amount they stated to be made up by the freight, the demurrage, and the costs of the action defended by the plaintiffs against the owners of the Pitho. They assessed the demurrage for each vessel at 56*l.*, being fourteen days at 4*l.* a day. Leave was reserved to move to reduce the damages by 208*l.*, the costs of the action, or such sum as the court should think fit.

A rule was afterwards applied for and refused as to the 208*l.*, on the ground that the question whether the plaintiffs had acted reasonably in defending the action was a question for the jury but granted generally to set aside the verdict and have a new trial on the ground that the judge misdirected the jury by telling them that if the masters of the vessels landed the coal the ship-owners would lose their lien for the freight, and that they could not land the coal without losing the lien.

Feb. 10, 1873.—Charles Russell, Q.C., with him Trevelyan, for the plaintiffs, now showed cause.—There is no authority to show that the master had not a right to hold the goods in his own hands so long as there was any possibility of the consignee coming forward. The liability of the shipowner as carrier continues as long as the goods are on board (Neille v. Whitworth, 18 C. C., N. S., 435; 34 L. J. 155, C. P.), and the special clause in the bill of lading was introduced for the benefit of the shipowner. Even if the master was entitled to land the cargo he was not bound to do so. The effect of the clause is to preserve the lien independently. The misdirection, therefore, was immaterial, the master being in no sense bound to land the cargo: See Black v. Rose (2 Moo. P. C., N. S., 277), where the court held that notwithstanding the practical power to keep alive the lien, the master was entitled to retain the goods, and to receive demurrage till the consignees came to fetch them. There is hardly any authority on the point whether a captain may land under an ordinary bill of lading and yet preserve his lien. In Smith's Mercantile Law, 7th edit. p. 564, it is said that "As a lien is a right to retain possession, it follows of course that where there is no possession there is no lien." There is, indeed, an obiter dictum of Willes, J. in Meyerstein v. Barber (L. Rep. 2 C. P. 54; 2 Mar. Law Cas., O. S., 420) to the effect that, had there been no Act of Parliament, according to our law he might have kept the goods a reasonable time on demurrage, or having landed and warehoused them. It is decided in Somes v. British Empire Shipping Company (30 L. J. 229, Q. B.) that no person possessing a lien can, in order to preserve it, create another; and if one man, who is entrusted with the goods of another, put them into the hands of a third person, contrary to orders, he is guilty of a conversion: Seyds v. Hay, 4 T. R. 260). [BRETT, J.—I can quite see that if a captain takes a warehouse of his own, or if he stores the goods in a privileged warehouse, he may keep his lien; but in every other case there would be two liens. KEATING, J.—The amount really in dispute is so small that it would be scandalous to send the case down for a new trial. I don't think Willes, J., in Meyerstein v. Barber, puts it that the lien could be preserved. What he says is rather an authority that the lien is lost.] They also cited and argued that in the first edition Lord Tenterden had been more cautious, and states what he states as a matter of practice, not as a matter of law.

Holker, Q.C. and Baylis for the defendants supported the rule.—The master must in these cases act in a reasonable manner. It is monstrous that a large vessel should be kept waiting on account of a few tons of coal. It is wrong to assume as a matter of law that the master may detain the goods as long as he pleases; and the question for the jury here was whether he had done what was reasonable or not. Before the Merchant Shipping Acts the shipowner might have landed at his own risk, as may be seen from the judgment of Willes, J., in Meyerstein v. Barber (L. Rep. 2 C. P. 54; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 420), where he says that the duty of the master, in case of no person being found to take delivery, or to pay freight, would have been to deal with the goods in a reasonable manner, regard being had to his lien for freight; and that according to our law he had the alternative given him of keeping the goods on board on demurrage, or of landing and warehousing the goods, having an action for the charges. [KEATING, J.—In your view, supposing that Meyerstein's case had been decided before the Merchant Shipping Acts, the decision would have been just the same. Logically, you must go that length. BRETT, J., referred to the judgment of Crompton, J. in Erichsen v. Barkworth (3 H. & N. 894.)] Only Black v. Rose is against me, and that case does not bear the meaning put upon it by the other side. [BRETT, J.—To understand that case, you must go back to the judgment of Creasy, C.J., in the court below for the adoption of his reasons. (a) As for the clause in the bill of lading, I think that entitled the captain to land the coal at once, but you go further, and say that it obliged him to land at once.] They also cited

It was ultimately agreed, at the suggestion of the court, that the damages should be reduced by the 56l. recovered for the detention of the Pitho.

KEATING, J.—The circumstances of this case are peculiar. The case having been summed up quite rightly and correctly, one of the jury turns round and asks this question of the learned judge: "The jury want to know whether the captain, when he stored the coal at that port still retained his lien?" Now that must have meant did he, under the circumstances, retain his lien, and had the judge said "no" simply, there would have been no ground for setting aside this verdict on the ground of misdirection, because there was no evidence that there were any privileged warehouses at the port in question. But the judge said "He cannot land the coal and keep his lien; he cannot take the cargo out of the ship and keep his lien." We think that this was too wide a proposition, for our opinion is that a captain may land, and yet keep his lien by placing the goods in some warehouse over which either he or the consignee of the ship has exclusive control. Mr. Holker therefore has some right to complain. But what the real effect of the answer was upon the jury we are unable to say. If the damages were affected, it must have been to a very slight amount. The question between the parties being so small, they are quite right in coming to terms. the judgment of the court is that the rule be discharged, each party paying his own costs.

GROVE, J.—I am of the same opinion. It appeared to me when the rule was moved, and I still think, that it could not be law that under no circumstances could the master land the cargo without parting with his lien for freight. The authorities only show that, if the goods are landed, they must, in order to preserve the lien, be so landed as to retain the master's absolute and entire dominion over them—a thing which rarely can be done. The answer of my brother Brett to the question put to them was qualified only by the supposition that there were public bonded warehouses at the port of discharge. But the doubt I entertain is as to the sense in which we ought to understand the question, after the way in which the learned judge summed up the case. I am of opinion that all that was meant was, whether, if the master lands the goods at the ordinary landing place, and puts them into an ordinary warehouse, he thereby parts with his lien. Undoubtedly, if the question was put in that sense, the answer would have been correct; and because the answer goes in its terms somewhat further, we are called upon to say that the question was not put in that sense. There is this further question, namely, whether, within the rule laid down in Orease v. Barrett (1 C. M. & R. 919), and other cases, the court would grant a new trial where the misdirection has not conduced to a wrong verdict. In the present case I cannot possibly see that, if the alleged misdirection had not taken place, the jury could have reduced the damages by more than 56*l.* That I think is the largest amount that can be taken off.

(a) The question being as to the terms of a charter-party, it had been held in the court below that the charter-party intended that the master should deliver, and the merchant receive at the ship's side each day, and that on such delivery and receipt, the master ceased to be responsible for the goods, and also ceased to have any lien on the goods.

BRETT, J.—I am of opinion that my answer to the jury was wrong, because it included the case where the master, after landing the goods, deposits them in a warehouse under his own control, and that it was incorrect to say that in such a case as that the master would lose his lien for freight. The point, as it seems to me, is by no means an easy one. This is a case in which the goods, when landed, would be landed in a port where the English statutes relating to public warehouses do not apply. There was no evidence as to what the foreign law was, and therefore the question is, What are the rights of a master at a port where there is no English warehousing statute in force, and no evidence of any law different from the law of England? I think the judgment of Crompton, J. in Erichsen v. Barkworth (3 H. & N. 894; 29 L. J. 96, Ex.) shows that there may be a case where the master may land and yet keep his lien, because that learned judge says that, even where the consignee has neglected to accept the goods, and therefore where he must be assumed to be in fault, the master cannot keep the goods on board his ship for an unreasonable time. What must he do with them, then? It seems to me to follow that there must be some way of landing them by which his lien may be preserved; and I feel now clear that Crompton, J., had it in his mind that the master might land the goods and still preserve his lien for freight, if he kept them still entirely under his own exclusive control. The dictum of Willes, J., in Meyerstein v. Barber (L. Rep. 2 C. P. 38), seems to me to be to the same effect, and so also is the passage cited from Abbot on Shipping, because if by "practice" he means the universal practice of merchants, it becomes, as it seems to me, part of the mercantile law. Whether the master can preserve his lien irrespectively of English statute law as to public warehouses, or of any foreign law equivalent thereto, by putting them into a warehouse belonging to a third person, is a question which is not necessary for us now to decide. The difficulty which presents itself against the master's retaining his lien in such a case seems to me to be this, that then another and an independent lien would exist; and I doubt very much whether, if the master were so to deposit the goods on shore as to give another person a lien upon them, he would not, as a matter of course, lose his own lien, even though such other person should undertake to the master not to deliver the goods to the consignee without being paid the master's claim for freight. But it is not necessary to decide that question now. I therefore think that the answer which I gave to the question put to me was wrong in its terms. I ought to have answered that under certain circumstances, a master might land and yet keep his lien, but there is no evidence that he could have done it in this case. If that had been the answer given, I should have been prepared to maintain it; but the answer I did give was wrong, and likely to lead the jury to a wrong conclusion. What I did say may have affected the verdict, but if it did it was to a very small amount. Whether it could have affected it to the extent of 56*l.*, I doubt; because it does not by any means follow that, even if the master could have landed the goods so as to preserve his lien, he was bound to land them; and the jury would have had to consider whether, under the circumstances of the case, he had acted reasonably in keeping the goods on board as long as he did. In strictness the defendant is entitled to have the rule made absolute, but he has very rightly chosen to give way on being fairly met by the other side.

BOTTOMRY.

1. Bond—What amounts to—Pledge of ship—Bill of exchange—No maritime interest—Maritime risk.—An instrument drawn in the form of a bill of exchange for the payment of necessary disbursements, but which is payable after the arrival of the ship at her destination, and pledges the ship "except in case of total loss," is, although not stipulating for maritime interest, a bottomry bond. (Adm.) The Elpis 472
2. What pledged—Maritime risk—Freight on subsequent voyage.—A bottomry bond can only hypothecate something which is in danger of perishing by maritime risk during the time that the bond is running, and therefore cannot validly pledge freight to be earned on a voyage, after that maritime risk is ended and the bond is forfeited. (Priv. Co.) Smith v. The Bank of New South Wales; The Staffordshire 365
3. Collateral security—Bills of exchange.—Although a bottomry transaction cannot be based on personal security, bills of exchange may be given in addition to the bond. (Adm. Ir. and Priv. Co.) Id. 101, 365
4. Bills of exchange—Collateral security—Presentation—What sufficient.—Where a bottomry bond has been given, together with bills of exchange payable ten days after sight, to secure an advance, and it is agreed that if the bills on presentation are accepted the bond shall not be enforced, but the

- drawee dies before the presentation can take place and, his executors refusing to act, probate or letters of administration have not been taken out, presentation to the managing clerk at the office of the deceased drawee on three several days is sufficient to satisfy the terms of the agreement so as to justify the bondholders, on the refusal of the clerk to accept, in enforcing the bond. The bondholders are not bound to accept an offer to pay after the bond has been despatched for enforcement, where they ask an indemnity for loss in case of seizure, and it is refused. (Priv. Co.) Id. page 365
5. Bills of exchange—Collateral security—Acceptance by bondholders—Want of presentation and protest—Validity of bond.—Where a bottomry bond on ship, freight, and cargo has been given by the master of a ship as collateral security for a bill of exchange drawn by him upon the bondholders, on the understanding that if the bill is properly met by funds being placed in the hands of the latter, the bottomry bond will not be enforced, but the master or shipowners, having placed no funds in the bondholders' hands, give notice that they do not intend to meet it, the bottomry bond is not bad as against the cargo, merely upon the ground that the bondholders have conditionally accepted the bill, and have neither presented it to the master for payment nor protested it. (Adm.) The Onward 540
 6. Necessity for communication with owners—Agency of master—Cargo—Repairs.—The master of a ship, being only the agent of the cargo in special cases of necessity, is bound, when the circumstances permit, to communicate with the owner of the cargo before he does any act which seriously affects the value of the cargo. A master, therefore, putting into Port Louis, Mauritius, for repairs to his ship, and intending to raise money for those repairs upon bottomry not only on ship and freight, but also upon cargo of an imperishable nature and belonging to one firm residing in Great Britain, is bound to communicate with them before having recourse to bottomry; otherwise the bond is invalid. (Adm.) Id. 540
 7. Communication with owners—What necessary.—To justify a master in giving a bottomry bond on cargo where communication with the owners is necessary, a mere statement of injuries sustained by the ship and of the consequent necessity for repairs entailing considerable expense, unaccompanied by a statement that a bottomry bond is proposed, is not a sufficient communication; the law does not require the owners from such premises to draw the conclusion that the ship and cargo must be bottomried; although it may not be required that the words "bottomry of cargo" should be used in the communication, the fact itself should be stated, or at least the necessity for a bottomry bond should be an obvious and irresistible inference from the circumstances stated. (Adm.) Id. 540
 8. Communication with owners—Sufficiency of statement of injuries and repairs—Withholding information—Owners of cargo.—A communication detailing the disasters to the ship, and the probable expense of repair, but not expressing the intention to bottomry the cargo, and requesting the owners of cargo to wait for further information, is not, where any communication is necessary, sufficient; more especially where the information as to the bottomry has been given to the shipowner, but withheld from the owners of cargo; and under such circumstances the owners of cargo are not bound to conclude that the master will resort to bottomry, or to

11. Ship agents—Advances by—Personal credit of owners—Validity of bond.—A bottomry bond is not invalid merely because the advance secured is made by the agents of the ship, provided that they could not be expected to advance on the personal credit of the owners, and gave the master an opportunity of obtaining an advance on the owners' personal credit elsewhere by refusing such an advance. (Priv. Co.) Smith v. The Bank of New South Wales; The Staffordshire 365

12. Master—Duty of, in relation to cargo—Expense of repairs falling on cargo—Transshipment—Semble, that a master being as agent for the cargo, as well as for the ship, bound to do his best for the whole adventure, and therefore not being entitled to bind the cargo for repairs of the ship at the sole expense of and without reasonable possibly of benefit to the cargo, cannot bottomry the cargo for repairs to the ship when the outlay for the repairs falling on the cargo would be so great that a reasonable and prudent owner, if present, would not have allowed his cargo to be bottomried, but would rather have paid the freight and transhipped the cargo. (Adm.) The Onward 540

13. Non-delivery of cargo—Unliquidated damages—Arrest in foreign port—Validity of bond.—A bottomry bond on a ship, given by the master to a creditor in satisfaction for, and as a compromise of, an unliquidated claim for breach of contract in respect of non-delivery of goods on a previous voyage, is bad, and will not be upheld by the High Court of Admiralty, even where the ship is arrested at the cost of the creditor in a foreign port, and the bond is necessary to obtain her release. CARRIAGE OF GOODS.

