JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

THE OWNERS OF THE STEAMSHIP ESK (apps.), v. THE OWNERS OF THE STEAMSHIP NIORD (resps.)

THE ESK AND THE NIORD.

Collision—Damage—Change of course—Judgment in the case of the Velocity explained.

The Esk was going down the Thames while the Niord was coming up. The Esk was coming round a point on a port helm. As the vessels approached each other, the Niord first ported her helm, and then put it hard a-port, till she had paid off about five points. The Esk, on seeing this manœuvre of the Niord, stopped and reversed her engines, and put her helm hard a-starboard. The result was a collision:

Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Admiralty), that the Esk was to blame for the collision: since, dealing with the question as one of general navigation, the Esk was in fault, either in not discovering, from insufficiency of the outlook, the course that the Niord was taking, or in failing, from some other cause, to port her helm as she ought to have done.

The decision in the case of The Velocity (21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 686) does not justify one of two vessels (which would go clear of each other if each held her own course) in crossing the course of the other, since such an act would be a violation of the "Regulations for preventing Collisions at Sea." But vessels are generally free to pass from one side of the mid-channel to the other.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Admiralty, in cross causes of damage, civil and maritime, between the appellants and respondents, on account of a collision which occurred between the two vessels in the Thames on Nov. 12, 1869, under circumstances stated in the judgment post.

Sir Robert Phillimore found that the Esk was solely to blame for the collision, and condemned the appellants in damages and costs. His judgment (not reported), after a statement of the facts, proceeded:—"The question which vessel was to blame for this collision has been much and carefully considered by the court and its nautical assessors. It appears that both these vessels were in the same reach, steering nearly opposite courses; the river seems not to have been in any material degree crowded with shipping, or to have presented any circumstances of difficulty to a navigation conducted with ordinary skill and care. After the recent decision of the Privy Council in the case of the Velocity (21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 686; 39 L. J. 21, Ad.), I think I am bound to hold that it was competent to either vessel to pass on either shore. The Niord availing herself of this right, ported her helm and attempted to pass on the north shore; and I am informed by the Trinity Masters that this was her proper course according to the custom of the river. While the Niord was taking this course, the two vessels came into collision. On the part of the Niord, it is asserted that she commenced the manœuvre of porting her helm when sufficiently far apart from the Esk for the latter vessel to have seen her intention, and to have taken steps to avoid the collision, which she ought to have done. The Esk contends that this manœuvre on the part of the Niord was executed when it was too late for the Esk to take any other step than that of starboarding her helm and reversing her engines. The question, therefore, which the court has to determine is narrowed to a small compass. The Niord, according to the evidence, went off under her port helm five points, and this is corroborated by the evidence that the blow was nearly a right-angled one. From the evidence on the part of the Esk, it appears that only one minute, or less than that time, elapsed between the order to starboard and reverse and the collision. The court is of opinion that the porting of the helm of the Niord was not seen as soon as it should have been by the Esk, and it appears in evidence that neither the master nor the chief officer of the Esk were on the bridge superintending the navigation of the vessel, but that she was left to the sole charge of a waterman. And the Trinity Masters are further of opinion that the starboarding of the helm of the Esk was an improper manœuvre. Upon the whole the court has, under the advice of the Trinity Masters, arrived at the conclusion that the Esk was solely to blame for this collision, and I pronounce accordingly."

Milward, Q.C., and Clarkson, for the appellants.

Butt, Q.C., and Phillimore, for the respondents.

Judgment was delivered by Sir JAMES W. COLVILLE.—The collision which has given rise to the suit and cross-suit which are now brought on appeal before their Lordships took place in that portion of the river Thames which is known as the Halfway Reach on the 12th Nov. 1869, about half-past nine on that morning. The screw steamer Esk, a collier in ballast, was proceeding down the river, and the Niord, Swedish screw steamer laden with a crop of oats, was coming up the river. Near the place of collision is a not very well defined point on the southern or Kentish side of the river, which divides the Halfway Reach from the Barking reach. The vessels appear to have first sighted each other across this point, whilst the Esk was coming down the Barking Reach; and as they approached each other, the Niord which was in charge of a licensed pilot first ported her helm and then put it hard a-port until she had paid off about five points. The Esk, on the other hand, upon seeing this manœuvre of Niord, stopped and reversed her engines, and put her helm hard a starboard. The result was a collision, the Esk running almost at a right angle into the Niord, nearly amidships, cutting clean into her boiler, and compelling her, in order to avoid sinking in deep water, to run ashore on the northern side of the river. These facts seem to be undisputed. The evidence as to the precise time at which the manœuvres were executed, the circumstances which preceded them, and the relative position of the vessels when the Esk first rounded the point, is conflicting, and in many respects even more loose and unsatisfactory than nautical evidence in cases of collision almost proverbially is. Upon that evidence, however, the learned judge of the Admiralty Court, assisted by two Elder Brethren of the Trinity House, came to the conclusion that the Esk was solely in fault; and upon the principles which uniformly guide this board, and which are more particularly laid down and enforced in the case of the Julia (14 Moo. P. C. 210), it will be their Lordships' duty to affirm that decision upon questions of fact, unless they are clearly satisfied that it is erroneous. Before, however, they proceed to consider the effects of the evidence and of the arguments which have been founded upon it, their Lordships deem it right to make a few observations upon the case of the Velocity (21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 686; 39 L. J. 21, Adm.), which was cited by the learned judge of the Admiralty Court in his judgment, and has also been cited at the bar, in order to remove any possible misapprehension which may exist concerning its effect. In that case the Admiralty Court had held that the case was one which fell within the 14th of the Steering and Sailing Rules; that the two steamers in question were crossing each other; that it was the duty of the Velocity to keep her course, and the duty of the other vessel (the Carbon) to get out of the way; that the Carbon by porting her helm, which brought her across the river, had executed the manœuvre which the performance of her duty required; and that the Velocity had failed to keep her course and was, therefore, solely in fault. The appellate court, on the other hand, held that the case was not one of two vessels crossing within the meaning of the 14th rule; that the course of the Velocity was, after rounding the Millwall Pier, to run down the river on the north shore; that the Carbon was not justified in assuming that the Velocity was crossing the river, but should have pursued her own course on the south of the mid channel, in which case the two vessels would have passed free starboard to starboard. It held further that if the case was one within the 18th rule, the Carbon was still to blame, inasmuch as she had not got out of the way of the Velocity, which had "kept her course," their Lordships holding that according to the true interpretation of the term "keeping her course" she was at liberty to hold on upon the course which she would have pursued, had no vessel been in sight, and was not bound to follow the direction in which her head, as she rounded the point, happened to be at the moment when she was first sighted. In the course of the argument, however, it had been brought to their Lordships' notice that whilst the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854 was in force, the Velocity would, under its provisions, have been bound to keep on the south side of the mid channel. But their Lordships, advertent to the repeal of the 297th section of that Act, observes that "vessels navigating the river were now at liberty to go on whichever side of it they pleased, taking care, of course, to observe the regulations for preventing collisions." This ruling seems to their Lordships to be by no means so broad as the summary of it which appears in the shorthand writer's note of the judgment in the Admiralty Court. If, for instance, it were clear upon the evidence, that the two vessels would have gone clear of each other if each had held on upon her own course, then the ruling would not have justified the Niord in crossing the course of the Esk, and so by her own act bringing the two vessels into the category of crossing vessels, since by such an act she would have violated the regulations for preventing collisions, and would have done that which, it was held in the case of the Velocity, she ought not to have done. It is probable, however, that the learned judge of the Admiralty Court only meant to say that in shaping her course up the river, the Niord, under the decision in the case of the Velocity, was generally free to pass from the one side of the mid channel to the other. Again, something has been said in argument of the negligence of the master of the Esk, in leaving his vessel in charge of the licensed waterman, Mr. Braine, and of the insufficiency of the look-out, in consequence of the mate quitting the forecabin. As to the first point, it is sufficient to observe that whatever blame may attach to the master for leaving the steerage and manœuvres of the vessel in charge of the waterman, that circumstance cannot effect the decision of this appeal, since the owners of the Esk are clearly responsible for the acts and omissions of the waterman as one of the crew. The insufficiency of the outlook, which their Lordships think is established by the evidence, is a very material consideration, if the evidence, really affords ground for believing that had there been a proper outlook on board the Esk, the accident would have been avoided. The real question, as it seems to their Lordships, is this,—was the Niord justified in coming across the river under a port helm? If she was, then if the effect of that manœuvre was to make the vessels crossing vessels within the 14th of the Sailing and Steering Rules, it seems to have been the duty of the Esk to get out of the way; and she failed to do so. On the other hand, if whilst executing that manœuvre the Niord was still in such a position that the two vessels, keeping each its proper course, might have passed each other free port side to port side, it was the duty of the Esk, by porting her helm, to ensure that safe passage, whereas by starboarding she brought about the collision. Their Lordships do not think it necessary to affirm that these vessels were, at the moment at which they first sighted each other, crossing vessels within the meaning of the rule; they will assume that the case does not strictly fall within the rule, and will then consider which vessel was in fault, dealing with that question as one of general navigation. They have had the benefit of consulting their nautical assessors, and those gentlemen entirely concur with the Trinity Masters, and with the learned Judge of the Admiralty Court, in the conclusion to which they came, that the Esk was solely in fault. The Esk unquestionably, in rounding that point, must have been under the port helm for a time. The other vessel had been hugging the south shore, and would, in the ordinary course of navigation, have gone under a port helm to the other side of the river about the point at which she did go. On the other hand, there seems to be no reason why the Esk coming round the point under a port helm, should not have followed the southward shore, continuing to port her helm. At all events, whatever may have been her rights or whatever course she might have taken had no other vessel been in the way, it was clearly her duty to observe the Niord, to see whether she was taking that course which persons acquainted with the navigation of the river must have known to be the ordinary course, viz., that of crossing the river, and to conduct her own manœuvres accordingly. She seems to their Lordships not to have done this. Whether in consequence of the insufficiency of the outlook she did not discover early enough what the Niord was doing, or whether from any other cause she failed to take the course which their Lordships, as advised by their nautical assessors, conceive was the right course, namely, that of porting her helm, she must be held responsible for the collision. Their Lordships do not consider it necessary to go further into the discrepancies in the evidence upon various points which have been commented upon at the bar. They will, however, mention that in their opinion, the place of the collision cannot have been below the lower creek marked in the chart, and therefore must have taken place shortly after the rounding of the point by the Esk. On the whole case, looking at the question as one of navigation on which four professional persons concur in supporting the judgment of the court below, their Lordships feel it to be their duty to advise her Majesty to dismiss this appeal with costs.

Judgment affirmed.

Dec. 7, 8, 16, 1870, and Jan. 13, 1871.

CONSERVATORS OF THE THAMES v. THE SOUTH-EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Floating pier—Tolls—Revocable licence—Bill to obtain possession—Jurisdiction in equity.

The City of London by licence granted a company permission to form a floating pier on the River Thames, such pier to remain during pleasure, and to take tolls on all passengers landed at the pier. Under the powers conferred upon them by the Thames Embankment Act 1862 the Board of Works took the floating pier from the company, and agreed to pay them a certain sum and to construct a new landing stage in lieu of the old pier, and to appropriate it in perpetuity to the benefit of the company. The Thames Embankment Act 1868 purported to give validity to this agreement. On a bill by the Conservators of the Thames (in whom all the estate, &c., of the City of London in the bed, soil, and shores of the river had become vested by the Thames Conservancy Act 1857) to restrain the company from continuing in possession of the landing stage constructed in lieu of the old pier: Held, that the company were entitled to the use of the pier only on sufferance, and at the pleasure of the plaintiffs; that the Board of Works had no power to convert the licence at pleasure into an irrevocable licence; and that the Act which purported to give a validity to the agreement between the company and the Board of Works did not affect the rights of the plaintiffs:

Held, also, that the proper remedy of the plaintiffs was by bill in equity, and not by ejectment.

THIS was a suit by the Conservators of the River Thames, who claimed, under the Thames Conservancy Act 1857, to be owners of the foreshore and soil of the river, to restrain the South-Eastern Railway Company from continuing in possession of the floating pier known as the Charing-cross Pier. The bill asked for an injunction and an account of the tolls.

On the 2nd Aug. 1844, the navigation committee of the river Thames, duly appointed by and acting for the mayor, commonalty, and citizens of the City of London, did, by licence not under seal, grant permission to the Hungerford Suspension Bridge Company to form a floating pier on the east side of the north pier of the bridge, such pier to remain during pleasure only. The pier was soon afterwards constructed in conformity with the licence, and was subsequently, by Act of Parliament, vested in the Charing-cross Railway Company, and finally in the South-Eastern Railway Company.

By an indenture dated the 24th Feb. 1857, all the estate, right, title, and interest of Her Majesty in right of the Crown of in and to the bed, soil, and shores of the Thames, within flux and reflux of the tides bounded eastwards by an imaginary line to be drawn from the entrance to Yantlett Creek, in the county of Kent, on the southern shore of the river, to the city stone, opposite Canvey Island, in the County of Essex, on the northern side of the river, were conveyed unto and to the use of the Corporation of London and their successors as conservators of the river.

By the Thames Conservancy Act 1857, all the estate, &c., of the Corporation of London in the bed, soil, and shores of the river, and all powers, authorities, &c., belonging to them in relation to the conservancy of the river were vested in the plaintiffs, who were incorporated by the Act.

The Thames Embankment Act 1862 authorised the Metropolitan Board of Works to construct the embankment, and to make all necessary walls, piers, &c. Sect. 27 of the Act was in the following words:

Subject to the provision herein contained, it shall be lawful for the board, by agreement, to appropriate by way of grant or demise, or for any term of years or other period, and for or subject to a nominal or any other consideration, or rent, any reclaimed land or any absolute or partial or qualified licence or right of user or enjoyment, right of way, right of frontage, or other right or easement of, out of, over, upon, in connection with or in relation to any reclaimed land, or any wharf, &c. . . . and landing places to be constructed or provided by the board under the powers of this Act, and the approaches, conveniences, and works connected therewith to any owner of lands now situated on the present left bank and river frontage of the river Thames, in front whereof the said intended embankments and roadway shall pass as aforesaid, in consideration of, and in lieu in whole or in part of the compensation which such owner or person may be entitled to claim for the damage (if any) to be sustained by him, by loss of river frontage or otherwise, by reason of such embankment and roadway, or other the exercise of any of the powers of this Act.

By an agreement, dated the 19th July 1867, and made between the South-Eastern Railway Company of the one part and the Metropolitan Board of Works of the other part, it was agreed that the Board of Works should pay the railway company 16,500*l.* by way of compensation for taking their pier at Charing-cross, and that they should construct a new landing stage instead of the old one, and should appropriate such new landing-stage in perpetuity to the benefit of the company.

By the Thames Embankment Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 111), s. 16, it was provided that as soon as the landing stage to be constructed by the Board under the agreement with the South-Eastern Railway Company had been constructed, the railway company should have and might exercise and enjoy the same rights, powers, and authorities for taking tolls and dues, and all other rights, advantages, powers, &c., and should be subject to the same duties and obligations affecting the public in respect of the landing stage to be provided as aforesaid as they had exercised and enjoyed and were subject to as regarded the old landing stage.

On the 4th March 1870 the plaintiffs served notice on the defendant company, determining the licence of the 2nd Aug. 1844.

Southgate, Q.C., and Montague Cookson, for the plaintiffs contended that licence granted by their predecessors in title, being only at pleasure, they had a right by giving notice as they had done, to determine the licence and to resume possession of the pier. The Board of Works had no power to grant an irrevocable licence as against the plaintiffs, and the Thames Embankment Acts did not deprive the plaintiffs of their right to possession of the pier.

Jessel, Q.C., and Phear, for the defendant company, contended that their agreement with the Board of Works was valid, and that the plaintiffs had no right to disturb them in their possession; and that, assuming the plaintiffs to be entitled to resume possession of the pier, their proper remedy was by ejectment, as they could not bring a bill, on a legal title, to turn the defendant company out of possession.

The following cases were cited:—

Corporation of Exeter v. Earl of Devon, 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 322;

Attorney General v. The Conservators of the Thames, 1 H. & M. 1;

Attorney General v. The Metropolitan Board of Works, 1 H. & M. 298.

Jan. 13.—Lord ROMILLY.—This suit was instituted by the Conservators of the River Thames for the purpose of obtaining an injunction to restrain the defendants from continuing in possession of the floating pier known by the name of the

Charing-cross pier, which possession, in point of fact is nothing more than the receipt of tolls. The defendants claim the right of taking tolls for passengers, luggage or goods landed from any vessel at this pier. The plaintiffs only take tolls from steamboats. The plaintiffs under the Act of 1857, claim to be owners of the foreshore and soil of the river. The defendants claim the floating pier by virtue of certain statutes and agreements unaffected by the Acts creating the plaintiffs. [His Lordship examined at great length the statutes above referred to and the agreement between the defendant company and the Board of Works, and then continued:] The question I have to determine is this, Do this agreement and this Act deprive the plaintiffs of their power to take possession of this pier? What I have first to consider is, what was the position of the defendants as regards the pier at the passing of this Act of 1868, and what effect has been produced by the provisions of the Act upon them? I think it clear that prior to the passing of this Act the South-Eastern Railway Company were only occupants of this landing pier during the pleasure originally of the City of London, and that under the Act which I have fully stated all the powers, rights, and privileges of the City of London relating to this matter, and including the power of resuming this pier, were for this purpose vested in the Conservators of the River Thames. I am also of opinion that these rights and powers are not affected or abrogated by any of the subsequent Acts. The only one that can be said to deal with the matter is the Thames Embankment Act, 1862, but it contains nothing to abridge or destroy the powers of the conservators over the floating pier or landing-place at Hungerford. At the time when this Act (31 & 32 Vict. c. 111) passed, I am of opinion that the South-Eastern Railway Company held the pier solely on sufferance at the pleasure of the Conservators of the River Thames, who might at any time have given them notice to conclude the occupancy. I say that after expressly referring to a clause which I read at length in the Thames Embankment Act, which is the only one that can have any reference to the subject, and which does not at all appear to me to deal with this particular point. If this view is correct, I look in vain for any power conferred on the Board of Works to interfere with the powers and rights of the Conservators of the River Thames. On the contrary they are all preserved to them by the Act except so far as they are expressly taken away. This floating pier is not within the scope or range of the powers of the Board of Works. It is true they may and probably have seriously affected and destroyed the pier in the occupation of the South-Eastern Railway Company, for which they may be liable to compensate them. But I am unable to see in what way it can reasonably be said that the Board of Works have power to deal with or destroy the power of resumption which was vested in the conservators, and which has not in express words been taken away by the Act of Parliament. The deed certainly does assume to convert into a perpetuity the licence to use during pleasure the landing pier which is given in lieu of the old one which is taken away. But if that was the intention of the Board of Works it was clearly, in my opinion, ultra vires. The 27th section of the Thames Embankment Act is that which is relied upon for this purpose, but it is to my mind clear that this section has no reference to the subject at all so far as regards the power of the plaintiffs, and that under it no power is given to the Board of Works to convert a mere licence to use and occupy during pleasure a landing pier granted by a third person without the concurrence or sanction of that third person who is the owner of the property, and the person who alone had the power to give such a licence. I am of opinion that such was not the intention of the Board of Works or the proper construction to be put upon their conduct. Their contract and deeds relate solely to the acts and deeds of the Board of Works, and consequently reading the agreement as if the words "so far as the Board of Works had power to do," were introduced, I am of opinion that the Board of Works had no such power, and that the licence they gave is confined to their own acts, and they had no power to give a licence at all. I am of opinion that if they had, the grant of a perpetual licence would not be valid. I concur in the observation that upon such a state of things no security could be given for the pier being properly supplied with lights, gangways, and attendance, and the case of the Attorney-General v. The Conservators of the River Thames (1 H. & M. 1), seems to me to establish that such a licence granted in perpetuity would be illegal and invalid. The railway company could only sell what they had, which was a revocable licence. The Board of Works did not, in my opinion, intend, and if they did so intend, they had not the power to buy such licence, nor had they the power, if they so intended, to diminish the amount they had to pay the South-Eastern Railway Company, as the value for what they took, by altering the character of the property they took, or giving instead other property in another place under the control of others and belonging to other persons, or to convey a fresh power upon the spot so given in exchange. The Board of Works took the site of a floating landing stage, held by the South-Eastern Railway Company upon a licence revocable at pleasure; the Board of Works gave them another floating landing place near to it, and it may well be that the South-Eastern Railway Company is not prejudiced thereby, and that it takes the new floating stage upon the same terms as the one taken. The Board of Works had no power to grant anything further, and their licence in perpetuity solely affects the acts of the Board of Works, which may be thereby debarred from taking any active steps to deprive the South-Eastern Railway Company of such floating landing stage, but leaves the rights and privileges of the plaintiffs untouched. This, however, does not dispose of the whole case. An objection was raised to this suit, which applies to the jurisdiction, and this is said to be the more material because, if the defendants fail, they will have a right to maintain an action for damages against the Metropolitan Board of Works. The court may hold that the railway company have been improperly deprived of their possession, that they are still entitled to it, and therefore, if their right is disposed of by a court acting ultra vires, it will have no effect upon the defendants' rights; and, therefore, it is said that some proceeding at law, either by ejectment or by trespass, and not by bill in Chancery, is the proper remedy for the plaintiffs to pursue. I have considered this question well, and I am of opinion that this is a case strictly belonging to this court, and that the plaintiffs are entitled to come here for a declaration of their rights, and for an injunction to compel the defendants to abstain for the future from levying tolls or doing any other act belonging to the occupancy of this floating pier, and that as the plaintiffs have given the proper notice determining the tenancy, or rather the occupancy of this pier, they are entitled to such a declaration, and to the injunction consequent upon it, and also to an account of the tolls from the filing of the bill.

LEATHER v. SIMPSON.

Document bills—Forged bills of lading—Representation.

A London bank received two bills of exchange drawn by S., a merchant in America, upon B., his correspondent in Liverpool, against two lots of cotton, each bill of exchange having attached to it a document purporting to be the bill of lading for the cotton, against which the bill of exchange was drawn. The bank attached to each bill of exchange a memorandum in the following form:—

"The Union Bank of London holds bill of lading and policy for 251 bales cotton, per William Cummings;" and, retaining the bills of exchange to B. ginnings, they presented the bills of exchange to B. for acceptance through their Liverpool agent. B., having been advised by S. of the shipments of cotton, accepted the bills of exchange on the faith of the statements in the memoranda. Before the bills fell due he retired them by paying to the bank their value less a rebate of interest, and obtained possession of the bills of lading. The latter proving to be forged, B. filed a bill against the bank to have the money returned:

Held, that the statements contained in the memoranda did not amount to a representation or a guarantee on the part of the bank that the bills of lading were genuine, and that B. had no equity to have the money returned.

Thiedemann v. Goldschmidt (1 De G. F. & J. 4; 1 L. T. Rep. N. S. 50) followed.

In the year 1870 John Newton Beach was carrying on the business of a merchant in Liverpool, under the style or firm of J. N. Beach and Co., and George B. Shute was his correspondent in New Orleans.

On the 23rd May 1870 Shute wrote to Beach and Co., advising them that he was about to consign to them by a vessel named the William Cummings two lots of cotton, consisting of 251 bales and 253 bales respectively.

In June 1870 two bills of exchange came into the hands of the Union Bank of London. One was dated the 23rd May 1870, and was drawn against 251 bales of cotton per William Cummings by Shute upon Beach and Co. for 3925l. 9s. 3d., payable sixty days after sight; the other was dated the 25th May 1870, and was drawn against 253 bales of cotton per William Cummings, by Shute upon the same firm for 4054l. 13s. 7d., payable also sixty days after sight. Each of the bills of exchange had a document attached purporting to be a bill of lading for the cotton against which the bill of exchange was drawn.

According to the usual practice of the Union Bank in dealing with such bills of exchange (which are called document bills), a printed form of memorandum was filled up and pinned to each of the bills. The memorandum attached to the bill of exchange of the 23rd May 1870 was as follows: "The Union Bank of London holds bill of lading and policy for 251 bales cotton per William Cummings." A memorandum in a similar form was attached to the bill of exchange of the 25th May 1870.

On the 13th June 1870 the bills of exchange, with these memoranda attached to them, were presented to Beach for acceptance by the Bank of Liverpool, as agents for the Union Bank of London. Beach did not see the documents referred to in the memoranda, but believing (as he alleged) that the Union Bank of London were then in possession of the genuine bills of lading for the cotton, he accepted the bills.

The William Cummings arrived in Liverpool in the beginning of August, and Beach being desirous of possessing himself of the cotton, applied to Joseph Leather and William Marriott (who were carrying on business as cotton brokers in Liverpool) to assist him in retiring the bills of exchange. Accordingly, on the 2nd Aug. 1870 Beach, Leather, and Marriott paid to the Bank of Liverpool the sum of 7969*l.*, of which 4500*l.* was found by Beach, and the remainder was supplied by Leather and Marriott. The bills of exchange, and two documents which purported to be bills of lading for the cotton, were then handed over by the bank. On these two documents being presented to the captain of the William Cummings, he stated that they were forgeries, and that the cotton had been delivered to the holders of the genuine bills of lading. Beach, Leather, and Marriott, immediately gave notice to the Bank of Liverpool not to part with the money, and offered to return the bills of exchange and documents which they had received, upon having repayment of the amount which they had paid. The bank, however, refused to repay any part of the money; and on the 4th Aug. 1870 a bill was filed by Beach, Leather, and Marriott against the Bank of Liverpool and the Union Bank of London, who were sued in the name of their respective public officers. The bill prayed for a declaration that, under the circumstances, the defendants were bound in equity to repay to the plaintiffs the sum of 7969*l.*, and for an order for such repayment; it also prayed for an injunction to restrain the defendants from paying the said sum of 7969*l.* except to the plaintiffs or as the plaintiffs might direct. An interim injunction was obtained in Aug. 1870, and the matter now came on strictly upon motion; but all parties agreed to treat it as the hearing of the cause.

Cotton, Q.C., Bardswell, and Benjamin, for the plaintiffs, contended that Beach had only accepted the bills on the faith of the statement by the bank that they had the bills of lading; and that if the bank did not make this statement good, the plaintiffs were entitled to have their money returned. They referred to Cotton in reply.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR (after stating the facts of the case).—The claim upon the part of Messrs. Beach and Co., the plaintiffs, is rested upon this, that they accepted the bills on the faith of the representation made by the Union Bank of London. "The Union Bank of London holds bill of lading and policy for 251 bales of cotton, per William Cummings." It is urged that this is a representation by the Union Bank of London that they hold a genuine bill of lading, and therefore that the person who is called upon to accept the bill will have the security of a document which will insure to him the delivery of 251 bales of cotton. Against that it is said there is no representation that it is genuine, and no guarantee. The bank do not undertake to say whether it is good or not; they only say, we have a bill of lading, but the fair meaning of that may possibly be, we have a document which on the face of it is a bill of lading. Nothing had occurred to excite their suspicion; they believed it to be a bill of lading, and they called it a bill of lading, because they so believed it. Then does this amount to a representation that it was a genuine bill of lading? The question that arises is whether by this representation the position of Messrs. Beach and Co. has been in any way altered. I put the case to the learned counsel in the course of the argument, "Suppose the bill of lading had been forwarded with the bill of exchange, which is the usual course of business?" It is perfectly clear, I apprehend, that Messrs. Beach and Co. would not have accepted the bill without the bill of lading accompanying it, if it had been in the hands of parties unknown to them, and who are not so responsible as they knew the Union Bank to be. The representation of the Union Bank that they had the bill of lading was a sufficient assurance to Messrs. Beach and Co., that that bill of lading would be forthcoming in proper time. They, therefore, give credence to their representation and act upon the faith of it. But does it make the case different from what it would have been if the bill of lading had actually been forwarded? I cannot myself, after all that I have heard on the subject, come to the conclusion that this puts Messrs. Beach and Co. in a different situation from what they would have been in if the bill of lading had accompanied the bill of exchange. Now, if the bill of lading had accompanied the bill of exchange, would they have accepted it? The best proof that they would have accepted it is this, that on the 2nd Aug., when they are desirous of having the cotton, the bill of lading is put into their hands, they pay the money on the faith of it, and

LEATHER v. SIMPSON.

they take the bill of exchange and the bill of lading in the perfect belief that it is a genuine document; they make no inquiry with regard to it; they take it to the captain of the ship, and then for the first time discover that they have been imposed upon, as all parties engaged in the transaction had been. Is it, then, I repeat, a guarantee by the Union Bank? It would be a very dangerous thing for a bank, if it were to be said that because they say they have a document of that kind, which they believe to be genuine, they therefore guarantee it. I do not think they do anything of the kind. I think Messrs. Beach and Co., if the matter had been the subject of the slightest degree of suspicion, ought to have said, "You say you have a bill of lading, we should like to look at it, forward it to us. We are going to accept two bills of exchange for a very large amount, more than 8000*l.* Before we do so we should like to see the bills of lading to test the signature, and see that we are perfectly safe." That is the course which they might have taken but they did not. In my opinion they are precisely in the same position as they would have been if they had seen the bills of exchange. They stand precisely in that situation, neither better nor worse. They are therefore precisely in the same situation as if this bill of exchange had annexed to it the bill of lading, and, having looked at it, they accepted the bill of exchange in the belief that the bill of lading was a genuine document. Now it certainly is, as Lord Campbell has pointed out, of the highest importance to the commercial interests of this country, that discredit should never be thrown upon a bill of exchange if it be possible to avoid it. No doubt there are many instances in which this court has to deal with bills of exchange which young spend-thrifts are in the habit of accepting. This court will stay an action on a bill of exchange, where a proper case is made for doing so, but it must be a very peculiar case. This court will always restrain an action on a bill of exchange if there is fraud in the person who holds the bill; but as against such a holder there can be no remedy unless he has taken it under circumstances which this court regards as amounting to notice. If he takes it without giving adequate consideration; if he buys it at a very cheap rate or takes so high a rate of interest that the court attributes notice to him, it is on such grounds as these that the court interferes as against the legal rights of the holder of a negotiable instrument. I pressed Mr. Cotton with a question, what would have been the position of Messrs. Beach and Co., if they had discovered this fraud before they wanted the cotton? They would have said this: "We have been induced to accept bills of exchange for 8000*l.* by fraud; they are not binding upon us." And it is perfectly clear that if they are entitled to get back the money which was paid on the bills of exchange, as they now seek to do in this suit, they would, before they paid the money, have been entitled to get the bills of exchange themselves back. But if when they filed a bill on the 4th Aug., they had not then paid the money, and the bill had been filed to get the bills of exchange delivered up to them, as having been accepted under a misrepresentation of fact, it is settled by the case of Thiedemann v. Goldschmidt, that they would not have been entitled to have the bills delivered up. I am not able to see that any difference between Thiedemann v. Goldschmidt and the present case, is caused by the fact that here the money was actually paid before maturity, and on a rebate of interest on the bills, instead of the bills remaining out. Thiedemann v. Goldschmidt was to all intents and purposes like the case now before me. The facts were these: [His Honour stated the facts and read the judgment in that case]. The full Court of Appeal there decided that the plaintiff had no equity to have the bills delivered up. Now if in that case there was no equity to have the bills delivered up, the bills must have remained out, and therefore the acceptor was liable upon those bills, and as they were a good firm the bills were undoubtedly sure to be honoured. The decision that the bills were not to be delivered up, is, in my opinion, a decision that there was no equity to have the money back, or restrain the whole rights of the holder of the bill against the acceptor under such circumstances. In the case of Robinson v. Reynolds precisely the same question arose: where a bill of exchange had been accepted on the faith of a bill of lading, presented by the bonâ fide holder who had not been guilty of any improper conduct whatever, and who, when he presented the bill of exchange for acceptance, believed the bill of lading to be genuine; was the holder of the bill of exchange precluded from recovering under that bill? I think the observations of Lord Denman there, are very applicable to the present case. Shute, the man who has probably committed the fraud, was the correspondent of the Liverpool firm. He told them by the letter of the 23rd May that he was going to send the 251 bales of cotton by the William Cummings; and it appears that the usual course of dealing with the Liverpool firm was, that whenever they accepted these bills drawn by Shute they uniformly had the bill of lading. There was no instance of Messrs. Beach and Co. having accepted a bill of exchange without the bill of lading. Therefore, when Shute in America, writing on the 25th May from New Orleans to Messrs. Beach and Co. says, "I am going to consign to you 251 bales of cotton by the William Cummings," that necessarily led the mind of Beach and Co. to this, that accompanying the acceptance which will represent the cotton there will be a bill of lading. Then if they expected that there would be a bill of lading coming from their own correspondent Shute, what could they understand from the memorandum from the Union Bank, "The Union Bank of London hold bills of lading and policy for 251 bales of cotton?" So far from the Union Bank misleading Beach and Co., I am of opinion that Beach and Co. could only have understood the memorandum in one way, "Shute has transmitted a bill of lading; we have that bill of lading." The meaning of that was, "You accept the bill; if you want to see the bill of lading we will forward it for your inspection; if you do not want to see it, you need not, we tell you we have it. If you accept the bill it will be handed to you when the bill arrives at maturity, and when you are called on to pay it." Therefore, I think to say that there was any misleading by the Union Bank is attempting to carry the case far beyond anything that the facts warrant. As to the general law of misrepresentation, the rules of this court are settled that when a representation in a matter of business is made by one man to another, calculated to induce him to adapt his conduct to it, it is perfectly immaterial whether the former makes the representation, knowing it to be untrue or whether he makes it believing it to be true, if, in fact, it was untrue. Because every man making a representation and inducing another to act on the faith of that representation must make it good if he takes upon himself to represent that which he does not know to be true, and he is equally bound as if he made it knowing it to be untrue. Therefore, if the court was warranted in any way in treating this memorandum as a representation that the document was genuine or a guarantee, the consequence would be plain; Messrs. Beach and Co. must have been indemnified by the Union Bank of London, and the money received by the bank must have been returned, as having been obtained upon a representation which turns out to be untrue. But after what I have said, it is unnecessary for me to go into this doctrine. If there be a distinction between this case and the cases of Thiedemann v. Goldschmidt, and Robinson v. Reynolds, I confess this case appears to me rather more unfavourable to Messrs. Beach and Co. In Thiedemann v. Goldschmidt the money had not been paid, but in the present case Messrs. Beach and Co. elected to pay the money. The money is taken, and it is much on the same principle as the cases which were cited, where a bank having presented to them a forged cheque, of course can reject it; but if it be presented, it is their duty to know the signature of their own customers, and if they pay the money they cannot get it back again. Here Messrs. Beach and Co. trusted to their own correspondent Shute that he would not transmit anything but a genuine bill of lading. I agree with the observation made by Mr. Jackson, that the equities between these parties are equal, the parties are equally innocent in the transaction. They have all been imposed upon; but there is this difference, that one of them by the course of the transaction has been in possession of the money; and I am at a loss to see any ground upon which I can be justified in making a decree that that money should be restored. I quite agree with Mr. Pollock's argument, that the case really depends on Robinson v. Reynolds and Thiedemann v. Goldschmidt. I can see no distinction between a bill filed to have the acceptance delivered up before it is arrived at maturity, and a bill filed to have the money restored after the bill has arrived at maturity, or has been treated as having arrived at maturity, and the amount of it paid. Upon these grounds I am of opinion that the bill fails, and must be dismissed.

Ex parte FERGUSON AND HUTCHINSON.

Ex parte FERGUSON AND HUTCHINSON.

Merchant Shipping Acts 1854, 1862 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, and 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63)—Collision between two "ships"—Loss of life—Failure of person in charge to render assistance—Jurisdiction of justices—Suspending certificates.

A collision having occurred off the Yorkshire coast between a steamship and a fishing coble, whereby the latter sank and three men on board were drowned, a coroner's inquest was held, to which the Board of Trade sent a clerk, who took notes of the evidence, and returned them to the Board.

Acting thereon, the Board of Trade ordered an investigation into the circumstances of the collision by two justices, who accordingly sat as a court of inquiry, summoned the master and mate of the steamship, and other witnesses, and heard a charge preferred against the master and mate on behalf of the Board of Trade, under 25 & 26 Vic. c. 63 s. 33, which enacts that "in every case of collision between two 'ships' . . . the person in charge of each ship shall render to the other ship, her master, crew, and passengers (if any) such assistance as may be practicable and necessary to save them from danger, and if he fail so to do his certificate may be cancelled or suspended."

The coble was a vessel of ten tons burden, twenty-four feet in length, decked forward only. She had two movable masts, and a lug sail for each; and was accustomed to go twenty miles out to sea, and to remain out twelve hours at a time. She usually sailed, but was sometimes propelled by oars when occasion required.

The court of inquiry having heard evidence, found that the master and mate of the steamship did not render assistance to save the crew of the coble, and made an order suspending their certificates. On a motion for a certiorari to bring up this order for the purpose of quashing it:

Held, that the justices had jurisdiction, and their proceedings were regular under the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and the Amendment Act 1862 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, ss. 241, 242, 432, 433; 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, ss. 23, 33) and that the coble, being substantially a seagoing vessel, was a ship within the terms of those statutes.

*MOTION for a rule calling on two justices of the borough of Sunderland to show cause why a writ of certiorari should not issue to bring up, for the purpose of quashing it, an order made by a court of inquiry, under the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 and the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, suspending the certificate of John Ferguson, the master, and of Lewis Hutchinson, the mate, of the steamship Thames.*

*It appeared from affidavits that, on the 21st Sept. 1870 the Thames was proceeding on a voyage from Sunderland to Cherbourg under steam, and was about three and a half miles off Saltburn, when about half-past two o'clock a.m. she came into collision with a fishing coble, named the Rachel. In consequence of the collision the Rachel sank directly, and three men on board of her were drowned.*

*The mate of the Thames was keeping his watch when this happened, and the master came on deck immediately afterwards. They made no effort to save the crew of the coble, but continued their course. No damage whatever was done to the Thames, nor to anyone on board of her.*

*The Rachel was a vessel of the kind used for the herring fishery along the northern coast of England, and locally termed a coble. She was 24ft. in length, of ten tons burden, was decked over about eight feet of her length, drew about 18in. of water, and had a flat bottom aft, so that she might be easily drawn up on the beach. She had two movable masts fitting into holes in the forthwart and stern sheets, and a bowsprit, and was furnished with a lug sail for each mast, and a jib. She had also a large rudder, extending below her keel, and four oars. The rudder could be readily shipped or unshipped, and required to be unshipped whenever the vessel was in shallow water.*

The oars were commonly used in propelling her to or from the shore and during the time she was engaged in shooting her nets, in calm weather or light airs, or on some part of her course. She was accustomed to go out to sea for a distance of twenty miles from the harbour to the fishing ground, and stayed out sometimes twelve hours at a time. Her crew consisted of three men and a boy.

A coroner's inquest having been held on the body of one of the men who were drowned, the depositions of Ferguson and Hutchinson and of other witnesses were taken. The jury found a verdict of "manslaughter" against Hutchinson, who was afterwards arraigned on the coroner's inquisition at the York Assizes, and acquitted.

A clerk, sent down by the Board of Trade to attend the inquest, took notes of the evidence, and forwarded them to the Board of Trade. The board thereupon directed a formal investigation concerning the running down of the fishing vessel and loss of life to be held before two justices. (a)

(a) 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104 (The Merchant Shipping Act 1854) s. 241, enacts that, "If the Board of Trade or any local marine board has reason to believe that any master or mate is, from incompetency or misconduct, unfit to discharge his duties, the Board of Trade may either institute an investigation or may direct the local marine board at or nearest to the place at which it may be convenient for the parties and witnesses to attend, to institute the same, and thereupon such persons as the Board of Trade may appoint for the purpose, or as the case may be, the local marine board shall, with the assistance of a local stipendiary magistrate (if any), and if there is no such magistrate, of a competent legal assistant to be appointed by the Board of Trade, conduct the investigation, and may summons the master or mate to appear, and shall give him a full opportunity of making a defence, either in person or otherwise, and shall, for the purpose of such investigation, have all the powers given by the first part of this Act to inspectors appointed by the Board of Trade, and may make such order with respect to the cost of such investigation as they may deem just; and shall, on the conclusion of the investigation, make a report upon the case to the Board of Trade; and in cases where there is no local marine board before which the parties and witnesses can conveniently attend, or where such local marine board is unwilling to institute the investigation, the Board of Trade may direct the same to be instituted before two justices or a stipendiary magistrate, and thereupon such investigation shall be conducted, and the results thereof reported, in the same manner and with the same powers in and with which formal investigations into wrecks and casualties are directed to be conducted, and the results thereof reported, under the provisions contained in the eighth part of this Act, save only that, if the Board of Trade so directs the persons bringing the charge of incompetency or misconduct to the notice of the Board of Trade shall be deemed to be the party having the conduct of the case." In part 8 of the said Act, sect. 432 enacts that: "In any of the cases following, that is to say, whenever any ship is lost, abandoned, or materially damaged on or near the coasts of the United Kingdom; whenever any ship causes loss or material damage to any other ship on or near such coasts; whenever by reason or any casualty happening to or on board of any ship on or near such coasts loss of life ensues . . . it shall be lawful for the inspecting officer of the coast guard . . . or for any other person appointed for the purpose by the Board of Trade to make inquiry respecting such loss, abandonment, damage, or casualty." Sect. 433: "If it appears to such officer or person as aforesaid, either upon or without any such preliminary inquiry as aforesaid, that a formal investigation is requisite or expedient, or the Board of Trade so directs, he shall apply to any two justices . . . to hear the case; and such justices . . . shall thereupon proceed to hear and try the same, and shall for that purpose, so far as relates to the summoning of parties, compelling the attendance of witnesses, and the regulation of the pro-

Such investigation was accordingly held by two justices, assisted by two nautical assessors. The master and mate of the Thames and other witnesses were summoned before the court thus constituted. The proceedings at the inquiry took the form of a charge preferred on behalf of the Board of Trade against the master and mate, of having been guilty of a breach of the provisions of the 33rd section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1862. (b)

Objections were raised by the attorney acting for Ferguson and Hutchinson that the court had no jurisdiction, and that the proceedings were irregular; but the court decided that the inquiry should go on. The defendants relied on the above objections, and declined to make any other defence. Witnesses were examined, and finally the justices gave judgment as follows:—"The court is of opinion that, although the master could not, and the mate might not have seen the collision, both master and mate had almost immediate evidence that a collision had taken place, and that men were in the water. It also finds on the evidence that neither the mate before the master came on deck, nor the master afterwards, did render such assistance as was necessary and practicable to save the lives of the men from the danger caused by the collision, which could have been done without any danger to their own ship and crew. The court therefore orders their respective certificates to be, and they are hereby, suspended for the period of three calendar months from this date, Dec. 22nd, 1870." (c) ceedings have the same powers as if the same were a proceeding relating to an offence or cause of complaint upon which they . . . have power to make a summary conviction or order, or as near thereto as circumstances permit; and it shall be the duty of such officer or person as aforesaid to superintend the management of the case, and to render such assistance to the said justices . . . as is in his power; and upon the conclusion of the case the said justices . . . shall send a report to the Board of Trade, containing a full statement of the case and of their . . . opinion thereon, accompanied by such report of or extracts from the evidence, and such observations (if any) as they . . . may think fit." Sect. 434 gives the Board of Trade a power to appoint nautical assessors.

(b) 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, s. 33: "In every case of collision between two ships, it shall be the duty of the person in charge of each ship, if and so far as he can do so without danger to his own ship and crew, to render to the other ship, her master, crew, and passengers (if any) such assistance as may be practicable, and as may be necessary in order to save them from any danger caused by the collision; in case he fails so to do, and no reasonable cause for such failure is shown, the collision shall, in the absence of proof to the contrary, be deemed to have been caused by his wrongful act, neglect, or default; and such failure shall also, if proved upon any investigation held under the third or the eighth part of the principal Act, be deemed to be an act of misconduct or a default for which his certificate (if any) may be cancelled or suspended."

(c) By the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, s. 242, "The Board of Trade may suspend or cancel the certificate (whether of competency or service) of any master or mate in the following cases (that is to say), (1.) If upon any investigation made in pursuance of" sect. 241, "he is reported to be incompetent or to have been guilty of any gross act of misconduct, drunkenness, or tyranny; (2.) If upon any investigation conducted under the provisions contained in the eighth part of this Act . . . it is reported that the loss or abandonment of or serious damage to any ship or loss of life has been caused by his wrongful act or default. . . . Gainsford Bruce, in support of the motion.—It is clear that the proceedings were under sect. 241 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854. But as there is a local marine board at Sunderland, that board was the proper tribunal, and therefore the justices had not jurisdiction. On the facts proved before the justices, it was evident that no offence had been committed for which the certificates could be suspended or cancelled under sect. 242 of the Act of 1854; there was not any “gross act of misconduct” on the part of the master or mate. [BLACKBURN, J.—But was there not loss of life . . . caused by his wrongful act or default” within the terms of sub-sect. 2? Those words are comprehensive.] But the enactment, for a breach of which the justices proceeded to suspend the certificates, was the Amendment Act 1862, s. 33, which provides, that in cases of collision between two ships, one ship shall assist the other. The collision in this case, however, was not between two ships, but between one ship and a fishing boat. [BLACKBURN, J.—Then we must consider whether a coble is a ship, although I should have thought that the duty to save life ought to have been made the same in all cases.] The definition of the word “ship” is to be found in the interpretation clause of the Act of 1854: “every description of vessel used in navigation, not propelled by oars.” In Everard v. Kendal (22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 408; L. Rep. 5 C. P. 428), a dumb-barge, being a vessel propelled by oars only, was held not to be within the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Acts (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71; 32 & 33 Vict. c. 51). The Malvina (6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 369; Lush. Ad. Rep. 493), was a case of damage done by a ship to a barge, within the body of a county. But sect. 7 of the Admiralty quent time grant to any person whose certificate has been cancelled a new certificate of the same, or of any lower grade.” By the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, sect. 23, it is enacted that “. . . (1.) The power of cancelling or suspending the certificate of a master or mate by the 242nd section of the principal Act conferred on the Board of Trade shall . . . vest in and be exercised by the Local Marine Board, magistrates . . . or other court or tribunal by which the case is investigated or tried, and shall not in future vest or be exercised by the Board of Trade. . . . (3.) Every such board, court, or tribunal shall, at the conclusion of the case, or as soon afterwards as possible, state in open court the decision to which they may have come with respect to cancelling or suspending certificates, and shall in all cases send a full report upon the case, with the evidence to the Board of Trade, and shall also, if they determine to cancel or suspend any certificate, forward such certificate to the Board of Trade, with their report. (4.) It shall be lawful for the Board of Trade, if they think the justice of the case require it, to re-issue and return any certificate which has been cancelled or suspended, or shorten the time for which it is suspended, or grant a new certificate of the same, or any lower grade, in place of any certificate which has been cancelled or suspended. . . .”

(a.) Sect. 24: “Every master or mate . . . whose certificate is or is to be suspended or cancelled in pursuance of this Act shall, upon demand of the board, court, or tribunal by which the case is investigated or tried, deliver his certificate to them, or if it is not demanded by such board, court, or tribunal, shall, upon demand, deliver it to the Board of Trade, or as it directs, and in default shall for each offence incur a penalty not exceeding fifty pounds.”

Court Act 1861 declares expressly that the High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any cause of damage done by any ship. The Bilboa (3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 338; 1 Lush. 149) decided that “ship” means a vessel “not propelled by oars.” The coble was adapted for the use of oars, and they were ordinarily used in some part of her trip. A probable reason why such a vessel is decked over the forepart only is, that if the deck were carried further aft, it would prevent the men sitting on the thwarts to row. An open boat of this kind is not a ship in ordinary language. [BLACKBURN, J.—The Argo was “propelled by oars,” yet was always called a ship. LUSH, J.—Suppose this coble had been propelled by means of steam and a screw, she would then have been strictly within the definition given in the interpretation clause. BLACKBURN, J.—And sect. 19 is worthy of notice; it enacts that every British ship must be registered, except . . . “(2) Ships not exceeding fifteen tons burden, employed solely in navigation on the rivers or coasts of the United Kingdom,” &c., thereby clearly implying that a vessel under fifteen tons, not employed solely in navigation on the rivers or coasts, would be a ship.] Next, the master, who was asleep in his berth at the time of the collision, was not the “person in charge of the ship” within sect. 33. [BLACKBURN, J.—if he were not in fault at the moment of collision, yet, coming on deck afterwards, was in fault in not picking up the drowned men, he would be within the terms of the section.] The duty is cast upon the person in charge at the time of the collision.

Cave showed cause in the first instance, and was requested by the court to address them on two points only, viz.:—1. Whether or no the two justices were empowered finally to decide to suspend the certificates, or whether their duty was not confined to making a report to the Board of Trade, who would have power if the judgment were too harsh to make it less so? 2. Whether sect. 33 is not limited to collision between two ships, and whether a coble like the one in question is a ship? and, further, whether it was not a ship which drowned the men, no matter whether they were on board or not?—Confining the argument to those points, it is to be observed in the first place that the power of cancelling the certificates was given to the Board of Trade by the Act of 1854, s. 242, after an investigation had been ordered, and held under sect. 241, and the results reported. But by sect. 23 of the Amendment Act 1862, the power of cancelling or suspending certificates was in all instances transferred to the local tribunal by which the case is investigated. And an express power of cancelling or suspending certificates for an offence under sect. 33 is given by that section. Secondly, it was necessary that the justices should determine whether this coble was a “ship” before they proceeded on sect. 33, and it must be assumed that their decision was right. For a vessel to be within the words of the interpretation clause (sect. 2), of the Act of 1854, oars must be the principal means of propulsion, and not merely secondary means or auxiliary to sails. In part 3 of the same Act, s. 109, sub-sects. 1 and 2, the Legislature treats fishing vessels as “ships” within the meaning of the Act. Then the Amendment Act 1862, s. 25, enacts that certain regulations concerning lights, &c., contained in table C in the schedule, shall come into operation. Turning to that table a clause is found

[Q.B.]

(art. 9), providing that "open fishing boats and other open boats shall not be required to carry such lights provided for other vessels," &c. And sect. 27 enacts that all owners and masters shall be bound to take notice of all such regulations; . . . and in case of wilful default the master or owner of the ship . . ." shall be deemed to be guilty of a misdemeanor. So there fishing vessels and boats are apparently included under the term "ship." Now unless the master of a fishing vessel or boat is master of a "ship," he is not bound to carry a light. [LUSH, J.—Sect. 29 assists that view.] Moreover, by sect. 30, surveyors appointed by the Board of Trade have power to inspect any "ships" for the purpose of seeing that such ships are properly provided with lights. It would be strange if they were not at liberty to inspect fishing vessels and boats. The conclusion to be drawn from the wording of these sections is, that the Legislature intended that fishing vessels and boats should be included in the word "ship." If so, the justices who were assisted by nautical assessors, and who heard the testimony of many witnesses, have come to the right conclusion.

Gainsford Bruce, in reply, referred to The Sea Fisheries Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 45). s. 5.

BLACKBURN, J.—I think we must discharge this rule, on the ground that the justices seem to have had jurisdiction, and that all they did was perfectly right. The original Merchant Shipping Act of 1854 provided, by its third part, for a variety of matters, and, amongst other things, it was enacted that where there was an offence charged against a master, &c., the Board of Trade should investigate; and then sect. 242 enacted that "the Board of Trade may suspend or cancel the certificate (whether of competency or service) of any master or mate in the following cases, that is to say, (1) If upon any investigation the master is reported . . . to have been guilty of any gross act of misconduct; . . . (2) If, upon any investigation conducted under the provisions contained in the eighth part of the Act, 'it is reported that the loss or abandonment of, or serious damage to, any ship, or loss of life has been caused by his wrongful act or default;' then (5) If, upon any investigation made by any court or tribunal authorised . . . to make inquiry into charges of incompetency or misconduct on the part of masters or mates of ships, or as to shipwrecks or other casualties affecting ships, a report is made by such court or tribunal to the effect that he has been guilty of any gross act of misconduct, drunkenness, or tyranny, or that the loss or abandonment of, or serious damage to, any ship or loss of life has been caused by his wrongful act or default . . ." Now, in all those cases, the Board of Trade is to cancel the certificate, not only if the inquiries are made when a charge has been preferred against the man, but also when a report has been made to the board in proceedings under the eighth part of the Act. Turning to that division of the Act, we find sect. 432 provides inter alia that: "Whenever, by reason of any casualty happening to, or on board of any ship on or near the coasts of the United Kingdom, loss of life ensued, . . . it shall be lawful for the inspecting officer of the coast guard, or the principal officer of customs residing at or near the place where such . . . casualty occurred, . . . or for any other person appointed for the purpose by the Board of Trade, to make inquiry respecting such . . . casualty." Then by sect. 433: "If it appears to such officer or person as aforesaid, that a formal investigation is requisite or expedient, or if the Board of Trade so directs, he is to apply to two justices to hear the case." They are merely to hold an investigation as here, and report to the Board of Trade. And sect. 438 enacts that "such justices . . . may . . . require any master or mate possessing a certificate of competency or service, whose conduct is called in question or appears to them, . . . likely to be called in question in the course of such investigation" (it being quite sufficient if they bring him before them, and the matter arises in the course of the investigation) "to deliver such certificate to them . . . and they . . . shall hold the certificate so delivered until the conclusion of the investigation, and shall then either return the same to such master or mate, or if their report is such as to enable the Board of Trade to cancel or suspend such certificate under the powers given to such board by the third part of this Act, shall forward the same to the Board of Trade to be dealt with as such board thinks fit." Under the Act of 1854, therefore, the Board of Trade had power to cancel if the report on the investigation was such as to enable them to do so. But under Part eight the justices had not power in themselves to cancel the certificates, but only to forward them to the Board of Trade, who had power to cancel them. Then, by the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), it is provided (sect. 23, sub-sect. 1), that "the power of cancelling or suspending the certificate of a master or mate by the 242nd section of the principal Act conferred on the Board of Trade shall . . . vest in and be exercised by the local marine board, magistrates, naval court, admiralty court, or other court or tribunal by which the case is investigated or tried, and shall not in future vest in or be exercised by the Board of Trade;" so that the power given to the Board of Trade to cancel, which was the only power which enabled them to do so, is there taken away, which was clearly no oversight, for the Legislature, remembering that the certificate would be sent up to the Board of Trade, provided expressly by the 4th sub-section of sect. 23 that "it shall be lawful for the Board of Trade, if they think the justice of the case requires it, to reissue and return any certificate which has been cancelled or suspended, or shorten the time for which it is suspended, or grant a new certificate of the same or any lower grade in place of any certificate which has been cancelled or suspended," thereby giving full and complete power to review and reverse any sentence that might seem to the board too harsh or severe. Now, applying the above provision to the facts of the present case, it seems that this steamship did come into contact with the coble (which, I think, is a ship within the meaning of the Act), and in consequence of the collision there was loss of life to the crew of the coble, and therefore the calamity was a case of a "ship occasioning loss to another," and also a "casualty occasioning loss of life." It was a casualty to both vessels, although there was a loss of life in the fishing boat exclusively. Clearly it was a case to be investigated under the eighth part of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and it was properly sent to two justices. Now, the power of suspending or cancelling certificates is expressly declared to vest in the magistrates. It therefore vested in, and was correctly exercised by them. Then there is a question arising upon the terms of the 33rd section of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, which are these: [Reads it.] What then the justices have found and said in effect is this: "The fishing vessel was a ship. There was a collision between the two ships. The two men, master, and mate of the steamer, were in fault in not saving life." Whether the justices were right on the facts is not a question for us. If they came to too harsh a conclusion the Board of Trade can review and mitigate their sentence. But it is argued that the fishing vessel cannot be called a ship. She is 24ft. long, is only partly decked, has two masts, which may be struck, and sails. It is shown that she is fitted for and propelled by oars, but that the oars are only used in calms, or on occasions of difficulty arising from adverse winds or in tending the nets. Yet, notwithstanding all that, it is said, she is not a ship. Let us next consider the argument on the interpretation clause of the Act of 1854, s. 2, the material part of which runs thus: "Ship shall include every description of vessel used in navigation not propelled by oars." Now these words have been regarded as if they exclusively applied to such and such things. But we must take it that if a ship is shown to be a ship, she shall be deemed to be a ship within the Act, whatever her character may be. Most of these small vessels often go far out to wrecks, and it would be monstrous to say they are not themselves ships so as to be within the protection of the Merchant Shipping Act. As to the oars, it must be remembered that vessels such as those which came over in the Armada with a thousand men on board, were "propelled by oars" worked by hundreds of slaves. Yet could it be said they were not ships? My own definition would be this, viz., "Every vessel that substantially goes to sea is a ship." I do not mean to say that every little boat that goes a mile or two outside a harbour is a ship, but if it carries on the business of going to sea, then I deem it to be a ship, although it may be propelled by oars like the vessel in question. The Act would take in the case of river steamers if the absence of oars were the test of a 'ship;' yet they never go to sea. But I repeat, whenever the vessel is substantially a seagoing vessel, whether it be decked or not decked, it would be a ship, and as such would be brought within the Act, if mine is the right definition. No one can doubt that this coble was a ship, although of only ten tons, and twenty-four feet long, when it was accustomed to go from twenty to thirty miles out to sea almost entirely by sails, and to stay out many hours. I should think it impossible to say that the justices were wrong in coming to the conclusion that this was a seagoing vessel, and consequently a ship, without reference to the interpretation clauses. Then, as there was a collision between two ships, and default in the master of one in not saving the crew of the other, there is an offence within the terms of the Act. The other conclusion—that if the ship run down was a fishing-boat, the master of the other vessel would be free from blame or liability—would be simply monstrous. So that point also fails.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. For the purpose of deciding this case it was necessary to go through a multitude of references which require considerable attention. But it would be a work of supererogation to go through them seriatim, because my brother Blackburn has not only shown very clearly how the matter stands, but he has put a reasonable construction on them in which I agree. In the conclusion he has arrived at with regard to the word "ship" I entirely concur. It was not, so to speak, the place of the Act of Parliament to limit the definition of that word, and I also think the rule must be discharged.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion, and have nothing to add to what my brother Blackburn has said.

Rule discharged.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT.

EASTERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK.

THE STEAMSHIP WESTPHALIA.

Collision in a fog—Steamship and brig—Speed—Fog horn.

Where a steamship, bound to the westward, in the English Channel, when off the Casketts, and ten miles therefrom, was running at a speed of eight or nine knots an hour in a dense fog;

Held, that the rate of speed was unlawful.

A steamer in a dense fog is bound to go as slow as it is possible for her to go and maintain steerage way.

In the locality mentioned the omission of a sailing vessel in a dense fog to sound her fog horn until she heard the whistle of a steamer quite near, was great neglect on her part. The horn should be continually sounded from the moment fog sets in.

BENEDICT, J.—This action is brought to recover of the steamship Westphalia for the damages occasioned by the sinking of the Norwegian brig Procis, in a collision which occurred between these two vessels in the daytime on the 9th July last, off the Casketts in the English Channel. The brig was sailing N. by E., close-hauled, with a very light breeze—just enough to move her through the water. The Westphalia was steering to westward, bound from Havre to New York. The sea was calm. The evidence on the part of the steamship shows that at half-past twelve o'clock, when the watch changed and the second officer took his station on the bridge, the weather showed signs of fog, which by one o'clock shut in so thick that objects could not be seen at any considerable distance. The look-out and wheel were then doubled, the passengers, of which some one hundred were on deck, directed to keep quiet, and orders given to whistle every fifteen seconds. At one o'clock p.m. the captain, having first slowed the speed of the steamer, went on the bridge and there remained. No vessel was seen or heard by those on the steamship until a few minutes after 2 p.m., when the look-outs reported a vessel right ahead, which proved to be the brig Procis, then from 150 to 160 feet distant, presenting her starboard side to the steamship and moving very slowly. The engine of the steamship was at once stopped and reversed and the wheel hove hard apart, but the vessels were in contact before the steamship could be stopped, or her course materially changed. The brig was struck by her fore-rigging and sank almost immediately. Fortunately, however, all her crew were saved, being picked up in the water by the boats of the steamer. Some eleven witnesses from the steamer have been examined, who substantially concur as to the facts above stated, and all say that no fog-horn was heard, nor was any notice given by the brig until she was seen right under the steamer's bows and outcries were heard from her crew. On the part of the brig it is shown that she was closehauled, going about half a mile an hour with all her sails set; that she had a man at the lookout and a man at the wheel; that the mate and captain were in the cabin engaged in working out the ship's position until nearly 2 p.m., when they came on deck, and shortly after the steamer's whistle was heard; whereupon the mate at once blew the fog-horn, answering the blasts of the steamer's whistle, and also blowing between the whistles, until the steamship came out of the fog close upon them and almost immediately ran them down. The faults charged against the steamship are that she was running at too high speed in such a fog, and that she ported her helm instead of starboarding when the brig was seen. On the part of the claimants it is contended that the steamer was running at a proper speed, with all possible caution; that the brig was seen at the earliest possible moment and all efforts made to avoid her, but it was then impossible; and that the sole cause of the collision was the omission of those on the brig to notify the steamer of their presence by blowing a fog-horn. Upon the proofs, I consider it clear that the steamship was not in fault for porting when she did instead of starboarding, but that she was in fault for running at a speed of nine or ten knots an hour in a dense fog. There is some evidence tending to show that the speed of the steamer before she was slowed by the captain was thirteen miles an hour over the ground, but that she had a tide with her running some three knots, making her speed through the water ten knots, which was reduced three knots when she was slowed; and in this way it is claimed that her speed through the water was only seven knots. The more reliable evidence is, however, to the effect that she was running from eight to ten knots an hour through the water when the brig was seen. The log showed the speed through the water, and the man who hove it says she was running ten knots. The captain says at that time, "she was running about eight to nine miles, I believe," and I notice that the log-book which would show the marking of the log, although called for, is not produced, nor is the engineer called as a witness, nor is his absence accounted for. Such a rate of speed in such a fog is unlawful. Indeed, a speed of seven knots could not be justified. I have not overlooked the testimony which has been introduced to show that this steamer which was sailing to the west, the tide, as she claims, running with her three miles an hour, at a distance of ten miles or more off the Casketts, in the English Channel, and which stopped for half-an-hour to pick up the crew of the brig, was compelled, in order to keep her course, to maintain a speed of seven or eight knots under all circumstances, owing, as it is said, to the strong currents of the locality; but this testimony has failed to convince me that such is the fact. I know that the steamer would answer her helm more quickly when going at eight or ten knots than at six, but she could not stop so quickly, and in such a dense fog she was bound to be going as slow as it was possible for her to go consistent with steerage-way, in order to enable her to stop in proper time. This, I am satisfied she was not doing, and for the omission I held her in fault. There remains to consider the fault charged upon the brig, that she omitted to blow her fog-horn. It cannot be doubted upon the evidence that no horn was heard by those upon the steamer. The precautions taken on the steamer indicate a state of watchfulness and render it difficult to understand how a horn could fail to have been heard, if blown, while, on the other hand, to hold that a horn was not blown is to disregard the positive evidence of six different witnesses from the brig, who testify affirmatively to the fact that their horn was blown. Moreover, the brig had a man on the lookout and a man at the wheel. She was in a dangerous locality, enveloped in a dense fog, and under such circumstances it seems hardly possible that a steamer's whistle would not have attracted their attention, even if it did not even occasion alarm. The master and mate were also on deck part of the time of the fog, and all say that the whistle did attract their attention, and that it was at once replied to by the horn. To omit that signal would be to greatly increase their peril, and no reason can be assigned for such an omission. It seems impossible, therefore, upon the evidence, to hold that the horn was not blown when the whistle was heard. But it is admitted that the horn was not blown until the whistle was heard, which was some time after the fog set in and when the steamer was quite near. The evidence for the brig, that the whistle was heard from three to five times, only shows this. The evidence of the number of times the horn was blown tends to show the same thing. According to the account given by the libellants themselves, therefore, the steamship was running within hearing distance of the brig for some minutes before the horn was blown, the fog being then very thick. To omit sounding the horn until they heard something, when in such a fog and in that locality, was great neglect. The horn should have been continually sounded from the moment the fog set in. It is true that when the horn was sounded it was not heard on the steamer, owing, it may perhaps be, to some passing current of air which carried the sound away; but it cannot be inferred from that circumstance that if blown when the steamer first came within hearing distance it would not then have been heard. The presumption must be that it would have been heard at that time. My conclusion therefore is, that this is a case of fault in both the colliding vessels—the fault in the steamer being that of running at too high speed in a thick fog; on the part of the brig, that of omitting to blow the horn from the time the fog set in, instead of from the time of hearing the steamer's whistle at no very great distance. I cannot dismiss the case without remarking, in addition, that if the not very unreasonable supposition be made that the witnesses for the brig, in their zeal for their own vessel and their own case, have been led to over-estimate and over-state the time which elapsed between hearing the whistle and the collision, the failure of those on the steamer to hear the horn would be explained. Under such an hypothesis the case would show the master and mate remaining in the cabin while the vessel was in a thick fog and coming out at the last moment only to find the steamer upon them. The horn blown at that time would naturally be unnoticed on the steamer in the excitement attendant upon the discovery of the brig close under their bows. But this hypothesis would impute to the lookout and man at the wheel of the brig, who were both on deck from the commencement of the fog, such an extraordinary neglect of duty—such disregard of their own personal safety even—and be so greatly opposed to the whole tenor of the evidence given for the brig, that I hesitate to adopt it as the explanation of the case but rest my decision on the other grounds above stated. This being a case of mutual fault, the damages will of course be apportioned. Let decrees be entered accordingly, and a reference ordered to ascertain the amount due to the libellants.

SUPREME COURT OF MISSOURI.

March Term, 1870.

THE PHENIX INSURANCE COMPANY (apps.) v. COPELIN (resp.)

THE BENTON (ss.)

Marine insurance—Abandonment—When justifiable—Expense of repairs—Partial or total loss—Ship stranded.

On Nov. 3, 1865, a steamship, when proceeding down the Missouri, was driven by a violent wind upon a large snag with such violence that the snag went through her into her hull, making a large hole, from which she soon filled with water. She was run upon a bar and attempts made to raise her, but without success. She was twisted and in danger of breaking in two. On the 21st the plaintiff, considering the ship a total loss, gave notice of abandonment. The defendants, on the 27th, raised her; she was repaired and tendered to the plaintiff on the 9th May, 1866. The actual repairs cost 1764dols. 76c.: the expense of raising her was 12,132dols. 82c. When tendered to the plaintiff she was worth 12,000dols.; her valuation in the policy was 45,000dols.:

Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover for a total loss.

When it appears that by proper exertions a stranded vessel might have been got off and been fully repaired at a moderate cost, the abandonment is void, and a partial loss only can be recovered; and to warrant the recovery of a total loss it must be proved that the delivery of the vessel from the peril was, upon reasonable grounds, judged to be impracticable.

The right to abandon must be determined by the judgment of experts, applied to the condition of the vessel at the time of abandonment.

The owners of a vessel are not bound to receive her from the underwriters if there is any material deficiency in the repairs. She must be as good as she was before, and be returned within a reasonable time.

If the underwriter takes possession of the ship, although under protest, and gets her off and repairs her, it is an acceptance of the abandonment if he does not return her in a reasonable time.

THIS was an appeal.

WAGNER, J.—This was an action brought upon a policy of insurance against the underwriter in favour of the plaintiffs, by which the steamboat Benton was insured for 5000dols. for one year, commencing on the 26th March 1865. The policy is in the usual form of marine insurance. The evidence in the case tends to show that on the morning of the 3rd Nov. 1865, while the Benton was descending the Missouri River, a number of miles above Omaha, she was driven by a heavy wind upon a large snag with such violence that the snag went through her into her hull, making a large hole, from which she soon filled with water, and that she was run upon a bar as far as possible. That her officers immediately erected pumps and bulkheads, and commenced pumping and used their best efforts to raise her, and that they worked for several days without success. That all the time the water was washing out from under midships and her bow, that her bow was settling down. She was in a bad condition, being twisted, and in danger of breaking in two. While in this condition the officers concluded that they could only save her machinery, and that all the balance would be a total loss. These facts they telegraphed to the plaintiff, at St. Louis, and received instructions from him, and they say from the defendant also, to proceed to wreck her as the only means of saving anything. The weather at that time was cold, and the river about closing with ice; that on the 21st Nov. the defendant took possession of the boat or wreck for the purpose of raising or repairing her, and restoring her to the plaintiff; that on that day, as plaintiff considered her a total loss, he made a formal written abandonment of her to defendants; that on the 27th Nov. defendant succeeded in raising the hull, as the river had fallen very much in the mean time. Defendant started with her for St. Louis on the 20th March 1866, being prevented from going earlier, as alleged, on account of the ice, and she arrived at that port on the 12th April thereafter. She was then put upon the docks to be repaired, and on the 9th May 1866, she was tendered to the plaintiff, six months after the loss, and two after the expiration of the policy. The actual repairs cost 1754dols. 76c., and the expense of raising her was 12,132dols. 82c., and she was worth when tendered to the plaintiff 12,000dols. only, her valuation in the policy being 45,000. There was further evidence going to show that defendant did not use proper diligence in making the repairs, and that the repairs could all have been done that were done, within four days after the boat reached St. Louis. That the defendant did not repair the injury done by the sinking, and that he well knew this—that, in fact, it would have cost from five to six thousand dollars additional to have repaired the boat and put her in substantially as good condition as she was when she struck the snag, and that she was not properly repaired or tendered within a reasonable time. The case was tried before the court, and upon certain declarations of law the verdict was for plaintiff. Without particularly, or in detail noticing the instructions given for the respondent, we will simply state the law as we understand it in regard to the question of abandonment. In Norton v. The Lexington Fire, Life, and Marine Insurance Company, (16 Ill. 235) the court, after a very free discussion of the subject, say that the right to abandon must be determined by the judgment of experts, applied to the condition of the vessel at the time of abandonment; and although the cost of saving and repairing the vessel after her abandonment may be less than 50 per cent., yet, if at the time the facts apparently justified an abandonment, it will be good. In Ruckman v. Merchants Louisville Insurance Company (5 Duer 36), Duer, J., a very high authority on the law of insurance, declares in the opinion, that, "the true principle upon which the whole doctrine of abandonment may be said to rest, and by which alone its application, in converting a partial into a total loss can be justified, is that which in the leading case of Anderson v. Wallis (2 M. & S. 240) is stated by Lord Ellenborough, with his accustomed brevity and force. It is, that an abandonment is never to be authorized, except when, at the time, the loss was actually total, or in the highest degree probable; and if we analyze the cases that have settled the law that now prevails in England, we should find that it is this principle that runs through, explains and justifies them all. To select an example from each class of cases: When the vessel insured is captured, there is an actual total loss; but, as she may be recaptured or restored, an abandonment is necessary to warrant its recovery; a title must be vested in the insurers to give them the benefit of the spes recuperandi. But when the vessel is stranded, the question whether the loss shall be deemed partial, or so far total as to warrant an abandonment, will depend upon the nature and extent of the peril in which the vessel is involved, and the probable difficulty, hazard, and expense of attempting to deliver and repair her. When it appears that by proper exertions she might have been gotten off, and have been fully repaired at a moderate cost, the abandonment is void, and a partial loss only can be recovered; and to warrant the recovery of a total loss, it must be proved that the delivery of the vessel from the peril was, upon reasonable grounds, judged to be impracticable, or not to be effected unless at an expense that would absorb her value. In other words it must be proved that a loss actually total was in the highest degree probable: (Fontaine v. Phoenix Insurance Company, 11 John. 295; The Sarah Ann, 2 Sumn. 255.) Judge Story distinctly announces the rule, that in case of stranding, the course an owner uninsured, in the exercise of his best judgment, would have followed, furnishes the correct test of the right of the assured to abandon: (The Sarah Ann, 2 Sumn., sup.) Chancellor Walworth in the case of the American Insurance Company v. Ogden (20 Wend. 302), holds the same doctrine, and there would seem to be no reason why the same test might not, with equal justice, be applied to every case in which an absolute right to abandon is not established by conclusive proof that the cost of repairs would have exceeded the value. The matter resolves itself into a question of fact, and must be determined by the jury upon the evidence before them. By the application of these principles we cannot say that there was sufficient error in the first of the instructions given to justify a reversal. Although they are subject to some verbal criticism, yet they are substantially correct. But the greatest objection is made to the instructions given by the court which in effect declared, that if the defendant on or about the 21st Nov. 1865 took possession of said boat with a view of raising and repairing her and retained her till the 9th May 1866, before offering to return her to the plaintiff, and that she never was repaired as required by the terms of the policy, and that the defendant and his agents knew that she was not so repaired, and that it would have required a large additional sum of money to have been expended upon her, to have put her in such repair, and that if the written notice of abandonment given by plaintiff was served on the defendant on the 22nd Nov. 1865, then the plaintiff was entitled to recover. Another instruction in substance told the jury that if the repairs could have been reasonably made in a much shorter time, and that the boat was not repaired and tendered in a reasonable time, then the verdict should be for the plaintiff. It seems to be well settled that the owners of a vessel are not bound to receive her from the underwriters, if there is any material deficiency in the repairs. She must be made as good as she was before. As to the return of the vessel within a reasonable time, the cases lay down a uniform rule. I have seen but one authority denying the proposition, and that is an adjudication of an inferior court. In Norton et al. v. The Lexington Fire, Life, and Marine Insurance Company, (sup.), it is held, that if after an abandonment, the underwriter takes possession of the vessel although he does it under protest, and gets her off and repairs her, no matter at how small or great a cost, it is an acceptance of the abandonment, if he does not return her in a reasonable time. This principle was first announced in Peele v. The Suffolk Insurance Company (7 Peck. 254) where it was explicitly adjudged that unless the repairs are made within a reasonable time, the insurer forfeits his right to return the vessel and he must be considered as having accepted the abandonment. In this last case the reason for the rule is thus stated by Parker, C. J.: "But the underwriter has his duties as well as his rights; if he took the vessel into his possession to repair her, he must do it as expeditiously as possible, in order that the voyage, if it be not completed, may not be destroyed. If he delay the repairs beyond a reasonable time, he forfeits his right to return the ship, and must be considered as taking her to himself under the offer to abandon. This principle cannot well be contested; without it, the underwriters may keep the assured entirely uncertain in regard to his rights and interests, and put his property in jeopardy. The right of the insurer to take into his custody the vessel of the assured without his consent, except under the abandonment, cannot exist without the correlative duty to keep her as short a time as possible under the circumstances in which she may be placed." The same principle is again affirmed in Reynolds v. Ocean Insurance Company (1 Met. 160), and in the case between the same parties in 22 Pich. 191. We are also informed by the counsel for the respondent that the principle has recently been examined and approved in the Supreme Court of the United States, but the decision has not been published, and we have not yet seen it. The only case that we have seen that controverts the above authorities is the Marine Dock and Mutual Insurance Company v. Goodman, decided in the Mobile Court of Chancery, and published in 4 Am. Law. Reg. 481. This case is not sufficient to overcome the great weight of authority arrayed against it, and its reasoning does not commend itself to our approbation. We see nothing objectionable in the action of the court in the matter of giving and refusing instruction on behalf of the appellant. Our conclusion is that the judgment should be affirmed. The other judges concur.

COURT OF ADMIRALTY.

THE NUOVA RAFFAELINA.

JOHN JAPP AND JOSEPH KIRBY (apps.) v. FRANCISCO DURANTE (resp.)

Claim arising out of the use or hire of a ship—Broker's commission—32 & 33 Vict. c. 51, s. 2, sub-sect. 1—Jurisdiction of County Court.
A charter-party made between captain and charterers contained a clause providing for payment of commission to broker for negotiating charter.
Held, that the broker could not sue in rem under 32 & 33 Vict. c. 51, s. 2, sub-sect. 1, as he was not a party to the charter.

This was an appeal from a decision of the learned Assessor of the Liverpool Court of Passage.

On the 3rd Dec. 1870, a cause for a claim alleged to arise out of an agreement made in relation to the use or hire of a ship, namely, for the sum of 87l. 14s. 9d., for commission on the effecting by a charter-party of the ship Nuova Raffaelina of the appellants for the respondent, dated the 14th Nov. 1870, was instituted in the Court of Passage of the borough of Liverpool under the provisions of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, and the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869, on behalf of the plaintiffs (now appellants), against the ship Nuova Raffaelina and the master and owner of the said ship the above-named defendant (now respondent).

On the 7th Dec. the defendant served the plaintiffs with notice of a motion that the said cause might be dismissed on the ground that the claim of the plaintiffs was not a claim arising out of any agreement made in relation to the use or hire of any ship within the meaning of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869, and that the said claim was not enforceable by proceedings in rem or in personam or otherwise within the Admiralty jurisdiction of the said Court of Passage.

The learned judge dismissed the cause on the ground that under the 32 and 33 Vict. c. 51, s. 2, sub-sect. 1 (a) the court had no jurisdiction over the subject matter of the claim. By the charter-party made between Captain Durante (the respondent) and Messrs. Shute and Hamilton, the charterers, it was stipulated thus: 2½ per cent. commission is due on the execution of this charter-party to Japp and Kirby, Liverpool (ship lost or not lost), by whom the ship is to be reported at the Custom House on her arrival at Liverpool, or by their agents, if at any other port of discharge. It was for this amount of commission that the plaintiffs had instituted their suit.

Charles Russell for the appellants.—The question is whether the plaintiffs' claim arises out of the agreement contained in the charter-party. It was contended by the other side in the court below that the words of the section could only mean that the claim must be one between the shipowner and the charterers, or vice versa, and could not extend to a collateral claim not directly arising under the agreement itself. But even if this were so, I should contend that this claim did directly arise out of the agreement. A large jurisdiction was given to the Court of Admiralty by 24 Vict. c. 10, but, nevertheless, it is reasonable to suppose that the Legislature, by 32 and 33 Vict. c. 51, intended to give a larger power than existed under that statute. Further, having, by 24 Vict. c. 10, given a remedy by process in rem for necessaries supplied to foreign ships, it is not unreasonable to conclude that the Legislature intended to give a similar remedy in a contract of this kind. Here is a foreign ship in the port of Liverpool without any owners in this country. Before it can be turned to any account in the earning of freight shipbrokers must be employed. Their claim to commission arises, therefore, directly out of the agreement and is within the Act.

Gainsford Bruce, for the respondent.—First, the right to commission does not arise under the charter-party; secondly, if it did, it is still not a claim arising out of an agreement relating to the hire of a ship within the meaning of the Act. (1) There is no agreement contained in the charter-party made by any person on behalf of the ship to pay commission to the broker. The broker is no party to the agreement. If he is entitled to commission it arises out of a distinct agreement. (2) The words in the Act must be interpreted, not in all their latitude, but must have a meaning attached to them in accordance with the general scope of the Act. In the case of the Dowse (22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 627; L. Rep. 3 Adm. 135), the claim was for necessaries, and the only question before the court was "Is it a claim for necessaries?" and the court said, "No." The court put a limited meaning on the words. The Legislature must have intended these words to be qualified to some extent when it is considered that the power given by the Act may be exercised in rem. It is unreasonable to suppose that any claim having any relation, however remote, to an agreement relating to the hire of a ship, is a claim for which a ship may be arrested. [Sir R. PHILLMORE.—There is a stipulation for the commission in the charter-party. Do you say that if the charterers had brought the action, they would have had no locus standi?] That would be a different case. [Sir R. PHILLMORE.—Your objection rather goes to the name of the plaintiffs. It is a claim under a charter-party which charter-party relates to the use and hire of the ship. You say it is an agreement not competent to the particular party to put in force.] I should say that it is an agreement in the charter-party which could not be enforced by anybody. An agreement to pay commission is not sufficiently connected with the carriage of goods in a ship to come within the clause of the Act of Parliament. The broker may have his remedy for work and labour. [Russell.—The ships pays commission in the absence of a contract to the contrary.] The claim exists independently of the charter-party. It is the nature of the claim which the court must look at. Brokerage has no relation to the carriage of goods.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 25. Sir R. PHILLMORE.—This is an appeal from the Court of Passage at Liverpool under 32 & 33 Vict. c. 51. The learned judge of that court, without assigning any reasons, decided that he had no jurisdiction to entertain the case. I regret that I have not the benefit of knowing the grounds on which he proceeded. The point to be decided is, whether the present plaintiffs, who are ship brokers, are entitled to sue in rem in the Admiralty Court for their commission under the following circumstances:—On the 14th Nov 1870, a charter-party was entered into between the captain of the Nuova Raffaëlina, and certain Liverpool merchants and charterers. In the penultimate clause of that charter-party it is stated that “ $\frac{2}{3}$ per cent. commission is due on the execution of this charter-party to Japp and Kirby.” The present plaintiffs and appellants. It is contended that Japp and Kirby may sue for this commission in the Court of Passage by reason of the following words in 32 & 33 Vict. c. 51, s. 2. Any County Court with admiralty jurisdiction may try a cause, “as to any claim arising out of any agreement made in relation to the use or hire of any ship.” I have not now to consider whether if the charterers were suing for the commission in question they would not be entitled to do so. It is very possible that under the authority of Robertson v. Wait (22 L. J. Ex. 209), they might have a locus standi as trustees for the broker for this purpose. I am inclined to think that if they were so suing on the charter-party the claim might be considered as arising out of the use or hire of the ship. But the appellant, who is the broker, cannot sue upon this instrument made between other parties, whatever use he might make of it as evidence in another action upon an implied contract for his services. As the jurisdiction of the Court of Passage must in this case be founded upon a claim growing out of the charter party, a claim which I have said the broker cannot maintain, I must, for the reasons which I have stated, and those only, dismiss the appeal, with costs.

THE INDUSTRIE.

Damage—Where no collision—Jurisdiction.

This court has jurisdiction where damage has been done or received by a ship, although there may not have been any collision between two or more ships. The vessel B. B., coming up the channel to H. on a dark morning, was compelled suddenly to port her helm by reason of the vessel I. being discovered across the fair way of the channel without any light exhibited, in consequence of this manœuvre the B. B. took the ground, and though her anchor was let go, dragged it and drove against the town wall of H., suffering damage:

Held (on motion to strike out articles of the answer, denying the jurisdiction and the relevancy of the petition alleging these facts), that the court had jurisdiction to entertain the action, and that a good ground of action had been disclosed.

By general maritime law those in charge of a ship aground at night in the fair way of a navigable channel are bound to take proper means to avoid other vessels of her position.

This was a cause of damage instituted on behalf of the owners of the brig Blue Bell against the vessel Industrie. The following are the material allegations contained in the petition.

1. On the 11th Oct. 1870 the brig Blue Bell, of the burthen of 191 tons register or thereabouts, navigated by Benjamin Dickenson and a crew of six hands, sailed from Shoreham in ballast bound to Hartlepool.

2. Shortly after five a.m. of the 16th of the said month the Blue Bell, in the prosecution of her said voyage, was in the channel leading to the harbour at Hartlepool, proceeding under close-reefed fore-topsail and fore-topmast staysail only, steering N.W. and by N. half N., and making about seven or eight knots an hour, with the Admiralty regulation lamps, to wit, a green lamp on the starboard side, and a red lamp on the port side, duly exhibited and burning brightly, and a good look-out was being kept from on board her.

3. The morning at this time was dark, the tide was flood and of the force of about one knot an hour, and the wind was a gale from S.S.W.

4. Whilst the Blue Bell was proceeding under the circumstances aforesaid, the lights of two steam-tugs were seen ahead towards the W. side of the channel. The Blue Bell approached to pass astern of the said two steam tugs, there being room sufficient for her to do so; but whilst so doing, a vessel, which proved to be the Industrie—the vessel proceeded against in this cause—and which had not any light exhibited, was made out ahead at the distance of about fifty yards from the Blue Bell. The helm of the Blue Bell was then ported; but as soon as this had been done, it was discovered that the Industrie was across the channel, and that the Blue Bell was in imminent danger of running into the side of the Industrie, and doing that vessel and herself considerable injury. The helm of the Blue Bell was put hard aport to avoid running against the Industrie, and thereby the Blue Bell succeeded in avoiding the Industrie, but in so doing, the Blue Bell was compelled to go out of the fair way of the channel, and in consequence thereof she took the ground close under the bows of the Industrie, and although the anchor of the Blue Bell was immediately let go, and her topsail furled, she dragged her anchor and drove against the Hartlepool town wall, and thereby sustained serious damage, and also did damage to the said wall.

5. The said damage to the Blue Bell, and the losses of the plaintiffs by reason thereof, were occasioned by the negligence of those on board, or in charge of, the Industrie, in having got that vessel across the fair way, and in leaving her there without any light exhibited, or other measures taken to warn other vessels of her position.

6. The measures taken by the Blue Bell to avoid coming into collision with the Industrie were proper, and were necessary for that purpose, and after taking such measures, those on board the Blue Bell were unable to prevent the Blue Bell from taking the ground and striking the said wall, and suffering the damage aforesaid.

7. The said damage to the Blue Bell was occasioned by the negligence of those on board or in charge of the Industrie, and not by any negligence of those on board the Blue Bell.

An answer was filed by the proctor for the owners of the Industrie, which contained, inter alia, the following articles: First, the said proctor submits that this court has not jurisdiction in respect of the matter or things alleged by the plaintiffs in their petition herein. If this court has or shall have jurisdiction, then he further says; secondly, the allegations contained in the said petition are irrelevant. No damage is shown to have been or was in fact done by the Industrie to the brig Blue Bell in the petition mentioned.

E. C. Clarkson.—The petition discloses a good ground of action. The Blue Bell in the exercise of proper caution and prudence, was compelled to port to avoid running into the Industrie, and the direct consequence of this manœuvre was the driving of the Blue Bell against the wall. When through the negligence of another, persons are compelled to adopt a dangerous alternative and suffer injury thereby, liability attaches to the party guilty of negligence, though not the direct causa causans: (Jones v. Boyce, 1 Stark.) The court has jurisdiction to entertain this action. It is not necessary, to found the jurisdiction in a cause of damage, that the plaintiff's vessel should come into collision with the wrongdoer, or that there should be a collision between two ships.

The court has jurisdiction in this case as part of the ancient jurisdiction of this court, and also under the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6, and the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 10, s. 7.

Phillimore, contra.—There is no good cause of action here. It is necessary that there should be some default on the part of the defendants amounting to negligence in law to support the action:

Adams v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company, L. Rep. 4 C. P. 739; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 850; 38 L. J. 277, C. P.;

But here the Industrie was under no obligation to exhibit a light. She was neither under way nor at anchor. The law imposes no duty on the owners of wrecked vessels to warn other vessels of her position: (Brown v. Mallet, 5 C. B. 599; 17 L. J. 227, C. P.) The petition ought to have shown that there was negligence in getting the ship into the position in which she lay. The court has no jurisdiction to entertain the action:

Clarkson in reply.—Brown v. Mallet is an authority to show that a duty does remain attached to the owner as long as the possession is retained. He also referred to the Sarah, Lush. 549, and White v. Crisp, 10 Ex. 312; 23 L. J. 317, Ex.

Sir ROBERT PHILLIMORE.—The case set up by the plaintiff, the owner of the Blue Bell, is as follows: The Blue Bell, in the prosecution of a voyage from Shoreham to Hartlepool, was, at five a.m. of the 16th Oct., in the channel leading to the harbour at Hartlepool under close-reefed fore-topsail and fore-topmast staysail, steering N.W. by N. $\frac{1}{2}$ N. The morning was dark, the tide was flood, and the wind was a gale from the S.S.W. Whilst the Blue Bell was proceeding in these circumstances she was obliged, on account of the Industrie being light exhibited, suddenly to port her helm; by this manœuvre she took the ground close under the bows of the Industrie, and although her anchor was let go, she dragged it, and drove against the Hartlepool town wall, and thereby sustained damage from, and also did damage to, the wall. It is alleged by the plaintiff that the damage was occasioned by the negligence of those in charge of the Industrie, "in having got that vessel across the fair way, and in leaving her there without any light exhibited or other measures taken to warn other vessels of the danger;" and it is alleged that the measures taken by the Blue Bell were proper and necessary. The allegations in the petition in fact substantially amount to this: that by the negligence of those in charge of the Industrie, the crew of the Blue Bell were obliged to run their vessel ashore, and against the Hartlepool town wall. Those articles of the answer to which the present application relates, allege that this court has not jurisdiction to entertain the suit, and that the statements contained in the petition are irrelevant. The 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6, enacts that this court shall have jurisdiction "to decide all claims and demands whatsoever in the nature of damage received by any ship." The Admiralty Court Act 1861, s. 7, enacts that this court shall have jurisdiction "over any claim for damage done by any ship." It is undisputed that if the Blue Bell had come into actual collision with the Industrie, the court would have had jurisdiction to entertain any claim for damage occasioned by the collision; and I am unable to see why there should be any difference in the rights of the parties simply because the Blue Bell in order to prevent a collision with the Industrie was compelled to go out of the fair way, and in consequence received damage. If the Blue Bell can make out that the misconduct or careless navigation of those in charge of the Industrie rendered it necessary for the Blue Bell to execute the manœuvre which caused her to receive the damage, I think she is entitled to maintain this suit. There has no doubt been some fluctuation in the decisions as to the extent of the jurisdiction of this court in cases of damage, but I think it is now established that this court has jurisdiction where damage has been done or received by a ship, although there may not have been any collision between two or more ships. It has been strongly contended on behalf of the defendant that it does not appear that in this case the damage was caused by any act or default on the part of the crew of the Industrie amounting in law to negligence. But the principal upon which the case of Brown v. Mallet, referred to in support of this contention, was decided, clearly applies only to cases in which a vessel has been abandoned or has ceased to be under the control or management of her owner or his servants. In the present case the petition does, I think, substantially aver that the acts of negligence complained of were owing to the conduct of those who were on board of or in charge of the Industrie, and I am of opinion that the defendants cannot contest their liability upon the suggestion that the Industrie had passed out of their control without pleading facts to support that defence. It has been contended that there was no obligation upon those in charge of the Industrie to exhibit any light to warn other vessels of her position. But, independently altogether of the "Regulations for preventing Collisions at Sea," I think those in charge of a vessel aground at County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), s. 9—Leave to proceed.

The court has no power to grant leave to proceed in the High Court of Admiralty, under the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, s. 9, when proceedings have already been instituted.

THIS was a suit for necessities instituted against the above-named ship. She had been repaired in a Spanish port in March 1870, and had sailed. The plaintiff heard that she was in Falmouth waiting for orders at the end of April in this year, and had her arrested in this court. The amount claimed was under 150*l*.

Webster moved for an order under the County Courts (Admiralty Jurisdiction) Act 1868, s. 9 (a), for leave to proceed with the suit.

Clarkson, contra.—The Court has no power to make such an order, and cannot under the Act bring the defendant here whether he likes it or not.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Where proceedings have been instituted the court has no power to interfere, and parties must proceed on their own responsibility.

Webster.—The section reads as to any proceedings, whether taken at the beginning of a suit or afterwards. Unless the words "take proceedings" mean "institute suit," any proceedings must be meant. It may affect our right to costs, as the court will say that we ought to have applied for leave to proceed.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This was an application to avoid the risk of being condemned in costs at the hearing of the cause. The 9th section of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 provides that, if any person shall take proceedings in the High Court of Admiralty which he might have taken in the County Court, except by order of the judge, and shall not recover over a certain sum, he shall be condemned in costs, unless the judge shall certify. There are two modes of avoid-

(a) Sect. 9.—If any person shall take in the High Court of Admiralty of England or in any superior court proceedings which he might, without agreement, have taken in a County Court, except by order of the judge of the High Court of Admiralty, or of such superior court, or of a County Court having admiralty jurisdiction, and shall not recover a sum exceeding the amount to which the jurisdiction of the County Court in that admiralty cause is limited by this Act, and also if any person without agreement shall, except by order as aforesaid, take proceedings as to salvage in the High Court of Admiralty or in any superior court in respect of property saved, the value of which when saved does not exceed 1000*l*., he shall not be entitled to costs, and shall be liable to be condemned in costs, unless the judge of the High Court of Admiralty or of a superior court before whom the cause is tried or heard shall certify that it was a proper admiralty cause to be tried in the High Court of Admiralty of England or in a superior court.

ing being condemned in costs in proceedings which might have been taken below. A plaintiff may come here before proceedings are instituted, or the court may certify at the end of the hearing. The 9th section only gives power to grant orders to proceed in this court before any proceedings have been instituted. The application must be refused.

THE BEAUMARIS CASTLE.

Costs—County Court Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, ss. 9, 21.

The court will certify for costs where it is less expensive to try in London than in a County Court.

THIS was a cause of salvage, instituted by certain Deal boatmen against the Beaumaris Castle for salvage services rendered by them on March 9th 1870. There was a tender of 110*l*., and the court awarded 100*l*. above the tender. At the time of the institution of the suit the ship was at Cardiff, and if the suit had been tried in the County Court it would have been tried at Cardiff.

The Admiralty Advocate (Clarkson with him) asked the judge to certify for costs, on the ground that it would have been more expensive to try at Cardiff, as the witnesses and owners were all in or near London.

Milward, Q.C. (Cottenham with him) objected.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I shall certify for costs in this case on the ground that trying in this court has been a less expense than trying below. At the beginning of this suit the vessel was at Cardiff, and under the 21st section of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act the case would have to be tried at Cardiff. The witnesses for the plaintiffs are nearer London than Cardiff, and the owners likewise live in London, and so it is a saving of expense to try in London rather than take all the witnesses down to Cardiff.

The Tug STRANGER.

Tugs—Duties of—Duties of tow vessels to avoid injury—Sheering of tow—Dangers of passage.

The doctrine that a tug is liable for an injury to the tow, unless the tug can show that she was not in fault, applies exclusively to cases of injury resulting from the violation or neglect of some duty coming within the scope of the duties devolving upon that class of employment.

Whilst being towed by a tug a schooner sheered out of the course and struck upon a sunken rock:

Held, that it was the duty of the tow to follow directly in the course of the tug, and that the tug, therefore, was not liable for damages resulting from the accident. It is no part of the duty of the tug to take precautions against the sheering of the tow; but if the tow sheers in consequence of a manœuvre of the tug, and thereby sustains damage, the tug is liable.

[AMERICAN REPS.]

[AMERICAN REPS.]

Quære, whether it is the duty of a tug to inform tow of danger in the passage.

THIS was a libel against the tug Stranger, for unskillful towing of the schooner Monteagle through the Sault Ste. Marie canal, on the 24th June 1868, in consequence of which she was caused to strike a sunken rock at the entrance to the canal, near its westerly side, breaking a hole through her bottom, and causing her to sink just below the lower lock. Schooner claims damages for salvage expenses, repairs, detention &c., in the sum of 5746dols. 40c.

The faults alleged against the tug are:—

1. That she entered the canal with her tow at too late an hour.
2. Entered at too great speed.
3. Entered to the right of the centre of the canal instead of the left of the centre, as she should have done, to avoid drawing the schooner upon the sunken rock, the locality of which was well known to the tug and was unknown to the schooner.
4. Failure to inform the schooner of the existence and location of said sunken rock, or to give any information or orders to the schooner as to entering and getting through the canal safely.
5. Let her steam run down, and so failed to handle the schooner properly, in view of her condition, and thereby causing her to strike again below the lower lock.
6. The master of the tug left her after entering the canal, thereby neglecting his duty.
7. The master of the tug failed and omitted to inform himself of how much water the schooner drew, and how much cargo she carried, as was his duty, and as was the custom, before attempting to take her through the canal.

The answer of John R. Gillett, and other owners of the tug, admits the towing as alleged, and denies all the allegations in the libel, of fault on the part of the tug, and charges that if the schooner struck a sunken rock at the entrance of the canal, it was in consequence of her not following in the wake of the tug, caused by the schooner being badly managed, and by her sheering to the westward at the entrance of the canal that the injury caused thereby was slight, and was not the cause of the schooner sinking below the lock; that the sinking of the schooner at that point was in consequence of her striking a rock there, and was caused by the negligence and mismanagement on the part of the schooner, and without any fault on the part of the tug. The evidence will be noticed in the opinion so far as necessary to a decision of the case.

H. B. Brown and W. A. Moore for the tug.

A. Russell for the schooner.

Opinion by LONGYEAR, J.—The towing and salvage services and supplies rendered and furnished by the tug, and the reasonableness of the charges therefore being admitted, nothing remains but to consider and determine the case of the libel against the tug. It may be regarded as now well settled that tugs are not liable as common carriers. They are, however, bound to use ordinary care, skill, and diligence in taking up, arranging, and managing their tows. The vessel being towed has also certain duties to perform, among which are to follow the tug, and in situations of danger, to use all possible means to avoid injury, and when injury ensues, to do all in its power to make the injury as light as possible. The primary injury complained of, and the one from which all the damages alleged are claimed to have flowed, is that caused by the schooner striking a sunken rock at the entrance of the canal. If the tug is not in fault for this injury, then she is not liable at all. If she is liable for this primary injury, then she is also liable for all subsequent injuries and damages to the schooner necessarily and naturally flowing from or caused by it, and which could not have been avoided by ordinary care and diligence on the part of the schooner. The whole gravamen of the case is contained in the third article of the libel, and is stated in the following words: "Third. That said tug proceeded on said voyage, and while in said canal, towed said schooner out of, and away from the proper and ordinary course in the centre and easterly side of said canal, towards the westerly side thereof, and ran said schooner upon a sunken rock, upon said westerly side, staying a hole in her bottom, whereof she soon sunk just below the lower lock." And further on, in the fourth article, it is alleged, "that the master, mate, second mate, and wheelsman were on deck, and kept said schooner directly after said tug, and the damage was occasioned solely by the fault of said tug, and without fault on the part of said schooner," thus recognising the duty of the tow, as above stated, to keep directly after the tug. The first important inquiry, therefore, is, did the tug "run the schooner upon a sunken rock," as alleged, and conceding that the schooner did run upon a sunken rock, did she do so while following directly after the tug, and if not, then was it in any manner occasioned by the fault of the tug? I think these questions are fully answered by a simple statement of the fact clearly appearing by the proofs, and in regard to which there is no controversy, viz., that on entering the canal the schooner took a sheer some distance, how far does not appear, to starboard, and that it was while she was taking this sheer she was struck. The tug is not charged in the pleadings or proofs with being in any manner in fault for the sheering of the schooner, and as it is clear that she struck solely in consequence of such sheering, and would have gone clear if she had been kept as she is alleged to have been, directly after the tug, it is equally clear that the tug cannot be held in any manner responsible for the schooner striking as she did. The case of the Angelina Corning (1 Benedict's R.), cited by libellant's advocate, was not one of the sudden sheering of the tow from bad steering qualities or otherwise, as in this case, and consequent running upon a sunken rock, but was that of the sagging or hanging off of the tow to leeward occasioned probably by the change of course of the tug. It is very easy to see how a tug, knowing of the existence and location of a sunken rock, should be held responsible for running a tow upon such rock in consequence of a change of course resulting in the sagging or hanging off of the tow in such a way as to bring her upon the rock. In that case the tug would be in fault for not having made due allowance for the sagging of the tow in consequence of the change of course; which is very different from a case of sheering of the tow solely on her own account, and not on account of any act or manœuvre of the tug, and which the tug could not have anticipated, or guarded against even if anticipated, because it would have been impossible to have known beforehand which way the tow might sheer. In that case it was held that, whether the sagging of the tow was chargeable to the pilot of the tug or to the men on the tow was immaterial, for the reason that the danger was not known to either. What would have been the result if the danger had been known to the tug and not to the tow, and the sagging of the tow in consequence of which the injury occurred had been, as in this case, chargeable to the tow, the court does not intimate. The case of the Quickstep (9 Wallace R., 670), holding that the tug is liable for an injury to the tow, unless the tug can show that she was not in fault, applies exclusively to cases of injury resulting from the violation or neglect of some duty coming within the scope of the duties devolving upon that class of employment. In that case the primary cause of the injury was the use of imperfect and insufficient towing lines, and the court held that it was among the duties of the tug to see that the lines were sufficient, and she was therefore held liable. But it certainly cannot be considered among the duties of a tug to anticipate and guard against the tow taking a sudden sheer to the right or to the left, as it might happen. [Having found the first three charges unsupported, the Court as to the fourth said:] That the tug failed to inform the schooner of the existence and location of the sunken rock, or to give the schooner any information or orders in relation to entering and getting through the canal safely. Without stopping to argue the question whether it was or was not the duty of the tug to give such information, under the circumstances of this case, or in any case of towage through the Sault canal, a channel perfectly familiar to all the navigators of the upper lakes, and through which those in charge of the schooner had frequently passed, it is a sufficient answer to this charge, that under the proofs in this case it is evident that such failure to give the information specified did not in any manner contribute to the catastrophe. Besides, this charge is inconsistent with the theory of the libel and the proofs in the case. The theory of the libel is that the accident happened while the schooner was following directly after the tug, and that it so happened in consequence of the tug drawing her against or upon the rock. The proof shows that it did not so happen, but, on the contrary, that if the schooner had so followed the tug she would have passed in perfect safety. Under this theory and these proofs it was entirely a matter of indifference whether such information was given or not. On all other points the Court found that the proofs failed, and dismissed the libel.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

NEW ENGLAND MUTUAL MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY v. DUNHAM.

Admiralty jurisdiction—Maritime contract—Marine insurance—Damage to ship—Claim on policy. The contract of marine insurance is a maritime contract, and a claim in personam arising out of it is cognisable in admiralty.

A libel in personam was filed by D. against the N. E. M. I. company, to recover a loss on a policy on the Albina. The vessel was run into by another vessel owing to the negligent navigation of the latter, whereby she sustained damage, and the cost of repairs formed the subject of the claim;

Held, that the district court of admiralty had jurisdiction to entertain the claim, under the constitution of the United States, declaring that the judicial power should extend to "all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction."

The opinion of Story, J., in De Lovio v. Boit (2 Gallison 398), approved and adopted.

Semble, that having regard to the maritime codes of all European countries, admiralty jurisdiction ought to embrace all maritime contracts, and that contracts the subject-matter of which is maritime are not the less maritime contracts because they are made and are to be performed elsewhere than on the high seas.

The English rule to the contrary criticised and disapproved.

This was an appeal from a divided opinion of the Judges of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts.

A libel in personam was filed in the District Court for the district of Massachusetts by Dunham against The New England Mutual Marine Insurance Company, on a policy of insurance, dated at Boston on the 2nd March 1863, whereby the insurance company, a corporation of Massachusetts, agreed to insure Dunham, the libellant, a citizen of New York, in the sum of 10,1000 dols., for whom it might concern, on the vessel called the Albina, for one year, against the perils of the seas and other perils in the policy mentioned; and the libellant alleged that within the year the said vessel was run into by another vessel on the high seas, through the negligence of those navigating the said other vessel, and sustained much damage, and that the libellant had expended large sums of money in repairing the same, of which he claimed payment of the insurance company; and the question was, whether the district court, sitting in admiralty, has jurisdiction to entertain a libel in personam on a policy of marine insurance to recover for a loss.

BRADLEY, J.—This precise question has never been decided by this court. But, in our view, several decisions have been made which determine the principle on which the case depends. The general jurisdiction of the district court in admiralty and maritime cases has been heretofore so fully discussed, that it is only necessary to refer to them very briefly on this occasion. The constitution declares that the judicial power of the United States shall extend "to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction," without defining the limits of that jurisdiction. Congress, by the Judiciary Act, passed at the first session, 24th Sept. 1789, established the districts courts, and conferred upon them, among other things, "exclusive original cognizance of all civil cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction." As far as regards civil cases, therefore, the jurisdiction of these courts was thus made co-extensive with the constitutional gift of judicial power on this subject. Much controversy has arisen with regard to the extent of this jurisdiction. It is well known that, in England, great jealousy of the admiralty was long exhibited by the courts of common law. The admiralty courts were originally established in that and other maritime countries of Europe for the protection of commerce and the administration of that venerable law of the sea which reaches back to the sources long anterior even to those of the civil law itself; which, Lord Mansfield says, is not the law of any particular country, but the general law of nations; and which is founded on the broadest principles of equity and justice, deriving, however, much of its completeness and symmetry, as well as its modes of proceeding, from the civil law, and embracing, altogether, a system of regulations embodied and matured by the combined efforts of the most enlightened commercial nations of the world. Its system of procedure has been established for ages, and is essentially founded, as we have said, on the civil law; and this is probably one reason why so much hostility was exhibited against the admiralty by the courts of common law, and why its jurisdiction was so much more crippled and restricted than in any other state. In all other countries bordering on the Mediterranean or the Atlantic, the marine courts, whether under the name of admiralty courts or otherwise, are generally invested with jurisdiction of all matters arising in marine commerce, as well as other marine matters of public concern, such as crimes committed on the sea, captures, and even naval affairs. But in England, partly under strained constructions of Parliamentary enactments, and partly from assumptions, of public policy, the common law courts succeeded in establishing the general rule that the jurisdiction of the admiralty was confined to the high seas, and entirely excluded from transactions arising on waters within the body of a country, such as rivers, inlets, and arms of the sea as far out as the naked eye could discern objects from shore to shore, as well as from transactions arising on the land, though relating to marine affairs. With respect to contracts, this criterion of locality was carried so far that, with the exception of the cases of seaman's wages and bottomry bonds, no contract was allowed to be prosecuted in the Admiralty unless it was made upon the sea, and was to be executed upon the sea; and even then it must not be under seal. Of course, under such a construction of the admiralty jurisdiction, a policy of insurance executed on land would be excluded from it. But this narrow view has not prevailed here. This court has frequently declared and decided that the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States is not limited either by the restraining statutes or the judicial prohibitions of England, but is to be interpreted by a more enlarged view of its essential nature and objects, and with reference to analogous jurisdictions in other countries constituting the maritime commercial world as well as to that of England. "Its boundary," says Taney, C. J., "is to be ascertained by a reasonable and just construction of the words used in the constitution, taken in connection with the whole instrument, and the purposes for which admiralty and maritime jurisdiction was granted to the Federal Government." (1 Black, 527.) "Courts of admiralty," says the same judge, in another case, "have been found necessary in all commercial countries, not only for the safety and convenience of commerce, and the speedy decision of controversies where delay would often be ruin, but also to administer the laws of nations in a season of war, and to determine the validity of captures and questions of prize or no prize in a judicial proceeding. And it would be contrary to the first principles on which the Union was formed to confine these rights to the States bordering on the Atlantic, and to the tide-water rivers connected with it, and to deny them to the citizens who border on the lakes and the great navigable streams which flow through the Western States:" (12 How, 455.) In accordance with this more enlarged view of the subject, several results have been arrived at widely differing from the long established rules of the English courts. First as to the locus or territory of maritime jurisdiction. [Having discussed this point as to jurisdiction in American waters he proceeded:—] Secondly, as to contracts, it has been equally well settled that the English rule which concedes jurisdiction, with a few exceptions, only to contracts made upon the sea and to be executed thereon (making locality the test) is entirely inadmissible, and that the true criterion is the nature and subject-matter of the contract, as whether it was a maritime contract, having reference to maritime service or maritime transactions. Even in England the courts felt compelled to rely on this criterion in order to sustain the admiralty jurisdiction over bottomry bonds, although it involved an inconsistency with their rules in almost every other case. In Menetone v. Gibbons (3 Term Rep. 269), Lord Kenyon makes this sensible remark: "If the admiralty has jurisdiction over the subject-matter, to say that it is necessary for the parties to go upon the sea to execute the instrument, borders upon absurdity." In that case there happened to be a seal on the bond, of which a strong point was made. Buller, J., answered it thus: "The form of the bottomry bond does not vary the jurisdiction; the question whether the Court of Admiralty has or has not jurisdiction depends on the subject-matter." Had these views actuated the common law courts at an earlier day, it would have led to a much sounder rule as to the limits of admiralty jurisdiction than was adopted. In this court, in the case of The N. J. Navigation Company v. Merchants' Bank (6 Howard, 344), which was a libel in personam against the company on a contract of affreightment to recover for the loss of specie by the burning of the steamer Lexington on Long Island Sound, Justice Nelson, delivering the opinion of the Court, says: "If the cause is a maritime cause, subject to admiralty cognisance, jurisdiction is complete over the person as well as over the ship. . . . On looking into the several cases in admiralty which have come before this court, and in which its jurisdiction was involved, it will be found that the inquiry has been, not into the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty in England, but into the nature and subject matter of the contract, whether it was a maritime contract, and the service a maritime service, to be performed upon the sea or upon waters within the ebb and flow of the tide:" (6 How. 392) [The last distinction, based on tide, as we have seen, has since been abrogated.] Jurisdiction in that case was sustained by this court, as it had previously been in cases of suits by ship carpenters and material men on contracts for repairs, materials, and supplies, and by pilots for pilotage; in none of which would it have been allowed to the admiralty courts of England: (see cases cited by Justice Nelson, 6 How. 390, 391.) In the subsequent case of Morewood v. Enquist, decided in 1859 (23 How. 493), which was a case of charter-party and affreightment, Grier, J., who had dissented in the case of the Lexington, but who seems to have changed his views on the whole subject, delivered the opinion of the court, and, amongst other things, said, "Counsel have expended much learning and ingenuity in an attempt to demonstrate that a court of admiralty in this country, like those in England, has no jurisdiction over contracts of charter-party or affreightment. They do not seem to deny that these are maritime contracts, according to any correct definition of the terms, but rather require us to abandon our whole course of decision on this subject, and return to the fluctuating decisions of English common law judges, which, it has been truly said, 'are founded on no uniform principle, and exhibit illiberal jealousy and narrow prejudice.'" Morewood v. Enequist (23 How. 393). He adds that the court did not feel disposed to be again drawn into the discussion; that the subject had been thoroughly investigated in the case of the Lexington, and that they had then decided "that charter-parties and contracts of affreightment were 'maritime contracts', within the true meaning and construction of the Constitution and Act of Congress, and cognisable in courts of admiralty by process, either in rem or in personam." The case of The People's Ferry Company v. Beers (20 How. 401), being pressed upon the court, in which it had been adjudged that a contract for building a vessel was not within the Admiralty jurisdiction, being a contract made on land and to be performed on land, Grier, J. remarked: "The court decided in that case that a contract to build a ship is not a maritime contract;" but he intimated that the opinion in that case must be construed in connection with the precise question before the court; in other words, that the effect of that decision was not to be extended by implication to other cases. In the case of the Moses Taylor (4 Wall. 411), it was decided that a contract to carry passengers by sea as well as a contract to carry goods, was a maritime contract and cognisable in admiralty, although a small part of the transportation was by land, the principal portion being by water. In a late case of affreightment, that of the Belfast (7 Wall. 624), it was contended that admiralty jurisdiction did not attach, because the goods were to be transported only from one port to another in the same State, and were not the subject of inter-state commerce. But as the transportation was on a navigable river, the court decided in favour of the jurisdiction, because it was a maritime transaction. Clifford, J., delivering the opinion of the court says: "Contracts, claims, or service, purely maritime, and touching rights and duties appertaining to commerce and navigation, are cognisable in the admiralty courts. Torts or injuries committed on navigable waters, of a civil nature, are also cognisable in the admiralty courts. Jurisdiction in the former case depends entirely upon the locality:" (7 Wall. 627.) It thus appears that in each case the decision of the court and the reasoning on which it was founded have been based upon the fundamental inquiry, whether the contract was or was not a maritime contract. If it was, the jurisdiction was asserted; if it was not, the jurisdiction was denied. And whether maritime or not maritime depended, not on the place where the contract was made, but on the subject-matter of the contract. If that was maritime the contract was maritime. This may be regarded as the established doctrine of the court. The subject could be very copiously illustrated by reference to the decisions of the various district and circuit courts; but it is unnecessary. The authoritative decisions of this court have settled the general rule, and all that remains to be done is to apply the law to each case as it arises. It only remains, then, to inquire whether the contract of marine insurance, as set forth in the present case, is or is not a maritime contract. It is objected that it is not a maritime contract because it is made on the land, and is to be performed (by payment of the loss) on the land, and is, therefore, entirely a common law transaction. This objection would equally apply to bottomry and respondentia loans, which are also usually made on the land and are to be paid on the land. But in both cases payment is made to depend on a maritime risk—in the one case upon the loss of the ship or goods, and in the other upon their safe arrival at their destination. So the contract of affreightment is also made on land, and is to be performed on the land by the delivery of the goods and payment of the freight. It is true that in the latter case a maritime service is to be performed in the transportation of the goods. But if we carefully analyze the contract of insurance we shall find that, in effect, it is a contract or guaranty, on the part of the insurer, that the ship or goods shall pass safely over the sea, and through its storms and its many casualties to the port of its destination; and if they do not pass safely, but meet with disaster from any of the misadventures insured against, the insurer will pay the loss sustained. So in the contract of affreightment, the master guarantees that the goods shall be safely transported (dangers of the seas excepted) from the port of shipment to the port of delivery, and there delivered. The contract of the one guarantees against loss from the dangers of the sea; the contract of the other against loss from all other dangers. Of course, these contracts do not always run precisely parallel to each other, as now stated; special terms are inserted in each at the option of the parties. But this statement shows the general nature of the two contracts. And how a fair mind can discern any substantial distinction between them on the question whether they are or are not maritime contracts, is difficult to imagine. The object of the two contracts is, in the one case, maritime service, and in the other maritime casualties. And then the contract of insurance, and the rights of the parties arising therefrom, are affected by and mixed up with all the questions that can arise in maritime commerce—jettison, abandonment, average, salvage, capture, prize, bottomry, &c. Perhaps the best criterion of the maritime character of a contract is the system of law from which it arises and by which it is governed. And it is well known that the contract of insurance sprang from the law maritime, and derives all its material rules and incidents therefrom. It was unknown to the common law; and the common law remedies, when applied to it, were so inadequate and clumsy that disputes arising out of the contract were generally left to arbitration until the year A.D. 1601, when the statute of 43 Eliz. was passed creating a special court, or commission, for hearing and determining causes arising on policies of insurance. The preamble to that Act, after mentioning the great benefit arising to commerce by the use of policies of insurance, has this singular statement, "And whereas, heretofore such assurers have used to stand so justly and precisely upon their credits as few or no controversies have arisen thereupon, and, if any have grown, the same have, from time to time, been ended and ordered by certain grave and discreet merchants appointed by the Lord Mayor of the City of London, as men by reason of their experience fittest to understand and speedily to decide those causes, until of late years that divers persons have withdrawn themselves from that arbitrary course, and have sought to draw the parties assured to seek their moneys of every several assurer by suits commenced in her Majesty's courts, to their great charges and delays." The commission created by this Act was to be directed to the judge of the Admiralty for the time being, the Recorder of London, two doctors of the civil law, and two common lawyers, and eight grave and discreet merchants. The act was thus an acknowledgment of the jurisdiction to which the case properly belonged. Had it not been for the jealousy exhibited by the common law courts against the Court of Admiralty, in prohibiting its cognizance of policies of insurance half a century before (4 Inst. 139), the latter court, as the natural and proper tribunal for determining all maritime causes, would have furnished a remedy at once easy, expeditious, and adequate. It was only after the common law, under the influence of Lord Mansfield and other judges of enlightened views, had imported into itself the various provisions of the law maritime relating to insurance, that the courts at Westminster Hall began to furnish satisfactory relief to suitors. And even then, as remarked by Sir W. D. Evans, "the inadequacy of the existing law to settle, proprio vigore, complicated questions of average and contribution, is very manifest and notorious. Such questions are, by consent, as matter of course, and from conviction of counsel that justice cannot be attained in any other way, referred to private examination; but a law can hardly be considered as perfect which is not possessed of adequate powers within itself to complete its purpose, and which requires the extrinsic aid of personal consent:" (Evans's Statutes, vol. 2, p. 226, 3rd edit.) The contrivances to which Lord Mansfield resorted to remedy in a measure these difficulties, are stated by Park, J. in the introduction to his work on insurance. These facts go to show, demonstrably, that the contract of marine insurance is an exotic in the common law. And we know the fact, historically, that its first appearance in any code or system of laws was in the law maritime as promulgated by the various maritime states and cities of Europe. It undoubtedly grew out of the doctrine of contribution and general average, which is found in the maritime laws of the ancient Rhodians. By this law, if either ship, freight, or cargo was sacrificed to save the others, all had to contribute their proportionate share of the loss. This division of loss naturally suggested a provisional division of risk; first, amongst those engaged in the same enterprise; and, next, amongst associations of shipowners and shipping merchants. Hence it is found that the earliest form of the contract of insurance was that of mutual insurance, which, according to Pardessus, dates back to the tenth century, if not earlier, and in Italy and Portugal was made obligatory. By a regulation of the latter kingdom, made in the fourteenth century, every shipowner and merchant in Lisbon and Oporto was bound to contribute 2 per cent. of the profits of each voyage to a common fund from which to pay losses whenever they should occur: (2 Pardes. Lois Mar. 369; 6 ib. 303.) The next step in the system was that of insurance upon premium. Capitalists, familiar with the risks of navigation, were found willing to guarantee against them for a small consideration or premium paid. This, the final form of the contract, was in use as early as the beginning of the fourteenth century, and the tradition is, that it was introduced into England in that century by the Lombard merchants who settled in London and brought with them the maritime usages of Venice and other Italian cities. Express regulations respecting the contract, however, do not appear in any code or compilation of laws earlier than the commencement of the fifteenth century. The earliest which Pardessus was able to find were those contained in the Ordinances of Barcelona, A.D. 1435; of Venice, A.D. 1468; of Florence, A.D. 1523; of Antwerp, A.D. 1537; &c. (Pardessus, vol. 5, p. 493; vol. 4, p. 598, 37.) Distinct traces of earlier regulations are found, but the ordinances themselves are not extant. In the more elaborate monuments of maritime law which appeared in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, the contract of insurance occupies a large space. The Guidon de la Mer, which appeared at Rouen at the close of the sixteenth century, was an elaborate treatise on the subject; but, in its discussion, the principles of every other maritime contract were explained. In the celebrated Marine Ordinance of Louis XIV., issued in 1681, it forms the subject of one of the principle titles (Lib. 3, tit. 6.) As is well known, it has always formed a part of the Scotch maritime law. Suffice it to say, that in every maritime code of Europe, unless England is excepted, marine insurance constitutes one of the principal heads. It is treated in nearly every one of those collected by Pardessus, except the more ancient ones, which were compiled before the contract had assumed its place in written law. It is, in fact, a part of the general maritime law of the world; slightly modified, it is true, in each country, according to the circumstances or genius of the people. Can stronger proof be presented that the contract is a maritime contract? But an additional argument is found in the fact that in all other countries, except England, even in Scotland, suits and controversies arising upon the contract of marine insurance are within the jurisdiction of the admiralty or other marine courts: (See Benedict's Admiralty, § 294, edit. 1870.) The French Ordinance of 1681 touching the marine, in enumerating the cases subject to the jurisdiction of the judges of admiralty, expressly mentions those arising upon policies of assurance, and concludes with this broad language: "And generally all contracts concerning the commerce of the sea:" (See Laws, 256.) The Italian writer, Roccus says: "These subjects of insurance and disputes relative to ships are to be decided according to maritime law, and the usages and customs of the sea are to be respected. The proceedings are to be according to the forms of maritime courts and the rules and principles laid down in the book called the Consulate of the Sea, printed at Barcelona in the year 1592:" (Roccus on Insurance, Note, 80.) It is also clear that, originally, the English admiralty had jurisdiction of this as well as of other maritime contracts. It is expressly included in the commissions of the admiralty: (Benedict, sect. 48.) Dr. Browne says: "The cognizance of policies of insurance was of old claimed by the Court of Admiralty, in which they had the great advantage attending all their proceedings as to the examination of witnesses beyond the seas or speedily going out of the kingdom:" (2 Bro. Civ. & Adm. Law, 82.) But the intolerance of the common law courts prohibited the exercise of it, in the early case of Crane v. Bell 38 Hen. 8 (1546). a prohibition was granted for this purpose: (See 4 Co. Inst. 139.) Mr. Browne says, very pertinently, "What is the rationale, and what the true principle which ought to govern this question, viz.: What contracts should be cognizable in admiralty? Is it not this? All contracts which relate purely to maritime affairs, the natural, short, and easy method of enforcing which is found in the Admiralty proceedings;" (2 Browne, 88.) Another consideration bearing directly on this question is the fact that the commissions in admiralty issued to our colonial governors and admiralty judges, prior to the Revolution, which may be fairly supposed to have been in the minds of the convention which framed the Constitution, contained either express jurisdiction over policies of insurance or such general jurisdiction over maritime contracts as to embrace them: (Benedict, c. 9.) The discussions that have taken place in the district and circuit courts of the United States have not been adverted to. Many of them are characterised by much learning and research. The learned and exhaustive opinion of Justice Story in the case of De Lovio v Boit (2 Gallison, 398), affirming the admiralty jurisdiction over policies of marine insurance, has never been answered, and will always stand a monument of his great erudition. That case was decided in 1815. It has been followed in several other cases in the first circuit: (see 2 Curtis, 332, 333.) In 1842 Story, J., in reaffirming his first judgment, says that he had reason to believe that Marshall, C.J., and Washington, J., were prepared to maintain the jurisdiction. What the opinion of the other judges was he did not know: (2 Storey's Rep. 183.) Doubts as to the jurisdiction have occasionally been expressed by other judges; but we are of opinion that the conclusion of Justice Story was correct. The answer of the court, therefore, to the question propounded by the circuit court will be, that the District Court for the District of Massachusetts, sitting in admiralty, has jurisdiction to entertain the libel in this case.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

(Before MARTIN and BRAMWELL, BB.)

WRIGHT v. WARD.

Mutual Shipping Assurance Association—Liability of individual shareholder—Assessment by committee—Adjustment by average-stater.

The rules of a Mutual Shipping Assurance Association provided that "in case of its becoming necessary to make any payment in respect of any loss or damage happening to any ship insured, the amount to be borne and paid by each member of the association should upon each and every such occasion be assessed and apportioned by the committee upon and amongst the members of the association liable to contribute thereto," &c.

In an action for loss the declaration set out the policy and the above rule, and averred that the plaintiff had "always been ready and willing that the amount to be borne and paid by each respective member of the said association in respect of the said loss should be assessed and apportioned by the committee of the association according to the regulations of the said policy," and that the plaintiff had "requested the defendant and the said committee to assess and apportion the same, but they had neglected and refused so to do, although a reasonable time for that purpose had long since elapsed." And that "except as aforesaid all conditions had been fulfilled," &c. It then alleged as a breach the nonpayment by the defendant of his proportion of the sum insured.

Held, on demurrer, that the declaration did not show any liability on the part of the defendant.

To the above declaration the defendant pleaded (sixthly), "That by the regulations annexed to the said policy it was declared that a committee 'tenth' should be appointed, who should meet quarterly, at the discretion of the managers, to audit the accounts, settle claims, and order payment of the same by the managers' draft; and that the managers should have full power to settle all claims on policies; and that the claim of the plaintiff had not been settled in manner provided, &c., nor had payment of the same by the managers' draft been ordered;" and (seventhly), "that by the said regulations it was declared that all average claims should be adjusted by a professional average-stater, according to the usage of Lloyd's, &c.; and that the only claim of the plaintiff was an average claim within the meaning of the said regulation, and that the same had never been adjusted as provided for, and the plaintiff had never been ready and willing to have the same adjusted."

Held, on demurrer, that the pleas were good.

THE first count of the declaration stated:—For that the plaintiff, before and at the time of making the policy of insurance hereinafter mentioned, was, and still is a member, together with the defendant and divers other persons, of a certain association called the National Mutual Shipping Assurance Association, and the ship or vessel hereinafter mentioned was, before and at the time of the making of the policy of insurance hereinafter mentioned, admitted, and entered in the said association. And the plaintiff, on the 20th March 1869, caused to be made a certain policy of insurance, purporting thereby, and containing therein, that the plaintiff, as well in his own name as for and in the name and names of all the assured to whom the same did, might, or should appertain, in part or in all, did make assurance, and cause himself and them, and every one of them, to be insured, lost or not lost, at and from meridian of the 20th March 1869 until meridian of the 20th March 1870, upon the body, tackle, apparel, ordnance, munition, artillery, boat, and other furniture of and in the good ship or vessel called the Cherub, or by whatsoever other name the said ship was or should be named, &c., and so should continue and endure until the said ship, with all her ordnance, tackle, &c., should be arrived as above, upon the said ship, &c., until she had moored at anchor twenty-four hours in good safety, and that it should be lawful for the said ship in the said voyage to proceed and sail to, and touch and stay at any port and place not excepted in the rules annexed to the said policy, and without prejudice to that insurance, and the said ship, &c., for so much as concerned the assured by agreement between the assured and assurers in that policy were and should be valued at 1000*l.* And touching the absolute perils of the sea which the assurers were contented to bear, and did take upon them in that voyage, they were of the seas, men of war, fire enemies, pirates, rovers, thieves, jettisons, letters of mart and countermart, surprisals, takings at sea, arrests, restraints, and detentions of all kings, princes, and people of what nation, condition or quality soever, barratry of the master or mariners, and of all such aforesaid perils, losses, and misfortunes that should come to the hurt detriment or damage of the said ship, &c., or any part thereof, according to the rules annexed to the said policy. And in case of any loss or misfortune it should be lawful to the managers, their factors, servants, and assigns, to sue, labour, and travel for, in, and about the defence, safeguard, and recovery of the said ship, &c., or any part thereof, without prejudice to that insurance, to the charges whereof they of the association would each one contribute according to the rate and quantity of that sum therein assured. And it was agreed by them the insurers that the said writing or policy of assurance should be of as much force or effect as the surest writing or policy of assurance theretofore made in Lombard-street, or in the Royal Exchange, or elsewhere in London. And so they, the association, were contented, and did thereby promise and bind themselves, each one for his own part, their heirs and executors, and goods, to the assured, their executors, administrators, and assigns for the true performance of the premises, confessing themselves paid the consideration due unto them at and after the rate of 20l. per cent., and by a certain memorandum thereunder written, it was mutually agreed that the regulations annexed to the said policy of assurance should form part of the said policy. And it was by the said regulations annexed to the said policy of assurance, amongst other things, declared—first, that the members of the said association severally and respectively, not jointly or in partnership, nor the one for the other of them, but each only in his own name, insured each other's ships or shares of ships from noon of the 20th March, 1869, or from the date of entry of such vessel respectively, until noon of the 20th March then next, and from that time until noon of the 20th March in the next succeeding year, and so on from year to year, unless notice to the contrary should be given as hereinafter mentioned, against all losses, perils, and damages of what nature or kind soever which might be sustained or received by their respective ships, or caused or done by them to other ships or craft, except when on the voyages in the trade, or under the circumstances hereinafter particularly excepted. And it was thereby further declared, secondly, that for the better regulation and more equitable adjustment of claims on the said association, there should be established four classes of assurances, and in case of its becoming necessary to make any payment in respect of any loss or damage happening to or by any ship or ships insured in the said association, the amount to be borne and paid by each respective member of the association should upon each and every such occasion be assessed and apportioned by the committee upon and amongst the members of the association liable to contribute thereto in the manner hereinafter mentioned. And it was thereby further declared, fourthly, that the managers of the said association should subscribe and sign all policies of assurance in the name of the said association, and that the signature of either of the managers should be binding and conclusive on all and every member, and have the same operation as if each and every member had signed such policies, subject to their being countersigned by one or more of the committee or two members. And it was thereby declared sixth, that ships should not be insured when employed in any unlawful trade with the knowledge or consent of the assured, nor when loading or unloading on any main shore or beach when being in the Solway Firth or in the port of Dundalk, Annan, Dumfries, Preston, or Lytham, nor when or after proceeding higher than Glasson Dock in Lancaster River, and that ships being employed in any case contrary to the said rule should not be entitled to recover for any loss by the sea risk of any subsequent voyage until surveyed in a safe port by some person appointed by the committee and re-admitted. And it was thereby further declared; eighthly, that any ship sailing on any voyage prohibited by the said association should thenceforth cease to be insured, but on notice in writing being given to the managers might be exempted from contribution to any losses or averages which might occur after the date of such notice, but not otherwise. And it was further declared, fourteenthly, that all drafts for claims written off by the committee should be duly accepted and returned to the managers within one month from date, and punctually paid, and if any member should neglect or refuse to pay such contributions, his respective ship or ships should immediately cease to be insured in or by the said association, but that he should still be liable to contribute to all losses and averages which might occur during the continuance of the assurance. And that the solicitors should be directed to sue immediately for the amount due on behalf of the association in the name of one of the managers to whom the assured or holder of the said policy covenanted to pay all contributions ordered by the committee. And it was thereby further declared, (twenty-third), that the managers, unless they received ten days' notice to the contrary, should renew each policy on its expiration, except in cases where it might be deemed expedient not to renew the same. And the plaintiff says that the said policy of assurance was then subscribed with the name of the defendant and divers other persons, and was then duly subscribed by either of the managers and countersigned by two of the members of the said association, according to the said regulations, as agents for the said several persons, as assurers for the sum of 1000l. upon the premises in the said policy of assurance mentioned. And the said policy was so subscribed and countersigned as aforesaid for procurement of the several members of the said association, every member bearing his equal proportion according to the sums mutually insured therein. And the plaintiff further says that, the said policy of assurance was so made by the plaintiff as aforesaid for and on behalf of the plaintiff and one John Melvin, and for the use and benefit of them or either of them, and the plaintiff and the said John Melvin were or either of them was at the time of the commencement of the risk and from thence continually afterwards until and at the time of the loss hereinafter mentioned, interested in the said ship to a large value and amount, to wit, to the value in the said policy mentioned. And the plaintiff further says, that the said ship or vessel, during the time covered by the said policy, was not employed in any unlawful trade nor in loading or unloading on any main shore or beach, nor was the said ship or

WRIGHT v. WARD.

vessel in any port or place prohibited by the said regulations annexed to the said policy, nor was the said ship or vessel sailing on any voyage prohibited by the said association, and the said ship or vessel at the time of the loss hereinafter mentioned remained and was insured in the sum of 1000*l.* by the said association for the period in the said policy mentioned. And the plaintiff further says that the said ship or vessel during the said time, and whilst she was attempting to prosecute a voyage which was protected by the said policy of insurance, to wit on the 8th March 1870, was, by the perils insured against, wholly lost; and by reason of the premises the defendant, as a member of the said association, became and was liable to pay to the plaintiff the defendant's proportion of the said sum of 1000*l.*; and the plaintiff has always been ready and willing that the amount to be borne and paid by each respective member of the said association in respect of the said loss, should be assessed and apportioned by the committee of the said association according to the regulations annexed to the said policy. And the plaintiff requested the defendant and the said committee to assess and apportion the same, but they have neglected and refused to do so, although a reasonable time for that purpose has long since elapsed. And except as aforesaid all conditions have been fulfilled, and all events and things existed, and all times elapsed to entitle the plaintiff to the payment of the defendant's proportion of the said sum of 1000*l.*, and to maintain this action; yet the defendant has not paid the same.

The defendant demurred to the declaration, on the ground that the plaintiff could not on the facts disclosed, sue the defendant on the policy declared on to recover a proportion of the sum insured. He also pleaded the following pleas (inter alia): Sixth, that by the said regulations annexed to the said policy, as in the said first count mentioned it was declared as follows: 10th, that a committee (not exceeding ten, three to be a quorum) should be appointed for superintending the affairs of the association, who should meet quarterly, at the discretion of the said managers, on the days therein mentioned, to audit the accounts, settle claims, and order payment of the same by the managers' draft; 24th, that the managers (vide rule 10) should have full power to settle all claims on policies. And the defendant says that the claim of the plaintiff has not been settled in manner provided by the said regulations, or either of them, nor has payment of the same by the manager's draft been ordered; seventh, that by the said regulations annexed to the said policy as in the said first count mentioned it was declared as follows: 12th, that all average claims be adjusted by a professional average, stater, according to the usage of Lloyd's, and delivered at the office of the manager, fifteen days previous to the periodical meeting of the committee (vide rule 10), to entitle the claimant to a settlement at such meeting; but should the committee or the assured be dissatisfied with such, they shall within ten days, notice being given to the managers, refer the same to two arbitrators, one to be chosen by the committee, and the other by the assured, who shall have the power to call in a third person to their aid, and the award of any two of such three persons shall be final, otherwise the decision of the committee to be conclusive. And the defendant says that the only claim of the plaintiff is an average claim within the meaning of the said regulations, and that the same has never been adjusted as provided for by the said regulations, and the plaintiff has never been ready and willing to have the same adjusted.

Demurrer to these pleas, the ground being that they confessed without avoiding, and joinder.

Herschell having been heard in reply, the court gave judgment as follows:—

MARTIN, B.—My brother Bramwell and I both think that the defendant is entitled to the judgment of the court. First, my impression is that the declaration is bad by reason of the omission to satisfy in some way or other the statement of the rule of the association, that in case of its becoming necessary to make any payment in respect of any loss or damage, "the amount to be borne and paid by each respective member of the association should upon each and every such occasion be assessed and apportioned by the committee upon and amongst the members of the association liable to contribute thereto." The plaintiff does not show either that that rule was satisfied, or that anything occurred which would entitle him to recover without an assessment being made. Secondly, I think the pleas are good. The seventh plea is identical with a plea in Tredwen v. Holman, which was held bad, and by that case we are bound. I think it is a sufficient answer to Mr. Butler's able contention that if people choose to make written contracts of this kind they must abide by them. No doubt it is an evil that there should be this excessive difficulty in maintaining an action, but the difficulty arises from the terms of the contract.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am of the same opinion. Mr. Butler has said all that could be said, but he is concluded both by the reason of the thing and by authority. I will first quote the beginning of my brother Martin's judgment in Tredwen v. Holman: "The case of Scott v. Avery decided that the insurer and underwriter may contract that no right of action (to be enforced in a court of law) shall accrue until an arbitrator has decided, not merely as to the amount of damages to be recovered, but upon any dispute that may arise upon the policy. The question, therefore, is one of construction, and we think the parties to this policy have so agreed." It is clear to my mind that the parties never contemplated that actions might be brought by one member against another. The suffering member was to make his claim to the committee, and they were to assess and apportion the amount according to the rules. Tredwen v. Holman is no authority for holding the declaration good, because there was an averment that all conditions precedent had been fulfilled. But here there is an exception—"except as aforesaid"—in the averment of the performance of the conditions precedent. Then we were pressed by the case of Strong v. Harvey (3 Bing. 304). That is certainly a remarkable case, and it was commented upon and distinguished by Wood, V.C., in Harvey v. Beckwith (2 H. & M. 429; 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 632).

The Vice-Chancellor says, "In Strong v. Harvey a policy had been granted, and the terms thereof were that the claim was to be paid within three months after it had been adjusted by a committee, named in the body of the policy itself; the action was brought against a member of the committee, who was also one of the underwriters of the policy, and all that was held was that he could not plead his own laches in not having made the adjustment in bar of the claim." Harvey v. Beckwith is really a strong authority in favour of our decision for the defendant, because the policy there was almost identical with that in the present case. The Vice-Chancellor's observation is applicable here. "The whole scheme is that the insurers are not to pay the insured directly, but the committee is to make an order, and the secretary is to draw upon the members in accordance therewith, and a fund is to be thereby raised out of which the losses are to be made good. One word as to the seventh plea. I think it is perfectly good. The only undertaking by the defendant was that he would pay according to the adjustment of the professional average-stater, or if the committee or the assured were dissatisfied with such, then that he would pay a sum to be fixed by arbitration.

THE FREEDOM.

Damage to cargo—Right to sue—24 Vict. c. 10, s. 6—18 & 19 Vict. c. 111—"Dangers of the seas"—Ventilation of ship's hold—Onus of proof.

In a suit for damage to cargo, and for improper delivery thereof by the consignees, who were also assignees of the bill of lading:

Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Admiralty) that the legal title having been transferred to and vested in the plaintiffs, the right of suing upon the contract was also transferred to them by force of the statute (18 & 19 Vict. c. 111). It was intended by this statute that the right of suing upon the contract under a bill of lading should follow the property in the goods therein specified—that is to say, the legal title to the goods as against the indorser.

The proximate cause of damage to oil-cake was that from the nature and collocation of a cargo of animal, vegetable, and (to some extent) putrescible matter, from sea-damage done to a portion of the cargo, from the packing and cramping of the ship so as to prevent any circulation of air, and from the closing of the hatches, the atmosphere in the ship's hold being without means of escape, became damp, heated, and vitiated:

Held that this proximate cause was not within the legal import of the exception "dangers of the seas":

Held, further, that it was enough for the plaintiffs to have established that the defendants had not performed their contract, since the defendants had failed to produce sufficient evidence of due provision for ventilation of the ship's hold, so as to throw the onus on the plaintiffs of proving that the damage might have been prevented by reasonable care and skill on the part of the defendants as shipowners.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Admiralty in a cause of damage to cargo instituted under sect. 6 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), to recover damages on account of alleged breaches of contract and duty on the part of the appellants with respect to certain parcels of oil-cake, which were laden on board the Freedom at New York, for carriage to and delivery in London.

The petition filed by the respondents alleged (so far as material) as follows:—

On or about Dec. 9, 1868, Messrs. Campbell and Thayer, of New York, caused to be shipped six parcels of goods, consisting each of 500 bags of oil-cake, marked respectively with certain marks and numbers, on board the Freedom, then lying at New York, to be conveyed from New York to London, upon the terms of six bills of lading, comprising respectively the said six parcels. These bills of lading were duly signed and delivered to Messrs. Campbell and Thayer, and were in form exactly similar to one another, the following being the material passage:—"Shipped in good order and well-conditioned by Campbell and Thayer on board the ship called the Freedom, whereof — is master, now lying in the port of New York and bound for London, to say (500) five hundred bags linseed-cake, being marked and numbered as in the margin, and are to be delivered in the like order and condition at the port of London (the dangers of the seas only excepted) unto order or to assigns, he or they paying freight for the said merchandise 17s. 6d. sterling per ton, with 5 per cent. primage and average accustomed of 2240lb. gross. In witness whereof the master or pursor of the said vessel hath affirmed to three bills of lading, all of this tenour and date, one of which being accomplished, the others to stand void. Dated in New York, Sept. 3, 1868. Weight unknown."

The bills of lading were afterwards indorsed by Campbell and Thayer to the respondents, who thereupon became the consignees of the oil-cake, and the assignees of the bills of lading within the true intent and meaning of sect. 6 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10). The oil-cake was (as the petition alleged) delivered much damaged and in much worse order and condition than when shipped, though this was not occasioned by dangers of the seas. And the six parcels were not delivered to the respondents separately; but 3000 bags were, by the master of the Freedom, mixed up without regard to marks or numbers, and without the damaged portion being separated from the undamaged.

The appellant's answer denied the aforesaid statements in the petition, and also alleged that the damage, if any, was occasioned by the dangers of the seas, or by the natural qualities of the oil-cake, and not by any breach of contract or by any negligence or breach of duty on the part of the master or crew of the Freedom. The cause was heard in the court below in Jan. 1870, and on March 4, 1870, Sir R. Phillimore gave judgment (reported 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 175) in favour of the respondents, and directed the usual reference to the registrar and merchants.

 The authorities cited are noticed in the judgment.

Judgment was delivered by Sir JAMES W. COLVILLE.—In this case a proceeding was instituted in the Court of Admiralty, under 23 Vict. c. 10, s. 6, by which jurisdiction has been given to the court over any claim by the owner or consignee, or assignee of any bill of lading, or any goods carried into any port of England or Wales in any ship, for damage done to the goods, or any part thereof, by the negligence or misconduct, or for the breach of any duty or breach of contract on the part of the master, owner, or crew. By this section a new remedy has been given to those who have a right of suit in any of the cases specified. By the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 111, the consignee of goods named in a bill of lading and the indorsee of a bill of lading, to whom the property in the goods mentioned shall have passed upon or by reason of such indorsement, shall have transferred to and vested in him all rights of suit and be subject to the same liabilities in respect of such goods as if the contract in the bill of lading had been made with himself. The transaction in the present case between the plaintiffs and the shippers of the goods in respect of which the suit was instituted, was one of a class described in the elaborate opinion of Mr. Justice Buller, delivered in the House of Lords, in which he shows that the nature of the dealing requires that the property in the goods specified in the bills of lading should be transferred to and vested in the indorsee thereof: (6 East, 29, n.) The plaintiffs were consignees for sale, but, as part of the transaction, a bill of exchange was drawn by the consignors for nearly the full value of the goods, the bills of lading were indorsed by them and forwarded to the plaintiffs, by whom the draft of the consignors was accepted and paid in due course. The legal title to the property in the goods specified in the bills of lading was thus transferred to and vested in the plaintiffs; the right of suing upon the contract in the bills of lading was transferred to them by force of the statute (18 & 19 Vict. c. 111). It was suggested in the argument that the applicability of this enactment was doubtful, in consequence of some words reported to have fallen from one of the learned barons in the Court of Exchequer, in the case of Fox v. Knott (6 H. & N. 305). But having regard to the facts of that case, and looking at the report in 30 L. J. 259, Ex., it would seem to have been intended to decide no more as to the construction of the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 111, than that it had no application to the case, and that to entitle the indorsee of a bill of lading to have transferred to and vested in him a right of suit as thereby enacted, the circumstances under which the bill of lading shall have been indorsed must be such that the property in the goods shall have passed to the indorsee by reason of the indorsement. The plaintiff in that case was the charterer, and, as such, the carrier. He had taken an assignment of the bill of lading upon the terms that freight should be paid. It was attempted on the part of the defendant to use the statute as having extinguished the right of the shipowner to freight, if he took an assignment of the bill of lading, whereby (it was argued) he had lost his remedy against the shipper for the freight. The court decided in favour of the plaintiff. Their Lordships are satisfied that it was intended by this Act that the right of suing upon the contract under a bill of lading, should follow the property in the goods therein specified; that is to say, the legal title to the goods as against the indorser. They entertain no doubt that in the present case the legal title was transferred to and vested in the plaintiffs, and that the subordinate right under the contract was transferred to them by the statute. The plaintiffs have brought their suit for non-performance of the contract stated in the bills of lading. There were six parcels of goods, each consisting of 500 bags of linseed cake; there was a separate bill of lading for each parcel. They are all in the same form, containing an acknowledgment of having received each parcel "in good order and well conditioned, and an undertaking to deliver them in like good order and condition at the port of London, the dangers of the sea only excepted." It was not disputed that the goods, for the damage to which the suit was brought, were not delivered in the order and condition in which they were shipped. But the question raised by the answers of the defendants is, whether this default was caused either by "the dangers of the seas," or by "the natural qualities of the oil-cake?" The onus of proving either branch of this defence lay upon the defendants. The former is founded on the express stipulation in the contract; the latter, on the implication of law. It would be unreasonable to make the shipowners responsible for deterioration or damage caused by latent imperfection or defects in the oil-cake, which could not be supposed to have been known to them at the time of the shipment. It was properly observed by Mr. Justice Neilson, in delivering the judgment of the court in the American case (Clark v. Barnwell, 12 Howard N. S. 272), cited in the argument, "that the acknowledgment in the bill of lading can only mean that as far as they had an opportunity of judging, the goods were sent in a perfectly good condition." The defendants in this suit were not precluded from showing (if they could) that the damaged oil-cake was imperfectly manufactured or insufficiently prepared for the voyage; or that it had some intrinsic defect, at the time of shipment, which caused the damage. A notice was served upon the defendants, on the part of the plaintiffs, before sending out a commission to America to take evidence on the subject. Having considered the evidence that was taken there, as well as that which was given in the Court of Admiralty, their Lordships are satisfied that the oil-cake was in good order and well-conditioned at the time of shipment. This disposes of one branch of the defence. The learned judge of the Court of Admiralty came to the conclusion upon the evidence, especially that of Dr. Letheby, that the damage complained of was mainly caused by the bones that formed part of the cargo. But at the same time he held that it was not necessary to found his judgment upon this, inasmuch as the onus was on the defendants to show, and that they had not shown, that this damage was caused by "dangers of the seas." Their Lordships are not prepared to say what may have been the actual or the relative effect of the bones, considered as a distinct item in the combination of concurrent causes, which led to and resulted in the damage to the oil-cake. The cargo was made up (amongst other things) of beef and pork below, and a large number of bags of oil-cake, some below and some above; clover seed behind; bones in the forehold, loose and in bulk, about 3ft.

THE FREEDOM.

from the oil-cake; a portion strewed about the bags of oil-cake, and some amongst tobacco. Every place was filled up so that no space was left in which any part of the cargo could be put. One of the witnesses for the defendants was asked his opinion as to the stowage with reference to allowing the air to circulate. His answer was—"I did not fancy she could have been stowed better. The ship was as full as she could possibly be stowed." That is to say, she was well stowed in the sense of being well crammed and closely packed; but (as the result showed) so as to prevent the circulation of air. At a subsequent stage, when there was no ventilation, and no outlet was left for heat and damp to escape, the bones may have gradually contributed to taint the atmosphere. That in such circumstances the oil-cake would be liable to become mouldy, is stated by competent witnesses on both sides. It is difficult, if not impracticable, to come to any satisfactory conclusion as to the relative effect of each of the concurrent causes that by their combination brought about the proximate cause of the damage. Causes mixte in themselves may be intensified in combination with others. The words in the bills of lading—"Dangers of the seas"—must, of course, be taken in the sense in which they are used in the policy of insurance. It is a settled rule of the law of insurance not to go into distinct causes, but to look exclusively to the immediate and proximate cause of the loss. In the present case, the remote causes are not only distinct from the proximate cause, but they are, for the most part, unconnected with dangers of the seas. If a shipowner undertakes to convey such a cargo, under the ordinary contract set forth in the bills of lading, he takes upon himself the risk of consequences and contingencies other than those which are within the express exception, or that which is implied by law. The question here is not one of negligence, but of breach of contract, as explained in the judgment delivered by Sir John Patteson in Tronson v. Dent (8 Moore's P. C. C. 433) The extent of sea damage done to some other parts of the cargo, so far as it was distinctly proved, was but limited, and the indirect effect of this damage is but a matter of conjecture. Some of the principal witnesses for the defendants (including the master) do not notice it at all, and some allude to it without relying much upon it. As to the closing of the hatches, the master assents to the suggestion made to him, that this may have had a share in causing the damage to the oil-cake, but he does not put it forward in the first instance. During the early part of the voyage (he says) he occasionally kept the hatches open, but during the last two-thirds of the voyage the weather was so tempestuous that he was under the necessity of closing them. He has not stated at what date this necessity arose, nor (except in this vague form) for what periods it continued. The log was not referred to; he did not make a protest after arrival at the port of London. The necessity must have ceased for some considerable period before the hatches were opened, on the third day after arrival, when there was such a rush of steam and heat as plainly indicated the absence of any means of escape for the confined and vitiated air during the time that the hatches were closed. One of the witnesses for the defendants says he thought it would have exploded the decks. Their Lordships have referred to the surveys and reports that were given in evidence, and have considered all the evidence relating thereto. They are of opinion that the conclusion proper to be drawn from the evidence is this, that from the nature and collocation of this cargo of animal, vegetable, and (to some extent) putrescible matter, the sea damage done to a portion of the cargo, the packing and cramming of the ship so as to prevent any circulation of air, and the closing of the hatches, the atmosphere in the ship's hold became heated, damp, and vitiated, without means of escape, and that this atmosphere was the proximate cause of the damage to the oil-cake, which is the subject of this suit. This proximate cause cannot be brought within the legal import of the exception of damages of the seas. In the American case (Clark v. Barnwell) (ubi sup.) that was referred to, it is said that where the defendants have brought their case within an exception in the contract, this shifts the onus upon the plaintiffs to prove that the damage might have been provided against and prevented by reasonable care and skill on the part of the shipowners. But in order to make this applicable, the defendants should first have given sufficient evidence to bring their case (prima facie at least) within such an exception. Their Lordships think that they have failed to do so in the present case. The simple truth is, that they did not make provision sufficient to enable them to fulfil their contract. They ought to have known that there were portions of the cargo which if deprived of ventilation, without circulation of air, and without an outlet for heated, damp, or vitiated air to escape, the result would be, in the natural course of things, that the oil-cake would be damaged. As they did not in fact provide sufficiently against such a natural, if not necessary, consequence, they imposed upon themselves the disability to fulfil the express contract into which they had entered under the bills of lading. In this view, it is not material to the plaintiffs whether the defendants are or are not chargeable with neglect, default, or providence. It is enough for the plaintiffs to have established that the defendants have not performed their contract, and have not sustained either of the defences which they have pleaded as a legal excuse for nonperformance. In this conclusion their Lordships agree with the learned judge of the Court of Admiralty. There was another part of the case, but of minor importance, as to the expenses incurred in the sorting and weighing, &c., in consequence of the state in which the goods were delivered and the mode of delivery. Whatever these expenses were, they will be ascertained and allowed by the proper officer of the Admiralty, and it is not necessary to give any further direction. Their Lordships will therefore, humbly advise Her Majesty that the judgment appealed against should be affirmed, and that the appeal be dismissed with costs.

THE GLENDUROR.

*Salvage—Appeal as to quantum awarded—Difference justifying interference of court of appeal—Division of salvage service.Salvage services, rendered with very great danger, materially contributed to save property worth 46,000*l.*, and twenty-seven lives. The Court of Admiralty awarded 1000*l.*, as compensation:Held (varying the judgment of the court below), that 2000*l.* would be a fair compensation; the salvors under the circumstances, being entitled, on the rule stated in The Clifton (3 Hagg. 121), to a "large and liberal" reward.In appeals as to quantum awarded, the difference ought to be very considerable (to the extent of one-third at least), in order to induce the court of appeal to interfere upon a question of mere discretion. The Chetah (19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 622), followed and approved.The defendants contended that the real meritorious service was on one night in saving life, and that what was done in the course of several subsequent days to the ship, in anchoring, unloading, pumping, and bringing her into port, consisted of ordinary services that any person might have rendered:Held, that it would not be right to split up the service of the salvors, or to treat it as other than one continuous salvage service rendered to life and property.This was an appeal from a decree of the judge of the High Court of Admiralty in a cause of salvage instituted against the ship or vessel Glenduror, the cargo laden on board thereof, and the freight due for the transportation of the same, and against the owners of the said vessel.In their petition the plaintiffs (the appellants) Jarvis Arnold, boatman, of Kingsdown, and others, alleged:—That at about eight o'clock p.m., on the 12th Feb. 1870, the Glenduror, a full rigged iron ship of 994·53 tons burden, after making signals of distress, came stern on to the shore a little to the northward of Kingsdown, having parted her cables in a tremendous gale which was then blowing.That the Kingsdown lifeboat was manned several times by the plaintiffs, who, with great danger and with the help of some sixty or seventy men, rescued twenty-nine persons from the Glenduror.That during the whole of the following week, the plaintiffs, eighty in number, besides the owners of the life boat, the lugger and the other boats mentioned in the petition, which were engaged, succeeded, by lightening the ship, landing and carefully warehousing part of her cargo, and by means of anchors and chains skilfully disposed, in getting the ship off and bringing her safely to London.That the Glenduror, her cargo, and freight as saved were of the total value of 46,000*l.The answer filed by the defendants (the respondents) admitted the saving of the twenty-nine persons, but alleged that the discharge of the cargo and salvage of the vessel was not performed by the plaintiffs, but by the master under the advice and assistance of the owner's agent and the crew of the vessel. The answer also alleged a tender of 500*l.* to the plaintiffs (the appellants), in full satisfaction and discharge of their services.*

The evidence offered on behalf of the plaintiffs went to show that the whole of the statements contained in the petition were true, and that the crew of the Glenduror were discharged and took no part in salvaging the ship and cargo.

The defendants called no evidence to rebut the plaintiffs' case or to support their own.

The learned judge in the court below found for the plaintiffs (the appellants), and awarded them the sum of 1000*l.* with costs.

This was the subject of appeal.

Judgment was delivered by Sir JAMES W. COLVILLE.—This is an appeal in a case of salvage from the Court of Admiralty, the salvors being dissatisfied with the quantum of remuneration which that court has thought fit to award them. Their Lordships have had to consider the question with that difficulty which has pressed upon this board in all these salvage cases, the great difficulty of laying down any principle by which they are to overrule what to a great extent must be considered as in the discretion of the court below, as a matter of individual estimate and opinion as to the value of certain services rendered, or the money which ought to be paid by the person to whom the services have been rendered, under all the circumstances of the case. In some cases (The Carrier Dove, 2 Moo. P. C., N. S., 254; The Fusilier, 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 699: 3 Moo. P. C., N. S., 69; The Cuba, Lush. 14) which have been referred to in the course of the argument, the difficulty has been put in very strong language; that is to say, that this committee would not enter into the question of quantum where there has been nothing to shock the conscience, nothing gross, nothing extravagant. In the case of The Chetah (19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 622; 38 L. J. 1, Adm.), in which this expression is quoted, there follows a more accurate expression of the rule according to their Lordships' view, that is to say, "It is, however, a settled rule, and one of great utility, particularly with reference to cases of this description, that the difference ought to be very considerable to induce the Court of Appeal to interfere upon a question of mere discretion." Now the facts of the case are really not in dispute. The judgment on the facts of the learned judge of the Court of Admiralty has not been questioned before us by either side, and it is not necessary for their Lordships to refer to the facts in any other terms than those which the learned judge himself has used in stating the nature of the case, and the circumstances under which the matter came before him for decision. The judgment ends thus:—"Seeing, then, that these services saved life while they were attended by certainly very great danger, which deterred the crew who went in the first from going in the other expeditions, the question is whether 500*l.* is a sufficient remuneration for having materially contributed to save property of the large value of 48,000*l.*" (it should be 46,000*l.*), "and having saved the lives of twenty or twenty-two men" (it ought to be twenty-seven, including the woman and child) "who were on board; and having also to some extent perilled their own lives in the services which they rendered; and I am of opinion that it is not," in which conclusion their Lordships entirely agree. But taking that as the true state of the case, their Lordships have to apply the rule which is probably best laid down in the case of The Clifton (3 Hagg. 121), where Lord Stowell expresses himself as follows: "Now, salvage is not always a mere compensation for work and labour. Various circumstances upon public considerations, the interest of commerce, the benefit and security of navigation, the lives of the seamen render it proper to estimate a salvage reward upon a more enlarged and liberal scale. The ingredients of a salvage service are—first, enterprise in the salvors in going out in tempestuous weather to assist a vessel in distress, risking their own lives to save their fellow creatures, and to rescue the property of their fellow subjects; secondly, the degree of danger and distress from which the property is rescued, whether it were in imminent peril or almost certainly lost, nothing out of it rescued and preserved; thirdly, the degree of labour and skill which the salvor incurred and displayed, and the time occupied; lastly, the value. Where all those circumstances concur, a large and liberal reward ought to be given." But he goes on: "Where none or hardly any, then the thing ought to be pro opere et labore." Applying that to the facts as stated by the judge of the Court of Admiralty in his judgment, their Lordships are of opinion, under all the circumstances of the case—not forgetting that to a great extent there possibly was not that very great peril of life which was stated in the case of the salvors, and that that peril was diminished after the first few hours; but still, having regard to all the circumstances which have been admitted and proved,—that the "large and liberal" reward in this case ought certainly to be something more than 1000*l.*, which the learned judge has awarded; and they have on the whole, having regard to the very large value of the property saved, and to the long list of cases in none of which do they find such a small proportionate remuneration as this given, come to the conclusion that 2000*l.* would be a fair sum to award to the salvors. They have not omitted to weigh what was much pressed on them, that the real meritorious service was, on the first night, in saving the lives, and that what was done afterwards to the ship—the anchoring, the unloading, the pumping, and the going round to the Thames—were ordinary services which any person might have rendered. But their Lordships do not think it right to split up the services of salvors in this way, or to treat it as other than one continuous salvage service rendered to life and property. They have, moreover, showed in this case, that according to the evidence of the salvors (wholly uncontradicted), the ship was left entirely to their care for several days; that what was devised and done was devised and done by them, and that they acted with great promptitude at a time when every hour might have been of vital importance. With respect to the amount of difference of estimate which would justify their Lordships to review the decision of the learned judge, they were referred to a case in which this court differed to the extent of one-third. Unless the difference amounted at least to that they would not have interfered, but they think in this case the difference is so considerable as to induce their Lordships to differ and to express that difference in the judgment which they have pronounced. The appellants to have the costs of the appeal.

Judgment varied.

Reported by H. F. PURCELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

March 1 and 28, 1871.

THE TEUTONIA.

Outbreak of war—Liability of shipowner for not delivering cargo—His right to freight pro rata itineris.

A state of war may exist de facto between two countries, although there has been no formal declaration of war by their governments.

A Prussian ship, carrying a cargo of nitrate of soda (contraband of war) arrived off Dunkirk, to which port she had been ordered by the consignees of cargo, and whilst lying there waiting for the tide, her master heard that war had broken out between France and Prussia, and he thereupon put back to the Downs, where he arrived on July 17, to make inquiries, but hearing nothing more, and being stopped by his owner, he put into Dover on the 18th, and there getting intelligence, refused to proceed to Dunkirk. The ship was running under charter entitling her to be sent to a safe port. War was not actually declared till July 19, but was imminent on July 16.

Held, that the ship on July 16 was not bound to go to Dunkirk, as she would have been liable to penalties for trading with the enemies of her country and capture by French cruisers; that even if war did not actually exist till July 19 that the master was justified in pausing for a reasonable time to make inquiries, and that under the circumstances he did not exceed that time by staying in Dover till after the declaration of war.

Whilst the ship was lying at Dover, the consignees demanded the delivery of cargo without any payment of freight. The master refused to deliver without payment.

Held, that the master was entitled to freight pro rata itineris.

THIS was a cause instituted under the 5th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, by Messrs. Duncan, Fox, and Co., of Liverpool, consignees of bill of lading of cargo laden on board the Teutonia against the said ship and her freight, and against David August Köster, of Hamilwörden, in Hanover, merchant, the owner of the said vessel, for damages consequent on the non-delivery of 2742 bags of nitrate of soda, the property of the plaintiff, then forming the cargo of the said ship.

The Teutonia was a Prussian vessel, and her owner was a Prussian subject, and in April 1870, she was at the port of Pisagua, where she shipped the above mentioned cargo under the following bill of lading, signed by her master.

Shipped in good order and condition, by Sawers, Duncan, and Co., of Valparaiso, under the ship Teutonia, whereof Köster is master for this present voyage, and now lying in the port of Pisagua, and bound for Cork, Cowes, or Falmouth, for orders 2742 bags, weighing in all 7623 quintals net Spanish weight, being marked and numbered as per margin, to be delivered in the like good order and condition at port of discharge, the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation of whatever nature and kind soever excepted, unto Messrs. Duncan, Fox, and Co., or assigns, freight for the said goods to be paid as per charter party, with primage and average accustomed. In witness whereof the master or purser of the said ship or vessel hath affirmed to three bills of lading, all of this tenor and date, the one of which bills being accomplished the others to stand void.—Dated in Pisagua, this 5th day of April 1870.

THE TEUTONIA.

The vessel was then running under a charter party, which is set out in the judgment. She proceeded to Falmouth, where she arrived on July 10th, 1870, and on the following day received orders to proceed to Dunkirk, which is a French port. On July 16th she arrived off Dunkirk, but the master having heard that war had broken out between France and Prussia, put back to the Downs, and arrived there on July 17th. Getting no information he telegraphed to his owner, and received an answer forbidding him to go to Dunkirk; and on Tuesday, July 19th, he took the ship into Dover, as the safest place. War was not actually declared by the French until July 20th, as from July 19th, but the relations between France and North Germany were disturbed some days before. The ship could not have got into Dunkirk before the evening of July 17th, as the tide did not serve. The cargo was contraband of war, and would have been liable to have been seized both by French and Prussian cruisers. The master refused to proceed to Dunkirk, and also declined to deliver the cargo at Dover when it was demanded by the consignees, after the formal declaration of war, unless on payment by the consignees of the whole freight, or the whole freight less the amount of expense in proceeding to Dunkirk. The master further offered to take the cargo to London, on the payment of the whole freight, but the consignees demanded the cargo without any payment whatsoever.

The defendants answer contained the following articles amongst others:

3. By reason of the premises, and of war having been declared and having broken out between Prussia and France after the making of the charter party and after the sailing of the Teutonia from Valparaiso, it became and was illegal according to the laws of Prussia, as well as the law of nations, for the master of the said vessel to proceed with the said cargo to Dunkirk; wherefore the master refused, as he lawfully might, to proceed with the said cargo to Dunkirk, and to deliver the same there, and proceeded to Dover, being a proper port in that behalf.

3a. If war between Prussia and France had not been declared or had not broken out at the time when the said master made default, as in the fourth article of the petition alleged, the said war was imminent and reasonably believed by the said master to have broken out and to have been declared; wherefore the said master, as he reasonably might, proceeded to a place, which was a reasonable place in that behalf, for the purpose of making inquiries and for the safety of the ship and cargo; and before a reasonable time for making such inquiries and for proceeding, as ordered, to Dunkirk had elapsed, war had broken out and been declared between France and Prussia; wherefore the master, as he lawfully might, refused to proceed with the said cargo, and to deliver the same there, which is the default in the said fourth article alleged.

To this the plaintiffs demurred, and further pleaded the ship might have proceeded to Dunkirk on July 18th, before war was declared, and did not in consequence of orders received from the owner.

The evidence of the declaration of war and the disturbance of relations between France and Prussia, is fully set out in the judgment.

March 1.—Butt, Q.C. (Clarkson with him), for the plaintiff.—It must be admitted that by the law of Prussia it is unlawful to trade with an enemy, but at the time that the ship ought to have gone into Dunkirk, Prussia was not at war with France. The first breach was, not going into Dunkirk on July 17th when the tide served; the second, not going there on July 18th and in putting into Dover, when there had been opportunity to know that war had not been declared; the third, in not delivering the cargo at Dover. When war breaks out the contract becomes illegal, and is therefore dissolved; but the defendants must show that war has broken out before they can be excused from performance: (Paradyne v. Jane, Aleyn's Rep. 26.) This case shows that where a person has by his own contract created a duty or charge upon himself, he is bound to make it good if he can; notwithstanding any accident or inevitable necessity, because he might have provided against it by his contract. Here the master could have proceeded to Dunkirk, and he is therefore bound to do so as long as he is not physically prevented. There was nothing to prevent him from proceeding before the outbreak of the war, the defendant is bound to show that he is excused from the contract. He would have been if war had broken out on July 16th, but it did not until July 19th. It will be contended that the master is entitled to reasonable delay and time to make up his mind: (Pole v. Cetcovich, 9 C. B., N. S., 430; 3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 438; 30 L. J. 102, C. P.) This is no authority either way. No authority for saying masters may wait if war is imminent. Atkinson v. Ritchie (10 East, 530), shows that a master must have something more than a fear that war will break out and that his ship may be seized. Clear default on July 18th, even if war had broken out on July 19th, as the master might then have put into Dunkirk without danger. The charterers might send the ship to other ports. Orders were given and accepted on July 11th to proceed to Dunkirk. Defendant must contend that the contract is rescinded by outbreak of war. If so, the plaintiffs are entitled to delivery of cargo at once without freight:

Avery v. Bowden, 6 E. & B. 953; 26 L. J. 3, Q. B. (Ex. Ch.);

Reid v. Hoskins, 6 E. & B. 953; 26 L. J. 5, Q. B. (Ex. Ch.);

Esposito v. Bowden, 27 L. J. 17, Q. B.; 7 E. & B. (Ex. Ch.) 763.

Abbot on Shipping, 9th edit. p. 435.

It is laid down here that a contract is dissolved on the outbreak of hostilities, even in the case where they commence, after the voyage was begun, and where there is no contract no freight can be earned. There is no implied promise to pay compensation for carrying goods a part of a voyage unless they are voluntarily accepted short of their destination. Freight cannot be earned under a charter-party unless the voyage has been completed: Osgood v. Groning (2 Camp. 466). A shipowner has no claim to freight pro rata itineris, except the consignee accepts the goods short of the destination, so that the law may imply a new agreement, and no freight is payable, nor can the shipowner claim freight if the owner of cargo is compelled to take the cargo at a port short of the chartered port. There must be a voluntary acceptance of the goods to sustain a claim for a pro rata freight, so as to show that the further carriage was dispensed with:

government would have punished him for his acts if he had gone to Dunkirk. The ship was liable to be seized by German cruisers as well as French: (Osgood v. Groning, 2 Camp, 465.) Although this is the decision of Lord Ellenborough, it was only at Nisi Prius, and it was a case where the jury found that the master unreasonably failed to perform his contract. There was no request to give up goods short of destination. If consignee demands goods, he must pay pro rata. The ship is entitled by the charter-party to go to a port safe by law as well as by nature: (Ogden v. Graham, 31 L. J. 26, Q. B.; 1 B. & S. 733; 5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 396.) If charterer does not send ship to such port, he is in default, and must pay whole freight and demurrage. The master was justified in using reasonable precautions: (Pole v. Cetcovich, 9 C. B., N. S., 430.) Paradyne v. Jane and Ritchie v. Atkinson were cited to show that, if a person contracts to do what is impossible, he must perform it or suffer the consequences, even though there be danger. Here, however, the contract is dissolved by becoming illegal through the outbreak of war subsequent to the forming of the contract:

Maclachlan on Shipping, p. 463;

Exposito v. Bowden, 27 L. J. 17, Q. B. (Ex. Ch.); 7 E. & B. 763, Ex. Ch.