1. Common carrier—Barge owner—Goods carried for one person at a time—No special contract.—A person who lets out barges for hire to any one of the public to convey goods from one place to another under his own care, but is in the habit of carrying for only one party at a time for the same voyage, and under no special contract, there being nothing to specify what vessel is to be employed, is a common carrier, and is liable for the loss of goods carried, although there be no negligence. (Ex.) *The Liver Alkali Company (Limited) v. Johnson*page 380
2. Bill of lading—Steamship—Auxiliary screw.—Where a vessel by which goods are carried is described as a "steamship," simpliciter, in the bill of lading forming the agreement between the freighter and the shipowner, the contract is that the goods shall be carried in a ship whereof the primary and principal propelling power is steam, and the terms of the contract will not be satisfied by forwarding the goods in an auxiliary screw steamship, making a sailing voyage with the occasional aid of the steam power. (Q. B.) Fraser and others v. The Telegraph Construction and Maintenance Company 421
3. Bill of lading—"Value, weight and contents unknown"—Goods named not carried—Rate of freight—Estoppel.—A bill of lading describing goods shipped as "thirteen packages, books, woodwork, whalebone, Dutch clocks, shoes, and linen goods," and stamped by the master with the words "value, weight, and contents unknown," is, on the ground that the shipowner declines by affixing the latter words to assent to the shipper's representation, as to the contents of the packages, a contract to carry whatever goods are contained in the packages; the shipowners are therefore bound to carry and deliver silk stuffs contained in one of the packages, there being no wilful or fraudulent representation on the part of the shippers. Although the freight charged for the other goods may be lower than for silk stuffs, the shippers are not estopped from proving the delivery of silk stuffs to the shipowners. (C.P.) Lebeau and another v. The General Steam Navigation Company 435
4. Bill of lading—Damage to cargo—Excepted perils—"Dangers of the seas"—Risk of capture—Refusal to deliver.—Where by a bill of lading, given by the master of a North German ship, goods are to be delivered at a North German port to English consignees, "the dangers of the seas only excepted," a refusal on the part of the master to deliver at the port named, on the ground of the existence of a war exposing his ship to risk of capture, is a breach of contract entitling the consignees to recover for damage to cargo, as by the terms of the contract the master was exempt from delivery in one event only. (Adm.) The Patria 71
5. Shipowner and charterer—Respective duties of.—The respective duties of charterer and shipowner are that the charterer must offer a reasonable cargo of the kind specified in the charter, and the shipowner must provide a ship that is reasonably fit to carry such a reasonable cargo. (C.P.) Stanton v. Richardson 442

6. Charter-party—Breach of—Frustration—Voyage—Dissolution of contract.—If the shipowner commits a breach of charter such as to justify the charterer in not putting the cargo stipulated for on board at the moment of the breach, and it cannot be remedied within such a time as not to frustrate the object of the voyage, the charterer is altogether absolved from performance of the charter. (C.P.) Id. page 449
7. Charter-party—Reasonable cargo—Unseaworthy ship—Unreasonable delay—Dissolution of contract.—Where a shipowner agrees to carry a cargo specified in the charter-party and the charterer provides a reasonable cargo of that description, but owing to the unfitness and unseaworthiness of the ship the cargo is damaged and is necessarily unloaded, the charterer is, if the ship cannot be made seaworthy within a reasonable time, absolved altogether from the performance of his contract to load a cargo, and may recover damages for the injury to his cargo. (C.P.) Id. 449
8. Charter-party—Demurrage—Dock regulations—Selection of agent—Commencement of lay-days.—Where by a charter-party a vessel is to proceed to a dock and there load in the usual and customary manner a full and complete cargo of coals to be supplied by an agent selected by the charterers, and, owing to the agent having other vessels to load a delay takes place, not by the charterer's fault but in consequence of the dock regulations, before the vessel goes into dock to be loaded by that agent, and a further delay in dock before getting to the place of loading, the lay days commence, in the absence of any express stipulation to the contrary, from the time of the ship's arrival in dock, provided that there is nothing unreasonable in the selection of the particular agent. Tapscott and others v. Balfour and others 501
9. English charter-party—Foreign ship—Governing law—Reasonable delay.—A charter-party in the English language between English merchants and foreign ship-owners; by which the foreign ship is to carry a cargo to a British port for orders for any port in the United Kingdom or on the Continent between Bordeaux and the Baltic, is governed upon a question of reasonableness of delay in a suit for damage to cargo by the law of the ultimate place of performance, that place being fixed by the orders received at the port of call. (Adm.) The San Roman 347
10. Contract of affreightment—Governing law—Transshipment.—A contract of affreightment in the English language, entered into at Constantinople, between the master of a North German vessel and North German merchants there resident, by which it was agreed that the vessel should load and proceed to a British port for orders for a safe port in the United Kingdom, or on the continent between Havre and Hamburg, is governed as to the duty of transshipment in an intermediate port by North German law, although the cargo may be consigned to consignees resident in England. (Adm.) The Express 355
11. Transshipment—North German law—Breach of contract.—By North German law, where the master of a vessel is required to transship his cargo in an intermediate port where he is detained by fear of capture by enemies' cruisers, he is not bound to do so otherwise than at the expense of the owner of cargo, nor to part with the cargo, unless distance freight for the part of the voyage performed and other expenses have been paid or secured. Where consignees require a North German master to transship at his own expense, he is not bound to do so, and his refusal under those circumstances is not a breach of contract. (Adm.) The Express 355
12. Freight paid in advance—Right to recover—Loss of cargo—Chartered rates.—Freight paid in advance is not recoverable on the loss of cargo before delivery. When by a charter-party it was stipulated that the charterers shall make advances on freight to the master, who shall sign bills of lading at the current rate of freight as required, but not under chartered rates unless paid the difference in cash, and the master is prevailed upon by the charterers to sign bills of lading under the chartered rates without being paid the difference, and the cargo is lost before delivery, the shipowners may recover the difference in an action against the charterers, as the difference if paid, would have been, not an indemnity pro tanto for the loss of lien, but a payment in advance of freight. (Ex. Ch. from Ex.) Byrne v. Schiller and others page 111
13. Demurrage—Dead freight—Short shipment—Lien—Charter-party—Right of shipowner—Holders of bills of lading.—A charter-party by which the ship is to proceed to a port and load a full cargo, which the charterer binds himself to ship, ten days to be allowed for demurrage, the master to have a lien for dead freight and demurrage, gives, as against the holders of a bill of lading (stipulating that the cargo is to be delivered as per charter-party, the consignees "paying freight and all other conditions or demurrage," as per charter-party), a lien for demurrage, and such lien is preserved by the bill of lading; but it does not give a lien upon the cargo for unliquidated damages in respect of cargo short shipped, that not being dead freight; nor has the shipowner a lien for damages in respect of the detention of the ship beyond the demurrage days, such detention not being demurrage. (Exch. Ch. from Q. B.) Gray v. Carr and another 115
14. Dead freight—Lien for—Charter-party—Holders of bills of lading.—"Dead freight" means compensation, liquidated or unliquidated, for the loss suffered by the shipowner by the failure on the part of the charterer to supply a full cargo, and the amount payable in respect thereof, where it is unliquidated, is such reasonable amount as the shipowner would have earned, after deducting such expenses as he would have incurred, if a full cargo had been supplied. A lien on the cargo, actually shipped, for dead freight may be created by express stipulation in the charter-party. Quære, whether this would affect holders of a bill of lading? (H. of L.) McLean v. Fleming. 160
15. Shipowner's lien—Holders of bills of lading—Notice of charter-party—General ship.—A charter-party entered into by charterers and the master of a ship, by which a lien is given to the master on goods shipped, does not bind shippers who ship their goods without notice of the charter-party, and upon the faith of an advertisement holding the ship out as a general ship, and they may claim the return of the goods, free of all claim by the master, on his refusal to sign bills of lading except in the terms of the charter-party. When a ship is so advertised shippers are not bound to inquire whether a charter-party exists. (Rolls.) Peek v. Larsen... 163
16. Shipowner's lien on cargo—Landing—Dominion over goods—Lien.—When the consignee of a cargo refuses to receive it the master of the vessel may, at common law, land and yet preserve his lien upon it for the freight, provided that he retain dominion over the goods. Semble, that if he deposit the goods in the warehouse of an independent warehouseman, his lien for the freight is gone. (C.P.) Mors-le-Blanch v. Wilson 605

SUBJECTS OF CASES.

17. Shipowner's lien upon cargo when landed—Right to demurrage.—Semble, a master of a ship, if he can retain his lien upon goods which consignees refuse to accept when landed and warehoused, cannot claim demurrage after the goods should have been so landed. (C.P.) *Id.*page 605
18. Delay—Deviation—Danger to ship—Cargo—Common peril.—A master, on the receipt of credible information that his vessel will be exposed to imminent peril by continuing her voyage, is justified in deviating or pausing for a reasonable time to avoid that peril, or to make inquiries. To justify a master in so pausing or deviating it is not necessary that the ship and cargo should run a common risk. (Adm. & Priv. Co.) The Teutonia; Duncan and others (apps.) v. Köster (resp.)...32, 214
19. Delay—Deviation—Risk of capture—Negotiation for discharge—Waiver of orders.—A delay of twenty-one days in an intermediate port during a war, in consequence of which there is immediate risk of capture if the ship put to sea, light and variable winds prevailing during the whole time, is a reasonable delay. Negotiation for discharge at such intermediate port may waive positive orders to proceed. (Adm.) The Heinrich 79
20. Delay—Deviation—War—Risk of capture.—A delay in an intermediate port of two months during a war, in consequence of which there is immediate risk of capture if the ship put to sea, the vessel waiting for a steam tug, which was considered necessary by the charterer's agents to avoid capture, but the master being willing to sail and take the risk of capture, is a justifiable delay, and the shipowners are not liable for the damage to the cargo or loss of profit caused by the delay. (Adm.) The Wilhelm Schmidt 82
21. Delay—Deviation—War—Risk of capture—Extent of risk.—By both English and North German law, risk of capture, such as to justify a master, whose vessel is carrying a cargo under a charter-party and bills of lading containing the exceptions, "Queen's enemies, &c," in putting into and remaining in an intermediate port during the continuance of the risk, need not amount to an actual operative restraint (almost a blockade), but must be that risk which would induce a reasonably prudent man, exercising due discretion and fortitude, not to expose the vessel to capture. Where such a risk exists, a delay even of nine months is not unreasonable, nor a breach of contract: Semble, that where the chances of escape and capture are equal, the master would be justified in remaining in port. (Adm.) The Express..... 355
22. Delay—Deviation—War—Fear of capture—Damage to cargo.—An apprehension of capture by enemies' cruisers in time of war, founded on circumstances calculated to affect the mind of a master of ordinary courage, judgment, and experience, will justify him in delaying his ship in port during the continuance of the risk of capture, even when carrying a neutral cargo, and the ship is not responsible in a suit in rem in the Admiralty Court for damage to the cargo caused by such reasonable delay, if the voyage is ultimately completed and the cargo is delivered. Semble, that if the voyage were abandoned, and the cargo not delivered according to the contract, the shipowners would be bound to show that they had been actually prevented from performing the voyage. (Adm. & P.C.) The San Roman... 347, 603
23. Contract—Illegal performance of—Intention to break law.—A contract to do a thing, which cannot be performed without a violation of the law, is void, whether the parties know the law or not; but in order to avoid a contract which can be legally performed, on the ground that there was an intention to enforce it in an illegal manner, it is necessary to show the existence of a wicked intention to break the law. (Q.B.) *Waugh v. Morris*page 573
24. Charter-party—Illegality—Carriage of hay—Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act—Intention of parties—Transshipment—Performance—Detention.—A charter-party, by which it is agreed that certain hay shall be carried to London, and there delivered, all cargo to be taken from the ship alongside, is not invalid because an order in Council, under the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, prohibits the landing of hay in the port of London, if there was no original intention on the part of either party to break the law, and the contract was capable of legal performance by the transshipment of the goods in the port, and by their export by the owner. There is no such illegality in the contract as will enable the owner of the goods to resist an action for damages in respect of the detention of the ship. (Q.B.) Id. 573
25. Charter-party—War—Illegality—Delivery at one of several ports—Order to illegal port—Right to new order—Payment of freight.—Where a charter-party stipulates that a cargo is to be delivered at one of several ports, as ordered by the consignee, and it becomes illegal by the law of the country of the ship through the outbreak of war, after the order is given, to deliver at the port named, and the master without committing a breach of contract puts into another of the ports named in the charter-party, he is entitled to a new order from the consignees, and is not bound to deliver at that port without payment of full freight. (Adm. & Priv. Co.) The Teutonia; Duncan and others (apps.) v. Köster (resps.) 214
26. Abandonment of voyage—Staying in port—Risk of capture—Refusal to deliver.—Offer of freight.—Where a master has improperly refused to complete his voyage and remains in an intermediate port on the ground of risk of capture, he is bound, on the offer of consignees to pay full freight, to deliver the goods at that intermediate port even though they be part of a general cargo and at the bottom of the hold. Semble, he would be bound by English law to deliver without payment of freight. (Adm.) The Patria 71
27. Dissolution of contract of affreightment—Blockade—Executory contract—Right of shipowner to refuse performance.—A blockade of the port of destination of which there is no chance of termination within a reasonable time, operates as a dissolution of an executory contract of affreightment containing an exception against restraints of princes; and where the shipowner obtains intelligence of the blockade after the contract is made, but whilst it is still executory, and before he has laden his cargo, he is justified in treating the contract as an entire contract to load and carry to the port of destination, and, as such, impossible of performance, and is, therefore, not bound to perform part of the contract by proceeding to load his cargo. (Q.B.) Geipel and others v. Smith and another..... 268

CARRIAGE OF PASSENGERS.

Special contract—Loss of baggage—Wilful default.—A special contract, entered into between a shipowner and a passenger by sea, containing a provision that the shipowner would not be answerable for loss of baggage "under any cir-

- CHARTER-PARTY.
- 1. Charterer—Cesser of liability—Liabilities before and after shipment.—A clause in a charter-party by which it is agreed that "this charter-party being concluded by the charterer on behalf of another person resident abroad, all liability of the charterer shall cease as soon as he has shipped the cargo," exempts the charterer only from liabilities incurred after shipment, but not from liabilities incurred previous to shipment. (Q.B.) Christoffersen v. Hansen 305
 - 2. Construction—Continuous employment—Breach—Dissolution of contract—Plea—Damages.—A charter-party, by which a ship is to proceed to a loading berth at B., and there load a cargo and carry the same, "the vessel to load with G. or C. till the end of September at master's option, after September with C., the vessel to continue at this rate and term till the end of March, 1872," is a contract for the continuous employment of the vessel, and the charterers, by refusing to load the vessel with G. in September, the master having exercised his option by electing to load with G., break the continuity of the employment and justify the master in refusing any longer to perform the contract. A plea to an action for breach of charter in not loading, that the master exercised his option, and the charterers refused to load with G., is a good plea. The breach of the charterers is not a partial breach for which damages on which an action for breach would have been compensation to the shipowner, but goes to the root and whole consideration of the contract. (Ex.) Bradford and another v. Williams 313
 - 3. Excepted Perils—Bill of lading differing from charter-party—Contract—Knowledge of consignees—Where a charter-party contains the exceptions "Queen's enemies, restraints of princes," &c., and a stipulation that the master is to sign bills of lading in pursuance thereof "without prejudice to this charter-party," and the bills of lading are signed containing no exception but "dangers of the seas only excepted," the cargo being thereby consigned to consignees named therein, who had notice of the terms of the charter-party at the time it was entered into, the contract is contained in both instruments, and the stipulation in the bills of lading does not supersede the stipulations in the charter-party. (Adm.) The San Roman 347
 - 4. Excepted perils—Outward and homeward voyage—Pleading.—The exceptions in a charter-party, which stipulates that a vessel shall proceed to a foreign port, and there load a cargo and carry the same to a home port, apply to the outward voyage as well as to the homeward voyage, and if the ship is lost by reason of excepted perils on the outward voyage, her owners are not
- liable for breach of charter. A plea setting up this defence to an action for breach of charter in not proceeding to the port of loading is a good plea. (Q.B.) Harrison v. Garthorne.....page 303
- 5. Demurrage—Working days—Statement of, to be furnished—"Expiration of charter"—Reasonable time—Pleading.—Where a time charter provides for a certain number of working days for loading and discharging in each voyage and that, of the number exceeded, "a statement shall be furnished to the said merchants on the expiration of this charter," and that the merchant shall pay for the excess, the above clause is complied with by furnishing a statement within a reasonable time after the expiration of the charter-party, and a replication that such statement was furnished within a reasonable time, is a good answer to a plea (to a declaration for money due for demurrage) alleged that the statement was not furnished at the expiration of the charter-party. (Ex.) Beard and another v. Rhodes 557
 - 6. Construction—Metage dues—Liability for—"Charterer's expense"—Metage, where performed.—Under a charter-party, providing that a ship would load a cargo of oats and proceed to a safe port and there "deliver the same always afloat on being paid freight" at certain rates per quarter of oats discharged; "the cargo to be brought and taken from alongside at charterer's expense and risk," the shipowners are liable to pay a due for metage performed by the owners of the port of discharge by virtue of an ancient right, if such due in its origin was for metage performed on board, but if the metage was to be done ashore the charge falls on the consignees and they must repay the shipowners the amount disbursed for the same. - COLLISION.
- 1. Pilot—Suit against—Admiralty Court—County Court—Jurisdiction.—The High Court of Admiralty, the County Courts and the Court of Passage (Admiralty Jurisdiction) have no jurisdiction to entertain a suit in personam against a pilot for damage by collision occasioned to a ship by his negligence whilst in charge of another ship. (Adm.) The Alexandria; The Oceanic Steam Navigation Company (Limited) v. Jones..... 464
 - 2. Rules of Navigations and Lights—Application to British and United States ships—Foundation of decisions.—The law administered by the Admiralty Courts of Great Britain and the United States, relating to all rules of navigation, and rules concerning lights in cases of collision on the high seas, is the same. In British Admiralty Courts, decisions in cases of collision between British and American ships rest directly upon the rules, as accepted expressions of law made applicable by the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), ss. 58, 61, to the ships of both countries. In the United States Admiralty Courts, the decisions are founded upon the general law and usage of the sea, as evidenced by written rules or statutes identical in the two countries, there being no such provision in the Act of Congress applying the rules in the United States as sect. 61 of the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act 1862. The steamer Scotia (20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 375; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 323), followed. (Vice-Adm. N. S. W.) The Navada 477

SUBJECTS OF CASES.

3. Lights and signals—Steamship—Getting under way—Going astern—Duty to show a light astern.—A steamship, which, in getting under way in the Thames to go up the river between sunset and sunrise, is compelled to go astern and partly athwart the river in order to get clear-a-head, and whose regulation lights are not visible to vessels coming up the river, is bound to take every possible precaution to warn approaching vessels of her position, and to use the best light she has on board for that purpose. Placing a service lantern, ordinarily used to give light in discharging cargo, over the stern, is not a sufficient precaution. A vessel neglecting such a precaution commits a breach of Art. 20 of the regulations for preventing collisions at sea. (Adm.) *The John Fenwick*page 249
4. Lights and signals—Overtaking ships—Duty of leading ship—Sailing rules, No. 17.—Where one ship during the night time is overtaking another within the meaning of Article 17 of the Regulations, although the leading ship may be in such a position that the following ship cannot see the regulation lights of the leading ship, the latter is not bound, under ordinary circumstances, to give a signal or show a light to the following ship. (Adm.) The Chanonry..... 569
5. Fog—Rate of Speed—Sounding fog-horn—Sailing rules, Nos. 10 and 16.—A steamer in a dense fog is bound to go as slow as it is possible for her to go and maintain steerage way. Eight or nine knots an hour is too high a rate of speed in a fog in the British Channel. A steamer should continually sound her fog horn in such circumstances. (U.S. Dist. Ct., East. Dist. of N. Y.) The Steamship Westphalia..... 12
6. Fog—Speed.—Four to five knots an hour is not a moderate speed for a steamer in a thick fog in the Baltic, twenty-five miles east of Gothland. (Priv. Co.) The Magna Charta 153
7. Fog—Duty of Steamship—Speed—Engine-power Sailing Rule, No. 16.—The meaning of Art. 16 of the regulations for preventing collisions at sea, when applied to a steamer in a fog, is that it is her duty to avail herself of her boiler power to be ready to stop and reverse with power and efficiency in a fog, while at the same time she moderates her speed so as to enable such power to be exercised with greater efficiency. A speed of nine and a half knots an hour is too high a rate of speed for a steamer in the Atlantic on a voyage from Bremen to New York in a fog. (U. S. Dist. Ct., S. Dist. of N.Y.) Gjessing v. The Steamer Hansa 240
8. Fog—Steamship—Steam-whistle—Duty to stop and reverse—Sailing rule, No. 16.—A steamship going at a moderate speed in a fog, on hearing a steam whistle sounded many times, indicating that another steamer is approaching and has come so near that if the vessels then stopped they would be within hailing distance, is bound under the terms of Art. 16 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, not only to stop, but to reverse her engines, and ought not to wait until the vessels sight each other, when such reversing would be too late. (P. C.) The Frankland; The Kestrel 489
9. Steamship—Tug drifting—Lights—Sailing rules, No. 15—Sailing ship—Duty of.—A tug, lying in wait and drifting with her coloured lights burning, is a steam vessel in motion, and is bound to keep out of the way of a sailing vessel, but the latter, having seen the lights of the tug in time to avoid her, is bound to use the necessary precautions to do so, and should she neglect this and a collision ensue, both vessels are to blame. (U.S. Dist. Ct., East. Dist. of Mich.) The Sunnyside 91
10. Steamship—Tug towing ship—Sailing vessel—Duty of tug—Special circumstances—Sailing rules, Nos. 15 and 19.—The fact that a steam tug is towing a vessel against the wind involves no such danger of navigation, and no such special circumstances within the meaning of Art. 19 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at sea as will justify a departure from the rule (art. 15) that a steamship shall keep out of the way of a sailing vessel. (Adm.) The Warrior.....page 400
11. Crossing ships—Picking up pilot—Pilot station—Special circumstances—Sailing rules, Nos. 14 and 19.—The fact that two steamers, upon crossing courses, are bearing down at the same time upon a well-known pilot station to take pilots on board, is not such a special circumstance within the meaning of art. 19 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, as will justify a departure from Art. 14, requiring the steamer which has the other on her own starboard hand to keep out of the way of the other. (Adm.) The Ada; The Sappho..... 475
12. Close hauled ship—Luffing—Deviation from course.—A close hauled vessel is justified in luffing so as to bring her, after she has sighted another vessel, as close to the wind as she can get so as to remain under command, and such luffing is not a deviation from her course that will relieve the other vessel, having the wind free, from the duty of getting out of her way. (Priv. Co.) The Marmion 412
13. Risk of collision—Vessels meeting end on—Sailing rules, Nos. 13 and 16.—When two steamships are meeting end on, within the meaning of Art. 13 of the regulations for preventing collisions at sea, and one of them, at a proper distance, ports her helm sufficiently to put her on a course which will carry her clear of the other, she thereby determines the risk, and is not "approaching another ship so as to involve risk of collision," within the meaning of Art. 16, and is not bound to slacken speed or stop. (Priv. Co.) The Earl of Elgin; The Jeomond..... 150
14. Risk of collision—Sailing rule, No. 16.—Art. 16 of the regulations only applies when there is a continuous approaching of two ships. (Priv. Co.) Id. 150
15. Overtaking ships—Same general course—Crossing ships—Sailing rules, Nos. 14 and 17.—Where two steamships, bound in the same general direction, but on courses differing by one point, are steaming one behind the other, and one is overtaking the other, they are not crossing vessels within the meaning of Article 14 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, but the vessel which is behind the other is a vessel overtaking another within the meaning of Article 17 of the Regulations, and is bound to keep out of the way of the leading vessel. (Adm.) The Chanonry 569
16. Going about—Following ship—Necessity for signal.—A vessel beating against the wind is entitled to go about in such a place as is usual and ordinary, without warning vessels following her of her intention, and vessels so following must be prepared for the vessel ahead going about. (Adm. and P.C.) The Palatine; The Priscilla..... 468
17. Foul berth—Ordinary precautions—Duty of first vessel.—Where a vessel taking up a berth to discharge, gives another a foul berth, the former vessel has no right to require that the latter shall take more than the ordinary and usual precautions against weather, and the latter having taken such precautions, will not be responsible for the damage to the former resulting from a collision which might have been prevented by further, but unusual, precautions. (Adm.) The Vivid 601

SUBJECTS OF CASES.

18. River navigation—Crossing river—Sailing Rules—Violation of.—Vessels navigating the river Thames are at liberty to go on which side they please of mid-channel, but if on crossing from one side to the other they violate the regulations for preventing collisions at sea, they will be held liable if they come into collision with another vessel. The Velocity, 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 686, explained. (Priv. Co.) The Owners of the Steamship Esk, apps., v. The Owners of the Steamship Niord, resps.; The Esk; *The Niord*page 1
19. River navigation—Side of river—Custom—Sailing rules, No. 14.—Crossing vessels—Course down river.—There is a practice for steam vessels, going down Greenwich Reach in the river Thames on a flood tide, to keep the north side of the river in rounding the point. Where a steamer is going up Greenwich Reach, and sights, two points on her starboard bow, the red lights of another steamer coming down the reach along the north shore, the vessel going up being further to the southward of the channel than the vessel coming down, the two vessels are not to be considered as crossing vessels, within the meaning of Art. 14 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea. The vessel going up the river has no right to suppose that the vessel coming down is crossing from one side of the river to the other, but is bound to suppose that the vessel coming down the river will, in accordance with the practice of the river and her consequent right, keep along the north shore. (P.C.) The Ranger; The Cologne 484
20. River navigation—Going about—Sailing vessel—Necessity for signal—Duty of other vessels.—Where a sailing vessel is beating up the river Thames on a flood tide against the wind, and has gone towards the south shore to the edge of the tide, and as near to that shore as she can safely go, so as to avoid collision with vessels at anchor on the south side of the river, she is entitled to go about without warning vessels of her intention, and a steamer coming up astern of her ought to know from her position and the state of her sails that she is going about, and is bound to take measures by stopping or otherwise to avoid a collision. (Adm.) The Palatine..... 468
21. Loss of life consequent upon collision—Contributory negligence—Duty of crew of damaged ship.—Two vessels came into collision, and one of them, being rendered helpless, was driven ashore by a gale of wind, and three of her crew killed and others injured. The other vessel, being to blame, was liable in loss of life and injuries, as they were the natural consequences of the collision. The crew of the wrecked vessel were not guilty of contributory negligence in not going on board other vessels when doing so would have been attended by great risk. (Adm.) The George and Richard 50
22. Rendering assistance after collision—Duty of wrong-doing ship—Risk of capture.—Although it is the duty of every vessel, whether British or foreign, to render assistance to another which she has injured in collision, that duty will not compel a ship to remain alongside another so injured, so as to run risk of capture by an enemy's fleet. (Adm.) The Thuringia..... 283
23. Rendering assistance—Merchant Shipping Acts—United States ships.—The rule contained in the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act 1862, sect. 33, that the omission by any ship, after a collision, to render all practicable assistance to another, shall be presumptive evidence against the former that she is in fault, does not apply to United States ships, because that rule has not been adopted by the United States. (Vice-Adm. N. S. W.) The Nevada 477
24. Inevitable accident defined.—Inevitable accident in point of law is that which the party charged with the offence could not possibly prevent by the exercise of ordinary care, caution, and maritime skill. The Virgil (2 W. Rob. 201), followed and approved. (Priv. Co.) The Marpesia.....page 261
25. Inevitable accident—Onus on defendant—Ordinary and usual precaution.—Inevitable accident is where the collision could not have been prevented by proper care and seamanship in the particular circumstances of the case. A defendant, in order to support a defence of inevitable accident, is bound to show that everything ordinary and usual was done which could and ought to have been done to avoid a collision. (Adm. Ir.) The Secret 318
26. Pleading—Practice—Admiralty Court.—If a party to a cause of collision in the High Court of Admiralty intends to rely upon a particular act of negligence, he is bound to set out that act in his pleadings, and it is not sufficient that the act may be included in an allegation in the pleadings which do not clearly express the intention, as the not having stated it is likely to mislead the other party and to prevent him from being prepared to meet that case. (Priv. Co.) The Marpesia 261
27. Pleading—Admiralty Court—Allegation of negligence—Damaged ship stationary.—In a cause of collision instituted by the owners of a vessel moored in a harbour, Semble, that the established rule, which requires a plaintiff in a cause of damage to state with reasonable certainty the instances of neglect on which he intends to rely, and if he relies on a breach of a statutory rule of navigation, that he should specifically plead that the act done or not done was in violation of that particular rule, does not apply to a case where one vessel is under way and the other incapable of moving. Where the petition states such facts on the part of the plaintiff, as if proved or admitted, would lead to the conclusion that the vessel charged with the collision was to blame, it is then rather for the defendant to show what has been done than for the plaintiff to show what might have been avoided. (Adm. Ir.) The Secret 318
28. Pleading—Admiralty Court—Allegation—Sufficiency of proof.—An allegation in a petition that the vessel proceeded against in a collision cause was "considerably further out to the south side of the river than" the other vessel, and improperly ported, and so brought about a collision, is sufficiently proved to entitle the owners of the vessel making the allegation to recover, by showing that the vessel proceeded against was further over to the south side of the river than the other, and improperly ported. The word "considerably" need not be proved to the full extent. (P.C.) The Ranger; The Cologne 484
29. Onus of proof—Lights—Fishing vessel—Sea Fisheries Act 1868.—In a cause of damage in the High Court of Admiralty on behalf of a fishing smack, injured by collision whilst attached to her nets, an allegation in the defendants' answer that the plaintiffs neglected to comply with the provisions of the Sea Fisheries Act 1868, as to lights, throws upon the plaintiff the onus of proof and the obligation to begin, contrary to the usual rule that a fishing vessel attached to her nets, being in the same position as a vessel at anchor, has the right to require a vessel coming into collision with her to begin and show excuse for the collision. (Adm.) The Bottle Imp 571
30. Onus of proof—Overtaking ships.—In a collision cause, where the plaintiffs established a prima facie case that the defendants' vessel was overtaking their vessel within the meaning of Art. 17 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, the onus of showing excuse for the collision is thrown upon the defendants. (Adm.) The Chanonry.....page 569

31. Onus of proof—Inevitable accident.—Where in a cause of collision in the High Court of Admiralty, the defence of inevitable accident is raised, the onus of proof lies in the first instance on the plaintiffs, who must establish that blame does attach to the vessel proceeded against. The onus attaches to the defendants only after a prima facie case of negligence and want of seamanship has been shown against them. The Bolina (3 Notes of Cases, 210) followed and approved. (Priv. Co.) The Marpesia 261