Their real cause of action was the deviation on July 16 and 17. The master was entitled to deviate in this case to make inquiries. His contract was not, not to deviate, but not to deviate without necessity. He did not mean to abandon his contract, but went to Dover to make enquiries.

Clarkson, in reply.—Deviation is always a breach of contract. It avoids a contract of insurance. A person who has bound himself to do a thing must do it, and is not excused by its impossibility:

Hall v. Wright, 29 L. J. 43, Q. B.; 1 L. T. Rep. N. S. 230,

If a contract is dissolved by the outbreak of war, it cannot be revived so as to give the shipowner the right to set up an implied contract to pro rata freight. There is now no contract on which freight can become payable.

March 28.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is a cause instituted under the 6th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, on behalf of Messrs. Duncan, Fox, and Co., of Liverpool, the consignees of a bill of lading of cargo laden on board the ship Teutonia, against that ship and her freight, and against Daniel August Köster, of Hamelwörden, a merchant and owner of the said vessel. The plaintiffs pray that the ship and freight, if any, may be condemned in damages for breach of contract. The Teutonia was a German or Prussian brig, subject to the laws of Prussia, and her master and crew were subject to the King of Prussia. In the month of April, 1870, she was lying in the port of Pisagua, on the coast of Bolivia. On the 1st Feb. her master had entered into a charter-party with Messrs. Sawers, Duncan, and Co., a branch at Valparaiso of the Liverpool firm, who are the suitors in this court, by which he undertook that the brig should "proceed to the port of Iquique where, or at one adjacent port, she shall receive and take on board a full and complete cargo of nitrate of soda in bags not exceeding what she can reasonably stow and carry over and above her cabin tackle, apparel, provisions, and furniture;" and it was "thereby mutually agreed that the vessel should not load more than 7800 quintals Spanish weight." It was further stipulated as follows: "That, after receiving on board the said cargo, stowing it in the customary manner, and being duly cleared out at the Custom House, the said vessel shall proceed either to Cork, Cowes, or Falmouth, at the option of the master, where he shall receive orders from charterers' agents, within three days after his arrival, to proceed to any one safe port in Great Britain or on the Continent between Havre and Hamburg, both included, and there, according to bills of lading and charter party, deliver the cargo, which is to be discharged and taken from alongside as fast as the customs of the port will admit. The freight to be paid, in manner hereinafter mentioned, on a true and right delivery of the cargo in the port of discharge, at, and after the rate of 45s. British sterling." The bill of lading, dated the 5th April, was as follows: [His Lordship here read the bill of lading before set out.] It appears from the evidence taken before me that the cargo, nitrate of soda, though used for agricultural purposes, is an ingredient in gunpowder, and that the prospect of war would raise the price of it in the market, but that no report of any war between France and Prussia had reached the Valparaiso firm at the time when this article was put on board the Teutonia. The brig arrived at Falmouth on the 10th July, and there, on the 11th July, received orders to take the cargo to Dunkirk. She arrived at a distance of about fourteen miles off that port at twelve o'clock at night of the 16th, which was a Saturday; and the master says that, after laying to for about two hours, a regular pilot in official uniform came on board; that he (the master) asked the pilot about the war, of which he had heard rumours at Falmouth; that the pilot told him it had been declared two days ago; that he asked the pilot where he could bring him in safety, so that he might ascertain whether war was declared or not; that the pilot offered to take him to Flushing or the Downs, or wherever he liked. According to the evidence there would not have been water enough for the Teutonia to have entered the port of Dunkirk till after four o'clock on the evening of the 17th. It is not unimportant to observe that she could not have entered that port before that time. The master elected to go to the Downs, and he anchored there on Sunday morning, the 17th, at ten o'clock. He says that on that day he could obtain no advice or information; that on the Monday, the 18th, he telegraphed to the owner (who was his father), and received an answer forbidding him (this came out on cross-examination) to go to Dunkirk; and that on Tuesday the 19th, he took the ship into Dover as the nearest or safest place. He added that he did not go to Dunkirk because war had broken out, being afraid for the safety of his ship, himself, and his crew in a French port, and also being afraid of punishment when he returned to his own country. On the Monday he was on shore at Deal, and the German consul told him that war had broken out. Upon this state of facts, the first question of law is raised in this case. It is averred by the plaintiffs that the master made default in obeying the proper orders given to him, and that on this account the owners of the ship are liable in damages. On the other hand, it is contended by the defendants, upon the pleadings as amended, "first, that war having been declared and having broken out between Prussia and France after the making of the charter-party, and after the sailing of the Teutonia from Valparaiso, it became and was illegal, according to the laws of Prussia, as well as the law of nations, for the master of the said vessel to proceed with the said cargo to Dunkirk, wherefore the master refused, as he lawfully might, to proceed with the cargo to Dunkirk and to deliver the same there, and proceeded to Dover, being a proper port in that behalf;" and secondly, it was contended "that if war between Prussia and France had not been declared, or had not broken out at the time when the said master made default as in the 4th article of the petition alleged, the said war was imminent and reasonably believed by the said master to have broken out and to have been declared, wherefore the said master, as he reasonably might, proceeded to a place which was a reasonable place in that behalf for the purpose of making inquiries, and for the safety of the ship and cargo, and before a reasonable time for making such inquiries, and for proceeding as ordered to Dunkirk had elapsed, war had broken out, and been declared between France and Prussia, wherefore the master, as he lawfully might, refused to proceed with the said cargo, and to deliver the same there, which is the default in the said fourth article alleged." The reply stated the arrival of the ship off Dunkirk on the 16th, and charged that "instead of entering the seaport, as she could and ought to have done, for the purpose of discharging her said cargo, she sailed thence to the Downs, and there anchored on the morning of the 17th July 1870, and whilst she was so anchored and before war had been declared or broken out as alleged in the said answer, the defendant on the 18th July 1870, who at such time knew, or had the means of knowing, that the said war had not been declared or broken out, ordered the master of the said ship not to proceed with his vessel and her cargo to Dunkirk, but to put back to Dover, and thereupon and before the said war had been declared or broken out, the master of the said ship wrongfully and in breach of the terms of the said charter-party and bill of lading proceeded with his vessel to Dover." It was admitted during the course of the argument by the counsel for the plaintiffs that on and after the 19th, the date of the formal declaration of war by the French Government, the Teutonia was not bound to carry cargo to Dunkirk. I am, therefore, relieved from the necessity of considering whether any relaxation of the strict laws of war by the order of the French Government after or at the same time with the declaration of war, would affect this case. It was proved, as I have already stated, that the Teutonia could not have entered the port before the afternoon of the 17th. The charge against her therefore of making default in delivering of the cargo is narrowed in point of time to the period elapsing between the afternoon of the 17th and the morning of the 19th. It is during this interval that this utile tempus occurred during which it is maintained that she ought to have delivered her cargo at Dunkirk. It is argued that two distinct breaches of contract took place during this interval: the first breach is, the not going into Dunkirk on the 17th, the second is not returning from Dover to Dunkirk on the 18th. As it seems to me that no substantial distinction exists as to the principle of law upon which these two breaches are charged, I shall endeavour to deal with them together, and not separately. It must be remembered that the Teutonia is a Prussian ship, subject to Prussian municipal law, as well as to general international law, and it has been admitted before me that, though no formal proof of the Prussian law has been given in evidence, it may be assumed that the maxim that a ship trading with the enemy of the state to which it belongs incurs the severest penalties, is a part of that law. The principal contention of the plaintiffs upon this part of the case has been, that war between France and Prussia was not declared until the 19th; but I think there can be no doubt that war may exist de facto, so as to affect at least the subjects of the belligerent state, either without a declaration on either side, or before a declaration, or with a unilateral declaration only. This is a position fortified by the opinions of great international jurists, down to the judgments of Lord Stowell in our own time: (The Nayade, 4 Rob. 251, 253; The Eliza Jane, 1 Dod. 244, 247), as well as by historical precedents relating both to foreign countries and to our own during the last century. To take only one instance, when, in 1761, in a negotiation which preceded the close of one of the most memorable wars which England ever waged, France demanded that "captures before the declaration, except King's ships, should be restored, or a recompense made, because taken contrary to the law of nations," it was replied on behalf of England that "the demand of restitution of captures before the war cannot be admitted, for it is not founded upon any particular convention, nor yet resulting from the law of nations; for the right of hostilities does not result from a formal declaration of war, but from the hostilities which the aggressor first offered;" (5 Ann. Reg. (1761), p. 260; 4 Ann. Reg. Art. 10; 3 Phil. Inter. Law, p. 87.) In 1854 the British declaration of war against Russia was not issued until the 29th March, but the Russian ambassador left England on the 8th Feb. It is notorious that the relations between France and Russia had been seriously disturbed from the 5th July. On that day Lord Lyons wrote to the Government of this country that the French Government had learnt that the Crown of Spain had been offered to and accepted by Prince Leopold of Hohenzollern, and that they had signified to the Prussian ambassador that they would not permit the establishment of any Prussian prince upon the throne of Spain. On the 8th July it was communicated from the same quarter to the British Government that the French Government found it impossible to refrain any longer from making military preparations, and at the time when the Teutonia arrived at Falmouth, namely, on the 12th, the apparent imminence of war was such as to alarm all Europe, and must have been perfectly well known to the charterers when they ordered this vessel to sail for Dunkirk, where the market for her cargo would, as the evidence shows, be raised by the probability of its being used for the manufacture of gunpowder. On the 15th July it was publicly announced in the French newspapers, that the French Government had made a formal declaration, both in the Corps Legislatif and in the senate, that the Prussian Ambassador had been told to demand his passport; that further attempts at conciliation were impossible. "Nous n'avons rien negligé pour eviter une guerre, nous allons nous preparer a celle qu'on nous offre." On the 16th July Lord Granville telegraphed to Lord Lyons, "The mercantile people in this country are anxious to know whether neutral vessels will be allowed by the belligerent powers to sail to and from French and German ports with cargoes for a specified time. Many ships, I am informed, are now loading in British ports for both countries. Ascertain this point without delay." And on the same day Lord Granville wrote to Lord Lyons, "Her Majesty's Government cannot doubt that the principles recorded in the declaration of Paris on the 16th April 1856, will be scrupulously acted on by the belligerents in the present war; but the Imperial Government may perhaps be disposed formerly to announce that, for its part, they will form the rule of its conduct in prosecution of hostile operations by sea." On the same date Lord Granville wrote, that the French Ambassador had called upon him and said that his Government intended on breaking off relations with North Germany; to place French subjects in the North German Confederation under the protection of the British Ambassador, ministers, and consuls. For these facts I have hitherto relied upon the correspondence presented to both Houses of Parliament, by command of her Majesty; I now advert to the telegram of the Prussian Minister, Count Bismarck, to the Prussian Ambassador at London, which was put in evidence before me.

1 45 a.m.

In consequence of the news of the open declaration made this day by the French Minister, which declaration appears to be equal to a declaration of war, the mobilisation of the whole of the North German army has been ordered, and a request has been addressed to the Governments of North Germany to place their forces on a war footing.

To His Excellency

The Royal Minister of State,
The Count Bernstorff.

London.

It appears from the evidence of Mr. Von Schmid that he telegraphed this intelligence to the Prussian Consul at Dover, and communicated it the same day to the Prussian Consul-General in London. On the same date the French newspaper, the Journal Officiel, contained a further statement of the French Government to the Senate as to the preparations for war. In this state of facts I am of opinion that the Teutonia would have incurred a double risk in proceeding to Dunkirk; she would have been exposed to the peril of being seized by a French cruiser on the ground of her Prussian nationality, and of being seized by a Prussian cruiser on the ground of her trading with and carrying contraband of war to the enemy. The information which the pilot gave her off Dunkirk was substantially correct. War had in fact broken out, or was so imminent as to render Dunkirk an unsafe port for a Prussian vessel. In the case of the Ariel decided by the Privy Council in 1857, their Lordships said "it is argued that war cannot be said to be imminent unless there be an embargo, or some similar act of the country about to be belligerent, and cases are cited in which such circumstances have occurred, but none of those cases go the length of laying down any positive rule as to the necessity of such circumstances: (11 Moo. P. C. Rep. 129; 3 Phill. Inter. Law p. xlvi, add.) The old case of Paradyne v. Jane (Aley's Rep. p. 27), and others founded upon the principle therein contained have been cited to me as authorities for the contention that the Teutonia was guilty of a breach of contract in not proceeding to Dunkirk, even in the circumstances which I have stated. The propositions of law in Paradyne v. Jane are, "where the law creates a duty or charge, and the party is disabled to perform it without any default in him, and hath no remedy over, there the law will excuse him; . . . but when the party by his own contract creates a duty or charge upon himself he is bound to make it good, if he may, notwithstanding any accident by inevitable necessity, because he might have provided against it by his contract." But assuming that this is at present a correct exposition of the law of England (though the last proposition is, I think, not in harmony with the jurisprudence of any other European state), it does not seem to me to affect this case. Indeed it has not been denied that if the contract has become illegal in virtue of a law subsequent to it, the non-execution of the contract is no breach. Item: quod leges fieri prohibent, si perpetuam causam servaturum est, cessat obligatio: (Dig. lib. xlv. Tit. I., s. 35.) This doctrine of the civil law is also laid down by Lord Ellenborough in the case of Atkinson v. Ritchie (10 East, 534). "Neither can it," he says, "be questioned that if from a change in the political relations and circumstances of the country, with reference to any other contracts which were fairly and lawfully made at the time, they had become incapable of being any longer carried into effect without derogating from the clear public duty which a British subject owes to his sovereign and the state of which he is a member, the non-performance of a contract in a state so circumstanced is not only excusable, but a matter of peremptory duty and obligation on the part of the subject. But in order to found the new public duty, which is to supersede the performance of his former private one, it is necessary that an actual change in the political relations of the two countries should have taken place; and that the danger to result to the public interests of his own country from an observance of the contract should be clear, immediate, and certain. In short, such a state of circumstances must be shown to exist, as that the contract is no longer capable of being performed by him without a criminal compromise of his public duty. Can anything of this kind," he continues, "be said with truth to exist in the present case? No actual change in the political relations of Great Britain and Russia had then taken place. The danger to result from remaining at Cronstadt was neither immediate nor certain, in point of fact it attached only at the distance of many weeks afterwards, and no one can venture to suggest, even in argument, that the loading in question might not have been completed without any criminal compromise of public duty." This was a case in which the impediment to the fulfilment of the contract was the apprehension of an embargo, the future effect of which is always doubtful, and to which considerations apply other than those which apply to a state of actual war, the end of which cannot be foreseen. Whereas an ordinary embargo imposes only a temporary restraint upon the performance of the contract. It is "an act," as Lord Stowell says, "hostile enough in the mere execution, but equivocal as to its effects, and liable to be varied by subsequent events, and by the conduct of the Government, the property of whose subjects is so detained:" (The Boedes Lust, 5 Rob. 233, 245.) But when an embargo is imposed in the nature of reprisals and partial hostility, the merchant, it is laid down by Lord Tenterden, may put an end to the contracts if the voyage is likely to be defeated by the delay: (Abbott on Shipping, p. 429, 10th edit.) In the subsequent case of Barker v. Hodgson (3 M. & Selw. Rep. 267, 270), Lord Ellenborough said: "If indeed the performance of this covenant had been rendered unlawful by the Government of this country, the contract would have been dissolved on both sides, and this defendant, inasmuch as he had been thus compelled to abandon his contract, would have been excused for the non-performance of it, and not liable to damages." These and other cases were fully reviewed and confirmed in the more recent judgment of the Exchequer Chamber, in the case of Esposito v. Bowden (1857, 7 Eil. & Bl. 763). In that case Mr. Justice Willes said: "The principal question in the case is as to the validity of the plea. It is in effect, whether a charter-party, made before the late Russian war between an English merchant and a neutral shipowner, whereby it was agreed that the neutral vessel should proceed to Odessa, a port of Russia, and there load from the freighter's factors a complete cargo of wheat, seed, or other grain, and proceed therewith to Falmouth, with usual provisions as to laying days and demurrage, was dissolved by the war between England and Russia, alleged by the charterer in his plea, which is to be taken as true for the purpose of the present discussion to have broken out before the vessel arrived at Odessa, and to have continued up to and during the time when the loading was to have taken place, it being further alleged in the plea that, from the time war was declared, it became and was impossible for the charterer to perform his agreement without dealing and trading with the Queen's enemies." The court, reversing the sentence of the Queen's Bench, held the plea to be valid. Willes, J., concludes the judgment in these words: "The plea alleges that the contract could not have been fulfilled without such dealing and trade. That, as we have already shown upon grounds not considered in the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, may be true. If it may, then, inasmuch as the law justifies what it commands, and effects that purpose, in cases like the present, by dissolving contracts which presumably cannot be executed without dealing and trading with the enemy, the plea is sufficient." In the case before me the law of France, the state to which the port belonged, did not, it is true, prevent the unloading at Dunkirk; but the law of Prussia, the state to which the ship belonged, prevented it. "The contract," as Lord Ellenborough says, "was no longer capable of being performed by the master without a criminal compromise of his duty;" for I think it might be reasonably maintained that the prohibition was as stringent in the one case as in the other, and that the same legal consequences flow from either state of things. I think that on the 16th July the Teutonia could not have entered Dunkirk with her cargo without being exposed to the penalties of trading with the enemy of her country. But if this be an erroneous application of the law to the facts at this date, the next question which arises is whether the circumstances did not justify her pausing and making further inquiries before she entered the port. I am of opinion that they did justify her in so doing, and that she was entitled to take reasonable measures within a reasonable time for this purpose. The law would be most unreasonable, I think, if it considered such a cause to be breach of contract; and I derive confirmation of my opinion on this point from the judgment of the Common Pleas in the case of Pole v. Cetcovich (2 F. & Fin. Rep. 104; 9 C. B., N. S., 430). Now what were the steps taken by the master of the Teutonia? He goes back to Dover on the 17th, which was a Sunday, and when, he says, he could obtain no advice or information. On Monday (the 18th) he telegraphed to his owner, and was ordered not to go to Dunkirk, and on the 19th he went into Dover, on which day, as I have already said, it is admitted that the law prevented him from executing his contract. It is said that he did not communicate with the charterers, but I am unable to see how any communication from them could, having regard to the facts and dates which I have already mentioned, have required him to go to Dunkirk on the 18th or even on the 17th, if he could have communicated with them on that day. I must add that the telegram which was received at Dover on the 23rd, shows that the master had probably not taken a wrong view of his duty to his own country. It was as follows: "From Bernstorff to North German Vice-Consul, Dover.—Try immediately to prevent North German ship Teutonia, Captain Koster, from going to Dunkirk." I am of opinion that the master of the Teutonia was entitled to pause and take a reasonable time for making further inquiries as to the existing relations between his own country and France, and that he did not exceed the limits of a reasonable time in making the inquiry, and after the inquiry had been made, it is admitted that the contract could not on account of the war be executed. I now come to the second branch of the case, namely, whether the owner of the ship is liable in damages because the master did not deliver the goods to the plaintiffs at Dover. It appears from the evidence that various attempts at negotiation on this subject passed between the master and the charterers; but that on the part of the charterers it never assumed the shape of a definite offer of pro rata freight, and that on the part of the owner the master offered on the 24th July to deliver the cargo on payment of freight and receipt of an indemnity against all consequences of not proceeding on the voyage; and on the 1st Aug. he offered to remit so much of the freight as would equal his expenses at Dunkirk (somewhere about 50l.), or to take the cargo to London for the same freight as to Dunkirk. On the same day the charterers proposed to transship the cargo on billyboys if the master would pay the expenses, and he refused. It does not appear that the charterers required him to proceed to any port mentioned in the charter party, except Dunkirk, at any time. The question of law arising on these facts is, whether the master was bound to deliver the cargo without any payment in respect of freight. The general rule that freight is due only where the goods are delivered at the port of destination, is subject to exceptions and modifications: and these exceptions or modifications may arise out of the terms of an express contract, out of an implied contract, or out of the equity between the parties. The law of England as administered in the courts of common law, requires the master to carry the goods to the place of destination unless prevented by an unavoidable casualty, and requires the merchant, if the goods be so delivered, to pay the stipulated freight. If the ship be disabled from completing her voyage, the master may still earn the whole freight by making, within reasonable time, the necessary repairs to the ship, or by sending the goods in another ship to the place of their destination; but if he decline to do this, the merchant is entitled to do this without payment of freight, the contract not having been performed; on the other hand, if the merchant refuse to allow the reasonable time for repairs, or the transmission of the goods at once, he must pay the whole freight, having prevented the performance of the contract. But if the ship be by inevitable necessity forced into a port short of her destination and is unable to prosecute her voyage, and if the merchant voluntarily accepts the goods at that port, he must pay a pro rata freight. The cases in which this principle is laid down are those in which a physical impossibility has prevented the execution of the contract. But where a moral or legal impossibility supervenes, the contract is dissolved. Here the law of England and the general law are in harmony. Donellus says, "Placet casus fortuitus nullo bonæ fidei iudicio itemque a nemine præstari." . . . "casus fortuitus, definitur casus qui peævidari non protest aut præviso resisti non potest:" (De Jure Civili, l. xvi., c. 6, §§ 11, 12.) And here the maxim of the Roman law, "Nemo tenetur ad impossibilia," derived from common sense and natural equity, is adopted and applied by the law of England. It has, however, been argued that the contract was dissolved by the supervening circumstance of the war, and that the consequence from this premiss is that the merchant had a right to take his goods out of the ship without payment of any freight at Dover. I do not scruple to say, that if such be the law it appears to me at variance with evident justice. But I do not find any case which goes the length of saying that where a supervening moral impossibility, arising out of the prohibition imposed by a law not applicable, or not existing at the time of the making of the contract, has prevented its fulfilment, the merchant is entitled to have his goods carried by the ship almost, as in this case, the whole length of the voyage, without any compensation to the shipowner. I find no authority for the position that the contract is dissolved in the sense of rendering null all that has been previously done under it, though it is dissolved as to all future consequences. The law, as Willes, J., says (Exposito v. Bowden, 7 El. & Bl. 763) justifies what it commands, if, on the one hand, it commands, in these circumstances, the dissolution of the contract, does it not, on the other hand, justify the command by placing the parties as nearly as possible in statu quo ante contractum? does it give to one party, both being equally innocent, a manifest advantage over the other? does it say to the merchant, you shall receive your goods greatly enhanced in value by their having been carried across the ocean within the neighbourhood of the place of destination, without any remuneration to the owner of the vehicle which has conveyed them? This may be the doctrine of the common law where a physical unexpected obstacle, which might have been guarded against in the contract, prevents the completion of it; but in this instance the completion is prevented by the act of the law itself. Moreover, in the present case, the merchant has, at the port of call, selected, out of several ports mentioned in the charter party, one to which access has become morally or legally impossible.

Has the merchant being apprised of this fact, not choosing to mention himself at any other port, and not making any tender of partial freight, but receiving an offer from the master to take the goods to one of the other ports mentioned in the charter party which did not belong to a belligerent, and was not far distant, a right to refuse this offer; and by this refusal, to escape the payment of all freight for the goods which he demands? I think not. But if such were, which I greatly doubt, the law to be administered in a court of common law, dealing with the subject exclusively on the narrow footing of a special contract express or implied, and not on the general principles of legal obligatio, of which, according to the civil law, contract is a branch, it would not necessarily be the law administered by a court of equity or by the Admiralty Court. In the case of Osgood v. Groning (2 Camp. 466; Abbott on Shipping, 344, 345, 10th edit.), an American ship the Neptune, in the year 1807, being under a charter party bound to Rotterdam, refused (the earlier history of the case is immaterial) to go there, being apprehensive of confiscation under the French decree then in force; and her master offered to deliver up her cargo, on being paid freight and charges, to the agents of the charterers in London. They refused to receive it, and required him to complete his voyage, according to the charter party. The master proceeding to sell the cargo, was restrained by an interim injunction of the Court of Chancery. The Lord Chancellor then directed two questions to be tried in a court of law; first, whether the master be entitled to any and what sum of money for freight on his cargo; and secondly, whether he was entitled to any and what sum of money by way of compensation for the carriage of the goods from Charleston to London. Lord Ellenborough tried the case, and is reported—to use Lord Tenterden's cautious phrase—to have said, "that the shipowner had no claim for freight, the goods being brought short of their destination, and there being no express contract for compensation in this event, and no implied contract, as there had been no acceptance of the goods to found a promise to pay pro rata itineris." Lord Tenterden proceeds to remark that "the Lord Chancellor afterwards directed the second question to be tried again in a court of law, and ordered the merchant to admit that he had accepted the goods in the port of London, if it should appear that the master could not reasonably have been required to proceed on the voyage; considering that if the master could not reasonably have been required, the merchant ought to have accepted the goods, and his refusal to accept them was an act against conscience, and a proper subject for the jurisdiction of a court of equity, which, on many occasions, places parties in the situation in which they would stand, if that which ought to have been had been actually done." The principle of this equity seems to have been adopted by my predecessor in the case of the Soblonstein (L. Rep. 1 Adm. 293; 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 393; 36 L. J. 5 Adm.) to which I think my attention was not drawn during the argument. The same principle as might be expected in a jurisprudence founded on the civil law, seems to have governed the following case in the courts of Scotland. In the case of Wilson v. Bennett (15 Fac. Coll. 251), decided March 10, 1809, a ship freighted from Dundee to Bridport with grain, was stranded off Portland Island. The shippers abandoned to the underwriters, who took delivery of the greater part of it, and had it sold. The master did not claim his lien for freight, but an action was afterwards brought against the shippers. The Judge Admiral decreed for "such proportion of the stipulated freight as shall correspond to the part of the voyage performed and the quantity of grain received . . . in respect that the master, where the partial non-fulfilment of the contract does not arise from any fault on his part, is entitled to such proportion of the freight as may correspond to the part of the stipulated voyage which the vessel has performed, and to the quantity of goods delivered, though not at the port of destination." This was affirmed in the Court of Session (Bell's Commentaries, edited by McLaren, vol. 1, pt. 2, p. 618.) Lord Tenterden in his chapter on freight (p. 646, 10th edit.), observes, "The authority of the Court of Admiralty being exercised upon the ship and cargo in specie or (which is, in effect, the same thing) upon the proceeds of a sale made under its own decree, is very different from that of a court of common law," and he cites the following case, the judgment in which, on account of its importance, I will state at length. Lord Stowell, in the case of The Friends (Edwards Adm. Rep. p. 246), said that "was a case of a British vessel which had been chartered at Campeachy for the purpose of delivering a cargo at Lisbon. The ship had successfully prosecuted her voyage to the very entrance of the Tagus, when she was warned off by the blockading squadron. Upon receiving this information she continued for some days with the fleet, but a gale coming on which blew her out to sea, she was picked up by a Spanish privateer, and was soon afterwards retaken by a British cruiser and carried to Madeira, where the ship and cargo were sold by the recaptors to pay the salvage. A claim has since been given for the ship and cargo, which was decreed to be restored, and the court has now to consider what freight is due under the circumstances of the case. On the part of the owner of the ship it is contended that the whole of the freight is due, as the ship had actually gone up to the mouth of the port to which she was destined. On the part of the owner of the cargo, it is contended that no freight is due, as the cargo was not delivered according to the terms of the charter party. Several cases from the courts of common law have been cited, but I confess it does not appear to me that any principle is to be extracted from them that is applicable to the present question, although I should have thought that some cases of British ships which had come up to the very port of their destination, and were prevented from discharging their cargoes there by the act of the sovereign authority of their own country, must have occurred in those courts, among the multiplicity of cases which the present extended system of blockade has given rise to. In the case of the American ships bound to France or Holland, which were brought into the ports of this country under the prohibitory law, the full freight was pronounced to be due where the owners of the cargoes elected to sell here; where they did not elect to sell here, the court left it to them to settle the freight with the owners of the ships. The court considered a voyage from America to this country very nearly the same in effect as a voyage to those contiguous countries to which these vessels were originally destined. In all probability the markets of this country were not less favourable than in the blockaded ports, and so doubt the sale was effected with every attention to the interests of the cargo. In those cases the court gave the master of the ship the full benefit of the freight, not by virtue of his contract, because, looking at the charter party in the same point of view as the courts of common law, it could not say that the delivery at a port in England was a specific performance of its terms. But there being no contract which applied to the existing state of facts the court found itself under an obligation to discover what was the relative equity between the parties. This court sits no more than the courts of common law to make contracts between the parties; but as a court exercising an equitable jurisdiction, it considers itself bound to provide, as well as it can, for that relation of interests which has unexpectedly taken place under a state of facts out of the contemplation of the contracting parties in the course of the transaction." The learned judge then again adverts to the circumstances of the case and concludes, "Under these circumstances I shall direct a moiety of the freight to be paid." It is true that the decision was given in the Admiralty Court exercising a prize jurisdiction; but Lord Tenterden makes no distinction on this head in citing the authority of the case, and the practice of the Admiralty Court, and I think rightly, because the court only applied to subjects of prize the general power, which, as the history and origin of its jurisdiction show, it always possessed. Thus Lord Stowell, then at the bar, in his celebrated argument before the Court of King's Bench, which established the jurisdiction of the Prize Admiralty Court on freight claimed by a neutral master against the captor, observed: "It may be admitted that no such power as this is to be found in the Prize Acts, but there are many undoubted privileges of the Court of Admiralty which are not given by them. The Prize Acts are of modern date, and form indeed a very small portion of the law of the Admiralty. They were drawn up principally for the Vice-Admiralty Courts, in which a jurisdiction over questions of prize was thereby for the first time given. But a great part of the admiralty jurisdiction is founded on the established usage, and, as it were, on the common law of the admiralty:" Smart v. Wolff (3 Durn. and East, 389), The modern statute which has given the Admiralty Court jurisdiction in the present case, has given it without restraint as to the exercise of that jurisdiction, according to its usual principles and practice. The general maritime law on the subject now before me is laid down in the well known French ordonnance. Art. XV. of this ordonnance was as follows: (Valin Ordonnance de la marine, l. 3, t. 3, Art. XV.) "S'il arrive interdiction de commerce avec le pays pour lequel le vaisseau est en route, et qu'il soit obligé de revenir avec son chargement, il ne sera dû au maître que le fret de l'aller, quand même le navire aurait été affreté allant et venant." The commentary on Valin is as follows: "Le cas où avant le départ du navire, il survient une interdiction de commerce avec le pays pour lequel il est destiné, est prévu par l'art. 7, tit. premier de ce livre. 3. Ici il agit de la même interdiction de commerce arrivée depuis le départ du vaisseau, et il est décidé que si le navire est obligé par-là de revenir avec son chargement au port d'où il était parti, le frère de l'aller sera dû au maître mais aussi qu'il faudra qu'il s'en contente, quand même le navire aurait été affrété allant et venant. Et rien n'est plus juste, puisque c'est là un cas fortuit, et procédant de force majeure, dont l'affrèteur ou marchand chargeur ne peut être garant; c'est bien assez qu'il paie tout le frêt de l'aller à cause que le voyage est commencé, par où il se fait une espèce de compensation de la perte causée par cet événement entre lui et le maître du navire." Emerigon remarks, "Dans ce cas la charte-partie subsiste. Il n'est cependant dû que le frêt d'aller; c'est par équité que la chose est ainsi décidée entre maître et chargeurs." He cites Pothier to the same effect: (Des Chartes-Parties, No. 69, t. 2, page 394.) Bouley-Paty, in his chapter: "Du Fret, s'il arrive interdiction de commerce avec le pays pour lequel le navire est en route" (Titre, 8, sect. 10, t. 2, p. 424), expresses the same opinion, and cites the 299th article of the modern Code de Commerce, which contains substantially the same regulations as the ordonnance. The American courts have recognised this authority as binding in the absence of any positive law or decision to the contrary. The case in which this authority was followed bore a considerable resemblance to the one now before me. In this case Morgan v. Insurance Company of North America (4 Dallas Rep. 421), Tilghman, C.J. said, "This is an action on a policy of insurance on freight of the brig Amazon, from Philadelphia to Surinam, valued at 3500 dols. The brig sailed from Philadelphia on the 7th Aug. 1799, with a cargo consisting of provisions and merchandise, and arrived in the river Surinam, on the 17th Sept. following. During the voyage, the colony of Surinam was conquered by the forces of the King of Great Britain. Permission was obtained from the British commander for the brig to go up to the town of Paramanto, and she arrived there with her cargo on the 20th Sept. On her arrival the captain of the brig, in pursuance of instructions from the owners, as well as in pursuance of an agreement between the owners and a certain J. A. Richter, who was a passenger in the said ship, offered to deliver the cargo to the said Richter upon his paying, or giving security to pay, 25,310 dols. Richter agreed to pay that sum as soon as possible after the delivery of the cargo, and actually gave good security for the money. But the British collector of customs refused permission to land any article of the cargo except the provisions, nor could such permission be obtained, although repeated petitions were presented to the Government. The consequence was that the cargo was not landed, and the captain entered his protest. The brig remained at Paramanto till the 27th Sept. The plaintiffs were owners both of brig and cargo. The question is, whether the plaintiffs are entitled to recover, either for a total loss, or for a partial loss, on this policy. The plaintiff's counsel contend that they are entitled to recover for a total loss; that the landing and delivery of the cargo is an essential part of the contract between the owner and the freighter, and not being complied with, no part of the freight has been earned; and that the circumstance of the same person being owners of the brig and cargo is immaterial in a question between the assurers and the assured. On the other hand, the defendants' counsel say that there has been no loss, because the freight was completely earned. No adjudged case, in point, has been cited on either side. The defendant's counsel relied on the case of Blight v. Page (3 Bos. and Pull., p. 295, note); but I do not think that case applicable." The learned Judge then deals with the case, and continues: "No conclusion can be drawn from this case under what circumstances freight may be earned or not earned, for it was not an action for the recovery of freight, but of damages for not being permitted to earn freight. But although there is no adjudged case, the subject has not escaped the notice of writers on the marine law. In one of the Ordinances of Louis XIV. (A.D. 1681) (1 vol. Louis XIV. 656, Art. 15, title Freight, cited by Abbot) (Shipping, 9th edit., p. 548), it is declared that on a charter-party to carry goods out and in, if during the voyage the commerce is prohibited and the vessel returns, the outward freight only is earned; and Valin, in his commentary on the article, says the law is the same if the vessel is freighted out only. These ordinances, and the commentaries on them, have been received with great respect in the courts both of England and the United States; notes containing any authority in themselves, but as evidence of the general marine law. Where they are contradicted by judicial decisions in our own country they are not to be respected; but on points which have not been decided they are worthy of consideration. I am strongly inclined to adopt the rule laid down by Valin, because I think it reasonable." The learned judge then proceeded to apply the law as laid down by Valin to the facts of the case. After as careful a consideration as I have been able to give to the general principles of jurisprudence applicable to the circumstances of the case, in the absence of any direct judicial precedents, I have arrived at the following conclusion:—That, the owners of the Teutonia have not committed any breach of the contract contained in the charter party and bill of lading, either, first, by refusing in the circumstances to carry the cargo to the port of Dunkirk; or, secondly, by refusing to deliver up the cargo to the plaintiffs at Dover without any payment of freight whatever, either pro rata itineris, or by way of compensation, for the carriage of the goods from Pisagna to Dover. I therefore dismiss the suit with costs.

THE TWO ELLENS.

Transfer of mortgage—Material man—Priority of lien.

The transferee of a mortgage, although the transfer be not registered, has a locus standi in a cause of necessities instituted against the ship.

The material man has no maritime lien. The mortgagee has priority over the material man. The Pacific (Bro. & Lush. 245, 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 541) followed, but doubted.

THIS was a case instituted against the ship Two Ellens, and John Alexander Black intervening, to recover a debt of 305l 3s., with interest thereon, from the 19th Feb., 1868, for necessities supplied to the said ship, and by the consent of the parties the following case was stated for the opinion of the court:—

ADM.]

THE TWO ELLENS.

[ADM.]

1. The plaintiffs are shipbuilders, carrying on business at Millwall.

2. The defendant is a merchant, who is agent of Messrs. Black Brothers and Co., hereinafter mentioned.

3. The Two Ellens is a British colonial vessel, belonging to the port of Digby, Nova Scotia, of which no owner or part owner was at the time of the institution of this suit domiciled in England or Wales.

4. Cornelius McBride, Dennis Falvey, and William Hogan, all of Weymouth, N.S., were the duly registered owners of the vessel which was commanded by the said Dennis Falvey,

5. By an instrument of mortgage in the form prescribed by the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, dated 9th March 1867, and executed by the said registered owners, the said registered owners mortgaged their $\frac{3}{4}$ share in the said vessel to George John Troop, a member of the said firm of Black, Brothers, and Co., Halifax, in consideration of gain, for the purpose of securing the repayment of the sum of 5000 dols. advanced by the said firm to the said owners, together with interest on the said sum. This mortgage has been duly registered.

6. About the month of Feb. 1868, the said vessel which had arrived in the port of London, shortly previous to the said date, and completed her then voyage, was lying in that port, and the said Dennis Falvey being the master, and part-owner of the said vessel, applied to the plaintiffs to do certain work and furnish certain supplies to the said vessel, which the plaintiffs accordingly did and made. It has been agreed that the plaintiff's account shall be taken to contain a correct statement of the items of the said plaintiff's claim. There is now due and owing to the plaintiffs for and in respect of such account a certain sum of money.

7. By an instrument of transfer, dated the 16th July 1868, in the form prescribed by the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and executed by the said George John Troop, in consideration of the sum of 5000 dols. alleged in the said instrument of transfer to have been paid by the defendant, the said George John Troop transferred to the defendant the said mortgage. This instrument has never been registered according to the provisions of the said Merchant Shipping Act 1854.

8. In point of fact, no money was paid by the defendant to George John Troop in consideration of the transfer of the said mortgage, but such transfer was only made to enable the defendant to take charge of the vessel for and on behalf of the firm of Messrs. Black, Brothers, and Co.

9. The plaintiffs were never informed and did not know that the said vessel was mortgaged.

10. In the month of July 1868, the defendant took possession of the said vessel, and shortly afterwards the said sum of 5000 dols. being still unpaid, put her up for sale, when she was bought in by Messrs. Cannon, merchants of Liverpool, as agents for the said firm of Black, Brothers and Co.

11. This cause was instituted on the 23rd Dec. 1868, as a cause of necessaries, but the plaintiffs did not then extract a warrant for the arrest of the said vessel. On the following day two of the crew of the said vessel instituted a cause of wages and caused her to be arrested, whereupon the plaintiffs amended the precipe by which they had instituted the said cause, by striking out the words "of necessaries" and leaving a blank, and they, on the 26th of the same month, issued a citation in rem which was duly served whilst the said vessel was under arrest in the said wages suit.

12. The printed evidence of Charles Black, one of the partners in the said firm of Messrs. Black, Brothers, and Co., is to form part of this case.

The question for the opinion of this court is whether the plaintiffs are entitled to recover in the said cause in respect of the aforesaid matters out of the proceeds of the said vessel before the said sum of 5000 dollars is paid to the defendant.

If the court shall be of opinion in the affirmative then the court is to pronounce for the claim of the plaintiffs, with costs of suit. It being referred to the registrar and merchants to ascertain what sum is due to the plaintiffs in respect of the aforesaid matters.

If the court shall be of opinion in the negative, then the plaintiffs suit is to be dismissed with costs.

The printed evidence of Chas. Black, above referred to, tended to prove that the repairs supplied to the ship, were not sanctioned either directly or indirectly by the mortgagees, and that the mortgagees were not aware that the plaintiffs supplied these necessaries to the ship on the credit of the ship, and not on the personal credit of the owners. The defendant was the agent of the mortgagees and claimed priority over the plaintiffs by virtue of the transfer of mortgage which he held. The plaintiffs had given up possession of the ship, and she was afterwards taken and sold by the defendant under the mortgage. Witnesses were called at the hearing to prove that what were supplied to the ship were necessaries, this being disputed by the defendant.

Cohen for the plaintiffs.—The defendant is a bare trustee, and cannot be admitted to intervene in this cause. He has no locus standi on legal grounds, for the transfer was not registered in accordance with the Merchant Shipping Act, and yet the mortgagee divested himself by the transfer of his legal title; and no locus standi on equitable grounds, for the register does not present a faithful account, the transfer not being mentioned, and no valuable consideration was given for the transfer. The plaintiffs have a maritime lien on the ship, and, therefore, priority over the mortgagees. The court has jurisdiction over claim of material man for necessaries: (24 Vict. c. 10, s. 5.) There is an implied authorisation by the mortgagees for the ship to be put in an efficient state (Williams and another v. Alsopp, 30 L. J., N. S., 353, C. P.; 4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 550), and the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, sect. 70, was there held not to conflict with this. The principle laid down in Bristow v. Whitmore (31 L. J. 467, Ch.; 4 L. T. Rep. N. L. 622) applies to this case. The mortgagees cannot avail themselves of the repairs which have been made by the material man, and which have enabled them to navigate the ship and have improved the value of their security. If they do they must discharge the debt incurred by these repairs, or at any rate allow him a lien upon the res.

Butt, Q.C. and Clarkson, for the defendant.—The title to a ship passes by the execution of a bill of sale, and not by registration: (Merchant Shipping Act, ss. 55 and 57.) And in Staplehurst v. Hayman and another (33 L. J. 170, Ex; 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 655), it was distinctly laid down that the property of a ship passes as between the vendor and his assignees and the vendee, by a bill of sale, although the transfer be not registered pursuant to the Merchant Shipping Act. In like manner, all rights under this deed of mortgage are vested in the defendant, although the transfer is not registered. The material man has no maritime lien on the ship under 24 Vict. c. 10, the ship not being a foreign ship. As ruled by Dr. Lushington in the case of the Pacific (Br. & Lush. 254; 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 541.) In the case of Williams v. Alsopp, cited by the plaintiffs, the material man had a possessory common law lien on the vessel for the repairs; he had repaired the ship on his own premises and retained it. In Bristow v. Whitmore certain unauthorised alterations were made by the master in order to enable the ship to carry a certain number of troops, and thereby earn a certain freight. But the owner or mortgagee in that case directly approved of the alterations by claiming the freight. The mortgagees did not in any way sanction these repairs. The material man supplied them not on the credit of the ship, but on the personal credit of the owners. The master or owners were not in any way acting as agents of the mortgagee. The mortgagee has priority of lien over the material man.

The Pacific, Bro. & L. 245; 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 541; The Troubadour, L. Rep. 1 Adm. 306; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 119.

Feb. 15.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is a cause instituted by certain shipbuilders at Millwall to recover a debt of 305l. 3s. and interest on account of necessaries supplied by them to a vessel called The Two Ellens, which belonged to the port of Digby, in Nova Scotia, and of which no owner or part owner was at the time of the institution of this suit domiciled in England or Wales. The defendant is a transferee of a registered mortgage from the owners. The facts are to be derived partly from a special case agreed upon by the parties, in which the averments are to be taken as admitted, and partly from evidence received upon certain disputed points. I am satisfied that the articles supplied and the repairs effected do fall under the category of "necessaries," which was the principal matter upon which evidence was taken. The owners on the 9th March 1867 mortgaged their sixty-four sixty-fourth shares to George John Troop, a member of the firm of Black, Brothers, and Co., of Halifax, for securing the repayment of 5000 dols. advanced by that firm to the said owners, together with interest thereon. This mortgage was duly registered. In Feb. 1868 the necessaries were supplied by the plaintiffs to the vessel in the port of London. On the 16th July, in the same year, George John Troop transferred to the present defendant, John Alexander Black, who is not, however, a member of the firm of Black, Brothers, and Co., this mortgage for the alleged consideration of 5000 dols.; but no money was, in fact, ever paid by the defendant to Troop, and the transfer was only made to enable the defendant to take charge of the vessel in trust for and on behalf of the firm of Black, Brothers, and Co. This transfer was never registered, and the plaintiffs did not know and were never informed that the vessel was mortgaged. The proceeds of the vessel are insufficient to satisfy the claims of the plaintiffs and defendant, and the question for the decision of the court is whether the plaintiffs are entitled to recover whatever sum the registrar and merchants may find to be due to them out of the proceeds of the vessel, before the sum of 5000 dols. is paid to the defendants; in other words, which of the two parties has the prior lien upon these proceeds. On the part of the plaintiffs, the first proposition contended for was that the defendant had no locus standi either on legal or equitable grounds—not on legal grounds, because the transfer had not been registered according to the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, and yet the mortgagee had diverted himself by the transfer of his legal title; and not on equitable grounds, because the register in its present condition did not present a faithful account, no mention being made of a transfer of the mortgage; and because no valuable consideration was given for the transfer. But to this it was replied that the title to the ship passed by the execution of a bill of sale, and not by the registration, whatever consequences might flow from the neglect of the purchaser to register; and the court was referred to the sects. 55 & 57 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104) and to the case of Stapleton v. Haymen and another (33 L. J. 170, Ex.; 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 655), in which it was distinctly laid down by the Court of Exchequer, in 1864, that the property in a ship passes as between the vendor and his assignees and the vendee, by a bill of sale, although the transfer be not registered pursuant to the Merchant Shipping Act 1854. Moreover, I must consider that the practice of this court has been, especially of late years, to be liberal in admitting parties who can show any interest whatever in a suit; and the evidence in this case shows that the defendant is the agent of the original mortgagees. Upon all these grounds, I am of opinion that he has a locus standi before the court, and I proceed to consider the next and principal question, namely, whether, as the law now stands, the material man has a maritime lien upon the ship, and therefore, on the principle usually applied to liens of this description, a priority over the lien of the mortgagee? The law previous to the passing of the admiralty jurisdiction statute, is set out in the case of The Neptune (3 Knapp, 94), by which it was decided that the Admiralty Court had ceased to have jurisdiction over the claims of material men, differing in this respect from the general law of commercial countries, which, founded upon the Roman law, gave to material men a lien on the ship enforceable in courts of admiralty. The 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, however, by sect. 6, enacted that this court should have jurisdiction to decide all claims and demands for necessaries supplied to any foreign ship or sea-going vessel. This statute was passed in 1840, and in 1863 my predecessor decided, after hearing a very elaborate argument, and correcting a previous judgment of his own in The Alexander (1 W. Rob. 294), that this section conferred upon claimants under it, a maritime lien: (The Ella A. Clark, Bro. & Lush. 32; 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 119.) This judgment, it will be seen, referred only to foreign ships. In 1861, the 24 Vict. c. 10. s. 5, provided that this court should have jurisdiction over any claim for necessaries supplied to any ship elsewhere than in the port to which the ship belongs, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that at the time of the institution of the cause, any owner or part owner of the ship is domiciled in England or Wales. The decision in the Ella A. Clark, though it turned principally upon the construction of 3 & 4

THE TWO ELLENS.

Vict. c. 65, was given after consideration of 24 Vict. c. 10; and in the course of the judgment the learned judge said (p. 36), "Looking through the several recent statutes, I am led to the general conclusion that when the Legislature has appointed the proceeding in rem, they intended to give the same remedy as heretofore was in use in this court in the administration of justice in cases of maritime lien, though no express words may be used to that effect." Nevertheless, in 1864, Dr. Lushington ruled, in a considered judgment, that a material man, claiming under 24 Vict. c. 10, in the case of a ship not a foreign ship, had not a maritime lien, but only a right of action in rem, which gave lien upon the ship "until the time of the institution of the cause" (sect. 5): (The Pacific, Bro. & Lush. 243; 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 541.) In this case he held that the mortgagee was entitled to be paid in preference to the material man who supplied the materials after the date of the mortgage. This case seems to have overruled the previous case of The Skipwith (2 Mar. Law Cas. 20; 10 Jur. N. S. 445). To this judgment he adhered in the subsequent case of The Troubadour, in 1866 (L. Rep. 1 Adm. 306; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 156.) I think I am bound to say that I am unable to acquiesce with the reasoning upon which the judgment in the Pacific was founded, or to reconcile that reasoning with the judgment in the Ellis A. Clark. The two statutes ought, I should have ventured to think, to have been construed as being in pari materia, and the argument which gave the maritime lien in the case of the foreign ship, ought to have given the same privilege in the case of the British ship. In The Bold Buccleugh (7 Moo. 284), supported by the judgment in The Europa (Bro. & Lush. 89; 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 368), the Privy Council said (p. 284): "Having its origin in this rule of the civil law, a maritime lien is well defined by Lord Tenterden to mean a claim or privilege upon a thing to be carried into effect by legal process; and Story, J. (1 Sum. Rep. 78), explains that process to be a proceeding in rem, and adds that wherever a lien or claim is given upon the thing, then the Admiralty enforces it by a proceeding in rem, and, indeed, is the only court competent to enforce it. A maritime lien is the foundation of the proceeding in rem, a process to make perfect a right inchoate from the moment the lien attaches; and whilst it must be admitted that where such a lien exists a proceeding in rem may be had, it will be found to be equally true that in all cases where a proceeding in rem is the proper course, there a maritime lien exists, which gives a privilege or claim upon the things to be carried into effect by legal process. This claim or privilege travels with the thing, into whosoever possession it may come. It is inchoate from the moment the claim or privilege attaches, and when carried into effect by legal process by a proceeding in rem relates back to the period when it first attached." The proceedings, in this case, of the material men are proceedings in rem; and the language already cited from the Ellis A. Clark seems to me as applicable to their claim in the case of a British as of a foreign ship; and I should have thought that in such a case the maritime lien was inchoate before the institution of the suit, though the power of enforcing it would depend upon the fact of the owner not being domiciled in England or Wales at that time. But I do not think that it would be right or proper, having regard to the usage which prevails in our courts of justice on this subject to reverse the careful and deliberate judgment of my predecessor, even if he were a less distinguished judge than Dr. Lushington. Only one other point remains for consideration; namely, whether there are any special circumstances proved in this case which would take it out of the application of the Pacific. I have been referred to two cases: Williams and another v. Allsup, decided in 1861, in the Court of Common Pleas (30 L. J., N. S., 353, C. P.; 4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 550), the marginal note of which appears to me to be correct, and is as follows:—"The plaintiffs, mortgagees of a ship having permitted the mortgagor to remain in possession for upwards of four years, and during that time to use and navigate the ship for his own profit, the latter, without the knowledge of the plaintiffs, delivered her to the defendant, a shipwright, for the purpose of having reasonable and necessary repairs done to her, which the defendant did; the plaintiffs having demanded possession of the defendant, the latter refused to deliver her up until his bill for the repairs was paid. Held, that the plaintiffs must be taken to have implicitly authorised the mortgagor to keep the vessel in an efficient state, and for that purpose to order necessary repairs to be done upon the ordinary terms, one of which was, that the shipwright should have his lien upon the ship for the repairs. Held, also, that sect. 70 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), which enacts that the mortgagor shall not be deemed to have ceased to be the owner of the mortgaged ship, except in so far as may be necessary for making such ship available as a security for the mortgage debt, did not conflict with this view." Willes, J., said, "The mortgagor is permitted by the mortgagees to remain in possession of the vessel for the purpose of using it in the ordinary way, and he cannot use it in the ordinary way, unless it is repaired. That seems to me to involve the permission of the mortgagees to get the vessel repaired upon the ordinary terms, though not to pledge the mortgagee's credit. Then, the shipwright who does the repairs is entitled to his lien as incident to his employment:" (Ib. p. 355.) These expressions were strongly pressed by counsel upon my attention, but upon examination of the case the decision only amounts to this: that the material man having a possessory common law lien upon the res which he had repaired in his own premises, was justified in retaining it until his debt was paid; and that this lien was not taken away by the Merchant Shipping Act. The next case was also decided in the year 1891 by the House of Lords: (Bristow v. Whitmore 31 L. J. 467, Ch.; 4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 622), the marginal note is as follows:—"The master of a vessel at the Mauritius, in April, entered into a charter party under seal (therein describing himself as master and owner) with the commissariat officer there for the conveyance of troops to Gravesend, and paid certain moneys, and incurred liabilities for fitting up the vessel for the purpose. In the following month he entered into another charter party, not under seal, at the Cape of Good Hope for the conveyance of other troops, and thereupon paid further sums, and incurred further liabilities to enable him to perform the contract. The owner became bankrupt, having previously mortgaged the vessel. Upon its arrival in the Thames the mortgagees seized it. The master filed a bill against the owner's assignees, praying a declaration that he was entitled to be repaid and indemnified out of the fund due from the Admiralty on account of the freight. The Commissioners of the Admiralty paid the amount into court: Held, reversing the decision of the Lord Chancellor, and restoring that of Vice-Chancellor Wood, that the master was entitled to be reimbursed out of the fund." In this case Lord Kingsdown observed that "there did not appear, on the general rules of law, to be much difficulty. A master of a ship had not a lien on freight for advances made by him on account of the ship; but if a trustee incurred expenses in the discharge of a trust, he was entitled to retain them out of the trust property. So, if an agent made a contract, the principal could not both approbate and reprobate it. The contract here was prima facie unwarranted by the master's general authority; the owner (or mortgagee) adopted it, and now insisted on receiving all the benefit, leaving the agent to pay the expenses incurred in carrying it into effect, and acquiring the money earned by it." It was strongly contended that I ought to apply the principles here stated to the case before me, and to hold that the mortgagees or their transferee could not approbate and reprobate the implied contract of the material man—could not avail themselves of the repairs which he had effected, by which they were enabled to navigate the ship, and to improve the security of their mortgage, without discharging the debt incurred by these repairs, or allowing him a lien upon the repaired res. I confess that I should not have been sorry to apply the principal of this decision to the case before me, because I think that the plaintiff has been hardly treated, but I am unable to do so. That judgment related to freight, which was acquired in consequence of the unauthorised alterations made by the master of the ship, which freight the owner or the mortgagee claimed to receive while refusing to pay for the expense of the alterations; and I must remember that it is expressly provided by the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 that the mortgagee is not to be considered in the legal category of owner (sect. 70), and the evidence before me does not sustain the position either that the mortgagee was aware that these repairs were supplied by the material man upon the credit of the ship, and not on the personal credit of the owner, or that the mortgagee stood by or looked on giving directly or indirectly any sanction to the supply of these necessaries on the credit of the ship; and according to the decision in the Troubadour the mortgagee in possession would not be liable for necessaries supplied to the ship unless the master, in ordering the necessaries, was acting as the agent of the mortgagee. I am therefore brought back to the consideration of the character of the lien conferred by the statute upon the material man, and I find, as I have said, the judgment of my predecessor directing that the material man has not a maritime lien, and therefore in this case not a claim entitled to priority over that of the mortgagees or transferee of the mortgage. I have ventured to state my doubts as to the grounds upon which these judgments are grounded. I must await their revision and alteration—if they are to be altered—by the appellate tribunal. I must dismiss this suit with costs.

THE MARKLAND.

Practice—Payment out of court—Priority—Power to revoke decree—Caveat—Costs.

The rule that a suitor who first obtains a decree shall have priority in order of payment only applies where suitors are in pari conditio.

Where the court in a suit in rem has made, per incuriam, an order directing payment out of court to satisfy the claim of a suitor, the court has power before payment to vary or rescind the order.

Where the plaintiff in a cause of necessaries obtains a decree, and the mortgagees neglect to enter a caveat until after the order for payment out of court has been made, the court will grant costs to the plaintiff.

ON the 21st Oct. 1870 a cause of co-ownership (No. 5495) was instituted on behalf of Thomas Ellis, the owner of 48 64th shares of the vessel Markland, against the said vessel. On the 24th Oct., Robinson Inglis and Co., the first mortgagees in possession, entered an appearance. On the 27th Oct. an appearance was entered on behalf of Sidney Toppin, who held a second mortgage on the ship. On the 3rd Nov. an order of court was made in the cause, under which the Markland was appraised and sold, subject to certain charter-parties before entered into by her owners, and the proceeds of the sale were brought into the registry by the marshal. On the 16th Dec. a cause of wages (No. 5575) was instituted on behalf of the crew of the Markland against the proceeds of the sale. On the 21st Dec. a cause of necessaries (No. 5560) was instituted on behalf of John Dawson, shipwright, against the Markland. On the 10th Jan. 1871, the court pronounced the sum of 30l. to be due to the plaintiffs in the suit, instituted on behalf of the crew (No. 5575), and ordered the said sum and costs to be paid out of the proceeds in the registry to the said plaintiff's solicitors, and this was accordingly done. On the 17th Jan. 1871, the cause of necessaries (No. 5560) came on for hearing, and the claim being unopposed, the court, on hearing proof, pronounced for the sum of 57l. 5s. 5d., the amount of the claim with costs, and further ordered the same to be paid out of the proceeds in court to the plaintiff's proctor. Before this money was paid out, the proctors for the first mortgagees filed a præcipe for a caveat against the payment of any sum out of the proceeds of the Markland, and a caveat was entered accordingly. On the 23rd Jan., a cause of wages (No. 5619) was instituted on behalf of the master of the Markland, against the proceeds of the vessel.

The amount in court was insufficient to satisfy the unpaid claims of the several suitors, and the question arose whether the decree obtained by the plaintiff in the cause of necessaries (No. 5560), entitled him to be paid the amount pronounced due to him out of the proceeds, in priority to the claims of the several mortgagees.

Jan. 24.—E. C. Clarkson, for the plaintiff in the cause of necessaries (No. 5560), moved the court to overrule the caveat entered by the several mortgagees, and to condemn the mortgagees in costs. This plaintiff is entitled to priority as he has obtained a decree in this suit which is in rem: (The Saracen, 2 W. Rob. 451; 3 Moo. P. C. C. 6; The Gustaf, Lush. 506; 31 L. J. 207, Adm.; 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 660.) The following is the practice of the court:—"According to the priority of time in which each claimant has obtained his decree, pronouncing for his claim and costs, so will be his right to be paid, in preference to others where there are several actions, out of the fund in court." (Coote's Admiralty Practice, 2nd edit. p. 133) The court sometimes, where there are several causes against the same vessel, will make an order for payment in one of the causes, when the others are not ready for hearing, and the order is always made expressly without prejudice to the rights of the other suitors who may be entitled to priority, but here the order was made absolutely, and without any reservation of rights of the mortgagees. The court found that this plaintiff was entitled to be paid, and even signed the order for the payment of the decreed sum out of court. The court has now no power to recall that order. The mortgagees have lost their right in priority by their own laches in not taking steps before this decree in favour of the plaintiff. The court will grant to the plaintiff in this cause the costs he has incurred in consequence of the neglect of the mortgagees to enter their caveat before the order of court was made.

Feb. 1.—Butt, Q.C., and Gibson, for the first mortgagees, opposed Clarkson's motion, and moved the court to direct the amount due to the first mortgagees to be paid out of court. The plaintiff in the cause of necessities is not in pari conditione with the mortgagees, and therefore the rule that preference will be given to the diligent suitor does not apply to this case: (The William F. Safford, Lush. Rep. 69; 2 L. T. Rep. N. S. 301; 29 L. J. 109, Adm.) [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—At the date of the decree in the cause of necessities no caveat was entered by your clients. Were they not thereby guilty of laches?] If a caveat had been entered, the first mortgagees would not have been in any different position. It is not the practice in this court for a party entering a caveat to receive notice of an application by other parties for a payment of money out of court. This practice is unsatisfactory. He does not receive notice until an order for the payment of money out of court is made, and is about to be acted upon: (Williams and Bruce's Admiralty Practice, p. 230, n. b.) [Sir R. J. PHILLIMORE.—The court would have had notice if a caveat had been entered.] Even so it is not too late to give the first mortgagees their just rights. The court still holds the proceeds, and has power to rectify any order made per incuriam.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The claimant for necessities in this case does not dispute that the mortgagees have a prior lien upon the funds in court, but he maintains that the advantage of that priority has been taken away from them by reason of his obtaining a decree, which took the form of a signed order, for the payment of his claim. The cases of the Saracen and the Gustaf, which have been cited, apply to claimants of equal degree, and do no more than enforce a well-known principle that a diligent creditor shall have the advantage of his diligence over a remiss creditor; but there is no authority, that I am aware of, which has decided that this doctrine can be extended to a case where the parties are not in pari conditione, but where one has a distinct legal priority over the other. The contrary, I think, appears to have been laid down in the case of the William F. Safford, referred to by Mr. Butt. With regard to the fact that the order for payment in this case was actually signed by me, I cannot hold that upon that ground the court is functus officio. The court has not parted with the funds: and after it has been apprised that by so doing it would be inflicting an injustice upon parties who have a prior legal claim over those funds, it would be strange indeed if the court had not power to prevent the execution of the order. I am clear that I have power, and ought to exercise it, to prevent the execution of that order, the effect of which would be to do a wrong to a party who has established priority in his claim: The Monarch (1 Wm. Rob. 21). With regard to the question of costs, I must refer to the 130th rule of the court: "A proctor desiring to prevent the payment of moneys out of the registry shall file a proceipe, and thereupon a caveat shall be entered in a book to be kept in the registry, called the Caveat Payment-book: (Williams and Bruce's Adm. Prac., App. xli.) No such caveat was filed by the mortgagees at the time the order was made for the payment of the claim for necessities; and I am of opinion that in this case the want of compliance with the rule, and the other circumstances, justify Mr. Clarkson in his application for the costs to which he has been put, and I shall, therefore, give him the costs. I may observe that, after the discussion which took place the other day with respect to the rule of court to which I have referred, I have thought it right, after conferring with the registrar, to issue an order to the effect that for the future any person who has entered a caveat against the payment of money shall receive a notice previously to any application by any other party for the payment of money in the matter in which the caveat has been entered. I direct that the claim pronounced for in the case for necessities shall rank in order of payment after the claims of the master and mortgagees. I reject Mr. Clarkson's motion to overrule the caveat, and I condemn the first mortgagees in the costs occasioned by their delay in entering a caveat against the payment of the claim for necessities.

THE GAUNTLET.

The Foreign Enlistment Act 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 90) ss. 8 and 19—Practice—Bail—Consent of the Crown.

Where a vessel is arrested under the provisions of the Foreign Enlistment Act 1870, the court will admit her to bail with the consent of the Crown.

Semble, the consent of the Crown is not necessary. The court will only require bail to be given to the extent of the value of the ship and her equipment, and not any further sum for costs.

THIS was a case instituted under the Foreign Enlistment Act 1870, by the Attorney-General on behalf of Her Majesty against the steam tug Gauntlet, and against all persons having or pretending to have any right, title, or interest in or to the said vessel.

The affidavit to lead the warrant for the arrest of the vessel set out the following facts:—That the said steam tug Gauntlet was, on or about the 26th Nov. 1870, and on certain days following, employed in the Naval Service of France, that is to say, in towing from the Downs, and from within three miles of the shore of England, to the port of Dunkirk, in France, a certain vessel (belonging to subjects of the North German Confederation), which last-mentioned vessel had lately been captured and taken at sea by a French vessel of war, and was then in possession of the Government of France; that the institution of the proceedings against the Gauntlet, under the provisions of the Foreign Enlistment Act 1870 has been duly sanctioned by Her Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

The Gauntlet was arrested on a warrant directed to be issued on the 28th Jan. by the court on the motion of Archibald.

The Admiralty Advocate (Dr. Deane, Q.C.), Edwyn Jones and T. J. A. Palmer, moved the court for an order to release the Gauntlet, on bail being given for the full value of the vessel. The Foreign Enlistment Act 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 90), sect. 19, enacts that the Court of Admiralty shall, in addition to any power given to the courts by the Acts, have in respect of any ship or other matter brought before it in pursuance of the Act, all powers which it has in the case of a ship or matter brought before it in the exercise of its ordinary jurisdiction. The court has full power to release ships in other cases, and therefore can release on bail, in cases arising under this Act.

The Attorney-General (Sir R. Collier), the Solicitor-General (Sir John Coleridge), the Queen's Advocate (Sir Travers Twiss), and Archibald, for the Crown.—By the above Act, sect. 8 "the ship in respect of which any such offence is committed, and her equipment, shall be forfeited to her Majesty." We must assume for the purposes of this application that such an offence has been committed, and, therefore, as the object of this suit is to obtain possession of the ship, in this respect suits under this Act resemble suits of possession. It is doubtful whether in suits of possession the defendant may substitute bail for the ship, although of course this may be done by consent: (Wms. & Bruce Adm. Pract. 210 n. (b)) [Sir R. J. PHILLIMORE.—The court will allow a ship to be released on bail in causes of possession, where the object of the suit will not be thereby defeated.] If the court considers it has power to order the vessel to be released on the crown giving its consent, the Crown will do so on the proper bail being given.

Sir R. J. PHILLIMORE.—I incline to the opinion that I have power to order this vessel to be released on bail without any consent on the part of the Crown; but I entertain no doubt that I have power to do so with the consent of the Crown; and as the Crown has given its consent I shall order the vessel to be released on bail being given for the full value of the vessel and her equipment.

The Attorney-General.—We are also entitled to have bail given for costs.

Sir R. J. PHILLIMORE.—No; I think you are not entitled to have security beyond the full value of the vessel. (a)

THE MOROCCO.

Rival salvors—Right to begin—Right to cross-examine each other's witnesses—Consolidation of cases.

In a salvage suit where there are rival salvors, the salvor who first enters his suit has the right to begin, unless special circumstances be shown.

Rival salvors have a right to cross-examine each other's witnesses, but only on a point at which they are at issue. A salvor who saves life in addition to the services rendered by him in connection with the other salvors, is not bound to consolidate where the salvors cannot agree as to the conduct of the cause.

FOUR causes of salvage were instituted by four Liverpool tugs—the Empress, the Knight Commander, the Lock Light, and Fire King—for concurrent services rendered by them to the steamship Morocco in the River Mersey. The ship, owing to an accident, was in danger of sinking, and she was beached by the tugs. The Empress took off her passengers. An application for consolidation had been made before the registrar, and the Empress claimed the conduct of the consolidated causes on the ground that she was the first salvor in point of time, but this was objected to by the other salvors, and the Empress proceeded alone, the others being consolidated. The suits came on for examination of witnesses and hearing on the same day, and were heard together.

Aspinall, Q.C. (Clarkson with him) for the Empress, claimed the right to begin, as the services of the Empress were first in point of time.

The Admiralty Advocate (Jones with him) objected on the ground that one of his causes had been entered before that of the Empress, and by the practice of the court he was therefore entitled to begin.

Sir R. J. PHILLIMORE.—It is the rule that those who first entered their cause should begin unless special circumstances be shown.

The only question between the two sets of salvors as to the services rendered was as to which of them reached the ship first, and one set of salvors wishing to cross-examine the witnesses called by the other, application was made to the court to determine the course as to this point.

Aspinall, Q.C., cited the Philadelphia, Br. & Lush. Rep. 28.

Butt, Q.C. (Gully with him), for the ship and cargo, contended that no such cross-examination ought to be allowed unless there was a real rivalry, and submitted that great injustice might arise if friendly salvors could cross-examine each other's witnesses, and so ask questions which could not be asked on examination in chief.

Sir R. J. PHILLIMORE.—I shall allow Mr. Aspinall to cross-examine on the question upon which the two sets of salvors are at issue, and that only.

Aspinall, Q.C., contended that the Empress was justified in not consolidating with the other salvors

(a) The vessel was released on the required bail being given: the bond was conditioned that the defendants should restore the vessel and her equipments, or the value thereof, when ordered by the court to do so.

as she could not have the conduct of the causes. She was a salvor of life, and also the first in point of time.

Butt, Q.C. submitted that there was no real difference between the different services, and that the refusal by the solicitor for the Empress before the registrar to consolidate must have been caused by his having been wrongly instructed by his clients, and if that were so it was not right that the defendants should have to bear the consequent costs in case of a decision against them.

Sir R. J. PHILLIMORE.—The Empress rendered services above those of the other tugs. She was alongside the ship first, and afforded the means of escape for those on board, and so in some sense may be said to be a salvor of life, as there was danger of the ship sinking in the river. Under these circumstances I consider she was justified in not consolidating.

THE WAVERLEY.

Contract to render salvage services—Competent parties—Tender.

A steamer which contracts to render salvage services to a disabled vessel for a fixed sum, will be held strictly to her agreement when it is entered into by competent parties.

It is no ground for claiming extra salvage remuneration, that the service was prolonged, and became more difficult.

Where the master of the disabled vessel—under pressure, being at the mercy of the salvors—consents to abandon the contract, the court will uphold the agreement if equitable.

Payment into court of a sum of money, above the agreed sum, by way of compensation for damage and extra expenses incurred, and for delay, will not estop the defendant from setting up the agreement.

THIS was a cause of salvage instituted on behalf of the owners, master, and crew of the screw steamship London against the screw steamship Waverley, and against Donald Macgregor, her owner, intervening, to recover remuneration for salvage services rendered by the steamship London to the steamship Waverley. The London is a large steamer, regularly running between the ports of London and Cadiz with passengers and cargo, and on the 27th Jan. 1871 she left Cadiz on her homeward voyage. On the following day, hearing that there was a steamer (the Waverley) off the coast which had lost her screw propeller, and required to be towed to Lisbon, the London went in search of her, and on Jan. 29th, about 5.30 a.m., she fell in with her and found that she had already dispatched the chief officer and some men to Lisbon for assistance. The mate of the London was sent on board the Waverley, and entered into an agreement with the master to tow the ship to Lisbon for 400*l*. The lifeboat of the London then brought a warp belonging to the Waverley on board the London, and the London commenced towing. The wind was then moderate from the N.N.W., with a heavy cross sea, but about 9 a.m. the wind and sea increased in force, and the hawser parted, and the Waverley got across the sea and drifted S.E. The London got another hawser on board the Waverley, and began towing again at 10.30 a.m., but the rope again parted almost immediately. The London succeeded in getting another hawser on board the Waverley, and also took one from her, and with the two hawsers continued to tow until 1.30 p.m., when the wind and sea being very high, one of the hawsers parted, and whilst they were trying to get another hawser on board the Waverley the second hawser went, and she was again adrift. The hawsers were again got on board of the Waverley, but at 4.30 p.m. both hawsers had parted, and it was then too dark to make fast again that night. By the advice of the master of the London, the Waverley then let go her anchors, and her master and crew went on board the London, leaving the Waverley to ride to her anchors through the night, as they were afraid of her breaking loose and going ashore, in consequence of the wind being very squally from the N.W., and of the heavy sea then running. The London remained under steam near the Waverley all night and until 6 a.m. on the morning of Jan. 30, and then the master and crew of the Waverley went on board her again with the mate and carpenter of the London; but before doing so the master of the London informed the master of the Waverley that he considered the aforesaid agreement, which had been entered into by the mate of the London on the previous day for the towage of the Waverley by the London for 400*l*. to be at an end, and the master of the London, on his examination, said that the master of the Waverley assented to this, but the master of the Waverley denied having assented to it, although he admitted that the master of the London did make the statement to him.

The London, on the morning of Jan. 30th, again took the Waverley in tow, and the Waverley slipping her anchors, she was taken into Lisbon, where she arrived at 120 p.m., the same day. Whilst there, the passengers of the London had to go to quarantine in consequence of the crew of the Waverley having been on board of the London, and she was detained two days in consequence; and it was found that she had suffered some damage to her ropes, gangway, and boat in the course of the services rendered to the Waverley.

The petition contained, amongst others, the following paragraphs:

29. The London performed services and incurred risks and expenses beyond the scope of the said agreement.

30. The sum of 400*l*. is not an adequate remuneration for the services, risks, and expenses rendered and incurred by the plaintiffs.

The defendants' answer contained, amongst others, the following paragraphs:

3. As to the withdrawal of the master of the London from the said agreement, they further submit to the court whether he could or not legally so acquiesce, and whether his acquiescence would or would not have any legal effect in the circumstances.

8. They deny the several allegations in Articles 29 and 30, and they further say that Article 30 is bad in substance and in law.

9. They have paid into court the sums of 400*l*. and 123*l*. 11*s*. 8*d*., which they have tendered to the plaintiffs; the said sum of 400*l*. being the full amount of the sum contracted for on behalf of the London, and the sum of 123*l*. 11*s*. 8*d*. being full remuneration for the expenses and damages incurred by the owners of the London in consequence of their having received the crew of the Waverley on board of her, and the said sum of 123*l*. 11*s*. 8*d*. being made up of the two following items, to wit, 61*l*. 6*s*. 8*d*., quarantine expenses, and 62*l*. 5*s*., being

THE WAVERLEY.

[ADM.]

demurrage at the rate of 9*d.* per ton on the registered tonnage of the London for the space of two days, which is the detention pleaded in the petition. The said tenders have been rejected by the plaintiffs.

10. They submit that the agreement pleaded in the petition was and is a valid agreement, and that the same has never been rescinded.

The value of the London, her cargo and freight is 94,700*l.*, of the Waverley, her cargo and freight 65,384*l.* It appeared that the weather was so bad that the tugs sent for to Lisbon were unable to put out to sea, but that it moderated on the morning of Jan. 30, the second day of the service.

Milward, Q.C. and Clarkson for the plaintiffs.—The agreement was originally inequitable, and the court will set it aside: The Enchantress (2 L. T. Rep. N. S. 574; 1 Lush. 96). It was necessary for the plaintiffs to take hold of the Waverley at once, and the agreement was made without due time for consideration. Greater difficulty and risk arose after the agreement, and the London is therefore entitled to further remuneration: (The Minehaha, 1 Lush. 347; 4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 811.) This danger was not in contemplation of the parties, and, therefore the agreement falls.

The Galatea, Swa. Rep. 349;

The White Star, L. Rep. 1 Adm. 68.

The master of the Waverley consented to abandon the agreement. The defendants have made a tender over the sum alleged to be agreed upon and are therefore estopped from saying that the plaintiffs are not entitled to more than that sum.

Butt, Q.C. and W. G. F. Phillimore for the defendants.—There was nothing inequitable in the agreement. It was entered into after due consideration and by competent parties:

The Betsy, 2 W. Rob. Rep. 170;

The True Blue, 2 W. Rob. Rep. 176, 179.

This was a contract not for mere towage but for salvage services, and was entered into as such. The defendants are not entitled to abandon their contract because the service becomes more difficult. The London did no more than she was bound to do in remaining by the Waverley all night.

The True Blue, 2 Rob. 176;

The Minehaha, 1 Lush. 347; 4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 811.

There was no element of serious danger in the circumstances which supervened, and the London was not entitled to abandon her contract: (The J. C. Potter, L. Rep. 1 Adm. 68; 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 603.) The master of the Waverley did not assent to abandon the contract, and if he did, the plaintiffs are not entitled to take advantage of his assent, as it was given under pressure, he being entirely at the mercy of the master of the London. The tender made by defendants is merely compensation for damage sustained during the service, and not in the nature of reward for salvage.

Milward, Q.C., in reply.

April 19.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is a cause of salvage instituted by a screw steamship the London against another vessel of the same kind, the Waverley. The value of the latter with her cargo and freight is 65,384*l.*, of the former 94,700*l.* The Waverley has made a tender composed of two sums—400*l.* as the alleged amount contracted for on behalf of the London, and 123*l.* 11*s.* 8*d.* as a full remuneration for expenses and damages incurred by her having received the crew of the Waverley on board of her. The London was a powerful screw steamer of 830 tons, engines of 120 nominal horse-power, a crew of thirty hands and a master, bound from Cadiz to London, with passengers and merchandise. About one p.m. on the 28th Jan. in this year, on her arrival off Cape Sagres, she was informed that there was a steam ship without a propeller near the coast to the south of Cape Espichel, which required to be towed to Lisbon. The London proceeded in that direction, and found on the following day (the 29th) about five miles from Cape Espichel the Waverley steamship, laden with tobacco, of 644 tons register, and engines of ninety horse-power; she was under sail, having lost her propeller; her chief officer and some of her crew had gone to Lisbon to procure a steam tug. At the time when the London came up there was a very heavy sea, but the weather, which had been very boisterous, had moderated. The master of the London caused a lifeboat to be lowered, and dispatched his chief officer in her, with a line to take off a warp from the Waverley, and with directions to ask 500*l.* for towing her to Lisbon—the distance of which was, I think, between twenty and thirty miles from the place where the towing began—if an agreement was insisted upon by the master of the Waverley. When the lifeboat came alongside of the Waverley her master insisted on an agreement, and offered 300*l.* After some discussion it was agreed to split the difference, and that 400*l.* should be given. The towing began at about eight o'clock a.m. of the 29th; a very heavy cross sea was running from N.N.E. and N.N.W. at the time. After an hour the wind increased, and violent squalls came on. The hawsers by which the Waverley was towed, parted several times. At 4.30 the Waverley got across the sea, and drove within three or four miles of the shore. It was dark, and the Waverley, under the advice of the London, let go her anchors. She had then made a progress of little more than six miles. The London was kept under steam during the night, and the crew of the Waverley came on board of her; they returned to the Waverley at six the next morning. At 7.15 she slipped her anchor, and was towed without any further parting of hawsers into Lisbon by 1.20 p.m. The passengers of the London were made to go into quarantine; she was detained two days longer than she would otherwise have been, and she suffered some damage to her ropes and port gangway ladder. It is admitted—the course pursued by the defendants has been very right and proper in making admission—that, as in article 21 of petition, “The Waverley and her master, and those of her crew who were on board her when she was fallen in with by the London, were saved by the aforesaid services from being lost.” It appears also that steamships had set out from Lisbon to assist the Waverley, and been compelled by the weather to return without reaching her. I have no doubt that a very meritorious salvage service was performed by the London, and that having regard to the value of the Waverley and the principles of private right and public policy upon which the court proceeds in these cases, the London would, if no contract had been made, have been entitled to a remuneration exceeding the sums of 400*l.* and 123*l.* 11*s.* 8*d.* The question in this case is whether the contracts made before the towing began was afterwards set aside by the parties to it, or from circumstances became null. I must now advert to a fact in the history of this case, the mention of which I have reserved for this place. On the morning of the 29th, when the crew of the Waverley returned to her, the master of the London had a conversation with the master of the Waverley, of which the following account is given by the former: "I said, my ship is too valuable to risk with the agreement we made yesterday. I would go to work and save his ship, but it would have to be settled by higher powers." He added that the master of the Waverley said: "Yes, I can do no more; I have done all I could." The master of the Waverley deposed that the master of the London said: "The agreement of yesterday I consider as null and void;" to which he made no reply." The master of the London said: "I consider we have done quite sufficient yesterday for 400*l*." He replied: "Captain, you have done your duty well;" and he repeated here that the captain had up to this time behaved very well, and I think there can be no doubt of the fact. The master of the Waverley said: "I knew I was at the mercy of the captain," and he thought, but is not certain, that he said nothing in answer to what was said about the agreement being at an end; he could not remember. The protest which has been put in evidence contains the original agreement, but says nothing about the abandonment of it. It is contended on the part of the London that the court ought to award salvage without reference to the contract; and upon these grounds: First, that it was originally inequitable; secondly, that circumstances of such a character as to vacate it supervened; thirdly, that the abandonment of it was acquiesced in by the Waverley; fourthly, that the tender in this case puts the Waverley out of court. The principles which govern the peculiar question of this kind of agreement have been very carefully considered and consistently enforced by this court and the Privy Council. I shall endeavour to observe those principles in this case as I did in that of The J. C. Potter (L. Rep. 1 Adm. 297; 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 603). There is no doubt that such an agreement as the present was legally binding when it was made: (The Betsy, 2 W. Rob. 170; The Repulse, Ib. 397.) There is equally no doubt that this court exercises an equitable jurisdiction with respect to such an agreement, and will set it aside if inequitable in its origin: (The Enchantress, 1 Lush. 96; 2 L. T. Rep. N. S. 574.) I cannot think that the circumstances of this case bring it within the principle of a contract originally inequitable. I must look, as was said by the Privy Council in the Jonge Andries (Swa. 303), "at the circumstances in which it was made, and the parties between whom it was made." In this case before me the agreement was made after considerable discussion, and assented to by a person of fully competent knowledge and experience; not an ignorant, uneducated seaman. In the case of the True Blue (2 W. Rob. 176) my learned and experienced predecessor said: "The real issue, therefore, which I have to determine in this case is whether or not an agreement to the effect stated was executed between the parties in the suit. But before I consider this point, I will look to the parties themselves, and their capability of entering into such a contract. With respect to the master of the True Blue, it is most undeniably clear that he was perfectly competent, acting on behalf of the owners, to enter into any bonâ fide agreement which he might think requisite for the purpose of fixing the remuneration for the services he required. With regard to the salvors, on the other hand, I see no reason to suppose that they were persons so uninformed and ignorant of their own interests as not to be equally capable of binding themselves by an agreement to which both of them had appended their signatures. There was no such imminent emergency as to prevent time for due consideration. The weather was moderate when they came on board, and there was nothing to induce them to enter into the agreement without a just regard to their own interests and the extent of the service to be performed. Of all persons in the world, they were the most competent to form an estimate as to the value of the service which was required of them." In the present case, moreover, and this circumstance is important in its bearing on the other points, it was clearly a contract for salvage service, though it assumed the form of towage; it was not denied that 400*l*. very largely exceeded the usual towage remuneration to Lisbon from the place where the Waverley was. Then, as to the next contention, that supervening circumstances annulled the agreement. In the True Blue the judge said: "It is no argument against the validity of the contract that in the first instance it was entered into under the impression that the service would be light, but that, in consequence of a change of weather, or other circumstances of that nature, it subsequently became more onerous. It is the very nature of agreements of this kind to fix a stated sum as a compensation for a stated service, and the parties who enter into the engagement take the risk of any change of circumstances which may, in effect, alter the extent of the stipulated service." This question was also fully discussed by the Privy Council in the Minnehaha (Lush. 335; 4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 811), in which case the two rules of this court were confirmed; first, that circumstances might supervene which might justify an abandonment of the contract; but secondly, when they did supervene, it was still the duty of the towing vessel to remain by and aid the towed vessel. In the J. C. Potter I said (citing The Galatea, Swa. Rep. 349, and The White Star, L. Rep. 1 Adm. 68): "In my judgment there must be among the supervening circumstances an element of serious danger, not in contemplation of the parties in the contract, in order to justify the abandonment of the contract, and to found a salvage service." I said also, "That the true criterion by which it is to be ascertained whether the towing vessel has become a salvor is whether the supervening circumstances were such as to justify her in abandoning her contract." I adhere to my ruling on these two points, and proceed to apply it to the circumstances of the present case. When the agreement was made the sea was very heavy, the weather, though moderated, rough, and threatening, such that the steam tugs would not come from Lisbon to assist the Waverley. The weather, on the one hand, became worse after the first towing began, and on the other hand, much better when the second part of the towing was accomplished on the next day. The master of the London, no doubt, expected to perform the whole service of towing on the first day, and believed that the weather would enable him to do so. He was disappointed, but this was the very risk which he undertook by his agreement. Had the weather become suddenly fine, and his task become comparatively easy, the Waverley would not have demanded a shilling by way of reduction of the 400*l*. which she had promised to give. The contract was not, in my opinion, annulled by any change in the weather, or by the greater difficulty and delay which therefrom attended the performance of the service, such as the parting of the hawsers, and the like. Then, when the Waverley anchored for the night, within little more than fifteen miles of Lisbon, it was the duty of the London to remain by her. The coming of the men of the Waverley on Board of the London was a proper precaution to take on behalf of both vessels. The London had towed the Waverley to a place, in which, if her anchors had parted, both ship and crew would have been in great danger of being lost; but did the London herself thereby encounter any sudden and new peril which could not have been expected? The Elder Brethren are most clearly of opinion that she encountered no danger at all in fulfilling her duty by remaining by the Waverley that night. It must be carefully borne in mind that it was not till the next morning that the master of the London declared the contract to be at an end. On what ground? Why, really that the towage service had turned out a more difficult task than he had expected, and that the interests of his owners required that he should have demanded a larger sum than he had demanded. Possibly he had obtained during the night fuller information than he before possessed as to the value of the cargo of the Waverley. But however this may be, I am of opinion that the supervening circumstances in this case were not such as to justify him in abandoning his contract. Some light is thrown upon this matter by the subsequent history. The vessels that morning, when the Waverley slipped her anchors, were from fifteen to twenty miles only distant from Lisbon, and the London tows the Waverley this distance that morning without interruption, or parting with a single hawser. Then as to the alleged acquiescence of the master of the Waverley in the new agreement; I cannot construe the evidence so as to support this position. What could the master do, towed near a lee shore in these circumstances, but say, as in effect he did say, "I am at your mercy; if you choose to say the contract is at an end I cannot help myself." I cannot consider there was any voluntary abandonment of the original agreement. It remains only to notice the last point taken on behalf of the London, namely, that the Waverley, by tendering the additional sum of 125*l.* 11*s.* 8*d.* to cover the expenses of the crew of the Waverley while on board the London, and the quarantine expenses, have annulled the original agreement for 400*l.* I do not think this inference is correct in point of law. It would surely be very inequitable. It is much the same thing as if he had offered to pay some extra sum for the loss of the London's ropes, or some damage inflicted upon her while towing. I feel as strongly as any of my predecessors in this chair have felt the duty and expediency of encouraging, by liberal remuneration, all salvage services; but I feel not less strongly the duty and expediency of not allowing a contract deliberately entered into between perfectly competent parties to be set aside by either of them, because the execution of it has proved more difficult or more easy than was anticipated at the time of making the contract. I pronounce for the tender, with costs from the time it was duly made in the acts of court.

THE GEORGE AND RICHARD.

Collision—Consequential damage—Contributory negligence—Lord Campbell's Act—Child en ventre sa mère.

A child en ventre sa mère is entitled to recover, under Lord Campbell's Act, on the death of its father by negligence. (a)

Two vessels came into collision, and one of them being rendered helpless, was driven ashore by a gale of wind, and three of her crew were killed and others injured. The other vessel was to blame.

Held, that the other vessel was liable to damage for the loss of life and injuries, as they were the natural consequences of the collision. (b)

The crew might have gone on board other vessels before the wreck, but it would have been attended with great risk.

Held, that as they were not bound to run any such risk, they did not contribute to their own loss or injuries.

THIS was a cause of limitation of liability, instituted on behalf of the owners of the brig George and Richard, against Robert Alexander, the owner of the large barque Eleutheria, and of her cargo, and against her master and the survivors of her crew, and against all other persons who might have any claim against the said brig George and Richard, arising out of a collision between the said vessels. On the 15th Jan. 1871, at about five a.m., the two vessels came into collision off the Lizard, and the port main rigging of the Eleutheria was carried away, and her maintop gallant mast brought down. The master of the Eleutheria jumped on board the George and Richard to ascertain what vessel it was, and as the vessels immediately parted was unable to return to his own vessel. The George and Richard wore round to assist the Eleutheria, but could not find her. It was at the time blowing a gale from the S.S.W., and shortly after the collision the helm of the Eleutheria was put up, and endeavours were made to square the main yard, but in doing so the mainmast went by the board and was followed by the foremast. The helm was put down and the mizen set, and the barque was thereby brought head to wind and sea. About noon a ship came up with the Eleutheria and got a warp on board, but this parting, the ship bore away without doing anything further, and shortly after a brig, at the request of those on board the barque, bore away for Plymouth to fetch a steam tug. The master of the Eleutheria had gone into Plymouth on board the George and Richard, and despatched a pilot boat to the assistance of his vessel, and she arrived about this time, and attempted to tow her; but in about an hour the warp parted, and Edward Glinn, the master of the pilot boat, arranged that his boat should go for a tug, and remained on board the Eleutheria. At 2 30 p.m.

(a) See Doe v. Clark (2H Bl. 399); Blasson v. Blasson (11 L. T. Rep. N. S. 353; 34 L. J. 18 Ch.). There would be difficulty in applying this doctrine in the common law courts, as there juries have to assess the damages and to divide the amount so assessed among the persons entitled, and if the child should afterwards be born dead, it would be difficult to find an owner for the amount given to it by the verdict, and the representative bringing the action would be entitled to obtain the money from the defendants on signing judgment.

the master of the Eleutheria went out to look for her in a steam tug, and remained searching for her until seven p.m., but could not find her. Towards night the gale increased considerably, and about two a.m. on the 16th inst., the Eleutheria went ashore on a rocky coast. Twelve of the seventeen hands on board and the pilot were saved, the others drowned. It appeared in the evidence that the mate, who was in command when the vessel struck, ordered two of the men who were drowned, Holland and Ellis, aft, but they did not come, and the pilot sang out to the men to look out for themselves. It was also shown that any attempt to leave the ship whilst the other vessel was near her would have been attended with great risk. The carpenter of the Eleutheria, Noyes, had his leg broken by a falling spar, and being unable, as was admitted, to do anything to save himself, was afterwards drowned when the vessel went to pieces. Brown, Newton, and Ellis, three of the seamen, were injured by falling spars.

The plaintiff's petition and conclusions set out these facts substantially, and admitted that the collision was due to the improper navigation of the brig George and Richard. There were four several answers; the first on behalf of Elizabeth Noyes, the widow of Phillip Noyes, the carpenter of the Eleutheria, and the child of the said Phillip Noyes, en ventre of the said Elizabeth Noyes; the second, on behalf of the said Robert Alexander, the owner of the late barque Eleutheria and her cargo (the plaintiff in a cause against the said George and Richard, No. 5612), and the master and others, the surviving of the crew of the said barque, proceeding for their money, clothes, and private effects (the plaintiff in a cause against the said George and Richard, No. 5630); the third, on behalf of Catherine Sarah Holland, the mother and administratrix of the said Henry William Holland, deceased, and Sarah Rasbrook Ellis, the mother and administratrix of the said Frederick Edward Ellis, deceased; the fourth, on behalf of Joseph Brown, Thomas Newton, and James Higgins, the seamen injured.

The plaintiffs contested their liability for the loss of life as not arising immediately from the collision, and being partly caused by the defendants' own acts, and for the injuries sustained as being the result of the negligence of those on board the Eleutheria, and maintained that the child en ventre sa mère was not entitled to recover. The plaintiffs prayed to be only held liable to the extent of 8*l.* per registered tonnage of the George and Richard, as not having caused loss of life under the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), s. 54. The defendants prayed that the plaintiffs might be held liable to the extent of 15*l.* per registered ton.

Bruce for the plaintiffs.—The deaths of Holland and Ellis were not caused by the collision. A gale afterwards rose and drove the ship ashore. This was not a direct consequence. The law looks only at the results which in the common course of events would have followed, in consequence of the wrong done. When the results would not have followed, but for the happening of other things, then, although the wrong done may be one of those things, without which the loss would not have happened, the wrongdoer must not be held responsible. Causa proxima non remota spectatur. Goods sold in order to enable a master to repair a ship which has been injured by perils of the sea, is not an immediate loss occasioned by those perils: (Powell v. Gudgeon, 5 Maule & Selw. 431.) In the case of Ionides v. The Universal Marine Association (32 L. J. 170, C. P.; 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 705) Earle, C. J. says: "If in the ordinary course of events the one antecedent is constantly followed by the other sequence, they may be taken to stand in the relation of cause and effect. Here, however, it cannot be said that a ship going ashore constantly follows a collision. The collision was the original but not the proximate cause: Marsden v. City and County Assurance Company (L. T. Rep. 1 C. P. 232; 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 465.) According to the ordinary rule, damage, to be recoverable by a plaintiff, must inevitably flow from the tortious act of the defendant. It must be caused by him as the causa causans: (Burton v. Pinkerton, L. Rep. 2 Ex. 340; 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 15.) This collision was not the inevitable cause of the wreck. The damage does not immediately and according to the common course of events follow the defendants wrong, and was not a necessary consequence:

Hoey v. Felton, 31 L. J. 105, C. P.; 11 C. B., N. S., 142; 5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 354;
Glover v. London and South-Western Railway Company, L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 25; 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 139; Scholes v. North London Railway Company, 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 855.

Holland and Ellis contributed to their deaths, and the others to their own injuries, in not leaving their ship when the other vessels were still by the Eleutheria, and further, by not going aft when ordered by the mate as the vessel struck: (Thoroughgood v. Bryan, 8 C. B. 115.) The injuries to the other men were not caused by the collision, but by the gale which afterwards arose, and were not the immediate consequence of the collision. A child en ventre can have no right to sue under Lord Campbell's Act. This Act is an extension of the common law right to sue for injuries caused by negligence to the representatives of those who are killed by such negligence. A child en ventre has no status at common law, whatever it may have in equity. Even in equity a posthumous child cannot claim rents received by a presumptive heir who enters into possession whilst the child is still en ventre: (Richards v. Richards, 29 L. J. 836, Ch.) If it is not recognised by the law before born with respect to its own estates, it cannot be said to have a claim under a statute, unless expressly provided.

W. G. F. Phillimore, for the defendants, claimants in respect of loss of life and personal injury.—The driving on shore and wreck clearly resulted from the collision, with the act of God superadded, and for this the wrongdoers in the collision are responsible. These consequences were the natural and probable results of the collision.

Scott v. Shepherd, 2 W. Bl. 892;
Bailiffs of Romney Marsh v. Trinity House, L. Rep. 5 Ex. 208;
Byrne v. Watson, 15 Ir. Com. Law Rep. 340;
Vandenburgh v. Truax, 4 Denio (New York) 464.

It appears now by the evidence that it would have been dangerous to try and leave the Eleutheria at any time after the collision, and the claimants are only bound to show that the deceased had, in consequence of the collision, two dangerous courses to choose from.

Jones v. Boyce, 1 Stark. 493;
Adams v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company, L. Rep. 4 C. P. 739; 38 L. J. 277, C. P.; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 850.

Even otherwise it is the duty of a seaman to stick to his ship, and this was what the deceased did in consequence of the duty. They were placed by the collision in the position of choosing between possible loss of life and dereliction of duty, which is a position in which they ought not to be placed. The same argument applies to the claimants in respect of personal injuries. The deceased did not contribute to their death by their own fault. It is not proved that they remained in an improper part of the ship when she went ashore; and if they did the court will not look too closely into an error of judgment at such a time. As to the claim of the child en ventre sa mère, the policy of Lord Campbell's Act is not to give a solutum to the feelings, but a money payment to those who, by the death of the deceased, have lost their natural support: (Blake v. The Midland Railway Company, 21 L. J. 233, Q. B.) No one can require more support than a child en ventre, who now, and from the moment it is born, is in a state utterly dependent on others. By the Roman law a child en ventre was entitled to be considered, when its interests were concerned, "Qui in utero est, perinde ac si in rebus humanis osset custoditur, quotiens de commodis ipsius partus quæritur:" D. 1, 5, 7; see also Inst. I., 4. By the English law children en ventre take under a will leaving a bequest to children in a class: (Williams on Executors, 6 edit., p. 1015.)

Bruce in reply.

April 1.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is a cause of limitation of liability, instituted on behalf of the owners of the George and Richard against the owners of the late vessel Eleutheria, and her cargo, the master and survivors of the crew proceeding for their private effects, also against the widow of Philip Noyes deceased, also against the child of which the widow is pregnant, not yet born, also against the representatives of the persons of the name of Holland and Ellis, deceased, and also against three persons, by name Brown, Newton, and Higgins, claimants on the ground of personal injury. The claim of the widow of Noyes as such has been admitted during the course of the suit; the claims of the other parties are contested. The collision which the owners of the George and Richard admit to have occurred by reason of the improper navigation of that vessel, took place on the 15th Jan. in this year, about fourteen miles from the Lizard light. It appears that the master of the Eleutheria got on board the George and Richard in order to ascertain her name, and went with her into Plymouth, and that he sent out a pilot boat to the assistance of the Eleutheria, and fully expected to see the Eleutheria arrive shortly afterwards; and being disappointed in this, sent out a steamboat, which, for some unexpected reason, after searching in vain for the Eleutheria returned to Plymouth, and could not on account of the weather be induced to go out again. The pilot boat went out and found a vessel attempting to tow the Eleutheria, but the attempt was vain, and the vessel went away: the pilot boat then attempted to tow and failed. The boat was then sent away to seek for a tug; the pilot himself got on board the Eleutheria with great difficulty and danger. As soon as the boat was gone, a heavy gale came on and continued until the Eleutheria was driven on shore, at two o'clock next morning. The vessel went to pieces. Five of the men were lost; the carpenter (Noyes) had his leg broken from the falling of a spar, and was afterwards killed. Brown, Higgins, and Newton received slighter injuries, during their endeavours to clear the wreck, upon their legs and ankles. The evidence satisfies me that if it had been right for the men to leave the ship in the vessel which was attempting to tow her, they could not have gone on board her without great danger to their lives. The chief officer of the Eleutheria said that before the ship broke in two on the rock, he called Ellis and Holland to come aft, but they did not come, or perhaps their lives might have been saved. The pilot said that after the boat went and the gale came on, nothing could have been done to save the ship; that when he saw land alongside he sung out, "Every man look out for himself;" and that there is some further evidence which would render it at least doubtful whether Holland and Ellis did not come aft. This is a short review of the facts, which I have thought it necessary to state previous to considering the arguments which have been addressed as to the law applicable to them. On behalf of the George and Richard, the following positions have been maintained: First, that the deaths of Holland and Ellis were not caused by the collision itself, but by subsequent events; secondly, that at all events there was negligence on their parts which contributed to their deaths; thirdly, that the personal injuries of Browne, Newton, and Higgins were not caused by the collision, but by events subsequent to it; fourthly, that the unborn child of the widow Noyes is not entitled to claim damages. The maxim of the common law, Causa proxima non remota spectatur was invoked; and a great many cases were cited for the purpose of showing that damages cannot be recovered by a plaintiff unless they be proximate, and, as it is sometimes said, the natural consequences and results of the defendants wrong, and flow from it immediately and according to the common course of events. Many of the cases cited related to policies of insurance, and the decision depended on the construction of the instrument as to whether the injury in question arose from the excepted perils. Cases of tort, however, as well as of contract, were among those which the industry of counsel laid before me. I have endeavoured to examine them carefully; I may observe that the inclination of the courts in cases of tort seems to be to make the wrongdoer liable, for the injurious consequences of his illegal or tortious act, although very remote. The well-known "squib" case, Scott v. Shepherd (2 W. Bl. 892-7), strongly confirms this observation. The earlier decisions on the subject seem to have been as to the technical form of the remedy, and the distinction between the actions of trespass and case, immediate injury founding the former, consequential, the latter form of remedy. In the case of Byrne v. Watson (15 Ir. Com. Law Rep. 340), in which an action under Lord Campbell's Act was tried, 1862, in the Irish Queen's Bench, Lefroy, L.J., says, p. 339: "The law is clear that every party is liable, not only for the immediate consequences of his negligence, but also for the resulting consequences of his acts, whether those acts are acts of violence, or of negligence in breach of a duty which imposed the necessity of care and caution upon him. Since the celebrated case of Scott v. Shepherd (sup.) the law has been perfectly settled with the concurrence of four most eminent judges, who at that time presided in the English Court of King's Bench, De Grey, C.J.,

THE GEORGE AND RICHARD.

Blackstone, Gould, and Nares, JJ. . . . In the present case, it is admitted that the deceased lady was cast into the lock of the canal, owing to the negligence of the defendant. But it is asserted that when she had thus been put in a position in consequence of which (the lock-keeper having let in the water) she was suffocated, and thus came by her death, the defendant is not answerable, because the water was let into the lock by a person over whom he had no control. It was not the negligence of the defendant that was the immediate occasion of her death, but it was the negligence of the defendant that put her into a position by which she lost her life, as a consequential injury resulting from that negligence; and, although that death was not caused immediately by the act of the defendant, nor was the immediate and instantaneous result of his negligence, yet it was the consequential result of the defendant's act, and enables her representative to maintain this action." In the case of The Bailiffs of Romney Marsh v. The Trinity House (5 L. Rep. Ex. 208), decided in 1870, the defendants' vessel being driven upon a sea-wall, became a wreck, and one of the questions for the court was whether this injury to the wall was caused by the negligence of the defendants so as to make them liable. Kelly, C.B., said: "The defendants' vessel, by the negligence of the captain and crew, grounded upon a shoal or sandbank within three-quarters of a mile of the wall of the plaintiffs', the immediate effect of which was that the vessel became unmanageable, and beyond the control of the crew; and as at the time a high wind was blowing, and the tide flowing towards the shore, the vessel was driven and carried with great violence against the wall, and so effected the injury in question. The rule of law is, that negligence to render the defendants liable must be the causa causans, or the proximate cause of the injury, and not merely a causa sine qua non. I think that it was so in the present case. The immediate effect of the negligence was to put the vessel into such a condition that it must necessarily and inevitably be impelled in whatever direction the wind and tide were giving at the moment, to the sea, and this was directly upon and towards the plaintiffs' wall. The case, therefore, appears to me to be the same as if the ship had been lying at anchor, with the tide flowing rapidly towards a rock, and the defendants had, by some negligence broken the chain and set free the ship, in consequence of which it had at once and immediately been carried by the tide with great force and violence against the rock, and had become a wreck. Would not the wreck of the ship have been caused by the negligence which broke the chain? I think that it would, and that such a case and the case before the court are the same; that the negligence of the crew, the servants of the defendants, was thus the immediate cause of the ship being driven against the wall of the plaintiffs', and that the plaintiffs are therefore entitled to recover." The judges of the Supreme Court in New York have perhaps carried the law on this point to its furthest limit in their judgment in Vandenburgh v. Truax, in which they relied on the case, Scott v. Shepherd. The marginal note of that case is correct, and is as follows: "One who does an illegal or mischievous act, which is likely to prove injurious to others, is answerable for the consequences which may directly and naturally result from his conduct, though he did not intend to do the particular injury which followed. Therefore, when the defendant, having had a quarrel with a boy in the street in the city, took up a pick axe, and followed him into the plaintiff's store, whither he fled, and, in endeavouring to keep out of defendant's reach, the boy ran against and knocked out the faucet from a cask of wine, by means of which a quantity of the wine ran out and was wasted: held, that the defendant was liable to the plaintiff for damages:" (4 Denios N.Y. Rep. p. 464.) There is, perhaps, some difficulty in ranging all the cases of consequential damages, where a tort has been committed, under one principle; but the general rule to be deduced is, that the natural and proximate consequences of the tortious act are the proper subject for consideration. I do not mean to depart from this rule in my judgment on the present case. I conceive that I am acting in accordance with it when I pronounce, as I do, that the deaths of the men Holland and Ellis were the natural and proximate consequence of the collision. It has been contended that the men whose lives were lost were guilty of a negligence which contributed to this catastrophe, and therefore that their representatives cannot recover damages under Lord Campbell's Act. It was not denied that if facts show this negligence, the law is as has been stated: Thorogood v. Bryant (8 C. B. Rep. 118). The question is one of fact—What is the contributory negligence alleged? First, the alleged refusal of these men to go aft when the vessel struck. Upon this first point there is a direct conflict of evidence as to the facts, and I am not disposed to disbelieve the evidence on behalf of the men. Secondly, it is contended that they ought to have left the ship before, but I am of opinion it was their duty to remain by the ship while there was any reasonable chance of preserving her; and if the circumstances would have justified them in leaving her, that they could not have got on board the pilot boat without great peril of their lives. The wrongdoer had no right to place them in a position of alternative danger, and then to refuse compensation because they did not adopt that alternative which he expects would have been the means of saving their lives. It is not a case where there was inconvenience in one course and danger in another, but danger in both courses. The rule of law on this point seems to me clear. The distinction between "inconvenience" and "danger," in its bearing upon the liability of the defendant, is well stated in the case of Adams v. The Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company (L. Rep. 4 C. P. 742; 38 L. J. 277, C. P.; 50 L. T. Rep. N. S. 850). M. Smith, J. there said: "I quite agree that if the negligence of a railway company puts a passenger in a situation of alternative danger, that is to say, if he will be in danger by remaining still, and in danger if he attempts to escape, then, if he attempts to escape, any injury that he may sustain in so doing is a consequence of the company's negligence; but if he is only suffering some inconvenience, and, to avoid that, he voluntarily runs into danger, and injury ensues, that cannot be said to be the result of the company's negligence." This is in accordance with the old case of Jones v. Boyce (1 Stark. 493), in which an action was brought against a coach proprietor for so negligently conducting the coach that the plaintiff, an outside passenger, was obliged to jump off the coach, in consequence of which his leg was broken. Lord Ellenborough said:

THE MARCO POLO.

"To enable the plaintiff to sustain the action, it is not necessary that he should have been thrown off the coach; it is sufficient if he was placed, by the misconduct of the defendant, in such a situation as obliged him to adopt the alternative of a dangerous leap, or to remain at certain peril; if that position was occasioned by the default of the defendant, the action may be supported." Applying these rules of law to the case of these deceased men, I am of opinion that there was no negligence on their part which contributed to their deaths, and which can relieve the owners of the George and Richard of the responsibility with respect to it. With respect to the claim for personal injury of the men Brown, Higgins, and Newton, I am of opinion that it was not remotely, in any legal sense of the word, but proximately connected with the collision. The question of injury is, of course, to be ascertained at the reference, it will probably not be great. I now approach the curious and novel question of the right of the unborn child, of which the widow of Philip Noyes was pregnant at the time of the collision, to claim. There is no doubt that the law in many cases considers and protects the status of the unborn child. A bill may be filed in equity to restrain damage by a tenant for life where the infant, if born, would be in remainder. So Williams, J., observes on the subject of legacies to children: "The leading principle is, that where a bequest is immediate to 'children' in a class, children in existence at the death of the testator, and these alone, are entitled; amongst which, children en ventre sa mère are to be considered:" (Williams on Executors, 6th edit., p. 1015.) It has been argued that the peculiar language of Lord Campbell's Act, requires the actual existence of a claimant as a condition precedent to a right of action. I am not of this opinion. The right of action is certainly given only on behalf of pecuniary loss to the survivor or executor, but is not the unborn child as a survivor? Although it has been said twenty-five years have passed since Lord Campbell's Act, and this particular question has not arisen for discussion, it seems to have been considered in one case as within the purview of this statute. In the case of Blake v. Midland Railway Company (18 Ad. & Ell. N. S. 108), Coleridge, J., said: "The title of this Act may be some guide to its meaning, and it is, 'An Act for compensating the Families of Persons killed,' not for solacing their wounded feelings. Reliance was placed upon the first section, which states in what cases the newly given action may be maintained, although death has ensued; the argument being that the party injured, if he had recovered, would have been entitled to a solatium, and, therefore, so shall his representatives on his death. But it will be evident that this Act does not transfer this right of action to his representative, but gives to the representative a totally new right of action, on different principles. Sect. 2 enacts, 'that in every such action the jury may give such damages as they may think proportioned to the injury resulting from such death to the parties respectively for whom and for whose benefit such action shall be brought.' The measure of damage is not the loss or suffering of the deceased, but the injury resulting from his death to his family. This language seems more appropriate to a loss of which some estimate may be made than to an indefinite sum, independent of all pecuniary estimate, to soothe the feelings; and the division of the amount strongly leads to the same conclusion. 'And the amount so recovered shall be divided amongst the before mentioned parties in such shares as the jury by their verdict shall find and direct.' By what rules ought the jury to be guided in this apportionment? Are they to inquire into the degree of mental anguish which each member of the family has suffered from the bereavement? Then not only the child without filial piety, but a lunatic child, or a child of very tender years, and a posthumous child on the death of the father, may have something for pecuniary loss, but cannot come in pari passu with the other children, and must be cut off from the solatium. It seems to us that if the Legislature had intended to go the extreme length of giving, not only compensation for pecuniary loss, but a solatium to all the relations enumerated in sect. 5, a father and mother, a grandfather and grandmother, a stepfather and stepmother, a son and daughter, a grandson and granddaughter, a stepson and stepdaughter, language more clear and appropriate for this purpose would have been employed." I am of opinion that the proctor for the unborn child has a right to claim in this suit; though until the child is born a reference on this subject cannot of course be made.

THE MARCO POLO.

Necessaries—Master's disbursements—Mortgages.
Certain necessaries having been supplied to a ship in a foreign port, they were paid for by the usual agents at that port, the master endorsing the accounts to the agents, when sent to him, with a request to them to pay, and signing them. The master was accredited to the agents by his owners, and the former were to draw bills on the owners for the amounts advanced. No money passed through the master's hands. When the ship arrived in England the mortgages took possession of her and the freight:
Held, that as the master became personally liable for the amounts so paid, he had a right to proceed in rem against the ship.

THIS was a suit instituted on behalf of Thomas Davies against the ship Marco Polo, and the mortgages of the said ship intervening, to recover wages and disbursements due to him as master of the said ship. The Marco Polo arrived at Callao in Chili on the 11th June 1870, under charter to proceed to Guanape Island and there load a cargo of guano for England. The ship was very old and leaky, and the pumps had to be kept constantly going. The Marco Polo proceeded to Guanape Island, and arrived there with a great part of her metal knocked off by her rolling in the seas. At this time she was making water very fast, and if the master had been forced to put back to Callao to get his clearances, he would have been forced to put her into a dry dock for repairs. The shippers of the guano being connected with the Government of Chili, will not allow a ship to put to sea with guano unless she is perfectly seaworthy.

THE MARCO POLO.

The cost of dry-docking would have been at least 5000*l*. In order to get his clearances at Guanape the master went in a steamer to Callao, and bought a windmill pump at the cost of 80*l*., which he took back to Guanape, which is 300 miles from Callao. To assist in getting up his moorings, the master employed a lighter belonging to the Government authorities. This lighter was sunk in the course of the night by a gale, forcing her across the ship's bows. The master was compelled to pay for the lighter, as the authorities refused to clear his ship unless he did so. On the voyage home the pump was never stopped, and it would have been impossible to have reached England without it. The crew refused to go to take the vessel to sea, and the master was forced to employ men to get her out of Guanape. There were other smaller disbursements.

After the master received his orders to proceed to Callao, his owners, Messrs. Baines, Taylor, and Co., on March 15, 1870, wrote to him: "Bryce, Grace, and Co. will do the needful in regard to the disbursements of your ship." The master had known Bryce, Grace, & Co. for many years, and had usually been accredited to them by his owners, and they had advanced money. When at Callao, purchasing the windmill pump, the master went to Bryce, Grace, and Co. to arrange the mode of payment of the liabilities he might incur for the ship. As the vessel was such a long distance off, and the master did not know what he was to receive, it was arranged that the accounts should be sent into Bryce, Grace, and Co., vouched by the master, and that they should pay them. They did not give the master any money. When the accounts were sent into the master he addressed them to Bryce, Grace, and Co., with a request indorsed on them to pay them, and he signed them with his name. Messrs. Bryce, Grace, and Co. were to draw on Messrs. Baines, Taylor, and Co., for the amounts so paid to the ship.

When the ship arrived in England in Jan. 1871 the owners, Messrs. Baines, Taylor, and Co., were bankrupt, and the defendants, the mortgagees, took possession of her and received the freight. On the 24th Jan. the master took his accounts to the defendants' brokers, but they would not accept them nor pay them. Mr. Bryce, of the Callao firm, saw the master in London about this time, and told him that the account had not been paid, and that he, the master, had better see about it. The plaintiff instituted this suit in this court in the same month, and on the 23rd Feb. Westall and Roberts, the solicitors for Messrs. Bryce, Grace, and Co., wrote to the plaintiff's solicitors, saying that if the plaintiff would proceed with the case in the Court of Admiralty and recover the amount due, they would not molest him on his solicitor's undertaking to pay over the results.

The defendants paid into court the sum of 470*l* 19*s*. 7*d*., as sufficient to cover the plaintiff's wages and disbursements, but refused to pay the money disbursed at Callao. The plaintiff's claim amounted to 1800*l*.

Butt, Q.C., and Cohen for the plaintiff.—These expenses were necessary, and the master made himself personally liable.

Aspland for the defendants.—Bryce, Grace, and Co. were the agents for the owners, and advanced on the owner's credit, and not on the master's. The letter of Bryce, Grace, and Co.'s solicitors shows that they considered the owners responsible, and only looked to the master to recover against the ship, as the owners were insolvent. [Sir R. Phillimore.—You must be prepared to maintain that the master is not liable for any suit or action in respect of this claim. I shall follow The Ferronia (L. Rep. 2 Ad. & Ec. 65; 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 619.)] In that case the main liabilities of the master were bills that he had drawn. Here he only testified that the accounts were correct. The letter of March 15th from the owners to the master shows that Bryce, Grace, and Co. were the owners' general agents, and that the master did not make himself but his owners liable for what was paid: (Priestly v. Fernis, 34 L. J. 172, Ex.; 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 208.) It is a claim for necessities brought by Bryce, Grace, and Co., who have no lien on the ship, and cannot proceed on the general mercantile account, and have, therefore, put the master up to sue. This is a fair inference from the letter written by Bryce, Grace, and Co.'s solicitors. In The Ferronia the master's liability was clear, but here he cannot be held liable, as he never pledged his own credit.

Butt, Q.C., in reply.—These expenses were incurred in bringing the ship home and they enabled the mortgagees to realise the value of the ship and to obtain the freight. It cannot be said that they are to take the benefit and not bear the expense: (Bristow v. Whitmore, 31 L. J. 467, Ch.; 4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 622.) The letter of the 15th March merely directs the master to whom to apply for money, and is the ordinary course, and does not exclude the master's liabilities. The letter of Bryce, Grace, and Co.'s solicitors shows that the money was advanced to the master, and that they held him liable.

Sir R. Phillimore.—This is a suit instituted by the master of the Marco Polo against that ship and the mortgagees intervening to recover his wages and certain disbursements made on behalf of the said ship. The owners of the ship are bankrupts, and she is in the possession of the mortgagees. I am clearly of opinion that the disbursements were properly made, and were such without which the vessel could not have arrived in England. On the arrival of the vessel in England, the owners being bankrupt, the mortgagees took possession of her, and received the freight payable in respect of the cargo she had brought from South America. The only question, therefore, is whether the circumstances of the case showed the liability of the master for the disbursements made by the agents at Callao. In the Ferronia (L. Rep. 2 Adm. & Ec. 65; 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 619), I held that the master was entitled to a lien on the ship for disbursements when properly made. There has been nothing proved before me in this case to show that the master is not personally liable for the payments made for these goods. The mortgagees only stand in the same position as the owners, and it cannot be said that they are entitled to take the benefit of the expenses which enabled them to obtain possession of the ship and earn the freight, and at the same time repudiate the payment of those expenses. I must have given this decision if the ship had still been in the possession of the owners. I overrule the tender, and pronounce for the prayer of the petition with costs.

SMITH AND OTHERS v. BROWN AND OTHERS.

[Q.B.]

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.Reported by T. W. SAUNDERS and J. SHORTT, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

May 2 and 30, and July 6, 1871.

SMITH AND OTHERS v. BROWN AND OTHERS.

Damage—Loss of Life and personal injury—Prohibition to Admiralty Court—24 Vict. c. 10 (The Admiralty Court Act 1861), s. 7—Jurisdiction of Admiralty Court to entertain suit under Lord Campbell's Act (9 & 10 Vict. c. 93).

The 24 Vict. c. 10, s. 7, enacts that "The High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim for damage done by any ship."

Held upon demurrer to a declaration in prohibition (per Cockburn, C. J. and Hannen, J. (Blackburn, J., dubitante), that the word "damage" does not include loss of life and personal injury, and that therefore the above section confers no jurisdiction upon the High Court of Admiralty, to entertain a suit under Lord Campbell's Act (9 & 10 Vict. c. 93) for damages resulting from negligence in the management of a vessel which has caused personal injury and death. (a)

DECLARATION.

Thomas Eustace Smith, George Luckley, and James Southern, complain of Jane Brown, Mary Ann Hodgson, and (fourteen others named), the plaintiffs in a certain suit in the High Court of Admiralty of England hereinafter mentioned, which said last-mentioned persons are hereinafter called the said plaintiffs in the said suit; for that the said Thomas Eustace Smith, George Luckley, and James Southern, were, at and before the time of the collision hereinafter mentioned, the owners of a certain steam vessel called the Black Swan, and the said steam vessel, on the 6th Jan. then last past, came into collision on the high seas with a certain other screw steam vessel called the St. Bede, and by reason of the said collision the St. Bede sank and her master and several of her crew were drowned. And the said plaintiffs in the said suit, who are respectively the wives, parents, and children of the said master of the St. Bede and of those of the crew of the St. Bede who were drowned as aforesaid in the said collision, and afterwards, to wit, on the 8th March then last past, by their solicitors acting for them in that behalf, instituted in the High Court of Admiralty of England a suit against the said steam vessel Black Swan, hereinafter called the said suit to recover damages for the injury resulting to the said plaintiffs in the said suit respectively, from the death of the said master, and the death of those of the crew of the St. Bede who were drowned as aforesaid, and the præcipe to institute the said suit, which was duly filed in the registry of the said High Court of Admiralty [præcipe set out]; and upon the institution of said suit the said T. E. Smith, G. Luckley, and J. Southern were, in order to prevent the arrest of their steam vessel Black Swan, compelled to enter an appearance in the said suit, and were compelled to give bail in the said suit for the sum of 5000*l.*, and they entered an appearance and gave bail accordingly; and afterwards, to wit on the 23rd April now last past, the said plaintiffs in the said suit filed their petition in the said suit, which said petition is as follows:—

"In the High Court of Admiralty of England.

"No. 5289.

The Black Swan.

"Hillyer and Fenwick, solicitors for the plaintiff, in a cause of damage instituted on behalf of Jane Brown, the widow of William Brown, deceased, late master of the steamer St. Bede, of 8, Garden-street, North Shields, in the county of Northumberland, William Brown, James Liddell Brown, John Gray Brown, and Anne Harriett

(a) It does not appear from the judgments of the judges in this case that, supposing the Admiralty Court to have jurisdiction in cases of loss of life and personal injury as above, on which point there are conflicting decisions, that there is anything in Lord Campbell's Act itself to prevent the court from exercising such jurisdiction. (See also the George and Richard, 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 717; ante p. 50.)—Ed.

Liddell Brown, children of the deceased, and others the relatives of the chief officer and crew of the said steamer St. Bede, against the Black Swan steamship, her tackle, apparel, and furniture, and against Thomas Eustace Smith, George Luckley, and James Southern, the owners of the said Black Swan steamship, the defendants in this cause, say as follows:—First, at about 5 a.m., on the 7th Jan. 1870, the screw steam vessel St. Bede, of 532 tons register or thereabouts, manned by a crew of nineteen hands all told, whilst on a voyage from Shields to Huelva, in Spain, with a cargo of pig iron and coke, was off Flamborough Head on the coast of Yorkshire; secondly, the wind at such a time was about south south west, blowing half a gale; the weather was dark and the tide was flood, and there was a very heavy sea; the St. Bede was steering about south by east half east, proceeding under steam alone at the rate of about three knots an hour, with her proper regulation masthead and side lights duly exhibited and burning brightly; thirdly, at such time the masthead and green lights of a steam vessel, which proved to be the above-named vessel, Black Swan, were seen at the distance of two or three miles or thereabouts from, and bearing about two points and a half on the port bow of the St. Bede; the helm of the St. Bede was ported a little; the Black Swan, with her green light open crossed on the starboard bow of the St. Bede when she was seen to be porting her helm, and she shortly afterwards ran against and with her stem struck the St. Bede abaft the fore rigging, and cut her nearly in two, and caused her to founder almost immediately, and her master and all her crew, with the exception of one man named James Dunning, were drowned: the said James Dunning, after being in the water for about an hour or upwards, was picked up by a smack and saved; fourthly, shortly before the said collision the helm of the St. Bede was starboarded by mistake of the man at the wheel, but immediately afterwards, and just before the said collision, her helm was ported; fifthly, the Black Swan made default in not keeping out of the way of the St. Bede as she ought to have done; sixthly, the Black Swan ported her helm at an improper time; seventhly, the Black Swan, which was under both steam and sail, and was proceeding at a rapid speed, did not comply with the provisions of art. 16 of the regulations for preventing collisions at sea; eighthly, the said collision, and the loss of the lives of the master and others of the crew of the St. Bede, were occasioned by all or some or any one of the matters set forth in articles 5, 6, and 7 of this petition; ninthly, the said collision was not in any way occasioned by any negligent or improper navigation on the part of the St. Bede; tenthly, the plaintiffs respectively are the wives, parents, and children of the master and those of the crew of the St. Bede, who were drowned as aforesaid, as defined by the statute 9 & 10 Vict. c. 93. There is not any executor or administrator of the said master or of any of the said crew. And the said Hillyer and Fenwick pray the right honourable the judge to pronounce for the damage proceeded for, and to condemn the defendants and their bail therein and in costs, and to refer it to the registrar, assisted by merchants, to ascertain the amount of such damage, and that further and otherwise right and justice may be administered to the plaintiffs in the premises. And together with the said petition, particulars were filed [particulars here set out of the persons for whom and on whose behalf the suit was instituted, and of the nature of the claim.] And shortly after the filing of the said petition and particulars, the said T. E. Smith, George Luckley, and James Southern, by their counsel, prayed the Right Honourable Sir Robert Joseph Phillimore, knight Doctor of Civil Laws, Lieutenant Judge and President of the said High Court of Admiralty, to reject the said petition, because the cognizance of the same appertained not to the said High Court of Admiralty of England. Yet the said lieutenant judge, and president of the said court not weighing the laws of this realm of England, to the great contempt of our Lady the Queen, and to the manifest injury of the said T. E. Smith, G. Luckley, and J. Southern, refused to reject the said petition, and ordered the said T. E. Smith, G. Luckley, and J. Southern to answer to the same. And the said T. E. Smith, G. Luckley, and J. Southern further say that the said plaintiffs in the said suit were not, nor was any or one of them on board the said steam vessel St. Bede at the time of the said collision, and that the said plaintiffs in the said suit had not, nor had any one of them, any share or interest in the said steam vessel St. Bede, or in any goods or chattels laden on board thereof or belonging thereto, and that the said plaintiffs in the said suit have not nor has any one of them sustained any loss, damage, or injury, by reason of any act, neglect, or default of the said T. E. Smith, G. Luckley, and J. Southern, or any or either of them, or any of the servants of them, or any or either of them other than the injury resulting to the said plaintiffs in the said suit respectively from the death of the said master, and from the death of those of the said crew, who were drowned as aforesaid. And, further, that no proceedings have been instituted or entertained in the said High Court of Admiralty at the suit of the said T. E. Smith, G. Luckley, and J. Southern or any of them, or at the suit of any owner of the said or steam vessel Black Swan, for the purpose of determining the amount of the liability incurred by the owner or owners of the said steam vessel Black Swan in respect of loss of life, personal injury, or loss of or damage to ships' boats or goods, or for the distribution of such amount, and the said T. E. Smith, G. Luckley, and J. Southern further say that according to the law of this kingdom of England the cognizance of the said suit belongeth not to the said High Court of Admiralty, and that the said High Court of Admiralty hath not power or authority to entertain the prayer of the said plaintiffs in the said suit, or to refer it to the registrar of the said court, assisted by merchants, to ascertain the amount of the damage claimed by the said plaintiffs in the said suit, nor had the registrar of the said court, assisted by merchants, power to ascertain the amount of such damage. Yet the said plaintiffs in the said suit have not ceased to prosecute the said suit in the said High Court of Admiralty, and still do prosecute the same there, to the great oppression of the said T. E. Smith, G. Luckley, and J. Southern. Wherefore the said T. E. Smith, G. Luckley, and J. Southern humbly imploring the assistance and munificence of this court, pray remedy by writ of our said Lady the Queen of prohibition to the said Lieutenant, judge, and president of the said High Court of Admiralty in form of law to be directed to prohibit him that he may not further hold plea before him in any wise touching the premises aforesaid."

Demurrer, that the declaration was bad in substance, wherefore the defendants prayed that the said writ of prohibition to the said Lieutenant, Judge, and President of the High Court of Admiralty of England might not issue as in the said declaration is prayed.

A ground of demurrer was that the facts stated in the declaration did not show that the High Court of Admiralty might not have cognizance of the said suit of the defendants therein.

Joinder in demurrer.

9 & 10 Vict. c. 93, enacts :

That whosoever the death of a person shall be caused by wrongful act, neglect, or default, and the act, neglect or default is such as would (if death had not ensued) have entitled the party injured to maintain an action and recover damages in respect thereof, then, and in every such case, the person who would have been liable if death had not ensued shall be liable to an action for damages, notwithstanding the death of the person injured, and although the death shall have been caused under such circumstances as amount in law to felony.

Sect. 2 :

That every such action shall be for the benefit of the wife, husband, parent, and child of the person whose death shall have been so caused, and shall be brought by and in the name of the executor or administrator of the person deceased; and in every such action the jury may give such damages as they may think proportioned to the injury resulting from such death to the parties respectively for whom and for whose benefit such action shall be brought; and the amount so recovered, after deducting the costs not recovered from the defendant, shall be divided amongst the before-mentioned parties, in such shares as the jury by their verdict shall find and direct.

24 Vict. c. 10 (The Admiralty Court Act 1861), s. 7 :

The High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim for damage done by any ship.

Sect. 22 :

Any new writ or other process necessary or expedient for giving effect to any of the provisions of this Act may be issued from the High Court of Admiralty in such form as the judge of the said court shall from time to time direct.

Sect. 35 :

The jurisdiction conferred by this Act on the High Court of Admiralty may be exercised either by proceedings in rem or by proceedings in personam.

Butt, Q.C. (with him Clarkson).—First, there are circumstances under which the Court of Admiralty has to do what it now assumes to do, viz., assess damages. By sect. 514 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), the liability of the shipowner in cases of collision, and perhaps other cases, was limited to the value of the ship and freight earned. That section was, however, repealed by the Amendment Act, 1862, and a provision (sect. 54) substituted, limiting the liability to an assumed value of the ship and freight of 8*l.* a ton, where there is damage to ships and goods without loss of life, and to 15*l.* per ton where both kinds of injury happen. And by sec. 514 the High Court of Chancery is empowered to entertain proceedings at the suit of any owner for the purpose of determining the amount of the liability where several claims are made or apprehended. Then sect. 13 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), enacts that "whenever any ship or vessel, or the proceeds thereof, are under arrest of the High Court of Admiralty, the said court shall have the same powers as are conferred upon the High Court of Chancery in England by the ninth part of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854." In Hill v. Andus (1 K. & J. 263), Wood, V. C. refused to entertain a suit of this kind unless the plaintiff admitted liability. But in The Amalia (8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 805; 1 Moo. P. C., N. S., 471), it was held that it is not necessary that owners of a vessel and cargo preferring their claim in the Court of Admiralty to limited liability should acknowledge in the first instance that their vessel was to blame. [COCKBURN, C. J.—Here there are a dozen claimants; each person's loss may vary, yet each person's pecuniary loss must be ascertained. Then the value of the ship being settled the amount to which each individual is entitled pro rata on the value of the ship must also be fixed. Moreover, the age of the deceased persons, their position in life, and all the various matters of inquiry in an action under Lord Campbell's Act have to be ascertained. But what machinery has the Admiralty Court by which it can do all this?] No doubt it is peculiarly the function of a jury to make such an investigation, unless jurisdiction is expressly given to the Court of Admiralty by the Legislature. That jurisdiction has been so given. The Court of Admiralty has similar functions to perform in other cases. The first proceeding is to stay all actions. COCKBURN, C. J.—Suppose twelve actions brought here, could the defendant go to the Admiralty and ask that the plaintiffs might all be enjoined not to go on? Sect 13 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 provides that whenever any ship or vessel, or the proceeds thereof, are under arrest of the High Court of Admiralty, the said court shall have the same powers as are conferred upon the High Court of Chancery in England by the 9th part of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854. [COCKBURN, C. J.—That is where the ship is arrested, but, assume that there was no arrest, could these widows be enjoined from proceeding? Not in the Court of Admiralty, but by the Court of Chancery they would be. Matters of this kind, where there is limited liability, cannot be determined without some such powers as the Admiralty Court possesses. If these numerous widows had come into the Court of Queen's Bench how could their claims be adjusted? [COCKBURN, C. J.—Judgment would go for the amount recovered.] Then the first judgment obtained might exhaust the value of the ship and leave the subsequent ones unsatisfied. [BLACKBURN, J.—I should have thought that the right course would have been to stay the actions proceeding to execution, but allow the plaintiffs to go on until then.] We rely on sect. 7 of the Admiralty Court Act, 1861, which gives the High Court of Admiralty jurisdiction over any claim for any damage done by any ship; and on sect. 35 which enacts that the jurisdiction conferred may be exercised either by proceedings in rem or in personam. Questions have arisen as to whether the Court of Admiralty can entertain a suit of damage by a seaman for injuries he has sustained. There are two cases upon that subject, first, The Sylph (17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 519; L. Rep. 2 Adm. 24). There a diver who while engaged in diving in the Mersey, was caught by the paddle wheel of a steamer, instituted a cause of damage against the ship. Held, that the Court had jurisdiction to entertain the suit. Sir R. Phillimore in that case was of opinion that the court had originally jurisdiction, and also jurisdiction given to it by the recent statutes. The judgment of Story, J., in the great case of De Lovio v. Boit (20 Gall. 398), ascribes to the Admiralty Court a wide jurisdiction, for which we do not attempt to contend; but we confine the argument to the jurisdiction given by statute. In The Beta (20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 888; L. Rep. 2 P. C. 447) it was held that the Court of Admiralty has jurisdiction, under 24 Vict. c. 10, s. 7, in a cause of damage instituted against a ship for personal injuries. Lord Romilly, delivering the judgment of the Privy Council on appeal from the decision of Sir R. Phillimore, says, "The words of the 7th section of the Admiralty Court Jurisdiction Act which had been referred to, clearly include every possible kind of damage. Personal injuries are undoubtedly within the words 'damage done by any ship.' The case of the Sylph, which has been referred to, and in which it was so held, has not been appealed from. There was every reason for the Legislature enacting that which the judgment of the court below holds to have been enacted." In many cases the vessel causing the damage is a foreign one, and unless the person injured could sue in the Court of Admiralty, he would be without any remedy at all, and it was to provide for many such cases, that this Act of Parliament was passed. Then how can it be said that the Admiralty Court would be better able to assess damages in cases of personal injury than in those where there has been loss of life? Both kinds are peculiarly cases for a jury. Yet, unless the Beta was wrongly decided, a power and jurisdiction to assess damages in cases of personal injury has been conferred on the Court of Admiralty by the Legislature. The Guldfaxe (19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 743; L. Rep. 2 Ad. 325) was a cause of damage on behalf of the administratrix of a seaman who, at the time of his death was one of the crew of a vessel which was sunk by a collision with the Guldfaxe, occasioned, as the plaintiff alleged, by the mismanagement of the Guldfaxe; and Sir Robert Phillimore held, although not without doubt, that the court had jurisdiction, under Lord Campbell's Act and the Admiralty Court Act 1861, s. 7, to entertain the suit. The Guldfaxe was a foreign vessel, (a) and therefore the plaintiff would have had no remedy against her except in Admiralty. If it is said contra, that the word "declaration" in sect. 4 of Lord Campbell's Act, shows that the action is to be brought only in a court where pleadings commencing with a declaration are used, an obvious answer suggests itself, viz., that the Act certainly applies to the County Court, where declarations are unknown. When this rule was moved the Lord Chief Justice asked what would happen if the Court of Admiralty found both vessels to be in fault? Since then a case has arisen in which the court has held both vessels to be to blame. The question thereby becomes rather complicated. [COCKBURN, C. J.—Whence does the Court of Admiralty derive its power of referring matters to the registrar?] There is no express power, but it is the established practice in all cases where the assessment of damages becomes necessary.

Manisty, Q.C. (with him Gainsford Bruce)—It is conceded that up to the passing of the 24 Vict. c. 10, the Admiralty Court had not jurisdiction to entertain a suit under Lord Campbell's Act. The question turns, therefore, on the meaning of sect. 7 of the first-mentioned statute. That section had no such wide effect as the other side would give to it. Lord Campbell's Act gave a new cause of action and a new remedy. It begins thus: "Whereas no cause of action is now maintainable against a person who by his wrongful act, neglect, or default, may have caused the death of another person, and it is oftentimes right and expedient that the wrongdoer in such case should be answerable in damages for the injuries so caused by him. . ." Then the right of action is given, and sect. 2 declares for whose benefit the action shall be and by whom to be brought. Sect. 4 (b) points to a particular remedy—viz., an action in a court of common law. The jury were to divide the damages amongst the parties entitled to them in shares—a provision which gave rise to sect. 2 (c) of 27 & 28 Vict. c. 95. Sect. 7 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 never was intended to give that court jurisdiction in this peculiar case, for it does not provide any mode of ascertaining damages. The damages could not, of course, be assessed by a jury. [BLACKBURN, J.—Sect. 35 gives a power to

(a) This fact does not appear from the reports.

(b) Sect. 4 enacts "That in every such action the plaintiff on the record shall be required, together with the declaration, to deliver to the defendant, or his attorney, a full particular of the person or persons for whom or on whose behalf such action shall be brought, and of the nature of the claim in respect of which damages shall be sought to be recovered."

(c) Sect. 2, after reciting sect. 2 of 9 & 10 Vict. c. 93, enacts "That it shall be sufficient if the defendant is advised to pay money into court that he pay it as a compensation in one sum to all persons entitled under the said Act for his wrongful act, neglect, or default, without specifying the shares into which it is to be divided by the jury; and if the said sum be not accepted, and an issue is taken by the plaintiff as to its sufficiency, and the jury shall think the same sufficient, the defendant shall be entitled to the verdict upon that issue."

proceed in personam, as Mr. Butt pointed out.] And that is an additional reason for holding that the court has not jurisdiction as an alternative proceeding in rem is also given, fastening upon the ship a maritime lien. Therefore the jurisdiction is confined to cases where there is a maritime lien, according to the general rule, to which there is only one exception—viz., when there is misconduct of a master towards their crew or passengers. Maritime lien is the foundation of the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Courts. Their jurisdiction has always been restricted to cases where they had a power to afford relief which the common law could not give. In 1840 an Admiralty Act passed, which led to considerable difficulty. It is the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65. Sect. 6 recites that the jurisdiction of the High Court of Admiralty may be advantageously extended. Up to that time the court had no jurisdiction within the body of a county, and the object of the statute was to give that jurisdiction. Moreover a power was also conferred of dealing with mortgages; and by sect. 6 of entertaining questions as to damages received by any vessel. [COCKBURN, C. J.—By the ship itself, not by the persons on board.] Yes; by the ship. The encroachments of the Admiralty Court on the courts of common law, clearly are shown by 13 Ric. 2, c. 5, and 15 Ric. 2, c. 3, which statutes declare that the admirals and their deputies shall not have jurisdiction within the bodies of counties, thereby giving rise to sect. 6 of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65. In The Bilbao (3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 338; Lush. 149), the late distinguished judge of the Admiralty Court, Dr. Lushington says: "It was very properly admitted," by counsel in argument, "that previous to the passing of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, the Court of Admiralty had no jurisdiction within the body of a county. This appears from several cases, one of which is the Eliza Jane (3 Hagg. 335), and indeed the statute was passed for the express purpose of remedying that and other inconvenient defects. The language of that statute, however, though in many respects very general as to damage, gives the court jurisdiction only in cases of damage, received by any ship or sea-going vessel." Then the Act of 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10) was passed, and the first case upon sect. 7 was the The Malvina (6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 369; Lush. 493). An action brought by a barge against a steamer for a collision on the Thames within the body of a county, and Dr. Lushington there held that the court had jurisdiction by sect. 7, saying, "Difficulties have continually occurred from the words of the statute of Ric. 2, but I am of opinion that now all such are wholly removed by these most expressive words: 'The High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim for any damage done by any ship.'" But it never was supposed that sect. 7 gave the Admiralty Court jurisdiction to proceed in rem in cases under Lord Campbell's Act. [HANNEN, J.—Do you suggest that damage done by a ship means by a ship to a ship?] We do. [BLACKBURN, J.—If by the negligence of the crew, the ship were driven against a man and killed him, or against the ship in which he might be, with the same result, it would be impossible to say that was not damage done by a ship.] The right of action in question was unknown to the common law. It was expressly given by Lord Campbell's Act. It is not likely that jurisdiction would have been given to the Admiralty Court in respect of it, otherwise than in express terms. The reason why that court has jurisdiction not possessed by the common law is founded on maritime lien. [BLACKBURN, J.—Suppose a man were injured at sea, but not killed, would not the Admiralty have jurisdiction, and is it not going a very little way further to give an action to his executor if he is killed?] There is no instance of any proceeding of such kind. [BLACKBURN, J.—I think the maritime lien arises from the jurisdiction, and not the jurisdiction from the maritime lien as you say.] The liability of the shipowner is limited to 15*l.* per ton by statutory enactment. Assume that in the present case, the vessel is not worth 15*l.* a ton, judgment obtained in the Court of Admiralty would be no bar to an action under Lord Campbell's Act; and suppose 10*l.* per ton had been recovered, the plaintiffs might afterwards sue in this court and recover an additional 5*l.* per ton. [BLACKBURN, J.—It must be remembered that the proceedings may by the recent Act be in personam as well as in rem.] In The Robert Pow (9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 237; Br. & Lush. 99), it was held that the Court of Admiralty has not jurisdiction under 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6; or 24 Vict. c. 10, s. 7, or otherwise, to entertain a claim against a steam tug for damage occasioned to the vessel towed by negligence in towing, if the damage arises not by collision, but by the vessel taking the ground. Dr. Phillimore there said, that the word "damaged" used in sect. 6, "must be taken according to the well understood meaning of the phrase in the Admiralty Court, namely, damage done by collision." Now, the present is not a case of damage done by collision, in the ordinary meaning of the word, as used in the Admiralty Court, for there is no maritime lien, and there is no jurisdiction in that court over collision cases, unless there be a maritime lien. The Ida (1 L. T. Rep. N. S. 417; Lush. 6), affords a deep illustration of what the Admiralty Court deems a case of collision, over which it has jurisdiction. There the master of a Danish schooner lying alongside a quay at a port in the Danube, wilfully cut an English barque adrift, in order to get his own vessel out, whereby the barque swung to the stream and capsized a barque which contained part of her cargo belonging to Turkish owners; and it was held that the Turkish owners of the cargo destroyed, could not sue the schooner in the Court of Admiralty. Dr. Lushington said: "The court, it must be remembered, has never exercised a general jurisdiction over damage, but over causes of collision only; and this is no collision in the proper sense of the term. . . . I have gone further than any of my predecessors in enlarging the jurisdiction of the court, because the commercial and maritime world has undergone such great changes; but I must not extend my jurisdiction beyond what circumstances render necessary." This subject is very fully considered in Ramsay v. Allegre (7 Curtis, 401; 12 Wheaton 611), where, in the midst of a long and learned judgment, Johnson, J. says . . . "the progress of the common law courts was rapid in wresting from the Admiralty every species of contract, leaving them none to act upon, on which they would themselves render complete justice according to the established rights of the parties. They are charged with absurdity and inconsistency; but I pronounce the charge utterly groundless; for one principle runs through all their decisions that of subjecting to the trial by jury every cause in which that form of trial could be applied without injury to the parties' rights." [He referred to numerous passages in his judgment.] [COCKBURN, C. J.—Why should not the Admiralty Court have jurisdiction when parties choose to resort to it, limiting their remedy to whatever might be the value of the ship?] Because the defendant is as much entitled to a trial by jury as the plaintiff. [COCKBURN, C. J.—Looking at it from a legislative rather than from a judicial point of view, the absence of a jury would probably be an advantage to the defendant, as juries are apt to lean towards the injured party.] Moreover, another consideration in the matter is that the Admiralty Court divide the damage where both vessels are in fault, and there are cross suits. [BLACKBURN, J.—But the drowned men may not themselves have been to blame for the collision.] Next, as to sect. 514 of the Merchant's Shipping Act, 1854: The effect of that section is that if a shipowner chose to come in and admit liability, the Court of Chancery might determine the amount, and Hill v. Andrus (sup.) has decided that there must be an admission of liability. Sect. 13 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, confers the same powers on the Court of Admiralty only when the ship is "under arrest." Now arrest only takes place when there can be proceedings in rem. The Common Law Procedure Act 1860 has by sect. 35 given to this court also the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery under the Merchant Shipping Act 1854. The 27 & 28 Vict. c. 94, amending Lord Campbell's Act, assumes that the parties are only able to proceed in the common law courts, even when there is an admission of liability, for it enacts that a defendant may pay money into court "without specifying the shares into which it is to be divided by the jury." The Gulfæe (sup.) was a case adjudicated upon by the learned judge whose decision is now impugned. In The Beta the Privy Council decided that a suit for personal injury could be maintained in the Admiralty Court. That case is adverse to the defendants, but it may be distinguished from the present one, for the persons bodily hurt there were alive, and had of course a right of action at common law. Therefore the judgment amounts only to this, viz., that in cases where there was a remedy at common law the Court of Admiralty now has jurisdiction given by the Act of 1861.

SMITH AND OTHERS v. BROWN AND OTHERS.

Butt. Q.C. in reply.—Similar powers given to Common Law Courts by sect. 35 of the Procedure Act 1860, would not abrogate those of the Court of Admiralty. The latter court has now jurisdiction in personam in various other cases. No argument has been adduced against the point as to the peculiar jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court over foreign ships. It is clear that court has power which is daily exercised in cases where no maritime lien exists. The Robert Pow (sup.) is wrong; and it was on contract. The case of the Ida (sup.) was reargued before Sir R. Phillimore, who decided in accordance with the previous judgment of his predecessor. The case was first decided before the passing of the Act in question. [BLACKBURN, J.—And there are two concurring opinions, one delivered before, the other afterwards, thereby conclusively showing it was not a hasty, but a deliberate judgment.] In the Uhla, reported in a note to the Sylph (sup.) Dr. Lushington says that sect. 7 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, means "every case of damage done by any ship; there is no limitation, no restriction expressed." That the jurisdiction is beneficially exercised is evident from the fact of plaintiffs resorting to the Admiralty Court for redress under Lord Campbell's Act. Nice questions would arise in the common law courts as to contributory negligence—viz., whether the family of a seaman might not be disentitled to recover because his officers or comrades in whose watch a collision occurred may have been guilty of negligence, although the sailor himself may have met his death while he was below, and have been himself free from blame: (Thoroughgood v. Bryan, 8 C. B. 115.) That case is, however, much doubted. [HANNEN, J. referred to Cattlin v. Hills (8 C. B. 123.) If Thoroughgood v. Bryan be good law it might be an answer. It must be remembered that in the Admiralty Court there is no injurious damage without misfeasance. Collisions frequently happen in fogs, when no blame is attributable to either vessels, and then both suits are dismissed. If this prohibition were to issue, seamen and passengers killed by foreign ships would have no remedy.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 6.—The COURT delivered the following judgments, the first being that of the Lord Chief Justice and Hannen, J., prepared by Cockburn, C. J.—This was a demurrer to a declaration in prohibition upon an application made to this court to prohibit a suit in the Court of Admiralty, instituted by the defendants, as widows or surviving relatives of certain persons who were drowned by the sinking of a vessel called the St. Bede, which was run down in a collision with the vessel of the present plaintiffs, called the Black Swan, occasioned, as was alleged, by the negligence of the person having charge of the latter vessel. The plaintiffs and defendants in the suit in the Court of Admiralty excepted to the jurisdiction of that court to entertain the suit, but that plea was overruled, whereupon they applied to this court for a prohibition, and the question which presents itself for our decision on the present record is whether the Court of Admiralty has jurisdiction to entertain such a suit or not. The question is one of considerable difficulty, but my brother Hannen and I are, on the whole, of opinion that the Court of Admiralty does not possess the jurisdiction contended for. The question turns entirely on the effect of the 7th section of the 24 Vict. c. 10. Whatever may have been the pretension of the Court of Admiralty in ancient times to jurisdiction on the matter of personal injuries arising on the high seas as explained by Story, J. in the case of De Lovio v. Boit (sup.), and referred to by Sir R. Phillimore in the case of The Sylph (sup.), as regards personal injuries caused by collision it is admitted that no such jurisdiction, independently of recent statutes, existed in modern times, and it is too plain to admit of doubt that the right of action, created for the first time by the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 73, and the 27 & 28 Vict. c. 95, was by these Acts confined to actions brought in the courts of common law. It is not contended that jurisdiction was conferred by these Acts on the Court of Admiralty; the jurisdiction, if it exist at all, must have been created by the recent legislation for the extension of the Admiralty jurisdiction. The 7th section of the 24th Vict. c. 10, on which the present question depends, is in these few words: "The High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim for damage done by any ship,"—the term ship being, by the interpretation clause 2, to be taken to include "any description of vessel used in navigation not propelled by oars." The question is, whether personal injury, occasioned by the collision of two vessels, comes under the term "damage" as used in this section. Now the words used are undoubtedly very extensive, but it is to be observed that neither in common parlance, nor in legal phraseology, is the word "damage" used as applicable to injuries done to the person, but solely as applicable to mischief done to property; still less is this term applicable to loss of life or injury resulting therefrom to a widow or surviving relative. We speak, indeed, of damage as compensation for injury done to the person, but the term "damage" is not employed interchangeably with the term injury with reference to mischief wrongly occasioned to the person, and that this distinction is not a matter of mere verbal criticism, but it is of a substantial character, and necessary to be attended to, is apparent from the fact that the Legislature in two recent Acts in pari materia, both having reference to the liability of shipowners in respect of injury or damage, namely, the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, part ix.), and the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), has, in a series of sections, carefully observed this distinctive phraseology, speaking in distinct terms in the same section of loss of life and personal injury on the one hand, and loss or damage done to ship's goods or other property on the other. In these Acts the term "damage" is nowhere used as applicable to injuries done to the person—it is applied only to property and inanimate things. We see no reason to suppose that the Legislature, in using the term in the enactment we are considering, had lost sight of the distinction uniformly observed in the preceding statutes. No doubt if there were anything in the other provisions of the Act which showed that the term "damage" had been here employed in a more comprehensive sense, we ought not to restrict the operation of the enactment by too nice a regard to the language used. But we not only find nothing in the other provisions of the statute which can have this effect; but it seems to us, when we consider what would be the consequences of bringing suits instituted under Lord Campbell's Act within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty, impossible to suppose that the Legislature can have intended, under a general enactment like the present, as it were by a sidewind, to effect so material a change in the rights and relative position of the parties concerned in such an action. The purpose and effect of the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 93, was to give to the parties who acquired a right of action under it a right of full compensation to be recovered by the procedure of the ordinary law of the land. But the consequence of a transfer of the jurisdiction of the courts of common law to the Court of Admiralty would be not only to deprive the parties of the common law procedure and mode of trial, but, what is of still greater importance, materially to alter their substantive rights and relative position inasmuch as the Court of Admiralty in dealing with claims for damage—as, for instance, in holding that where both vessels were in the wrong the loss is to be decided between them—acts upon principles unknown to the common law, and which, though they may be very proper in the case of damage done by one vessel to another are altogether inapplicable to the case of personal injury or the right to compensation given by Lord Campbell's Act. We cannot think that the Legislature would have introduced so important a change without an enactment referring in express terms to the case of loss of life or personal injury as was done in the Merchant Shipping Acts already referred to. It is true that in these Acts the Legislature has interfered with and abridged the rights of parties having a right of action under Lord Campbell's Act by limiting the liability of the shipowner in case of collision to the value of the ship and freight and enabling the latter to apply to the Court of Chancery for protection against any demand beyond it, but in doing so the Legislature has given no jurisdiction in reference to loss of life or personal injury in express terms, and has not contented itself with the general term "damage," but, on the contrary, has confined the use of the latter to injury to ships and property as distinguished from persons. We cannot but think that what the Legislature has there done with reference to what may be called the protective jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery created by the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, part 9, and the general limitation of the shipowner's liability, established by the latter statute of the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, it would have done in the present instance had it intended to confer the initiative jurisdiction of entertaining a suit instituted under Lord Campbell's Act, by the parties entitled to sue under that Act. It may be said that if the enactment of the 7th section of 24 and 25 Vict. c. 10, is to be confined to damage done to property in case of collision, the enactment becomes useless, seeing that the Court of Admiralty had undoubted jurisdiction in such cases before. But if the language of Dr. Lushington, in the case of The Malvina (sup.), be looked at, it will be seen that even with reference to the jurisdiction of the admiralty in respect of damage to property, the section is by no means without its value. By the statute of 13 Ric. 2, c. 5, the jurisdiction of the admiral being expressly limited to cases arising on the high seas, it was therefore excluded in respect of any damage occurring on any water within the body of a county. By the Act of the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, this restriction was indeed removed, jurisdiction being given in respect of all claims and demands whatsoever in the nature of damage received by any ship or seagoing vessel, whether such ship or vessel may have been within the body of a county or upon the high seas at the time when the damage was received, in respect of which such claim is made. But the jurisdiction then given was confined to ships and seagoing vessels; damage done to a barge or other vessel used for inland navigation, would not have been within the jurisdiction. Hence, Dr. Lushington says that from the use of these words constant confusion had arisen; when therefore an Act was passed expressly for the purpose of placing the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty on a broader and firmer basis, of making it what it had not before been—a court of record—and giving it many of the powers in respect of procedure, previously confined to the courts of common law, it is not to be wondered at that a provision should have been introduced for getting rid of the difficulty created by the 3 and 4 Vict. c. 65, in limiting the jurisdiction to any ship or seagoing vessel, by including within it damage done by any description of vessel used in navigation not propelled by oars. Under this enactment

SMITH AND OTHERS v, BROWN AND OTHERS.

SMITH AND OTHERS v. BROWN AND OTHERS.

[Q.B.]

Dr. Lushington, in a case referred to, was enabled to hold that damage done by a ship to a barge in the river Thames was within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty. However large the words of the 7th section may be, it is plain that the opinion of Dr. Lushington was that while they removed the difficulties arising from the statute Ric. 2, and the language of the 3 & 4 Vict., they could not operate to enlarge the jurisdiction of the court in respect of matters which were not within it before. In the case of the Robert Pow (Br. & Lush 102), he says, "as in the former statute, damage here means damage done by collision," and on this ground he refused to entertain a claim for damage occasioned by a vessel by negligence in towing. It is true that in the case of the Ulla (L. Rep. 2 Adm. 29) Dr. Lushington held that where a ship had driven against a breakwater, and had done damage to it, a suit in the Admiralty Court would lie, but there the damage had been actually done to the breakwater by the ship itself, and the case, therefore, came within the very words of the Act, nor was there the difficulty we have pointed out in the application of the term "damage" to personal injury. If the opinion there expressed by the eminent authority referred to was, as we think it was, the correct view of the enactment in question, it would appear to follow that, inasmuch as prior to the statute the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty in the case of collision did not extend to loss of life or personal injury, no enlargement of the jurisdiction to claims thus arising can be held to have accrued from the enactment of the 7th section, and that is the conclusion at which, though not without doubt and difficulty, my brother Hannen and I have arrived. We are aware that in holding that the Court of Admiralty has not acquired jurisdiction in cases within the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 93, we are taking upon ourselves to overrule cases decided by very high authority. In the case of The Sylph (sup.) the present judge of the Admiralty Court held that a diver who had been caught by the paddle wheel of a steamer, and had suffered personal injury, might maintain a suit in that court. In the subsequent case of The Goldfaze (sup.) the same learned judge held, though, as he himself declares, not without doubt and hesitation, that a claim arising on Lord Campbell's Act was within the jurisdiction of the court. In the still later case of The Beta (sup.) the plaintiff having brought his suit in the Court of Admiralty in respect of personal injuries sustained through a collision between a ship, on board of which he was serving, and the defendant's vessel, the defendants excepted to the jurisdiction; and the judge having rejected their petition, and the case having been brought before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council on appeal, that court, without even calling on the counsel for the respondents, dismissed the appeal with costs. We have, of course, felt greatly pressed by the weight of the decision of a court of such high authority, but we have been unable to bring ourselves to adopt the same view. The grounds of the decision, which appears to us to have been arrived at somewhat hastily, are very briefly given in the report of the case, but the difficulties which have stood in our way in taking the same view of the effect of the 7th section, and which have led us to an opposite conclusion, do not appear to have been present to the minds of the members of the Committee who took part in the decision. Whatever deference we should, under other circumstances, feel bound to show to the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council as an appellate tribunal, in the exercise of our jurisdiction now invoked we can only look upon it as forming a branch of the Court of Admiralty, and as, after having given the case our best consideration, we arrive at the conclusion that the Legislature, in omitting all reference to loss of life or personal injury, such as is to be found in the Merchant Shipping Acts, cannot properly be taken to have intended to give jurisdiction in respect of such matter by use of the term "damage," and thereby materially to alter the rights accruing under Lord Campbell's Act, we are bound, notwithstanding the weight of the authority we have referred to, to give effect to our opinion, by giving judgment for the plaintiffs in prohibition.

BLACKBURN, J.—I have entertained doubts in this case, not altogether removed, but which are not strong enough to make me dissent from this judgment, or even to make me require further time for consideration. I agree that the whole question depends upon the construction of the statute 24 Vict. c. 10, and I also agree that in a case of prohibition, where we are called upon to restrain the Court of Admiralty, we are not bound by any decisions either in the Court of Admiralty or in the Court of Privy Council when sitting in an appeal from that court, though their reasons are to be weighed with great respect. I cannot concur in what is said by the Privy Council in the case of The Beta, viz., that there was every reason for the Legislature enacting that which the court below holds to have been enacted. On the contrary I feel the full force of the objections stated in the judgment just delivered to the Legislature so enacting; I think that the Legislature, if such was their intention, have been guilty of an improvident and hasty piece of legislation, more particularly in not providing for the difficulties as to the mode of assessing the damages, and by not enacting whether the civil law or the common law is to be followed in cases where the injured or slaughtered man was partly to blame. I feel also strongly that it rests on the defendants in this suit to satisfy us that the Legislature affirmatively expressed an intention to confer on the Admiralty a new jurisdiction so extensive as is said. My doubt however has been whether the words used by the Legislature are not such as to show that the Legislature have so enacted, in a way I think rash and careless, but still have so enacted. I do not dissent from a judgment which seems to me to have the effect of putting that meaning on the words of the Legislature, which in my opinion they should have intended to express, but I much doubt too whether they have expressed such an intention to give this jurisdiction, to permit me to concur in the judgment, though I sincerely hope that the statute may ultimately be held to have the meaning put upon it by the judgment of the majority.

Priv. Co.] REG. (app.) v. McCLEVERTY (resp.); THE TELEGRAFO OR RESTAURACION. [Priv. Co.]

JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

Reported by DOUGLAS KINGSFORD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Monday, Feb. 20, 1871.

(Present: The Right Hon. Lord ROMILLY, M.R.,
PHILLIMORE.)

REG. (app.) v. McCLEVERTY (resp.); THE "TELEGRAFO" OR "RESTAURACION."

Piracy—Forfeiture of ship—Sale.

The taint of piracy does not, in the absence of conviction or condemnation, continue, like a maritime lien, with a ship through her transfers to various owners, and therefore a ship duly sold by public auction to a bona fide and innocent purchaser, cannot be afterwards arrested and condemned, on account of former piratical acts, at the suit of the Crown.

THIS was an appeal from the judgment of the judge of the Vice-Admiralty Court of the Virgin Islands, in a cause promoted by the Crown against the steam ship Telegrafo or Restauracion, alleged to be forfeit to the Crown for piracy, in which proceeding the respondent, Augustus McCleverty, appeared under protest to the jurisdiction.

The facts shortly were these: In May 1869, the Telegrafo was bought at St. Marc, in Hayti, from a British subject, by the revolutionary government of Hayti. The ship having been equipped as an armed vessel, was afterwards employed in acts of hostility. In July 1869 the ship, then lying in a port of the island of Tortola, was sold by public auction, and purchased by the respondent, a British subject. In Jan. 1870 the ship was arrested, as a piratical vessel, by a warrant from the Vice-Admiralty Court of the Virgin Islands.

The court below ordered restitution of the vessel, but without costs or damages.

Thereupon the present appeal was brought.

Sir R. Palmer, Q.C., Semper, Shortt, Blake, and Shee, for the respondent.

Judgment was delivered by Sir ROBERT PHILLIMORE.—This is an appeal from a sentence of the judge of the Court of Vice-Admiralty in the Virgin Islands. By that tribunal a warrant of arrest had been decreed, on the motion of the advocate for the Crown, in a prosecution against a steam vessel called the Telegrafo or Restauracion, as a pirate vessel. Her owner appeared under protest, to the jurisdiction of the court, and, after hearing an elaborate argument from counsel which occurred several days, the learned judge pronounced for the protest, and decreed restitution to the claimant, but gave no damages or costs. From this sentence the Crown has appealed, and the claimant has adhered to the appeal so far as the sentence affected the question of damages and costs. The proceedings in the court below were confined to what is known in the Admiralty Court as an Act on petition, in which the protest was set out. An answer to that Act was given in on behalf of the Crown, and a rejoinder on behalf of the claimant. The averments in these summary pleadings were supported, as is usual, by affidavits from both parties; some of those filed on behalf of the claimant were set aside by the court as having been, in the circumstances, improperly filed, and these have been printed in the papers laid before this tribunal. Their Lordships have, however, been careful to confine their attention to those affidavits and documents which the court below admitted and referred to. Even these, it must be observed, exceeded, to a certain extent, the technical limits within which, having strict regard to the character of the proceeding, namely, a protest to the jurisdiction, they would have been kept by a court more accustomed to exercise jurisdiction of this kind; and it has been contended at this bar by the law officers for the Crown, the appellant, that the protest upon the question of jurisdiction, the only question for consideration in the court below and here, is not sustained by the evidence, that that protest should be overruled, and that they ought to be allowed to establish by plea and proof in a formal manner, and according to due course of law, the merits of their case against the steamship. The protest and the answer, however, raise various important questions of public and international law which appear to have been fully argued in the court below, and are referred to in the judgment of that court, and have been much insisted upon by the appellant before this tribunal, namely, whether the acts of the former master and crew of this vessel were of a piratical or belligerent character, whether, if piratical, they were done within the territorial waters of a foreign state, and therefore justiciable only by that state, or whether, being done upon the seas, though within territorial waters, they were not, according to the law of nations, justiciable, as piratical, by the tribunals of every state. It appeared, however, to their Lordships, during the course of the argument, that there were facts admitted or proved in this case, as it was conducted by both parties in the court below, which rendered any decision upon these grave and important matters unnecessary. The protest among other allegations contained the following:—"Nor had the said Isaac Farrington, the seizer, in the absence of any adjudication pronouncing the said steamship to have been engaged in acts of piracy, or to have been the property of pirates, any authority to seize and detain the said steamship, which had been purchased at public auction by the said Augustus McCleverty, nor can the said steamship Restauracion, late Telegrafo, thus illegally seized, be brought within the jurisdiction of, or her alleged acts of piracy be recognisable by, this honourable court." The answer does not deny the facts of the sale and ownership as here stated, but alleges that the ship being found in the port, justified the seizure and warranted the jurisdiction of the court. On the 3rd May 1869 the Telegrafo was at Santo Marco, a Haytian port; at which time it would appear that a civil war existed, or an insurrection had broken out in the island of San Domingo. The Telegrafo, afterwards equipped as an armed vessel, did various acts of hostility, alleged on the one side to be piratical and on the other to be belligerent, upon various parts of the coast of San Domingo. She was then owned and commanded by one Domingo Acevedo. On the 8th June she was commissioned by the revolutionary government of San Domingo, having on board her Gregorio Luperon, general-in-chief of the Republican forces; on the 6th July she landed troops at Barrahona on the island, and about the 12th July she came into the port of Road Town, Tortola; on the 21st July she was sold by public auction for 10,025 dollars in a formal and regular manner by her owner to her present possessor, Mr. McCleverty, and she paid to the British Government certain dues upon the auction, according to the law of the place; and it was not till the 19th Jan. 1870 that she was arrested by a warrant from the Court of Vice-Admiralty, as a piratical vessel; she was at that time, and had been since the month of July, in the possession of a British owner, not connected in any way with her previous action, whether piratical or belligerent, on the coast of San Domingo; not an agent acting conclusively for her former owner, for no such suggestion is made in the affidavit which led to the warrant or in the subsequent affidavits filed by the court, but a bonâ fide purchaser, at a public sale for value. This being the state of facts apparent on the face of the proceedings, and taken into the consideration of the court, their Lordships were anxious to know on what authority of principle or precedent this vessel could be arrested as belonging to a pirate. No precedent has been cited to their Lordships, but it has been strongly contended that the principles of law applicable to the cases of piracy warrant the arrest. Many authorities were cited for the purpose of establishing the position that the goods of pirates cannot be transferred by the pirates to a third party. That goods piratically taken cannot be transferred to a third party as against their legitimate owner is an undoubted proposition of public and of international law; but the further and different proposition that the ship of the pirate, which has not been taken from another person, cannot be transferred to an innocent purchaser for value, is not supported by any of the authorities cited. The goods of pirates are forfeited to the Crown in her Office of Admiralty, but not until after conviction, and the ship of the pirate, but not until after condemnation; or, as it is correctly stated in Bacon's Abridgment, "Piracy," "the goods of pirates not taken from others, belong, after attainder, to the Crown or its grantee; and those of which others have been despoiled will be forfeited in the same manner if the owners come not within a reasonable time to vindicate their property." The cases establish this position, that the Court of Admiralty has jurisdiction to entertain a suit, usually though not always instituted in a civil form, for restitution of goods piratically taken on the high seas. The question of restitution might, in fact, be raised by two modes of civil proceeding—either by what is technically called a cause of possession, as in the The Segredo or Eliza Cornish (1 Spinks, 37), in 1853, and in a recent case, the Mary otherwise Alexandra (18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 891), in which the United States of North America were the claimants; or by a cause of piracy civil and maritime (causa spoliî civilis et maritima). In the case of the Hercules (Chitty; 2 Dobson, Ad. Rep. 369), Lord Stowell considers the whole question of the authority of the Court of Admiralty in this matter. And it is necessary to observe how clearly the important distinction is taken between private owners seeking a restitution of their goods, and the Crown or Lord High Admiral proceeding pro publicâ vindictâ, for condemnation or conviction. In the Hercules, an application was made to the court on behalf of Spanish subjects, who prayed restitution of certain moneys in possession of the court, alleged to be the proceeds of goods piratically taken. Lord Stowell, in the course of his judgment (2 Dods. 373), observed:

The objections stated in argument are principally three: first, that there should be a preceding conviction of piracy; that this has not been generally required is sufficiently clear. It is true that where the Lord Admiral proceeds pro interesse suo, upon his royal grant bona piratarum, i. e., their own proper goods, not goods of others unlawfully taken on the sea, he must show that the party has been attainted of piracy (Primston and others v. The Admiralty); but when a person, so despoiled of his own goods, proceeds merely for restitution, no such preliminary is required. Some of the proceedings here are by articles, which of themselves are of a criminal nature, and, therefore, could not have been preceded by a conviction. Others, as in the case of Eglesfield and others, merely civil, by libel, or without reference to any antecedent conviction, nor has any such antecedent conviction been traced. In the case reported in Buletrode (Pelaye's case), likewise in the 4th Institute, where the Spanish ambassador proceeded for the restitution of Spanish goods taken on the high seas from Spanish subjects (and the ambassador of that country appears to have been a frequent party in suits of this nature), and where the adverse party Pelaze, was a Jew, setting up a commission from Morocco, the court said he could not be proceeded against criminally, for it was not a robbery (I presume on account of his commission), but that they might deal civilly with him for them in the Admiralty, and that he ought to answer for them there civilly. And per curiam he may answer the suit as to the point of restitution. And it appears, as far as I can collect it, the settled law that without a conviction the party might proceed for what is termed the point of restitution.

In another part of his judgment Lord Stowell says:

A third objection is, that the act of piracy, being a crime, could not be considered by the common law as the proper subject of a civil suit for restitution. And it is certainly a known principle of common law that a civil suit cannot be founded on a felony, for that would approach to what is termed a compounding of a felony. The civil demand merges in the felony. The common law rather, perhaps, considers that demand as in the nature of a debt arising upon something like a contract, and ex maleficio non oritur contractus. Whether this principle was imported (though with a more technical meaning) from the civil law (where I am not certain it is to be found in terms), or whether this mode of considering the demand as merged, is not a principle coeval and congenial with the fundamental principles of the common law itself, is more than I can presume to say. But I take the rule to be confined to such maleficia as the law technically considered as felonies, or as felonies and something more than felonies, as high treason. To misdemeanors, or other offences differently qualified, the policy of the law has not applied it. Now piracy is certainly not considered as a felony at the common law. It is expressly so laid down by Lord Hale. Pardon of all felonies reacheth not piracy. The principle, therefore, does not reach it, at least in its ordinary extent; and looking to what has taken place in the cases of prohibition alluded to, I am led rather to infer that it could not be extended to a crime belonging to, and defined by, another system of jurisprudence, and where reasons of legal policy and convenience rather appear to oppose its introduction; for though the law may very justly and commodiously apply its own peculiar principles to its subjects in their ordinary transactions, governed immediately by its own rulers, and may, therefore, compel such individuals to give up, pro publicâ vindictâ, and for the protection of the community, their own private claim of indemnification for any wrong they may have suffered, it by no means follows that where the wrong done is contra jus gentium, and the foreign sufferer, standing upon that law, requires a reparation, the common law of this country would impose upon him the burthen of sacrificing his private rights, so founded, to the duty of protecting the interest of the country of the offender, by confining the whole of his remedy to the useless privilege of a criminal prosecution.

As far as I am enabled to infer from the cases of attempted prohibition, the common law has made no such demand, but has admitted the prosecution of a civil suit for the point of restitution, either exclusively of a criminal prosecution, or in conjunction with it.