32. Onus of proof—Total loss by negligence of ship's own crew.—In the High Court of Admiralty, the burden of proving that the total loss of a vessel injured by collision resulted, not from the collision but from want of ordinary nautical skill and courage on the part of the crew of that vessel, lies upon the original wrong-doers. (Adm.) The Thuringia 283

33. Onus of proof—Compulsory pilotage—Charge of defective steering.—In a cause of collision, where the defence is compulsory pilotage only, and the defendants prove orders given by the pilot and obeyed by the crew for the purpose of avoiding the collision, and where the plaintiffs seek to show that the collision was due to the defective steering power of the defendants' vessel, it lies upon the plaintiffs to establish the fact by substantive evidence. (Adm.) The Livia..... 204

34. Practice—Admiralty Court—Preliminary act.—The High Court of Admiralty will not, at the hearing, allow the amendment of the preliminary act in a cause of damage by collision. (Adm.) The Frankland 207

35. Practice—Admiralty Court—Cross cause—Evidence.—Where a cause of damage arising out of a collision between two ships has been heard and decided, and both ships have been found to blame, and the owners of cargo on board the ship proceeded against subsequently institute a cause against the former plaintiffs in respect of the same collision, the Court of Admiralty has no power to make an order allowing the plaintiffs (the owners of cargo) to use the evidence given in the former cause in the hearing of the latter, if the defendants refuse to consent to such an order. (Adm.) The Demetrius..... 250

36. Practice—Admiralty Court—Notice of action—Proceeding in rem.—Under a statute which provides that no action shall be brought against the City of Dublin Steam Packet Company in respect of injury done to any vessel on the high seas, unless a month's notice of action shall be given to the company, it is not necessary to give such notice before instituting proceedings in rem in the Admiralty Court, as that Court deals with the res only, and the res, and not the owner personally, is liable in the suit, and the statute relates only to personal actions. (Adm. Ir.) The Mullingar ... 252

37. Practice—Interrogatories—Admiralty Court—Jurisdiction.—The Court of Admiralty has power to order interrogatories to be administered to a defendant before the plaintiff has filed his petition. (Adm.) The Murillo..... 579

38. Practice—Interrogatories—Admiralty Court—Appearance—Jurisdiction.—When a cause of collision was instituted in personam against a defendant as owner of a ship, and the defendant entered an appearance, alleging himself to be "improperly sued as one of the owners" of the ship, the Court of Admiralty allowed interrogatories to be administered by the plaintiff to the defendant for the purpose of ascertaining the ownership before the plaintiff's petition was filed. (Adm.) The Murillo.....page 579

39. Assessment of damages—Demurrage—Time—Delay for repairs—Business connected with collision—Rate allowed.—Demurrage is allowed by the High Court of Admiralty to the owners of a ship damaged by collision during the time that she has been necessarily delayed for the purpose of effecting the repairs rendered requisite by the collision, and of transacting business unquestionably connected with the collision. Making a protest and the obtaining the necessary official documents by the master relating to the damage done to both ship and cargo is business unquestionably connected with the collision. Delay in their preparation, caused by the dilatoriness of foreign authorities, and not by the default of the master, is chargeable to the collision. Quære, whether transshipment and forwarding of cargo can be said to be business connected with the collision. The usual rate of demurrage allowed to steam vessels of the ordinary class, carrying cargo, is 6d. per ton on the gross tonnage, or 9d. per ton on the net tonnage, per day. (Adm.) The City of Buenos Ayres 169

40. Assessment of damages—Unjustifiable abandonment—Want of ordinary courage and nautical skill—Liability of wrongdoers.—The master and crew of a vessel injured by collision are bound to show ordinary courage and nautical skill in endeavouring to save their vessel from total loss, and defendants will not be held liable for any loss that might have been avoided by the exercise of such ordinary courage and skill, and if her master and crew unjustifiably abandon her, and she is consequently totally lost, the defendants will not be liable for such total loss of the plaintiff's ship, but only for the expense which would have been incurred in making good the actual damage sustained by the collision, and for loss of earnings during the probable time required to effect the repairs. (Adm.) The Thuringia 283

41. Assessment of damages—Reference to registrar and merchants—Revision of report.—Where a reference has been made to the registrar and merchants in a cause of collision in the High Court of Admiralty to assess the damages as to the time and rate at which demurrage is to be allowed, the court will review the registrar's report and correct any portion of it founded upon what the court deems to be an erroneous review of the evidence. (Adm.) The City of Buenos Ayres 169

42. Costs—Defence of compulsory pilotage.—Defendants in a cause of damage, who rely at the hearing upon the defence of compulsory pilotage only, but whose pleadings raise other issues, which are not proved, are not entitled to their costs. (Adm.) The Livia 204

43. Costs—Inevitable accident.—The rule of the Admiralty Court, in cases where a collision is found to be the result of inevitable accident, is to make no order as to costs unless it can be shown that the suit was brought unreasonably, and without sufficient prima facie grounds, and this rule is followed by the Court of Appeal. (Priv. Co.) The Marpesia 261

44. Costs—Exorbitant claim—Reference.—Where an exorbitant claim is made before the registrar and merchants for the value of a vessel injured in a collision, abandoned and totally lost, and the abandonment is held unjustifiable, the plaintiff will be condemned in the costs of the reference. (Adm.) The Thuringia..... 283

COMPULSORY PILOTAGE.

1. Colonial statutes—Binding in Admiralty Courts—Waters of colony.—Colonial statutes, imposing compulsory pilotage upon vessels navigating in the waters of the colony and relieving owners from liability for the negligence of pilots taken under such compulsion, are binding equally upon the High Court of Admiralty and the Vice-Admiralty Courts. (P.C.) The Hibernian..... page 491
2. Compulsion—What amounts to—Penalty—Destination of.—A statute enacting that certain vessels "shall take on board" a pilot to conduct such vessels in certain waters "under a penalty equal in amount to the pilotage of the vessel," which penalty goes to a fund for the relief of decayed pilots, renders the taking of a pilot compulsory upon such vessels, on the ground that when a statute inflicts a penalty for not doing an act, the penalty implies that there is legal compulsion to do the act, whatever may be the destination of the penalty. (P.C.) Id...... 491
3. Canadian statutes—River St. Lawrence—Compulsion—Penalty.—The two Canadian statutes enacting that (27 & 28 Vict. c. 58, sect. 10) masters of certain vessels leaving Montreal for a port out of the province "shall take on board a branch pilot for and above the harbour of Quebec, to conduct such vessel, under a penalty equal in amount to the pilotage of the vessel, which penalty shall go to the Decayed Pilots' Fund," and that (27 & 28 Vict. c. 13, sect. 14) "no owner, &c., shall be answerable to any person whatever for any loss or damage occasioned by the fault or incapacity of any qualified pilot acting in charge of such ship within any place where the employment of such pilot is compulsory by law," are to be read and construed as in pari materid, and the owner of a ship navigating the River St. Lawrence (Canadian waters), under the direction of a pilot taken on board under the provisions of those statutes, employs the pilot so taken on board by compulsion of law, and is, therefore, exonerated, according to the law of Canada, from all liability for damage inflicted upon another vessel by the pilot's negligence. (P.C.) Id...... 491
4. Selection of pilot—Licensed pilots—Master and servant.—A power of selection given to shipmasters, &c., by a statute (27 & 28 Vict. cap. 58, s. 2, Canadian), by which they may choose such "pilot or pilots," as they may think fit from among certain licensed pilots," there called "branch pilots," gives only a restricted power of selection out of a particular class, and therefore does not create the relation of master and servant between the shipowner and pilot. (P.C.) Id.... 491

CONSIGNOR AND CONSIGNEE.

1. Appropriation of cargo—Lien—Bills of exchange—Endorsement to third parties—Priority.—Where a consignor draws bills of exchange on the consignees against a cargo consigned to the latter, at the joint risk and profit of himself and them, and, forwarding to them the bill of lading, requests the consignees to honour the bills, to which they consent, but afterwards endorses the bills to third persons, there is no appropriation of the proceeds of the cargo to meet the bills, and the third parties have no lien on the cargo in priority to the claim of the consignees in respect of their general lien. (L.J.J.) Roby and Company's Perseverance Ironworks (Limited) v. Ollier..... page 413
2. Vesting of property—Acceptance of bill of exchange—Intention of consignor.—Where a bill of exchange and a bill of lading are sent together, with the intention that the bill of exchange shall be accepted or the bill of lading returned, the property in the goods to which the bill of lading relates, does not pass to the person to whom the bill of lading is sent, on his refusal to accept the bill of exchange. (H. of L.) Shepherd v. Harrison..... 66
3. Passing of property—Loss before arrival—Purchaser taking risk—Liability—Bills of lading.—An agreement between vendors and purchasers that the vendor shall ship on board a vessel a cargo of fresh water ice, "to be despatched with all speed to any ordered port, the vendors forwarding bills of lading to the purchaser, and upon receipt thereof the purchaser takes upon himself all risks and dangers of the sea, and the purchaser agrees to buy and receive the said ice on its arrival at the ordered port, and pay cash on delivery, at the rate of twenty shillings per ton weight on board during delivery," passes the property to the purchaser on receipt of the bills of lading, and renders him liable to pay on arrival according to the value of the cargo; and if the cargo be lost by the perils of the sea before arrival, transfers the risk to the purchaser, so as to render him liable to pay the vendor the value of the cargo at the time of the loss. 1. Certifying for costs—County Court—Admiralty Jurisdiction Acts—Admiralty Court—Expense of trial.—The High Court of Admiralty will certify for costs, under 32 & 33 Vict., c. 71, s. 9, where it is less expensive to try in London than in a County Court. (Adm.) The Beaumaris Castle. 19

SUBJECTS OF CASES.

2. Sale of vessel—Admiralty Court—Costs of sale—Priority.—Where there are several claimants against the proceeds of a vessel in the registry of the High Court of Admiralty, the vessel having been sold in the cause of one claimant, the costs of sale will be paid before all other claims, as the sale is for the benefit of all. (Adm.) The Panthea..... page 133
 3. Consent to motion—Admiralty Court—Practice.—The High Court of Admiralty will not give the costs of appearing to consent to a motion where the party so appearing is not in any way prejudiced by the motion. (Adm.) The Achilles..... 165
 4. Admiralty Court—Practice—Decree—Necessaries—Mortgages.—Where the plaintiff in a cause of necessities obtains a decree against a ship, and the mortgagees neglect to enter a caveat until after an order for payment out of court in the cause of necessities has been made, the court will give to the plaintiffs in the cause of necessities the costs caused by the delay of the mortgagees. (Adm.) The Markland 44
 5. Pleading—General traverse—Special defence—Defendants' rights to costs.—Defendants in a cause in the Admiralty Court may prove a special defence under a general traverse, if such defence is no surprise to the plaintiffs, and on such defence being established the defendants are entitled to costs. Where a special defence is raised on the pleadings, if such defence is established, and even though the case is concluded under the general traverse, the defendants are entitled to judgment and costs on the second defence. (Priv. Co.) The Orient 108
 6. Mistake in law affecting costs—Right to appeal.—Where there has been a mistake on a matter of law in the court of first instance which affects or governs costs, the party prejudiced is entitled to have the benefit of correction by appeal. (Priv. Co.) Id. 108

COUNTY COURTS ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION.

1. Extent of jurisdiction—Admiralty Court—Charter-party—Short delivery.—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Acts (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71, and 32 & 33 Vict. c. 51), although they invest certain County Courts with a jurisdiction to entertain and determine a limited portion of the cases which were formally entertained and determined only in the High Court of Admiralty, do not by inference and indirect enactment enlarge the jurisdiction of the High Court of Admiralty, or give to County Courts a jurisdiction which the High Court of Admiralty never possessed. A County Court having admiralty jurisdiction has no jurisdiction to entertain a suit for damages for short delivery of cargo arising out of a charter-party, the High Court of Admiralty having no jurisdiction to entertain such claim. (C. P.) Simpson and another v. Blues and another 326
2. Extent of jurisdiction—Claim in relation to the hire of ship, or to the carriage of goods—Admiralty Court.—The County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51), sect. 2, conferring upon certain County Courts, having Admiralty Jurisdiction under the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), power to try "any claim arising out of any agreement made in relation to the use or hire of any ship, or in relation to the carriage of goods in any ship," confers upon those County Courts a more extensive jurisdiction

- in relation to such agreements than that possessed by the High Court of Admiralty, under the Admiralty Court Act 1861, sect. 6 (P. C., reversing Adm.) Gaudet (app.) v. Brown (resp.); Cargo ex Argos—Geipel and others (apps.) v. Cornforth (resp.); The Hewsons page 360, 519
3. Jurisdiction—Proceedings against goods—Freight demurrage and expenses—Proceedings against ships—Breach of charter irrespective of damage to goods—Domicile of owners.—County Courts having Admiralty Jurisdiction have, under the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869, sect. 2, jurisdiction to try causes instituted in rem by ship-owners against goods laden, or lately laden, on board their ships to recover freight, demurrage, and expenses, and also causes instituted in rem by charterers against ships, which they have chartered for breach of charter-party, irrespective of any damage to, or breach of contract or duty in respect of goods carried on board such ships, even though the owners of the goods or ships may be domiciled in England or Wales. (P. C. reversing Adm.) Id. 360, 519
 4. Broker's commission—Charter-party—Right of broker to sue.—A charter-party made between captain and charterers contained a clause providing for payment of commission to a broker for negotiating the charter-party: Held, that the broker could not sue in the County Court in rem, under 32 & 33 Vict. c. 51, s. 2, sub-sect. 1, as for a claim arising out of an agreement made in relation to the use or hire of a ship, he not being a party to the charter. (Adm.) The Nuova Raffaëlina; John Japp and Joseph Kirby (apps.) v. Francisco Durante (resp.) 16
 5. Leave to proceed—Jurisdiction—Practice—Admiralty Court.—The Court of Admiralty has no power to grant leave to proceed in that court, under the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, s. 9, when proceedings have already been instituted. (Adm.) The Loretta 19

COUNTY COURT APPEALS.

1. Fresh evidence on appeal—Admiralty Court—Jurisdiction—Practice—Reporter.—The High Court of Admiralty is extremely reluctant to admit evidence at the hearing of an appeal from a County Court, but will do so under special circumstances. The insufficiency of notes of evidence in the court below is some ground for the admission of evidence at the hearing of the appeal, but the fact that a reporter has not been employed to take down the evidence below must always be a circumstance to be inquired into when an appellant applies for leave to produce evidence on appeal. (Adm.) The Busy Bee... 293
 2. Fresh evidence on appeal—Grounds for admission of—Practice—Admiralty Court—Surprise.—The Court of Admiralty is very cautious as to admitting fresh evidence at the hearing of an appeal from a County Court, and will not do so unless justice will not be satisfied without it. Semble, surprise is a ground for the admission of fresh evidence. DAMAGE.

1. Jurisdiction—Admiralty Court—"Damage done by any ship"—Loss of life and personal injury—Lord Campbell's Act—Prohibition.—"Damage done by any ship," in the Admiralty Court Act, 1861, s. 7, does not include loss of life and personal injury, and therefore the Admiralty Court has no jurisdiction to entertain a suit under Lord Campbell's Act for damages resulting from negligence in the management of a vessel which has caused personal injury and death. And the Court of Queen's Bench will prohibit such a suit. (Q.B.) Smith v. Brown page 56
2. Jurisdiction—Admiralty Court—Ship avoiding collision run ashore—Lights—Ship aground—Fairway.—Where a vessel, in order to avoid a collision with another, is compelled to run ashore, the Admiralty Court has jurisdiction to entertain an action against the other vessel as a claim for damage received by a ship under 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6. By general maritime law those in charge of a ship aground at night in the fair way of a navigable channel are bound to take proper means to apprise other vessels of her position. The Industrie 17
3. Injury to tow—Supply of tug—Duty of tug and tow.—The doctrine that a tug is liable for an injury to the tow, unless the tug can show that she was not in fault, applies exclusively to cases of injury resulting from the violation or neglect of some duty coming within the scope of the duties devolving upon that class of employment. Whilst being towed by a tug a schooner sheered out of the course and struck upon a sunken rock: Held, that it was the duty of the tow to follow directly in the course of the tug, and that the tug, therefore, was not liable for damages resulting from the accident. It is no part of the duty of the tug to take precautions against the sheering of the tow; but if the tow sheers in consequence of a manœuvre of the tug, and thereby sustains damage, the tug is liable. Quære, whether it is the duty of a tug to inform tow of danger in the passage. DAMAGES.

DAMAGE TO CARGO.

1. Consignees—Assignees of bill of lading—Right to sue under Bills of Lading Act.—Consignees who are also assignees of bills of lading, have the right to sue under 18 & 19 Vict. c. 111 in a suit for damage to cargo. It was intended by this statute that the right of suing upon the contract under a bill of lading should follow the property in the goods therein specified—that is to say, the legal title to the goods as against the indorser. (Adm.) The Freedom 28
2. Assignees of bills of lading—No loss suffered—Right to sue—Consignees.—Assignees of bills of lading acquire a right to sue under the Bills of Lading Act and the Admiralty Court Act for damage to cargo caused by delay, even though they have suffered no loss, owing to their being compensated for the deterioration of the cargo named therein under the terms of the contract of sale, and semble, they may sue as trustees for the consignees. (Adm.) The Wilhelm Schmidt ... 82
3. Putrefaction—Sea damage—Want of circulation Close packing of cargo—Excepted perils—Evidence—Onus—Performance of contract—Reasonable care.—Damage to cargo proximately caused by the putrefaction of other portions of the cargo injured by sea damage and by close packing and want of ventilation, is not within the exception

- "dangers of the seas" in the bill of lading. The consignees have a right to recover for such damage on showing that the shipowners have failed to perform their contract to deliver in like good order and condition as shipped, unless the shipowners (on whom the onus lies) can show that the cargo was properly ventilated during the voyage, and so throw upon the plaintiffs the burden of proving that the damage might have been avoided by reasonable care on the part of the shipowners. (P.C.) The Freedom page 28
4. Duty of master—Preservation of cargo.—There is a duty imposed upon a master, as representing the shipowner, to take reasonable care of the goods entrusted to him, not merely in doing what is necessary to preserve them on board the ship during the ordinary incidents of the voyage, but also in taking reasonable measures to check and arrest their loss, destruction, or deterioration by reason of accidents, for the necessary effects of which there is, by reason of the exceptions of the bill of lading, no original liability. (Ex. Ch. from Q.B.) Notara v. Henderson 278
 5. Injury by collision and water—Perishable cargo—Duty of master.—Where a vessel is damaged by collision, and her cargo, being injured by water, is of a nature to deteriorate if steps are not taken to dry it or otherwise restore it to its usual condition, it is the duty of the master, if he have opportunity without unreasonable delay or deviation, to unship his cargo, or take other steps for that purpose. If he has such opportunity and neglects it, and the cargo is damaged in consequence, the shipowners will be liable for the damage occasioned by such neglect. (Ex. Ch. from Q.B.) Id. 278

FOREIGN ENLISTMENT ACT 1870.

1. Prize crew—Taking charge of prize—Warlike operation.—The detaching a prize crew after capture to take charge of and to carry a prize, and its native crew as prisoners of war, safely to a port of the captors, is essentially a warlike naval operation. (Priv. Co. reversing Adm.) The Gauntlet; H. M.'s Procurator-General (app.) v. Elliot and others (resps.).....86, 211
2. Prize—Merchantman—Possession of captors—Naval operation of captors.—A merchantman, on lawful capture by a belligerent vessel, and whilst held by a naval prize crew detached from that vessel, is in the actual possession of the government of her captors, her prize crew are still part of the crew of the belligerent vessel, share in captures made by that vessel, and may make lawful captures whilst on board the prize. The prize, therefore, ceases to be a merchantman and becomes a vessel engaged in the naval operations of her captors. (Priv. Co. reversing Adm.) Id...... 86 211

3. Towing prize of war—Naval operation—Service of belligerent.—A British steam tug sent by her owners to tow a prize in charge of a prize crew from British waters to the waters of her captors, the tug owners knowing she was a prize, is assisting in a naval warlike operation, and the sending the tug for that purpose is, Her Majesty being neutral, a dispatching for the purpose of taking part in the naval service of a belligerent within the meaning of the Foreign Enlistment Act 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 90), sect. 8, sub-sect. 4, and the tug is therefore forfeited to the Crown. (Priv. Co. reversing Adm.) Id......page 86, 211
4. Practice—Admiralty Court—Bail—Amount of—Consent of Crown.—Where a vessel is arrested under the provisions of the Foreign Enlistment Act 1870, the Court of Admiralty will admit her to bail with the consent of the Crown. Sem-ble, the consent of the Crown is not necessary. The court will only require bail to be given to the extent of the value of the ship and her equipment, and not any further sum for costs. (Adm.) The Gauntlet 45
5. Practice—Vessels detained—Application for indemnity.—In an application to the Court of Admiralty for an indemnity by the Crown in respect of the detention of vessels under the Foreign Enlistment Act 1870, sect. 24, where the Secretary of State has released the vessels without issuing his warrant stating reasonable and probable cause for the detention, the proper form of procedure is by motion upon affidavits, but the Crown is entitled to time to answer the applicant's affidavits so as to raise any questions of law and fact. GENERAL AVERAGE.

1. Leak—Pumping with engine—Spare spars as fuel—Coals purchased.—Where a sailing vessel, having on board a donkey engine ordinarily used for the purpose of working the ship and pumping so as to save a number of hands, is compelled after encountering a severe gale, in which she has sprung a leak, to burn the spare spars and coal, in order to keep the engine at work to pump the water out of her, and so keep herself afloat; such consumption of spars and stores (per Kelly, C.B., and Bramwell, B.) entitles her owners to general average contribution from the owners of cargo, but contra (per Martin and Cleasby, BB.) Coals afterwards purchased for that purpose by the master, are not general average expenses. (Ex.) Harrison v. Bank of Australasia ... page 198

2. Damage by water—Fire—British custom—Law.—Loss by injury to cargo through water being let into a ship's hold to extinguish a fire, being a voluntary and intentional sacrifice of the cargo made under the pressure of imminent danger, and for the benefit and with a view to secure the safety, of the whole adventure then at risk, is a general average loss by English law; but it having hitherto been the practice of British average stators to treat a loss so occasioned as not a general average loss, a shipper, whose goods are shipped under a bill of lading providing for "average, if any, to be adjusted according to British custom," and are so injured, is precluded by that stipulation from recovering as for a general average loss under the existing custom. The custom should in future be in accordance with the law. (Q.B.) Stewart v. West India Pacific Steamship Company 528

2. Sovereign prince—Exemption from jurisdiction—Person and property—Proceeding in rem—Jus coronæ.—A sovereign prince is exempted from the jurisdiction of the tribunals of a state in which he happens to be, absolutely so far as his person is concerned, and, with respect to his property, at least so far as that is connected with the dignity of his position, and the exercise of his public functions: no proceeding in rem can be instituted against the property of a sovereign prince if the res can in any fair sense be said to be connected with the jus coronæ of the sovereign, but other property of a sovereign may be proceeded against in rem. (Adm.) The Charkeih 581

3. Sovereign prince—Trading—Waiver of exemption.—A sovereign prince, by engaging in trade, may waive the privilege which he otherwise possesses of being exempt from the jurisdiction of the tribunals of a state in respect of the property so engaged. (Adm.) The Charkeih 581

Intention of parties—Construction of contract—The rights and obligations of parties to a contract are to be determined by the law which they have declared themselves to intend, and where there is no express declaration of intention the presumption as to the law contemplated by the parties must be gathered from the circumstances of each case. LIMITATION OF LIABILITY.

1. Carriers by land and sea—Loss at sea—Right to Limitation—Injunction.—A railway company, who are both carriers by land and carriers in their own ships by sea, are entitled, under the Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), sect. 54, to limitation of liability in respect of the loss occasioned by their negligence at sea of luggage belonging to a passenger, whose contract with the company was for carriage partly by land and partly by sea on a through ticket; and the Court of Chancery will grant an injunction restraining an action brought to recover that loss. (L.C. and L.J.J.) The London and South-Western Railway Company v. James page 526
2. Admiralty Court—Jurisdiction—Vessel totally lost—Sum paid into court in lieu of bail—Ship or proceeds not under arrest.—The payment into the Admiralty Court of a sum of money in lieu of bail in a collision cause, the vessel being totally lost, is not sufficient to give that court jurisdiction in a suit for limitation of liability at the instance of the owners of the vessel, because neither the ship nor the proceeds thereof are under arrest within the terms of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10) sect. 13. 3. Two collisions at same time—Right of shipowner to limitation.—A shipowner, whose vessel injures two other vessels in a collision on one occasion, and by one act of improper navigation, does not incur in respect of each vessel a separate liability beyond the limitation of liability provided for by the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act 1862, sect. 54, and is entitled to have his liability limited as for one collision. MARINE INSURANCE.

1. Maritime contract—Admiralty Jurisdiction—Claim in personam—American rule.—The contract of marine insurance is a maritime contract, and a claim in personam arising out of it is cognisable in admiralty, under the constitution of the United States, declaring that the judicial power should extend to "all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction." The opinion of Story, J., in De Lovio v. Boit (2 Gallison, 398), approved and adopted. Semble, that having regard to the maritime codes of all European countries, admiralty jurisdiction ought to embrace all maritime contracts, and that contracts the subject matter of which is maritime, are not the less maritime contracts because they are made and are to be performed elsewhere than on the high seas. The English rule to the contrary criticised and disapproved. (U.S. Sup. Ct.) New England Mutual Marine Insurance Company v. Dunham 21
2. Insurable interest—Deck cargo—Clear bill of lading—Mistake of shipper's agent—Jettison.—Shipowners are so far bound by the signature of their agent in a foreign port that, when the agent gives by mistake a clear bill of lading for goods shipped on deck, the goods having been directed to be received, and having been received to be shipped on deck at shipper's risk, instead of a bill of lading stating that fact, the shipowners are liable for a loss by jettison, and have therefore an insurable interest in the goods. (C.P.) Stephens v. The Australasian Insurance Company 458
3. Risk covered—African trade—Deviation—Delay—Salving owner's property.—An insurance on a ship "at and from L. to the coast of Africa, and during her stay and trade there," means that she is to go to the coast of Africa, and stay there for any purpose which properly falls within the description of African trade, and the shipowner cannot substitute any other risk, nor may the ship be employed, under the terms of the insurance, for other than trading purposes. Delaying the ship in an African port whilst the master and crew are engaged in salving a vessel, which the owner has purchased after loss, is substitution of another risk and employment for other purposes, and vitiates the policy. (Ex. Ch. from Ex.) The Company of African Merchants (Limited) v. The British and Foreign Marine Insurance Co. (Limited) 558
4. Policy on goods by ship or ships to be declared—Contract—Declaration.—The contract of an underwriter who subscribes a policy on goods by ship or ships to be declared is that he will insure any goods of the description specified which may be shipped on any ship answering the description, if any, in the policy, or on the voyages specified in the policy, to which the assured elects to apply the policy; the object of the declaration is to identify (and it need do no more) the particular adventure. (Q.B.) Ionides v. The Pacific Fire and Marine Insurance Company 141

5. Policy on goods carried by lightermen—Proportion of underwriters' liability—Loss actually sustained—Amount at risk.—A policy on an ordinary form of Lloyd's policies effected by lightermen on the river Thames upon craft of every description, on "all goods and produce as interest may appear," which contains at the foot a special clause, stipulating that the policy is "to cover all losses, damages, and accidents, amounting to 20*l.* or upwards, in such craft, to goods carried by Messrs. G. as lightermen, and delivered to them to be waterborne either in their own or other craft, and for which losses, damages, and accidents Messrs. G. may be liable or responsible to the owners thereof, or others interested," renders underwriters liable for the proportion that their subscription bears to the loss actually sustained and not merely to the amount of the value actually at risk at the time of loss. (Q.B.) Joyce v. Kennard page 194
6. Policy on chartered freight—Passage money—Total loss of cargo—Valued policy.—In a policy of insurance in the ordinary form upon "chartered freight," the term "freight" does not include passage money paid for coolies, and where there has been a total loss of cargo on board the vessel, an underwriter of a valued policy on freight is not entitled to take into account that passage money in estimating his liability for the loss. (C.P.) Denoon v. The Home and Colonial Assurance Company (Limited) 309
7. Valued policy on freight—Partial cargo—Loss—Liability of underwriters.—A valuation of the freight prima facie refers to the freight due for a full cargo, and therefore, unless underwriters are otherwise informed, a policy on freight, valued at a fixed sum, and underwritten for one-half that sum, is, as applicable to a partial cargo, an open policy for one-half the loss of freight not exceeding in any case half the valued amount, and where a loss of freight less than that amount takes place in respect of a partial cargo, the underwriters are liable only in respect of half that loss. Id 309
8. Open policy—Ship or ships to be declared—Declaration—Mistake—Alteration after loss—Usage.—By the usage prevailing among underwriters, a declaration on an open policy "on goods by ship or ships to be thereafter declared" may be altered, even after the loss of the goods is known, if it be altered at a time when it can be, and is, altered innocently and without fraud. Where shipowners alter declarations so as to make the policy "on goods by ship or ships to be thereafter declared" cover goods which ought to have been shipped at shippers' risk, but were actually, through a mistake of their agents abroad, shipped at their own risk, and make these alterations after the loss becomes known, under the bona fide belief that their agent has neglected to inform them of the terms of shipment, and with a bona fide intention of rectifying the mistake in accordance with the usage, the alterations are binding on the underwriters. (C.P.) Stephens v. The Australasian Insurance Company 458
9. Insurance on profits—Reasonable profits—Excessive valuation—Evidence of fraud—Notice to underwriters.—An insurance, if on profits, must be taken to be an insurance on such profits as may be reasonably expected, or possible profits. Excessive valuation of profits is almost conclusive evidence of fraud, and, even if not fraudulent, would seem to be a material fact that should be communicated to the underwriters; the mere mention in a slip that profits were to be insured "however high they might be" would seem to be an insufficient communication to the underwriters. (Per Hannen, J. at N.P.) Ionides v. Pender page 432
10. Inception of risk—Chartered freight—Attaching of policy—"At and from."—A policy on chartered freight "at and from" a port, which stipulates that the insurance "shall commence upon freight and goods or merchandize aforesaid from the loading of the said goods on board the said ship or vessel at as above," does not attach till the cargo is actually laden on board. (Q.B.) Beckett v. West of England Marine Insurance Company (Limited) 185
11. Inception of risk—Attaching of policy on goods—"From the loading"—Part only loaded.—A policy on chartered freight on a cargo of guano "lost or not lost in the sum of 800*l.* upon the freight payable to them (the insurers) in respect of the present voyage to be performed as below by the vessel Napier, &c., from Baker's Island to port of discharge in the United Kingdom, the insurance on the same beginning from the loading of the said vessel," does not attach if the vessel, after arrival at Baker's Island, but before taking in the whole of her cargo, is driven on a reef and becomes a total wreck. (Q.B.) Jones and another v. The Neptune Marine Insurance Company 416
12. Inception of risk—"From the loading"—Prior loading—Construction of policy—Outward cargo—Homeward interest.—The usual clause that the assurance is to commence "from the loading" of the goods at as above in a policy, being a re-insurance subject to all the clauses and conditions of the original policy, is not to be construed strictly, where a clause in the original policy indicates that the policy is intended to cover a prior loading. Where, therefore, a re-insurance was declared to be upon cargo in the ship D. at and from any port or ports on the West Coast of Africa, to the vessel's port or ports of call and discharge in the United Kingdom, the insurance to commence "from the loading" of the goods at as above; and by the original policy it was agreed that the insurance should be upon cargo of the vessel D., at and from Liverpool to any ports in any order backward and forward on the coast of Africa, and thence back to a port of discharge in the United Kingdom, "outward cargo to be considered homeward interest twenty-four hours after arrival at the first port of discharge," the policy of re-insurance was held to cover the goods loaded at Liverpool after they had been twenty-four hours in the first port of discharge, the outward cargo being thus in the same position as if it had been shipped in Africa for the homeward voyage. (Q.B.) Joyce v. The Royal Marine Insurance Company 396
13. Barratry—Carrying deck cargo—Jettison—Clear bills of lading.—The act of a master in stowing goods (afterwards jettisoned in a storm) on deck, after he has been warned by the ship's agent of the responsibility he was assuming, and that as he had signed clear bills of lading he was bound either to carry the goods under deck or to provide for it on deck by extra insurance, does not amount to an act of barratry. All the authorities on the law relating to barratry reviewed. (New York Court of Common Pleas.) Atkinson and Hewitt v. The Great Western Insurance Company 382
14. Barratry—Scuttling ship—Knowledge of shipowner.—The scuttling of a ship by the master with the knowledge of the shipowner, but without the knowledge of the freighter, is an act of barratry in respect of which the freighter may recover against the underwriters on cargo. (Per Hannen, J. at N.P.) Ionides v. Pender 432