To the same effect is the old case Radley and Belbow v. Eglesfield and Whital, reported in Ventris, p. 173, and referred to by Lord Stowell in this judgment. The present case, however, is clearly distinguishable from all these cases; here no private owner is seeking restitution of his ship, but the Crown is proceeding pro publica vindicta, without previous condemnation or conviction, against a vessel neither now piratically owned nor stated to have been piratically taken from any previous owner. There is no authority, their Lordships think, to be derived either from principle or from precedent for the position that a ship duly sold, before any proceedings have been taken on the part of the Crown against her, by public auction to a bona fide and innocent purchaser, can be afterwards arrested and condemned on account of former piratical acts to the Crown. The consequence flowing from an opposite doctrine are very alarming. In this case six months have elapsed between the sale and the arrest; but upon the principle contended for, six of any number of years and any number of bona fide sales and purchases would leave the vessel liable to condemnation on account of her original sin. Their Lordships are of opinion that the taint of piracy does not, in the absence of conviction or condemnation, continue, like a maritime lien, to travel with the ship through her transfers to various owners. Assuming, therefore, that this vessel had been piratically navigated previous to her transfer (a fact which their Lordships are very far from saying appears upon the affidavit which led to the warrant of arrest), their Lordships have arrived at the conclusion that the court ought not to have arrested a vessel which for many months had been in the undisputed possession of a bona fide purchaser by public auction on account of piratical acts alleged to have been committed from board of her before the sale took place. Their Lordships, therefore, will humbly advise Her Majesty that the sentence of the court below should be affirmed, so far as relates to the dismissal of this suit. Their Lordships will direct that the respondent have his costs of the appeal to Her Majesty in council, but not the costs of his own adherence to the appeal, and no costs in the court below and no damages.

THE SAPHO.

Salvage—Ships belonging to same owners, when salvage services are performed by one ship to another, and both ships belong to the same owner, the crew of the ship which has performed the salvage services is entitled to salvage reward, if the services rendered are not such as the crew are bound to perform under their contract.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Admiralty Court in a cause of salvage instituted on behalf of the boatswain and seventeen seamen of the steamship Nero against the steamship Sappho. Both the ships belonged to the same owner. Sir R. J. Phillimore, by his judgment of July 27, 1870, decided that the plaintiffs were entitled to salvage, and awarded 350l. : (23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 710.)

Clarkson for the appellants.

Deane, Q.C. and Gibson for the respondents.

Judgment was delivered by MELLISH, L. J.—This is a suit for salvage, and it raises a question of considerable importance, namely, whether, when salvage services are performed by one ship to another, and both ships belong to the same owner, the crew (and the master also were he to claim it) of the ship which has performed the salvage services is entitled to salvage remuneration? It certainly seems curious that this question has never been decided on principle at all. It was very much considered in the case of the Maria Jane (14 Jur. 857), which is said to be an authority, that in no case where the ship belongs to the same owners can any salvage remuneration be recovered. But when the facts of that case are looked at, their Lordships do not think that Dr. Lushington intended to lay down any such general rule. There the ships belonging to the same owner were engaged in the African trade. It is stated in the judgment that it was part of the general arrangement that the ships of the same owner and the crews of the same owner should render mutual assistance to each other, and the real question seems to have been whether the services there rendered did go beyond that mutual assistance which under the circumstances of the African trade and according to the well-known usages of that trade, one ship was bound to render another? Dr. Lushington, after all, puts the case upon what appears to their Lordships to be the true principle, namely, whether the services rendered were services which under their contract the seamen were bound to perform, and for which they are remunerated by their wages? (a) It is quite clear that as a general rule of law seamen cannot recover salvage remuneration for services which by their contract they are bound to perform, and therefore they never recover salvage remuneration for services connected with the saving of their own ship as long as the relation of master and servants between them and their owner, with reference to that ship, continues. But it has never been laid down, and their Lordships are not disposed to lay down, that if a seaman performs services for the benefit of his owner which are not within his contract, he cannot be entitled to salvage remuneration. Their Lordships do not say services which he is not bound to perform, because it may be that as an ordinary incident of a voyage if a ship meets another ship in distress, and the master orders the seamen of his ship to give assistance, they are to a certain extent bound to give assistance, but then for that assistance, if salvage services are rendered, they are entitled to receive salvage remuneration. Their Lordships do not see why the case should be different if it turn out that the ship to which the service is rendered belongs to the same owner. The ordinary contract which a seaman enters into certainly says

(a) Dr. Lushington, in his judgment in the Collier (L. Rep. 1 Adm. 83, 85), says that the Maria Jane was decided on the ground that the charterer was in possession of the salved vessel under the charter party, so as to divest the owners of their ownership for the time being. (See also the Caroline, Lush. 334 : 5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 89.—ED.)

nothing about rendering services to another ship. He does something, therefore, which is not within his contract. It may be that he ought to do it because it is an ordinary incident that he should do it, but then if it is an ordinary incident that he should do it, and if he does it, not because it is within his contract, but for the reason Lord Stowell assigns in the case of the Waterloo (2 Dods. 443), where he says that nobody but a freebooter would refuse to render assistance under such circumstances, and that there is a moral duty to render assistance,—if he performs that duty towards a ship, though it may be belonging to the same owner, because of that moral duty, and not because it is within his original contract of service with his owner, there does not appear to be any good reason why the ordinary consequence should not follow, namely, that for this extraordinary service he should receive the remuneration which the law gives him. That appears to be in accordance with the ordinary rules laid down by Lord Stowell, and all the great authorities respecting salvage, that it is a right very much favoured in the law, and therefore that it ought not to be narrowed in a case which clearly comes within the principle. Indeed, the learned counsel for the appellant appeared to admit that if a man risked his life, that being a thing he was not bound by his contract to do, he would be entitled to receive salvage remuneration; but their Lordships do not see on what principle a distinction can be drawn between a case where a seaman risks his life and a case where he performs other extraordinary services which would in their nature be salvage services. That would be raising a new distinction, for which there appears no sufficient ground or authority. The true rule appears to their Lordships to be, to consider whether the services are in themselves of the nature of salvage services; and next, whether they are services which are within the contract which the seaman originally enters into, so that he receives remuneration for them by his ordinary wages. If they are not within his contract, so that he does not receive remuneration for them by his ordinary wages, and they are in their nature salvage services, their Lordships are of opinion that there is no good reason why the seaman should not receive the ordinary salvage remuneration which the law gives him. Then, as to the question of amount, their Lordships certainly think that the amount awarded by the court below is somewhat large, and they will not say that if they had to determine the question, they would give the same amount; but it is a fixed rule that their Lordships do not interfere with the amount given for salvage, unless it is a case where the amount is very greatly in excess or deficient in their Lordships' estimation; and they do not think that, on the whole, there is sufficient reason to induce them to interfere with the amount in this case. The result is, that their Lordships will recommend to Her Majesty that this appeal be dismissed, with costs.

Judgment affirmed.

(Before Lord CHELMSFORD, Lord WESTBURY, Lord COLONSAY, and Lord CAIRNS.)

SHEPHERD v. HARRISON AND ANOTHER.

Consignor and consignee—Vesting of property in goods—Condition precedent—Bill of exchange and bill of lading sent together.

P. N. and Co., of Pernambuco, purchased cotton for the plaintiff, a Manchester merchant. Two lots were received by the Plaintiff under bills of lading forwarded to him by the Liverpool agents of P. N. and Co., together with two bills of exchange for the amounts, the invoices being made out "on account of and at the risk of" the plaintiff. These bills of exchange were accepted by the plaintiff, and paid by him at maturity, but he protested that part of the cotton had not been bought according to his instructions. P. N. and Co. then forwarded the remainder (200 bales) of cotton by one of their own steamers, and wrote to the plaintiff, inclosing an invoice "on account and at the risk of" the plaintiff and saying that they had drawn on him for the amount, and that they inclosed the bill of lading. The bill of lading, which was indorsed in blank, was not, however, inclosed, but was forwarded, together with the bill of exchange, by P. N. and Co. through their Liverpool agents to the plaintiff. The plaintiff, on the ground that his order had not been complied with, refused to accept the bill of exchange, but he retained the bill of lading, paid the freight, and received a delivery order for the cotton signed by the defendants, who were unaware that the bill of exchange had not been accepted. On a refusal by the defendants to deliver the cotton, the plaintiff brought trover:

Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber), that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover, the intention with which the bill of exchange and the bill of lading were sent to the plaintiff being, that the bill of exchange should be accepted or the bill of lading returned; and therefore that the bill of lading, on his refusal to accept the bill of exchange, gave no right of property to the plaintiff. Lord CHELMSFORD.—My Lords, the question in this case is whether the defendants, the owners of the vessel Olinda, were bound to deliver to the plaintiff 200 bales of cotton, which were shipped by Paton, Nash, and Co. from Pernambuco, and invoiced on account and at the risk of the plaintiff, and whether they are liable to an action for the non-delivery. The question is one entirely of fact, depending upon the circumstances stated in the special case, and upon inferences which the courts below were at liberty to draw from those facts. (His Lordship discussed the facts.) Now, on this question we have had the opinion of two courts—I should say the unanimous opinion, notwithstanding the slight doubt intimated by Cleasby, B.—and of nine judges, that the plaintiff, under the circumstances, was not entitled to the possession of the cotton. But it is said, on behalf of the appellants, that the inference of fact is only to be drawn with reference to decisions which have occurred with regard to documents which pass the property in goods; and we have been referred to cases to show that, where goods are shipped on account of and at the risk of a consignee, the absolute property in the goods vests in him, subject only to a right on the part of the consignor to stop in transitu. Some strong cases have been cited on that subject, and particularly two before Lord Ellenborough, viz., Walley v. Montgomery (3 East. 585) and Cox v. Harden (4 East 211.) In the latter case the consignee had obtained possession of the goods, which, Lord Ellenborough said, removed the difficulty which stood in the way of the consignees, namely, “the circumstance of the captain’s having signed the bills of lading in such terms as did not entitle them to call upon him for a delivery under these bills of lading.” This shows, therefore, that upon a shipment with an invoice on account and at the request of the consignee, the consignor may impose conditions on the delivery of possession. Now that this is always a question of intention appears to me decided by the case of Noakes v. Nicolson (12 L. T. Rep. N.S. 573; 19 C. B., N.S., 290.) In a book to which I have been referred, and which appears to be very ably written (Benjamin on Sale of Personal Property), the authorities on the subject are all collected, and the result summed up clearly and distinctly in the following passage (p. 288): “The following seem to be the principles established by the foregoing authorities: First, where goods are delivered by the vendor in pursuance of an order to a common carrier for delivery to the buyer, the delivery to the carrier passes the property, he being the agent of the vendee to receive it, and the delivery to him being equivalent to delivery to the vendee; secondly, where goods are delivered on board a vessel to be carried, and a bill of lading is taken, the delivery by the vendor is not a delivery to the buyer, but to the captain, as bailee, for delivery to the person indicated by the bill of lading as the one for whom they are to be carried.” Under these circumstances I think that your Lordships can entertain no doubt whatever that the judges in the court below were right, and that the judgment of the Courts of Exchequer Chamber ought to be affirmed.

Lord WESTBURY.—My Lords, the law and the inferences of fact are in this case clear. The Pernambuco house in shipping the cotton took from the captain a bill of lading to their own order. The effect of this transaction was to contest the possession of the captain, and make him accountable for delivery to the holder of the bill of lading. The shippers also reserved to themselves the right of demanding possession from the captain. They had, therefore, all the incidents of property vested in them. Now this was not inconsistent with the special terms of the shipment, namely, that the cotton was shipped on account of and at the risk of the buyers. The buyer, however, relies on certain circumstances to control the legal effect of the above transaction. With regard to the letter of Nov. 12, the bill of lading is spoken of as accompanying the invoice which the letter covers. But this it seems was a mere accidental mistake, which cannot affect the legal conclusion as to the transaction. Another and a very important inquiry is as to the intent with which Paton and Co. sent the bill of lading and bill of exchange to the present appellant. I think there is no doubt that the inference they intended to be drawn from their sending both documents together was that if the appellant did not choose to accept the bill of exchange he would send back the bill of lading. This was not done, and I take it that the bill of lading acquired in that way gave no right of property to the present appellant. The judgment of the court below ought to be affirmed.

NICHOLSON (app.) v. WILLIAMS (resp.)

Port—Powers of the Board of Trade to declare the limits of—Taking ballast or shingle from— 54 Geo. 3, c. 159, s. 14.

The powers of the Board of Trade under the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 107 (Customs Consolidation Act 1853), and the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 69, s. 17 (the Harbours Transfer Act 1862) to appoint ports and declare the limits thereof, are not limited to revenue purposes only; nor are such powers confined to “ports” in their merely geographical sense. Where, therefore, by an order of the Board of Trade, the limits of the port of Hull were extended and defined, and the sea between Flamborough Head and Spurn Point was placed within them, and persons were prohibited from taking ballast or shingle from certain parts of the shore so extended as the port of Hull:

Held, that a person so taking ballast or shingle from such parts was guilty of an offence within the meaning of sect. 14 of the 54 Geo. 3, c. 159. (a)

THIS was a case stated under the 20 and 21 Vict. c. 43, by the stipendiary magistrate of Hull, upon a conviction by him of the appellant, under the 54 Geo. 3, c. 159, s. 14, for taking shingle from the shores of the port of Kingston-upon-Hull. The cases stated among other things, as follows:—

The information against the appellant in this case was laid by the collector of customs at Hull, by direction of the Board of Trade, and charges that the appellant did on the 11th April 1870, at the parish of Owthorn in the county of York, unlawfully take shingle from the shores or banks, or from a portion of the shores or banks of the port of Kingston-upon-Hull, whereby the said port was, and is, in danger of being damaged contrary to the 54 Geo. 3, c. 159, thereby incurring a penalty of 10*l*.

The offence thus brought under consideration, was committed on the seashore at Withernsea, in the parish of Owthorn, and county of York, Withernsea being a village about fifteen miles to the north of the Spurn Point, and several miles south of Flamborough Head, and lying also between Spurn and a village called Hornsea. On the 1st Aug. 1868, the Board of Trade issued an order which prohibited the removal of shingle from the shore or banks or any portion of the shore or banks at Spurn Point, from the low lighthouse southward to the extreme of the point at low water, and northward two and a half statute miles on both sides of the Spurn Point. In July 1869 proceedings were taken by the board against several parties for infractions of this order at a place called Kilnsea, two miles from Spurn Point, and they pleaded guilty, no professional gentleman having appeared for them; the result being, that the practice of taking shingle within the limits defined by the order was stopped.

After the proceeding in July 1869, the Board of Trade issued a second order, bearing date the 6th Sept. 1869, prohibiting the removal of shingle or ballast from the shores and banks of the port of Kingston-upon-Hull, and the works thereof between the northernmost boundary of the parish of Hornsea, and the limits north of Spurn Point, defined by the said order of the 1st Aug. 1868.

The prohibition contained in this second order of the Board of Trade seems to have been the means of stopping the removal of shingle within the extended limits up to the 11th April last; but on that day the appellant, by the direction of Sir Clifford Constable, removed shingle from the shore near Withernsea, a previous intimation that he would do so having been sent to the Board of Trade by Sir Clifford Constable's solicitor.

The removal of the shingle is admitted, and it was not only admitted, but proved before me by the evidence of Mr. Code, Captain Carter, Mr. Oldham, and others, that such removal, if unrestricted from Hornsea to Kilnsea, must, by endangering the lighthouse at Spurn and the navigation and harbourage in the Humber, in the Hank roads, and under Sunk Island, to be injurious to the last degree to the port of Hull, assuming that such port (as alleged on the part of the Board of Trade) should be found to extend from Trent Fall to Flamborough Head.

Mr. O'Dowd (who appeared for the Board of Trade), after quoting various authorities, proceeded to the Acts, Orders, &c., of more modern date, which authorise the Board of Trade to proceed against parties removing shingle from the coast at Withernsea, and he submitted the mode under which a port can now be created, and the only mode is under the provisions of an Act, commonly called the Customs Consolidation Act 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 107), but the full title of which is an Act to Amend and Consolidate the Law relating to the Customs of the United Kingdom and of the Isle of Man, and certain Laws relating to Trade and Navigation, and the British Possessions. Under that Act the Treasury may by their warrant appoint any port or sub-port in the United Kingdom, and declare the limit thereof, and appoint proper places within the same to be legal quays for the lading and unloading of goods, and declare the bounds and extent of any such quays, or annul the limits of any port, sub-port, haven, creek, or legal quay already appointed, or to be hereafter set out and appointed, and declare the same to be no longer a port, sub-port, haven, creek, or legal quay, . . . or alter and vary the names, bounds, and limits thereof, &c. Mr. O'Dowd then contended that under the powers of this Act, Hull was appointed a port by the Treasury, as appears by the Gazette of 17th March 1848 (No. 20,837), hereto annexed, and that such port commences at the confluence of the Trent and Ouse, and extends to Spurn Point at the entrance of the Humber, and from thence northerly along the coast of Yorkshire to Flamborough Head. The 54 Geo. 3, c. 159 (which creates the offence alleged to have been committed by appellant) enacts that in order to prevent damage being done to the shores or banks of the ports, harbours, or havens of the kingdom, no person shall take ballast or shingle from the shores or banks, or any portion of the shores or banks, of any port, harbour, or haven of the kingdom from which the Commissioners for executing the office of Lord High Admiral shall find it necessary, for the protection of such port, harbour, or haven, or the works thereof, by order published in the Gazette, to prohibit the taking or removing of such shingle or ballast upon pain of forfeiting ten pounds for every such offence.

By the Harbours Transfer Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 69, s. 17) it is enacted that from and after the 31st Dec. 1862, sects. 14 and 16 of the 54th Geo. 3, c. 159, and all provisions relative thereto shall be read and construed as if the Board of Trade were named in the said section instead of the Admiralty.

In pursuance of the powers thus conferred upon them, the Board of Trade issued the two orders already referred to, A and B, and for the breach of the observance of the second of those orders the proceedings against appellant have been taken.

In reply to the case for the prosecution, Mr. Kemplay admitted that if the Board of Trade have power to make an order that will include Withernsea, the defendant must be convicted, but contended that the port of Hull, alleged by the prosecution to extend from Trent Falls to Flamborough Head, and thus or otherwise to include Withernsea, is only a port for Customs Purposes, and not a port within the meaning of the 14th section of 54 Geo. 3, c. 159, and that that statute applies only to ports as defined by Lord Hale.

The only case referred to by Mr. Kemplay in support of this argument was the Hull Dock Company v. Browne (2 Barn. & Adol. 43), and I find that it was noticed in a subsequent case, Beilby v. Raper (3 Barn. & Adol. 284); but upon examining those cases they do not appear to me to lead to the conclusions Mr. Kemplay was contending for. I failed to satisfy myself, having regard to the mode of creating ports in ancient and more modern times, and to the various authorities on the subject of ports, to which reference has been made, that it would be safe for me to coincide in the conclusion that the port of Hull can only be said to include the coast near Withernsea for Customs purposes, so as to exclude that part of the coast from the protection of the 54 Geo. 3, c. 159, s. 14.

I can find nothing in the title or object of the Act of 1853 that indicates any intention to circumscribe the ports created under its provisions to merely revenue purposes, or in any matter whatsoever, but on the contrary, the ports referred to would seem to be capable of limitation only in accordance with the terms of the order creating them, nor do I find in the order of 1848 any words circumscribing the creation of the port of Hull, so as to limit its provisions to merely revenue purposes, nor is it a fact that the duties of the Customs in reference to the port of Hull, using that term in the extended sense contended for by the Board of Trade, are limited to revenue purposes, as I find that the Customs have jurisdiction over the port of Hull as thus extended for various purposes wholly independent of revenue, such as cases of stranding, registry of vessels, &c., being the ordinary agents of the Board of Trade in matters not belonging to the Customs as a revenue department. It has not been suggested by the appellant that there is any other mode of creating a port in the present day than that adopted as to the port of Hull under the order of 1848, and it has not been shown by evidence or otherwise that there is or ever was a port of Hull in accordance with the definition of Lord Hale, though it would seem from the case referred to by Mr. Kemplay that there was formerly a port of Sayer Creek, which was sometimes called the port of Hull. No reasons were adduced by the appellant when before me for contracting materially the benefits to be derived from the 54 Geo. 3, c. 159, s. 14, though such a result must follow if that Act is confined to such ports only as come literally within the definitions contained in Lord Hale's work.

On a review of the various legal authorities adduced before me, I decided in favour of the view taken by the Board of Trade, and held that, according to the proper construction of the authorities referred to of the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 107, the 54 Geo. 3, c. 159, s. 14, and of the Prohibitory Orders of the Board of Trade, an offence had been committed by the appellant as charged against him in the information before me, and I found him guilty accordingly.

The only question of law that I propose to submit on the above statement for the opinion of this court is, whether the orders of the Board of Trade, having date the 1st Aug. 1868 and the 6th Sept. 1869, are valid in point of law?

If the court should be of opinion that the said orders are valid, then the said conviction was legally and properly made, and the appellant is liable as aforesaid, and the said conviction is to stand; but if the court should be of opinion otherwise, then the said information is to be dismissed.

Attached to the case were an extract from the London Gazette of the 17th March 1848 (No. 20,837), purporting to be an order of the Lords of the Treasury, annulling the limits of the port of Bridlington, and defining the limits of the port of Hull; also an order prohibiting the taking of ballast or shingle from the shores or banks of the said port. Reference to these will be found sufficiently made in the statement of the case, and in the judgment of the court.

The arguments of counsel are so fully adverted to in the following elaborate judgment, that it is unnecessary further to refer to them.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 27.—LUSH, J.—The question submitted to us by the case is, whether two orders of the Board of Trade, dated the 1st of Aug. 1868, and the 6th Sept. 1869, are valid in point of law. The first of these orders, after reciting that the board had found it necessary for the protection of the harbour or haven of the river Humber, and of the shores and banks thereof, and of the works thereof, to prohibit the taking or removing of any shingle or ballast from the shore or bank thereafter specified, prohibited all persons from taking or removing any description of shingle or ballast from the shore or banks, or from any portion of the shore or banks, at Spurn Point, from the Low Lighthouse southward to the extreme of the point at low water, and northward two and a-half statute miles on both sides of the Spurn Point. The second order, after reciting the first, and that for the further protection of the said harbour, haven, or port, and also for the protection of the shores and banks of the port of Kingston-upon-Hull, and of the works thereof, the Board of Trade had found it necessary to extend the limits mentioned therein, went on to prohibit the taking of shingle or ballast from the shores or banks, or from any portion of the shore or banks of the said harbour or haven, or from the shores and banks of the port of Kingston-upon-Hull, and the works thereof, between the northernmost boundary of the parish of Hornsea and the limits north of Spurn Point, defined by the order of the 1st Aug. 1868. These orders were professedly founded on the statute 54 Geo. 3, c. 159, s. 14, by which it is enacted that, in order to prevent damage being done to the shores or banks of the ports, harbours, or havens in this kingdom, no person or persons shall take any ballast or shingle from the shores or banks or any portion of the shores or banks of any port, harbour, or haven of this kingdom from which the Commissioners for executing the office of Lord High Admiral of the United Kingdom for the time being shall find it necessary for the protection of such port, harbour, or haven, or the works thereof, by order under their hands, &c., to prohibit the taking or removing of such shingle or ballast, upon pain of forfeiting for every such offence the sum of 10*l.* By the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 69, s. 16, the powers vested in the Commissioners of the Admiralty by this section were transferred to the Board of Trade. The place where the shingle was taken by the defendant, and for which taking he was convicted, is not upon any portion of the shore or banks of that which is popularly known or which would be geographically described as the harbour or haven of the Humber, or the port of Kingston-upon-Hull, but upon a part of the coast fifteen miles to the north of Spurn Point, and lying between Spurn and a village called Hornsea. This was not in any sense part of the port of Kingston-upon-Hull, or of the haven of the Humber at the time of passing the 54 Geo. 3; but it was, at the date of the offence, within the limits of the port of Kingston-upon-Hull, as those limits were appointed and defined by an order of the Commissioners of Customs made in 1848, and published in the London Gazette on the 17th March in that year. By that order, made under the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 102, the coast from Spurn Point to Flamborough Head, which in the fourth year of Geo. 2 had been assigned to the port of Bridlington, and which, at the passing of the 54 Geo. 3, was within the limits of that port, were transferred to and directed to form part of the port of Hull. On behalf of the appellant it was contended that the powers of the Board of Trade under the 53 Geo. 3, c. 159, s. 14, are confined to what is geographically within part of the port or haven which is popularly known as such, or at all events, as regards this case, to so much of the shore as formed part of the port of Hull at the time when the Act passed. The title of the Act is, "An Act for the better Regulation of the several Ports, Harbours, Roadsteads, Sounds, Channels, Bays, and Navigable Rivers in the United Kingdom, and of His Majesty's Docks, Dockyard, Arsenal, Wharfs, Moorings, &c.," and it contains various enactments, some of which apply to the whole coasts of the kingdom, others only to places frequented by ships for the purpose of loading and discharging. The two sections immediately preceding the 14th belong to the former class. They prohibit the unloading on any part of the shore, except at a wharf constructed for the purpose, of any ballast, stone, gravel, &c., except at or within two hours before, or two hours after, high water, and the depositing of such matters at any time below low water mark at neap tides, &c. The 14th section belongs to the latter class, and applies only to ports, harbours, or havens, its object being to prevent disturbance of the shore of these places or resort for shipping which might result in injury to the navigation and consequent detriment to commerce. It is therefore clear that the jurisdiction of the Board of Trade to prohibit the taking of shingle extends not over the whole of the coast of the kingdom, but only over such portions thereof as are within the ambit of a port, harbour or haven. Whatever is done beyond those limits is left to be dealt with at common law, but within those limits the jurisdiction of the board to prohibit the public from taking shingle or ballast is absolute and without appeal. What may be the meaning and operation of the saving clause, the 28th section, it is unnecessary to consider, because the defendant did not bring himself within its provisions. On the other hand, it is equally clear that their jurisdiction is not limited to ports or havens for which regulations have been made under the earlier sections of the Act. The enactment applies, as the object and purpose of it require that it should apply, to "any" and every port, harbour, and haven in the kingdom. Ports and havens are not mere geographical expressions. They are places appointed by the Crown for persons and merchandises to pass into and out of the realm, and at such places only is it lawful for ships to load and discharge cargo. The assignment of such places to be "the" inlets and gates of the realm is and always has been a branch of the prerogative, resting, as Blackstone remarks (vol. 1, p. 264), partly upon a fiscal foundation, in order to secure the king's marine revenue. Their limit and bounds are necessarily defined by the authority which creates them, and the area embraced within those limits constitute the port. Having once granted the franchise, the king had not at common law the power of resumption or of narrowing and confining their limits when once established, but any person had a right to load and discharge his merchandise in any part of the haven, whereby, as observed by Blackstone in the same volume, "the revenue of the Customs was much impaired and diminished by fraudulent loadings in obscure corners." This occasioned the statutes of 1 Eliz. c. 11, and 13 & 14 Car. 2, c. 11. The latter statute (sect. 14) enables the Crown by commission to appoint all such further places, ports, havens, and creeks (except the town of Hull) as shall be lawful for loading or discharging, lading or shipping of any goods, wares, or merchandizes within the Kingdom of England, and to set down and appoint the extents and limits of every port, haven, or creek within the kingdom, whereby the extents, limits, and privileges of every port, haven, or creek may be ascertained and known. The town of Hull, which was a legal port time out of mind, having been excepted out of the operation of this Act, a private Act was passed in the 14 Geo. 3 (c. 56), whereby his Majesty was empowered to assign necessary places and quays at Kingston-upon-Hull, and to settle the extents and limits of the same; and by the 45 Geo. 3 (private), the rights and privileges which then belonged to the port of Kingston-upon-Hull were extended to new docks and basins then made, which were deemed and held to be part of the port: (see Hull Dock Company v. Brown, 2 Barn. & Ald. 43.) The Act of Charles II. remained in force down to the year 1825, when it was repealed, together with a large number of other statutes relating to the Customs, and a new Act passed (6 Geo. 4, c. 108, s. 135), whereby a similar power was given to appoint by commission out of the Court of Exchequer any port, haven, or creek in the United Kingdom, and to set out the limits thereof; but this section contained a proviso in affirmance of the common law, that all ports, havens, and creeks, and the respective limits thereof, and all legal quays appointed and set out and existing as such at the commencement of the Act under any law till then in force shall continue to be such ports, havens, creeks, limits, and legal quays respectively as if the same had been appointed under the Act. This provision was re-enacted in the subsequent Consolidation Acts (the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 52, and 8 & 9 Vict. c. 86), and each contained the saving in favour of existing ports and quays. But the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 102, which dispensed with the commission out of the Exchequer, and vested the appointment of ports, sub-ports, and quays in the Commissioners of Customs, abrogated the right which existed at common law which had been preserved by all the previous Acts. Sect. 15 empowers the commissioners to annul the limits of any port sub-port, haven, creek, or legal quay, or to alter or vary the names, bounds, or limits of any such port, sub-port, haven, creek, or quay. Sect. 16 requires the appointment, annulment, or alteration to be published in the London Gazette. It was under this statute that the order was made in 1848, annulling the port of Bridlington, and assigning the limits formerly of that port to the port of Hull. From these considerations it appears to us to be beyond a doubt that the word "port" in 54 Geo. 3 is used not in a geographical, but in its legal and proper sense, as denoting a place to which ships were or should be authorised to resort for loading and discharging. Its object and purpose being the preservation and protection of these places from injury for the sake of shipping and commerce, it cannot have been meant to refer to places where ships are not allowed to resort, nor can it refer to the mere geographical limits of such places. Ports and havens are not bounded by such limits, but by limits arbitrarily defined by the authority by which the port is constituted. Bridlington, which was created a port under the statute of Car. 2 extended along this very line of coast at the time the 54 Geo. 3 was passed. Can it be said that this spot was not at that time a part of the shore or bank of the port of Bridlington? It had as a port no other limits than those which were assigned to it when it was created a port. But it was further argued that as Hull is an ancient port, and the power to vary its limits was given for Customs purposes only, the limits of the port remained for all other purposes as they were at the time the 54 Geo. 3 passed, and that the 14th section must be read as applying to the port as it existed at that time. We cannot accede to this argument. It was for Customs purposes that ports were at first instituted, and it is for such purposes they are allowed to retain their franchise, and although at common law the Crown could not revoke an appointment once made, it is clear that under the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 102, the Crown now has the power to annul and take away the franchise from any port, whether it be an ancient port like Hull, or a comparatively modern one like Bridlington. When this, however, is done, the place ceases to be a port, and the 54 Geo. 3 no longer applies to it. If, instead of annulling the port, the commissioners were to contract its ancient limits, the port would consist of the area embraced in those new limits and the coast outside, though formerly subject to, would no longer be within, the jurisdiction of the Board of Trade; so if instead of annulling or contracting, the commissioners extend the limits of the port, the parts newly taken in become as much a part of the port as was the part originally within it. If the question were whether a right to anchorage or other dues claimable in the port as it existed before the order of 1848, is by virtue of that order extended over the new area, the case would be widely different. The answer that the enlargement was made for Customs purposes, and not to benefit the grantee of the dues, would be conclusive, but that has no bearing on the question we have to decide, which is whether the extended limits form part of the port within the meaning of the 54 Geo. 3, c. 159. For the reasons given we are of opinion that they do, and that the port intended by that Act is the port as it is constituted for the time being by the orders of the Commissioners of Customs. We therefore affirm the conviction. Conviction affirmed.

Non-delivery of cargo—Outbreak of war—German ship—English bill of lading and consignees—What law governs—General maritime law.

There is a general maritime law administered alike by English and foreign courts, having admiralty jurisdiction, distinct from the municipal laws of nations. (a)

Lloyd v. Guibert (13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 602) considered.

By the laws of England and of the North German Confederation, a bill of lading is decisive as between ship owner and consignee, and the North German code, although providing a form of bill of lading, does not prevent a special form of contract.

The master of a North German vessel, under a North German charter party, gave a bill of lading for goods shipped on board his vessel, in South America, as part of a general cargo to be delivered in North Germany to English consignees. The English language, money, and weight were used in the bill of lading, which contained the proviso, "the dangers of the sea only excepted." The master of the vessel, on her arrival at Falmouth, refused to proceed on account of the outbreak of war between France and Germany:

Held, that, whether the contract was governed by English, general maritime, or North German law, the master was bound to proceed, as the bill of lading was precise in its terms, and, contemplating the happening of certain events, exempted him in only one event.

The goods were stowed at the bottom of the hold under those of the other shippers, and as the charterers refused to consent to the unloading of the cargo at

(a) There may arise cases of contract where the law of no particular state is applicable, no intention of the parties being expressed, as in the case of a contract made on the high seas between vessels of different states, to be performed on the high seas, and there is no doubt that there are certain rules of conduct which are observed by all civilised nations alike, and this applies both to questions of contract and tort. Such rules are enforceable by both British and foreign courts, and so become law, and therefore it may be said, that in maritime matters there is a general maritime law. The legislative enactments of England, or of other countries, cannot apply to foreign ships with respect to acts done on the high seas or in foreign ports, unless their owners so wish at the time, and when a suit is instituted against such ships, it is manifest that there must be some law applicable to them which is distinct from the statute law of the land, and this law is derived from those principles which form the foundation not only of our English law, but of the laws of all civilised nations. Such a law whatever it may be called, is no doubt administered by English and foreign courts having admiralty jurisdiction. As the principles themselves do not make the law, but it is made rather by the application of them, the dictum above will not conflict with the words of Willes, J., in Lloyd v. Guibert (sup.), where he uses the phrase, "the general maritime law as administered in England." As to the law governing cases of collision between British and foreign ships on the high seas, see The Zollverein (Swa, 96), The Dnmfries (Swa, 63), *The Chancellor (14 Moo. P. C. C. 202; 9 L. T. Falmouth, the master would not deliver to the consignees there, even on the offer of full freight; Held, that the master was bound to deliver at Falmouth.

Semble, that as the rights and obligations of the parties to a contract are to be determined by the law which they have declared themselves to intend, and as where there is no express declaration of intention, the presumption as to the law contemplated by the parties must be gathered from the circumstances of the case. in this case the English law applied to the contract as between the shipowner and consignee. (a)

This was a suit instituted under the 6th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 on behalf of Messrs. Chalmers, Guthrie, and Co., of Idol-lane, in the City of London, merchants, the consignees under a bill of lading of 1923 bags of coffee on board the ship Patria, for damages occasioned by the non-delivery of the said goods.

The Patria is a vessel sailing under the flag of the North German Confederation, and belonging to the port of Geestemunde in Hanover, one of the states of the Confederation, and her owners are subjects of the said state. In March 1870 she was chartered to Messrs. Frederick Müller and Sons, of Bremen, subjects of the said Confederation, and the said charter was entered into at Bremen.

Whilst under the said charter party, she was lying at the port of Champerico, in the republic of Guatelema, taking in a general cargo for Hamburg. The said cargo was shipped under the charter party for the benefit of Messrs. Müller and Sons, and was procured by them or their agents, and not by the owners of the ship.

The plaintiff's goods were shipped on board the Patria, to be carried to Hamburg, on the terms of the following bill of lading.

Shipped in good order and condition by Fdgoras y Ceballas on board the vessel called the Patria, whereof B. H. Kassebohm is master, now lying at the port of Champerico, and bound for Hamburg, via Tecojate and San Jose de Guatemala, to say, 1923 bags of coffee, of 130lb. net each, being marked and numbered as in the margin, and are to be delivered in the like order and condition at the port of Hamburg (the dangers of the sea only excepted) unto Messrs. Chalmers, Guthrie, and Co., of London, or to assigns, he or they paying freight for the said goods 4l. British sterling per ton of 2240lb. and 5l. per cent. primage. In witness whereof the master or purser of the said vessel hath affirmed to five bills of lading all of this tenor and date, one of which being accomplished, the others to stand void.

B. H. KASSEBOHM.

Dated in Champerico the 19th March 1870.

Five copies of the said bill of lading were signed by the master, and four were given by him to the said Fdgoras y Ceballas.

All the remaining goods on board the Patria were shipped to Hamburg by, and belonged to, subjects of the North-German Confederation, and continued to belong to them up to the institution of this suit. On 5th April 1870 the Patria sailed for Hamburg, and on the 23rd Aug. arrived in the British Channel, and her master and certain of her crew being ill and in want of medical assistance, the ship put into the port of Falmouth.

Before the arrival of the ship in the English Channel war had broken out between France and Germany, and was then existing, and the port of Hamburg was blockaded by a French fleet from the 19th Aug. until the 18th Sept. At the time the Patria put into Falmouth there were French cruisers in the channel and on the whole line of route to the port of Hamburg, and if she had gone to sea she would have run great risk of capture.

The master of the Patria on the 9th Sept. left his ship, which remained at Falmouth, and went to London, and did not return until the 1st Dec. The ship was arrested on the 9th Nov, 1870. Previous to the arrival of the ship, on the 1st June 1870, the plaintiffs learned, by a letter from Messrs. Müller and Sons, from Bremen, that they were the charterers and consignees of the vessel, and the plaintiffs wrote, on the 16th July 1870, to Müller and Sons, a letter set out in the judgment.

A correspondence took place between the plaintiffs and the master of the Patria, and in substance it showed that the plaintiffs did not require the master to sail during the blockade of the port of Hamburg; that they required delivery at Hamburg after the raising of the blockade, unless the master would deliver at Falmouth, either of which the master refused to do. The plaintiffs' demand for delivery at Falmouth was disputed, and the master said that there had never been a distinct demand. The master further said that there had been no sufficient tender of freight, but the plaintiffs gave evidence to prove the tender, and called a Mr. Coward, clerk to Broad and Sons, plaintiffs' agents in Falmouth, who swore that he said to the master "We will pay full freight, as if the ship was discharged at Hamburg." All the bills of lading were not given up, but it did not appear that the master made any demand for them. The goods in question were stowed at the bottom of the vessel, and could not be got out at Falmouth without unloading the goods of the other shippers. To this Müller and Sons, the charterers, would not consent unless the plaintiffs paid their proportion of the general average expenses of such unloading. It did not appear on the evidence that any demand for such payment had been made. Paragraph 2 of the defendant's answer said that the goods were shipped "on the terms of a bill of lading signed and delivered by the master of the Patria."

The defendants' answer also contained the following paragraph:—

13. By the law of Hanover and the said North German Confederation, the master of the Patria was entitled to keep the Patria in Falmouth harbour, whilst the Patria or her cargo, or part thereof, would have been liable to risk of capture at sea by reason of the continuance of the said war, and the master of the Patria was not by such law, whilst the blockade continued, or whilst the said war and liability to risk of capture continued, under any obligation to the plaintiffs to proceed or attempt to proceed to Hamburg with the Patria; and by the said law the master of the Patria in putting into and remaining with the Patria in the said harbour of Falmouth as aforesaid had not at the time of the institution of this suit been guilty of any breach of duty or of contract to or with the plaintiffs.

15. By the law of Hanover and the said Confederation, certain expenses incurred by reason of the Patria having gone into and having been detained at Falmouth became divisible among ship freight and cargo, according to the principles of general average; and by such law the master of the Patria is entitled to retain any part of the cargo of the Patria for the proportion of such expenses chargeable on or in respect of such part, or until the owner of such part should have given security for the payment of such proportion, and the plaintiffs never tendered or offered to pay their proportion of the said expenses in respect of the cargo comprised in the said bill of lading, nor to give security for the same.

(a) This does not in any way conflict with Lloyd v. Guibert (sup.), as in that case the intention of the parties furnished the guide to the governing law.—ED.

THE PATRIA.

[ADM.]

17. By the law of Hanover and the said Confederation, the master of the Patria was forbidden to deliver to the plaintiffs, and could not lawfully deliver the goods mentioned in the said bill of lading unless all the copies of the said bill of lading, signed by the said master and delivered by him as aforesaid, were delivered as aforesaid. The plaintiffs never tendered to the said master divers of the said copies of the said bills of lading; and divers of such copies have remained and are in the hands of persons unknown to the said master and the owners of the Patria.

20. The defendants further say that, by the said charter party aforesaid, which bore date the 29th Jan. 1869, the said charterers were entitled to the use of the said ship, and that the said ship had been put up by them as a general ship; and thereby the said bill of lading was signed and delivered by the said master pursuant to the terms of the said charter party, for the benefit of the said charterers and not for the benefit of the owners of the said ship; and that in signing and delivering the said bill of lading, the said master acted as agent for the said charterers and not as agent for the defendants.

21. The said Fdigoras y Ceballas had, at the time when the said goods were shipped, notice that the said ship was under charter; and the plaintiffs had, at the time when they became the consignees of the said goods, notice that the said ship was under charter at the time of the said shipment.

22. The defendants submit that the said goods mentioned in the said bill of lading were not carried into any port in England or Wales within the true intent and meaning of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, s. 6, and that this Honourable Court has not jurisdiction to entertain this suit.

Mr. Travers, Vice-Consul of the North German Confederation, who was German advocate, proved the existence of a North German code of laws and produced a copy of the Mercantile Code, and said that a correct translation of the part relating to maritime law was published in "Papers on Maritime Legislation, with a translation of the German Mercantile Law relating to Maritime Commerce, by Ernst Emil Wendt. The articles of the code referred to in the argument were as follow:

Art. 504.—The master shall at the same time take every possible care of the cargo during the voyage, in the interest of those who are concerned therein. When special measures are required in order to avoid or lessen a loss, it is his duty to protect the interests of those concerned in the cargo, as their representative; to take their instructions, if possible, and, as far as circumstances admit, to carry the same into effect; otherwise, however, to act according to his own discretion, and generally to take every possible care that those interested in the cargo are speedily informed of such occurrences, and of the measures thereby rendered necessary. He is in such cases particularly authorised to discharge the whole or portion of the cargo; in the most extreme cases, if a considerable loss on account of imminent deterioration or other causes cannot be otherwise averted, to sell or hypothecate it for the purpose of providing means for its preservation and further transport; to reclaim it in the case of capture or detention; or, if it shall have been otherwise withdrawn from his charge, to take all extra-judicial and judicial steps for its recovery.

Art. 505.—When the prosecution of the voyage in its original direction is prevented by an accident, the master is at liberty either to continue the voyage in another direction, or to suspend it for a shorter or longer period, or to return to the port of departure, according to the circumstances, and to the instructions received, which latter are to be adhered to as far as possible. In the case of the cancelling of the contract of affreightment, he shall act according to the provisions of Art. 634.

Art. 631.—Either party can withdraw from the contract without being liable for damages:—1. When, before the commencement of the voyage, the vessel is placed under embargo, or taken possession of for the service of the country or a foreign power; the trade with the port of destination is prohibited; the loading port or the port of destination is blockaded; the exportation of the goods, to be shipped according to the contract of affreightment, from the port of loading, or their importation into the port of destination is prohibited; the vessel is by a Government order prevented from putting to sea, or the voyage, or the transmission of the goods to be shipped according to the contract of affreightment, is prohibited. In all the foregoing cases, however, the Government order justifies the withdrawal of the contract only when the impediment that has arisen is apparently not of short duration. 2. When, before the commencement of a voyage, a war has been declared, in consequence of which the vessel, or the goods to be shipped according to the contract of affreightment, or both, can no longer be considered free, and would be liable to risk of capture.

Art. 634. The dissolution of the contract or affreightment alters nothing in the obligation of the master to take care of the cargo in the absence of the interested parties, even after the loss of the vessel (articles 504, 506). The master is, therefore, justified and obliged, and in urgent cases even without previous inquiry, as circumstances may require, either to forward the cargo to the port of destination in another vessel for account of the parties concerned, or to have it stored, or sold, and in case of its being forwarded or stored, to sell a portion of the same for the purpose of realising the funds necessary thereto and to its preservation, or in case of its being forwarded, to take a bottomry bond on the whole or part of it. The master is, however, not obliged to part with the cargo, or deliver it to another master for the purpose of its being forwarded, unless the distance freight as well as all other claims of the shipowner, and the contributions due from the cargo for general average, salvage, and assistance and bottomry have been paid or secured. The shipowner is answerable for the fulfilment of the duties devolving on the master according to the first section of this article, to the extent of his ship, so far as anything has been saved of it and of the freight.

Art. 636. When subsequent to the commencement of the voyage, any of the incidents occur to which reference is made in Art. 631, either party has a right to withdraw from the contract without being liable to damages.

When, however, any of the incidents mentioned in Art. 631, No. 1, have occurred, the parties have, before being able to withdraw, to wait for the removal of the impediment, three or five months respectively, according as the vessel is in a European or in a non-European port. Such period shall be calculated from the day of receiving notice of the impediment, if the master is then at a port, or from that day on which, after having received such notice, he first reaches a port with the vessel.

The discharge of the vessel shall, in default of an agreement to the contrary, take place at the port at which it is staying at the time of the receipt of the notice of withdrawal. The charterer is bound to pay a distance freight for such portion of the voyage as is actually performed.

When, in consequence of such impediment, the vessel has returned to the port of departure or to any other port, in calculating the distance freight the nearest point to the port of destination which the vessel had reached shall be taken as the basis for ascertaining the distance actually performed.

The master is likewise bound to act, in any such cases, before and after the dissolution of the contract of affreightment, in the interest of the cargo, in conformity with the articles 504-506, and 634.

Art. 637. When the vessel, after taking in its cargo, is detained in the port of loading before the commencement of the voyage, or in an intermediate port, or in a port of refuge after its commencement, by any of the emergencies mentioned in Art. 631, then the expenses of such detention (even if the requirements of general average are not present) are divided among the ship, freight, and cargo, according to the principals of general average, whether the contract is thereby put an end to, or afterwards completely fulfilled. The expenses of the detention include all the expenses enumerated in the second clause of art. 708, No. 4; but those of putting into and leaving port only when the vessel has put into a port of refuge on account of the obstacle.

Art. 641. Should the contract of affreightment be dissolved, pursuant of Art. 630-636, the expenses of unloading from the vessel are borne by the shipowner, and all other expenses of the discharge by the charterer. When, however, the cargo only has been affected by the incident, the whole of the expenses of the discharge are borne by the charterer. The same rule applies when, in the case of Art. 638, a part of the cargo is discharged. When in such a case, it was necessary to put into a port for the purpose of discharging, the charterer shall also bear the port charges.

Art. 643. Should the contract not extend to the whole of the vessel, but only to a proportionate part, or to a specially defined space of the same, or to a general cargo, the articles 630-642 apply, subject to the following modification, viz.: 1. In the cases of articles 631 and 636 either party is justified in withdrawing from the contract immediately after the occurrence of the impediment, and without regard to its duration.

Art. 645. The bill of lading contains, first, the name of the master; secondly, the name and nationality of the vessel; thirdly, the name of the shipper; fourthly, the name of the consignee; fifthly, the port of lading; sixthly, the port of discharge, or the place at which orders for the same are to be obtained (port of call); seventhly, the description, quantity, and marks of the goods shipped; eighthly, the stipulations respecting the freight; ninthly, the place and date on which it has been issued; tenthly, the number of the copies issued.

Art. 647. The master is bound to deliver the goods in the port of discharge to the legal holder of even one copy of the bill of lading only. As legally entitled to receive the goods. He is to be considered the party who is designated as consignee in the bill of lading, or to whom the bill of lading, in case it is issued to order, has been transferred by endorsement.

Art. 653. The bill of lading is decisive for the legal position of the shipowner and the consignee of the goods towards each other; more especially the delivery of the goods to the consignee shall take place in accordance with the contents of the bill of lading. Provisions of the contract of affreightment not embodied in the bill of lading have no legal effect as against the consignee, unless special reference has been made to them. When such reference has been made respecting the freight to the contract of affreightment (for instance, by the words "freight as per charter-party"), the stipulations as to the time for discharging, the days on demurrage, and the demurrage are not considered to be therein included. As regards the legal position of the shipowner and the charterer towards each other, the clauses of the contract of affreightment remain conclusive.

Art. 661. After a bill of lading has been issued to order, the master cannot comply with any instructions of the shipper concerning the returning or delivery of such goods, unless all copies of such bill of lading are returned to him. The same rule applies to any demand made by the holder of a bill of lading for delivery of goods previous to the arrival of the master at the port of destination. Should he act in contravention of these provisions, he remains liable to any legal holder of the bill of lading. In case the bill of lading has not been issued to order, the master shall return or deliver such goods even without the production of a bill of lading, if the shipper and the consignee named in such bill of lading have expressed their proper consent to the returning or delivery of such goods. When, however, all copies of the bill of lading are not returned, the master can previously demand security for any losses which might arise in consequence thereof.

Butt, Q.C., and Cohen, for the plaintiffs.—The contract here is plain, and its language ought to be construed naturally, and clearly shews the intention of the parties, so that it does not admit of the introduction of any law dehors the contract. If it can be said that any law must be considered in order to explain the agreement, that law is the lex fori, or the maritime law as administered in this country. Sir R. J. PHILLMORE.—Maritime law is not administered specially in England. It is wrong to identify English law with maritime law. Maritime law resembles the jus gentium of the Roman law. The civil law of Rome did not apply to strangers, so the prætors adopted what was common to the law of different states, and this law so adopted was administered by them in suits instituted by or against strangers. So there is a maritime law administered by the comity of nations by all states alike, and this law is arrived at by eliminating what is peculiar to each nation, and adopting what is universal. To hold otherwise, you must throw over Lord Kingsdown and Lord Stowell.

The Hamburg, Bro. & Lush, 253, 272; 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 206;

The Gratitude, 3 C. Rob. 241;

De Lovio v. Boit, 2 Gallison (U. S.) 398.

Lord Mansfield says that the maritime law is not the law of a particular state, but the general law of all nations: (Luke v. Lyde, 2 Bur. Rep. 883, 887.) The master chose to remain in an English port; therefore the lex fori should apply. The law of the flag does not apply; no one suggested that it should apply in the Hamburg. In Cammell v. Sewell (5 H. & N. 723; 2 L. T. Rep. N. S. 799), it was decided that where a master sold the cargo of his vessel in a manner binding according to the law of the country in which they were disposed of, that disposition was binding in this country. But here the master commits a breach in this country, and seeks the protection of a foreign municipal law which is not binding upon an English court. (The Halley L. Rep. 2 P. C. App. 193; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 879.) By the lex fori the master was bound to proceed. The excepted peril in the bill of lading is the "dangers of the seas only excepted." Neither the law of England nor the general maritime law justifies a master in not performing his contract or in delaying an unreasonable time merely on account of the outbreak of war.

Pole v. Cetkovitch, 9 C. B., N. S., 430; 3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 438; The Teutonia, 1 Aspinal's Maritime Law Cases, 32.

Paradine v. Jane, 2 Aleyne Rep. 26;

The bill of lading is decisive as between the owner and the consignee. No terms of the charter party can be taken as introduced into the bill of lading unless so expressly stipulated (Smith v. Sieveking 4 E. & B. 945.) Even supposing that the German law governs, the bill of lading is decisive between the owner and the consignee: (Code, Art 653.) Further, the defendants, in paragraph 2 of their answer, say that the goods were shipped "on the terms of the bill of lading." It is an English bill of lading; the language used, the money stipulated for, and the consignees are all English. These facts show that it was the intention of the parties that the English law should govern. By the English law a master is bound to perform his contract and to proceed to his port of destination, unless the consignees prevent him from carrying the goods on, and in that case he is entitled to recover his freight: (Cargo ex Galam 2 Moore's P. C. C. N. S. 216, 229; 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 550.) He is entitled to pro rata freight if he delivers the goods at the intermediate port and they are accepted by the consignees.

Christy v. Row, 1 Taunt. 300;

Luke v. Lyde, 2 Burr. 883.

In this case, however, the master was offered the full freight, and he refused to deliver the goods. The amount of freight was not refused as inadequate at the time, but he now says that he was entitled to general average contribution towards the expense of unshipping and reloading the cargo. This claim is made under art. 637 of the code. This is a foreign master relying on foreign law, and he was bound to inform the consignees of his claim, and he made no such claim. The master refused to deliver, and therefore a tender on the part of the consignees was unnecessary.

Dirks v. Richards, 4 M. & G. 574;

Jones v. Tarleton, 9 M. & W. 675.

By German law, the consignee named in the bill of lading is entitled to delivery of the goods without endorsement to him: (Code, art. 647.) The master is bound to deliver on the first bill of lading being presented by the terms of the instrument itself: (The Tigress, Bro & Lush, 38, 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 117.) By the German law it is only when the bills of lading were issued to order that the master has a right to demand that all should be given up by the holder before delivery at an intermediate port: (Code, art. 661.) These bills of lading were not issued to order. There were named consignees—namely, the plaintiffs, and they have a right to sue, as they are entitled to possession at any place on presentation of the bill of lading after reasonable notice and tender of freight: (Tindall v. Taylor, 24 L. J. 12, Q. B.; 4 Ell. & Bl. 219.) The master was not excused from performance of his contract under this bill of lading by the blockade of Hamburg; and even if he were, he was bound to proceed as soon as the blockade was at an end, or to deliver the goods at Falmouth.

Millward, Q. C., and Clarkson for the defendants.

—The charter party was made at Bremen between Germans, and related to a German ship. Delivery in Germany is contemplated. The charter is the foundation of the adventure, and the bill of lading is under the terms of the charter. The shipper of the goods was not English, and the bill of lading was the contract entered into between him and the master, and the intention of the parties was not to make the English law govern. This bill of lading was given by a German master, and therefore the agreements to be implied as to his duties to proceed and deliver in a port of refuge must be ascertained by reference to the law of the flag which the vessel carries: (The Bahia, Bro. & Lush 61). This case adopts Lloyd v. Guibert (L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 115; 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 570, in Ex. Ch.; 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 602), which decides that, unless otherwise expressly provided, the law of the country to which the ship belongs must be taken to be the law to which the parties have submitted themselves. The charterers must be presumed to have had some agent at Guatemala; the vessel was not in the master's hands to procure German freight. As to the owners, cargo and ship, the whole transaction was German, so that English law cannot govern. The fact that the vessel came into an English port is not sufficient to found the jurisdiction. "Carried into any port" under the Admiralty Jurisdiction Act (24 Vict. c. 10, s. 6) refers to a port of destination. If not, being driven into a Spanish port would have made the Spanish law apply. The whole contract was to be performed at Hamburg. The master received his authority from German owners, and was master of a German ship, and it cannot be said that he could, by signing these bills of lading under a German charter, make the ship and owners subject to English law. This would be exceeding his authority as agent. He was agent to the charterers, and signed the bills of lading as their agents, and not as agent of the owners. Even by the English law the master was entitled to put into Falmouth on account of the sickness of himself and his crew, and when there he found the war had broken out. This entitled him, by German law, to stay in port. During the blockade he was entitled to remain three months in Falmouth before he was bound either to proceed or to withdraw from the contract: (Code, Arts. 636, 631, par. 1). The remaining in port after the blockade from the 18th Sept. to the 9th Nov., the date of the arrest of the ship, was not an unreasonable delay under the circumstances. If it were, the master was justified by the German law. By Arts. 643, 636 of the code, the master was entitled to withdraw from the contract, and was not bound to proceed, war having broken out after the commencement of the voyage. As he was not bound to proceed, he was clearly entitled to put into port for the safety of ship and cargo. The master was not bound to proceed, because the bill of lading was not in the form prescribed by the code. It is not there made compulsory: (Art. 645.) The stipulation, "dangers of the seas only excepted," does not exclude such an unforeseen circumstance as the outbreak of the war. This exception is provided for by the code and it was surplusage to put it into the bill of lading. The master was not bound to deliver the goods at Falmouth but on the payment of pro rata freight by the general maritime law:

Christy v. Row, 1 Taunt. 300;

Cargo ex Galam (sup.);

Luke v. Lyde, 2 Burrows Rep. 883 (per Lord Mansfield).

By German law (Art. 636) the charterer is bound to pay a distance freight for such portion of the voyage as is actually performed. There was no sufficient demand of the goods or tender of freight on the part of the plaintiffs. By Art. 637, the master was entitled to the general average contribution of the plaintiffs towards the expenses of detention in Falmouth, and, by Art. 641, part of the expenses of discharging the cargo. These the plaintiffs did not offer to pay. The master was not bound to deliver up the goods to the plaintiffs, at any port short of the destination without receiving all the bills of lading signed by him (Art. 661), and he did not receive them. These goods were stowed at the bottom of the hold, and the master under the circumstances acted for the best in the interests of the different owners of cargo, as directed by Art. 504.

Butt, Q. C. in reply.—If Lloyd v. Guibert decides that the general maritime law administered in England is not a universal maritime law binding on all nations in time of peace, but a law to be derived from practice and decisions of English tribunals, the decision is wrong, and not binding on the court. It is against the principles of the cases already cited. Lloyd v. Guibert referred to things not contemplated by the parties, but here the contract is precise in its terms. The German law does not prevent parties adopting a special form of contract, and this form is conclusive: (Kay v. Wheeler, L. Rep. 2 C. P., 302; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 66.) As to the jurisdiction, the objection ought to have been taken under protest (Adm. Rules 37), and further the question is decided (Bahia, Bro. & Lush. 61). The owner cannot release himself from liability by chartering his vessel without the consent of the owners of the goods, there being no demise of the ship, and the master receiving freight as owners' agent as well as charterers':

Sandeman v. Scurr, L. Rep. 2 Q. B., 86; 36 L. J., Q. B., 58; 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 608;

St. Cloud, Bro. & Lush. 4; 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 54.

Further, this is a proceeding in rem against the ship, and is not against the owners, and therefore a maritime lien attached under the statute when the ship was arrested. The master refused to deliver, and therefore the owners were not entitled to claim pro rata freight. The master did not require all the bills of lading to be given up. He depends on the German law, and this bill of lading is not in accordance with the code. It was presented by the consignee named therein. By Art. 504 of the code the master was bound to consider the interest of the owners of cargo, and to deliver at Falmouth.

June 6.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is a suit by Messrs. Chalmers, Guthrie, and Co., consignees under a bill of lading, of 1293 bags of coffee, lately laden on board the ship Patria, for damages against that ship, on the ground of a breach of the contract contained in the bill of lading. The Patria is a ship sailing under the flag of the North German Confederation, belonging to a port in Hanover. In the month of March 1870, she was chartered to Messrs. Muller and Sons, of Bremen, and was lying in the port of Champerico, Guatemala, when a person of the name of Ceballas, who, I presume, was an American Spaniard, shipped on board her the coffee above mentioned, to be carried to Hamburg, on the terms of a bill of lading signed and delivered by the master, which is as follows. (His Lordship here read the bill of lading before set out.) Five copies of the bill of lading were signed by the master, four of which were delivered to Ceballas. One of those was delivered by Ceballas to the plaintiffs. Other goods were also shipped for Hamburg by other persons. The ship sailed on the 5th April. On the 23rd Aug. she arrived in the English Channel, with some of her crew, including the captain, seriously ill, and on the same day she put into Falmouth. Before this time war had broken out between the North German Confederation and France, and Hamburg was blockaded from the 19th Aug., before the arrival of the vessel, until the 18th Sept. On the 7th Nov. the suit was instituted in this court, and in substance it charges the defendants with two distinct breaches of contract—namely, refusal to deliver the coffee of the plaintiffs at Hamburg and at Falmouth. The question by what law such charges are to be tried may, according to the circumstances of each case be one of nicety and difficulty. The law of the place in which the contract was entered into (lex loci contractus), that of the place in which it is to be performed (lex loci solutionis), that of the state to which the shipowner belonged, usually called the law of the flag, the general maritime law administered by the comity of all states, and the law of the tribunal in which the suit is instituted (lex fori), are the laws upon one of which the attack or defence is usually founded. In the present case the defendant has relied principally upon the law of the flag. The plaintiff also maintains that the contract itself furnishes by its own terms the law applicable to his case, from whatever source the law so furnished be derived, but he contends that if any law without the contract is to be imported, it is the general maritime law. The proposition that the terms of the contract furnish per se the law in this case raises the first question to be considered. The propositions of jurisprudence applicable to it appear to me the following:—First, that the rights and obligations of the parties to a contract are to be determined by the law which they have declared themselves to intend; secondly, that, where there is no express declaration of intention, the presumption as to the law contemplated by the parties must be gathered from the circumstances of the case; thirdly, that where the contract is plain in its language, that language must receive the ordinary and natural construction, and does not admit the introduction of a law dehors the contract; fourthly, that the contract must be executed according to its terms, or abandoned with due compensation to the parties injured, unless supervening unforeseen circumstances of a certain character have rendered the execution legally impossible, as where the port of destination has become the port of the enemy of the state to which the shipowner belongs;—and here I must observe that there is no question in this case, as in the recent case of the Teutonia (1 Aspinall's Maritime Law Cases 32; 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 521) as to the fulfillment of a contract being prevented by such a legal impossibility, or by the necessity of a compromise between a public and private duty;—fifthly, that the happening of unforeseen events may, according to the circumstances, justify a reasonable delay in the execution of a contract which does not infer the abandonment of it. I will now apply these propositions to the facts of the case before me. During the interval between the arrival of the ship at Falmouth on the 25th Aug., and the institution of the suit on the 7th Nov., the ship remained in the port of Falmouth. The captain was absent from Falmouth from the 9th Sept. to the 1st Dec., when he returned to his ship. It has not been contended by the plaintiffs that there was any breach of contract in the deviation to Falmouth caused by the illness of the master. There are some outlying objections taken on the part of the defendants, which it will be convenient to dispose of in this place. It is objected that the proceedings should have been against the charterer, and not the owner. But I am of opinion that this objection cannot avail, for two reasons: first, the owner of the ship cannot release himself from his liability by chartering his vessel without the consent of the owner of the goods. In this case there is no demise of the ship. The master receives freight as agent for the owner as well as the charterer: Sandeman v. Scurr and others (sup.). Secondly, the proceeding here is in rem; the maritime lien attached under the statute as soon as the ship was arrested. Another objection is as to the jurisdiction of the court under sect. 6 of 24 Vict. c. 10. It is said that the goods in this case are not "carried into any port of England or Wales," because Falmouth was not the port of destination. In the first place this objection should have been taken under protest; in the next place, it has been already raised and disposed of by my predecessor, in whose judgment I entirely concur, and which, as it applies closely to the present case, I will state. That learned judge said: "Here, then, is a cargo, originally destined to be imported into the port of Dunkirk. In consequence of accident, the ship puts into the port of Ramsgate, and the master refuses to carry on the cargo to Dunkirk, or to give delivery at Ramsgate. That this is a great grievance cannot be denied, and the court ought to give, if necessary, great latitude to the construction of the Act of Parliament, in order to extend the remedy to this case. However, it appears to me this section was carefully worded to give the utmost jurisdiction in the matter. It uses the words 'carried into any port in England,' and does not use the word 'import. I apprehend the phrase 'carried into' was advisedly used instead of the word 'import.' Then it goes on, 'or for any breach of duty or breach of contract.' Here there is a clear breach of contract and breach of duty, I am of opinion that, without any violence of construction, the statute applies to this case. I reject the motion, with costs": (The Bahia, Bro. & Lush. p. 62.) Another objection was, that the master had no power under the charter party "to contract," as it was expressed, "his owner out of that charter party;" but I am of a different opinion, and upon this point I adopt the language of the Court of Queen's Bench in the case already cited of Sandeman v. Scurr. Cockburn, C. J., in delivering the judgement of the court, said: "We think that, so long as the relation of owner and master continues, the latter, as regards parties who ship goods in ignorance of any arrangement whereby the authority ordinarily incidental to that relation is affected, must be taken to have authority to bind his owner by giving bills of lading. We proceed on the well-known principle that where a party allows another to appear before the world as his agent in any given capacity, he must be liable to any party who contracts with such apparent agent in a matter within the scope of such agency. The master of a vessel has by law authority to sign bills of lading on behalf of his owner. A person shipping goods on board a vessel, unaware that the vessel has been chartered to another, is warranted in assuming that the master is acting by virtue of his ordinary authority, and therefore acting for his owner in signing bills of lading. It may be that as between the master and the charterer, the authority of the master is to sign bills of lading on behalf of the charterer only, and not of the owner. But, in our judgment, this altered state of the master's authority will not affect the liability of the owner, whose servant the master still remains, clothed with a character to which the authority to bind his owner by signing bills of lading attaches by virtue of his offices. We think that until the fact that the master's authority has been put an end to is brought to the knowledge of a shipper of goods the latter has a right to look to the owner as the principal with whom his contract has been made": Sandeman v. Scurr (sup.) I should mention that it appears from the correspondence between Müller and sons and the plaintiffs that the plaintiffs were apprised by a letter from Bremen dated the 1st June, that Müller and sons were the charterers and consignees of the vessel. And on the 16th July the plaintiffs (war having broken out on the 15th July, according to the dates agreed upon), wrote as follows:—"16th July '70. Messrs. Fredk. Müller and Sons, Bremen. Dear Sir—In reference to your favour of 1st June, in which you inform me you are consignees and charterers of the German vessel Patria from Guatemala, as the disturbances on the Continent will probably close the port of Hamburg, please communicate with the owners as regards their wishes. It would no doubt be safer for the vessel to come to London, and, in the event of her doing so, we shall be most happy to take charge of her and her cargo on your account.—We are, Dear Sir, yours truly, CHALMERS, GUTHRIE and Co." I am of opinion that the contract contained in the bill of lading cannot be affected by the terms of the charter party. The English (Smith v. Sieving, 5 Ell. & Bl. 589), I may observe, and the German law are equally clear on this point, according to Act 653 of the German code. [His lordship read the article of the code before set out.] The German expert who has been examined explained this law in its natural sense. Moreover, the second article of the answer in this suit refers to the shipment as having taken place "on the terms of a bill of lading." The bill of lading in this case is in the usual form of an English bill of lading. If this instrument had specified that the English law should govern the construction of it, it could not have been maintained that the bill would not have been subject to this law. But it is contended that the intention of the parties to the contract that the English law should govern cannot be inferred from the facts that the language, form, and money for the freight are English and the consignees English; while the other surrounding facts are that the ship was German, the owners German, the charter party German, the destination of the goods a German port, the shipper not English—all these facts show, it is urged, that the law of the flag of the ship must prevail, and bring the case under the principles of the decision in Lloyd v. Guibert. I have been much pressed by counsel for the plaintiffs to pronounce that the decision in Lloyd v. Guibert (sup.) is not binding on the Admiralty Court, and also that the judgment errs in ascribing to the Admiralty Court the doctrine that the general maritime law is not an universal maritime law binding upon all nations in time of peace, but a law which is to be derived from the practice and decisions of English tribunals. If it were necessary to decide the latter point, with all respect for the high authority of the tribunal which delivered the judgment, I should have hesitated a long while before I assented to the position that there was not a general maritime law which, according to the comity of nations, was administered in the English as well as in the foreign courts of Admiralty. I should have remembered and endeavoured to apply the law upon which Lord Stowell in the Gratitude (sup.) founded the authority of the master when acting as necessary agent for the owner of the cargo, and the language of Lord Tenterden in Simonds v. White (sup.) as to the division of average. "The principle of average," says that high authority, "is of very ancient date and of universal reception among commercial nations. The obligation to contribute, therefore, depends not so much upon the terms of any particular instrument as upon a general rule of maritime law: (Simonds v. White, 1824, 2 B. & C. 811). I should have referred to the judgement of Storey (De Lovio v. Boit, 2 Gallison 398) as to the ancient laws, customs, and usages of the sea, and considered whether there was not a general maritime law founded upon them, and the recognised exposition of them as wholly distinct from the common law of England, as the law by which in cases of collision the Admiralty Court finds both parties to blame is distinct from that of the common law court, which, upon its own principles, refuses to allow any verdict to be given. But in truth it does not appear to me necessary to note any decision on either of the points pressed upon me touching the authority of Lloyd v. Guibert (sup.) That case related to the question of what law should be applied to events not contemplated by the contract; but in the case before me the contract is precise in its language, and does contemplate the happening of events which might impede the execution of the contract, and provides that, with one special exception, namely, "The dangers of the seas only excepted" Kay v. Wheeler, (sup.) such events shall not excuse the shipowner from the fulfilment of the contract. It has not been maintained that the German law would prevent a German shipowner from adopting any special form of contract; and I must presume that the German system of jurisprudence, like that of all other states would construe according to its plain meaning, such a contract as the present. According to the natural construction of the language of this contract, the breaking out of the war did not relieve the shipowner from the obligation of fulfilling his contract. The first breach of contract alleged is the not going to Hamburg in spite of the blockade—that is before the 18th Sept. It was contended that if the consignees were ready to take the risk, it was not competent to the master, under the bill of lading, to refuse to sail. I think, however, that this breach was practically abandoned during the course of the argument, and I much doubt whether, having regard to the letter of the 16th July, it could have been maintained. But after the 18th Sept. the shipowner was bound and without any further demand, by the terms of his contract, to continue his voyage. I do not mean to say that he was not entitled to a reasonable delay in order to decide as to what was the best course to pursue. What lapse of time may be included in a reasonable delay must depend on the circumstances of each case. In The Teutonia (24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 521; 1 Aspinal's Maritime Law Cases, 32) and in the case of Pole v. Cetcovitch (sup.) the delay was of two or three days. In this case fifty days elapsed before the suit was instituted, a period which I am of opinion exceeded the limits of the time during which the master was entitled to pause, and which constituted the unreasonable delay which was expressly found to be wanting in Pole v. Cetcovitch (sup.), but which in the case before me made a complete breach of the contract. The expert distinctly stated that if the master had proceeded to Hamburg after the war had broken out he would not have violated any principle of German law. The contract, therefore, being plain, the circumstance of the war not relieving the defendants from the duty of executing it, and the delay being so unreasonable as to amount to a refusal to do so, the judgment must be for the plaintiff, unless his conduct or that of his agents had deprived them of the right to claim it. That conduct must be gathered from the correspondence and the evidence taken before me. It amounts, I think in substance to this. First, that the plaintiffs did not require the defendant to sail during the blockade of Hamburg, that is, before the 18th Sept.; secondly, that after that date they did require the delivery of the goods at Hamburg unless the master would deliver them at Falmouth. But this alternative was offered to him by the plaintiffs; their complaint is that the captain would neither fulfil the contract nor withdraw from it. These observations bring me to the consideration of the second alleged breach of the contract, viz., the refusal to deliver the coffee at Falmouth. If this question be triable by the English law, the contract was at an end by the refusal of the master to go to Hamburg, and the merchant was entitled to his goods, whether with or without payment of a pro rata freight. By the general maritime law the plaintiffs would, I think, have been entitled to their goods, on the payment of pro rata freight. By the German law, or the law of the flag, art. 631, 636, 504, of the code), either party had a right to withdraw from the contract without being liable to damage; and it is the duty of the master to take the instructions of the owners of the cargo, and as far as circumstances admit to execute them, and (art. 641) the expense of unloading is to be borne by the shipowners, and other expenses of discharge by the charterer and as I understood the expert, a payment of "distance" freight,—which is, I suppose, pro rata freight—is to be made. I must here observe, that though I do not doubt that Mr. Travers, the expert, efficiently discharges the duties of his consular office, he did not pretend to any knowledge of jurisprudence apart from the letter of the code, and was wholly unacquainted with any judicial decisions thereupon. The court, therefore, is left very much to put its own construction upon the code, the translation of which by Mr. Wendt has been relied upon by the counsel on both sides. With regard to the German law, the first objection to the delivery of the goods raised by the defendants was that no direct demand had been made for the goods; it appears to me that the evidence proves that there was a sufficient demand. As to the second objection, that there was no sufficient tender of freight, I am of opinion that the contrary is proved. Mr. Coward, the clerk of Messrs. Broad and Son, the agents, said: "I told him (that is the master) we would pay full freight, the same as if the ship was discharged at Hamburg." As to the third objection, that all the bills of lading were not given up, a sufficient answer is that the master never asked for the other bills of lading. This objection is in the circumstances purely technical, and it is very doubtful, to say the least, whether according to the German law he had any right to insist upon the other bills of lading in the case of such a bill of lading as the present, which is not the one contemplated by the German code, and which was presented by the consignee named in the instrument itself. By the English law the master was certainly bound to deliver the goods to the holder of the bill of lading: (The Tigris (sup.)) The remaining and principle objection is that these goods were put on board a general ship, and so stowed that they could not be delivered without disturbing the goods of other shippers; that the master is by the German law to exercise his discretion upon the subject, and that he had a right to exact their share of general average from the plaintiffs, which share was never tendered to him. Here again it may be answered, that the demand for average was never made by the master—a remark which loses none of its force from the fact that this claim was made according to the foreign law, with which the English merchant could not be supposed to be conversant. Neither, I may observe in passing, was any demand made by the master for an indemnity. But further it appears to me that it was the duty of the master, under the German code, to deliver goods by Art. 504. (His Lordship read the article.) It seems to me, however, that all these objections have been devised by the skill of counsel since the suit has been instituted; that the real objection urged by the master at the time was not the want of a proper demand or inadequacy of the freight tendered, or the want of security or indemnity, but the absence of consent on the part of the charterers. I do not think that the absence of this consent was a sufficient justification under the German law for the refusal to deliver the goods to the plaintiffs. Upon all grounds, therefore, that the refusal was contrary to the plain stipulations of the contract, that after the tender of full freight, it was not justified either by the law of the flag, or by the lex fori, or by general maritime law, I pronounce for the petition of the plaintiffs with costs.

Non-delivery of cargo—War—Reasonable delay—Waiver.

A North German vessel shipped goods in the Black Sea for a port in the United Kingdom or on the Continent under an English charter-party, by which she was to call at F. or P. for orders, such orders to be given by the charterer's agents in London by return of post on receipt of the master's announcement of his arrival.

She arrived at F. on Aug. 9th. Orders were given, but not till Sept. 3rd, to proceed to Leith; but from that date until the arrest of the ship, on Sept. 21st, negotiations were going on for discharge of the cargo at F. Between those dates the winds were light and variable, and the master remained in port for fear of capture by French cruisers in the channel, war then existing between France and Germany:

Held, that the delay was reasonable, and that neither by English nor North German law was the master bound to proceed, and that the negotiations waived the orders to proceed. (a)

This was a suit instituted under the 6th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 on behalf of Messrs. A. Southgate and Son, merchants, of Ipswich, against the ship Heinrich and her owners for the damages they had sustained in consequence of the non-delivery of certain goods, of which they held the bill of lading, as indorsees of the consignees.

The Heinrich was a vessel sailing under the North German flag, and belonging to the port of Rostock, in the Grand Duchy of Mecklenburg, a state of the North German Confederation, and her owners and master were all Germans, and subjects of the said state.

On the 11th March 1870 the master of the Heinrich, then lying at Constantinople, entered into a charter-party with Messrs. Brocklemann and Hartog, German merchants in that city, of which the following are the material provisions:—

Memorandum for charter,
Constantinople, March 11, 1870.

It is this day mutually agreed between Captain Krull, of the good ship or vessel called the Heinrich 511. 1 Paus of German flag, of the burthen of 1700 quarters register measurement or thereabouts, whereof he is master, now in this port ready, and Messieurs Brocklemann and Hartog, of this city, merchants. That the said ship being tight

(a) It will be seen the term "reasonable delay" is to be interpreted according to the circumstances of each case, and does not necessarily mean only two or three days, as in the cases cited in the argument. It could scarcely be contended that a master was bound to put his ship into position where he must have been captured, unless he has bound himself to run all such risks by the terms of his agreement. His duty is to deliver the goods, and he must take the best means in his power to do so.—ED.

staunch, and strong, and every way fitted for the voyage, shall with all convenient speed sail and proceed to a safe port in the Sea of Azov, as ordered, at Berdianski, in twenty-four hours after arrival, with Messieurs Carburi and Wagstaff, or lay days to count, or so near thereunto as she may safely get and there load from the factors of the said freighter, a full and complete cargo of tallow, wheat, Indian corn, seed, or other stowage goods or grain, at the option of the freighter, not exceeding what she can reasonably stow and carry over and above her tackle, apparel, provisions, and furniture, and being so loaded, shall therewith proceed to a safe port in the United Kingdom or a safe port on the Continent between Havre and Hamburg, both inclusive, or so near thereunto as she may safely get, calling at Cork or Falmouth or Plymouth, at the master's option, for orders, which are to be given by return of post in reply to the captain's letter to the charterers' agents in London, or lay days to commence, and deliver the same, always afloat at all times on being paid freight, as there set out. It is also agreed, should the cargo consist of wheat, Indian corn, barley, oats, rye, or seed, and the whole or any portion be delivered in a heated or damaged condition, and the receivers of such cargo claim to deduct half freight upon such damaged or heated portions, it shall be at the captain's option either to allow the same, or to be paid full freight upon the quantity of cargo shipped according to bill of lading, provided no part of the cargo be thrown overboard or otherwise disposed of on the voyage (the act of God, the Queen's enemies, restraint of princes and rulers, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation, of what nature and kind soever, during the said voyage always mutually excepted). The freight to be paid in cash on unloading and right delivery of the cargo. Thirty-five running days are to be allowed the said merchant, if the ship be not sooner despatched, for loading and unloading, and if one-half or more of the cargo consist of wool, ten additional lay days to be allowed ten days on demurrage over and above the said laying days, at 5*l.* per day.

BROCKLEMANN AND HARTOG.

The Heinrich thereupon proceeded to Berdianski, which is a port in the Empire of Russia, and pursuant to the said charter party received on board a cargo of wheat from one Michele Paicos. The said master of the Heinrich signed and delivered a bill of lading in three parts for the said cargo, and such a bill for lading was in Italian, and the following is a translation thereof:—

Berdianski, 15/27th May, 1870.

In the name of God has been loaded at this port by Mr. Michele Paicos on account and risk of whom it may concern on board the Mecklenburg brig called Heinrich, Capt. J. H. Krull, to conduct and to consign the same on this his present voyage, according to the tenor of his charter party stipulated at Constantinople, and dated 11th May 1870. To order the goods as stated and numerated at foot in the same and like good condition, and as such the said captain promises on his safe arrival to deliver the freight being paid him according to the terms of his charter party with all other conditions expressed therein. In witness whereof the master will sign this with similar other as put before him, one of which being accomplished the other to stand void.

Consumed for loading cargo twenty-four lay days.

W. J. M. PAICOS.

The Heinrich sailed in due course from Berdianski with the cargo so shipped on board her, and on the 8th Aug. 1870 arrived therewith at Falmouth, and on the 9th Aug. 1870 the master of the Heinrich wrote to Messrs. Spartali and Co., of London, who were the charterer's agents in London, and to whom the bill of lading had been endorsed by Michele Paicos, a letter announcing his arrival at Falmouth, and asking for orders, but he got no orders until Sept. 3rd, when he was ordered to proceed to Leith.

At the time of the arrival of the Heinrich at Falmouth war was waging between France and Germany, and continued till after the arrest of the vessel, Sept. 21st. There were French cruisers in the British Channel, and if the Heinrich had gone out she would have run a great risk of capture.

For the plaintiffs a Mr. Coward was called at the hearing, and he said:—

I am a clerk in Fox and Co.'s office at Falmouth. They are agents for Mr. Luxton, the plaintiffs' broker. I remember the Heinrich arriving in Falmouth. On the 23rd Aug. I saw the master and asked him if he would allow the ship to be towed to Dublin. He answered that he would only allow her to be towed to Plymouth. On the 10th Sept., in consequence of a letter from Luxton, I asked the master if he would allow 2s. or 3s. per quarter deduction from his freight, and discharge at Falmouth; this he declined, and offered 6d. per quarter deduction, but we did not agree to it. On the 13th Sept. the master called, and said that he would sail for Leith unless we accepted his offer to discharge on deduction of 6d. per quarter. On the 14th Sept. he refused to go to Leith, and I communicated this to the consignees.

Cross-examined:—

He declined to leave because of the war and the French cruisers outside. The first time he said he would go to Leith was the 13th Sept. I saw him on the 3rd Sept., but I do not remember his saying that he would go then. On the 14th Sept. we were still trying to get him to allow a further deduction from his freight.

For the defendants a German advocate was called, and he proved the existence of a North German code, and said that a translation by Wendt was correct (Maritime Legislation, with a Translation of the German Mercantile Law relating to Maritime Commerce. Ernst Emil Wendt.) He gave it as his opinion that according to that code a North German vessel is justified in putting into and stopping in port, and that the master would be entitled to land the cargo if there were danger of its spoiling. He cited articles 631, 636, 637, 505: (see The Patria, ante, p. 71.) He further said that if there was a stipulation in the charter against delay in port, the contract would overrule the code, and such a contract would not be illegal according to German law. The master of the Heinrich was then called and said:

When the ship was laden we had eleven lay days left. I first heard of the war from a pilot inside the Lizard. We arrived at Falmouth on the 9th Aug., and I wrote a letter to Spartali and Co., asking for orders, but got no answer. On the 22nd Aug. I entered a protest against detention, and on the 23rd Aug. Mr. Coward asked me if I would go to Dublin. I said it would be dangerous, but did not refuse. On the 25th Aug. he asked me if I would like to go to Leith, or to discharge at Falmouth, on giving up 3s. or 2s. 6d. per quarter on freight, I told him he had no business to ask such a question, as I had put into the port for orders. I told him I was waiting for orders, but heard nothing until the 3rd Sept. On that day orders to sail to Leith and a protest were given to me, and I said I was willing to sail as soon as I could.

Sept. 4.—I offered to give up a portion of the freight and unload at Falmouth, or to proceed to Leith. I claimed demurrage.

Sept. 5.—Coward told me I had no right to demurrage. We negotiated for discharge; they asked 3s. per quarter. I offered 6d. per quarter deduction.

Sept. 8.—The wind was fresh in the forenoon; S.W. by S.S.W. in the afternoon.

Sept. 10.—I saw Coward, and he asked for a deduction of 2s. per quarter. I declined to deduct more than 6d., as it would leave me no profit. I said I should sail if he did not accept my offer. He telegraphed to his principals, and did not object to my waiting.

Sept. 12.—I was preparing the ship for sea when the crew refused to go. They were afraid of being captured.

Sept. 13.—I told the crew that the consul said they were bound to go, and I promised they should not lose their wages if taken; and they consented to go on.

Sept. 14.—Negotiations about reduction of freight still went on. I told Coward I was willing to sail for Leith on the first opportunity. I did not speak of Plymouth.

I did not go because the weather was changeable. The wind was S.W., and then flew round to N., and it was calm.

Sept. 15.—The wind was S.E. It was a bad wind for getting out. I saw French cruisers close to the harbour.

Sept. 16.—The wind was light.

Sept. 17.—Wind S., almost calm.

Sept. 19.—Wind S.E.

Sept. 21.—The vessel was arrested. With light breezes I was sure to be captured by the French, and could not have got through the Channel. I had given directions to my agent, Mr. Van Weenan, to clear the ship at the Custom House, and he would have paid the light dues after I had gone, so that the French consul should not know when I was going. The cargo was afterwards discharged to prevent it from spoiling. I could have proceeded at once if orders had come on Aug. 10, as the wind was fair.

Cross-examined.—The negotiation for discharge at Falmouth began on the 25th Aug. We differed in the treaty to the extent of 130l. I should have gone out of Falmouth the day my crew refused. They prevented me.

The cause was instituted on the 15th Sept., and the vessel was arrested on the 21st Sept.

The defendants offered to give up their claim for demurrage if the plaintiffs abandoned the claim against the ship.

The defendants' answer contained amongst others the following paragraph:—

“By the law of the said States of the said North German Confederation and of the said Grand Duchy, regard being had to the terms of the said charter party and bill of lading, the master of the Heinrich was not bound to attempt to proceed from the said port of Falmouth to Leith with the Heinrich, if by so doing he would have exposed the Heinrich to risk of capture, and the said master would, by attempting to proceed with the Heinrich to Leith at any time after he received orders so to proceed up to the time of the institution of this suit and of the said arrest, have exposed the Heinrich to risk of capture, and by reason of the premises the master of the Heinrich and the defendants had not at the time of the institution of this suit been guilty of any breach of contract or duty with or to the plaintiffs.”

Butt, Q. C. and Cohen for the plaintiffs.—The defendants relied in the pleadings on the right of the master to remain in port on account of the war. The master now says he was always willing to sail. This is a question of English law. Has the master excused himself from the performance of this contract, or has anything happened to excuse him? He says he is excused, first, on account of the weather; secondly, because negotiations were going on, and so the orders to sail were waived. But the charter party provides the only exceptions that can excuse him. These exceptions prevent the defendants from going into the German code. Express stipulations override the operation of that code. There were most positive orders to sail on the 3rd Sept. It cannot be said that the discussion as to how much the master should deduct from his freight, excuses him from obeying his orders. The orders were given after the negotiations had commenced. There was a clear refusal to sail on the 14th Sept., and this was communicated to the consignees by Coward. No sufficient proof that the weather stopped them. On the 12th Sept., the crew refused to go. This is a clear breach. The crew are servants of the owners as much as the master.

tract. The question of what law is to govern must be considered with reference to the time when the contract is completed. By the contract we were to call at Falmouth for orders. By the contract the lay days began on the 11th Aug., as there was no reply to the master's letter to the charterers' agents. The not sending this reply was a breach on the part of the plaintiffs. The master was entitled to a reply by return of post. If the master had received orders by return, he could have proceeded as the wind then was. The master considered that he had a right by law to stay in port, but that he would run the risk if he could get a fair wind. He was not bound to sail for a reasonable period, but he was willing to take the risk if there was a chance of success. We do not abandon the law, we only say that we were justified in acting as we did. The master was entitled to reasonable delay: (Pole v. Cetcovich, 9 C. B., N. S., 430; 3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 438; 30 L. J. 102, C. P.) He was prevented from sailing by the exception in the charter, "Queen's enemies." This means the enemies of the sovereign of the shipowner: (Russell v. Niemann, 34 L. J. 10, C. P.; 17 C. B., N. S., 163; 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 786.) The claim for demurrage arises strictly out of the contract, and out of the clause in the charter party which provides for orders being given by return of post. By that clause lay days are to begin unless orders are given. Demurrage commences when the lay days are finished. A claim for demurrage is in the nature of a claim for liquidated damages.

Butt, Q. C. in reply.—A necessary condition precedent to a claim for demurrage is readiness and willingness to sail for the port as ordered. If the defendants claim demurrage they put aside their defence of the outbreak of war. If they stopped in port in consequence of the war they cannot say they were willing to proceed. If the clause about orders in the charter party is a condition precedent they would have a right to sell the cargo in order to free the ship. The delay was unreasonable. They were fully entitled to stay in port a few days.

June 6.—SIR R. PHILLIMORE.—This is a suit brought by Messrs. A. Southgate and Son, the assignees of the bill of lading of a cargo lately laden on board the vessel Heinrich, against the said vessel, under the 6th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861. The Heinrich is a vessel sailing under the flag of the Grand Duchy of Mecklenburg, one of the states of the North German Confederation. On the 11th March 1870, the Heinrich, being then lying at Constantinople, a charter-party was entered into between her master and Messrs. Brockleman and Hartog, of Constantinople. The ship was to take on board a cargo at Berdianski, in the sea of Azov, and to proceed to a safe port in the United Kingdom, or a safe port on the continent between Havre and Hamburg (both inclusive), or so near thereunto as she may safely get, calling at Cork or Falmouth or Plymouth, at the master's option, for orders (which are to be given by return of post in reply to the captain's letter to the charterers' agents in London, or lay days to commence), and deliver the same always afloat at all times on being paid freight as therein mentioned, the act of God, the Queen's enemies, restraint of princes and rulers, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation of what nature and kind soever during the said voyage always mutually excepted. The freight to be paid in cash on unloading and right delivery of the cargo. Thirty-five running days are to be allowed the said merchant (if the ship be not sooner despatched) for loading and unloading; and if one-half or more of the cargo consist of wool ten additional lay days to be allowed, ten days on demurrage over and above the said laying days, at 5*l.* per day. The ship proceeded to Berdianski, and took on board the cargo of wheat mentioned in the petition from a Greek merchant Michele Paicos. A bill of lading was signed by the master at Berdianski in three parts, in the Italian language, of which the following translation is in all material parts accurate: (His Lordship here read the bill of lading before set out.) The ship arrived at Falmouth on the 8th Aug., and on the 9th the master wrote to Spartali and Co., from whom Paicos had told him to get his orders, and who were the charterers' agents in London, and also indorsees of the bill of lading, as follows: "Falmouth, 9th Aug. 1870. Messrs. Spartali and Co., London. Gentlemen,—I herewith beg to advise you of my safe arrival here with the North German brig Heinrich, under my command, with a cargo of wheat from Berdianski, awaiting your orders as soon as convenient.—I remain, Gentlemen, yours &c., J. H. Krull." No answer was received by the master to his letter. On the 23rd or 25th Aug. some conversation passed between him and Mr. Coward. Coward was a clerk in the office of Fox and Co., who acted as agent for Luxton, the broker of the plaintiffs, Messrs. A. Southgate and Son. According to Coward, the master was asked whether he would allow his ship to be towed to Dublin, when he said he would allow her to be towed to Plymouth, if the consignees paid the towage. According to the master, nothing was said about towing by steam; he was asked to sail to Dublin, and said it would be dangerous to do so. Nothing was said about being towed to Plymouth, to which place he never refused to go, but would, on the contrary, have been happy to have gone. It does not appear from the evidence that any definite order for a port of destination was given at this interview. On the 27th or 28th Coward asked him if he would like to go to Leith; he said, "You have no business to ask such a question; I put into this port for orders." He was then asked if he would make a reduction on his freight instead of going to Leith, and he offered to take a pro rata freight, and it was settled that Coward should write to his principal on the subject. Upon the 3rd Sept., for the first time, the master received something approaching to a distinct order to go to Leith. He ought to have received, according to the charter-party, an answer by return of post to his letter of the 9th Aug., and demurrage would begin from that date. On the 15th Sept. the suit was instituted in this court, and on the 21st the ship was arrested. The true question is whether the not sailing between the 3rd and 21st of Sept. constituted a breach of contract. On the 3rd Sept. the master said—as he said continually on the other days of this interval—that he would sail for Leith on the first favourable opportunity, meaning he said, favourable in two senses—namely, first, having a fair wind for leaving the port; and, secondly, such a wind as would enable him to run if he saw French cruisers. That there were French cruisers in the neighbourhood and there was a real risk of capture are conclusions which must be drawn from the evidence. Mr. Van Weenan says that he received orders from the master to clear the vessel for Leith on the 5th or 6th Sept., and that he did not clear the vessel because he feared that the French consul would learn her destination, and obtained permission from the Custom House to pay the light dues after the vessel had gone out. On the 12th Sept. the crew refused, when ordered, to weigh anchor, alleging an apprehension, which I believe was sincere, of being captured and imprisoned by the French. At the same time negotiations were continually going on, having for their object the delivery of the cargo at Falmouth for a reduced freight. Looking at all the circumstances of the case, I am of opinion that, whether the English or whether the German law be applied to the construction of the contract of affreightment—which in this case is to be derived from the charter-party and the bill of lading, the delay of the master was justified by the existence of the excepted peril of the enemies of his sovereign: (Russell v. Niemann. 34 L. J. 10, C. P.; 17 C. R., N. S., 163; 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 786.) I also think that the continuing treaty on the subject of the reduction of freight modified the character of the order which he received to sail for Leith, and which I cannot help surmising was given for the purpose of inducing the master to acquiesce in the larger reduction of freight proposed on behalf of the plaintiffs; and I doubt, to say the least, whether any positive refusal of a distinct and clean order is established in this case. But I think the first ground sufficient to support the defence which is set up in the answer, and I dismiss the petition with costs.

THE WILHELM SCHMIDT.

Damage to cargo—Outbreak of war—Reasonable delay—Law governing contract—Right of assignee to sue—Bills of Lading Act—Admiralty Court Act.

The master of a North German ship, lying at Constantinople, entered into a charter party with North German subjects, there resident, to carry a cargo to a port in the United Kingdom or on the continent, to be delivered to English consignees. The charter party and the bill of lading given under it were in the English language, and it was stipulated that the ship should call at one of three ports of the United Kingdom for orders. The ship duly called at F., and was ordered to proceed to an English port to discharge.

Held that, as the intention of the parties as to what law should govern, was to be gathered from the circumstances of the case, and as the giving of the orders fixed the seat of the contract in England, the law of England applied. (a)

(a) It will be seen from this case and the Patria (ante p. 71) and the Heinrich (ante p. 79) that the intention of the parties, as evidenced by the circumstances of each case, shows what law is to govern a contract made by War then existed between France and Germany. The master sailed from F., as ordered, but, through a reasonable fear of capture, put into D. The ship remained at D. for two months, waiting for a steam tug, which was considered necessary by the charterers' agents to avoid capture, the master expressing himself ready to sail with the first fair wind. The ship was then sent forward by steam power, at the charterers' agents' expense. The cargo was damaged and the plaintiffs lost profits by the delay.

Held, that the master was justified in putting into and remaining in port, and that the shipowners were not liable for the damage caused by the delay.

Whilst the ship was yet to arrive, the charterers' agents (the consignees of cargo) appropriated the cargo and endorsed the bill of lading, through other persons, to the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs sustained no loss by deterioration, for, under the contract of sale, they paid for the cargo after deductions settled by arbitration, for the damage done to it.

Held, that the plaintiffs were entitled to sue under the Bills of Lading Act and Admiralty Court Act 1861, and perhaps even as trustees for the consignees.

This was a cause instituted under the 6th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, on behalf of Messrs. Barber, Roper, and Co., of Lowestoft, in the county of Suffolk, merchants, the owners of a cargo loaded on board the vessel Wilhelm Schmidt, and against her owners intervening, to recover damages consequent on the non-delivery of the said cargo within reasonable time, the deterioration caused to the cargo by delay, and the having to procure other cargoes to supply its place. The Wilhelm Schmidt at the time of the institution of the suit was a German vessel belonging to the port of Rostock, in the Grand Duchy of Mecklenburg Schwerin, and was sailing under the flag of the North German Confederation, and her owners were subjects of the said confederation. In the month of March 1870, the ship was lying at Constantinople, and on 21st March, a charter party was there entered into between her master and Messrs. Schjött and Reppen, merchants, resident at Constantinople, but subjects of the North German Confederation. By such charter party, which was in the English language, the Wilhelm Schmidt was to proceed to a safe port in the sea of Azov, as ordered at Beridianski, and there load a full and complete cargo of goods at the option of the freighter, and proceed therewith to a safe port in the United Kingdom or the continent, calling at Cork, Falmouth, or Plymouth for orders, which were to be given by return of post in reply to the master's letter to the charterers' agents in London, and deliver the said cargo on being paid freight at rates therein mentioned, "the act of God, the them. It is impossible to fix a hard and fast rule, as was attempted in Lloyd v. Guibert (inf.). Such a rule would lead to the most complicated questions. We need only instance the case of goods shipped at the same time at a foreign port on two vessels of different flags by the same shippers, and consigned to the same consignees in England, under identical bills of lading. If the laws of the flags governed these contracts, the goods would be carried by the two ships on different terms, according to the different laws, although the intention of the shippers was to make the terms in each case identical. It is easy to gather the intention of the parties in each case, and such intention is a pure question of fact, and not of law; and it is to be regretted that it has not been so treated in this country.—Ed.

Queen's enemies, restraint of princes and rulers, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation of what nature and kind soever, during the said voyage, always mutually excepted." In pursuance of the said charter party, and in accordance with the charterers' orders, the ship proceeded to Yeisk, and the said Messrs. Schjött and Reppen caused to be shipped on board, by one D. A. Negroponte, a cargo of linseed, and the master of the Wilhelm Schmidt signed and delivered a bill of lading in the English language, in the following terms.

Shipped in good order and condition by D. A. Negroponte in and upon the good ship called the Wilhelm Schmidt, Captain Fr. Zeplien, now riding at anchor in Yeisk, and bound for Cork, Falmouth, or Plymouth, for orders as per charter party, linseed in bulk, say two thousand five hundred and fifty-two tsoetverts at 10*l.* each.

Mats for dunnage—1000 being marked and numbered as in the margin, and are to be delivered in the like good order and condition at a safe port of the United Kingdom or on the continent (the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation of whatever kind soever excepted) unto Messrs. Melas, Brothers, of London, or to their assigns, paying freight for the said goods, and all other conditions as per charter party, dated Constantinople, March 21, 1870, with primage and average accustomed. In witness whereof the master or purser of the said ship hath affirmed to three bills of lading, all of this tenor and date, one of which bills being accomplished, the other two to stand void.

FRED. ZEPLIEN,
P. D. A. NEGROPONTE,
S. PALAPRU.

Dated in Yeisk 2/14, May, 1870.

Laying days consumed in loading cargo, twenty.

On 14th May 1870 the ship sailed from Yeisk with the said cargo on board, and arrived at Falmouth on 7th Sept. 1870, and the master at once wrote to Messrs. Melas, Bros., the consignees and charterers' agents. On the 10th Sept. 1870 the master received orders from Messrs. Melas, Bros., to proceed to Ipswich, and there deliver to the plaintiffs. Messrs. Melas, Bros., whilst the cargo was yet to arrive and whilst the ship was on her voyage, sold the cargo to Messrs. Edwards, Eastty, and Co., who were the plaintiffs' brokers in London, for and on behalf of the plaintiffs. The captain had no knowledge of such sale, and received his orders from Melas, Bros., and their agents at Falmouth. At the time of the arrival of the ship at Falmouth war had broken out between France and Germany, and it continued to exist until after the delivery of the cargo to the plaintiffs. When the ship arrived at Falmouth her bottom was very foul: and her master, thinking it necessary in order to diminish the risk of capture, proceeded to have it cleaned. This and light and unfavourable winds kept the ship at Falmouth until 12th Oct. 1870. The winds were easterly and very light until that date; and the master said that he had not a fair chance of slipping through the French cruisers, of which there were many about the Channel, without a strong wind from the westward. On 26th Sept. the agents of Melas, Bros., at Falmouth, asked the captain to accept orders to go to Lowestoft instead of Ipswich, and he consented. On 12th Oct. there was a strong S.W. gale, and the captain would have started, but he could not get a pilot: but on 13th Oct. he sailed, being towed out by two tugs. The wind lasted favourable until that evening, when it changed and fell to nearly a calm, and when off Dartmouth the master saw two men-of-war, which he feared were French cruisers, and he stood in for Dartmouth, into which port he put the next day. It was proved that these were French cruisers in the Channel trying to capture German ships. Whilst at Dartmouth the master was in constant communication with Mr. Kingston, the agent of Melas Brothers there, who was also German consul. He warned the master of the French cruisers being on the route the master would have to take. On Oct. 22nd the agent of Melas Brothers asked the master to pay a sum of money towards the expenses of a tug to tow the ship to Lowestoft, and the master on obtaining his owner's consent, offered to pay 20*l.*, but this was considered too small a sum by Melas Brothers. A tug was not procured owing to a tug company, through fear of capture, refusing to carry out a contract they had made to tow the ship. The master did all he could to obtain a tug. On the 1st Nov. the captain promised to sail with the first fair wind, and repeated his promise on Nov. 17th, when he said he would go whenever he had a good chance to get through the cruisers, but that he had a difference with his crew; and at the end of Nov. the master declared he would go under canvas, and thereupon Messrs. Melas Brothers on Dec. 2nd intimated that they would provide a tug at their own expense.

The ship was towed out of Dartmouth on the 10th Dec., and arrived at Lowestoft 14th Dec. The master acknowledged that he would not have put into and delayed at Dartmouth, and would have sailed for Lowestoft direct, if it had not been for fear of capture. The discharge of cargo did not commence until 22nd Dec., and when the cargo was examined it was found to be damaged by heating caused by the long detention in the ship's hold. The plaintiffs paid Messrs. Melas Brothers the full price of the cargo less certain deductions for deterioration which were settled by arbitration in accordance with the contract of sale. The cargo had been examined at Dartmouth, and found to be slightly heated, and the master did all he could to prevent further mischief.

The defendant's answer contained, amongst others, the following paragraphs:

16. By the law of Rostock and the North German Confederation the master of the Wilhelm Schmidt was entitled to keep the said vessel in the port of Falmouth and in Dartmouth whilst she would have been liable to risk of capture at sea by reason of the existence of the said war, and by such law the master of the Wilhelm Schmidt whilst the said war and liability to risk of capture continued was not under any obligation to the plaintiffs to proceed or to attempt to proceed to Ipswich or Lowestoft with the Wilhelm Schmidt, and by the said law the master of the said vessel had not been guilty of any breach of contract or of duty with or to the plaintiffs by remaining in Falmouth or putting into and remaining in Dartmouth with the said goods on board the said ship under the circumstances.

18. If the said cargo was not delivered in like order and condition as when it was shipped on board the Wilhelm Schmidt, the damage and deterioration thereto was caused by the restraints of princes and rulers within the true intent and meaning of the said charter party and bill of lading, and by its having been shipped green and in an unfit condition for shipment, and by the natural condition and inherent vices of the said cargo, or by some or one of such causes.

19. The damaged and deteriorated condition (if any) of the said cargo was occasioned by the natural condition and the inherent vices of the said cargo, and by the prolongation of the voyage owing to the said war, and liability to risk of capture, and by the law of the said

Confederation the owners of the Wilhelm Schmidt are not liable to the Plaintiffs in respect thereof.

Mr. Travers, Vicc-Consul of the North German Confederation, and a German advocate, was called who proved the existence of a code of the North German Confederation, and proved a translation by Wendt (Papers on Maritime Legislation, with a translation of the German Mercantile Law relating to Maritime Commerce) to be a correct translation. He gave it as his opinion that under that code a master is not responsible for any damage resulting from delay under the circumstances of this case. He referred to Art. 636 taken with Art. 631, Art. 637, 505, of the code. These articles of the North German code and all the others cited in the argument and judgment will be found set out in the Patria, ante p. 71, except the following articles.

Art. 607. The shipowner is answerable for any damage arising through loss of or injury to the goods, from the time of their being shipped until their delivery, unless he can prove that such loss or injury has been caused by the act of God (vis major) or by the natural condition of the goods, more particularly by vice propre, by diminution in quantity, by ordinary leakage, &c., or by such defective packing as could not be noticed externally. Loss and injury arising from a defective condition of the vessel, which, in spite of all possible caution, could not be discovered, are to be considered as loss and injury by the act of God.

Art. 649. The act of handing over any bill of lading issued to order to the party thereby becoming authorised to receive the goods, has, as soon as such goods are really shipped, the same legal consequence with respect to the acquisition of the rights depending on the delivery of the goods, as the delivery of the goods themselves.

Art. 659. Should the bill of lading contain the clauses, "free from breakage," or "free from leakage," or "free from damage," or any other addition to the same effect, the shipowner is not answerable for the breakage or leakage or damage, unless it can be proved to have been caused by the default of the master or another person by whom the shipowner is responsible.

Benjamin (Cohen with him) for the plaintiffs.—The cargo was delivered in a damaged state, caused by heating arising from the delay. The vessel arrived at Falmouth on 7th Sept., and did not discharge her cargo for four months. It is admitted that the master did not proceed for fear of capture. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The question is, whether the existence of the war is a justification of the delay.] It is no justification, whether the case is to be governed by German or English law. By all laws written agreements bind as long as they are not illegal. The bill of lading is here the agreement between the parties. The vessel is not described in the bill of lading as a German ship. Article 645 of the North German Code provides a form of bill of lading, and this is not in accordance with that form. It does not mention the nationality of the ship, and therefore it is not a German bill of lading. By Arts. 647—649 of the code the plaintiffs had a right to delivery of the cargo. By Art. 653 the bill of lading is decisive as between the shipowner and the consignee, and the latter is not affected by the charter unless it is referred to; but the only provisions in the bill of lading are "the act of God, the Queen's enemies," &c., the usual exceptions of an English bill of lading. The contract must depend upon its written terms, and here they are precise: (Kay v. Wheeler, L. Rep. 2 C. P. 302; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 66.) Even supposing it is a German contract, the shipowner would, by German law, be exempt only under Art. 607 from loss caused by the risks therein contained. Further exemptions must be set out in the bill of lading. There is no article in the code exempting the shipowner from liability to damage occasioned by delay. The word "accident," in Art. 505 of the code, cannot mean risk of capture. By Arts. 631—636 either party may withdraw from the contract when a war has been declared, in consequence of which the vessel would be liable to risk of capture, but they are not compelled to withdraw. The master did not withdraw, he only delayed. The defendants ask us to put in the stipulation "free from damage." (Art. 659.) The bill of lading contains an exception, "Queen's enemies," but this cannot mean the enemies of Prussia. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE—Russell v. Niemann, 34 L. J. 10, C. P.; 17 C. B., N. S., 163; 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 786.] If the contract is to be governed by English law, there was no act of enemies. The special exceptions in the bill of lading point to acts done in war, not the mere outbreak of war. Articles 631, 636, of the code, give the parties power to withdraw, and are therefore inapplicable here where both parties refused. Whilst at Falmouth, the master could either stick to his contract or withdraw under these articles. He elected to sail with the first fair wind, and must be held bound by this election. He committed a breach by putting into Dartmouth for fear of capture. His position was the same as if the charter party had been entered into after war had begun to his knowledge; he then would have been bound to proceed unless prevented by the excepted perils. None of these things happened. He could not be said to be prevented from proceeding by the presence of the French cruisers; he had no right to delay a perishable cargo on account of fear. He held out to us that the wind delayed him, and gave us no chance to withdraw. The right to delay on account of risk of capture depends upon whether the case is to be governed by English or German law. The obligation as to delivery is governed by English law. It is immaterial that the contract was made at Constantinople; the law of the place of delivery governs, and that is in England. The destination was fixed by the orders for England, and it is as though the bill of lading ran to deliver in Lowestoft. The seat of the contract is England, and it was the intention of the parties to bind themselves by the English law: Lloyd v. Guibert (L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 115; 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 570; in Ex. Ch. 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 602.) The master has power to make his owners liable for contracts entered into by him to the extent allowed by the law of the country of the owners. When the contract was made there was no war; it was an ordinary English bill of lading, containing English exceptions given in pursuance of an English charter. The bill of lading was in English, and the form was English, because the contract was to be carried out in England. The language selected shows which law is to bind. The intention is to be sought in the acts of the parties, and governs the contract unless the law interposes.

⁴ Phillimore's International law, pp. 478, 480.

Clarkson (Butt, Q.C. with him), for the defendants.—The plaintiffs have no right to sue. This is an English court, and right of suit depends on English law. The plaintiffs were not parties to the contract. They acquire their rights under the Bill of Lading Act. They have suffered no damage as they had allowances for deterioration.

ADM.

THE WILHELM SCHMIDT.

They cannot sue as trustees for the consignees. They could only sue if the cestui que trust had no right of action, but here the consignees, Melas Brothers, have a right to sue, and can sue even if the plaintiffs succeed. The main question must be governed by German law. The master had no authority from his owners to impose upon them liability, except that contemplated by their own law. The rights and liabilities of the parties must not be taken to be in abeyance until orders were given at Falmouth. This would be contrary to the passage in Phillimore's International Law. If it were so, the owner of the goods might wait and see which was the best port as to rights arising from the relations of nations. The contract is complete, with one term to be supplied, but the rights are determined when it is made, and the law of the flag governs the case: (The Bahia, Bro. & Lush., 292.) Even if English law governs, parties may be exempted by law where there is no stipulation in the written agreement, as in the case of loss by fire: (Merchant Shipping Act 1854, s. 503.) It is a principle of both German and English law, that the court must look to the written contract, but the parties are not deprived of the protection of the code unless there is an express stipulation. The master did not elect to go on; he said he would go as soon as he could without risk. The plaintiffs might have withdrawn. They deprived themselves of the right to recover for not going to Ipswich by giving the second order: (Pole v. Cetcovich, 9 C. B., N. S., 430; 5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 438.) The master accepted that order for the plaintiffs' convenience. The plaintiffs wished the vessel to be towed in order to diminish risk. By the German law the master was justified in his delay: (Art. 636.) The damage was caused by the delay, and the shipowner is not answerable for the natural condition of the goods consequent thereon: (Art. 607.) If English law governs, the contract says nothing as to time of delivery, and its completion was prevented by Queen's enemies. This means enemies of sovereign of shipowner: (Russell v. Niemann 34 L. J. 10, C. P.; 17 C. B., N. S., 163; 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 786.) The words are not, "act of Queen's enemies," and do not mean particular acts, but risk of capture. There is a further exception, "restraint of princes." The contract of the shipowner was to proceed under sail, not under steam, and he was prevented. Their own agent warned the master not to go save under steam.

Benjamin in reply.—The plaintiffs have a right to sue under the Bills of Lading Act: (Smurthwaite v. Wilkins, 31 L. J., 214, C. P.; 11 C. B., N. S., 842; 5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 842.) Even as trustees they have a right to sue: (Robertson v. Wait, 22 L. J. 210 Ex.; 8 Ex. 299.) This objection was not raised on the pleadings. This is a suit for damages for breach of contract and duty and loss of profit, and not merely for non-delivery. If it is held that the existence of enemies excuses the defendants from performance, it must be held that no overt acts are necessary but the mere existence of war. In this case the defendants would have been excused if there had been no cruisers in the Channel.

June 6.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE (after stating the facts).—It has been contended that, having regard to these facts, the present plaintiffs, who have sustained, as is alleged, no damage, and who are suing under the Bills of Lading Act and the Admiralty Court Act, and who cannot sue as trustees, have no personæ standi in this court. To this objection there are several answers: First, that it is not properly taken, but ought to have been pleaded; secondly, that it is by no means clear—looking to the case decided by Baron Parke (Robertson and another v. Wait sup.), an authority to which I was referred in the Nuova Raffaelina (1 Aspinall's Mar. Law Cas. 16: 24 L. T. Rep. N. S.), lately decided by me—that the plaintiffs cannot sue as trustees; thirdly, under the Bills of Lading Act, the assignee of the bill passes not only his property, but also his liabilities and rights (Smurthwaite and another v. Wilkins sup.); fourthly, this suit is brought not only for damages, but for breach of contract and duty, and for the consequent loss of profit which thereby accrued to the plaintiffs. It is a question for the registrar, assisted by merchants, if any reference be ordered to ascertain what the amount of that loss is. I am of opinion that the preliminary and technical objection cannot be sustained. Now, as to the merits of the case, there are some important points which the admissions of counsel on both sides have placed out of the reach of controversy. The damage done to the cargo is not ascribed to want of care or negligence of the master, but to delay in sailing to the particular port for which orders were given. That delay was caused by the fear which the master entertained of being captured by the enemy of his sovereign, and not by any physical obstacle or by any moral or legal impossibility. Neither party to the contract wished to withdraw from, but both elected to adhere to it. The plaintiffs contended that the defendant is liable to damages, because the contract contained in the bill of lading is plain, and capture was not an excepted peril; and also because the contract, if any difficulty arise, must be construed according to the English law, which alone is applicable to it, and by which the risk or fear of capture did not, in the circumstances, release the master from his liability to carry the cargo to its destination. Nor, it is contended, if the German law be applicable, is the master, who adhered to his contract after being apprised of the war, released from his liability. And lastly, the hesitating and uncertain conduct of the master in playing fast and loose with the owners of the goods prevented them from exercising the option given them by the German law of withdrawing from the contract. These are the principal arguments which have been addressed to me on behalf of the plaintiffs. The contract of affreightment is in the charter party and in the bill of lading which refers to it. Both these contain as excepted perils the Queen's enemies, and the charter party further, "restraint of princes." The question by what law any terms in this contract which are not of themselves clear, are to be explained, depends for its solution upon the answer to another question, viz., what law did the parties intend to govern the contract which they executed? and upon this point I am disposed to agree with the able argument of Mr. Benjamin, that the intention of the parties can be collected from the contract itself. The contract, he justly observed, is in the English language, which is not the language of the place in which it is made, but of one of the parties to it; the obligation of the contract is relative to the delivery of the goods, and an English form of contract has been chosen by the parties for the expression of their intention, because that obligation of delivery is to be executed in England. The consignee of the goods is English. The vessel is to proceed with her cargo to one of three British ports, where she is to receive the order which is to fix her destination to some safe port in the United Kingdom or the Continent; and when those orders are received and the destination is fixed, it does not seem to me irrational or unfair that the determination should be considered as if expressed in the original contract, and when the place of performance was fixed to be in England, the seat of the contract, to use the expression of foreign jurists, would be in that country, and the law of the country would be the law of the contract. To the objection, that upon this principle the law of the contract would be in abeyance until the order fixing the destination was given, it may, I think, be fairly answered, not only that the maxim "Certum est quod certum reddi potest" applies, but that the primâ facie law and the ultimate law, so to speak, agree, the law of the place of call for orders, and the law of the place of performance fixed by the orders being both English; and I am of opinion that if any law is to be invoked for the purpose of construing the terms of the contract, both the intention to be collected from the circumstances of the contract, and the fact as to the place of performance lead to the conclusion that that law must be the law of England. The question remains whether the expected perils of the king's enemies (Russell v. Niemann, sup.) and the restraint of princes do or do not, according to the law of England relieve the master from the liability to damages which by the delay in the delivery of these goods he would otherwise have incurred. The vessel having arrived at Falmouth on the 9th Sept., on the 10th the master received orders from Melas Brothers to proceed to Ipswich. He had then received intelligence that French cruisers were in the neighbourhood. The bottom of the ship was foul, and the sails were damaged; some time was occupied in cleansing and repairing them; the winds were unfavourable. On the 26th Eastly and Co. telegraphed to Melas, "if in time, we should feel much obliged by your ordering the Wilhelm Schmidt to Lowestoft in lieu of Ipswich, as originally requested." Fox and Co. asked the master "if he would accept Lowestoft instead of Ipswich." He answered, "Yes, if I can please you." The acceptance of this alteration seems to have been asked in some degree as a favour of the master. The plaintiffs had bought another cargo to go to their mills at Ipswich, and had then cancelled the orders for Ipswich, and substituted the order for Lowestoft. The master deposes that there was no favourable wind before the 12th Oct.; that on that day he hoisted his jack for a pilot, but it blew too hard. On the 13th the pilot came on board, and the vessel was towed out of Falmouth harbour by two steamers. The wind afterwards wore round from the S.W. to the N.E., and died away. The master, seeing what he believed to be two French cruisers to the east of him, put into Dartmouth on the 14th Oct., and there he remained till the 10th Dec. This interval of time was occupied by negotiations with reference to obtaining the agency of steam power to take the ship to Lowestoft. The evidence on this matter is principally, if not entirely, furnished by the master, Mr. Kingston, the agent at Dartmouth for the plaintiffs, and the correspondence. From the evidence I think the following propositions are to be deduced:—First, that the master was sincerely apprehensive of being captured by French cruisers—the enemies of his sovereign; that this danger apprehended was not remote or chimerical, but present and real; that Mr. Kingston, who was German Consul as well as agent for the plaintiffs, while in his latter capacity, he was continually urging the master to sail, was as continually, in his former capacity, admonishing him that if he did sail his ship would be taken. "You are in a very bad position," he said; "I would not be in your place; as German Consul I must tell you that you will lose your ship. I must advise you to stay here." Secondly, that it was indirectly, if not directly, admitted in terms, but certainly by the conduct of the plaintiffs, that steam power was, in the circumstances, necessary to bring the ship to Lowestoft, because by this agency she could be towed within the territorial limits of England, and thereby escape the imminent peril of capture. Thirdly, that during this interval negotiations were taking place between the plaintiffs and defendants, having for their object an arrangement as to the proportions of expense to be borne by the master and the plaintiffs consequent on the employment of a steam tug. Fourthly, that the master was honestly desirous of being towed to Lowestoft for the purpose of delivering the cargo at that port, and did all that he thought he could do consistently with his duty to his employers to forward the arrangement for obtaining a steam tug. It should be observed that it appears that one of the causes of failure of the negotiations was the alarm which one of the steam tugs negotiated with entertained of being captured. Fifthly, that on the 10th Dec. the steam tug and the ship immediately sailed for Lowestoft. Applying the principles of the English law to these propositions of fact, to the whole history of the case, and especially to the terms of the contract of affreightment, I do not think that the Wilhelm Schmidt is liable for the damages occasioned by the delay in the delivering of the cargo. If the principles of the German Code be applicable to this contract, they are still more favourable to the plaintiff. I dismiss the petition in this case with costs.

THE GAUNTLET.

Naval service—Towing prize of war—Property in prize—Foreign Enlistment Act 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 90), s. 8.

The property in a prize of war may pass to the captors without such prize being taken into a port belonging to the country of the captors, or being condemned by a prize court.

A prize of war (a merchantman), with a prize crew on board, is not a ship of war.

A tug towing such a vessel from neutral waters to the waters of her captors, in the ordinary course of her employment, does not complete the capture, and is not employed in the naval service of a belligerent within the meaning of the Foreign Enlistment Act 1870, s. 8, subs. 4.

THIS was a cause instituted by her Majesty's Procurator-General against the steamtug Gauntlet to obtain the forfeiture of the Gauntlet to her Majesty for alleged breaches of the Foreign Enlistment Act 1870, s. 8, subs. 4 (a.)

The following is the petition in the said cause:—

1. On the 24th Nov. 1870, the ship Lord Brougham, of the port of Hamburgh, having been then lately captured and taken on the high seas, by a French vessel of war, as a prize of war, arrived and anchored in the Downs, to wit, within three marine miles of the shore of England, being in the possession of the Government of France, and in charge of a French prize crew.

2. On the same 24th Nov. 1870, Henry Beer Mumford, one of the owners of the said steam vessel Gauntlet, did, without the licence of her Majesty in that behalf—to wit, at Deal, in the county of Kent, make and enter into a certain agreement with Le Saurel, then being French Consul at Folkestone, in the county of Kent, and in the service of the French Government, that in consideration of a sum of money to be paid, to wit, by the French Consul-General in London, on behalf of the French Government, to wit, to the said Henry Beer Mumford and the other owners of the said steam vessel, he would despatch the said vessel Gauntlet in order or with intent that the said steam vessel should, or with knowledge or having reasonable cause to believe that she would be employed in the naval service of France, in towing the said ship Lord Brougham from the place where she then was, in charge of a French prize crew, as such prize of war as aforesaid—to wit, from within three marine miles of the shore of England to the port of Dunkirk, in France.

3. On the 26th Nov. and following days the said Henry Beer Mumford did accordingly in pursuance of the said agreement, and without the licence of her Majesty, despatch or cause or allow to be despatched the said steam vessel Gauntlet, in order or with intent that the said steam vessel should or with knowledge or having reasonable cause to believe that she would be employed in the naval service of France as aforesaid in towing the said ship Lord Brougham, then being in charge of a French prize crew as such prize of war as aforesaid, to wit, from within three marine miles of the shore of England to the said port of Dunkirk in France.

4. The said steam vessel Gauntlet then being in charge of the servants of the said Henry Beer Mumford and the said other owners was thereupon accordingly without the licence of her Majesty employed in the naval service aforesaid of France in towing, and did tow the said ship Lord Brougham, then being in charge of a French prize crew as aforesaid as such prize of war as aforesaid, to wit, from within three marine miles of the shore of England to the said port of Dunkirk.

5. During all the times aforesaid, France was a State at war with Prussia, and Prussia was a State at peace with her Majesty, as the said Henry Beer Mumford and the other owners of the said steam vessel Gauntlet during all the times aforesaid well knew.

6. By reason of the premises, the said Henry Beer Mumford did within her Majesty's dominions, and without the licence of her Majesty, within the meaning of the

(a) Sect. 8. If any person within her Majesty's dominions, without the licence of her Majesty, does any of the following acts: (1), builds, &c.; (2), issues, &c.; (3), equips, &c.; (4), despatches, or causes or allows to be despatched, with intent or knowledge, or having reasonable cause to believe that the same shall or will be employed in the military or naval service of any foreign State at war with any friendly State; such person shall be deemed to have committed an offence against the Act, and the following consequences shall ensue:—(1), the offender shall be, &c.; (2), the ship in respect of which any such offence is committed and her equipment shall be forfeited to her Majesty, &c.

Sect. 30. In this Act, if not inconsistent with the context, the following terms have the meanings hereinafter respectively assigned to them; that is to say . . . "naval service" shall, as respects a person, include service as a marine, employment as a pilot in piloting or directing the course of a ship of war, or other ship, when such ship of war or other ship is being used in any military or naval operation, and any employment whatever on board a ship of war, transport or store ship, privateer, or ship under letters of marque; and, as respects a ship, include any user of a ship as a transport, store ship, privateer, or ship under letters of marque.

Foreign Enlistment Act 1870, despatch and cause and allow to be despatched the said steamship or vessel Gauntlet in order or with intent that she should or with knowledge or having reasonable cause to believe that she would be employed in the naval service of a foreign State, to wit, France, then at war with a State, to wit, Prussia, then at peace with her Majesty, and the said steamship or vessel and her equipment thereby became and were and are forfeited to her Majesty, in pursuance and under the provisions of the said Act.

The defendant's answer set out that it was a common and usual practice for the masters of steamtugs to apply to the consuls of foreign states for employment in the towage of vessels and to arrange with or in the presence of such consuls the sums to be paid for such service, and, as a rule, the masters of foreign vessels will enter into no agreements in relation to their ships unless in the presence of or with the approbation of the consuls of their respective states where such consuls are accessible, and this statement appeared to be the fact. The answer further contained the following articles:

6. The said Henry Beer Mumford and the said James William West had heard a rumour to the effect that the Lord Brougham was a North German vessel which had then lately been captured on the high seas by a French vessel of war as a prize of war. The said contract was notwithstanding entered into, and the said towage service rendered for the ordinary remuneration of the said tug, and not otherwise.

7. That the said Henry Beer Mumford did not on the 24th Nov. 1870, or on any other day, enter into an agreement with Le Saurel, the French consul at Folkestone, in the county of Kent, as stated in the said petition, or at all for the despatch of the said steam vessel Gauntlet in order or with intent that she should or with knowledge or having reasonable cause to believe that she would be employed in the naval service of France in towing a prize of war as in the said petition alleged, and that the said Henry Beer Mumford did not on the 26th Nov. and following days, or any other days, in pursuance of the said agreement, or of any other agreement, or at all despatch or cause or allow to be despatched, the said steam vessel Gauntlet, in order or with intent that she should, or with knowledge or having reasonable cause to believe that she would be employed in the naval service of France in towing such prize of war as in the said petition alleged, and that the said steam vessel was not accordingly or at all employed in the naval service of France in towing the said ship, as in the said petition alleged.

The parties agreed upon certain admissions, which are as follows:

1. That on or about the 20th Nov. 1870, the ship Lord Brougham in the petition filed in this cause referred to, was duly captured in the English Channel, as prize of war, by a ship of war in the service of the Government of France.

2. That at the time of such capture the said ship Lord Brougham was the property of subjects of the King of Prussia, and was sailing under the Prussian flag, on a voyage from South America to Hamburgh with a cargo of merchandise.

3. That upon such capture the greater number of her crew were taken out of the said ship Lord Brougham, as prisoners of war, and a prize crew from the said French ship of war, under the command of an officer in the French naval service was put on board of the said ship Lord Brougham.

4. That after the said capture the Lord Brougham was driven, by stress of weather, to the Downs, where she arrived on the 24th Nov. 1870 (and by order of an Admiral in the French naval service commanding the French ship of war, La Provence, then lying in the Downs), anchored near to the said ship La Provence, and within three marine miles of the shore of England.

5. That the French ship of war, La Provence, left the Downs on the 25th Nov. 1870, leaving the said Lord Brougham still at anchor there.

6. That on the 27th Nov. the said steamtug Gauntlet made fast to the said ship Lord Brougham, at the place where she was lying at anchor in the Downs as aforesaid, and towed her to Dunkirk Roads and there left her.

7. That the said ship Lord Brougham was so towed as aforesaid under and in pursuance of a certain agreement for that purpose, and which agreement is in the words and figures following, that is to say:

"We, the undersigned, do agree to tow the Lord Brougham from the Downs to Dunkirk Roads, for the sum of 70*l.* sterling.

"(Signed) H. B. MUMFORD,
"DOUZOUVILLE."

8. The said Henry Beer Mumford, one of the parties to the said agreement, is one of the above-named defendants and a part owner of the said steam-tug Gauntlet. The said M. Douzouville, the other party to the said agreement, was the prize captain of the said Lord Brougham, and the said agreement was signed in the presence and with the concurrence of the said Le Saurel, one Woodruffe being also present.

9. That the said sum of 70*l.* mentioned in the said agreement is a usual charge for the towage of such a vessel as the Lord Brougham from the Downs to Dunkirk Roads.

10. That as soon as the Gauntlet had towed the said vessel, Lord Brougham, to Dunkirk Roads, J. W. West, the captain of the Gauntlet, presented to the said M. Douzouville the usual towage certificate, which is in the words and figures following, that is to say:

I hereby certify that the steam-tug Gauntlet has towed the ship Lord Brougham, under my command, from the Downs to Dunkirk Roads to my satisfaction, for which please pay the sum of 70*l.* sterling. DOUZOUVILLE.

The 27th Nov. 1870.

11. The said certificate having been signed by the said M. Douzouville, was, on the return of the Gauntlet to Deal, presented by the said J. W. West to the said M. Le Saurel for payment of the said sum of 70*l.* The said M. Le Saurel then handed to the said J. W. West an order upon the French consul-general in London for payment of the said sum. Such last-mentioned order, accompanied by the said certificate, was on the 7th Dec. presented to the said French consul-general in London, who, on the 27th Dec. 1870, paid the said sum of 70*l.*

12. That the Lord Brougham, during such voyage to Dunkirk Roads, was in charge of the said prize crew and the officer commanding the same.

Dated this 20th July 1871.

According to the instructions issued by her Majesty's Government during the war between France and Germany, any belligerent ship which entered the territorial waters of her Majesty was required to depart and put to sea in twenty-four hours, except in case of stress of weather, and "armed ships of either party are interdicted from carrying prizes made by them into the ports, harbours, roadsteads, or waters of the United Kingdom, or any of her Majesty's colonies or possessions abroad." (Letter of Lord Granville to the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, London Gazette, 19th July 1870, p. 3432). On the 26th Nov. the collector of Customs at Deal had an interview with an agent of the French consul, and called his attention to the orders of her Majesty's Government, and asked him "if the French consul was coming to see him about the ship, as it was time she started." The reply was that the French consul had been telegraphed for. He arrived on the same day at Deal, went to the office of the latter, and said to him, "I come to speak about the Lord Brougham, as you have sent me word that she was to be moved at once. I did telegraph to many places to have a tug, and I found one that was by accident at anchor in the Downs. This tug was not the one for which I had telegraphed;" he said "that's all right." The collector pointed out to the French consul the orders of the Government under which he ordered the prize to be removed.

The Attorney-General, Queen's Advocate, and Archibald, for the Crown.—The section applicable is s. 8, sub-sect. 4. The sole question is whether the tug was employed in the naval service of France? Had her owners reasonable cause to believe that she would be employed in the naval service? The amount paid is immaterial. By means of the tug they avoided recapture, of which they were in danger until infra præsidia. If a Prussian cruiser had chased the tug, there would then have been naval service. If she had towed out a French man-of-war to capture the prize, or in or out of action, it would be a clear offence, for she would have been under the command of a French officer. Does it make any difference that she assisted only in the completion of the capture? She was under the command of the prize captain and was bound to obey him under penalty of losing the towage money: (The Christina, 6 Notes of Cases, 4). The tug and the prize were one vessel: (The Cleadon, 1 Lush. 158, 4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 159). The prize was towed to a French port, when she first became safe, and this was part of the capture, viz., its completion. If the prize captain had taken the master of the tug on board as one of the crew, he would have been in the naval service. What is the difference between that and towing under orders? It must depend on the intention of the parties. If the object were to take her out of English waters there was no offence, but if to take her infra præsidia, there was. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The evidence was, that the intention was to take her out of British waters.] So far as the evidence went. The place to which she was taken shows the intention. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Supposing she had only been towed a mile, the criterion would then be to what port they were taking her. Does the taking her to Dunkirk constitute the offence, or the taking her in tow at all?] The taking her to the waters of a belligerent is a naval service and constitutes the offence. The agreement was with the French consul on behalf of the French government. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Under what part of the interpretation clause do you put the offence?] That clause does not limit the words "naval service," but only says what shall be included in them, and even if it is not within the words, it is a naval service. The object of the Act is to maintain perfect neutrality. The act done amounted to pilotage. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—If the master of the tug can be called a pilot, must not his service be in a military or naval operation? Is not the capture complete when the flag is struck?] No; there must be deductio infra præsidia: (3 Phil. Int. Law, 504). A vessel must be condemned before the property definitely passes to her captors: (Ib. p. 464; Goss v. Withers, 2 Burr. Rep. 693). Capture is not complete until the ship is brought into port. This ship must be taken to be a ship of war under this Act. She would have to fight against recapture. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Suppose the vessel empty.] That would be different; here she is connected with a ship of war, and has a prize crew on board. The object of the Legislature is to make the Act as wide as possible.

The Admiralty Advocate and Edwyn Jones for the defendants.—The ship was removed at the instigation of the collector of customs; this shows the intention was to remove her from British waters. This Act is a penal one, and must be strictly construed. All that is not forbidden is permitted; there is no such word as "towing" in the Act. To condemn the tug you must hold towing to mean naval service. The tug actually towed the ship from a place of safety into danger, as there might be Prussian cruisers in the Channel. The words of the Act are "military or naval service;" there must be a hostile operation or warlike act. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Is not the first duty of a captor to bring the prize infra præsidia by taking her into port?] A vessel may be condemned in a neutral port by a competent tribunal:

The Polka, 1 Spinks, 447;

The Henrich and Maria, 4 C. Rob. 43.

If that is so, she belonged to the French Government when she put into Deal, at any rate sufficiently to justify the Gauntlet in towing her. She could not be said to be any longer the property of her German owners. The title to her had passed, or at any rate, could only be matter of dispute before a competent tribunal, and it cannot be said that a neutral tug could be responsible in such a case. This was a French prize, and by French law she was infra præsidia in a neutral port, and could be condemned by the consul if the English Government consented: (Traité des Prises Maritimes; Pistoye et Duverdy, p. 225.) [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—If the vessel had been seized by the Prussians, would the tug have been free from capture?] It cannot be said that the crew of the tug could be made prisoners of war. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The crew of a blockade runner cannot be taken prisoners.] Neither could the crew of this tug. The statute says the words shall "have the meanings hereinafter respectively assigned to them," and these meanings must be strictly construed in a penal statute. If the word "pilot" applies, the ship must be employed in a naval or military operation, and there can be no difference between the employment of a person and a ship in the meaning of the Act. The prize was not a ship of war, and, by capture, she was French property. There is no reason why a disabled man-of-war should not be towed. It is not a naval operation, even if she thereby escape capture. The men on board the tug were not servants of the French Government, if the tug had thrown off they would have been guilty of no breach of naval duty, but only of a breach of contract. The Cleadon (sup.) is only applicable to cases of collision.

The Queen's Advocate in reply.—An interpretation clause does not narrow the meaning of words, but extends them: (Ex-parte Ferguson and Hutchinson, L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 280; 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 96; 1 Aspinall's Mar. Law Cas. 8.) The tug was employed in subserving the naval operations of France, and is therefore within the statute: (The International, L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 321; 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 787.) The Lord Brougham was a ship of war as long as she was in possession of the prize crew. They would have been prisoners of war if they had been captured, and were in the same position as if they had been on board the French man-of-war. If they had made any capture the whole of the crew of the man-of-war would have shared.

The Frederick and Mary Ann, 6 C. Rob. 214

Aug. 2.—Sir R. Phillimore.—This is a suit instituted on behalf of the Crown by her Majesty's Procurator-General against a steamship called the Gauntlet. The petition prays that this ship may be decreed to be forfeited to the Crown on the ground that the ship has violated the provisions of the Foreign Enlistment Act, and more especially those contained in the 8th section of that statute. That section provides "that if any person within her Majesty's dominions, without the licence of her Majesty, does any of the following acts, that is to say . . . (4) despatches, or causes or allows to be despatched, any ship, with intent or knowledge, or having reasonable cause to believe, that the same shall or will be employed in the military or naval service of any foreign State at war with any friendly state." . . . The statute provides that the ship, in respect of which any such offence is committed, and her equipment, shall be forfeited to her Majesty. The interpretation clause (sect. 30), to which I must again presently advert, enacts that "naval service shall," &c. (as before set out.) The principal facts of the case to be derived from the admissions of both parties filed in court are as follows: (His Lordship here stated the facts.) The question for the court to determine is, whether these facts render the Gauntlet liable to condemnation under the provisions of the statute to which I have adverted. The statute is a highly penal one. As to its general character I have expressed my opinion in the recent case of the International (sup.) I will only now say that it is my duty neither to weaken the effect of the statute by a tenderness to the circumstances of a particular case, nor to strain the provisions of it so as to include a case which is not clearly within them. There is one argument on the construction of the statute which I wish to dispose of in limine. It has been contended by the defendants that the interpretation clause limits and restrains the enacting clause, and that inasmuch as steamtug is not among the vessels therein enumerated, there is a casus omissus in the statute which disposes of the present case in favour of the defendants. I am of opinion, however, that the interpretation clause is not of a restrictive, but of an enlarging, character. I am glad to be fortified in this conclusion by the opinion of Blackburn, J. in Ex parte Ferguson and Hutchinson (sup.) upon a similar clause in the Merchant Shipping Act, as to which he says, "The argument against the proposition is one which I have heard very frequently, viz., where an Act says certain words shall include a certain thing, that the words must apply exclusively to that which they are to include. That is not so; the definition given of a 'ship' is in order that 'ship' may have a more extensive meaning." The argument on behalf of the Crown for the condemnation of this vessel has been that the consequences of the act of capture were incomplete until the prize had been brought infra præsidia, and that these consequences were completed by the agency and intervention of the Gauntlet. That the towing was connected with the original seizure, was indeed a continuance of the belligerent act; that if the intention had been merely to take the vessel out of neutral waters, the case would have been subject to different considerations; but here she was brought in safety into the waters of the captors country, and the captor was relieved from the necessity of protecting his prize during the transit across the channel. That the Gauntlet was, for the time, the servant of the French captain, and hired by the French consul, so as to be employed in the French naval service. It was also contended that the captured vessel having a prize crew commanded by an officer, on board, was herself a ship of war; and it was urged that for one of, or for all these reasons, the Gauntlet has been despatched by her owner without the licence of her Majesty, "with reasonable cause to believe" that it would be employed in the naval service of France, and therefore has incurred the penalty of condemnation. I think this is a fair summary of the arguments of the Counsel for the Crown. I proceed to consider their force and effect, bearing in mind the reply which has been offered to them by the counsel for the defendants. First, I am unable to assent to the main position with respect to the completion of the act of capture by the employment of the Gauntlet, having regard to the circumstances of this case. It is true that various opinions have been expressed by great authorities on international law as to what constitutes a consummation, so to speak, of the act of capture—what is the criterion of the property in the vessel having become finally vested in the captor, and that the deductio infra præsidia of the country of the captor is, by general recognition, a certain and secure, and, I may add, in my opinion, the proper means of effecting the transfer of such property; but at the same time this act cannot be said, having regard to the practice of states, to be the only criterion or the only means. I cannot express myself so well on this point as in the language of Lord Stowell in the Heinrich and Maria (sup.) In that case the condemnation in the court of the enemy of a prize ship lying in a neutral port was holden to warrant the sale of her to a neutral merchant. Lord Stowell says: "Without entering into a discussion of the several opinions that have been thrown out on this subject, I think I may state the better opinion and practice to have been that a prize should be brought infra præsidia of the capturing country, where, by being so brought, it may be considered as incorporated into the mass of national stock. The greatest extension that has been allowed has not carried the rule beyond the ports or places of security belonging to some friend or ally in the war, who has a common interest in defending the acquisitions of the belligerent, made from the common enemy of both. In later times an additional formality has been required, that of a sentence of condemnation in a competent court, decreeing the capture to have been rightly made, jure belli; it not being thought fit, in civilised society, that property of this sort should be converted without the sentence of a competent court, pronouncing it to have been seized as the property of an enemy, and to be now become jure belli the property of the captor. The purposes of justice require that such exercises of war should be placed under public inspection: and, therefore, the mere deductio infra præsidia has not been deemed sufficient. No man buys under that title; he requires a sentence of condemnation, as the foundation of the title of the seller; and when the transfer is accepted, he is liable to have that document called for as the foundation of his own. From the moment that a sentence of condemnation becomes necessary, it imposes an additional obligation for bringing the property on which it is to pass into the country of the captor; for a legal sentence must be the result of legal proceedings in a legitimate court, armed with competent authority upon the subject matter, and upon the parties concerned—a court which has the means of pursuing the proper inquiry, and enforcing its decisions. These are principles of universal jurisprudence applicable to all courts, and more particularly to those which, by their constitution, in all countries, must act in rem upon the corpus or substance of the thing acquired, and upon the parties, one of whom is not subject to other rights than those of war, and is amenable to no jurisdiction, but such as belongs to those who possess the rights of war against him. Upon principle, therefore, it is not to be asserted that a ship, brought into a neutral port, is with effect proceeded against in the belligerent country. The res ipsa, the corpus, is not within the possession of the court, and possession in such cases founds the jurisdiction."

It might be reasonably expected that these premises would have led this great judge to the necessary conclusion that not having been brought infra præsidia, and having been condemned while lying in a neutral port, had not passed by a legal title to the claimant, but the decision is nevertheless otherwise, for Lord Stowell proceeds to say: "But it is not to be denied that the Court of Admiralty has gone further. It is now for a considerable time, that this court has been in the habit of condemning prizes carried to Lisbon and Leghorn, at times when I am not at liberty to say, that the sovereigns of those ports were engaged in a common war against the enemy of this country. The fact, that the ships proceeded against here, were lying there, has not been dissembled." . . . After some other remarks he continues: "Now, unless it can be shown that there is something in the nature of all these ports that essentially distinguishes them from the common character of neutral ports, not merely in certain other respects, but such as furnish a ground of solid distinction for purposes of this nature, I think it will be difficult to avoid the consequence, that whatever the correct principle may be, and however much it might import this country to respect and enforce this principle, this court, at least, is bound against that principle by its own practice. . . . How far the Superior Court will consider this question as concluded by the practice, even an inveterate practice of this court, is more than I can say. It might be extremely proper that the opinion of the court should be taken on this important question. It might deem it to be its duty, for anything I know (for it would be presumptuous in me to hazard a conjecture), to recall the practice of this court to the proper purity of the principle. But sitting here, and observing, as I am judicially bound to do, the course of judicial administration which has prevailed, I do not feel myself authorised to uphold the sentences, which have passed in this court, over prizes carried into foreign ports, and disallowed at the same time, the validity of such as the enemy had pronounced, under circumstances so nearly similar, as not to afford ground of distinction between them, which appears, to my judgment, sufficiently solid." The course which Lord Stowell evidently wished to be taken, was pursued. The case was appealed, but in spite of this strong expression of Lord Stowell's opinion, I find that this case of Heinrich and Maria was affirmed by the Lords Commissioners of Appeal, on the 7th Aug. 1807. During the late war with Russia, my immediate predecessor in this court, while maintaining that a prize condemned ought to be in belligerent territory, nevertheless condemned, though reluctantly, a prize lying in a neutral port, the Sovereign of which expressly consented to such condemnation: (The Polka (sup.)) Can I, in the face of these judgments, but more especially of the former, pronounce, under the provision of a penal statute, a sentence of forfeiture to the Crown of this vessel on the ground that by bringing the French prize infra præsidia of France, she had completed the title of her possession, only inchoate by the act of the French capture? I am of opinion that I cannot do so. But I must also observe that in considering the force of this argument, that the property in the prize could not pass without bringing her infra præsidia, the practice of the courts of the captor, as well as that of our own courts must be examined. It appears to me clear that the French tribunals of prize would hold that this deductio infra præsidia was not necessary to confer a valid title to the property: (De Pistoye et Duverdy; Traité des Prises Maritimes, pp. 173, 176, 225, and, &c., 229, and, &c.) This vessel then would have been condemned while lying in neutral waters by a properly constituted tribunal of prize sitting in France. And it is to be observed that if the Lord Brougham had been for months instead of days in neutral waters the captor would, according to the argument, have acquired no legal property in the prize. Such a tribunal could not indeed be lawfully constituted or lawfully sit in a neutral territory. But it may be as I have stated, that with the permission of the neutral State, the prize locally situate in the waters of the neutral State might be condemned by the belligerent tribunal sitting in the belligerent State. Whether the neutral State, by such permission, might not provoke a serious question as to the strict maintenance of her neutral character and position; whether such permission must not be equally granted to both belligerents, and whether even such a course would not involve the neutral State in great difficulties, are grave considerations into which I have not to inquire. The fact that apart from the orders of her Majesty's government such a sentence of condemnation would not be illegal is only adverted to by me for the purpose of showing the contention that the Gauntlet is brought within the penal clauses of this statute, because her Act alone enabled the belligerent to acquire a valid title to this prize, cannot in my opinion be sustained. But if the vessel had become jure belli a French vessel, then it was as lawful for the neutral steamtug to tow her as it would have been for her to have towed any merchant vessel, originally French, across the Channel, though she had been hired for this purpose by the captain of a belligerent ship with the approval and intervention of the French consul. The case has been put of a neutral steamtug attendant upon a belligerent ship and employed in towing away the prizes which she made; and it has been asked whether such conduct, relieving the belligerent ship from the encumbrance of protecting her prizes, and enabling her either to go into action against the enemy or to make fresh prizes, would not be an employment in the naval service of the belligerent? I mean to express no doubt that the judicial answer to this question would be in the affirmative, but the circumstances of the present case are materially and essentially different; the Gauntlet was in no way whatever directly or indirectly connected with or ministering to the capture of the vessel. She had, indeed, reasonable ground "to believe" at the time when she was hired that the vessel which she was employed to tow had been captured from the German belligerent, but that was all. For that there was any intention on the part of the Gauntlet to infringe the provisions of the Foreign Enlistment Act, is not only an inference unwarranted by the facts in evidence before me, but, in truth, the contrary is to be presumed from them. The English collector of customs tells the French Consul that this vessel cannot remain in English waters. He is the person who originates and demands her removal. The consul says that he has accidentally found a steamtug which would tow her away. The collector is perfectly satisfied. No suggestion of anything illegal in the transaction is made, and the tug proceeds to do her ordinary work, for the ordinary price. And I may here observe that it is not only a fact of notoriety, but one proved in the recent suits instituted in this court by English owners of cargo against German merchantmen, that there was no German cruiser in the Channel at this time, and that the transit was practically unattended by any risk or peril arising out of the war. Having towed the vessel across the Channel, the master of the tug, on presenting a certificate that he has performed his service, receives the ordinary price from the French consul on his return. It may indeed be, that, however innocent as to intention, the Gauntlet has, as a matter of fact, violated the provisions and incurred the penalties of the statute; but it is certainly a conclusion at which the court would be reluctant to arrive. Then it has been contended that, inasmuch as the vessel had a prize crew and officer on board, she was a ship of war, and, therefore, to tow her was to be employed in the naval service of the belligerent. I do not assent to this proposition. The prize crew and officer are not put on board a prize for the purpose of enabling her to cruise against the enemy, but for the purpose of maintaining the capture and preventing the native crew from rescuing the vessel. She was not commissioned, and was not a ship of war. Upon the whole, I am of opinion that the circumstances of the case do not warrant me in pronouncing that the Gauntlet is forfeited to the Crown, on the ground of her having been despatched with reasonable cause to believe that she would be employed in the naval service of France; and I dismiss her with her costs from this suit.

THE SUNNYSIDE.

Tug lying in wait—Duties of to avoid collision—Responsibility of sailing vessel coming into collision with tug—Both vessels in fault.

A tug was lying in wait with her anchor up, drifting at the rate of between one and two miles per hour. She had the bright coloured lights up of a steam vessel in motion. A bark with all her sails set, and going about nine miles an hour, ran into the tug and sunk her, no effort having been made by the tug to get out of the way, but the bark at the last moment having put her helm hard up.

Held, in a suit by the owners of the tug, that it was the duty of the tug, notwithstanding she was lying in wait, to keep out of the way of the bark :

Held, also, that the lights of the tug having been seen from the bark two miles off, it was the duty of those on board to keep on her course, and to keep the lights of the tug in sight, and therefore the bark was in fault. The damages were ordered to be borne equally by the two vessels. (a)

COLLISION.

The collision occurred in Lake Huron, some five or six miles off shore, and a little above the port of Lexington, in the state of Michigan, at about three o'clock in the morning of the 14th June 1869. The night was clear, and although it was not yet daylight, the morning had dawned, and a vessel could be seen from one and a half to two miles distant. The wind was south-west. The tug was then, and for several hours previously had been, waiting for a tow. She had her bright coloured lights burning, and although her steam was up, her machinery was not in motion, and she was lying entirely still, except that she was drifting before the wind in a north-easterly direction, at the rate of from one to two miles per hour. At the time of the collision she was heading eastwardly, or as some of the witnesses said, east by north-half-north.

The bark was on a voyage from Erie to Chicago with a cargo of coal, and at the time of the collision was, and for some time previously had been, sailing on a course north-half-west. She had all sails set, and was moving through the water at the rate of about nine miles per hour. The bark struck the tug while the latter was lying as above described, hitting her just forward of the pilot house, at about right angles, or perhaps anking a very little forward, crushing in her timbers, and causing her to sink in about fifteen minutes.

The allegations on both sides appear by the judgment.

LONGYEAR, J.—The only fault attributed to the bark by the libel, viz., a change of course, is not sustained by the proof, but on the contrary, it clearly appears that the bark kept her course without any variation up to the moment of collision. If the trial had been confined to this one allegation of fault, the libel should clearly be dismissed. But such is not the case. A large portion of the testimony, admitted without objection, relates to other questions of fault on the part of the bark, and of excuse on the part of the tug, than those set up in the libel, and although the objection was made at the argument, the case was really tried and submitted upon those other questions. The case has, no doubt, been as fully and fairly tried, and can be as satisfactorily disposed of in its present position, as it could be if the present libel were dismissed and a new one filed, covering the case more fully as made by the testimony. The court will, therefore, in the exercise of that broad discretion possessed by it, allow the libel to be amended, and dispose of the case upon the merits as really presented and submitted at the hearing. It is clear to my mind that gross faults are attributable to both vessels in this case. First, as to the tug. The tug, showing as she did, the lights of a steam vessel in motion, must be held to the responsibilities and duties of such vessel. By article 15 of the Collision Act of 1864, it was the duty of the tug to keep out of the way of the bark, provided the bark kept her course, as was her duty under article 18. The bark, as we have seen, did keep her course. Therefore, the tug is clearly in fault in not keeping out of the way of the bark, unless the excuses set up for her or some of them are tenable. It is contended, on behalf of the tug, that she had a right to lay where she was, in wait for a tow, and that it was customary for tugs to do so. The tug, no doubt, had the right claimed, but while exercising that right she had no right to exhibit the lights of a steam vessel in motion, and thereby mislead other vessels as to her status and intentions. If she would exercise that right in the night time in such a manner as to exempt herself from the duty imposed by article 15, she must do so at anchor, and with her anchor light up. It is also contended, on behalf of the tug, that some portions of her engine or machinery were partially disabled, in consequence of which she could not get under motion readily when lying still. This excuse is clearly untenable, because, first, it appears that no effort whatever was made to put her in motion; and, secondly, it does not appear but that there had been ample opportunity for repairs since the disability was known to exist. The tug, then, was clearly in fault in not keeping out of the way of the bark. Secondly, as to the bark: the duty of a steam vessel to keep out of the way of a sailing vessel, and of the latter to keep on her course, does not excuse the sailing vessel from the observance of ordinary care in her navigation, nor from the use of such means as may lay in her power to avoid a collision in case of immediate danger, even though that danger may have been made imminent by a non-observance of duty on the part of the steam vessel. Such I understand to be the effect of article 19, which is as follows: "In obeying and construing these rules, due regard must be had to all dangers of navigation, and due regard must also be had to any special circumstances which may exist in any particular case rendering a departure from the above rules necessary in order to avoid immediate danger." That is to say, these rules are made exclusively for preventing collisions. Now if under "any special circumstances which may exist in any particular case," it is necessary to depart from these rules in order to accomplish the very object the rules are intended to accomplish, then it is just as much the duty of a vessel to depart from the rules, as it is under other circumstances to observe them. It will not do to say that because one vessel shall fail to do its duty, the other is thereby licensed to run her down and destroy her, when such a consequence may be avoided by the exercise of ordinary care and precaution. And yet in order to exonerate the Sunnyside from blame in this case we must adopt that theory. The bright and green lights of the tug were seen and reported by the lookout on the Sunnyside when one and a half to two miles distant. The lights were seen a little over the port bow of the bark, and clearly indicated a steam vessel ahead to the eastward and across the bows of the bark. When the tug's lights were reported by the lookout the master, then in charge of the navigation of the bark, told the lookout that he "supposed it was a steamer, and guessed she would take care of herself." From this time the tug's lights were not reported, nor was any watch kept or any notice whatever taken of them on board the bark until the lookout saw the tug right under the bows of the boat, and a collision was inevitable. Ordinary care and precaution require that when a light is once seen in circumstances to involve risk of collision, close watch must be kept on such light until it is safely passed: (See article 20, Collision Act of 29th April 1864; 1 Pars. on Ship. & Adm. 505, note 3; The Grey Eagle, 9 Wall 505; The Havre, 1 Ben. 295, 303, 306.) The lights of the tug, as we have seen, were seen from the bark when from one and a half to two miles distant. The bark was moving through the water at the rate of nine miles per hour, at which rate she must have been from ten to fourteen minutes reaching the tug after her lights were first seen from the bark. There could have been no difficulty by the exercise of the commonest care and precaution on board the bark in determining that the tug was not in motion, but was slowly drifting right up into the course of the bark, where a collision must be inevitable unless the bark herself did something to avoid it. Neither was there any difficulty in the way of the bark's avoiding the collision, and if ordinary care and precaution had been exercised she would no doubt have done so. Because that care and precaution were not exercised on board the bark, contributing to the collision, as it undoubtedly did, she is in fault, and must stand her fair proportion of the loss occasioned by the collision. The tug and the bark were, therefore, both in fault, and the damages sustained by both on account of the collision must be equally divided between them. Let a decree be entered accordingly, and referring it to a commissioner to ascertain and compute the damages. The question of costs is reserved until the coming in of the commissioner's report.

(a) It has been held in the Admiralty Court that a vessel drifting must show her coloured lights; (The George Arkle, Lush 382; The Esk and The Gitana, 38 L. J. 33, Adm.; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 587.—Ed.)

WOODHAM AND ANOTHER (apps.) v. PETERSON (resp.)

Charter party—Port of Rochester—Metage due—Liability of shipowner or consignee.

By charter party it was agreed that a ship should load a cargo of oats and proceed to a safe port on the east coast of Great Britain, &c., and there "deliver the same always afloat on being paid freight," at certain rates per quarter of oats discharged. "The cargo to be brought to and taken from alongside at charterer's expense and risk."

The ship sailed to Rochester, and discharged her cargo within that port.

The mayor and corporation of the city of Rochester, as owners of the port, are entitled to an ancient fee, toll, due, or reward of 1d. per quarter upon corn brought by water to, and unloaded within, the said port, payable by the person bringing such corn, for the weighing of the said corn, or being ready and willing to weigh the same. This due having been paid by the captain, the shipowners' agent brought an action in the County Court to recover the amount from the consignees of the cargo as and for money paid for them at their request. Judgment was given for the plaintiff.

On appeal, the court being of opinion that the question of liability arising between the shipowners and consignees depended upon whether the due was in ancient times a payment for actual metage service done by the mayor and corporation before a cargo was put over the side of a ship, or afterwards, remitted the case to the judge below in order that he might ascertain the fact; and

Held, that (having regard to the terms of the charter party), if the due in its origin was for metage to be performed on board, the shipowners must bear it; but, if the metage was to be done ashore, then the charge should fall on the consignees, who would in that case be liable to repay to the shipowners the amount disbursed for the same.

APPEAL from the judgment of the judge of the County Court of Kent, at Rochester, upon a plaint brought by the plaintiffs, as agent for the owners of two ships, against the defendants, as consignees of the cargoes of the said ships, by which plaint the plaintiff sought to recover 14l. 1s. 3d., as and for money paid by the plaintiff for the defendants at their request.

The plaintiff, a ship and insurance broker, carrying on business in London, entered into two charter parties with Johnson and Son, of London, merchants, by each of which it was agreed that the ship therein named should proceed to a certain place, and there load a full cargo of oats, and, being so loaded therewith, should proceed to a safe port on the east coast of Great Britain, London inclusive, or a safe port in the English Channel, or to Havre—orders to be given on signing bills of lading—or so near thereunto as she might safely get, and there deliver the same, always afloat, on being paid freight—2s. 3d. sterling for east coast of Great Britain, London inclusive, 2s. 6d. ditto for English Channel, 2s. 7½d. ditto for Havre, all per quarter of 336lb. oats discharged; 2l. gratuity to captain for good delivery. "The cargo to be brought to, and taken from alongside at charterers' expense and risk." (The act of God, &c., always excepted). "The freight to be paid on unloading and right delivery of the cargo in cash. The necessary cash for ship's disbursements to be advanced by shippers at the port of loading on usual terms."

The defendants were consignees of both cargoes, the bills of lading of which were endorsed to them in the usual way. Both ships were ordered to Rochester, and discharged their respective cargoes within that port. The case set out a certain decree of the Court of Chancery, dated the 28th July 1851, in a cause between the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the city of Rochester and one William Lee, whereby it was declared "that the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the city of Rochester, in the county of Kent, otherwise the mayor, aldermen, and citizens of the city of Rochester, in the county of Kent, are, as owners, of the port of the city of Rochester, lawfully entitled to demand, have, receive, and take the fee, toll, due or reward of three pence and one-half of a farthing for each and every ton weight of coals brought by water to and unloaded within the said port of the said city, payable by the person or persons bringing such coals by water in any ship or vessel to, and unloading the same coals within the said port of the same city, for the weighing of the said coals, or being ready and willing to weigh the same . . ."

It was admitted that the mayor, aldermen, and citizens of the city of Rochester are a body corporate, and are also as such owners of the said

WOODHAM AND ANOTHER (apps.) v. PETERSON (resp.)

port of the said city entitled upon the terms of the said decree to a due of 1d. per quarter upon corn, grain and seeds. The captain of the two ships paid to the collector of the mayor, aldermen, and citizens in the whole course of business dues amounting in the whole to the sum of 14l. 1s. 3d., the amount sought to be recovered, and the receipts given by the collector had endorsed on them the following direction, signed by the respective masters of the two ships: "Pay the within to Messrs. Grouse and Co" (the shipowners), "or order, the value received in cash."

It was contended, on behalf of the plaintiff, that the due is payable for the corn, in fact, for the mayor, aldermen, and citizens weighing or being ready and willing to weigh the same, and not upon the ship, and that although the mayor, aldermen, and citizens obtain the money from the shipowner in the first instance, yet that the toll or due ultimately falls upon the owner or consignee of the cargo, they being the persons interested in the unloading and right delivery of the cargo, the due, as was contended by the plaintiff, being a due in respect of certain things, such as coal, corn, and seeds brought into the port by water, and unloaded there, and for the above reasons, the sums paid being paid by compulsion of law, were recoverable from the defendants as for money paid for their use and at their request. The defendant contended that the freight covered the port dues, and that the owner was liable under the charter parties to all charges necessarily incurred prior to and for the purpose of the delivery of the cargo, unless such were expressly excepted by the charter party.

The judgment of the County Court was given for the plaintiff, and the question was, whether this judgment was correct in point of law.

The case was stated at the request of both parties.

If the court should be of opinion that the judgment of the County Court was right, the verdict for the plaintiff was to stand; if otherwise a nonsuit or a verdict for the defendants was to be entered as the court might direct.

Prentice, Q.C. with him Barrow.—The question is, whether these port dues were payable by the shipowner or the charterers? According to the ordinary rule, the shipowner must pay them. [BLACKBURN, J.—This payment is for metage, and is not a port due.] By the charter the shipowner is to deliver the cargo "always afloat." The only place where the corn would be weighed would be on board ship. The captain pays the charge in the usual course of business, a fact tending to show that the shipowner is liable, and the ship is distrained if the payment is not made. "Always afloat" are words written in ink and not printed. This due is payable on unloading, and for being "ready and willing to weigh" the corn. [LUSH, J.—The weighing may be for the benefit of the shipowner, or of the charterer, or both. BLACKBURN, J.—In Hargr. Law Tract, p. 76, measurage is defined to be "a toll due for the use of a common bushel or other instrument to measure dry or wet goods imported or exported." The right to this fee toll or port due was established in the Court of Chancery, as is stated in the case. In order to enable the shipowner to earn his freight he was under the necessity of paying these dues, and, having paid them, is not entitled to recover the amount from the charters: (Faith

v. The East India Company, 4 B. & Ald. 630.) In the charter party there, the freighter promised to pay and defray two-thirds of the port charges; the owner having paid the whole, was held to have no lien on the goods shipped for those charges, and Holroyd, J., expressing an opinion that the owner could not recover a sum he had paid for port charges, adds, "These charges would if not specially provided for by the charter party, fall on the owner of the ship. Then do they, by this charter party, become freight or in the nature of freight? I think not; and that the plaintiff is not entitled to a lien for them." [BLACKBURN, J.—The learned judge is there speaking of a charge on the ship.] But that shows the general rule. The real consideration for the due is the mayor and corporation being ready and willing to weigh the cargo. [LUSH, J.—This is not a duty for coming into the port; if the vessel merely came in for repairs or safety and anchored, say for a week and then went out, the due would not be payable.] In Bishop v. Wear (3 Camp. 361), Sir James Mansfield, C.J., said, "If the goods are not landed, a compensation must be made for the benefit derived from the wharf by the owner of the ship. The goods cannot be subjected to this charge more than to many others which are incurred by the ship in the course of the voyage. According to the bill of lading the goods in question were to be delivered on payment of freight." BLACKBURN, J., mentioned a case referred to in Jayburn v. Crisp (8 Car. & P. 399), as having been tried before Lord Mansfield and a special jury at Guildhall in the year 1779. Upon discharging this corn into the barges it was necessary to pay this due. [BLACKBURN, J.—That is the very thing I want you to prove to me. The old records of Rochester would be most material to the present question.] If this is not paid on unloading, why does the shipowner pay it at all? The consignees are entitled to have these oats on payment of freight only. How can an action for money paid lie against them for this due? [BLACKBURN, J.—There would be no difficulty as to that point if it was a charge imposed by law on the shipowner.] If they were liable to pay, the shipowner was not liable; if they were not originally liable then they are not so now. [LUSH, J.—If the charter had contained a stipulation that the consignees should pay this due, still the captain would be bound to pay it in the first instance.]

Pollock, Q.C. (with him F. J. Smith) for the respondents.—The County Court judge was right; this charter is in a very ordinary form. There is a clear distinction between metage and other dues with which owners of cargo have nothing to do, such as lightage dues, &c. For whom is this charge incurred? Surely for the consignees. Before the amount of freight to be paid can be ascertained, the cargo must be measured. He cited

BLACKBURN, J.—This case is not so stated as to enable us to decide whether or no the judgment was right or wrong, and consequently we are obliged to say that the case must be remitted to the County Court Judge. This is to be regretted, LIDGETT v. SECRETAN AND ANOTHER.

as the amount in dispute is small, although the question involved is of some importance. Probably, however, when our reasons about to be given are heard, the parties may come to some arrangement, or if they are unable so to do, the County Court judge will know what our opinion is on the subject, and he will doubtless be guided thereby. The question arises on these charter parties by which each ship therein named may be ordered to a large number of ports, and she may go as near thereto as she may safely get. She must keep afloat—that means that she shall not be bound to take up any position in a place where she would be left lying on the mud to await a turn of tide. Freight is to be paid at so much per quarter of 336lb., oats discharged—that provision of course requires for the mutual benefit of shipowner and consignee that the quantity of the cargo should in some way or other be ascertained. Next comes the important clause: "The cargo to be brought to and taken from alongside at charterer's expense and risk." The shipowner said this, as it were, "I will bring the ship as near as I can, and deliver the cargo alongside, whether the ship lies close to a wharf, or whether you bring boats or lighters out to her, according to the nature of the port. I will deliver alongside, and so earn my freight." All to be done thereafter is to be done by the consignee, and not at the shipowner's expense. Now there is ancient toll of 1d. payable upon every quarter of oats, due to the mayor and corporation of the city of Rochester for their being ready and willing to do the service of weighing and measuring grain brought to their port. If, required, they must perform that service, but, if the parties do not choose that they shall do it, the mayor and corporation are nevertheless entitled to the due. If it is paid without services done, it comes to be somewhat of the nature of a tax: but its origin was in service. If the mayor and corporation were bound to render that service so that their money was earned before the goods were taken out of the ship, then the payment would fall on the importer (a word which I think must mean the shipowner who brings the grain in), and the consignee would be under no obligation to recoup him. But, on the other hand, if the right of the mayor and corporation was to have the weighing done ashore, and consequently they had not earned their money until after the goods were taken out of the ship and put into the hands of the consignee, then it would be otherwise. If the shipowner had done all that he agreed to do when he delivered the goods over board alongside, and if, owing to his having come in and made himself liable and being obliged to pay, he had paid this due, it would be a payment by compulsion of law, and he would be entitled to recover the sum so paid from the consignee. It seems to me that the real question for us to determine is, whether this due was earned before the grain was put over the side of the vessel or afterwards. Was the ancient usage, when the mayor and corporation acquired this prerogative right to do the work of weighing and measuring, that in order to earn this money the mayor was obliged to send a person down to measure on board the ship before she went alongside, then the 1d. would have been earned before the goods came into the hands of the consignee; or was it the ancient usage that the mayor was to have bushels and measures in some appointed place in the town, and by strict right the persons whose grain was discharged in the port had to bring it to the appointed place to be weighed. I think in such latter case the due would fall on the consignee, and not on the shipowner. But my judgment turns entirely on the terms of these charter parties. The charter parties might be easily framed so that the metage due might be either upon the shipowner or the consignee. I cannot say whether the ancient custom of Rochester would entitle the mayor and corporation to have goods brought to places where he would measure them—for such a due as this due for metage might be either earned at the ship or on the shore, whereas such dues as cranage, wharfage, &c., from their nature could only be earned for services rendered on land—or whether it was that the mayor and corporation were in the habit of sending their meter down on board the vessel, and the earning of their metage due was contingent on their doing that. What the original practise was I cannot tell. I cannot but think, however, that if the evidence given upon the numerous trials which seem to have taken place with respect to the dues of this port was carefully searched through, the matter would be determined. All we can say in the present case is, that the question as to which side should bear this metage due depends on the terms of the charter parties.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. I agree that the charter parties are in the ordinary form as respects the question at issue, and in practice no doubt there is a difficulty in getting brokers to alter established forms of charter parties, however desirable a change might be. I quite agree with my learned brother, that the question is whether the service for which this toll was originally given was one which the mayor and corporation were entitled to require to be performed on board, or whether it was one to be rendered after the cargo was discharged. If it was to be done on board, then the charge would be upon the ship, and she must bear it. The matter depends upon the ancient usage.

HANNEN, J.—I am of the same opinion. The duty on the ship would be a duty on the shipowner, while the ship was still afloat to deliver, according to circumstances, into barges alongside, or if his vessel could get to a quay, to deliver from the vessel. The question is, can he fulfil that duty without already having become liable to pay this due? and the answer to that question will decide the case.

Case remitted accordingly.

LIDGETT v. SECRETAN AND ANOTHER.

Marine insurance—Particular loss suffered by ship while insured under one policy, and total loss while insured under another—Merger of partial into total loss—Rights of insured.

Plaintiff insured his ship with various underwriters, among whom were defendants, for the voyage from L. to C., and thirty days after arrival at C. Before the ship reached C. she suffered a particular loss. Plaintiff, not knowing of this, insured her while at C., and on the voyage from C. to L., under a valued policy (the value taken fairly representing the real value of the ship in an uninjured state) with various underwriters, among whom were defendants. On arrival at C, the ship was taken into dock, where it was ascertained that considerable repairs were required. These repairs were set on foot; but before they were completed, and after the first policy had expired and the second policy had attached, the ship was totally destroyed by fire. The two policies were altogether independent of each other.

Held, that plaintiff was entitled, under the first policy, to recover, not only the cost of the repairs actually executed, but the whole amount that it would have cost to complete the repairs rendered necessary by the damage sustained, and, under the second policy, the sum at which the ship was valued in the policy, without any deduction in respect of that part of the sum claimable under the first policy, which had not been actually expended in repairs. (a)

THIS was an action brought by the owners of the ship Charlemagne upon two policies of insurance upon the ship, underwritten by the defendants, the one for a voyage out from London to Calcutta and for thirty days there after arrival in safety, and the other at and from Calcutta to London. The vessel struck on a reef on the voyage out, and sustained a particular and general average loss, and whilst at Calcutta, after her arrival, was totally destroyed by fire. The declaration contained counts claiming losses under both policies, including a general average loss under the outward policy, and to these counts the defendant pleaded a single plea of payment into court of 110*l.* in satisfaction of the plaintiffs' claims. To this plea the plaintiffs replied that the sum paid in was not sufficient.

The cause came on for trial at the Guildhall, in the City of London, at the sittings after Michaelmas Term 1868, before the Lord Chief Justice and a special jury, when it was ordered by the court, with the consent of the parties, that a verdict should be entered for the plaintiffs for the amount claimed in the declaration, subject to the opinion of the court upon a special case to be settled by Mr. Charles Pollock upon the question whether, when the ship was destroyed by fire, she was covered by the outward policy, and also as to the principle upon which the partial loss under the outward policy was to be calculated in the event of the plaintiffs being held by the court not to be entitled to recover a total loss under the outward policy; and it having been decided by this court upon a case stated for that purpose that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover for a total loss under the outward policy (see 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 272), the following further case was stated, in order to obtain the opinion of the court as to the principle upon which the partial loss is to be calculated under that property.

CASE.

In July 1866 the plaintiffs, who are shipowners carrying on business in London, were the owners of the iron sailing vessel the Charlemagne, then about to proceed on a voyage from London to Calcutta, and after a certain stay there, back again from Calcutta to London. To cover the vessel on the outward voyage, the plaintiffs effected a policy of insurance in the ordinary form with various underwriters to the amount of 18,000*l.* upon the ship, valued at 20,000*l.*, and the defendants, who are underwriters at Lloyd's, underwrote the policy for 150*l.* In order to cover the ship upon the homeward voyage, the plaintiffs effected a further policy, in the ordinary form, with various underwriters, which was subscribed to the amount of 10,100*l.* on the ship, valued at 20,000*l.*, and the defendant underwrote this policy for 100*l.* In the outward policy the risk was expressed to be "at and from London to Calcutta, and for thirty days after arrival." In the homeward policy the risk was, "at and from Calcutta to London."

The Charlemagne, in the course of her outward voyage, struck upon a reef or bank near the mouth of the River Hooghly, and remained aground for about an hour. The captain deemed it best for the safety of the vessel, passengers, and cargo, to force the vessel over the bank, and for that purpose to throw overboard some of the cargo in order to lighten her. Accordingly a quantity of cargo was jettisoned, and the ship being thus lightened, gradually worked over the bank. The ship sustained considerable damage to her bottom and rudder, but the extent of this was not fully known until the survey hereinafter mentioned. She continued her voyage, and reached Calcutta on the 28th Oct., and at once proceeded with the discharge of her cargo, which was completed by the 8th Nov.

On the 12th Nov. the Charlemagne was taken into dry dock for survey and repairs. The result of the survey made upon the Charlemagne in the dry dock showed that extensive repairs were necessary, in consequence of the damage done to the ship while aground. The repairs were accordingly commenced. Whilst they were in progress, the outward policy expired. Afterwards, on the 5th Dec., the vessel was totally destroyed by fire.

According to the plaintiff's evidence the expenses actually incurred amounted to a small proportion of the outlay which would have been required to complete the repairs.

The defendant admits that he is liable to a general and particular average loss under the outward policy, and for a total loss with benefit of salvage under the homeward policy, and the amount paid into court has been calculated on the supposition that it covers the defendant's proportion of the loss and general average, and other expenses actually incurred by the plaintiffs under the outward policy, and the total loss under the homeward policy. The plaintiffs do not admit the correctness of the calculation.

The plaintiffs, however, contend that they are entitled under the outward policy to recover for the whole amount of loss and damage sustained by the said ship by striking on the said reef, without regard to the extent to which the same was actually repaired and made good.

The plaintiffs also contend that in estimating the costs of repairs for which the defendant is liable under the outward policy, they are entitled to include the amount which the plaintiffs would have had to pay for dock dues, and other charges of a like nature for the time during which the vessel would have remained in the dry dock for the purpose of being repaired. The defendant contends that under the outward policy he is only

(a) This case clearly shows that the rights of the parties to a policy are determined when the risk under the policy is ended; and, therefore, nothing that happens after the termination of the risk exempts them from liability incurred previously to such termination.—ED.

In adjusting the amount of the salvage under the homeward policy, the dock dues incurred since the fire, and which must have been necessarily incurred before realizing the net salvage of the wreck, are deducted from the proceeds arising from the sale of the wreck.

The questions for the opinion of the court are, what are the true principles upon which the said losses are to be assessed.

The case is to be remitted to the said arbitrator to determine whether, adopting the principle so laid down as to the mode of calculating the particular average loss, the said sum of 110*l.* is sufficient to satisfy the plaintiffs' claims in the action, and if the arbitrator should find that it is not sufficient, then the judgment is to be for the plaintiff for such sum as the arbitrator shall find that the plaintiffs are entitled to, with costs of suit, and if the arbitrator shall find that the said sum is sufficient, then judgment is to be entered for the defendants with costs.

Sir George Honyman, Q.B. (Watkin Williams and Cohen with him), for the plaintiff.—The rights of the parties ought to be determined at the time of the expiration of the risk. That being so, the defendants cannot allege, in answer to the claim under the first policy, anything that happened after the expiration of that policy. As to the claim under the second policy, Barker v. Janson (17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 473; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 303) is conclusive in favour of the plaintiff.

Sir John Karstake, Q.C. (J. C. Mathew with him) for the defendants.—If a contract of insurance be a contract of indemnity, then the assured cannot recover more than the value of the ship which he has lost; but if the plaintiff is to have awarded to him all that he now claims, he will get a great deal more than the value of the ship. The partial loss is merged in the subsequent total loss, although the one happened while the ship was under one policy and the other while she was under another. As is stated in Tudor's Mercantile Cases (notes to Lewis v. Rucker, p. 216, 2nd edit.), "although a vessel may have sustained an average loss, if no expenses have been actually incurred in repairing it, the assured cannot recover anything for the average loss in addition to the subsequent total loss." The reasoning of the court in Livie v. Janson (12 East, 648) applies here. Stewart v. Steele (5 Scott's New Rep. 927) is an authority for saying that the plaintiff can recover under the first policy only the amount that he actually expended on the repairs. But if the plaintiff is entitled under the first policy to recover as much as it would have cost to have put his ship in proper repair, the defendants have a right to an abatement in the amount payable by them under the second policy to the extent to which that money was not actually expended. The second policy being a voyage policy, there was implied in it a warranty of seaworthiness. The case is precisely the same as if the money had been expended on the ship and some part of the ship had escaped, or as if it had been spent in timber for the repairs, and the timber, though lying close to the ship, had not been burnt. In either case the insurers could have claimed the benefit of the salvage.

Sir George Honyman, Q.C., in reply.

VOL. I. N. S.

WILLES, J.—In this case two questions are raised. They arise in this way—the vessel, which was first injured and afterwards destroyed by fire, was insured on one policy, which was a distinct contract, on the voyage from London to Calcutta, and for thirty days after arrival. It was also insured on another policy for the voyage back from Calcutta to London. The vessel appears to have been damaged during the time that the first policy attached, and in respect of that damage compensation as for a particular loss is claimed under the first policy. After the second policy had attached, the ship was totally destroyed by fire, the repairs rendered necessary by the injuries previously sustained having at that time been commenced, but not being finished. At the time the vessel was burnt a substantial amount of repairs remained to be done, so that the injuries sustained materially detracted from the value of the ship at the time she caught fire. No reference is made in one policy to the existence of the other, but the two policies are distinct contracts relating to distinct periods of time. The first policy, which covers the period of the voyage out, and thirty days after arrival at Calcutta, stands by itself. In this first policy, neither party refers to another contract to be made to cover the subsequent period, and neither party claims, or can claim, to be absolved from liability on the first policy by reason of another distinct contract having been made to cover the subsequent period. The circumstances of the defendant having underwritten both policies is merely an accident, and forms no connection between the two policies. Thus the rights of the parties under each policy have to be determined upon the true construction of that policy, and without reference to the other. The first question is raised on the first policy. What is the right of the plaintiff under that? He claims to be compensated by the underwriters, for, not only the expense he was put to in respect of the repairs actually done to the ship, but also for the cost of the repairs that would have had to be done before the ship could have been said to have been properly and thoroughly repaired. As to the cost of the repairs actually done, the underwriters raise no question. To that extent, it is conceded that payment must be made. But the underwriters dispute their liability under the first policy to make good the cost of repairs that were never done, and that raises the question whether in any case of particular loss a shipowner can recover against the underwriters before expenses have been incurred in respect of the damage sustained; in other words, whether the owner is bound to repair the ship before he can bring an action. It is further said that, even if the owner had completed the repairs, they would have done no good, because the ship was subsequently burnt. That however, is reaching a long way, and speculating on results which it is assumed would have ensued, but which it is impossible to affirm would have taken place. The fact that the ship was kept a long time at Calcutta by reason of the damage she had sustained, may or may not have led to the fire taking place. We cannot affirm that it did or that it did not. We are asked to have resort to the circumstance of the fire—which is apparently totally unconnected with the accident that happened to the ship while going up the river—to relieve the underwriters from liability under the first policy. If we look still closer into the circumstances connected with this part of the question, we find that the ship at the time that the first policy expired was reduced in value. A ship which, for the sake of argument, I will say was worth 5000*l.* was reduced in value to 4000*l.*, and a policy of insurance is a contract of indemnity. That being so, if the shipowner is worse off by 1000*l.*, he is entitled to be indemnified to that extent, and if he were dealing with an underwriter who was disposed to settle at once, the loss, if at once settled, would be settled at 1000*l.* Supposing that in this case the last of the thirty days had been the 31st December, and the owner had made his claim on the 1st Jan. for the whole cost of the repairs rendered necessary by the accident, and that claim had been settled on the 2nd Jan., and the fire had taken place on the 4th; could the underwriter under such circumstances have brought an action to recover the value of his cheque, or stop payment of it if not presented, and plead failure of consideration if sued upon it? It would be strange if he could; and if he could not, the damages must be regarded as a liquidated sum, and as settled at the time the risk expires. I might take another case. Supposing that the ship insured is, through injuries sustained, worth only 4000*l.* instead of 5000*l.*; the risk expires on Dec. 31st, and on Jan. 2nd the ship is sold by the underwriter at her reduced value, 4000*l.*, and on the 3rd Jan. is destroyed by fire, could the underwriters say that the sale was not one of the perils insured against, and that he would not pay, because the owner was only able to claim by reason of something happening after the policy had expired? Could the underwriter, under such circumstances, say that the particular loss was merged in the total loss which, on the supposition, does not happen till after the policy has expired? It is said that the underwriter would have such a defence, because a particular loss is not paid for if the ship is afterwards and during the risk totally lost. That is for one of two reasons. Either the underwriter agrees to pay as for a total loss, and does pay (except losses which come under the head of suing and labouring), and in so paying discharges the whole loss. If he paid in respect of the particular as well as of the total loss, he would be paying more than the value of the ship. Another case which might arise is this. A ship, having suffered a particular damage by a peril insured against, is afterwards lost or destroyed by a peril not insured against, but as to which the owner is his own insurer. That was the case in Livie v. Janson. The result of such a state of things is that, as the assured has put himself in the same position as the underwriter would have been if he had taken that risk, the particular loss has to be borne by him, just as it would have had to be borne by the underwriter if he had taken the risk through which the vessel was lost. Authority and reasoning go together on this point. Are we then to extend what is called the doctrine of merger to a case where the total loss occurs after the expiration of the policy? On this point there is no authority? but I think the case put by my brother M. Smith very apposite in point of principle. A tenant, under covenant to repair, at the end of his term leaves the house very much out of repair. The landlord, wanting to build another sort of house upon the ground, pulls the house down, but sues the tenant for a breach of the covenant to repair. The answer of the tenant is, I am not bound to pay, because you never wanted the repairs done. He thus sets up, in answer to the claim in respect of a breach of covenant, matter which has subsequently occurred. That is clearly no answer to the action. In the same way, the liability of the underwriter must be determined at the expiration of the risk, and the underwriters of the first policy in this case must pay as they would have had to pay if they had settled as soon as the risk expired. They must pay an amount equal to the depreciation of the vessel at the end of the first voyage. I will not go into arithmetical details; the assessor must go into that for himself. The only question before us is, on what principle the assessor is to proceed? The plaintiff is not entitled to get anything which he had not actually lost at the time of the expiration of the first policy; but the arbitrator must inquire what the vessel would have been worth but for the damage, and what it actually was worth in its damaged state, and give the owner the difference. The arbitrator will, in so doing, take into account the expenses necessary to put the ship into a proper state of repair, in order to arrive at a conclusion as to what was the diminution in the value of the ship at the time the risk expired. In the case of a wooden ship it would be customary to charge the owner to the extent of one-eighth of the repairs, in respect of the advantage of having part of the ship new instead of old. It is said that the same calculation is not applicable here, as the ship was an iron one. Whether this principle would apply here or not has not been argued, so I will dwell no longer upon it. Whatever may be the actual result, the arbitrator will give only such a sum as will represent the diminution in the value of the ship at the time the risk expired. The second question arises under the second policy. It is a question of great importance, and has been discussed over and over again. The practice of insuring ships at an agreed value is commonly recognised among both underwriters and shipowners' and, though it may be abused in some cases by dishonest persons, has this great advantage, that, when honestly carried out, it ensures a full indemnity to the assured, and gives large premiums to the underwriters; and moreover, these valuation policies save both parties, in case of loss, very costly inquiries. Of course, if a ship is insured for a sum so very disproportionate to its real value that fraud may be presumed, that is another matter, and if the sum for which the ship is insured be so large that a jury would say that the policy was in reality a wager as to the safety of the ship, the underwriters would be protected and the policy would be void. There are other reasons why the practice of valuation is useful. It must be admitted that such policies are to some extent objectionable, as giving facilities to infractions of the law against wagering policies, as it is always difficult to prevent a man from insuring to a larger extent than his ship would be worth in the market. Still, on the other hand, owners often insure when the ship is far away and her precise value cannot be ascertained, and it is important to enable people to insure their ships for a fair and reasonable sum, though perhaps at the time they may be in a damaged state, or even lost. But if you introduce this principle of valuation into policies, the sum at which the ship is valued most, if she be lost, be paid, though it may turn out that the ship was not worth half the sum at which she was valued in the policy, by reason of the damage she had sustained. (a) Another set of cases may arise in which the same principle applies. Supposing that a shipowner makes a speculation, and fits out a vessel to carry troops, or for some other out-of-the-way purpose, which would require great expenditure in the way of fitting out his ship. If such a man were to send his ship so fitted up into the market, it might be that the alterations in question would make her less valuable; still he would undoubtedly be able to include the value of the alterations in his valuation, and recover the value of the ship with reference to its cost, and not with reference to what the ship would fetch in the market, and he might do so, although the special purpose for which he had fitted out the ship had failed. There are other cases which occur very frequently. A shipowner sends a ship on a voyage which is unsuccessful; he then sends her on a second, and in insuring her for this second voyage, introduces as an element in the valuation the loss he has sustained on the first voyage, though of course that would never add anything to the real market value of the ship. This practice is allowed to pass among underwriters, though I must not be understood now as expressing any lawyer's opinion on it. It is at any rate convenient that there should be a fixed sum, and especially in the case of vessels insured when far from home, and that this fixed sum should be paid if the vessels are lost. This rule has been applied in many cases, the most recent being Barker v. Janson. There the ship was valued at 8000*l.* and the policy was a time policy. The ship having been lost, the whole sum of 8000*l.* was demanded of the underwriters. At the time the ship was lost she had been so damaged in a storm that occurred prior to the attaching of the policy in question, that a large sum would have had to have been expended on her before she could have been pronounced seaworthy. The underwriters claimed to be allowed to deduct this sum from the 8000*l.* for which the ship had been insured. The court, however, refused to allow this. The vessel, as she stood at the time, had been valued at 8000*l.*, and that was the sum agreed to be paid, whether she was destroyed or not. If her value had been increased, the underwriters would have had to pay no more than 8000*l.*, and when it had decreased, they could not claim to pay less: 8000*l.* represented the conventional rather than the real value. We had occasion the other day to refer to this question and show that, as the result of the decisions both in this country and in the United States, the value fixed in the policy is taken as the sum to be paid in case of loss, but not in calculating whether there has been a constructive loss. An article was adopted in 1861 or 1862 into the German code, after great consideration, by which it was determined that the insurance value of a ship should not be taken into account in deciding whether there had been a constructive total loss. That is the state of the law both here and abroad; and it would be destructive of the advantages derived from valued policies if, in such a case as this, or Barker v. Janson, the underwriters could go into the state of the vessel at the time of the making of the policy, or claim a deduction in respect of injuries sustained by the ship before the policy attached. The case of Barker v. Janson would be exactly applicable here, but for the distinction pointed out by Sir J. Karlake, that there the policy was a time policy. In the case of such a policy it was not necessary that the ship should be in a seaworthy state at the time the policy was to attach, whereas, in this case, the insurance being for the voyage, the ship could not leave port without having been made seaworthy; and in this case it was expressly stipulated that the vessel should not leave the Hooghly till the repairs were properly done, the cost of which repairs the underwriters now claim—in other words, the underwriters claim to pay less for a loss in port than they would have had to pay for a loss at sea. If the ship had been lost at sea, she being then in the same condition as she was in port (assuming the policy to have attached), would the underwriters have been entitled to claim a deduction in respect of a particular loss sustained before the policy attached? There is no authority in support of such a claim, and, on the grounds I have already stated, the sum fixed in the policy must (in the absence of fraud or wagering) be taken as the sum which the underwriters have to pay. Sir John Karlake has next contended that the underwriters of the second policy have a right to the amount of money that was to have, but had not, been spent on repairs, as salvage. But then, to make out this claim, they must have recourse to the first policy. If there had been no such first policy, the owner would have had no such sum to pay; and it is immaterial, so far as the underwriters of the second policy are concerned, that the owner had happened to effect this first policy. If the sum named in the second policy be taken as the sum to be paid, we cannot consistently allow any deduction to be made from it. The result is that the arbitrator must assess the damages on the principles contended for by the plaintiff.

M. SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The questions raised have been in the main already decided in the cases referred to. It appears that there were two separate policies, by one of which the ship was insured on the outward voyage from London to Calcutta, and thirty days after, and by the other while at Calcutta and on the homeward voyage from Calcutta to London. She suffered damage while insured by the first policy, and this damage had been only partially repaired when the first policy expired; and after the expiration of that policy, and the attachment of the second one, and while the repairs were still in a very incomplete state, the ship was totally destroyed by fire. The defendant, who happens to have underwritten both policies, now has this action brought against him, to compel payment of his proportion under the first policy of the amount that it would have cost to have thoroughly repaired the injuries sustained by the ship while sailing under the first policy, and also under the second policy, of his proportion of the 8000*l.* for which the ship was insured. He has paid money into court on the supposition that he is liable to pay under the first policy his share only in the expenses actually incurred in repairs, or that, if he has to pay more under the first policy, he and the other underwriters of the second policy are entitled to an abatement to the extent to which the money payable under the first policy for the repairs was not actually expended. The question now for us to decide is, what is the true principle of assessing the damages? The plaintiff is, in my judgment, entitled under the first policy to recover to the extent to which the ship was deteriorated in value by the accident, so that the measure of damages is the answer to the question what the necessary repairs would have cost. It is material in dealing with this question, to consider at what time the cost of the loss sustained by an insured ship becomes a fixed sum payable by the insurers. It is unnecessary to determine whether or not it may be so regarded earlier, but at any rate it may be considered a fixed sum, subject to estimation at the time of the expiration of the policy. That is stated to be the law of Manle, J. in Stewart v. Steele, where, referring to the case of Blackett v. The Royal Exchange Assurance Company, he says: "That case establishes this principle, that the proper time to estimate the loss, where the party is put to no expense, is at the expiration of the risk." At that period, at any rate, the rights of the parties may be taken as fixed. But it is contended by the defendants that the particular damage, sustained while the ship was under the first policy, is merged in the total loss against which the owner is insured under the second policy; but, the loss having occurred after the first policy had expired, there was nothing in which the loss could merge. If the total loss had happened during the currency of the first policy, the doctrine of merger might have applied. The principle of this distinction is obvious. The underwriters insure against accident during the whole voyage, and it may be that the whole voyage must be regarded before the extent of the indemnity payable can be estimated. But when the period for which a ship is insured is at an end, I am at a loss to see how anything happening after the expiration of that period can affect the rights of the parties, which are fixed as soon as the period has expired. This view is supported by the judgment of Lord Campbell, C.J., in Knight v. Faith (15 Q. B. 649) where he says, (p. 668): "But here the insurers have not paid, and they deny their liability to pay, a total loss; and they are not at liberty to allege that the partial loss is merged in a total loss, from which they are exempt." Moreover, in this case, the underwriters of the second policy have nothing to do with the partial loss that occurred during the period covered by the first policy. Their liability is just the same as if the owner had not effected that first policy. It is unnecessary to go further into the question of the defendants' liability under the first policy. I will only say that I fully concur with the judgment of my brother Willes, which is amply supported both by reasoning and authority. Then it is contended by Sir John Karlake that, assuming the defendants to be liable to pay a particular average under the first policy to the whole extent to which the ship was deteriorated in value, still they are entitled to a reduction in the amount payable by them under the second policy, to the extent to which the money payable under the first policy was not actually expended in repairs. That seems to me an attempt to open the question of value in the case of a valued policy. Supposing there had been no first, but only this second, policy. In such a case the valuation, having been made bonâ fide, would have to be accepted. When a ship is insured by a valued policy to commence on a future day, the value must always be liable to be reduced by accidents; in this instance the ship was damaged by sea peril. It would be contrary to principle if such a circumstance were to be taken into consideration and urged as a reason for opening the question of value, when the contract has once been made. It is unnecessary that I should say anything more on that part of the question, as it was fully discussed in the recent case of Barker v. Janson. No doubt, if the repairs had been completed before the policy attached, the ship would have been of greater value than she actually was. But that has nothing to do with the underwriters of the second policy. No doubt a policy of insurance is a contract of indemnity; but in the case of a valued policy, the value of the ship is taken at a liquidated sum, which is by the agreement to be taken as the real value. I think, therefore, that the defendant has paid money into court upon a wrong principle, and that the case must go back to the arbitrator for him to assess the damages to the principles we have laid down.

LIVERPOOL SUMMER ASSIZES.

Monday, Aug. 14, 1871.

(Before the LORD CHIEF BARON (Kelly) and a Special Jury.)

MORRISON v. THE UNIVERSAL MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Marine insurance—Signing "slips"—Usage among underwriters—Stamps on "slips."

Held, that a slip signed by underwriters is not admissible as evidence of a contract of insurance unless stamped.

Held, further, that a custom whereby an underwriter is held bound to issue a policy in accordance with the terms of the "slip," notwithstanding that it was discovered after the signing of the "slip" that the subject matter of the insurance was lost, is bad (a)

THIS was a claim for 500*l.*, the amount of a policy of insurance effected by the plaintiff with the defendants upon a chartered freight which the plaintiff's vessel, the Cambria, was to take in at one of the South American ports and bring to Liverpool. The claim was resisted by the defendants upon the ground that, as they alleged, the policy had been effected by means of fraud, the plaintiff having concealed a material fact which should have been made known to the underwriters.

Holker, Q.C., and Herschell were for the plaintiff, Quain, Q.C., Butt, Q.C., and Mellor for the defendants.

(a) This decision is in entire accordance with a previous dictum of Lord Kenyon in a case of Rogers v. Macarthy, sittings after Hilary Term 1800, cited in a note in Park on Marine Insurance, vol. 1, p. 45, 7th edit., and in Arnould on Marine Insurance, vol. 1, p. 253, 3rd edit. By sect. 7 of the Stamp Act (30 Vict. c. 23), no agreement for sea insurance is valid unless the same is expressed in a policy; and by sect 9 no policy can be given in evidence unless stamped, and as the same section says that the Commissioners of Inland Revenue cannot stamp policies when once signed, the slips can never become policies, and can never be given in evidence.—Ed.

[ADM.]

The evidence material as regards the slip was this:

Mr. Pridgett, assistant underwriter to the company, said Mr. Preville, the plaintiff's broker, called at the office on the 12th Oct. He brought a "slip," and said he had seen Mr. Fisk, and that gentleman had quoted eight guineas per cent. for insurance of the freight of the Cambria. Witness thereupon accepted the risk for 500*l.* at the rate named, and signed the "slip." About a quarter of an hour afterwards he went up to Lloyd's, and saw in the loss book the following entry: "The Cambria (probably the Callao), from New Orleans, aground on the North Breaker." He went to Mr. Preville at once, and said to him, "This is very extraordinary; this looks like the Cambria, which I have underwritten for you," or words to that effect. Mr. Preville replied that he had seen the report before, and that he had investigated the matter, and found that it was the Cameo. After that the policy was made out in the usual way. He considered that the contract was concluded when the "slip" was signed.

Alfred Tozer, the secretary of the company, was called, and asked by Quain whether, if after the signing of the "slips" it came to the knowledge of the underwriters that an important fact which ought to have been communicated before the signing of the "slips" had been withheld, and they intended thereupon to dispute their liability, it was the usage, nevertheless, to execute the policy.

KELLY, C.B. said he was clearly of opinion that if there were any such usage, it was void in law; because it was something almost like fatuity that people who intended to dispute their liability upon a contract entered into should, nevertheless, deliberately execute an instrument repeating and putting under seal the contract in question. It appeared to him to be something so irrational.

Quain said it was not so irrational, as the "slips" were not binding at all, and could not be enforced on either side.

KELLY, C.B.—What is there to prevent them being binding?

Quain.—Because they are not stamped at the time they are initialled.

KELLY, C.B.—I am of opinion if there be such a usage it is a usage intended to defraud the revenue of stamps.

Quain.—Oh no, my lord; on the contrary.

KELLY, C.B. said if people entered into contracts by means of these "slips," which could not be enforced because they were not stamped, the remedy was simple—they must take care to have them stamped.

Quain said a stamped "slip" would not do.

KELLY, C.B.—If a stamped "slip" will not do, a stamped "slip" constitutes no insurance.

In reply to questions by Mr. Holker and by the learned judge, the witness further stated that if a vessel were being insured, and between the signing of the "slips" and the issue of the policy he found out that she had been lost a month previously, he would still issue a policy. He was quite satisfied about that.

In summing up to the jury, KELLY, C.B., said: With reference to the practice of signing "slips" preliminary to the issue of a policy, the Chief Baron said it was his opinion that the "slips" constituted a contract between the parties that the underwriter would execute and deliver, and that the shipowner would accept a policy of insurance upon the terms contained in the "slips." But as these "slips" were not stamped, they were not, under the Stamp Act, admissible in evidence in an action. His lordship drew attention to the fact that the policy was not executed until Oct. 14, so that though there might have been concealment of material facts on the 12th, when the "slips" were signed, it could not be said that there was a concealment of facts known to the plaintiff and unknown to the defendants at the time the policy was executed, because at this time their assistant underwriter had possessed himself of information which was to be found in Lloyd's books, and which was substantially the same as that possessed by the plaintiff. As to the point of honour which induced underwriters to deliver a policy after the signature of the "slips," notwithstanding that material information had been withheld, the Chief Baron said it was mere folly and nonsense to say that any men were bound to put their hand and seal to a contract when both parties understood that they meant something totally different from what was stated in the contract. If he might give a word of advice to the underwriters of Liverpool, he would recommend them, in cases where they found there had been an undue concealment which would vitiate the policy, to append a proviso to the policy.

The jury were unable to agree, and were discharged.

HIGH COURT OF ADMIRALTY (IRELAND).

Reported by ARCHIBALD J. NICOLLS, Esq.,
Barrister-at-Law.

April 15, 17, 18, 19, and 27, 1871.

THE STAFFORDSHIRE.

Bottomry bond—Communication with owner—Bill of exchange—Collateral security—Procedure in colonial court.

A British ship, under a charter from London to Callao, put into Melbourne for repairs. The master, who was also part owner, fearing that the shipwrights would, unless their claims were paid, detain the vessel, and that she might thus be unable to fulfil her charter, raised the necessary funds from the ship's assets at Melbourne upon a bottomry bond of the ship and freight.

Held, that the bond was not invalidated by the absence of previous communication between the master and the co-owner; and that the case was distinguishable from The Panama (L. Rep. 3 P. C. 199; 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 73), and from all those in which the general duty of previous communications is laid down.

Held also, that, although a bottomry transaction cannot be based upon personal security, bills of exchange may be given in addition to the bond.

Held also, that the mortgagees of a ship cannot, for the purposes of such previous communications as is necessary between the party hypothecating the ship and the owner, be deemed an owner; though it may be otherwise if the mortgagee be also the ship's agent and agent for the owner.

Held also, that it may be presumed that the procedure in the Vice-Admiralty Court of Victoria is so far analogous to that in the maritime courts of Great Britain and Ireland, that a shipwright of Melbourne would be entitled to arrest a British ship and detain her until his legal demands upon her were satisfied.

THIS was a cause of bottomry, and the petition, which was instituted on behalf of the Bank of New South Wales, of Old Broad-street, in the city of London, stated, that the Staffordshire, while on a voyage from London to Callao, put into Melbourne, and, being in want of funds necessary to enable her to proceed on her voyage, the master, having no credit at Melbourne, and being unable to obtain the necessary money there, was compelled to and did take up and borrow from Henry Dickson and Walter Williams, of Melbourne, on bottomry of the said vessel and her freight, the sum of 3,265*l.*, for the aforesaid purposes; and by a certain bond of bottomry, dated the 7th Sept. 1869, the master of the said ship hypothecated her and her freight to the said Messrs. Dickson and Williams, their executors, administrators, and assigns, as a security for the said sum, which was thereby made payable to them within seven days next after the safe arrival of the Staffordshire at Callao, with a condition that if the said ship should be lost, cast away, or destroyed before her arrival at the said port, then the said sum should not be recoverable. That, in consequence of the second advance of money, the Staffordshire was enabled to proceed to Callao, where she arrived safely, having earned a considerable freight in respect of her said voyage; that the plaintiffs were now the assignees and lawful owners of the said bond; and that frequent applications had been made to the defendants for payment of the amount due thereon, but that they had neglected and refused to pay the same.

The answer put in by the defendant W. H. Smith, of Hyde-park, will be found set out, so far as is material, in the judgment of the court.

Elrington, Q.C., LL.D., Boyd, LL.D., and Corrigan, LL.D. appeared for the plaintiffs.

Todd, Q.C., Seeds, LL.D., and Madden appeared for the defendant.

The evidence of Mr. Currie and others, taken by commission in London, on the 6th Dec. 1870 and following days, was read at the hearing.

April 27.—TOWNSEND, J.—The facts of this case, which has been so fully and ably discussed, are these: The suit has been instituted to enforce payment of a bottomry bond for 3265*l.*, which was executed at Melbourne, in Australia, on 7th Sept. 1869, by William Barrett, since deceased, who was then the master of the Staffordshire, of London, and a part owner of twenty-two sixty-fourths of that vessel, to Henry Dickson and Walter Williams, ship agents, who have assigned the bond to the plaintiffs, the London Branch of the Bank of New South Wales. Neither the execution nor the assignment of the bond is disputed, but the defendant Mr. W. H. Smith, of London, who is owner of the remaining forty-two sixty-fourths of the vessel, disputes the validity of the bond on several grounds, to which I shall hereafter refer. No other party has appeared in the cause. The bond binds the vessel and her freight to be earned on her then intended voyage from Melbourne to Callao, and from thence to any other port or ports, and it is made payable, with 50 per cent. bottomry premium, within seven days after the arrival of the ship at Callao. The condition of the bond recites that the ship had lately arrived from London at Melbourne; that she was in want of funds to enable her to proceed to Callao, where she was then bound and about to go; and that without such funds she could not proceed. It contains no reference to bills of exchange, or to any other security, collateral or otherwise. Before and at that time, the Staffordshire was subject to a mortgage to Mr. Gumm, of London, which is stated to bear date 22nd Dec. 1868, and to be still subsisting, but it has not been given in evidence in this cause, nor does the exact amount appear which it was intended to secure. On the same day as the date of the mortgage, the owners of the ship (Barrett and Smith) gave Mr. Gumm a letter, which is in evidence, assigning to him all the freights and earnings of the ship, and the insurances effected and to be effected on the ship and freight, empowering him to effect such insurances as he might deem necessary, appointing him their attorney for receiving the freights and insurance moneys, constituting him ship's husband, giving him the sole management of the vessel, and appointing him to be her sole agent at home and abroad. It does not appear that this letter was specially communicated to Messrs. Dickson and Williams, but Mr. Dickson states that he understood that Gumm had the principal management of the ship. The latter, by a letter to Dickson and Williams, dated 19th Feb. 1869, consigned the ship before her arrival at Melbourne to their firm. They had been previously acquainted with Mr. Gumm, and had done business for him as ship's agents. The Staffordshire sailed from London in January 1869 with a cargo for Melbourne. She became leaky on the voyage, and when she anchored at Melbourne it appeared by her log that it had been necessary to keep her pumps going day and night. Captain Barrett placed himself in the hands of Dickson and Williams, as agents for the ship, and in a few days told them that he expected to be obliged to expend about 1000*l.* in repairs, but he did not then mention any other disbursements, nor ask for any advances. This is accounted for by the fact that a sum of 2100*l.* was payable at Melbourne for freight, which sum Messrs. Dickson and Williams were to receive, the ship being consigned to their firm. Dickson states that he knew it was their duty to make the necessary ship's disbursements out of the freight, but they had no reason to suppose they should have occasion to advance anything beyond the amount of that freight; and I do not doubt that he was also at that time confident that the freight would supply a sufficient fund for all the ship's expenditure at Melbourne. When the cargo was discharged it was found necessary to get the ship into dock to be examined and repaired; and it appears to have been necessary to keep the ship waiting for a slip until some days after the 16th July. The repairs were completed, and the vessel got off the slip before the 13th Aug., but the shipwright's bill was not furnished until about the 24th of that month. The only evidence of what then occurred is that of Mr. Dickson. The bond was then executed. Two bills were also drawn by Captain Barrett on Mr. Gumm, one for 3586*l.*, and another for a sum of 19*l*. The former was endorsed by Dickson and Williams to the Bank of New South Wales at Melbourne, and the bond was also made over to the bank in the usual manner. The Staffordshire sailed from Melbourne for Callao on the 11th Sept., the bond being sent in her, with a letter written by Mr. Dickson, with the permission of the bank, instructing Gibbs and Co. of Lima to take the directions of the Bank of New South Wales in London as to enforcing the bond. Dickson states that he informed the captain of the fact, and that if the bill was not honoured the bank would instruct Gibbs and Co. to enforce the bond. These, he says, were the instructions given to the bank. On the day that the vessel left Melbourne Dickson and Williams wrote to Mr. Gumm a letter, which was the first intimation that appears to have been given to anyone in England of any intention to hypothecate the ship, or of the fact that the bottomry bond had been given. Mr. Gumm died in the month of October, before the letter arrived in England. It reached his office in London, as appears from the evidence of Forde, who had been in his employment for some time, who had for a long time the management of the transaction, and who took part in the subsequent transactions respecting the bill in London. Forde says that Mr. Gumm was not advised that funds were needed for the repairs; but a letter to him from Capt. Barrett, dated 13th Aug. 1869, must have apprised him that the repairs were likely to cost about 3000*l*.; and a letter of the same date from Barrett to the defendant stated the same fact, and expressed a doubt as to how he was to get the money. Neither letter alludes to bottomry, or a necessity for it. Dickson left Melbourne on 12th Sept., and arrived in England on 30th Oct. The bill drawn at Melbourne, together with the accounts of Dickson and Williams with Mr. Gumm, reached London on 2nd Nov. On that day the bill was presented at Mr. Gumm's office for acceptance, by direction of Mr. Currie, the secretary of the London branch of the Bank of New South Wales. It was returned to the messenger who presented it, who was merely told that Mr. Gumm was dead. It was not accepted, nor was he referred to Mr. Gumm's executor, or to any other person; nor was any offer made to consider the matter. On the next day the bill was presented again by a notary, and the only answer given was "No advice," whereupon it was protested for non-acceptance. Mr. Gumm's will was not proved until the 10th Dec. 1869; and on the 5th Nov. Mr. Forde wrote a letter, signed by him on behalf of the executors of Gumm, requesting the bank to present the bill again when due. It was never again presented, nor was any direct application ever made to the executors of Gumm respecting it. On the 5th Nov. Mr. Taylor and Mr. Dickson had an interview with Mr. Currie, at which Taylor told Currie there would be no difficulty about making an arrangement as to the bill, but that it could not be done that day; to which Currie replied, "Unless the money is here by four o'clock this afternoon, the bill will go back to the colony." Taylor also states that he had another interview with Mr. Currie in presence of the defendant on the same evening, when the defendant gave to Mr. Currie Ford's letter of the 5th Nov. At this interview one of the directors was also present, who asked, "Why didn't you pay the money?" to which Taylor replied, "You shall have it when due; surely you do not want it before. Nothing seems to have been said respecting acceptance, or about the executors. The next mail for Lima left London on the following day (6th Nov.), and by it Mr. Currie advised Gibbs and Co. that the bill had been dishonoured, and directed them to put the bond in force. On the 11th Nov., before that direction could have reached Lima, and again on the 16th Nov., offers were made by Mr. Forde to Mr. Currie to take up the bill by actually paying the amount. These offers were declined, unless the bank should be indemnified against any consequences that might ensue from the bond being enforced in Callao, where there was likely to be a loss on the sale of the vessel. Mr. Currie's version of this is very different; but his recollection of the transactions is not perfect. Another unsuccessful attempt at negotiation was made on the 16th Nov. The bond was not paid or enforced at Callao, from which port the Staffordshire sailed on her homeward journey about the 25th Jan. 1870, and on her arrival at Queenstown, on the 13th July, 1870, she was arrested in this suit. The defendant then appeared, and on the 21st July gave bail generally for the ship and freight. The petition prays the condemnation of the defendant and the bail in the sum alleged to be due, the bottomry premium, the interest, and the costs of suit. The answer opposes the bond on several grounds: First, that the money was not laid out in expenses necessary to enable the ship to proceed on her voyage; secondly, that the bond was but a collateral security for the amount of the bill, which amount was, it is alleged, tendered to the plaintiffs' manager shortly after the bill arrived at maturity, and was refused by him unless on the terms of getting the guarantee, to which the defendant contends the plaintiffs were not entitled; thirdly, that the freight sought to be attached was not earned on the voyage from Melbourne to Callao, where the sea risk ended, but since, and was earned in respect of a different cargo from that which was on board when the bond was given; fourthly, that neither Dickson and Williams, nor Captain Barrett, communicated with the defendant as to requiring an advance of money, nor as to any intention to get or to give the bond; fifthly, that the bottomry premium is excessive. Two of these defences, the third and fifth, may be at once disposed of. The bond might be good as regards the ship, and yet be invalid as regards the freight, against the mortgagees. But The Jacob (4 Ch. Rob. 245) shows that the mere including of the freight of a subsequent voyage would not of itself invalidate a bottomry bond; and in Parsons on Shipping, vol. 1, p. 160 (where The Zephyr, 3 Mason, 441, is cited), it is stated that a general hypothecation of the freight of a ship is construed to include all the freight of the whole voyage, whether earned at the time the bond is given or not, provided it has not been paid to the master or owner. I have now to determine, in the first place, is the bond valid as a bottomry transaction? The alleged excessive amount of the premium is no objection to the validity of the bond, because, if it be excessive, the court has authority to moderate it: La Ysabel (1 Dod. 277). There is no evidence that the transaction was any fraud between the Melbourne agents and Captain Barrett. It is admitted, and indeed cannot be denied, that a ship agent may, when acting with good faith and integrity, lend money on bottomry, provided that the transaction be in other respects legally valid. And here we have ship agents dealing with a part owner of the ship, and making every reasonable effort to correspond with the gentleman who had consigned her to them; nor is there a single misstatement in any one of their communications with him that had been read. The first ground of objection to the bond cannot, in my opinion, be sustained. If the amount for which the bond was given includes any expenses not necessary for enabling the ship to proceed on her voyage, such expenses may be disallowed in a Court of Admiralty, and a decree might be made for so much as is not open to objection and is sustained by sufficient proof. But I find it is given principally for the shipbuilder's accounts for repairs done, with the concurrence of Captain Barrett, interested as a part owner, and under the inspection of the surveyors of the Chamber of Commerce, to a vessel which could not possibly have gone to sea leaking as described. The questions in the case are thus reduced to two—both very important—the second and the fourth. It is quite certain that the fourth objection is true in fact, whatever be its effect in law. The defendant contends that notice of the intention to hypothecate a vessel must be given to the owner, if possible; and in support of that proposition the cases of The Olivier (Lush. 484) and The Oriental (7 Moo. P. C. 398) have been cited. In the former case Dr. Lushington stated the rule as laid down by the Superior Court to be that the master, before giving a bond on ship and cargo, should, if practicable, correspond with the owners of the cargo, as well as with those of the ship, and receive instructions from them; and that the lender on bottomry, before he enters into an engagement to advance, should satisfy himself that such communications have been made. He says: "The whole question resolves itself into this, Was it reasonably practicable for the master to have any such correspondence with the shippers and consignees of the cargo?" The Oriental (7 Moo. P. C.), decided by the Court of Appeal, lays down the rule that, to justify the agent of the ship in taking a bottomry bond on the vessel, an express communication must be made to the owner, by telegram, if possible. In The Hamburg (Br. & Lush. 253) a question arose on the validity of a bond affecting a cargo; and Lord Kingsdown laid down the rule after the previous cases had been cited. So in The Karnak (sup.), Lord Kingsdown treats the fact of no communication having been made with the owner before the bond was taken as one the effect of which cannot be appreciated without taking it in connection with the other facts of the case. It is, therefore, my duty to examine whether a necessity existed which justified the loan, and whether it was practicable, compatibly with that necessity, to consult the owner previously. No question arises here as to consignees of a cargo; nor would it, I conceive, have been the duty of either the master or the lender to consult the mortgagee merely as such. The mortgagee cannot for that purpose be deemed an owner; though, considering him as ship's agent and agent for Mr. Smith, the case might be different. It is necessary to observe that there is evidence that the mail left Melbourne for England on the 19th June, but one fortnight after the ship's arrival, and before she could be examined on the slip. The next mail left on the 17th July, the next on 14th Aug., and the next appears to have gone on the 13th Sept. On the 19th June Dickson and Williams wrote to Mr. Gumm, informing him that it was expected that the vessel must be docked to be examined, and stating that the captain thought it better not to remit any money on account of freight by that opportunity. They add: "We hope the repairs may not amount to any great sum, but it is hard to say what may be required when the vessel is out of water." That letter was received by Mr. Gumm, and it can hardly be doubted that they knew he was the agent for the owners to receive the freight. They would not have written thus to a mere mortgagee. It seems a fair letter, and was written by an early opportunity. They wrote again by the next mail (16th July), inclosing copy of their former letter, stating that they were since without any of his favours, and informing him of the delay about the slip. This letter also was received, but appears not to have elicited any reply. Was there fraud or concealment here? They write again by the mail of 13th Aug., and inform Gumm that the repairs would cost over 2000*l.*, but they could not give him the exact amount, and they refer him to the captain for the expenditure. They also refer to the "almost impossibility of Capt. Barrett reaching Callao in time to conform to the guano charter." From the documents put in evidence it seems probable that the existence of a charter to Callao was a fact well known to Gumm and to the defendant. On the evidence I cannot have a doubt that the vessel when at Melbourne was under a charter for Callao, which it was deemed of great importance both by the master and agents to fulfil. No charter was entered into at Melbourne, so no confusion can arise in respect of any second document of that nature. Having then evidence of a charter, the time for fulfilling which was the 30th Sept., and that the ship was bound to comply with it, I regard that fact as one of the elements to be considered with reference to the necessity of the case, according to the interpretation of that term given by the Superior Court in the Karnak. The amount of the shipwright's bill appears to have taken both the ship's agents and Capt. Barrett by surprise; but the repairs done were extensive, and Barrett has made no objection to it as unfair. No doubt it would have been the duty of the master to telegraph with the owner if a reply could have been received in time to prevent an obvious loss by delay. But it appears that, even by telegraph, a reply could not have been received from London much, if at all, before Christmas. It has not been argued whether the colonial law at Melbourne enabled the shipwright to arrest the vessel. The statute 26 Vict. c. 24, gave the Vice-Admiralty Courts of certain British possessions, jurisdiction over claims in respect of the repairing of ships of which no owner is domiciled within the possession when the work is done, and the schedule to that Act extends its provisions to the Vice-Admiralty Court of Victoria. I think it may be presumed that the procedure in that court is so far analagous to that in the maritime courts of Great Britain and Ireland, that the shipwright had a right to arrest the ship to satisfy his demands. The circumstance alone, or even his threat to enforce such a right, would not, according to the principle laid down by Lord Stowell in The Augusta (1 Dod. 283), and recognised in The Royal Arch (Swab. 279), justify the granting of a bottomry bond; but, as Dr. Lushington has said in the last-mentioned case, as in the The Vibia (1 W. Rob. 1), there could hardly be a stronger necessity for the execution of a bottomry bond than that a vessel might otherwise be arrested, and either remain under detention or be sold, and that circumstance, combined with others, ought to be taken into consideration. In The Karnak (sup.), as in the present case, the money was required to pay for repairs which had been previously executed, and other charges and expenses incurred in the port of bottomry. The Court of Admiralty held the bond valid, and the decision was upheld on appeal. Dickson did not interfere with the arrangements made by Capt. Barrett; but it is clear, from the judgment in Duncan v. Benson (1 Ex. 554), that a merchant advancing money on bottomry, though bound to show a reasonable cause of unprovided necessity for the advance, from the want of repairs or otherwise, is not bound to inquire into the expediency of incurring those repairs with reference to the interests of the owner. The judgment of Dr. Lushington in The Vibia is to the same effect. Considering all these things, I think this case is distinguished from The Panama (L. Rep. 3 P. C. 199; 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 73), and indeed from all those in which the general duty of previous communication has been asserted. I think the choice of Capt. Barrett was prudent, for his own advantage, and that of his co-owner, was an act of necessity, in the sense in which that term is to be used, where he gave Mr. Dickson the security he required, to avoid the alternative of losing the chance of performing the charter, of leaving the ship unemployed for nearly four months, and possibly of being involved in expensive and ruinous litigation. A wrong choice would have involved a severe loss. There was a necessity, as laid down by Sir W. Erle in the Karnak. Necessity creates the law of bottomry; it supersedes the ordinary rules of conduct, it justifies what it requires, and whatever is just and reasonable in such cases is also legal. Capt. Barrett was himself an owner when he signed the bond. Mr. Dickson says the money was not advanced by his firm on personal credit; I think the facts confirm his statement. He might have been willing to risk something for the benefit of Mr. Gumm, but he was under no obligation to advance 3000*l.* on the personal security of Gumm, whom, it is to be remembered, Capt. Barrett had no authority to bind. I therefore, must conclude that the bond is not invalidated in this particular case by the want of previous correspondence with the defendant respecting it. But there is yet one other question to be determined—namely, whether, although the bond may not be invalid ab initio, the bill for 3586*l.* is to be deemed the primary security, and the plaintiff is precluded by the agreement made between Mr. Dickson and Capt. Barrett to hold over the bond, from now endeavouring to put the bond in suit. It is admitted that there was no tender made in cash of the payment of the bill, but the offer to pay is regarded on all sides as equivalent, for our present purposes, to an actual tender. The defendant is certainly not to be affected by the instructions given to the agents at Lima, and I think this question must turn, not on those instructions, but on the original arrangement. If the bill was the security on which the money was originally advanced, I must agree with the proposition admitted by the plaintiff's counsel, and unquestionable in law, that the subsequent bond could not convert the transaction into a valid bottomry bond. But though it is an indubitable rule that a bottomry transaction cannot be based on personal security, bills of exchange may be given in addition to the bond, and such is a very ordinary practice. [His Lordship here commented upon The Ariadne, 1 W. Rob. 421.] The defence is that the bond was given as a collateral security for the bill. But it is admitted that both securities were collateral with each other; that is according to the plaintiff's construction, the bondholder had his option to contract himself with the bill, or to enforce the bond. That is the usual course. In The Tartar (1 Hag. 1), where a bottomry bond and bills of exchange were given, and the bond was indorsed "an instrument to be considered as a collateral security for bills of exchange drawn by Captain Tharp (master of the vessel), which bills being duly honoured, this bond is to be cancelled and of no effect;" and it was contended that the bond was therefore given manifestly as a security for the bills; Lord Stowell held the bond valid. The considerations to bottomry bonds and to the duty of the court in enforcing them are well stated by Sir C. Robinson, in The Huncliff (2 Hag. 283). I think it of no moment whether we call the bond collateral with the bill, or the bill with the bond, but that the real question is, was the money advanced on the personal credit of Gumm, or was the bond regarded by the parties as the primary security. I think there is no doubt that Mr. Dickson states truly that he did not consent to advance the money except on the clear understanding that the bond should be given, and that the ship should be his security, in case, as he says, the bill was not arranged for. But, undoubtedly, Mr. Dickson and the bank in Melbourne likewise assented to the holding over the bond until the bills had reached London and advice been received thence. The bills were expected to reach London about the time when the ship might be expected to reach Callao; and I do not see anything suspicious or unfair in making the bond payable at Callao, where the risk was to terminate, or in making the bills payable in London about the time when the bond should become due. The holding over the bond was for the advantage of those concerned in the vessel; and if Mr. Gumm had lived, and had at once accepted the bill, and paid it when due, the bond would have become inoperative. However, he was dead; but the person who had the management of the affair of the Staffordshire was still in his office, carrying on his business. Mr. Currie's clerk presented the bill, not indeed to the executor, whom he did not know, but at the office. He is merely told that Mr. Gumm is dead. The following day the bill is again presented by a notary. The only reply is "no advice." Mr. Currie, rightly vigilant, sends out the protest by the next mail, advising the agent at Lima that the bill had not been arranged for, had been, in fact, protested. It may have been unfortunate that the mail left London so soon; it may have been deemed hard by Mr. Forde that his request on behalf of the executors of Mr. Gumm was not complied with, or that Mr. Currie did not delay his letter to Lima or accept subsequent offers of payment. But it is no part of my duty to criticise the mode in which these gentlemen transacted their mercantile business; I am merely to endeavour to ascertain legal rights; and I think the plaintiffs' agent fulfilled the arrangement made between Mr. Dickson and Captain Barrett by presenting the bill for acceptance at Mr. Gumm's office. The circumstances of the case had rendered it impossible that the bill could be accepted by Mr. Gumm, and the gentleman who appeared to be transacting his affairs disclaimed the acceptance. There was no reference made to the executor, no prospect held out that the money would be paid before the departure of the next mail. The bill was not "arranged for" in any sense. This may have been unfortunate, but I cannot charge Mr. Currie with unjustifiable precipitancy merely because he did not think proper to wait the convenience of those who represented Mr. Gumm, or re-present, when due, the bill which had not been accepted, and of the payment of which there was no very strong hope up to the hour when he sent his advices to Lima. I do not think he was bound to accept payment of the bill on any terms different from those which he deemed it his duty subsequently to propose. Now, it has been held that, if a bill be taken in payment, which turns out to be unavailing, the person to whom it is given may at once proceed upon his original demand: (Mussen v. Price, 4 East, 147; Hickling v. Hardy, 7 Taunt. 312). If the drawee refuse to accept, it is not incumbent on the holder to present it a second time for acceptance: (Hickling v. Hardy, 7 Taunt. 312). I cannot involve the original security in the collateral considerations which may arise. It is, indeed, generally true that when the drawee of a bill of exchange is dead, the bill, unless made payable at a particular place, must be presented to his personal representative, and if there be none, the holder should demand acceptance at the house or place of business of the deceased. That would be necessary to enable the holder to sue. But it is the law of this court that the general validity of a bottomry bond is in no degree impaired by the additional security of a bill of exchange, and that the bond may, if necessary, be enforced here in the same manner as if no such security had been taken. I cannot come to the conclusion that Mr. Dickson, if still the holder of the bond, would have been bound, after the transactions of the 2nd and 3rd Nov., to hold his hand with respect to it, and to look to the bill alone for his security, when he had found that the bill did not afford the easy mode of settling his account which he and Capt. Barrett had anticipated. This being my opinion, I need not decide the point whether the bond, being an assignable instrument, is to be regarded, as concerns the plaintiffs, as a bill of exchange in the hands of an indorsee for value. I think it is plain that the master's draft was not duly honoured in England at such a time or in such a manner as to render the enforcement of the bond an illegal proceeding, or so inequitable that I should refuse the aid of this court in enforcing it. The instant the plaintiffs found that the bill was not to be met, they were discharged, in my opinion, from the stay they had imposed on the execution of the bond. The argument that Mr. Currie might have given some more time is surely not one that can have much weight in a court of justice. The very meaning of collateral securities appears to me to be that a creditor may have recourse at his option to either of them. On this ground I do not deem that the original security of the bond has been invalidated by the offers made in London after the notice had been given by Mr. Currie to the agents at Lima, and I must, therefore, pronounce for the validity of the bond. The whole affair has been an unfortunate one; and I would gladly have availed myself of any fair reason to exonerate the vessel from the costs of this litigation; but I can see no just legal grounds for departing from the ordinary principle that a successful litigant is entitled to his costs, and I must give the plaintiffs the general costs of this suit. But I shall refer it to the registrar to take the account and ascertain the sum fairly and properly due in respect of the bond, taking into consideration the several items of the account, the maritime premium, and the interest; and I shall especially reserve the question of the costs of the reference till the return of his report.

THE STAFFORDSHIRE.

Reported by E. D. BENEDICT, Proctor and Advocate in Admiralty.

IN ADMIRALTY.

THE BRIG J. L. BOWEN AND HER CARGO.

Salvage—Mutiny—Furnishing navigation.

A brig was four days out from port when an affray occurred between the officers and four of the crew in which the master was killed, the second mate disabled, and the first mate seriously injured. The first mate was able, however, to do duty, and turning the ship about, sailed her for two days, when a ship came to her, in answer to a signal of distress, and the mate of the ship went on board and navigated her sixty hours to a place of safety. The brig and her cargo were worth 50,000 dols., and a libel was filed by the mate of the ship, on behalf of all interested, to recover salvage.

Held, that it was a clear case for salvage compensation, 3000 dols. salvage was awarded; to the owners of the ship 1600 dols., to her master 450 dols., to the libellant 650 dols., and to her crew 300 dols., according to their wages.

THE brig J. L. Bowen, was bound from New York to Gibraltar, with a ship's company of a master and two mates, a coloured cook and six coloured men before the mast, and with one passenger. The vessel and cargo were worth 50,000 dols. When four days out, on Thursday, June 1, 1871, an affray occurred between four of the seamen and the officers, in which the master was killed, the second mate was so injured that he was incapable of doing duty, and the first mate was very much hurt. He, however, remained on deck at his duty, and headed the vessel back for New York. His orders were obeyed by all the men who were fit for duty, two of the four who were concerned in the disturbance having been disabled. The passenger rendered what assistance he could, but the first mate was the only officer left for duty, and the only man left alive, except the second mate, who understood navigation, and he remained on deck all the time without sleep, from the affray till Saturday morning. On Friday a signal of distress was set, and on Saturday morning the ship Europa, bound from Bremen to New York with a general cargo and 130 passengers, came in sight, noticed the signal of distress, and made for her. The Europa had but one mate, Charles H. Hilmer, and he was the only one on the Europa, except the master, who could navigate the ship. The cook of the brig and one man were sent in a boat to the Europa, and her master was informed of the condition of things, and he sent his mate on board the brig, who had an interview with the mate of the brig, and learned from him what had happened.

THE MISSIONARY v. THE VIRGINIA.

The mate of the brig requested assistance, and Hilmer, having returned to the Europa and reported, went, by permission of the master of the Europa, on board of the brig to assist in her navigation. On board of her he discharged the duties of his position as mate, the first mate of the brig also assisting. The brig reached New York late on Monday night, the services of Hilmer covering a little over sixty hours. The weather was fine all the time, though soon after Hilmer went for service on board of the brig a fog came on, and the vessels lost sight of each other. The Europa reached New York twenty-four hours sooner than the brig did.

Hilmer filed a libel against the brig and her cargo on behalf of himself and all others, claiming salvage compensation. An answer was put in denying that the service was one of great peril or danger, and denying that the brig and her cargo were rescued from any considerable peril, or were in any peril beyond the power of her mariners to control.

For libellant, Beebe, Donohue, and Cooke.

For claimants, Scudder and Carter.

BLATCHFORD, J.—There can be no doubt that the service in this case was a salvage service, in respect of which the owners of the Europa and her master and crew are entitled to a salvage compensation: (The Alphonso, 1 Curtis's C. C. R. 376; The Czarina, 2 Sprague, 48; The Roe, Swabey's R. 48; The Janet Mitchell, id. 3; The Golondrina, L. R. 1 Eccl. & Adm. 334; Jones on Salvage 14.) The only contest in the case is as to the amount to be awarded. The answer avers that the owners of the brig and cargo are willing to make ample compensation for the service rendered, but that the sum demanded has been so unreasonable and inequitable that no settlement could be made. What that sum was is not stated in the answer nor shown by the evidence. The libel specifies no amount, but demands reasonable compensation. In the case of The Alphonso (1 Curtis's C. C. R. 376), the two mates of the Alphonso were disabled, the master was ill with the yellow fever, a signal of distress was flying, and the mate of the salving vessel took command of the Alphonso, and ran her a distance of twenty-three miles to a port of safety, and the Alphonso and her cargo were worth 15,000 dols. The court allowed 750 dols. salvage, giving 300 dols. of it to the mate. In the case of The Czarina (2 Sprague 48), the master and the two mates of the Czarina had been killed, no one was left to navigate her; she and her cargo were worth about 50,000 dols., and the chief mate of the salving vessel was put on board of the Czarina and navigated her for twenty days. The owners, master, mate, and sailors of the salving vessel brought suit, and the court awarded to them 5485 dols., of which the owners received 3500 dols., the master, 800 dols., the first mate, 1000 dols., the second mate 25 dols., and sixteen sailors 10 dols. each. (See also the cases of The Roe, The Janet Mitchell, and The Golondrina, above cited.) In the present case, I think the sum of 3000 dols. is a proper allowance. Of this I award to the owners of the Europa 1600 dols., to her master, 450 dols., to the libellant Hilmer, 650 dols., and to the rest of her crew, 300 dols., to be divided according to their wages. I give the libellant costs.

THE MISSIONARY v. THE VIRGINIA.

Salvage—Loss of salving vessel—Dangers of service—Liability of vessel saved—Negligence.

The V. having got aground, the M. came to her assistance. They were lashed together, the V. being by far the more powerful vessel. The V. got off, but the M. ran upon a snag and made a hole in her bottom, and was lost. The V. had been aground more than a day, and had had ample opportunity of knowing the locality:

Held, that in having failed to make the necessary investigations as to the dangers of the place, and being the chief and controlling motive power, the V. was liable for the services and loss of the M. (a)
OPINION by Drummond, Circuit Judge.

This is an appeal by the claimants of the steam-boat Virginia from a decree of the District Court against them for services and for the loss of the steam ferry-boat Missionary. The libel was filed by the owners of the latter.

The Virginia, while on a voyage from St. Louis to New Orleans, in the fall of 1868, ran on a "log heap" in the Mississippi river, a few miles below New Madrid. She struck with her bow and thus lay fast, with her stern up stream. After several ineffectual efforts to get off by lighting, and by the use of the engines, a message was sent to Cairo for assistance on the evening of 24th Oct. and on the morning of the 25th the Missionary, in answer to the message, arrived and rounded to on the starboard side of the Virginia in a reverse position,—the bow of the Missionary being up stream. They were thus fastened together side by side, the stern of the Missionary and the bow of the Virginia being nearly opposite to each other. They were, however, of very unequal length. The Virginia was of considerable size and power,—226ft. long, 860 ton burthen, and had on board at the time she struck 450 tons of freight. The Missionary was 138ft. long, and about 100 tons burthen. After the arrival of the Missionary, about sixty tons of freight—more or less—were removed from the Virginia to the Missionary. It was then resolved that another effort should be made to get the Virginia off. The undisputed facts are, that the two were fastened together at the time in the manner stated, steam raised on both and the engines of each put in operation at about the same time; the Virginia was thus backing and the Missionary trying to go ahead. Very soon both started, and the result was that the Virginia got off the “log heap” and the Missionary ran on a snag, stove a hole in her bottom, and shortly after sunk and became a loss, except to some part of her machinery. The libellants claim that the captain of the Virginia took entire control of the Missionary, and that the former is liable for the loss as an act of negligence as well as for the value of the services rendered. On the other hand it is insisted the Missionary was under the management of her own officers and men, and took the ordinary risks incident to a salvage service. These facts are established in addition to those already mentioned; the two steamers were fastened together by the joint act of the officers and men of both. (It is not material who attached the lines.) The co-operation of the Missionary in removing the Virginia from the “log heap,” was with the consent and acquiescence of the officers of the Missionary. Webb, the quasi captain of the Missionary, and Kauffmann, the engineer (who, if Webb was not, was the captain) agreed to assist by the action of the engines in getting the Virginia off. But this seems to have been the extent of the aid given by the Missionary. The general direction and control of the movement was with the Virginia. If it be conceded the services of the Missionary was a salvage service, which is apparently the footing upon which the libellants seek to place it, then it involved the ordinary risks of that kind of service, and no more. It may be admitted that if a steamer, in trying to save a stranded vessel by its own motive power, is lost or injured by the movement, it is one of the necessities of the service, and is a risk assumed as such. It is because as well of the peril to the vessel or property saved, as the risk to the salvor, that courts of admiralty allow more than a quantum meruit compensation. If the Missionary had, in this case, been the sole motor, a more rigid measure of responsibility would have attached. And the case must turn mainly on this: Whose peculiar duty was it under the circumstances to foresee and guard against the possible consequences of success in the effort which was about to be made? The Virginia had employed the Missionary to aid in the relief without any special contract as to the terms on which it was to be effected. The former was many times larger and more powerful than the latter, and in case of motion, even though lashed together, would substantially control the Missionary. It was therefore the duty of the Virginia, in a special manner, to explore the spot that might be passed over in the movement proposed to be made, and to see that there was no obstacle in the way which would be likely to cause disaster. The fact that the officers of the Missionary acquiesced in the demand made for the assistance of the engines, did not make them responsible farther than for the consequences necessarily growing out of such consent. If the case had been reversed, and the Virginia had been lost, it could scarcely be maintained in the absence of wilful fault on the part of the Missionary, that the latter would have been liable for the loss, or even for an apportionment of the loss: (2 Parsons on Shipping, 263.) The Virginia had been on the “log heap” more than a day, and had had every opportunity of examination; in fact, had sounded, in order to ascertain the depth of water. The Missionary was employed by the Virginia to perform a special service—to aid in moving the latter from the “log heap.” If the assistance rendered had been that of lighting only, there can be no doubt it would have been the duty of the Virginia to take reasonable care of the Missionary, and the Missionary in such case could scarcely be held accountable for the dangers of navigation, and the fact that the officers of the Missionary merely assented to the action of the engineers, cannot change the rule. Webb, on the Missionary, gave notice to the captain of the Virginia of the approaching danger. It is asserted the warning was not heard, but it at least shows that some of the parties foresaw the peril of the movement—something which the Virginia ought also to have foreseen, and guarded against. The evidence shows that if proper vigilance and prudence had been used by the Virginia, the disaster might have been prevented. The open snags could have been seen, the hidden ones discovered. The District Court allowed 500 dols. as the value of the services rendered, and 4000 dols. for the loss or damage. I shall not give any interest on the decree of the District Court, but will affirm the decree as the decree of this court for that amount as found of the present date.

(a) This case is calculated to mislead, as it would almost induce us to suppose that a salvor is not entitled to recover compensation for loss of his vessel, except in case of negligence on the salved vessel. We fail to see the necessity for deciding the case on the question of negligence. It is a well recognised practice in courts of Admiralty to award compensation for loss and damage sustained in rendering salvage services, quite independently of any negligence on the part of the salved vessel: (The Saratoga, Lush. 318.) In one instance a lugger, rendering salvage service, was crushed and sunk, and Dr. Lushington gave her owners compensation, saying that where a vessel was injured in rendering salvage service, the presumption was that the injury arose from the risk and necessity of the service, and that if the salvees alleged negligence, the onus of proof lay upon them: (The Thomas Blyth, Lush. 16.) It is quite clear that if there was negligence on the part of the Virginia, she was liable as in an ordinary case of damage, but where she is liable to pay for the damage in another way it is dangerous to introduce a doctrine capable of misconstruction. The question asked, as to "whose duty it was to foresee and guard against the possible consequences of success?" has nothing to do with the real question of whether the vessel was injured whilst performing a salvage service, and would imply that negligence alone created liability.—Ed.

JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

(Present: the Right Hon. Sir JAMES W. COLVILLE, Sir JOSEPH NAPIER, Lord Justice JAMES, and Lord Justice MELLISH.)

THE ORIENT.

Damage—Pleading—Special defence—Costs—Judgment for same cause of action at law—Right of parties to decision of issues on the record.

Where there has been a mistake on a matter of law that governs or affects costs, the party prejudiced is entitled to have the benefit of correction by appeal.

Defendants in a cause in the Admiralty Court may prove a special defence under a general traverse, if such defence is no surprise to the plaintiffs, and on such defence being established, the defendants are entitled to costs.

When a special defence is raised on the pleadings, if such defence is established, and even though the case is concluded under the general traverse, the defendants are entitled to judgment and costs on the second defence.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Admiralty Court in a cause of damage instituted by the respondents against the appellants. The respondents, in their petition alleged that the damage complained of was attributable solely to the acts of the owners of the Orient and their servants. The answer to the petition set out, first, a general traverse or denial of the statements in the petition; and, secondly, a special defence, "that the cause of action in the said petition mentioned, and also the damage sought to be recovered for in this cause by the plaintiffs, are respectively the same cause of action, and the same damage in respect of which the plaintiffs commenced an action in her Majesty's Court of Common Pleas, and afterwards, and before the institution of this suit, obtained judgment therein, in which said judgment the said cause of action became and was merged, and which said judgment was satisfied before the commencement of this suit." The reply admitted such action, but set out that it was brought to recover compensation for trespass to, and wrongful detention of, the ship, and that this suit was to recover for damages done by the Orient to the respondent's vessel, and that this was a proceeding in rem and against different defendants. At the trial it appeared that the Orient was placed in the position in which she did the damage by a person who had possession of the ship simply for the purposes of completion and sale, and who was neither owner nor a servant of the owners of the Orient: but these facts did not appear on the pleadings. The appellants declined to amend their pleadings, and requested the learned judge to hear and determine the other issues raised on the record. His Lordship dismissed the suit, but held that, as the defence had not been specially set forth in the pleadings he was bound to give no costs to the defendants. He also held that in consequence of his being bound to act upon the evidence as to the possession he was not bound to take into consideration the second part of the defence, although it was properly pleaded and proved, and his judgment was required upon it by counsel for the defendants. The suit was dismissed without costs being given to the defendant either on the general or the special issue: (ante, vol. 3, p. 321.)

PRIV. CO.

THE ORIENT.

Butt, Q.C., Cohen and Bullen for the appellants.—This is not an appeal for costs merely, but there has been a misapprehension on the part of the Admiralty Court.

Attenborough v. Kemp, 14 Moore, P. C. C. 351;

5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 67;

10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 142.

The case must be proved secundum allegata, and here the petition alleges that the ship was in the hands of the defendants' servants, and it was not: The Haswell (Bro. & Lush. 247.) The plaintiff must establish his case: The East Lothian (14 Moore, P. C. C. 173.) The plaintiff was entitled to a decision in the second defence, if that would have entitled them to costs.

The Admiralty Advocate (Dr. Deane, Q.C.) and Cottingham for the respondents.—The defence set up at the trial was a surprise to the plaintiffs and ought to have been pleaded. The court exercised a discretion as to costs, and ought not to be interfered with. Bona fide care was used:

Attenborough v. Kemp (sup.);

Richards v. Birley, (sup.).

If the first objection to the suit was fatal, there was no necessity for inquiring into the second.

Judgment was delivered by Sir JOSEPH NAPIER, after a summary of the proceedings in the court below.—Now, the first duty with regard to the reception of evidence upon which a court has to act in a suit, is to see that the fact which the evidence is offered to prove or disprove, has been sufficiently put in issue by the pleadings. Here there is a comprehensive denial of each and all of the material allegations in the petition. It was just defence on the part of the owners of the Orient, who are sought to be made responsible in this proceeding, although not resident in England. They in effect say to the plaintiffs, "We require you to establish and prove the essential allegations in your petition, one of which is, that the damage of which you complain was done by us, or by some one for whose acts we are responsible. If we are (as you allege) legally responsible, you have been legally satisfied by a proceeding at law in an action in which you had the opportunity of making the best case you could as to your claim for this damage." It appears on the admissions of the plaintiffs, that before this proceeding was commenced, the sum for which judgment was recovered in the action at law had been paid. If the security for damages adjudged and not paid was insufficient, or if the owners of the ship were responsible but insolvent, the plaintiff would have had a cumulative remedy by proceeding in rem in the Court of Admiralty; but it could only be to realise one compensation for the same cause of action. Where there is a remedy both in personam and in rem, a person who has resorted to one of the remedies may, if he does not get thereby fully satisfied, resort to the other. Here the plaintiffs proceeded against the party who was the primary trespasser, and properly responsible. The amount of compensation for the damage which the law had reduced to certainty in the action had been paid; and having been by the law so reduced to certainty, and the amount having been paid before the commencement of this proceeding, there was an end of the matter both in law and justice. A question is made as to what the effect of the general traverse is as to costs of the defence admissible under it, when proved; whether the judge was bound to decide the other issue raised by the special defence, which became material only so far as related to the costs on that issue; and whether the judgment, as involving costs only, was subject to an appeal. Their Lordships do not mean to question or recede from the decisions that have been pronounced about not allowing an appeal for costs, but where there has been a mistake upon some matter of law that governs or affects costs—some matter that involves the due application of principles of law—the party prejudiced is entitled to have the benefit of correction by appeal. At common law, where there are several issues raised by the pleadings, it may be that some are found to be quite immaterial, and the judge at the trial has the powers of discharging the jury from finding a verdict on such; but as to those that involve a substantial question of costs, the party interested has a right to have the proper findings entered on the record, in order to secure the costs to which he is lawfully entitled on such issues: R. v. Johnson, 6 Cl. & Fin. 60.) The plaintiffs are here proceeding against parties who are resident in a foreign country, and they seek to make their claim available against the vessel of the defendants, who have a right to call upon the plaintiffs to prove the allegations in their petition. It seems to their Lordships to be the effect of the general traverse and denial, that it puts in issue the material allegations in the petition of the plaintiffs, and requires them to prove their case as alleged. According to the general rule of law, as stated by Serjeant Williams (2 Saund. 158, a. n. 3), whatever facts a plaintiff or a prosecutor is bound to prove on the general issue pleaded, the defendant may controvert the truth of, by opposite evidence. Here a material allegation is that the damage to the ship of the plaintiffs was done by the owners of the Orient or their servants, and therefore it was open to the defendant, under the general traverse, to controvert the truth of this allegation, which the plaintiffs were, on the other hand, called on to sustain. The law of the Court of Admiralty is laid down in the case of the East Lothian (4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 487); 14 Moo. P. C. 173), followed and further explained by the judgment delivered by Lord Kingsdown, in the case of the Minnehaha (4 S. T. Rep. N. S. 810; 15 Moo. P. C. 133.) In the case of the East Lothian, where the defendant in answer to the petition stated a particular defence, in addition to the denial of the plaintiff's case, it was held that he was not bound to prove his special defence as pleaded, but that he was at liberty to avail himself of the failure of the plaintiff to make out the case alleged in the petition. The distinction is taken and explained between the case on the part of the plaintiff and that on the part of the defendant. The plaintiff is bound to state distinctly what his gravamen is and the defendant has a right to call on him to prove it as it has been stated. If the plaintiff fail in this, the defendant may say—that is in itself a good defence for me, albeit that I am unable to prove the special defence which I have put forward. In the judgment delivered by Lord Chelmsford, after having pointed out that the defendant might have contented himself with a denial of the plaintiff's allegation (14 Moo. P. C. 181), his Lordship says: "An erroneous allegation of the mode in which the injury occurred, made by way of answer to a libel, does not narrow the issue down to the particular fact alleged, so as to entitle the complaining party to recover, if the proof of it should fail. He must rely on the establishment of his own case, and not upon the failure of his adversary, and must succeed upon the truth of his own allegation, or not at all." It is said that in a suit in the Court of Admiralty, if the defence be not distinctly pleaded, the plaintiff might be taken by surprise. Now there was no difficulty as to this in the present suit. It was open to the plaintiffs, if they had grounds sufficient, to have applied to the court to alter or amend or set aside the general traverse as embarrassing. By the 77th rule of 1859 every pleading shall stand admitted, if within four days from the filing, the adverse proctor does not file a notice of motion objecting to the admissibility thereof. No such notice was filed, and no application was made by the plaintiffs, and therefore it must be taken that they consented to go to trial on the pleadings as they stood. It does not appear that in fact there was any ground of surprise. On the contrary, the learned judge in his judgment points out that he was himself obliged to take judicial cognisance from the report of the proceedings in the action at law (which was put in evidence) that the plaintiffs could not have been ignorant that Mr. Yeo was only an agent of the owners of the Orient for the purposes of sale: There was no case then for the exercise of equitable interference, because there was no danger of doing any injustice to the plaintiffs, by adhering to the general rule of law, as to the sufficiency of the general traverse to put in issue every material allegation of the plaintiffs. In the judgment in the Minnehaha, where the question was whether negligence could be relied on as a defence where it had not been specially pleaded—Lord Kingsdown says: "It is then contended by the appellants that as to negligence or error in judgment there is no case brought forward by the answer, and that the court is precluded from inquiry into the matter. We are not prepared to go that length. The claimants must prove their own case, they must show that the ship being in danger, from no fault of theirs, they performed services which were not covered by their towage contract, and did all they could to prevent the danger." (15 Moo. P. C. 158.) He afterwards says: "Though we think that the appellants must make out their own case, and that the objections to which we have referred are open to the respondents, still in judging of the effects of the evidence we must have regard to the degree of notice which was given by the respondents to the appellants of the nature of the objections on which it was intended to rely. Certainly the defence here is framed that although it puts in issue all the facts alleged by the appellants, it does not give them notice of any particular point to which their evidence should be especially directed." The general traverse was taken to be legally sufficient to put in issue the allegations that were material to the plaintiff's case, but subject to such equitable treatment as would give no undue advantage to the defendant from not having put forward his defence specially. Here the essential defect in their case was known to the plaintiffs before the suit was commenced; the defence as pleaded required them to prove their case; they made no application to the court to amend or set aside the general traverse, or for leave to discontinue the suit, but when the evidence of Mr. Yeo was given they admitted that their proceeding against the defendants could not be maintained. The court certainly was not bound to interfere in order to assist a proceeding which was admitted to be unfounded; and this must be taken to have been known to the plaintiffs and their advisers, before this suit was commenced. It was an abuse and perversion of the procedure of the Court of Admiralty for the unjust and illegal purpose of trying to augment the compensation, which had been legally assessed and paid to the plaintiffs—in respect moreover of acts done, for which these defendants were not responsible in any court. As to the general traverse, it was legally sufficient to put the plaintiffs upon strict proof of their case, and to admit the defendants to controvert any of the material allegations in the petition. If these were put in issue in a form that was embarrassing, the remedy was by a motion to the court. If the form was inadmissible and insufficient, the evidence of Mr. Yeo as to his limited agency ought to have been objected to on the part of the plaintiffs; the learned judge ought to have been called on not to receive it; or when it was found what the effect of it was, he should have been requested to strike it out of his notes as inadmissible. A judge is not at liberty to act upon evidence that he does not hold to be admissible on some one of the issues raised by the pleadings. Indeed, the learned judge of the Court of Admiralty said that he "must not reject the evidence, but must apply, it to the general averments and denial." How could this be allowed unless these averments and denial were legally sufficient? He was not required by the plaintiffs to exercise an equitable control, or to make any order alleged to be material to the assertion of the plaintiffs' rights. The leading counsel for the plaintiffs not having objected to the admissibility of the evidence of Mr. Yeo, and having admitted that it could not be controverted, upon that issue and upon the very right of the case, there was an end of the plaintiffs' suit, which ought never to have been commenced. But, although there was so far an end of the case, it did not follow that the other defence that was raised was not also to be decided as required on behalf of the defendants as material to them, at least in respect of cost. Their Lordships, therefore, are of opinion that the defence admitted under the general traverse, and established by Mr. Yeo's evidence, should have been followed by the legal result as to costs; and as to the other defence, that it ought also to have been decided in favour of the defendants, with a like result as to costs. It is only necessary to look into the pleadings and proceedings in the action, and at the way in which the learned Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas left the case to the jury, to see that, in point of law, the claim for damage to the plaintiffs' ship was substantially comprehended, and compensation was adjudged in that action. This has been paid, and the present suit should not have been instituted. There Lordships, therefore, will humbly recommend Her Majesty that this appeal be allowed, and that the judgment that has been pronounced by the learned judge of the Admiralty be varied, by directing that the suit be dismissed with costs; the appellants to have their costs of this appeal.

Judgment reversed.

BYRNE v. SCHILLER AND OTHERS.

Ship and Shipping—Charter party—Prepayment on account of freight—Failure of voyage by loss of cargo—Freight not earned—Construction of charter—Difference between English and foreign rule of maritime law.

The plaintiff, by charter party between him and the defendants, chartered a vessel to the defendants for a homeward voyage from Calcutta, with an option to the defendants to send the vessel on an intermediate voyage at a rate of freight mentioned in the charter, "such freight to be paid as follows: 1200l. in rupees to be advanced to the master by the freighter's agents at Calcutta, against his receipt, to be deducted together with 1½ per cent.

commission on the amount advanced, and cost of insurance, from freight on settlement thereof, and the remainder, on right delivery of the cargo at port of discharge, in cash as customary." The charter party contained another clause as follows: "The master to sign bills of lading at the current rate of freight required, without prejudice to the charter party, but not under chartered rates, except the difference be paid in cash."

The defendants elected to exercise their option of sending the vessel on an intermediate voyage, and paid the above-mentioned 1200l. and prevailed upon the master to sign bills of lading below the chartered rate without being paid the difference in cash, on the understanding that such difference, amounting to 737l. would be paid upon completion of the full cargo. The difference was not paid, the defendants refusing to pay it, and contending that they had fulfilled the obligation imposed on them by the charter party in that respect by the payment of the 1200l.

The vessel was lost in the river on her way out to sea from Calcutta on the intermediate voyage: and in an action by the plaintiff to recover the above difference of 737l. it was.

Held, by the Court of Exchequer Chamber (affirming the judgment of the court below), that the shipowner, the plaintiff, was entitled to recover the amount of the difference between the two rates of freight, notwithstanding that the freight had not been earned by reason of the loss of the cargo. A payment made in advance of freight was not recoverable, even though the cargo was lost, and by the terms of the charter party the payment was to be a payment in the nature of freight, and not on indemnity pro tanto to the shipowner for the loss of his lien; and, therefore, inasmuch as if the defendants had paid it in advance, they could not have recovered it back again on the loss of the cargo, the plaintiff is now entitled to recover it from them, it never having been paid to him.

THIS was error brought by the defendants on a special case in an action upon a charter party, dated 4th Feb. 1868, by which the plaintiffs' ship Daphne was chartered to the defendants for a voyage from Calcutta to London or Liverpool.

The clauses of the charter party which are material to this report are the two following:

The freighters are to have the option, to be declared within twenty days of the vessel's arrival at Calcutta, of sending her, subject to the general provisions of the charter party, on one intermediate voyage from Calcutta, at their option either to Port Louis, Mauritius, or to Colombo, with a full and complete cargo of rice in bags, paying freight on the same at and after the rate, if to Port Louis, of Rs1 12s.; and if to Colombo, of Rs2 8s. per bag of rice delivered, such freight to be paid as follows: 1200l. in rupees to be advanced the master by the freighters' agents at Calcutta against his receipt, and to be deducted, together with 1½ per cent. commission on the amount advanced, and cost of insurance, from freight on settlement, and the remainder, on right delivery of the cargo at port of discharge, in cash, as customary.

And in a subsequent clause it was provided as follows:—

The master to sign bills of lading at current rates of freight required, without prejudice to the charter party, but not under chartered rates except the difference be paid in cash.

The defendants elected to send the vessel on the intermediate voyage to Port Louis, and required the master to sign bills of lading at Calcutta for Port Louis, at rates considerably under the chartered rates; and they induced him so to sign them on board, without being paid in cash the difference between the two rates of freight, upon their assurance that all would be settled upon the completion of the lading of the vessel. According to the chartered rate, the total freight would have amounted to 3382*l.*, which was 737*l.* more than the amount of the bills of lading freight. Upon the vessel being about to sail, the master demanded payment of this difference (737*l.*) from the defendants, but they refused to pay it, and claimed to set off against it the advances made by them on account of the vessel. The difference, therefore, was not paid, and the vessel sailed on her voyage and was lost in the river on her way out to sea.

(a) The argument in this case was commenced and part heard after Hilary Term last (Saturday, Feb. 11), before Cockburn, C.J., and Willes, Keating, Mellor, M. Smith, Lush, and Brett, J.J., but as the court was now differently constituted, it was thought advisable to commence it again from the beginning.

The present action was then brought to recover the difference, amounting to 737*l.*, and the Court of Exchequer gave judgment in favour of the plaintiff (the shipowner), holding that he was entitled not only to the 1200*l.* which had been paid to the master, and which was to be taken as an advance on account of freight and not as a payment by way of loan; but also to the difference of 737*l.* the united amount of the two sums not exceeding the amount of the freight according to the chartered rates (see case fully reported below, ante vol. 3, p. 514; L. Rep. 6 Ex. 20; 40 L. J. 40, Ex.).

Upon that judgment the defendants brought error, and the question for the opinion of the Court of Exchequer Chamber was whether or not the plaintiff was entitled to recover this sum of 737*l.*

Butt, Q.C. (with him was Baylis) for the defendants, said that the main question for decision by the court in this case was whether a prepayment of freight having been made, and the contract having failed by reason of the loss of the cargo, the sum so prepaid can be recovered back by the charterer where there is nothing in the terms of the charter party expressly preventing it, or whether such a prepayment is absolute, final, and unconditional, and irrecoverable, even though the cargo be lost and the freight be never earned? The true rule, taking the English and American authorities together, is that it is recoverable in the absence of an express indication in the terms of the charter party of an intention to the contrary, and this is the rule adopted by the codes of all other European countries. The plaintiff contends that money so prepaid is not recoverable by our law, but if that be so our law is directly opposed to that of every other country in Europe, and also to that of America. In Watson v. Duykinck (3 Johnson's Rep. 335, American), decided so long ago as 1808, Kent, C. J., after saying that little light was afforded on the point by the English authors, says, "Cleirac in his commentary on the judgments of Oleran, Art. 2, No. 9 (Les Usages et Coutumes de la Mer. p. 42) declares that in cases of shipwreck the master is bound to render to the merchants the advances which they may have made upon the freight, and he cites a decision of one early jurist confirming his doctrine. The Ordonnance de la Marine (tit. du Fret, Art. 18), recognises the old rule, and ordains that if goods be lost by the perils of the sea, the master shall be holden to refund the freight which had been previously advanced to him, unless there be a special agreement to the contrary, containing (according to Valin, in his Commentary on the Ordonnance, tom. 1, p. 661) an express stipulation that the advance by money shall be retained in any event which may happen in the course of the voyage. The principle is that freight is a compensation for carriage of the goods, and if, after prepayment the goods be not carried, owing to any accident for which the shipper is not responsible, then it forms the ordinary case of money paid upon a consideration which happens to fail." The learned Chief Justice alludes to a dictum of Saunders, C.J., in an anonymous case in 2 Show, 283, seeming to imply that money advanced for freight was in no event to be refunded, but he says he places no reliance upon that very imperfect report in opposition to the explicit opinion of various writers whom he refers to. The rule is established and acted on in America is clearly stated in 1 Parsons on Shipping (p. 210), where it is said: "Sometimes the freight money is paid in advance, in whole or in part, or other advances are made to the owner of the ship. Then, if the goods are not delivered, or the voyage not performed, under circumstances which would give the shipowner no right to claim freight if it had not been paid, the question arises whether he is bound to pay it back;" and a little further on it is said: "It is now quite certain that if the payment be merely a payment of freight in advance, it must be repaid, if freight is not earned." In support of that proposition, the judgment of Story, C.J., in Pitman v. Hooper (3 Sumner's Rep. 50), is cited where at page 56, he says: "Besides in the ordinary case of freight paid in advance, I do not understand that, if the voyage is not performed, the owner can, without an express stipulation to the purpose, retain it, but the shipper is entitled to recover it back;" and further on he says: "I am aware that some of the English cases look the other way, and whilst they admit the doctrine, fritter it away upon very nice distinctions." The following more recent American authorities are also to the same effect, showing that the rule has been uniformly followed there:

Minturn v. Warren Insurance Company, 2 Allen's Rep. 86;

Benner v. Equitable Safety Insurance Company, 6 Allen's Rep. 222;

Griggs v. Austin, 3 Pick. Rep. 20.

The same doctrine is found laid down also by Roccus, in his work De navibus et Naulo, Art. 80, and p. 288, and the like rule is adopted by the Code de Commerce, Art. 302 (French), as well as by the codes of Italy, Spain, Holland, and Germany. There are some English cases, too, which support the view of the defendants, viz., Mashiter v. Buller (1 Campb. 84), and Leman v. Gordon (8 C. & P. 392), where the law was laid down in the same way by Lords Ellenborough, C.J., and Abinger, C.B., respectively, and in Blakey v. Dixon (2 B. & P. 321), the general principle that freight was due only on performance of the voyage was clearly stated. It cannot be denied, however, that the majority of the English authorities show that the rule as construed and acted upon in America and on the Continent does not prevail in this country. All these cases would seem to be founded upon the before mentioned anonymous case (in 2 Shower's Rep. 283), but upon a careful scrutiny of them, and the point decided in each, distinctions may be drawn sufficient, it is submitted, to prevent their being of such undeniable authority as to prevail against the rule which is in force and operation in every other country. The following are the cases in question:

No doubt the English rule differs to a certain extent from the American and continental rule, that express words are not necessary, but none of them go so far as to say that some distinct indication of intention is unnecessary, and it is open to this court, sitting in error, to correct or depart from the previous decisions on this point, if they see fit so to do. But the defendants deny any intention that this should be a prepayment on account of freight. The intention was that it should be an indemnity pro tanto to the shipowner for the loss of his lien. The two clauses of the charter are perfectly independent of one another. Nothing is to be paid on account of the difference unless the difference exceeds 1200*l.*, and even then it is not to be paid absolutely. The consideration was the right delivery of the cargo at its destination, which has totally failed, and if the defendants had paid this money they could have recovered it back, and therefore it is open to them now, in order to avoid circuits of action, to set off that right of recovery as a defence to the plaintiff's claim in the present action. [COCKBURN, C.J.—We are all agreed that the law is too firmly settled for us to depart from it even in a court of appeal, that where freight is paid in advance it cannot be recovered back. The plaintiff's counsel will therefore address themselves only to the question whether, under the terms of the charter party, the payment here was a payment on account of freight. The general principle we cannot shake, though we are not inclined to extend it any further.]

Millward, Q.C. (with him was R. G. Williams), for the plaintiff, urged that but for the special clause in question the charterers could not call upon the captain to sign bills of lading for any but the chartered rates. The immediate payment of the difference in cash is the price paid by them for the exercise of their option, and it would be inconsistent with the whole tenor of the contract, and particularly with the words that the difference should be "paid in cash" to construe this payment as anything but a payment in advance of freight. He cited

Yeames v. Lindsay, 3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 855; and was then stopped.

Butt, Q.C. did not reply.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I am of opinion that the judgment of the court below in favour of the plaintiff must be affirmed, and upon the ground that, looking at the language of the clause in the charter party in question, the true construction of it is, that the payment of the difference to be made under and according to it was to be a payment on account of freight. Now it is settled by the numerous authorities, which have been cited before us in the course of the argument, that, by the law of England, such payment in advance on account of freight cannot be recovered back in the event of the goods being lost, and the freight consequently not becoming payable. I very much regret that the law is so. It seems to me, I must confess, to be founded upon an erroneous principle, and to be anything but satisfactory; and I am emboldened to say this much because I find that the highest American authorities have settled the law of America upon directly opposite principles, and that the law of all other European countries is in conformity with the American, and contrary to our law in this respect. Indeed, it seems that the rule of law has been so settled in France and Germany for a very long period of time. Valin even doubts the wisdom and propriety of any exception whatever being allowed to the rule that an advance on account of freight must be repaid in the event of the goods being lost, and the freight not becoming payable; and I see by Bedarride's great work upon mercantile law (Bedarride Comm. on the Code de Commerce, vol. 2, p. 436) that at the time of framing and settling the Code de Commerce, the question was very seriously and anxiously discussed, whether such an exception should be introduced into the code, but that eventually the principle of the freedom of contracts prevailed, and the exception was inserted in art. 302 of the code (a) which provides that, in the absence of any stipulation to the contrary, a payment in advance on account of freight shall be recovered back in the event of freight not being earned, by reason of the loss of the goods. The article in question is as follows: "Il n'est dû aucun fret pour les marchandises perdues par naufrage ou échouement, pillées par des pirates, ou prises par des ennemis. Le capitaine est tenu de restituer le fret qui lui aura été avancé, s'il n'y a convention contraire." However, whatever may be the right and true principle, I quite agree in thinking that the authorities which have been cited, founded probably on the ill-digested case in 2 Shower's Rep. p. 283, and which have been acted on ever since, to the contrary of the general European doctrine, are much too strong to be overcome; and that, if the law is to be altered, it must be by means of distinct legislation for the purpose, and not by judicial decisions to the contrary. That being so, we have to consider the clause of the charter party in question, and to see whether the payment thereby required to be made, in the event of the master being called upon to sign bills of lading at a lower rate than the charter party freight, was intended to be a prepayment on account of freight, final and conclusive, or whether it was, as has been contended for by the learned counsel for the defendants, merely handing over the difference to the master, with the view of making good, pro tanto, the loss of lien to the shipowner which would be so caused. Now, although I should be very glad to think that we could take the case out of the general rule, with which we are, as I have before said, dissatisfied, and which we by no means desire to see extended, still, when we come to look closely at the words of the agreement contained in the charter party, we must, I think, hold that the payment in question was a payment in advance on account of freight. I am very much struck with the use of the word "payment." I agree with Mr. Millward as to the meaning of that word there, and think with him, that this payment means primâ facie payment on account of the freight to which the shipowner would have been entitled in the event of the goods arriving at their ultimate destination. The shipowner is entitled to payment according to certain rates agreed upon and stipulated for in the charter party. But the charterers have stipulated on their side for the option, in case they find that they cannot get these rates, of calling upon the master to sign bills of lading for the conveyance of the goods at a lower rate; and, on the other hand, the shipowner has said, "Very well; by doing that the security which I have by my lien on the goods as freight is endangered to the extent of the difference between the two rates of freight, and, therefore, if you insist upon this being done, I, upon the other hand, shall insist upon your paying me down this difference at once, in cash, once and for all, so that, come what may so much of the freight at all events will be secured." That, in my opinion, is what the shipowner would be perfectly warranted in insisting upon, and I can see nothing unreasonable, or in the least savouring of extortion on his part, in his doing so, and claiming that, if the reduced rate of freight is to be signed for, the difference between it and the chartered freight shall be paid at once, and so that part of the original rate of freight shall be wiped out of the transaction. Looking at all the circumstances and there being nothing unreasonable in the shipowners' so insisting, and looking at the language of the charter party, the word "freight" being the word used, and seeing that the document contains no expression of any intention that this payment should be merely a substitute for the lien, and nothing at all inconsistent with its being a payment in advance on account of freight, I cannot come to any other conclusion than that the parties intended that this payment should be a payment on account of freight pro tanto, and so be wiped out of the transaction. I cannot get over the words of the charter party. That being so, the moment we arrive at the conclusion that this was a payment on account of freight, the case falls within the general rule, and the payment could not have been recovered back if it had been made. Inasmuch, therefore, as if it had been paid to the plaintiff, it could not have been recovered back from him, the plaintiff is now entitled to recover it from the defendants, it never having been paid to him. I think therefore that our judgment should be for the plaintiff, and that the judgment of the Court of Exchequer should be affirmed.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. If we were free to decide this case independently of authority, we might feel inclined to decide it in favour of the defendants, but the current of authority, though flowing from a somewhat feeble spring, is far too strong for us to resist it. It is binding, not only upon us, sitting here as a court of error, but also, probably, upon the highest court of judicature the House of Lords. This payment was a payment therefore to the master, not a loan, but on account of freight, which freight was never earned. I entirely agree with and will add nothing more to what has fallen from the Lord Chief Justice. The judgment of the court below therefore will be affirmed.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is in my opinion quite impossible for us to act contrary to the current of authorities as to the prepayment of freight not being recoverable in the event of the loss of the cargo. Whether the principle upon which that doctrine was originally founded, be or not a sound principle, is, of course, an entirely different thing. It is no doubt always unfortunate when the law of our own country disagrees with, and differs from the law of other civilised countries; but the rule of law is fixed on the matter, and ought not to be lightly shaken on such a point; and indeed to hold otherwise would be to disturb and upset a vast number of floating contracts which have been entered into upon the footing of that construction of the rule, throughout this great maritime country, which would be a consequence most injurious to the commercial interests of the kingdom. The question then is, in what character was this payment made? Does it, under the circumstances, and under the terms of the charter party, range itself under the cases in which there is a payment on account of freight? I think it does. It seems to me, for the reasons given by the Lord Chief Justice, with which I entirely agree, that it was manifestly the intention of the parties that this should be, in any event, an absolute payment, and one not liable to be affected by the subsequent loss of the goods. For these reasons I think that we ought to affirm the judgment of the court below in favour of the plaintiff.

M. SMITH, J.—I also am of the same opinion although I have felt much hesitation in arriving at a conclusion in this case, from the difficulty of precisely apprehending upon what ground it is that the rule of our English law has been placed. I apprehend, however, that the foundation of that rule, viz., a prepayment of freight is not recoverable that the charterer in the event of the failure of the voyage by the loss of the cargo, depends upon this, that at the time, when such prepayment is made there is an implied understanding that it is a payment which is made once for all, and which is not to be subject to any contingency. Now, undoubtedly, there was the character of the prepayment in the present case. The law of foreign countries, on the other hand, requires that, if such is their intention, there shall be an express agreement to that effect between the parties; whilst, on the contrary, our law would seem to suppose that, there is an implied agreement to that effect, unless it be expressly excluded. Taking that to be the foundation of the rule, there was, without doubt, a prepayment here, and the question is whether it was intended that the money so prepaid was to remain in suspense, and to be kept by the shipowner only in the event of the safe arrival of the cargo, or whether it was a payment in the nature of a prepayment on account of freight, and so not recoverable. Now, looking at the rule of English law, which has been established and acted upon for so long a period of time, and assuming, as we must, that the parties had knowledge of that rule, and that they entered into this contract with such knowledge, I confess that it appears to me that their intention was that this payment of the difference should not be a payment to remain in suspense, but that it should be an absolute payment and subject, on the shipowner's part, to no contingency whatsoever. It is clear that the master could only be required to sign bills of lading at a less rate than the chartered rate of freight, upon condition that the difference was paid to him in cash. The words of the clause are, "the master to sign bills of lading at any rate of freight required, without prejudice to the charter party, but not under chartered rates, except the difference be paid in cash." It seems to me, gathering the intention of the parties from the language used by them in the document, that when they name a payment in cash—not in bills, but in money—they mean a payment which shall not be subject to any after contingency. We have to construe this contract by the rule of the English law, and ought therefore to hold that this money would not be recoverable back from the shipowner, if it had been paid to him before the loss of the cargo, and that the judgment of the Court of Exchequer should therefore be affirmed.

GRAY v. CARR AND ANOTHER.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think it is of the very highest importance that a rule of our commercial law, which has been established for such a length of time as the one which we have been discussing in this case, should be upheld and adhered to. I confess that I was at one time much struck by Mr. Butt's argument that this payment of the difference was intended by the parties to be only a substitute, and an indemnity to the owner for the loss of his lien upon the goods. That might, no doubt, be a very reasonable agreement for the parties to make; but, looking at the terms used by them in the agreement entered into between them, I do not think that that was their contract or their intention. On the contrary, I think their intention was that the payment should be a payment out and out, and that it was a payment on account of freight, which, according to the rule of our law, cannot be recovered back. I am of opinion, therefore, that the plaintiff is entitled to recover, and that the judgment of the Court of Exchequer should be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

ERROR FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH.

Nov. 29, 1870, Feb. 1, June 15, 1871.

GRAY v. CARR AND ANOTHER.

Charter party—Bill of lading—Lien—Short shipment—"Dead freight"—Demurrage—Detention beyond demurrage days—"All other conditions." By charter party of 18th Aug. 1866, it was agreed between an owner of the Superior and C. of London, merchant, that the ship "shall . . . proceed to Sulina, . . . and there load as customary from the factors of the . . . freighter a full and complete cargo of staves and [or]" other things "which the . . . merchant binds himself to ship, . . . and . . . therewith proceed to London, and deliver the same on being paid freight" at specified rates . . . "in cash on . . . right delivery of cargo. . . . Fifty running days . . . to be allowed for loading, . . . and ten days on demurrage, . . . at 8l. per day . . . The owners to have an absolute lien on the cargo for all freight, dead freight, demurrage, and average; and the charterer's responsibilities to cease on shipment of the cargo, provided it be of sufficient value to cover the freight and charges on arrival at port of discharge. . . ." At Sulina a short cargo was shipped by the charterer's agents, and a bill of lading signed by the captain for 283,682 staves, to be delivered "at the port of discharge as per the aforesaid charter party unto order, or . . . assigns, he or they paying freight and all other conditions(a) or demurrage (if any should be incurred) for the said goods as per the aforesaid charter party." The vessel was detained at her port of loading during the whole of the ten days on demurrage, and also eighteen days beyond. The plaintiff, as owner of the vessel, claimed against the defendants, consignees named in the bill of lading, a lien on the goods for—first, 80l. demurrage; secondly, dead freight for the cargo short shipped; thirdly, damages for the detention of the vessel beyond the ten days. The cargo shipped was of value sufficient to cover these claims.

The court of Queen's Bench, following decided cases, and without hearing argument, gave judgment for the plaintiff on his first claim, and for the defendants on the second and third. Error was mutually brought by the parties in the Court of Exchequer Chamber, coram Kelly, C.B., Bramwell, Channell, and Cleasby, BB., Willes and Brett, JJ. This court—Held, first, that by the charter party a lien for the 80l. demurrage claimed was given to the plaintiff, and that the bill of lading preserved such lien, (Willes and Brett, JJ., dissenting, on the ground that the lien, if any, was not so preserved); secondly, that by the use of the words "dead freight" no lien was given to the plaintiff for damages in respect of cargo, short shipped, (Bramwell and Cleasby, BB., dissenting); (b) thirdly, that the plaintiff had no lien for damages resulting from detention of the vessel at the port of loading beyond the demurrage days. Thus the judgment of the court below was in toto affirmed.

ERROR from the Court of Queen's Bench on the following special case, stated without pleadings.

1. The plaintiff is the owner of the ship Superior, the defendants are merchants in London, and the consignees of certain timber shipped on board that ship.

2. On the 18th Aug. 1866, the plaintiff entered into a charter-party with R. Carnegie, of which the following are the material parts:

It is this day mutually agreed between N. Gray, managing owner of the ship Superior, of the measurement of 689 tons or thereabouts, now at Alexandria, Henry Whitehead, commander, and R. Carnegie, of London, merchant, that the said ship, being tight, staunch, &c., shall with all convenient speed proceed to Sulina, or so near thereto as she may safely get, and there load as customary from the factors of the said freighter a full and complete cargo of staves and [cr] grain, seed or stowage goods, or lawful merchandises, which the said merchant binds himself to ship, not exceeding what she can reasonably stow; and being so loaded, shall therewith proceed to London, and deliver the same on being paid freight as follows: viz., 8s. per 100 pieces of oak staves, 34/36in. x 4½/16in. 11/14 lines, all French measure; other dimensions in proportion; and other merchandise, if shipped, to pay in full and fair proportion. . . . The cargo to be brought to and taken from alongside at charterer's expense and risk, the ship's boats and crew to render all customary assistance in towing the lighters, &c. The freight to be paid in each on unloading and right delivery of the cargo; fifty running days, not to count before the 15th Oct. If required by merchant's agents, are to be allowed the said merchant (if the ship is not sooner despatched) for loading, and to be discharged as fast as ship can put the cargo out, and ten days on demurrage over and above the said laying days, at 8*l.* per day; detention by frost not to be reckoned as lay days. The owners to have an absolute lien on the cargo for all freight, dead freight, demurrage and average, and the charterer's responsibilities to cease on shipment of the cargo, provided it be of sufficient value to cover the freight and charges on arrival at port of discharge. Should any portion of the cargo be delivered in a heated or damaged condition, the freight shall be computed in the usual manner on the bill of lading quantity, or half freight paid on the heated or damaged portion at captain's option, provided no part of the cargo be thrown overboard, or otherwise disposed of on the voyage. Cash for ship's use at port of loading, not exceeding 200*l.*, to be advanced the master free of interest and commission, and deducted from the freight with insurance. . . .

(b) In McClellan v. Fleming (inf.), Lord Chelmsford says, that "it must be assumed that the parties understood the meaning of the terms they employed, and that, amongst others, the term 'dead freight' meant (according to Lord Ellenborough's definition in Phillips v. Rodie (inf.)) 'an unliquidated compensation for loss of freight.'" Here the majority of the court say that dead freight does not include unliquidated damages for short loading, but is a liquidated sum expressed on the face of the charter party. Bramwell and Cleasby, BB. who were in the minority, are on the side of authority and seem to have the weight of reasoning with them.—ED.

3. The ship arrived at Sulina on the 14th Oct. 1866, and on the 19th Oct. 1866 the captain gave notice to Mr. Theophilatus, the charterer's agent at Sulina, that the ship was then ready to receive cargo, and that the lay days were to commence from the 20th Oct. 1866.

4. Although the master repeatedly inquired of Theophilatus after the cargo between the 20th Oct. and the 1st Dec. 1866, and required him to load the ship in conformity with the charter party, no cargo was supplied to the ship till the 1st Dec. 1866, on which day a number of staves were sent in lighters alongside the ship. The stowing of these staves was at once commenced, and it went on till the 5th Jan. 1867, but no cargo was shipped on the ship until the 3rd Dec.

5. On the 8th Dec. 1866, the master made a protest before the Vice-Consul at Sulina, declaring, as the fact was, that neither the merchant nor his agent had completed the loading of the ship, notwithstanding the expiry of the lay days on that day, and that the vessel would from that day lie on demurrage on the terms of the charter party. A copy of this protest was sent to Theophilatus.

6. On the 26th Dec. 1866 Theophilatus sent a letter to the master to the effect following:

As your ship is down to the water allowed to cross the bar with, and in consequence you have stopped the work this morning to load the remainder of the cargo in the roads, I beg to notify to you that, as customary, your ship's time ceases counting henceforward.

7. The plaintiff contends that it was not customary that a ship's time should cease counting under the the circumstances mentioned in the 6th paragraph; but the defendants dispute this contention; and should this circumstance be, in the judgment of the court, material to the case, it is to be determined by the arbitrator, as hereinafter mentioned.

8. On the 26th Dec. the ship crossed the bar into the roads, and the loading was there continued till the 5th Jan. 1867, on which day the loading and stowing of such cargo as was furnished by the merchant was completed.

9. On the said 5th Jan. the master signed, under protest (but of which protest the defendants had no notice before the commencement of this action), a set of four bills of lading, as follows:

Shipped in good order and condition by Theologos and Carnegie, in and upon the good ship called the Superior, under English flag, whereof is master, for the present voyage, Henry Whitehead, and now lying in the port of Sulina, and bound to consign his cargo as per charter party, dated London, the 18th Aug. 1866, 283, 682 oak staves, which are to be delivered in the like good order and condition at the port of discharge as per the aforesaid charter party, or unto order, or to his or their assigns, he or they paying freight and all other conditions or demurrage (if any should be incurred) for the said goods as per the aforesaid charter party. . . .(a)

10. It is to be assumed, for the purposes of this case, that the merchant did not ship a full and complete cargo, and that the ship sailed from Sulina, and performed her voyage with a short cargo. The plaintiff claims 364*l.* 19*s.* 5*d.* as dead freight for the cargo thus short shipped.

11. The vessel was also detained at her port of loading during the whole of the ten days on demurrage, which, at 8*l.* per day, amounted to 80*l.*, and also eighteen days beyond the said ten days. What would be a fair amount of compensation for such detention is still a matter of dispute between the parties, to be referred, in case of necessity, to arbitration, as agreed between the parties.

12. The ship arrived in London on the 23rd March 1865, and at once commenced unloading.

13. The cargo was of value sufficient to cover the plaintiff's said claims for freight, dead freight and demurrage.

14. The defendants were the consignees named in the bill of lading, and the property in the goods was vested in the defendants upon and by virtue of such consignment. The defendants had no notice until the arrival of the ship in London of the said claims of the plaintiff, but a copy of the charter party had been sent to the defendants with the original bill of lading.

15. The plaintiff claimed a lien on the goods for the amount of his claims for dead freight and demurrage, and ultimately delivered the goods to the defendants upon the terms that such delivery should not prejudice the plaintiff's claim if any, to a lien upon the goods for such amounts. The question for the opinion of the court was whether the plaintiff had a lien upon the cargo as against the defendants for the said amounts, or any, and which of them. The Court of Queen's Bench gave judgment on the 26th Jan. 1870, for the plaintiff for 80*l.* for demurrage, and for the defendants as to the dead freight and damages for detention beyond the days allowed for demurrage. This judgment was pronounced by the court, without arguments having been heard, on the authority of decided cases.

The plaintiff brought error on the ground that he was entitled to judgment on all three claims; and the defendants also alleged error on the ground that they were entitled to judgment as to the demurrage also.

The arguments are sufficiently stated in the following elaborately prepared judgments:

Curr. adv. vult.

June 15.—CLEASBY, B.—In this case the defendants were the holders of a bill of lading of the cargo of the ship Superior, of which the plaintiff was owner. The vessel had been chartered for a voyage from Sulina to London. Upon the arrival of the ship at the port of discharge the plaintiff claimed a lien upon the cargo for ten days' demurrage, for a proper allowance for a further period of detention, and for dead freight. The Court of Queen's Bench held the plaintiff entitled to the claim for demurrage, but disallowed the claim for dead freight and for detention. Error has been brought in this court, and the case has been fully argued. I am of opinion that the judgment of the Queen's Bench should be affirmed so far as relates to the demurrage allowed, and to the claim for detention disallowed. But it appears to me that the plaintiff is also entitled to the claim for dead freight. The charter party is between Gray, the managing owner, and R. Carnegie, of London, charterer, and contains a clause which is now not unusual, viz., that the charterer's responsibilities are to cease on shipment of the cargo, provided it be of sufficient value to cover the freight and charges on arrival at the port of discharge; and gives the owner an absolute lien on the cargo for all freight, dead freight, demurrage, and average. The first question to be considered is to what extent could the lien be enforced as between the parties to the charter party. The charter party allows fifty running days for loading the cargo, which is to be discharged as fast as the ship can put the cargo out, and ten days are to be allowed on demurrage over and above the laying days at 8*l.* per day. Now the word demurrage has a known legal meaning, viz., the additional period during which the vessel may remain by agreement of the parties. It was said upon the argument that by the understanding of shipowners and charterers it had a more extensive signification, and embraced the further period beyond the demurrage days during which the vessel was detained. If that be so, evidence that in such a document as a charter party the word was so usually understood should have been given, and the opinion of the jury taken, but in the absence of all evidence we must give to the word demurrage its known legal meaning, and this excludes from the operation of the lien the claim for damages caused by further detention. As regards the claim for lien in respect of demurrage, I do not see how there can be any doubt about its existing under the charter party. It appears clear to me that whether the demurrage days are occupied in the loading of the ship or in the discharge of it, the charterer is equally discharged from personal liability as soon as a sufficient cargo is loaded, and that in that case the claim of the owner in respect of it exists only by virtue of the lien which is given by agreement. This is in conformity with the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in the case of Bannister v. Breslau (sup.) As regards the lien for dead freight, I can see no sufficient reason why it should not be conferred by the charter party. Dead freight is an expression having a well known signification, viz., the freight which would have been payable for that part of the vessel which has not been occupied by merchandise, but ought to have been. I understand the objection to the lien existing in this case to be, that under this charter the claim for dead freight must be a claim for unliquidated damages, and that the expression has found its way into this charter from others where the claim would be for liquidated damages, and that as applied to a claim for unliquidated damages there would be such delay in the delivery of the goods, and such inconvenience in enforcing it, that it must be regarded as applying only to a charter where the claim for dead freight would be in the nature of a debt. This appears to have been the view taken of the subject by the Court of Common Pleas in the case of Pearson v. Goschin (17 C. B., N. S., 352). It was there said that the words "dead freight" were part of a printed form and ought to be rejected from such a contract as the present one. But the reason given does not apply to the present case. Upon looking at the printed parts of the charter the words which give the lien for dead freight are in print, but so are the words which make the claim for dead freight a claim for unliquidated damages. The printed part provides for the charterers loading a full cargo of grain, seed, or other stowage goods, and the freight is to be paid at so much per quarter of corn, and for other grain, seed, or stowage goods in proportion according to the Baltic printed rates; so that one cargo might be more profitable to some extent than another, and the calculation of damages for dead freight would be complicated by that consideration. In the charter, as it stands altered in writing, the calculation would be simple. It obliges the charterer to load a full cargo, and make the freight payable at so much per 100 pieces of oak staves and other cargo in fair proportion. It does not make the freight payable in respect of different cargo according to different specified rates, so as to make the freight earned vary with the cargo carried. But whatever be the cargo carried it would be paid at the same rate as if all had been oak staves, so that although the claim in form would be as damages for not loading a complete cargo, yet as soon as the capacity of the vessel for carrying oak staves is ascertained the claim is liquidated by deducting the freight actually carried. The shipowner could at once make his claim for the known capacity of the ship, and he would do so at his peril if he claimed too much and refused to deliver: and any two captains in the docks could settle the amount. I am informed that in a case like the present the House of Lords has decided very lately that the lien for dead freight applies. Some of my learned brothers have seen a note of the case and will refer to the name and particulars of it. If there was any authorised report of the case I should, of course, have referred to it and corrected my judgment by it, if necessary; so far as I can collect no correction would have been necessary. If there was a serious dispute the cargo would be delivered either upon a deposit of a sum of money at a banker's or upon security by bond. The lien for a general average involves much greater difficulties. It appears to have always existed independent of contract both by the civil law and our law (Abbot on Shipping, p. 242, 5th edit.): and by the American law (which does not lightly esteem convenience) the captain may detain the goods until a bond to pay the sum contributable is paid, or even until the amount is paid (Kent's Commentaries, vol. 3, p. 339, 10th edit.) It is expressly contracted for in the present case. Now, we know how many weeks or months the adjustment of a general average claim may take, and what questions arise as to the proper item for allowance, and yet, practically, it never interferes with the delivery of the cargo, proper security being given as a matter of course to pay what in the result is found to be due. The rule contended for by the defendant, and which is to some extent sanctioned by Pearson v. Goschen (sup.), would come to this, that the only case in which there is a lien for dead freight it is not for dead freight at all. If there is an agreement to pay so much a ton upon the carrying capacity of the ship, it matters not whether the ship is full or empty, the same sum is to be paid by the agreement, and there is nothing like dead freight in the transaction; yet it is said that the clause for dead freight was intended to apply, and can only apply, to such a charter party. But if the agreement is to load a full cargo, and to pay so much a ton for the cargo delivered, then, if a short cargo is loaded, there is a claim for dead freight; in other words, the freight does not exist, or is dead, which would have existed if the cargo had been loaded, and in this, which is the only real case of dead freight, the agreed lien for dead freight is said not to be applicable, and in that way the agreement of the parties is set aside. As regards authority the judgment of all the Judges in the case of Birley v. Gladstone, 17 C. B. N. S., 352, may be regarded as almost in point, in favour of the view above taken. In that case the freighter engaged to ship a full cargo, and was to pay 2*l.* 5*s.* per ton for salt on the voyage out, and 12*l.* per ton of flax and hemp, and 8*l.* per ton for tallow on the voyage home. There was a claim for dead freight, 372*l.* 12*s.*, in respect of space unoccupied. The question argued was, whether the general clause in the charter party, by which the shipowner bound the ship and tackle, and the freighter bound the cargo, under a penalty for the due performance of all the covenants, amounted to a contract that the shipowner should have a lien for dead freight. It was held that it did not; and the ground of decision was that this clause was intended to give mutual remedies, and as it would not operate to give the freighter a lien, so it was not intended to give the shipowner a lien. But it was never suggested that if there was a contract for a lien in respect of dead freight, it would not apply to such dead freight as the present, because it was unliquidated. The case of Phillips v. Rodie (15 East, 547), is in entire conformity with this decision. I think it will appear that one of the learned judges who decided the case of Pearson v. Goschen (sup.), was under an erroneous impression as to the effect of the above two cases, though the error was corrected by the other learned judge, Mr. Justice Willes. In reality the inconvenience seems to be rather one suggested in the interpretation of the contract than felt by the merchant in acting upon it. I do not think that we can, upon the ground of inconvenience, set aside a contract giving a certain security for dead freight, which must mean the dead freight accruing under the same contract. To do so would be rather adopting that construction which has been much condemned, and which the doctors called interpretatio viperina, because it destroyed the text. If the construction of the charter party which I have arrived at is the proper one, the remaining question is whether, on the bill of lading, the right of lien for the demurrage and dead freight is retained as against the holders of that document. Upon the particular words used in this as in similar documents, such as policies of insurance, there is abundant room for ingenious argument, both as regards the printed part—"he or they paying freight or demurrage if any should be incurred," and upon the written addition, "and other conditions," coming in so awkwardly as it does between the words "freight" and "demurrage." But, taking it altogether, the effect of it seems to me to be clear enough; when given to the charterer it was intended to retain the whole right of lien, and the fair meaning of the word is to do so. It was contended by the defendants that the words "if any should be incurred" showed that the demurrage previously incurred could not be interded. But these words are part of the usual form, and are in general really superfluous, because demurrage cannot be payable unless it has been incurred. It would be unwarrantable to make the effect of such an instrument depend upon the retaining of words generally inoperative. And, on the other side, it may be said that the word "demurrage" in the bill of lading must refer to demurrage at the port of loading, because, according to the language of the charter party, none could be contemplated at the port of discharge. And it may be observed that although the words are generally inoperative as regards the right to demurrage, yet they prevent the bill of lading from containing an admission that demurrage is due, and this would be a good reason for retaining them in the present case, because by the charter party days of frost are not to be included in the loading days, and it might not be known or agreed how much of the delay was from that cause. It appears to me, however, sufficient to say that the language in the present bill of lading includes all the conditions in the charter party upon the performance of which the cargo is to be delivered—viz., payment of freight, demurrage, dead freight, and average. This construction is in conformity with the authorities which have been decided upon the effect of the word "conditions" in such a document. In Wegener v. Smith (sup.), the words of the bill of lading were "and other conditions as per charter party," and the Court of Common Pleas held that the word "conditions" made demurrage due under the charter party payable upon delivery. And this decision was entirely approved of by the Court of Queen's Bench in Smith v. Sieveling (4 E. & B., p. 945), though in that case the only words being "paying for the goods as per charter party," the court held the fair meaning of those words was payment of freight at the rate in charter party. Error was brought in the Exchequer Chamber, and the case was considered too clear for argument. A remark was made referring to the demurrage incurred before the signing of the bill of lading not being covered by the language, but this was not the ground of decision which Parke, B. stated to be that the words "payment for the goods" meant payment for the carriage of the goods. There is no authority giving a different meaning to the word "conditions," and it is the only rational meaning of the word, coupled as it is with "freight and demurrage," and thus signifying those payments provided for by the charter to be made on delivery, or as a condition for delivery. It must be taken by the reference in the bill of lading to the charter party that the defendant had notice of the contents; it indeed was admitted upon the argument that he had received a copy of it, so that he knew all the conditions upon which the cargo was deliverable. I am therefore of opinion that the Queen's Bench were right in giving the plaintiff the demurrage, that they were right in withholding the damages for the detention, that they would be right in giving the dead freight, and that their judgment must be corrected to that extent. I will only add that from what we were told took place upon the argument of this case in the court below there is no reason for supposing that the Court of Queen's Bench would not have given the dead freight if they had not felt bound by the decision in Pearson v. Goschen (sup.)

BRETT, J.—This is a special case stated in an action in which the plaintiff sued the defendants for dead freight and demurrage. The plaintiff was the owner of a ship called the Superior. The defendants were merchants in London, and consignees of certain timber shipped on board the ship. The plaintiff chartered the ship to one Carnegie. By the charter party the ship was with all convenient speed to sail and proceed to Sulina, and there load from the factors of the freighter a full and complete cargo of staves, grain, seed, or stowage goods or lawful merchandise, which the merchant bound himself to ship, and being so loaded should therewith proceed to London and deliver the same on being paid freight, according to certain specified rates. The freight to be paid in cash on unloading and right delivery of the cargo, fifty running days, not to count before 15th Oct., if required by merchants' agents, are to be allowed if the ship is not sooner despatched, for loading, and to be discharged as fast as ship can put the cargo out: and ten days on demurrage over and above the said laying days at 8*l.* per day; the owners to have an absolute lien on the cargo for all freight, dead freight, demurrage, and average; and the charterer's responsibilities to cease on shipment of the cargo, provided it be of sufficient value to cover the freight and charges on arrival at port of discharge. The ship proceeded to Sulina and loaded a short cargo. The cargo was shipped by the charterer's agents. A bill of lading was signed by the captain for 283,182 staves to be delivered at the port of discharge as per charter party unto order or assigns, he or they paying freight and all other conditions, or demurrage, if any should be incurred, for the said goods as per charter party. The claim for cargo short shipped (claimed as dead freight) was 36*l.* 19*s.* 5*d.* The claim for demurrage in respect of the ship being detained ten days on demurrage proper at the port of loading was 80*l.*, and there was a further claim of reasonable damages for eighteen days' detention at the port of loading beyond the ten demurrage days. The defendants were the consignees of the goods named in the bill of lading, and the property in the goods vested in them upon and by virtue of the consignment. The plaintiff claimed a lien on the goods mentioned in the bill of lading for the dead freight and demurrage, and damages in nature of demurrage, which he alleged to be due. It was argued on behalf of the plaintiff, that he could have had, by virtue of the charter party, a lien on the goods shipped for the dead freight, demurrage, and damages, if the cargo had not been of sufficient value to cover freight and charges, &c., but as the cargo was of sufficient value, the charterer's responsibility under the charter party had ceased, and that, consequently, the bill of lading ought to be construed more favourably for the shipowner, and that the plaintiff had a lien on the goods to be delivered according to the bill of lading, because the bill of lading by reference imposed upon the goods to be delivered under it at the port of discharge, the lien from which the charterer was relieved under the charter party, and authorised the plaintiff to exercise that lien in respect of what had occurred at the port of loading against the defendants, the holders of the bill of lading at the port of discharge, and the owners of the goods mentioned in it. It was contended, on behalf of the defendants, that the printed words in the charter party, which were supposed to give a lien for dead freight had no effect, because no charge for dead freight was stipulated for in the charter party; that the non-responsibility of the charterers was applicable only to defaults which might occur after the sailing of the ship from the port of loading; that the bill of lading incorporated only such stipulations of the charter party as were applicable to the goods mentioned in it, and which might take effect in respect of those goods only, and that the claims of the plaintiff in the present action, even though they might come within the terms of the charter party, were not such claims as were imposed on the defendants by the bill of lading. These arguments raise two questions, namely, first, What is the right construction of the charter party? and, secondly, What is the right construction of the bill of lading? As to the charter party, I am of opinion in the first place, that it gave no lien to the shipowner for dead freight. It seems to me that a charter party which leaves the damages to be recovered in respect of short loading unspecified, and therefore, at large, gives no claim for dead freight properly so called. Such a claim for unliquidated damages is not dead freight (per Williams and Wiles, J.J. in Pearson v. Goschen (17 C. B., N. S., 352), and as I have always understood, was intended by Lord Ellenborough in Phillips v. Rodie (15 East, p. 555). I always thought that that great judge was pointing out that although many people called unascertained damages for not loading a full cargo dead freight, they were wrong. And inasmuch as the charter party gives an express lien in terms for dead freight only, it is not to be construed as giving it for unliquidated damages for not loading a full and complete cargo. Speaking of a similar claim in respect of prepaid freight, which was not freight in its ordinary sense, Lord Kingsdown laid it down that "where parties instead of trusting to the general rule of law with respect to freight, have made a special contract for themselves for a payment which is not freight, it must depend upon the terms of that contract whether a lien does or does not exist, and that when the contract made gives no lien the law will not supply one by implication (Kirchner v. Venus, 12 Moo. P. C. C., p. 398), and the application of this doctrine to the present case is not affected by the printed clause, which would, if there had been any dead freight stipulated by the charter party, have given an absolute lien for it: (Pearson v. Goschen, 17 C. B., N. S., p. 352). That case seems to me, if I may be allowed to say so, rightly, and according to the true mode in which the courts ought to deal with mercantile business, to point out a necessary and timely modification of the older rule of construction as to giving, if possible, a meaning to every term in the contract in cases where a modern mercantile instrument is known to be in a printed and general form, with parts of it to be filled up in writing, to apply it to particular transactions. As to the second point argued with regard to the charter party, namely, that the liability of the charterer in respect of damages for short loading and for demurrage and damages for detaining the ship at the port of loading beyond the demurrage days, ceased on the loading on board the ship of a cargo of sufficient value, and that as a consequence, the bill of lading ought to be construed in favour of the shipowner, so as to throw the burden of the lien on the consignee under the bill of lading at the port of discharge, I cannot agree that the second proposition could properly be affirmed, merely because the first were made good. But, further, I do not think that the first proposition is sound. With all respect for the judges who decided Bannister v. Breslawer (sup.), I think that their interpretation of the charter party was too severe. The case was decided on demurrer. The judges relied much on the lien given in respect of demurrage which they assumed was for delay at the port of loading. But if by other terms of the charter party than those which were before the court, demurrage was stipulated for in respect of delay in loading at the port of discharge, the chief ground on which they based their interpretations would be cut away. I cannot but think that the safer and juster, and more correct construction of the clause then and now under discussion is, that it absolves the charterer, when once a cargo of sufficient value is on board, from all liabilities which, but for it, he might incur in respect of anything happening after the sailing of the ship or more properly speaking after the bill of lading is given, as it were, to replace the charter party. The next question is, what is the true construction of the bill of lading? Even if the charter party does give to the shipowner the alleged lien with regard to the alleged dead freight, the demurrage and damages in nature of demurrage, is such lien imposed upon the goods mentioned in the bill of lading as against the defendants the owners of such goods and consignees of them under the bill of lading? The answer, as it seems to me, depends entirely on the construction to be put on the terms of the bill of lading. Upon that construction alone depends the question whether there is any evidence from which a contract between the plaintiff and the defendants to the effect contended for by the plaintiff can be implied. The rule or canon of construction is to be deduced from the cases which have been cited. In Smith v. Steeking (4 E. & B. 985) the action was brought against the consignee at the port of discharge under the bill of lading for demurrage incurred at the port of loading. By the terms of the bill of lading, which was for the whole cargo, the goods were to be delivered in London to order, &c., he or they paying for the said goods as per charter party. By the charter party an ascertained sum of 5*l.* per day was stipulated for as demurrage for delay at the ports of loading and discharge; and it was agreed and understood that for the payment of all freight and demurrage the captain should have an absolute lien and charge on the cargo. The Court of Queen's Bench decided in favour of the defendants (4 E. & B. 945), and Parke, B., in affirming that decision in the court of error (5 E. & B. 590), said, "In this case you must contend that the consignee at the port of discharge contracted to pay for the antecedent delay of the charterer, which occurred at the port of loading before the consignee had anything to do with either goods or ship. Such a contract is one which requires strong evidence to support it, for it is, to say the least, not a reasonable one." In Chappell v. Comfort (10 C. B., N. S. 802) the action was against the indorsees of the bill of lading for demurrage at the port of discharge. By the charter party sixteen lay days were allowed for loading and unloading, and there was demurrage at 2*l.* per day for any detention beyond that time. By the bill of lading the goods were deliverable to order "paying freight as per charter party," and there was a memorandum written in the margin, "there are eight working days for unloading in London." Upon this memorandum the claim was founded. The court gave judgment for the defendants. Willes, J. says, "It may be, and it does often happen, that the person who receives the goods intends to pay all the charges mentioned in the charter party. But when it is intended that such an obligation should be imposed upon him it should be done in plain words, as was done in Wegener v. Smith (15 C. B. 285) and other cases where by the terms of the bill of lading the goods were made deliverable to order against payment of the agreed freight, and other conditions as per charter party." And at the end he says, "There must be a plain intention expressed that the consignee of the bill of lading is to pay demurrage before he can be charged with it. This is an established rule to which it is highly important to adhere." So in Fry v. The Chartered Mercantile Bank of India (L. Rep. 1 C. P. 689), the charter party made the goods deliverable on payment of freight at 3*l.* 10*s.* per ton, the ship to have a lien on cargo for freight. The terms of the bill of lading were "freight for the said cargo, payable in London as per charter party." It was contended that the defendants, the holders of the bill of lading, were liable for the unpaid freight of the whole cargo. The court decided against the claim. "The charter party," says Erle, C.J., "also contains the clause, 'ship to have a lien on the cargo for freight,' and it is said that this entitled the shipowner to a lien on each part of the cargo for the whole freight. I think the judgment of Willes, J. in Chappell v. Comfort applies in terms to this case, &c. I agree with it that if it is wished to include more of the terms of the charter party," i.e., more than to make the freight payable as per charter words "ought to be introduced into the bill of lading, which would show that intention more plainly." The plaintiff's counsel, however, relied strongly on the case of Wegener v. Smith (15 C. B. 285). The case as reported states that the action was for demurrage, without saying whether for delay at the port of loading or discharge. The charter party provided for the delivery of the cargo at a certain measurement freight, and in case of detention the captain to be paid 5*l.* for every proveable lay day. The bill of lading made the goods deliverable to order "against payment of the agreed freight, and other conditions as per charter party." The court held that by the words "and other conditions," the liability to pay demurrage was incorporated into the bill of lading, and they decided in favour of the plaintiff. This would be a strong case in favour of the plaintiff if the demurrage therein claimed had been in respect of delay at the commencement of the voyage, "but it has been ascertained on inquiry," says Lord Campbell, in Smith v. Steveling (4 E. & B. 951, 952), that "the demurrage sued for in that case had accrued in the port of delivery, and had arisen from the default of the defendant in not sooner receiving the goods." And upon the case being again cited in the court of error, Jervis, C.J., remarks that "the action was for demurrage accruing from his (the defendant's) own delay in the port of discharge" (5 E. & B. 591). These remarks were intended to point out that the case is not inconsistent with the doctrine laid down in Smith v. Steveling. The case of Kern v. Deslandes (10 C. B. N. S. 205) was also relied on, and certainly in it, effect was given to a claim of a lien as being introduced from the charter party into the bill of lading, though the words of the bill of lading were only "he or they paying freight for the said goods as usual." Great stress was laid by the court in that case on the fact that the defendants, the consignees, claiming under the bill of lading, were mere agents of the charterers. Unless the decision can be supported on that ground, which it seems unnecessary at present to determine, I think it cannot be supported at all. It is stated with some significance, in a note by the learned reporters at the end of the case, that "error was brought upon this judgment, but the matter was compromised before argument." The rule, or canon of construction, seems then to be that which is laid down by Willes, J., in Chappell v. Comfort (10 C. B. 802), namely, that no liability other than such as naturally attaches in respect of the carriage of the particular goods, is to be held to be imposed on a consignee of goods mentioned in a bill of lading, unless such liability is clearly imposed by plain words. Applying that rule to the bill of lading in the present case, it seems to me that we ought not to hold that any liability attached against the defendants in respect of dead freight, demurrage, or damages in the nature of demurrage, incurred at the port of loading. The words "and all other conditions or demurrage, if any should be incurred," are satisfied by making them applicable to damages in the nature of demurrage for any delay which may occur through the default of the consignee at the port of discharge. Indeed, they are rather apt to such a liability in the present case, because by the charter party no specified number of lay days is allowed at the port of discharge, and no demurrage, strictly so called, is provided for. The ship is to be discharged as fast as she can put the cargo out. The bill of lading may, therefore, be construed as if the phrase, "conditions or demurrage," were intentionally alternative, that is to say, applicable to a claim which may more properly be called a condition in the nature of demurrage, than demurrage. The proposed construction also gives full value to the words, "for the said goods." At all events the bill of lading does not clearly and plainly apply to claims made in respect of transactions which occurred before the particular goods were on board, and not in respect of those goods, and which claims therefore, when made against persons in the position of the defendants, are, to say the least, not reasonable. Therefore I am opinion that the judgment below ought to have been wholly in favour of the defendants. I think that the part which was in favour of the plaintiff for 80*l.* for demurrage ought to be reversed, and the part of the judgment which was in favour of the defendants, as to dead freight and damages, ought to be affirmed. Since this case was argued, and since this judgment was written, our attention has been called to the case of M'Lean v. Fleming, in the House of Lords (L. Rep. 2 H. of L. Sc. 128), and if I had thought that that case overruled anything I have said in this, I should have willingly bowed to it. But in that case, as I understand the judgment, the charter party was in respect of the carriage of a uniform cargo, and the freight was payable at a fixed sum per ton, and the charter party ascertained the amount of the cargo that was to be loaded. It then put upon the charterers the liability of loading a full cargo, and gave a lien to the shipowner for dead freight. Now, under those circumstances, it was pointed out by some, if not all, of the learned lords who took part in the judgment, that the damages for not loading a full cargo were, in point of fact, ascertained, because they would be the specified amount per ton upon the quantity that was really ascertained; and if that were so, that would properly be dead freight within the ordinary meaning of the term, and the lien being given in terms for dead freight, that case would be within the recognised rule; and as I understand their Lordships, they declined to overrule the case of Kirchner v. Venus, and expressly declined to overrule the case of Pearson v. Goschen, which I think is decided on valuable principles, that ought to be generally applied. I therefore do not consider that that case overrules what I have said of this charter party. With regard to the question of the bill of lading, even although the charter in this case did give a lien for dead freight, it seems to me that the authority in the House of Lords leaves the case untouched, because the House of Lords in the case before it came to the conclusion that the action was between those who were virtually the charterers and the shipowner, and, therefore, they decided the case on the charter party alone, and held only that the fact of bills of lading being given to a charterer cannot alter or affect his liability under the charter party. It therefore seems to me that that case does not affect this case, and I adhere to the judgment which I had already written. The case seems to me to be one of great importance, because bills of lading are the documents on which goods are bought and sold before ships arrive, and if the value of the bill of lading is to be dependent on an unascertained amount to be paid in respect of antecedent transactions, which cannot be known or estimated, any legitimate, in the sense of wholesome, traffic in such a document cannot be undertaken. This consideration tends to the same conclusion as the legal reasoning which has been before applied.

GRAY v. CARR AND ANOTHER.

CHANNELL, B.—In this case I think the judgment of the Queen's Bench should be affirmed. The question is, whether the plaintiff who is a shipowner, has a lien on certain timber carried in his ships, as against the defendants, who are indorsees of a bill of lading relating to the timber, for all or any of three distinct claims. These claims are, first 80*l.* for demurrage incurred by the detention of the ship at the port of loading for ten days, during which, according to the terms of the charter party, the charterer, if he detained the ship, was to pay 8*l.* per day demurrage; secondly, a further claim for damages for the ship's detention for a further period of eighteen days beyond the ten days; and thirdly a claim for what is called dead freight, which is said to be incurred in consequence of a full cargo not having been loaded. It is clear that the plaintiff can only have a lien for any of these claims by express contract, inasmuch as the lien which as shipowner he would have, independently of any contract, would only extend to the actual freight of the goods carried: (Phillips v. Rodie, 15 East. 547; Birley v. Gladstone, 3 M. & S., 205.) Further, although the charter party may contain an express contract giving him such a lien on the goods as against the charterer, yet he could not have the lien as against the indorsee of a bill of lading, unless it is stipulated for in the bill of lading, either by the incorporation of the clause in the charter party, or by its being expressly mentioned. The question what lien a shipowner has against the holder of a bill of lading therefore reduces itself into a question of construction, either of the bill of lading alone, or of the bill of lading and the incorporated charter party combined, as the case may be: (see Wegener v. Smith, and Smith v. Sieveking (sup.)). It is important, however, in construing these documents, to consider both the nature of a lien and the nature of the documents in respect of which a lien is claimed. In Phillips v. Rodie, the difficulties which would be created by a lien for an uncertain amount are pointed out. Where the amount of the demand in respect of which the lien is claimed is capable of being calculated, the holder of the bill of lading will know what to tender; but where the demand is for unliquidated damages no tender can be made; and therefore, except by some arrangement between the parties, such as was arrived at in the present case, but which could not be possible where the solvency of the holders of the bill of lading was at all doubtful, the goods must be detained until these damages have been ascertained. In the very probable case of the parties as against whom the damages have to be fixed being foreigners, or, indeed, in any case, it is obvious that very considerable delay must take place. In the mean time the goods may deteriorate in value. The greatest inconvenience would therefore be caused by construing the shipowner's lien to extend to unliquidated damages for breach of the charter party; and although it is not of course impossible for the parties to contract for a lien for such damages, unless there was in the contract a very clear expression of their intention to do so, the court would not so construe the contract. In the present case both the charter party and the bill of lading mention a lien for "demurrage." I think there can be no question that this extends to the 80*l.* claimed for the ten days during which the charterers detained the ship, as provided for by the charter party. The plaintiff is therefore entitled to this amount as decided by the Queen's Bench. As regards the further detention for eighteen days, the damages for this are not demurrage at all properly so called. Demurrage is a sum agreed to be paid for the detention of a vessel, and the term is not applicable to the damages caused by detaining her contrary to agreement. I have, therefore, no doubt at all that the plaintiff is not entitled to any lien for the damages caused by the further detention for eighteen days. The point of most difficulty in the case is, that relating to what is called "dead freight." The charter party gives the shipowner a lien for "dead freight," it does not, however, in any other way mention any dead freight, nor does it contain any covenant that full freight shall be paid on all the ship could carry, whether a full cargo is loaded or not. The bill of lading provides that the holder shall pay "freight and all other conditions and demurrage (if any be incurred) for the said goods, as per the said charter party." I think this sufficiently incorporates the charter party to entitle the shipowner to insist as against the defendants on any lien which he would have under the charter party for what is there called "dead freight": (see Wegener v. Smith (sup.)). The question, however, is, what is the true meaning of the expression "dead freight," so used in the charter party, and does it cover the claim in the present case, which, as pointed out by Lord Ellenborough, in Phillips v. Rodie (sup.), is not freight at all, but is unliquidated damages for the loss of the freight? In that case Lord Ellenborough says, that in order to give the lien claimed, "the covenant should have been to pay full freight as if the goods had been actually loaded on board, and that the master should have the same lien upon goods actually on board as if the ship had been fully laden with all goods covenanted to be loaded." In the present case, the latter part of the suggested covenant, or something like it, is found, but not the former. It is true that if we hold that "dead freight" in the charter party does not include unliquidated damages for loss of freight, we give no effect to the expression at all. I agree, however, with what was said on this point by Williams and Willes, J.J., in Pearson v. Goschen (sup.), that when these words occur in an ordinary clause in a mercantile contract it is not necessary to find an application for them in this particular case. If the charter party had provided for any dead freight, strictly so called, being payable, the clause would have taken effect and conferred a lien, but as it is, it does not take effect, because there is nothing for it to apply to. In the case last referred to, the point in the present case was really decided, as the court held that a clause giving a lien for "dead freight" was wholly inapplicable to a claim for damages in respect to the charterers having failed to load a full cargo. In this court we should not be bound by that decision if we did not agree with it; but I do agree with it, and adopt the reasoning on which it proceeds. We have been pressed in the argument with the clause in the charter party that the charterer's responsibilities are to cease on shipment of the cargo, provided it be of sufficient value to cover the freight and charges on arrival at the port of discharge. It has been contended that all the charterer's responsibilities for all breaches of contract were to cease on shipment, and that, therefore, it must have been intended that there should be a lien on the goods, otherwise the shipowner would be without remedy. It is not, of course, necessary for us to decide whether the charterers were, or were not relieved from responsibility in respect of the claims which we now decide the shipowner cannot maintain against the defendants. As at present advised, however, I think the clause does not apply. At all events, it contains nothing to induce me to put a different construction on the previous claim than I otherwise should. Probably the charterer's responsibilities which are to cease, are the responsibilities in respect of those matters for which a lien is created; but the difficulties in the way of creating a lien for unliquidated damages, and the stipulation that the cargo is to be of sufficient value to cover the freight and charges only, and not the freight charges, and all damages, afford a stronger argument for holding that there is no lien, and, therefore, no cesser of responsibility of the charterers as regards the damages than for holding that there is a cesser, and, therefore, a lien. A case of Barrister v. Breslauer (sup.) has been quoted, in which it was held that, under somewhat similar though stronger words in a charter party, the charterers' responsibility for demurrage did cease. If the demurrage there referred to was demurrage properly so called, then I agree with the decision. If, however, as certainly rather appears to have been the case from the report, it was merely unliquidated damages for the detention of the ship, then I think the decision is somewhat doubtful, and to be supported, if at all by the fact that the words as to the cesser of responsibility were stronger there than here. The attention of the court there does not appear to have been drawn to the fact that the demurrage there claimed was not demurrage properly so called, but only unliquidated damages, and, therefore, the opinion of the judges that a lien was created for this so-called demurrage, is not entitled to the same weight as I should be disposed to give it, if the point had appeared to have been carefully considered. Besides which, it was merely an opinion not absolutely essential to the decision of the case, for although unlikely it is not impossible that the parties should so contract as to make the responsibility of the charterer cease, although no lien was effectually created. In such cases, where damages have been incurred prior to the shipment, it would be prudent for the master to refuse to sign any bills of lading which did not give express notice to the indorsee of the claim for damages which had accrued, and stipulate for the payment. For these reasons I am of opinion that the judgment of the Queen's Bench should be affirmed on all points. After the argument of this case, and I had written what I have read as my judgment on the point of dead freight, our attention was called to the case of McLean v. Fleming (L. Rep. 2 H. of L. Sc. 128), decided by the House of Lords on the 3rd April last. The delivery of the judgment of this court was postponed till we had an opportunity of inquiring into the case of McLean v. Fleming. My brother Bramwell considers the decision in the House of Lords governs this case, and must govern him, whatever his opinion otherwise would have been. My brother Brett, for reasons he has given, considers that McLean v. Fleming does not apply. Other of the judges, including myself, take the same view of the effect of the decision in McLean v. Fleming. If I considered the decision of the House of Lords as one which governs the present case, of course I should be bound by it, and should withdraw so much of the judgment respecting the point of dead freight as I had prepared and have read; but, thinking that the decision of the House of Lords does not govern the present case, I abide by the opinion that the plaintiff cannot recover his claim for dead freight; and I therefore think the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench should be affirmed on all points.

The judgment of BRAMWELL, B., was read by WILLES, J.—The questions in this case depend on the construction of the bill of lading and charter party. The former refers to the latter; the captain is "bound to consign his cargo as per charter party, dated London, 18th Aug., 1866," and payment is to be made as "per the aforesaid charter party." A copy of this charter party was sent to the defendants with the original bill of lading. The bill of lading, then, must be construed in connection with the charter party, and the surrounding circumstances—perhaps as the bill of lading is negotiable, not all the surrounding circumstances that would be applicable as between charterer and owner—but one, at least, must be borne in mind, viz., that the defendants were consignees of the whole cargo. This being so, it seems to me that the best way to examine the matter is first to ascertain the meaning of the charter party. It was said by the plaintiff that the effect of it was, that on the loading of the cargo the responsibility of the charterer ceased, as well for all things future as those past; and that therefore a right must be taken to be given against the person entitled to receive the goods under the bill of lading to withhold them till satisfied for all claims which otherwise would have been enforced against the charterer. It is not strictly necessary to decide this, perhaps, because it may be that from the form of the bill of lading no right is given against the defendants, although all rights are lost against the charterer; and, on the other hand, it may be, that by the terms of the charter party rights remain against the charterer, while by those of the bill of lading they are given against the defendants. But the argument is so important, an answer one way to the question would be so cogent in favour of the plaintiff, that it is necessary to consider it minutely. It seems to me that the plaintiff is wrong in his contention on this point. I do not think that the parties intended, nor that they have expressed an intention, that the charterer's responsibilities for causes of actions then accrued should be extinguished on shipment. Agreements should be construed on the principle that parties, when making them, contemplate keeping, not breaking them. I do not think this charter contemplates that the charterer will break his contract. It is true, the words "dead freight" are used, which certainly are unmeaning in this case, except they provide for the case of a short cargo contrary to the charter. What meaning, if any, is to be given to them, I shall have to explain presently; but I think they are not sufficient to show that "responsibilities" mean "responsibilities for past breaches of agreement." Again the charterer's "responsibilities" are to "cease." It is a verbal criticism, but the right words would be, "be extinguished" as to accrued claims. Further, they are "to cease on shipment of the cargo, provided it be of sufficient value to cover the freight and charges on arrival at port of discharge." So that it must be of sufficient value to cover the freight and cargo. But why should the shipment of a cargo of sufficient value to cover freight and charges extinguish an already incurred claim for short loading, demurrage, and detention over the demurrage days? Again, it must be of that value "on arrival at port of discharge." So that if damaged on the voyage to a less value, the other responsibilities would exist. Further, they are to cease on shipment of the cargo, i.e., a full cargo. That is a good reason why the responsibility to ship a full cargo should cease, viz., because it has been done; but why is it a reason why responsibility for delay in loading should cease? Why should shipping a short cargo not only be a cause of action in itself, but also keep alive the cause of action for delay in shipping? It is also certain that all breaches of contract by the charterer are not provided for by a remedy against the person entitled under the bill of lading. For if there was no advance at the port of loading, an action would lie against the charterer; but clearly there is no lien on the goods for the damages thereby recoverable. Of course that is not decisive, it may have been overlooked; but it is an argument. I am of opinion on this part of the case, that the responsibilities which are to cease, are those which the shipowner without loss to himself may render unnecessary in the case supposed, viz., responsibilities for the freight and charges to cover which the cargo is of sufficient value on arrival at port of discharge. The clause should be read thus: "And on shipment of the cargo, provided it is of sufficient value to cover the freight and charges on arrival at port of discharge, the charterer's responsibilities to cease, for such freight and charges." It is said this opinion is inconsistent with the case of Bannister v. Breslauer (sup.). If so, I respectfully intimate my doubt of that decision. But it is to be observed that every case such as this, where no general principle of law is involved, but only the meaning of careless and slovenly documents, must depend on its own particular words. I may observe that in one sense this question does not arise. For if the plaintiff is right "the cargo" has not been shipped, but something short of the cargo. However, to help the construction of the bill of lading, the question does arise; but, for the reasons I have given, it should, I think be answered unfavourably to the plaintiff. Putting this meaning on this part of the charter party, it is next convenient to examine what lien by the charter party would be reserved against the party entitled to the goods, whom I will call "consignee." The owners are to have an absolute lien for all freight, dead freight, demurrage, and average. The doubts are as to dead freight and demurrage. First, does dead freight include short loading? In strictness, it does not. Dead freight apparently, in strictness, means some agreed sum fixed or capable of calculation, for short loading. Now, it is certain that general damages, which are all the plaintiff could recover here, are something very different from that. Here the plaintiff might recover more than a sum equal to the charter freight for goods carried; or less, if he filled up advantageously elsewhere. Why, then, are these words, which do not naturally signify damages for short loading, to be held to do so in this case? The burthen of showing this is on the plaintiff. The argument he uses is, that unless so interpreted, the words "dead freight" have no application: that a meaning ought to be given to them if they are capable of it; that damages for short loading are often called "dead freight;" that words may be construed in a secondary sense when not applicable in their primary sense; that otherwise no lien is given for dead freight, though the parties intended to give very extensive liens. This argument is, I think, of great force; still its value must be tried and compared with arguments the other way. Those arguments seem to be these. That the parties might have said, "damages for short loading" in so many words if they had thought fit; that as they have not done so, those who have to decide on the charter ought not to say so, without almost a necessity for so doing; that no such necessity exists here; for that, although it is a rule that a meaning should be given to all words if they are capable of one, there is no rule that it must be done in all cases; and that when it is remembered that the forms of these documents are prepared in the same words in print, whatever particular stipulations may be introduced in each, it is more right and more natural to add the words "if any" to all such general words as those in question, as was done in the case of Cross v. Pagliano (L. Rep. 6 Ex. 9), than to give any such secondary meaning; for that where a secondary meaning is given to words incapable of their primary meaning, the words properly have that secondary meaning, as where "son" is held to mean "illegitimate son" where there is no legitimate son. Further, to suppose that a lien is given for damages for short loading, is to suppose that the parties contemplated that the agreement would be broken, and not kept, which is a wrong way of construing agreements, as, presumably, parties making them contemplate keeping them. Now, when dead freight is agreed to be paid, the charterer has the right to load a short cargo on paying the dead freight. Another argument against the plaintiff is that the construction he contends for is inconvenient; that it is not likely a merchant would charter a ship in such terms that he would not be entitled to a bill of lading without the goods in it being liable to a thing so uncertain and open to dispute as a claim for short freight; and that, though in this case there is but one bill of lading, there might have been several, and the goods in each subject to this claim. Which of these reasonings should prevail might be matter of much doubt but for the case of McLean v. Fleming (sup.), recently decided in the House of Lords, where a lien for "dead freight," under circumstances very similar to those of this case, was held to give a lien for damages for short loading. Pearson v. Goschen (sup.) is, no doubt, the other way, though certainly there the matter was rather assumed than determined. Anyhow, if it conflicts with McLean v. Fleming, of course the latter must prevail. It remains to consider, as to this point, whether the shipowner having a right to this lien, that right has been preserved in the bill of lading? But I will first examine what other liens are given by the charter party. Analogous considerations to the foregoing show, to my mind, that "demurrage" means demurrage strictly so called. In the first place, demurrage, though sometimes used to signify any undue delay in loading, is an expression in common use to signify an agreed time, and is so used in this charter party. Demurrage proper is contemplated by this charter and the word therefore is satisfied; so that, if the plaintiff is right, "demurrage" would have two meanings, viz., "demurrage proper," and "damages for detention," which may be at a greater or less rate than the agreed demurrage. In the next place, there is the argument that the parties are not to be taken to contemplate breaking their agreement. In the result, then, I think the charter party enables the owner to insist on a lien for demurrage, strictly so called, but not for delay in loading, ultra the demurrage days. If, then, these are the proper constructions of the charter party, what is that of the bill of lading? If the master has not reserved the liens he was entitled to, or has stipulated for those to which he was not entitled, why has he? Shortly, the meaning to be expected in the bill of lading is one in conformity with the charter party. Let us examine it. The goods "are to be delivered unto order, or to his or their assigns, he or they paying freight, and all other conditions, or demurrage, if any, should be incurred for the said goods, as per the aforesaid charter party." It is certainly impossible to speak with confidence as to the meaning to be put on this document. In the first place, the word is "or" demurrage; of course, this must be read "and." Then the words are "if any should be incurred." This means on the face of it, I suppose, "should thereafter be incurred." But when it is remembered that the charter, "per" which this is to be paid, makes no provision for demurrage at the port of discharge (and it certainly does not), while it does for demurrage at the port of loading, and when it is remembered how commonly the mistake is made of using the "should" or "shall be" for "shall have been" to comprehend possible past and future, must not this be read as a bit of bad grammar for "if any shall have been incurred?" It seems to me it must be so read, especially when read in conjunction with the words "he or they paying freight, and all other conditions." These words I now have to consider in reference to the remaining questions, viz., is there a lien under the bill of lading for the damages for short loading? But for the words "all other conditions" there clearly would not be. But those words must be read as "performing or satisfying all other conditions" for the said goods as per the aforesaid charter party: for "paying" conditions is insensible. But if I am right in my construction of the charter party, one of the conditions the consignee might be required per the charter party to satisfy in order to have the goods, is paying damages for short loading under the name of "dead freight," for it seems to me that the word "conditions" has no application, unless it is to secure the liens to which the shipowner is entitled by the charter party. It supposes the performance of some condition, precedent or concurrent, by the consignee. What is he to do by the charter party? Pay freight? That is expressly provided for. Unload as fast as the ship can put the cargo out? But that is not a condition precedent or concurrent, to or with his having the cargo. He may be bound so to unload, but not for "the goods;" for he must have them whether he unload at that rate or otherwise. Besides, that would be only one condition, and not conditions. The clause about heated or damaged condition does not create any condition to be performed, but provides for a way in which, in a certain event, the freight is to be computed. It seems to me, then, that by the charter party there is a right to insert in the bill of lading a lien for the demurrage and dead freight or damage for short loading; that there is no reason to suppose that the captain intended to give up that right; that there are words sufficient to carry it; that those words have no application unless they have that effect; and that consequently they have that effect; and the plaintiff is entitled to his lien for those damages and demurrage. It is said that the words are "paying for the goods;" I think that the words must be read "paying and satisfying all the conditions for the goods;" for "paying conditions" for the goods is insensible. Even then it is argued that the paying and satisfying are to be "for the goods," which means "for the carriage of the goods." I do not think so. It means "to have the goods." Demurrage is not paid for the carriage of the goods, but for delaying in loading, nor is average; yet, by the bill of lading, demurrage and average may have to be paid for the goods, which may mean "to have them." Smith v. Sieveling (sup.), is cited to show that those words "for the goods" are to be so understood; and certainly that case tends that way. But Wegener v. Smith (sup.) is an authority the other way. And it seems to me clear that each of those cases must depend on the very words used. Here, again, the argument is used, that if there were several consignees, and several bills of lading, it would be impossible to construe them in this way; that either there would be liens on small parcels for large damages, or other difficulties would arise. There is only one bill of lading. It may be if there were several it would be impossible so to construe them, though I do not think so. But, if so, the conclusion to be drawn is, that in that case the bills of lading would have been differently framed. In this particular case (if such a matter may be noticed) the fact is, that "all other conditions" are inserted in writing in an otherwise printed form obviously for some important purpose, while the clause about demurrage "if any should be incurred" is in print, and good enough, at the time of printing, to comprehend all demurrage, whether incurred before or after the signing of the bill of lading. Supposing that by the words "demurrage if any should be incurred," no lien for the demurrage anterior to the bill of lading would be given, I think it would be given by the words "all other conditions." I think those words, for the reason I have given, would suffice without express mention of demurrage, and I think that express mention does not lessen their effect. In conclusion, I think the plaintiff entitled to a lien for the demurrage, and the dead freight or damages for short loading; and that the judgment should be affirmed as to the former, and reversed as to the latter. But I speak with great doubt, seeing the state of the authorities, and knowing the different opinions entertained on the questions, and considering what they are—viz., what meaning is to be put on loose and careless expressions? But I cannot help thinking that if we decide against the plaintiff, he will lose a benefit he clearly means to have, and the charterers intended he should have. The questions ought to have no importance except to the parties interested, and except as a warning to others not to let them arise again.

WILLES, J.—I entirely concur with the judgment delivered by my brother Brett—a judgment written with such fresh and accurate acquaintance with the mercantile and maritime law applicable to the subject, that I will not attempt to add anything.

KELLY, C.B.—Three questions arise upon this appeal. One, and the most important, for it governs the entire case, is whether the words interlined in the bill of lading, so far incorporate into that instrument the conditions in the charter party as to entitle the plaintiff to a lien upon the cargo, of which the defendants have become the owners under the indorsement of the bill of lading. The first point is as to demurrage in respect of the ten days, from the 8th to the 18th Dec., amounting to 80*l*. Under the bill of lading the cargo was to be consigned “as per charter party,” and the cargo is to be delivered “as per charter party unto order or assigns, he or they paying freight and all other conditions” [these words being interlined in writing in the printed bill of lading], “or demurrage, if any should be incurred for the said goods, as per the aforesaid charter party.” This must be read as paying freight and demurrage, if any; and the question is, how much of the charter party is imported into the bill of lading by the words interlined in the bill of lading, “and all other conditions?” These words must be read “performing all other conditions” to make them intelligible and sensible. When we look to the charter party we find, after the provision for the payment of the freight on unloading, and for fifty lay days from the 15th Oct. and ten days on demurrage at 8*l*. per day, the charter party proceeds thus: “The owners to have an absolute lien on the cargo for all freight, dead freight, demurrage, and average, and the charterer’s responsibility to cease upon shipment of the cargo, provided it be of sufficient value to cover the freight and the charges upon arrival at the port of discharge.” And the question is, Whether this condition is binding upon the defendants under the words “and all other conditions” interlined as before mentioned? I think it is. First, because the words cannot be treated as words of form and superfluous, or as having no meaning or effect, seeing that they are introduced expressly and in writing by interlineation in the printed bill of lading, and must therefore point to something intended and distinctly agreed upon between the parties, and I see no other condition to which they can apply, but the very important one that the owner was to have a lien upon the cargo for all freight, dead freight, and demurrage. It has been contended that the words apply only to any condition touching these goods, the freight payable under the bill of lading being the freight only for this shipment; but I think the reasonable interpretation is, that any and every condition is imported which affects in any way the interests of the owner or of the defendants in relation to the cargo thus consigned. I do not say that notice of the contents of the charter party would have bound the defendants by this condition, but assuming the words to mean “performing all other conditions,” I think the only reasonable effect to be given to them is to preserve to the owner the lien for which he had stipulated upon the cargo consigned to the defendants, which otherwise they would not have been liable to satisfy. It is unnecessary to determine whether, upon the shipment of this cargo, the liability of the charterer and the lien of the owner altogether ceased, as well in respect of demurrage already incurred, as of any species of liability that might afterwards arise, for, whether such liability wholly or in part continued or ceased, the owner might claim the benefit of his lien against the consignee of the cargo, either as a substituted or an additional or collateral security for the freight and demurrage. No case has been decided in which the question has turned upon words like this. We must, therefore, decide this case according to what we believe to have been the intention of the parties, to be collected from the language of the two instruments taken together. It is true that, had the two constituted but one contract between the owner and the consignees, it is most unlikely that the consignees would have allowed their cargo to stand as a security for demurrage already incurred, and not by reason of any act or default of theirs; but we must remember that the charter party was entered into between the owner and the charterer before it could be known what compensation the owner would become entitled to, whether in respect of freight or demurrage or any other incident of the adventure. I think, therefore, that the verdict for the plaintiff for 80*l*. ought to stand, and the judgment of the Court of Queen’s Bench upon this point should be affirmed. The next question is, whether the lien extends to the compensation claimed for the detention of the ship after the lapse of ten days on demurrage. Now the words are “freight, dead freight, demurrage, and average;” and it seems to me impossible that this claim should come within either of these words. I think, therefore, the judgment below must also be affirmed upon this point. It remains to be considered whether the claim to unliquidated damages for the not having shipped a complete cargo can be claimed as dead freight, and so brought within the lien to which the owner was entitled. Now, inasmuch as we have no means of ascertaining the amount of these damages, except by consent or by verdict of a jury, they cannot be brought within the strict legal meaning of the term “dead freight,” which must be a sum ascertained or ascertainable by the charter party itself, as where a complete cargo is agreed to be 1000 tons at a specific sum as 20*s*. per ton, and therefore the term “dead freight” in this condition must mean the unliquidated damages for not shipping a full cargo, or it has no meaning at all with reference to the whole effect of this charter party. But we often find words in these printed instruments which are so framed and introduced as to be applicable to a great variety of different cases which have no application at all, and therefore no meaning and effect whatever in the particular case in which such a question as this arises. I am far from saying that a different construction is to be put upon words in print and words in writing, but it may be in an instrument of either character, but more especially where it is in a printed form, that a word or term of this description must be read with the implied addition of the words “if any.” After all, we are in this case to draw our own inferences as to the meaning of the parties in the use of these words, and if they are doubtful, and there be no evidence on the one side or the other of their bearing a particular meaning among commercial men, we must put such a construction upon them as we think calculated to give effect to the rea-intention of the parties; and if they are of a doubtful import they should have a reasonable interpretation; and it certainly does not seem reasonable that these parties should have agreed upon a lien like this, the effect of which would be that, whenever the cargo becomes deliverable upon the arrival of the ship it will be impossible for the consignees to satisfy the lien and to obtain possession of their property, unless by agreement between the parties, as to the amount of damages claimed by reason of the deficiency of the cargo, a matter upon which they are very unlikely to agree, or by means of the verdict of a jury or the award of an arbitrator, which might not be obtained for months, or even for years, after the arrival of the vessel. I may add, that if we are to put a strictly literal construction upon these words, a claim to damages by reason of the shipment of a deficient cargo cannot be brought within the true meaning of the word "freight," which imports a sum certain to be paid in respect of the conveyance of goods in a ship, and therefore the term "dead freight," as well observed by Lord Ellenborough, in the case of Phillips v. Rodie (sup.), cannot be properly used as designating the unliquidated damages recoverable by reason of the breach of contract to ship a full and complete cargo. And this view of the question last raised being supported by the case of Pearson v. Goschen, I think the plaintiff cannot be entitled to a lien for a short shipment, as in this case, under the term "dead freight." I have, indeed, great difficulty in understanding how a lien can exist for a sum of money not ascertained at the time when the goods upon which the lien is supposed to attach are deliverable according to the contract, nor capable of being ascertained but by the award of an arbitrator or the verdict of a jury. But since this case was argued we have been informed of the judgment delivered by the House of Lords in a case of McLean v. Fleming (sup.), in which it was held that damages by reason of the shipment of less than a full cargo might be recovered as dead freight, and we are no doubt bound by that decision. In that case, however, the amount of the damages was capable of being at once ascertained, inasmuch as the short shipment was of the specific quantity of 210 tons of bones, the stipulated freight being 35s. per ton. This is in the nature of dead freight, strictly so called, and is thus distinguishable from the case now before the court. Upon the whole, therefore, I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench should be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

Necessaries—Right of ship's agent to sue—Co-partner.

The agents of a foreign ship in a British port, who have paid for necessaries supplied to her, or who have rendered themselves liable to pay for such necessaries, may sue the ship for such advances as were made on the ship's account, but not for the balance of a general account against her owners. A co-partner in a ship may sue the ship for such advances made by him, but, semble, not if the co-partner is interested in the particular voyage for which the ship is supplied.

The West Friesland (Swa. 455) followed.

THIS was a suit instituted by Alexander and Joseph Taylor, merchants, of Liverpool, to recover certain sums of money expended by them for necessaries supplied to the ship Underwriter in the port of Liverpool. The Underwriter was an American ship, and put into the port of Liverpool, having encountered severe weather on her voyage from Liverpool. She was consigned to the plaintiffs, and they received the freight due upon her cargo, and so received a sum of money sufficient to pay the ordinary disbursements of the ship, but not sufficient to pay for the repairs actually executed. She was surveyed and repaired, the master, who was also part owner, not objecting to the repairs, but leaving the matter in the hands of the plaintiffs as the ship's agents.

The plaintiffs from time to time paid large sums on the ship's account, and made themselves liable to third parties for various supplies to be furnished to the ship. The whole of the ship's bills were from time to time certified, according to the usual course, by the master, as being correct, and the ship, in Feb. 1866, being fully repaired, sailed from Liverpool. The plaintiffs also had large transactions with the owners of the vessel in respect of other vessels, and on the 12th June 1866 there was due to the plaintiffs from the owners a large sum of money, exclusive of the claim in respect of the Underwriter. The plaintiffs also had large transactions with one Trask, of New York, and on the said 12th June 1866 owed him a considerable sum of money. On that date Joseph Taylor, one of the plaintiffs, being then in New York, acting on behalf of the plaintiffs, transferred by endorsement the said account against the owners of the Underwriter to the said Trask. Subsequently the owners paid to Trask the items in the account other than those of the Underwriter, expressly stating at the time that the payment was not on account of the Underwriter. Trask then instituted a suit against the Underwriter and her owners, in the United States District Court at New York, for the recovery of the amount remaining due on the account. On Jan. 7, 1867, the libel of Trask in the said suit was dismissed on the ground that it had been brought in violation of a rule of the Supreme Court, by joining ship and owner. No opinion was given upon the original debt, or the effect of the assignment. On the 20th April 1867, the ship having returned to England was arrested at Liverpool by the plaintiffs, who held the account returned to them by Trask, and claimed the balance due thereon. On the part of the defendants it was pleaded that the advances were not for procuring necessaries, but were paid for necessaries already supplied, and partly for procuring and paying for things that were not necessaries. One Joseph Stuart was, at the time of the advances made, and of the arrest of the ship, the registered owner of one-fourth part of the ship, and the defendants alleged that he held this share as trustee for the plaintiffs, and that they were the real boneficial owners of such share, but this was denied by Joseph Taylor in his examination. The defendants further alleged that the advances were made, not on the credit of the ship but solely on the personal credit of the owners, and that there was no reasonable necessity to make such advances without first communicating with the owners; and the assignment of the debt to Trask vested in him the right to sue by the law of New York, and that he was still entitled to sue, and had instituted a suit. Trask had abandoned the suit in rem, and had obtained leave to proceed in personam, but had not done so. The master asserted that he had objected to the repairs as being too expensive, as he considered such an outlay unnecessary, but that he did not stop them because he understood that Messrs. Taylor were part owners. The other facts of the case are fully stated in the judgment.