15. Stranding—Beaching—Previous injury by perils insured against—Ordinary and usual place.—Where a ship has been so injured by perils insured against that it becomes necessary to beach her in an ordinary and usual place for vessels to take the ground, but in consequence of her previous loss and injuries she sustains injury by straining, such beaching cannot be considered as in the usual course, but is a "stranding" within the meaning of that word as used in policies of insurance. (C.P.) De Mattos v. Saunders...page 377
16. Contraband of war—Carried to neutral port—Ultimate destination.—A cargo, which if it were shipped direct to a belligerent port would be contraband of war, does not cease to be contraband by reason of its being first sent to a neutral port, if the original intention of the shippers is that it shall ultimately reach a belligerent port. Such a cargo is within the warranty "no contraband of war" in a policy of insurance, and shippers cannot recover against the underwriters for it if seized on the voyage to the neutral port. (C.P.) Seymour v. The London and Provincial Marine Insurance Company 423
17. Concealment of material facts—Slip contract—Knowledge after initialling.—A slip being in practice the complete and final contract between the parties to a contract of marine insurance, although not enforceable at law or in equity, there is no obligation on the assured to communicate a material fact that comes to his knowledge after the initialling of the slip and before the issuing of the policy. (Q.B.) Cory v. Patton; Lishman and others v. The Northern Maritime Insurance Company (Limited) 225, 554
18. Concealment of material fact—Pleading—Knowledge after initialled.—In an action on a policy of Marine Insurance a replication by the plaintiffs to a plea of the concealment of a material fact that before they had knowledge of the fact their agent had entered into an agreement with the defendant to effect the assurance, and that if they had communicated the fact to the defendant when they first knew it, he would still in honour, conscience, and good faith have been bound to subscribe his name to the policy sued upon, is good replication. (Q.B.) Cory v. Patton 225
19. Concealment of material fact—Initialling of slip—Issuing of policy—Knowledge of underwriters.—The issuing of a policy of insurance without protest by underwriters, after they have become aware that the assured has (innocently and without fraud) concealed from them a material fact known to him, but unknown to them, before the initialling of the slip, is conduct which, if it leads the assured to suppose that the underwriters treat the contract as still subsisting, and deliver it to him as a binding contract, shows that the underwriters have made an election not to avoid the contract, but to treat it as still binding and subsisting, and throws upon them the burden of showing that the circumstances attending the issuing of the policy were such that the assured was not justified in supposing them to have made such an election. (Ex. Per Martin and Bramwell, BB., Cleasby, B. dissentiente.) Morrison v. The Universal Marine Insurance Company (Limited) 503
20. Policy—Warranty—Benefit of underwriters—Slip—New risk—Communication.—The introduction into a policy on freight of a warranty (not in the slip) for the benefit of underwriters, to the effect that the hull of the ship is not insured beyond a certain amount, does not create a new contract or new risk different from the slip, and therefore does not affect the duty of communication of material facts. (C.P.) Lishman and others v. The Northern Maritime Insurance Company (Limited) page 554
21. Concealment of material fact—Open policy—Ship or ships to be declared—Name of ship.—Where a policy on ship or ships to be declared is subscribed by an underwriter after a material fact relating to a particular ship, which the assured afterwards intends, if necessary, to declare under that policy, has been posted at Lloyd's, and so become known to the assured and may or may not have so become known to the underwriter, without the name of the ship and the material fact having been communicated by the assured to the underwriter so that he may know the risk proposed, the policy is vitiated. (Q.B.) Leigh v. Adams 147
22. Material fact—Lloyd's list—Class of ship—Half time survey.—The refusal of a shipowner proposing an insurance to submit his ship, classed A 1., to the half time survey required by Lloyd's rules is not, as a matter of law, a material fact which need be communicated by him to an underwriter, a subscriber of Lloyd's. The materiality of the fact is a question for a jury. (Q.B.) Gandy v. Adelaide Marine Insurance Company... 188
23. Underwriter's knowledge—Lloyd's lists—Material fact—Necessity for communication.—There is no rule of law, either in principle or upon authority, which affects the underwriter with notice of whatever may be in Lloyd's lists beyond those things which are matters of general knowledge, and not applicable to a particular ship. A shipowner proposing insurance is, therefore, bound to communicate to the underwriters every material fact relating to his ship, unless such material fact is already within the knowledge of the underwriter, such knowledge being a question of fact in each particular case. (Ex.) Morrison v. The Universal Marine Insurance Company (Limited) 503
24. Misrepresentation—Safety of port.—Where a shipowner proposes a policy of insurance on his ship whilst at a port of which he has no knowledge beyond the opinion of the master and of a local pilot, bona fide expressed in a letter from the master stating that the port is a safe port, which opinion the owner communicates to the insurer by showing him the letter, this is not such a misrepresentation by the assured as will vitiate the policy if the port afterwards turns out to be unsafe. (C.P.) Anderson and others v. The Pacific Fire and Marine Insurance Company 220
25. Misrepresentation—Metalling of ship—Repairs to metal.—A statement in a proposal for insurance that a ship was last metalled in a named year, whereas in fact she was metalled two years previously, but in the year named in the proposal the metal sheathing was overhauled, thoroughly repaired, and replaced with new where necessary, is not such a misrepresentation as will vitiate the policy. (V.C.B. and L.J.J.) Alexander v. Campbell 373, 447
26. Misrepresentation—Age of ship.—A misrepresentation, however innocent, that a ship is new when she is in fact old, will vitiate a policy. (Q.B.) Ionides and Another v. The Pacific Fire and Marine Insurance Company 141
27. Mistake in ship's name—Subject sufficiently described.—If the description in a policy of marine insurance designate the subject of insurance with sufficient certainty, or suggests the means of doing it, a mistake in the name of the ship, or of other particulars, will not defeat the contract. Id 141
28. Mistake in ship's name—Open policy on goods—Substitution of policy on particular ship.—Where a slip is signed for an open policy on goods on

- ship or ships to be declared, but afterwards and before the policy is issued it is arranged between the underwriters and the assured that a policy on a particular ship shall be substituted for convenience, the parties intending that the goods shall be insured on whatever ship they may be loaded, a mistake in the name of the ship is immaterial, and will not vitiate the policy. (Ex. Ch. from Q.B.) Ionides v. The Pacific Fire and Marine Insurance Company page 141, 330
29. General average—Foreign adjustment—Liability of underwriters.—Under a policy in the ordinary form, but containing in the margin the condition "to pay general average as per foreign statement if so made up," underwriters are bound by a statement at a foreign port, both as to the facts and the law of general average at the foreign port, and must pay any sum awarded by the foreign average stater. This applies in a case where the statement includes charges on ship and cargo for a bottomry bond given by the master. (C.P.) Harris v. Scaramanga..... 339
30. Partial loss—Total loss—Seizure by salvors.—Where a partial loss has occurred, such partial loss is not converted into a total loss by seizure of the property by salvors, and proceedings thereon in the Admiralty Court, which absorb the whole of the property. (C.P.) De Mattos v. Saunders 377
31. Partial loss—Repairs—Total loss succeeding—Valued policy—Liability of underwriters—Two policies.—Where a ship is insured from L. to C., and thirty days after arrival at C., and before arrival suffers a particular loss, and the assured, not knowing this, insures her again with the same underwriters while at C. and home to L., under a valued policy fairly representing her value in an uninjured state, and the ship, whilst under repair and after the expiration of the first policy and the attaching of the second, is totally destroyed by fire, the underwriters are liable under the first policy for the amount the repairs would have cost if completed, and under the second for the sum at which the ship was valued, without deduction of any part of the sum payable under the first policy. (C.P.) Lidgett v. Secretan and another..... 95
32. Partial or total loss—Abandonment—When justifiable—Experts—Ship stranded—Acceptance of abandonment.—When it appears that by proper exertions a stranded vessel might have been got off and been fully repaired at a moderate cost, the abandonment is void and a partial loss only can be recovered, and to warrant the recovery of a total loss it must be proved that the delivery of the vessel from the peril was, upon reasonable grounds, judged to be impracticable. The right to abandon must be determined by the judgment of experts, applied to the condition of the vessel at the time of abandonment. The owners of a vessel are not bound to receive her from the underwriters if there is any material deficiency in the repairs. She must be as good as she was before, and be returned within a reasonable time. If the underwriter takes possession of the ship, although under protest, and gets her off and repairs her, it is an acceptance of the abandonment if he does not return her in a reasonable time. (Sup. Ct. of Missouri.) The Phenix Insurance Company v. Copelin; The Benton..... 14
33. Common carrier—Loss—Subrogation to rights of assured as against underwriters—Right of insurer to sue carrier.—Where goods upon which an insurance has been effected are delivered to a common carrier, he is primarily liable for any loss which may occur, but is entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the insured as against the insurer. The principle of subrogation applies equally in the case of fire and marine insurance. Where a loss arises by the fault of the carrier, the insurer who pays the amount of it to the assured is entitled to use his name in a suit to recover damages against the carrier. (U.S. Sup. Ct.) Hall v. The Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad Company..... page 406
34. Assignee of policy—Interest—Right to sue.—The assignee of a policy of marine insurance assigned under the policies of Marine Insurance Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 86, sect. 1), may maintain an action in his own name, even though he is not beneficially interested in the subject matter of the insurance. By the assignment the assignee obtains an interest in the thing lost, and is therefore "entitled to the property" within the meaning of the Act. (Q.B.) Lloyd v. Fleming; Lloyd v. Spence 192
35. Set-off—Suing in right of third person—Advances—Premium—Bankruptcy Act 1861.—Where a plaintiff, suing on a policy in the right of a third person who has made advances on the security of the bill of lading and the policy of insurance on the goods, has become bankrupt, the defendant is not entitled under the Bankruptcy Act 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 184, sect. 197) to set-off sums due to him for premiums by way of mutual credit. (C.P.) De Mattos v. Saunders... 377
36. Practice—Plea of unseaworthiness—Particulars—Intention to scuttle ship.—In an action brought on a marine policy the defendant obtained a Master's order granting leave to plead several matters, inter alia, "that the vessel, when she set sail on the said voyage, was not seaworthy for the same," upon condition that particulars of the plea should be delivered. The defendant gave as particulars "that the master when she set sail intended to scuttle the ship on her said voyage." The Master discharged the order allowing the plea, on the ground that the particulars were insufficient, but the court allowed the plea, as the evidence offered in support of the plea would be limited by the particulars, sed quare, whether the fact stated in the particulars would be admissible as proof of unseaworthiness. (Q.B. Bail Court.) Ionides v. Pender 381
37. Slip—Evidence—Issuing of policy—Custom of underwriters.—A slip signed by underwriters is not admissible as evidence of a contract of insurance unless stamped, and a custom whereby underwriters are bound to issue a policy, in accordance with the terms of the slip, notwithstanding that it was discovered, after signing the slip, that the subject matter of the insurance was lost, is bad. (Per Kelly, C.B. at Nisi Prius.) Morrison v. The Universal Marine Insurance Company 100
38. Slip—Evidence—Stamp Act.—An underwriter's slip, although not in any way a binding contract, is not a policy within the meaning of the 30 Vict. c. 23, sect. 9, and is admissible in evidence to show the intention of the parties to a policy of insurance at the time of entering into the contract. (Q.B. and Ex. Ch.) Ionides v. The Pacific Fire and Marine Insurance Company..... 141, 330

- MARINE INSURANCE ASSOCIATION.
1. Arbitration clause—Jurisdiction of court of equity.—A rule of mutual insurance association by which all matters in dispute relative to any claim in respect of an insurance are to be referred to arbitration as a condition precedent to any action at law or suit in equity, does not apply to questions of law, and the jurisdiction of

SUBJECTS OF CASES.