The Solicitor-General (Sir W. B. Brett) and Vernon Lushington, for the plaintiffs, relied upon The West Friesland (Swa. 454).—This was an advance made and a liability incurred in order to procure necessaries required:

June 30, 1868.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is a suit instituted by Messrs. Taylor and Co., of Liverpool, against the ship Underwriter, belonging to Charles Carow and others, of New York, for the sum, I was informed by counsel for the plaintiffs, of 4830*l.* 2*s.* 4*d.*, as stated in the exhibit B annexed to the petition (not for the sum of 5833*l.* 10*s.* 6*d.* as set forth in the 18th article of the petition), being money expended for necessaries supplied to this ship between the months of Sept. 1865 and Feb. 1866, at Liverpool. In the latter month the ship being fully repaired sailed from Liverpool, to New York, and was arrested on her return to Liverpool on the 20th April 1867, and the court is now prayed to pronounce the sum which I have mentioned to be due to the plaintiffs, and to condemn the ship in payment thereof with costs. The defendants in their answers alleged various reasons why the prayer should not be complied with, to which I will presently advert. But I must first consider the admitted and approved facts in the case. I must take it to be admitted that the ship arrived at Liverpool in Sept. 1865, "having encountered very severe weather in the course of her voyage, and being on her arrival at Liverpool almost in a sinking state" (see Article 3 in petition.); that she was consigned to the plaintiffs as agents for the owners, who received the freight, the balance of which after deducting the amount of the bill drawn upon it by the captain was about sufficient to pay the ship's ordinary disbursements at Liverpool; that the ship was properly surveyed and extensive repairs done to her; that large sums of money on the ship's account were paid by the plaintiffs, and liabilities to a considerable amount incurred by them for supplies furnished in the usual manner, tradesmen bringing their bills signed by the captain to the office of the plaintiffs, who thereupon discharged them; that the captain gave all the orders and certified according to the usual course all the bills to be correct; that the plaintiffs have not been repaid nor reimbursed by the owners for the moneys which they have advanced, or the liabilities which they have incurred, and that the supplies so furnished to the ship were necessary to enable her to prosecute her voyage. The objections advanced on behalf of the owners, which are set out in their answer, or in the argument of their counsel, against the claim of the plaintiffs upon the ship, may be stated under the following heads:—First, that the plaintiffs did not pay the sums of money, nor incur the liabilities in the petition mentioned on the credit of the ship, but solely on the personal credit of the owners, or of the defendant, Charles Carow (the managing owner) alone; secondly, that the money was advanced as in an ordinary mercantile account, between correspondent and correspondent, that the advance of it did not constitute a maritime lien on the res, that in fact it was a demand for a balance of account between agent and principal, for which a common law action of assumpsit, was the proper remedy; thirdly, that under the law of New York, the debt of the plaintiffs being a chose in action, was assignable, so as to vest the legal right in the assignee, and had been duly assigned by the plaintiffs to a Mr. Trask, of New York, and that they have, consequently, no right to sue in this court; fourthly, that they are part owners, and, on that account, are incapacitated from bringing this suit. With respect to the first objection, I do not think it is sustained by the evidence as to the facts in this case, and, indeed, it was not much insisted upon by counsel, except in so far as it is connected with the second and next head of objection. This is by far the most serious objection, and deserves very careful consideration. The petition in this case was, according to the statement of the Solicitor-General originally intended to be a special statement, upon which an agreement was to be founded; the agreement was, however, broken off, but the special character of the petition, which contains, as it should seem, part of the defendant's case, remains. Mr. Joseph Taylor has been examined and cross-examined before me at considerable length, but with respect to the point under immediate consideration, it is enough to say that he appears to have been an agent for Messrs. Carow and Co. for many years. The accounts which have been put in show that the plaintiffs acted as brokers and agents in the matter of several ships, and that they forwarded debtor and creditor accounts, acting, in fact, as general agents. It appears to have been their habit to send in, not only particular accounts for each ship, but, at stated periods, general accounts for all the ships for which they were agents or brokers. In the case of the West Friesland (Swa. 455) my predecessor decided that "there is nothing in the Act to exclude agents from suing, and nothing in the relation itself apart from positive law, as is clearly illustrated by the continental law." This judgment was, it is true, reversed by the Privy Council, but upon a ground of fact which left this exposition of the law, as well as another to which I will hereafter advert, unaffected. If the evidence in this case had established that this suit was brought to recover the balance of an account, or in order to obtain a general balance of accounts, I should hold that I was bound by the decisions of the Privy Council in the Twentje, which was an appeal from the decision in the West Friesland, afterwards called The Twentje (13 Moo. P. C. C. 185; Swa. 454), and by the decision of my predecessor in The Comtesse de Frégeville (sup.), to hold that this court had no jurisdiction to entertain the suit. But I think that the present case is materially distinguished from these cases. This suit is instituted, not to recover any particular or selected item of a general account, but the whole of the sum expended upon this particular occasion in payment of the necessities required by the exigencies of the ship, and without which she could not have prosecuted her voyage. With regard to the third objection, I think the fair result of the admissions in court, and of the evidence, is that the plaintiffs, owing Trask a considerable sum of money, transferred by indorsement, under the law of New York, their account in respect of other vessels with Charles Carow, the managing owner; that Trask recovered sufficient payment for his purpose from Charles Carow, the latter expressly stating at the time "that the said payment was not on account of the Underwriter" (Art. 12); that Trask subsequently instituted a suit in the Court of New York against the Underwriter and her owners; that this suit was dismissed "on the ground that it had been brought in violation of the 17th Admiralty rule of the Supreme Court by joining the ship and owner. No opinion was given upon the original debt or the effect of the assignment" (Art. 14). It appears to be admitted and proved that the account with the endorsement has been delivered up by Mr. Trask to Mr. Joseph Taylor, and is now in the possession of the plaintiffs; and that, notwithstanding the formal language of the transfer, Mr. Trask has no longer any interest in the instrument. I am not embarrassed, therefore, by any consideration as to the plaintiffs having parted with their right to sue, or as to there being a lis alibi pendens in the matter now before me. Fourthly, it remains to consider the objection that the plaintiffs are part owners; and, first, as to the facts: the defendants themselves allege in their answer that Joseph Stuart was and still is the registered owner of one-fourth part of the said ship, but he held and still holds the said one-fourth part as trustee for and to the use of the plaintiffs, who at the time of the said transactions were and still are the beneficial owners of such one-fourth part of the said ship" (Art. 3). The defendants now contend that Stuart is mortgagee; but they have given no evidence on this point. It is true that in the letters which they have put upon cross-examination into the hands of Mr. Taylor, it appeared that Trask, in the summer of 1866, wrote a letter to Joseph Taylor, the language of which assumed that Joseph Taylor still retained the fourth part in the ship; and that in his answers Taylor does not deny this assumption; but he has sworn in his evidence before the court that he had parted with all his interest in the said fourth share in the summer of 1865 to Mr. Stuart; and I do not think that I should be warranted on the evidence before me in holding him to be guilty of deliberate perjury. Secondly, as to the law. In the West Friesland (sup.) my predecessor said "that Mr. Bremer was himself a part owner, is only a technical objection. At common law partner cannot sue partner, but that is a rule which does not obtain in this court, and here the property is sued and not the co-partner." Perhaps the statement would have received some modification from the learned judge, in the case of a partner, who is concerned in the particular voyage for the prosecution of which the ship has been supplied with necessaries, and for the payment of which necessaries the ship is arrested, but Dr. Lushington's enunciation of the law and practice of the court certainly applies to the circumstances of this case. Upon the whole I am of opinion that I must grant the prayer of the plaintiffs, subject to any reference which may be necessary to the registrar, assisted by merchants.

Salvage--Passenger's baggage--Salvor's lien--Rival salvors--Right to begin--Life salvage from a foreign ship--Jurisdiction--Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), s. 9.

A salvor's lien does not extend to personal baggage and effects (wearing apparel and other goods ejusdem generis) belonging to passengers on board the vessel, to which the services have been rendered, and the Court of Admiralty will order such effects to be released.

Where suits of rival salvors come on for hearing at the same time, the right to begin must depend upon the circumstances of each case.

The F. schooner, having taken on board part of the passengers and crew of a foreign vessel, which was on fire, afterwards transferred them to the S. steamer, in order that they might get ashore more quickly. The whole transaction took place outside British waters:

Held, that the services of the two vessels were not so continuous that they could be considered as one, and that therefore the F. was not entitled to life salvage from a foreign vessel as for services rendered either wholly or in part in British waters under the Admiralty Court Act 1861, s. 9.

In this case there were originally five suits of salvage instituted against the Willem III.: two (Nos. 5771 and 5774), which were consolidated, were instituted on behalf of the General Steam Navigation Company, the owners of the Scorpio ss. and her master and crew, and on behalf of William Watkins the owner of the tug Cambria and her master and crew; two more Nos. 5773 and 5775), also consolidated, were instituted on behalf of John Coote, licensed Trinity House pilot, and John Burnett, the master, and the owners and crew of the cutter Mary of Portsmouth, and on behalf of George Greenham, licensed Trinity House pilot, and the owners, master, and crew of the cutter Alarm; and the fifth (No. 5805), on behalf of the owners, master, and crew of the French schooner Flora. All these suits were for salvage services alleged to have been rendered to the Willem III. and her passengers and crew. On 20th May 1871 the pilot cutter Mary was on her station off the Owers Lightship in the Channel, when at about 9.45 p.m. she perceived signals of distress, and immediately bore down upon the place from whence they proceeded, and at 11.15 p.m. found a vessel which was the Willem III. on fire. Near the vessel they found a large boat containing some of the passengers and crew of the Willem III., and these people, about fifty in number, were taken on board the Mary. This boat was sent back to the ship, and shortly after two more boats came up, and those in them, about forty persons, were taken on board the Mary, and the boats were ordered to save any other persons they were able, and to take them to the Flora, which was then lying on the port quarter of the Willem III. The Flora was a French schooner bound on a voyage from Nantes to Stockholm, with a cargo of molasses valued at 1500*l*. She received on board about 100 persons, from four boats belonging to the Willem III., and fastened these boats alongside. The Flora lay by the burning vessel until between three and four o'clock in the morning of May 20th. The Mary took on board a further boat load of thirty-four people, principally women and children, and at about 1 a.m. on May 21st, having ascertained that a steamer was waiting to pick up the rest of the passengers and crew, and being quite full she set sail for Portsmouth, where she arrived at 1 p.m. on the same day, with all on board safe. The Scorpio was a screw steamer of 661 tons, bound on a voyage from Sunderland to Charente, and with her cargo was valued at 20,000*l*. On the night in question, on her watch making out the burning ship, she bore down to the place and picked up four boats belonging to the Willem III., and took on board those of the passengers and crew that were in them, including the master. The Scorpio, at the request of the master of the Willem III., then went in search of the Flora, and all those persons belonging to the Willem III. on board the Flora were transferred from her to the Scorpio, and the boats alongside the Flora were fetched away and were made fast to the Scorpio. The Scorpio had then on board of her about 150 persons. About this time the pilot cutter Alarm came up, with plaintiff George Greenham on board, and after searching for mere boats and not finding any, George Greenham was engaged by the master of the Scorpio to pilot that steamer into Portsmouth, the master of the Scorpio saying that George Greenham agreed to do so for the sum of 3*l*. The Flora in the meantime proceeded on her voyage. The Scorpio then made fast her hawser to the Willem III. for the purpose of towing her in, and the Scorpio's boatswain and two seamen and some of the crew of the Willem III. went on board the burning vessel to make fast. In the meantime the tug Cambria came up, and she, being a powerful paddlewheel steamer, working up to 400 horse power, after some negotiation it was arranged that she should tow the Willem III. ashore instead of the Scorpio. The fire continued to burn fiercely. The Scorpio then proceeded to Portsmouth, where she landed those saved from the Willem III., and handed them over to the Dutch consul, who paid the plaintiff, George Greenham, the stipulated 3*l*. She also took in some of the boats of the Willem III., of the value of 400*l*. The Scorpio then went out in search of the Cambria and the Willem III., George Greenham still remaining on board. When they found the two vessels the Scorpio offered further assistance, but those on board the Cambria said it was unnecessary, but that they wanted the pilot, and thereupon George Greenham went on board the Cambria. The Scorpio then proceeded on her voyage. Whilst the Scorpio was away landing her passengers, the Cambria had made fast her hawser to the Willem III., and in doing so her crew incurred considerable risk, as they had to go on board the burning vessel and had to cut away the foremast, which was of iron, and had gone by the board, and was hanging alongside by the wire rigging. At 7 a.m. they got all clear, and began towing, and about 3 p.m. the Cambria succeeded in placing the Willem III. on the Hamilton bank outside Spithead, and they continued by her, pumping water into her. The Willem III. was a new steamer, on her first voyage from New Dieppe to Batavia, and belonged to Dutch owners. She had on board a number of passengers, principally officers and soldiers in the service of the Dutch Government, and some ladies, and these persons had personal effects on board, including money, and these were left in the burning ship owing to the hurry of the escape. The plaintiffs contended that there must be gunpowder on board, and that the risk was thereby increased, but this the defendants denied.

The petition in the suit instituted on behalf of the Flora (No. 5805) contained, amongst others, the following paragraph: "The Flora herself was not, during any portion of the time when the persons from the Willem III. were on board of her, within three miles of the shore of England or in British waters.

PASSENGERS' BAGGAGE AND PERSONAL EFFECTS.

June 27.—The case was brought before the court on motion for its direction as to certain baggage and personal effects belonging to passengers on board the Willem III. at the time of the rendering of the salvage services in respect of which the above suits have been instituted. An affidavit by the master of the Willem III. was read which, inter alia, stated that certain baggage was on board, and that it had been deteriorated by the fire and water, and that coins to the value of about 40*l*. had been found. The motion was to obtain an order of court releasing the baggage and personal effects from salvage claims.

W. G. F. Phillimore, for the passengers and owners.—The entire question is, whether the goods of passengers are liable to salvage or not. In 1 Beaw's Lex Mercatoria, 6th edit., p. 242, it is laid down that the wearing apparel of the master and seamen are always excepted from the allowance of salvage, and this is cited in Park on Insurance, 7th edit. p. 225. In "Wreck and Salvage" (by W. Marvin, Judge of the Florida District Court, U.S.), p. 133, it is said that "bills of exchange or other papers, evidences of debt or title to property, are not liable to salvage (The Emblem, Darcis' Adm. Rep., District of Maine, U.S., p. 61); nor is the clothing of the master and crew," and for this proposition The Rising Sun (Ware's Adm. Rep., District of Maine, U.S., p. 385) is cited. It is also said that, "In this district the wreckers have never demanded salvage upon the clothing or personal baggage of the master, crew, and passengers." In the Rising Sun (sup.), Ware, J., says: "A question was raised at the arguments whether the clothing on board, which appears to have been principally the wearing apparel of the crew, ought to be included in the mass of property on which salvage is allowed. I think not. On these melancholy occasions, those who escape from shipwreck usually find themselves in a strange land, without friends, and without resources, and if the wreck happens to be brought to the same shore by other hands, the common feelings of humanity require that their clothing should be restored to them forthwith, unburdened by salvage." This applies equally to passengers. Money found on the person of a passenger found on board of a salvaged vessel was ordered by the same judge to be restored to his legal representatives after deducting the expenses of his funeral: (The Amethyst, Dares's Adm. Rep., District of Maine, U. S., pp 20 & 29.) In questions of general average it is well settled that passengers' effects do not contribute; and Lord Tenterden says: "Neither in this country do the wearing apparel, jewels, or other things belonging to the persons of passengers and crew, and taken on board for their private use, and not for traffic, contribute on these occasions:"

Abbott on Shipping, 11th edit., p. 549.

Dig. 14, 2, 2.

Traité des Assurances et des Contrats a la Grosses d'Emerigon, par Boulay-Paty, t. 1, ch. xii, sect. xlii, §§ 7, 8.

This by analogy applies to salvage. Passengers' effects ought not to contribute.

The Admiralty Advocate (Dr. Deane, Q. C.) and Clarkson for the salvors.—This is the first time the point has arisen. Mr. Phillimore says that "baggage and personal effects" are exempt. These may differ very much; they may include objects of great value. In an emigrant ship the passengers carry out their entire fortune, and all their possessions would be personal effects, but it could not be said that they would be exempt from salvage. The broad rule is that the salvor has a lien on whatever is salvaged. In the case of Hartford v. Jones (1 Raym. Rep. 393), which was in trover for goods, the defendant pleaded that they were in a ship, and the ship took fire, and they hazarded their lives in trying to save them, and therefore they were ready to save them if the plaintiff would pay 4*l.* for salvage. The plaintiff demanded generally, and Holt, C. J., held that "they might retain the goods until payment as well as a tailor or a hatter or common carrier. And salvage is allowed by all nations, it being reasonable that a man should be rewarded who hazards his life in the service of another. But though the retainer be lawful it does not amount to a conversion, no more than a distress for rent." If the retaining of these goods be not a conversion we are entitled to salvage. The same case is reported in 2 Salk. 654, and there it appears that part of the goods salvaged were twenty small carpenter's tools, which were clearly personal effects. With respect to the master's and crews' effects being exempt, this is only by comity and from a feeling that the effects of persons engaged in so many perils ought to be regarded with favour. Expressio unius est exclusio alterius. In the Rising Sun (sup.) this was the ground of the judgment, as the clothing mostly belonged to the master and crew. The Amethyst (sup.) is distinguishable from the present; the money was paid to the personal representatives of the dead man, and the man was washed ashore. [W. G. F. Phillimore.—He was found dead on board the vessel.] No analogy can be drawn from general average, and this court is very chary of meddling with its doctrines. Personal effect for daily use would, perhaps, be considered privileged. De minimis non curat lex. Passenger's baggage is not usually of sufficient value to make it worth while for salvors to claim against it, but in this case there were about 200 passengers. The defendants contend for an absurdity; the cargo pays salvage reward to salvors of life as well as of property: (The Fusilier, 3 Moo.

P. C. C. 51: 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 186.) Why should the property of those whose lives have been saved be exempt? Salvage is paid on the ground of public policy. Clothes actually worn at the time are perhaps exempt on the ground of decency. Salvage is awarded for the purpose of encouraging others to render such services, and not merely to reward services performed. In this case there being no information as to the articles on board, the court is in danger of going wrong as to what is exempt. Would household plate, which are strictly personal effects, be exempt? Or diamonds or buillion? (The Jonge Bastiaan, 5 C. Rob. 322, 324.) This is argued as a principle, and the court has no guide as to what is claimed. In the case of R. in his office of Admiralty v. Property Derelict (1 Hag. 383) a moiety of the property found being coin, a trunk, gold watches, rings, &c., was decreed to the salvor. There is no distinction between property derelict and not derelict, and that case is a direct authority that private property is subject to salvage; and it militates against The Amethyst (sup.) If the property had been wreck, the receiver of wreck would have been entitled to salvage. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—It is quite likely an emigrant might take out his entire capital with him. The practical difficulty is where to draw the line between personal effects and private property, as there would not be any difficulty in holding personal effects not liable, if a sufficient restrictive meaning could be given to these words. It is the custom of the Dutch to carry all their personal property about with them, even their stock-in-trade. General international law would justify me in deciding that actual wearing apparel and personal effects for daily use are privileged, but beyond this there is a very wide margin.]

W. G. F. Phillimore in reply.—I only claim for baggage and personal effects. Certainly the latter may bear a very wide meaning, but I mean by personal effects only what are included in the strict meaning of the words. Cases in the Railway Acts have decided that certain things are not personal luggage with them. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The Railway Acts are very special.] The principles of general average do not apply to jewels. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Would it not be a strong thing to say that a valuable jewel would be exempted from the lien.] If on the owner's person it would certainly be exempt. In the case of unpaid passage money, the passengers' luggage cannot be seized, though he himself may be detained. As to the argument that any amount of "personal effects" might be taken by a passenger, no such thing can occur, as he is only allowed a limited amount, and must pay freight for the remainder. It would be inconvenient to hold against the exemption, on account of the great number of passengers and the consequent number of bail bonds.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I hold wearing apparel and things ejusdem generis exempted from the salvor's lien. In my opinion, strict personal effects, such as wearing apparel, are not liable to salvage. It would be as well to point two arbitrators to determine what things should be exempted, doubtful points to be referred to the court. Costs to be costs in the cause, (a)

RIGHT TO BEGIN.

July 26.—The consolidated causes came on for hearing together.

Butt, Q. C. for the Scorpio and the Cambria (Nos. 5771 and 5774), claimed the right to begin, and cited the Morocco (24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 598; ante, p. 46) in support of his contention, that the cause first entered ought to be first heard.

The Admiralty Advocate (Dr. Deane, Q. C.) and E. C. Clarkson for the Mary and the Alarm (Nos. 5773 and 5775).

Sir John Karlake, Q. C. and Phillimore for the defendants.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—It is difficult to lay down any rigid rule in such a case. Each case ought to depend on its own circumstances. I think it more convenient for counsel for the Mary and the Alarm to begin, as the Mary was first on the spot. (a)

SALVAGE OF LIFE FROM A FOREIGN VESSEL.

Aug. 2.—The cause (No. 5805) instituted on behalf of the Flora came on on motion to reject the petition on the ground that the life salvage was rendered to foreigners outside British waters, and that the court had, therefore, no jurisdiction.

W. G. F. Phillimore for the defendants.—The Court of Admiralty had no original jurisdiction to award salvage for the saving of life only. No jurisdiction was given by the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, ss. 458, 459, 476, over salvage of life on the high seas, particularly from a foreign ship: (The Johannes, Lush. 182.) British legislation does not affect foreigners except when within its jurisdiction, unless it is so expressly enacted.

The Zollverein, Swa. 96;

Cope v. Doherty, 4 K. & J. 367.

In this statute there is no such enactment. The Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), s. 9, extends these provisions, and gives jurisdiction over salvage of life "from any foreign ship or boat, where the services had been rendered wholly or in part in British waters." liberty, under the inspection of some person, to be agreed upon between the parties to this cause, to deliver to the passengers on board the vessel Willem III., at the time of the services in question in this cause being rendered, the wearing apparel and other goods ejusdem generis belonging to him, and he made no order as to the costs of this motion.)

(a) The court, after hearing evidence in the two cases, awarded salvage as follows: In the cases, Nos. 5771 and 5774, the sum of 3500*l.*, which was thus divided between the two vessels—to the Scorpio, 1000*l.*; to the Cambria, 2500*l.* In the cases, Nos. 5773 and 5775, the sum of 625*l.*, which was thus divided: to the Mary, 600*l.*; to the plaintiff George Greenham, 20*l.* and 5*l. nomine expensarum*. The tender in the first set of causes was 2000*l.*, and in the second 400*l.* to the Mary, and 10*l.* to Greenham. The claim of the owners, master, and crew of the Alarm was abandoned at the hearing.

Sect. 458.—In the following cases (that is to say), whenever any ship or boat is stranded or otherwise in distress, on the shore of any sea or tidal water, situate within the limits of the United Kingdom, and services are rendered by any person, (1) in assisting such ship or boat, (2) in saving the lives of the persons belonging to such ship or boat, (3) in saving the cargo or apparel of such ship or boat or any portion thereof; and whenever any wreck is saved by any person other than a receiver within the United Kingdom, there shall be payable, &c. . . . a reasonable amount of salvage, &c.

Sect. 459.—Salvage in respect of the preservation of the life or lives of any persons belonging to any such 242) salvage was given for saving life.] That case was overruled by the Zephyrus (1 W. Rob. 329), where Dr. Lushington held that the statute (1 & 2 Geo. 4, c. 75, s. 8), by which the salvage was awarded only applied to cases before magistrates. The services of the Scorpio and the Flora were distinct, and no part of the Flora's service was rendered in British waters, and as the Willem III. was a foreignship, the services were neither "wholly nor in part in British waters," and the court has no jurisdiction. There is no treaty between England and Holland so as to give the court jurisdiction under the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, s. 59. (a) The word "services" in the Admiralty Court Act 1861, s. 9, mean only the particular services in respect of which the claim is made, and these were not rendered within British waters.

R. E. Webster, for the owners and crew of the Flora.—Some part of the services to the persons taken on board the Flora were rendered in British waters. For the benefit of the saved persons the crew of the Flora placed them on board the Scorpio. If the Flora had taken them in she could have recovered, and if she merely transferred them, the services of the Flora and the Scorpio were one continuous service. The Flora was the bridge which conveyed them to a place of safety. Where a salvage is finally effected, those who meritoriously contribute to that result are entitled to a share in the reward, although the part they took, standing by itself, would not in fact have produced it.

The Atlas, Lush. 518; 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 737.

The Jonge Bastiaan, 5 C. Rob. 322.

A first set of salvors are entitled to reward where they cannot perform all the salvage: (The Samuel, 15 Jur. 407.) Abandonment after great exertions to save a ship will not disentitle to salvage if the ship is brought in by another set of salvors.

The E. U., 1 Spinks, 63.

W. G. F. Phillimore in reply.—To hold the ship liable would be contrary to the principles of international law.—The statutes cited are modern enactments, and must be construed strictly.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The question has been very ship or boat as aforesaid, shall be payable . . . in priority to all other claims for salvage, &c.

Sect. 476.—Subject to the provisions of this Act the High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction to decide upon all claims whatsoever relating to salvage, whether the services in respect to which salvage is claimed were performed upon the high seas, or within the body of a county, or partly in one place and partly in the other, and whether the wreck is found at sea or cast upon the land, or partly in the sea or partly on land.

The Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10, s. 9).—All the provisions of The Merchant Shipping Act 1854, in regard to salvage of life from any ship or boat within the limits of the United Kingdom, shall be extended to the salvage of life from any British ship or boat, wherever the services may have been rendered, and from any foreign ship or boat, where the services have been rendered either wholly or in part in British waters.

(a) Sect. 59.—Whenever it shall appear to Her Majesty that the Government of any foreign country is willing that salvage shall be awarded by British courts for services rendered in saving life from any ship belonging to such country when such ship is beyond the limits of British jurisdiction, Her Majesty may, by Order in Council, direct that the provisions of the principal Act (Merchant Shipping Act 1854), and this Act with respect to salvage for services rendered in saving life from British ships, shall in all British courts be held to apply to services rendered in saving life from the ships of such foreign country, whether such services are rendered within British jurisdiction or not.

well argued, and involves a point of difficulty and nicety. The claim is made under 24 Vict. c. 10, s. 9, and it appears that a vessel not belonging to the salvors now claiming brought the lives saved within British waters. I must hold it to be the rule of law that life salvage could not be awarded jure gentium. No case can be found of life salvage having been awarded where no property was at the same time saved before the Merchant Shipping Acts, and I must therefore hold that life salvage was first made recoverable by those Acts. I must also hold it to have been decided by The Johannes (sup) that the Merchant Shipping Acts must be construed as confined to salvage of life within British waters. The next statute on the subject is the 24 Vic. c. 10, which is intended, no doubt, to carry the provisions further. I think that to give a right to claim for life salvage from a foreign ship under this statute services must be shown to have been rendered within British waters. Mr. Webster, in his able argument, has put his case on the ground that the salvage was partly rendered in British waters. The services commenced when beyond the limits of those waters, but he contends that they were completed within them. It is admitted that no treaty exists to enable the salvors to invoke the powers of the 59th section of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63. The question is reduced to the point, Do the circumstances show that the services rendered by the Flora and the Scorpio were so continuous, that those of the Flora may be considered as wholly or in part rendered in British waters? The vessel did not herself proceed within British waters with the lives saved on board, but it was argued that, as the Scorpio took them within the jurisdiction, the service of the two vessels must be considered as continuous and therefore one. Upon consideration I am of opinion that this position cannot be maintained. I must construe this statute strictly, having regard to the fact that it is an alteration of the existing law of nations. The services must have been rendered to these persons either wholly or in part within British waters, and I am of opinion that they were not. I pronounce that the Flora is not entitled to salvage, but make no order as to costs, as this is the first case that has arisen.

Priority of lien—Master—Ship's agent—Ship-builder—Wages—Disbursements—Repairs—Mercantile account.

The master of a ship has a maritime lien on her for his wages and disbursements, and his claim takes priority over all other claims, save claims for salvage and damage by collision.

A ship's agent was appointed by the master on his arrival at B. He had no previous knowledge of either master or owner, but made no inquiries as to how he was to be repaid his advances for necessaries. He allowed the vessel to be placed in the hands of a shipwright to be repaired, and when her value was by this means increased, caused her to be arrested:

Held, that he was not entitled to be paid his claim in priority to the shipwright.

Where there are several claimants against the proceeds of a vessel in the registry, and she has been sold at the suit of one, the costs of such sale will be paid before all claims, as such sale was for the benefit of all.

THIS ship was arrested and sold at the suit of Henry Randall James, of Bristol, in a cause (No. 5720) instituted on his behalf for necessaries alleged by him to have been supplied to the said ship, and against the proceeds of the sale of the said ship. Three more causes were afterwards instituted; the first (No. 5749) by John Batchelor, of Cardiff, shipbuilder, for necessaries supplied and repairs done to the said ship; secondly (No. 5761) by Hopkins Williams, master mariner, for wages earned and disbursements made by him as master of the said ship; thirdly (No. 5785) by Daniel Philip Messervy, master mariner, for disbursements made by him, as master of the said ship, by a decree of the Judge of the Court of Admiralty of the 2nd Aug. All these claims were referred to the registrar of the said court to report as to the order in which they should be paid, the proceeds being insufficient to satisfy them all in full. These claims came before the registrar on Aug. 14, and the accounts and vouchers were produced before him, and the question of priority was fully argued. Thereupon the registrar reported that the claims were to be paid in the order annexed to the end of his report, and gave his reasons for so reporting. The order and his reasons are given below. On Nov. 7th the judge ordered the several payments to be made in accordance with the report. The facts of the case, and the arguments used, are fully set out in the report.

Clarkson for plaintiffs in causes Nos. 5749 and 5785.

THE REGISTRAR'S report was as follows: These cases were fully argued before me on the 16th Aug. last by Mr. Cohen on the one side, and by Mr. Clarkson on the other, and it is hardly necessary to observe that everything that could be said on the subject was said by those two learned advocates. Owing, however, to the confusion in which the whole question of the priority of liens is involved, I fear the conclusion at which I have arrived will hardly be so satisfactory as I could have wished. This is the more to be regretted as I understand that the parties intend to accept my award as final, and that they have no intention of appealing. The question appears to me to be sufficiently important to be formally argued before the court, and I could even wish now that that course may be taken. Assuming, however, that it is not intended to carry the case any further, it only renders it the more incumbent upon me carefully to consider the conclusions to which I may come, lest by want of due care and attention I should be doing an injustice which would not be remedied on appeal. The facts of the case are as follows: It seems that the Panthea was purchased in June 1870 by a Mr. Norton, of Guernsey, and as I understood was registered at that port. On the 27th June Mr. Norton appointed Daniel Philip Messervy, the plaintiff in cause No. 5785 to the command, at wages of 20*l.* a month. Captain Messervy thereupon, by the owner's directions, shipped a crew, and on the 30th of the same month set sail in her for Sunderland, thence he proceeded to Boston and to Beverley, in the United States, after that to St. John's, New Brunswick, and ultimately returned to Bristol, where she arrived on the 6th Jan. 1871, and discharged her cargo. The crew were soon afterwards discharged, but Captain Messervy remained in charge of her until the 20th March following. During the time that he was in the service of the ship, Captain Messervy received various sums of money and made various disbursements on account of the vessel, and on a balance of account between himself and his owner he claims a sum of 4*l.* 2*s.* 1*d.* Captain Messervy was succeeded in the command of the ship by Hopkins Williams, the plaintiff in cause No. 5761. He claims to have been appointed her master on the 17th March, 1871, three days before the termination of Captain Messervy's service, and was to receive wages at the rate of 14*l.* a month. He seems to have remained in charge of the vessel until the 24th June, 1871, when he was dispossessed by the sale of the vessel under the authority of this court. He claims not only his wages during the above period, but also for certain disbursements made by him and amongst them for a sum of 10*l.* lent by him to the owner, as it is said, for ship's disbursements, and for board and lodging during the whole period of his service at the rate of 3*s.* per day, he having been unable to live on board owing to the repairs that were going on. His claim amounts to the sum of 73*l.* 16*s.* 4*d.* Another case (No. 5720) is that of Mr. Henry Randall James, a shipbroker, of Bristol, who says that he was appointed by Capt. Messervy to take the management of the ship's business upon her arrival at Bristol in Jan. 1871. He says that she lay at Bristol up to some time in March, when she was removed to Cardiff, and that during January, February, March, and April, he made, as ship's agent, various disbursements for wages, dock dues, and other necessities, amounting altogether to 382*l.* 13*s.* 5*d.*, no part of which has ever been paid to him. The last claim is that of Mr. John Batchelor, the plaintiff in cause No. 5459. He is a shipbuilder, residing at Cardiff, and states that in the month of March 1871 he executed certain repairs to the vessel, as I understand, by the direction of Mr. Norton, the owner. By the account which has been brought in the repairs seem to have extended from the 21st to the 28th March, and to have been mainly for docking and re-metalling the ship. His account amounts altogether to the sum of 262*l.* 8*s.* 11*d.* It may be as well to state here that the first suit instituted was that of Mr. James, the shipbroker; then that of Mr. Batchelor, the shipbuilder; after him that of Capt. Williams; and last of all the suit of Capt. Messervy, the first master in point of date. Besides the above claims, two other bills for wire rigging and for setting it up have been sent to the registry; but as the parties have not, although duly warned, thought proper to bring their causes properly before the court by entering actions, I am prevented from taking them into my consideration; and the only cases with which we shall have to deal are the four for which suits have been instituted. In the cases of the two masters and of the shipwright, no question was raised, when they were before the court, as to the amounts, and accordingly the learned judge pronounced for them as claimed. As these decisions however, passed without discussion it will not preclude me from reporting to the court any items of the claims which appear to me to be inadmissible, leaving it to the learned judge to strike them out or not, as he may think proper. In the remaining case, that of Mr. James, the shipbroker, the whole question has been left open, and I am to report whether any and what part of the claim shall be allowed. I have also to say in what order the claimants are entitled to be paid. And first as to the claims of the two masters for the balances due to them on account of wages and disbursements. By the 191st section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, a master has the same "rights, liens, and remedies for the "recovery of his wages" as a common seaman. And in the case of the Mary Ann (L. Rep. 1 A. & E. 8; 13 L. T. Rep. Rep. N. S. 384) Dr. Lushington decided that a master's claim for his disbursement stands upon precisely the same footing as the claim for his wages; for both he has a "maritime lien" on the ship. On the authority, too, of other decisions, a lien of this nature takes precedence of all other claims against the ship, except a claim for salvage, and possibly one for damage by collision, of which, however, there is no question in the present case. Counsel, therefore, did not dispute the claim of the two master mariners to priority over the other two claimants for their wages and disbursements. To the amounts also of these claims no question was raised, except as to a sum of 10*l.* appearing in Captain Williams' accounts, and described as having been advanced to Mr. Norton, the owner, for the purpose of making disbursements. No information is given me as to how this money was expended by Mr. Norton, and whether it really was expended for the ship's use; and as it can hardly be said to be a duty incident to a master's position to lend money to his owner, and then to claim the amount thereof out of the proceeds of the vessel, in priority to other valid claims against the same property, I am of opinion that this sum of 10*l.* should be struck out of Captain Williams' claim. No other item was objected to in either of the claims. I must, therefore, report that Captain Messervy is entitled in respect of a sum of 4*l.* 2*s.* 1*d.*, and Captain Williams in respect of a sum of 63*l.* 16*s.* 4*d.*, to priority over the other claimants, together with their costs. The question as to which of the two masters is entitled to priority over the other, does not arise in the present case, the fund in court being amply sufficient to pay them both, as well as costs. But even if it had, I am not sure, looking to previous decisions of the court, that I could have given either of them precedence over the other. At the same time I cannot but think that, if the question were to be fully argued, a master like Captain Messervy, who has been employed on board the ship, sailing her to different ports, and earning a considerable amount of freight thereby, would be entitled to be preferred before that of Captain Williams, who seems to have done little, if anything, beyond what an ordinary shipkeeper, might have done, and who claims to be paid for such services at the rate of 14*l.* a month, besides 3*s.* a day for board and lodging during the whole period. But, as I have already said, the question does not arise in the present case. There remain the claims of the shipbroker and ship-wright; and, first, as to that of Mr. Batchelor, the shipwright. When that gentleman instituted his suit, the vessel was already under the arrest of the court, and as the claim is for repairs, there can be no question as to his right to sue under the 4th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861. Mr. Clarkson contended, and with some reason, that it was a claim which was peculiarly entitled to consideration. The vessel had been placed in Mr. Batchelor's hands by the owner, Mr. Norton, for the purpose of repairing and remettalling; the work had gone on from the 21st to the 28th March; on the latter day Mr. James, the shipbroker, institutes this suit, she is arrested, and is subsequently sold by order of the court in her improved condition. The repairs, then, that had been done to her by Mr. Batchelor, may be said to have been sold with her, and to have materially increased the proceeds in court. His claim, therefore, appears to me to be especially deserving of the consideration of the court. Mr. Batchelor's account amounts to the sum of 26*l.* 8*s.* 11*d.*, he admitted, however, when he was before me, that if his bill had been paid at once, he should have had no objection to allow the usual discount of 10 per cent. Seeing, however, that six months have now elapsed since the work was done, and that perhaps even now the money will not be immediately paid, I think that a deduction of 5 per cent. might properly be made from his account, which would leave a sum of 24*l.* 6*s.* 6*d.* to be due to him. The question, however, remains as to whether he or Mr. James is entitled to priority, or whether they ought to stand upon the same footing, and divide the balance that may remain, rateably between them, and for this purpose it will be necessary to see of what Mr. James's claim consists. According to this gentleman's statement the vessel was put into his hands by Capt. Messervy, the master, immediately upon her arrival at Bristol in January last, and it is said that he thereupon advanced sums of money to the master, amounting in all to 180*l.* to enable him to pay the crew; that he paid the usual port charges, including pilotage, towage, lights, dock dues, and the expenses of disbursements incurred at Queenstown; his own commissions, and sums advanced at various times to Mr. Norton, amounting to 26*l.*, make up in all a sum of 382*l.* 13*s.* 6*d.*, which he claims to be paid to him out of the proceeds. Mr. Clarkson contended that Mr. James's claim was not for "necessaries" within the meaning of the Act, and he referred to the cases of the N. B. Gosfabrick (Swab. 344), to the Onni (action of Seymour, Peacock, and Co., Lush. 157; 3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 447), and to the Comtesse de Fregeville (Lush. 329; 4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 71), to show that the money advanced to discharge a debt incurred for necessaries, and ordinary mercantile accounts between a shipowner and agent, which he contended this was, were not necessaries within the meaning of the Act, and could not be recovered against the proceeds of the vessel, and certainly not in priority to a claim for repairs. Mr. Cohen, on the other hand, although he admitted that some of the items of the account as, for instance, the 32*l.* odd advanced by Mr. James in satisfaction of an account for disbursements at Queenstown, and 26*l.* advanced to Mr. Norton, the owner, were not necessaries within the meaning of the statute, contended that the moneys advanced to pay for the wages at all events, and even for the pilotage, dock due, and other port charges, were necessaries within the meaning of the Act, and as such were entitled to be paid out of the proceeds. And he referred to the case of the W. F. Safford (Lush. 69; 2 L. T. Rep. N. S. 301), where the learned judge held that money advanced to pay the wages of the crew was entitled to rank as wages in priority to other claims upon the proceeds. The cases of the W. F. Safford and the N. B. Gosfabrick are, it must be admitted, not very easy to reconcile; in the former case it was held that money advanced to pay for wages was not only necessaries within the meaning of the Act, but was entitled, like wages, to priority over the claims for necessaries; in the latter case it was held that money advanced to discharge a debt incurred for necessaries, was not necessaries within the meaning of the Act. It is not very easy to understand why a claim, which is good in the hands of the first creditor should be bad in the hands of the transferee of the claim, or why, when a number of creditors have each separately a good right of action against the proceeds of a vessel, a person taking an assignment of those debts should be unable to sue in one action for the total amount of the debts. Such, however, would seem to be the case. Whether, if the transferee were to institute a suit for the money advanced for the wages alone, he would be entitled, as the case of the W. F. Safford, to priority as for a claim of wages, as if he entered another suit for the money advanced to pay the pilotage, he would be entitled to priority as for a claim of pilotage, and so on through all the items of the account, it is not easy to say. I think, however, that enough has been said to show that the question of the relative priorities of these several claims is in an extremely unsatisfactory state, and will demand the most careful consideration from the court when the question comes before it. It appears to me, however, that, apart from these very difficult questions there are other considerations which seem to militate against Mr. James's claim to be preferred to Mr. Batchelor, or even to rank equally with him. Mr. James, as I have already said, was appointed by the master to be the broker for the ships immediately upon his arrival at Bristol. He stated, when he was before me, that he had no previous knowledge either of the master or of the owner, and that he took it up as an ordinary matter of business. Now, the usual practice of a ship's broker, if I am well informed on the subject, when he advances moneys, as in this case, to nearly 400*l.*, for the disbursements of a ship, of whose owner and master he had previously no knowledge, is to inquire what prospect there is of his being repaid. Ordinarily he collects the freights, repays himself out of it his advances, and hands over the balance either to the master or to the owner of the vessel. And it is quite clear the vessel brought a cargo home, for there is a charge in Mr. James's account for discharging the cargo. I required to know what has become of the freight, and to whom it has been paid? In reply, I was informed that the sum of 475*l.* 17*s.* 2*d.*, the balance due for freight, had been paid to Mr. Norton, the owner, by the shippers of the cargo at St. John's, New Brunswick, previous to the sailing of the vessel, and that no part of it had been paid, either to the master, Messervy, or to Mr. James. Assuming this to be so, a question arises whether Mr. James did not, when asked to make these advances by people of whom he knew nothing, inquire, in the first place, whether there was any freight to be received out of which he could be repaid; and, when he had ascertained that it had all been received by the owner at St. John's whether he did not take measures to ascertain in what way his advances were to be repaid to him. That would seem to be the natural course which a prudent man would have adopted; but, instead of that, what, according to his own statement, does he do? He allows the vessel to be placed in Mr. Batchelor's hands for repairs, and when that gentleman has completed the repairs, and has re-metalled her, and thus materially increased her value, he institutes his suit in this Court of Admiralty, and causes the vessel to be arrested; and he now applies to the court to be paid the amount of his account out of the proceeds, in priority to the claim of Mr. Batchelor; in other words, he seeks to be paid his claim, in part at least, out of the goods which, with his cognisance, Mr. Batchelor had put into the ship. It seems to me that this is hardly equitable; if when Mr. James made his advances he took no pains to ascertain the true position of affairs, but made them on the faith of his being repaid by the owner, it is to the owner that he must look for reimbursements. It would be hard indeed that he should be paid in priority to a gentleman whose claim is for repairs, which have tended materially to increase the proceeds in court. I am of opinion that the claim preferred by Mr. James is for an ordinary mercantile account between himself as ship's agent or ship's broker, and the owner as master of the vessel, and that, as such, on the authority of the cases cited, it is not entitled to rank in priority to the claim of Mr. Batchelor, the shipwright. If Mr. James has been deceived by Mr. Norton, he must take the consequences; it would not be fair to visit them upon those who have not been equally incautious, Vigilantibus, nondormientibus, succurrilex. I will add, however, that inasmuch as Mr. Norton, the owner, has not thought proper to come forward and defend these suits if there should be any balance remaining after payment of the claims of the two masters, and Mr. Batchelor, and the costs incurred by them, I see no objection to its being paid to Mr. James, in part satisfaction of his claim, that course having been adopted by the learned judge in a recent case. The expenses, also, incurred by Mr. James in obtaining the order of the court for the sale of the vessel, being for the benefit of all parties, will have to be paid in priority to all of them.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the order in which the several claims ought to be satisfied out of the proceeds remaining in court is as follows:—(1) The costs incurred in the suit of Mr. James No. (5720) in regard to the sale of the vessel, (2) the claims of Captain Messervy (No. 5785) to the amount of 4*l.* 2*s.* 1*d.* and costs, (3) the claim of Captain Williams (No. 5761) to the amount of 63*l.* 16*s.* 4*d.* and costs, (4) the claim of Mr. Batchelor (No. 5749) to the extent of 249*l.* 6*s.* 6*d.* and costs, (5) the balance (if any) may be paid to Mr. James in part satisfaction of his claim and costs.

Costs—Bail—Præcipe—Re-arrest of ship where the amount due for damages and costs exceed bail—Admiralty Court Act 1861, ss. 15, 22.

Where a suit has been instituted against a vessel, and bail has been given for an estimated amount to cover damages and costs, and the damages recovered and the costs taxed are a larger sum than the bail given, and there has been no carelessness on the part of the plaintiffs, the court will not amend the præcipe, but will issue a writ under the Admiralty Court Act 1861, ss. 15 and 22, for the re-arrest of the ship to satisfy the costs, and will direct such writ to the marshal for execution. (a)

The practice by which the amount, in which a suit is instituted, is laid to cover probable damages and costs is simply a matter of convenience.

THIS suit was brought on behalf of Messrs. Simmonds, Hunt and Co., against the ship Freedom, an American vessel, of which the owners were domiciled in America. The petition set out that the plaintiffs were indorsees of bills of lading of parcels of oilcake, and that they had instituted a cause against the ship to recover damages for injury to the cargo, and that at the time of the institution of the suit, they had taken bail for the vessel in the sum of 500*l.*, having estimated their damages and probable costs in that amount; that they had recovered the sum of 453*l.* 2*s.* 8*d.* in the High Court of Admiralty, and that on appeal to the Privy Council the above award was con-

(a) The writ issued in pursuance of the judgment in this case was as follows;

In the High Court of Admiralty of England.
No. 4704.

Victoria, by the grace of God of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, Queen, Defender of the Faith. To the Marshal of the High Court of our Admiralty of England, and to all and singular his substitutes, greeting. Whereas in a cause instituted in our said court on behalf of Simmons, Hunt, and Company, of No. 37, Mark-lane, London, the indorsees of the bills of lading of certain parcels of oil cake, now or lately laden on board the ship or vessel Freedom, against the said vessel, her tackle, apparel, and furniture, and against the owners thereof intervening, the judge of our said court did on the 4th March 1870, pronounce for the damage proceeded for, condemn the defendants and their bail therein, and in costs, and refer the said damage to the registrar of our said court, assisted by merchants, to report the amount thereof. And whereas the said damage has been assessed at the sum of 452*l.* 2*s.* 8*d.* with interest thereon until paid, and the said costs have been taxed at the sum of 432*l.* 10*s.* 3*d.*, making together a sum of 884*l.* 12*s.* 11*d.* And whereas it hath been alleged that the sum of 500*l.* being the amount for which the sureties in the said cause have bound themselves on behalf of the owners of the said vessel Freedom, has been paid to, and accepted by, the plaintiffs in satisfaction of the said damage and interest, and in part satisfaction of the costs, and that there is now due to the plaintiffs a sum of 384*l.* 12*s.* 11*d.* for costs, in addition to such further costs as have been incurred subsequent to the taxation. We do, therefore, hereby command you, justice so requiring, to arrest the said vessel Freedom, her tackle, apparel, and furniture, and to keep the same under safe arrest until the defendants shall have paid what may be due from them to the plaintiffs in this cause, or until you shall receive further orders from us.

Given at London, under the seal of our said court, the day of _____, in the year of Our Lord 1871.

firmed (a); that the costs when taxed amounted to 432*l.* 10*s.* 3*d.*, and that the two sums together exceeded the amount of the bail by 384*l.* 12*s.* 11*d.*, and the plaintiffs prayed the court "to allow the plaintiffs to increase the amount in which the suit was instituted and to direct that a writ of fi. fa. do issue to enable the plaintiffs to obtain execution and satisfaction of the said judgment for damages and cost." The defendants answered, submitting that the court had no power to do so.

Nov 7.—Cohen for the Plaintiffs.—We are entitled to a judgment for the damages and costs. The bail is for 500*l.* only, and therefore we have only 47*l.* for costs. It has been decided, no doubt, that if bail has been put in the ship cannot be re-arrested to answer for damages: (The Wild Ranger, Bro. & Lush. 84.) [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The principle of the cases which decide that point seems to be that after judgment has been given the sum in which the action has been entered cannot be altered.] Sects. 15 and 22 (b) of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 give the court power to re-arrest the ship for payment of costs, in spite of the former decisions. The sections presuppose the ship not under arrest. This court must have power to enforce a judgment. It can obtain possession of the goods of the judgment debtor, or may seize his ship. We ask the court to issue execution. It is not necessary to increase the original amount of action. We have a good judgment, and although before the Admiralty Court Act 1861 the court may have had no power to re-arrest the ship, it now has power to issue a writ of fi. fa., and we ask for it.

Butt, Q.C. and Clarkson for the defendants.—It is necessary for the plaintiffs to have the proceipe amended before they can recover more than 500*l.*, the amount of the bail. The amount in which an action in the court is entered is always such as to cover damages and costs, and according to the practice no more can be asked for costs than the sum entered, which is supposed to include the estimated amount of plaintiff's costs. The cause has come to an end, and all has been done that can be done. We have a decree, and have gone to a reference. It was not an interlocutory decree. The figures are ascertained, which, with costs, are more than the amount of action, and the court has no power to make any order increasing the amount of action save on the payment of costs by the plaintiff. If the plaintiff had come to the court before the interlocutory judgment, he might have had an alteration of the proceipe; but it is now too late: (Tebbs v. Barron, 4 M. & G. 844.) In this court the amount of action includes costs. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—There is no rule of court which compels a plaintiff to institute his suit in a sum which will cover both damages and costs. You contend that if he does, he cannot get costs. It is done only as a matter of precaution.] No alteration can be made after judgment at common law; but the courts will grant a new trial by virtue of their equitable jurisdiction by rescinding the judgment. But even then they require the payment of costs by the plaintiff. The form of the bail bond in this court is that "we," &c., "consent that if the said _____ shall not pay what may be adjudged against him in the said cause with costs, execution," &c., and this shows that the bond is intended to cover both damages and costs. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—It shows that the plaintiff is content to take it; but has it been decided that where the sum awarded has been more than that named in the bond, more could not be given, and the ship could not be re-arrested? I have great doubt as to that point. A court of common law can enforce payment of a sum beyond the damages for costs, and cannot I do the same under sect. 15 of the Admiralty Court Act? If you can make it out to be a rule that the suit must be instituted in a sum to cover everything, you are unanswerable; but it seems doubtful that where a case afterwards becomes very expensive such a rule can obtain.] The answer to that is that the plaintiff may apply at any time before decree. A judge giving his reasons only gives an interlocutory decree, and an application may be always made. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Supposing I were to make an order for the issue of a fi. fa. under sect. 22.] The real question is whether the amount of action entered is conclusive? [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—That question is grounded not on a rule, but on the practice of the court. If the judgment recovered were in the exact sum in which the action was instituted with costs, could not the court order payment of the costs? Not without amending the proceipe, and it is now too late to amend. The plaintiff cannot have his proceipe amended without payment of costs, and since the Common Law Procedure Act it has been decided that a judgment at common law cannot be set aside except on such payment: (Cannan v. Reynolds, 26 L. J. 62 Q. B.; 5 E. & B. 301.) In this court it is necessary to be even more particular than at common law, as it is the practice to give sufficient bail. There is a distinction between this court and the common law courts; in the latter a pleader puts into his declaration what sum he chooses, and the amount is immaterial, whilst here the property is arrested, and two things are concurrent, the suit is instituted in an amount to cover costs and damages, and bail is issued to cover this amount. It is material here that the amount should be accurate, and it has been the practice to allow the plaintiffs to estimate the sum. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The case of the Temiscowata (2 Spinks 208) is conclusive against the contention that practice of the court is to require bail to be entered to cover both damages and costs.] Since that case (decided in 1855) the court has become a court of record, and there, there were peculiar circumstances. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE: In the Volant (1 W. Rob. 383, 390), Dr. Lushington says: "Suppose no bail given, may not the owner abandon the ship? and can the court do more than sell the ship for the benefit of the plaintiffs

(b) By the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 & 25 Vict., c. 10), sect. 15, "All decrees and orders of the High Court of Admiralty whereby any sum of money, or any costs, charges, or expenses shall be payable to any person, shall have the same effect as judgments in the Superior Courts of common law, and the persons to whom such moneys or costs, &c., shall be payable shall be deemed judgment creditors, and all powers of enforcing judgments possessed by the Superior Courts of common law, or any judge thereof, with respect to matters depending in the same courts, as well as against the ships and goods arrested as against the person of the judgment debtor, shall be possessed by the said Court of Admiralty with respect to matters therein depending," &c. Sect. 22: "Any writ or other process necessary or expedient for giving effect to any of the provisions of this Act may be issued from the High Court of Admiralty, in such form as the judge of the said court shall from time to time direct."

in the action? No further liability can be imposed on the owner, save as to costs." That cannot be good law. Dr. Lushington seems to say that a liability is created beyond the value of the ship. The plaintiffs were bound to require bail to the full value. Their neglect to do so disentitles them to recover more than the amount of the bail: (Nostra Senora del Carmine, 1 Spinks, 303.) It would be impolitic to order a re-arrest of the vessel.

Cohen, in reply. We originally arrested for a small amount, and this the court approves, and we ought not now to suffer. In salvage cases there is no jurisdiction where the property saved is not up to a certain sum, and yet the court may give costs. In causes of limitation of liability costs may be given. Costs are not part of the judgment, but its legal consequences and ancillary to it. Admitting that we have made a mistake, we are entitled to a remedy by the equitable jurisdiction of the court. The common law courts will give relief on a mistake being made: (Cannan v. Reynolds (sup.)).

Nov. 10.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—In this case the plaintiffs, who were English subjects, instituted a suit against the American ship Freedom, of which the defendants were owners domiciled in America, for damages to cargo. I gave judgment in favour of the plaintiffs, and this judgment was affirmed by the court of appeal. The usual reference was made to the registrar, who reported that there was due to the plaintiffs 45*l.* 2*s.* 8*d.*, with interest; and the costs were taxed at the sum of 43*l.* 10*s.* 3*d.* The suit had been instituted in the amount of 500*l.*, and bail had been taken for that amount and the ship released. The defendants have now paid to the plaintiffs the sum of 500*l.*, leaving the sum of 384*l.* 12*s.* 11*d.*, due for costs, still unpaid. It appears that the ship is still within the jurisdiction of the court. The plaintiffs pray the court, for Mr. Cohen confined himself to this part of the prayer, to issue such process against the ship as may enable the plaintiff to obtain execution and satisfaction of the judgment, for damages and costs. The defendants contend that the application is too late; that before judgment the court might have increased the amount in which the suit was instituted on proper application being made to it, but that it has no power to do so after judgment has been given; and that the ship, having been released on bail given for the full amount in which the suit was instituted, cannot be re-arrested. Cases were cited by the defendants from the courts of common law; the one principally relied upon was Cannan v. Reynolds (sup.), for the proposition, that where a mistake has been made in the amount claimed and recovered, the judgment may be set aside, at the instance of the plaintiff, upon payment of all costs incurred after declaration, and a new action entered; and it was contended that this was the only mode of redress to which the plaintiffs could have recourse. It was not denied that these cases, whatever their authority may be for the practice of this court, related only to an increase of the amount of damage for which the action was laid, nor that the court, as a matter of course, issued a proper writ to enforce the payment of costs quite independently of the question of the amount of damages; but it was urged that it was according to the invariable practice of this court that the proæcipe for the institution of this suit should lay the amount at a sum which would cover costs as well as damages, and therefore I find a difficulty in following the argument that the common law cases were applicable. I am clear that this is an erroneous view of the practice of the court. It did not require the authority of the Temiscouata (2 Spinks, 210), to prove that this court can always issue a monition in personam for the payment of costs which have exceeded the amount in which the suit was instituted. Moreover, if the vessel had not been bailed, and were still under arrest, there can be no doubt that she would not be released without payment of costs, and the fact of bail having been given in no way affects the liability of the owner of the ship for costs as well as damages, and I think that, even under the old law, if necessary, the court would have ordered the re-arrest of the ship for the payment of costs. I say nothing about the subject of damages. The fact that generally the amount in which the suit is instituted is laid to cover probable costs and damages is simply a matter of convenience; and the court has always discouraged the institution of a suit for an excessive amount. In this case the defendants are foreigners domiciled abroad, and no monition in personam can be enforced against them; though if they had succeeded in the suit they could have obtained a monition in personam against the plaintiff. It is, therefore, manifestly in furtherance of justice that the plaintiffs should have the remedy for which they pray. Such a remedy might, I think, have been furnished by the old law and practice of the court; but, however this may be, I am satisfied that the 15th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, enables the court to cause execution of the sentence by the seizure of the goods, which in this case is the ship of the defendants, and under the 22nd section I have the power to frame a writ for that purpose; and I shall execute that power by directing, under a proper instrument, the marshal to seize the ship of the defendants for the payment of the balance of costs due to the plaintiffs, in which will be included the costs of the application.

British vessel in United States Court—Wages—Protest of British Consul—Voyage not ended—Absence of special circumstances—Jurisdiction.
A crew shipped in a British vessel for a voyage "from Liverpool to Bombay and any ports and places in the Indian, Pacific, and Atlantic Oceans, and China and Eastern seas, thence to a port for orders, and to the Continent, if required, and back to a port of final discharge in the United Kingdom, term not to exceed three years." On arriving at Boston on the return voyage, the crew claimed their wages as per schedule, and brought a suit in the United States Court. The British acting consul protested against the jurisdiction, on the ground that the voyage was not ended, and that by English law British seamen are not permitted to sue in foreign ports unless discharged there, or so ill-treated as to be put in fear of their lives.

Held, that although the court might doubt the validity of the ship's articles, it could not, in the absence of special circumstances, entertain the suit against the protest of the British consul. (a)

LIBEL by the crew of the British ship Becherdass Ambaidass, alleging that they shipped at Liverpool in Nov. 1869 for a voyage to the East Indies, and thence to Boston; that the ship arrived in safety at this port in Feb. 1871, where the libellants' services terminated, and they became entitled to their wages as fully stated in their schedule. H. B. M. acting consul at Boston protested against the court taking jurisdiction of this cause, for the reasons that the libellants signed shipping articles in a usual form approved and used in the Government shipping offices, and for a voyage not yet ended; that by the Merchant Shipping Act of Great Britain (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, ss. 190, 207), seamen are not permitted to sue in foreign ports unless duly discharged there, or so ill-treated as to be put in fear of their lives; that neither alternative applies to these libellants, and that it will be for the advantage of both parties to remit them to their home tribunals. The master, by his answer, reiterates the same grounds of objection, and adds a description of the voyage from the articles as follows: "From Liverpool to Bombay, and any ports and places in the Indian, Pacific, and Atlantic Oceans, and China and Eastern seas, thence to a port for orders, and to the Continent if required, and back to a port of final discharge in the United Kingdom, term not to exceed three years." The shipping articles on inspection agreed with the masters answer, and the libellants admitted that their description of the voyage in the libel was not the true one, and prayed leave to amend by alleging that they were brought to Boston against their will. No objection was made to allowing such an amendment; but none such was made and sworn to.

LOWELL, J.—The law is well settled in England and America, that courts of admiralty have jurisdiction of suits by foreign seamen for their wages against a foreign ship, or her master or owners who are found within the territorial limits of the jurisdiction of the court. As early as 1795, Peters, J., thus stated his practice: "I have avoided taking cognizance, as much as possible, of disputes in which foreign ships and seamen are concerned. I have in general left them to settle their differences between their own tribunals. On several occasions I have seen it a part of the contract that the mariners should not sue in any other than their own courts; and I consider such a contract lawful," &c. He adds that where the voyage is ended or broken up here, and no treaty or compact prescribes the mode of proceeding, he had permitted such suits to be brought: The Catharina

(1 Pet. Adm. 194.) He makes a very similar statement in The Försök (Ib. 197.) And there is no substantial change since that time. See The Jerusalem (2 Gal. 191), Taylor v. Caryl (20 How. 611, per Taney, C. J.), The Maggie Hammond (9 Wall. 452, per Clifford J.) These three cases do not decide the very point, but they contain dicta of great weight, and the decisions are in conformity with them: Patch v. Marshall (1 Curtis C. C. 452), The Gazelle (1 Sprague 378), The Havana (Ib. 402), Davis v. Leslie (Abbott Adm. 123), Gonzales v. Minor (2 Wall. Jr. 348), and there are many similar cases in which the rule is shown to be that the Admiralty Court has jurisdiction, but has a discretion whether to exercise it or not. It is not possible, of course to lay down a precise rule to govern even the sound and judicial discretion of a court in future cases. Those in which actions have been maintained, against objection by the defendants or claimants (leaving out of view for the present the protest of the consul or minister), are where the voyage ends here by its own terms, and the wages are due here; where it has been wholly broken up by a sale of the ship, whether voluntarily or under legal process; where the ship is unseaworthy that the crew are not bound to go in her; where they have been forced to leave her by the cruelty of the masters. It has been doubted whether a seaman discharged here by his own consent should be permitted to sue, and whether a deviation by the master would be good ground for taking jurisdiction. On this last point see Moran v. Baudin (2 Pet. Adm. 415), The St. Oloff (Ib. 428), for, and Davis v. Leslie (Abbott Adm. 134), and Bucker v. Klorkegeter (Ib. 409), against, suits being sustained, the latter being dicta by Betts, J., in which he expresses the opinion that the cases in Peters are not well decided. His ground is, that the very question of deviation may present all the difficulties of ascertaining the foreign law and applying it to the contract that induce the courts to decline the jurisdiction of questions arising during the course of a still unfinished voyage. My own opinion is, that a plain departure from an admitted voyage absolves the crew from their engagement by the general maritime law, and authorises them to leave the vessel at any port where the only inconvenience to the master will arise from the necessity of hiring a new crew, even at higher wages; and that the decision in the former of the two cases cited from 2 Peters, where it is shown that the crew had been taken on voyages they had never agreed for, was clearly right. Such seems to be the opinion of Mr. Parsons (2 Parsons on Shipping, 227), and Judge Betts's dicta must be taken, not as announcing any general rule, but rather as suggesting important exceptions to a sound rule. There are such exceptions, no doubt, to any rule that may be attempted to be made. A seaman discharged here may yet have bound himself by a valid contract not to sue here; or we may be bound by treaty not to entertain the suit; or an offer may be made to return destitute seamen to their home, which the court may think they ought to accept, &c. Subject to such exceptions, I consider deviation may be a ground for discharging the crew and ordering their wages to be paid to them, and this upon plain grounds of justice and universal authority. This is not a case of deviation, strictly so-called. The crew in their sworn libel say they were to come to Boston, and that the voyage was to end here. It is admitted now that the voyage was not to end here, and it is said, though not verified by oath, that they were brought here against their will. If this were so, the men must certainly have known it when they filed their libel, and should have alleged it, so as to put it in issue. As the case stands, I cannot take this fact for granted. The voyage described in the articles is broad enough to include Boston within its terms, and the contract seems to have been fully read and explained to the crew, and I understand the real objection relied on by the libellants is, that the articles are void for uncertainty. That is a point which has often arisen in this court; and, so far as our own statute is concerned, it is settled that such a description is too vague. This is not denied by the claimant, nor does he hesitate to admit that the decisions of the High Court of Admiralty, so far as any such have been reported, seem to agree very nearly with the American case; still he insists that I cannot know the English law, and that he ought to have the right to take evidence in England concerning the present law and practice there, if I take jurisdiction at all. Besides these considerations, there is the protest of H. B. M. acting consul, which affirms the validity of the articles, and protests that the court ought not to take jurisdiction. Several of the authorities above cited refer to the consent or dissent of the representative of the foreign government as being an important fact, but precisely what weight should be given to it is not defined. Sprague, J., in The Bloomer (cited 2 Parsons on Shipping, 229, note 2), says: "The usual course in the case of a libel by a foreign seaman against his vessel is to direct the clerk to inform the consul of the government of the dependency of the suit, that he may take such notice of it as he thinks proper; and unless there were strong circumstances in the case, the court would not proceed in rem against a foreign vessel without the assent of the commercial representative here of the foreign government of the country where she belonged." What circumstances would be strong enough to induce action, notwithstanding such a protest is not stated. Peters, J., appears to have found such circumstances in The St. Oloff (2 Pet. Adm. 428), where there had been both cruelty and deviation. So did Mr. Justice Curtis, in Patch v. Marshall (1 Curtis, C. C. 452), where the defendant appeared domiciled in Massachusetts, and the voyage was ended there. In a late case in England, it has been decided in conformity with the practice in both countries, that the protest of the foreign consul could not bar the jurisdiction; but that it ought to be respectfully considered and weighed together with the other facts and circumstances upon which the sound discretion of the court must be exercised. The Nina (L. Rep. 2 P. C. 38; 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 391; ib. 585); see, too, The Golubchick (1 W. Rob. 143); The Milford (Swabey, 362); The Herzogin Marie (1 Lush. 292). The practice pointed out by Sprague, J., which agrees entirely with the English practice as shown by these cases was not followed in this case, and the consul was not notified before the warrant issued; and for the sufficient reason that the libel says nothing about the vessel being foreign, but states simply the case of a voyage ending here, the ship earning freight, and the seamen entitled to their wages; and not only so, but it invokes the immediate action of the court on the ground that the ship was about to proceed to sea within ten days, an allegation made under the statute of 1790, 1 Stats. 134, which is wholly inapplicable to the case of a British crew shipped in England, as these men are now admitted to have been. A libel so framed in total disregard of the truth of the case is an abuse of the process of the court, and the costs which have resulted from it will justly fall on the libellants if it turns out that no warrant ought to have been granted. And my opinion is, that justice does not require me to take jurisdiction against the protest of the consul. That objection has weight as showing the opinion of the person who is intrusted with the care of British seamen, that there is no such hardship in this case as required the libellants to be paid here rather than at home. His opinion of the law, too, must have some weight, because he is in a position to know and act upon it often. Nor can I find in the case any of the strong circumstances such as Judge Sprague refers to, as requiring the protest to be disregarded. The libellants do not appear to have been brought here against their will, and the master professes himself ready to carry them home. The time for which they shipped has not run out, and no reason is given, excepting what under the circumstances of this case may fairly be called the technical one, that their contract is null. It is the policy of all maritime countries to discourage the discharge of their seamen in foreign ports, and if the master undertook to discharge these men here against their will, he would be guilty of a misdemeanor by the terms of the Merchant Shipping Act (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, ss. 206, 207). They say it is in their election to be discharged. If this be so, yet there is no reason given excepting the strict right, and that is precisely what a court of admiralty does not feel bound to enforce without further reasons. Reserving, therefore, an opinion upon any state of facts not now before me, I must say that I do not find here any good cause for taking jurisdiction. One of the difficulties in the operation of the well-established course of practice is, that we are obliged to try the case before we can ascertain whether it ought to be tried or not, and I find that difficulty somewhat embarrassing here, for the facts may not have been fully developed in the short hearing already had. I shall retain the libel until the sincerity of the master's professed readiness to take back the men has been ascertained; but if the facts turn out to be as they now appear, I shall not exercise jurisdiction further. Whether I shall do so in any event, unless one or more of the crew shall appear to have been discharged with the master's consent, I do not decide. But in such a case as I have sometimes seen, of a master inducing a crew to desert, and then setting up the act in bar of their wages, perhaps his consent to discharge them might be presumed.

Q. B.] IONIDES AND ANOTHER v. THE PACIFIC FIRE AND MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY. [Q. B.]

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

IONIDES AND ANOTHER v. THE PACIFIC FIRE AND MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Marine Insurance—Policy on goods on ship or ships to be declared—Mistake in ship's name—Innocent misrepresentation—Underwriter's slip—Evidence—30 Vict. c. 23, ss. 7, 9.

The contract of an underwriter who subscribes a policy on goods by ship or ships to be declared is, that he will insure any goods of the description specified, which may be shipped on any vessel answering the description, if any there be, in the policy, on the voyages specified in the policy, to which the assured elects to apply the policy; the object of the declaration (and it need do no more) is to identify the particular adventure to which the assured elects to apply the policy.

If the description in a policy on a particular ship designates the subject with sufficient certainty, or suggests the means of doing it, a mistake in the name of the ship or in other particulars, will not defeat the contract, and where it can be proved that it was a clear mistake, and the underwriter cannot be prejudiced, it is of no consequence.

If a representation is made to an underwriter, however honestly and innocently, that a ship is a new ship, when, in fact she is an old ship, and the underwriter subscribes a policy on goods on board of her in favour of a person making such representation, the policy is thereby vitiated, for the age of the vessel is material in considering the premium.

An underwriter's slip is a contract for marine insurance, and is not a policy, but by 30 Vict. c. 23, ss. 7, 9, it is not valid, that is, not enforceable at law or in equity; it may, however, be given in evidence, wherever it is, though not valid, material.

The plaintiffs, in pursuance of instructions from Messrs. G., of Hamburg, had entered into a policy to cover hides on ship or ships to be declared. This policy was subscribed by the Progress Insurance Company, which had failed and was being wound-up. Interests had been declared on this policy, so that there only remained open the sum of 121l. The plaintiffs received instructions from Messrs. G., to declare on this policy to cover hides shipped on the Socrates, Captain Jean Card, from a port in the Brazils to Hamburg. L., plaintiffs' clerk, went to the defendants' office, and asked D., the defendants' manager, if he would re-insure the portion of the risk covered by the policy of the Progress Insurance Company, viz., 121l. L. had not the letter of instructions with him, but D. looked at the Veritas register, and saw there the Socrate, Captain Jean Card, an old French vessel, and next to it the Socrates, Captain C. J. Albertson, and asked L. if the Socrates was the ship; L. replied that he thought so. D. thereupon initialed a slip and a policy was issued for 121l., and at the same premium. The goods were really shipped on board the Socrate, and were totally lost.

Held, that as the defendants were in no way bound to accept this policy, the mistake and misrepresentation as to the name of the ship was such that the policy was thereby vitiated, and that the defendants were not liable in respect of the policy.

After the policy for 121l. had been subscribed by the defendants, they, in pursuance of instructions from Messrs. K., of Hamburg, opened a further policy on hides, on ship or ships to be declared for 5000l.; the slip was signed, but the policy had not yet been prepared. The plaintiff been ordered by Messrs. K. to declare on hides to the value of 2700l. coming by the Socrates from Brazil to Hamburg and others by other ships, one of the plaintiffs went to the defendants' office and took the slip for 5000l., and wrote out a slip for a policy on 2455l. on hides per Socrates, and another slip for 2500l. for hides on another vessel, saying to the defendants' clerk, that instead of drawing-up an open policy for 5000l., and then declaring on it for 4955l., which would leave so small a balance as 45l., it would be more convenient for all parties to have two ship policies. The clerk assented and initialed the two slips, and policies were duly issued in accordance with the slips. The hides were really on board the Socrate, and were afterwards totally lost:

Held, that as the defendants were bound in accordance with the slip for 5000l. to issue a policy on any ship selected by the plaintiffs, and as knowledge of facts as to the risk under that policy is issued, would not have been material to them, and as the policy for 2455l. was a policy substituted for the other, the mistake in the ship's name was immaterial, and the defendants were liable,

DECLARATION.—First count, that a contract was made by and between the plaintiffs and the defendants by a certain policy of insurance, purporting thereby, and containing therein, that the defendants held insured the plaintiffs, as well in their own as that of the name or names of those to whomsoever they might appertain, and whether lost or not lost, in the sum of 3000l., in hides as might be declared valued at invoice cost, and 12l. 10s. per cent. additional, free from particular average, unless the ship should be stranded, sunk, or burnt, under 5 per cent. on the whole interest part of 6000l., from any ports or places in the Brazils, to any port of call and for discharge in the United Kingdom (and—or) the continent of Europe between Havre and Hamburg, both inclusive, and continuing the risk from the United Kingdom or Havre, by steamer, to Hamburg, on board the good ship or ships, whereof, &c. . . . And the plaintiffs say that afterwards interests on hides were declared to the defendants, and accepted by them as interests to be covered by the said policy, which interests were, by the said declarations, valued for the purposes of the said policy, and their aggregate said values amount to 6000l., and amongst them the following interest valued as aforesaid at 245l. was declared—that is to say, 2600 dry salted hides, part of the value of which was declared to be covered by the said policy, such part being the said sum of 245l., though the said hides were by the said declaration collectively valued for the purposes of the said policy at 2700l., the said sum of 245l. being by the said declaration declared to be part of the 6000l. to be covered by the said policy, and it was declared that the said hides were insured by a certain vessel called, to wit, the Socrates, on one of the said voyages covered by the said policy as in the declaration described, and the said declaration was indorsed on the said policy, and assented to by the defendants, and all things were done and happened, and all times elapsed, &c. . . . and the plaintiffs say that the said ship with the said hides on board thereof, started and proceeded on the said voyage, and during the said voyage, and during the continuance of the risk covered by the said policy, the hides were wholly lost by the perils insured against, and the plaintiffs say that certain persons, called Messrs. Kalkman, at the time of the said loss were interested in the said hides in respect, &c., and all things were done and happened to entitle the plaintiffs to have the defendants pay them the said sum of 245*l.*, yet the defendants did not pay the same, nor did they otherwise indemnify the plaintiffs against the said loss to the extent of 245*l.* or any part thereof.

Second Count: That a contract was made by and between the plaintiffs and defendants by a certain policy of insurance, purporting thereby, and containing therein, that the defendants held insured the plaintiffs, as well in their own, as that of the name or names of those to whomsoever the same might appertain, and whether lost or not lost in the sum of 2455*l.* on hides valued at 2700*l.* . . . from Ceara to Hamburg on board the good ship Socrates, whereof was master, or whosever else should be master, beginning the adventure, &c., and the plaintiffs say that all things were done, &c., and that the said ship with the said hides on board thereof started and proceeded on the said voyage, and during the said voyage, and during the continuance of the risk covered by the said policy, the said hides were wholly lost by the perils insured against, and the plaintiffs say that certain persons called Messrs. Kalkman before and at the time of the said loss were interested in the said hides to the full value, &c. . . and all things happened, &c. . . Yet the defendants did not pay the same, nor did they otherwise indemnify the plaintiffs against the said loss to the extent of the said sum of 2455*l.* or any part thereof.

Third Count: That a contract was made by and between the plaintiffs and the defendants by a certain policy of assurance, purporting thereby, and containing therein, that the defendants held insured the plaintiffs as well in their own as that of the name or names of those to whomsoever the same might appertain, and whether lost or not lost, in the sum of 2354*l.*, on hides valued at invoice charges, and 12*l.* 10*s.* per cent. additional, in conjunction with policies for 3500*l.*, dated 14th Oct. 1868, warranted to sail after 1st July, 1869, from any ports and places in the Brazils to a port or ports of call, and for discharge in the United Kingdom, or on the continent of Europe between Havre and Hamburg, both inclusive, on board the good ship Yli; whereof was master, or whosever else should or might be master, beginning the adventure, &c., and the plaintiffs say that afterwards interests on hides to the value and amount of 5250*l.* were declared to the defendants, and accepted by them as interests to be covered by the said last recited policy, and by the said policies for 3500*l.*, dated 14th Oct. 1868, and amongst them the following, that is to say: 1400 dry salted hides, and it was by the said declaration declared that the said hides were insured by a certain vessel called, to wit, the Socrates, on one of the said voyages covered by the said last mentioned policy, which voyage was in the said declaration described, and the said declaration was indorsed on the said policy, and assented to by the defendants, and all things were done and happened, &c., and the plaintiffs say that the said ship with the said hides on board thereof, started on the said voyage, and during the said voyage, and during the continuance of the risk covered by the said policy, the said hides were wholly lost by the perils insured against, and the plaintiffs say that one John Tecker Gayen, was interested in the said hides, in respect of which the said sum of 1450*l.* was insured to the full value of all the moneys by them or him ever insured thereon, and the said insurance was made for the use and benefit, and on account of, the said John Tecker Gayen, and all things were done and happened to entitle the plaintiffs to have the defendants pay them the said sum of 725*l.*, under the said last recited policy, yet the defendants did not pay the same, nor did they otherwise indemnify the plaintiffs against the said loss, to the extent of the said 725*l.* or any part thereof.

Fourth count: That a contract was made by and between the plaintiffs and the defendants by a certain policy of insurance, purporting thereby and containing therein that the defendants held insured the plaintiffs as well in their own as that of the name or names of those to whomsoever the same might appertain, and whether lost or not lost in the sum of 121*l.* on 1400 hides, valued at 1450*l.*, being a re-insurance on part of policy issued by the Progress Insurance Company, subject to same clauses and conditions as said insurance, and to pay as might be paid thereon from Ceara to Hamburg on board the good ship Socrates, whereof was master, or whosever else might or should be master, beginning the adventure, &c., and the plaintiffs say that all things were done and happened, &c., and that the said ship, with the said hides on board thereof, started and proceeded on the said voyage, and during the said voyage and during the continuance of the risk covered by the said policy the said hides were wholly lost by the perils insured against by the defendants, and the plaintiffs say that one John Tecker Gayen was interested in the hides, &c.; and the said insurance was made for the use and benefit, and on account of the person so interested, and all things were done, &c.; yet the defendants did not pay the same, nor did they otherwise indemnify the plaintiffs against the loss to the extent of the said sum of 121*l.*, or any part thereof.

Fifth count: For money payable, &c.

Pleas:—First, as to first and third counts, payment into court of 134*l.* 9*s.* 8*d.*; secondly, as to the second and fourth counts, denial of contract; thirdly, as to second and fourth counts, denial of interest in the hides; fourthly, as to the second and fourth counts, that the said policies were not made for the use and benefit of Kalkman and Gayen respectively, as alleged; fifthly, as to second and fourth counts, denial of shipment on board the Socrates; sixthly, as to the second and fourth counts, that the defendants were induced to subscribe the said policies in those counts mentioned, and to become insurers to the plaintiffs on the terms of the said policies respectively, by the misrepresentation of the plaintiffs of a fact material to the risks by the said policies respectively covered, that is to say, that the hides were shipped by the ship Socrates, whereas, in fact, they were shipped by another ship, that is to say, the ship Socrate; seventhly, as to the second and fourth counts, denial of the loss of the hides; and eighthly to the fifth count, never indebted.

Q. B.] IONIDES AND ANOTHER v. THE PACIFIC FIRE AND MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY. [Q. B.]

The plaintiffs took out of court the sum of 134*l.* 9*s.* 8*d.* paid in, replied damages ultra, and joined issue on the second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth pleas. The defendants amended their pleadings, and added a plea to the second and fourth counts that "at the time of the defendants subscribing the said policies and becoming insurers, as therein mentioned, the plaintiffs and their agents wrongfully concealed from the defendants a fact then known to them and unknown to the defendants, material to the risk caused by the policies, that is to say, that the plaintiffs had received a letter from the consignee of the goods in the said policies respectively mentioned, and which ought to have been communicated to the defendants, whereby it appeared that the said goods were shipped on board of a foreign vessel, the name of whose master was Jean Card;" and they further paid into court on the first and third counts the sum of 131*l.* 18*s.* 2*d.*, and this sum the plaintiffs took out in satisfaction of their claim under those counts, and entered a nolle prosequi thereon, and joined issue on the amended plea above set out.

The case came on for trial at Guildhall, before Hannen, J. and a special jury, at the sittings after Michaelmas Term 1870, and a verdict was found for the plaintiffs on the second and fourth counts, the learned judge asking the jury, first, whether the parties, when the name of the vessel was declared, had in contemplation, and contracted about, the same identical vessel; secondly, whether there was a misrepresentation as to the ship on which the goods were; thirdly, whether there was a concealment of the captain's name (a). Leave was reserved to the defendants to move to enter a verdict for them, on the ground that no insurance was effected on goods on board the Socrate, and no loss was proved within the meaning of the several policies declared on; the defendants also moved for a new trial, on the ground that the learned judge misdirected the jury, in putting to them as material, whether they thought the parties intended to insure the hides by whatever ship they might be carried, or that there was any evidence proper to be submitted to them that the parties insured, or meant to insure, hides carried by any other ship than the Socrates, and that they might properly find for the plaintiffs, on the pleas of concealment and misrepresentation upon the evidence of the captain's name, under the circumstances proved, and also that the verdict was against the evidence. The facts are fully set out in the judgment.

May 30 and June 9.—Cohen and Lanyon for the plaintiffs showed cause.—The defendants have paid money into court on the first and third counts, and have thereby admitted their liability under the others. The policies on which they have paid are similar to the others. The policy set out in the second count was entered into for convenience. The defendants had already initiated a slip for 5000*l.* and were bound to issue a policy in accordance with that slip. Before the issue of that policy, and in order to avoid the necessity of declaring upon it the plaintiffs got a slip signed for goods on board a ship they called the Socrates. It is exactly the same thing as if they had declared on the policy for 5000*l.* for the amount insured as per Socrates. A policy on goods on board a ship to be afterwards declared, imports an insurance on any ship in the absence of fraud. The ship alluded to and intended by the parties in both policies (for 2455*l.* and 121*l.*) was the ship on which the hides actually were. The real question is, what was in the contemplation of the parties? The jury found for the plaintiffs, and that finding really was that the defendants were willing to insure the hides on any ship declared by the plaintiffs as long as there was no fraud, and that they did not contemplate any particular ship. A mere mistake in the name of the ship will not vitiate the policy. Casaregis says (De Commercio, disc. 1, § 159), "Error tamen nominis alicujus navis non attenditur, quando ex aliis conjecturis constat de navis identitate." In this case the identity was of no consequence, and, therefore, the mistake cannot affect the right to recover. See also Emerigon, par Boulay-Paty, Ch. 6, sect. 2. In 1 Arnould on Marine Insurance (3rd edit. p. 327), it is said that, where the name of the ship is by mistake declared wrong it may be corrected. Both these policies were in the nature of declarations, the one for 121*l.* being only a re-insurance:

(a) With respect to this question, Hannen, J., in his summing up, said: "A concealment of a material matter, though made in forgetfulness, though made unintentionally and without any fraud, but through forgetfulness, will vitiate the policy. But then we must consider what it must be forgetfulness of. A man may hear something casually, from some source wholly unconnected with the business which he is about to enter upon, and if that is the only knowledge he has, so casually obtained, and that does not occur to his mind at the time, that is not a concealment of the fact. It must be a concealment (and I am supposing, mind, through forgetfulness), of a fact which the majority of the community, as represented by twelve men chosen by chance, and sitting in a jury box, think that a man ought, in the ordinary course of things, to have had present to his mind."

Robinson v. Touray, 1 Mau. & Sel. 217; 3 Camp. 158;

Phillips on Insurance, c. 5, s. 1, 430;

Le Mesurier v. Vaughan, 6 East, 3822.

In a policy on "ship or ships," the assured has a right to apply any of the policies to a loss on board any ship he pleases that comes within the terms of such policy (1 Arnould on Insurance, 3rd edit., p. 329), and these policies were really on "ship or ships." There was never any positive statement that the Socrates was the ship on which the hides were. It was only said that the plaintiff thought so. The Socrates was not shown to be unseaworthy, and on such policies the insurers are bound to take any ship. They cannot now set up that they would have required a higher premium if they had known it was the Socrate. The defendants could not have repudiated their engagement to issue a policy in accordance with the slip for 5000*l.*, and if they had issued that policy it would not have been material to them whether certain facts were known to the plaintiffs, and not known to them which would have made the risk greater. They were under that policy bound to take her, good or bad, at a premium fixed in the slip. Even should the policy for 121*l.* be considered an insurance de novo, there was no misrepresentation. The plaintiffs honestly believed that they were naming the right ship. The clerk said he "thought so," as no doubt he did think so. That was a true representation, and cannot vitiate the policy. There was no fraud or wilful intention to deceive:

1 Arnould on Marine Insurance, 3rd edit., p. 496.

Milward, Q. C., and Murphy in support of the rule.—The policy for 121*l.* was on goods on the ship Socrates, not on the Socrate. As far as the defendants were concerned it was an entirely new policy, and upon a particular ship. The ship was material to them, as the risk on the Socrate, being an old ship, was greater than on the Socrates, a new ship. The plaintiffs' clerk clearly represented that the ship was the Socrates, and it was on the faith of that representation that the defendants undertook the risk. They were under no obligation to do so. Misrepresentation, however innocent, vitiates the policy, and here the plaintiffs gave the name of the wrong ship:

1 Arnould on Marine Ins. 491, 3rd ed.;
Anderson v. Thornton, 8 Ex. 425.

In fact, there was no contract at all between the parties; the defendants undertaking to insure one ship, and the plaintiffs asking them to insure another. They were not ad idem. No distinction can be drawn between the two policies. The policy for 2455*l.* was equally a new policy, and entered into between the same parties. It has been contended by the plaintiffs that as the defendants initialled the slip for 5000*l.* they were bound to issue a policy, and that the policy actually issued was in accordance with their undertaking; the policy actually issued, however, was in a particular ship, the Socrates. The plaintiffs are not entitled to go beyond the written terms of the policy. What passed between the plaintiffs and defendants as to the policy for 121*l.* binds the plaintiffs as to the policy for 2455*l.*, and it must be taken that the representation as to the name of the ship was repeated. The plaintiffs are not entitled to use the slip as evidence of the intention of the parties. A slip is not admissible in evidence by 30 Vict. c. 23, ss. 7, 9, and the court are not at liberty even to look at that slip as evidence of a contract: (Mackenzie v. Coulson, L. Rep. 8 Eq. 368, 374.) [BLACKBURN, J.—A slip is not a policy, and the Act only forbids policies being given in evidence when not duly stamped. A slip is not valid as a contract, but may be given in evidence where material.] It has been otherwise decided:

Marsden v. Reid, 3 East, 572;
1 Arnould on Marine Insurance, 253.

The defendants were not in any way bound to enter into this new insurance. The plaintiffs waived the issue of the first policy, and asked the defendants to enter into a fresh policy on a different footing, and any representations made at that time are binding on the parties. The second policy cannot be taken as a substituted policy, as there never was a policy in existence for which to substitute it. In Le Mesurier v. Vaughan (sup.), the judgment went mainly on the ground that the policy contained the words "or by whatever other name or names the said ship should be called." These words are not inserted in either of these policies.

June 24th.—The judgment of the COURT (Cockburn, C.J., Blackburn, and Hannen, JJ.) was delivered by

BLACKBURN, J.—This was an action on four different policies of marine insurance made by the defendants with the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs are brokers, who, as is common, enter into policies in their own names, but on behalf of and to protect the interests of different constituents. No notice was given to the defendants for whom the different policies subscribed by them were made, but from the ordinary course of business they must have known that the plaintiffs probably had principals, and nothing was done by the plaintiffs to justify the defendants in concluding that the principals in the different policies were the same person. In fact, the policies which come in question in the present action were made by two different firms, Messrs. Kalkman and Messrs. Gayen, both of Hamburg. In order to make the points raised at the trial and discussed in court intelligible, it is necessary to state what was the position of the plaintiffs with regard to both of these firms in the latter part of Jan. 1870, when the transactions took place which gave rise to the present dispute. The plaintiffs, in pursuance of instructions received from Messrs. Gayen, had entered into policies in conjunction with each other to cover hides to a considerable value on ship or ships to be declared. The defendants had subscribed one of these policies for the amount of 2354*l.* Another of the policies was subscribed by another company, the Progress, which had failed, and was being wound-up. So many interests had been declared on these policies that there remained so little open on them to declare that the proportion on the defendants' policy left open would be 725*l.*, and that on the policy in the Progress, 121*l.* In this state of things the plaintiffs received from Messrs. Gayen a letter dated the 23rd Jan., written from Hamburg, directing them to declare on each of these policies to cover hides shipped on the Socrates, Capt. Jean Card, from a port in the Brazils to Hamburg. The plaintiff Chapeaurouge, having received this letter on the 24th of Jan. directed one of his clerks, Lambert, to go to the office of the defendants, and there declare on the Socrates for 725*l.*, so as to fill up the defendants' ship or ships' policy, and at the same time to see if the defendants would at the same premium re-insure the portion of the risk covered by the policy in the insolvent company, the Progress, viz., 121*l.* The letter of instructions was not by him, but the Veritas was lying on the table, and on looking into it the plaintiff and his clerk saw in the register, which is in alphabetical order, the Socrates, Capt. C. J. Albertson, a new Norwegian vessel, and next to the Socrate, Captain Jean Card, an old French vessel. Had the plaintiff recollected that the letter described the vessel as the Socrates, Captain Jean Card, he would probably have conjectured that the inaccuracy was in the name of the vessel, and that, as the fact turned out to be, the hides were shipped on board the Socrate; but not recollecting this, he observed to his clerk that a Norwegian ship of that character was very likely to be engaged in that trade, or words to that effect. The clerk went down to the office, and there was the defendants' principal manager, Drummond. He then indorsed on the policy a declaration of interest by the Socrates, which he handed to Drummond to initial, and at the same time requested him to insure on the same ship 121*l.*, by way of re-insurance of what had been insured in the Progress Company. Drummond, turning to the Veritas, and there seeing the Socrates, asked if that was the ship? Lambert replied that "he thought so," and Drummond then initialled the declaration. At the same time a slip was prepared for a policy on hides, per Socrates, to cover 121*l.* at 66*s.* per cent., being the same premium. No discussion took place about the premium, probably because the transaction was so small, and was entered into rather to oblige a good customer than with any view of making a profit; but there can be no doubt that the premium on an old vessel such as the Socrate, would have been higher than that on a new one, such as the Socrates, though the difference on such a sum as 121*l.*

would not have been more than a few shillings, and was probably neglected by both parties. The policy for 121*l.* was afterwards made out and executed. This finished the transactions so far as the plaintiffs were acting for Messrs. Gayen. The third count was on the declaration on the ship or ship's policy to recover the 725*l.* The fourth count was on the policy for 121*l.*, and in both these counts the interest was averred to be in Messrs. Gayen, and the policies to be made on their behalf. The plaintiffs had also opened with the defendants a policy on hides, by ship or ships to be declared, for 3000*l.* This had been done on behalf of Messrs. Kalkman. The plaintiffs had also received instructions from the same parties to open a further policy of the same nature to the extent of 5000*l.*, and had agreed with the defendants for it. The slip was signed, but the policy had not yet been prepared. On the 3rd Feb. there had been so many interests declared on the 3000*l.* policy that there remained open on it only 245*l.* This being the state of things, the plaintiffs received a letter from Messrs. Kalkman, informing them they had hides to the value of 2700*l.* coming by the Socrates from Brazil to Hamburg, and also hides to the value of 3600*l.* coming by the Sophie, and desiring them to insure 1100*l.*, and to declare on their open policies for the residue. It will be observed that the interest open on the policy for 3000*l.*, viz., 245*l.*, the 5000*l.* for which the slip was signed, though the policy was not executed, and 1100*l.*, would together make 6345*l.*, being 45*l.* more than the amount coming by the two vessels as announced by the letter of the 3rd Feb. The plaintiffs procured a policy for 1100*l.* on the hides per Sophie, and then, on the 4th Feb. the plaintiff Chapeaurouge went in person to the defendants' office; he there saw a different clerk of the defendants, one Lark, and there was no controversy of testimony between them as to what took place. The plaintiff indorsed on the back of the 3000*l.* policy a declaration of interest on hides per Socrates to the extent still open on the policy, viz., 245*l.* He at the same time took the slip for the 5000*l.* policy on hides by ship or ships, and taking up two pieces of paper wrote out a slip for a policy for 2455*l.* on hides per Socrates, and another slip for a policy for 2500*l.* on hides per Sophie, and laid those four documents before Lark. Lark asked what this meant, and Chapeaurouge said that, instead of drawing up an open policy for 5000*l.*, and then declaring on it for 4955*l.*, which would leave so small a balance as 45*l.*, it would be more convenient for all parties to have two ship policies. Lark assented, and initialed the declaration and the two slips. The plaintiff Chapeaurouge went away, and soon after two policies on hides by the Socrates and on hides by the Sophie were duly executed on behalf of the defendants. The first count was on the declaration of interest on the open policy of 3000*l.* to recover the 245*l.* The second count was on the policy on the Socrates to recover the 2455*l.* In both these counts the interest was averred to be in Messrs. Kalkman, and the policies to be made on their behalf. The defendants ultimately paid money into court on the first and third counts, being those on the ship or ships' policies, which the plaintiffs accepted, so that no question arose on the trial as to those two counts, though it has been necessary to mention them in order to render the defence as to the others intelligible. As to the second and fourth counts, they pleaded several pleas. Those that were material are, the second, non-assumpsit; the fifth, that the hides were not shipped by the Socrates; the sixth, that the defendants were induced to subscribe the policy by a misrepresentation of a material fact, viz., that the hides were shipped by the Socrates, whereas they were shipped by the Socrate; the seventh, a denial of the loss, as alleged; and, lastly, an additional plea, that the letter in which the name of the captain was given was not communicated. On all these pleas issues were joined, which came on to be tried before my brother Hannen, and a special jury, at the sittings at Guildhall. Evidence to the effect above stated was given. It was not disputed that hides to the value insured were in fact shipped on the Socrate on behalf of the parties interested, and that they had no hides whatever on board the Socrates, and that the Socrate was totally lost, with the hides on board. My brother Hannen reserved leave to the defendants to enter a verdict for them on all or any of the issues, subject to the finding of the jury on the question which he left to them, which was, whether the parties, in entering into the contracts, both meant to insure the hides by the vessel on which they were actually shipped, whatever her name might be, though they supposed it to be the Socrates, or whether the defendants meant to insure hides on board the Socrates. The jury answered this question in favour of the plaintiffs. Mr. Milward obtained a rule nisi to enter the verdict according to the leave reserved. He also obtained it for a new trial, on the ground of misdirection; but that latter ground was merely pro majore cautela, in case the point was not properly raised. We have come to the conclusion that the plaintiffs are entitled to retain their verdict on all the issues on the pleas to the second count, that on the policy for 2455*l.*; but that the defendants are entitled to have a verdict entered for them on the second and sixth pleas, so far as those pleas relate to the fourth count, namely, that on the policy for 121*l.* Our reasons for this distinction are as follows: The contract of an underwriter who subscribes a policy on goods by ship or ships to be declared is, that he will insure any goods of the description specified which may be shipped on any vessel answering the description, if any there be, in the policy, to which the assured elects to apply the policy. The object of the declaration is to earmark and identify the particular adventure to which the assured elects to apply the policy. The assent of the assurer is not required to this, for he has no option to reject any vessel which the assured may select; nor is it necessary that the declaration should do more than identify the adventure, and so prevent the possible dishonesty of a party insured, who might intend to apply the policy to particular goods, so that they should be at the risk of the assurers, and he could come on them if they were a loss; and then, when those goods had arrived safely, to pretend that he intended to apply the policy to another set of goods still subject to risks: (Harman v. Kingstun, 3 Camp. 150; Robinson v. Touray (sup.)). It seems plain, therefore, that the declaration of the Socrates on the ship or ships' policies was, under the circumstances, amply sufficient to show that the assured had elected to attach those policies to the goods actually shipped on board the Socrate; and, consequently, that the defendants were well-advised when they withdrew their defence to the 1st and 3rd counts. But on the 24th Jan., when the policy for 121*l.* was agreed upon, the defendants were under no obligation to subscribe any policy for that 121*l.* They had an absolute right to decline to enter into a contract except on their own terms as to premiums, or indeed, into any contract at all unless they liked. And though we see no reason to doubt that the jury were quite right in finding that both parties were intending to insure the goods by the ships on which they were actually shipped, yet, when we find it not disputed that the one party expressly asked the question whether the ship was the Norwegian ship Socrates, and was told by the other party that he thought it was, we cannot think that there was any evidence on which the jury could properly find that the defendants entered into a contract to insure by any other ship than the Socrates. The most that could be legitimately found was that there was no contract, the parties not being ad idem. And we think also that, if the representation was made, however honestly and innocently, that the ship was a new ship when in fact, she was an old one, the policy was vitiated thereby, for the age of the ship must be material in considering the premium. It was argued that a representation, if only as to expectation or belief, is substantially complied with if the assured really had honestly entertained that expectation on sufficient grounds, and that the representation that "he thought" the ship was the Norwegian ship was literally true. We think this expression tantamount to an assertion that she was the Norwegian, but even were it otherwise, the letter of advice would, but for the carelessness of those who read it, have made them aware that the ship was that, of which the captain was Jean Card, and therefore the plaintiffs had not reasonable grounds for believing that she was the Norwegian ship. But, though we come to this conclusion as to the smaller policy of insurance for 121*l.*, we think the case is quite different as to the other policy for 2455*l.* Mr. Milward argued that there could be no difference, for the plaintiffs were the persons who made both contracts, and made them both with the defendants; and, therefore, he argued, all that passed on the 24th Jan. between Lambert, representing the plaintiffs, and Drummond, representing the defendants, must be considered as present to the minds of the plaintiff Chapeaurouge in person, and Lark representing the defendants, on the 4th Feb., and as if then virtually repeated. But the transaction on the 24th Jan. was respecting one contract, in fact made for one principal, and the transaction of the 4th Feb. was respecting another contract, in fact made for another principal, and the defendants knew that they were almost certainly made for undisclosed principals, and had no reason to suppose that the principals in the two contracts were the same. We think, therefore, that, even if the defendants had, in fact, on the 4th Feb., recollected all that took place on the 24th Jan., they would not have been justified in coming to the conclusion, without further inquiry, that the real parties were the same, and meant to make a similar contract. The identity of the name of the ship, and of the voyage described, would no doubt raise a reasonable suspicion that both parties meant to describe the same ship; but that was all. And, in fact, there can be no doubt that the plaintiff and Lark, if they ever knew what took place between Lambert and Drummond, did not, on the 4th Feb. think of it. We think, therefore, that it is clear that the transaction of the 4th Feb. must be looked at as if that of the 24th Jan. had happened subsequently, or had never happened at all. And in looking at it in this way, the fact that a slip for a policy for 5000*l.* on hides by ship or ships to be declared had been prepared, and was in existence, is of great importance. The slip is, in practice, and according to the understanding of those engaged in marine insurance, the complete and final contract between the parties, fixing the terms of the insurance and premium, and neither party can, without the assent of the other, deviate from the terms thus agreed on without a breach of faith, for which he would suffer severely in his credit and future business. The Legislature, for the purpose of protecting the revenue, had by the very strongest enactments provided that no such instrument should be given in evidence for any purpose; but all those enactments are repealed by the 30 Vict. c. 23, and the law is now governed by the 7th and 9th sections of that Act. By sect. 7 no contract or agreement for sea insurance shall be valid unless expressed in a policy. And by sect. 9 no policy shall be pleaded or given in evidence in any court unless duly stamped. As the slip is clearly a contract for marine insurance, and is equally clearly not a policy, it is, by virtue of these enactments, not valid, that is, not enforceable at law or in equity; but it may be given in evidence wherever it is, though not valid, material; and in the present case it is material.^(a) The defendants could not, without a breach of faith, repudiate that engagement, and they never proposed to do so. And whilst they adhered to that engagement it was not material to them whether they were or were not facts known to the insured, and not known to them, which might make the vessel a less eligible risk, for they were going to take her, whatever she was, at a premium, the amount of which was already finally fixed. Mr. Milward's argument was, that they were not legally bound to do so; and that, therefore, when they entered into a substituted policy on a ship they were entitled to hold it avoided for want of a disclosure which, in fact, would have made no difference. This would be to make the rule, that contracts of marine insurance are considered as uberrimæ fidei, a means in this case of working fraud. In fact, the case is exactly as if the underwriter had said, "I have finally made up my mind to take the policy on unalterable terms; nothing you can disclose to me will make the slightest difference, and therefore

(a) It may be as well to point out here that sect. 4 of this Act says, "And the word 'policy' means any instrument whereby a contract or agreement for sea insurance is made or entered into." Blackburn, J., in his judgment, says that a slip is a contract for sea insurance, but that it is not a policy, whereas the Act says that a policy means any such contract. If a slip is a policy within the meaning of the Act, it could not be received in evidence, and could not be taken as showing the existence of the contract for an open policy of 5000*l.*, and therefore the parties could not travel out of the terms of the policy for 2455*l.* Sect. 4 of the Act is an interpretation clause, but where such a clause exactly defines the meaning of a word, the rule that interpretation clauses do not restrict the ordinary meaning of words but extend them, can scarcely apply. If this view is right, the defendants here were entitled to judgment on both policies.

you need disclose nothing." It is true the last words were not expressed, but they were evidently implied. The only remaining point arises, therefore, on the misnomer of the vessel, which was called in the policy the Socrates, when, in fact, she was the Socrate. But the rule of law, both in England and America, is stated in Phillips on Insurance (sect. 430), that if the description of the policy designates the subject with sufficient certainty, or suggests the means of doing it, a mistake of the name of the ship or of other particulars will not defeat the contract. In Le Mesurier v. Vaughan (6 East, 382), where the broker had received instructions to insure goods by an American ship called the President, and by mistake insured as on a ship called the American President, it was held that, it being clearly proved by the invoice and letter of instructions that the goods were on the President, and that the name was a mistake, the plaintiffs might recover. It is true that in the judgment some weight seems to have been given to the expression contained in the ordinary Lombard-street policy, "or by whatever other name or names the said ship should be called," and that those words are omitted in the form of the policy used by the defendants in the present case. But we think this far too narrow a ground, and that the real ground of the decision is that which is expressed by Lord Ellenborough, that where it can be proved that it is a clear mistake, and the underwriter cannot be prejudiced by the mistake, it is of no consequence. The jury here have found and were justified in finding, that neither party cared what the name of the ship was, as they meant to insure the goods by the ship on which they were really shipped. When the other policy for the 121*l.* was made, it appears plainly that the underwriter really believed that the ship was the Norwegian ship, and that was a matter very material to the risk, and the underwriter was free to accept or refuse that risk, and therefore the mistake in the name was of importance. We think, therefore, that the rule should be made absolute to enter a verdict for the defendants on the second and sixth pleas, as far as they relate to the fourth count, and discharged as to the rest.

Rule accordingly.

LEIGH v. ADAMS.

Marine insurance—Material concealment—

Liability of underwriter.

Where a policy on ship or ships to be declared is subscribed by an underwriter after a material fact relating to a particular ship, which the assured afterwards intends, if necessary, to declare on that policy, has been posted at Lloyd's and so become known to the assured, and may or may not have so become known to the underwriter, without the name of the ship and the material fact having been communicated by the assured to the underwriter, so that he might know the risk proposed, the policy is vitiated.

Lynch v. Durnsford, 14 East, 494, followed.

Plaintiff was accustomed to insure at Lloyd's upon floating policies quantities of cochineal shipped for him from the Canaries; he declared the name of the ship upon receipt of each bill of lading.

He received information that a large quantity would be shipped in the Candida, and by the same mail an anonymous letter reached Lloyd's, containing a statement that the owners intended to lose that ship on her next voyage, in order to make the underwriters pay. A notice of this letter was openly affixed to a board at Lloyd's; and the plaintiff was aware of the contents of the letter, but considered them unworthy of credit. At this time the plaintiff reasonably expected that the bills of lading by the Candida would be the next to be declared by him, and in that case they would be covered by policies previously made.

He entered into the policy now sued upon without communicating to the underwriter his intelligence of a cargo to be shipped by the Candida, or the contents of the anonymous letter. By accident the bills of lading of the Candida came to the plaintiff after those of later shipments, and the Candida was declared upon:

Held, in an action to recover for a total loss of part of the cochineal which had been jettisoned from the Candida, that plaintiff had been guilty of a concealment which invalidated the policy.

SPECIAL CASE.

1. The plaintiff is a merchant carrying on his business in London, under the firm of J. Studdy, Leigh, and Co., and the defendant is an underwriter at Lloyd's.

2. The action is brought to recover 46*l.* 18*s.* 1*d.*, and interest on 37*l.* 10*s.* 6*d.*, part thereof at the rate of 5*l.* per cent. per annum from 1st April, 1869, the proportionate amount of defendant's subscription as underwriter to a certain policy of insurance, in respect of a total loss of certain cochineal (in which it is to be taken for the purposes of this case that the plaintiff was interested), which loss occurred during the voyage of a vessel called the Candida, from the Canaries to London.

3. This policy was underwritten by other underwriters at Lloyd's besides the defendant, of whom some are also defending the claims upon this policy, and the actions against them are consolidated with the present.

4. Before and at the date of the shipments of the cochineal in question, the plaintiff had been and was engaged in trade between London and the Canaries, which was carried on in the following manner:

5. He sent quantities of goods of different kinds to correspondents on those islands, in execution of certain orders received from them, for which almost invariably credit was given. He also made advances in money to cochineal growers in those islands; and the arrangement was, that in payment of these goods, and these advances, the plaintiff should receive cochineal both from his correspondents and the growers, which should be shipped to him by degrees as the former could purchase, and as the latter could collect it.

6. In order that these shipments of cochineal might be properly insured, it was necessary, as the plaintiff was nearly always in ignorance of the names of the vessels by which specific shipments would be made, to have floating policies open, similar in form to the policy sued upon in this action, on which to declare the shipment, and the value of the produce shipped as the bills of lading for the same were received.

7. In pursuance of this course of business,

Q. B.]

LEIGH v. ADAMS.

[Q. B.]

the plaintiff had opened the following policies in Lloyd's room from the commencement of the cochineal crop of 1862, viz. :—

1862. Aug. 15.....	£3000
1862. Oct. 21.....	3000
1862. Dec. 22.....	5000
1863. June 24.....	5000
	£16,000

on all of which declarations were made to the full amount, and the cochineal so insured arrived in safety, some by steamers, and some by sailing vessels.

8. In each of these policies it was expressed that it followed and succeeded the preceding one effected, and it sometimes happened that a shipment of cochineal was declared partly on one policy and partly on its successor.

9. On the 30th Sept. 1863, as the plaintiff was then doing a greatly increased business with the Canaries, he opened a fresh policy for 10,000*l.* to follow and succeed the said policy for 5000*l.*, insured at Lloyd's on the 24th June 1863.

10. On the 3rd and 10th Nov. 1863, by which time declarations to the full amount had been made on the said policy for 5000*l.*, shipments were declared upon the last-mentioned policy for 10,000*l.*, to the extent of 2450*l.*, thus leaving 7550*l.* open on the said policy for subsequent declarations. On the 16th Nov. 1863, in consequence of advices from a firm of Escofet, Diaz, and Co., carrying on business at Las Palinas, that they intended to ship a large parcel of cochineal to the plaintiff by their vessel, the Candida, a further policy of 5000*l.* to follow the last-mentioned policy for 10,000*l.* was opened at Lloyd's by the plaintiff; a total of 12,550*l.* was thus left open for subsequent declarations.

11. On the 9th Dec. 1863, the plaintiff received a bill of lading of a shipment of cochineal by the ship Azorlan, to the value of 1591*l.* This shipment was declared on the plaintiff's policy for 10,000*l.* of the 30th Sept., thus leaving a total of 10,959*l.* undeclared, viz., 5959*l.*, upon the said policy for 10,000*l.*, and the whole amount of the policy for 5000*l.* of the 16th Nov. 1863.

12. On the same 9th Dec. 1863, the plaintiff received advices that further shipments of cochineal to a large amount were intended to be made to him by the said vessel, the Candida and that there was in addition other cochineal ready to be shipped to him. The plaintiff, however, had no means of knowing what the amount of the cochineal to be shipped by the Candida would be, except that it would be large, amounting in probable value to more than 800*l.*, or what the amount of the additional cochineal so ready to be shipped would be.

13. By the same mail which arrived on the 9th Dec. the following anonymous letter was received at Lloyd's :

Messrs. Lloyds.—The house of Escofet, Diaz, and Co., intend shipping to the consignment of Messrs. J. R. Yglesias and Co., 600 sacks of cochineal, and sends them in the Candida belonging to the aforesaid house of Escofet, Diaz, and Co. It is not cochineal, but barley; and the intention is to lose the vessel in order that the underwriters pay. They are ruined, and desire to save themselves in this manner. The house of J. R. Yglesias is innocent.
A FRIEND.

14. A notice of the fact that a letter had been received which would affect all persons insuring by or interested in the Candida, and that such letter could be seen at the secretary's room, was openly affixed to a board at Lloyd's; but, in point of fact the defendant never observed such notice, or saw such letter.

15. The contents of this letter, and the fact that it had been received at Lloyd's, were made known to the plaintiff on the next day, the 10th Dec.

16. From the time when the letter was received it would have been impossible to effect an insurance at Lloyd's on goods intended to be shipped by the Candida, except at an advanced premium.

17. On the 11th Dec. 1863, the plaintiff gave instructions to his brokers to open a policy at Lloyd's for 10,000*l.* to follow and succeed the policy for 5000*l.* A policy was accordingly opened in pursuance of such instructions, which is the policy the subject of the present action.

18. The defendant accepted the risk at the ordinary rate of premium, and subscribed the policy (which is the policy sued upon) for 100*l.*

19. At the time when the plaintiff gave instructions to have this policy opened, and when this risk was shown to the defendant, and when the defendant subscribed the policy, the plaintiff had not received any bills of lading of the shipments by the Candida, and was still ignorant of the amount of cochineal which would be shipped by her. But he was then expecting that further large shipments of cochineal would shortly be consigned to him, besides the shipments by the Candida, and he opened the said policy in the ordinary course of business, and he was in no way induced to open the said policy by the fact of the receipt of the said anonymous letter having been made known to him. At this time also the plaintiff reasonably expected that the bills of lading of the cochineal by the Candida would be the next bills of lading that would be received by him, so that the value of the cochineal in such bills of lading would be the next that would be declared; and as there were 19,959*l.* still undeclared on the former policies as before mentioned, and as he did not expect that cochineal to a greater amount than to the value of 10,959*l.* would come by the Candida, he expected that all the cochineal that would come by the Candida would be declared on such former policies. But whether all the cochineal that was shipped by the Candida would be declared on such former policies depended on what would be the value of the cochineal that would come by the Candida, and on whether any other bills of lading for cochineal to be shipped to the plaintiff would arrive before the bills of lading of the cochineal shipped by the Candida; and the plaintiff knew it so depended, and when he opened the said policy he knew that either by reason of the amount of the cochineal shipped by the Candida being larger than he expected, or by reason of bills of lading of shipments by other vessels being received before the bills of lading by the Candida it might reasonably happen that the whole of the cochineal shipped by the Candida could not be declared on the former policies, and intended in that case that the portion not declared on the former policies should be declared on the said last mentioned policy, the subject of the present action.

20. The plaintiff did not communicate to the defendant or to the other underwriters of the said policy, the fact that the plaintiff had received advices that shipments of cochineal were about to be made to him by the Candida; nor the fact that in the contingency mentioned in the last paragraph, part of the shipments by the Candida might and would be declared on the said policy. If the defendant had known of these facts he would not have accepted the risk or subscribed the policy on the terms on which he did subscribe it.

21. On the 24th Dec. 1863, a mail came in from the Canaries, and by that mail, in spite of many promises contained in previous letters, that bills of lading of larger shipments per Candida would be forwarded by that mail, bills of lading were only received of the following shipments per Candida to the extent of 2485*l.*, that is to say :

Quevedo Romero	8 bags cochineal	£225
Morera Hermanos	66 " "	1855
Lois Ynglott	15 " "	405

22. On the 28th Dec. 1863, the plaintiff received bills of lading from the different correspondents of a shipment per the steamer Amazon, value at 6361*l.*

23. Owing to the Christmas holidays the bills of lading which arrived on the 25th Dec. as before mentioned, were not declared until the 28th Dec. 1863; on which day the bills of lading mentioned had arrived. Declarations were made in respect of both these sets of bills of lading at the same time, and in the following order—A declaration was first made as to the 6366*l.* on the bills of lading which arrived on the 28th Dec. by declaring as to 5569*l.* part of the said amount of 6366*l.*, on the policy for 10,000*l.*, on the 30th Sept. 1863, which was thereby and by a declaration for 390*l.* on produce shipped by a steamer from Teneriffe filled up: and by declaring as to 797*l.* residue of the said sum of 6366*l.* on the said policy for 5000*l.* of the 16th Nov. 1863. A declaration was then made as to the said bills of lading to the amount of 2485*l.* per Candida, on the said policy of the 16th Nov., leaving still undeclared on the same policy 1718*l.*

24. On the 9th Jan. 1864, another mail arrived bringing bills of lading of other shipments per Candida, viz :

From T. M. Bethencourt,	7 bags cochineal	£195
„ Escofet Diaz and Co.	185 " "	5200
„ M. G. Castelanos	11 " "	310

Of this sum of 5705*l.* 1718*l.* was declared on the 11th Jan. on the policy of 5000*l.* of the 16th Nov. 1863, leaving 3987*l.*, which was declared on the same day on the policy for 10,000*l.* of the 11th Dec. 1863, now sued upon. The defendant initialled by his clerk the declaration so made, but at the time the defendant's clerk so initialled it, neither the defendant or his clerk in fact knew of the receipt of the said anonymous letter at Lloyd's, or the fact that the plaintiff knew of the receipt of the letter at the time of the opening of the said policy, and had not communicated such letter to the defendant and the other under writers.

25. The whole of the remainder of the said policy for 10,000*l.* of 11th Dec. 1863, that is to say 6013*l.* was filled up by subsequent declarations on shipments by other vessels, and since that time, viz: on the 11th Jan. 1864, a subsequent policy was, in pursuance of the above mentioned course of business, effected for 5000*l.*, the whole of which amount has been declared upon.

26. It is to be taken for the purpose of the argument of the special case that cochineal, to the amount declared upon the policy in question, was shipped on board the Candida, and that in consequence of disasters sustained by the ship on her voyage, a large portion of the cochineal was jet-tisoned.

It is agreed that the court shall have power to draw all inferences of fact which a jury ought to have drawn.

The question for the opinion of the court is whether, under the circumstances above stated, the plaintiff is entitled to recover on the said policy.

If the court should be of opinion that he is so entitled, then judgment is to be entered for him for the said sum of 46*l.* 18*s.* 1*d.* and interest on 37*l.* 10*s.* 6*d.*, part thereof, at the rate of 5*l.* per cent. from the 1st April 1869 until judgment and cost of suit. If the court should be of a contrary opinion then judgment is to be entered for the defendant with costs of suit.

Pollock, Q.C. (with him F. M. White) for plaintiff:—The case finds in effect that there was bona fides on the plaintiff's part throughout his transactions, and it must be taken that he believed not only that the statement in the anonymous letter in no way affected his goods, but further that the statement was a mere idle rumour unworthy of consideration. The letter too, and its contents, were equally within the knowledge of the defendant and plaintiff, and the presumption of the underwriter's knowledge is sufficient in this case to preclude the defence of a concealment: 2 Duer on Marine Insurance, 555. It is stated in Arnould on Marine Insurance (3rd edit.) p. 535, that "loose rumours indeed which have gathered together, no one knows how, need not be communicated; and intelligence may be so general, and its application to the subject insured so doubtful and remote, that the assured need not communicate it, though it may possibly turn out to have related to the subject insured." At the time this insurance was effected the plaintiff did not know that the subject of it would be on board the ship concerning which this loose rumour was promulgated. It was held by Burroughs, J., in Friere v. Woodhouse (1 Holt's N.P. 572), that "what the underwriter by fair inquiry and due diligence may learn from the ordinary sources of information, need not be disclosed." In Elton v. Larkins (8 Bing. 198), it was decided that the non-communication of facts which were as accessible to the underwriter as to the assured, did not vitiate a policy. [LUSH, J.—Is not Lynch v. Durnsford (14 East, 494), exactly in point against you?] No, in that case the assured knew that one of the ships upon which his goods were laden was reported to be deep and leaky; here the plaintiff had no knowledge that he should declare the goods insured by this policy upon the Candida. Indeed it seems to have been only by accident that they were so declared. This would be carrying the law concerning concealment further than any of the cases yet decided. See the judgment of Shee, J., in Bates v. Hewett (L. Rep. 2 Q.B. 610).

Sir Geo. Honyman Q.C. (with him J. C. Mathew) for the defendant, was not heard.

COCKBURN, C. J.—I think our judgment must be for the defendant. We need not decide the larger of the two questions raised in this case, viz., how far this notice on the board at Lloyd's was intelligence to the underwriters of the contents of the letter to which it referred; or whether a party insuring is compelled to communicate expressly knowledge which he obtains from such a source, or whether he is justified in assuming that such a matter ought to be and is known to all underwriters in the course of their business. It has been laid down that the lists at Lloyd's are within the knowledge which every underwriter is presumed to possess, but how far the same presumption relates to a notice of this extraordinary and exceptional nature, we are not justified from the findings of this case in concluding. I think it would be necessary, before we expressed an opinion upon the point, to know whether this is the ordinary business of an underwriter. In my view it is not necessary to consider that question, for according to the facts it was on the day after the notice was exhibited at Lloyd's, and the day after he knew that a cargo was to be shipped for him on board the Candida, the plaintiff instructed his agent to make this insurance. He did not at that time know that this policy would apply to, or that he should be able to declare the policy upon, the cargo of the Candida; but he knew that it might possibly so turn out. The concealment was that he did not communicate the fact that the policy was intended, if it might happen to be necessary, to cover the shipment in the Candida. There were two facts within the plaintiff's knowledge which he did not communicate to the defendant; one was that he knew a cargo would be forwarded for him by the Candida; the other was that there existed an anonymous letter which impeached that ship's reputation. We may assume for the purposes of this case that the second of these facts was known equally by the plaintiff and defendant; but without information from the plaintiff, the defendant could not know anything about the first. The case finds that if the defendant knew both these matters he would not have entered into this insurance, but would have required a higher premium. Now, unless he knew the first, it would have been useless to him to know the second. The fact then that plaintiff had received intelligence of a cargo by the Candida was known to one and not to the other of the parties to this contract; and in my opinion this constitutes a good and valid defence to the action. I am of this opinion not only on principle, but also on authority. In Lynch v. Durnsford (14 East, 494), the facts are almost exactly like these; and Lord Ellenborough concluded his judgment in these words: "If the underwriters had had the knowledge possessed by the assured, it might have been a question with them whether they would have insured at all; or, if they did, whether they would not have required an enhanced premium." That is the case here, and the defendant is entitled to judgment.

MELLOR, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. Whether or not the assured was justified in supposing the underwriter to be aware of the subject of the notice, I am perfectly satisfied that the parties did not contract upon equal terms; for the plaintiff knew, and the defendant did not know, of circumstances which rendered it probable that the notice might apply to this particular insurance. I think on principle and on authority the defendant is entitled to succeed.

JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

ON APPEAL FROM THE HIGH COURT OF ADMIRALTY AND THE VICE-ADMIRALTY COURTS.

Reported by J. P. ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Monday, Nov. 13, 1871.

(Present: The Right Hon. Sir JAMES W. COLVILLE, Sir JOSEPH NAPIER, and Sir MONTAGUE SMITH,)

THE EARL OF ELGIN AND THE JESMOND.

Collision—Regulations for preventing collisions at sea—Articles 13 & 16—Risk of collision.

Article 16 of the "Regulations for preventing collisions at sea" only applies when there is a continuous approaching of two ships.

When two vessels are meeting end on, or nearly end on, within the meaning of Article 13, and one of them, at a proper distance, ports her helm sufficiently to put her on a course which will carry her clear of the other, she thereby determines the risk, and is not "approaching another ship so as to involve risk of collision" within the meaning of Article 16, and is not bound to slacken speed or stop.

This was an appeal from a decree made on the 25th July 1870 by the judge of the Court of Admiralty in cross causes of damages, instituted on behalf of the owners of the steamship Jesmond, and the owners of the steamship Earl of Elgin.

The cause arose out of a collision between those vessels, which occurred about half-past ten p.m. on the 7th May 1870, off Staithes, on the coast of Yorkshire. The Jesmond was a screw steamship of 589 tons register, and 100-horse power, and was on a voyage from London to the Tyne in ballast. The Earl of Elgin was also a screw steamship of about 608 tons, and was on a voyage from Sunderland to Bordeaux, laden with coals. The weather was fine and clear, and the wind light.

The Jesmond was under steam only, steering N.N.W., and making between seven and eight knots an hour, with the Admiralty regulation lights exhibited, and a good look-out being kept on board of her. The masthead and then the side lights of the Earl of Elgin were made out at the distance of a mile and a half ahead. According to the evidence of the second mate of the Jesmond, who was in charge, the helm of the Jesmond was ported, and the vessel went off about a point and a half, and was then brought back to within half a point of her course. When the vessels were about 300 yds. apart the green lights of the Earl of Elgin opened into view, and the second mate immediately gave the order "hard-a-port," and placed the dial of the engine room telegraph at stop, but did not know which way he turned it, or whether his signal was heard in the engine room. About a minute after the two vessels came into collision the stem of the Jesmond striking the Earl of Elgin close by the fore rigging on the starboard side, and the Earl of Elgin shortly afterwards sank.

The case set up by the Earl of Elgin was that she was under steam, and proceeding at the rate of from seven to eight knots an hour, that the masthead and green light of the Jesmond were seen on the starboard bow of the Earl of Elgin; that the Earl of Elgin was kept on her course with a view to pass on the starboard side of the Jesmond until the Jesmond, by porting her helm, opened her red lights to the Earl of Elgin, causing danger of an immediate collision, whereupon the helm of the Earl of Elgin was starboarded. But from the evidence of the man on the look-out on board the Earl of Elgin, it appeared that he first saw the red light of the Jesmond about half a mile off, and thereupon the order was given by the mate in charge of the deck to put the helm hard a starboard.

And it further appeared from the evidence of both sides that nobody at any time apprehended any risk of collision until the Earl of Elgin starboarded her helm. The owners of the Earl of Elgin pleaded in their answer in the court below that the Jesmond improperly neglected to comply with the provisions of Article 16 of the Regulations for preventing Collisions at Sea, by not easing or stopping her engines at a time when risk of a collision was involved.

The learned judge of the Admiralty Court pronounced both vessels to blame; the Earl of Elgin on the ground that she improperly starboarded her helm, and the Jesmond on the ground that she did not stop or ease her engines under the provisions of Article 16.

His judgment (not reported), after a statement of facts, was as follows: "The first question upon which the court must come to a clear conclusion is, were these vessels meeting end on, so as to bring them within what is called the port-helm rule, the 13th Article of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea? That article is as follows: 'If two ships under steam are meeting end on, or nearly end on, so as to involve risk of collision, the helms of both shall be put to port, so that each may pass on the port side of the other.' Each vessel saw the other at a distance of about a mile and a half off; and the evidence appears to me, and also to the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House—although it is more, perhaps, my province to decide upon this question, and the responsibility of this part of the decision must rest entirely upon me—the evidence seems to me to establish that these vessels were meeting end on in the sense of the rule which I have read. I believe the evidence given by those on behalf of the Jesmond, to the effect that they first saw the bright light of the other vessel, then the three lights, then they ported, then they saw the green light of the Earl of Elgin, and then they ported, and the collision took place. I might even go into the evidence to show that the testimony on the part of the Jesmond is in some sense corroborated by the witnesses on board the Earl of Elgin. The man Aikin, who gave his evidence extremely honestly, did not deny that he had expressed a regret for the starboarding; and the captain of the Earl of Elgin, when he was asked as to a conversation that ensued when he came on board the Jesmond, after the collision, did not deny that he had said so, but he said that he could not recollect what the conversation was, and it was distinctly sworn to by the captain of the Jesmond. I, therefore, on the evidence given by the crew of Jesmond, corroborated in these particulars by the evidence of the witnesses to whom I have referred on behalf of the Earl of Elgin, come to the conclusion that these vessels were meeting end on, so that it was incumbent upon them to put their helms to port, and, we have no doubt that, if they had done so, this collision would have been avoided. But there remains another very important question to be decided—I may say, two questions—which were put by the Admiralty Advocate: one is, whether the Jesmond ought not to have stopped her engines and the Earl of Elgin to have stopped hers. We think that the Jesmond did err in porting as slightly as she did. The evidence came to this—she ported and then steadied, and did not port again till the collision became nearly inevitable, but it is not upon this ground that I should come to the conclusion that such blame attaches to the Jesmond as to disentitle her to recover, if she succeeded on other points; but I mention it as a fault on the part of the Jesmond. The real blame that attaches to the Jesmond and the Earl of Elgin is their not easing and stopping their engines before this collision took place. The more it is examined the less defensible it appears, that two steamers should be going at the joint speed of eighteen or nineteen miles an hour, nearly on opposite courses, seeing each other a mile and a half off, and not take the common precaution of stopping or easing their engines under such circumstances. At all events, we have arrived at the conclusion that the order of the 16th article—'Every steamship when approaching another ship, so as to involve risk of collision, shall slacken her speed, or, if necessary, stop and reverse'—has not been obeyed in this case, and I have no alternative but to pronounce that both parties are to blame for this collision."

From this judgment the owners of the Jesmond appealed.

Butt, Q.C. (R. E. Webster with him) for the owners of the Jesmond. When two steamers show their red light to each other no collision can happen without one steamer starboarding. It is clear from the evidence that the steamers were red light to red light, soon after they sighted each other. Neither side apprehended a collision, nor had they any right to do so when red light to red light. The case for the Earl of Elgin was that the steamers were green light to green light, but the look-out said that he saw the Jesmond's red light when she was half a mile off. This corroborates the story on the part of the Jesmond, that she ported, and so got on the port bow of the Earl of Elgin. In his judgment the learned judge said that the Jesmond "was approaching another ship so as to involve risk of collision." There was no such risk at the distance of a mile and a half. If there is no reason to believe that the mate ought to have anticipated a collision, he cannot be held to blame for making a mistake. Stopping at 300yds. would not have prevented a collision.

The Admiralty Advocate (Dr. Deane, Q.C.) for the owners of the Earl of Elgin.—If the Jesmond had been prudently navigated, her engines would have been eased or stopped at some intermediate point between a mile and a half and 300 yards from the Earl of Elgin. Article 16 of the "Regulations for preventing Collisions at Sea," must be taken in combination with Art. 13, and as supplementary to it. If the master had reasonable cause to apprehend a collision he was bound to apply the supplementary rule, and to ease the engines. If there was risk, not certainty, but probability or chance of a collision, he was bound to stop. How was the officer commanding the Jesmond to know that the Earl of Elgin would obey the 13th rule? If she did not do so there would have been risk. If the Earl of Elgin had been accidentally disabled, she would have been unable to obey the rule, and this is a contingency against which the Jesmond was bound to provide. It was not sufficient for her to port only.

THE EARL OF ELGIN AND THE JESMOND.

E. C. Clarkson, on the same side.—If the master of a vessel considers he comes under the port helm rule, it is his duty to carry out that rule so that there may be no mistake as to what he is doing. The Jesmond, if she ported when her witnesses said, did not port enough. The Regulations are carefully worded, and it must be noticed that article 16 refers not to collision, but to risk of collision, and to the manner in which steamers must act under such risk, and not when in actual danger of collision. The Jesmond was bound to slow on sighting the Earl of Elgin.

Butt, Q.C., in reply. The real question is what is meant by risk of collision? In the Regulations for preventing Collisions at Sea (published by the authority of the Board of Trade, by Thomas Gray, 5th edit., and made positive and binding by Order in Council of July 30th, 1868), sect. 1 § 6, it is said, "Every one is unanimous in agreeing that no two ships can come into collision so long as they show each other the same coloured light, green to green, or red to red." These vessels were red light to red light. Both saw the other's red light, and in the same book it is said, § 7, "The rule cannot therefore apply; (a) when a green light is seen anywhere on the starboard side; (b) when a red light is seen anywhere on the port side, &c." The rule here referred to is Art. 13, set out in the judgment. It is further said, § 8, "There is not the remotest chance of collision in either of the cases above put . . ." If my friends are right, whenever a master ports or starboards his helm to get out of the way under Art. 13, he is at the same time bound to slow his engines. This is an absurdity. No collision could have happened but for the starboarding of the helm of the Earl of Elgin.

Sir JAMES COLVILLE delivered the judgment of the court. In this case their Lordships must hold that it has been conclusively found that the two colliding vessels were meeting each other end on, or nearly end on, within the meaning of the 13th sailing rule; that the Jesmond, in obedience to that rule, ported her helm—whether enough or not is a question which will be afterwards considered; that the Earl of Elgin violated that rule by starboarding instead of porting, and thereby put herself clearly in the wrong, and became primâ facie responsible for the collision which took place. But the learned judge of the court below, having found these facts, said: "We think that the Jesmond did err in porting as slightly as she did. The evidence came to this: She ported and then steadied, and did not port again till the collision became nearly inevitable; but it is not upon this ground that I should come to the conclusion that such blame attaches to the Jesmond as to disentitle her to recover, if she succeeded on other points, but I mention it as a fault on the part of the Jesmond. The real blame that attaches to the Jesmond and the Earl of Elgin, is their not easing and stopping their engines before this collision took place. The more it is examined, the less defensible it appears, that two steamers should be going at the joint speed of eighteen or nineteen miles an hour, nearly in opposite courses, seeing each other a mile and a half off, and not take the common precaution of stopping or easing their engines, under such circumstances." That part of the judgment, therefore, raises two propositions; first, that the Jesmond did not port sufficiently, but, at the same time, qualifies that finding by saying that, of itself, that circumstance would not disentitle the Jesmond to recover. The learned judge, however, as their Lordships understand his judgment, would couple the insufficiency of porting with an assumed obligation to slacken speed, under the 16th article, and finds that, under the whole circumstances of the case, the Jesmond ought to have slackened speed as well as the Earl of Elgin, and that by reason of that fault on the part of the Jesmond the damage, according to the rule of the Court of Admiralty, is divisible between the two vessels. Their Lordships think that it will be desirable, in dealing with these two propositions, to deal with them, in the first instance at least, separately, as has been done in the argument. Their Lordships see no reason to doubt the truth of the evidence of the second mate of the Jesmond. They believe, upon his evidence, and the learned judge of the Admiralty Court has certainly not found that that evidence was to be disbelieved, that, when the three lights of the Earl of Elgin were first seen, the order to port was given. They believe that she payed off under her port helm a point and a half, but that before she had gone so far the mate gave the order to steady the helm, which ultimately brought back the vessel to within half a point of her original course. Their Lordships were urged by Dr. Deane to consult their nautical assessors upon this point, and they have done so; and these gentlemen, so far from finding, as Dr. Deane anticipated, that the evidence must be inaccurate in stating that the vessel went so far under the port helm as to pay-off a point and a half, think that there is nothing inconsistent or unreasonable in that statement; on the contrary, that upon principles of navigation, the fact is credible and what might be expected. Their Lordships, therefore, accept the evidence as given. Again, the nautical assessors also concur in thinking that the Jesmond, having paid-off as far as a point and a half, was, though brought back to within half a point of her original course when her helm was steadied, placed upon a line on which, if the other vessel had even kept her course, she would have gone clear, and that she had brought the two vessels into the position of red light to red light, and that the danger of collision was at an end. A fortiori, had the Earl of Elgin ported her helm and obeyed the rule, as she was bound to have done, the distance between the two vessels would have been increased, and the collision would have become still more improbable. That being the state of the case, their Lordships can hardly concur with the learned judge in thinking that the alleged insufficiency of porting on the part of the Jesmond in any degree contributed to the accident. They next proceed to consider whether they ought to hold that those on board the Jesmond, in omitting to slacken the speed of their vessel, were guilty of a default which justifies the judgment under appeal. Now the 16th Article says: "Every steamship when approaching another ship so as to involve risk of collision shall slacken her speed." It is not necessary to read further, because nobody contends that the Jesmond was bound to stop and reverse her engines except at the moment when a reversal of the engines had almost become impossible, namely, when the other vessel was nearly run into. The article imposes this obligation only upon a ship which is "approaching another ship so as to involve risk of collision." It may be said that there was a moment at which the two vessels were in that condition, for if they had not been in that condition they would have been within Article 13. But it seems to their Lordships, taking the two articles together, that Article 16 only applies when there is a continuous approaching of the two ships, and, indeed, it was admitted candidly by Dr. Deane that there was not an obligation to slacken the speed the moment the two vessels sighted each other, and when the first porting took place. If their Lordships are right in their view of what was then done, the original risk of collision was determined when the vessels were brought port light to port light. Nor can it be said that after that porting the Jesmond was approaching the Earl of Elgin so as to involve a risk of collision, unless the true construction of the term "risk of collision" be that for which in one part of his argument Dr. Deane contended. As their Lordships understood his argument, he was prepared to insist that the term must be taken to include either a default on the part of the other vessel to do what the 13th Rule required of it, or the disabling of that vessel by some accidental cause of which the Jesmond was not, and probably could not be aware. It does not appear to their Lordships that the first of those elements can be reasonably imported into the risk of collision; there is no foundation in fact for supposing that the Earl of Elgin was prevented by any accident from doing what she ought to have done; nor are their Lordships aware that in obeying these rules it is necessary for persons navigating vessels to foresee and to provide against every possible accident. Their Lordships would be extremely sorry, by any decision of theirs, to diminish the stringency of any rule tending to prevent the great loss of property and destruction of life which are but too common in our narrow seas; but they do not feel at liberty to extend the application of the 16th Article beyond what seems to them to be its proper construction, and therefore they must respectfully differ from the learned judge in what he has found in respect to the obligation which lay upon the master and crew of the Jesmond. The result therefore will be that their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty to allow the present appeal; and to declare and order that the Earl of Elgin was solely responsible for the collision, and must be condemned in damages accordingly, and of course the costs in the court below and the costs here will, according to the ordinary rule, follow the result.

THE MAGNA CHARTA.

Collision—Fog—Duty and powers of Trinity Masters as assessors in the Admiralty Court—Evidence—Conflict of opinion between judge and Trinity Masters.

Four to five knots an hour is not a moderate speed for a steamer in a thick fog in the Baltic, twenty-five miles east of Gothland.

The duty of Trinity Masters, sitting as assessors in the Admiralty court, is to assist the judge in questions of nautical skill. In case of a difference of opinion between the judge and the assessors, the judge is not at liberty to act upon any inferences which they may draw from the evidence, except they accord with his own. It is the duty of the judge to decide the case on his own responsibility.

THIS was an appeal from a decree of the Judge of the High Court of Admiralty in a cause of damage instituted by the owners, master and crew of the steamship Scotia, against the steamship Magna Charta. The vessels came into collision at about four o'clock in the afternoon of Aug. 3rd, 1870, about twenty-five miles east of the Island of Gothland. The Magna Charta was a steamship of 788 tons register, propelled by engines of 90-horse power, with a crew of twenty-three hands all told, laden with a cargo of oats, on a voyage from Riga to Havre. The Scotia was a steamship of 535 tons, and 160-horse power, and was navigated by her master and a crew of twenty-three hands, and was proceeding from Sunderland to Cronstadt, with a cargo of coals. The Magna Charta struck the Scotia on her starboard side a little abaft the beam, and cut 11ft. into her engine-room through her coal bunkers, and the Scotia sank in a few minutes. It was admitted on both sides that at the time of the collision the weather was very foggy. The remaining facts of the case are sufficiently set out in the following judgment (not reported) delivered by Sir R. Phillimore on Feb. 28th, 1871:

"It appears that the Scotia was navigated with the greatest care, both with respect to vigilance and speed; with respect to vigilance, because all the men whose especial duty it was to be on the look-out, and, indeed, all the watch, more or less, were on the look-out. And with respect to speed, because the rate of it had been reduced to one and a half knots an hour, "just enough to steer," the master of the Scotia said, that is to a minimum consistent with keeping her under command. The two vessels became mutually visible at a distance of 70yds., when the Magna Charta was observed four points on the starboard bow of the Scotia, and then the Scotia starboarded her helm and put on full steam as the only chance of avoiding the collision, which manœuvre was in the circumstances not improper, and the best means of attempting to get out of the way of the Magna Charta. The steam whistle had been kept perpetually going. It appears that the Magna Charta had been all the morning steaming in a calm, and in comparatively clear weather; that a haze came on between one and two p.m., which greatly increased in thickness towards three p.m. A little before three she was going full speed, and then the master went below to his cabin, leaving the deck in charge of the second mate. Her full speed was alleged to be from seven to eight knots. At about a quarter-past three, while the master was below, he heard the signal for putting her at slow half-speed. He came on deck for a short time, and seems to have thought the order unnecessary. From that time to the collision the fog seems to have been dense, and she continued at the same speed, making, as the engineer in charge says, from twenty-eight to thirty revolutions, her full speed being sixty-five. This so-called engineer represents himself as the third engineer. He had no certificate, and was, I suppose little more than a leading stoker. No other order was given till just before the collision. The watch on deck consisted of the second mate and four hands. There was no look out forward, the mate was on the bridge, the men were shifting the coal, and the man who would otherwise have been on the look out was so employed. At this time the fog was so thick that a vessel could not be seen more than a ship's length. The whistle appears to have been sounded from the time that the vessel was put at slow half-speed. The Scotia was seen nearly right ahead, at a distance of 70 yards, by the mate from the bridge, who almost immediately stopped and reversed. The collision, as I have already said, was violent, the Magna Charta cutting 11 feet into the Scotia, according to the evidence of her captain. In this state of circumstances, it appeared to me that the Magna Charta was alone to blame for the collision, partly on the ground of her careless navigation, but more especially on the ground of her speed. The Trinity Masters, by whom I was assisted, were of opinion that the accident was inevitable, and were disinclined to believe the evidence as to the reduced speed of the Scotia. It was then suggested to me to adopt a course, occasionally adopted by my predecessor, namely, to refer the case and evidence to the Trinity House, with a request that the opinion of other Trinity Masters might be taken thereupon. The result was a conflict of opinion among those to whom it was referred, two holding that the accident was inevitable, and two that the Magna Charta was alone to blame. I have thought it right to state these circumstances, and I have thereupon determined to follow the opinion I originally formed upon the evidence, and still retain; and I therefore pronounce the Magna Charta alone to blame for this collision."

From this judgment the owners of the Magna Charta appealed, on the grounds that the evidence proved that the Magna Charta was not going at an improper speed, and that the course taken by the judge—referring the case and evidence to the Trinity House—was irregular and inexpedient; and even if that course were justified by the practice of the court, the preponderance of professional opinion in favour of the appellants (including the opinion of the two elder brethren who heard the case) was so great that the judgment should have been given in favour of the appellants.

Butt, Q.C., and F. M. White, for the appellants. It has been said that it is hopeless to appeal on a matter of fact. This does not apply here. The learned judge and the assessors differed in opinion, the assessors thinking the Magna Charta not to blame. The opinions of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House, if they are to be taken into consideration, and those of the assessors, who heard the case, gives the appellants the voices of four as against two. This system of reference is not expedient, as it is better that the evidence should be heard if possible. The opinion of the assessors who did hear it is in favour of the appellants, and must be taken in preference to that of the others. [Sir J. NAPIER.—Have the assessors the right to decide questions of fact?] They may make up their minds and record their dissent if necessary. Whatever weight should be given to the opinions of ordinary assessors, in the Admiralty Court there are reasons why their opinions should receive great weight. That court will not receive evidence of experts, as the assessors are the proper advisers of the court. The Trinity Masters did not believe the story of the Scotia, as they thought that if she was only going at the speed proved she could not have been well in hand for steerage purposes. It is found in the judgment that the Magna Charta was not going at an immoderate speed.

Milward, Q.C., and Clarkson, for the respondents. —The full speed of the Magna Charta was about nine knots, and half speed must have been about four and a half knots. This is too high a rate. The depth of the blow shows that she must have been going at a great rate of speed. It is hard upon the parties to send the case down to the Trinity House, and it is a dangerous course. The rate of speed was not a question for the Trinity Masters, but for the court. [Sir MONTAGUE SMITH. —It was a question of fact for the court whether the speed was more than the witnesses for the Magna Charta said.] It is the duty of the Trinity Masters to give assistance to the court in determining the possibility of facts given in evidence by witnesses, but not to decide whether the evidence is true or false.

Butt, Q.C., in reply.

SIR JOSEPH NAPIER delivered the judgment of the court, and (after commenting on the evidence, and finding that the rate of speed of the Magna Charta was from four to five knots an hour) said:—Their Lordships are satisfied, looking at the nature of the blow, and the evidence as to the speed of the Magna Charta, that she was not going at a moderate speed, and that from the want of a sufficient look-out, as well as to the Magna Charta not having reduced her speed, the collision is to be attributed. The learned judge of the court below as a matter of fact, came to the same conclusion. It has been said that there was a difference of opinion between those gentlemen by whom the learned judge of the Admiralty Court was assisted, that they took a different view of the case, and that, when the case was referred to the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House, a difference of opinion existed there. It was, however, the duty of the learned judge to decide the case upon his own responsibility. The learned judge has got the responsibility cast upon him of arriving at a judicial conclusion; he is advised and assisted by persons experienced in nautical matters, but that is only for the purpose of giving him the information he desires upon questions of professional skill, and having got that information from those who advise him, he is bound in duty to exercise his own judgment, and it would be an abandonment of his duty if he delegated that duty to the persons who assisted him. The assessors merely furnish the materials for the court to act upon, and, for convenience sake, they are allowed to hear all the evidence. If the learned judge is unable to see what are the grounds upon which they give their opinion and draw their inferences, or assume facts, and if they are other than those to which he gives his assent, he is not at liberty to act upon any inferences which they draw from the evidence, except they accord with those of which he himself approves. The deductions to be drawn from the evidence must be his own, and all the assessors can do is merely to give him their aid and advice in those matters in which they are supposed to be skilled. Their Lordships are of opinion, upon the whole of the evidence, that there was a want of a sufficient look-out on board the Magna Charta, and that the inference to be drawn from the evidence is that her speed was not a moderate speed. There Lordships have come to the conclusion that the view taken upon the whole case by the learned judge of the Admiralty Court was the right view, and therefore they will humbly recommend Her Majesty to affirm the judgment of the court below, and, of course, with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Practice—Proxies—Duty of proctors with respect to—Vice-Admiralty Rules and Regulations. r. 40.

The usual practice in the High Court of Admiralty as to proxies is for proctors to proceed without the exhibition of any proxy until called upon to produce it, and when they are called upon they satisfy the law by stating the names of the parties for whom they appear.

In the vice-admiralty courts proctors are not bound to do more than this under rule 40 of the Vice-Admiralty Rules and Regulations, unless upon a strict order of the court.

The production of a proxy, purporting to be duly signed and sealed, but without proof of the handwriting of those who appear to have subscribed the instrument, is a prima facie compliance with an order to produce a proxy, and throws the onus of disproving its authenticity on the opponents.

An objection to a suit on the ground of the non-production of a proxy is a preliminary objection, to be raised on motion, and not on protest, and the utmost a court can do where such proxies as above are produced is to stay proceedings until further information can be obtained.

This was an appeal from a decree of the Judge of the Vice-Admiralty Court of Malta, delivered on the 4th Oct. 1870, upon the protest of Roche Marius Fabre, master of the steamship Euxine, who had appeared under protest to a suit instituted on behalf of the appellants against the steamship Euxine, in the Vice Admiralty Court of Malta. The appellants were John Harvey and William Benjamin Harvey, of Littlehampton, in the County of Sussex, the owners of the late English brig Clymping; Emin Schemeil and Bichara Schemeil, merchants at Liverpool, trading under the name of Schemeil, Brothers, and Co., the owners of the cargo of cotton-seed laden on board the said brig at the time of the loss, and George Hedgecock, the master and others the crew of the said brig. The respondents were owners of the French steamship Euxine, belonging to Marseilles, and carrying on business at that city as the firm of Fraissinet, Père et Fils. The suit arose out of a collision between the Euxine and the Clymping, which occurred in the Mediterranean about 120 miles west of Alexandria, on 2nd July 1870, and occasioned the total loss of the Clymping and her cargo, and of the private effects of her master and crew. On the 16th July 1870, William John Stevens, a proctor practising in the Vice-Admiralty Court at Malta, filed a proceipe to arrest the Euxine, and to cite all persons interested "to answer to John Harvey and another, of Littlehampton, in the county of Sussex, the owners of the English brig Clymping, George Hedgecock, master, Emin and Bichara Schemeil, of Liverpool, in the county of Lancaster, the owners of the cargo of cotton seed, &c., . . . and George Hedgecock aforesaid, the master and others, the crew of the said brig, as owners of private effects also on board at the time, and J. W. Harper, on behalf of the salvage committee at Lloyd's of which he is secretary, other parties interested, the plaintiff represented at Malta by William Leonard, a partner in the firm of Robinson, Duckworth, and Co., bankers, merchants and agents for Lloyd's, of the city of La Valetta aforesaid, in a cause of damage civil and maritime." The affidavit to lead warrant, sworn and filed the same day, set out the following telegram:

To Robinson, Duckworth and Co., Malta.

Seize for committee, through Admiralty Court, French steamer Euxine, owners Faissinet, Pere et Fils, of Marseilles, Captain Fabre, which will call at Malta about 15th inst., for running down English brig Clymping, George Hedgecock master, on June 2nd last, near Alexandria, at the suit of John Harvey and another, of Littlehampton, Sussex, owners of the brig, and Emin and Bichara Schemeil, of Liverpool, Lancaster, owners of cargo of cotton seed, and Hedgecock, master, and others, crew of brig, for private effects, damages, 10,000*l.* When seized, give every facility for release on proper security; act promptly.

Harper, secretary, Salvage Committee,
Lloyd's, July 12, 1870.

The vessel was thereupon arrested. On the 19th July, an appearance under protest to the said suit was entered on behalf of Roche Marius Fabre, the master of the Euxine, by George Domenico Page, a proctor of the court, and the sum of 10,000*l.*, the amount for which the warrant of arrest was issued, was paid into court and the release of the vessel thereby procured, and this sum was afterwards withdrawn on bail being given.

On the 1st Aug, 1870, the proctor for the Euxine filed his petition on protest, which alleged three grounds of objection to the jurisdiction.

1. That this Court of Vice-Admiralty has no jurisdiction in the trial of this cause brought by the said William Leonard (the plaintiff's agent), because Her Majesty's Court of Commerce in Malta possesses powers and authorities for the exercise of admiralty jurisdiction, and therefore this court of vice-admiralty cannot have concurrent jurisdiction with the said Court of Commerce.

2. That should it be held that this court of vice-admiralty has concurrent jurisdiction with Her Majesty's Court of Commerce of Malta, the title and authority of the said William Leonard in this cause is insufficient and illegal, it being merely in virtue of a telegraphic despatch produced in the registry of this court, without containing the names and descriptions of all the parties claiming damage, and without documentary proof of the authenticity of such telegram.

The third ground of objection to the jurisdiction was, that the grounds of the suit, the damage alleged to have been done to the Clymping by the Euxine, had already been made the subject of a suit before the French Imperial Consular Court at Alexandria, which had dismissed the claim on behalf of the Clymping, in consequence of the non-presentation of a protest in that court within twenty-four hours after arrival in Alexandria, as required by the rules of the court, so that the cause was, in fact, res judicata, and could not be tried again in the vice-admiralty court.

To this petition on protest an answer was filed by Stevens, as proctor holding a special proxy for the owners, &c. of the Clymping and her cargo on the 12th Aug. 1870, affirming the jurisdiction of the court under the Vice-Admiralty Court Act 1863, and alleging:

3. That the title and authority of the said William Leonard for entering this cause is sufficient and legal, it being not merely in virtue of the telegraphic despatch produced, but in virtue of written and duly signed confirmations thereof, and subsequent formal proxies or powers of attorney to Stevens the proctor, containing the names and descriptions of the parties claiming damage.

The answer further pleaded res judicata was no defence, as the only point contested in the French consular court was of a purely technical nature, and concerning the rules of that court.

On Aug. 17th a reply under protest was filed by the proctor for the Euxine containing (inter alia) the following paragraphs:

3. That without motion or leave of the worshipful the judge of this court, the said William John Stevens, for the said William Leonard, as aforesaid, has now taken part in these proceedings by replying to the said act on protest as asserted, special proxy of John Harvey, &c. . . . the plaintiffs, represented by William Leonard, a partner in the firm of Robinson, Duckworth and Co., bankers, merchants and agents for Lloyd's at Malta, all parties abroad, asserted plaintiffs, who were previously represented by the said William Leonard without authority, which appearance of the said William John Stevens in the reply to the act on protest for persons not residing in this island of Malta, without having entered an action on their behalf, without leave of this court, and without any justification of his assumed title and authority, is irregular and illegal.

4. That the present appearance of the said William John Stevens as special proxy proves that the said William Leonard had not legal power to institute the action taken in this cause of damage, civil and maritime; and whereas very serious loss has been occasioned to the master and owners of the steamship Euxine by her arrest and consequent detention in this port of Malta, it is of the greatest importance to the said Roche Marius Fabre, master of the said vessel Euxine, that the title and authority of the said William Leonard, comprising the titles, names, and descriptions of his constituents abroad at the time of issuing the warrant of arrest from this court, should be legally furnished and fully authenticated in the registry of this court, in order that the owners and master of the said ship Euxine should know the proper parties against whom they may act for all losses and damages arising from the arrest and detention of the said ship Euxine.

On the 23rd Aug. a rejoinder was filed on behalf of the owners, &c., of the Clymping, taking issue on the points set out in the reply, and saying that Stevens, the proctor, "will in due time produce his authority." The pleadings were then concluded.

In an affidavit sworn on Aug. 29th, 1870, William Leonard and Stevens, the proctor, exhibited two proxies, as having been received by the former in a letter from Harper, the secretary of the salvage committee at Lloyd's. The proxies were identical, save as to the signatures, and the material parts are as follow:

Whereas there is now depending in the Vice-Admiralty Court at Malta a certain cause of damage on behalf of John Harvey, &c.; . . . and whereas we, the undersigned John Harvey, &c., are desirous of nominating and appointing a proctor, &c. . . .

Now know all men by these presents that we, the said John Harvey, &c., do hereby nominate, and in and by these presents constitute and appoint William John Stevens, of La Valetta, in the Island of Malta, proctor, &c., or in his absence, any other proctor of the said

Vice-Admiralty Court of Malta, to be our true and lawful proctor for us, and in our names to appear before the said court and exhibit this, our special proxy, and in virtue thereof to prosecute the said cause so instituted, &c., . . . until the final conclusion thereof, &c. . . .

Giving and granting unto the said W. J. Stevens full power and authority to appoint one or more substitute, &c. . . . And whatsoever our said proctor shall lawfully do or cause to be done in and about the premises we do hereby respectively promise to ratify, confirm, and allow for valid.

In witness whereof we have hereunto respectively set our hands and seals this 22nd of July, 1870.

(Signed) { JOHN HARVEY (L.S.)
WILLIAM B. HARVEY (L.S.)

Signed, sealed and delivered by the within-named John Harvey and William Benjamin Harvey in the presence of
Solicitor, Littlehampton.

The proxy for the owners of the cargo purported to be signed by them, and to be witnessed in a similar manner by an underwriter and an accountant of Liverpool, and was also dated the 22nd of July. The affidavit above mentioned also contained an allegation by Stevens, that he was retained on the 13th July by William Leonard to act for him in the cause.

On the 26th of Sept. a further affidavit was filed, exhibiting a similar proxy from the master and crew of the Clymping, dated the 14th Sept. 1870.

It was further proved that William Leonard had received, besides the telegram annexed to the affidavit exhibited to lead the warrant of arrest, certain other telegrams delivered by the messengers of the Mediterranean Telegraphic Extension Company, one of which, dated London, 16th July 1870, contained a request from the said John Harvey to "take proceedings against the Euxine as instructed by the salvage committee at Lloyd's;" and the other, dated Liverpool, 15th July, from Schemeil Brothers and Co., authorised "proceedings against Euxine, as London Salvage Committee instruct," and the transcripts of these telegrams were verified by affidavit and brought into court. On 9th Sept. 1870 Stephens brought into court the following letter:

Association for the Protection of Commercial Interests as respects Wrecked and Damaged Property. Incorporated by Royal Charter.

Clymping and Euxine.

Dear Sirs,—I enclose copies of the telegrams which have passed between us. The powers of attorney shall come forward by next steamer; they could not be prepared for this mail. I feel sure you will do what is necessary in the mean time. I hope to communicate more at length in a few days. I am, dear Sirs, yours faithfully, (Signed) J. A. W. HARPER, Secretary.

In an affidavit sworn on the same day, William Leonard verified this letter, and swore to having received it in course of post, and further said that Harper was secretary of the association, "as had already been proved in this case by the production on Sept. 5th, on the hearing thereof, of the printed London Directory, published under the authority of her Majesty's Postmaster-General." The copy telegram inclosed and filed at the same time was the telegram already set out as appearing in the affidavit to lead warrant. On Sept. 9th Stevens, the proctor, filed a copy of the register of the Clymping, also verified by affidavit, by which it appeared that John Harvey and William Benjamin

Harvey were the registered owners of 48-64ths and mortgagees of 16-64ths of the Olymping, and on Sept. 26th Stevens filed a document purporting to be the bill of lading of the cargo of the Olymping, which was signed by George Hedgecock, and in which the named consignees were Schemel Brothers and Co., of Liverpool, and this bill of lading was forwarded to Leonard in a letter purporting to be from Harper. The bill of lading had on it signatures purporting to be those of George Hedgecock and Schemel Brothers and Co.

The questions arising upon the proceedings upon protest were argued upon the 5th, 12th, and 14th Sept., before Sir Antonio Micallef, judge of the Vice-Admiralty Court, and on the 4th Oct. 1870 the learned judge pronounced two decrees—the first decided in favour of the jurisdiction of the court; the second, which related to the subject of this appeal, was as follows:

“The court, on the protest or exception of the defendant against the title of the plaintiff Leonard, in the names of which the instituted action has been entered in the action book of the court under date 16th July 1870, by the notary, William John Stevens, duly authorised to practise as proctor in this court, and appearing for the plaintiffs, represented in this island by the aforesaid Leonard.

“Considering—

“That, although it is manifest from the telegram despatched from London on the 12th July 1870, and received in this island on the 13th July 1870, as set forth in the affidavit of the said Leonard, under date of the 16th July, 1870, that one ‘Harper, secretary salvage committee, Lloyd’s,’ did empower the said Leonard, for Robinson Duckworth, to arrest for the said committee, under the authority of this court, the French steam vessel Euxine, for 10,000l. sterling, pretended amount of damages caused on the 2nd June 1870, in the vicinity of Alexandria, to the English brig Olymping, lately commanded by Captain George Hedgecock, and this at the suit, as asserted in the said telegram, of one John Harvey and another, of Littlehampton, in the county of Sussex, owners, as therein stated, of the said brig, and of Emile and Bichara Schemel, of Liverpool, in the county of Lancaster, owners, as is also therein stated, of the cargo of the said brig, consisting of cotton seed, as likewise of the said Captain Hedgecock and others of the crew of the said brig for private effects, it has not been, however, proved by the said Leonard that the said telegram was sent to the said Leonard by the said Harper; that although a copy of the said telegram was transmitted on the 15th July, 1870 to the said Leonard for Messrs. Robinson Duckworth, and Co., in a letter bearing the signature of J. A. W. Harper, who is therein qualified as secretary of the Association for the Protection of Commercial Interests as respects Wrecked and Damaged Property, incorporated by royal charter; and although the receipt of the said letter, besides being corroborated by the Post-office stamps, is affirmed by the said Leonard in his affidavit of the 9th Sept. 1870, no proof has been produced in authentication of the handwriting of the subscriber of the said letter not admitted by the defendant; that, besides the want of said authentication, no proof has been produced that the said Harper, is the secretary of the before-mentioned committee, and for such an object the Post-office London Directory, exhibited by the aforesaid Leonard is not admissible, because, according to law, similar directories form no proof (see Taylor on Evidence, vol. ii., No. 1585); that the royal charter by which it is alleged the before-mentioned association was incorporated has not been produced, and consequently it does not result either from the said charter or from any other document what are the powers of the said secretary, and therefore whether he is a person competent to appear in this suit for the said committee; that it has been in no way shown in what consists the interest of the before-mentioned committee in the present cause, in which are also made to appear the alleged owners of the vessel and cargo of the vessel and individuals alleged owners of private effects on board the said vessel; if the said committee be interested in this cause on behalf of the insurers, such interest ought to have been proved by means of the policies of insurance and of the act of abandonment on the part of the owners; that owing to the defect of proof as required by law in confirmation of the telegrams annexed to the two affidavits of the aforesaid Leonard, under date of the 29th Aug. 1870, no proof of a warrant to the said Leonard to effect the before-mentioned arrest is afforded either by the telegram directed to Duckworth, Malta, on the 17th July 1870, as is alleged in the said telegram by Harvey, Littlehampton, or by the telegram directed to Robinson, Duckworth, and Co., Malta, on the before-mentioned day of the 17th July 1870, as is alleged in the said telegram by Schemel Brothers and Co., Liverpool; that no proof such as required by law has been produced in authentication of the signatures of John Harvey and William B. Harvey, or at least of the signatures and of the seals of the witnesses attesting the said signatures in authentication of the signatures of Emin Schemel and of Bichara Schemel, or at least of the signatures and seals of the witnesses attesting the said signatures, or in authentication of the signatures of George Hedgecock and of the other individuals alleged to form part of the crew of the brig Olymping, or at least of the signatures and seals of the witnesses attesting the said signatures, as all such signatures and seals appear opposed to the three proxies alleged to be executed in favour of and directed to the before named proctor, William John Stevens, and exhibited with the affidavits of the aforesaid Leonard and of the said Stevens, under the dates of the 29th Aug. 1870, and of the 26th Sept. 1870; that the signatures of George Hedgecock, and of Schemel Brothers and Co., have not been authenticated, as they appear on the bill of lading, exhibited by the said Leonard with his affidavit on the 26th Sept., 1870, and which bill of lading is stated to have been by him received on the 23rd Sept., 1870, in a letter (not produced) bearing date the thirteenth of the said month from J. A. Heathcote, of London, on behalf of J. A. W. Harper, Esq., the Secretary of the Salvage Committee at Lloyd’s.

“Declares and decides.

“That it does not appear that the said Leonard and the said proctor are persons legitimately authorised to represent in a suit of law the before-mentioned absent parties, and in whose name the action was instituted, and therefore pronounces for the protest of the defendant, and dismisses the suit with costs in favour of the defendant, and against the said Leonard personally recoverable by him from those parties who may be pledged to him according to law."

From this judgment the owners of the Olymping and of her cargo and her master and crew appealed, on the grounds, that the suit was properly instituted on behalf of the appellants; that the appellants adopted and ratified the institution of the suit on their behalf: that the exhibition by the proctor of the appellants of the proxies of his parties was sufficient proof that he had authority to institute and prosecute the said suit; that there was sufficient evidence produced on the part of the appellants to show that they were interested parties, and that they had authorised and adopted the institution of the suit; that William Leonard was no party to the suit, and all questions as to his title and authority were immaterial and irrelevant under the circumstances.

Bull, Q.C. (E. G. Gibson with him) for the appellants.—The telegram of 12th July, 1870, was sufficient authority to institute the suit. The proxies were put in after. It cannot be contended that a proxy may not be given after a suit has been instituted. The parties may ratify the acts of their agents. The decision goes on the ground that there is no proof of the handwriting in the proxies or in the letters. If Leonard and Stevens were not duly empowered how did they come by the original bill of lading? The practice of the vice-admiralty courts is regulated by the Orders in Council of June 27th, 1832, made in pursuance of the powers conferred by 2 Will. 4, c. 51, s. 1. By sect. 40 of these rules and regulations, no doubt, proxies may be required, (a) under certain circumstances. We have complied with this requirement by producing proxies in the form set out in the appendix to the rules. Our proxies are witnessed in the same way as required by that form, and are proper proxies under the rule. This is a claim against a foreign ship, and she may never come into our hands again. Is it to be said that because the proxies may possibly be forgeries they are not to be of any effect? They raise a prima facie presumption that Stevens was duly authorised, and it lies upon the respondents to rebut that presumption.

E. C. Clarkson for the respondents.—The real question is, how did the matter present itself to the respondents in the court below and to the judge of that court? The rule as to proxies is positive. Whatever may be the practice of the High Court of Admiralty, in the Vice-Admiralty Court it was competent to the respondents to require the production of proxies. Do proxies require evidence to prove them, or do they prove themselves? There was no proof that they were of more value than blank papers. The appellants had every opportunity of giving evidence of their authenticity, and chose to go to trial without doing so. In paragraph four of our reply we required the production of the authority. The persons taking active proceedings in the matter were not persons entitled to sue, they being only Lloyd's Salvage Committee. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—As agents in the first instance, and then a proctor took up the suit, and I should have thought this ratified the proceedings. Sir J. COLVILLE.—You contend that on the pleadings the appellants must prove the signatures?] In Clarke's Praxis, p. 13, it is said: "The warrant of attorney or proxy in civil and maritime causes is made in the same form with the proxy or procuratory ad lites, in ecclesiastical causes, &c. . . . Proxies of this kind, in order to be authentic, should be sealed with an authentic seal, in the same manner that such papers are in the ecclesiastical courts." See also Pritchard's Digest, p. 519. The ancient practice of the court was for proctors to exhibit and file proxies. Now the court may order a proxy to be brought in; and it is not sufficient to bring in a proxy without due verification. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I have always understood that proctors were responsible officers, and that they were liable for dismissal for doing anything wrong.] No doubt, but this is a question whether the documents produced by the proctor were sufficient. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Ought this question to have been raised in this way? The Judge decided that he had jurisdiction in the case, and then decided that these parties could not proceed.] I should have thought that the powers of the proctors were not matter of pleading, but as both parties have chosen this way it must be considered. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—It would be a special issue; a preliminary point altogether. Sir MONTAGUE SMITH.—The suit ought to have gone on. There should have been an application to stay proceedings to await due proof of authority. Rule 40 of the Vice-Admiralty Regulations is to prevent proceedings under a colour of authority where there is none, but it is an increase of expense, and therefore ought not to be enforced unless absolutely necessary.] The rule has been enforced in the Dumfriesshire (Stuart's Vice-Admiralty Cases in Lower Canada, p. 245). [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Rule 40 is to prevent proctors proceeding without authority. Is there any ground in this case for supposing that there was no right on the part of Leonard and Stevens to proceed?] It appears by the præcipe that Harper and Leonard were improperly joined. No doubt this raised the suspicions of respondents. The judgment, however, goes on the ground that the signatures and seals were not duly authenticated. (3 Burns' Ecclesiastical Law by Phillimore, 9th edit., p. 377). A document is not a proxy until the handwriting is duly proved before the court. A proxy is a warrant of attorney, and no such document would obtain payment out of the Court of Chancery without authentication. There was ample time to prove the signatures.

W. G. F. Phillimore, on the same side.—There are three questions. Had we a right to call for proxies? Did we call for them? Did we get proxies? Sect. 40 of the Vice-Admiralty Regulations is made under statutory authority and not by the judge himself, and he could not disregard it. The rule was framed for such a case as this. Two persons were joined in the suit who had no right to intervene. In a court of common law or Chancery misjoinder of plaintiffs was formerly fatal, and is now ground for striking out the names. This was sufficient to cause suspicion and to give a right to call for proxies. The Wilhelmine (1 W. Rob. 335; 2 Notes of Cases, 213), decides that a proctor is not only bound to give the names of the parties for whom he appears, but to show that he has authority. The Dumfriesshire (sup.) was a case to recover penalties under the Passengers Act (5 & 6 Will 4, c. 58), and shows that the non-production of a proxy is ground for the dismissal of a suit. We called for proxies by appearing under protest. When so appearing parties are bound to set forth their reasons at once, and we did so in our reply, par. 3. We there deny that the proctor held a proxy. [SIR JOSEPH NAPIER.—Do you contend that no suit can be instituted without a proxy?] No. A suit may go on to the end without a proxy, but if a proxy is called for at any stage it must be produced. This would be the rule of the High Court of Admiralty, and by Rule 40 it is binding in vice-admiralty courts. These proxies were merely pieces of paper until the attesting witnesses had been called to prove the signatures. The form of the proxy is that of a deed, and it should be proved as such. If these proxies had been attested before a notary public, under 17 & 18 Vict. c. 78, s. 8, it would have been sufficient, as the seal of a notary would have been accepted in an English Court.

(a) See "Rules and Regulations made in pursuance of an Act of Parliament passed in the second year of the reign of His Majesty King William the Fourth, touching the practice to be observed in suits and proceedings in the several Courts of Vice-Admiralty abroad, and established by the King's Order in Council," p. 26. Rule 40 is as follows: "Although proxies are not usually exhibited in maritime suits, yet they may sometimes be required, in order to prevent proctors from proceeding in causes on instructions from parties not being themselves entitled to intervene, or not having a legal persona standi to prosecute a cause." For the form of the proxy required, see the appendix to these rules, No. 239.

Butt, Q.C., in reply.—The respondents assume that we were ordered to produce proxies, whereas we have never been so ordered. In the Dumfriesshire (sup.) there was a positive order to produce, and disobedience to that order; the suit was dismissed for non-compliance with the order of the court, not with the demand of one party. It is enough to give the names of the parties for whom a proctor appears. We have done more and produced proxies. They made no application to dismiss the suit.

SIR ROBERT PHILLIMORE delivered the judgment of the Court.—This is an appeal from the Vice-Admiralty Court at Malta, raising questions of practice in the admiralty courts. Their lordships have no doubt at all as to the advice which it will be their duty to tender to Her Majesty upon this matter. It appears that a suit was instituted in the Vice-Admiralty Court at Malta by an English ship, the Chlymping, against a French ship, the Euxine, for a collision at sea somewhere near Alexandria. The suit was instituted in that court by a proctor who appeared in the usual form, and stated the nature of the suit and his title to appear in the usual manner. It has been contended that he was duly called upon to produce a proxy, and that having been so duly called upon he did not comply with the order, but produced an imperfect document, which cannot be taken in law as being a proxy, and therefore that the judge of the court below was justified in taking the course that he did take, namely, of dismissing the suit altogether. With regard to the practice of the court as to proxies, it is very clearly laid down by that experienced judge, Dr. Lushington, in the case of the Wilhelmine (sup.). He says: "Now, looking to the ancient practice of the court, it is perfectly clear that the rules with regard to appearances in the Court of Admiralty were originally the same as are now adopted in the ecclesiastical courts. In the more modern practice of this court these rules, it is true, have been relaxed for the convenience of the practitioners, and for a period of probably not less than 200 years, proctors have been permitted to appear on behalf of parties suing without being called upon to exhibit any proxy, as is the indispensable custom in the ecclesiastical courts. The first question, then, which I must consider in the present instance is this: What is the duty and what the responsibility attaching upon a proctor who so appears without exhibiting a proxy? Upon general principle, I apprehend that the court is entitled to expect from such proctor when he does appear that he be duly authorised by some person having an interest in the cause in issue, or that he should have a justifiable and strong ground for believing that the individual for whom he appears has such an interest. I apprehend further, that at any period of the cause, and at any time before the case is dismissed out of court, the court has a right to call upon that proctor to state, not generally but specifically by name, the whole of the parties for whom he is authorised to appear. The authority of the court to make this demand upon the proctor is, I conceive, inherent in the jurisdiction of this court, in common with all other courts, and is absolutely essential to the due administration of justice for the purpose of preventing unauthorised litigation. If it were otherwise what would be the consequence in regard to the proceedings in this court? The consequences would be that proctors might appear for individuals who either were not in existence, or for persons who gave no authority, or who, assuming the names of others, might take the chance of a decree being made in their favour, without at any time being obnoxious to the consequences of an unsuccessful litigation." Now it is quite clear from the passage of the judgment which I have read, first, that the usual practice is for proctors in the Court of Admiralty to proceed without the exhibition of any proxy, and, secondly, that when they are called upon for their proxy they satisfy the law by stating the names of the parties for whom they are authorised to appear. Read by the light of this judgment, there appears to be no difficulty in construing the rules and regulations of the Vice-Admiralty Court, which were made at a subsequent period, one of which rules is (Rule 40): "Although proxies are not usually exhibited in maritime suits, yet they may sometimes be required, in order to prevent proctors from proceeding in causes on instructions from parties not being themselves entitled to intervene, or not having a legal personae standi to prosecute a cause." In this case there is no question whatever that the appellants before the court, being the owners of the cargo on board the brig, and the master and crew who appear, as is usual, as to their personal effects, are the parties who are really interested and entitled to prosecute the cause in this case. The objection which has been taken, has been truly said to be one of the most technical description. The proxy is said not to have been duly signed and sealed, and it is said that there is no evidence of the handwriting of the witnesses who appear to have subscribed the instrument. The answer to that is that if there had been a strict order of the court (and none was made on this occasion) that they should produce their proxy, there would have been a prima facie compliance with that order by the production of those instruments, and those who sought to impugn their authenticity should have taken further steps in the matter. It is also to be observed that great confusion appears in the pleadings of the court below, and in the protest, because this is an objection which should have been taken separately and at once, and should not have been mixed up with other matters, as it appears to have been in this protest. Even if the argument of the counsel for the respondents could be sustained to its utmost extent, the duty of the judge would have been no more than this, to have stayed proceedings until the doubt which they alleged with respect to the authenticity of the document could have been properly solved. Upon all grounds therefore,—upon the ground first of all that there were no circumstances of suspicion in the case which warranted the departure from the usual admitted practice and called for the production of a special proxy,—upon the ground that if there were such circumstances they were prima facie fully complied with by the instruments which are before the court on this occasion, that the objection ought to have been taken at the earliest period, and not mixed up with the other proceedings, and that the utmost the court could have done in any case would have been to stay proceedings until further information could have been obtained,—their Lordships have no hesitation whatever in saying that it will be their duty humbly to advise Her Majesty to reverse the sentence of the court below. Their Lordships think that looking to the confusion which prevailed in these pleadings, the fault of which does not lie entirely upon one party but must be shared by both, no order should be made as to the costs of the appeal. The costs in the court below will be costs in the cause.

Appeal allowed.

Butt, Q.C. asked the court to retain the suit in accordance with the prayer of the appellants.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This court has always been extremely reluctant to retain cases and to depart from its functions of a court of appeal and to become a court of original jurisdiction, but if both sides wish it they will do so.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

McLEAN AND ANOTHER v. FLEMING.

Charter-party—Dead freight—Deficiency of cargo—Lien—Indorsees of bills of lading also charterers—Quantity specified in bill of lading.

“Dead freight” means compensation, liquidated or unliquidated, for the loss suffered by the shipowner by the failure on the part of the charterer to supply a full cargo, and the amount payable in respect thereof, where it is unliquidated, is such reasonable amount as the shipowner would have earned, after deducting such expenses as he would have incurred if a full cargo had been shipped.

A lien on the cargo actually shipped for dead freight may be created by express stipulation in the charter-party.

Where a charter-party is entered into on behalf of the indorsees of the bills of lading given under the charter, so that they are the actual charterers, they are bound by a stipulation as to lien in the charter-party.

Bills of lading signed by the master are prima facie evidence that the quantities named therein were received on board by him; the onus of rebutting this presumption and of showing that a less quantity than that specified was received lies on a shipowner. (a)

(a) The exact words of the charter party, so far as they are material, are as follow: “It is this day mutually agreed between Samuel Donaldson, of the good ship or vessel Persian, of Liverpool, of the measurement of 598 tons or thereabouts, now lying at this port (Constantinople), whereof himself is master, and Mr. A. Carmust, of this city, freighter of the said vessel, that the said ship, being tight, staunch, and strong, and in every way fitted for the voyage, shall with all convenient speed, after discharging her present cargo, be made ready to sail and proceed to Onnieh, Kerrasounda, in a third place of Marmora, and to fill up in a fourth place below, viz., Enos, Kherc, Orfano, Port Lagos, Salonica, Smyrna, or Scala Nuova, at charterer’s option, or so near thereunto as she may safely get, and there load from the agent of the said freighter a full and complete cargo of cattle bones in bulk, the captain to sign bills of lading at each port, at the option of the freighter, not exceeding what she can reasonably stow and carry over and above her tackle, apparel, provision, and furniture; and being so loaded, shall therewith proceed to a safe port in the United Kingdom, orders on signing bills of lading on the last port or lay days to commence, and deliver the same, on being paid freight as follows—viz., at the rate of, say, 35s. (thirty-five shillings) sterling English per ton of bones of 20 cwt. Delivered in full. . . . The captain or owner to have an absolute lien on the cargo for all freight, dead freight, and demurrage. The cargo to be brought to and taken from alongside, &c. . . . The freight to be paid on unloading and right delivery of the cargo, half in cash, and the remainder by approved bills, &c. . . . sixty running days, &c. for loading and unloading, &c. . . . Penalty for non-performance of this agreement, amount of freight. Charterers binding themselves to ship at Onnieh and Kerrasounda from 170 to 200 tons of said bones. It is understood that the ship is to be loaded in four of the above places.” On reference to the case of Gray v. Carr (ante p. 115), it will be seen that the charter parties in the two cases are almost identical, more especially in those parts giving a lien for dead freight. Brett, J., commenting on McLean v. Fleming in his judgment in Gray v. Carr, says: “The charter party was in respect of the carriage of a uniform cargo, and the freight was payable at a fixed sum per ton, and the charter party ascertained the amount of the cargo that was to be loaded;” and he distinguished the two cases. In Gray v. Carr it will be seen that the charter party (as to the cargo actually shipped) was in respect of a uniform cargo, that is, of oak staves; that the freight was payable at a fixed sum per 100 pieces of oak staves; and that the charter party, by giving the ship’s tonnage, gave the same means of ascertaining, in that case, the amount of cargo that was to be loaded in the same way as it was given in McLean v. Fleming. In fact, in McLean v. Fleming the actual amount of cargo shipped was only ascertained by weighing at the port of discharge, and in that sense the damages were unliquidated. The fact that it might have been easier to measure the damages in the one case than the other cannot affect the principle. The bills of lading were different, as that in Gray v. Carr contained the words, “Paying freight and all other conditions or demurrage for the said goods as per the aforesaid charter party,” whilst in McLean v. Fleming the words were “paying freight for the said goods as per charter party.” The majority of the court in Gray v. Carr lay down that dead freight does not include damages for not loading a full cargo unless the sum is specified in the charter party. On the other hand, the Lords in McLean v. Fleming say that dead freight means damages for not loading a full cargo, whether such damages are ascertained by the charter party or not. Therefore the decisions here given are in

McLEAN AND ANOTHER v. FLEMING.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the second division of the Court of Session, affirming a judgment of the Lord Ordinary.

The appellants, merchants in Edinburgh, ordered a cargo of cattle bones from Messrs. W., at Constantinople, and Messrs. W. obtained, on payment of 5*l.*, a transfer to them, from a broker at Constantinople, of a charter-party of the ship Persian, of which the respondent was owner. Messrs. W. forwarded the charter to the appellants, and charged them with the 50*l.* and other advances made in pursuance of the charter, which the appellants paid.

By the charter-party it was "mutually agreed" that the ship should proceed to certain ports, "and there load, from the agents of the freighters, a full and complete cargo of cattle bones in bulk," the cargo to be completed at four ports, and thence to a port in the United Kingdom, and "deliver the same on being paid freight at the rate of 35*s.* per ton. The captain or owner to have an absolute lien on the cargo for all freight, dead freight, and demurrage," &c.

Messrs. W.'s agents at the different ports shipped bones, and received bills of lading, purporting to be for an amount equal in Turkish measure to 701 tons, in the names of the appellants, as shippers, "to be delivered unto order or to their assigns, paying freight for the goods as per charter-party," and endorsed the bills of lading in the words "weight and quality unknown."

Before the ship had received a full cargo, the shipper's agents at the fourth port found they had no more bones, and told the master he might sail for Great Britain; the master noted a protest that he was despatched with a short cargo, and when he arrived at Aberdeen only 386 tons were delivered, and no more were then on board, whereas the measurement tonnage of the ship was from 596 to 598 tons. The respondent (the shipowner) claimed a lien for "dead freight" to the amount of 367*l.* 10*s.* as due on 210 tons short shipped, at the rate of 35*s.* a ton, the stipulated rate of freight; and the consignees (the appellants) claimed damages for the nondelivery of the 701 tons stated to have been shipped in the bills of lading. The Lord Ordinary found that the appellants had no right to claim for damages for non-delivery, as the amount actually shipped was only 386 tons. The Court of Session confirmed it is finding. The facts are sufficiently noticed in the judgments.

Birley*, 2 Mer. 401.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Hatherley).—The case of Kirchner v. Venus (12 Moo. P.C. 361) is distinguishable on the ground that there was no such express contract as there was here. "Dead freight," though, as observed by several authorities, not a very accurate term, is intelligible enough. "Dead freight" has been defined by Lord Ellenborough in Phillips v. Rodie (15 East, 155), as "unliquidated compensation for loss of freight." The question whether there has been an engagement by the parties for a lien of such unliquidated damages is matter of proof. There is no difficulty as to what the engagement was in this case. So much per ton was agreed to be paid for a full cargo of a uniform description, and a full cargo was agreed to be supplied, and there was no difficulty in ascertaining either the quantity of the cargo agreed for or the amount agreed to be paid per ton. The payment was to be at the same rate in respect of the goods not supplied as for those supplied. Of course there might be always some difficulty in liquidating the damages, because it might be that the captain might have had it in his power to fill up the deficiency with other cargo; but that was not the case here. It is enough to say that here there is a clear case of an omission to supply a full cargo as contracted for, and a clear case therefore for applying the definition of Lord Ellenborough as to what "dead freight" is—a definition exactly agreeing with that given in Bell's Commentaries (vol. 1, p. 620, 7th edit.) As to the contention that the appellants claimed under the bill of lading, which did not incorporate the terms of the charter-party, the appellants were, to all intents and purposes, in the position of charterers, and were therefore bound by the terms of the charter-party. I am of opinion, therefore, that the judgment of the court below must be affirmed.

LORD CHELMSFORD.—My Lords, the first question is, whether there was evidence that the cargo shipped was only to the extent of the quantity found to be in the ship on arrival at Aberdeen. On this point your Lordships held so clear an opinion that you did not require any argument for the respondent upon it. The master is the agent of the shipowner in every contract made in the usual course of the employment of the ship; and though he has no authority to sign bills of lading for a greater quantity of goods than is actually put on board, yet, as it is not to be presumed that he has exceeded his duty, his signature to the bills of lading is sufficient evidence of the truth of their contents to throw upon the shipowner the onus of falsifying them, and proving that he received a less quantity of goods to carry than is thus acknowledged by his agent. But it being admitted that it lay upon the shipowner to rebut the prima facie evidence arising from the bills of lading, he appears to me to have satisfactorily done so. If the evidence of the master is to be believed, and there seems no reason to doubt it, it is impossible that the additional quantity of bones could at any time have been on board the vessel. In the course of his evidence, the master

said, "I brought to Aberdeen the whole of the cargo that was shipped. No part of it was put away either by myself or anyone else, nor interfered with from the time it was put on board till it was landed at Aberdeen." It is no slight confirmation of the evidence that there was not a full and complete cargo when the ship sailed from Enos, the last place of loading, that the quantity of bones delivered on April 3, 1865, having exhausted all that were there for delivery, the captain on the following day went before the Vice-consul at Enos, and in a formal document stated that he had informed the agent of Whittaker and Co., in the presence of the Vice-Consul (who must have known whether the statement was correct), that not having received a full cargo for his vessel, he reserved his right to protest, and formally protested against the freighter. The appellants were not able to meet this evidence by proof that the quantities mentioned in the bill of lading, or any more than the 386 tons, were actually shipped, and this question was therefore properly determined by the Lord Ordinary, and by the court of second division in favour of the respondent. The questions then remain: First, whether the 210 tons short of a complete cargo can be regarded as dead freight, to which the lien in the charter-party applies? and, secondly, supposing a lien to have existed, whether it was available against the appellants? The Lord Advocate argued that the rule as to dead freight was inapplicable to a case where the neglect to supply a full cargo under a charter-party, results in a claim to unliquidated damages, and that by law dead freight can exist only where there is an express stipulation for a certain amount to be payable eo nomine. Upon the question of enforcing the lien against the appellants in respect of dead freight, he contended that they were indorsees for value of the bills of lading, which bound them merely to pay "freight for the goods as per charter-party," and imposed upon them no liability for dead freight, even if any were payable under the charter-party. It must be admitted that the term "dead freight" is an inaccurate expression of the thing signified by it. "It is," as Lord Ellenborough said in Phillips v. Rodie (15 East, 554), "not freight, but an unliquidated compensation for the loss of freight recoverable in the absence and place of freight." The learned counsel for the appellants, in support of their argument that no dead freight properly so called was agreed to be paid under the charter-party in question, cited the cases of Kirchner v. Venus (12 Moo. P.C. 361) and Pearson v. Goschen (17 C. B., N. S. 352). Pearson v. Goschen was referred to for some dicta of the judges, not defining what dead freight was, but stating what it was not. In the case of Kirchner v. Venus there was no attempt to define, and no necessity for a definition of the term "dead freight." The Judicial Committee merely decided that a sum of money payable before the arrival of a ship at her port of discharge, and payable by the shippers at the port of shipment, did not acquire the legal character of freight because it was described under that name in the bill of lading; that it was in effect money to be paid for taking the goods, and not for carrying them. With respect to the observations of the learned judges upon the subject of dead freight in Pearson v. Goschen, your Lordships were told that there is a case Gray v. Carr (sup.) standing for judgment in the Court of Exchequer Chamber, in which their opinions may have to be considered. I shall therefore abstain from any remarks upon them. It was argued for the appellants that, even if a claim for damages for breach of a covenant in a charter-party to furnish a full lading to a ship may correctly be called "dead freight," and yet that no lien can exist where the damages are unliquidated. But I understand the case of Phillips v. Rodie not to have denied that though the damages were unliquidated, there might have been a lien upon the cargo for them if the contract of the parties had stipulated for it, which it had not. And in the case of Birley v. Gladstone (3 Man. & Sel. 205), cited by counsel for the appellants, there was no actual decision upon the question of lien for dead freight; but it was held that a clause mutually binding the shipowners and the ship, and the freighter and the cargo in a penalty, could not be considered as intended to give the shipowner a lien for the performance of the covenant in the charter party to load a full cargo. It may be observed that even where there is an express stipulation to pay full freight, as if the goods had been actually loaded on board, and that the master shall have the same lien upon the goods actually on board as if the ship had been fully laden, the case may be one of unliquidated damages, for the master may have filled the vacant space with the goods of other persons, and the freighter would be entitled to have any allowance for the profit thus made. In construing the charter-party it must be assumed that the parties understood the meaning of the terms they employed, and that, amongst others, the term "dead freight" meant (according to Lord Ellenborough's definition) "an unliquidated compensation for the loss of freight." The freighter with this understanding agrees to load on board the respondent's ship a full and complete cargo of cattle bones, and to pay freight at the rate of 35s. sterling English per ton. He knows that, if he fails to perform his covenant to load a full and complete cargo, he will be liable to the shipowner in damages under the name of dead freight, and he agrees to give the captain or shipowner an absolute lien on the cargo for all freight, dead freight and demurrage. Why should not his agreement have its intended effect? This case can hardly be considered to be one of unliquidated damages, because the master, not having brought home any other goods than those of the appellant's, the proper measure of the shipowner's claim appears to be the amount of the agreed freight which he would have earned upon the deficient quantity of 210 tons of bones. But whether the amount of his damages is to be regarded as ascertained or not, I am of opinion that the charter party gives him a lien for his claim on account of the deficient cargo. Was the lien, then, available against the appellants? I quite agree that, if they were merely holders of the bills of lading for valuable consideration, the shipowner would not have been entitled to a lien upon the cargo on board the ship for anything more than the freight upon the quantity actually shipped and brought home. But it appears to me that there is evidence to show that the charter-party was entered into by their agents on their behalf. The appellants were really the charterers; and, therefore, although as indorsees of the bills of lading merely, they would not be bound by the stipulation as to lien in the charter-party, yet, as the real charterers, it is binding upon them. I am of opinion that the interlocutors appealed from ought to be affirmed.

Lord WESTBURY.—My Lords, two questions were argued at the bar: First, what is the meaning of the term “dead freight,” in respect of the remedy which it gives the shipowner? Does it entitle him to say that the deficient quantity shall be paid for at the rate assigned per ton in the charter-party. I think that that would be a very unreasonable construction; for if the full freight had been furnished to the captain, the charge for boarding and the other outlays attendant upon the additional 210 tons which were wanting, would have occasioned some expenditure to the shipowner. The result, therefore, is that in a charter-party giving no specific sum as the amount to be recovered by way of compensation for dead freight, the shipowner becomes entitled only to a reasonable sum, which is another phrase for unliquidated damages. The next question is, whether considerations of convenience would prevent the shipowner from having a lien upon the cargo, seeing that he would become entitled to retain it during the time occupied in ascertaining the amount of the unliquidated damages. There may be some inconvenience in that construction, but that ought to have been considered by the parties when they entered into this express stipulation. I think it is impossible to set up any consideration of inconvenience in answer to the clear terms of the contract. There remains but one further point, and that is, whether the shipowner has a right in respect of dead freight and the damage pertaining to it, as against an indorsee of the bill of lading for valuable consideration? Now that has been examined specially by my noble and learned friend who has just sat down, and I agree with him that, substantially, the present appellants are not only indorsees of the bill of lading, but that in reality they were bound as the persons who originally authorised the chartering of the ship, and who remained entitled to the benefit of that charter party, and were therefore subject to the obligations contained in it. The result is that their title to the bill of lading is controlled by their liability under the charter-party. I am of opinion that the appeal is without foundation, and should be dismissed with costs.

Lord COLONSAY.—I agree that the appellants were in the position of charterers. I cannot find the slightest difficulty in holding that, under this charter-party, there was a claim for “dead freight.” It is not a very accurate expression, but it is the only expression we have for the claim which arises in consequence of the failure to furnish a full cargo. It is so described in the English authorities, and in the Scotch authorities, such as in Bell’s Commentaries (vol. 1, p. 620, 7th edit.), in his Law Dictionary and Principles; and it is a phrase which had also obtained a place in our mercantile authorities. As to the lien, I think it clear both on principle and authority that, if there be a stipulation in a charter-party that dead freight shall be exigible, and that there shall be a lien for it in the cargo, then a lien is constituted by contract, although there be no lien for dead freight by law. I adopt the words of Sir William Grant in Gladstone v. Birley (2 Mer. 401), where he says, “The question always is whether there be a right to retain goods till a given demand is satisfied.” This charter-party says in so many words that there shall be a lien for dead freight; and it makes no difference that the words were in print—they were allowed to remain. The circumstance that the precise amount was not specified does not affect the principle; questions of amount may arise where the rate has been specified. In the present case there is no difficulty. It was not pleaded in the court below that the claim for 210 tons is an exorbitant claim, or one from which a deduction ought to be made. The vessel was proved to have been capable of carrying a good deal more, and there was no allegation that anything ought to be deducted from the sum awarded.

Interlocutor affirmed.

Reported by H. PEAT, THOMAS BRETT, and G. WELBY KING, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

July 17 and 18, 1871.

PEEK v. LARSEN.

Ship—Charter-party—Lien on cargo for freight—Advertisement as general ship—Shipment without notice of charter-party.

C. and Co., who chartered a foreign vessel under a charter-party, which provided that the captain should have a lien on the cargo for freight, dead freight, and demurrage, advertised the vessel as a generalship, the advertisement inviting applications as to the freight, &c., to be made “to C. and Co. brokers.” The plaintiffs entered into an agreement with C. and Co. for the carriage of certain goods at a certain rate of freight, and put the goods on board without notice of the charter-party. The captain refused to sign the bills of lading, except subject to the charter-party, and claimed a lien on goods for expenses:

Held, that the plaintiffs were not bound by the charter-party as they had no notice of it when they put the goods on board, and that they were entitled to have the goods returned to them free from any claim by the captain:

Held, also, that as the vessel was advertised as a general ship, the plaintiffs were not bound to inquire whether it was subject to a charter-party or not. (a)

THIS was a suit by a firm of tea merchants, carrying on business in the city of London under the style of Francis Peek, Winch, and Co., against Larsen, the master, and Bjorn, the owner, of the Norwegian ship Alliance, praying that the defendants might be restrained from sailing with, or removing certain packages of tea, which the plaintiffs had put on board the ship, and that they might be ordered to concur in the transfer of the tea into the plaintiffs’ names at the London Docks.

The circumstances of the case were as follows.

In Feb. 1870 Messrs. Claxton and Co. advertised the Alliance as about to sail. The advertisement, so far as material, was in these words:

GUARANTEED FIRST SPRING SHIP.

To sail March 1, 1870.

Direct for St. John, N. B.

The splendid and fast clipper Alliance, 5-6ths in Veritas and coppered, 800 tons, Niels Larsen commander, loading in London Docks. For freight or passage apply to J. D. Claxton and Co., brokers, 5½, Lawrence-lane, Cheapside.

(a) As to the liability of holders of bills of lading for claims arising under the stipulations of a charter-party, see Gray v. Carr (ante, p. 115); and McLean and another v. Fleming (ante, p. 160).—Ed.

In the course of the same month, the plaintiffs entered into an agreement with Claxton and Co. for the carriage of 149 packages of tea from London to St. John's at 17s. 6d. per ton and 5 per cent freight, payable at St. John, primage allowed. The sum payable under this agreement was 10l. 16s. 8d. less 5 per cent. primage. The tea was delivered out of bond and put on board the Alliance on the 1st March, a receipt being given to the dock company by the mate.

On the same day the plaintiffs presented to Claxton & Co. the bills of lading for the captain's signature.

On the 7th March, Claxton & Co. returned the bills of lading unsigned, inclosed in a letter, in which they stated that, owing to certain unfounded rumours, they were obliged to remove the Alliance from the berth, and that they would be glad if the plaintiffs would apply to Messrs. Dahll and Co., the agents for the ship, for the removal of their goods from the ship.

Thereupon the plaintiffs immediately applied to Dahll and Co. for information why the ship was not to sail, and requested their goods to be returned to them. And they were then informed that, in consequence of Claxton and Co. being unable to carry out the terms of their charter-party, the captain claimed a lien on the tea for expenses incurred through waiting for freight and bringing his ship into dock.

This was the first intimation received by the plaintiffs as to the existence of any charter-party affecting the ship. They at once made further inquiries, and learned that the ship was chartered to Claxton and Co. by a charter-party, dated the 27th Jan. 1870, which provided that the ship should, with all convenient speed, proceed to a safe loading place in the London Docks, and load afloat from the factors of the charterers a full and complete cargo of lawful merchandise, including lucifer matches, acids, and gunpowder, the freighters binding themselves not to ship more than she could reasonably stow away, and, being so loaded, should proceed to St. John, New Brunswick, and deliver the goods, on being paid freight as follows:—30s. British sterling per British register ton, five guineas gratuity in full of all port charges and pilotage. The freight to become due and paid in cash on unloading, and right delivery of the cargo. The charterer's responsibility to cease as soon as such difference as might exist between the freight payable by bills of lading at St. John, and the freight due to the vessel in virtue of the charter-party was paid, such difference to be paid the captain in cash on signing bills of lading. The captain to have an absolute lien on the cargo for freight, dead freight, and demurrage.

The captain, on being formally requested to sign the bills of lading, refused to do so except subject to the charter-party, and he also refused to deliver up the tea, claiming a lien on it for expenses. Thereupon, the plaintiffs instituted the present suit.

An interlocutory order was soon afterwards made in the suit that the tea should be removed to London docks and placed there in bond, in the joint names of the solicitors of both parties, to abide the result of the suit.

The cause now came on for hearing.

Sir Richard Baggallay, Q.C. and Marten for the plaintiff.—We submit that, as we had no notice of the charter-party, the defendants are not entitled to the lien which they claim. The present case, we submit, is governed by Paul v. Birch (2 Atk. 621), where it was held that where a factor makes an agreement for the hire of a ship with the master on his own account for a certain sum a month, and not on the part of the merchants, his principals, they are not liable, nor their goods put on board, to satisfy the master's demand, but they are liable to pay the factor for the cargo; and as he was bound by the charter-party, which gave the master a specific lien on the goods, he had a right to be paid in the first place. In Mitchell v. Scaife (4 Camp. 298), where a ship was chartered for a particular voyage for a gross sum by way of freight, and the captain signed bills of lading for the cargo (which was the property of and consigned to a third person), specifying a rate of freight amounting to a less sum than that mentioned in the charter-party, it was held that the shipowner had no lien on the cargo beyond the freight specified in the bills of lading. In Fry v. The Chartered Mercantile Bank of India, London, and China (14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 709; L. Rep. 1 C. P. 689), where a vessel was chartered to ship cotton to a certain place under a charter-party containing the stipulation, "the ship to have a lien on cargo for freight, 3l. 10s. per ton, payable on right delivery at the port of discharge;" the goods shipped fell short of a full cargo; the bill of lading of these goods stated "freight to be payable as per charter-party;" the rest of the cargo was shipped at a lower freight, and the defendants were indorsees for value of the bill of lading, and it was held that the plaintiffs (the owners of the vessel) had no lien on the goods for the whole amount of freight, and that the provision as to freight being payable as per charter-party only incorporated the charter-party as far as the rate of freight was concerned. In his judgment in that case, Montague Smith, J. said that "it would require very strong words to render the defendants liable for the freight, payable under the charter-party for the whole cargo." Here it would be impossible to hold the shippers' goods liable for the whole cargo, as they had no notice of the charter-party. They also referred to Southgate, Q.C., J. C. Mathew (of the Common Law Bar), and F. H. Colt for the defendants.—We contend that we are entitled to a lien on the goods in question for general freight. The plaintiffs knew that the ship was a foreign ship, and might have inferred that it was chartered. By the charter-party we were to have an absolute lien on the cargo for freight, dead freight, and demurrage. In McLean and Hope v. Fleming (L. Rep. 2 Sc. App. 123; ante, p. 160) dead freight is defined to be simply an unliquidated compensation recoverable by the shipowner from the freighter for deficiency of cargo. They also referred to

THE ACHILLES.

July 18.—Lord ROMILLY said that the case turned upon the question whether the plaintiffs had notice of the charter-party, and whether it was their duty to inquire whether there was a charter-party or not. Every person who had notice of a charter-party was bound by its contents, but until he had notice of the charter-party or was set upon inquiry, he was not bound. All that the plaintiffs knew in this case they learned from the advertisement, which would have led anyone to suppose that Messrs. Claxton and Co. were the agents of the owner of the ship, and not the charterers of the ship. True it was that the master could not enter into a fresh contract, but he was bound to sign a bill of lading as soon as he received the goods on board. He ought to have signed the bills "as per charter-party," and then the plaintiffs would have been put on inquiry as to the charter-party. How was a shipper to get notice of a charter-party except from the master on board the ship? It was the duty of the master to give that notice on signing the bill of lading. If the plaintiffs had been guilty of laches, they might have lost their claim to relief, but there was no such thing in this case; the moment they heard of the charter-party, they refused to be bound by it and demanded back their goods. No authority was produced to show that persons acting as the plaintiffs had done could be bound by a charter-party of which they had no notice at the time they put their goods on board. Of the cases cited the nearest to the present case was Small v. Moates (9 Bing. 574). But that was nothing more than this: the master on board the ship had goods which belonged to the owner; that is, the owner had a lien on them and the master chose to sell those goods and to treat them as if there was no lien on them at all; then the court had to consider which of two innocent parties was to suffer—whether the man who sold the goods as his own gave a good title to them, or whether he could only sell what he himself possessed, which was subject to the lien of the owner of the vessel. That did not govern the present case; there the judge said "that a shipper putting his goods on board the ship a general ship,"—which was the case here—"upon the faith of a bill of lading signed by a person whom the owner has allowed to bear the character of master, would be entitled to receive the goods at the end of the voyage upon payment of the freight reserved by the bill of lading, may be readily admitted, as well upon the reasonableness of the proposition itself as upon the authority of the cases referred to by the plaintiffs in the course of the argument." That merely showed that if the master had signed a bill of lading for these goods simpliciter, without any notice of the charter party the shippers would have been entitled to receive the goods at the end of the voyage upon the ordinary payment of freight. But, in the present case, the master had not done that, but had said that he would only sign the bills of lading subject to the charter-party. Could that bind a shipper who then heard of the charter party for the first time and refused to be bound by it? Why was the shipper under such circumstances not to have back his goods? He had entered into no contract, and the effect of holding him to be bound by the charter party would be to bind him by a contract into which he had not only not entered, but had refused to enter, and which was of a very onerous character, to be carried out by the owner and charterer, and of the existence of which he had had no previous intimation. His Lordship was of opinion that such a decision would not be according to equity. That was not the doctrine of notice in the courts of equity. The doctrine of those courts was that a man was bound by notice whenever he had either distinct notice, or such information as should set him on inquiry; and accordingly, in Small v. Moates (sup.), one of the persons was treated as having been set upon inquiry. But there was nothing in the present case to set the plaintiffs on inquiry; the advertisement was simply an advertisement of a general ship, with nothing about it to suggest such a thing as a charter-party. Therefore his Lordship was of opinion that the plaintiffs were not bound by the charter-party, as they had not received any bill of lading, and no transaction was completed between the parties, and as they knew nothing of the charter-party, and had no notice of it, and were not set on inquiry as to whether a charter-party existed or not.

Decree accordingly in the terms of the prayer of the bill.

THE ACHILLES.

Costs—Consent to a motion—Practice.

The court will not give the costs of appearing to consent to a motion where the party so appearing is not in any way prejudiced by the motion.

THIS was a suit instituted by the holders of a bottomry bond on the Achilles and her cargo against the cargo only.

The Achilles broke down on her voyage home, and her master chartered the Ellen Ashcourt to bring the cargo home. The Achilles and her cargo were subject to a bottomry bond. On the arrival of the Ellen Ashcourt at Liverpool the bondholders seized the cargo. The consignees refused to receive it, and thereupon the master of the Ellen Ashcourt discharged the cargo under the Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act (21 & 22 Vict. c. xcii), s. 166. The owners of the Ellen Ashcourt claimed a lien on the cargo for freight, and gave notice to the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board to detain it under sects. 193 and 194 of the same Act.

E. C. Clarkson now moved the court for an order to sell the cargo for the benefit of all parties, as the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board had no power to do so.

Bruce for the trustee in bankruptcy of the holders of the bill of lading consented, and claimed the costs of appearing on the motion.

Clarkson objected, as the sale was for the benefit of all, and the trustee of the holders of the bill of lading was not in any way prejudiced. He did not appear to oppose the motion, and need not have appeared at all.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—There is no practice of the court by which I can give Mr. Bruce his costs. The principle on which costs are awarded to a party appearing on a motion, is that he appears to protect his own interests from something in the motion which prejudices them, Here the motion is for the benefit of all parties, and nobody can be prejudiced. Mr. Bruce's clients could have communicated their consent to this motion without appearing in court. I cannot give costs here.

Collision—Objection to registrar's report—Motion for further evidence—Affidavits—Practice.

The court will not hear further evidence in objection to the registrar's report, unless the party making the application can satisfy the court that the further evidence could not, by proper diligence, have been produced before the registrar and merchants, or that they asked at the reference for an adjournment to produce it, and were refused.

The affidavit in support of a motion for leave to produce further evidence, where the object is to vary the evidence already given, should be clear and precise as to the witnesses it is proposed to call, and the nature of their testimony.

The affidavit of a witness, who is not tendered for cross-examination, and who deposes to a fact material to the inquiry before the registrar and merchants, should be filed before the hearing.

The adjournment of the hearing of the motion for the convenience of counsel does not preclude the parties making the motion from filing and using a further affidavit.

THIS was a motion for leave to adduce further evidence on the hearing of the objection to the registrar's report on the case. The Thuringia was a German steamer, bound for Hamburg, and on the 14th Oct., 1870 she ran into the English steamer, J. B. Watt, which was bound from Hamburg to West Hartlepool, in ballast. The collision took place about 18 miles north-west of Heligoland, and the master and crew of the J. B. Watt abandoned her, and went on board of the Thuringia. The Thuringia was arrested at the suit of the owners of the J. B. Watt, and the case was heard before the Judge of the Admiralty Court, and he found that the Thuringia was solely to blame, and referred the question of damages to the registrar and merchants. The case was heard before them, and the question at issue was whether the master and crew of the J. B. Watt were or were not justified in abandoning her after the collision, and on this question evidence was called on behalf of both plaintiffs and defendants. For the plaintiffs, the master, the chief officer, the carpenter, the boatswain, a seaman of the J. B. Watt, and a pilot who was on board of her as a passenger were called. The evidence of these witnesses went to show that the J. B. Watt was severely damaged by the collision, and that at the time they left her she was making water fast, and they all considered that it would have been unsafe to remain on board of her. The engineers of the J. B. Watt were not called. On behalf of the defendants, the chief mate, the second engineer, and the pilot of the Thuringia were called. They proved that there was a good deal of water in the hold, and that the boilers had a pressure of 80lbs. to the square inch, and that the donkey engine was not going, and that these things were called to the attention of the engineers of the J. B. Watt, and that thereupon the donkey engine was set going by them. As part of the defendants' proof, the registrar admitted an affidavit of M. Senez, a second captain in the French navy, who was not tendered for cross-examination. This affidavit was not filed before the hearing, but was produced at the opening of the defendant's case, no notice having been given that such evidence was going to be given. The affidavit was objected to on behalf of the plaintiffs, but was admitted by the registrar, who offered to adjourn the hearing to give the plaintiffs an opportunity of answering it, or of considering what course to pursue; as a matter of fact, the hearing was, at the end of the first day when this affidavit was produced, adjourned for a week. The plaintiffs did not accept the offer of adjournment, nor did they at the next hearing, or at any time, produce any evidence before the registrar to contradict the evidence of M. Senez. From his deposition it appeared that he was second in command of the French ship of war, L'Heroine, which was then cruising in company with the French fleet in the neighbourhood of Heligoland. Between two and three o'clock in the afternoon, owing to certain manœuvres which appeared suspicious on the part of a large steam vessel (which was the Thuringia), L'Heroine was ordered by the French Admiral to proceed towards her. The Thuringia steamed away, and he then observed the J. B. Watt, apparently damaged by a collision. He did not go on board, but saw the place where she had been damaged, and said that it was not below the water line, and that, although she was struck abaft the bridge, and was down in the water astern, she was not so in any extraordinary degree. L'Heroine remained for about twenty-five minutes near the J. B. Watt, and then steamed away again to rejoin the French fleet. He said he continued to watch the J. B. Watt, and that at half-past five o'clock, at which time they were twelve miles away from her, she was still afloat. He was not allowed to go on board, as his captain (now Admiral Bruat) thought the J. B. Watt might be in a sinking state. They returned to look for her the next day, but could not find her. He further stated that the weather was at the time very fine, the sea was calm, that there was hardly any wind, and that the same kind of weather continued during the night and the next day, and that the J. B. Watt was eighteen miles from Heligoland. A Captain Petley, R.N., was also called by the defendants to prove that, if the J. B. Watt had been got to Heligoland, she might have been run into shoal water, and temporarily repaired there. The defendants had no notice before the reference that this evidence would be given. On this evidence the registrar, on June 13th, reported that the master and crew of the J. B. Watt were not justified in abandoning her; that they had left the engines in a highly dangerous state for low pressure engines, and that she might have been got to Heligoland or some other place, and there temporarily repaired; and that, therefore, the owners of the Thuringia were only liable for the amount it would have cost to repair the J. B. Watt had she been taken into port, and that that amount was 2750*l.*; her value was about 15,000*l.* The report was filed on June 15. From this report the plaintiffs appealed, and now moved the court for leave to adduce further evidence on the hearing of the petition on objection. Two affidavits were filed; one, sworn by the plaintiff's proctor, was as follows:—

I, Henry Graham Stokes, of Doctors' Commons, proctor, make oath, and say as follows:

1. I am proctor for the plaintiff in this cause, and as such proctor I attended the reference before the registrar and merchants held in this cause.

2. The plaintiffs in this cause claimed to recover from the defendants as for a total loss of the steamer, J. B. Watt; but the registrar in his report has reported against the claim for a total loss, upon the ground that the J. B. Watt was improperly abandoned by the master and crew.

3. The evidence at the reference on the part of the plaintiffs was taken by the oral examination of witnesses. At the end of the plaintiffs' case, an information made by one M. Senez, an officer in the French navy on board a French frigate named L'Heroine, was tendered in evidence by the defendants. The defendants had not previously filed this affirmation, nor given any notice to the plaintiffs of their intention to tender any such evidence, nor had the plaintiffs any knowledge that any such evidence would be tendered. The admission of such affirmation was objected to by counsel for the plaintiff, but such affirmation was admitted by the registrar. I have perused the shorthand writer's notes of what took place on the occasion, and therefrom and from my own recollection I verily believe that no offer was made to adjourn the reference for the purpose of producing the said M. Senez for cross-examination; nor was it suggested by the defendants that they had it in their power to produce the said M. Senez, he not being within the jurisdiction of the court.

4. From the registrar's reasons annexed to his report, I verily believe that he attached great weight to the evidence of the said M. Senez, and in a great manner formed his opinion on the case therefrom.

5. From inquiries which I have caused to be made on the part of the plaintiff since the registrar made his report, I believe that if leave be given to the plaintiffs to adduce further evidence on the hearing of their petition in objection to the report, they will be able to adduce strong evidence showing that the said M. Senez formed the opinion expressed in his affirmation on erroneous and insufficient grounds, and showing that at the time when the said frigate L'Heroine fell in with the J. B. Watt, she (the said J. B. Watt) was in a sinking condition and incapable of being taken to Heligoland, or elsewhere.

6. I further say, that it was not until the hearing of the said reference that the plaintiffs had any notice or knowledge that the defendants were about to suggest that Heligoland was a place where the J. B. Watt could have been taken and temporarily repaired. From inquiries I have caused to be made since the said reference, I verily believe that if leave be given to the plaintiffs to advance further evidence, they will be able to prove that, even if the J. B. Watt could have been taken to Heligoland, there was no place there where she could have obtained shelter, and no place where or by means of which she could have been temporarily repaired, but on the contrary, that she must, if taken there, have been broken up.

7. I further say, that I have been informed and believe that the first and second engineers of the J. B. Watt were absent from this country on foreign voyages at the time of the said reference. They had been examined and cross-examined as witnesses at the hearing of the cause, but owing to their absence aforesaid, they having respectively left this country in the month of March, 1871, it was impossible to produce them at the reference. I believe that the plaintiffs will be able to avail themselves of the evidence of such engineers if such leave be given as aforesaid, and that their evidence will benefit the plaintiffs. I am further informed and believe that the registrar was in error in thinking that the engines of the J. B. Watt were low pressure engines.

8. I say that the plaintiffs are desirous that leave should be given to them to adduce further evidence upon the hearing of their said petition.

Sworn, &c.

H. G. STOKES.

Another affidavit was filed by the plaintiff, sworn by G. J. Hogg, the plaintiff's agent, who stated that he had gone to Heligoland after the reference, and had seen the harbour master there, who showed him a letter from Messrs. Pritchard and Sons, the defendants' proctors, asking him (the harbour master) to swear an affidavit to the effect that such a ship as the J. B. Watt, in the condition she was after the collision, could have been beached and repaired there, and inclosing an affidavit to that effect. From Mr. Hogg's affidavit, it appeared that the harbour master had refused to do this, and was of opinion that such a ship could only be put on shore there for the purpose of saving her cargo, and Mr. Hogg further affirmed that, from information received, he believed that it would have been impossible to have repaired the J. B. Watt at that place (a).

Butt, Q.C. for the plaintiffs, in support of the motion.—It is now the rule that further evidence is only admitted on good ground shown. The difference between the amount allowed and the amount of value is 12,000*l.* In an application to admit further evidence, the amount is of importance when it is remembered that the parties appear before the registrar without pleading or particulars. We did not know certain facts on which they relied, which we should have known if there had been pleadings. The evidence that the ship might have been taken to Heligoland and beached took us by surprise. We wish to show the impossibility of this. We knew nothing with respect to the excessive steam pressure on the boilers. The registrar assumed that they were low pressure engines, whilst they were not. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Did you make any application to the registrar and merchants to adjourn or to hear evidence on these points?] We had no reason to disbelieve the evidence there given, but we have since found it to be untrue, and our affidavits set this out. The affidavit of M. Senez ought not to have been admitted. He ought to have been produced for cross-examination. We wish to produce further evidence to show the state of the J. B. Watt when L'Heroine came up. The report seems to find that the engineers neglected their duty in leaving the engines as they did, and we wish to call evidence to show how this really was. We had no knowledge of any charge against the engineers. Our case was, that the injury to the ship's bottom was such that she must have gone down before we could have got into a place of safety. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—If you had made any application for adjournment, I should go a long way with you. I object to the system of going before the registrar and not applying at the time; letting everything be finished and then objecting to the report and trying to get in fresh evidence. I always require very strong affidavits showing why the evidence was not produced at the hearing.] We are entitled to great indulgence, on the ground that we had no means of knowing the issue that they were about to raise.

(a) Sir John Karlake objected to this affidavit being received at all, on the ground that the hearing of this motion had been originally fixed for Tuesday, Nov. 28th, and was only postponed for convenience of counsel, and this affidavit had been filed since (on Friday, Dec. 1st). It is not right practice that, after a motion has stood over which would have been heard but for the absence of counsel, that a fresh affidavit should be filed.

Butt, Q.C. contra.—The defendants would have been in no worse position if the motion had stood in to-day's paper. The affidavit would then have been admissible, and a mere adjournment cannot affect the question. The practice in this court usually is, that notice of motion is given and then the affidavit is filed.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I think I must admit this affidavit, subject to all objections to the affidavit itself, and subject also to any postponement which Sir John Karlake may require to answer it.

Clarkson, on the same side.—The report finds that she could have been taken to Heligoland, and when there could have been beached and repaired. If we were surprised on one or both of these questions we are entitled to a further hearing. Senez' affidavit, should have been filed in the usual way before hearing. It is a serious thing to ask for an adjournment. If the affidavit had been duly filed we could have communicated with the other French officers on board L'Heroine. It is material to see how she could have been repaired at Heligoland. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The great difficulty in the way of your application is this; the issue before the registrar was whether your crew was justified in abandoning the vessel; notice was given to you that you must produce the evidence of all those persons knowing anything about the navigation of the ship. No application was made for adjournment. You do not appeal on the ground that the registrar was wrong on the facts which he finds, but that there is further evidence behind. There must be some strict practice on this point. I have always held that further evidence shall not be admitted unless it can be shown that it could not have been produced at the hearing below, or that you had no means of getting it at the time.] The evidence shows that the only means of repairing was by beaching, and this was impossible, as we are prepared to show. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The registrar did not refuse to adjourn, nor did he improperly admit or refuse evidence.] I objected to Senez' evidence being admitted, and this put it on the other side to offer to produce him, and not upon me to ask for an adjournment to produce him. If we can prove by further evidence that the ship was sinking, it would be a miscarriage of justice to refuse to admit the evidence. If we ought to have produced this evidence at the reference, it is now only a question of costs.

Sir J. Karlake, Q.C., for the defendants.—The rule as to surprise in the common law courts is, that to get a new trial it must be shown that the side applying did not know and had no means of knowing facts which were given in evidence for the first time at the trial. Senez' statement was read the first day, and the plaintiffs should have applied for time to answer it. The fact as to beaching was no surprise; it was cross-examined to. The engineers were examined at the hearing of the principal cause, and ought to have been before the registrar. Surprise does not mean the not seeing the necessity of keeping witnesses in England. There is no information in the affidavit of Stokes to show that they can alter the effect of Senez' evidence. They knew that we were going to prove that she could have been saved if she had not been abandoned. She must have been taken ashore to be saved. It is a first principle that, when a case is tried upon a particular issue, and without any imputation of unfairness, it was not right to come afterwards and say there is a further evidence, and a consequent right to a fresh hearing.

W. G. F. Phillimore on the same side.—The nature of the defence must have been known to the plaintiffs. We are not bound to file Senez' affidavit before the plaintiffs' witnesses had been cross-examined. It was put in as soon as our case was begun.

Clarkson, in reply.—It is a standing rule in this court that a party may call upon the other side to produce a witness, who has made an affidavit, for cross-examination. The report finds facts on improper evidence, and we may fairly say we were taken by surprise.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is an application to the court in the case of an objection to the report of the registrar, assisted by merchants, to allow the admission of fresh evidence on an appeal from that report. That the court has power to admit fresh evidence is unquestionable since the decision of the Privy Council (see The Flying Fish, B. & L. 436, 442; 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 619), but nevertheless it is a power which the court ought in my judgment to exercise with great caution, and I think I do not go too far in saying, with great reluctance. It certainly is for the interests of justice that no person should be deprived, by reason of surprise, of the means of making a fair and just statement of his case; but it is no less for the interests of justice that no person should be enabled, after having gone to a fair trial, to patch up the defects which that trial has disclosed in his case by new evidence before another tribunal. It is manifest that there is no door more widely open than that which I have mentioned. In this case the application to the court is founded on an affidavit which, though it does not expressly use the term "surprise," contains averments from which the court is to infer that upon material points upon which the decision of the court below turned, the plaintiffs at the reference were surprised, and that therefore they were unable to state their case as fairly and fully as they otherwise would have been enabled to do. One of the first questions which every court of justice must look to in an application of this kind is the question of dates. I find, upon referring to the minutes, that the decision of the registrar, assisted by merchants, took place in June, and that the registrar's report was filed on the 15th of that month. No application is made to the court till the middle of November for the introduction of new evidence, and that is a circumstance of light materiality in determining the judgment of the court. Turning to the affidavit to which I have referred, it is stated that at the end of the plaintiff's case an affirmation made by one M. Senez, an officer in the French navy, on board a French frigate called L'Heroine, was tendered in evidence by the defendants, and that the defendants had not previously filed this statement or affirmation, or given any notice to the plaintiffs of the production of any such evidence. The reception of this affirmation in evidence by the registrar is now made a ground for the introduction of further evidence. It appears now, from the statement of counsel, and from the evidence before the court, that it was correctly stated that the affirmation of M. Senez was not filed before the hearing of the cause before the registrar and merchants, and it should have been so filed, I think. I think, also, that it is impossible to read the report of the registrar without seeing that he attached weight, and in some degree founded his report on the evidence of M. Senez. Now M. Senez was an officer in the French navy, under the command of Admiral Bruat at the time, and his evidence went, in effect, to this—that he came up to the J. B. Watt after the collision, and that in his opinion when he so came up the appearance of the vessel was such as to lead him to think that she was not in a sinking state at the time, and might have been saved. Inasmuch as the main issue submitted to the registrar and merchants was whether or not the crew were, in the circumstances of the case, justified in abandoning their vessel as they did immediately after the collision, it cannot be denied that this is an affidavit of importance; and unquestionably, if the plaintiffs had made any application to the registrar and merchants that they might have had any opportunity of cross-examining the maker of the affidavit, or if they had made an application for an adjournment in order that they might have time to consider what course to pursue, and such application had been refused, I should have no hesitation whatever in granting the present motion. But no such application was made. On the contrary, the registrar informs me that he offered the parties to have an adjournment for the purpose of considering what course they would pursue, and that that offer was rejected. As a matter of fact, it appears that after the introduction of this affidavit there was an adjournment for a whole week, and that this affidavit of M. Senez was brought to the attention of the opposite side, not indeed two or three days before, or one day before the reference, as it ought to have been strictly speaking, but still on the day upon which the reference was first heard. I do not find in the affidavit of Mr. Stokes that there is that amount of precise statement which the court requires on a point of this description. The language of the affidavit is very vague in a case where it ought to be as precise as possible. It states that the plaintiffs will be able to adduce strong evidence showing that M. Senez formed his opinion on erroneous grounds, but it does not state with the amount of precision requisite the witnesses who are to be brought forward to show this, nor does it in any way indicate the nature of their evidence with regard to this point; it should also be remembered that the registrar did not form his opinion on M. Senez' evidence alone. The second point urged by the plaintiffs is, that they had no notice that the defendants were about to suggest that Heligoland was a place where the J. B. Watt could have been taken and temporarily repaired; and again, that is stated in the vaguest possible manner on the affidavit. Now there is, I think, some mistake in the argument of counsel on this point. I cannot discover in any part of the registrar's finding any statement that the vessel must necessarily have been taken to Heligoland in order to be beached, which seems to have been assumed throughout the whole of the arguments which have been addressed to me. The statement is, that she might have been taken to Heligoland, which was distant, I think, about eighteen miles, and that there proper measures might have been taken by which the leak might have been stopped, so as to have enabled her to go on to another port, where permanent repairs might have been effected. A third point was taken, that the opinion of the registrar and merchants was partly founded on the evidence of the engineer and other witnesses from the Thuringia, and that the first and second engineers of the J. B. Watt, although examined in the principal cause when heard before this court, were absent from this country on foreign service at the time of the reference, and that it was impossible to call them, I have already said that the main issue which the parties knew they had to meet before the registrar and merchants was, whether or not the crew of the J. B. Watt were or were not justified in leaving her directly after the collision; and it is impossible to entertain the slightest doubt that the knowledge of the nature of the issue must have admonished those who had to prove the negative, that the most important witnesses they could adduce would be the engineers; and it cannot avail now on an application for the introduction of new evidence to say, if we had known that reliance could have been placed on the examination of the engineers as to the state of the low pressure and the general machinery of the ship, we should have produced the absent witnesses, and we now ask leave to produce them in the Court of Appeal, because we believe that we shall be able to avail ourselves of the evidence. On the whole, I am satisfied, looking to all the circumstances, that the court ought not to admit the introduction of fresh evidence on the ground of surprise, which is in reality the ground on which the application is founded in this case. I am of opinion that the applicants have not brought themselves within the conditions of the rule which I have determined to observe in all applications of this description, namely, that they must satisfy the court that the evidence which they now seek to introduce, could not, by proper diligence and by proper application, have been produced in the court below. I must, therefore, reject this application with costs, but I think it right to say that this is a matter in which, if you ask for leave to appeal, I will grant it.

Collision—Measure of damages—Demurrage—Time and rate—Reference to registrar and merchants—Objection to registrar's report.

In a cause of limitation of liability arising out of a collision, where, the fund in court being insufficient to satisfy the claims against it, a reference has been made to the registrar and merchants to assess the damages as to time and rate, the court will review the registrar's report and correct it, if it should appear that any portions of the report are founded on what the court deems to be an erroneous view of the evidence.

Demurrage is allowed to the owners of a ship damaged by collision during the time that she has been necessarily delayed for the purpose of effecting the repairs rendered requisite by the collision, and of transacting business unquestionably connected with the collision.

As the master has, in some circumstances, the duty cast upon him of acting as agent for the cargo as well as the ship, the making a protest and obtaining the necessary official documents in a foreign port relating to the damage done to both ship and cargo is business unquestionably connected with the collision. Delay in their preparation caused by the dilatoriness of the foreign authorities, and by no default of the master, is chargeable to the collision.

Quere, whether trans-shipment and forwarding of cargo can be said to be business connected with the collision.

The usual rate of demurrage allowed to steam vessels of the ordinary class, carrying cargo, is 6d. per ton on the gross tonnage, or 9d. per ton on the net tonnage, per day. This estimate is arrived at by doubling the amount of the wages of the crew and of the cost of their provisions, so as to include both expenditure and loss of trade.

THIS was an objection to the registrar's further report in this cause. The suit arose out of a collision which took place at the island of St. Vincent between the British steamship, the City of Buenos Ayres, and the North German steamship, Bismarck, of Hamburg. The owners of the City of Buenos Ayres admitted their liability, and instituted a suit to obtain a limitation of the amount, and paid into court the sum of 10,514*l.*, being at the rate of 8*l.* per ton on the registered tonnage of the vessel, with interest up to the date of such payment. Two sets of claimants appeared, namely, the owners, master, and crew of the Bismarck, and the owners of the cargo on board her. The court thereupon, as the amount paid in was insufficient to satisfy both claims, referred the question to the registrar and merchants to decide the proportion in which each claim should be paid. The evidence before the registrar and merchants, on which the first report was based, was entirely documentary evidence. The protest, which was made before the North German consul at Rio de Janeiro on 4th June 1869, contained an extract of the log of the Bismarck. From this extract, it appeared that on 30th Nov. 1868 the Bismarck, bound on a voyage from Glasgow to the Cape of Good Hope, moved out into Glasgow roads and took on board some powder. On 1st Dec. she went to sea in good order, with her cargo well stored, and with her coals on board. After landing her channel pilot at Queenstown, she proceeded on her voyage until 10th Dec., when a fire was discovered in her coal bunkers. The powder was then thrown overboard, and by the use of the steam pump, the fire was mastered and apparently extinguished. On 16th Dec. the coals again commenced to burn, and were again extinguished by the steam pump, and some coals were taken out of the bunkers. On 19th Dec. the Bismarck cast anchor at about 6 p.m. in the roads of Porto Grande, St. Vincent, and about 9 p.m. on the same evening she was run into and was very seriously damaged by the City of Buenos Ayres. As the vessel was fast making water, and there was a fear that she would sink in deep water, the pumps were set to work, and were kept going all night; and on the following morning the ship was got under steam into shallow water, whereupon the dry portion of the cargo was discharged. The master of the Bismarck at once went ashore to enter a protest against the City of Buenos Ayres, but could obtain no security either from the English Consul or from the Portuguese authorities, and that steamer left St. Vincent. On 22nd Dec. a survey was held on board the Bismarck; the steam pump was continued at work without intermission; the discharge of the cargo and of the coals to the amount of 115½ tons, went on, and attempts were made to stop the leak, but without success. On 28th Dec., a second survey was held on board, and in consequence a diver was sent down, and he discovered that the hole in the ship's side went down 8ft. under the water line. After continued efforts to stop the leak, and to lessen the water in her by pumping, on 5th Jan. the ship was given a list to starboard in order to raise the leak better out of the water, and the boiler smiths began at the repairs from the outside. On 16th Jan., whilst the repairs still went on, the captain, the first and second officers, and the first and second engineers, went on shore to note a protest prepared by a notary. On 18th Jan. the ship was hove further over to starboard by means of filled water casks, to which on 22nd Jan. were added three boats filled with water in order to enable the smiths to reach the lowest plates. On 29th Jan. the boiler makers had finished the plates outside but, according to the protest, it was not possible for them to cover the lowest part of the cut with plates, and that part was stopped as well as possible from the inside with sacks and wood. The ship was then tight, and the fires in the boilers were allowed to go out, and the pumps to stand. Thereupon the ship was cleaned, and on 1st Feb. a survey was held by a boiler maker and the commanders of two Brazilian steamers, who reported to the captain of the port, that the ship was repaired as far as the means at that port would admit, but that as the lower part of the repairs had been effected under water, they could not have been sufficiently complete to warrant the reloading of the vessel with her cargo; they therefore recommend that she should be sent to a port in Europe for permanent repairs, and the cargo forwarded to its destination by some other vessel; they further suggested that a short trial of the engines should be made in order to test if any damage had been sustained by them in the collision. The trial trip did not take place until 14th Feb. and, according to the protest, "the intermediate time was used to caulk the deck and take in coals." The trial trip took place in the presence of appointed surveyors, who found that the repaired side of the ship made much water, and, therefore recommended that the ship should not go to a European port, but should go to Rio de Janeiro there to effect the necessary repairs. The Bremen three-masted schooner Willy was, thereupon chartered to take on to the Cape of Good Hope the undamaged part of the cargo, and on 16th March the Bismarck put to sea for Rio de Janeiro, being, according to the surveyors, in a sufficient seaworthy state for this voyage, and arrived there in safety on 30th March.

On 31st March she was surveyed, and after stating the damage the surveyors recommended "that the ballast and coal be discharged and the steamer put in dry dock, and another survey held when in dock; that before going into dock she should make a trip in this harbour for the purpose of examining the working of her machinery, it being, nevertheless, understood that the machinery has to be re-examined after the steamer leaving the dock." On 3rd April a survey was held on the machinery, and the surveyors reported that they "have this day inspected the machinery of the said steamer while under steam, and found it working satisfactorily, but, nevertheless, are of opinion that the said machinery should have a thorough overhaul after leaving the dock." On 9th April the steamer being then in dry dock, a survey was held and certain repairs were ordered, in order "to make the steamer in as good condition as she was before the accident," and amongst other things that "the hull of the steamer be thoroughly cleaned and painted with three coats of red metallic oxide, the floorings to be taken up for examining the bulkhead." On 28th April another survey was held, the vessel being still in dry dock, and the surveyors inspected the watertight compartments, and reported that "some leaks were perceptible in the bulkheads, only the sides of the vessel being perfectly watertight; that the inside painting of the hull has been destroyed by the salt water that remained in it a long time at St. Vincent, and also by the repairs that have been requisite," and they recommended that "the inside of the hull and bulkheads be well cleaned and painted with red metallic oxide." On 29th April the vessel left the dry dock. On 8th May surveyors inspected the machinery, and recommended some repairs to the clutch coupling at the end of the shaft, and further, that "the donkey pumping engine will require a thorough repair, as it has been working night and day to keep the water out of her as much as possible the whole time the vessel was at St. Vincent, as also on her passage to Rio de Janeiro, and the working parts are much worn, and one of the cocks broken." All these surveys at St. Vincent were signed by the surveyors on the days on which they were held, but on each of them appeared the following endorsement:

The above survey took place in our presence, and the signatures of the experts (here are the names of the various surveyors) are genuine and written with their own hands. Otherwise without prejudice as to the extent and liability of the insurance.

Rio de Janeiro, May 21, 1869.

Agent to the Hamburg Underwriters.

On 31st May a further survey was held, and the surveyors reported:—"We found her under steam with engines ready to work; having set same at work, while at anchor, ahead and astern, found same in good state and condition. Examining from the exterior accessible parts of the bottom, we found that some parts were denuded of paint, while since the ship came out of dock, the whole, by lying in the lively and warm water of the harbour to complete the repairs, has become sufficiently dirty for the said bottom to be recleaned and repainted." On 3rd June she was finally surveyed, and it was reported that "the vessel is in perfect condition to undertake any voyage to Europe." These last two surveys were also signed by the surveyors on the dates of the surveys, and had on them an endorsement similar to the one already set out, but dated 10th June. The Bismarck sailed for Hamburg on 19th June with a valuable cargo shipped at Rio. The registrar and merchants had before them all the accounts and vouchers relating to the expenses incurred.

On 1st July 1870, the registrar made his first report, and found that the expenses incurred in consequence of the collision, and the demurrage due together, amounted to 8205*l.* As to the demurrage, which was afterwards the only question contested, the registrar reported that, as the Bismarck would have been delayed at St. Vincent in consequence of the fire among her coals, and would have taken till the end of January to proceed to her ports of destination, demurrage did not begin to run until 1st Feb.; that the repairs were completed at Rio de Janeiro on 8th May; that the further surveys were only to fit her for her homeward voyage; that three days more were to be allowed for necessary work on coming out of dock, and he thereupon found that 100 days was the time during which the owners of the Bismarck could claim demurrage. As to the rate at which demurrage was allowed he reported, that the usual rate was 6*d.* per ton on the gross tonnage of a vessel, or 9*d.* per ton on the net tonnage; that it was an ample allowance in the present case as appeared from an account filed of the wages of the crew, numbering twenty-four hands; their wages amounted to 12*l.* per month; the cost of provisioning them at 1*s.* 6*d.* per head would be 36*s.* per day, or say 2*l.* per day, or 60*l.* a month; so that the cost of the wages and provisions of the crew would be about 180*l.* per month, and as the amount allowed for demurrage at 12*l.* 10*s.* per day would be 375*l.* per month, this would leave 200*l.* a month to cover interest in capital, wear and tear, which would of course be trifling whilst the vessel was lying in harbour and undergoing repairs; this made the total sum allowed for demurrage 1250*l.* for the period of 100 days.

From this report the owners of the Bismarck appealed and in the particulars of objection filed by them in pursuance of an order of the judge, they objected, amongst other things, to the rate of demurrage allowed; first because 1*s.* per ton is the usual and proper rate allowed to vessels of the description of the Bismarck; secondly, thirdly, and fourthly, because 12*l.* 10*s.* per day was an inadequate sum, and only just covered daily cost and not interest on capital and wear and tear, and, fifthly, because St. Vincent and Rio de Janeiro were especially expensive ports and the cost of maintaining the crew there was unusually large; to the reduction of the number of days for which demurrage ran they objected, first, because, admitting that some deduction should be made for the time which the Bismarck would have taken to sail from St. Vincent to her ports of destination, forty-three days was an excessive deduction; secondly, because twenty-one days was sufficient deduction; thirdly and fourthly, because the Bismarck was not ready for sea on 8th or 11th May, but on 4th June; fifthly, because demurrage should have been allowed from 19th Dec. to 4th June, deducting only twenty-one days.

These objections were argued before the court and the report was confirmed in all respects, except so far as it related to the plaintiff's claim for demurrage, and as regards that part of the report, the court, without expressing any opinion, referred it back to the registrar and merchants, with liberty to hear fresh evidence and with an express direction that the registrar should be at liberty to award in respect of the claim for demurrage a less or a larger sum than had been awarded in the first report.

On the further evidence three witnesses were called. The first witness was Mr. Edward Leopold Avis, a provision merchant in the city of London; he stated that he had been in business for twenty-eight or thirty years, and that he had a general knowledge of the price of provisions all over the world, and that he supplied provisions to ships sailing to all parts; that the cost of provisioning ordinary seamen in the port of London for the last three years was from 13*d.* to 15*d.* per head per day, for common seamen, and for officers from 3*s.* to 3*s.* 6*d.*; that the expense of provisioning ships at St. Vincent is much more expensive than in London as everything has to be imported and nothing is produced there, except vegetables and sugar; that at Rio de Janeiro the cost of ship's provisions was dearer still, owing to heavy import duty; that all salt provisions were imported; that fresh beef and vegetables were the only native products available; that at St. Vincent the cost would be twice, at Rio three times, that of provisions in London that German crews cost less than English to provision, as they require less meat, and eat more farinaceous food; that his evidence as to the cost of ship's provisions referred to salt beef, and that he had no knowledge that there were large stores of wild cattle running wild at St. Vincent; that the cost of fresh beef at Rio was as he had been informed from 6*d.* to 8*d.* per lb., but that he knew nothing of the price at St. Vincent, except that fresh beef would be somewhat dearer at Rio than at St. Vincent on account of the mode of trade.

The second witness was Wilhelm Lauer, the master of a German vessel of about 1000 tons burden. He stated that he had never been at St. Vincent, but often at Rio; that in 1868 he was at Rio with his ship for three months; that he usually laid in his ship's stores (not fresh stores) at Bremen, where the prices were about the same as in London; that at Rio everything is dearer than in England, including fresh stores; that the price of fresh meat at Rio depends on the season of the year, it being in the dry season sometimes double the price it is in the wet season; that the wet season is from April to October; that during that time fresh meat is cheaper than in England or at Bremen; that the price of salt meat at Rio is about double that in London; that the cost of provisioning a ship at Rio for a German crew would be about double that in London; that the cost of provisioning the officers, including the master when at sea, would be about double that of a common seaman; that by the German law a master is bound to give his men fresh meat twice a week whilst in port; that the cost of fresh meat at Rio was about the same as the cost of salt meat at Rio; that biscuit at Rio was double what it is at Bremen.

The third witness called was Constant Staevens, who was the managing clerk to Messrs. Lippert and Co., the owners of the Bismarck, and he stated that he was sent out by that firm to St. Vincent, when the news came of the collision; that he arrived at St. Vincent on the 14th Feb. 1869; that he had bought the Bismarck for her owners at Glasgow, and had fitted her out, and that her total cost was 13,500*l.*; that she was fitted out to trade on the coast of South Africa, Cape Colony, and up to Port Natal, and to the Mauritius eventually, because it was in negotiation to have a mail contract from the Mauritius to Port Natal which she got later, and carried out until the French and German war began; that she sailed from Glasgow with 230 tons on board, her tonnage being 497 tons; that he took this cargo at low rates of freight as she was obliged to go out for the local trade, and they were willing to take any rates rather than go in ballast; that the freights paid were from 30*s.* to 60*s.*, mostly about 35*s.*, instead of 80*s.* per ton, the usual rate; that it was intended, when the ship sailed, that she should put in at St. Vincent for coals; that arrangements had been made with the firm of Messrs. Miller and Son, of Bristol, that their firm at St. Vincent should supply the ship with coals; that the Bismarck put into St. Vincent in pursuance of this arrangement; that it never took more than twenty-four hours to coal a steamer at St. Vincent; that he chartered the schooner Willy to take on the cargo on 20th Feb. 1869, but that it took about three weeks after this date to get the cargo ready and on board the Willy; that the delay at St. Vincent from 1st Feb. to 16th March was, first, for the purpose of making the ship as safe as possible for her journey to Rio; secondly, to get the Bismarck's documents properly drawn up as required by the local authorities and by the law that refers to such average cases; thirdly, to enable the master to provide for the cargo as in duty bound; to get the damaged parts of the cargo put to rights as far as possible, and to discharge the duties he had undertaken by signing bills of lading at Glasgow; that the accommodation for reloading the cargo was very bad; that they stayed at St. Vincent about five days after the Willy sailed; that his orders were to get away as soon as possible, and that every possible exertion was made to get away; that they were obliged to buy stores at St. Vincent or they would have been starving several times, and they were nearly starving; that steamers calling there had only got their own amount of provisions; that there were no cattle on the island of St. Vincent, but only on the island of Antonio, about seven miles distant, and that there was an occasional steamer trading between the islands; that they had three months' ship's stores on board; that they bought stores for three weeks at St. Vincent for the voyage to Rio; that expenses were much heavier than in London; that there was very little fresh meat; that the cost of provisioning a common seaman in Europe would be about 1*s.* 6*d.* per day, and for an officer three or four times as much; that he sailed to Rio de Janeiro with the Bismarck; that he was present at all the surveys held there; that they got the steamer out of dry dock as soon as they could; that the surveyors would not look at the engines in the dry dock; that they only did such repairs in dry dock as could not be done elsewhere, as they were anxious to save the rent of the dock; that from 27th April to 8th May repairs were still going on; that everything was done as the surveyors recommended, and as quickly as possible; that no cargo was engaged for her at Rio until 6th June, and none shipped until 8th June, and that she was not chartered; that the time between 8th May and 31st May was entirely taken up by the repairs to her engines; that the cost of provisions at Rio in some cases is two or three times that in London and Hamburg; that the Bismarck took on board about five weeks' provision at Rio for the voyage to Hamburg; that if there had been no collision she would have taken twenty-one days to go to the Cape of Good Hope, one day at the Cape, three days to Port Elizabeth from the Cape, one day there, three days from Port Elizabeth to Natal, and two days there; that the documents prepared at St. Vincent were so prepared by orders of the master, and that the delay with regard to them was owing to the want of persons competent to prepare them, and to the Portuguese authorities requiring so many forms to be gone through, and being very dilatory.

In addition to this evidence, the documents above referred to were produced at the reference. First, a protest entered into by the master, first and second officers, first and second engineers, and the carpenter of the Bismarck, relating to the collision: the proceedings relating to this document began on 24th Dec. 1868, and finished on 1st Feb. 1869, but the master did not obtain a certified copy from the notary until 9th March 1869; secondly, a public form of civil inspection of the cargo ordered by the Court of the Island of St. Vincent on the petition of the master of the Bismarck; the proceedings connected with this document began on 31st Dec. 1868, and were concluded on 13th Jan. 1869, but the master did not obtain a certified copy until 11th March 1869; thirdly, a public form of civil inspection of another portion of the cargo ordered by the above court on the petition of the master; the proceedings in connection with this document began on 22nd Jan. 1869, and were concluded on 3rd Feb. 1869, but the master did not get a certified copy until 11th March 1869; fourthly, a protest, entered into by the same persons as the first protest, with reference to the coals damaged by fire on the voyage from Glasgow to St. Vincent; the proceedings with reference to this protest began on 21st Dec. 1868, and were concluded on 1st Feb. 1869, but a copy was not supplied by the notary till 10th March 1869; fifthly, a copy of civil proceedings instituted at St. Vincent against the City of Buenos Ayres, to recover damages for the collision, commenced on 16th Feb. 1869, and concluded, on the non-appearance of the defendants, 4th March 1869; a notarial copy was furnished on 8th March 1869; sixthly, a copy of civil proceedings of inspection instituted in the court by Millers and Nephew for the appointment of surveyors to report on the possibility of repairing the ship at St. Vincent; these proceedings were commenced on 14th Jan. 1869, and on 15th Jan. the surveyors appointed reported that it was not possible to institute thorough repairs at St. Vincent, but only a temporary repair to enable her to proceed to some other port where she might be thoroughly repaired, and the proceedings were concluded on 20th Jan. 1868; and seventhly, a similar document as to the reports of the later surveys held at St. Vincent, from which it appeared that proceedings were begun on 27th Feb. 1869, that, on 4th March the surveyors reported the extent of the damage done, and that the proceedings were concluded 8th March; notarial copies of these two documents were furnished to the captains on 9th March 1869, and it appeared from the notaries' verification that there was only one notary in the island; and ninthly, an account sent in by Miller and Nephew to the master of the Bismarck, from which it appeared that they had supplied 24 live sheep, at the price of 91,200 reis (about 21l. 5s. 8d.), and 1723lb. of fresh beef at 241,220 reis (about 56l. 5s. 10d., or 7s. 41d. per lb.), and other provisions, which had been chiefly purchased from ships lying in the harbour. The defendants produced no evidence, but at the reference the registrar produced and read in the presence of both parties two letters which are set out in his report.

The further report was made on 8th July 1871 and the registrar, after stating the way in which the case had come before him, and disposing of certain preliminary questions, set out the evidence as appearing from the various documents, and then proceeded as follows:—

“The question that we have to consider is, what portion of the time between the vessel's arrival at St. Vincent, on 19th Dec. 1868, and her departure from Rio on 19th June 1869, is properly chargeable to the collision. Now the first point to be observed is, that on the voyage to St. Vincent, and previous to her arrival at that place, fire had twice broken out amongst the coals, first on 10th Dec. and again on the 16th of that month; and although the crew ultimately succeeded in getting the mastery over the fire, it is idle to suppose that they would have continued their voyage from St. Vincent without a thorough overhaul of the vessel, and without discharging the whole of the coals, if not a portion of the cargo, in order to ascertain the origin of the fire. That this would have taken some time to effect, is apparent from the length of time which seems to have been required to discharge the coals and cargo after the accident, when they had every inducement to employ the greatest expedition in order to save the cargo from being damaged; they had also the assistance of the crew of a Russian frigate, which was in port at the time. Looking at all the circumstances of the case, we think that, even had there been no collision at all, the vessel could hardly have discharged her coals, overhauled the cargo, and replenished her stock of coals, and have been again prepared to pursue her voyage under five days. The collision occurred within three hours of her arrival at St. Vincent; so that there would have been five days, during which she would have been necessarily detained at St. Vincent, and which cannot be charged to the collision.

“Secondly, it will be seen from the manifest of the Bismarck's cargo, which is the last document in the printed appendix, that the vessel was originally destined to the Cape of Good Hope, Port Elizabeth, and Port Natal, rather less than one fourth of the freight being payable in respect of goods to be carried to the Cape of Good Hope, about the same amount for those to Port Elizabeth, and rather more than half the freight for the cargo which was to be landed at Port Natal. As has before been stated, when it was ascertained that the vessel could not continue her voyage, the damaged portion of the cargo was sold, and the undamaged portion was put on board a vessel called the Willy, which had been hired expressly for the purpose of carrying it to its destination, and thus enabling the owners of the Bismarck to claim the freight. And as, in addition to the freight which they have received, they have been allowed for any loss they may have sustained in respect of the damaged goods, together with the whole cost of trans-shipping the remainder of the cargo, and of the hire of the schooner Willy, it follows that a deduction must be made from the demurrage for the time which would probably have been required to complete the voyage to the three above-named ports, and to there discharge the cargo. Objection was at first taken to any deduction on this account, but it is so clear that, if the claimant gets the full freight, which he would have earned had no collision taken place, he must allow for the time during which he would have been employed in earning that freight, that it seems strange that the point should ever have been contested; ultimately, however, the objection was withdrawn. Now, according to the evidence of Mr. Staevens, it would have taken the vessel from twenty to twenty-one days to get from St. Vincent to the Cape of Good Hope; he allowed one day to discharge cargo there, three days from the Cape to Port Elizabeth, one day discharging there, three days thence to Port Natal, and two days discharging at that port. In all, then, he allows from thirty to thirty-one days to complete the voyage from St. Vincent; and it will probably not be thought that the time is at all too long, when it is remembered that the Cape is above 5000 miles from St. Vincent, and Natal nearly 1200 miles from the Cape, and that she had to discharge cargo at three different ports. We shall, therefore, deduct thirty-one days on this account. Mr. Phillimore contended that some allowance must be made, on account of the freight which it is thought she might possibly have earned for cargo, which she might have taken in at the Cape or at Port Elizabeth. No evidence, however, was given that she would have obtained any such cargo, or as to the amount of freight which she would thereby have earned, so that it was impossible to form even a 'conjectural estimate' on this point. It is also not to be forgotten, that if she had taken in cargo either at the Cape or at Port Elizabeth, it is probable that she would have been detained somewhat longer at those places than has been allowed for. On the whole, we think that thirty-one days would be a fair allowance to make for the completion of the voyage and the discharge of the cargo, and that period must, therefore, be deducted from the time for demurrage.

"And now we come to a very important question, namely, whether any, and, if so, what amount of time was wasted at St. Vincent, and whether the ship could by reasonable diligence have sailed from St. Vincent at an earlier period than she did; if so, and that this time was not necessarily required for the repair of the damages sustained by the vessel in the collision, it is clear that the plaintiffs cannot claim, as against the defendants, the time that has been so wasted. It must not be forgotten, that all that was done at St. Vincent was to discharge the coals and the cargo, and to do certain temporary repairs to the vessel, sufficient to enable her to get to some port where the permanent repairs could be effected. On the other hand, we must remember that St. Vincent is an open roadstead, that, therefore it could hardly be expected that repairs could be performed as expeditiously there as at a port where there were docks and other facilities for the purpose. The coals and cargo were, it seems, discharged by the 28th Dec., and without examining too minutely whether the subsequent repairs were as expeditiously performed as they might have been, we find from the survey and protest, that on the 1st Feb. the temporary repairs have been completed, sufficient to enable her to proceed to a port for the purpose of having the permanent repairs done; but that the surveyors recommended that she should previously have a short trial of her engines. It was not, however, until the 14th Feb. that this trial trip took place. Why it was that it was so long deferred we are not informed, except that we are told that 'the intermediate time was used to caulk the deck and take in coals. On the trial trip it was found that the vessel made so much water on the repaired side, that it was determined to send her to Rio for repairs, instead of to a north European port, as had been previously intended.

"It was at this time that Mr. Constant Staevens arrived at St. Vincent, a circumstance which, it appears to us, was not attended with all the advantages which the owners no doubt contemplated, when they sent him out to manage the vessel's affairs. From the position which he held, as representing the owners on the spot, he might have given us the fullest information on the case; but unfortunately he was troubled with that kind of memory which consisted in remembering very distinctly all those matters, however trifling, which seemed to tell in favour of his owners, and in ignoring altogether facts which seemed to have an opposite tendency, and which it might reasonably have been expected that he would have known.

"The vessel, as I have said, had undergone her trial trip on the 14th Feb.; it was not, however, until the 16th March following that she sailed for Rio. What was the reason of this great delay we are not informed. Mr. Staevens, when asked, took refuge under the plea that the ship was under the management of the master, and the master was not produced before us for examination. There was a suggestion that the vessel was detained from the 14th Feb. to the 16th March, to enable Mr. Staevens to arrange about the sale of the damaged cargo, and to despatch the undamaged portion to its destination. There was also some evidence that Mr. Staevens was employed during this time in obtaining the necessary papers to enable him to claim against the underwriters, as well for the damage occasioned by the fire which had broken out on board, as for that resulting from the collision. But, even were it so, it would be no reason for detaining the vessel at St. Vincent. The cargo had been long before discharged from the Bismarck and placed on shore in the hands of Messrs. Miller, Brothers, who were the agents at St. Vincent of the owners of the Bismarck. Any duties, therefore, connected with the sale or despatch of the cargo could have been readily performed by those gentlemen, and if Mr. Staevens preferred to see to the sale and transhipment of the cargo, and to collect the necessary documents himself, that can be no reason why he should have detained the vessel for that purpose. Mr. Staevens might, if he had thought it necessary have remained behind at St. Vincent, and when he had disposed of all the business, have followed the ship to Rio; but he could have no right to detain the vessel for this purpose at the cost of other parties. If Mr. Staevens had never come out at all, is it supposed that these duties would not have been efficiently performed by Messrs. Miller, the owners' agents, on the spot? Or, if Mr. Staevens was unwilling to allow the master to go to Rio without him, not having sufficient confidence in him to entrust him with making arrangements for the permanent repairs, is that a ground upon which we can allow this vessel to be detained, at the expense of third parties, for a period of some thirty days, at a cost, according to the owners' claim, of nearly 25*l.* per day? We are clearly of opinion that no good reason has been given why this vessel was detained at St. Vincent from the 14th Feb. to the 16th March; nothing, in fact, which would induce us to throw the cost of this detention upon third parties. There seems, indeed, to be no reason why she might not immediately after the trial trip have made arrangements for going to Rio; and, allowing two days for this purpose, we think that there was here a loss of twenty-eight days, that is from the 16th Feb. to the 16th March, which cannot properly be charged to the collision.

"The vessel then arrived at Rio on the 30th March, and no time seems to have been lost in having her surveyed, a preliminary survey having been held on her on the 31st. On the 3rd April the machinery was surveyed, and on the 9th of the same month the vessel underwent a thorough survey. We are not disposed, considering the port at which the repairs were done, the nature of the climate, and the character of the people, to complain of the time during which she remained in dock. Something also would probably have had to be done to the vessel after she came out of dock on the 29th April; at the same time we are at a loss to understand why the engines were not overhauled during the twenty-six days that the vessel remained in dock, in order that the repairs to the vessel and the engines might have gone on together. Instead, however, of this being done, it was not until the 8th May, more than a week after she had come out of dock, that the engines were surveyed. When, too, this was at length done no such damage was discovered as would have required any very long time to repair, for it was chiefly the donkey engine that required repair, and that certainly could have been done whilst the vessel was in dock. We are not told when the repairs to the engines were completed; but on the 31st May another survey is held, and it is then said that the vessel, by 'lying in the lively and warm water of the harbour to complete repairs, has become sufficiently dirty for the said bottom to be re-cleaned and painted.' It should here be observed that the vessel had only come out of dock on the 29th April, and that whilst there her bottom had been 'thoroughly cleaned and painted with three coats of red metallic oxide,' or at all events a charge for it has been made and allowed. To suppose then that a vessel that had been thoroughly cleaned and painted with three coats of paint should, after being in the harbour of Rio only one month, have become so dirty as to require to be re-cleaned and re-painted is utterly unreasonable. It is very well known that vessels, even after a long transatlantic voyage, are detained at Rio for considerably more than a month discharging and taking in cargo, without its being considered necessary to dock and re-paint them; were it otherwise the port would hardly be so much frequented as it is. The claim then for this second cleaning and painting of the vessel's bottom, which was at one time strongly insisted upon, appears to us to be utterly unreasonable. But if the necessity for re-painting the vessel is given up, what becomes of the claim for demurrage during the time that this re-painting was going on? It is clear that this must go also. And what we must endeavour to ascertain is, not when it was that the last repairs were done to her, but when they might with reasonable diligence have been completed, and the vessel have been placed in a position to enter upon a new voyage; to put her, in fact, in the same condition as she would have been upon her arrival at Natal, had she prosecuted her voyage to that port, and there discharged her cargo.

"I have already stated that there seems to be no reason why the repairs to the engines might not have gone on at the same time as the repairs to the ship, instead of being deferred until after she came out of dock. But giving the plaintiffs the benefit of the doubt, and assuming that no time was lost up to the time of the survey of the 8th May, let us inquire what would be a reasonable time to allow from that date to complete all the repairs shown by that and the previous surveys, both to the engines and to the vessel itself. Now there is a fact, apparently trifling in itself, which seems to indicate that by a particular day the repairs had been completed. If the surveys of the 31st March, 3rd, 9th, and 28th April, and 8th May be examined, it will be seen that they were all signed by Messrs. Lackemann and Co., the agents to the Hamburg underwriters at Rio, on one and the same day, namely, the 21st May 1869; and to each survey the following words were added: 'without prejudice as to the extent and liability of the insurance.' Now is it possible that at this date all the repairs had been completed, and the accounts were being made up and submitted to the underwriters' agent; and that the subsequent re-docking, re-cleaning, and re-painting the bottom had relation to some engagement subsequently entered into by Mr. Staevens for the voyage to Hamburg? Is it possible that the merchants may have made it a condition to their shipping this very valuable cargo on board the Bismarck that those additional repairs should be done to her? But whether this be so or not, what we are clearly of opinion is, that all the necessary repairs, all such as were occasioned by the collision, ought to have been, even if they were not, completed by the 21st May. There is nothing in the surveys to show us that they were not completed by that day; and the time allowed by us appears to be amply sufficient for the purpose. If then we are right in this opinion, no demurrage would be due after that day.

"Now the whole time claimed by the plaintiffs is from the 19th Dec. 1868 to the 19th June 1869, a period of 182 days. From this then we must first deduct the five days during which the vessel would have had to remain at St. Vincent, in discharging her coals and overhauling her cargo to discover the origin of the fire, and in replenishing her stock of coals, even if no collision had occurred. Secondly, there is the deduction of thirty-one days for a time which would have been required to complete her voyage and earn her freight. Thirdly, there is the loss of time at St. Vincent from the 16th Feb. to the 16th March, a further period of twenty-eight days. Fourthly, there is from the 21st May, when the repairs ought in our opinion to have been completed, to the 19th June, or twenty-eight days more. In all there would be ninety-two days to be deducted from the 182 claimed, leaving ninety days as the number in respect of which demurrage is properly due.

"Secondly, as to the rate at which the demurrage ought to be allowed.

"In our former report we had estimated it according to the rate usually adopted by us in the case of steam vessels of this class; that is to say, at 6*d.* per ton per day on the gross tonnage, or 9*d.* per ton on the net tonnage. This is the rate which experience has shown us to be generally sufficient to cover all the expenses, and to leave a fair remuneration to the owner for the loss of the services of his vessel. The gross tonnage of the Bismarck was 497 tons, which at 6*d.* per ton would give 12*l.* 8*s.* 6*d.*; the net tonnage was 336 tons, which at 9*d.* per ton gives 12*l.* 12*s.* We allow it at 12*l.* 10*s.* per day. The rest of our remarks under this head, were only to show that the rate which we had allowed appeared to be fair and reasonable, looking at the wages paid to the crew, and the probable cost of the provisions. I stated that, according to their own showing, the wages paid to the crew amounted to 12*l.* a month, or about 4*l.* a day; and that as 1*s.* 6*d.* per head per day for provisions, would only give for the whole crew of twenty-four, officers and men included, 36*s.* per day, if we allowed it even at 2*l.* a day, that would make the cost of wages and provisions to amount to only 6*l.* a day. I added that as a general rule, it was found that the demurrage was equal to about twice the cost of the wages and provisions, and that as we had allowed 12*l.* 10*s.* a day, it appeared to us to be more than sufficient.

"It was not objected that the sum of 6*d.* per ton on the gross tonnage, or 9*d.* per ton on the net tonnage, was not the usual rate for vessels of this class, or that, as a general rule, this would not be a proper rate at which to allow the demurrage; nor was it said, that about double the cost of the wages and provisions would not be a fair allowance; but it was contended that, under the exceptional circumstances of this case, which I will presently state, the amount was not sufficient. No evidence of these exceptional circumstances was given when the case was formerly before us, which is the more remarkable if they intended to rely upon them for an exceptional award. And it was chiefly to establish this point that the witnesses were produced before us at the second hearing. The tenor of their evidence I will now proceed to state."

The learned registrar here set out the evidence of the witnesses as above, and, after specially noticing the evidence of Staevens as to the scarcity and the cost of provisions at St. Vincent, and as to his statement that they were starving, continued:—

"Now, one of the peculiarities of these references is that we are not obliged to shut our eyes to facts which are within our own cognisance, even though they should not be proved by the evidence in the case, nor are we compelled to believe statements, even though they should be sworn to, which are contrary to our experience; thus if a witness were to swear before us that the usual price of rope was 100*s.* per cwt., when we knew it to be worth only from 38*s.* to 42*s.*, or that a fir-built American vessel was more valuable and more expensive than an oak-built English vessel, we should simply not believe him, and should prefer to act upon our own experience and knowledge of the facts. Applying then, these principles to the evidence of Mr. Staevens, we can only say that they are contrary to our experience. From having had a brother resident for many years at St. Vincent, as judge in the Mixed British and Portuguese Commission Court, established at that place, I happened to have some knowledge of the place, and I had always understood that fresh provisions of all kinds were most abundant and cheap at St. Vincent; that large herds of cattle were to be found in some of the islands in a semi-wild state, from which the market at St. Vincent was amply supplied; that it was a favourite place of resort, especially for American merchant vessels, and for our own ships of war, to obtain fresh provisions, and that of late it had become a very important coaling station. With this knowledge, it was impossible for me to accept without question the evidence of Mr. Staevens, unreliable as we had found it to be upon other points, and with a strong bias in favour of his own side. Accordingly I wrote to Mr. George Miller, a partner of the firm of Messrs. Miller Brothers, who had acted as the ship's agent at St. Vincent, and who I knew to be in this country, for information on the subject, and I received from him a letter, of which the following is a copy:

"St. Werburgh Chambers, Bristol,
"3rd Feb. 1871.

"Dear Mr. Rothery,—I have thought the best answer I can give to your note will be the enclosed account just received from our St. Vincent house for supplies made to a steamer put in there in distress. You will see that the price of beef is 140 reis per pound, which is equal to about 7½*d.*

"In your brother Charles's time beef was about 2*d.* per pound; but the constantly increasing demand at St. Vincent of late years for supplies to steamers, and the imposition of a municipal tax, has caused this increase in price. At some of the other islands, where the consumption is generally limited to the wants of the inhabitants, the price is less, but it has been affected in all of them, as supplies of cattle have been drawn from them for St. Vincent.

"At St. Jago, St. Antonio, St. Nicholas, Fofo, and Brava, there are abundant supplies of fresh vegetables and fruits, and at very moderate prices; but as the harbours are not good, and at times dangerous, they are little frequented, except St. Jago, which has a tolerable harbour, safe for nine months in the year, but, then, it is notoriously unhealthy. Comparatively few vegetables are grown in St. Vincent, but there is nearly a daily importation of them from the island of St. Antonio, distant about twelve miles. You will see in the account several articles supplied under the head of engineers' stores. The large number of steamers and colliers that now go to St. Vincent has led to our having kept in store there almost everything that can be required for refitting either steamers or colliers, and we have besides a staff of skilled English engineers, smiths, &c., supplemented by taught natives, available for undertaking light repairs when needed.

"Will you kindly return me the account in the course of a post or two?—Believe me, yours truly,
"G. MILLER."

(Here followed the account mentioned in the letter, showing the price of fresh beef as 140 reis, or about 7*8*/₁₆*d.* per pound).

"As Mr. Miller had not replied to my question about the cattle, I wrote again to him, and received the following reply:

"Bentry, Westbury-on-Trym, Gloucestershire, 5th Feb. 1871.

"My dear Mr. Rothery,—Nearly all the cattle at the Cape Verde Islands may be said to be in a half wild state, they roam about nearly at will for pasturage over unenclosed common lands, and herd together, but they are all marked and owned. Formerly there was an export trade to the West Indies, but it has ceased for many years. The supply now is fully sufficient for the existing demand, but it cannot be said that there are large herds from which an unlimited supply could be drawn. If the demand increased, no doubt a largely increased production would be stimulated; at present breeding is left entirely to chance, and no sort of attention given to it. The only island in which I ever knew wild cattle to exist was Santa Lucia, one of the smallest of the Cape Verde group; there were very few there, probably not more than a hundred, but I believe there are none there now.

"The fights described by your brother he will have seen on the plains at St. Nicholas, not between actually wild cattle, but between cattle accustomed to roam nearly at will.

"I am sorry that I did not fully reply to your first note. If there is any other point upon which you wish information, and think I can give, pray do not hesitate to ask me for it.—Believe me, yours very truly,

“But the case does not rest here; and I am glad that it does not, for it would not be satisfactory to have to decide a question of this description, upon information received from a gentleman who, however competent and however trustworthy I might know him to be, had not been sworn to give evidence in the cause. It happens, however, that the information furnished by Mr. Miller is strongly corroborated by documents which have been brought in by the plaintiffs themselves, and which are now before us. One of these documents is the account of the provisions supplied to the Bismarck during the time she was at St. Vincent, by Messrs. Miller Brothers, and bears date the 15th March 1869, the day before the vessel left the island. If this account be examined it will be seen that, in addition to twenty-four live sheep, the Bismarck during her stay at St. Vincent’s was supplied with 1723lb. of fresh beef; and that the price at which it was supplied was the same as that mentioned in the account sent to me by Mr. Miller, namely, 140 reis—equal to about 7½d. per lb. It further appears that she obtained bread and provisions from eight different vessels that were in the harbour, but at what price there is nothing to show, as the quantities are not stated.

“With these facts before us, how is it possible to believe the statements of Mr. Staevens, that, whilst at St. Vincent’s, they were nearly starving; that they could obtain no supplies from the vessels that were in the harbour, that fresh meat and provisions were not to be had, and that the market was not well supplied with cattle, or, as he describes it, that ‘sometimes there came one or two muttoms, sometimes one,’ and that ‘there might be occasionally a small Portuguese steamer as a sort of adventure.’

“I should add that, as it seemed only fair that both parties should know the contents of these letters, I read them aloud at the meeting of the 6th Feb., but neither counsel applied to be allowed to produce any further evidence on the point.

“On the whole, then, we have no hesitation in saying that the evidence of Mr. Staevens as to the cost of difficulty of obtaining provisions at St. Vincent’s cannot be relied upon. As to the cost and quantities of the provisions supplied at Rio, Mr. Staevens either could not or would not give us any information.

“How then stands the case in regard to the cost of the provisions at St. Vincent and at Rio? It is impossible to give much weight to the general statement that the cost of provisioning a ship at those places is two or three times that at London or Hamburg; for when the witnesses spoke of provisioning a ship, it is clear that they meant provisioning her for a voyage, not merely supplying the crew with provisions during the time that the ship remained in port. Salt meat and biscuit could no doubt be more cheaply purchased in London or at Hamburg or Bremen than at St. Vincent or Rio; but, on the other hand, sugar, cocoa, coffee, lime-juice, rum, and a variety of other things which go to the provisioning of a ship, could be purchased more cheaply at Rio at all events, if not at St. Vincent, than they could be either at Hamburg or in London. And as to fresh meat, with which of course the crew would be largely supplied, it has been shown not only that there was no want of it at St. Vincent, but that it was obtained at a not unreasonable price—namely 7½d. per lb. As to Rio, we find from Captain Lauer’s evidence that the time during which the Bismarck was at Rio, from April to June, was the season when fresh meat is cheapest. Fresh vegetables also would appear to have been abundant and reasonable at both places.

“It has therefore not been shown to our satisfaction that the cost of provisions at St. Vincent and Rio was so great as to justify us in awarding a higher rate of demurrage; indeed, there seems to be no reason to think that the cost of maintaining the crew at St. Vincent and at Rio would be much, if at all, more than the cost of provisioning a ship at London or Hamburg; at all events, there is no evidence to show us that it was so.

“The question then remains, whether, with the additional evidence now before us, there is reason to think that the estimate in our former report of 2l. per day for the maintenance of the crew of the Bismarck was or was not too little; and whether this sum would not as a general rule cover the cost of provisioning a vessel of this size with her crew of twenty-four, officers and men included?

“And first, it should be observed that all the witnesses concur in saying that the cost of provisioning a ship at London and at Hamburg is about the same. In the next place, Mr. Avis, the provision merchant, says, and he is clearly the best authority on this point, that the cost of supplying provisions for the common seamen is, and has been for about the last three years past, from 13d. to 15d. per man per day; let us take it at 14d. Thirdly, Captain Lauer, the German master, who must also be the best witness as to the relative cost of provisioning an officer and a common seaman on board a German merchant vessel, says that the keep of an officer is double that of a seaman. Now, of the crew of twenty-four hands all told, eighteen were common seamen, and six officers, including the master and two superior officers. The cost, then, of provisioning the whole of the crew per day would, according to the evidence of Mr. Avis and Captain Lauer, amount to

Six officers, at 2s. 4d. each.....	0 14 0
Total.....	£1 15 0

“Supposing, however, we allow the cost of provisioning the six officers at three times that of the men, we should only have

Eighteen men, at 14d. each.....	£1 1 0
Six officers, at 3s. 6d. each.....	1 1 0
Total.....	£2 2 0

“Indeed, this was the estimate claimed by Mr. Phillimore, although he made up the account in a somewhat different way; he claimed for twenty-one of the crew at the rate of 1s. 6d. a day each, and for the master and two chief officers at 3s. 6d. a day each. This would give

Twenty-one men, at 1s. 6d. each ...	£1 11 6
Three officers, at 3s. 6d. each.....	0 10 6
Total.....	£2 2 0

“We may, therefore, take the total cost of provisions per day to be at the outside 2 guineas. As to the wages, there is no question upon this point. By the plaintiff’s own documents, the monthly wages appear to have been 12*l.*, which would be 4*l.* 0*s.* 8*d.* per day. The total cost then for wages and provisions would be 6*l.* 2*s.* 8*d.*; doubling this, which is one mode of obtaining the sum proper to be allowed for demurrage, we get only 12*l.* 5*s.* 4*d.*, whereas the sum which we have allowed for the demurrage of this vessel is 12*l.* 10*s.* per day. Tested, therefore, by this rule, our award, so far as the rate is concerned, would appear not to be unreasonable.

"But it was said that the cost of this vessel, and the expenses of navigating her, were so great that the rate of demurrage allowed by us would not cover the expenses, and at the same time afford a fair remuneration to her owners on the capital employed. It was said by Mr. Staevens that the original cost of the vessel was 13,500*l.*, but that, owing to the expense of fitting her out and other charges, he estimated that she had cost them altogether 15,000*l.* He stated that the insurance was at the rate of 9 per cent. per annum on this value. He claimed also 5 per cent. on the capital expended, and 10 per cent. for wear and tear, making altogether 24 per cent. on the capital expended, which would be 3600*l.* per annum, or rather less than 10*l.* a day. This then, added to the cost of wages and provisions, would make about 16*l.* a day instead of 12*l.* 10*s.* the amount allowed by us.

"Now, the first thing that strikes us as strange in this calculation is that a claim of 10 per cent. per annum should be made, for the wear and tear of a vessel which was not being navigated, not tossed about by the winds and waves with the chance of injury to her masts, sails, and rigging, but which was lying safely in port part of the time in dry dock, and undergoing a thorough and complete repair. That a vessel would or could, under these circumstances, depreciate at the rate of 10 per cent per annum, is what no one in the smallest degree conversant with these matters would allow. Vessels, it should be observed, depreciate by being used, not whilst undergoing repair and when in dry dock.

"Again, it is to be observed, that when vessels are insured for a whole year, it is not unusual for the insurance office or the underwriters to make some abatement when it is shown that the vessel has, from some cause or other, been laid up in harbour instead of being exposed to the dangers of navigation. Mr. Staevens denied that any such abatement had been made in this case; and although we have shown that implicit reliance cannot be placed on the word of this gentleman, we will admit for the moment that this was so. We will take the value of the vessel at 15,000*l.*, and allow that the rate of insurance was as stated, at 9 per cent. We will also allow the owners the 5 per cent. claimed on the capital employed; but we can hardly allow them for supposed wear and tear, for which there was no pretence. We should thus have to allow at the rate of 14 per cent. on a capital of 15,000*l.*, which would give 2100*l.* per annum, or something under 6*l.* per day. If, instead of allowing 5 per cent. on the capital, we allowed 6 per cent., this would give 2250 per annum, or under 6*l.* 4*s.* per day. Add to this the cost of the wages and provisions, which has been shown to be at the outside 6*l.* 2*s.* 8*d.*, and we get 12*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* per day as the rate proper to be allowed for the demurrage of this vessel. What, however, we have allowed is 12*l.* 10*s.* per day, a sum therefore fully sufficient, not only to cover the wages and provisions of the crew, but to give the owner a fair interest on his capital.

"From whatever point of view then we regard this question, it seems to us that the rate which we have allowed for the demurrage of this vessel, namely, 12*l.* 10*s.* per day, is a reasonable and proper sum, and is amply sufficient to cover not only all the owners' expenses, but to allow them a reasonable compensation for the capital employed. By our former report we had allowed for the demurrage of the vessel 1250*l.*, being for 100 days at the rate of 12*l.* 10*s.* per day. As, however, by the additional light which has been thrown upon the case by this further inquiry, we have come to the conclusion that 90 days would be a sufficient allowance to make, and as we see no reason to alter the rate previously allowed, our award in regard to the demurrage must be reduced to 1125*l.*, being at the rate of 12*l.* 10*s.* per day for 90 days.

"We are very glad to have been afforded this opportunity of correcting the estimate which we had formed on the case as it was at first presented to us. And although the result may not perhaps be quite so satisfactory to the plaintiffs as they may have anticipated, it will no doubt be a satisfaction to them to feel that the case has now been thoroughly investigated, and that their arguments have been most fully weighed and considered. To us also it is a satisfaction to feel that the principles which have hitherto guided us in awarding demurrage in cases of this description, appear, upon a more careful examination of the subject than we have ever before given to it, to be sound. The attempt which the owners of the Bismarck have made to obtain a larger award having proved unsuccessful, it only remains for us to say that they ought, in our opinion, to pay all the costs occasioned thereby.

"H. C. ROTHERY, Registrar."

"8th July 1871.

From this report the owners of the Bismarck appealed, and filed a petition in objection, of which the material allegations are as follows:—

11. . . . The owners of the Bismarck claim that one day only instead of five should be deducted for the probable stay at St. Vincent, had no collision happened.

12. The learned registrar has further deducted from the time allowed for the repairs, the whole time allowed from 14th Feb. to 16th March being the time from the Bismarck's trial trip to the date when she actually left St. Vincent. This deduction was not made in the first report. . . . But it is submitted as matter of law that the master, being in the circumstances agent for the cargo as well as ship, was bound to perform these duties, and especially to attend to the transshipment of the cargo, for which he had signed bill of lading, and for the due conveyance whereof he was responsible; and that this was the view taken by all concerned with the Bismarck at St. Vincent is clear from the evidence of Staevens. Then it appears that the whole time between 14th Feb. and 16th March was required for the performance of these duties.

13. . . . And it is submitted that there is no ground for ascribing wilful delay to the masters and others concerned in the management of the Bismarck, and that on the contrary, there is every probability for supposing that they, as it is in fact sworn, used their best endeavours to leave St. Vincent as soon as possible.

14. It appears, moreover, from the evidence of Staevens that the ship was not fit for sea on 14th Feb., and that for the purpose of fitting her for sea alone some days must have been consumed.

15. As to the date of the final repair of the damage, it appears that the last survey of the Bismarck, at Rio Janeiro, was held on 3rd June, and it was not till then that she was certified to be fit for sea. There is no reason for ascribing any wilful delay to the master or others concerned with the Bismarck; on the contrary, they had every motive for expedition. . . .

16. (This paragraph set out that the repairs at Rio had been done in as short a time as possible, and in accordance with the surveys.) On the 3rd June the vessel was again surveyed, and on the 4th June, the time for demurrage claimed by the owners of the Bismarck expires.

17. . . . It is moreover sworn that there was not even a beginning made of engaging cargo for her till the 5th or 6th June; and, in fact, she did not leave Rio with her cargo till the 15th June.

18. The period from the 19th Dec. to the 4th June, less one day's delay at St. Vincent, and thirty-one days for completing her original voyage, makes 135 days demurrage of the Bismarck, the time claimed on behalf of her owners.

19. As to the rate of such demurrage a day the learned registrar has found the value of the vessel to have been 15,000*l.*, the amount contended for by the petitioners, and he has allowed interest on that amount, and insurance at 9 per cent., in estimating the amount of the demurrage, as claimed by the petitioners. The amount of the wages of the crew is agreed at 4*l.* 0*s.* 8*d.* a day, and the ordinary cost of provisioning the crew (that is, the cost at London or North German prices) has been found by the learned registrar, in terms of the petitioner's contention, at 2*l.* 2*s.* a day, instead of 3*l.* 6*s.* to 2*l.* a day, as found in the first report. The learned registrar has, however, disallowed any claim in respect of the wear and tear or wasting of the ship, although he allowed for it in his first report, and although it is manifest that there must be, and in fact was, such wear and tear or wasting; and he has disallowed all claim in respect of increased cost of provisions at the ports of St. Vincent and Rio de Janeiro.

20. (This paragraph set out the evidence as to prices at St. Vincent and at Rio de Janeiro.)

21. (This paragraph set out the evidence as to natural products at those places.)

22. It is, however, suggested that fresh meat could be procured very easily and cheaply at St. Vincent, in spite of the testimony of Avis and Staevens to the contrary. The learned registrar has for this purpose thought fit to refer by letter to a Mr. Miller, who seems to have some connection with St. Vincent. It is submitted on behalf of the petitioners that such reference to a person not summoned by either party, unsworn and not cross-examined, is irregular and improper, and the petitioners desire to take every objection available to them in law to the information given by him. . . . The petitioners therefore claim an allowance on an average of double the ordinary price of provisions on account of the dearness of the ports of St. Vincent and Rio de Janeiro.

23. As to the items of the petitioners' claim allowed by the learned registrar addition be made of a reasonable sum in respect of wear and tear, and the price of provisions allowed by him be doubled, the sum will amount to something in excess of 16*l.* a day, and the petitioners claim 16*l.* a day.

24. The learned registrar has improperly reported that the petitioners ought to pay the costs of both references.

The answer of the respondents, so far as it was material, was as follows:—

4. As to the 11th article of the petition: The averments in the said 11th article contained are untrue. It is proved by the evidence that 115½ tons of coal, that is to say, more than one half of the quantity of coal which the vessel could carry, were discharged at St. Vincent.

5. As to the 10th and 11th articles of the petition: It is submitted that the reasons given in the registrar's further report, as well as the evidence before the registrar and merchants as to the legal proceedings which were taken at St. Vincent solely on account of the fire and the consequences thereof, fully warrant the conclusion that had there been no collision the ship would at least have been detained five days at St. Vincent.

6. As to the 12th, 13th, and 14th articles of the petition: (a) The averments in the said articles contained are untrue or inaccurate. (b) The Bismarck was reported ready for sea on the 1st Feb. and the learned registrar has not only allowed the interval between the 1st and the 14th Feb. for taking in coals, for certain necessary repairs, and for the trial trip, but has also allowed a further time of two days for any further preparations that might be necessary to enable the ship to proceed to Rio. There was no evidence to show, nor is any ground alleged in the petition, why the said interval of two days was not a sufficient allowance, and it is submitted that on a practical question of this nature the decision of the registrar and merchants ought to be held conclusive in the absence of any reason or evidence to the contrary. (c) The learned registrar, in his first report, stated that the detention of the vessel between the 14th Feb. and the 16th March at St. Vincent was unaccounted for, and that he thought that if he had erred at all, it was by allowing too much time for demurrage. On the argument on the objections to the registrar's first report, it was urged on behalf of the respondents, that the demurrage allowed in that report was even excessive, because the detention of the vessel between the 14th Feb. and the 16th March, being unaccounted for, ought not to have been allowed in the calculation of the demurrage, and it was because the appellants alleged their desire to adduce fresh evidence to explain this and other points connected with their claim for demurrage that their said claim was referred back to the registrar and merchants. (d) It is submitted that the learned registrar was right in disallowing in his further report the time between the 14th Feb. and the 16th March, because, although it was incumbent upon the appellants to prove that the detention was the necessary and proximate consequence of the collision, they failed in adducing any satisfactory evidence to that effect, and also because the evidence adduced before the registrar and merchants shows that the afore-mentioned detention was not such a necessary and proximate consequence of the collision as to make the owners of the City of Buenos Ayres legally liable in respect of the same. (e) It is further submitted, that the reasons given for the ship's detention in the afore-mentioned articles of the petition are not proved by the evidence before the registrar and merchants, and that, even if they had been proved, the owners of the City of Buenos Ayres would not have been legally liable in respect of such detention as a consequence of the collision.

7. As to the 15th, 16th, 17th, and 18th articles of the petition: (a) The statements therein contained are untrue or inaccurate. (b) As to the second repainting at Rio, this court has already decided that the appellants claim in respect of the same must be rejected, and it is therefore submitted that their claim for so much of the demurrage as was occasioned by the second repainting cannot be supported. (c) It is submitted that the question when with reasonable diligence the necessary repairs at Rio might have been completed and the vessel made fit for sea, is one which the tribunal of registrar and merchants is peculiarly competent to decide, and that their decision ought not to be overruled unless it appears manifestly to be wrong, but it is also submitted, that the evidence before the registrar and merchants fully supports that decision.

8. As to the 19th, 20th, 21st, and 23rd articles of the petition: (a) The averments therein contained are untrue or inaccurate. (b) The learned registrar founded his estimate of the rate of demurrage on the consideration that the sum of 6*l.* per ton on the gross tonnage was the usual rate at which demurrage is estimated for vessels of the class of the Bismarck, a rate which was generally found to be equal to about double the cost of wages and provisions per day, and the learned registrar awarded a rate of demurrage even exceeding the sum which a calculation upon either basis would give. (c) It was alleged on behalf of the appellants before the registrar and merchants, and is alleged in the petition, that the present case is exceptional, because the expenses of provisioning the crew at St. Vincent and Rio were peculiarly great. But the appellants did not, although they might have done so and were challenged to do so, produce the proper evidence to show the cost of the provisions actually consumed at St. Vincent and Rio. (d) It is submitted, however, that the decision as to the cost of provisions at St. Vincent and Rio by the learned registrar, assisted by merchants, who had the advantage of hearing the examination and cross-examination of the witnesses, ought not to be overruled by this court unless it is manifestly erroneous. (e) It is further submitted, that the account given of the evidence in the afore-mentioned articles of the petition is inaccurate and incomplete, and that the evidence fully warranted the conclusion stated in the registrar's further report as to the cost of provisions at St. Vincent and Rio. (f) As regards the complaint made in the 22nd article of the petition, that the learned registrar referred by letter to Mr. Miller, the said Mr. Miller was a member of the firm of Miller and Co., the appellants' own agents for the ship at St. Vincent, and the appellants neither objected to the production of Mr. Miller's letters nor asked to produce any further evidence, although those letters were read by the learned registrar for the purpose of warning Mr. Staevens, the appellant's principal witness, of the reckless statements he had made, and to afford him an opportunity of making an explanation as well as to enable the appellants to adduce further evidence if they thought proper. (g) It is submitted that the reference to Mr. Miller which is complained of was neither unusual nor improper, but it is also submitted that it is wholly immaterial, not only because the decision of the registrar and merchants as to the cost of provisions at St. Vincent and Rio was not founded on the information received from Mr. Miller, but also because that decision was fully borne out by the evidence, and, finally, because the petitioners failed to prove by satisfactory evidence which they must or might have had in their possession what was actually expended for provisions at St. Vincent and Rio. (h) It was suggested by the appellants before the registrar and merchants that there was a third proper mode of estimating the rate of demurrage, namely, by allowing a sum made up of five per cent. on the original cost price of the vessel, ten per cent. for wear and tear, nine per cent. for insurance and the cost of wages and provisions. But it is submitted that to adopt this basis of calculation would be equally erroneous and unusual, and that although the demurrage might well be measured by the net earnings of the ship, it cannot properly be measured by or made to depend on the original cost price of the ship; and it is further submitted that, in fact, the mode in which the learned registrar fixed the rate of demurrage is simply founded on what experience and practice have proved to be the ordinary net earnings of a ship of the tonnage and class of the Bismarck. (i) It is submitted that the decision arrived at by the learned registrar as to the rate of demurrage is one which for many reasons ought not to be overruled unless it is manifestly wrong; but it is also submitted that his decision is right for the reasons stated in the registrar's further report, and also because the net earnings of the Bismarck, which is all the appellants lost by the detention, were not proved to be greater, and were even admitted by the appellants before the registrar and merchants not to be greater, than the ordinary earnings of ships of her class and tonnage, and the expenses of the ship during her detention were not proved to have been, and were not, in fact, unusually large.

Dec. 5 and 9.—Butt, Q.C., for the petitioners (owners of the Bismarck).—We claim demurrage, for 135 days. The sum allowed per day, 12*l.* 10*s.* is too small. As to the time, the deduction of five days at St. Vincent was improper. We do not object to the deduction of thirty-one days for the time that would have been occupied in the voyage to Port Natal. We object to the deduction of the twenty-eight days at St. Vincent, and to part of the deduction of twenty-eight days at Rio de Janeiro. The evidence as to the time occupied at St. Vincent shows that but for the collision no overhauling of the cargo would have been necessary. There is no evidence that the coals need have been discharged, and no inference could be drawn from the fact of the fire, as the discharge of the coals took place after the collision, and was a natural consequence of it. These facts depend on Staeven's evidence, which is uncontradicted. The vessel would only have been two days at St. Vincent but for the collision, and she was going there under any circumstances to coal. As to the disallowance of twenty-eight days at St. Vincent, Staeven's evidence showed that she was not ready to start before the 16th March. It was the duty of the master to find another ship to carry on the cargo, and this was the cause of the delay. If it should be found that they stayed for the purpose of getting the necessary papers prepared with reference to the ship in which the cargo was forwarded, the master only did his duty. There is no evidence that this could have been done by Messrs. Miller, or that they were agents for the owners of the Bismarck. The master was bound to get the documents for the owners of the cargo, or they could not have claimed against the underwriters. As to the deduction of twenty-eight days at Rio, the engines could not have been repaired in dry dock, according to the evidence, and extensive repairs were necessary. The fact of the underwriters' agent signing the surveys does not in any way indicate when the repairs were finished. If the signatures to the surveys ending 8th May prove anything, the same signature is appended to those of 31st May and 3rd June, and the date only differs. The underwriters would only be liable for what was the consequence of the collision. No cargo was contracted for until 5th June. There is nothing on the face of Staeven's evidence to entitle the registrar to discredit it. The producing of Mr. Miller's letter was most unjustifiable; it was introducing unsworn testimony for the purpose of discrediting sworn evidence. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE. —I cannot see upon what ground this letter could be admitted in evidence. I presume you objected to it at the time.] We could not object to its use, as it was in the possession of the court; it was not evidence according to first principles, and we were not bound to object. It affected the mind of the registrar as to Mr. Staevens's credibility, if not as to the amount we were entitled to. As to the rate of demurrage, the proper measure is 1*l.* per thousand per day on the value of the ship; (The Black Prince, Lush, 568.) We are therefore entitled to 15*l.* per day, as our value was 15,000*l.*

Dec. 9th.—W. G. F. Phillimore on the same side. —The common practice in estimating the rate of demurrage is to take the earnings of the vessel before the collision, and so find the amount. Here that is difficult, as the Bismarck was fitted out to create a new trade, and her freight was below the usual rate. The averment in the answer that 6*d.* per ton on the gross tonnage is the usual rate of demurrage is contrary to the Black Prince (sup.) We claim 10 per cent. for interest and wear and tear, that is 5 per cent. for interest and 5 per cent. for wear and tear. There is no question as to the 9 per cent. for insurance. On the question of wages of crew and provisions the first is right, the second is too small. In the first report the registrar allowed for wear and tear; here he does not, and gives no reason for changing. A vessel must deteriorate, even in harbour. The cost of provisions allowed is too small, and we claim 4*l.* 4*s.* a day on account of the extra expenses at Saint Vincent and Rio, as shown by Staevens's evidence, uncontradicted save by the letter of Mr. Miller.

The Admiralty Advocate (Dr. Deane, Q.C.) for the respondents (the owners of cargo on board the Bismarck).—There is no obligation thrown upon a master whose ship has been injured to remain with his cargo to see it transhipped.

The Hamburg, Bro & Lush, 272; 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 175;

The Karnak, L. Rep. 2 P. C. 506-513; 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 159-162.

The master stayed to adjust the papers relating to the cargo; this had nothing to do with the collision, and there was no justification for retaining the ship at St. Vincent after Feb. 16th. She was fit to sail after the survey of 1st Feb. 1869. At Rio there is nothing to show that the donkey engine could not have been repaired in dock. The bill of Messrs. Miller put in shows that the price of provisions was not excessive. The calculation in the Black Prince (sup.) was made under the extraordinary circumstances of that case. The Bismarck must have discharged her coals at St. Vincent, as the fire had been extinguished with salt water, and this rendered them liable to take fire again. The costs of these proceedings should not fall on the respondents, as the cause of any error in the report is that the owners of the Bismarck have not put in any documentary evidence, as to the actual expenses incurred, before the registrar and merchants.

Cohen, on the same side.—The discharge of the burnt coals and the reloading must have taken some days. The legal proceedings connected with the coals lasted three weeks, and this would have been done independently of the collision. We are only allowed five days for this. On the first reference there was no evidence of what the ship was doing at St. Vincent, but on the second there was, and from this it appears that the master was taking part in legal proceedings and the trans-shipment of the cargo, which he was not bound to do, nor was he bound to delay the voyage.

Shipton v. Thornton, 9 A. & E. 314.

As the master is not bound to look after the interests of the cargo, he cannot charge us with the delay. The legal proceedings were to obtain evidence against the underwriters. With regard to the delay at Rio, everything was completed on May 21st, the underwriter's agents would not have appended their signatures to the surveys until the repairs were actually done. As to the rate of demurrage. Demurrage cannot be properly measured by the price paid for the ship: (Pritchard's Digest, 707, 708.) This ship would not earn more than usual and is therefore only entitled to the usual rate. The Black Prince (sup.) was a case where unusual profits were made. The usual rate is 6*d.* per ton, and that is the basis of the Registrar's report. He goes into the other modes of calculation to make his report agree with the appellant's theory as to wear and tear. The evidence as to the cost of provisions is not satisfactory. The question whether evidence should be objected to before the registrar and merchants should be decided, as they may get information out of court. Miller's letter is not different from other evidence, such as is admitted at these references. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—No doubt, but the objection in this case is that Miller's letter is used to contradict Staeven's evidence; an unsworn document used against sworn testimony. The registrar in his report clearly is guided by this letter, and there was no opportunity of cross-examination. This is not right.] The registrar did not form his opinion on that letter alone, and he came to the conclusion that Staeven's evidence was untrustworthy, and there is nothing to show the contrary.

Dec. 12.—W. G. F. Phillimore in reply.—There was no opportunity of testing Miller's statements. There was no necessity for us to enter into a protest as to the coals at St. Vincent. The coaling would only have taken twenty-four hours. Although a master is not bound to trans-ship, it is nowhere decided that he may not do so. No doubt this delayed them, but the principal object of the delay was the survey of the damaged cargo and of the ship. The underwriter's certificate on the Rio surveys only show that surveys have been held. Evidence was that the donkey engine could not have been prepared in dry dock. As to rate of demurrage; this was a first trip, and ordinary rules cannot apply. She was prevented by the delay of collision and the German war from continuing her trade, and future earnings are therefore no test. The rate of 6*d.* per ton cannot apply to large steamers. The test is the average price of the vessel at the time of the collision. There were extraordinary expenses according to the evidence.

Our. adv. vult.

Dec. 19.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is an appeal from second report of the registrar assisted by merchants, in a cause of limitation of liability, which was referred to him by this court in order that he might pronounce upon the claims of the owners of the vessel Bismarck and of the owners of the cargo laden on board her, against the City of Buenos Ayres. The limit of the liability of the Buenos Ayres had been fixed by the Court at the sum of 10,514*l.*; the claim of the owners of the Bismarck was for a sum of 13,546*l.* 6*s.* 6*d.*; the claim of the owners of the cargo was for a sum of 4444*l.* 19*s.* 6*d.* The fund, therefore, paid into court of 10,515*l.*, with the interest at 4 per cent. from the date of the collision until the payment into court, was insufficient to satisfy the two claims upon it, and the question to be decided was the proportion in which that fund should be divided between them. The first report of the registrar, made in April 1870, found that the sum of 8205*l.* 0*s.* 9*d.* was due to the petitioners, instead of the sum of 13,546*l.* 6*s.* 6*d.* claimed by them. To the owners of the cargo 3558*l.* 11*s.* was awarded in lieu of the sum of 4444*l.* 19*s.* 7*d.* claimed. With that award the owners of the cargo are content. Objections were taken by the owners of the Bismarck to this report, and the case was heard before me in December and January last; and the result was, that all objections were withdrawn, with the exception of those which related to the sum allowed for demurrage, and with respect to this item the court sent back the report for reconsideration, with liberty to both parties to produce further evidence, and with power to the registrar to increase or diminish the amount previously awarded. In July the registrar made a second report, in which he found that 1125*l.* was due to the owners of the Bismarck on account of demurrage in lieu of the sum of 1250*l.* previously reported to be due. The owners of the Bismarck have appealed against this award to the court, and they place their objections to it upon two grounds—namely, that the demurrage is inadequate, both with regard to the time and to the rate of expenses allowed. The demurrage allowed on the first report was for 100 days, at 12*l.* 10*s.* per day; the demurrage allowed by the second report is for ninety days only, at the same rate. The appellants claimed in their petition 1035*l.* more than the sum allowed, on the ground that they were entitled to demurrage for 135 days, at the rate of 16*l.* per day. That period of time was reduced by five days during the course of the agreement, and 130 days are now claimed by the appellants. It is not without reluctance that the court entertains objections from a tribunal so well calculated to deal with the questions submitted to it as that of the registrar and merchants; nevertheless, as I have before me the evidence upon which their conclusions were founded, and as I learn from the report the way in which it affected their judgments, I must not shrink from my duty of correcting any portions of the report which are founded—if any such there be—upon what appears to me an erroneous view of the evidence. And in the present case, also, I must remember that there is some variation between the first and the second report. I must now proceed to state my opinion upon the two questions of the time and the rate as to which it is alleged the demurrage allowed is insufficient. The Bismarck left Glasgow on the 30th Nov. 1868 for the Cape of Good Hope. On the 10th Dec. last it appeared that a fire had broken out among the coals. It was extinguished, and on the 16th it broke out again, and was again extinguished. At six p.m. on the 19th Dec. she arrived in the roadstead at St. Vincent, and it is important to observe the fact that the Bismarck had always intended to take in coals at this place. Three hours after her arrival at St. Vincent she was run into and seriously damaged by the City of Buenos Ayres. The Bismarck remained at St. Vincent until the 16th March, when she sailed for Rio Janeiro for the purpose of effecting further repairs, and there she arrived on the 30th March. On the 19th June she left Rio, with a cargo for Hamburg. The question is whether all, or, if not all, how much of this period of time was properly occupied in effecting repairs, rendered necessary by the collision, to the vessel. In their arguments before this court the appellants claimed the whole interval from the 19th Dec. to the 4th June, with the exception of two days at St. Vincent, and four days at Rio, making a total of 130 days. The Registrar has allowed only ninety days. And first, with respect to the delay at St. Vincent. That period admits of two divisions: First, the time occupied by coaling; secondly, the time occupied by the transaction of business and repairs. As to the first period, the registrar has considered that five days of this detention must be ascribed to the coaling as connected with the circumstances of the fire, and cannot be charged to the collision. I think the evidence shows this deduction to be too large, and that, having regard to the fact that the Bismarck always intended to coal at St. Vincent, and that the fire seems never to have been connected with the cargo, and to the average of time which is shown to be necessary for coaling, that three days would have been sufficient. I add, therefore, under this head, two days to the ninety days which has been allowed by the registrar. The next deduction is from the 16th Feb. to the 16th March, or twenty-eight days. This deduction, which was not made in the first report, is founded on the ground that the Bismarck was in a proper condition to sail for Rio on the 14th Feb.; and allowing two days in addition, she ought, at all events, to have sailed on the 16th Feb. The period between the 16th Feb. and the 16th March was, according to the evidence of Mr. Staevens, occupied with the transaction of business, having for its object to obtain necessary papers properly certified by the Portuguese authorities—who proceed, unfortunately, in a lethargic manner—the sale of the damaged cargo and the trans-shipment of the undamaged cargo upon a vessel called the Willy. After the examination of the evidence, I have come to the opinion that the correct conclusion was arrived at by the registrar in his first report, in which this deduction was not made. There seems to have been no inducement to delay at St. Vincent but on the contrary, from the extreme dearness of provisions and the want of appliances for making repairs, every inducement for leaving it, and the instructions were positive to get away as soon as possible. It is difficult in this case to draw a line between business unquestionably connected with the collision—such as making the protest and obtaining the necessary official documents—and business connected with the trans-shipment of the cargo. The master had, in the circumstances, the duty cast upon him of acting as agent to a certain extent for the cargo as well as the ship. It is not necessary that I should decide, and I am not prepared to decide, whether, if the time had been occupied entirely by the trans-shipment rendered necessary by the collision, that delay ought or ought not to be charged to the collision, but I am of opinion that the result of the evidence is that the delay was caused by the necessary transaction of business connected with the collision, I must therefore allow the twenty-eight days which have been disallowed. I have now to deal with the question of twenty-eight days' delay at Rio, where the Bismarck arrived on the 30th March. I have considered the whole of the evidence, not only derived from the testimony of the witness, but from the documentary evidence. The registrar has disallowed twenty-eight days, including the interval from the 21st to the 31st May. The evidence, especially the documentary evidence, leads me to the conclusion that this is an excess of eight days; I shall therefore allow a deduction of twenty days. Lastly, I have to consider the objection as to the rate of allowance, and, according to the best judgment I can form on the evidence before me, I am satisfied that the finding of the registrar upon this point ought not to be disturbed. Having regard to all the circumstances of the case, and the peculiar position of the respondents, I shall make no order as to costs.

THE PALMYRA.

Salvage—Apportionment—Sailing vessel as salvor. In apportioning salvage reward among the owners, master, and crew of a sailing vessel which has rendered salvage services, the Court of Admiralty will not allot to the owners the same proportion of the reward as in the case of services rendered by a steamship (usually one-half), unless the circumstances show that the vessel itself, as when the services are effected by steam power, was the chief agent in effecting the salvage.

In apportioning the sum of 1500l., where the services were mainly the personal exertions of the master and crew of a sailing vessel, the court awarded 500l. to the owners, 650l. to the crew, and 350l. to the master.

This was an application to the court to apportion the sum of 1500l., tendered in this suit and accepted by the owners, master, and crew of the sailing vessel Adelphoi, as salvage reward in respect of services rendered by that ship to the sailing vessel Palmyra. The Adelphoi was a barque of 349 tons register, manned by a crew of twelve hands all told, and was bound on a voyage from Colombo to London with a general cargo. The Palmyra was a ship of 932 tons register, manned by a crew of twenty-three hands all told, and was bound on a voyage from Liverpool to New Orleans with a cargo of 885 tons of salt. The Adelphoi found the Palmyra in a disabled condition in the Atlantic, about 700 miles due west of Bordeaux, on the 30th Sept. 1871. There was then a light wind. Some of the Palmyra's crew deserted her, and went on board another vessel. The master of the Adelphoi boarded the Palmyra, and found that her master had the intention of abandoning and scuttling his ship. The master of the Adelphoi remained on board the Palmyra for some time, and after the Palmyra's nautical instruments, the effects of her crew, and some of her stores had been transferred to the Adelphoi, he succeeded in inducing the master of the Palmyra to stick to his ship, by promising him to remain by him and give him all possible assistance, and by threatening him that "If you leave your ship, I will send one of my mates on board, and if you scuttle your ship, you will run a risk of losing your certificate and of being transported." The master of the Adelphoi then left the Palmyra, leaving on board of her the master and eleven of the crew; eleven others had been taken away by the other vessel. On the same evening a gale sprang up which lasted for two days, and until the morning of Oct. 3rd, and the Adelphoi kept as near to the Palmyra as it was possible to do. On Oct. 2nd the master of the Palmyra hailed the master of the Adelphoi to come on board, and two of the crew of the latter vessel volunteered to take him on board. They went on board and back again to their own ship, and again on board the Palmyra, a gale blowing the whole time. The master of the Palmyra was very desirous of leaving his ship, but an agreement was entered into between the two masters that the Adelphoi should take the Palmyra to an English port, and the master of the Adelphoi returned to his vessel. On Oct. 3rd, the weather having moderated, the Adelphoi took the Palmyra in tow, and although the tow rope broke four times, succeeded in towing her safely to Falmouth, whence they arrived on Oct. 6th. On Oct. 3rd, the effects of the crew and the nautical instruments were sent back to the Palmyra, and the stores were returned at Falmouth. The Adelphoi would not have gone into Falmouth but for the salvage services. During the gale the master of the Adelphoi was obliged to direct the Palmyra's course as there were no instruments on board of her, and this he did by laying his own ship alongside as close as possible and hailing her. The master and crew of the Adelphoi were engaged day and night with little intermission during the services, and they were much exhausted.

The Admiralty Advocate (Dr. Deane, Q.C.), and Wood Hill for the owners and six of the crew of the Adelphoi.—We admit that the master and the two men who went on board the Palmyra are entitled to more than the others. Still the master, although he incurs personal responsibility, throws great responsibility on his owners, more especially with reference to their liability for the cargo. The responsibility he incurs is really that of the owners, and they are therefore entitled to the greater proportion of the reward. The owners are entitled to at least one-half.

These are cases of steamers. The same was awarded to the owners of a sailing vessel. (The Waterloo, 2 Dods. 443). Although the master and crew behaved well, there is nothing to entitle them to an extraordinary amount. The voyage was delayed and this loss falls on the owners.

Bruce, for five of the crew of the Adelphoi.—The services were mainly rendered by the personal exertions of the crew. In most of the cases cited, steamers rendered the services, and steamers are by reason of their steam power themselves the principal agents in services rendered by them.

Phillimore for the master.—The owners did not suffer from the delay. The ship was always on her course. The Palmyra was really saved by the encouragement given by the master and crew of the Adelphoi, and was not abandoned in consequence of the language used by the master of the Adelphoi, which induced the master of the Palmyra to stick to his ship. The master's personal services, and his determination and skill, mainly effected the salvage.

The Admiralty Advocate in reply.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—In all these cases of apportionment, with respect to the amount to be allotted to the owners, a question to be considered is, whether the salving vessel was under steam or sail. In the case of a steamship, the steam power is the chief agent in effecting the salvage, but where a sailing vessel is a salvor, the circumstances of each case must decide whether the owners can possibly be entitled to the same reward as would be allotted to the owners of a steamer. I cannot find such circumstances here. The Adelphoi was in some jeopardy, no doubt, but it was not very great. With respect to the claim of the master, it is impossible to doubt that his courage and determination, as well as his skill, were the principal means of saving the Palmyra. But for his threat in the first instance, the vessel would no doubt have been scuttled. Taking these circumstances into consideration, I shall award 500*l.* to the owners, 650*l.* to the crew, a double portion going to those two men who went on board in the gale, and 350*l.* to the master.

THIS was a cause of salvage instituted on behalf of John Purvis and others, fishermen of Whitburn, in the county of Durham, against the steam-tug Empress. The Empress was abandoned by her crew, and was driven on to Whitburn Rocks, and the plaintiffs on 23rd Dec. 1871, succeeded in getting her off, and took her as a derelict into Sunderland Harbour. praisement issued out of the Court of Admiralty at the sum of 720*l*.

Clarkson, for the defendants, the owners of the Empress, now moved (by consent, a petition on protest not having being filed) the court to dismiss the suit with costs, on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction. By the Merchant shipping Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63) s. 49, the provisions of the eighth part of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), in respect of salvage cases, are extended "to all cases in which the value of the property saved does not exceed one thousand pounds," and the latter Act (s. 460) takes away the jurisdiction of this court in such cases and confers it upon justices.

Phillimore, for the salvors.—No doubt the court lost its jurisdiction in these cases under the interpretation of those Acts by Dr. Lushington, but it is now restored by the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71). If we had been content to recover 300*l*., the County Court could have heard this case under sect 3 (a) of that Act, and could have been transferred by motion to this court under sects. 6 & 8, and again sect. 9 of the same Act, distinctly contemplates a cause being tried in this court, when the value is under 1000*l*., and makes the question a matter of costs only. In the Dowse (L. Rep. 3 Adm. 135; 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 627), and in Everard v. Kendall (L. Rep. 5 C. P. 428; 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 408), it is decided that the County Courts, having admiralty jurisdiction, have only jurisdiction in causes in which the High Court of Admiralty has itself jurisdiction, and the converse of that proposition must be true; viz., that wherever the County Courts have admiralty jurisdiction the same jurisdiction at

(a) County Court Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868.—Any County Court having admiralty jurisdiction shall have jurisdiction . . . to try and determine . . . the following causes:

1. As to any claim for salvage—any cause in which the property saved does not exceed 1000*l*., or in which the amount claimed does not exceed 300*l*.

Sect. 6. The High Court of Admiralty, on motion by any party to an admiralty cause pending in a County Court, may, if it shall think fit, with previous notice to the other party, transfer the cause to the High court of Admiralty, and may order security for costs, or impose such other terms as to the court may seem fit.

Sect. 8. If during the progress of an admiralty cause in a County Court it shall appear to the court that the cause could be more conveniently prosecuted in some other County Court, or in the High Court of Admiralty, the court may by order transfer it to some other County Court, or to the High Court of Admiralty of England, as the case may be, and the cause shall thenceforward be so prosecuted accordingly.

Sect. 9. If any person shall take in the High Court of Admiralty of England, or in any Superior Court, proceedings which he might, without agreement, have taken in a County Court, except by order of the judge of the High Court of Admiralty, or of such Superior Court, or of a County Court having admiralty jurisdiction, and shall not recover a sum exceeding the amount to which the jurisdiction of the County Courts in that admiralty cause is limited by this Act, and also if any person without agreement shall, except by order as aforesaid, take proceedings as to salvage in the High Court of Admiralty, or in any Superior Court, in respect of property saved, the value of which, when saved, does not exceed 1000*l*., he shall not be entitled to costs, and shall be liable to be condemned in costs, unless the judge of the High Court of Admiralty, or of a Superior Court, before whom the cause is tried or heard, shall certify that it was a proper cause to be tried in the High Court of Admiralty of England, or in a Superior Court.

the same time exists in the Admiralty Court. This question has already been decided by the Hermann Wedel (23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 876; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 530), where it is said that the cases which decide that under the Merchant Shipping Acts the court has no jurisdiction are inapplicable since the passing of this Act. The Court has now a discretion to hear any cause of salvage, whatever the value.

Clarkson in reply.—There is nothing in the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 to prevent a County Court from awarding more than 300*l*. There are in sect. 3 two cases in which a County Court has jurisdiction, and they are totally distinct. The jurisdiction of this court is taken away by express terms in the Merchant Shipping Acts, and cannot be restored by words which merely imply jurisdiction. The Hermann Wedel (sup.) does not decide that the court has jurisdiction originally, but only that there was an agreement such as gave it jurisdiction under sect. 9 already cited. [SIR R. PHILLIMORE. This 9th section does certainly appear to contemplate the court taking jurisdiction.] It would be straining the words of the Legislature to hold that where jurisdiction has been taken away by express words it can be revived by words such as those of sect. 9. The words of the section can be satisfied without taking this jurisdiction. It is admitted that but for sect. 9 there would be no jurisdiction. [SIR R. PHILLIMORE.—Does not that section contemplate a case under 1000*l*. in value being tried here, and a state of things where the party suing would be entitled to costs?] No doubt, but that is in one particular case, namely, a case coming from the Cinque Ports. It was decided in The Jeune Paul (L. Rep. 1 Adm. & Ecc. 336; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 125; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 478) that this court had concurrent jurisdiction with the Court of Admiralty of the Cinque Ports where the value was under 1000*l*., and it is more reasonable to suppose that the Legislature, by this section, intended to provide for such a case as this rather than to revive a jurisdiction expressly taken away. The Legislature must be taken to have been perfectly acquainted with the subject with which they were dealing, and it must be supposed that they meant to meet some existing case such as the above, rather than to give general jurisdiction by implication. [SIR R. PHILLIMORE.—The Act gives me power to transfer causes here, even though the amount is below the limit.] Such a cause is still a County Court cause, and the power to transfer does not give this court original jurisdiction. By the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51), the County Courts having admiralty jurisdiction, have power to try causes in which this court has no original jurisdiction, and yet they may be transferred here by the Act now in question, and the appeal lies here. Again, there is a distinction between salvage suits and other admiralty causes; in the latter the court has original jurisdiction, but in salvage it has not where the value is under 1000*l*.

SIR R. PHILLIMORE.—It is an unsatisfactory duty to have to construe the sections of this Act, but as it is cast upon me I must interpret them according to the only meaning that, in my view, can be put upon them. The only construction that I can put upon sect. 9 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 is that which I have already indicated during the argument. I am of opinion that the court has jurisdiction to hear the case, and to award costs according to the view it may take on the hearing. I quite feel the difficulty which must necessarily arise from either construction of the section; but I must, as I interpret the section, allow the case to go on, and decide upon the merits hereafter whether it was a proper cause to be tried here.

BECKETT v. THE WEST OF ENGLAND MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY (LIMITED).

Marine insurance—Construction of policy—Inception of risk—Policy on freight—Goods not on board—At and from.

A ship was chartered to carry a cargo from Liverpool to Lagos, on the west coast of Africa, there discharge and reload another cargo for the United Kingdom, in consideration of a lump sum by way of freight, payable half before sailing from Liverpool, half on delivery of the homeward cargo. The plaintiff, the shipowner, effected an insurance on freight "at and from Lagos," and the policy contained a clause whereby the defendants, the insurance company, agreed that the insurance "shall commence upon freight and goods or merchandise aforesaid from the loading of the said goods or merchandise on board the said ship or vessel at as above." The ship was lost before she had shipped any of her homeward cargo.

Held, that this clause precluded the plaintiff from recovering against the underwriters, although the freight was chartered freight.

DECLARATION on a policy of insurance (afterwards set out), upon freight to be earned by the ship Gem, under a charter party (afterwards set out), lost or not lost, at and from Lagos and [or] any place or places on the west coast of Africa, between Cape Palmas and Cape Formosa to any port of call, and [or] discharge in the United Kingdom; the insurance to commence upon the freight and goods or merchandise aforesaid from the loading of the said goods or merchandise on board the said vessel, alleging interest in the freight, and loss of the vessel by the perils insured against whilst in Lagos Roads and during the continuance of the risk. Pleas: First, denial that the defendants became insurers; secondly, denial of interest; thirdly, that the policy was not made for the benefit, or by the authority of the said persons interested as alleged; fourthly, denial that the ship was under charter; fifthly, denial of loss; sixthly, that the loss of the said ship and subject-matter of insurance did not happen during the continuance of the said risk, but before the same had commenced, and before the said ship was at Lagos, or any place on the west coast of Africa between Cape Palmas and Cape Formosa, within the meaning of the said policy.

On these pleas the plaintiffs joined issue.

At the trial before Blackburn, J., at Guildhall, sittings after Michaelmas Term, 1870, it appeared that the plaintiff was a shipowner at Glasgow, and that the defendants were an Insurance Company, carrying on business at Exeter. On the 26th April 1869 a charter-party was entered into between the plaintiff and Messrs. Holland, Jaques, and Co., in the following terms:

London, 24th April, 1869.
Liverpool, 26th April, 1869.

[Charter-party.]

It is this day mutually agreed between John Beckett, Esq., owner of the good ship or vessel called the Gem A 1 red., of the measurement of 120 tons or thereabouts, now in Liverpool, and Messrs. Holland, Jaques, and Co., of London, merchants, that the said ship being tight, staunch, and strong, and every way fitted for the voyage, shall receive and take on board in one of the docks and river for gunpowder, all such lawful goods or merchandise as the charterers or their agents, may send alongside, and shall forthwith proceed and deliver the same at any place or places on the West Coast of Africa agreeable to bills of lading, as directed by the charterers' agent, between Cape Palmas and Cape Formosa inclusive, and reload a full and complete cargo of African produce; the vessel to load a full cargo if required inside Lagos Bar, which the said merchants bind themselves to ship, &c., and being so loaded shall therewith proceed to London, and deliver the same (the act of God, &c., excepted). The freight to be paid as follows: In full for the round the lump sum of 600l. payable by charterers, acceptance at three months' date for 300l. from day of clearing, and the balance on correct delivery of the return cargo, as customary, in cash. Fifty running days, &c. [Here follow various immaterial clauses.]

Signed { HOLLAND, JAQUES, AND Co.
JOHN BECKETT.

Pursuant to the charter-party, an outward cargo was shipped at Liverpool by the charterers, consisting of eleven bales of cotton goods, to be delivered at the port of Jellah Coffie, on the West Coast of Africa, and of one hundred cases of hatchets, and fifty tons of salt, and a quantity of mats for dunnage to be delivered at Lagos, and for this cargo the master signed bills of lading on 10th May.

On 11th May the policy in question was effected by the plaintiff's brokers, and its material parts are as follow:

West of England Insurance Company (Limited).
No. 4806. 300l.

Whereas Walker, Martin and Todd have represented to the West of England Marine Insurance Company (Limited) that they are interested in or duly authorised as owner, agent, or otherwise to make the insurance hereinafter mentioned and described with the said company, and have promised or otherwise obliged themselves to pay forthwith for the use of the said company at the office of the said company the sum of 6l. as a premium or consideration at and after the rate of 40s. per cent. for such insurance; now this policy of insurance witnesseth that, in consideration of the premises, the said company promises and agrees with the said Walker, Martin, and Todd, their executors, administrators, and assigns, that the said company will pay and make good all such losses and damages hereinafter expressed as may happen to be subject matter of this policy, and may attach to this policy in respect of the sum of 300l. hereby declared to be upon freight valued at 300l. the ship or vessel called the Gem, whereof is at present master, or whoever shall go for master of the said ship or vessel, lost or not lost, at and from Lagos, and, [or] any place or places on the west coast of Africa between Cape Palmas and Cape Formosa, to any port of call and [or] discharge in the United Kingdom, including all risk of craft, warranted free of captures and seizures, and the consequences of any attempts thereat.

And the said company promises and agrees that the insurance aforesaid shall commence upon the freight and goods or merchandise aforesaid, from the loading of the said goods or merchandise on board the said ship or vessel at as above, and continue until the said goods or merchandise be discharged and safely landed as at above; and that it shall be lawful for the said ship or vessel to proceed and sail to and touch and stay at any ports or places whatsoever in the course of her said voyage for all necessary purposes, without prejudice to this insurance, and touching the adventures and perils, &c. [Here follow the usual perils insured against, the suing and labouring clause, and certain warranties, free from average under 5 per cent., and ship and freight, warranted free, average under 3 per cent., unless general, or the ship be stranded.] In witness whereof the said company have hereunto set their common seal at Exeter the 11th May 1869.

The Gem left Liverpool on 11th May, and arrived at Jellah Coffie on 12th July, 1869, and there discharged the eleven bales of cotton shipped for that place, and after three days' delay proceeded for Lagos. On 18th July 1869, she arrived in Lagos roads. Between Lagos roads and Lagos harbour there is a bar which makes it necessary for ships drawing more than 9ft. of water to discharge part of their cargo into lighters in the roads, so as to enable them to get over the bar into the harbour. Vessels usually discharged part, if not all, of their cargoes in Lagos roads, and when the Gem arrived there, several vessels were then discharging in that place. On 19th July, the master gave notice to the consignees that the ship was ready for discharging in the roads, and on 21st July a portion of the cargo was discharged, and the discharge continued down to 29th July, when the ship had 87 tons on board, and was drawing only 8½ft. of water, and thereupon the master applied to the consignees for a tug and pilot to take the ship inside the bar to enable her to finish the discharge there, and to commence reloading the homeward cargo in Lagos harbour. On 5th Aug. a pilot came on board and a tug took the Gem in tow, and they proceeded for the harbour, but in crossing the bar the Gem struck the ground and broke the tow rope, and was obliged to put back into the roads. The Gem remained at anchor in the roads, without discharging any more cargo, until 11th Aug. when another attempt was made to tow the Gem across the bar, but she again struck the ground, and the tug was unable to get her off. The Gem ultimately drifted on the beach, and was abandoned. No portion of the homeward cargo had been shipped.

Upon these facts, Blackburn, J., ruled that the Gem had arrived "at" Lagos within the meaning of the policy, and so directed the jury, and a verdict was entered for the plaintiff for 300*l.*, but leave was reserved to the defendants to move to enter a verdict, if the court should be of opinion that Blackburn, J., was wrong in his ruling. The words in the policy—"The insurance aforesaid shall commence upon the freight and goods or merchandise aforesaid from the loading of the said goods or merchandise on board the said ship or vessel at as above"—were not in any way brought to the attention of Blackburn, J., or the jury during the trial.

On Jan. 11, 1871, the defendants moved pursuant to the lease reserved, and brought to the attention of the court the above clause of the policy, and obtained a rule calling upon the plaintiffs to "show cause why the verdict obtained in this cause should not be set aside and a verdict entered for the defendants instead thereof, on the ground that the risk had not attached when the ship was lost."

May 30.—Manisty, Q.C. (Barnard with him) showed cause.—This was a policy on chartered freight. It is not so expressed in the policy, but it was so in point of fact. The voyage, therefore, must be considered as a whole, and the moment the vessel arrived at Lagos the policy attached.

The ship had already broken ground upon the voyage on which the freight was to be earned under the charter party by sailing from Liverpool, and on her arrival at Lagos the risk commenced. When she was in Lagos Roads she was "at" Lagos within the meaning of the policy. The fact that she had not discharged the whole of her outward cargo cannot affect the plaintiff's right to recover: (Foley v. The United Fire and Marine Insurance Company of Sydney, L. Rep. 5 C. P. 155; 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 108.) The clause in the charter party which provides that the insurance shall commence when goods are on board cannot apply to freight. No doubt if the policy were on goods or ship it would prevent the plaintiff from recovering, but with respect to freight can have no more effect than if it were omitted altogether. If it should be held binding it will have the effect of rendering void the word "at," as the freight would have been uninsured during the greater part of the time the ship was at Lagos. The policy in Foley v. The United Fire and Marine Insurance Company of Sydney (sup.) was upon chartered freight "at and from Mauritius to rice ports;" and Kelly, C.B. says:—"It seems to me that it would be a strained construction of the policy to subdivide the period during which the ship was at Port Louis into two portions, and to say that she shall not be insured for more than one of these two portions." This clause in the policy is only the ordinary printed form of the company's policies, and cannot override an express stipulation applying to a particular adventure.

Watkin Williams (Sir G. Honyman, Q.C., with him) in support of the rule.—The plaintiff admits that if this were a policy in goods, this clause would bar his claim, and we contend that with this special clause in the policy the words in this case can apply only to freight. The clause is printed and used in policies on goods also. "At and from" are words used in the ordinary form of the policy, and must be qualified by the meaning to be given to the special clause. The risk did not commence until the goods were laden on board, and in this case the outward cargo was not discharged [COCKBURN, C.J.—The plaintiff was entitled to his freight whether the goods were loaded or not. He gets his chartered freight independently of the loading. The assured cannot have intended that the policy should not be the same as the risk.] Whether the assured did or not cannot affect the defendants, as the brokers made the policy, and they clearly so intended. Again, there is a difference between freight and chartered freight. [BLACKBURN, J.—It has been settled for a century that "freight" must be construed in a policy in its widest sense.] Ordinary policies on freight are made quite irrespective of the goods being laden on board.

Winter v. Haldimand, 3 B. & Ad. 649;

Potter v. Rankin, L. Rep. 3 C. P. 562; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 712; and in the Exchequer Chamber; . Rep. 5 C. P. 341; 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 347.

The time for the commencement of the insurance is fixed in order to avoid the risk of the most critical part of the voyage, viz., that during which the vessel lies off a dangerous port, as in the present instance, and the words of the policy are expressly framed to meet decided cases. The trade on the west coast of Africa is peculiar, being a barter trade, consequently large quantities of nuts, oil, and other African produce are constantly in store waiting for ships, which, therefore, have a homeward cargo always ready for them. Then it might be said, that a policy of insurance always attached on the arrival of the ship. This clause is inserted to prevent the attaching at that period, and the meaning of it is, that the risk shall not commence until the cargo is loaded, and only then. Should the court decide against the underwriters of the present policy, more stringent terms must be devised and inserted into policies in order to express their obvious intention as to the inception of the risk. This policy is not in the ordinary form of Lloyd's policy; it is a special form. In Lloyd's policies, where an insurance is effected on freight, it is so expressed in the margin of the policy, without the general form being in any way altered, and the clause as to the attaching of the policy is "beginning the adventure upon the said goods and merchandises from the loading thereof on board the said ship," which words are only applicable to a policy on ship or goods. This policy declares the insurance to be on freight in the body of the policy and is on nothing else, and there is a special clause that "the insurance aforesaid shall commence upon the freight and goods or merchandise aforesaid from the loading," &c. In this policy this clause can only apply to freight.

COCKBURN, C. J.—I am of opinion that this rule must be made absolute. The words used are plain, precise, and perfectly intelligible; they mean that the risk shall not attach until the goods are actually on board. I did not at first understand how or why such a stipulation as the one in question should be introduced or submitted to on the part of the plaintiff, the shipowner, seeing that his remuneration on the charter-party—his freight (the term being applied to whatever was earned by the vessel)—was in no wise dependent on the loading and carrying of the goods, but was for the use of his vessel, whether a cargo was carried or not. Therefore it struck me that if there was any way in which we could read these words, reddendo singula singulis, the argument of Mr. Manisty might prevail; but I think the answer given by Mr. Watkin Williams quite conclusive, first, that this clause being part of a printed form of policy cannot be intended to apply to goods, for the simple reason that until they were loaded the risk did not attach; but besides that I think Mr. Williams has given a second very good reason for the insertion of the words by the underwriters, viz., the peculiar difficulty of loading vessels on the west coast of Africa, where they are exposed to dangers of tempests and other perils during the process of loading. That being so, one can quite understand the underwriters saying "We do not take upon ourselves, without requiring extra premium, the risk of the vessel loading at the coast under these circumstances." Though it may be that, they said: "When the loading is completed and the vessel is over the bar, with a full cargo on board, we will undertake it." But, even independently of that, I cannot see any possible means of getting over the precise language used in the policy. I think, therefore, that this vessel having been lost before the loading was completed, the risk under the policy never attached, and that the defendants are entitled to judgment, and that the rule must be made absolute.

BLACKBURN, J.—I come to the same conclusion. The policy of insurance is, in fact, a contract by which the underwriters promise that they will indemnify the assured against certain perils from the particular time. When the clause is looked at, we see that it amounts to this, that the underwriters insure from the time the cargo is on board, whether the subject matter of the insurance is on freight or on goods. Of course then another question comes in—if the freight is merely dependent upon finding a cargo, the ship may never be in a position to earn it. Therefore, although the period may have arrived when the underwriters are responsible for perils, and the ship went down, yet if no freight really existed, it could not be recoverable from the underwriters. Then comes the question, did the period come, and was there freight upon which the risk would attach? It is now perfectly well established that the word "freight" is a general term used, as a merchant would understand it, to mean the benefit that is to be got from the employment of the ship; not merely chartered freight, but also that benefit which the ship would get from carrying the owner's goods in the owner's ship. Therefore I think "freight" clearly included this charter, and that there clearly was cargo in existence, so that freight really did exist, and from the loss of the vessel the freight was lost. Now in the case of an ordinary Lombard-street policy in general use, where there is no particular mention made of freight or the period when it is to be paid, it is to commence "beginning the adventure . . . upon the ship, &c.;" it does not state the time when the risk is to commence, and consequently it is always the practice on those policies for the risk to begin at the place where the voyage insured against begins, viz., "at and from Lagos" (in this case.) In the case of Potter v. Rankin (sup.) alluded to by Mr. Williams, the policy was effected on chartered freight from Calcutta to London, to attach only during a preliminary voyage to New Zealand. There the freight which was actually provided was freight which the ship would have carried from Calcutta to England, but then the policy had said, "From the Clyde to Southland, New Zealand, while there, and thence to Otago, New Zealand, and for thirty days in port there after arrival," and the underwriters were, I think, perfectly rightly held responsible. But here it was from "at and from" Lagos, and if the matter had stood here I apprehend, that the vessel, having reached Lagos, the underwriters' risk would have commenced there; but then come the words, "and the said company promises and agrees that the insurance aforesaid shall commence upon the freight and goods or merchandise on board the said ship or vessel at as above," and those words are printed in a part of the policy where they do not catch attention. At the trial I never noticed them, and I was not even aware of them when the motion for a new trial was made until my attention was called to them. I think the company making a policy which is different from the ordinary form, should print them a little more conspicuously. But, having regard to the words used in it, I cannot see how we can construe this clause applying to the goods and merchandise and not to freight.

MELLOR, J.—The construction which we are asked, on behalf of the plaintiffs, to put on the clause is hardly a fair one. What the words really mean is, the commencement of the risk on the freight shall be when the goods and merchandise are on board at Lagos, and not when the ship merely arrives there. Once let that construction be put on the policy, and the case is perfectly clear.

HANNEN, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think it impossible to put any construction on these words which would give effect to Mr. Manisty's argument. We cannot reject operative words in a sentence merely because there may be a reason for a suggestion that one of the parties may not have contemplated the effect they would have. It must be remembered that they are the words of the underwriters as well as those of the assured. Mr. Williams has given us very good reason why the underwriters should desire to put those words in, and I do not see how they could have expressed their intention in other terms, although, as my brother Blackburn suggested, they certainly might have printed them in larger letters.

GANDY v. ADELAIDE MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Marine insurance—Concealment of material fact—Lloyd's rules—"Half-time" survey—Loss of class—Knowledge of underwriter.

By Lloyd's rules, a vessel classed A 1 for seven years must undergo a half-time survey, signified when undergone by the letters "H. T." endorsed on the Lloyd's register. If such survey is refused by the owner, the vessel is struck off the register.

Such refusal is not necessarily (Cockburn, C.J., dissentiente) a material fact which need be communicated to an underwriter of Lloyd's, who subscribes a policy on such a vessel after the refusal (the letters "H. T." not being in the register), but before the vessel was struck off the register. The materiality of the fact is a question for the jury.

Seem, that the initialing of a ship is so far the completion of a contract of insurance that an underwriter is only bound by his knowledge of facts existing at that time, and not by knowledge within his power between that time and the execution of the policy.

DECLARATION on a policy of insurance dated 1st Dec. 1869 on the ship Annie, lost or not lost, for twelve months from 1st Dec. 1869, to 30th Nov. 1870, alleging that the defendants executed and underwrote the said policy for the sum of 300l., at a premium of 7 guineas per cent., and that the ship was totally lost on 31st Dec. 1869, by the perils of the seas insured against.

Fourth plea: That the defendants were induced to execute the said policy and to become insurers to the plaintiff, by the misrepresentation of the plaintiff and his agents, and by the wrongful and improper concealment by the plaintiff and his agents from the defendants of certain material facts then known to the plaintiff and unknown to the defendants, and which ought to have been communicated to the defendants by the plaintiff and his agents.

Pursuant to a master's order, the following particulars of concealment were delivered by the defendants to the plaintiffs:

Whereas the vessel, when the insurance was offered to defendants and accepted by them, stood in the register book under class A the plaintiff, who was managing owner, had at the time the intention that she should go out of the book, and with that intention had refused to subject her to the survey, which, according to the rules of the book, she must have undergone to entitle her to keep her class, and to which the surveyor of the book, by letter, required her to be subjected. The consequence was, that she was insured at a first-class premium; whereas, if the truth had been known, she would not have been insured at all.

The cause came to trial at the Liverpool winter assizes, before Brett, J. The entry of the Annie in Lloyds' book was produced, and its material parts were as follows: "Annie; bk., 345 N. Bruns. 1865, 6 mo.: 7 A 1, 11, 65;" this meant that the Annie was a barque of 345 tons register, built in New Brunswick; launched in 1865, in the month of June; classed A 1 for seven years, having been surveyed and classed in Nov. 1865. Lloyds' rules were also produced, and those relating to this question are as follow:

Rule 33.—Ships A will consist of new ships and those which have not passed the prescribed age, provided they are kept in a state of complete repair and efficiency. The character A will not, however, be granted to any vessel unless satisfactory evidence of the date and build, and place where built, is produced.

Rule 34.—The number of years to be assigned for this character to be determined with reference to the original constitution and quality of the vessels, materials employed, and the mode of building; and their continuance for the time so assigned to depend upon its being shown by occasional surveys, annually if practicable, that their efficiency is duly maintained. The characters of ships classed A will be struck out of the ships' book, unless they be submitted to the following intermediate survey, within periods not exceeding four years in case of vessels classed eight years and under either originally, on restoration, or on continuation, and within periods not exceeding half that assigned in vessels classed for longer terms. The survey will be registered in the register book thus: "H. T." (half-time), with the date of the survey affixed. [The rule then set out how the survey was to be made.]

The current rate of insurance of a vessel classed A 1 was then seven guineas per cent.

It appeared that the defendants' copy of Lloyd's book was sent by them to Lloyd's to be posted up on 20th Nov., and was returned to them 23rd Nov., the entry as to the Annie being struck out; but this did not come to the defendants' knowledge until after they had subscribed the policy, as they did not refer to the register after it had been altered.

The remaining facts given in evidence, the questions left to the jury by the learned judge, and the verdict are fully set out in the judgments. A verdict was entered for the plaintiffs, and leave was reserved to the defendants to move to enter a verdict, if the court should be of opinion that the learned judge should have directed a verdict for the defendants on the plea of concealment.

The defendants obtained a rule nisi to enter the verdict for them pursuant to the leave reserved, on the ground that the plea of concealment was proved as matter of law, so that the jury ought to have been directed to find that issue for the defendants, or for a new trial on the ground that the judge misdirected the jury in telling them that there was no misrepresentation, that the insured might have changed his mind as to continuing the classification of his ship, and in not directing them that the defendants were not, under the circumstances, put upon inquiry and also on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence.

June 8.—Benjamin showed cause.—The refusal of the plaintiff to have his ship surveyed, and so kept on Lloyd's book, was not material; this did not in itself render the ship degraded. The plaintiff might have changed his mind. There was no concealment of a material fact not practically known to the defendants. Even supposing the refusal to be a material fact, the plaintiff had a right to consider that the ship would be struck out of Lloyd's book, and that the defendants, being members of Lloyd's, had the knowledge that it was so struck out, or, at any rate, that they would know that the time for half-time survey was passed, and that the fact of "H.T." not being entered against the Annie would indicate to them that the survey had not taken place. The defendants' underwriter referred to the book, and he ought, with his acquaintance of the rules of Lloyd's, to have been able to read his own book. The defendants' copy of Lloyd's book was returned to them with the entry of the Annie struck out before the policy was signed. It may be said that the ship was initialled and the contract entered into, but a slip is not a contract of marine insurance by 30 Vict. c. 23, s. 7.

Butt, Q.C. and Herschell in support of the rule.—Knowledge acquired by the underwriter after the terms of the contract have been agreed upon cannot affect the defendants' position as to the validity of the contract. The entry at the time of contract showed the ship to be classed A 1, and on that basis the premium was settled. The practice as to half-time surveys is not sufficiently strict to enable an underwriter to judge whether a survey ought to have taken place, or even to put him on inquiry. The ship was supposed to be still A 1 by both plaintiff's agent and defendants' underwriter, and it must have been known to the plaintiff that this was the basis on which he obtained the rate of insurance at seven guineas. The ship was struck out of the register before the execution of the policy, but after the initialling of the ship, which according to the practice of underwriters, although not by law, is the contract; all subsequent matters are mere questions of routine, and the ship once initialled on certain terms, the underwriter is not bound to make further inquiry. No doubt by Mackenzie v. Coulson (sup.) a slip is not evidence of a contract, and that is all that case decides; it cannot be said on the authority of that case, that after the terms of a contract are arranged, the position of the contracting parties is in any way affected by mere means of knowledge which they subsequently acquire. There was nothing in the book at the time the premium was agreed upon to show that the half-time survey ought to have been held, nor anything to show the plaintiff's determination not to have the ship surveyed. This was a material fact, which the plaintiff knew and the defendant did not know, and had no means of knowing, and which the plaintiff was, therefore, bound to have communicated. If a material fact be not communicated, even although it had once been known to the underwriter, yet if it be not present to his mind at the time of effecting the insurance, the want of such communication affords a good defence to the underwriter. It is not enough for the assured to show that, if the underwriter had given sufficient consideration to the facts of the case, the particulars supplied by the assured, together with the underwriter's previous knowledge, would have made the latter acquainted with the material fact. This is laid down in Bates v. Hewitt (L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 595; 36 L. J. 282, Q. B.); but this case is even stronger, because the underwriter had no previous knowledge at the time of making the contract; even his means of knowledge was acquired afterwards, and he did not use those means, nor was he bound to do so.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 6.—The judgment of Mellor, Lush, and Hannen, JJ., was delivered by MELLOR, J.—The plaintiff in this case was the owner of the barque Annie, built at New Brunswick in 1865, in which year he had purchased her, she being at the time classed at Lloyd's A 1 for seven years from 1865; she was in fact classed in Nov. 1865. In Oct. 1869 she was lying in the Canning Graving Dock at Liverpool for some repairs, and on the 22nd Oct. the surveyor of Lloyd's at Liverpool wrote a letter to the plaintiff, whereby he informed him that the barque Annie was then due for half-time survey, and requested to know when she would be ready for survey. To this letter the plaintiff replied on the 23rd Oct. as follows:—"In reply to your memorandum to hand, I beg to say that I have decided not to continue the Annie in Lloyd's book." By the rules of Lloyd's a ship classed A 1 for seven years, in order to retain that position in the register, is required to undergo a half-time survey, and upon the report of such survey it is decided by the committee of Lloyd's register to whom such report is referred whether she shall retain her classification of A 1, or shall be degraded from that class. If the survey is satisfactory to the committee, the ship retains her classification, and in that case, the letters "H. T." are placed opposite her name and description in the register, and the date of the survey is affixed; but these letters are only so placed after she has satisfactorily undergone "the half-time survey." If the report is not satisfactory, she is degraded from her class, and if a survey is not had, or is declined, she is struck out of the register. The time for half-time survey is not in practice strictly observed in certain cases, as if, for instance, the ship is at sea. Every subscriber to Lloyd's obtains a copy of the register, and in the case of London subscribers the books containing the register are sent weekly to Liverpool for correction, where they are posted up and returned the next day. Every subscriber to Lloyd's can get any information he requires by going to the secretary of Lloyd's registry. On the 28th Oct., Messrs. Banks and Co., the plaintiff's brokers at Liverpool instructed Messrs. Maclean and Co., brokers, in London, to ascertain and telegraph to them "to-morrow" at what rate they should insure "the Annie, of Liverpool, 345 tons, built at New Brunswick, 1865, for twelve months, being intended to take coal from this to Gibraltar or a Mediterranean port, and to bring home one from Sicily or Pomaron, and will probably continue in this trade." These were the instructions upon which the insurance was subsequently effected with the defendants on the 15th Nov. On receipt of the letter from Banks and Co., of 20th Oct., Mr. Wright, a partner in the firm of Maclean and Co., went to the defendants' office to ascertain at what rate the insurance could be effected, and read the letter of 28th Oct. to Mr. Kemp, the defendants' underwriter. A copy of Lloyd's book was then in the office, and the entry as to the Annie was referred to by Mr. Kemp, who asked Mr. Wright, "Is this the

GANDY v. ADELAIDE MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY.

ship you wish to insure?" To which Mr. Wright replied, "It is." She then stood in the book classed A 1 seven years from 1865; and thereupon Kemp gave Wright a quotation of the rate at which he would insure; and, ultimately, on the 15th Nov., the slip was initialled for an insurance of 300*l.*, and the policy was in due course issued and dated the 1st Dec. 1869. The Annie was in fact struck out of Lloyd's register on the 16th Nov., and the plaintiff was informed thereof on the 17th by letter, stating that his vessel not having passed the survey had been struck off the register. The Annie was wrecked and became a total loss on the 31st Dec. 1869. At the trial the defendants' counsel contended that the judge ought, as a matter of law, to direct a verdict to be entered for the defendants on a plea of concealment. The judge, however, declined doing so; but at the end of the case he reserved leave to the defendants' counsel to move to have the verdict entered for the defendants if this court should be of opinion that he ought so to have directed. The judge left to the jury several questions, and amongst them the following: "Was the ship on the 15th Nov. in the ordinary business sense degraded from her class?" To which the answer of the jury was, "No." "Was the fact that plaintiff had resolved not to continue the ship on the list and had so stated to the surveyor a material fact?" To this question the jury answered "No." He then asked the jury, "Ought the underwriter to have known on the 15th Nov. that the continuance of the class must depend on whether the ship had been then lately surveyed and passed, and would within a few days be surveyed and passed or repaired; and if, 'Yes,' ought the knowledge to have put the underwriter to ask whether the ship had been surveyed or was about to be surveyed?" To this question the answer of the jury was "Yes." The verdict thereupon passed for the plaintiff. The defendants' counsel, in Hilary Term, obtained a rule to enter the verdict for the defendants, pursuant to the leave reserved; and for a new trial, on the ground of misdirection by the judge in telling the jury that there was in fact no misrepresentation, that the assured might have changed his mind as to continuing the classification, and that the defendants were not, under the circumstances, put upon inquiry; and also that the verdict was against the weight of evidence. On the argument, it was not insisted that there was any misrepresentation in point of fact on the part of the plaintiff, and we have only to determine, first, whether the judge was bound, under the circumstances, to direct the jury as matter of law that the verdict on the plea of concealment must be found for the defendants; secondly, whether there was any misdirection by the judge; and, lastly, whether the verdict was against the weight of evidence. As to the first question, we are clearly of opinion that the judge was quite right in refusing to direct the jury as matter of law that the plea of concealment was proved; without putting it to the jury to draw the proper inferences from the facts proved there was not, in the facts themselves, enough to enable the judge to say "aye" or "no" that there had been the concealment of a material fact; and, under the circumstances of the case, it was impossible to withdraw the question from the jury. It appears to have been contended on the trial that the ship became in fact a degraded ship by virtue of the resolution expressed in the letter of the 23rd Oct., but this was not insisted upon on the argument, except so far as it was included in the question of materiality. The misdirection complained of resolves itself into two distinct matters: first, that the judge in directing the attention of the jury to the question with regard to the materiality of the resolution of the plaintiff not to continue the Annie in Lloyd's book, and his communication thereupon to the surveyor of Lloyd's on the 23rd Oct., submitted to the jury, whether there was anything in those circumstances to preclude the plaintiff from changing his mind and submitting to a survey, and continuing the classification of the ship at Lloyd's, and whether, if the underwriter had been told of those circumstances, he might not have said or thought, "Well, he may change his mind." Now, it is to be observed that this was not a direction in point of law, but merely consisted of observations for the consideration of the jury; and unless we are of opinion that the resolution expressed in the letter of 23rd Oct. was a material fact, we ought not, because of observations of which we may not altogether approve, to hold that they amount to a misdirection. Can we then say that it was a necessary or material fact? The effect of it could not be greater than that of refusing to submit the ship to the "half-time survey," the necessary consequence of which, according to Lloyd's rules, would be to exclude the ship from the register. Is it anything more than an answer to a notice that the time had arrived for the survey? If the mere fact of the ship not undergoing "the half-time survey" would in fact exclude her from Lloyd's register, what necessity was there on the part of the plaintiff to disclose circumstances which only could affect the result by virtue of the rules of Lloyd's with regard to the "half-time survey?" The plaintiff's answer declining a survey could not be otherwise important than as it affected the proceedings of Lloyd's committee under the rules. As a resolution of his own it was of no consequence, and it was only as his answer to the demand for a survey that it could acquire importance, and so far as the plaintiff was concerned, it amounted to neither more nor less than declining a survey, and a desire to remove the ship from Lloyd's register. The value of the classification of the ship as A 1 for seven years at Lloyd's in the eyes of an underwriter can only depend upon the supposition that Lloyd's rules have been, and will be, observed, and that it will not be classed or retain its class except after proper surveys. Under such circumstances can we say affirmatively that the fact was material, and if we cannot, was it not clearly right to put it to the jury? It was further contended that the judge misdirected the jury by leaving to them "whether the underwriter ought to have known on the 15th Nov. that the continuance of the class must depend on whether the ship had been lately surveyed and passed, and, if 'Yes,' ought this knowledge to have put the underwriter to ask whether the ship had been surveyed, or was about to be surveyed?" This, of course, depends upon whether, in the very nature of his profession as an underwriter and a subscriber at Lloyd's registry, he ought not to have been sufficiently acquainted with the rules and practice of the association of which he was a member to have been able with understanding "to read his own book," as Mr. Benjamin expressed it. Primâ facie, we should

GANDY v. ADELAIDE MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY.

think that every underwriter who relies upon the classification of a ship in Lloyd's register as determining the rate of insurance, ought to be acquainted with the rules and practice which gave the classification its value. In the present case the underwriter did refer to Lloyd's book before he gave his quotation; and if he had taken ordinary pains, and was, as we are entitled to presume that he ought to have been, acquainted with the rules, he ought to have seen at once that the period for the half-time survey had passed, and that as yet no letters "H. T.," with the date of the survey were appended to the description of the ship in the register. It was contended by Mr. Benjamin that as mere matter of professional knowledge, the underwriter, looking at the book for the classification of the ship, and not finding the letters "H. T." and the date of the half-time survey there, ought at once to have seen the propriety of asking how and why it was that the ship had not undergone her half-time survey; and that, not having done so, he had been guilty of negligence which disentitled him to complain that he had been at all misled by any want of communication on the part of the plaintiff. We think that this question was rightly left to the jury, and that the present case is entirely distinguishable from that of Bates v. Hewitt (sup.), which was much relied upon by the defendants' counsel. It was there said by the Lord Chief Justice, in his judgment, that "No proposition of insurance can be better established than this, viz., that the party proposing an insurance is bound to communicate to the insurer all matters which will enable him to determine the extent of the risk against which he undertakes to guarantee the assured. It is true, if matters are common to the knowledge of both parties, such matters need not be communicated. It is also true that when a fact is one of public notoriety, as of war, or where it is one which is a matter of inference, and the materials for informing the judgment of the underwriter are common to both, the party proposing the insurance is not bound to communicate what he is fully warranted in assuming the underwriter already knows." And Mellor, J. quotes from Lord Mansfield's judgment in Carter v. Boehm (3 Burr. Rep. 1910) as follows:—"An underwriter cannot insist that the policy is void because the insured did not tell him what he actually knew, what way soever he came to the knowledge. The insured need not mention what the underwriter ought to know; what he takes upon himself the knowledge of, or what he waives being informed of." And Shee, J. expressly says:—"He is not bound to communicate facts or circumstances which are within the ordinary professional knowledge of an underwriter." It is therefore, it appears to us, impossible to contend successfully that there was any misdirection on the part of the judge in leaving this question to the jury. The rule, therefore, so far as it relates to the entering the verdict for the defendants, or to imputed misdirection by the judge, must be discharged. It only remains to consider whether there ought to be a new trial, on the ground that the verdict is so unsatisfactory on the questions of fact left to the jury that we ought not to allow it to stand. For the reasons already assigned in discussing the question of misdirection we think that we cannot come to that conclusion, and that there was evidence on both questions fit to be submitted to the jury, and that we cannot say that they were wrong in the conclusion at which they arrived. The rule, therefore, on this ground also, will be discharged.