- an equity court on a question of law is not thereby excluded. (V.C.B.) Alexander v. Campbell page 373, 447
2. Rules—Loss—Right of action—Prior assessment by committee.—A member of a mutual shipping assurance association, whose ship is insured by the association and is lost, has no right of action against another member for his contribution to the loss, when, by the rules of the association, signed by the plaintiff, the amount to be borne by each member is to be assessed and apportioned by the committee of the association, and this is not done. (Ex.) Wright v. Ward..... 25
3. Rules of—Assignee of policy—Payment of sums due—Undertaking to pay.—A rule of a mutual assurance association which provides that "no member, mortgagee, or assignee, the whole or any part of whose share in a ship insured in the association shall, at the time of entering or afterwards, be mortgaged or assigned to any person or persons, shall have any claim by virtue of this policy, nor shall any assignee of such policy have a claim for any loss or damage which may be sustained by such ship, unless previous to the occurrence of such loss or damage such member, mortgagee, or assignee, shall have delivered to the manager an undertaking approved of by the mortgagee or assignee, whereby he shall covenant with the manager to pay and discharge all sums of money which are or may become due from such member in respect of such ship and her insurance, and in respect of the insurances underwritten on his behalf in this association," is not fulfilled by a deposit of a policy for a valuable consideration (who is to be considered as an assignee within the meaning of the rule) paying all sums payable in respect of the ship and her insurance without giving the undertaking; and such a deposit cannot recover on the policy. (L. JJ. reversing V.C.B.) Alexander v. Campbell 373, 447
4. Admission of liability—Policy not stamped—Winding-up.—An entry in the minute book of a marine assurance association admitting the liability of the association upon a certain policy, the association being ordered to be wound-up before the money is paid, entitles the insured to prove for the amount so admitted to be due, although the policy is not stamped. (V.C.B.) Re The Teignmouth and General Mutual Shipping Assurance Association (Martin's Claims) ... 325

MARITIME LIENS.

1. Order of payment—Priority.—Maritime liens, being in the nature of rewards for services rendered, rank against the fund out of which they are to be paid in the inverse order of their attachment on the res, and the last in time should be the earliest in payment. (Adm.) The Hope..... 563
2. Master's wages and disbursements—Bottomry bondholder—Priority.—The claim of a master for his wages earned and disbursements made subsequently to a voyage, during which a bottomry bond has been given on his ship, takes priority over the claim of the bondholder. (Adm.) Id. 563
3. Bottomry bondholder—Master's wages—Priority.—A bottomry bondholder is entitled to priority over the claim of a master for wages earned on voyages previous to that during which the bond is given. (Adm.) Id. 563
4. Master's wages and disbursements—Mortgagees—Priority.—A master's claims for wages and disbursements, whenever earned or made, takes priority over the claims of mortgagees, who have no maritime lien in respect of their mortgage. (Adm.) Id. 563

MORTGAGE.

1. Freight—Right to—Possession—Second mortgage—Lien—Priority.—A first registered mortgagee of a ship, on taking possession, is legally entitled to any freight then due, and a second mortgagee cannot claim to have the value of ship and freight applied as one fund in discharge of the first mortgage, and after that is discharged, the balance in discharge of the second mortgage. The first mortgagee has the paramount legal title, and he takes the ship and freight by the same title. A second mortgagee having an express lien on the freight does not acquire any right as against the first mortgagee, nor does a farther advance by the first mortgagee, after the date of the second mortgage, alter the right of the first mortgagee to the freight under the first mortgage. (L.J.J.) The Liverpool Marine Credit Company (Limited) v. Wilson page 323
2. Freight—Possession—Mortgage of freight.—A mortgagee of a ship is entitled to accruing freight on taking possession, and this right is not taken away by the fact that the freight is mortgaged to a third party without notice to the mortgagee of the ship. (V.C.M.) Wilson v. Wilson 265
3. Charterers—Mortgagees—Possession—Deduction of advances by charterers.—Where a ship is mortgaged previously to a charter-party entered into between the shipowner and the charterers, and the ship is subsequently seized by the mortgagees, the charterers are not entitled to deduct from the amount due for freight advances made by them

- for ships' disbursements in excess of the sum stipulated for by the charter-party, even if they have no notice of the mortgage. (V.C.B.) *Tanner v. Phillips*page 448
4. Mortgages in possession—Sale of ship by—Discharge—Mistake—Registration—Admiralty Court—Jurisdiction.—Where mortgages in possession sell a ship to a purchaser, and at his request endorse on the back of the mortgage deed a discharge, which is by mistake registered at the Custom House, in consequence whereof the Custom House authorities refuse to register the ship in the name of the purchaser, the High Court of Admiralty has jurisdiction to, and will, declare in a suit of mortgage and possession brought by vendor and purchaser the property to be in the purchaser, no reason to the contrary being shown. - NECESSARIES.
1. Meaning of—Admiralty Court—Statutes.—The term "necessaries," where used in the statutes giving the Admiralty Court jurisdiction over such claims, has the same meaning as is given to it by the common law courts, and signifies, whatever the owner of a vessel as a prudent man would, if present under circumstances in which his agent, in his absence, is called upon to act, have ordered for the service of his vessel. Webster v. Seekamp (4 B. & Ald. 352) followed. (Adm.) The Riga 246
2. Insurance premiums—Charges paid for entering, dues, pilotages, and protest—Advances.—Premiums paid by a ship broker, at the owners request, to procure insurance on freight; charges paid by a ship broker for entering, reporting, and piloting a ship, for tonnage and light dues, and for noting protest; advances made by a shipbroker for pilotage, travelling expenses of the master, and goods supplied for the ship's use, are necessaries. (Adm.) Id. 246
3. Brokerage charges.—Brokerage charges, made by a ship's broker for acting as ship's agent, and for negotiating a charter-party, may be necessaries, but must be shown to come within the definition. (Adm.) Id. 246
4. Maritime lien—British vessel—Mortgages—Priority.—Material men have not a maritime lien upon a British or British colonial ship for necessaries supplied in England. All valid charges upon the ship, to which persons other than the owner are liable for the necessaries supplied, take precedence of such a claim for necessaries. A mortgage, therefore, has priority over a material man. Semble, that when a British ship has been transferred by sale to an owner, other than the owner liable for the necessaries, no claim can be made against the ship for those necessaries. (Adm. and Priv. Co.) The Two Ellens 40, 203
5. Maritime lien—Foreign Ship.—Semble, Material men have a maritime lien for necessaries supplied to a foreign ship. (Priv. Co.) Id. 208
6. Mortgage—Transferee—Right to appear in cause of necessaries.—The transferee of a mortgage, although the transfer be not registered, has a locus standi in a cause of necessaries instituted against the ship. (Adm.) The Two Ellens...page 40
7. Ship's agents—Advances—Ship's account—Co-owner—Right to sue.—The agents of a foreign ship in a British port, who have paid for necessaries supplied to her, or who have rendered themselves liable to pay for such necessaries, may proceed against the ship for such advances as were made on the ship's account, but not for the balance of a general account against her owners. A co-owner of a ship may proceed against the ship for advances made by him, but semble, not if he is interested in the particular voyage for which the ship is supplied. (Adm.) The Underwriter..... 127
8. Ship's agent—Shipwright—Advances—Repairs—Priority of payment.—A ship's agent appointed by a master on his arrival in port, having no previous knowledge of either master or owner, making no inquiries as to how he is to be paid for advances for necessaries, and allowing the ship to be placed in the hands of a shipwright for repairs, cannot, when her value is increased by the repairs, claim to be paid, in a suit in which he arrests the ship, in priority to the shipwright. (Adm.) The Panthea 133
9. Master—Part owner—Agency—Wages—Priority.—A master of a foreign ship, who is also part owner, and upon whose orders necessaries have been supplied, is not entitled to claim priority for his wages over the material men, as he himself is personally liable to them for the necessaries supplied. Semble, that a master who is not part owner would not in such case be entitled to priority over a material man, as he also would be liable for the necessaries supplied by his orders as agent for his owners. In a suit for master's wages, a plea by material men that the necessaries were supplied by the master's orders, is a good plea. (Adm.) The Jenny Lind 294
10. Bottomry Bond—Merger.—A claim for necessaries supplied to a ship, to secure the payment of which the master has given a bottomry bond on his ship, is merged in the bond, and cannot be enforced by the material men on the single contract. (Adm.) The Elpis 472
11. Domicil—Objection to jurisdiction—When to be taken—County Court—Prohibition.—Where a suit is instituted in a County Court (Admiralty Jurisdiction) under 31 & 32 Vict. c. 71, s. 3, for necessaries supplied to a ship, the objection that the owner or part owner of the ship is domiciled in England or Wales (24 Vict. c. 10, s. 5) must be taken before judgment is pronounced. Where the objection is taken for the first time after judgment has been pronounced, a prohibition will not be granted. (Q.B.) Ex parte Michael... 337
12. Bottomry—Cause of necessaries—Transfer of cause—County Court—Petition—Practice—Jurisdiction.—Where a cause of necessaries is instituted in a County Court under the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71) and is transferred under sect. 8 of that Act to the High Court of Admiralty, and the petition of the plaintiff shows the claim to be based on a bottomry bond (the County Court having no jurisdiction over bottomry bonds), the High Court will reject the petition. Semble, that where a suit is instituted in a County Court over which that court has no jurisdiction, the High Court of Admiralty cannot acquire jurisdiction by transfer, even if it has original jurisdiction in such a suit. (Adm.) The Elpis 472

SUBJECTS OF CASES.

13. Vice-Admiralty Court—Jurisdiction—British possession.—A Vice-Admiralty Court has no jurisdiction under 24 Vict. c. 24, s. 10, to entertain a suit for necessaries supplied at a port out of the possession, that is the British possession, in which the court is established. (Vice-Adm. Vict.) The Albion.....page 481
14. Pleading—Practice.—Where a petition in a cause of necessaries alleges that money was advanced for necessary expenses at the owner's request, without stating what those necessary expenses were, such a claim will be struck out on motion to reject or alter the petition. (Adm.) The Riga..... 246
15. Bail—Payment into court—Order of Court of Chancery.—Where official liquidators of a company paid into court a sum of money in lieu of bail in a suit of necessaries, and then obtained an order from the Court of Chancery (England), restraining the plaintiff from proceeding in the suit "until further order" only, the Court of Admiralty of Ireland refused to make an order directing the payment out of court of the money to the defendants. PRACTICE.

- Admiralty Court—Vice-Admiralty Courts—Proxies—Production of.*—The usual practice in the High Court of Admiralty as to the production of proxies is for proctors to proceed without the exhibition of any proxy until called upon to produce it, and when called upon they satisfy the law by stating the names of the parties for whom they appear. In the Vice-Admiralty Courts proctors are not bound to do more than this, under rule 40 of the Vice-Admiralty Rules and Regulations, unless upon a strict order of the court. (Priv. Co.) The Euazine 155
- Proxies—Proof of—Production.*—The production of a proxy, purporting to be duly signed and sealed, but without proof of the handwriting of those who appear to have subscribed the instrument, is a prima facie compliance with an order to produce a proxy, and throws the onus of disproving its authenticity on the opponents. (Priv. Co.) Id. 155
- Want of proxy—Objection to suit—Motion—Protest.*—An objection to a suit on the ground of the non-production of a proxy is a preliminary objection to be raised on motion, and not on protest, and the utmost a court of admiralty can do when a proxy, purporting to be duly signed, is produced is to stay proceedings until further information can be obtained. (Priv. Co.) Id. 155
- Admiralty Court—Re-arrest of ship—Costs—Admiralty Court Act 1861, ss. 15 & 22.*—The High Court of Admiralty will issue a writ under

- the Admiralty Court Act 1861, ss. 15 & 22, directed to the marshal, for the re-arrest of a ship, to cover costs taxed in a suit against her, where the damages and costs together exceed the amount of bail. (Adm.) *The Freedom*page 136
5. Admiralty Court—Reference to registrar and merchant—Objection to report—Further evidence.—The Court of Admiralty will not, in a cause of collision, hear further evidence on objection to the registrar's report as to damages, unless the party making the application can satisfy the court that the further evidence could not, by proper diligence, have been produced before the registrar and merchants, or that the party asked at the reference for an adjournment to produce it, and was refused. (Adm.) The Thuringia 166
6. Admiralty Court—Reference to registrar and merchants—Objection to report—Further evidence—Affidavit.—The affidavit in support of a motion for leave to produce further evidence (on objection to the registrar's report), where the object is to vary the evidence already given, should be clear and concise as to the witnesses it is proposed to call, and the nature of their testimony. (Adm.) Id. 166
7. Admiralty Court—Reference to registrar and merchants—Affidavit—Time of filing affidavit.—The affidavit of a witness who is not tendered for cross-examination, and who deposes to a fact material to an inquiry before the registrar and merchants, should be filed before the hearing of the reference. (Adm.) Id. 166
8. Admiralty Court—Motion—Adjournment—Filing of affidavit.—The adjournment of the hearing of a motion in the Admiralty Court for the convenience of counsel does not preclude the parties making the motion from filing and using a further affidavit. (Adm.) Id. 166
9. Admiralty Court—Priority—Decree—Suitors in pari conditione.—The rule that a suitor in the High Court of Admiralty who first obtains a decree shall have priority in order of payment only applies where suitors are in pari conditione. (Adm.) The Markland 44
10. Admiralty Court—Suit in rem—Decree made in mistake—Power to rescind.—When the High Court of Admiralty in a suit in rem has made, per incuriam, an order directing payment out of court to satisfy the claim of a suitor, the court has power before payment to vary or rescind the order. (Adm.) Id. 44
11. County Courts—Admiralty jurisdiction—Short-hand-writers—Reporter—Rules—Appeal.—By rule 32 of the General Orders for the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction, it was intended that a shorthand-writer, or at least a reporter, should be employed in all admiralty causes in the County Courts, where there is a probability of appeal, to take down the evidence, so that the appellant might be in a position to bring up at the hearing of the appeal a transcript of the notes of evidence. Order to purchase goods—Construction of by agent—Principal's power to repudiate.—Where a principal gives an order to an agent in such uncertain terms as to be susceptible of two different meanings, and the agent bona fide adopts one of them and acts upon it, it is not competent to the principal to repudiate the act as unauthorised because he meant the order to be read in the other sense of which it was easily capable. An order to agents to purchase 500 tons of sugar at a certain limit to cover costs, freight, and insurance, "50 tons more or less no moment if it enables you to get a suitable vessel," is substantially complied with by the shipment by the agents of 400 tons, the agents bona fide adopting this construction of the order, of which it was fairly capable. SALE OF CARGO BY MASTER.

1. Authority of master—Necessity for sale—Inability to communicate with owners—Agency—Duty to sell.—The authority of a master of a ship to sell the goods of the absent owner is derived from the necessity of the situation in which he is placed; and, consequently, to justify his thus dealing with the goods he must establish (1) a necessity for the sale; and (2) inability to communicate with the owner and obtain his directions. Under these conditions, and by force of them, the master becomes the agent of the owner, not only with the power but under the obligation (within certain limits) of acting for him; but he is not entitled to substitute his own judgment for the will of the owner in selling the goods if it is possible to communicate with the owner and ascertain his will. (Priv. Co.) *The Australasian Steam Navigation Company v. Morse*page 407
2. Necessity for sale—Interest of owner.—There is a necessity for the sale of cargo by a master if, under the circumstances of the case, a sale is the best and most prudent thing to be done for the interest of the owner. (Priv. Co.) Id...... 407
3. Communication with owners.—Urgency for sale.—Distance—Means of communication—Duty of master—Telegraph.—The possibility of communicating with the owner of a cargo depends upon the circumstances of each case, involving a consideration of the facts which create the urgency for an early sale, the distance of the port from the owners, the means of communication which exists, and the general position of the master in the particular emergency. Such communication only need be made when an answer can be obtained, or there is a reasonable expectation that it can be obtained, before sale; the master is bound to employ the telegraph as a means of communication, where it can be usefully done; but the state of the particular telegraph, the way in which it is managed, and the possibility of submitting explanatory messages, are proper subjects to be considered in determining the question of the practicability of communication. (Priv. Co.) Id. 407
4. Communication with owner—General cargo.—The fact that a master cannot communicate with all the owners of a general cargo does not of itself justify him in selling without communicating with any of the owners; but this fact, increasing the embarrassment of the master, is to be considered when an estimate of his conduct has to be formed. (Priv. Co.) Id...... 407

SALE OF SHIP.