COCKBURN, C. J.—I regret to be unable to concur with my learned brothers in the judgment which has just been read. I am of opinion that the fact that the survey of the vessel necessary to enable her to keep her class in Lloyd's register had been declined by the owner was a material fact, and one which ought to have been communicated to the underwriter. The retention of a vessel in Lloyd's register as of the class A 1 is so important to the owner as promoting the profitable employment of the vessel, that the refusal to submit to the survey necessary to enable her to retain her class, leads fairly to the inference that the owner is conscious that the condition of the vessel has so far deteriorated that the result of the survey would be unfavourable; and, as the degradation of the vessel from her class is the necessary consequence of the refusal to submit to the survey, the fact of such refusal would produce the same effect upon the mind of the underwriter as if the vessel had actually been degraded, and he had become aware of it. Now, the degradation of a vessel from her class appears to me important, as necessarily carrying with it the presumption that a deterioration in the condition of the vessel has taken place; a circumstance, of course, calculated materially to influence the decision of the underwriter as to the amount of premium he will require as the consideration for undertaking the risk. I take it, that if an underwriter, not being a subscriber to Lloyd's, who had been in the habit of insuring a vessel represented to him as classed A 1 in Lloyd's register, were asked to renew the insurance at a time when the vessel had been degraded from her class, this not being within his knowledge, the degradation of the vessel would be a fact, the omission to inform him of which would amount to concealment of a material fact. If so, the refusal to submit to the survey being, as it seems to me, equivalent to degradation, the fact of such a refusal was, in my judgment, a material fact which ought to have been communicated to the underwriter, unless the latter knew, or ought to have known it. And this brings me to the second question. Now I entirely adhere to the doctrine laid down in Bates v. Hewitt (sup.), namely, that a party proposing an insurance is not bound to communicate to the underwriter that which the underwriter already knows, or that which in the course and conduct of his business he ought to know, and may properly be taken to know, or that which may be matter of inference from materials common to both parties. The first of the three cases does not arise here. It is clear that the underwriter did not know of the owner's refusal to submit to the survey. It is said, indeed, that as the plaintiff had given notice to the agent of Lloyd's at Liverpool that he would not have the vessel surveyed, this was sufficient to affect the underwriter with knowledge. I cannot concur in this view, as it appears that in the discharge of his duty the surveyor would communicate the fact of the refusal, not to the subscribers, but to the committee alone, who, again, do not communicate the fact to the subscribers until they have actually caused the vessel to be degraded from her class. The underwriter would therefore have neither actual knowledge, nor the means of knowledge, from the report made by the surveyor to the committee of Lloyd's. The question whether the case comes within the second branch of the proposition to which I have referred is one of the greatest difficulty. The date of the building of the ship being stated in the register, which the underwriter had before him, he might have seen, had he reflected, that half the time for which she was originally classed had expired; and, the letters "H. T." not appearing against the ship, he might have inferred that the necessary survey had not been had, and that, consequently, the ship would now be degraded from her former class. I should feel the force of this argument if vessels were uniformly degraded unless surveyed on the expiration of half time; but such, it is admitted, is not uniformly the practice. While it is competent to the local surveyor to call on the shipowner, on the expiration of the half time, to submit to a survey, as the condition of the vessel keeping her class, it appears that this is by no means uniformly done, and that vessels are suffered to remain as of their former class, though the half time has expired and no fresh survey has been held. I think, therefore, that the underwriter—though, if his attention had been called to the ship's age, he might have seen that the half time had expired, and from the absence of the letters "H. T." might have inferred that no survey had been held on her—must not be taken to have been bound to infer that the owner had refused to have her surveyed. Adhering to what I said in Bates v. Hewitt, that where a fact is "matter of inference, and the materials for informing the mind of the underwriter are common to both parties," both may be left to draw their own inferences, I am reluctant to apply that principle to a case like the present, where a material fact is matter of positive knowledge to the party proposing the insurance, and only matter of possible inference, from very imperfect materials, to the underwriter. It must never be forgotten that insurance is a contract in which uberrima fides is required, and that the assured is bound to disclose every material fact known to him and unknown to the insurer, unless he is justified in believing such fact to be known to the latter. The plaintiff knew he had refused to have his vessel surveyed, and that her degradation must necessarily follow. It does not appear to me that the circumstances were such as to warrant the conclusion that the underwriter knew, or ought necessarily to know, that the survey had been declined. I think the doctrine in Bates v. Hewitt goes quite far enough for the protection of the assured, and I should be unwilling to extend it to a case like the present. I quite concur in thinking that there was no misdirection on the part of the learned judge on the trial, and that he was quite right in not withdrawing the case from the jury; but I am of opinion that the facts do not warrant the findings of the jury; and I should myself have thought it right to send the case down to a new trial; but my learned brothers think differently, and the rule must therefore be discharged.

LOYD v. FLEMING; LOYD v. SPENCE.

Action by assignee of marine policy of insurance—Beneficial interest of plaintiff—Policies of Marine Insurance Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 86, s. 1).

In an action by the executors of the assignee of a policy of assurance upon goods shipped against underwriters of the policy, the loss alleged being under the suing and labouring clause, the declaration averred that after loss, the said policy, together with all rights accrued under, and by virtue thereof, was by the assured, for good consideration, assigned to the plaintiff's testator in his lifetime:

Held, upon demurrer, that this declaration was good, although it contained no averment that the plaintiffs were beneficially interested in the subject matter of the insurance at the time of action brought.

THE declaration stated that the plaintiffs were the executors of one William Entwistle, deceased, and that by a certain policy of insurance, bearing date the 17th Oct. 1860, certain persons trading and known under the firm of Robinson and Fleming, did ^{and} _{or} as agents, as well in their own names as for and in the name and names of all and every other person or persons to whom the same did, might, or should appertain, in part or in all, make assurance and cause themselves and them and every of them to be insured, lost or not lost, at and from Rotterdam to Batavia, on 802 boxes of steel, valued at 800*l.*, in the ship Two Antonys, beginning the adventure from the loading of the said goods on board the said ship as above, and continuing until the same should be at Batavia aforesaid discharged and safely landed against perils of the seas, &c.; and in case of any loss or misfortune it was thereby also agreed that it should be lawful to the assured, their factors, servants, and assigns, to sue, labour, and travel for, in and about the defence, safeguard, and recovery of the said goods and merchandise, or any part thereof, without prejudice to the said assurance; to the charges whereof the assurers thereby would contribute each one according to the rate and quantity of his sum in the said policy insured, and the said goods were warranted as usual in marine policies upon goods. And the defendant, in consideration of a certain premium to him paid on that behalf by certain persons interested in the said goods, and whose interest in the said goods is hereinafter averred, underwrote the said policy for 100*l.* and became an insurer thereon to the said persons for that amount on the said goods; and the said goods were shipped on board the said ship at Rotterdam aforesaid, to be carried therein on the said voyage. And certain persons hereinbefore referred to, that is to say, Julius Frederick Sichel, Sylvester Emil Sichel, and Josias Bracken Canning Alexander, or some or one of them were or was then and thence and until and at the time of the happening of the loss hereinafter mentioned, interested in the said goods to the amount of all the moneys by them insured thereon; and the said policy was made by authority and for account and benefit of the said persons so interested. And the said ship with the said goods on board sailed on the said voyage, and while she was proceeding on the voyage the said ship was stranded, and the said goods were by the perils insured against injured, damaged, and lost. And by reason of the said loss and misfortune the assured did by their factors and servants, sue, labour, and travel for, in, and about the defence, safeguard, and recovery of the said goods, and thereon and for that purpose did necessarily lay out and expend divers large sums of money. And after the said loss and misfortune, and the said expenditure had been incurred as aforesaid, the said policy of insurance, together with all rights accrued under and by virtue thereof was, by the said Julius Frederick Sichel, Sylvester Emil Sichel, and Josias Bracken Canning Alexander for good consideration to them moving from the aforesaid William Entwistle, duly assigned to the said Wm. Entwistle in his lifetime. Whereby and by reason of the premises, the defendant became liable to pay to the plaintiffs, as such executors of the said Wm. Entwistle, deceased as aforesaid, a large sum of money.

And all things have been done and happened, and all times have elapsed necessary to entitle the plaintiffs as such executors to be paid the said sum of money. Yet the defendant has not paid the same.

This declaration was demurred to on the alleged grounds that there was no averment that Entwistle was entitled to the property insured by the policy, and that the declaration showed no title to sue.

Another ground was that a mere claim under the suing and labouring clause is not within the policies of Marine Insurance Act 1868.

F. M. White (with him Lanyon) argued for the defendants, that the intention of the Legislature in this Act was to give the assignee a right to sue only when he has a beneficial interest in the subject matter of the policy, as was the object of the Bills of Lading Act 1855, with respect to bills of lading.

Holker, Q.C. (with him Maclachlan) for the plaintiff, contended that the words "duly assigned" were sufficient to imply that the assignment was made in an operative manner under the Act.

White in reply, maintained that the word "duly" related only to the form of assignment.

Our. adv. vult.

Jan. 11.—BLACKBURN, J., delivered the judgment of the court (Blackburn, Mellor, and Lush, JJ.).—In each of these cases the declaration is by the executors of William Entwistle against underwriters of a policy of marine insurance on goods. The declaration states a loss by the perils insured against, and then avers that after the loss "the said policy, together with all rights accrued under and by virtue thereof, was, by the assured for good consideration to them moving from the said W. Entwistle, duly assigned to him in his lifetime." To this there is a demurrer, on the ground that the action cannot be maintained in the name of the assignee. It is clear that before the stat. 31 & 32 Vict. c. 86, it could only have been maintained in the name of the original contractor, but by that act, after reciting generally that "it is expedient that the assignees of marine policies of insurance should be enabled to sue thereon in their own names," enacts that "whenever a policy of insurance on any ship or on any goods in any ship, or on any freight, has been assigned so as to pass the beneficial interest in such policy to any person entitled to the property thereby insured, the assignee of such policy shall be entitled to sue thereon in his own name." The argument in support of the demurrer was that this enactment was confined to cases where the policy is assigned before the loss along with the goods; and in support of this the words "entitled to the property" were relied on, as it was said the assignee after a loss could not be so entitled, but we do not think that such was the intention of the Legislature, nor do we think the words cited have that effect. A policy of marine insurance is a contract of indemnity against all losses accruing to the subject matter of the policy from certain perils during the adventure. The subject matter need not be strictly a property in either the ship, goods, or freight; for, as has been long said, if a man is so situated with respect to them that he will receive benefit from their arriving safely at the end of the adventure, or sustained loss in consequence of their not arriving safely, he has an insurable interest: (see per Lawrence, J. in Lucena v. Crauford, 2 N. R. 269). If the assured, before the termination of the adventure, has parted with all interest in the subject matter of the insurance, he can suffer no damage from any subsequent loss; and consequently, the nature of the contract being one of indemnity, he cannot recover in respect of any loss subsequent to his transfer of the property: (see Powles v. Innes, 11 M. & W. 10.) And, for exactly the same reason, an attempted transfer of the beneficial interest in the policy before loss to a person having no beneficial interest in the subject matter is inoperative; for the cestui que trust of the contract, having nothing in respect of which to be indemnified, could recover no indemnity. But after the loss has happened, and the adventure is over, this reason ceases at once. The assured may sell the damaged subject of insurance, thereby, as it were, ascertaining how much his loss is, and yet recover for the loss he has sustained. It is every day's practice, where a ship has sustained damage, to sell the injured hull for the benefit of whom it concerns, and then sue on the policy. If it can be made out that the loss is total, the sale is for the benefit of the underwriters, who pay the total loss. If the loss proves partial only, it is for the benefit of the assured; but no one ever thought of saying that the sale of the damaged hull put an end to the right to recover an indemnity for the partial loss. The reason of the distinction is, that after the loss the right to indemnity no longer depends on the right of property in the subject matter of the insurance, so far as it still exists, but on the right of property in the thing or the portion of the thing lost. After a loss, the policy of insurance, and the right of action under it, might, like any other chose in action, be transferred in equity; though at common law the action must have been brought in the name of the original contractor, the assignor. Such an assignment may be objectionable on the ground of maintenance or champerty, but it is not necessarily so, and no circumstances are stated on this record to raise such a defence. It seems to us that the general object of the Legislature was to make the right of action on policies of marine insurance assignable at law, and that the assignment of a policy after loss is within the object of the Act. There is a very common form of commercial adventure, where goods are sold for a price to cover cost, freight, and insurance, payable on receipt of the shipping documents. In such a case the policy and bill of lading are habitually made the subject of sale, whilst the parties are ignorant whether the goods are safe or not. It could never, we think, be intended to except from the Act such cases, if it should turn out that the loss accrued before the sale. The words relied on in the case of an assignment before loss express what is necessarily implied, and so are superfluous; perhaps inserted pro majore cautela. In the case of an assignment after loss, when the policy and "all rights under and by virtue of it are assigned," it seems to us that the assignee becomes entitled to the property thereby incurred; for then it is ascertained that the interest in the damage, the chose in action, is the only property which is covered by the policy, consequently that the words of the Act were literally complied with. We think, therefore, that judgment on these demurrers should be for the plaintiff.

JOYCE AND OTHERS v. KENNARD.

Insurance—Indemnity against loss as carriers—Right to complete indemnity, Plaintiffs, lightermen on the river Thames, caused a policy of insurance, in the ordinary form of a Lloyd's policy, to be effected on their behalf upon craft of every description, on "all goods and produce as interest may appear." At the foot of the policy was written, "to cover and include all losses, damages, and accidents, amounting to 20l. or upwards, on each craft, to goods carried by the plaintiffs as lightermen, or delivered to them to be water-borne either in their own or other craft, and for which losses, damages, and accidents the plaintiffs may be liable or responsible to the owners thereof, or others interested. It is agreed that the amount of each underwriter's liability shall not exceed the amount of his subscription." The policy was subscribed by various underwriters for different sums amounting altogether to 2000l., the defendant underwriting it for 100l.; and during the continuance of the risk a loss happened to goods carried by the plaintiffs as lightermen, for which they had to pay the owners 1100l. At this time the total value of the goods carried in the barges of the plaintiffs which were covered by the policy amounted to 20,000l. and upwards. An action having been brought against the defendant to recover the sum of 55l. as his proportion of the loss sustained, it was Held, that the defendant was liable for that sum, and not merely for such a proportion of the loss sustained as the sum for which he subscribed the policy bore to the total value of the goods on board all the plaintiffs' craft which were covered by the policy at the time of the loss.

This was a special case stated for the opinion of the court.

1. The plaintiffs are lightermen carrying on business in the city of London, and the defendant is an underwriter also in the city.

2. In the month of Oct. 1869 the plaintiffs caused the following policy of insurance to be effected on their behalf.

To cover and include all losses, damages, and accidents amounting to 20l. or upwards in each craft to goods carried by Messrs. W. A. Joyce and Son as lightermen, or delivered to them to be waterborne, either in their own or other craft, and for which losses, damages, and accidents,

Q. B.]

Messrs. W. A. Joyce and Son may be liable or responsible to the owners thereof, or others interested. It is agreed that the amount of each underwriter's liability shall not exceed the amount of his subscription.

This policy was subscribed by different underwriters for different sums amounting in the whole to 2000*l.*

3. The defendant underwrote the said policy for 100*l.*, and received by way of premium the sum of 3*l.* 10*s.* [A fac simile copy of the policy accompanied this case, and formed part thereof.]

4. On the 7th Dec. 1869, and during the continuance of the risk covered by the said policy, a loss, damage, and accident within the meaning of the said policy happened to goods carried by the plaintiffs as lightermen as aforesaid, in a certain craft called the Lord Cardigan, and for which loss, damage, and accident the plaintiffs have become liable and responsible to the owner and others interested in the said goods to the sum of 1100*l.*, and have paid that amount.

5. It is agreed that the total value of the risks of the plaintiffs in this and other barges employed by the plaintiffs at the time of the loss, and which were covered by the policy, amounted to the sum of 20,000*l.* and upwards.

6. The total value of the goods in the barge Lord Cardigan at the time of the loss was 2906*l.*

7. The plaintiffs contend that upon the true construction of the policy they are entitled to be indemnified for the loss actually sustained, namely, 1100*l.*, and to recover from the defendant 55*l.* for his proportion of such loss.

8. The defendant contends that, under the policy sued on, the plaintiffs are only entitled to recover from the defendant such a proportion of their loss as the sum for which the defendant subscribed the policy, namely, 100*l.*, bears to the total value of all the goods on board all the plaintiffs' craft, which were between the limits mentioned in and which were covered by the policy at the time of the loss before mentioned, and have paid into court the sum of 6*l.*, which is admitted to be sufficient to satisfy the plaintiff's claim, assuming this contention to be correct.

9. The defendant further contends that in any view the plaintiffs are not entitled to more than such proportion of the loss as 100*l.*, the sum insured, bears to the total value in the barge—viz., 2906*l.*

10. The court is at liberty to draw all inferences of fact which a jury ought to have drawn.

The question for the opinion of the court is which of the principles above referred to is the proper principle upon which the amount to be recovered ought to be settled.

If the court should be of opinion that the plaintiffs are only entitled to recover such proportion of the loss as 100*l.* bears to the said total amount at risk—namely, 20,000*l.*—then judgment is to be entered for the defendant with costs of defence.

If the court should be of opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover such a proportion of the loss as 100*l.* bears to the total value of the goods in the barge, then judgment is to be entered for the plaintiffs for 31*l.* 19*s.* 3*d.* in addition to the sum of 6*l.* paid into court with costs of suit; and if the court should be of opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover the proportion of the actual loss as contended for by the plaintiffs, judgment is to be entered for the plaintiffs for the sum of 49*l.* in addition to the 6*l.* paid into court, with costs of suit.

If the court should be of opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover either the 37*l.* 19*s.* 3*d.* or the 55*l.*, the plaintiffs claim in addition such interest as the court may think fit to allow.

Quain, Q. C. (with whom was A. L. Smith) for the plaintiffs.—This case is peculiar, and turns upon the peculiar language of the policy. The policy is in the ordinary form, but at the end it contains the words "to cover and include all losses, damages, and accidents, amounting to 20*l.* or upwards in each draft to goods carried by Messrs. W. A. Joyce and Son, as lightermen, or delivered to them to be waterborne, either in their own or other craft, and for which losses, damages, and accidents, Messrs. W. A. Joyce and Son may be liable or responsible to the owners thereof or others interested." The intention was clearly to cover all the risks which the plaintiffs ran in the course of their business as carriers of goods on the river. The only case which is at all similar to the present is that of Crowley v. Cohen (3 B. & Ad. 478), which the defendant will probably rely on. There the plaintiffs, carriers on a canal, effected an insurance for twelve months upon goods on board of thirty boats named between London, Birmingham, &c., backwards and forwards. The insurance was agreed to be 12,000 on goods, as interest might appear thereafter; the claim on the policy warranted not to exceed 100*l.* per cent., and 5000*l.* only was to be covered by the policy in any one boat on any one trip, the premium being 30*s.* per cent. It was held that upon the loss of goods on board one of the boats the assured was entitled to recover that proportion of such loss which 1200*l.* bore to the whole value of the goods afloat at the time, and not the proportion of 1200*l.* to the whole amount carried during the year. The present case is, however, distinguishable from that; for there the risk covered by the policy was the ordinary marine risk, whereas here it is all risk which the plaintiffs might run as carriers of goods on the river. The words written at the foot of the policy in the present case distinguish it from all reported cases. Lord Tenterden, C. J. in the case referred to said: "As to the mode of calculating the indemnity, the defendant insists that this is to be done by ascertaining the proportion which 1200*l.* bears to the whole value of goods carried during the year, and allowing the assured such a proportion of the amount of loss. But the rule of calculation relied on by the defendant is never adopted in cases of policy on goods with liberty to change the cargoes. Here the whole value of the goods afloat at the time of the loss must be taken, and the plaintiffs will recover such a proportion of their loss as 12,000*l.* bears to the value of all the property on board all the boats at the time of the accident, if that value exceed 12,000*l.*, if not, they will be entitled to the whole amount lost." This has no application to a policy such as the present, which is more like a fire policy. In Wilson v. Jones (14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 65; 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 669), where the question was whether the policy, which was effected on a submarine cable by a shareholder in a telegraph company, was to be construed as an ordinary marine policy, or as a policy on the undertaking of successfully laying down the cable, the court adopted the latter construction of the instrument, although the body of the policy was in the ordinary form of a marine insurance. Martin, B., in delivering the judgment of the court below, said: "The contract is partly written and partly printed, and the agreement between the parties is to be ascertained by the words of it. The circumstance that it is upon the printed form which is usually adopted for a common marine policy, is wholly immaterial if the language used and adopted by the parties shows that the insurance extended further than marine policies ordinarily do." These observations are strictly applicable to the present case; and it is submitted that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover from the defendants.

Sir G. Honyman, Q.C. (with him Watkin Williams) for the defendant. A policy of marine insurance differs from a fire policy. In the latter case the whole loss sustained must be made good by the insurer; whilst in the former the proportion which the amount for which each underwriter has subscribed bears to the whole risk must be calculated. The amount to be paid does not depend on the number of underwriters who have subscribed the policy; it depends on the proportion which the amount for which each subscriber underwrites, bears to the whole amount stated in the policy, in the case of a valued policy, or to the whole value of the goods in the case of an open policy. The mention of the sum of 2000*l.* in the policy is only for the purpose of fixing the amount of stamp duty. There was nothing to hinder the plaintiffs from getting insurances from any number of other underwriters. The question, no doubt, is one of construction, but there was no intention to alter the ordinary degree of liability which each underwriter undertook; and that in the present case, is the proportion which 100*l.* bears to the value of all the goods on the plaintiffs' barges at the time of the loss, viz., 20,000*l.* [LUSH, J.—Suppose the intention was to insure the plaintiffs against their ordinary possible losses as carriers, what other words than those written at the foot of this policy could be chosen?] Those words seem to have been inserted in place of the ordinary memorandum clause, protecting the insurers from liability under 5 per cent., which might be inconvenient in the case of goods of a fluctuating value. This case cannot really be distinguished from that of Crowley v. Cohen (ubi sup.); the object and intention of the assured are the same in both cases. The assured in that case was also a lighterman who effected a policy to cover the risk which he ran as a lighterman, and yet the underwriters' liability was determined by the ordinary principle applicable in cases of marine insurance. When the amount of the premium paid to the defendant in the present case is looked at, it cannot be supposed that for such a consideration he would undertake the liability with which he is now sought to be charged.

Quain, Q.C., in reply.—If the defendant's contention be correct, no efficacy whatever will be given to the words inserted at the foot of the policy.

MELLOR, J.—Our judgment must be for the plaintiffs. It seems to me that the policy in this case is not properly described as a marine policy. It is an instrument by which one of the parties indemnifies the other against any liability which he may incur as a carrier with respect to the owners of the goods carried, and we must construe the words in their ordinary meaning. The undertaking is, in the words of the instrument, "to cover and include all losses, damages, and accidents, amounting to 20*l.* or upwards, in each craft, to goods carried by Messrs W. A. Joyce and Son as lightermen, or delivered to them to be waterborne, either in their own or other craft, and for which losses, damages, and accidents, Messrs. W. A. Joyce and Son may be liable or responsible to the owners thereof or others interested." It appears to me that the meaning of these words, on the face of them, is that contended for by Mr. Quain. The case is entirely distinguishable from those which have been relied on for the defendant; and, indeed, I think none of the cases which have been referred to throw any light upon the present case. There is no reason whatever why the parties should not enter into a contract to give indemnity against such losses as the plaintiffs might sustain as lightermen. It is suggested that no man in his senses would contract to indemnify against such a risk for the premium charged; but I confess I do not see the matter in that light at all. The consideration of the amount of premium paid does not aid us in construing the contract between the parties.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. This is an exceptional policy, and we have only to collect from the language of the parties what it was which they intended. Now I cannot doubt, looking at the position of the plaintiffs, who are carriers on the river, that what they wanted was to be secured against any loss which they might sustain as such carriers; and I cannot interpret the contract in any other sense than this—that the defendant undertook to be liable to the plaintiffs for all the loss for which they would be responsible to the owners of the goods carried. That is the very language of the policy; and I cannot entertain a doubt that that was the intention of the parties. It is not an ordinary marine policy, but a policy of mixed nature, the object of which was to secure to the plaintiffs an indemnity to the extent of the sum subscribed for, or for any loss which they might sustain during the year by reason of their being responsible as carriers for the loss of the goods.

BYRNE AND OTHERS AGAINST THE GUANO CONSIGNMENT COMPANY (defendants); WEGUELIN AND OTHERS (trading as THOMSON, BONAR, and Co.), (garnishees).

Lord Mayor's Court—Foreign attachment—Freight—Prohibition.

Where process had issued out of the Lord Mayor's Court against garnishees, and, on cause being shown against a rule for a prohibition, it appeared that the claim against the original defendants was for extra freight due on a charter-party in respect of a voyage from the Chincha Islands to the Victoria Docks (not within the city of London), and that neither the defendants nor the garnishees resided within the city of London,

Held, that the prohibition must issue, although, by the terms of the charter-party, payment of the freight was to be made within the city of London. Semble, that if the cargo had been delivered within the city of London, it would have made no difference.

This was a rule to show cause why a writ of prohibition should not issue to the Lord Mayor's Court of the City of London to prohibit all further proceedings in the said court against the garnishees upon a foreign attachment issued out of that court.

The facts may be gathered from the affidavits, which were as follows:—Affidavit of William Slee Wellborne, clerk to Thomson, Bonar and Co., the garnishees, filed in support of the rule.

1. That I have the management of the freight account and matters under the charter of the ship Talisman, out of which the question in dispute in the action and foreign attachment now pending in the Lord Mayor's Court, London, arose, and that on the 4th Nov. 1871, Andrew Ewing Byrne, Arthur Bower Forwood and Duncan Campbell entered an action in the said Mayor's Court, London, against the Guano Consignment Company to Great Britain, and issued out of the said Mayor's Court a certain process of foreign attachment attaching all moneys, goods, and effects in the hands and custody of the said garnishees, which should thereafter come to their hands or custody, to the extent of 346l. 15s. 7d.

2. On the 29th April 1869, a charter-party was made and entered into between the said Andrew Ewing Byrne, A. B. Forwood, and D. Campbell, as owners of a ship called The Talisman, of the one part, and the said Guano Consignment Company of the other part, by Messrs. J. Thomson, T. Bonar and Co., as their agents, and the said charter party was duly executed by the said Andrew Ewing Byrne, A. B. Forwood, and D. Campbell, and by the said Messrs. J. Thomson, T. Bonar and Co., as agents for the said charterers.

3. That under and in pursuance of the said charter-party, the said Andrew E. Byrne, A. B. Forwood, and D. Campbell have made large claims for freight against the said charterers, and have, as I am informed and verily believe been paid for and on account of the said freight the sum of 5587l. 9s., and which said sum is as I am advised and verily believe all that the said charterers admit to be due under the said charter-party; but the said A. E. Byrne, B. Forwood, and D. Campbell, in addition to the said sum already paid to them for and on account of the charterers, claim the sum of 346l. 15s. 7d., under a certain memorandum dated on or about the 5th Aug. 1869, which provides for the payment of an extra rate of freight of 3s. 9d. per ton as mentioned in the said memorandum, a copy of which is produced and shown to me at the time of swearing this my affidavit, and is marked with the letter C.

4. That I am informed and believe that the said ship having arrived at Callao after the dated limited for her arrival there, it was arranged that instead of the charter being then and there cancelled, the charter should be maintained, on the condition that the captain should come back for final clearance to the same port instead of going to Payta, and without extra charge, that on the 2nd Aug. the said A. E. Byrne, A. B. Forwood, and D. Campbell caused to be issued out of Her Majesty's Court of Exchequer of Pleas a writ of summons against the said Messrs. J. Thomson, T. Bonar and Co., and against the said Guano Consignment Company, and by such writ they claim the sum of 644l. 9s. 8d., and interest thereon.

5. The claims in the said action in the Lord Mayor's Court, London, and the claim of the said action in the Court of the Exchequer of Pleas includes the third extra freight claimed under the said memorandum of the 5th Aug. 1869.

6. That at the time of making of the said charter-party the said ship was on her way from Sweden to Melbourne, and no part of the voyage of the said ship, under the said charter-party, was performed, nor was any part of her cargo received, conveyed, or delivered within the jurisdiction of the said Lord Mayor's Court of London.

7. That her cargo was discharged and delivered in the Victoria Docks, out of the jurisdiction of the said Lord Mayor's Court, London.

8. That the said Guano Consignment Company carry on their business at Lima, in the republic of Peru, out of the jurisdiction of the said Lord Mayor's Court, London, and have no residence, offices, or place of business of any kind or description whatsoever within the jurisdiction of the said Lord Mayor's Court.

9. The cause of action (if any) for which the said A. E. Byrne, A. B. Forwood, and D. Campbell have proceeded in the said Lord Mayor's Court, London, and upon which the said attachment is founded, is the extra freight mentioned in the said memorandum of the 5th Aug. 1869, which extra freight is claimed in respect of the said vessel having returned to Callao instead of going to Payta is provided for by the said charter-party, and the said cause of action (if any) did not, nor did any part thereof arise within the jurisdiction of the said Lord Mayor's Court, London.

10. The said A. E. Byrne, A. B. Forwood, and D. Campbell carry on business at Liverpool, in the county of Lancaster, and have no place of business within the jurisdiction of the said Lord Mayor's Court, London, and I believe the said charter-party and memorandum were respectively entered into and signed by the said A. E. Byrne at Liverpool aforesaid.

11. I am advised and verily believe that the said Lord Mayor's Court has not jurisdiction in the matter of the said action, and ought to be stayed from further proceedings therein, and that the said Mayor's Court assumes to have jurisdiction, and will proceed therein unless stayed by prohibition.

14. I am also advised and verily believe that by the course and practice of the said Mayor's Court the defendants are unable to obtain relief against the said assumption of jurisdiction by any application to or proceeding in the said court, and that the defendant will sustain great injury unless the said proceedings are stayed by prohibition.

Messrs. J. Thomson, T. Bonar, & Co.,

Gentlemen,—In the event of the undermentioned ships owned by us loading at the Gunape or Maccavi Islands, we agree to give the charterers, or their agents, the option of ordering them to return to Callao for final clearance, instead of Payta, at an extra rate of 3s. 9d. per ton.—Your obedient servants,

ANDREW E. BYRNE AND CO.

Affidavit of William Burrows (in opposition to the rule):

1. That I have had, on behalf of Messrs. Arthur Bower Forwood, William Bower Forwood, and Thomas Forwood the younger, of Great St. Helen's, in the City of London, merchants, who carry on business there under the name or style of Leech, Harrison and Forwood, the management of the matters of the above action on the part of the said plaintiffs. I have read the office copy affidavit of Mr. W. Slee Wellborne made in this matter.

2. I say with respect to the claim in this action, that although this action is brought in the names of the said A. E. Byrne, B. Forwood, and Duncan Campbell, the same has been so brought in their names on behalf of and for the benefit of the said Messrs. Leech, Harrison, and Forwood, who are mortgagees in possession of the said ship.

3. That I have perused a copy of the charter-party referred to in the second paragraph of the affidavit of the said W. S. Wellborne, and I say that one of the terms of the said charter-party is as follows: "This charter-party is effected through the intervention of Lloyd, Lowe, and Co., by whom the ship is to be reported at the Custom House, and through whom the freight and all expenses, if any, are to be settled and paid;" that the said Lloyd, Lowe, and Co., reside and carry on business in London within the jurisdiction of the said Mayor's Court of London.

4. That I verily believe that the said charter-party was entered into and executed and signed by the garnishees, as agents for the defendants, as thereon, appears in the city of London, within the jurisdiction of the said Mayor's court.

HARRISON v. BANK OF AUSTRALASIA.

Ex.]

5. That the plaintiffs' cause of action arises from the nonpayment in London by the said Messrs. Lloyd, Lowe, and Co. of the balance due for freight.

6. That the said plaintiff, A. B. Forwood, is a member of Lloyd's, and carries on business there as an underwriter (within the jurisdiction of the said Mayor's court of London), and has done so for six years past. That the said Arthur Bower Forwood is also senior partner in the said firm of Leech, Harrison, and Forwood, who carry on the business of merchants in the city of London, and within the jurisdiction of the said Mayor's court, and I say that it is well known to the said Messrs. Lloyd, Lowe, and Co., the said Messrs. Thomson, Bonar, and Co., and to the said W. Slee Wellborne, that the said plaintiff A. B. Forwood is such partner of the said Leech and Co., and does carry on business as aforesaid.

7. That the proceedings taken in this matter in the Mayor's Court have been taken under advice of counsel, because the plaintiffs are advised that the garnishees are not personally liable on the said charter-party, and the said garnishees, who alone represent the defendants in this country, refused through their attorneys to appear for the said company to an action which had been brought by the plaintiffs against the said company.

Affidavit of George Lucas.

1. That I have had the conduct and management of the action hereinafter referred to, and of the action above-mentioned, and the proceedings in foreign attachment in the Mayor's Court of London in relation to such action on behalf of the above-named plaintiffs.

3. That I am informed and believe that the said Messrs. J. Thomson, Bonar and Co. are the only representatives of the said Guano Consignment Company in this country, and carry on its business here at Old Broad-street, in the City of London, within the jurisdiction of the said Mayor's Court of London.

12. That in case this honourable court should interfere by prohibition to stay the said action in the Mayor's Court aforesaid, in my judgment and belief the said plaintiff's would be remediless, inasmuch as the plaintiffs do not, except through the mode of attachment against the said Messrs. Thomson, Bonar and Co., possess any means of procuring the appearance of the defendants, the company, to any action in respect of the plaintiff's claim.

13. That this action is brought in the names of the above-named plaintiffs, inasmuch as they are the registered owners of the ship Talisman. That the said plaintiff, A. B. Forwood, is a member of Lloyd's, and carries on business as an underwriter there.

14. That the said A. B. Forwood is also the senior member of the firm of Messrs. Leech, Harrison, and Forwood, and carries on business there as a merchant, and within the jurisdiction of the said Mayor's Court of London.

Cohen showed cause.—He cited: Mayor of London v. Cox (L. Rep. 2 H. of L. 239.) (The purport of his argument will sufficiently appear from the judgments.)

Shiress Will, in support of the rule, was not called upon.

WILLES, J.—We are all of opinion that prohibition should issue. In the case of The Mayor of London v. Cox, the judges advised the House of Lords that the claim of jurisdiction in the Lord Mayor's Court could not be supported, because the cause of action did not arise within the jurisdiction, and it did not appear that the garnishee was more than a mere passenger within the jurisdiction. The present case rests upon the same footing, and the same reasoning is applicable to defeat the attempt made to set up jurisdiction. Such process, if held to be good, might, as there suggested, be a means of extreme annoyance and injury to strangers and foreigners. But it has been argued here that by custom these claims are within the jurisdiction, and that custom may give to an inferior court a right beyond its limits. This argument was noticed and refuted in the above case. The custom of foreign attachment, like other customs, must be local in order to be valid, and a custom which transgresses the local limits is incongruous and therefore void. Then it is further said that the course of proceedings is such that it is not necessary to show that the cause of action arose within the jurisdiction. But in inferior courts there is no presumption in favour of jurisdiction. This claim falls within the rule laid down by Pattenon, J., in Williams v. Gibbs (5 Ad. & Ell. 212): "The consideration, therefore, must be within the jurisdiction. To show, therefore, that the action is maintainable, it must be shown that the consideration arose within the jurisdiction." It has also been argued that the breach is non-payment of freight, and that the payment of freight was to be made in London. This does not end the matter; for there was also the consideration which consisted of the carriage of the goods from the Chincha Islands to this country. Mr. Cohen further adduced the ingenious argument that freight is due for delivery only, and not for carriage; but this is of no avail, because the delivery was at the Victoria Docks, which are not within the city of London. The cause of action must arise within the jurisdiction, and the term "cause of action" cannot be restricted to the mere contract or to the making of the promise. The general rule with respect to inferior courts is, that every part of the cause of action should appear to be within the jurisdiction of the court: (Thom v. Chinnoek, 1 M. & G. 220; Peacock v. Bell, 1 Wms. Sandars, 74a.)

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the prohibition should issue, because the whole cause of action did not arise within the jurisdiction of the Lord Mayor's Court.

BRETT, J.—I am of the same opinion. When the Lord Mayor's Court has jurisdiction, a particular mode of enforcing it may be adopted by seizing the goods of a garnishee; but the whole cause of action must take place within the city of London. Even if the delivery had been in London, that is not the whole consideration for the payment of the freight. The cause of action, therefore, not being within the jurisdiction, the prohibition ought to go.

GROVE, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Rule made absolute.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

HARRISON v. BANK OF AUSTRALASIA.

Ship and shipping—General average—Cost of pumping ship—Donkey engine and fuel.
A sailing ship sailed from Melbourne to London with cargo on board. The ship was in every respect properly manned and fitted for such a voyage, and had on board a sufficient quantity of coals for an ordinary voyage to work the donkey engine, with which she was furnished, and by means of which she was pumped whenever necessary.
In consequence of the uses to which the donkey engine was applied, the number of the crew was ten less than it would have been if no donkey engine had been carried.

[Ex.]

[Ex.]

The ship having encountered a cyclone sprang a leak, and was only prevented from sinking by constant pumping with the donkey engine.

The coal having been much reduced in consequence of the excessive pumping, the captain was obliged to use as fuel the spare spars and ship's stores.

Without the use of the donkey engine the ship could not have continued on her voyage.

Held (per Kelly, C.B., and Bramwell, B., dissentiente Martin and Cleasby, B.), that the value of the spars and ship's stores was the subject of general average, and that there was such a certainty of destruction within a short space of time, unless prevented, as to make the peril imminent.

Per Martin and Cleasby, BB.—That by the terms of the contract the shipowner was bound to deliver the cargo safely; and that as the donkey engine was provided for the purpose of saving the seamen's wages, the owner must take the risk of any loss caused by his having shipped an insufficient quantity of fuel; and also that the ship never was in such imminent peril of total loss as to fulfil the requisites of a case of general average.

THIS was an action brought by the plaintiff as owner of the ship Champion of the Seas, to recover from the defendants the sum of 95l. 8s. 10d., as a contribution in general average due from them as owners of four boxes of gold, part of the cargo of the ship, on her voyage from Melbourne to London.

The defendants pleaded payment into court of the sum of 51l. 6s., as sufficient to cover the plaintiffs' claim, and on this plea issue was joined.

The action came on for trial at the sittings at Nisi Prius, held at Guildhall on the 7th July, 1869, before the Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer, when it was ordered that a verdict be entered for the plaintiff for the damages in the declaration, subject to a special case.

The following special case has been stated under the said order:—

1. The plaintiff is a ship owner, and was in the year 1868 owner of the British sailing ship Champion of the Seas, of 1946 tons registered measurement.

2. The defendants are bankers, carrying on business at Melbourne, in Australia, and also in the City of London.

3. In Feb. 1868, the ship was at Melbourne aforesaid, bound on a voyage from that port to London.

4. The defendants shipped four boxes of gold, to be conveyed by her to London, and a bill of lading, in the usual form, dated on or about the 28th Feb. 1868, was signed for the four boxes of gold, by Outridge, the master of the ship, for the voyage.

5. The ship sailed from Melbourne, on her voyage, on the 29th Feb. 1868, laden with a very valuable cargo of general merchandise and specie, being in every respect properly fitted and manned for the voyage, and having on board a sufficient quantity of coals for an ordinary voyage.

6. The ship was furnished with a donkey engine of eight-horse power. It was adapted for loading and discharging cargo, for hoisting sails and taking them in, and for pumping the ship. It was, according to the evidence of the captain, equivalent for the purpose of working the ship during the voyage to a crew of ten men, and had the donkey engine not been on board, the vessel would have required an additional crew of that number.

7. From the saving of labour and the reduction of the number of the crew effected by the use of a donkey engine, it is sometimes called a steam crew.

8. It is usual for such a ship as the Champion of the Seas, on the voyage from Melbourne to England, to be furnished with a donkey engine which is used for pumping the ship when necessary.

9. The ship sailed from Melbourne on the 24th Feb. 1868, and up to 16th March experienced ordinary weather, and whatever pumping was necessary was done by the crew; on the 10th March the ship encountered a severe cyclone followed by very bad weather which caused her to strain and make much water. The water in the hold at times increased to five feet, and could only be kept down by constant pumping. At first the pumping was done by the engine during the day and by the crew during the night, but it afterwards became necessary to keep the donkey engine pumping constantly. With the donkey engine the pumps were got to suck now and then.

10. There was no sudden emergency rendered the cutting up of the spars wood, but it would have been impossible to have kept the ship afloat with the crew alone without working the donkey engine. After April 1st the weather moderated, but the vessel continued to leak; and about the 16th April the supply of coals was reduced to about one and a half tons, from the constant working of the engine. It was necessary to keep the engine at work, and the captain, after consultation with the first and second officers in order to obtain fuel, directed that some spare spars and wood, which was part of the ship's stores and not intended to be used as fuel, should be cut up to use with the coals.

11. Wood alone would not have sufficed to get up the steam necessary to work the engine, and the captain acted prudently and judiciously for the preservation of a ship and cargo in obtaining fuel by cutting up the spars and wood to use with the coals.

12. The fuel so procured was not sufficient to keep the engine at full work; and, notwithstanding the efforts of the crew, who were occasionally assisted by some passengers in working the pump, the water in the hold slowly increased.

13. On the 25th April it was discovered that a bolt under the port fire channels, and 6ft. or 7ft. below the water, had been started; whereupon the master of the said ship lowered a boat and stopped it with grease, and on the 27th caused a stage to be rigged, and by means of wedges and plugs succeeded in partially stopping the leak.

14. On the 5th May the ship fell in with the barque Peru, and obtained from her thirty-three bags of coals. With this supply the engine was put to full work, and the water in the hold greatly reduced.

15. In order to procure a further supply of coals the master determined to run into the port of Pernambuco, and the ship anchored at Pernambuco on the morning of the 16th May.

16. The ship could not have been repaired at Pernambuco, and the captain, having obtained a large supply of coals, viz., thirty tons, proceeded on the voyage. The captain in so doing acted prudently. The ship was exposed to no serious risk from the water she made while there was sufficient fuel on board to work the donkey engine.

17. The vessel continued to leak during the remainder of the voyage, and it was necessary to keep the engine constantly at work at the pump.

Ex.]

Ex.

When she arrived in the Thames, the coals had been exhausted. Without the aid of the donkey engine, the vessel could not have continued the voyage.

18. The ship arrived at her place of discharge in the docks on the 6th July. The engine broke down while she was coming up the river. The injury to the engine was the result of wear and tear from the constant working during the voyage.

The court is to be at liberty to draw such inferences of facts as a jury ought to draw.

The question for the opinion of the court is, whether the cost of the coals purchased from the Peru, and at Pernambuco, or the cutting up of the spars and ship's materials for fuel for the donkey engine, and the cost of the repairs of the donkey engine, can be charged to general average and recovered from the defendants.

If the court is of opinion in the affirmative, the case shall be referred back to the arbitrator to ascertain if the amount paid into court is or is not sufficient to cover the plaintiff's claim against the defendants. And if he shall find that such sum is not sufficient, then judgment shall be entered for the plaintiff for deficiency, together with costs of suit.

If the court shall be of opinion that none of the said items can be charged to general average, then the judgment shall be entered for the defendants, together with costs of suit.

The plaintiff's points for argument were: First, that the cost of coals purchased from the Peru and at Pernambuco were general average expenses, because they were extraordinary expenses incurred for the preservation of the ship and cargo; secondly, that the loss incurred by cutting up the spars and ship's material for fuel, was a general average loss, because it was a sacrifice voluntarily incurred for the preservation of the ship and cargo, and rendered necessary by extraordinary perils; thirdly, that the cost of the repairs to the donkey engine constitutes a general average expense, because the damage done to the donkey engine was occasioned by the employment of the donkey engine for an extraordinary purpose—for the purpose of saving the ship and her cargo.

May 30 and 31.—H. James Q.C. (with him was A. Cohen), for the plaintiff.—With regard to the question whether the cost of the supply of fuel, whether in the shape of extra coal or spare spars for the use of the donkey engine, under the circumstances stated in the case, be or be not the subject of "general average," so as to be or not to be recoverable in the present action, it is clear that such coal and spars were used for an extraordinary purpose, and one for which they were not originally intended. The vessel was a sailing vessel, and there was no contract of affreightment by which the donkey engine was to be used for the purpose of navigating her. Having through stress of weather sprung a dangerous leak, the captain was bound, in order to keep her afloat, and so to save the cargo, to work the donkey engine in pumping out the water she made through the leak, and it was not possible to do that without using the coal in the first instance, and when that was consumed, and no more was accessible, then having recourse to the spars. It was an exceptional case, and an exceptional use of these articles for the joint safety of both ship and cargo, and therefore it is submitted that they came clearly within the definition of "general average" expenses. The ship here was thoroughly well fitted and furnished at starting on her voyage. The tempest she encountered was "an act of God," which no master could contend against. The obligation is only to have a ship sufficiently furnished and manned with a crew sufficient to enable her to meet, and to be navigated in, weather ordinarily to be expected. There is no authority which says that the peril must be imminent in the sense of being immediate in point of time, but only in the sense of being, as was the case here, morally certain in point of effect. Had the ship lost her rudder, or her masts, or, as she did do, sprung a leak, part of her timber might have been cut away to remedy the mischief, and that would have been within "general average." What distinction, then, can be drawn between that case and the present? It is only necessary, in order to found a claim coming within "general average," that what is done should be a prudent and necessary action in order to avoid the certainty of eventual loss. In Arnould on Insurance (2nd vol. p. 770, 3rd edition), the two classes of losses which give a claim to "general average," are thus defined; first, those which arise from sacrifices of part of the ship or part of the cargo, purposely made in order to save the whole adventure from perishing, and, secondly, those which arise out of extraordinary expenses incurred for the joint benefit of both ship and cargo. It is there said that "if any part of the ship or her tackle be sacrificed or cut up for the rescue of the common adventure, and applied to some purpose different from its ordinary one, the loss thence arising is a general average loss." (Ib. 4th edit. p. 771.) The plaintiff's claim seems clearly within that definition. Sacrifice and expenditure are, generally speaking, the two heads of general average. (See also 2 Phillips on Insurance (American), 5th edit. p. 61, sects. 1270, 1271.) If, as is clearly the case, the "hire of hands to pump the ship" be a "general average" claim (2 Phillips on Insurance, sect 1236, and Field on General Average, p. 78), what possible difference can there be between that and the cost of pumping the ship by means of the donkey engine? In many of the cases cited by Mr. Arnould there was no imminent peril, and yet the expenses claimed were held to be "general average" expenses. [MARTIN, B. referred to Wilson and another v. The Bank of Victoria (16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 9; L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 203; 36 L. J. 89, Q. B.)] That case, it is submitted, is really in the present plaintiff's favour. There was no danger there, and there was nothing to do but to bring the ship home she had been driven out of her course, and to avoid the loss of time in a long sailing voyage the captain purchased coals to work the auxiliary screw, and that was held not to be the subject of "general average." The whole judgment there turned on the question of what was the cost of affreightment, and it was that the ship was to be partly worked by the auxiliary screw. But the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, as delivered by Blackburn, J. is favourable to the present plaintiff's view, for his Lordship, at the conclusion of it expressly says, "It is not similar to the case of the master hiring extra hands to pump when his crew are unable to keep the vessel afloat, or any other expenditure which is not only extraordinary in its amount, but is incurred to procure some service extraordinary in its nature." That is precisely the present case.

[Ex.]

If hiring a double set of men to pump the ship be "general average," then surely working the donkey engine a double number of hours for the like purpose is also "general average." The case finds that ten men, for whom the donkey engine was an equivalent, could not, working day and night, have done the work which the engine did, and by working which alone both ship and cargo were preserved. The case here is not the bringing to bear a greater amount of power of the same kind as, e.g., twenty men in lieu of ten, but the extra working of the donkey engine equalling the work of twenty extra men. The plaintiff was clearly entitled to recover. He cited also and referred to—

Birkley and others v. Presgrave, 1 East, 220;
Meredith's Emerigon, pp. 283, 478;
Pothier, vol. 4 part 2, p. 421. edit. 1851;
Bailey on General Average, pp. 15, 17.

Chas. Pollock, Q.C. (Lodge with him.)—Both the case of Plummer v. Wildman (3 M. & S. 482) and Birkley v. Presgrave (1 East, 220) have been severely commented on. Scarcely a judgment is given in which they are not mentioned with the greatest dissatisfaction. The question in Birkley v. Presgrave was whether an action would lie for general average, Lord Kenyon there says, "A loss is incurred which the law declares shall be borne by certain persons in their several proportions, where a loss is to be repaired in damages, where else can they be recovered but in the courts of common law?" And wherever the law gives a right generally to demand payment of another, it raises an implied promise in that person to pay. All ordinary losses and damage sustained by the ship happening immediately from the storm or perils of the sea must be borne by the shipowner; but all those articles which were made use of by the master and crew upon the particular emergency, and out of the usual course, for the benefit of the whole concern and the other expenses incurred, must be paid proportionately by the defendant as general average. [CLEASBY, B.—The definition of general average is the expense incurred for the whole cargo.] In Hallett and others v. Wigram and others (9 C. B. 580), which was a claim to contribution for general average, where a part of the cargo had been sold to defray the expenses of repairing the ship in consequence of sea perils, Wilde C.J., says at page 602, "Where a ship went into port in distress, and wanted repairs, it became necessary to take out the cargo, and, there being no warehouses at hand, it was necessary to put it on board other vessels. Lord Stowell said that as the unloading of the goods was for the common benefit of all, it being necessary to unload the ship for the preservation of the cargo as well as for its own repair, the expense incurred by it must be considered as general average." It seems to result from these decisions that if a vessel goes into port in consequence of an injury which is itself the subject of general average, such repairs as are absolutely necessary to enable her to prosecute her voyage, and the necessary expense of port-charges, wages, and provisions, are to be considered as general average: (Abbott on Shipping, p. 497. In the case of Clifford v. Hunter (Mood. & M. 103), the captain of the ship was taken ill with several of his crew at the Mauritius. He sailed on, however, and finding himself worse, and none of the other officers able to undertake the command of the ship to England, he started back to the Mauritius, and the ship was lost. Lord Tenterden said, "A ship certainly is not fit for a voyage unless she sails with a competent crew—a crew competent for the voyage, considering its length and the circumstances under which it is undertaken. Can a ship be said to be sufficiently manned, when, in the event of any accident to the captain, there is no one else on board to perform his duties?" If the contention of the plaintiff was right would he not be entitled to say, "This voyage is longer than usual, and I am entitled to charge the extra coals consumed as general average." If the plaintiff has burnt a more expensive fuel by not taking enough of the cheaper material, he cannot make that the subject of general average. He cited Wilson v. Bank of Victoria (L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 203; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 9).

Cohen in reply.—The burning of the spars being an extraordinary expenditure, through the leak, was the subject of general average. There must be an immediate and certain danger of the loss of the ship, and that danger was present, for if the ship had not been pumped she would have sunk.

Cur. adv. vult.

The court being divided in opinion the following judgments were delivered. The judgment of Kelly, C.B., and Bramwell, B., being delivered as follows by BRAMWELL, B.:—It seems to us this is a case of general average. The ship was well found, seaworthy, and with proper quantity of coal for the donkey engine. She sprung a leak, and through it she must, if the donkey engine ceased to work, have foundered in a few days or hours, unless some relief not to be foreseen or calculated on had arrived. The arbitrator finds that she had coal for a few hours only, that had she burned her coal wood would not have sufficed to keep up the fires, but that by combining coal and wood the fires could be kept up for a much longer time. Accordingly the captain prudently and properly sacrificed some spare spars, and saved the ship and cargo. There seems to us here all the ingredients of a case of general average—perils of the seas—imminent, certain loss in a short time, unless something not to be anticipated should intervene, and a sacrifice of the property of one for the benefit of all. Suppose the wood had been cargo, and the captain had burned it, would it have been a wrongful act in the captain? would not the owner have had a good claim for general average? Would not the captain have failed in his duty unless he had burned these spars, whether the property of his owners, or cargo? Suppose the donkey engine had been cargo, and had been fitted upon the springing of the leak, and the wood burned as now. It is said the danger was not imminent; that there was no emergency. We think there was, and that a certainty of destruction within a short time, unless prevented, is an emergency and imminent. Suppose a vessel ran for shelter into a river where no supplies could be obtained; suppose she would have to stay a fortnight unless she got out at the then spring tides; suppose her provisions would fail her in that time; suppose, to get out, she lightens herself by throwing some heavy cargo over, would not that be a case of emergency and imminent danger? We think it would; and that such is the result of all the authorities some of which may now be briefly considered. A general average loss has been defined to be "a loss arising out of extraordinary sacrifices made, or extraordinary expenses incurred, for the joint benefit of ship and cargo." See per Lawrence, J., in Birkley v. Presgrave (1 East. 220, 228); Wilson v. The Bank of Victoria (2 L. Rep. 203, Q.B.), cited on behalf of the defendants, only shows that where steam power is substituted for sailing power, which from injury to the ship had been exhausted, the additional expense of fuel is not to be deemed an extraordinary expense within the meaning of the rule. But the present case is not one of substitution at all. It was necessary, in order to keep the ship afloat, that additional fuel should be found. The coals on board by themselves would have been insufficient, and, to feed the fires, a number of spars, the property of the owners part of the ship's stores, were cut up and used in addition to the coals as fuel. This was, we think, an extraordinary sacrifice, and necessary, as may be fairly inferred from the statement in the case, to save the ship from sinking. In principle, this seems to be within the case of Plummer v. Wildman (3 M. & S. 482), where part of the rigging of the ship was cut away, and the expenses of returning to port to repair the damage, without which the ship could not have proceeded on her voyage, or safely kept the sea, was held to be the subject of general average. This case is supposed to have been shaken by the case of Power v. Whitmore, shortly afterwards decided, and reported in 4 M. & S. 141, and so in Hallett v. Wigram (9 C. B. 580), where a part of the cargo had been sold to raise money at a port to which the ship had put back for the repair of damage incurred by the ordinary perils of the sea, it was held to be no case of general average; but the true principle, as applicable to all these cases, is well stated in Abbott on Shipping, 497, referred to in 9 C. B. 603, in these terms: "It seems to result from these decisions, that if a vessel goes into port in consequence of an injury, which is itself the subject of general average, such repairs as are absolutely necessary to enable her to prosecute her voyage, and the necessary expenses of port charges, wages, and provisions during the stay, are to be considered as general average, but if the damage was incurred by mere violence of wind and weather, without sacrifice on the part of the owners for the benefit of all concerned, it falls with the expenses consequent upon it within the contract of the shipowner to keep his vessel tight, staunch and strong during the voyage for which she is hired." And the later case of Kemp v. Halliday, in the Exchequer Chamber (L. Rep. 1, Q.B. 520), is in strict conformity to the doctrine thus laid down by Lord Tenterden. Upon these grounds we are of opinion that, as regards the spars cut up and the ship's materials used for fuel, this is a case of general average; but not so the cost of the coals obtained from the Peru, or purchased at Pernambuco, or of the repairs of the donkey engine. Upon this point, therefore, we think the plaintiff entitled to the judgment of the court, and that the case must be referred back to the arbitrator.

MARTIN, B.—This is an action in which the question is whether the plaintiff is entitled to recover a sum of about 40*l.* for general average; and although the amount in dispute is not large, the question involved a matter of very great importance to the mercantile shipping interest of this country. The facts have been stated by an arbitrator in a special case.

The first four paragraphs state that the plaintiff is the owner of a ship called the Champion of the Seas, which, in Feb. 1868, was at Melbourne, bound on a voyage to London, and that the defendants shipped on board four boxes of gold, for which the master signed the ordinary bill of lading. The bill of lading is not set out, but it would state that the defendants had shipped on board the four boxes of gold, to be carried from Melbourne to London, and there delivered to the consignee upon payment of a certain ascertained sum for freight, unless prevented by the perils mentioned in the bill of lading. This is the only contract between the plaintiff and defendants, and it is clear that if the Champion of the Seas was the veriest hulk which ever sailed, and if she departed from Melbourne only half manned and utterly unseaworthy, nevertheless if she had arrived in London, and the four boxes of gold had been there delivered to the consignee the plaintiff would have performed his contract, and would be entitled to his freight. The defendants would have no legal ground of complaint that the ship was half rotten; that she was half manned; that instead of sailors she had a donkey engine, and a quantity of fuel utterly insufficient to work it for the voyage. The answer of the shipowners would be, 'Your four boxes of gold have been safely delivered to you in London. I have performed my contract. The manner in which I have performed it is my business, not yours.' The next question in the present case is whether the shipper (the merchant) is bound by law to pay to the shipowner for the performance of the services contracted in the bill of lading a sum of money beyond that stipulated for in the written contract between the parties. The facts upon which he relied to entitle him to the additional payment are the following, and are contained in paragraphs 5-14, inclusive, of the special case. On the 29th Feb. 1868, the ship sailed from Melbourne with a valuable cargo in every respect fitted and manned, and having on board a sufficient quantity of coal for an ordinary voyage, she had a donkey steam engine of 8-horse power adapted, amongst other purposes, for pumping the ship. It was equivalent to a crew of ten additional men, and had it not been on board ten additional seamen would have been required, and it is usual for such a ship to have such an engine. Up to the 16th March the ship experienced ordinary weather, but upon that day a severe cyclone, followed by very bad weather, which caused her to strain and make much water, which could only be kept down by constant pumping, and at times it was necessary to keep the donkey engine constantly pumping. After 1st April the weather moderated, but the ship continued to leak, and on the 10th April the coal was reduced to about a ton and a half. It was necessary to keep the engine at work, and in order to obtain fuel the captain directed that some spare spars and wood, which was part of the ship's stores, and not intended to be used as fuel, should be cut up to use with the coals. The arbitrator found that the captain acted prudently and judiciously for the preservation of the ship and cargo, by cutting up the spars and wood to use with the coal. There was no immediate emergency which rendered the cutting up the spars and wood necessary, but it would have been impossible to have kept the ship afloat with the crew alone without working the donkey engine. The first claim made against the defendants is to contribute to pay the plaintiff the value of his spars and wood. On the 25th it was discovered that a bolt had started, and on the 27th the leak consequent upon it was partially stopped. On the 5th May the ship fell in with a barque, the Peru, at sea, and 33 bags of coal were bought from the master; and with them the engine was put to full work, and the water in the hold greatly reduced. Contribution to the price of this coal was the second claim against the defendants. There was a third claim which was abandoned. The result of the voyage was that the ship having put into Pernambuco arrived in London, and the four boxes of gold were safely delivered to the consignee, and the question is whether either of the above claims are general average, and I am of opinion that neither of them are. It seems in reason highly unjust that the merchants should be called upon to pay the two sums claimed. He had contracted with the shipowner to pay him a certain sum for the conveyance of his four boxes of gold from Melbourne to London. The shipowner was to provide the ship and seamen to perform the service, and he thought fit, instead of hiring ten additional seamen, to have a steam engine which in order to its being of any use necessarily required fuel; he did provide at Melbourne what he reasonably deemed sufficient, but it turned out he was in error, and that the supply was not sufficient. How in reason does this relieve him from the obligation of doing his best to remedy the short supply, and cast upon the merchant the obligation of contributing to the loss and expense which he incurred in consequence. There is no doubt, however, that long continued custom has created the claim called general average. This subject is treated of in the first chapter of the 6th part of Abbott on Shipping, 11th edit. 521. It is said by Lord Tenterden to be founded upon the lex rhodia de jacta, or in other words, the law of jettison, which is, "if for the sake of lightening the ship a jettison (jactus) is made of merchandise, that which is sacrificed for all should be made good by the constitution of all." His Lordship comments upon it, and proceeds to state its true principle—that it must be a voluntary sacrifice for the good of all, and made at a moment of imminent danger, which he instances by the ship being in danger of perishing by a hurricane or by the quantity of water that may have found its way into it, or by labouring upon a rock or a shallow upon which it may have been driven by a tempest, or when a pirate or enemy pursues, gains ground, and is ready to overtake, the loss arising from throwing merchandise overboard, under such circumstances, is to be made good in general average. He then proceeds to discuss cases in which, in analogy to the law of jettison, general average has been allowed, and, as it seems to me, is rather disposed to think they have gone too far, for the subject is discussed at great length by the learned editor, in the note, and I think he has, at the conclusion of note n, p. 537, expressed the true rule, viz., that to make expenses incurred by the shipowner general average, they must be expenses voluntarily and successfully incurred, or the necessary consequence of a resolution voluntarily and successfully taken by a person in charge of a sea adventure for the safety of life, ship and cargo, under the pressure of a danger of total loss or destruction imminent and common to them. In my opinion, in the present case, there was no imminent danger of total loss when the spars and wood were cut up and burnt. The weather had moderated for the ten days previous; there was a ton and a half of coal remaining, which it was proper to husband, and the spars and wood were used to burn with the coal; there could clearly have been no jettison at the time, and, in my opinion, the shipowner must bear the loss of his timber being made use of to aid in making up for the deficient coal. For the same reason I think the price of the coal bought on the 5th May is not general average, and must be borne by the shipowner. In my opinion there was no present immediate peril imminent. The cases relied on on behalf of the plaintiff were Birkley v. Presgrave (1 East, 220,) and Plummer v. Wildman (3 M. & S. 482.) These cases were said by the learned counsel for the defendants to be, although perhaps apparently in favour of the plaintiff, yet in reality not so, and he relied upon Powell v. Whitmore (4 M. & S. 141), Hallett v. Wigram (9 C. B. 580), and Wilson v. Bank of Victoria (L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 204.) In my opinion the two cases last mentioned were correctly decided, and are accurate exponents of the law. In addition to these cases I believe every text-book expression and dictum of French, German, American and English authorities which exist were cited, and in Mr. Arnould's book it is said that where a rudder had been carried away, and a spare spar was cut up to make one, it was decided to be general average. The circumstances of the case are not stated. I think the question in the present case is one of fact, and that the case does not show that at the time when the spars and wood were cut up to add to the coal, or at the time when the coal was bought from the barque, there was such imminent danger of the ship's sinking that the loss and expenses incurred by the shipowner ought to be contributed to by the merchant. I think that in reason and in accordance with his contract he ought to bear the loss and expense himself.

[Ex.]

CLEASBY, B.—I have read the judgment which my brother Martin has written, and I agree in that judgment. I will only add two remarks, first, I think the statement in the case does not afford sufficient materials for the conclusion that any sacrifice was made at a time of imminent danger. The captain would not have been justified in making a jettison of a portion of the cargo to diminish the leak, and so lessen the necessity for continuous use of the donkey. It was a proper and prudent thing in the captain to guard against the supply of fuel failing, and the possibility of his being unable to get a further supply in time. But this prudence is not sufficient to justify a jettison or any other sacrifice so as to lay a foundation for general average. It does not appear upon the case how long the coal would have lasted after the 10th April, when the captain began to use the spars, nor how much remained at the time when the fresh supply was obtained; but it does appear the spars were only used to eke out the coal, and that they lasted from the 10th April to the 5th May. The danger in reality is not of going to the bottom if nothing is done, but the improbability of meeting with a supply of fuel during the interval while the existing fuel is being consumed; and it appears to me that this not only is insufficient to establish such a case of imminent peril as is necessary to forward a claim for general average, but negatives it. The other remark is that some difficulty is created in this case by referring to American authorities on this subject, and Stevens on Average, and other works of a similar nature. The law in America does not in all respects agree with ours on the subject of general average (as will be pointed out shortly), and the other works referred to do not, in my opinion, correctly state the English law on the subject. We were pressed with many authorities to show the imminency of danger was not necessary to make the expenses incurred by a vessel in going into port to repair a subject of general average. It is undoubted that when some sacrifice has been made (for example, cutting away masts, &c.), the expenses consequent upon going into port after the danger is over to repair this loss is, in England, the subject of general average; because going into port, though there is no imminent danger at the time, yet being rendered necessary by the sacrifice made in imminent danger, stands upon the same footing as the sacrifice itself. But the expense attending the going into port to repair sea damage caused by a storm when no sacrifice has been voluntarily made do not, it is submitted, form items of general average according to English law, although they are regarded as doing so in America. See Kent's Commentaries, vol. 3, p. 329, and note at the end. The distinction is clearly pointed out in the judgment in Powell v. Whitmore (4 M. & S. 148). The case of Plummer v. Wildman (3 M. & S. 482), relied upon by the plaintiff, might appear to countenance the opinion that the expense consequent upon putting into port to repair sea damage for the benefit of all went into general average, but that case must always be taken with the explanation given by Lord Ellenborough in Powell v. Whitmore (4 M. & S. 141) the following year. He was the judge who presided when both cases were decided, and in the latter case he points out that in Plummer v. Wildman the master had cast away the rigging in order to preserve the ship, and afterwards put into port to repair that which he voluntarily sacrificed for the benefit of all. Now, according to paragraph 6, the donkey engine and coals were a part of the regular equipment of the ship and used for loading and unloading cargo, hoisting sails and taking them in, and pumping the ship. If then, from the unexpected length of the voyage and tempestuous weather, causing the vessel to strain and leak, and so making pumping indispensable for the safety of the ship, the supply of coals run short, and the ship made for the nearest coal depot to provide a further supply, without which the voyage could not be prosecuted with safety; could the expense of providing this further supply go into general average? would it not fall upon the owners as part of the necessary expenses of navigating the ship? Or, again, if from excessive use in any of the purposes for which the donkey engine was used it broke down, and it was necessary to go into port to repair it, would the expense of going into port fall into general average? In those States in America in which it has been held that the expenses of going into port to repair damage from tempest, this might be so, but it is submitted it would not be so here. Or suppose that there were no means of repairing the damage to the engine in the case last put, and therefore, instead of the engine and coals the captain ships an equivalent crew of ten men (see paragraph 6), could this expense go into general average? It is hardly necessary to point out the distinction between the several cases last put and a case put in the argument, viz., that if a vessel with a full and complete crew was unable to keep down a leak, so that if nothing further was done the ship would go to the bottom, then the expenses of sending ashore and getting additional hands, or it may be a donkey engine to keep down the leak would go into general average. In that case the emergency was urgent and imminent, and the emergency was not caused by having coals on board, which are consumed by being used instead of a crew which is not so consumed.

The Court being divided in opinion, Cleasby, B., withdrew his judgment.

Reported by J. P. ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Friday, Jan. 26, 1872.

THE LIVIA.

Collision—Compulsory pilotage—Burden of proof—Several issues—Costs.

In a cause of damage by collision, where the defence relied upon is compulsory pilotage only, and the defendants prove that the vessel was in charge of a licensed pilot by compulsion of law, and that he gave orders for the purpose of avoiding the collision, and that these orders were obeyed, and here the plaintiffs seek to show that the collision was due to the defective steering power of the defendants' vessel, it lies upon the plaintiffs to prove such defective steering power by substantive evidence. (a)

Defendants in a cause of damage, who rely at the hearing upon the defence of compulsory pilotage only, and succeed in this point, but whose pleadings raise other issues which are not proved, are not entitled to their costs.

THIS was a cause of damage instituted on behalf of the owners of the schooner Lulea, and of her cargo, against the brig Livia. The petition was as follows:

1. The three-masted schooner Lulea, of 227 tons British register, was riding at anchor, in a fair and proper berth, in Falmouth Roads, at about 2.30 p.m. of the 14th Nov. 1871.

2. The weather at such time was rather thick, with slight rain. There was a strong breeze from the S.S.W. The tide was in the first quarter flood. The Lulea lay with her head about S. by W. half W. A good look out was being kept on board of her.

(a) It may be as well to point out here that some confusion seems to have existed as to the meaning to be attached to the words "and that these orders were obeyed." It is not the mere putting the helm to port in consequence of orders of the pilot that is obedience to orders, but the ship must have gone off under her port helm before the orders can be said to have been obeyed; the ship, and not the helmsman only, must have obeyed orders. If the learned judge meant, in his judgment, to say that, it having been shown that everything was done to cause the ship to go off under her port helm, he would not presume an exceptional state of circumstances, which prevented her from obeying her helm, without some positive proof of those circumstances, the decision is consistent with decided cases; but on the other hand it is submitted that it lies on those pleading compulsory pilotage to show clearly that they were not to blame, and if the ship did not obey orders they were bound to show why she did not.—Ed.

3. In these circumstances the brig Livia, proceeded against in this cause, was observed by those on board the Lulea, about three cables' length off, and bearing about one and a half points on her port bow. In a very short time the Livia came into collision with the Lulea with great violence, the port bow of the Livia by her cat-head striking the port midships of the Lulea. Very serious damage was done to the Lulea by the collision aforesaid, and much loss and injury has been in consequence suffered by the owners of the Lulea, and her cargo.

4. The collision aforesaid, and the damage and loss arising therefrom are attributable to the default, neglect, or mismanagement of the Livia, or those on board of her.

5. No blame in respect of the said collision is attributable to the Lulea, or to any one on board of her.

The answer filed on behalf of the owners of the Livia was as follows:

1. The Livia is an Italian brig, of 241 tons register, or thereabouts, navigated by Vincenzo Mazella, her master, and a crew of ten hands.

2. On the 21st July 1871, the Livia, navigated by her said master and crew, left Marianople with a cargo of rye, bound for Queenstown or Falmouth for orders.

3. At about 11 a.m. of the 14th Nov. following, the Livia, in the prosecution of her said voyage, arrived off the Lizard, and was boarded by a duly licensed pilot named John Collins, in charge of whom she afterwards proceeded for Falmouth.

4. Shortly before 2 p.m. on the said 14th Nov. the weather was a little thick, and there were passing showers, and the wind was blowing strong from the S.S.W., and the Livia, still in charge of the said John Collins, was proceeding upon Falmouth, under lower foretopsail, flying jib, and foretopmast staysail, and making about four knots an hour. A good look out was being kept from on board of her, and the said John Collins was also upon the forecastle looking out, and directing the navigation of the ship.

5. Whilst the Livia was thus proceeding, several vessels were seen at anchor in Falmouth Roads. One of such vessels, to wit, the Lulea, whose owners are the plaintiffs in this cause, was particularly observed by the said John Collins when at the distance of about one hundred fathoms from, and bearing about one point on, the port bow of the Livia, but no alteration was then made by the said John Collins in the course of the Livia. When, however, the Livia had approached to within a short distance of the Lulea, the said John Collins gave orders for the helm of the Livia to be put hard a-port, and for her port jib-sheets to be hauled aft; but notwithstanding that these orders were immediately obeyed, the Livia, with the luff of her port bow, came into collision with the port side of the Lulea, and damage was occasioned thereby as well to the Lulea as to the Livia. The Livia, after clearing the Lulea, was then, by direction of the said John Collins, brought to anchor.

6. Save as herein appears, the defendants deny the truth of the allegations contained in the petition.

7. The aforesaid collision was not in any way occasioned by any negligence or default of the master and crew of the Livia.

8. Before and at the time of the occurrence of the aforesaid collision, the Livia was navigated within a pilotage district, wherein, and under circumstances in which it was compulsory by law upon her and her master and owners that she should be in charge of a pilot duly licensed for such district; and the said John Collins was a pilot duly licensed for such district, and before, and at the time of the said collision, was in sole charge of the Livia, and directing her navigation; and if, and so far as the said collision was occasioned by any negligent or improper navigation of the Livia, it was wholly occasioned by the negligence or want of skill of the said John Collins, in whose charge the Livia then was by compulsion of law.

On this the plaintiffs concluded denying the allegations in the answer, save in so far as they agreed with the statements in the petition. At the hearing before the judge, assisted by Trinity Master, the facts alleged both in the petition and answer were substantially proved. The defendants' witnesses were first called, and from the evidence of the master of the Livia it further appeared that the Livia steered well; that before this voyage she had been to Constantinople, and that whilst there that the ship's bottom had been thoroughly cleaned that at Marianople, before starting on this voyage, she had been listed over and cleaned as far as possible; that the Lulea was lying with her head out to sea; that there might have been an inch of barnacles and weeds on her bottom as far as he could see, but that this would not interfere with her steering. The pilot was not called on either side. From the evidence of a channel pilot, called for the defendants, it appeared that he had navigated the ship from Falmouth to Rotterdam, and that whilst on her voyage, and whilst being towed up the Helvetysluis canal to Rotterdam, she steered well. From the defendants' evidence, it appeared that the Livia, whilst at Falmouth, had been examined by order of the commissioners of pilotage, and that she was thoroughly foul with barnacles and grass three inches and a half thick. The witness, a master of a merchant vessel, who gave this evidence, stated as his opinion that this would materially affect the ship's steering. Whilst at Falmouth the Livia was cleaned with scrapers fastened to handles four feet long. The carpenter of the Lulea stated, that as the Livia approached she was yawing from side to side.

Milward, Q.C. (Clarkson with him) for the defendants.—We have shown that the vessel steered reasonably well, and that is sufficient. As long as she was in ordinary safe trim, although she might have been in handier trim, the owners are not responsible: (The Argo, Swab. 460.) We have proved that the pilot's orders were given and obeyed (The Schwalbe, Lush. 239), and we are not bound to call the pilot.

Butt, Q.C. (Phillimore with him) for the plaintiffs.—The Livia would not steer. The Lulea was about one point on the port bow of the Livia, and struck the Livia on the port bow, and this shows that the Livia did not answer her port helm but came to. If anyone is bound to call the pilot, the defendants are, and not the plaintiffs: (The Carrier Dove, Bro. & Lush. 113). It is sufficient for the plaintiffs to show that the vessel did not answer her helm. The defendants must prove by whose fault it did not. The evidence raises a presumption that the steering was bad, and if it was bad we are entitled to a verdict. Owners are responsible for bad steering occasioned by an inherent defect in a ship: (The Peru, Pritchard's Digest, 440, (a)). If she was more than ordinarily unable to steer, the owners are liable.

Milward, Q.C. in reply.—We have shown all that we are required under the defence of compulsory pilotage, and the onus of proving that the vessel could not be steered lies upon the plaintiffs. There is no positive evidence given by the plaintiffs to show that the vessel steered badly, so as to bring this case within the principle laid down in The Peru (sup.).

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is a case in which a collision took place between the brig Livia and the three-masted schooner Lulea. The Lulea, a Swedish vessel, was riding in a fair and proper berth in Falmouth Roads at about 2.30 p.m. on the 14th Nov. 1871. The Italian brig Livia was coming into Falmouth Roads for orders. She had taken a duly licensed pilot on board off the Lizard, and whilst she was running up the harbour, she came into collision with the Lulea, and inflicted on the latter vessel serious damage. It is not denied by the defendants that the Livia was alone to blame for the collision. The only question that I have now to decide in this case is, whether the defence set up, namely, that the Livia, at the time of the collision was in charge of a pilot; that he gave orders for the purpose of avoiding the collision; that those orders were obeyed, but that the collision, nevertheless, took place. But it is said on the part of the plaintiffs that the collision was due to circumstances, which appears on the face of the case, that clearly shows that the Livia, at the time of the collision, was in such a condition that she was incapable of steering, and that her owners are therefore responsible. The plaintiffs, to prove this proposition, have brought forward evidence to show that the Livia was foul with barnacles and grass. Now, if it were proved to the satisfaction of the court that the vessel was so foul as not to obey her helm, then, no doubt the injury sustained would be due to the vessel and not to the pilot, as he would have given the necessary orders in ignorance of her condition. Such a fact as this, however, ought not to be proved by presumptions to be deduced from the plaintiffs' or the defendants' case, but by positive evidence of the clearest character. Now, what is the evidence of the defendants, on this point. The vessel was cleaned at Constantinople, and afterwards partially at Marianople, and then she made this voyage. Her master said she steered well all the time. After the collision she went to Rotterdam under the charge of a channel pilot. He sailed in her on the 10th Dec., the collision having taken place on the 14th Nov., and he found no fault with her steering, and he had to steer her whilst being towed up the Helvetshyus canal, in which place a vessel must answer her helm reasonably well to be safe. On the part of the plaintiffs, the court is asked to presume that the vessel did not steer well from the fact of her being covered with barnacles. The evidence given is quite sufficient to discharge the owners of the Livia from proof of the condition of their vessel. They have shown that the pilot's orders were obeyed, and if the plaintiffs intended to show that the Livia, and not the pilot was to blame, that ought to have been proved by substantive evidence; the burden of proof is removed to the plaintiffs, and they must show that the Livia is to blame. There may be cases, no doubt, in which the evidence adduced by the defendants appears sufficient to warrant the court in finding on that evidence alone that the ship and not the pilot is to blame; but this is not such a case. The presumption in such case would have to be very strong before the court would act upon it. The opinion of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House—and with this opinion I entirely concur—is that if the order given by the pilot to keep her away had been given sooner this collision would not have taken place; and they think that the pilot did not, when he first saw the ship, make sufficient allowance for the flood tide running into the harbour. The Livia could have had very little steerage way on her. Holding this opinion, I must find in this case that the pilot alone, and not the Livia, is responsible for this collision, and I accordingly dismiss the suit. The cases cited (The Carrier Dove (sup.), and The Schwalbe (sup.)), with reference to calling the pilot, establish the proposition that sufficient evidence must be given to show that the collision was occasioned by the default of the pilot, and that the necessary facts must be strictly proved; but they are not authorities for saying that, where the fact that the pilot has given orders, and those orders have been obeyed has already been proved, the owners are bound to call him in support of their case.

(a) Cited in the argument from reports of Admiralty decisions in the Shipping and Mercantile Gazette, out from that paper and preserved in the Registry.

THE LIVIA.

Milward, Q.C., for the defendants, applied for costs, and cited the Royal Charter (L. Rep. 2 Adm. 362; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 109; 3 Mar. Law Cas; O. S. 262.) (a).

Clarkson, on the same side, contended that the defence in this case as shown by the answer amounted to that of compulsory pilotage only. The only defence the defendants relied on was that of compulsory pilotage. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The 8th paragraph of the answer surely raises the question whether there was negligence on the part of the Livia. The real test in this case is whether as counsel, you would advise, on the pleadings as they now stand, that witnesses should be called on the question of compulsory pilotage only.] Certainly I should. There are only three defences that we could have raised, first, that the Lulea was to blame; secondly, that the pilot was to blame; or thirdly, that the collision was an inevitable accident. We could only raise the defence of compulsory pilotage in this case, and that was our defence. The plaintiffs tried to prove facts as to our ship's steering, and they have failed. They were not bound to bring this action. They should have ascertained the facts clearly before coming here: (The London, 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 348; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 398; Bro. & Lush 82.)

Butt, Q.C. contra.—Is it distinctly admitted on the face of the answer that the only defence is compulsory pilotage? That is the only question. Could we safely bring witnesses as to compulsory pilotage only? Parag. 5 of the petition raises a distinct issue and is traversed in the answer.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—In the case of the Royal Charter, I said, "Looking to all the circumstances of this case, and the present state of the law with respect to compulsory pilotage, I am of opinion that the defendants are entitled to their costs," and if the present case could be brought within the principle that I acted on in that case, I should follow it. There was an agreement as to facts, and it was confined to the sole question of compulsory pilotage, and it admitted that that was the only defence. It is impossible to read the answer in this case, and to suppose that such an admission is made. Such an admission should be made in language of the most distinct character, and should not be left to be drawn by ingenious inference from the words of the answer. I am of

(a) The judge sent for the documents in the Royal Charter (sup.) from the registry, and it appeared that in that case there were no pleadings, but a statement in nature of a special case agreed upon between counsel, which clearly and distinctly raised the one question in the case, viz., that the defence was compulsory pilotage, and that only.

Collision—Preliminary act—Amendment—Practice
The Court will not, at the hearing, allow the amendment of the preliminary act in a cause of damage by collision.

THIS was a cause of damage, instituted on behalf of the owners of the steamship Kestrel against the steamship Frankland. The Frankland was on a voyage from Sunderland to London, and was, at the time of the collision, according to the answer filed on her behalf, off the coast of Norfolk, and was proceeding on her voyage in a thick fog at the rate of about two knots an hour, and the collision took place two hours after she had passed the Dudgeon light. The plaintiffs alleged in their petition that the Frankland was proceeding too fast. The preliminary act filed in her behalf alleged that the collision took place "about four miles southward of the Dudgeon light vessel," and the answer contained the same allegation. The cause now came on for hearing, and before the opening of the plaintiff's case, and without offering any proof of the fact—

Milward, Q.C. (Clarkson with him) for the defendants, applied for leave to amend their preliminary act and their answer, by altering "four miles southward of the Dudgeon light," to "six or eight miles southward of the Dudgeon light," on the ground that, in calculating the distance they had passed the light, they had not made allowance for the tide, which was running in their favour at the rate of about a mile and a half. In relation to our speed it is important to fix the place of collision.

Butt, Q.C. (Pritchard with him) for the plaintiffs, objected, on the ground that the object of a preliminary act was to obtain a statement from the party making it immediately after the institution of the cause, with a view to accuracy whilst the facts are still fresh, and that if amendments were allowed at the trial that object would be defeated. The court holds parties strictly to the statements in their preliminary acts.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I am of opinion that the application to amend the preliminary act cannot be granted. The object of the preliminary act is to commit the parties to statements of the facts, at a time when they are fresh in their recollection, and this object would be entirely defeated if I allowed the act to be amended at the hearing of the cause. The same objection does not apply to the amendment of the answer, as the defendants have applied before the evidence has been taken. The answer may therefore be amended, but it will of course, be competent to counsel for the plaintiffs to comment upon the discrepancy between the answer and the preliminary act.

Tender—Costs—Practice.

A tender must be made with costs, or the ground for refusing costs must appear on the face of it.

THIS was a cause of salvage instituted against the Thracian, in which the defendants had tendered 300*l.* The tender was as follows:—

IN THE HIGH COURT OF ADMIRALTY.

No. 5970.

The Thracian.

Take notice, that I have this day paid into the Bank of England, to the credit of the registrar of this honourable court, the sum of 300*l.*, which amount I tender to the plaintiffs in full satisfaction for the services proceeded for, exclusive of costs, the defendants reserving to themselves the right of contending that the plaintiffs ought to be condemned in the costs of the suit, or ought not to have their costs.

Dated this 18th Jan. 1872.

THOMAS COOPER, Defendants' Solicitor,
To Messrs. Lowless, Nelson, and Jones, Plaintiffs' Solicitors.

On 1st Feb. 1872, the defendant's solicitor served a notice of motion on the plaintiffs' solicitors that he would, "on the 6th day of February, move the judge in chambers to direct the plaintiffs to declare forthwith whether they accept or reject the tender made in this cause." Accordingly, the respective solicitors appeared before the judge in chambers on 6th Feb. and it there appeared that the tender was made in the form set out above, in order to raise the question whether, if the 300*l.* were accepted, the plaintiffs were or were not entitled to their costs, under the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868, whereupon the learned judge adjourned the motion into Court.

Clarkson now moved in the terms of the motion.

Webster, contra.—We are entitled to know the ground on which the defendants refuse to pay costs, and they should set out the ground in the tender: (The Hickman, L. Rep. 3 Adv. & Ecc. 15; 21 L. T. Rep. N, S. 472.)

Clarkson, in reply.—We are only bound to let the plaintiffs know that we object to pay the costs.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I think it desirable that the practice, as laid down in The Hickman (sup.), should be adhered to, and that a defendant, in making a tender, should either tender with costs, or should show distinctly the ground on which he refuses costs. Parties have a right to be apprised of the ground on which costs are refused. In this case the tender should be altered, after the words "exclusive of costs," so as to read, "and I contend that the plaintiffs ought to be condemned in costs, or ought not to be allowed their costs, on the ground that the suit ought to have been brought in the County Court (Admiralty Jurisdiction)," leaving out the words "the defendants reserving &c.," down to the end of the tender. The motion will therefore be dismissed, but without costs.

ON APPEAL FROM THE HIGH COURT OF ADMIRALTY.

THE TWO ELLENS.

*Necessaries—Material men—Mortgagees—Priority —Maritime lien—Admiralty Court act 1861, s. 5
—3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6.*

Material men supplying necessaries in England to a British or British-colonial vessel do not, under the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), s. 5, acquire a maritime lien upon the ship. The ship does not become chargeable with the necessaries supplied until actually arrested by the Court of Admiralty.

All valid charges on the ship, to which any person, other than the owner of the ship personally liable for the necessaries, is entitled, take precedence over claims for necessaries.

A mortgagee, therefore, is entitled to priority over material men.

Semble, a British ship in the hands of third parties, to whom she has been duly sold by the owner, who is liable for the necessaries supplied, cannot be made chargeable for those necessaries under this section.

*Semble, a maritime lien is given by 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65,
s. 6, for necessaries supplied in England to foreign ships.*

THIS was an appeal from the High Court of Admiralty of England in a cause instituted in rem, by Donald Johnson and others, the appellants, to recover a debt of 305l 3s., together with interest thereon, from the 19th Feb. 1868, foreequipping, repairing, and supplying necessaries to the British-colonial vessel the Two Ellens. The facts in the court below were mainly raised on a special case, from which it appeared that the respondent, John Alexander Black, was the transferee of a registered mortgage on the vessel, dated 9th March 1867. The transfer was dated 16th July 1868, but was not registered. In Feb. 1868, the appellants supplied certain necessaries to the ship in the port of London at the request of a part owner, who was also her master, and parted with the possession of her, and afterwards, the vessel being then in the port of Liverpool, the respondent took possession of her on behalf of the mortgagees and sold her. She was bought in by the mortgagees. The vessel was arrested in this suit on 26th Dec. 1868. Her value was insufficient to satisfy both claims. On 15th Feb. 1871 the Judge of the Admiralty Court held, following The Pacific (Bro. & Lush, 243; 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 541), but doubting that decision, that material men have no maritime lien upon a British ship for necessaries under 24 Vict. c. 10, s. 5, and therefore that the mortgagees (the respondent) had priority; and that a transferee, though the transfer be not registered, had a locus standi to defend the suit. The report of the case in the court below will be found 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 592; ante, p. 40.

From this judgment the material men appealed, on the grounds, as stated in the case on appeal, first, because the respondent had no locus standi entitling him to maintain the said cause in the Admiralty Court; secondly, because the respondent, or those whom he represented, was estopped from denying that he or they authorised the master to give the appellants the orders in respect of which their claim arose; thirdly, because the respondent, or those whom he represented, had received the benefit of the work, supplies, and necessaries, in respect of which the appellants' claim accrued; fourthly, because the appellants acquired a maritime lien in respect of their claim.

The respondent's case on appeal submitted that the decree ought to be upheld, first, because the appellants had not any right to proceed against the ship except under the 4th or 5th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861; secondly, because the ship not having been under the arrest of the court at the time of the institution of the suit, the appellants had no right of action under the 4th section of the said Act; thirdly, because, before the passing of the Act, a mortgagee of a British or British colonial ship was not in any way liable in respect of or affected by a claim for repairs or necessaries done or supplied to such ship unless upon his authority and credit, and the respondent did not authorise these repairs and necessaries; fourthly, because neither the 4th nor the 5th section of the Act give a maritime lien; fifthly, because, even if those sections do confer a maritime lien, the 11th section of the Act equally gives a registered mortgagee a maritime lien; fifthly, because the 11th section of the Act does not alter the relative positions of material men and mortgagees; sixthly, because the mortgagee was under the Act entitled to priority.

The 6th section of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, and the 4th and 5th sections of 24 Vict. c. 10, are set out in the judgment. Sects. 11 and 35 of the latter Act are as follows:

Sect. 11. The High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim in respect of any mortgage duly registered according to the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, whether the ship or the proceeds thereof be under arrest of the said court or not.

Sect. 35. The jurisdiction conferred by this Act on the High Court of Admiralty may be exercised either by proceedings in rem or by proceedings in personam.

The Admiralty Advocate (Dr. Deane, Q.C.) for the appellants.—The first question is, whether the respondent has a locus standi in this suit; but the real question is, whether the appellants, as material men, have a maritime lien, and thence a right of priority over other debts. Down to the time of Charles II., the Admiralty Court exercised jurisdiction over the claims of material men, and repairs and necessaries were held to form a lien upon the ship itself, but at that time the jurisdiction was put an end to by prohibition.

Abbott on Shipping, 11th edit. p. 122, note (i);
The Zodiac, 1 Hagg. 320, 325.

Sir J. Nicholl tried to revive the jurisdiction in A.D. 1835, in The Neptune (3 Hagg. 129), but this decision was overruled by the Privy Council (3 Knapp's P. C. C. 94). In 1840 the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, became law, and gave, by sect. 4, jurisdiction to the Court of Admiralty to decide all claims for necessaries supplied to any foreign ship. On this statute, Dr. Lushington held in The West Friesland (Swabey, 454), that the lien for necessaries continues after the ship has changed owners. A maritime lien is a claim upon a thing to be carried into effect by legal process: The Bold Buccleugh (7 Moo. P. C. 267, 284), and exists from the

The St. Jago de Cuba, 9 Wheaton Rep., 409, 417;
 3 Kent's Commentaries, 11th edit., pp. 229, 230.

The 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6 was intended to remedy the hardships arising from supplying vessels which did not come into port, and gave a maritime lien on foreign vessels: (The Ella A. Clark, Br. & Lush. 32.) The Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10) s. 5, extends the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court to necessities supplied to any ship, and I submit that it also creates a maritime lien. The words in the two statutes are similar, and the latter limits the jurisdiction in certain cases, but does not make any change in the nature of the remedy. The words, in 24 Vict. c. 10, s. 5, "unless, &c., any owner or part owner is domiciled in England, &c.," refer to the owner, at whose orders the goods were supplied, and the lien is not affected by a transfer. [MELLISH, L. J.—Is it intended by the statute to affect the security of mortgagees, ex post facto, by giving a lien to material men for goods supplied after the mortgagees have advanced their money?] The mortgagee gets the greater security of the increased value of the ship by reason of the repairs done to it. "Domiciled" must be taken in its legal sense: (The Pacific, Br. & Lush. 243; 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 541; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 21), and neither owners nor mortgagees were domiciled in England or Wales. If the claim is enforceable upon the res by process of law, then there exists a maritime lien. [MELLISH, L. J.—Then the 35th sect. (24 Vict. c. 10) has given maritime liens in all cases triable in the Admiralty Court?] The Legislature must be taken to have known the effect of that section, [MELLISH, L. J.—Then why did not the Legislature regulate priorities?] There is at any rate a lien in the case of necessities supplied: The brig Nestor (1 Sumner, 73.) The material man benefits the property in whose-ever hands it may be.

Cohen follows on the same side.—The material men are entitled to the ship as security (Rich v. Coe, Cowper, 636), and wherever the Admiralty Court has jurisdiction there is prima facie a maritime lien. When we find that the Admiralty Court exercised jurisdiction over the claims of, and enforced the liens of material men until prohibited, as shown by Abbott on Shipping, p. 122, 11th edit., and that the same jurisdiction is now exercised by foreign courts of admiralty under the maritime law, it is a fair inference that the Legislature intended, when they enacted this section to give a maritime lien. This section does not apply to foreign ships (The India, 9 Jur. 419; 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 234; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 390), but only extends the jurisdiction over foreign ships given by 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6 to British ships. This is a statute in pari materia, and the jurisdiction given by it must be presumed to be that of all admiralty courts. The 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6, gave a maritime lien in foreign ships, and it is reasonable to suppose that a statute in pari materia passed a few years after, gave the same remedy against all other ships in the same position as foreign ships. [MELLISH, L. J.—My difficulty is to see how the statute gives a lien. It seems to me that it merely relates to procedure, and cannot give a lien without express enactment. Such a statute as this could not give a lien by conferring jurisdiction on the common law courts.] The statute necessarily empowers the Admiralty Court to exercise its jurisdiction according to its own laws and traditions. Anything that tends to preserve the res ought to have priority. In the absence of strong reasons to the contrary, where a proceeding in rem is given in the Admiralty Court, a maritime lien is created, and this is not affected by mortgages not having a lien on the face of the statutes. The 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 3, only gave jurisdiction over the claims of mortgagees when the ship was under arrest, or the proceeds in court, and the 24 Vict. c. 10, s. 11, in extending the jurisdiction, says nothing which would create a lien. There was no jurisdiction over mortgage claims before these statutes. In the case of necessities the first statute does create a maritime lien for necessities in case of a foreign ship, and the second extends this lien to British ships. The Ella A. Clark (sup.) was against a purchaser after the necessities were supplied. Here the mortgagee buys the ship, and takes the benefit of the repairs:

Williams v. Alsop, 30 L. J., N. S., 353 C. P.; 4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 550; Bristowe v. Whitmore, 41 L. J. 467 Ch.; 4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 622.

He must take subject to the maritime lien to which I contend a material man is entitled. Dr. Lushington in The Pacific (sup.) held the contrary only because of the limitations in sect 5.

Butt, Q. C. for the respondents.—There are two questions; first, is there a maritime lien given by the 4th or 5th sections of the Admiralty Court Act 1861? secondly, does not the 11th section give a mortgagee an equal right to a mortgagor? If this were a case of building or repairing under the 4th section there could be no seizure of the ship, as the court has no jurisdiction unless some other person than the builder has instituted proceedings, and the proceeds of a ship are in court. If no one takes proceedings the claim may never become enforceable against the ship, and there is therefore no lien. This applies equally to proceedings under the 5th section, as the material man may never be able to proceed if the owner is domiciled in this country. The definition of maritime liens in The Bold Buccleugh (sup.) must be taken to have had reference to cases where such liens existed independently of statute law. It is admitted that in some cases the right to proceed in rem exists where there is no maritime lien, and this admission shows that The Bold Buccleugh (sup.) is not to be applied in all such cases. The mortgagee is at least in as good a position as the material man. It may be contended that the mortgagee, under sect. 11, has a maritime lien whilst a material man has none; because the jurisdiction of the court does not depend upon extraneous circumstances, as in the case of necessities supplied to a British ship, but the moment the mortgage is registered the court has jurisdiction, and the lien might attach, whereas the claim of a material man does not attach, if the owner be domiciled in this country. It cannot be said that the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, and the Admiralty Court Act 1861 are in pari materia, because the former statute relates to matters in which maritime liens existed, except in the case of necessities supplied to a foreign ship, apart from the statute; whereas the latter statute deals only with such claims as are not enforceable in rem except by that statute. Without express words, the statute cannot create a maritime lien.

Clarkson follows on the same side.—Before the 24 Vict. c. 10, a mortgagee had priority over all other creditors: (Dickenson v. Kitchen, 8 El. & Bl. 789). There is nothing in this statute which puts the mortgagee in a worse position or alters the relative positions of material men and mortgagees. If the statute gives a maritime lien to material men, then a shipbuilder having built and sold a ship to a man who resells to several as co-owners, and becomes insolvent before payment, would be entitled, under sect. 4, on a suit being instituted between the co-owners, to come to the court and claim precedence over the co-owners, although a builder cannot proceed in the first instance. The fair construction is, that where there is a mortgagee the claim of the material man is against the equity of redemption only.

The Admiralty Advocate in reply.—It must be admitted that 24 Vict. c. 10, s. 4, gives no lien. The 24 Vict. c. 10 was passed after the decision of the Court of Admiralty in The West Friesland (Swab. 454), decided in 1859, and the Legislature used the same words in this statute as in the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, and must be taken to have given the same lien in British ships. They have revived an old jurisdiction and must be taken to have provided that it should be exercised by the laws and the procedure peculiar to the Admiralty Court. In the case of mortgagees the jurisdiction conferred was entirely new and had never been exercised before by the Admiralty Court.

The judgment of the Court was delivered by Lord Justice MELLISH.—This is a suit by a plaintiff, who performed necessary repairs to a ship, to obtain payment by the sale of the ship, under the 5th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861. The question to be determined is, whether his right to be paid out of the proceeds of the ship takes precedence of a previous mortgage. The mortgage had been assigned to the defendant in the suit, but it is admitted that that makes no difference in the rights of the parties. There have been several cases in the Court of Admiralty on this point, and the decisions are to a certain extent conflicting. Dr. Lushington appears in the first instance to have determined the question in accordance with the decisions which had been come to under the previous Act respecting necessities supplied to foreign ships, viz., that a maritime lien was created from the time that the supplies were furnished, and that therefore, having such maritime lien, the man who supplied the necessities took precedence of the mortgage. But in the case of the Pacific (sup.), after giving full attention to the case, and reconsidering his former decision, Dr. Lushington came to a contrary opinion, and determined that no lien was created until the suit was commenced, and that accordingly the mortgage took precedence. Dr. Lushington again affirmed, in the case of the Troubadour (L. Rep., 1 Adm. 306; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 156; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 475), the decision he had arrived at in the Pacific (sup.). In the present case the learned judge of the Court of Admiralty thought he was bound by the previous decisions of Dr. Lushington; but in his judgment he acknowledged that if the matter has been res nova, and he had not been bound by the previous decisions, he should himself have come to a contrary conclusion. Therefore the question has to be determined by their Lordships, and it may be said, perhaps, that as far as authority is concerned the authorities are very equally balanced. It is clear that previous to the passing of the 3 & 4 Vict. the Court of Admiralty had no jurisdiction in the case of necessities supplied to a ship, and that the supply of such necessities did not give any maritime lien upon a ship. It is perfectly true that for many years prior to the time of Charles II. the Court of Admiralty had claimed, and to a considerable extent exercised such a jurisdiction; but the courts of common law in the time of Charles II. and subsequently had prohibited them from exercising that jurisdiction on the ground that they never possessed it. Subsequently, in the case of the Neptune, it was decided by the Privy Council that there was no such jurisdiction. Therefore, notwithstanding this jurisdiction was practically exercised for years, it must be taken now to be conclusively the law that the Court of Admiralty, by the law of England, never had jurisdiction over necessities supplied to a ship, and that necessities supplied to a ship do not give any maritime lien upon a ship. The first Act which altered this state of the law was the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65. The 6th section of that Act is in these terms: "Be it enacted, that the High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction to decide all claims and demands whatsoever in the nature of salvage for services rendered to or damage received by any ship or sea-going vessel, or in the nature of towage or for necessities supplied to any foreign ship or sea-going vessel, and to enforce payment thereof, whether such ship or vessel may have been within the body of a county or upon the high seas at the time when the services were rendered or damage received or necessities furnished in respect of which such claim is made." In the construction of this section it has been held in several cases in the Court of Admiralty that there is a maritime lien in the case of supplies and necessities furnished to a foreign ship; and their Lordships do not mean to intimate any doubts as to the validity of those decisions. But they are of opinion that those decisions may be supported upon the ground that, though it is perfectly true that the only words used in the section are "that the High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction,"—which words seem hardly sufficient in themselves to create a maritime lien—yet, looking at the subject matter to which that section relates, it appears designed to enlarge the jurisdiction which the Court of Admiralty already had in matters forming the subject of a maritime lien. These are strong grounds for holding that as respects salvage and as respects collision, which already gave a maritime lien when they occurred on the high seas, it was intended that they should also when they occurred in the body of a county equally give a maritime lien, and that being so as to salvage and as to collision, it might be well said that, necessities immediately following, it was intended that the same rule should apply in the case of necessities. That being so, the case then comes to the decision of the statute in question; and it may be observed that the mortgage of ships is a security which is well known and which has existed in this country for many years. It is quite clear that, according to the decisions of the courts of common law and according to the express provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, which say that a mortgagee is not to be deemed an owner except for the purpose of enforcing his security, a mortgagee was never liable at common law for supplies furnished to the mortgagor while the mortgagor continued in possession of the ship. Then the question is, did the Legislature intend to alter that rule, and to say that, in certain cases specified in this section, instead of the mortgagee having precedence over the material man who had furnished supplies to the ship on the credit of the mortgagor remaining in possession, that rule should be altered, and that the material man should take precedence? Now, in order that the rights of different classes, the subjects of the Queen, should be altered, one certainly would expect that such an alteration should be expressed in tolerably clear terms. The 4th section, which begins this subject, says this: "The High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim for building, equipping, or repairing of any ship if at the time of the institution of the cause the ship or the proceeds thereof are under the arrest of the court." Now, it is admitted by Dr. Deane, and their Lordships think it is quite clear, that that 4th section does not give any maritime lien, because it only gives jurisdiction in respect of "any claim for building, equipping, or repairing of a ship if at the time of the institution of the cause the ship or the proceeds thereof are under arrest of the court." Now, it certainly would be absurd to say that the question whether the mortgagee is or is not to take precedence over a person who had either built or repaired or equipped a ship should depend upon the accidental circumstance whether some third person had happened to commence a suit in the Court of Admiralty and arrest the ship. That would certainly be a most irrational construction, and therefore it seems clear that that section at any rate does not give any maritime lien, but merely entitles the person who has done the repairs or built the ship to be paid out of the proceeds, in preference at any rate to the owner, to whom the proceeds would otherwise be given up. The 5th section, which immediately follows, is: "The High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim for necessaries supplied to any ship elsewhere than in the port to which the ship belongs, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that at the time of the institution of the cause any owner or part owner of the ship is domiciled in England or Wales." The question is, does that give a maritime lien? Dr. Lushington, in the case of The Pacific and in the case of The Troubadour, has decided that it does not, for a reason which appears to their Lordships by itself to be amply sufficient, namely, that the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty is not made by this section to depend upon what is the state of things at the time when the supply is furnished, but is made to depend upon what is the state of things at the time when the suit is instituted; namely, whether there is at that time an owner of the ship domiciled in England. It is contended on the part of the appellants that the maritime lien attaches directly the supplies are furnished. But suppose that there is an owner at the time domiciled in England, then it is clear that the Court of Admiralty has no jurisdiction; and how can the maritime lien attach if things had not happened which gave the Court of Admiralty any jurisdiction over the matter at all? How can it be said that there is something inherent in the ship which constitutes a charge on the ship when there is actually no mode of enforcing it at all, and the ship is perfectly free from it? Therefore in that case it does not attach. Suppose either the owner leaves England and becomes domiciled elsewhere, does it then attach? And suppose he comes back again, does it cease to attach? It appears to their Lordships that it is altogether inconsistent that a maritime lien should exist on Monday and should not exist on Tuesday, and should then come back again on Wednesday. A maritime lien must be something which adheres to the ship from the time that the facts happened which gave the maritime lien, and then continues binding on the ship until it is discharged, either by being satisfied or from the laches of the owner, or in any other way by which by law it may be discharged. It commences and there it continues binding on the ship until it comes to an end. It would involve this absurdity that the rights of all other parties would be shifted according as this maritime lien existed or not, as in the instance which has been put during the argument, if goods were sold to a shipowner who was an Englishman, and domiciled and resident in England, then of course the man who so repaired or furnished supplies for the ship has no remedy at all by law except a personal action against the owner. Suppose that man becomes bankrupt, then he has no remedy except to prove against his estate. The trustee sells his ship, as he must do under the bankruptcy. If he sells it to a man who is also an Englishman living in England, then no right accrues, and he is left solely to his remedy against the bankrupt. But if at any time, within six years I presume, when it may be barred by the Statute of Limitations, and I do not know whether that would make any difference, yet if at any future time that ship becomes the property of a man who happens to be domiciled in the colonies, then it is said the right is to attach to it, and it may be seized against anybody, and all the interests of the real owners of the ship at that time may be sacrificed for the purpose of paying the man who had simply furnished his supplies on the credit of an owner who became bankrupt. Therefore their Lordships think it is quite sufficient to say that, according to the true construction of this section, the res, the ship, does not become chargeable with the debt for necessaries until the suit is actually instituted, and that all valid charges on the ship to which any person other than the owner of the ship who is liable for the necessaries is entitled must take precedence. Their Lordships, therefore, will humbly recommend Her Majesty that this appeal be dismissed, with costs.

THE GAUNTLET.

ELLIOT AND OTHERS (resps)

Naval serrice—Towing prize of war—Warlike naval operation—Construction of penal statute—Foreign Enlistment Act 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 90).

The detaching a prize crew after capture to take charge of and to bring a prize and its native crew as prisoners of war safely to a port of the captors, is essentially a warlike naval operation.

A merchantman, on lawful capture by a belligerent vessel, and whilst held by a naval prize crew detached from that vessel, is in the actual possession of the Government of her captors. Her prize crew are still part of the crew of the belligerent vessel, share in captures made by that vessel, and may make lawful captures whilst on board the prize. The prize, therefore, ceases to be a merchantman, and becomes a vessel engaged in the naval operations of her captors.

A British steam-tug was sent by her owners, Her Majesty being neutral, to tow such a vessel from British waters to the waters of her captors, the tug owners knowing that she was a prize; the tug performed the towage service:

Held (reversing the judgment of the Admiralty Court), that the towing was assisting in a warlike naval operation, and that the sending the tug for that purpose was a despatching for the purpose of taking part in the naval service of a belligerent within the meaning of the Foreign Enlistment Act 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 90), s. 8, subsect 4, and that the tug was therefore forfeited to the Crown.

Where an offence is before written in the words and within the spirit of a penal statute, that statute must be construed like any other instrument, according to the fair common sense meaning of the language used; and a court is not to find any doubt or ambiguity in the language of a penal statute, where such doubt or ambiguity would clearly not be found in the same language in any other instrument.

Quere, can the Crown be condemned in or receive costs in such a suit?

This was an appeal by the Queen's Proctor in a suit instituted on behalf of the Crown, against the steam-tug Gauntlet, in the High Court of Admiralty, for an offence against the provisions of the Foreign Enlistment Act 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 90). The owners of the Gauntlet were charged with having on the 27th Nov. 1870, despatched that vessel with intent and knowledge, and having reasonable cause to believe that she would be employed in the naval service of France, then at war with Germany, both nations being at peace with Her Majesty. La Provence, a French man-of-war, brought on Nov. 24th, a German merchantman, called the Lord Brougham, into the Downs, as a prize of war. The Lord Brougham had on board a prize crew and some of the German sailors, as prisoners of war. La Provence left the Downs, and the Gauntlet was engaged by the French consul, at Dover, to tow the Lord Brougham to Dunkirk, and on Nov. 27th she did so tow her to Dunkirk. The Gauntlet was arrested by the order of the Government and the suit instituted for her condemnation. The learned judge in the court below held that there was no naval service, and dismissed the suit with costs. The facts, which were chiefly admitted, the pleadings, and the judgment, will be found 25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 69; ante, p. 86.

From this judgment the Crown appealed, on the grounds, as stated in their case on appeal—First, because the towing a prize of war was a naval service; secondly, because such towing was against the Foreign Enlistment Act 1870, and rendered the Gauntlet liable to condemnation; thirdly, because the Foreign Enlistment Act 1870 conferred no power on the Court of Admiralty, under the circumstances of the present case, to give costs against the Crown. The respondent's case on appeal submitted that the judgment ought to be upheld—First, because the Gauntlet was not employed in the naval service of France, within the meaning of the Foreign Enlistment Act 1870; secondly and thirdly, because the petition and facts proved and admitted, showed no offence against that Act; fourthly because the Crown failed to prove their case, as alleged in the petition; fifthly, because the Gauntlet was only engaged in the ordinary course of her employment; sixthly, because the removal of the Lord Brougham from the Downs was ordered by Her Majesty's collector of customs, and it was impossible to remove her without the assistance of a steam-tug.

The Solicitor-General (Sir G. Jessel, Q.C.), the Queen's Advocate (Sir Travers Twiss, Q.C.), and Archibald, for the Crown (the appellants).—The sole question is whether this was a naval service. Pilotage on board a belligerent vessel is by the interpretation clause a naval service, and this service was in the nature of pilotage. The interpretation clause of the Act says that naval service shall "include" certain things, and must there be taken to imply that all similar acts are offences against the Act. An interpretation clause does not narrow the meaning of an Act, but extends it: (Ex parte Ferguson and Hutchinson, L. Rep. 6, Q. B. 280; 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 96; ante, p. 8.) The word "include" gives a still more extensive meaning to the Act than the word "mean," which is generally used in such clauses. It is unnecessary to consider whether the prize had passed into the possession of the French Government. She was a ship of war to all purposes, and in rendering service to her the tug rendered a naval service. The prize crew were entitled to make lawful captures, and were for that purpose still part of the crew of the French man-of-war La Provence. The crew of La Provence would have been entitled to share in any captures so made: (The Frederic and Mary Anne, 6 C. Rob. 213.) Part of the German crew were on board the prize as prisoners of war, and the prize crew were there to guard them and the prize. No commission was necessary to make her a ship of war any more than it would have been in a boat belonging to La Provence. By towing this prize the tug released La Provence from the duty of towing the prize into French waters, and so put her in a position to commit other belligerent acts. The defendants had knowledge that this was a French prize; and, even if the parties acted in ignorance or forgetfulness of the law, there was an actual "despatch" within the meaning of the Act. The question of the enforcement of the penalties is for the consideration of the Crown. The object of the Act is to prevent British territory from being made a place of hostile operation. The judgment in the court below assumes that the prize was an ordinary merchantman. This could not be so, as she was in the possession of a prize crew before condemnation, and even after condemnation she would not be an ordinary merchantman until sold and used as such. To vest the property in the captors there must be condemnation; and before condemnation the property is in the general owners: (Goss v. Withers 2 Bur. 683.) A French prize does not pass until after condemnation: (Pistoyer et Duverdy, Trait  des Prises Maritimes, 173, 176, 225, 229.) She was the property of the French Government, and was being used in their naval operations. With respect to costs, the Crown can neither recover nor be condemned in costs :

Atkinson v. H.M. Proctor, L. Rep. 2 P. & D. 255 ;
Wilson v. Wilson, L. Rep. 1 P. & D. 180 ; 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 674 ;
The Leader, Bro. & Lush. 19 ;
Reg. v. Beadle, 7 E. & B. 492.

The 19th section of this Act is not applicable in such a case as this.

The Admiralty Advocate (Dr. Deane, Q.C.) and Edwyn Jones for the defendants (the respondents).—The words in the interpretation clause, “when engaged in naval or military service,” imply that a pilot may, under some circumstances, be lawfully employed by a belligerent vessel, and consequently a tug may be lawfully employed also. The meaning of “naval service” is shown by 59 Geo. 3, c. 69, s. 2. It must be employment in a warlike operation or employment coincident with warlike operation. Reg. v. Carlin, The Salvador, (L. Rep. 3 P. C. 231 ; 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 203 ; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 479) shows there must be aggression “against any prince.” [MELLISH, L.J.—Those words are omitted in the present Act.] The service must be undoubtedly for some warlike purpose, and not such service as may be construed either as peaceful or warlike :

The International, L. Rep. 3 Ad. & Ecc. 321 ; 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 787 ; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 523 ; Wheaton's International Law, by Dana, 8th edit., 438 et seq.

The prize was not a ship of war. She was not entitled to the protection of the French naval flag, but only to the protection accorded to a French merchant vessel. [JAMES, L. J.—If there had been an attempt by the German crew to recapture her, and the prize crew had killed a German in British waters, would they have been triable for murder in this country ?] Their being here was against orders, and they would have been responsible for any acts done here. To have towed the vessel out of British waters would have been no offence, and the continuing the towage to Dunkirk cannot be said to be any more a naval service. The vessel was removed at the order of the collector of customs, and could not have been removed without a steam tug. The Crown have not shown in their petition, nor on the facts, proved any offence against the Act. The interpretation clause shows what offences are included in the meaning of the words “naval service,” and what ships can be so used. A steam tug is not included.

The Solicitor-General in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 20.—The judgment of the court was delivered by—

Lord Justice JAMES.—In this case the Crown sought the condemnation of the respondents' ship the Gauntlet, for a violation of the Foreign Enlistment Act. The learned judge of the Court of Admiralty found that there was no such violation, and dismissed the petition of the Queen's Proctor with costs. The Crown, by the present appeal, complains of the finding and dismissal ; and further, that if, the judgment and order in this respect were well founded, the Court of Admiralty had no jurisdiction to award costs against the Crown. The facts of the case are not in dispute, and may be briefly summarised. The respondent's steam-tug, under an agreement with the French consul, made by one of her owners and the master, left its anchorage near the Ryde Pier to go to a vessel called the Lord Brougham, lying a few miles off in British waters, for the purpose of towing her across to Dunkirk Roads, and did accordingly so tow her. The Lord Brougham was, and was (as their Lordships have no doubt) well known to all parties concerned to be a German merchant ship which had been captured by a French cruiser, and then was French prize of war. She had on board a French officer and a French prize crew, with some of the original crew as prisoners. The Crown contends that sending an English steam-tug expressly for the purpose of towing a prize to the captor's waters is despatching a ship from the United Kingdom for the purpose of taking part in the naval service of the belligerent power, and is therefore within the words and plain meaning of the prohibition. On the part of the respondent it is urged that, at all events, there was no conscious violation of the law ; that the ship engaged in the transaction in the ordinary course of business, just as it would have towed any other ship across, and for the ordinary remuneration for such service ; and that, in truth, the immediate cause of the hiring of the tug was the pressure of an English authority who insisted on the prize no longer remaining in British waters. The Solicitor-General, on behalf of the Crown, did not contest what may be called the moral innocence of the respondents, but insisted—and in their Lordships' opinion unanswerably—that parties knowing the facts constituting their act a legal offence, cannot be heard in a court of law to allege that they were ignorant of, or had forgotten, or, what is more probable here, never thought of the law. These are matters for the indulgent consideration of the Crown, but not matters which the Court of Admiralty or this board has any jurisdiction to deal with. It was much pressed in the court below, and again before their lordships, that the statute being a penal, or as it was phrased, a highly penal one, it was to be construed strictly. It appears to their Lordships necessary to say a few words as to this topic, which is so often pressed in argument. No doubt, all penal statutes are to be construed strictly, that is to say, the court must see that the thing charged as an offence is within the plain meaning of the words used, and must not strain the words on any notion that there has been a slip, that there has been a casus omissus, that the thing is so clearly within the mischief that it must have been intended to be included and would have been included if thought of. On the other hand, the person charged has a right to say that the thing charged, although within the words, is not within the spirit of the enactment. But where the thing is brought within the words and within the spirit, there a penal enactment is to be construed, like any other instrument, according to the fair common sense meaning of the language used ; and the court is not to find or make any doubt or ambiguity in the language of a penal statute, where such doubt or ambiguity would clearly not be found or made in the same language in any other instrument. It was contended in the court below, but without success, that the words in the prohibitory clause were to be restricted by the words in the definition clauses, and that contention has been repeated here. In the court below that argument was used in support of a contention that “steam-tug” was not within the definition. Here, in support of the contention, that the uses are limited to the uses specifically mentioned in the definition. The words, however (as was pointed out by the learned judge), are not "shall mean," but "shall include." In some of the same clauses in the same Act the other words "shall mean" are used, and in the other clauses in which the words "shall include" are used, the most absurd consequences would follow if the words "shall include" were construed as equivalent to "shall mean," e.g., the clause as to what shall be included under the words "United Kingdom." Indeed, as to this particular clause itself, consequences no less absurd would follow if the things included were to be considered as an exhaustive enumeration, and so as to be the only things comprised. Their Lordships have therefore no hesitation in concurring with the learned judge that the words in the definition can have no effect in restricting the meaning to be put on the words of the prohibitory section. And the whole question is really what is the meaning of the words in that section "naval service." In the court below a good deal of the argument appears to have turned on, and a good deal of the judgment deals with the question as to how far it is essential to the legal completion of a captor's title by formal judicial condemnation, that the prize should be brought infra præsidia to give the prize court jurisdiction to pronounce such condemnation. It does not appear material to their Lordships to consider that question. It appears to have been considered that if it had been made out that it was essential, then the act of the steamtug in going to tow the prize into French waters, and so infra præsidia, would be an act done in the naval service of the captor power. But it appears to have been overlooked that that is not the only way in which, nor the only object for which, service can be rendered to a belligerent in connection with a prize. It would seem to be quite as important, to say the least, to complete a capture de facto by lodging it in a place of safety, as to complete it de jure, by bringing it within the jurisdiction of the captor's prize court. What was the position of the Lord Brougham when the defendant's vessel undertook the towing of her to French waters? She had (subject to the possibility of escape or recapture) ceased to be a German merchantman. She certainly had not become a French merchantman. She was in the actual possession of the French Government. She was under the command of a French naval officer, with a crew of sailors of the French navy, temporarily detached from the French ship of war for that purpose. The officer and crew were still part of the ship's crew—entitled to share in any fresh prize made by the latter—bound to share any prizes which they themselves might have made, as they lawfully might, of any German ship coming in their way. They had in our waters the right of a French man-of-war, as against any action of our municipal law, in respect either of their prisoners or their booty. Their Lordships agree, therefore, with the contention on the part of the Crown that it is impossible to distinguish such a ship, because it had been a prize, from the case of a tender or a pinnace detached for any purpose from a ship of war, or any other vessel taken up by or for the belligerent power in the course of its naval operations. The counsel for the respondents contended that naval service must mean service in or directly connected with some warlike naval operation. In their Lordships' opinion the detaching a prize crew after capture to take charge of the prize, and to bring it and the prisoners safely home is essentially a warlike operation—as much and as important a warlike operation as the chase before the capture. Their Lordships therefore have no doubt that sending an English steamtug for the express purpose of taking the detached prize crew, its prisoners and booty, speedily and safely to French waters, where the prisoners, prize, and booty would be taken charge of by the French authorities, and the prize crew set free to rejoin and strengthen their own ship, was despatching a ship for the purpose of taking part in the naval service of the belligerent, within the plain meaning, the words and the spirit of the Act of Parliament. Their Lordships will, therefore, humbly recommend that the decision of the Court of Admiralty be reversed, and that, in lieu thereof, an order of condemnation be made as prayed by the Queen's Proctor. On the subject of costs it is no longer the interest of the respondent to contest the proposition of the Solicitor-General, who admits that his principle is to apply as well against as in favour of the Crown, and their Lordships have therefore not had the assistance of the arguments on the other side which they would have desired to hear if it had been necessary to pronounce any decision on the point.

THE TEUTONIA; DUNCAN AND OTHERS (apps.) v. KÖSTER (resp.).

THE TEUTONIA; DUNCAN AND OTHERS (apps.) v. KÖSTER (resp.)

Non-delivery of cargo—Deviation—Reasonable delay—Outbreak of war—Port named unsafe—Duty of consignees to name another port—Construction of charter-party—Payment of freight.

War may exist de facto without a declaration, but only where there is an actual commencement of hostilities.

A master, on receipt of the credible information that his vessel will be exposed to imminent peril by continuing his voyage, is justified in deviating or pausing for a reasonable time to avoid that peril, or to make inquiries.

To justify a master in so pausing or deviating it is not necessary that the ship and cargo should run a common risk from the peril.

Where a charter-party stipulates that a cargo is to be delivered at one of several safe ports as ordered by the consignees, and it becomes impossible, by the outbreak of war, after an order is given, to deliver at the port named, and the master, without committing a breach of contract, puts into another port within the charter, he is entitled to a new order, and is not bound to deliver there without payment of full freight. (a)

(a) In Oyden v. Graham, cited both in the argument and in the judgment, Blackburn, J. expresses an opinion that, if a port becomes closed after an order is given, the owners of the goods are not bound to give another order, and the shipowner must deliver without freight, but this was not necessary to the decision of that case and the present decision is directly contrary where there are several possible ports of discharge named in the

[PRIV. CO.]

A Prussian vessel shipped a cargo of nitrate of soda (contraband of war) under a charter-party by which she was to proceed to C. C. or F. for orders, at the option of the master, where he was to receive orders to proceed to any one safe port in Great Britain, or on the continent between Havre and Hamburg, both included, and there deliver the cargo. The vessel duly called at F. on July 10th; the master received orders on July 11th for Dunkirk, a French port, for which he at once set sail. On July 16th, off Dunkirk he was informed by a French pilot in official uniform that war had been declared. The master thereupon put back to the Downs to make inquiries, and arrived there on July 17th, a Sunday, and could get no further information; he was ordered by his owner not to go to Dunkirk, and on July 19th put into Dover. On July 19th war was actually declared by the French against Prussia. On July 23rd, the master refused to go to Dunkirk. On August 1st, the consignees demanded the cargo at Dover without offering freight, but the master refused unless paid freight.

Held (affirming the decision of the Admiralty Court) that, as it would have been illegal and dangerous to go into Dunkirk if war had actually existed, the master was upon the information received, justified in putting back to the Downs to make inquiries, and that the time occupied before the declaration in making those inquiries was a rea-charter-party. If only one port were named in the charter-party the question would again arise as to whether the shipowner, on being prevented, without any fault on his part, from delivering at the port named, was bound to deliver the goods at any port into which he might put, without payment of freight: (see The Flora, 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 325.) From the grounds of the present decision it would almost appear that in such a case he could claim no freight. The Judicial Committee say that they will not create a new contract, but only find that the master in the present case has substantially performed his contract, and they decline to deal with the question of the Court of Admiralty being a court of equity and having power to say that the goods shall be considered as accepted. This part of the decision of the Court of Admiralty remains untouched, and, until a case arises where only one port is named in the charter, can hardly again be discussed. It is however, as appears from the review of the cases cited in the argument here, very doubtful whether the Admiralty Court has such an equitable jurisdiction, more especially under a statute which merely gives the court power to enforce a jurisdiction already existing at common law by its own peculiar forms of procedure. The fact that the court has an equitable jurisdiction in matters of prize cannot give it the same power in other matters, unless it can be shown to have exercised that power before its jurisdiction was extended by statute, and there is little proof of its having done so. There are indeed one or two instances where the court exercises an undoubted equitable jurisdiction, for instance, in marshalling assets so as to protect one creditor against another and in directing the order of priority in which claims against the res are to be paid; but the instances are few in number and the jurisdiction seems to have arisen in these cases rather from the peculiarity of these particular circumstances and from the desire always expressed by the court to do substantial justice to all, than from any power belonging to the constitution of the Admiralty Court itself. If, however, the court is a court of equity, a strong presumption necessarily exists that in extending its powers the Legislature intended it to apply the principles already administered by it to such cases as should arise under its new jurisdiction. The exact position of the court is not anywhere clearly shown, and the question is too difficult for any one to express a decided opinion upon. We have thought it right to call attention to this question in the hope that in any new arrangement of our judicial system the exact powers of the court may be defined.—ED.]

Held also, that, as there was no improper deviation or delay in putting into Dunkirk in the first instance, the case was the same as if war had broken out when the vessel first arrived off Dunkirk, and, there being no breach in putting into Dover, the contract was not, under this charter-party, impossible of performance, or dissolved by the outbreak of war, but was capable of being substantially performed; that the consignees, as they had demanded possession at Dover (a port within the charter), were not entitled to delivery except on payment of full freight.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the High Court of Admiralty, in a cause instituted under the 6th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, on behalf of the consignees of a bill of lading of the cargo of the Teutonia, against that vessel, and her freight, and her owners intervening to recover damages for breach of contract in not delivering the cargo at Dunkirk, according to the terms of the charter-party, and for not delivering the cargo to the consignees at Dover, after the refusal to proceed to Dunkirk, the master refusing to deliver except on payment of freight. The Admiralty Court dismissed the suit with costs, whereupon the consignees appealed. The facts will be found set out in the judgment of their Lordships, and in the report of the case below: (see 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 521; 1 ante, p. 32.)

Feb. 2, 3, and 6.—Butt, Q.C., for the appellants.—This question must be decided on English law, as the German law was neither pleaded nor proved. We admit that it is illegal to trade with the enemies of our sovereign. We also admit that nitrate of soda is contraband of war. The master of the Teutonia has not performed his contract, and it lies upon the defendants to show good excuse for that non-performance. There was no actual war before the declaration. The telegram from Bismarck to Bernstorff, quoted in the judgment below, is no proof of the existence of hostilities. It is true that to constitute a state of war there need be no declaration, but there must be some act of war. The mere mobilization of an army, or even the moving of that army to the frontier to await orders is not an act of hostility. We contend that the master was bound to put into Dunkirk on July 16th, or before the 19th, and that having refused to do so, he was bound to deliver the cargo to the consignees at Dover without payment of any freight. By his refusal to proceed to Dunkirk, he lost his lien on the cargo for freight. [MELLISH, L.J.—Has it ever been decided that, where a charter-party names several ports to which the ship may be ordered at the port of call, the naming of one particular port by the consignees makes the charter-party read as if that port only had been originally inserted in the charter?] There is no such case. The master was not prevented from proceeding to Dunkirk by any of the excepted perils, and we are therefore entitled to judgment unless the defendants can show that they were not bound to proceed. The defendants say that war actually existed, and that even if it did not exist the master received such intelligence off Dunkirk that he was justified in putting back to make inquiries. I contend that even if he was justified in putting back he could have made the inquiries on July 17th, and would then have found that no war existed, and could have proceeded to Dunkirk on July 18th. The evidence used by the Judge in the court below, as to the existence of war on July 16th, ought not to have been used at all. Documents laid before Parliament are no evidence of the existence of war. Moreover, those documents do not show that war did exist on that date. The information received by the master from the French pilot was not accurate. To entitle the master to put back there ought to have been some peremptory cause, or an actual change of relations between France and Germany: (Atkinson v. Ritchie 10 East, 530.) [MELLISH, L.J.—Was he not entitled to put back to get information to show what he had heard to be true or false?] It is not enough to show that they heard of war existing; they must show that something did actually exist, and that the information received justified his act. The cases, cited in the judgment for the proposition that war may exist de facto before a declaration, show open acts of hostility:

The Nayade, 4 C. Rob. 251;

The Eliza Anne, 1 Dods. 244.

On 19th July, even if there was no breach before, the outbreak of war absolutely dissolved and put an end to the contract, and annulled all obligations.

The plaintiffs were, therefore, at once entitled to their goods. The cases cited in the judgment as to the dissolution of the contract are no authority against the appellants. Pole v. Cetcovich (3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 438; 9 C. B., N. S., 430; 30 L. J. 102, C. P.) only decides that under the circumstances there shown the master was entitled to wait for further orders, and moreover in that case both the shipowners and charterers ran a common risk, whilst here there was risk only to the shipowner. Unless a shipowner carries the goods to their destination, or so deals with them as to satisfy the consignees, he can have no claim for freight. Where the original contract is ended, the acts of the parties must raise an implied contract before freight can become due. Osgood v. Groning (2 Camp. 466: Abbot on Shipping, 11th edit., pp. 401, 402), cited in the judgment below, shows an implied contract, for the Lord Chancellor ordered the consignee to accept the goods in London if a jury should find that it was not reasonable that the master should proceed to Rotterdam. The Soblomsten (L. Rep. 1 Adm. 293; 15 L. T. Rep., N. S. 393; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 436) also proceeded on the ground of an implied contract, by acceptance of the goods at a port short of their destination. Wilson v. Bennet (15 Fac. Coll. 251) also shows an implied contract by abandonment by the owner to the underwriters. The Friends (Edwards' Adm. Rep. 246), was a case in the prize court, and if Lord Stowell exercised equitable jurisdiction there, and gave pro rata freight, that is no authority for saying that the Instance Court of Admiralty has an equitable jurisdiction, particularly under the Admiralty Court Act 1861, s. 6, which rather gives that of the common law courts. Lord Tenterden (Abbot on Shipping, 11th edit., p. 402), does not seem to have noticed this distinction. Morgan v. Insurance Company of North America (4 Dallas Rep. 421), shows that the cargo was placed in such a position that it was considered to have been delivered to the consignee. Common law could give no right to pro rata freight. The power of equity to give it depends upon Osgood Groning (sup.) and the Admiralty Court does not exercise an equitable jurisdiction under sect. 6 of the Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1861:

The St. Cloud, Br. & Lush. 4; 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 54; 1 Mar. Law Cas. 309.

Feb. 6.—Clarkson follows on the same side.—The terms of the charter-party show that Dunkirk, once named by the consignees, must be considered as if it were the only port mentioned in the charter-party. Can the master be said to have acted reasonably in the interests of both ship and cargo? (Pole v. Cetcovich, 2 F. & F. 104.) If there was a breach of contract in not proceeding to Dunkirk, the appellants are entitled to their goods without paying freight, and even if there was no breach, they are entitled to possession: (Tindall v. Taylor, 4 E. & B. 219.) There was no consent to accept the goods short of destination, therefore no freight due:

Liddiard v. Lopez, 10 East, 525;

Hunter v. Prinsep, ib. 378.

The fact of this suit being brought in the Court of Admiralty cannot affect the question. The court administers common law only, when exercising jurisdiction by statute similar to that of the common law courts. In The Dom Francisco (Lush. 468; 5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 460; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 169), Dr. Lushington held that under this section he was bound to proceed on principles of law, and that the power of the Admiralty Court to administer equity was limited. The 6th section was passed to remedy evils arising from short delivery and damage to cargo by foreign ships which, by leaving this country, took away from the owners of cargo their remedy. The court has no power to deal with freight under the section. Before freight is due there must be an acceptance: (The Newport, Swabey, 335.) The Friends (sup.) is distinguishable; Lord Stowell there says that the court does not make contracts any more than the courts of common law; the ground of the decision was that the loss was common to both parties, both were affected by the blockade; here only one party is affected. Where the goods are not carried to their destination, owing to the incapacity of the ship, no freight is due: (The Fortuna, Edwards' Adm. Rep. 56.) That was a case in the prize court, but this case is much stronger, as it is a mere question of contract.

Milward, Q. C. for the respondents (the shipowners).—I contend that the documents before the learned judge, and cited in the judgment, were sufficient proof of the existence of a state of war on 16th July. Even if war did not then exist, the master, upon the information he received from the pilot, was justified in putting back to the Downs for information. Apprehension of danger, if founded upon reasonable evidence, justifies deviation or delay; no doubt the danger must be obvious, and it was so here.

no breach before the performance of the contract became illegal :

Avery v. Bowden, 5 E. & B. 714; 6 E. & B. 953.

Is freight due or not? Before this Act there was no practical means of bringing this suit, and the Act gives the necessary jurisdiction to the Admiralty Court, and therefore it must be supposed that the Legislature intends that the jurisdiction shall be exercised according to the principles usually applied in that court. That the Admiralty Court has a jurisdiction peculiar to itself, is shown in the argument of Lord Stowell in Smart v. Wolff (3 T. R. 623, 932). The jurisdiction is of advantage to plaintiffs, and if they adopt it, they must take it subject to existing rules. I contend that the court is a court of equity. A court of equity treats as done what ought to be done, as in the case of Osgood v. Groning (sup.), where the Lord Chancellor ordered the goods to be accepted if it was reasonable that the master should stay in the port of London. [Sir M. E. SMITH. —Is it not the rule that a party to a contract who is to be paid upon completion, cannot claim payment when only part is performed? Appleby v. Myers (L. Rep. 2 C. P. 651; 36 L. J. 331, C. P.; 16 L. T. Rep. N. The Friends (sup.);

The Dom Francisco (sup.).

By the terms of the charter-party the master was entitled to be sent to a safe port. The contract is not that the port shall be safe when the ship sails, but when the order is given, and when she arrives off the port of destination: (Ogden v. Graham, 1 B. & S. 773; 31 L. J. 26 Q. B.). If the order to go to Dunkirk was bad there was substantially no order, and the master is entitled to put into any port within the charter: (Sieveking v. Maes, 6 E. & B. 670). The appellants were bound to substitute another order. Freight is due even when the master has lost some of the goods by his own negligence: (The Norway, Br. & Lush, 377, 404; 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 57; 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 50; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 168, 254.) An implied contract may be founded upon meritorious service rendered by the ship to the owners of cargo.

[MELLISH, L. J.—In the cases you cite the contract was capable of being performed, but the strong point against you is that it is contended that the contract was dissolved by the war.] If a voyage be interrupted there may be a claim for pro rata freight.

Cook v. Jennings (7 T. Rep. 586), was upon an express covenant to deliver, and is distinguished by the judges who decided it, from Luke v. Lyde (sup.), which was in assumpsit. Liddard v. Lopez (sup.) is distinguishable because in that case there was an absolute refusal to accept the goods, whilst here the appellants were willing to accept, but refused freight. Hunter v. Prinsep (sup.) proceeded on the ground that the master unwarrantably sold the cargo. The Friends (sup.) was rather a case of salvage than prize. [MELLISH, L. J.—That decision distinctly goes upon the ground that the incapacity to proceed was common to both ship and cargo.] In The Hoop (1 C. Rob. 196) freight was given, although the contract was illegal and dissolved. He cited also :

Damages against us would be merely nominal, as the appellants get as much benefit from delivery here as in Dunkirk.

Feb. 7.—Cohen followed on the sameside.—There was no contract to proceed direct to the port of destination, but only a contract to deliver within a reasonable time. A master is justified in deviating under circumstances which would not justify non-delivery. None of the cases cited on questions of contract draw any distinction between the ship and cargo, but treat them as one common adventure. The information received was such as a reasonable man would act upon. The contract was not thrown up at once by the master, as in the case of Atkinson v. Ritchie (sup.). In this charter-party there are several ports to which the ship might have been ordered, and I contend that if the consignees have ordered her to a port which became unsafe before her arrival there, they are not entitled to the cargo without payment of freight. Where a contract, of which there has been no breach, is put an end to without the fault of either party, and one party is substantially benefited, I contend that he is bound to pay a quantum meruit. Again, I contend that this contract never was dissolved so as to put an end to all obligations under it. It has never been broken by the master, as he was always ready to deliver, and I submit that he has substantially performed his contract. The consignees were bound to name another port, and as they did not the law will say that they should have received at Dover, and have paid freight: (The Norway, sup.) In Esposito v. Bowden (sup.) the contract was held to be absolutely dissolved. If the contract is not dissolved the shipowner is not bound to deliver without freight. As to the question of pro rata freight, the law will imply a contract where it is equitable to do so. Implied contracts are not such as arise merely from the acts and intentions of the parties, but also such as the law presumes the parties ought to have intended. The law creates fictitious contracts; as in the case of the obligation of a surety to refund to his co-surety his proportion of the whole debt paid. A benefit has been received here and there is therefore an equitable right to freight or a quantum meruit.

In Appleby v. Myers (sup.) the contract was incapable of being performed.

Feb. 8.—Butt, Q.C., in reply.—The deviation was for the benefit of the ship only. The insurance cases on questions of deviation show that where masters deviate to avoid a peril for which the underwriters are liable by the policy, the owners may recover, but not where he deviates to avoid a peril not covered by the policy. The question in such cases really is, was the deviation for the benefit of both ship and underwriters.

O'Reilly v. Royal Exchange Assurance, 4 Camp. 246;
O'Reilly v. Gonne, 4 Camp. 249.

The same principle applies in this case. The contract was dissolved as the consignees, having given a definite order to go to Dunkirk, could only change that order by consent, which would have raised a new contract; no new order was given. The order was good as the port was safe at the time it was given, and the fact that it became afterwards unsafe does not make it an improper order. [Per BLACKBURN, J. in Ogden v. Graham (sup.)] There has been no acceptance of the goods, and, therefore, no implied contract. We are entitled to substantial damages as we are liable for breach of contract in not delivering at Dunkirk.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 21.—The Judgment of the court was delivered by Lord Justice MELLISH.—This is an appeal in a cause instituted under the 6th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, on behalf of Messrs. Duncan, Fox, and Co., the consignees of a bill of lading of the cargo laden on board the ship Teutonia, against that ship and her freight, and against the owner of the vessel. The Teutonia was a Prussian brig, subject to the laws of Prussia, and her master and crew were subjects of the King of Prussia. The bill of lading, dated the 5th April 1870, was as follows: "Shipped in good order and well-conditioned by Savers, Duncan, and Co., of Valparaiso, upon the ship Teutonia, whereof Köster is master for this present voyage, and now lying in the port of Pisagua, and bound for Cork, Cowes, or Falmouth for orders, 2742 bags, being nitrate of soda, to be delivered in the like good order and well conditioned at the port of discharge, the Act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation of what nature and kind soever excepted, unto Messrs. Duncan, Fox, and Co., or assigns. Freight for the said goods to be paid as per charter-party." And by the charter-party referred to in the bill of lading it was agreed that, "after receiving on board the said cargo, the said vessel shall proceed either to Cork, Cowes, or Falmouth, at the option of the master, where he shall receive orders from charterer's agents within three days after his arrival to proceed to any one safe port in Great Britain or on the continent between Havre and Hamburgh, both included, and there, according to bills of lading and charter-party, deliver the cargo. Freight to be paid in manner herein mentioned on a true and right delivery of the cargo in the port of discharge at and after the rate of 45s. British sterling per ton." The vessel arrived at Falmouth on the 10th July, and the master, whilst there, heard rumours that war was probable between France and Prussia. On the 11th July the master received orders from the consignees to discharge the cargo at Dunkirk, and he at once set sail for Dunkirk, and arrived at a distance of about fourteen miles off that port, at twelve o'clock at night of the 16th, which was a Saturday; and the master says that, after laying-to for about two hours, a regular pilot, in official uniform, came on board; that he asked the pilot about the war; that the pilot told him it had been declared two days ago; that he asked the pilot where he could bring-to in safety, so that he might ascertain whether war was declared or not; that the pilot offered to take him to Flushing, or the

Downs, or wherever he liked. The master elected to go to the Downs, and he anchored there on Sunday morning, the 17th, at ten o'clock. He says that on that day he could obtain no advice or information; that on the Monday, the 18th, he was on shore at Deal, and the German consul told him that war had broken out. He telegraphed to the owner, who was his father, and received an answer, forbidding him to go to Dunkirk, and on Tuesday, the 19th, he took the ship into Dover, as the nearest port. On the same 19th July the French declaration of war was delivered to the Prussian Government at Berlin, which was known the same day by telegraph in England. On the 23rd July an agent of the plaintiffs went to Dover, and required the master to proceed to Dunkirk, which he refused to do. Afterwards, on the 1st Aug., the plaintiffs required the master to deliver them the cargo at Dover, which he refused to do, unless he was paid his freight. Under these circumstances, the plaintiffs allege, that the master has committed two breaches of contract or duty; first, in refusing to proceed to, and deliver the cargo at, Dunkirk; and, secondly, they complain that, when the performance of the contract became impossible, and the contract was, as they allege, dissolved by the war, the master was not justified in refusing to deliver the cargo to the plaintiffs at Dover without payment of freight. The first question to be considered is, whether the master was bound to have entered the port of Dunkirk on the 17th July, and on that question the learned judge in the court below has found that, on the 16th July, the Teutonia could not have entered the port of Dunkirk with her cargo without being exposed to the penalties of trading with the enemy of her country; but that, if this was an erroneous application of the law to the facts at that date, the circumstances justified the master in pausing and making further inquiries as to the existing relations between his own country and France, and that he did not exceed the limits of a reasonable time in making the inquiry. Their Lordships have great difficulty in agreeing with the learned judge that the Teutonia could not have entered Dunkirk without being exposed to the penalties of trading with the enemy of its country on the 16th July. There does not appear to their Lordships to be any satisfactory evidence that a state of war existed between France and Prussia prior to the 19th July. Their Lordships do not think that either the declaration made by the French Minister to the French Chambers on the 16th July, or the telegram sent by Count Bismarck to the Prussian Ambassador in London, in which he states that that declaration appears to be equal to a declaration of war, amounts to an actual declaration of war. And though it is true, as stated by the learned judge, that a war may exist de facto without a declaration of war, yet it appears to their Lordships that this can only be effected by an actual commencement of hostilities, which, in this case, is not alleged. It is, however, unnecessary further to consider this part of the case, because their Lordships agree with the learned judge that the master of the Teutonia, when he was informed, on his arrival off Dunkirk, by the pilot, although incorrectly, that war had been actually declared two days before, was entitled to pause and to take a reasonable time to make further inquiries, and that he did not exceed the limits of a reasonable time in making inquiries

[PRIV. CO.]

If the master had entered Dunkirk, and it had turned out that war had been previously declared he would have entered it with notice, that he was entering an enemy's port, and this would have obviously exposed his ship to condemnation and might have exposed himself to severe penalties when he returned to his own country. It seems obvious that, if a master receives credible information that, if he continues in the direct course of his voyage, his ship will be exposed to some imminent peril, as, for instance, that there are pirates in his course, or icebergs, or other dangers of navigation, he must be justified in pausing and deviating from the direct course, and taking any step which a prudent man would take for the purpose of avoiding the danger. And their Lordships agree, if authority was wanting, that the case of Pole v. Cetcovitch (sup.), is an authority in point. It was argued, however, on the part of the appellant, that, to justify this course, both ship and cargo must be exposed to a common peril, whilst in the present case the cargo, being the property of a neutral owner, would have been in no danger from being carried into a French port, and it was argued that though a master might be justified in deviating from the direct course of the voyage for the purpose of avoiding a danger to which both ship and cargo were exposed, although it might afterwards turn out that the information upon which the master acted was incorrect, yet that if the reported danger was a danger to the ship alone, the master would commit a breach of contract by deviating from the direct course of the voyage unless the danger actually existed, and the master could allege that he was prevented by one of the perils excepted in the bill of lading from pursuing his voyage in the direct course. It appears to their Lordships, however, that there is no sound ground for this distinction; if the cargo had been a Prussian cargo it would have been exposed to the same danger as the ship from entering the port of Dunkirk, and it appears to their lordships that when an English merchant ships goods on board a foreign ship, he cannot expect that the master will act in any respect differently towards his cargo than he would towards a cargo shipped by one of his own country, and that it cannot be contended that the master is deprived of the right of taking reasonable and prudent steps for the preservation of his ship because from the accident of the cargo not belonging to his own nation, the cargo is not exposed to the same danger as the ship. On the whole, therefore, their lordships are of opinion, on this part of the case, that the master was justified in going to the Downs for the purpose of ascertaining whether war had actually been declared; and they also entirely agree with the opinion of the learned judge that the master was guilty of no unreasonable delay in not returning to Dunkirk before war was actually declared on the 19th July. The next question to be determined is, whether the owner of the ship is liable in damages because the master did not deliver the goods to the plaintiffs at Dover, and this depends on the further question, whether the master was bound to deliver the cargo at Dover without any payment in respect of freight. As neither party has relied on the law of Prussia in his pleadings, or given any evidence respecting that law, the question must be decided according to the law of England. The learned judge came to the conclusion that, although the cargo had not been carried to or delivered at the port of destination, and although, therefore, the shipowner was not entitled to the freight agreed to be paid by the bill of lading and the charter-party, nevertheless, that he was entitled to some payment of freight, either pro rata itineris, or by way of compensation for the carriage of the goods from Pisagua to Dover. It was argued, however, before us on the part of the respondent, that, under the circumstances, the shipowner was entitled to be paid the freight which, according to the bill of lading and the charter-party, was to be paid on a delivery at Dover. The argument for the appellant assumes that the breaking out of the war rendered the performance of the charter-party illegal, and that, therefore, the contract between the parties was dissolved; and there can be no doubt that the breaking out of the war did render it illegal for the Teutonia to enter any French port, but the question is, whether, under the terms of this charter-party, the contract might not still have legally been performed by the delivery of the cargo at some of the other ports mentioned in the charter-party as ports at which the cargo might be delivered. The substance of the contract between the parties is that the cargo may be delivered at any one of a great number of ports; that the consignee is to have the selection of the particular port, but that he is bound to select a safe port—that is, a port at which the master can deliver the cargo, and earn his freight; and the question is, whether that contract is completely performed by the naming of a port at which it turns out in the event to be impossible to deliver. In Ogden v. Graham (sup.) it was held by the Court of Queen's Bench that the charterer, under a charter framed like this, committed a breach of contract by naming a port which was closed by the order of the Government of the country at the time he named it; and this case is a direct authority that, if the war had broken out before the consignee gave orders for the master to proceed to Dunkirk, the consignee would have been bound to name some other port than a French port as the port of discharge. It was, indeed, argued that, as it was known at the time when the orders were given at Falmouth, that there was great danger of war breaking out between France and Germany, Dunkirk was not even then a safe port, and that the charterer had no right to order the master to proceed there. Their Lordships, however, are not of that opinion; they think that, until the war was actually declared, the consignee was entitled to require the master to proceed to Dunkirk; and it is to be observed that the master, when he received the orders, made no objection to them, but proceeded on his voyage to Dunkirk. The question to be determined is, what is the effect of the named port becoming a closed port by reason of war breaking out between the time when the orders are given, and the time when the ship arrives? As their Lordships have already given their opinion that the master was guilty of no improper deviation or unreasonable delay in proceeding to Dunkirk, they think the case, as to this branch of it, is exactly the same as if the war had already broken out when the vessel first arrived off Dunkirk. Now, on the one side it is contended that, when once the consignee has named a port, which is an open and proper port at the time he names it, the bill of lading and charter-party are to be read exactly as if this was the only port of discharge named in them; on the other side, it is contended that, assuming the consignee committed no breach of contract in giving orders to the master at Falmouth to proceed to Dunkirk, yet, nevertheless, as in the event it turned out to be impossible for the master to deliver at Dunkirk, the consignee had not completely performed his part of the contract to name a port at which the cargo could be delivered, and that he was bound to select another port from among those named in the charter-party. There is no authority on the proper construction of the charter-party in this respect, but their Lordships are of opinion that they ought not to hold that the contract between the parties has become impossible of performance, and is therefore to be treated as dissolved, if by any reasonable construction it can be treated as still capable in substance of being performed. Although it is true that the court ought not to make a contract for the parties which they have not made themselves, yet a mercantile contract, which is usually expressed shortly, and leaves much to be understood, ought to be construed fairly and liberally for the purpose of carrying out the object of the parties, and it would seem very unjust to hold, because the consignee has named a port at which, without any fault on the part of the shipowner, it is impossible for the cargo to be delivered, that therefore the consignee is entitled to the possession of the cargo at the nearest neighbouring port, which in a charter framed like this, must necessarily be one of the ports named in the charter, without paying for the cargo any freight whatever. The ship, without any breach of contract on the part of the shipowner, has arrived at Dover; the consignee has required the master to deliver him the cargo there, and he has not required the master to proceed to any other port except Dunkirk, where it was impossible for him to go. The charter provides what freight is to be paid if the cargo is delivered at Dover, and how it is to be paid; and therefore it appears to their Lordships that they ought to hold that the contract was not dissolved by the impossibility of delivering the cargo at Dunkirk, and that the shipowner had not lost his chartered freight, nor his lien for it, at the time when the cargo was demanded at Dover. Their Lordships having come to the conclusion that the shipowner had still a lien for the full freight, it becomes unnecessary to consider whether, if Dunkirk had been the only port of discharge, the shipowner would have been entitled either to freight pro rata itineris, or to a sum by way of compensation for the carriage of the goods from Pisagua to Dover, and they wish to be understood as giving no opinion on these questions, which no doubt are questions of great difficulty and importance. On the whole, their Lordships will recommend to Her Majesty that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

ANDERSON AND OTHERS v. THE PACIFIC FIRE AND MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Marine Insurance—Misrepresentation of material fact—Honest expression of erroneous opinion honestly formed.

In a policy of marine insurance the safety of a particular place as an anchorage was a material fact. The assured knew nothing about the place, The assured also knew nothing about it, except that he had received a letter from the captain of the ship proposed to be insured, in which the captain expressed it as his opinion and that of the local pilot, that the place was a good and safe anchorage. This letter was, at the time of the making of the policy, communicated to the assurer. In point of fact the place was not a good and safe anchorage, and the ship was lost there in consequence. The jury found that the captain honestly entertained the opinion he had expressed:

Held, that this was not such a misrepresentation by the assured as to vitiate the policy.

THIS was an action on a policy of insurance on the ship Clarendon, from Belize to Rendezvous Point, in the island of Turneffe, back to Belize, thence to other ports, and finally to London.

At the trial before Brett, J., at the sittings in London after Michaelmas term, it was proved that on or about the 28th Dec. 1870, plaintiffs' clerk, one Bruce, went to defendants' offices, where he saw one Drummond, defendants' manager, with respect to effecting a policy on the ship Clarendon. A conflict of evidence took place as to what was done on this occasion. Bruce stated that he told Drummond that the plaintiffs knew nothing about Rendezvous Point, further than this, that they had that day received a letter from the captain of the ship. Bruce alleged that he then read this letter to Drummond, in which the captain said of Rendezvous Point, "It is considered by the pilot here as good and safe anchorage, and well sheltered. I have been out and seen the place, and consider it quite safe." Drummond denied that Bruce had shown or read him this letter, and said that, without reading the letter, he had told him as a matter of fact that the place was a good and safe anchorage. Neither the parties themselves nor Bruce nor Drummond had any previous knowledge of the place as an anchorage. Drummond took a day to consider of it, and then the policy was effected, an extra 1 per cent. beyond the ordinary rate from Belize being charged by way of premium. No bad faith was charged against the plaintiffs' or their clerk. It appeared that the Clarendon was going out to Rendezvous Point to recover a cargo of mahogany, the cargo of another ship—the Gibraltar—which had been lost there a short time previously. So little was known by either party about the place, that it was called in the policy "Rendennis Point." The anchorage at Rendezvous Point was well protected by a reef from the violence of the waves, but it was not protected against the northerly winds, which blow very strong in that part of the world at certain seasons of the year. A gale arose while the Clarendon was at Rendezvous Point; the ship's anchor did not hold, and she was driven against the reef and totally lost. The defendants adduced strong evidence to show that Rendezvous Point was not a good or safe anchorage, but a very dangerous place; and they contended that, assuming Mr. Bruce's version of what took place between him and Drummond to be true, that amounted to a representation by the plaintiff that Rendezvous Point was a good and safe anchorage, and that as it was not such an anchorage, that was a misrepresentation so as to vitiate the policy. The learned judge left two questions to the jury: First, was the captain's letter read by Bruce to Drummond? Secondly, was the representation in that letter true? The jury answered both questions in the affirmative, and the learned judge thereupon directed a verdict for the plaintiffs.

Prentice, Q.C. (Murphy with him) moved for a new trial, on the ground of misdirection and of the verdict being against the weight of evidence. After the verdict of the jury, it must be conceded that the captain's letter was read by the plaintiff's clerk to the defendants' manager; but the learned judge ought to have directed the jury that, assuming that to be the case, the reading of that letter was tantamount to a statement by the plaintiffs that in point of fact Rendezvous Point was a good and safe anchorage and well sheltered. The only question for the jury would then have been, whether the place answered that description or not, and there was abundant evidence to show that it did not. Ionides v. Pacific Insurance Company (25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 490; L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 674) is an authority directly in favour of the plaintiffs to show that that was the effect of the reading by the plaintiff's clerk of the captain's letter. Blackburn, J., in delivering the judgment of the court, there says: "It was argued that a representation, if only as to an expectation or belief, is substantially complied with if the assured really had honestly entertained that expectation on sufficient grounds, and that the representation that he thought the ship a Norwegian ship was literally true. We think this expression tantamount to an assertion that she was the Norwegian." Moreover, the verdict was against the weight of evidence, as it was so abundantly proved that Rendezvous Point was notoriously a very dangerous place, that the jury ought to have found that the captain could not honestly have considered it a safe place and well sheltered.

WILLES, J.—The defendants in this case seek to get rid of their liability under a policy of insurance on the ground of an alleged misrepresentation by the assured of a material fact. There is no doubt that such a misrepresentation, though made perfectly bonâ fide, will vitiate a policy, if intended at the time to be acted on by the assurer. The rule as to good faith in matters of assurance is so strict, that the assured is bound to communicate to the assurer any material circumstance within his knowledge that is not within the ordinary common knowledge of an underwriter. Moreover, if it turns out that in effecting the policy the assurer had misstated or concealed a material fact, the policy is void, without its being necessary to show any bad faith on the part of the assurer. In this case there does not appear to have been any concealment on the part of the plaintiffs. The jury have found as a fact that the plaintiffs' clerk read to the defendants' manager the letter that the plaintiffs had received from the captain of the ship, in which the captain had said of Rendezvous Point, "It is considered by the pilot here as good and safe anchorage, and well sheltered. I have been out and seen the place, and consider it quite safe." On the part of the defendants it is contended that that is a misrepresentation such as to vitiate the policy, as it was abundantly proved that Rendezvous Point was not a good and safe anchorage. If then we take the letter to be a statement by the master that, as a matter of fact, Rendezvous Point was a good and safe anchorage, the plaintiffs, no doubt, would be bound by his misrepresentation. But the question arises, whether the expressions contained in the captain's letter amounted to an absolute statement of a fact, or were only an expression of opinion. If the letter were only an expression of opinion and the jury had found that, in the state of the facts, the captain could not have honestly formed or entertained the opinion, it seems to me that the plaintiffs would be bound by it. But the jury have found that the opinion was honestly formed. Then, do the words amount to an absolute statement of a fact? I do not think they do; nor do I think that the defendants' manager could have so understood them at the time of effecting the policy. Neither the plaintiffs' clerk nor the defendants' manager appear to have known much about the place. All the information that the plaintiffs had was laid before the defendants. That was found as a fact by the jury. The plaintiffs had no other information about the place, beyond the captain's letter, and that contains merely an expression of his opinion—an opinion which the jury have found to have been honestly formed. I think, then, that the direction was right, and that as to the misdirection there must be no rule. With regard to the verdict being against the weight of evidence, the facts appear to have been fairly laid before the jury, and as the learned judge does not appear to be dissatisfied with the verdict, there will be no rule on that point either.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The captain's letter does not contain the statement that Rendezvous Point was a safe and good anchorage, but that he and the pilot considered it so. As the jury have found that the captain really and honestly entertained the opinion which he thus expressed, I do not think there is any ground for charging the plaintiffs with misrepresentation.

GROVE, J.—I am of the same opinion. We are asked by the defendants' counsel to say that the captain's letter contained a statement false in fact, on the faith of the truth of which the policy was effected. But as I regard the captain's letter as containing only an expression of his opinion, I cannot regard his statement as false in fact, unless I come to the conclusion that the captain did not entertain the opinion he expressed. But the jury have expressly negatived that. With regard to the case cited by Mr. Prentice, I do not think it has any bearing on the present case. The question there was as to the identity of the vessel—whether the ship to be insured was the Norwegian ship Socrates, a new vessel, or the old French ship, Socrate. All that the representation here amounts to is, that the captain had formed an opinion, based partly on the report of the pilot and partly on his own observation, that the place was a safe anchorage.

BRETT, J.—I think my direction was right. I left four questions to the jury: First, "Did the plaintiffs communicate to the defendants the captain's letter? Secondly, is the representation in that letter true? Thirdly, did plaintiffs' clerk omit to read the captain's letter, and state that in point of fact Rendezvous Point was a good and safe anchorage? Fourthly, if so, was the place in point of fact a good and safe anchorage?" The jury answered the first two questions in the affirmative, and accordingly I did not press for an answer to the third and fourth questions, and directed a verdict for the plaintiffs. The great question at the trial was as to the matter of fact whether the letter had been read or not, and that was decided by the jury in favour of the plaintiffs. The insurer's manager knew that the risk was an unusual one, and an extra premium was charged in consequence. I expressed my opinion to the jury that the captain's letter expressed only his own opinion, and the jury concurred with me. I saw no reason to doubt that the opinion was honestly formed; as, though the reef did not protect the ship from the wind, it gave sufficient protection from the sea. The captain might, then, very fairly form the opinion which he had expressed.

SMITH v. MYERS AND ANOTHER.

Contract—Sold note—Sale of Cargo "expected to arrive" by a particular ship.

Defendants, merchants at Liverpool, purchased 600 tons of nitrate of soda, through their agents at Valparaiso, who chartered the vessel Precursor, to bring it to England, and informed the defendants of this by letter. The defendants then entered into the following contract with the plaintiff:

"We have this day sold to you about 600 tons, more or less, being the entire parcel of nitrate of soda expected to arrive at port of call, per Precursor, at 12s. 9d. per cwt. . . . Should any circumstance or accident prevent the shipment of the nitrate, or should the vessel be lost, this contract to be void." The greater part of the nitrate of soda had been, in the meantime, whilst lying at the port of loading, destroyed by an inundation caused by an earthquake, and the charter of the Precursor cancelled by the defendants' agents at Valparaiso. These agents, on hearing from the defendants of their contract with the plaintiffs, subsequently purchased another 600 tons of nitrate of soda, obtained a transfer of a fresh charter of the Precursor, and sent the nitrate of soda to England. On its arrival, the plaintiff claimed this cargo, which the defendants refused to deliver, whereupon the plaintiff brought an action on the above contract:

Held (affirming the judgment of the Queen's Bench), that the plaintiff was not entitled under his contract to claim the nitrate of soda which arrived by the Precursor.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, making absolute a rule to enter a verdict for the defendants in the action: (23 L.T. Rep. N. S. 240; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 495.)

The action was for not delivering 600 tons of nitrate of soda expected to arrive per Precursor, pursuant to a contract of sale.

The defendants pleaded (besides denial of the contract as alleged and other pleas) that the shipment of the nitrate of soda was prevented by circumstances and accidents within the true intent of the contract, viz, by the soda being destroyed by an inundation caused by an earthquake at the port of loading, and that no parcel of nitrate of soda within the true intent and meaning of the contract arrived as alleged. On these pleas issue was joined.

At the trial of the cause, which took place before Hayes, J., at the Liverpool Summer Assizes 1869, it appeared that the plaintiff was a merchant at Bristol, and defendants were merchants at Liverpool, carrying on business under the name of Myers, Sons, and Co., and also partners in the firm of Myers, Bland and Co., of Valparaiso.

Myers, Bland and Co., on the 15th July 1868, purchased from Messrs. Cross and Co., pursuant to orders from the defendants, 600 tons of nitrate of soda, and on the following day chartered a vessel called the Precursor to convey the nitrate of soda to England.

On the 13th Aug. 1868 the greater part of the nitrate of soda so purchased, whilst lying at Iquique, the port of loading, was destroyed by an inundation caused by an earthquake. A dispute having arisen as to whether Messrs. Cross and Co. were bound to supply other nitrate of soda under their contract, it was decided by arbitration (according to the terms of the contract), on the 1st Sept. 1868, that they were not so bound, whereupon Myers, Bland and Co., on the 2nd Sept. 1868, cancelled the charter of the Precursor, by an agreement with the captain of that vessel.

In the meantime the defendants, who had received advice from Myers, Bland and Co. of the purchase of the nitrate of soda, and of the Precursor having been chartered to convey it to England, sold, by means of their brokers, to the plaintiff the nitrate of soda, of the purchase of which they had been advised. The sale note was in the following terms:—

Liverpool, Sept. 1868.

Messrs. William Smith and Co.

"We have this day sold to you, on account of Messrs. Myers, Sons and Co., about 600 tons (say 600) more or less, being the entire parcel of nitrate of soda expected to arrive at port of call, per Precursor, at 12s. 9d. per cwt., from the quay. . . . Should any circumstance or accident prevent the shipment of the nitrate, or should the vessel be lost, this contract to be void. Buyers to have the option of sending the vessel into any safe port in the United Kingdom.

The defendants informed Myers, Bland, and Co., by letter, that they had sold to the plaintiff the nitrate to arrive, whereupon Myers, Bland, and Co., on the 29th Oct. 1868, bought of Messrs. Cross and Co., on account of the defendants, at a price beyond the limit given by the defendants, another parcel of 600 tons of nitrate of soda, and on the 30th Oct. obtained from Messrs. Cross and Co. a transfer of a fresh charter of the Precursor entered into by Messrs. Cross and Co., after the cancellation of the former charter. The parcel of nitrate of soda so purchased was shipped under this charter to England, consigned to the defendants. Myers, Bland, and Co., on the 30th Oct. 1868, wrote to the defendants, advising them of the intended shipment of this second parcel of nitrate of soda, and hoping that it might enable them to fulfil their contract with the plaintiff, if obliged to do so, or if not so obliged, to sell at a profit.

SMITH v. MYERS AND ANOTHER.

After the receipt of a letter from Myers, Bland, and Co., written on the 2nd Sept. 1868, announcing the destruction of the first parcel of soda and the cancellation of the charter, the defendants, on the 15th Oct. 1868, wrote to the brokers of the plaintiff, telling them of the destruction of the soda and the cancellation of the charter of the Precursor, and informing them that the contract with the plaintiff was consequently void. The brokers of the plaintiff replied, on the 21st Oct. 1868, saying that they expected a fulfilment of the contract, and that they were not concerned with any nitrate of soda which might have been destroyed by the earthquake, as that had nothing to do with their contract.

Upon the arrival of the Precursor at Queenstown on the 8th May 1869, with the second parcel of nitrate of soda, the plaintiff claimed the cargo, but the defendants refused to deliver it, on the ground that the contract with the plaintiff was terminated by the destruction of the nitrate of soda just purchased. An action was then commenced by the plaintiff.

A verdict was entered for the plaintiff for 960*l.*, being the difference between the contract price, 12*s.* 9*d.*, and the market price, 14*s.* 6*d.*, at the time of the arrival of the Precursor. Leave was reserved to move to enter a verdict for the defendants or a nonsuit, the court to have power to draw inferences of fact.

A rule nisi having been obtained on the ground that the cargo which arrived was not the cargo agreed to be sold, the Court of Queen's Bench (Cockburn, C.J., Mellor and Lush. J.), made absolute the rule, on the ground that the contract, though not for a specific lot of nitrate of soda, was for a specific adventure or voyage, which both parties contemplated as about to take place, and that the second lot of nitrate of soda was not within the contract.

R. G. Williams (with him Quain, Q.C.), for the plaintiff, argued that the plaintiff was entitled to maintain his verdict, and that the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench should be reversed. The contract was not one for the sale of any specific quantity or parcel of nitrate of soda. The delivery of any quantity of 600 tons arriving by the Precursor would be a fulfilment of the contract with the plaintiff. It might well be that at the date of the contract the defendants had not purchased any particular parcel of nitrate of soda; and in that case the plaintiff would be compellable to take the cargo which did arrive by the Precursor. If so, he is equally entitled to the delivery of it to him. As to the words, "should any circumstance or accident prevent the shipment of the nitrate, or should the vessel be lost, this contract to be void," it is submitted that they are simply superfluous. The effect of the contract would have been the same had those words been omitted. In Johnson and another v. Macdonald (9 M. & W. 600), the defendant by a bought and sold note agreed to sell the plaintiffs "100 tons of nitrate of soda, at 18*s.* per cwt., to arrive ex Daniel Grant, to be taken from the quay at landing weights," &c.; and below the signature of the brokers a memorandum was inserted, "Should the vessel be lost, this contract to be void." It was contended on the part of the plaintiff that the contract was to be put an end to only on the loss of the vessel, and that shipment on board the vessel was not necessary, but Parke, B., said: "This is a contract not passing any property in any existing chattel on board the vessel at the time it was entered into, but merely an agreement for the sale and delivery of a portion of her cargo at a future period, namely, when the vessel should arrive—in short, that the goods are to be delivered at the quay out of the vessel if she should arrive; in order to fulfil which condition a double event must take place, namely, the arrival of the vessel with the nitrate of soda on board. . . . That being so, the short question remaining for our consideration is this: Is that construction altered or interfered with by the short memorandum inserted at the end of the bought and sold note, namely, 'should the vessel be lost, this contract to be void.' It is a very loose memorandum, and although the parties might possibly have thought it fully expressed their meaning, I think we cannot attribute to it the efficacy of altering the original contract, and that it must be understood as confined solely to this, that if the vessel is lost, the contract is to be altogether void. It is, as I have said before, a loose memorandum, and ought not to be allowed to alter the meaning of a contract which clearly contains within itself a double condition for its performance." The judgment of the court below proceeds, in one respect at least, on a misconception of the facts of the case. Cockburn, C.J., said: "In this case it appears that the intended cargo perished; but it happened that some nitrate of soda was afterwards to be had, and the defendants' agents purchased it, but not to satisfy this contract, and without any intention that the nitrate of soda so purchased should come home in the Precursor at all. It is a mere accident that it came home in the Precursor." That cannot properly be called an accident which was intentionally done for the purpose of enabling the defendants to fulfil their contract with the plaintiff.