Foreign contract—Specific performance—Power of Court of Chancery.—The Court of Chancery has power to grant specific performance of a contract to purchase a ship. A., an Englishman, entered into a contract at Hamburg to purchase from B., a foreigner, a foreign ship, then on her homeward voyage to Cork, possession to be given on discharge of the cargo at any port whither she may be ordered. The vessel was ordered to Sunderland and discharged her cargo. The Court granted to A. specific performance against B., who was out of the jurisdiction, and restrained the removal of the vessel from Sunderland. (V.C.M.) *Hart v. Herwig*page 572

SALVAGE.

1. Admiralty Court—Value of rated property under £1000—Jurisdiction—Merchant Shipping Acts—County Court Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868.—The jurisdiction in salvage causes, when the value of the property is under £1000, taken away by the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104) sect. 460, and the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63) sect. 49, is restored to that court by the County Courts' Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vic. c. 71) sect. 9. (Adm.) The Empress 183
2. Short-handed ship—Putting hands on board—Owners, master and crew—Right to salvage reward.—Putting additional hands on board a vessel in distress, which has been driven out to sea by stress of weather short-handed, to assist in bringing her into port, is a salvage service. The men so placed on board the distressed vessel are the principal salvors, but the owners, master, and crew of the salvaging vessel are entitled to share in the reward; the owners, however, are entitled only to a small proportion as their vessel itself does not under such circumstances render assistance, and the only risk they run is, that she may be short-handed in bad weather. (Adm.) The Charles 296
3. Stranded ship—Shifting cargo—Labourers—Right to reward.—Work done by labourers in shifting the cargo of a vessel that has been damaged by collision and so forced to run ashore, for the purpose of lightening her and of enabling her to be sufficiently repaired to get to the nearest port, is in the nature of salvage service, and entitles the labourers to salvage reward. (Adm.) The Antelope 513
4. Slipping cable—Taking out anchor and chain—Salvage service.—Taking out during bad weather an anchor and chain to a vessel, which is compelled to slip her cable to get away from a dangerous position and run for a place of safety, is, although the anchor and chain in the result are not needed, a salvage service. (Adm.) The Æolus 516
5. Mutiny—Officers incapacitated—Supplying officer—Master, owners, and crew—Right to reward.—Where the officers of a vessel are rendered incapable of navigating her by reason of a mutiny on board, and another vessel sends her mate on board, and the disabled vessel is taken by him into place of safety, the other vessel is a salvor, and her owners, master, and crew are entitled to salvage reward. (U.S. Dist. Ct.; S. Dist. of N.Y.) The Brig, J. L. Bowen and her cargo 106
6. Charterer—Demise of ship—Right to salvage.—A charter-party, by which it is stipulated that the charterer shall bear all expenses, pay the wages of the crew, and all charges incidental to the running of the steamer, except marine insurance, and that the steamer shall be delivered up at the termination of the engagement, in the same and as good condition as she was at the time of the hiring, so passes the ship to the charterer, that he is entitled as pro hac vice owner to reward for salvage service which may be rendered by the vessel. (Adm.) The Scout... 258

7. Salvage of ship and cargo—Salving, and salvaged ship owned by same persons—Bills of lading—Excepted perils—Right of owners, master, and crew to salvage reward.—Where a screw steamship carrying cargo under bills of lading, containing the exception "accidents from machinery," becomes disabled through her machinery breaking down, and another vessel belonging to the same owners renders salvage service, and brings the disabled ship into safety, those services being 'over and above the contract to carry safely and deliver in the like good order and condition as shipped, entitle the shipowners to salvage reward, as against the cargo of the salvaged vessel. The master and crew of the salving vessel are entitled to reward as against ship, cargo, and freight. (Adm.) The Miranda...page 440
8. Crew of ship as salvors—Abandonment by master and crew—Dissolution of contract.—The abandonment of a vessel in distress by her master (accompanied by the majority of the crew) operates as a dissolution of the contract between the owners and seamen, and if one of the crew voluntarily remains on board, and renders salvage services, he is entitled to salvage reward. (Adm.) The Lejonet..... 438
9. Ships belonging to same owners—Right of crew to reward—Contract.—Where salvage services are performed by one ship to another, and both vessels belong to the same owner, the crew of the ship which has performed the salvage service is entitled to salvage reward, if the services rendered are not such as the crew are bound to perform under their contract. (Priv. Co.) The Sappho..... 65
10. Pilot—Contract of—Right to salvage reward.—A pilot entering into an engagement to pilot a vessel undertakes to supply local knowledge and the peculiar skill of his class, and will not be allowed, even though he contribute to the safety of the vessel, to change the character of his service from pilotage to salvage, except where the vessel was in distress before he went on board to render the service, or where such circumstances of extreme danger and personal exertion supervene, which exalt his service into a salvage service. (Adm.) The Aeolus 516
11. Waterman—Acting pilot—Right to salvage reward.—A waterman acting as a pilot is subject to the same disabilities as a licensed pilot in respect of claiming salvage reward against a ship which he has been engaged to pilot. (Adm.) Id. 516
12. Contract with salvors—Employment by salvors of third persons—Knowledge of contract—Right to reward.—A contract between salvors and owners for an agreed amount to be paid in any event, creates only a personal obligation on the part of the owners, and as a salvor by contract has no claim against the property salvaged beyond the contract price, such a claim cannot create against the owners of the property any obligation beyond that price in favour of a third party, who, with a knowledge of the contract, is employed by the salvors to assist in recovering the property. (U. S. Dist. Ct. of Mich.) The Schooner Marquette 404
13. Contract for salvage services—Effect of competent parties—Increased difficulty of service—Payment into court—Estoppel.—A contract to perform salvage services when entered into by competent parties is binding, even if the services increase in difficulty. Even if one of the parties, being at the mercy of the other, consents to abandon the contract, the Admiralty Court will uphold the agreement. The owners of the salvaged vessel will not be stopped from setting up the agreement by tender or payment into court of money by way of compensation for damages and extra expense incurred by the salvors. (Adm.) *The Waverley*page 47
14. Contract for expenses—Right to reward—Ousting of right.—An agreement entered into between the master of the salving ship and the officer commanding the distressed vessel, by which the latter acknowledges the receipt of the men, and undertakes "to pay all expenses attached thereby, as my vessel is in distress for want of men, and I cannot bring her in without help," is not such an agreement as will oust the right of the salvors to reward, but is an agreement to pay expenses in all events. Semble, even if the agreement did oust the right of the others, it would not effect the right of the men placed on board the distressed vessel. (Adm.) The Charles..... 296
15. Collision—Default of salvor—Right to salvage reward.—A vessel rendering assistance to another which she has injured in collision cannot claim salvage reward if the collision takes place by her default. (Adm.) The Glengaber 401
16. Collision—Salving vessel owned by owners of vessel doing damage—Right to salvage reward.—The owners, master, and crew of a vessel which renders assistance to a vessel injured by collision are not deprived of their right to salvage reward by the fact that some of the owners are also owners of another vessel by whose misconduct the collision takes place. (Adm.) Id...... 401
17. Collision—Salvor employed by wrong-doing vessel—Right to salvage reward.—A vessel rendering salvage assistance is not deprived of her right to reward by the fact that she is employed by a vessel whose misconduct renders her employment necessary. (Adm.) Id...... 401
18. Passengers' baggage—Lien.—Salvors have no lien upon personal baggage and effects belonging to passengers on board a salvaged vessel. (Adm.) The Willem III. 129
19. Life salvage—Foreign ship—Service out of British waters.—Salvors of life cannot recover salvage reward under the Admiralty Court Act 1861, sect. 9, for services rendered outside British waters to a foreign ship, even though such services are by another vessel to which the salvaged persons have been transferred by the original salvors completed within British waters. (Adm.) The Willem III...... 129
20. Value of salvaged property—Assessment of reward—Deduction of expenses paid by salvors.—Expenses incurred in salving a vessel, such as pumping, watching, &c., which strictly ought to be paid by the marshal of the High Court of Admiralty, will if paid by salvors, be deducted from the value of the salvaged vessel in assessing the salvage reward. (Adm.) The Lejonet..... 438
21. Extent of Liability—Negligence of salvaged ship—Injury to salvor.—The V. having got aground, the M. came to her assistance. They were lashed together, the V. being the more powerful vessel. The V. got off, but the M. ran upon a snag and made a hole in her bottom, and was lost. The V. had been aground more than a day, and had had ample opportunity of knowing the locality. Held: That in having failed to make the necessary investigations as to the dangers of the place, and being the chief and controlling motive power, the V. was liable for the services and the loss of the M. (U. S. Circ. Ct.; S. Dist. of Ill.) The Missionary v. The Virginia..... 107
22. Appointment—Owners, master, and crew—Salving vessel—Steam power.—In apportioning salvage reward among the owners, master, and crew of a sailing vessel which has rendered salvage service by towing a vessel in distress, and remaining by her in bad weather, the High Court of Admiralty will not allot to the owner the same proportion as that allotted to the owners of a steamship (usually one-half) unless it appears that the sailing vessel itself was, as in the case of services rendered by means of steam power, the chief agent in effecting the salvage. (Adm.) The Palmyra 182

23. Admiralty Court—Pleading—Proceedings against ship and cargo—Settlement of claim against ship—Plea of.—In a cause of salvage originally instituted against ship and cargo, where the owners of the ship have settled the claim against the ship, the plaintiffs, in proceeding against the cargo, may plead the fact that they have so settled with the shipowner, but are not entitled to plead the amount paid in settlement. (Adm.) The Due Checchi page 294

24. Admiralty Court—Pleading—Suits in different courts—Plea of amount recovered.—Where two suits of salvage were instituted by different sets of salvors in respect of salvage services rendered to the same property on the same occasion, the one suit in the Admiralty Court of the Cinque Ports, the other in the High Court of Admiralty, and the salvors in the former suit recovered salvage reward, the High Court allowed the amount of such reward recovered to be pleaded by the defendants in their answer in that court for the purpose of informing the court of the value of the property against which it would have to make its award, that value being the net value, less all proper deductions, and an award previously made by a competent court in respect of the same service being a proper deduction. (Adm.) The Antelope 513

25. Admiralty Court—Practice—Consolidation of causes.—The Court of Admiralty will consolidate causes of salvage instituted on behalf of several sets of salvors on the application of the plaintiffs. (Adm.) The Melpomene 515

26. Admiralty Court—Consolidated causes—Practice—Conflicting interest.—Where salvage causes have been consolidated by order of the Court of Admiralty, but it appears that the interest of one of the plaintiffs conflicts with those of the others, the court will give leave for that plaintiff to appear separately by counsel at the hearing. (Adm.) The Scout 258

27. Admiralty Court—Practice—Rival salvors—Right to begin—Cross-examination—Consolidation—Life salvor.—In a salvage suit in the Court of Admiralty where there are rival salvors, the right to begin depends upon the circumstances of each case, but the salvor who first enters his suit has originally the right to begin, unless special circumstances be shown. Rival salvors have a right to cross-examine each other's witnesses, but only on a point at which they are at issue. A salvor who saves life in addition to the services rendered by him in connection with the other salvors, is not bound to consolidate, where the salvors cannot agree as to the conduct of the cause. (Adm.) The Morocco; The Willem III. 46, 129

28. Admiralty Court—Practice—Evidence—Amount of claim.—In a salvage suit evidence of the amount on which another suit has been instituted in another court for services rendered at the same time is not admissible. (Adm.) The Antelope 477

29. Tender—Costs—Practice—Admiralty Court.—A tender in a cause of salvage in the High Court of admiralty must be made with costs, or the ground for refusing costs must appear upon the face of the tender. (Adm.) The Thracian 207

30. Tender—Appeal from Cinque Ports—Practice—Admiralty Court.—On appeal by the owners of a salvaged ship from a salvage award made by the Cinque Ports Commissioners, the appellants may, without filing pleadings, place upon the file of the court a tender, although no tender was made before the Commissioners, and the respondents are bound to accept or reject a tender so made. (Adm.) The Annette page 577

31. Evidence—Appeal from Cinque Ports—Practice—Value of salvaged property—Admiralty Court.—An appeal from an award of Cinque Ports Commissioners being in the nature of a rehearing, pleadings may be filed and new evidence given by the appellants, although at the imminent risk of costs; and, consequently, the question of the value of the salvaged property, although agreed before the commissioners, may be reopened on appeal. (Adm.) Id. 577

32. Appeal—Increasing reward—Grounds for.—The Privy Council will increase the amount awarded by the Admiralty Court for salvage services where such amount would not be fair compensation, considering the risk and amount of property and number of lives saved. But the difference must be very considerable before they will interfere. Where the same salvage services are rendered at first with great risk, but afterwards with ease, the court will only treat it as one transaction. (P.C.) The Glenduror 31

SHIP.

Fishing coble—Seagoing vessel—Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment Act 1862, s. 3—Board of Trade—Justices—Jurisdiction.—A fishing coble of ten tons burthen, 24ft. in length, and decked forward, with two movable masts and lug-sails, accustomed to go twenty miles out to sea, and to remain out twelve hours at a time, usually sailing, but sometimes propelled by oars, is a "ship" within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act 1862, s. 3. Where such a vessel was run down by a steamer, and her crew drowned, the Board of Trade sent down a clerk to the coroner's inquest held thereon, and he took notes of the evidence and forwarded them to the Board of Trade, and they directed the justices to hold an inquiry, it was held that such justices had jurisdiction to hold such inquiry under the Merchant Shipping Acts. SOLICITOR'S LIEN.

1. Priority—Necessaries—Admiralty Court.—Where a solicitor in a cause in the High Court of Admiralty has acquired, by order of the court under 23 & 24 Vict. c. 127, sect. 28, or otherwise, a lien for his costs upon a ship, as for property recovered or preserved by his exertions, or upon its proceeds in court, his lien takes precedence of liens for necessaries supplied after the institution against the ship of the cause in respect of which he is entitled to costs, but not of liens for necessaries supplied before the institution of that cause. (Adm.) *The Heinrich*page 260
2. Priority—Master's wages—Master part owner.—A solicitor's lien takes precedence of the lien of the master of the ship for his wages, where the master is also part owner, and has instructed the solicitor to defend a cause instituted against the ship. (Adm.) The Heinrich 260
3. Wages suit—Lien for costs—Change of solicitors—Practice—Order for payment—Admiralty Court.—Where a solicitor for a defendant in a wages suit was entitled to a lien for his costs on the balance of a sum of money paid into the registry in lieu of bail (after payment of the plaintiff's claim and costs) and the defendant wishing to dispute the registrar's report on the plaintiff's claim, to which he had previously submitted, caused another appearance to be entered for him by other solicitors, without previously paying his original solicitor's costs, the court ordered the second appearance to be set aside, and the original solicitor's costs to be paid out of the fund, after payment of the plaintiff's claim and costs, leaving the other solicitors to apply and enter an appearance after this had been done.