Milward, Q.C. (with him Baylis), for the defendants, were not called upon.

KELLY, C.B.—The real question is, whether the contract before us, of the 8th Sept. 1868, relates to the specific quantity of nitrate of soda which was purchased by the defendants, and which is, in fact, referred to in the letter of the 16th July, or whether it relates to any quantity of nitrate of soda which might, at any subsequent time, have been purchased and ultimately sent to England by the ship Precursor. Now, I am clearly of opinion that the contract relates to the quantity of nitrate of soda which is referred to in the letter of the 16th July, a quantity which had been actually purchased, and at the date of that letter was within the terms and express language of the contract of the 8th Sept., a specific quantity intended to be conveyed to England and expected to arrive by the Precursor. There can be no doubt, when we look to the facts of the case, that a specific quantity of 600 tons of nitrate of soda had been purchased by the agents of the defendant, and that the letter of the 16th July informed the defendants of that purchase, and also of the fact that the ship Precursor had been chartered in order to convey that specific quantity to this country. There can be no doubt that when the contract was entered into by the defendants with the plaintiff, they meant, and meant nothing else than a specific quantity of nitrate of soda mentioned in the letter of the 16th July, which they believed had at that time been actually shipped, or was lying at Valparaiso ready to be shipped, on board the vessel. There can be no question, therefore, that the defendants intended that specific quantity alone. The question for us to determine is, whether the mere accident that that letter had not been communicated to the plaintiff by the defendants altered the meaning and legal effect of the contract entered into, and converts the specific quantity intended by the defendants into any quantity, which might or might not have been purchased at the time, but which should afterwards be sent to this country by the Precursor. I think it does not, and that the parties clearly referred to some specific quantity to which the description in the contract directly and exclusively applies. The words of the contract are, "We have this day sold to you about 600 tons, more or less." If it had stopped there it might mean any 600 tons of nitrate of soda; but the contract goes on to give this precise description of the 600 tons, "being the entire parcel of nitrate of soda expected to arrive at port of call per Precursor, at 12s. 9d. per cwt." Does not this, as plainly as words can speak, say to the plaintiff, "There is a certain quantity, about 600 tons, of nitrate of soda expected to arrive at the port of call, and it is one entire parcel." I think, without any communication of the letter of the 16th July to the plaintiff, the plaintiff was apprised by the terms of the contract that it related to one entire parcel of nitrate of soda expected by the defendants to arrive by the ship Precursor. If the question had been asked, "What is the quantity you expect to arrive by the Precursor? is it purchased?" the answer would be, "There is a specific entire quantity, amounting to about 600 tons, which we expect to arrive by that vessel." And that was the quantity which, according to the terms of the contract, is described in the words to which I have referred. Then the language of the subsequent portion of the contract seems to me to put the case beyond all doubt: "Should any circumstance or accident prevent the shipment of the nitrate, or should the vessel be lost, this contract to be void." This attaches a proviso to the contract, that the contract was to become void in case of any accident happening to prevent the shipment. The contract having reference to a particular quantity of nitrate of soda, and an accident having prevented the shipment, the defendants contend that the contract is at an end. It is true that this accident occurred before the date of the contract, and was unknown to the parties at the time they entered into the contract; but this accident did in fact prevent the shipment of the nitrate. I say nothing at present as to the award made at Valparaiso, which might probably have the same effect. Let us suppose that the nitrate of soda had not been destroyed by the earthquake, and that whilst lying on the wharf an embargo had prevented its being shipped, and that the Precursor had to sail away without it; let us suppose further that the Precursor had on board another quantity of nitrate of soda amounting to 600 tons consigned to some other house, could the plaintiff have claimed that quantity on its arrival in England? There would be, in the case I put, a quantity of 600 tons, as mentioned in the contract; but it is clear that the plaintiff could not claim it. The defendants might answer: "We undertook to sell you a quantity of nitrate of soda, to arrive by the Precursor, but we referred to a particular quantity, the shipment of which has been prevented by an accident; therefore, by the terms of the contract itself the contract is at an end." It seems to me, therefore, whether we look at the language of the early part of the contract and the words "being the entire parcel of nitrate of soda expected to arrive at port of call per Precursor," or whether we regard the subsequent provision in the contract that "should any circumstance or accident prevent the shipment of the nitrate, or should the vessel be lost, this contract to be void," the contract must be held to refer to a specific quantity—to that specific quantity of which the defendants had notice in the letter of the 16th July. Otherwise this conclusion would follow, that an accident having prevented the shipment of the nitrate, as provided for in the terms of the contract, the defendants were unable to perform the contract; and if, by any accident they were unable to purchase any other quantity of nitrate for him, but a quantity belonging to another person had nevertheless arrived here by the Precursor, they would be bound to deliver it to the plaintiff. It appears to me, then, the specific quantity of nitrate of soda agreed to be sold by the defendants to the plaintiff was that mentioned in the letter of the 16th July, and the shipment of that having been prevented by an accident, the contract between the parties, under the express proviso contained in it, became void, and the judgment of the court below must therefore be affirmed.

WILLES, J.—I should like to say that I entirely agree in the judgment delivered by the Lord Chief Baron; but I wish to reserve my judgment on the hypothetical case put, of several persons claiming the 600 tons under the contract. My notion is, that the parties to this contract meant that if by any circumstance or accident the nitrate should be prevented from being shipped, the contract was to be void, and I am of opinion that the earthquake was a circumstance or accident within the meaning of the contract which did prevent the shipment.

CHANNELL, B.—I am of the same opinion.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion.

PIGOTT, B.—I agree, and for the reasons given by the Court of Queen's Bench.

CLEASBY, B.—I am of the same opinion. I wish only to say that the cargo which arrived in May was not the cargo which was expected to arrive in September.

CORY v. PATTON.

Marine assurance—Concealment—Knowledge of assurer only after agreement to assure.

In an action upon a policy of marine assurance, the plaintiffs replied to a plea of the concealment of a material fact that, before they had knowledge of the fact, their agent had entered into an agreement with the defendant to effect this assurance, and that if they had communicated the fact to the defendant when they first knew it, he would still in honour, conscience, and good faith have been bound to subscribe his name to the policy sued upon.

Held, upon the authority of the decision of this court in Ionides v. The Pacific Insurance Company (L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 674: ante, p. 141), that if the practice of merchants were as alleged, the replication was a good answer to the plea.

THIS was a demurrer to a replication.

The declaration, which set out a policy of marine insurance upon the ship Ceylon, averred a total loss by perils insured against.

The sixth plea stated that at the time of the making of the said policy of insurance as in the declaration mentioned, the plaintiffs concealed from the defendant a fact then known to the plaintiffs, and not known to the defendant, and material to the said risk, that is to say, that the said ship having set sail and departed on the said voyage with the said goods on board, had met with an accident and misfortune whilst proceeding on the said voyage.

The second replication to the sixth plea stated that before the plaintiffs had any knowledge of the material fact, they, being at a distance from the defendant, by a letter written by them to their agent, instructed their said agent to effect the said insurance, and the plaintiffs said that they had no knowledge of the said material fact until after the lapse of a reasonable time for their agents to agree with an underwriter or underwriters to insure the said goods, and to settle with him or them the terms and premium on and for which the said insurance should be effected: and the plaintiffs said that in the ordinary course of business their said agent ought to have agreed and settled as aforesaid, before they, the plaintiffs, knew of the said material fact; and the plaintiffs said that before they knew the said fact the said agent did apply to the defendant as such underwriter as aforesaid to insure the said goods and settled and arranged with the defendant the terms and premium on and for which the defendant would insure the same; and the defendant made a binding agreement with the said agent to insure the same on those terms, and for that premium, and became in honour, conscience, and good faith, though not in law, bound to submit a policy for insuring the said goods on those terms and for that premium; and the plaintiffs said that if the said material fact and plaintiffs' said knowledge of it and the premises aforesaid had afterwards been made known to the defendant, he would still in honour, conscience, and good faith, have been bound to subscribe himself to the plaintiffs for such a policy as aforesaid; and the plaintiffs said that the policy in the declaration mentioned was the policy which the defendant was so bound to subscribe as aforesaid; and the plaintiffs said that they, the plaintiffs, knowing as the fact was, that in due course of business at the time when they first had knowledge of the said material fact, either a policy for insuring the said goods in pursuance of their instructions would be effected or that such an agreement would be made by some underwriter or underwriters which would in honour, conscience, and good faith bind him or them to subscribe a policy for effecting the said insurance, did in good faith abstain from communicating the said material fact to their said agent, or to the defendant, which is the concealment in the sixth plea mentioned.

Watkin Williams, for defendant, supported the demurrer.

Butt, Q. C. (with Shield), contra.

The arguments sufficiently appear from the considered judgment of the court.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 24.—BLACKBURN, J. delivered the judgment of the court (Blackburn, Mellor, and Lush, JJ.). The declaration in this case was on a marine policy of insurance. The sixth plea was that at the time of the making of the policy the plaintiffs concealed from the defendant a material fact then known by the plaintiffs, and not known to the defendant. There is a second replication to this plea, to which there is a demurrer, which was argued in the sittings after last term before my brothers Mellor and Lush, and myself, by Mr. W. Williams for the defendants, and Mr. Butt for the plaintiff. From the statement of the counsel we learn that the replication was intended to confess the plea, and assert by way of avoiding it that the plaintiffs had no knowledge of the material fact till after the slip was initialled, and to aver as a fact what was assumed in the judgment of this court in Ionides v. The Pacific Insurance Company (L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 674; ante, p. 141), that the slip is in practice, and, according to the understanding of those engaged in marine insurance, the complete and final contract between the parties, fixing the terms of the insurance and the premium, and neither party can, without the assent of the other, deviate from the terms thus agreed on without a breach of faith, though for fiscal purposes the Legislature have enacted that this contract shall not be enforceable at law or in equity. Some doubt was entertained whether the replication did really raise the question, and leave was offered to the plaintiffs to amend on the usual terms, of which, however, they declined to avail themselves. We think that the replication, as it stands, would be proved by proof of the facts which we have just stated. The practice and understanding of merchants are not matters of law, and it is open to the defendants at the trial to contend on the traverse of this replication that the practice and understanding are not such as averred, but on this demurrer we must take it to be truly stated; and that being assumed, the question must be determined whether this excuses the concealment of a fact which came to the knowledge of the plaintiffs after the execution of the slip, and before the policy was made. Mr. Williams quoted authorities to show that the assured must use due diligence to make his agents, who are negotiating a policy, aware of all material facts which freshly came to his knowledge preceding the negotiation, nor do we at all question this doctrine. On the other hand it is quite clear that there is no obligation to disclose any matter which first comes to the knowledge of the assured after the policy is made, and we cannot doubt that if there was a complete contract to execute a policy enforceable in a court of equity, which the slip in America appears to be (1 Duer, 107), the court of equity would compel the party to execute the policy as of the date when he was bound to have executed it, notwithstanding any intervening facts, on the principle that in equity the thing is considered as done when it ought to have been done. (See as to a subsequent fire Paine v. Mellor, 6 Ves. 349). The non-disclosure of a fact after the policy was made in equity could have no more effect than a similar non-disclosure after it was made in law. The present is an intermediate case, and the question which must now be determined seems to us to be whether after the negotiation is complete and the contract made in fact, and in good faith, and the underwriter is under a moral obligation to execute a formal policy, the insured is bound by good faith to give information to the assurer of a matter which would make him aware that his bargain was a bad one,—information which ought to have no effect on him, but would expose him to a temptation to break his contract, which as far as the law is concerned he may do with impunity, because, for fiscal purposes the Legislature has forbidden the court either of law or equity to enforce the contract. To the question thus stated, the answer seems obvious, that he is not bound to lead his neighbour into temptation. Until lately no question of this sort could be raised in any court, for the rules of evidence required that the contract being written should be proved by the production of the writing, i. e., the slip, and Lord Ellenborough, in Warwick v. Slade, 3 Camp. 127, accurately expressed the effect of the statutes then in force, when he said: "The revenue laws forbid me to look to what is called the slip," and such continued to be the law down to and after the time when Xenos v. Wickham (L. Rep. 2 E. & Ir. App. 296; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 800; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 537) was argued in the House of Lords, and the judges who (on the 8th May 1867) gave their opinions in the House of Lords, used language showing that they thought that the law was as stated by Lord Ellenborough; and so it was. These passages were quoted and relied on in the argument before us. But in that very year, on the 31st May 1867, the 30th Vict. c. 23, received the royal assent. This statute was not brought to the notice of James, V.C., in Coulson v. Mackenzie (L. Rep. 8 Eq. 368.) According to the construction put upon it by this court in Ionides v. Pacific Insurance Company, that Act completely changed the law and repealed all those Acts which had ordered that the slip was not so much as to be looked at in a court of justice, and put it on a footing very similar to that of an unsigned memorandum of a contract within the Statute of Frauds, or a lease for more than three years not under seal, viz., that it was void, and not enforceable at law or in equity, but might be given in evidence wherever, though not valid, it was material. It is open to the plaintiffs in a court of error to question the accuracy of the reasoning on which the judgment in Ionides v. Pacific Insurance Company proceeded, but we think that whilst it stands unreversed, it leads irresistibly to the conclusion that the judgment in the present case should be for the plaintiffs.

JAMES v. THE LONDON AND SOUTH-WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Prohibition to the Court of Admiralty—Collision at sea—Limitation of liability—Power of Admiralty Court to stay actions—Jurisdiction—Action for negligence.

The High Court of Admiralty is not created by the statutes extending its jurisdiction to a Superior Court so as to take away from the Superior Courts at Westminster the power, which they undoubtedly possessed before those statutes, of issuing a prohibition to the court.

Smith v. Brown, ante p. 56, approved of.

By sect. 514 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104) it is enacted that in cases where any liability has been incurred by any owner in respect of loss of life or loss for damage to ships, boats, or goods, several claims are made or apprehended in respect of such liability, then it shall be lawful for the Court of Chancery to entertain proceedings at the suit of the shipowner for determining the amount of such liability and for the distribution of such amount rateably amongst the several claimants, with power for such court to stop all actions and suits pending in any other court in relation to the same subject matter.

By sect. 54 of the Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment Act 1852 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63) substituted for the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, sect. 50, it is enacted that the owners of any ship are not liable for loss of life, whether alone or together, with loss of or damage to ships, boats, goods, merchandise, or other things, to an aggregate amount exceeding 15l. per ton on the ship's tonnage. By the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), sect. 13, it is enacted that "whenever any ship or vessel, or the proceeds thereof, are under arrest of the High Court of Admiralty, the said court shall have the same powers as are conferred upon the High Court of Chancery in England by the ninth part of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854."

To give the Admiralty Court jurisdiction to entertain a suit for limitation of liability, the ship or the proceeds thereof, or at least an equivalent for the value of the ship, must be under arrest of the Admiralty Court.

The payment into court in a collision suit of a sum of money equal to the amount in which the suit is instituted in lieu of bail, the ship having been totally lost in the collision, is not such an equivalent as will give the Admiralty Court jurisdiction to entertain a suit by the shipowner for limitation of liability.

Even the payment into court after the institution of the limitation suit of an aggregate amount of 15l. per ton on the ship's tonnage will not give the court jurisdiction in such a case.

Before the Court of Admiralty can have jurisdiction to entertain a suit for, and to declare persons entitled to, limited liability, the plaintiffs in that suit must make an absolute and unqualified admission of their liability, but (per Kelly, C.B.) as the Court of Admiralty has jurisdiction to hear causes of collision and to decide the liability of the persons claiming limitation, and as the exact period of the suit when such admission must be made is rather a question of procedure, such admission need not be made at the institution of the suit, but must be made before a decree can be given.

The plaintiff took a ticket of the London and South-Western Railway Company, to be conveyed by them from London to Guernsey, and when on his journey in the company's vessel, the Normandy, between Southampton and Guernsey, a collision took place between this vessel and a vessel called the Mary, in consequence of which the plaintiff lost his luggage, and the Normandy sank to the bottom of the sea. Cross-suits were then instituted in the Court of Admiralty by the owners of both the Normandy and Mary, each alleging negligence, the owners of the Normandy paying into court 5000*l.*, the sum in which the suit against them was instituted, in lieu of bail; and an action was commenced in this court (Exchequer) by the present plaintiff against the defendants, as owners of the Normandy, and other actions by other passengers were also commenced against them for losses sustained by the collision. The owners of the Normandy instituted a suit for limitation of liability, and, in their proceedings in the Court of Admiralty, undertook that if the court should find the Normandy solely to blame, or find both the Normandy and the Mary to blame for the collision, they would in the other actions admit liability to such plaintiffs as might prove their title to sue, and they prayed the court to pronounce the plaintiffs, if liable, were not liable to an aggregate tonnage of the Normandy, and that they might be at liberty to pay into court that sum with interest, and that all further proceedings in the said actions should be stayed, &c. Thereupon the Court of Admiralty, after hearing the counsel of the parties in the suits in that court, ordered that all actions should be stayed, the owners of the Normandy undertaking to admit liability in all such actions, as soon as the court should have pronounced for the damages proceeded for in the suit before it. The decree pronounced by the court stated that the court had jurisdiction to entertain the cause, and that the owners of the Normandy were entitled to limited liability, according to the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 and the Merchant Shipping Act 1862, and that if answerable, they were only so in damages to an amount not exceeding 6376*l.*, being at the rate of 15*l.* for each ton of the registered tonnage, and the owners were ordered to pay into court that sum, together with interest. The court also decreed the Normandy to have been solely to blame for the collision. The defendants accordingly paid into court the said sum of 6376*l.*

The plaintiff in the action in this court having applied for a rule to prohibit the Court of Admiralty from further proceeding in the suit and from further proceeding to enforce and issue any injunction to restrain the plaintiff from prosecuting his action in this court, the court directed him to declare in prohibition, which he accordingly did, and the foregoing facts having been set out in the declaration and the defendants' plea, the plaintiff demurred to such plea.

Held, first, that a prohibition would lie from this court to the Court of Admiralty; secondly, That as neither the vessel nor the proceeds thereof was or were under arrest of the Court of Admiralty, as enacted by sect. 13 of the 24 Vict. c. 10, the Court of Admiralty had no jurisdiction.

Per Kelly, C.B.—That had an equivalent for the ship been brought into court, that would have given the Court of Admiralty jurisdiction, but that a payment into court of 5000*l.* in lieu of bail could not be taken as an equivalent for the value of the ship. If at the time of the institution of the suit a sum equal to 15*l.* per ton on the ship's tonnage had been in court, that might have been an equivalent. Also that the admission of liability should be an absolute and not a qualified admission.

Per Martin, B.—That the suit of limited liability should be a simple one of itself, and that the plaintiff in the present action should have been a party to it.

Quere, Whether the Court of Admiralty had any jurisdiction over such a cause of action.

IN a former term a rule had been obtained by the plaintiff calling upon the defendants and the judge of the High Court of Admiralty to show cause why they should not be prohibited from further proceeding in a certain suit in the said court called the Normandy, and numbered 5366, to the injury of the said plaintiff, and why they should not be prohibited from further proceeding to enforce and issue any injunction to restrain the said plaintiff from prosecuting a certain action in this court in which the said plaintiff is the plaintiff and the said company are the defendants, on the ground that such suit and proceedings are without jurisdiction, or in excess of jurisdiction, and why the said company should not pay the costs of and occasioned by this rule.

Upon the argument of that rule, the court directed the plaintiff to declare in prohibition, which he accordingly did as follows.

The declaration in prohibition stated that the defendants were common carriers of passengers with their luggage from London to Guernsey, and the plaintiff became a passenger with his luggage to be conveyed from London to Guernsey, and that afterwards the plaintiff was safely conveyed to Southampton for a portion of his journey, but that whilst the plaintiff was being carried by the defendants in and upon a certain steam vessel called the Normandy, the said vessel, by and through the negligence, misconduct, and actual default of the defendants, came into collision with a certain other steam vessel called the Mary, whereby the said steam vessel the Normandy was so damaged that it sank, and by reason of the premises the plaintiff was cast into the water and injured, and his luggage was lost, &c.; and that afterwards he brought an action in the Exchequer of Pleas against the defendants to recover damages in respect of the premises, and declared against the defendants in the said action. The declaration in prohibition then set out the declaration in the action, which was in substance the same as above, claiming as damages 200*l.* To the declaration in the action the defendants pleaded first, not guilty; secondly, that the luggage delivered to them was received subject to the condition that they should be exempt from liability for any loss or damages which might arise during the carriage of such luggage by sea from the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, accidents from machinery, boilers and steam, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation of whatever nature and kind soever, and that the loss of the said luggage arose during the carriage of the same by sea, from dangers and accidents of the sea and navigation within the meaning of the above condition. To which pleas the plaintiff replied, taking and joining issue and giving notice of trial. The declaration in prohibition further stated that afterwards, on the 9th June 1870, the defendants commenced a certain suit of limitation of liability in the High Court of Admiralty, which suit was named the Normandy, No. 5366, against Edward Jordan Hough and others, the owners of the said steamship the Mary, and against the owners of the cargo of the said steamship, and against all and every other person or persons interested in the said steam vessels the Mary and the Normandy, or having any right, claim, or interest whatsoever with reference to or arising out of the collision aforesaid, and that the defendants afterwards presented and filed a petition in the said suit (see 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 519.) The declaration in prohibition then set out such petition, which stated, amongst other facts, that the defendants were owners of the said vessel called the Normandy, of the tonnage of 425·05 tons without deduction being made on account of engine room; that at midnight on the 16th March 1870 the Normandy, laden with a cargo of general merchandise and carrying Her Majesty's mails and with about thirty persons as passengers on board^a left Southampton for Jersey, and that on the morning of the 17th the Normandy came into collision with the Mary and sank, and that in consequence the master and many of the passengers and crew of the Normandy, and their luggage and effects, were lost, and also that the Mary was damaged, and her cargo, in fact, lost; that the said collision occurred without the actual fault or privity of the plaintiffs—the owners of the Normandy; that on the 13th April 1870, a caveat warrant against the arrest of the Mary was filed in the Court of Admiralty by the owners of the Mary, they undertaking to give bail; that on the 7th May 1870, a cause of damage, No. 5347, was instituted in the said Court of Admiralty against the Mary by the plaintiffs, the owners of the Normandy; and that on the 21st May a cause of damage, No. 5359, was instituted in the Court of Admiralty against the owners of the Normandy, on behalf of the owners of the Mary and the owners of her cargo, to recover damages by reason of the said collision, and on the 30th May an appearance was entered in the latter suit by the defendants, and the sum of 5000*l.*, the amount in which such suit had been instituted, was paid into court in lieu of bail; that actions have been brought against the plaintiffs, the owners of the Normandy, in respect of loss of and damage to goods on board the Normandy at the time of the said collision, and they have reason to believe that other actions and suits will be brought and instituted against them for the recovery of damages in respect of loss of life of persons on board the Normandy, and loss and damage to goods on board the Normandy, and goods on board the Mary at the time of the collision; that the value of the Normandy at the time of the said collision at 15*l.* sterling for every ton of the gross registered tonnage is presumed to be insufficient to answer the claims in the said suits or actions; that the plaintiffs, the said owners of the Normandy, undertake that if the Court of Admiralty should, in the said suit, No. 5359, find the Normandy solely to blame, or find both the Normandy and the Mary to blame for the aforesaid collision, they will, in the said other actions and suits, admit liability to such plaintiffs as may prove their title to sue in such other actions and suits. The petition then prayed the judge of the Admiralty Court to pronounce that the plaintiffs, if liable, are not liable in damages in respect of loss or damage to ships, goods, merchandise, or other things, or in respect of loss of life or personal injury, to an aggregate amount exceeding 15*l.* for each ton of the gross registered tonnage of the Normandy, and that the plaintiffs may be at liberty to pay into the registry of the court such aggregate amount, together with interest, at 4 per cent., from the date of the collision to the day of the payment into court, and that all further proceedings in the said suits and actions, with the exception of the said suits numbered respectively 5347 and 5359, be stayed, &c. The declaration in prohibition then set out the answer of the owners of the Mary, denying all blame on their parts, and denying the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty to grant the prayer of the petition. The declaration further stated that on the 4th June, 1870, the judge of the Court of Admiralty, having heard counsel for the plaintiffs and defendants in the foregoing suits, ordered that all actions and suits pending in any other court in relation to the subject matter of that suit—to wit, the liability of the owners of the vessel Normandy, the plaintiffs in this suit, in respect of the loss of life, or personal injury, or loss or damage to ships, goods, merchandise, or other things, on the occasion of a collision which occurred on or about the 17th March, 1870, between the said vessel Normandy and a vessel called the Mary—be stopped; the plaintiffs, by their counsel, undertaking to admit their liability in all such actions and suits as soon as the court shall have pronounced for the damage proceeded for in the cause pending in this court, entitled The Normandy (5359), or for a moiety of such damage; and that afterwards, on the 14th July 1870, the judge made a decree or order in the said suit, which was set out (see 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 519). The decree stated that the judge pronounced that the court had jurisdiction to entertain the cause and that the owners of the Normandy are entitled to limited liability according to the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862; and that, in respect of the loss occasioned by the collision, the owners of the Normandy, if answerable, are only so in damages to an amount not exceeding 6376*l.*, being at the rate of 15*l.* for each ton of the registered tonnage; and he ordered the owners to pay into court that sum, together with interest thereon at the rate of 4 per cent. and he condemned the plaintiffs in the costs of the suit. The declaration in prohibition then set forth that the defendants in the present action afterwards applied to the Court of Admiralty, and took proceedings, and are continuing to take proceedings, to induce the said court to issue a further injunction directed to the plaintiff to restrain him from proceeding with the said action in the said Court of Exchequer of Pleas, and have not ceased to prosecute the said application, and that at the several times of the commencement of the said suit in the said court, and of the said order and decree and application, the said ship, the Normandy, was not, nor were any proceeds thereof, under the arrest of the said court, nor were the said Normandy, or any proceeds thereof since the commencement of such suit, under such arrest, and that the plaintiff was not ever the plaintiff or defendant in any suit in the said court, and that the citation in the said suit was not served on the plaintiff, nor any other process of the said court, previously to the service of or other than the said order of the 4th June 1870, and that according to the law of England the cognisance of the said suit called The Normandy, No. 5366, belongs not to the High Court of Admiralty, and that the said court has no power or authority to entertain the petition of the plaintiffs in such suit, or the said application, or for an injunction, or to make any such order as is hereinbefore stated, or any order or injunction in the said suit in the said High Court of Admiralty, or otherwise to restrain the plaintiff prosecuting his said action in the said Court of Exchequer of Pleas, &c. The declaration concluded by praying for a writ of prohibition to the judge of the Court of Admiralty to prohibit him from enforcing or issuing any injunction to restrain the said plaintiff, or further to hold plea before him in anywise touching the premises aforesaid, or proceed further on the said petition or in the said suit in anywise against or to the detriment, loss, or damage of the plaintiff.

To this declaration in prohibition the defendants pleaded, admitting all the introductory averments of the plaintiff, and alleging that on the 29th July 1870, the before-mentioned two causes of damage having come on for hearing, the Court of Admiralty gave judgment against the defendants, and decreed the defendants' said vessel Normandy solely to blame for the said collision, and on the 4th Aug. the defendants paid into court, in the said suit of limitation of liability, the sum of 6473*l.* 11*s.*, being the sum of 6376*l.* together with proper interest, for distribution rateably among the several claimants, and thereupon admitted their liability in pursuance of the undertaking of their counsel, as stated in the said order of the 4th June 1870. The plea then set out the various proceedings which were afterwards taken in the suit of limited liability. It further stated that on the 22nd Nov. 1870 the defendants moved the Court of Admiralty to restrain the plaintiff from prosecuting his said action at law against the defendants, and the court, having heard the plaintiff by his counsel, took time to deliberate; and that the motion for the present prohibition having subsequently, on the 24th Nov., been made, and a rule nisi having been granted, the judge of the Admiralty Court declined to make any order on the said motion pending the proceedings of prohibition in this court. The plea concluded by averring jurisdiction in the said Court of Admiralty.

To this plea the plaintiff demurred.

The plaintiff's points of argument:—1. The plea does not show any jurisdiction in the Court of Admiralty to entertain the suit in that court, or to make any injunction staying the plaintiff's action for damages. The Court of Admiralty has no jurisdiction to entertain the suit for limitation of liability, for the following reasons. 2. The jurisdiction of the court quoad hoc is entirely founded on the 24 Vict. c. 10, s. 13, and unless the ship or its proceeds were under the arrest of the court it could have no jurisdiction. The ship, being at the bottom of the sea, could not be under arrest, and, as there never were any proceeds of it, the Court of Admiralty could not have jurisdiction. 3. The court could not, by ordering a sum of money to be paid into court to represent the ship, thereby give itself jurisdiction, for, at the time it made the order, and at the time the suit in which the order was made was instituted it had, by hypothesis, no jurisdiction, and the jurisdiction must exist at the commencement of the suit. 4. To hold that the court has jurisdiction would be to defeat the object of the statute, which was to prevent two suits, and make it unnecessary for the shipowner to pay the value of his ship into court when it was already under arrest. Further, the court has no jurisdiction to grant an injunction. 5. The court has no jurisdiction to interfere with an action on contract made on land to carry goods partly by land and partly by water. 6. The liability of the shipowner causing damage upon his contracts is not limited by the Merchant Shipping Acts. 7. The action in the Exchequer is not an action in another court relating to the same subject-matter as the suit in the Court of Admiralty. 8. The pleadings in the Admiralty Court do not allege or show, as they ought in order to found the jurisdiction, that the damage in question was not caused by the actual fault or privity of the defendants, and, on the whole, the contrary appears to have been the case. 9. The defendants dispute their liability, which ought to be tried at common law, the Court of Admiralty being only authorised to distribute the proceeds of the ship in cases of undisputed liability, and to do all things incidental to such distribution. 10. Under any circumstances, the Court of Admiralty would only have jurisdiction to stay the judgment in the action, and not the trial of the issues joined, which it is itself incompetent to try. As to prohibition lying to the Court of Admiralty,—11. It has been so decided: Jennings v. Audley (2 Brownlow, 30); Grant v. Gould (2 H. Bl. 69, 100); Velthasen v. Ormsley (3 T. R. 315); The Admiralty Case (12 Co. 73); Smith v. Brown (ante, p. 56; 40 L. J. Q. B., 214; 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 808.) 12. Independently of authority, it lies, for the Court of Admiralty is an inferior court. 13. Even though it should be for some purposes a Superior Court, prohibition would lie to it for various reasons; first, because it proceeds contrary to the course of the common law; secondly, because the court of appeal from it is different from the court of appeal of the common law courts; thirdly, from the necessity of the case, for otherwise there would be no means of causing the common law to be respected and observed where the rights of parties are brought in question in the Admiralty Court. 14. The Admiralty Court Act makes no difference in this respect, for the right of the common law courts to prohibit the Court of Admiralty before that statute could not be taken away except by express enactment, and there is none such.

The defendants' points of argument: 1. That under the circumstances stated in the plea, taken in conjunction with the statutory powers of the Court of Admiralty conferred by (among other statutes) the 24 Vict. c. 10, s. 13, the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104,

s. 14, the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, s. 54, the said Court of Admiralty has jurisdiction to entertain the suit for limitation of liability, and to grant an injunction to stop the plaintiff's action for damages. 2. That where a ship, or the proceeds thereof, are under arrest of the High Court of Admiralty, the said court has, by virtue of the provisions of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, all those powers which are conferred on the Court of Chancery, the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, sect. 514, and that the pleadings do not show that the Court of Admiralty has exceeded the said powers, and it in effect appears that they have not exceeded them. 3. That the sums paid into court under the order of the 14th July 1870 represent and are virtually the "proceeds" within the meaning of the 24 Vict. c. 10, s. 13. 4. That the words "under arrest of the court" were virtually satisfied by the prayer and readiness of the defendants to be permitted to bring the "proceeds" into court, and by the order of the said court of the 14th July 1870 being made conditional thereon. 5. That in order under the 24 Vict. c. 10, s. 13, to give the Court of Admiralty the power conferred on the Court of Chancery by the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, s. 514, it is not necessary that at the time of the institution of the cause the ship or "proceeds thereof" should be under arrest of the Court of Admiralty. 6. That the mere fact of a ship going to the bottom, or being otherwise wholly lost, does not oust the Court of Admiralty from jurisdiction over the claims of the parties arising from her loss: (The Amalia, Br. & Lush. 151; 32 L. J. 191, P. M. & A.) 7. That to hold that this court could prohibit the Court of Admiralty from proceeding in this case would be to deprive the defendants of the right to have their liability limited intended to be conferred on ship-owners by the 24 Vict. c. 10, s. 13. 8. That from the circumstances stated in the plea the plaintiff is estopped from denying the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty in the said cause, and has otherwise disentitled himself to a prohibition. 9. That a prohibition does not lie in this case to the High Court of Admiralty, more especially since the passing of the following Acts, 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, ss. 11, 13, and 19; 24 Vict. c. 10, ss. 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, and 23; 31 & 32 Vict. c. 71, ss. 9 and 26; 34 & 35 Vict. c. 91, s. 2; and see Ricketts v. Bodenham, 4 A. & E. 433. 10. That even if the order of the Court of Admiralty of the 4th June 1870 cannot be supported, yet, that at any time after the payment into court under the order of the 14th July 1870, the Court of Admiralty had and now has power to grant an injunction to stop the plaintiff's action under the 24 Vict. c. 10, s. 13, and so the writ prayed for is too large, and cannot be granted. 11. That the pleadings do not disclose a valid cause for prohibition, or any valid power in the court to grant the same. 12. That the contract in the declaration mentioned is within the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, s. 54, on this (among other grounds): The effect of such contract to carry partly by land and partly by water, is to give the defendants the protection of any statute limiting the liability of carriers by land as to so much of the journey as is to be performed on land, and the protection of any statute limiting the liability of carriers by water as to so much of the journey as is to be performed by water, and not to put them out of the protection of either Act: (See Le Conteur v. The London and South-Western Railway Company, L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 244.) 13. That the defendants having paid into the Court of Admiralty an amount to the full extent of their liability in respect of the collision, to be there distributed according to law, this court will not interfere to harass them with proceedings in other courts with respect to the same subject-matter: (See Potts v. Place, 8 Ex. 905; 5 H. of L. Cas. 388.) The proceedings in the case of The Normandy in the Court of Admiralty will be found 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 519; L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 152; 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 631.(a)

Sir J. Karlake, Q.C. and C. Wood appeared for the defendants in support of the plea.

Manisty, Q.C. and W. E. Harrison, for the plaintiff, appeared in support of the demurrer.

The arguments and cases are so fully referred to in the very elaborate and exhaustive judgments of the learned judges, that it is unnecessary to repeat them here.

KELLEY, C. B.—In this case of James v. The London and South-Western Railway Company, it is with very great regret that I feel myself compelled to hold that the plaintiff is entitled to the judgment of the Court. I say it is with very great regret, because I think it is manifest, that upon the facts, the justice and the merits of the case are altogether with the defendants in prohibition, whom—in order to avoid confusion—I will hereafter call "the company;" for they have been made subject, by reason of this most unfortunate collision—as to which the shareholders,

(a) By sect. 514 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104 (ninth part) it is enacted: That in cases where any liability has been incurred by any owner in respect of loss or damage to goods, &c., and several claims are made or apprehended in respect of such liability, then it shall be lawful for the High Court of Chancery . . . to entertain proceedings at the suit of any owner for the purpose of determining the amount of such liability . . . and for the distribution of such amount rateably amongst the several claimants, with power for any such court to stop all actions and suits pending in any other court in relation to the same subject matter, &c.

By the Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63) s. 54—The owners of any ship, whether British or foreign, shall not, in cases where all or any of the following events occur without their actual fault or privity, that is to say:—First, where any loss of life or personal injury is caused to any person carried in such ship; secondly, where any damage or loss is caused to any goods, merchandise, or other things whatsoever on board such ship; thirdly, where any loss of life, or personal injury is by reason of the improper navigation of such ship as aforesaid caused to any person carried in any other ship or boat; fourthly, where any loss or damage is by reason of the improper navigation of such ship as aforesaid caused to any other ship or boat, or to any goods, merchandise, or other thing whatsoever on board any other ship or boat: be answerable in damages in respect of loss of life or personal injury, either alone or together with loss or damage to ships, boats, goods, merchandise or other things, to an aggregate amount exceeding fifteen pounds for each ton of their ship's tonnage; nor in respect of loss or damage to ships, goods, &c. . . to an aggregate amount exceeding eight pounds for each ton of the ship's tonnage; such tonnage to be the registered tonnage in the case of sailing ships, and in the case of steam ships the gross tonnage, without deduction on account of engine room.

By the 24 Vict. c. 10 (The Admiralty Court Act 1861), s. 13, it is enacted that—Whenever any ship or vessel, or the proceeds thereof, are under arrest of the High Court of Admiralty, the said court shall have the same powers as are conferred upon the High Court of Chancery in England by the ninth part of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104).

who are the parties really liable, are altogether blameless—to a claim to a very large amount indeed, in respect of which, now they have at last admitted their liability, they are clearly entitled to the benefit of those statutes with regard to what is called “limited liability.” But, looking at the facts of this case and the proceedings in the Court of Admiralty, I am clearly of opinion that this writ of prohibition ought to go, on the ground that the Court of Admiralty was proceeding at the time when the motion was made, and at the time of the declaration in prohibition, without jurisdiction. At a very early period of the argument we intimated our opinion that if the Court of Admiralty be really proceeding in the suit without jurisdiction, the writ of prohibition will lie in this or in any of the Superior Courts of law, without any reference to the nature of the constitution of the court, and consequently the only question is, was there or was there not jurisdiction to entertain this suit at the time when the application for a prohibition was made, or rather at the time of the declaration in prohibition? Now, the objection to these proceedings in the Court of Admiralty is made upon two grounds; first, upon the ground that there is a want of jurisdiction by reason of the company not having admitted their liability; and, secondly, upon the ground that the condition upon which alone the jurisdiction is conferred upon the Court of Admiralty to entertain a suit of this nature did not attach, namely, that a cause had not occurred in which at the time of the suit being instituted any ship or vessel, or the proceeds thereof, were under arrest of the High Court of Admiralty. Now, it is necessary first to consider the ground which was originally principally argued at the Bar: the question of the want of any allegation, or rather the absence of any admission, of liability on the part of the company. And really upon this point the question is not whether an admission of liability is indispensably and absolutely necessary in order to entitle the plaintiffs in such a suit to a decree of limited liability; but whether that was not a matter arising or which might arise and might be disposed of in the course of the suit, and was not in itself an original sine qua non to enable the plaintiff to institute the suit at all. It was certainly argued at the Bar that no admission of liability was necessary at all in a suit of this nature, and the high authority of Dr. Lushington was quoted to establish that proposition; but I shall deal with that point, which has arisen incidentally in this case, hereafter. With regard to the question of whether in the first place it was essentially necessary that there should be an admission of liability, before we proceed to consider the question at what period of the suit it was absolutely necessary that the admission should appear and constitute a part—and an irrevocable part—of the proceedings in the suit, we must look to the statute to see what really is the jurisdiction conferred first upon the Court of Chancery, and afterwards, though upon a different condition and under somewhat different circumstances, upon the Court of Admiralty, to entertain a suit of this description. Now, it is only necessary to look at the words of the Act of Parliament, in the 51st section of the 17 and 18 Vict. c. 104, to see that it is absolutely necessary that there should be an admission of liability, not merely to authorise the Court of Chancery to entertain the suit, but to enable the Court of Chancery to take that proceeding in the suit, and ultimately to pronounce that decree, which it was the very object of the statute to enable the court to pronounce—a relief of the shipowner who had been made subject to these claims. The words of the Act are: “In case where any liability has been or is alleged to have been incurred by any owner in respect of loss of life, personal injury, or loss of or damage to ships, boats, or goods, and several claims are made or apprehended in respect of such liability, then, subject to the right hereinbefore given to the Board of Trade of recovering damages in the United Kingdom in respect of loss of life or personal injury, it shall be lawful in England or Ireland for the High Court of Chancery”—now see what follows—“to entertain proceedings at the suit of any owner for the purpose”—for what purpose? For the purpose of ascertaining whether the shipowner is liable for these claims or any of them, or not? No such power is conferred—no such proceeding or inquiry is at all referred to or mentioned in this clause; but it is only “for the purpose of determining the amount of such liability, subject as aforesaid, and for the distribution of such amount rateably amongst the several claimants,” and so forth. Here then it is quite clear that the functions of the High Court of Chancery are precise and defined. It is not to inquire into whether the shipowner is liable or not, and in case he should be found liable, or in case he should admit his liability, then to proceed to ascertain the amount and to apportion the same in court, but it is only and solely to entertain proceedings at the suit of any “owner” for the purpose of determining the amount of such liability, subject as aforesaid, and for the distribution of such amount rateably amongst the several claimants out of the fund in court. I do not therefore see how it can possibly be contended that, without such liability either altogether proved or admitted on the record, admitted in some way or other, it was irrevocably binding on the party so admitting—upon the shipowner who claims the relief to which he may be entitled under the statute. I do not see how anything more, any greater or other power, is conferred upon the court than to simply ascertain the amount, and then to apportion that amount among the different claimants. The absence of any other provision in this section raises the all-important question whether the Court of Chancery has any jurisdiction or power at all to entertain originally a suit, or incidentally to determine a suit already raised, for the purpose of determining the question of liability under Lord Campbell’s Act, or even liability for a personal injury sustained by reason of the collision? I need hardly say that if a bill in the Court of Chancery were filed by the executors of one deceased under Lord Campbell’s Act, charging that the death had been occasioned by the negligence of the shipowner in question, the company, by reason of the collision complained of, to recover damages by reason of that loss, it would be open to demurrer, and the bill would be at once dismissed. Lord Campbell’s Act gives the power to the executors of the deceased, under such circumstances, and having such a claim, to enforce that claim by an action at law, to recover damages in a mode, and by a certain course of procedure, and with certain results familiar to us all. But no such power is conferred upon the Court of Chancery, and I am at a loss to understand upon what ground it can be contended that the Court of Chancery—at all events the original court upon which this jurisdiction was first conferred by the Act of Parliament—possesses any power in such a suit to determine the question of liability; and if it has no such power, how is the question of liability to be determined? How can justice be done, or a decree be effectually made under this Act of Parliament, in relief of the owners of the ship lost? Whether there has been a collision occasioning damage, under the circumstances of this case how is it to be ascertained, except by admission of the parties in any suit in Chancery which may be preferred under this Act of Parliament? Then comes the question, is there any difference in the Court of Admiralty? Now, when we look to the 13th section of the 24 Vict. c. 10, we find that the word “jurisdiction” is not introduced, but it is included and comprehended in the word “powers?” We find that, under circumstances mentioned in the condition specified, the said court shall have the same powers as are conferred upon the High Court of Chancery by the Act of 1854. Now, if no such power is conferred by the Act of 1854 on the Court of Chancery, and no such power can pass under this later Act of Parliament to the Court of Admiralty, then it is quite true, as argued at the bar on behalf of the Company, that the Court of Admiralty possesses and inherits original and independent jurisdiction in cases of damage by reason of collisions between ships. That is true; and if that original jurisdiction comprehended a case of this nature, no doubt there would be a difference between the law as applicable to it in the Court of Admiralty and that same law as applicable to a case in the Court of Chancery. But although the Court of Admiralty possesses jurisdiction, and, indeed, although it possessed it before, it is further conferred upon it under the 7th section of this same Act of the 24th Vict., that it shall have jurisdiction over any claim for damage done by any ship. Although, therefore, the court had an original jurisdiction, and for aught I know—I say nothing upon that point—that jurisdiction may be somewhat enlarged by this 7th section of the 24th Vict., still I think it cannot be successfully contended that the Court of Admiralty ever did possess, either originally by its ancient constitution or under the provisions of this Act of Parliament, any jurisdiction to entertain an original suit claiming compensation, either under Lord Campbell’s Act or for a mere personal injury. As far as authority goes the case of Smith v. Brown (sup.) in the Queen’s Bench is decisive. It may be that having a concurrent jurisdiction, and this being a new case, the first or rather the second case only that has arisen on this point under these Acts of Parliament, we might, without any disrespect towards the Court of Queen’s Bench, entertain a different opinion and pronounce a judgment at variance with the decision in that case, and more especially so as in the course of the argument in that case, I may say of the judgment or the opinions delivered by the learned judges, differences appear to have been entertained, and, indeed, have been recognised and held in that case between the Court of Queen’s Bench, and not merely the Court of Admiralty but the Privy Council. I, however, speaking independently and without reference to authority, either to the authorities referred to in the Court of Admiralty or afterwards upon appeal before the Privy Council, am myself clearly of opinion that there is nothing in either of these two Acts of Parliament which confers any jurisdiction whatsoever upon the Court of Chancery or upon the Court of Admiralty to entertain an original suit at the instance of one claiming damage under Lord Campbell’s Act, or claiming damages merely for a personal injury. The case in the Queen’s Bench, as far as it went, is an authority to this effect. But without such authority, and independently of any such authority, I see nothing whatever to enable the Court of Chancery or the Court of Admiralty to entertain such a suit, and the language to which I have adverted of the 51st section, which relates to the Court of Chancery, is quite at variance with it; for the only power conferred on the Court of Chancery by that section is, as I have already observed, a power to ascertain the amount of the damages and afterwards to apportion among the claimants the fund that may be paid into court. I think, therefore, that it is an objection to these proceedings that there was no admission of liability; indeed there has been no sufficient admission of liability in the suit at all until a late period in the suit, at which period indeed that which had been a conditional admission became an absolute and irrevocable admission, which, perhaps, may be deemed sufficient. But then comes the question, although there must be an admission of liability by the shipowners who claim the relief under these Acts of Parliament before any decree in their favour can be pronounced, is it absolutely necessary that in the original proceeding by which the suit is first commenced and put or brought into the court in question, that then and there the unconditional admission of liability should appear? I am not prepared to say that it is so. There are no words in either Act of Parliament expressly requiring that before either court shall entertain a suit of this nature the liability shall be admitted. It results only from the limited powers conferred upon these two courts in succession, and from the language of the Act of Parliament, by which their functions and their jurisdictions seems to be confined to the mere ascertaining of the amount, and then the appropriation of the different portions of the fund; and I am not prepared to say that it would not be competent to the Court of Admiralty—I say nothing at present of the Court of Chancery—to make a rule or order, as no particular mode of procedure is pointed out by the Act, giving the Admiralty Court jurisdiction to make any rule in relation to procedure, to the effect that upon the instituting of a suit of this nature the plaintiff might petition in general terms for relief under the Act, and that there should be an admission of liability made within a certain number of days, or made in such form and at such period, but always before a decree could be pronounced and the relief given; that at some period or other in the suit convenient with reference to the course of proceedings in the Court of Admiralty, there should be an admission of liability. If that be so the effect is this—there must be an admission of liability, and an unconditional and irrevocable admission to enable the court to pronounce judgment, that is, to pronounce a decree in favour of the claim to limited liability. It does not follow, and I do not see, that there is anything in the statute absolutely to require that that admission should be made at, and as part of, the institution of this suit itself. It is very true that in the case in Kay and Johnson (Hill v. Andrus 1 K. & J. 263), in the decision of which I entirely concur, the bill was dismissed and the plaintiffs held to be not entitled to the relief claimed, by reason of the bill itself, by which the suit was commenced, containing no allegation of an admission of liability; but when we look to that bill, we find it was a bill in which not only was the liability not admitted but it was denied, and it was clear that upon the bill the relief which the statute afforded, or might afford, under a decree, was duly claimed, and in proper and sufficient terms. That bill was not determined on demurrer. If there had been a demurrer to that bill and the suit had been dismissed by reason of there being no statement in the bill of an admission of liability it might have had a different effect, because it might then have been contended that the bill was dismissed for want of jurisdiction; but the bill was entertained, and it appears to me that the effect of that decision is not that the court has no jurisdiction unless the bill shall show that in instituting the suit there is an admission of liability; but it was necessary, before any decree could be pronounced, that there should be an admission of liability. We find that an injunction in that case was applied for. Not only was there no admission of liability, but there was a denial of liability; and under these circumstances the learned Vice-Chancellor held, and most correctly held, that the claim could not be maintained, and whether it was followed by a mere refusal of the injunction or by a dismissal of the bill is not material. It was a decision of a matter of law upon a question of law, arising in the course of the suit, and then it did not in terms, nor necessarily in effect, imply a decision upon the want or absence of jurisdiction. Then we come to the Court of Admiralty, and to consider whether there was a want of jurisdiction. I have already observed that it appears to me to be within the power of the court, in regulating its own procedure, to determine at what period of the suit, so that it is not prejudicial to other parties in the suit, and in what form an admission of liability shall be made. Therefore, under the circumstances, I must say it appears to me—I am far from saying that it is not open to a great deal of doubt—that it would be going too far were this court to pronounce judgment in favour of the plaintiff in prohibition, on the ground that there was no jurisdiction in that court to entertain the suit, because there was not in the original Act or the petition, and indeed not till a later period of the suit, an admission of liability. It has been indeed said, under the authority of a decision of Dr. Lushington (The Amalia, 1 Moore P.C.C. N.S. 471; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O.S. 359), that no admission of liability is necessary at all. I cannot think that that is, or could be, the effect of that decision, or that that very learned and distinguished judge could have come to any such conclusion—I mean treating it as a general proposition applicable to all descriptions of cases of this nature that might arise in the Court of Admiralty. Looking at the circumstances of the case which were before him, in which the only question of damage, and the only claim to damage, arose in a suit between ship-owners, or the owners of cargo or parts of cargo and the shipowners, it might have been true that as the court had jurisdiction to determine the question of liability in those suits, that is, in the suits then before the learned judge, and as the question of liability had already been determined, or might, or might not have been determined before a decree could be pronounced in the suit for limited liability, the observation may have been made, "it is unnecessary there should be an admission of liability, because that question will be determined, and there must be a decision to the same effect, that is, a decision that the ship-owners are liable, before the decree can be pronounced." That would reconcile the dictum or the decision of Dr. Lushington with the law as we are now disposed to hold it as applicable to cases of this nature. I must, however, add that if it really be the effect of that or any other decision in the Court of Admiralty that there must not be an absolute, unconditional, and irrevocable admission of liability before a decree of this kind can be pronounced, in such a suit, I am clearly of opinion that the decision is wrong, and ought not to guide any court of law or equity, or admiralty, or any other court, in any case that may arise under these Acts of Parliament. It is perfectly clear that the whole power conferred upon the Court of Chancery, and therefore the sole power conferred by the Act of Parliament upon the Court of Admiralty, is limited to the ascertaining of the amount, and the appropriation and distribution of the fund in court among the different claimants. I think, therefore, that it was absolutely necessary that there should be an admission of liability before any decree in this case could have been pronounced in relief of the company; but it does not appear to me to follow, and I am not disposed to hold, that there was want of jurisdiction to entertain the suit by reason of that admission not having been made until a comparatively late period of the suit, so that it was made; however, it was made before any decree was pronounced. I do not speak with confidence upon this subject. I am not at all prepared to hold that as in the course of these proceedings it was necessary to entertain the question of liability, though indirectly and incidentally only, the court did not exceed its jurisdiction in proceeding to ascertain that question, and that the prohibition might not have been moved for and ought to have issued at an earlier period of this suit; because, when we look at the facts of this case, we find that there had been a cause of damage, first between the owners of the Mary and the company, the owners of the Normandy, and then again an error suit by the owners of the Normandy against the owners of the Mary, and in those suits the question of liability arose. As in fact those were the only suits in which any question of liability could or did arise at the time, and the court, after the institution of this suit, the suit in question, proceeded with the investigation of those two causes, and in truth to a decision of those two causes, which involved the question of an admission of liability in the cause in question or of a limitation of liability, I am by no means prepared to hold that it was not competent to the plaintiff in this case, to sue for a prohibition in order to restrain the Court of Admiralty from proceeding to entertain, even indirectly, the question of liability in the suit or suits before that court. But, as I have observed, as this seems to me to involve rather a question of procedure as to the period of the suit at which it is necessary this admission should be made, and does not necessarily involve the question whether it [must be made before the suit is instituted, I would forbear to hold upon the present occasion that the prohibition ought to go in this case, on the ground merely that at the time when the suit was instituted, or in the petition by means of which it was instituted, the plaintiff and now the company have failed to admit their liability. I think it may be deemed a mere question of procedure, and therefore, on this ground, the plaintiff has not entitled himself to the judgment of the court. I now come to the more material question, whether the court had jurisdiction to entertain this suit of limited liability under the 13th section of the Act of Parliament (24 Vict. c. 10), or whether this 13th section does not confer this jurisdiction upon a condition which had not been performed, and which did not therefore attach at the moment when this suit was instituted. That depends upon the words introducing the 13th section. First, it is to be observed that they are totally and essentially different from the words in which the 514th section confers this power or jurisdiction upon the Court of Chancery, and in the earlier Act the words are, "In cases where any liability has been or is alleged to be incurred by any owner in respect of loss of life or personal injury, or loss of, or damage to ships, boats, or goods," and so on, it shall be lawful to the court to entertain a suit of this nature. It is, therefore, necessary only to give the Court of Chancery jurisdiction to entertain a suit of limited liability that there should be a claim or claims, and that there should be either a liability or the mere allegation of a liability to the damage which may be claimed. Therefore in the Court of Chancery if, after a collision of this nature, the loss of a ship, injury to the cargo, the death of persons, giving claims to executors under Lord Campbell's Act, or personal injuries, or any other such species of claim of damage, it is quite enough that such claims should exist and be made upon the company, upon the shipowners, to entitle the shipowners at once to go in the Court of Chancery, file their bill, and claim the relief afforded by the Act of Parliament. The mere existence of the claims, even without suit, is enough. If several come together and make their claim against a shipowner for damage arising from a collision, it is at once competent to a shipowner to go to the Court of Chancery to file his bill for limited liability, in other words admitting his liability to the claims, and call upon the Court of Chancery to ascertain the amount, and then to apportion the value of the ship or the value of the ship in reference to her registered tonnage, which of course must be paid into court, and then he is entitled to the relief which he claims. The only condition as I have observed, in the earlier Act of Parliament upon which the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery arises, is that claims should exist and be made upon the shipowner. But when we come to the case of the Court of Admiralty, there is a condition of a totally different nature, and a condition made in very plain and express terms, without which, and independently of which, no power whatever is conferred, no jurisdiction whatever arises in the Court of Admiralty. The condition here is, not if any claim shall be made or exist, but "whenever any ship or vessel, or the proceeds thereof, are under arrest of the High Court of Admiralty," the Court shall then have the same powers as the Court of Chancery. If there be any force or meaning in words, there must therefore be a case in which a ship or vessel, or the proceeds thereof, are under arrest in the High Court of Admiralty, or some such state of things clearly amounting to an equivalent, shall exist to enable the court to assume to itself and to exercise any such jurisdiction. Well, did it exist in this case? It clearly did not. What were the circumstances of this case? At the time, I mean, that this suit of limited liability was instituted in the Court of Admiralty, a cause of damage had arisen by the owners of the Mary against the Normandy. A cross suit was instituted by the owners of the Normandy against the owners of the Mary; and what has taken place in those suits to bring the case, or even to seem to bring the case, or tend to bring the case, within the provision of the 24th Vict. c. 10? Not the arrest of the ship or the proceeds of the ship, or anything equivalent, but merely the payment into court on the part of the owners of the Normandy, the company in question, of the sum which, it now appears beyond all doubt, is less than the amount for which the company are liable with reference to the registered tonnage and the value of the ship; and therefore wholly insufficient to meet the claims that might be made, indeed to meet any claims that might be made, under this Act of Parliament. Such was the state of things at the time this suit was instituted. But then, did a state of things exist which was an equivalent? Undoubtedly we have the high authority of a very learned and accomplished judge, and one having a long and great experience in causes of this nature—Sir Robert Phillimore — that an equivalent is sufficient. But in the case that was before him—I think it was the Northumbria (3 Mar. Law. Cas. O. S. 316)—the state of things which existed was this: it was not the case of the arrest of the ship or the proceeds thereof, but merely of a sum of money, the full value of the ship being in court and under the control of the court. It was more than an equivalent, and therefore, under those circumstances, the Act of Parliament applied. Again, I say here, I entertained considerable doubt whether an equivalent could be sufficient, whether there must not be in the very language of the Act of Parliament some "ship or vessel or the proceeds thereof under arrest." I cannot but say I entertained a doubt whether any equivalent can be substituted for these very plain and intelligible words which the Legislature used, and which they have made the condition of the assuming by this court of the jurisdiction in question. But when I find that the learned judge of the Admiralty Court has held that an equivalent is sufficient, that is, if not indeed the whole proceeds of the ship, but the whole value of the ship in the case where the ship has sunk in the sea, is an equivalent, and brings the case within the Act of Parliament, I am not at all disposed to overrule that decision, and to hold in this court, unfamiliar as we are with the process and procedure, and a great deal relating to and involving the practice of the Court of Admiralty, that that decision is wrong. I think, therefore, at once adopting the opinion of Sir Robert Phillimore, as far as it goes, that there may be an equivalent for the ship or the proceeds of it being under arrest, and all we have to consider is whether any such equivalent existed in this case. Here I must say, and with great regret, I am clearly of opinion that no such equivalent did exist. What is supposed to be the equivalent? 5000*l.* has been paid into court; that is manifestly insufficient. The court could not exercise its functions or perform its duty supposing claims were made, as probably they will be, to the amount of 6000*l.* or 7000*l.* or more. The court could not perform its duty under the Act of Parliament and appropriate the requisite sum to each and every of the claimants, because 5000*l.* is not equal to 6376*l.*, which is the sum that ought to have been in court. If, under any circumstances, consistently with the proceedings of the court and the Act of Parliament, a sum of 6376*l.*, the full value of this ship in relation, I mean, to its registered tonnage, had been in court, and under the control of the court, I should have been quite prepared to hold that it was an equivalent, that the foundation of the jurisdiction then existed, and that this suit might have been properly and lawfully instituted. But inasmuch as at the time it was instituted not only was there no such sum as 6376*l.* in court, but no sum at all adequate to the exigencies of the case—and I do not see how it appears with any certainty that any such sum would have been paid into court—I think the foundation of the right to proceed, the foundation of the jurisdiction of the court, is altogether wanting; that this condition, which is made in clear and express terms, in this the only section of the Act of Parliament that confers any such jurisdiction upon the Court of Admiralty, was wanting; and that, consequently there was no jurisdiction in the Court of Admiralty to entertain this suit, and therefore that this writ of prohibition or the judgment in favour of the plaintiff in prohibition must go. I can only say again that if it were possible, consistent with the terms of the Act of Parliament by which we are all bound, whatever we may think of the provisions which we must submit to and act upon, I could come to any other conclusion and pronounce any other judgment I would do so; and most readily, because nothing can be clearer than that, under the circumstances of this case, the shareholders of this company are entitled to the benefit of this Act of Parliament. Unfortunately they have proceeded in the Court of Admiralty in such a way, that is, first of all, without their admission of liability, as to raise a series of important and difficult questions; in other words, a series of obstacles to that to which they were entitled; and they have also instituted their suit without regard at all to the language of the Act of Parliament, which alone entitled them to bring any such suit before the court, or the court to entertain any such suit. Under these circumstances I must hold that this court has proceeded without jurisdiction, and that consequently there must be judgment for the plaintiff.

MARTIN, B.—I am of the same opinion. The last point made by Sir John Karslake was that upon the present constitution of the Court of Admiralty, under the Admiralty Act 1861, this writ of prohibition did not lie at all, and that the effect of that Act of Parliament was to place the now existing Court of Admiralty on the footing in all respects of one of the Superior Courts. As I have always understood, there are four Superior Courts in this country, the Court of Chancery, the Court of Queen's Bench, the Court of Common Pleas, and the Court of Exchequer; and I apprehend none of those courts is competent to direct a writ of prohibition to one of the others, and that the law of this country vests in those Superior Courts the power of determining whether they have jurisdiction or not, subject of course to a writ of error, or any other legal mode of questioning a decision they may come to. But with respect to all other courts of this country, I apprehend they are all inferior to the four Superior Courts I have mentioned; and as regards the Court of Admiralty, prohibitions have issued for centuries in respect of proceedings in the Court of Admiralty from all the other Superior Courts. From the form in which the Admiralty Act of 1861 is framed I am satisfied that it does not and did not intend to take away that writ of prohibition; for it will be found when I come to call attention to the effect of the Act, that if it had been the intention to take away the writ of prohibition, there would have been an express clause to that effect. That is my belief upon the construction of this Act; but as far as we are concerned there is no necessity to give any judgment upon it, because it is concluded. The Court of Queen's Bench have given judgment in the case of Smith v. Brown (sup.), in which they claimed to exercise this right of issuing this writ of prohibition, and they did issue it. By that judgment we are bound, and if there be error in that it must be decided in a court of error. With respect to this particular case the facts are these; Upon some day in 1870 the plaintiff went to the Waterloo Station and took a ticket from London to Guernsey. That was for a journey partly by land and partly by water; and he proceeded and got safe to Southampton, where he got on board a vessel called the Normandy, belonging to the defendants, for the purpose of being conveyed to Guernsey. In the course of that voyage the Normandy came into collision with a vessel called the Mary, the consequence of which was that the Normandy was sunk. Considerable injury was done, both to persons and property, and amongst other things the plaintiff's luggage was lost. Now I, for myself, must say that I should be perfectly open to hear an argument whether or not this case is within the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty at all. A man enters into a contract in London. His contract is to be performed partly on land and partly on water, and it is said that because the breach of that contract occurred on the sea, therefore the man loses the protection of the common law of this country, and is confined to the protection given by a court of law utterly different from the common law of England, giving different damages, giving a different mode of redress, on altogether a different principle. And if this be correct, the consequence may be, that if a man took his ticket from Euston-square to go to Dublin, so far as Holyhead he would be under the protection of the common law of his country, but when he got from the port of Holyhead he would be under a different law altogether—the law as administered by the Court of Admiralty. That has not been argued at all. All I can say is, that I will keep my mind open for it; and I am by no means prepared to say that upon a contract made in this fashion, when a passenger goes into a packet to go to Guernsey, or Dublin, or Belfast, or any other place, he loses the protection of the common law, and is cast upon the code of law administered in the Court of Admiralty. Sufficient for that day is the evil thereof. When the point arises it will be discussed, and I can give no opinion upon what has not been discussed. These goods being lost upon the 21st May 1870, the plaintiff brought a common law action against the defendants in this court as common carriers. That action was clearly maintainable. There was clear jurisdiction in this court for the action to be sustained, and it was the proper, and, up to the year 1734, the only mode by which a man, under such circumstances, could get redress; up to the year 1734, there was no other mode of bringing an action. He gives notice of proceeding to trial, but, in the meantime, and after this action was commenced, two suits were instituted in the Court of Admiralty, and I apprehend those suits were properly instituted there so far as the parties to them were concerned. The parties to the cross action were the Normandy upon one side, and the Mary on the other; they therefore brought cross actions against each other, alleging negligence the one against the other by reason of which this collision occurred on the sea; and I am not aware that there is any reason why the Court of Admiralty had not jurisdiction in those cases by reason of its ordinary jurisdiction, without anything more. But in the proceedings of the Court of Admiralty it is stated that the Normandy proceeded against the owners of the Mary, and against the owners of the cargo of the Mary, and against all and every other person or persons interested in the said Mary, or having any right, claim, or interest whatever in reference to, or arising out of the relation aforesaid, and afterwards presented and filed a petition. Therefore, in the proceeding it is one against all the persons interested in this collision; but they did not take the step of giving any notice of this to any of those persons whose property and persons were injured at all. They are not cited to appear, and the case goes on as between the two parties, suing as in an ordinary suit. The result of that was that the Mary denied all negligence in the matter brought against her, and the Normandy denied all negligence in the matter brought against her. They both insisted that they were innocent, and that no cause of action in the Admiralty Court existed against either of them. That cause went on, and was determined and the court, upon some day in July, gave judgment that the Normandy was alone to blame. Thereupon comes this which is supposed to give jurisdiction to the Admiralty Court against the plaintiff: in the proceeding the Normandy people state that in the event of its being decided that the Normandy was solely to blame, or in the event of its being decided that the Mary and the Normandy were jointly to blame, they then claimed to institute this suit in respect of limited liability. But they made it conditional upon the decision in the case. They did not give any notice to the plaintiff in this action, or to the other persons whose goods have been injured by reason of this collision, but went on discussing the case between themselves and the owners of the Mary without the slightest reference to anyone else. But after judgment—this is what I consider is the real point in this case—before the final decision, but pending it, that is, when there was this merely conditionally admitted liability, upon 4th June an order was made by the Court of Admiralty, which order was to this effect: Amongst other things they ordered that all actions and suits pending in any other court in relation to the subject matter of this suit, to wit, the liability of the owners of the vessel Normandy, in respect of loss of life, or personal injury, or loss of, or damage to ships, goods, or merchandise, or other things on the occasion of a collision which occurred on or about 17th March 1870, between the said vessel Normandy and a vessel called the Mary, be stopped. And the real question in this case is, whether the Court of Admiralty had jurisdiction without notice to the plaintiff in this suit without giving him an opportunity to be heard, without taking any step whatever, to interfere in this way, and order this action to be stopped; and I am very clearly of opinion that there was no such jurisdiction. The question depends upon the construction of two Acts of Parliament. The first of these Acts of Parliament is the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, part ix. I have already said that till the year 1734 the liability of carriers by water was to the full extent of the loss. In Abbott on Shipping, 11th edit. p. 348, head "Limitation of Responsibility," it will be found that up to the year 1734 the liability of a carrier by water was the same as the liability of a carrier by land; and they were responsible for the whole amount of loss in the ordinary way. But upon a petition to the House of Commons by several merchants in London, setting forth the alarm of the petitioners at the event of an action in which it was determined that the owners were answerable for merchandise embezzled by the master, an Act was passed limiting the responsibility, by enacting that they should not be answerable beyond the value of the ship, and of the freight then being earned. That Act of Parliament was continued by three other Acts of Parliament, but ultimately they were all repealed, and the existing Act of Parliament upon the subject is the ninth part of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, which is the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, and the only authority now existing to restrict the liability of a shipowner—a carrier by water—under that which must be borne by a carrier by land, is this Act of Parliament, which proceeds to enact by sect. 503, "No owner of any sea-going ship or share therein shall be liable to make good any loss or damage that may happen without his actual fault or privity," which I take to mean where he himself is not guilty of any negligence, or a party to any carelessness "of or to any of the following things, that is to say, of or to any goods, merchandise, or other things whatsoever taken in or put on board any such ship, by reason of any fire happening on board such ship, of or to any gold, silver, diamond, watches, jewels, or precious stones, taken in or put on board any such ship by reason of any robbery, embezzlement, making away with or secreting thereof unless the owner or shipper thereof has, at the time of shipping the same inserted in his bills of lading, or otherwise declared in writing to the master or owner of such ship the true nature and value of such articles, to any extent whatever." Then the 504th section (a) is, "No owner of any sea-going ship or share therein shall, in cases where all or any of the following events occur without his actual fault or privity, that is to say, (1.) Where any loss of life or personal injury is caused to any person being carried in such ship. (2.) Where any damage or loss is caused to any goods, merchandise, or other things whatsoever on board any such ship. (3.) Where any loss of life or personal injury is by reason of the improper navigation of such sea-going ship as aforesaid caused to any person carried in any other ship or boat. (4.) Where any loss or damage is by reason of any such improper navigation of such sea-going ship as aforesaid, caused to any other ship or boat, or to any goods, merchandise or other things whatsoever, on board any other ship or boat, be answerable in damages to an extent beyond the value of his ship and the freight due, or to grow due in respect of such ship, during the voyage which at the time of the happening of any such events as aforesaid, is in prosecution or contracted for, subject to the following proviso, that is to say, that in no case where any such liability as aforesaid is incurred in respect of loss of life, or personal injury to any passenger, shall the value of any such ship and the freight thereof be taken to be less than 15*l.* per registered ton." So that the substance of this enactment is, that in respect of various matters stated, there shall be a limitation of responsibility to the value of the ship and the then earning freight, and with this proviso, if there be loss of life or injury to the person, the value of the ship shall be taken to be at all events at 15*l.* per ton. That will be found, I think, to be fatal to these proceedings, when we come to look into it, for in point of fact the shipowner is responsible for the value of the freight. The ship may be of greater value than 15*l.* per ton, but instead of the ship being paid in to satisfy the Act of Parliament, it has been said without any proof or finding upon it to be sufficient to pay in 15*l.* per ton. That I think is fatal to these proceedings. The Act of Parliament then proceeds to show the mode of getting the remedy. The 513th section relates to proceedings by the Board of Trade. Then the 514th section enacts: "In cases where any liability has been, or is alleged to have been, incurred by any owner in respect of loss of life, personal injury, or loss of, or damage to ships, boats, or goods, and several claims are made or apprehended in respect of such liability, then subject to the right hereinafter given to the Board of Trade of recovering damages in the United Kingdom, in respect of loss of life or personal injury, it shall be lawful in England or Ireland for the High Court of Chancery, and in Scotland for the Court of Session, and in any British possessions for any competent court to entertain proceedings at the suit of any owner for the purpose of determining the amount of such liability, subject as aforesaid and for the distribution of such amount rateably amongst the several claimants, with power for any such court to stop all actions and suits pending in any other court, in relation to the same subject matter; and any proceeding entertained by such Court of Chancery or court of session, or other competent court, may be conducted in such manner and subject to such regulations as to making any persons interested parties to the same, and as to the exclusion of any claimants who do not come in within a certain time, and as to requiring security from the owner, and as to payment of costs, as the court thinks just." That is the jurisdiction which is given to the Court of Chancery by this Act of Parliament; and it has no other jurisdiction. It has, as I understood, exercised this species of jurisdiction frequently, and, as I collect from the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor in the case which has been referred to in Kay and Johnsons (Hill v. Andus, 1 K. & J. 263), the Court of Chancery has, in carrying out this Act of Parliament, insisted that the party who sought to obtain this limited responsibility should admit as a foundation of the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery that to some extent he was liable. I collect from the Vice-Chancellor's judgment that that has been the construction, and he expressly puts the construction upon the section of the Act of Parliament. That judgment has never been appealed against, and it seems to me that as it stands it is binding upon every other court. If this case had been in the court of Chancery, the Court of Chancery might have dealt with it as it thought fit. The Court of Chancery is one of the Superior Courts. It has a right to conduct the proceedings in any way it thinks fit, and no prohibition would lie against it; it is master of its proceedings in the same way as we are masters of our own proceedings in this court; and no prohibition would lie against it from this court. What it did could not be challenged. I do not say that the Court of Chancery would do anything but what was just and right; but I mean to say that as far as the Court of Chancery is concerned it is a court against which no prohibition would lie, and it had absolute control over this matter, subject to an appeal to the House of Lords. But now comes the Act of Parliament under which the Court of Admiralty has jurisdiction at all at common law. But for that Act the Court of Admiralty would have no jurisdiction whatever over this matter; everything they did would be a pure nullity, and this court, or any other court, would have been bound, in the event of an attempt to exercise jurisdiction in a matter over which they had no jurisdiction, to issue a prohibition. The sole power they have got is under the Act of the 24th Vict. c. 10. This is an Act to extend the jurisdiction and improve the practice of the High Court of Admiralty. It first states when it shall come into operation. Then the 4th section enacts: "The High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim for the building, equipping, or repairing, of any ship, if at the time of the institution of the cause the ship or the proceeds thereof, are under the arrest of the court." Then there is jurisdiction as to claims for necessaries (sect. 5); then as to claims for damage to cargo imported (sect. 6); then over claims for damage done by any ship (sect. 7.) I do not know that this would come under that Act at all. My own impression is that it would, and the Court of Queen's Bench in the case cited, put the true meaning upon damage. Then they are to have jurisdiction over questions as to ownerships, &c., of ships (sect. 8). The 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, as to claims for salvage of life is extended to that court (sect. 9). They are to have jurisdiction over that; they are to have jurisdiction over any claims made by seamen as to wages earned by them (sect. 10), and over any claim with respect to mortgages within the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, whether the ship or the proceeds thereof be under arrest or not (sect. 11). So where they are giving jurisdiction in respect of this mortgage dispute they expressly state that the Merchant Shipping Act shall be extended to them, and they shall have that jurisdiction whether the ship or the proceeds thereof be under arrest or not. Then clause 12 is: "The High Court of Admiralty shall have the same powers over any British ship or any share therein, as are conferred on the High Court of Chancery in England by the 62nd, 63rd, 64th, and 65th sections of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854." Then comes the 13th section: "Whenever any ship or vessel, or the proceeds thereof, are under arrest of the High Court of Admiralty, the said court shall have the same powers as are conferred upon the High Court of Chancery in England by the ninth part of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854." Under the 11th section they have jurisdiction whether the ship or proceeds be under arrest or not, and by the 13th section it is stated specifically, when the ship or the proceeds thereof are under arrest, then and not until then have they the power conferred on the Court of Chancery. It seems to me to show the meaning of the Legislature as clearly as words can do it; that the Legislature did not intend to confer this jurisdiction upon the Court of Admiralty except the ship or vessel or the proceeds thereof were under arrest. Therefore it seems to me that is a condition precedent to their jurisdiction in the matter at all. With regard to that matter the learned judge of the Court of Admiralty seems to have decided that, in his court, after this action had been discussed to the extent that the Mary was entitled to recover against the Normandy in regard to this misfortune, and they had come and stated that although the Normandy is at the bottom of the sea, and although there were no proceeds of the Normandy because she was never sold, and therefore could not be under arrest, they had jurisdiction in the event of the owners of the Normandy paying into court the sum of money which would represent the ship if she had been in existence. Whether that is so or not I do not know, but certainly the value of the ship has not been paid into court, but what has been paid into court is that conventional value in respect of loss of life which is represented by 15*l.*, or a certain number of tons regulated by the Act of Parliament, and I find no averment anywhere that that is the real value of the ship. Therefore it seems to me there never has arisen that which can be taken as a substitute for the value of the ship at the bottom of the sea; that has not been done which the Act of Parliament requires to be done, that is, that the parties who seek for this protection should have the ship actually in the possession of the Court of Admiralty for the purpose of satisfying the claim. Therefore it seems to me there was no jurisdiction to entertain this action at all according to the plain and obvious meaning of the Acts of Parliament. Supposing the Court of Admiralty had jurisdiction, it ought to have been exercised by a suit brought for the purpose, having nothing to do with the liability of the Mary. There ought to have been a simple suit in which liability was admitted to the extent the Vice-Chancellor decided in the case cited. Then the suit should have been brought simply for the purpose of having this matter decided. It is not competent of them to bring such an action as they have thought fit to bring, to introduce by a sidewind this proceeding, making it conditional on liability being found in the Normandy. For these reasons I am of opinion that this prohibition should go, and I must further say I think the prohibition should go on a higher ground altogether. I do not understand how it is possible that the Court of Admiralty can have jurisdiction when a man is known to have a cause of action, when a man is known to be prosecuting that cause of action in one of the Superior Courts according to the law of this country, without notice to him to issue a prohibition against proceedings in that court, without giving him an opportunity of appearing and stating his reasons. I do not mean to go at any length into this matter, but I refer to Mr. Broom's Maxims, where all the cases seem to be collected, and I find that it is not by reason of an Act of Parliament, or by the omission of any mention in an Act of Parliament, but that by the English law of jurisprudence, by the mode in which it carries into effect its rules of law, it is an essential principle of justice that if the man be known against whom the court is about to proceed to make an order, he shall have notice of that proceeding, and an opportunity given to him to come and show that it cannot be maintained. A maxim is cited, which is true enough. It seems to me it is taken from Seneca, and therefore it is a very old one. The meaning of it is that when a judgment has been given without the other side being heard, although the judgment be quite right, it is not a lawful or right judgment, for the want of those persons upon whom that judgment imposes some burden having an opportunity of coming in and stating their reasons why it should not be. Therefore, it seems to me there was a defect in this proceeding in the plaintiff not having had an opportunity given to him of going into the Court of Admiralty and stating his reasons, if he had any, why he should not be prohibited from prosecuting an action in one of the Superior Courts of common law, which seems to me to be the right of all people in this country, whether native or foreign, and that it cannot be stopped without giving some reason for it, to which he would have a right to answer. In my judgment this proceeding is without jurisdiction. I think the suit is wrong, and I think further, and what I particularly direct my attention to is, that there was no jurisdiction whatever to issue that order of the 4th June to stop the proceedings in this suit, that that proceeding was a nullity, and that we are bound for the purpose of protecting the plaintiff from any consequences thereof to grant the prohibition. I therefore to a certain extent concur with my Lord in what he has said, but as I have already observed, I am not prepared to say that this matter is a matter within the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty. When a contract is made in London for the carriage of goods in the ordinary way, it does not seem to me that because a breach of that contract happens upon sea, the carriage being to a place beyond the sea, therefore the case is taken away from the common law, and transferred to the Court of Admiralty; and I am satisfied in my own mind, that the persons connected with this branch of business are aware of it; because up to a short period, within a year, the ordinary ticket that you got for going to Dublin or Belfast or anywhere was one ticket. It was from Euston-square to Dublin or Belfast, as the case may be. They saw the difficulty that might arise from that, and instead of one there are two—one is for conveying you from London to Holyhead, and the other is for conveying you from Holyhead across to Dublin or Belfast. I have not the slightest doubt that this difficulty has occurred to the people who have advised these companies, and they have shifted the matter in this way for the very purpose of getting out of the difficulty this company are now in. Whether they will be successful or not I do not know; but we have had no argument upon the question of a man who is under the protection of the common law of England, till he gets to Holyhead, and when he gets a quarter of a mile beyond Holyhead on the sea, should be under the admiralty law, which is taken from the civil law, and supposed to be more in accordance with the law of foreign lands. We have not had an argument upon that, therefore I have not to pronounce an opinion upon it.

[Ex.]

CLEASBY, B.—I shall add very little in this case to what has been said, but as it is a case in which we are exercising a somewhat unusual jurisdiction, and I may not perhaps agree altogether with all the reasons that have been given, I feel bound to state, very briefly, those which bring me to the same conclusion as the rest of the court have arrived at. This is an application for a prohibition. The prohibition is a writ directed to the court commanding them (I am now reading the words of Blackstone) to cease from the prosecution of a suit upon a suggestion that either the cause originally, or some collateral matter arising therein, does not belong to that jurisdiction, but to the cognisance of some other court. It is quite obvious from the statement of what its object is, that it is a matter of great importance to the subject, and it is not a matter that rests in our discretion. If it was a matter that rested in our discretion, then, considering all that has taken place in this case, subject still to the question that has been adverted to by my brother Martin, I should decline to accede to the motion made. But this is a case in which I am bound, I am sorry to say, to express my opinion. You will find it laid down, no doubt correctly, in Com. Dig. ("Prohibition" Letter C.), "Prohibition ought to be granted ex debito justitiæ." Then he quotes numbers of authorities "by all the judges." (2 Instit. 607). If it ought to go according to law it must go, and we must agree to its going. The prohibition which is asked is a prohibition to the Court of Admiralty, and the same passage in Blackstone, vol. 3, p. 112, says, "It may be directed to the Courts Christian, the University Courts, the Court of Chivalry, or the Court of Admiralty, where they concern themselves with any matter not within their jurisdiction, as if the first"—that is the former courts—"should attempt to try the validity of a custom pleaded, or the latter a contract made or to be executed within this Kingdom." So that it stands as matter beyond dispute that the Court of Admiralty is one to which this writ of prohibition in the ordinary course goes. You will find a great deal about it in Com. Dig. ("Admiralty" Letter F. 1.) The Court of Admiralty has no jurisdiction in any cause which arises upon land or within any county, (4 Inst. 134); and by the statute Ric. 2, c. 5, it was enacted that the Admiralty meddle not with things done in the realm but only on the sea; and it goes on to say that the person doing so comes within the danger of premunire. Afterwards at F. 2, "So upon motion after a suggestion that the suit in the Admiralty is for a matter out of their jurisdiction, and after oyer of the libel and day given to the party, a prohibition goes." (4 Inst. 135-6.) As if the libel there be upon a contract, plea, or complaint made by water or by land, within any county of the Kingdom. Well, now, the Court of Admiralty then had a limited jurisdiction. Nothing that has taken place since has prevented it from being a court having a limited jurisdiction. For the purpose of providing judges for the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council by an interpretation clause, you may class it with the Superior Courts, or you might even call it a Superior Court; but still you do not prevent it from being a Superior Court having a limited jurisdiction. The jurisdiction has been enormously enlarged by the Act of Parliament referred to. But that does not show it to be a court with anything but a limited jurisdiction. On the contrary, all those specific enlargements assume it to be still a court with limited jurisdiction, and provided a suit were to be brought in reference to a contract made upon land for the purpose of extending the jurisdiction, and we know that jurisdictions have been from time to time extended in courts, could it be said that this court or other courts could not properly interfere, by prohibition, to prevent that jurisdiction from being so exercised? It could not be done properly by appeal. An appeal corrects either the interlocutory or final judgment of the court., but the hardship upon the subject is to be compelled to go on to judgment in a case in which there is no jurisdiction. Therefore, he has a right to come, if there be no jurisdiction, and apply to prevent the case proceeding. I have thought it worth while to give these reasons, because I do not accede entirely to what was said by my brother Martin about our being bound by Smith v. Brown (sup.). Upon this matter, if we are called upon to exercise a particular jurisdiction, we ought to be satisfied that we have the right to exercise it. At the same time that authority goes a great way to satisfy me that we have the jurisdiction, and I am very glad to find that the Court of Queen's Bench have had no hesitation in considering themselves justified, and we are justified to the same extent, in issuing the prohibition to the Court of Admiralty. Having disposed of those two matters satisfactorily, certainly to my own mind, we have now to consider, were they or were they not exceeding their jurisdiction? They have a limited jurisdiction. It is a case for a prohibition. We are bound to issue the prohibition if they did exceed their jurisdiction. Was it within their jurisdiction or was it not? I will go through the facts again, but very shortly. This action was brought in consequence of a collision at sea. A man having entered into a contract with the company to be carried from London to Guernsey, or wherever it may be, two vessels came into collision, and the passenger sustained loss. Two suits are instituted—two causes of damage in the Admiralty Court. Then what is called the limited liability suit is also commenced by the defendants in the ordinary form, and an order is thereupon made, to which my brother Martin has particularly referred, on the 14th June, followed up by a decree on the 14th July, or something of that sort, directing that all actions, proceedings in respect of loss of life, or anything else, in the most general terms, shall at once and forthwith be stopped. Well, first, we have to consider, had they jurisdiction to make this order, and is a prohibition a proper course if they have made the order without jurisdiction? The state of facts is simply this:—An action had been brought for redress. The Court of Admiralty at the time it made that order could not give the redress. It is admitted it could not give it, because until it could give that redress a question remained to be tried—a question between the Mary and the Normandy. It was therefore incompetent to give redress, and it issued an injunction stopping and preventing a subject obtaining the redress to which he was by law entitled in the common law courts of the country. Well, now, upon that proceeding being taken, whether the plaintiff in this case could have stopped the suit until that order was made, which to some extent, no doubt, was binding upon him, it is not necessary to inquire; but as soon as it was made, and he was directly affected by this exercise of jurisdiction preventing him obtaining the redress which he could not obtain anywhere else, then I apprehend it was a case in which it was the duty of the common law courts to interfere and say, "You have no right to interfere to prevent this man getting the redress where he can get it." Well, now, has anything occurred to prevent this from being a case in which a prohibition should go? Why could not the Court of Admiralty give the plaintiff redress in this case at that time? Merely because they had no jurisdiction to do it. Their jurisdiction to give that redress arose subsequently. They had not the jurisdiction to give the redress themselves, but as at that time in that suit which was instituted for the purpose that has been mentioned, they had not the jurisdiction to give the redress themselves, and they issued an injunction preventing the subject from having the redress to which he was otherwise entitled, it becomes, it appears to me, exactly a case in which the prohibition ought to go, and nothing that has occurred since, that I can imagine, has interfered with the right which the plaintiff then had, unless it can be shown that the court had jurisdiction to make that order—his right to have a prohibition go against that suit being proceeded with, in which that order stands. Had they jurisdiction to give the redress then? Had they jurisdiction to proceed in that suit for the purpose of giving redress? That depends upon the construction to be put upon the 13th section of the Admiralty Act. It appears to me plain that the intention of that section was that where the ship or the proceeds thereof, or I will assume for the sake of argument, where all those matters were in court, and therefore the Court of Admiralty could give redress, such redress as it could give in respect of the matter complained of in the court of law, then they should have the jurisdiction conferred upon the Court of Chancery in genera where liability is admitted and nothing remains but to administer the fund. That seems to me plainly to have been the object. It shall not be necessary to go to the Court of Chancery to get this redress. You shall have it, provided the vessel, or the proceeds thereof are in court; and the reason is manifest which I have given. Therefore, in this case, we have to consider—were the vessel or the proceeds thereof in any sense whatever in court? Was that part of the section complied with? I am not going to repeat the reasons given, because it is not necessary. I entirely agree with what has been said by the court upon that subject, that that preliminary condition has not been complied with, therefore the jurisdiction to give this redress at that time did not exist. But then another question occurred to me, which I threw out in course of the argument; whether it was a case for a prohibition; whether, though there was no jurisdiction to entertain the suit at the time it was commenced, yet when the suit was afterwards going on, and proceedings taking place under circumstances which would have given jurisdiction to commence the suit—of course it was a matter of discretion—that would have been sufficient to prevent them exercising the prohibition? But even treating it, not as a matter of discretion, but as a question of law, the point might have deserved consideration, more especially if the condition had clearly been performed, upon which there is a difference of opinion—I mean as to the distinction between the vessel and the proceeds. But without considering that, it appears to me sufficient to say in this case that this was a suit in which, on the 4th June, an order had been made for an injunction stopping the action; that at that time there was no jurisdiction to make that order, and no jurisdiction to entertain the suit; and that the plaintiff had a right, therefore, to prevent that suit from continuing which was commenced without jurisdiction, in which an order was made against him without jurisdiction, which order may always operate as a prejudice against him, and be the ground of proceeding. That seems to be a satisfactory answer to the difficulty which I felt—I will not say it is a real difficulty—but an answer to the difficulty such as it is. He has a right to prevent the suit going on, in which an order has been made where there was no jurisdiction to entertain a suit at that time.

GJESSING v. THE STEAMER HANSA.

Collision between steamer and sailing vessel—Fog—Speed of steamer—Rule as to.

A steamer going at the rate of nine and a half miles an hour during a fog at night which occasionally lifted, ran into and sank a sailing vessel. The sailing vessel had kept a good look out, and blown a fog horn, which, however was not heard on board the steamer. It was submitted for the steamer that she answered her helm better when steaming rapidly, and that her speed was not so great that she could not have been stopped on receiving due warning, that is to say, within the distance at which a fog horn is usually heard, and that she had not heard any warning:

Held, that this was no defence, and that the steamer was to blame.

It is the duty of a steamer to avail herself of her boiler power, to be ready to stop and reverse with power and efficiency in a fog, while at the same time she moderates her speed, so as to enable such power to be exercised with efficiency, and with greater efficiency than if she did not moderate her speed.

The result of the authorities is that while the justifiable rate of speed will depend upon the circumstances of the case, there is no such criterion as that the steamer may go at a rate such as will enable her to stop within an assumed distance at which she may, under favourable circumstances, expect to hear a fog horn or a steam whistle, if blown.

Beebe, Donohue, and Cooke, for the libellant.

W. Q. Morton, and W. W. McFarland, for the claimants.

BLATCHFORD, J.—On the morning of the 31st May, 1871, but a few minutes before half-past two o'clock, the German screw steamer, Hansa, in the Atlantic Ocean, about 350 miles from the port of New York, came into collision with the Norwegian barque Rhea, striking her a square blow on her port side, between her main-mast and mizen-mast, and cutting into her to a distance of some 18ft. The barque had all her sails set except her light sails, and was going three or four knots an hour, heading south-half-west, the wind being about west-south-west, and the barque being close hauled. The steamer was on a voyage from Bremen to New York, and the barque on a voyage from Rotterdam to New York. After the collision, which occurred in a fog, the steamer backed out from the barque, and the barque disappeared in the fog, towards the port hand of the steamer, and undoubtedly went down with her cargo. The value of the barque and her cargo are claimed to have been 160,000 dollars. The libel alleges that as and before the collision the barque had a fog horn blowing and sounding; that the barque kept on her course without variation until the steamer was close on board of her; that then, to ease the blow if possible, the mate ordered the helm a port, but the collision took place before any change could be made in her course; that the collision was caused without fault on the part of the barque; that she had a proper look-out set, and a fog horn blowing, and a good man at the wheel; that a full and efficient look-out was kept; and that the fault was in the steamer in running at too great a rate of speed, in not keeping a good and sufficient look-out, in not in time taking steps to avoid the barque, as it was the duty of those on the steamer to do, and in not stopping and backing in time. The answer avers that during the time between midnight and half-past two o'clock a.m. on the 31st May, a drifting, but not continuous, fog was experienced, which had commenced some hours before, and had varied in the extent of its obscuration, from time to time lighting up and changing in character, and presenting thick and clear atmosphere alternately; that during the prevalence of the fog the Hansa was kept at a moderate rate of speed, part of the time as low as seven knots an hour, and at no time exceeding nine and a half knots, nine knots per hour being about the rate immediately before and at the time of the collision; that her rate of speed was regulated according to the circumstances; that, in view of the skill and care exercised and the precautions taken in navigating her, and of the reciprocal precautions required by law from other vessels, her rate of speed was at all times prudent and safe; that during the half hour immediately preceding the collision, blasts of her steam whistle were sounded at intervals not exceeding at any time one minute and a half, lights of the most effective description were displayed, the most vigilant look-out was maintained, an officer of capacity and long experience was in charge of the deck, a force of four men—two able seamen and two quartermasters—was kept in the wheelhouse, the most effective apparatus for conveying orders from the officer in charge to the engine-room and the wheel respectively were provided, thus creating a reciprocal duty on the part of approaching vessels to give notice of their location by proper sounds of their steam-whistles or fog-horns, the distance at which the Hansa's steam-whistle could be heard, being at least two miles in much less favourable circumstances, and the distance at which ordinary fog-horns and steam-whistles on other vessels could have been heard by those on board the Hansa, not being less than two miles; that, under these circumstances, the speed of the Hansa was, in all respects moderate, judicious and safe, and did not in any manner contribute to the collision; that while so proceeding, the steamer heading about west, and no answering blast of whistle or fog-horn, and no hail having been detected, although attentively listened for in the intervals between the blasts of the Hansa's steam-whistle, and immediately after another blast of the Hansa's steam whistle, a dim light the colour of which was not at first distinguishable, but which proved to be the red light of a vessel alleged to have been the barque Rhea, came into view, and was sighted and reported simultaneously by both lookouts on the bows of the Hansa; that the light bore about two points on the starboard bow of the Hansa, and indicated the dangerous proximity of a vessel apparently under full sail, heading to the southward, across the bow of the Hansa; that, by immediate telegraphic orders from the bridge to the engine and wheel of the Hansa, her engine was at once stopped and backed, and her helm was put hard-a-starboard, but, before the heading or way of the Hansa could be materially affected thereby, a collision, inevitable to the Hansa, occurred, and the port side of the barque came in contact with the bow of the Hansa; that, as soon as the vicinity of the barque became known, every possible effort on the part of those navigating the Hansa was made to avoid the collision; and that no fault was committed by them, and the collision was not caused by any fault or negligence on the part of those in charge of navigating the Hansa. The answer charges that the collision was occasioned by the negligence and unskilfulness of those in charge of the barque, and deficiencies in her equipment, and omissions of duty and of precautions, as follows: First, the failure on the part of those navigating the barque to give due notice of her presence and approach by sounding properly one or more fog-horns, as, had the same been so sounded, they must necessarily have been heard on board of the Hansa at a distance much farther than was necessary to enable those on board of her to easily avoid any danger of collision, at even a much greater rate of speed than she was then going; and, in the absence of such signal or signals on the part of the barque, to indicate her presence and bearing, all precautions by those navigating the Hansa were, necessarily unavailing to prevent a collision, and would have been so at whatever rate of speed the Hansa might have been proceeding. Secondly, the barque, at the time of the collision, was being navigated on a part of the ocean out of the usual course of sailing vessels. Thirdly, her master, officers, and crew were not vigilant, but negligent in the performance of their duties, and were inefficient as to nautical competency, seamanship, and number. Fourthly, before, and at the time of, the collision, no competent or effective look-out was stationed or maintained on the barque. Fifthly, immediately before, and at the time of the collision, the wheel of the barque was in the sole charge of an inexperienced and incapable boy, who was ignorant of the Norwegian language, in which language the usual orders for navigating the barque were given. Sixthly, the lights on the barque were dim, defective, and placed on an unusual and improper part of the vessel, and, as so defective and misplaced, tended to mislead as to her true position and bearing. Seventhly, there was a general neglect of discipline and proper precautions on board of the barque; and blasts of the steam whistle sounded from on board of the Hansa were heard on board of the barque in ample time for her, by answering sounds of fog horn and otherwise, to have notified those navigating the Hansa of the position of the barque, and enabled them to avoid a collision; and, through culpable negligence and want of seamanlike presence of mind, sagacity and promptitude on the part of those navigating the barque, no answering fog horn or horns was or were sounded, or other measures resorted to to notify the Hansa of her position; and the collision was due solely to the seven causes thus stated. The consideration of this case might well stop here. The Hansa and the Rhea were proceeding in such directions as to involve risk of collision, and it was the duty of the Hansa to keep out of the way of the Rhea, and she failed to do so. The Hansa was approaching the Rhea so as to involve risk of collision, and it was the duty of the Hansa to seasonably slacken her speed, and to seasonably stop and reverse, and she failed to slacken her speed in season, and she failed to stop and reverse in season. The Rhea kept her course. There was no danger to accrue to the Hansa from obeying the rules, and there were no special circumstances existing to render necessary any departure by the Hansa from the rules. The Rhea did not neglect to carry the proper lights, or to make the proper signals, or to keep a proper look-out, or to observe any precaution required by the ordinary practice of seamen, or the special circumstances of the case. The burden being on the Hansa, under such circumstances, to excuse herself from fault, and she not having done so, condemnation of her necessarily follows. But, I think it is shown affirmatively that there was fault on the part of the Hansa in failing to observe the requirement to go at a moderate speed in the fog which prevailed. The actual rate of speed of the Hansa at the time of the collision was nine and a half knots an hour. That had been her speed for an hour and a half previously. Her average speed up to the previous noon, during the voyage, had been eleven knots an hour, using sails whenever practicable. From the previous noon, without sails, her speed had at no time exceeded ten and a half knots. The answer avers that, during the prevalence of a drifting, but not continuous fog, which commenced some hours before the midnight previous to the collision, the Hansa was kept at a moderate rate of speed, part of the time as low as seven knots an hour, and at no time exceeding nine and a half knots, nine knots per hour being about the rate immediately before and at the time of the collision. These statements are not borne out by the evidence from the log book of the Hansa. On the contrary, of the fourteen logs at the fourteen even hours between the time of the collision and the previous noon, there was no rate of nine knots, there were two logs at nine and a half, six logs at ten, four logs at ten and a half, and two logs, namely, at seven p.m. and at eight p.m., at seven. The master of the Hansa testifies that he would consider ten miles a very moderate kind of speed for a vessel like the Hansa on a night when there was a thick fog at times and lighting up at times, and in the location where the collision occurred. Her speed from the noon before the collision until the collision averaged, taking the log rates, a little under nine and two-thirds miles an hour, without sails, her speed at the time of the collision being nine and a half. From noon of the 29th to noon of the 30th, with fore and aft sails, gaff topsails and staysails set for twenty-two hours, she ran at the average rate of nearly eleven and one-tenth miles an hour. Yet her master testifies that, during a part of the time of the day preceding the collision, the fog was steadily very heavy; that during that time the rate of speed they made was from about six and a half to seven miles; that when the fog was thick at times, and lighting up at times, their speed was about nine and a half miles; and that he regards those rates of speed as prudent rates under the circumstances. He says that during the 29th and 30th the weather was sometimes very thick, and sometimes lighter, mostly cloudy, dark weather, with rain and fog; that when he went to bed, two hours and three-quarters before the collision, the weather was quite clear; and that he had not been in bed before for more than thirty-six hours. Sander, the second officer of the Hansa, testifies that, in his judgment, the speed of the Hansa, nine and a half knots, at the time of the collision, was a moderate and prudent rate of speed for her on such a night, heading as she was, and with the wind, sea, and fog such as they were. He says that it began to get thick soon after midnight, and continued getting thicker, and lighting up until the time of the collision. The fog was such that the Hansa kept her whistle blowing at the same intervals from before half-past twelve until the collision, and that Sander lost sight of the Rhea after the collision, when the Rhea was about half the length of the Hansa away from the Hansa, that is, about 185ft. off. It is urged, on the evidence, that a steamer steers better when going at a quick rate of speed than when going at a slow rate of speed; that a steamer making a given rate of speed, with only sufficient steam for that rate, cannot be stopped in any less distance than when making double that rate, with sufficient steam for such double speed; and that the Hansa could be brought to a full stop, when going at the rate of nine and a half knots an hour, in the condition of things as they were at the time of the collision, in, as her master thinks, less than twice her own length, and in, as Sander thinks, from two to three times her own length, her length being 367ft. The evidence shows that there was no difficulty in managing and steering the Hansa at a much less rate of speed than nine and a half knots, for, after the collision, she moved around in a circle of a half or three-quarters of a mile in diameter, for a considerable time, at a speed of four miles an hour and sometimes less, sometimes stopping entirely, searching for traces of the Rhea. There is no doubt that a steamer, or any other vessel, will answer her helm more readily, so as to avoid a given object ahead by actuating the helm at a less distance off from such object, when she is going at a higher speed than when she is going at a lower rate. But this has nothing to do with the control exercised by her steam machinery to stop her headway and give her sternway. That control is more effective at the lower speed. Not that five knot steam will give her sternway when her speed is five knots only, any sooner than ten knot steam will give her sternway when her speed is ten knots. But, a steamer with boiler capacity for steam for ten knots, and whose usual rate is ten knots, in clear weather, can, from running at ten knots, with ten knot steam, reduce her rate to five knots in a fog, and so manage her fires and have in reserve a force of steam, as to be able to apply, in aid of obtaining sternway in an emergency, a greater power of steam than that used to go ahead at five knots, and thus avoid many a collision at five knots which could not be avoided at ten knots. It is the duty of a steamer to avail herself of her boiler power to be ready to stop and reverse with power and efficiency in a fog, while at the same time she moderates her speed so as to enable such power to be exercised with efficiency, and with greater efficiency than if she did not moderate her speed. That is the meaning of the rule that a steamer shall in a fog go at a moderate speed. It is that she may avail herself of the power which belongs to a steamer to go directly astern in spite of wind and waves, and thus avoid collisions which no vessels but a steamer can avoid. Hence it is the steamer that is to keep out of the way of the sailing vessel, and she is to do it by moderating her speed in a fog. Independently of the question of avoiding entirely another vessel, a collision at a less rate of speed may be very much less disastrous. There may be time to give a slanting blow. In the present case, a considerably less rate of speed in the Hansa would probably not have cut the Rhea nearly in two, or, the light of the Rhea being seen at the same distance it was, the Hansa's helm might, at the less speed, have sheered her so as to give the Rhea a glancing, and, perhaps, not necessarily fatal, blow. In regard to the distance in which the Hansa could be brought to a stop, when going at the rate of nine and a half knots an hour, the evidence given is purely a matter of speculation and opinion. It is not stated to be the result of experiment, or even observation. It is not given by an engineer. It is given solely by the master of the Hansa and the officer of the deck, the persons responsible for this collision and for the loss of property and of life attendant upon it. But, even if it should be assumed to be possibly true, it amounts to nothing. In the first place, plunging on through the fog as the Hansa was, with a fresh breeze from nearly ahead, and a head sea, at the rate of nine and a half knots an hour, with the attending circumstances before referred to, which made it impossible to hear her steam whistle on the Rhea, and impossible to hear the fog horn of the Rhea on the Hansa, a capacity to be brought to a full stop in a distance so great even as that suggested was of no service. There should have been a capacity to be brought to a full stop in a less distance. There would have been such capacity if the speed had been less than nine and a half knots, with the proper reserve of steam power ready to be instantly commanded to reverse with the utmost efficiency. It is a self-evident proposition, that if, with a reserve force of steam ready to be used but not in use, and the throttle-valve only partly open, a speed be maintained less than that which would result from having the throttle-valve wide open, the vessel can, by reversing with the throttle-valve opened wide, be brought to a full stop in a less distance from the lesser speed than from the greater speed. No proposition to the contrary of this is sought to be maintained by any evidence. Instead of that this question, and this alone, is put, not to any engineer, but to Sander, the officer of the deck on the Hansa: "Assuming that a steamer is making five knots an hour, with sufficient steam for only that rate of speed, can she be stopped in a greater or less distance than a steamer going ten knots, with steam enough for going at that rate of speed?" He answers: "It will take the same time to stop her." The premises being irrelevant, the conclusion is equally so. It is the more incumbent on these large steamers of great speed, weight, and momentum to go at a moderate speed in a fog in order to be ready to reverse with more power than that used in their onward movement, because of the almost certainly fatal consequences to anything which they hit with a direct blow, as in this case, where the Hansa cut into the Rhea to a distance of eighteen feet. The probability of serious injury to such a steamer in a collision with a sailing vessel is so comparatively small, that the steamer, feeling safe herself, takes precautions in a fog substantially only in reference to other steamers. The probability of serious injury to a sailing vessel in a collision with such a steamer is so comparatively great, that the steamer should take extraordinary precautions in a fog, especially in moderating her speed, and making that moderate speed efficient by being ready to reverse with a greater power than that used in her onward movement. The propositions maintained on the part of the Hansa, as to speed, are, that if her speed did not exceed such a rate as would admit of her being stopped, after being warned that another vessel was in her way, she was going at a prudent and allowable rate; that this test depends on the distance within which she could be stopped and the distance at which she was entitled to expect warning that another vessel was in her way; that if she could be stopped within the distance at which such warning was to be expected, her speed was not unreasonable; that such distance is to be taken at the usual reach of the customary warning; and that any other rule will destroy rapidity of communication by steam across the ocean, and interfere with the rapid transit of merchandise and of the mails, which has become a necessity. It is sufficient to say that no such rule of speed has ever been established or recognised by any Admiralty Court. It would put all sailing vessels, even though complying with all the rules of navigation, wholly at the mercy of these large and powerful steamers, with no chance of redress. If the steamers will persist in going at these rapid rates in fogs, they must take the risk upon themselves and bear the consequences, and not throw the risk upon those whose lives and property they destroy. I had occasion, in the case of the Chancellor, in May, 1870 (N. Y. Daily Transcript of June 10, 1870), to express what I regard to be the settled views of courts of admiralty on this subject, and it is well, in view of the continued and persistent recklessness of steamers, to repeat those views. One of the witnesses for the claimant in that case was the master of a steamer plying regularly between New York and Liverpool. He said that while crossing the bank in a fog it was not his custom to diminish his rate of speed at all; that he generally went ten or eleven knots an hour through a fog on the banks; and that from three hundred to four hundred yards was the furthest distance which a fog horn or a bell could be heard. On this testimony I made these observations: "This practice, if it be one, of not diminishing speed in a fog on the Banks, is directly, so far as steamers are concerned, in the face of the 16th article of the sailing rules, which provides that every steamship shall, when in a fog, go at a moderate speed. . . . Two prominent ideas were advanced by the witnesses for the claimant in this case, as justifying undiminished speed in a fog on the Banks. One was, that the danger to any vessel in a fog is greater the longer she remains in the fog. The other was, that the faster the vessel is going, the more quickly will she mind her helm, and thus the better will she be able, on a signal of danger, to avoid colliding with another vessel in a fog. Neither of these ideas has any sanction in the law, and any vessel which acts upon them takes upon herself the consequences of recklessness. The first idea disregards wholly the rights and the safety of other vessels. The other idea pre-supposes that a signal of danger proceeding from a vessel unseen in a fog, to another vessel, will necessarily be heard so seasonably, and acted upon so intelligently, by the latter, as to secure, by a proper movement of her helm, the avoidance of a collision." A review of the principal cases on the subject of speed in a fog will show not only that no such rule as that contended for on the part of the Hansa has ever been laid down or sanctioned by courts of admiralty, but that the rule which is applied has not been relaxed in view of the increase of intercourse by steamers, and of the enlargement of the size and power of steamers. In the Rose (2 W. Rob. 1, 3), in 1843, Dr. Lushington said: "It may be a matter of convenience that steam vessels should proceed with great rapidity, but the law will not justify them in proceeding with such rapidity if the property and lives of other persons are thereby endangered." He reiterates this view in the cases of the Virgil (2 W. Rob. 201, 205), The Iron Duke, in 1845 (2 W. Rob. 377, 385), and the Juliet Erskine, in 1849 (6 Notes of Cases, 633, 635). The same view was taken in the case of the London-derry (4 Notes of Cases, supplement, 31, 45), and by the Supreme Court of the United States, in Newton v. Stebbins, in 1850 (10 Howard, 586, 606), in McCready v. Goldsmith, in 1855 (18 Howard, 89, 91), and in Rogers v. The St. Charles in 1856 (19 Howard, 109, 112). It was enforced in the Northern Indiana, in 1853 (3 Blatchf. C. C. R. 92, 109), in the Batavier, in 1854 (9 Moore's P. C. R., 287, 297; and 40 English Law and Eq. Rep. 19, 25), and in The John Adams, in 1860 (1 Clifford, 404, 414). In The Great Eastern, in the Privy Council, in 1864 (2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 97; 11 L. T. Rep. N. S. 5, 8, and Holt's Rule of the Road, 167, 180), it is said: "Their Lordships do not mean to lay down any rule beyond that expressed in the regulations themselves, as the occasion when a steam vessel is bound to moderate her speed, or as to the rate which, in the circumstances prescribed in the evidence, she ought not to exceed; but their Lordships are of opinion that it is the duty of the steamer to proceed only at such a rate of speed as will enable her, after discovering a vessel meeting her, to stop and reverse her engines in sufficient time to prevent any collision from taking place." This was the principle adopted by this court in the case of the D. S. Gregory, in 1868 (2 Benedict 167), where the D. S. Gregory, a steamer, came into collision with a vessel at anchor, and where it was said that the fact that the steamer, while under way in a fog, collided with the vessel at anchor, which used all proper precautions to give notice of her position, was sufficient evidence that the speed of the steamer was not moderate, there being no special circumstances existing in the case to justify her in maintaining the rate of speed she did; that in such a fog her speed ought to have been as much less than it was, as would have been sufficient to enable her to avoid the vessel at anchor; that she ought not to have gone so fast as not to have been able by slowing, stopping, and backing, to avoid a collision; and that, if the fog was so thick, that at the speed she had, with all the precautions she used, she could not avoid the collision, the conclusion was irresistible that her speed was not that moderate speed in a fog which was required by the well-settled rules of navigation. The same principle was again applied by this court in the case of the Louisiana, in 1868 (2 Benedict, 371), and in the Bristol, in Dec. 1870 (New York Daily Transcript, of Feb. 3, 1871). In the case of the Monticello, in the Circuit Court for the Massachusetts District, before Clifford and Shepley, J.J., where a steamer running not less than eight miles an hour, in a fog, collided with a sailing vessel in the ocean, thirty to forty miles from Cape Lookout, the court say: "The only rule to be extracted from the statute and a comparison of the decided cases is, that the duty of going at a moderate speed in a fog, requires a speed sufficiently moderate to enable the steamer, under ordinary circumstances, seasonably, usefully, and effectually to do the other things required of her in the same clause of the statute, namely, to slacken her speed, or, if necessary, to stop and reverse." In the case of the Blackstone, in the district court for the Massachusetts district, in Nov. 1870, where a steamer ran down a sailing vessel, in a fog, in the Vineyard Sound, Judge Lowell held, that the steamer, in running at her usual speed, took the risk of meeting any other vessel properly navigating, and further said: "I do not place much reliance upon the evidence, though not contradicted, that a slower speed would have made no difference. It was well suggested at the argument that it might at least, have enabled the lookout to hear the fog-horn sooner, because the noise at the steamer's bow would have been less; and it is by no means clear that it would not have enabled the steamer to avoid the libellant's vessel after she was seen. Even an expert must speak very cautiously to such a question, which involves a very close calculation of what a steamer can do in a given time, because no one is in the habit of timing them exactly, and a difference of a few seconds changes the whole aspect of the question. The statute undoubtedly assumes that a slow speed conduces to safety, and there is nothing in this case that should take it out of such a general rule, unless it be that the fog was unusually dense, or the steamer particularly difficult to manage, [in either of which cases the necessity for caution was all the greater. I should be glad to see the experiment tried by a steamer of moderating her speed in a fog, but I have hitherto found that they do not consider it to be important. If it is not, they should procure a change of the law." A very instructive case on this subject is that of the Pennsylvania, in the Privy Council, in June 1870 (The National Steamship Company v. Merry; The Pennsylvania, 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 55; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 477). The Pennsylvania, a screw steamer running in a line from Liverpool to New York, collided, in a fog, in the day time, with a barque, about 200 miles to the eastward of Sandy Hook, while on a voyage to New York. There was a fresh breeze from the south south-west, and a heavy swell, the speed of the steamer was about seven knots per hour, her steam whistle was being sounded at proper intervals, she was steering west by south, and she was keeping a careful look out. The barque was heading to the southward and eastward, and making about a knot an hour, her helm being lashed a-lee. The barque was seen by the steamer about a length of the steamer off on her star-board bow, the helm of the steamer was put hard-a-port, and her engines were stopped and reversed. She struck the barque with her stem. The barque had been sounding a bell instead of a fog-horn, which bell was heard on board of the steamer at about the same time the barque came into view. The Court of Admiralty held that the barque, being under way, ought to have sounded a fog-horn and not a bell, but that the use of the bell instead of the fog-horn, did not occasion or contribute to the collision; that there was no fault in the barque; and that the collision was caused wholly by the wrongful porting of the steamer, and by her improper rate of speed. The Privy Council affirmed the decision, holding, that, if the collision was inevitable when the vessels first came in sight, it was the fault of the steamer for going at an improper rate of speed; that the collision was not occasioned by the absence of blowing the fog-horn of the barque; that if, on the evidence, the fog-horn would have been heard further than the bell, it would not have been heard at a sufficient distance to have enabled the steamer to avoid getting into that position; that in a thick fog, in the Atlantic Ocean, in the direct line to New York, about 200 miles to the east of Sandy Hook, seven knots an hour is too great a speed for a steamer to proceed at; that, as against the view that a less speed than that would paralyze mercantile transactions, and interfere with business and trade in the carriage of passengers and goods, the lives of passengers and the safety of goods must be protected in the first place; and that, even if these fogs should last longer than they are said to do, still the steamers must abate their speed, and if they do not they must take all the consequences of a collision: (See also on this point, Rogers v. The St. Charles, 19 How. 108, 112.) The case of The Westphalia, in 1871, in the District Court for the Eastern District of New York (ante, p. 12; 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 75), holds the same views. The steamer, in a thick fog, the breeze being very light, and the sea calm, collided in a thick fog, in the day time, in the English Channel with a brig. The steamer was whistling every fifteen seconds, and had slowed her speed to from eight to ten knots an hour, and her lookout and other precautions were proper. The brig came in sight from 150ft. to 160ft. distant, no sound from her having been previously heard. The engine of the steamer was at once stopped and reversed, and her helm was hove hard a port, but the vessels were in contact before she could be stopped or her course materially changed. The brig was sunk. The brig had blown a fog-horn after hearing the steamer's whistle, but it had not blown it before. The court held, that the steamer was not in fault for porting, but was in fault for running at a speed of nine or ten knots an hour in a dense fog; that a speed of seven knots could not be justified; that although the steamer would answer her helm more quickly when going at eight or ten knots than at six, she could not stop so quickly; that, in such a dense fog she was bound to be going as slow as it was possible for her to go consistent with steerage-way, in order to enable her to stop in proper time; that she was in fault for not doing so; that the brig was in fault in not sounding her fog-horn before she heard the steamer's whistle; and that the damages ought to be apportioned. In the case of the Magna Charta, in Nov. 1871, before the Privy Council (ante, p. 153; 25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 512), which was a collision between two steamers, in a fog, in the daytime, in the Baltic Sea, both steamers having been sounding their whistles, one of them going at the rate of one and a half knots an hour, and the other at the rate of from four to five knots an hour, the vessels having become visible to each other at seventy yards' distance, the latter having cut into the former to the distance of 11ft., and the fog being so thick that a vessel could not be seen more than a ship's length off, both the Court of Admiralty and the Privy Council held that the speed of from four to five knots was too great. The result of all the authorities is, that while the justifiable rate of speed will depend upon the circumstances of the case, there is no such criterion as that the steamer may go at a rate such as will enable her to stop within an assumed distance at which she may, under favourable circumstances, expect to hear a fog-horn or a steam-whistle, if blown. The present case illustrates the folly of such a test. Neither vessel heard the signal of the other. Yet, on the evidence, each gave the proper signal. The barque could do nothing but what she did. The steamer could easily have been going at less speed. I forbear to remark on the look-out kept on the Hansa, in view of the speed she was going at. The officer on the bridge saw the light of the Rhea before it was reported by the men on the look-out on the bow. If the Hansa's speed had been less; and the light of the Rhea had then been reported, as soon as a vigilant look-out on her bow could see it, and her helm had then been starboarded, and her engines had at the same time been reversed, it might well have been that the collision would have been avoided, or at least have been less disastrous. But I put the decision as to affirmative fault in the Hansa on the ground solely of the Hansa's speed not having been, under the circumstances, that moderate speed in a fog required of her by the rules of navigation. There must be a decree for the libellant, with costs, with a reference to a commissioner to ascertain the damages.

COURT OF ADMIRALTY.

Reported by J. P. ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Tuesday, Feb. 20, 1872.

THE GREAT NORTHERN AND THE MIDLAND.

Foreign Enlistment Act 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 90) sect. 24—Arrest of vessels by the Crown—Motion for indemnity—Practice.

In an application to the Court of Admiralty for indemnity by the Crown in respect of the detention of vessels under the Foreign Enlistment Act 1870, sect. 24, where the Secretary of State has released the vessels without issuing his warrant stating reasonable and probable cause for the detention, the proper form of procedure is by motion upon affidavit.

The Crown is entitled to time to answer the affidavits in support of the application, so as to raise any questions of law and fact.

This was a motion upon affidavits praying the court to order that the owner of the steamships, the Great Northern and the Midland should be indemnified by the Crown by the payment of costs and damages for the detention of those vessels, under the Foreign Enlistment Act 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 90) sect. 24. (a) The two vessels, it was alleged, were in January 1872 lying in the Birkenhead Docks in the Mersey, about to be sent to America to carry the mails and passengers between New York and Havannah; on the 10th Jan. they were seized by the collector of customs at Liverpool, who suspected that they were to be despatched to Cuba for the use of the insurgents against the Spanish Government. The Secretary of State issued no warrant, and on Feb. 7th 1872 the vessels were released.

Milward, Q.C., Clarkson, and Goldney, in support of the motion.

Archibald, for the Crown, submitted that the proper course was for the applicants to file a petition, or at least that the Crown was entitled to have time to answer the affidavits.

Milward, Q.C., and Clarkson.—There are three distinct cases in which an owner whose ship is seized may apply for indemnification, and the sections of the Act clearly point out different modes of procedure. Under sect 23, where the Secretary of State arrests, by his warrant, and continues to detain the ship, the owner may apply to this court for its release, and "the court shall, as soon as possible, put the matter of such seizure in course of trial between the applicant and the Crown, and has power to indemnify the owner." In this case the Act points to formal trial, by way of petition and answer, and the court may inquire as to the arrest having been on reasonable grounds. Again, under the same section, where the ship is arrested on warrant, and released before application to the court, the court "has power to make a like order for the indemnity of the owner in a summary way." The warrant raises the question of whether the Crown had good cause for the arrests, and in their case the Crown may go into the merits. But in a case like the present, the Secretary of State himself, by not issuing his warrant, finds that there was no ground for the arrest, and this court has power only to assess the damages. The 24th section says that the owner "shall be indemnified," and the court has no discretion to consider whether the Crown was justified, as in the first case, where the words are, "shall have power to declare," &c. The Crown, therefore, are entitled to no time to answer, as they cannot now say that there was reason for the arrest. The remedy is to be given in a "summary way," and that is in contra-distinction to "course of trial," as in the first case. The words "summary way" clearly point to motion upon affidavit, and not to petition, which is the most formal proceeding in this court. The object of the statute is to prevent delay. The International (40 L. J. 1, Adm.; 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 787; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 523) was upon motion.

(a) The following is the material part of this section: Where the Secretary of State, or chief executive authority, orders the ship to be released on the receipt of a communication from the Secretary of State without issuing his warrant, the owner of the ship shall be indemnified by the payment of costs and damages in respect of the detention upon application to the Court of Admiralty in a summary way, in like manner as he is entitled to be indemnified where the Secretary of State having issued his warrant under this Act releases the ship before any application is made by the owner or his agent to the court for such release.

Archibald, contra.—I only ask for direction as to procedure. There ought to be a distinct allegation as to the question raised. There may have been reasonable cause for believing in an intention to violate the Act, even though there was no such intention. The Crown are entitled to have the question of law raised as to their liability where there was such reasonable cause. A motion is a most indefinite form, and raises no distinct question.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I am quite clear upon the point that the court must have before it the case raised in some form in which it can give judgment upon the points raised. One party must make an allegation as to the facts and law, and the other must deny it. I think the Act contemplated, in a case under this section, the most summary way, and that is clearly by motion. The Crown can move to reject the motion, and support their case by affidavits. The proceedings must be by motion and affidavits, and I consider that the Crown are entitled to have ten days to prepare their affidavits in answer.

THE RIGA.

Necessaries—Definition of—Shipbroker—Brokerage—Payment of charges—Advances—Pilotage—Dock dues.

The term "necessaries," where used in the statutes giving the Admiralty Court jurisdiction over such claims, has the same meaning as is given to it by the common law courts, and signifies, whatever the owner of a vessel, as a prudent man, if present under circumstances in which his agent, in his absence, is called upon to act, would have ordered. Webster v. Seekamp (4 Barn & Ald. 352) followed. Premiums paid by a shipbroker at the owner's request to procure insurance on freight are necessaries.

Charges paid by a shipbroker at the owner's request for entering, reporting, and piloting a ship, and for tonnage and light dues, and for noting protest, are within the meaning of the term "necessaries."

ADM.]

THE RIGA.

[ADM.]

Advances at the owner's request for travelling expenses of the master and goods supplied for the ship's use are necessaries.

Brokerage charges made by a ship's broker for acting as ship's agent, and for negotiating a charter-party, may be necessaries within the meaning of the statutes, but must be proved, to come within the definition.

Where a petition merely alleges that money was advanced for necessary expenses at the owner's request, without stating what those necessary expenses were, such a claim will be struck out on motion to reject or alter the petition.

THIS was a cause of necessaries instituted on behalf of Wilko Hermann Foget, a ship broker in the city of London, against the Norwegian schooner Riga, her tackle, apparel, and furniture, and against the freight due for cargo lately carried on board the Riga, and against Ole Wasboe and others, her owners.

An appearance was entered by the assignee of the creditors (in Sweden) of the shipowners; the assignee had instituted a suit of possession, in which judgment had been allowed to go by default.

The cause now came before the court on motion by the defendant to reject or alter the petition, on the ground that the claims therein set out were not claims for necessaries within the meaning of the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6. The petition was as follows:

1. The Riga is a Norwegian schooner, and on or about the 17th July 1871 she sailed from the port of D'Urban in Port Natal, Africa, laden with a cargo of wool, bound for the port of London.

2. On or about the 6th Sept. 1871 the plaintiff received a letter from Ole Wasboe, part owner of the said schooner, bearing date D'Urban, 18th July 1871, requesting the plaintiff to effect an insurance on the freight due for the transportation of the aforesaid cargo to the amount of 400*l.*

3. In pursuance of the request contained in the aforesaid letter, the plaintiff on the 11th Sept. 1871 effected an insurance upon the said freight in the sum of 400*l.*, on payment of a premium of 2 per cent., and paid in respect thereof the sum of 8*l.* 1*s.*

4. On or about the Oct. 1871 the plaintiff received a letter from the said part owner, Ole Wasboe, at St. Helena, dated the 2nd Sept. 1871, confirming the instructions contained in the previous letter.

5. In the month of Nov. 1871 the Riga arrived off the Scilly Islands, and the said Ole Wasboe landed and proceeded to London, and on the 20th Nov. 1871 he had an interview with the plaintiff, at which the said Ole Wasboe, being without any funds to pay the necessary expenses arising out of the arrival of the said ship, requested the plaintiff to make to the said Ole Wasboe an advance of 150*l.* against the said freight, in order to enable him to meet the aforesaid necessary expenses.

6. The plaintiff accordingly made the advance of 150*l.*, as requested, on account of the said freight, taking a receipt in the words and figures following—that is to say, "London, 20th Nov. 1871.—Received of W. H. Foget the sum of 150*l.* on account of freight receivable in London of my vessel the Riga, now bound here from Natal.—O. WASBOE."

7. The said Ole Wasboe also at the same time handed to the plaintiff the ship's papers, and requested him to pay all charges for pilotage, light, tonnage, and harbour dues, and other necessary expenses on the arrival of the said vessel. Accordingly, on the arrival of the said vessel at London, the plaintiff paid charges for entering, reporting, and piloting the said vessel, and for tonnage and light dues and for noting protest, in all to the amount of 21*l.* 19*s.*; supplied goods for the necessary use of the said vessel to the amount of 1*l.* 10*s.*; and also advanced various sums for pilotage, travelling expenses of the master, and other charges, amounting in the whole to 2*l.* 3*s.*

8. Shortly after the arrival of the Riga in the port of London, that is to say, on the 24th Nov. 1871, the vessel and the cargo laden therein was arrested by the marshal of this honourable court on a warrant issued at the suit of one Cornelius Kraz, claiming possession of the said vessel, and also claiming the said freight, as the representative of the creditors in Norway of the said Ole Wasboe, the owner of the said vessel; and on the 2nd Sept. 1871, a second suit was commenced in this honourable court against the said vessel and freight by the seamen then or lately serving on board, in respect of claims for wages then due.

9. The said freight was paid into court by the persons claiming the cargo, in order to obtain release thereof.

10. The plaintiff also continued to act as agent and broker for the said vessel, and negotiated a charter-party on behalf of the said owners, and there is now due and owing to the plaintiff as such agent or broker, in respect of his necessary services as such agent or broker, the sum of £48 0*s.* 6*d.*

11. The said insurance of freight was effected, the said advances made, the said charges paid, the said goods supplied, and the said services rendered by the plaintiff upon the credit of the Riga, and of the said freight, and not upon the personal credit of the owners, and the whole of the said sums, amounting to £231 13*s.* 11*d.* are still due and unpaid to the plaintiff.

Clarkson, for the defendant, the creditors' assignee, in support of the motion.—The question is whether any of these items are necessaries within the meaning of the statute. To be necessaries the things supplied must be actually wanting for the service of the ship at the time of supply.

The Alexander, 1 W. Rob. 346;

The Sophie, 1 W. Rob. 368.

Money advanced is not always necessaries, and must always be more strictly proved to have been necessary than in the case of goods supplied (The Alexander, sup.), and cannot be recovered under this statute when advanced to pay for necessaries already supplied: (The N.R. Gosfabrick, Swab. 344.) The section was passed to enable persons supplying necessaries to foreign ships on an emergency to do so with a fair chance of payment, and necessaries mean articles immediately necessary for the ship, as contra-distinguished for what is required for a voyage: (The Comtesse de Fréville, Lush., 329; 4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 713; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 106.) Necessaries must be furnished on an emergency, and not in the ordinary course of business: (The Onni, Lush. 154; 3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 447; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 6.) Advances of money are not necessaries unless for the use of the ship or crew: (The Aaltje Willemina, L. Rep. 1 Ad. and Ecc. 107.) Premiums paid for insurances are not necessaries for the ship; when they were paid she was not in this country. Pilotage, light, tonnage, and harbour dues are not necessaries, but rather a matter of mercantile account, and paid in the ordinary course of a broker's business. Again, the pilot's service has been already supplied at the time of advance, and money advanced to pay for what is already supplied is not necessaries. An advance upon freight, even though to procure necessaries, cannot be called necessaries within the statute, as it is upon the security of the freight which is to pass through the broker's hands. Broker's charges for chartering a ship are not necessaries, being in the ordinary course of a broker's business. A tradesman advances goods, which are delivered by him for the use of the ship, but a broker advances money to procure goods on the credit of the owner, and looks to him for payment. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—In Webster v. Seekamp (4 B. & Ald. 352), Lord Tenterden lays down that the rule for ascertaining what is necessary is to consider what a prudent owner, if present, would have done under circumstances in which the agent, in his absence, is called upon to act. The words of the Act would include necessaries supplied for a voyage.] I submit not. The common law cases turn upon the question of the master's authority to bind his owners. The question here is, what evil does the statute remedy? and Dr. Lushington has held (in the Comtesse de Frégevile, sup.) that the section applied only to what was supplied on an emergency. The common law meaning of necessaries is much wider. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—There is no definition of necessaries to be extracted from these cases except that of Lord Tenterden. I presume you contend that the word is more strictly applied in this court than in the common law courts.] In the decisions since the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, the word has been mostly strictly applied, and the Admiralty Court Act 1861 did not extend the meaning so given. The word "necessaries" must be taken to mean such things as material men would supply. It has been so decided, and this court is bound by those decisions.

Webster, contra.—The real defendants are the representatives of the shipowner, who instructed the plaintiff to make the advances, and he placed the ship's papers in the plaintiff's hands. The defendant is the assignee of the shipowner's creditors. In the Comtesse de Frégevile (sup.), the engagement of the broker by the owner was in the ordinary course of business, and the claim was for a balance of account. The moneys were here advanced on the security of the ship, as shown by the ship's papers being in the plaintiff's hands, and this is a claim in this ship only, and not for a balance of account. The real question is whether there was such a bonâ fide necessity that these things would have been supplied by the master or the owner acting as a prudent man. In the West Friesland (Swab. 454), it is held that what is needed for the service of the ship, such as coals, are necessaries. The Onni (sup.), as quoted, was for money advanced to pay off a bottomry bond, and is inapplicable. There is no case which says that premiums paid are not necessaries. The Alexander (sup.) expressly finds that "necessaries" have the same meaning in the Admiralty Court and the common law courts. If the Admiralty Court Act 1861, s. 5, was intended to limit the meaning of the word "necessaries," it should have expressly used the words "material men." Necessaries have a wider meaning than supplies by material men. The decisions do not alter this interpretation. He also cited

The Underwriter, 25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 279; 1 Asp. Mar. Law. Cas. 127.

Clarkson in reply.—The common law cases do not use the technical word "necessaries," they only talk of what is "necessary" for the service of a ship.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 5.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is a motion to reject a petition in a cause of necessaries instituted by a London shipbroker against the Norwegian vessel Riga and her freight. The ground of the motion is that the items set forth by the plaintiff in the petition do not fall under the legal category of "necessaries," according to the construction put upon that term by my predecessors in this court. I have taken time to look into the various decisions upon which this proposition was alleged to be founded. The 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6, conferred upon this court a "jurisdiction to decide all claims and demands whatever. . . for necessaries supplied to any foreign ship or seagoing vessel." In the case of the Alexander (sup.), Dr. Lushington said: "And here I may observe, that when the recent statute conferred upon this court a jurisdiction in these matters, or rather perhaps revised an ancient jurisdiction long prohibited, it never was nor could be intended to alter the law, but merely to give a new remedy which was rendered necessary in the peculiar cases of foreign ships, and is confined to that necessity. I will state in one sentence what I apprehend to be the condition necessarily imposed upon the court. It is this: That the court must not make the owners of a foreign ship liable for the supply of any articles for which, under similar circumstances, if resident here, they would not be responsible in a court of common law." In the following case of The Sophie (1 W. Rob. 369), the court said: "The technical meaning of the term 'necessaries' I have already explained, as strictly applying to anchors, cables, rigging, and matters of that description; at the same time I consider myself at liberty to enlarge the term necessaries so as to include money expended upon necessaries; but in such cases I must be satisfied that the necessaries were wanting, and that the money was bonâ fide for the purpose of procuring them." In the N. R. Gosfabrick (sup.), the court included meat as strictly falling within the term necessaries. In The West Friesland (sup.), in 1859, coals were held to be necessaries. In the Onni (sup.) it was held that under this section it mattered not whether the necessaries were furnished on personal credit or not, and that an advance of money for procuring necessaries was within the equitable construction of the statute. This decision was in 1860; the statute had then been in force twenty years. In a subsequent case, of the Comtesse de Frégevile (sup.), in 1861, Dr. Lushington seems to have considered the proper legal meaning of the word "necessaries" still unfixed. In that case Dr. Lushington said: "I have to determine whether the demand made in this suit can be maintained within the statute of the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6, and this question wholly turns upon the proper legal meaning to be affixed to the word 'necessaries.'" I have no hope of finding the means of solving this difficulty from resort to any other part of this statute, or to any other statute; neither has the question ever been submitted directly to the court of appeal. In former times, and up to a late period, up to the decision in the case of The Neptune (3 Hagg. 120; 3 Knapp's P. C. C. 94), by the Judicial Committee, the Court of Admiralty was accustomed to allow material creditors to sue against the proceeds, when in court. Material men were those who repaired a vessel or furnished materials to enable her to proceed to sea; it was a technical term, the meaning of which was well understood. I do not think, as my former decisions show, that the term "necessaries" in this statute should receive so circumscribed a meaning. On the other hand it has been urged that the term "necessaries" ought to receive the same liberal construction as in cases of bottomry. This construction would include every requisite for a voyage. For there are many articles allowed to be covered by a bottomry bond which it would be very difficult to comprise within any ordinary meaning attached to the word 'necessaries.' Unless enabled by superior authority, I cannot venture to adopt so comprehensive a meaning for this enactment. It appears to me that the most convenient course I can follow is to take an intermediate one, to make a distinction between the ship and the voyage. I shall hold that 'necessaries' means primarily indispensable repairs, anchors, cables, sails, when immediately necessary, and also provisions; but, on the other hand, does not include things required for the voyage, as contra-distinguished from necessities for the ship." The attention of the court (Dr. Lushington) does not seem to have been drawn to the previous case of the Onni (sup.), nor to the 24 Vict. c. 10, which had been passed in the month preceding the decision in the Comtesse de Frégevill (sup.), to which it seems to me very important to advert, because, in the 4th section, that statute, I take it, gives the court a jurisdiction over "claims for building, equipping, or repairing any ship"—claims which would answer to those of the old material man, as known in this court before the decision in the Neptune (sup.)—and in the 5th section it gives the court a distinct jurisdiction over "any claim for necessities supplied to any ship" in certain cases. Since this statute, in the case of The Bonne Amélie (L. Rep. 1 Adm. & Ecc. 19; 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 191; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O.S. 321), in 1865, it was decided that the travelling expenses of an agent to attend a trial in a case of collision were not necessities; and in the Aaltje Wilhelmina (sup.), in 1866, the court refused to consider money, advanced to a master to pay averages, necessities. In both these cases, however, and in other former cases, the court seems to have considered that money advanced for the purchase of necessities stood on the same footing as necessities themselves. It appears to me on a review of these cases, on which the court seems to have proceeded tentatively, so to speak, with the new jurisdiction, and on a consideration of the language of both the statutes, I must come to the conclusion that there is no distinction as to necessities between the cases in which by common law a master has been holden to bind his owner, and suits for necessities instituted in this court. This seems to have been Dr. Lushington's original opinion in the Alexander (sup.), and it seems to me to be strengthened by the language in the subsequent statute, and was, I think, also the foundation of my decision in The Underwriter (25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 279; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 127), in 1868. I am unable to draw any solid distinction (especially since the last statute) between necessities for the ship and necessities for the voyage; and I shall follow the doctrine of the common law as laid down by the high authority of Lord Tenterden in the case of Webster v. Seekamp (4 B. & Ald. 352). In that case he says (p. 354): "The general rule is, that the master may bind his owners for necessary repairs done, or supplies provided for the ship. It was contended at the trial that this liability of the owners was confined to what was absolutely necessary. I think that rule too narrow, for it would be extremely difficult to decide, and often impossible in many cases, what is absolutely necessary. If, however, the jury are to inquire only what is necessary, there is no better rule to ascertain that than by considering what a prudent man, if present, would do under circumstances in which the agent, in his absence, is called upon to act. I am of opinion that whatever is fit and proper for the service on which a vessel is engaged, whatever the owner of that vessel, as a prudent man would have ordered, if present at the time, comes within the meaning of the term 'necessary,' as applied to those repairs done or things provided for the ship by order of the master, for which the owners are liable." I have now to apply the principles of this law to the particular case before me. I allow the sum of 8*l.* for insurance for freight, as set out in Articles 2, 3, and 4 of the petition. I disallow the sum of 150*l.*, as pleaded in Articles 5 and 6, on the ground that though it is alleged in general terms that that sum was advanced for necessary expenses, it is not stated, as it ought to have been, what these necessary expenses were. I allow the sums of 21*l.* 19*s.*, 1*l.* 10*s.*, and 2*l.* 3*s.*, as set forth in the 7th Article. With respect to the item of 48*l.* 0*s.* 6*d.* charged for brokerage in Article 10, I shall allow this article to go to proof, reserving my opinion till I see what that proof is, as to whether the item falls within the legal category of necessities or not. Subject to these alterations I admit the petition. I shall make no order as to costs.

THE JOHN FENWICK.

THE JOHN FENWICK.

Collision—Steamship getting under way—Lights—Want of proper precaution—Regulations for preventing collisions at sea, Art. 20.

A steamship, which, in getting under way in the Thames to go up the river between sunset and sunrise, is compelled to go astern and partly ahwart the river in order to get clear ahead, and whose regulation lights are not visible to vessels coming up the river, is bound to take every possible precaution to warn approaching vessels of her position, and to use the best light she has on board for that purpose.

Placing a service lantern, ordinarily used to give light in discharging the cargo, over the stern is not a sufficient precaution.

A vessel neglecting such precaution commits a breach of the 20th Article of the Regulations for preventing Collisions at Sea, and will be held to blame if a collision ensue.

THIS was a cause of damage instituted on behalf of the General Steam Navigation Company, the owners of the steamship Granton, against the steamship John Fenwick and her owners intervening. The Granton was an iron screw steamship, of 637 tons register, 245 feet long, with engines of 240 horse power nominal, and manned by a crew of thirty-two hands, all told, and employed in the trade between London and Hamburg. The John Fenwick was a screw steamship of 548 tons register, and ninety horse-power, and at the time of the collision was bound on a voyage from Zante to London with cargo. Between three and four p.m. on the 19th Oct. 1871, the Granton arrived at Gravesend from Hamburg, and took on board a pilot, and proceeded up the Thames to Brown's Wharf in Blackwall Reach, where she arrived at about five p.m., and discharged part of her cargo. At about ten p.m., she was ready to proceed higher up the river to Horselydown Pier in the Upper Pool, where the rest of the cargo was to be discharged. It was then very dark, with driving rain, and the tide was three-quarters ebb, and the river very full of craft coming down, and the master deemed it prudent to await the flood tide, and, therefore, made the Granton fast alongside a coal hulk moored in Blackwall Reach, above Brown's Wharf, about abreast of the Folly House, on the north side of mid-channel. She was moored on the outer or south side of the hulk, and her head was up the river, and her anchor light was up. There is not room to anchor a ship of the Granton's class at that part of the river. At about half-past four a.m., on the 20th Oct., the tide being then on the last quarter flood, the Granton cast off from the hulk. Her regulation lights were burning, and her anchor light was taken down. She was too long to be able to steam ahead at once without running into the tiers, and, therefore, the stern fastenings were first cast off, and the flood tide acting on her stern sheered it off from the hulk. She then steamed astern, casting off her head ropes and angling over to the south side of the river, so that she might have ample room to go ahead, get steerage way, and proceed up the river. When steaming astern, and about mid-channel, and partly athwart the river, a sailing barge, driving up the river under her stern, obliged the Granton to stop, and then move easy ahead, to keep her stationary. At this time the John Fenwick under charge of her master, and with a licensed waterman on board, was coming up the river, and, rounding Blackwall point about three quarters of a mile below the Granton with her regulation lights burning, and a good look out. She was then going, according to the defendants' evidence, at about three knots an hour through the water, but the plaintiffs contended that she was going very fast. The master of the Granton at this time saw her, and as from the relative positions of the two vessels none of the Granton's lights would be visible on board the John Fenwick, he ordered a lantern to be put over the stern, which was done. The lantern used for the purpose was a common lantern, which had been in use for some hours, to give light to those engaged in discharging the cargo. The fact whether the lantern was put over the stern of the Granton in such a place as to be visible on board the John Fenwick was in dispute between the parties. The plaintiffs called evidence to show that it was over the starboard quarter; the defendants sought to prove that the lantern was hung over the stern in a position in which it could not be seen from the John Fenwick. When the John Fenwick got into Blackwall Reach, her engines were slowed till she was going at the rate of two knots an hour, and she ported and whistled on perceiving another steamer, and almost immediately afterwards saw a dark object which proved to be the Granton, lying across the river, and her engines were stopped and reversed, and the Granton was hailed to go ahead. The Granton whistled, and as soon as she was able to clear the vessels on her way, went ahead, but too late to avoid the collision. The starboard bow of the John Fenwick came into collision with the starboard quarter of the Granton, and cut deep into her.

Butt, Q.C. (Webster with him), for the plaintiffs, contended that the John Fenwick was alone to blame. She was coming at too high a rate of speed. Those on board of her ought to have seen the light hung over the stern of the Granton. The Granton was justified in acting as she did, and took all precautions necessary to avoid the collision.

Milward, Q.C. (Gainsford Bruce with him), for the defendants.—The Granton was in an improper place in the river. She ought not to have gone astern without showing lights. The light she did show was insufficient, and not visible. The proper thing to have used was a flash light. The having her regulation lights is no excuse. Under Art. 20 of the Regulations for preventing Collisions at Sea, the Granton was bound to take precautions to meet the special circumstances, and she neglected to do so. The regulation lights were not at all visible.

Butt, Q.C. in reply.—The John Fenwick was overtaking the Granton, and was bound under Art. 17 of the Regulations to keep out of the way of the Granton.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—It is quite clear that the Granton, when she cast off from the hulk and placed herself athwart the fairway of the river, in the early morning, when it was dark, incurred great risk. When executing such a manoeuvre at such a time she ought to have taken every possible precaution to warn approaching vessels of her position. What did she do? According to her own account, when she saw the John Fenwick approaching, all she did was to put an ordinary service lantern over her stern, or, as some of the witnesses say, over her quarter. I am of opinion that this service lantern was not sufficient to give effective warning to the John Fenwick. Those on board the Granton should have used as a warning signal the very best light they had on board. It is true that there is no special regulation defining the signals to be used in such a case as the present, but the provisions of the 20th article of the Regulations for preventing Collisions at Sea, states that nothing in those rules shall exonerate any ship from the consequences of any neglect to carry lights or signals, or of the neglect of any precaution which may be required by the ordinary practice of seamen, or by the special circumstances of the case. There is no evidence of any negligence on the part of the John Fenwick. I must, therefore, pronounce the Granton alone to blame for the collision.

THE DEMETRIUS.

Collision—Cross cause by owners of cargo—Principal cause already decided—Admissibility of evidence taken in the principal cause—Costs.

Where a cause of damage, arising out of a collision between two ships, has been heard and decided, and both ships have been found to blame, and the owners of cargo on board the ship proceeded against in the former cause, subsequently institute a cause against the former plaintiffs in respect of the same collision, the Court of Admiralty has no power to make an order allowing the plaintiffs (the owners of cargo) to use the evidence given in the former cause, on the hearing of the latter, if the defendants refuse to consent to such an order.

ADM.]

THE DEMETRIUS.

Quare, if the defendants refuse their consent, will they be entitled to their costs?

This was a cause of damage, instituted on behalf of Charilaos Notara and Nicholas Notara, the owners of 2589 ardebs of beans, lately laden on board the steamship Trojan, against Michael Spartali, the owner of the steamship Demetrius. The cause was in personam. On the 24th Oct. 1868, the Trojan and the Demetrius came into collision in the river Mersey, and both vessels were injured. A suit (No. 4660) was afterwards instituted, in rem in this court, by the owners of the Demetrius against the Trojan to recover damages for the collision, and on 30th July 1869 that suit was heard before the Judge, assisted by Trinity Masters, and the court found that both vessels were to blame, but that the Trojan was exempted from liability by reason of being at the time of the collision under the command of a compulsory pilot. Subsequently the present plaintiffs brought an action in the Court of Queen's Bench against the owners of the Trojan to recover for damage sustained to the cargo consequent upon the master carrying it on to its destination in its wetted condition caused by the collision, without taking the proper steps to dry it, and so prevent deterioration; the plaintiffs had offered to pay pro rata freight at Liverpool, but the master of the Trojan had refused to deliver, and carried the freight on to Glasgow so as to earn full freight. On a special case stated for their opinion the Court of Queen's Bench held that the master's act was unjustifiable, and that the owners of the Trojan were liable for the damage sustained by that act (see Notara v. Henderson, L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 346; 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 577; 3 Mar. Law. Cas. O. S. 419), and this judgment has been confirmed on appeal by the Exchequer Chamber (L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 225).

The present suit was brought to recover damages for the wetting of the beans caused by the collision, and the amount claimed was (both vessels having been held to blame) half the total damage sustained, less the sum recovered in the common law action.

The case was now brought before the court on a motion set out in the following notice of motion:

Take notice that this Honourable Court will be moved on Tuesday next the 5th March, at 11 o'clock in the forenoon, or as soon after as counsel can be heard, for leave to the plaintiffs to be allowed to use, at the hearing of this cause, the whole of the evidence given and used at the hearing of the cause, No. 4660, the Trojan, in this Honourable Court, and also for leave to the plaintiffs to be allowed, if they should think fit, to adduce further evidence at the hearing of this cause in addition to the said evidence given in the said cause.

Dated this 28th Feb. 1872.

1. Charilaos Notara, of Liverpool, in the county of Lancaster, merchant, one of the above-named plaintiffs, make oath and say as follows:—

1. I, and the said Nicholas Notara, during 1868, carried on business in co-partnership as merchants at Liverpool aforesaid.

2. On or about the 25th Sept. 1868, we shipped at Alexandria, on board of the Trojan, 2589 ardebs of beans to be carried in the Trojan to Glasgow.

3. The Trojan, on her voyage to Glasgow aforesaid, touched at Liverpool, and whilst proceeding down the Mersey on the 24th Oct., and with our said beans on board, she was run into by the steamship Demetrius, of which the defendant was the owner.

4. In consequence of the collision, and of the Trojan being beached to prevent her sinking, the said beans became saturated with salt water and were damaged, and a portion of the said beans were washed away.

5. Afterwards the defendant instituted a suit in this honourable court against the owners of the Trojan, and in due course the said suit came on for hearing, when evidence was adduced on behalf of the defendant and the owners of the Trojan, and the judge of this honourable court, assisted by two elder brethren of the Trinity House, after hearing the said evidence, delivered judgment, pronouncing both vessels to blame, and exempting the owners of the Trojan upon the ground of her being by compulsion of law in charge of a duly licensed pilot.

6. I am informed and believe that the said defendant afterwards entered an appeal from the judgment of this honourable court to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, but has long since abandoned the said appeal, and paid to the owners of the Trojan one half of the damage and loss sustained by the Trojan in the said collision.

7. We have instituted in this honourable court a suit against the defendant, the owner of the Demetrius, for the damage and loss to our said beans consequent upon the said collision.

8. I am advised that we are entitled to the leave of this honourable court to be allowed leave to use at the hearing of this suit the evidence given at the hearing of the suit in which the present defendant was plaintiff, and the owners of the Trojan were defendants; such leave, if granted, will cause a great saving of expense to all parties.

9. I believe great difficulty will be experienced to procure the presence at the hearing of this suit of the persons who gave evidence at the hearing of the said suit, and that unless the said evidence in the said suit be allowed to be used in this suit, a long time must necessarily elapse before the suit could be heard.

Milward, Q.C., Butt, Q.C., and Myburgh, in support of the motion.—In a cross action for damage by collision, where the cross action is heard after judgment in the original action, the court will admit the evidence in the original action: (The North American, Lush. 79.) In the suit against the Trojan the judgment was in rem; will not that judgment be binding on all parties? The refusal to admit this evidence will entitle us to our costs if we are compelled to call further evidence. In the former trial the defendants had an opportunity of cross-examining the witnesses whom we shall have to call. They might have forced us, if our suit had been instituted at the same time, to consolidate, and then this evidence would have been used.

Cohen, contra.—In the North American (sup.) the parties were the same in both suits. An action cannot be consolidated after the hearing of the original action, and if this motion is granted that effect will be produced. Evidence in a cause instituted by the owners of a ship cannot be admitted in a cause concerning the same collision by the owners of cargo on board the ship unless the owners of cargo consent to consolidate. As the parties are not the same consolidation can only take place in such a case where it is not opposed. As to the question of the judgment being binding because it was in rem, it is quite clear that if the judgment is sufficient proof of the plaintiffs' case, the evidence taken before is useless; if the judgment is not binding the evidence cannot be admissible, as it was on that evidence the court founded its judgment.

Milward, Q.C. in reply.

March 8.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is a motion made on behalf of the plaintiffs for leave to be allowed to use at the hearing of this cause, the whole of the evidence given and used at the hearing of the cause of collision, The Trojan (No. 4660). The collision took place between the two vessels, the Demetrius, now proceeded against, and the

Trojan, and the plaintiffs' cargo was on board the Trojan. The suit referred to was a suit in rem, and I held that both vessels were to blame for the collision. The facts appear from the affidavit filed in this cause. [His Lordship here set out the facts.] It will be observed that this application is made at a very late period, long after the hearing of the original cause of collision, and the application of the plaintiffs is opposed by the defendant, and I have to consider whether the court has power to order the evidence to be admitted notwithstanding such opposition, as it would manifestly be a great saving of time and expense to do so. I must remark here that the practice in this court is invariable for parties to consent to an order that evidence used in one cause shall be used in another, when the question at issue is practically the same. There is no case which shows that a contrary course has been followed; but, on the other hand, there is no case in which the court has, of its own authority, and without the consent of both parties, made an order admitting evidence given in a cause already heard, to be used in another cause, even though the issue in both had been identical on the point for which it is intended to use the evidence. The law on this point is laid down in The William Hutt (Lush. 25). That case was a motion to dis sever suits of damage which had been consolidated by an order of the court, and Dr. Lushington said, "the court was not a little surprised when the learned counsel who moved, sat down without giving the court any information of the reasons for making the motion, or of the consequences of granting it. When I ordered these three actions to be consolidated, did I do so according to the power and practice of the court? If not, I should willingly retract the order if I had the opportunity. But, according to my knowledge, the universal practice of the court has been to consolidate actions where the decision of each action depends on precisely the same facts; and in salvage suits the court has gone further, consolidating actions where there are several sets of salvors not rendering precisely the same services. The power of consolidating actions is most beneficial. But for this power the owners of a ship would often be vexed by a host of different actions arising out of one matter—as in a case of collision, by all the several owners of cargo in the vessel run down—and the court could afford no relief, having no power to order the evidence in one action to be taken as evidence in another." From the law as laid down in that case, I deduce two propositions; first, that the object of consolidating actions is, that they may be heard together and upon the same evidence, and therefore that they must be consolidated before the hearing, and not after one has been heard and decided; secondly, that where one action been heard and decided, and another action is brought against one of the same ships arising out of the same matter, the court has no power to make an order admitting the evidence in the first action as evidence in the second. I derive confirmation of my opinion from the wording of the 34th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10). That section provides that the court "may, on application of the defendant in any cause of damage, and on his instituting a cross cause for the damage sustained by him in respect of the same collision, direct that the principal cause and the cross cause be heard at the same time and upon the same evidence." That section gives the court power to order cross causes to be tried at the same time and upon the same evidence as principal causes, but if parties neglected to bring their cross cause till after the principal cause was heard and decided, it is, to say the least, doubtful whether the court could allow the cross cause to be heard upon the same evidence without consent. In fact, the presumption to be derived from the words of the statute is the other way, as the statute seems to suppose that the cross cause will be brought before the principal cause is heard, and only gives power to make the order in such a case. I am of opinion, therefore, that I have no power to make an order for the admission in this cause of the evidence in the former action according to the terms of the prayer of the motion, and I therefore reject the prayer. But I must be taken as expressing no opinion upon the question of the propriety of the course which the defendants have adopted in refusing to consent to the admission of this evidence, nor as to how far that refusal may in the future affect their right to costs. If the plaintiffs had brought their action before the principal cause was heard, and had refused to consolidate, or had negligently delayed the institution of their suit until after that hearing, and had then brought forward the old evidence, they would perhaps not have been entitled to their costs; but where they have offered to admit the evidence taken in the former cause, it will be a question for the consideration of the court hereafter, how far that course alters their position. And further, I must not be taken as expressing any opinion upon the difficult question as to how far these parties are bound by the decision in the original suits, as being a decision in rem, but I decide that question only which is before me to-day. I reject the motion.

action in any of His Majesty's courts against the City of Dublin Steam Packet Company, has reference merely to actions in personam against the company, and not to actions in rem against the company's vessels.

The Court of Admiralty is a court of law within the meaning of the 8 section of the said Act.

THIS was a motion on behalf of the City of Dublin Steam Packet Company, the owners of the steamer Mullingar, against which vessel a cause had been instituted, for an order that the cause be dismissed with costs.

The cause was one of collision, which took place near Halpin's Point, on the river Liffey, and within the harbour of Dublin, on the 20th Jan. 1872, between the steamer Mullingar, the property of the City of Dublin Steam Packet Company, and the smack Belle, of Dublin, the property of the plaintiffs. The affidavit to lead the warrant, made by Mr. Good on the 21st March last, merely states

That the smack Belle, of Dublin, received considerable damage on the 20th Jan. last, by reason of the steamer Mullingar coming into collision with her ;

That the damages, actual and consequential, sustained by reason of said collision amount to the sum of 183l. 13s. 8d. sterling, with interest until paid ;

That the steamer belongs to the City of Dublin Steam Packet Company, and trades between Dublin and Liverpool.

On filing this affidavit the usual warrant issued to seize the Mullingar. The warrant was not actually executed, but the Messrs. Hone, solicitors of the company, signed an undertaking (which was endorsed on the warrant), dated the 28th March, to appear under protest and give bail for the company. On the 4th April Mr. Hone filed an affidavit on behalf of the company, setting forth the grounds of protest.

The facts and arguments are fully stated in the judgment of the Court.

Exham, Q.C., LL.D., and Robertson were heard in support of the motion.

Elrington, Q.C., LL.D., and Corrigan, LL.D., contra.

APRIL 15.—TOWNSEND, J.—This case comes before the court under the following circumstances. On the 21st March 1871 a cause of damage was instituted by Messrs. Hamerton and Son, on behalf of Matthew Good and Thomas Byrne, against the steamer Mullingar, of Dublin, and on the same day a warrant of arrest in the usual form was obtained by Messrs. Hamerton, requiring the marshal to arrest and detain the Mullingar, and to cite all persons who had, or claimed to have, any right, title, or interest therein, to appear. The warrant was not actually executed, but Messrs. Hone, the solicitors of the company, signed an undertaking, which is endorsed thereon, dated the 28th March 1872, to appear under protest, and give bail for the vessel on behalf of the City of Dublin Steam Packet Company, the owners of the steamer Mullingar, in the cause of damage which had been instituted on behalf of the plaintiffs against the vessel. On the 4th April Mr. Hone, on behalf of the company, filed an affidavit, according to the 32nd General Order of the court of the 4th Feb. 1869, in which he sets forth the grounds of protest, and on the same day gave notice of a motion to have the cause dismissed with costs. The ground stated for the protest is that by a local Act (6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 100), which by its 11th section is to be judicially noticed as a public Act, it was enacted (sect. 8) that "no action in any of His Majesty's courts of law, to which the company should be liable in respect of any damage, injury, or trespass alleged to be done, committed, or occasioned to or against any ship on the high seas, or in any river, port, or harbour, or to or against any person or persons, property, goods, or effects whatsoever, shall be brought, commenced, or prosecuted against the company, unless one calendar month's previous notice, in writing, should have been given by the party or parties commencing such action to the said company." The affidavit states, and the fact is not disputed, that the claim of the plaintiffs is for the cost of repairs of injuries alleged to have been done to a smack called the Belle, by a collision with the Mullingar, on the river Liffey, in the port and harbour of Dublin, and for the damages consequent upon that collision. The affidavit further states that the action is one to which the company, as owners of the Mullingar, are liable. It is admitted that no such notice as the Act requires was given on the part of the plaintiffs. The defendants' counsel insist that this cause is to be deemed an action, brought, commenced, and prosecuted against the company. They have relied upon the terms of the warrant, which directs the citation of all who claim an interest in the vessel, and contend, as I understand the argument, that the owners have in fact been cited by the mere mention of the warrant. The plaintiffs' counsel have very properly not made any objection to the raising of this question by the protest, but they insist in the first place that the Act of 6 & 7 Will. 4 is not applicable to this court, because it is not one of Her Majesty's courts of law ; I have, however, no doubt that this court, though not a court of common law, is still to be deemed one of Her Majesty's courts of law in the ordinary meaning of those words: "A court," says Sir Edward Coke (Co. Lit. 58A), "is a place where justice is administered," and Sir Wm. Blackstone says that all the courts of justice are derived from the power of the Crown, whether created by Act of Parliament, "letters patent, or subsisting by prescription." (See Stephen's Commentaries on the Laws of England, 6th edit., p. 383.) He enumerates the several courts of justice which are of a public and general jurisdiction, and in these he includes the Maritime courts (Ib., p. 442), so that I cannot attribute much weight to the argument suggested, that this court was anciently the court of the Lord High Admiral, while such an officer existed, and that the judge was appointed by him. That was indeed so, but as the judicial power of the Admiral, or his appointee was deemed to be ultimately derived from the Sovereign, the court was still, I think, one of the King's Courts, and now by the Court of Admiralty (Ireland) Act, 1867, the judge is appointed directly by the Sovereign, and by sect. 21 of that statute this court has been made a court of record, and Sir William Blackstone further tells us expressly "that all the courts of record are the King's Courts, in respect of his crown and dignity." (Stephen's Comm., p. 384.) In The Johannes (Lush. 182) Dr. Lushington says that the High Court of Admiralty is a municipal court, and is bound to obey the statutes of the realm in all matters ; and in The Heart of Oak (39 L. J. 15, Adm. ; 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 727 ; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 317), Sir R. Phillimore expressly laid down that the High Court of Admiralty of England was both a court of law and equity, and, for that reason, would follow the decisions of the courts of law and equity in bankruptcy cases. As this court is now similarly constituted to the High Court of Admiralty in England, I am of opinion that it has equal claim to be considered a court of law and equity also. It is indeed a court of equity only so far as that it decides upon equitable principles, without assuming the general functions of a court of equity; but I think it is to be called a court of common law, although it administer a peculiar system of law, modified, recognised and allowed by the statute and common law, a system not originally founded on the common law of England, but rather on those foreign and peculiar sources of the law maritime, to which I need not more particularly refer. But the plaintiffs' counsel have further argued that the statute in question is not applicable to the present case, which is a proceeding in rem, inasmuch as the cause is not brought, commenced, or prosecuted against the company, but against the ship according to the peculiar procedure in this court. The question is one of importance, both to the company and to the public, I therefore felt bound to consider it carefully before proceeding to give an opinion on the point before me. I do not see the force of the argument which has been used by the defendants' counsel, that the Act is one for the public benefit, and should be liberally construed in favour of the defendants. It seems to me that there is more weight in that advanced on the other side, namely, that it is rather in abridgment of a public right; but I need not offer any opinion, whether the Act is a remedial one or not, because I think that however that may be, I am bound to give full effect to the language of the Legislature fairly interpreted, while I have no right either to extend or narrow it. If this be a proceeding against the company, the notice is clearly requisite. If not, I am not to stretch the words of the Act beyond their natural and ordinary import, merely because the notice may be deemed a protection to the company, or because the Legislature has favoured them by according that protection to them, confiding it would seem, in their solvency and high character. The title and preamble of the Act have no relation to the 7th section. The Act is entitled, "An Act to authorise the City of Dublin Steam Packet Company to apply a portion of certain moneys already subscribed in fulfilment of their contracts for building six additional steam vessels, and to legalise such subscription." The preamble first recites the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 115, and that since the passing of that Act an increase in the number of their vessels had been rendered necessary. It then recites the 5 Will. 4., c. 67, for the improvement of the Shannon navigation, and that the improvement of that navigation would greatly increase the necessity for an addition to the number of the company's vessels. It then recites, that to provide additional vessels, the directors had made certain contracts, and that divers persons had subscribed capital to be applied in completing them. Then follows the enacting part. This is ex concessis, a proceeding in rem corresponding with the real action of the civil law (Inst. Lib. 4, tit. 6, s. 2), which is founded not on a personal obligation, but on a right to the thing which is the object of the suit. A suit to enforce a maritime lien against a particular ship for damages alleged to have been done by that ship in collision with another is certainly an action in rem. Such an action could not be maintained at common law, but it is a matter of almost daily practice in the Admiralty Court, and this distinction between a proceeding in respect of a personal wrong, or a personal obligation, has been recognised by Lord Kenyon in his judgment in Mentone v. Gibbons (2 T. R. 267). In The Ruby Queen (Lush. 266), Dr. Lushington did not deem the law of negligence as applied in the courts of common law to be applicable to a proceeding in rem in the Admiralty Court, regarding it as distinct and peculiar. In The Volant (1 Wm. Rob. 383) the same great authority on matters of admiralty law distinguishes three modes of proceeding in the Court of Admiralty to recover the loss occasioned by a vessel doing damage—first, against the owners personally; secondly, against the master personally; thirdly, by a proceeding in rem against the ship. There can be no doubt, after reading Hone's affidavit, that this is a suit brought to enforce a maritime lien for damage against the Mullingar. Now, in such a case, it is wholly immaterial to whom the vessel belonged. Several American authorities are cited to that effect in Dunlop's Admiralty Practice, 92 (a) Clarke v. New Jersey Steam Navigation Company (1 Story's Rep. 531), The Bee (Ware, 332), The Ada (Davies R. 407). The owner, or anyone interested, may come in and defend the res, if the res be left to itself. The court, on finding that a just cause of action exists, will sell the res, but can go no further in that suit; if the res be insufficient, the plaintiff loses the full amount of his claim. In The Victor (Lush. 72), a cause of damage by collision, the court ordered the cargo on board a wrong-doing ship, although that cargo belonged to the owner of the ship, to be released, on the ground that it was not competent for the Court of Admiralty to attach the property of the defendant wherever found, though the ship itself would be liable for the damage. Anybody having or claiming an interest in the Mullingar, whether as owners, mortgagees, or otherwise, might appear and defend her, and thus become parties in the cause. But a party who has appeared may, if he will withdraw from a suit in rem, and the suit will go on against the res as before. Bearing this in mind, we may get rid of a certain confusion of terms, when we speak of defendants in an Admiralty cause in rem who, although they may come in to defend the res, are not, therefore, necessarily the parties against whom the proceedings are brought. But, in fact, it is not the defendant, whether he be owner of the res or not, who is liable to the suit. In a certain loose and popular sense, indeed, a man may be said to be liable in a proceeding in rem, because, if he wishes to exonerate the res, he may be unable to do so without paying the plaintiff's demand; but I do not think that, legally and correctly speaking, the company are liable in a proceeding in rem. They may abandon the res, and no liability in the suit will exist beyond its value. The plaintiff may, and often does, establish his claim in a proceeding in rem, and recover his loss without the court ever knowing who the owner is. If the company had sold the Mullingar since the collision, that would make no change in the plaintiff's position, for they could still follow on their suit against the vessel and enforce it, whoever was the owner, and the company would not have anything to say to the matter. In a court of common law the party summoned appears and takes defence and becomes the defendant, but in the Admiralty Court the res is the original party against which the suit is instituted, that is the language of the forms, and, as I before observed, the antiquated style of the pleadings in this court, before it was laid aside as cumbrous, always designated the res as the "party impugnant, or proceeded against in the suit." I mention this as corroborative, by way of contemporaneous exposition of what I deem to be the ancient procedure of the court which, when not altered by the Act or rules, is expressly preserved, and to this hour the plaintiff may proceed either in personam, or in rem, and the Admiralty Court Acts, both in England and Ireland, recognise the distinction. If the proceeding had been a personal one against the company, no doubt the notice would have been necessary, but I think the clause in question has not provided against a proceeding in rem. I do not think this is a suit brought, commenced, or prosecuted against the company. I have no authority to extend the terms of the Act, if they be plain. The arguments ab convenienti on either side can hardly prevail against the plain language of the statute; and I think it quite compatible with the language of the statute, that while the company has the privilege of a month's notice whenever they are sued at common law for any damage done in collision by any of their vessels, they should not be protected against the procedure in rem in the Admiralty Court, which does not appear to me to have been in the contemplation of the Legislature when the Act of Will. 4 was passed. I am confirmed in that opinion by the language of that Act itself, for when the Act was passed no remedy lay in the court for damage done by collision in a harbour within the body of a county, whereas there has been a remedy for it against the owners of a damaging vessel at common law, whether done within a county or on the high seas. Had the Act been intended to apply to a proceeding in rem, the addition of the words, "or against any vessel of the company," or a similar expression, would have made its meaning unquestionable. But I do not think it extends to the present proceeding, and I must refuse this motion with costs, and require the defendants to appear absolutely.

ERROR FROM THE EXCHEQUER.

(Before COCKBURN, C.J., and WILLES, BLACKBURN, MELLOR, BRETT, AND GROVE, JJ.)

CASTLE AND OTHERS v. PLAYFORD.

Vendor and purchaser—Marine contract—Receipt of bills of lading—Arrival and delivery of cargo at port—Purchaser on delivery of bills of lading to take all risks of the seas, &c.—Agreement to buy and receive cargo on arrival—Payment on delivery "at per ton weighed on board during delivery"—Loss of cargo—Liability of purchaser—Insurable interest—Construction of contract—Condition precedent.

By an agreement in writing between the plaintiffs (therein described as "vendors"), and the defendant therein described as "purchaser," the vendors agreed to ship on board a vessel a cargo of fresh water ice, "to be dispatched with all speed to any ordered port in the United Kingdom, the vendors forwarding bills of lading to the purchaser; and upon receipt thereof, the purchaser takes upon himself all the risks and dangers of the seas, &c., and the defendant agrees to buy and receive the said ice on its arrival at ordered port, and to pay for it in cash on delivery at the rate of 20s. per ton, weighed on board during delivery." The ice having been duly shipped and dispatched, and the bill of lading forwarded to, and received by, the defendant, the vessel and cargo were subsequently lost on the voyage by risks and dangers of the seas within the meaning of the above agreement.

The plaintiffs having, therefore, brought an action against the defendant to recover the value of the cargo, it was held on demurrer by the majority of the Court of Exchequer (Martin and Channell, B.B., dissentient, Cleasby B.), giving judgment, for the defendant, that the contract was not one of insurance but of purchase, and that under its terms, the arrival of the cargo, and ascertainment of its weight during delivery, were conditions precedent to the defendant's liability to pay the price or value of it, and that the clause relating to "the risks and dangers of the seas," &c., was to save the plaintiffs from liability, in case of loss before arrival, to an action for non delivery. But Cleasby, B., held that, on receipt of the bill of lading, the property passed to the defendant as purchaser, and the cargo was then at his risk, and insurable by him, and that a good cause of action was disclosed by the declaration. The plaintiffs having brought error, and also appealed from that decision, it was Held by the court of error (Cockburn, C.J., and Willes, Blackburn, Mellor, Brett and Grove, JJ.) reversing the decision of the majority of the court below, that, whether or not the property in the cargo passed to the defendant on the receipt of the bills of lading (which the court said it was not necessary to decide, though they strongly inclined to hold that it did pass with all its risks), yet that the defendant, the purchaser, having agreed to "take upon himself all the risks and dangers of the seas," &c., from the time he received the bills of lading, was liable to pay for the cargo according to a certain rate; and if, meantime, it perished through the perils of the seas, to pay for it according to a fair estimate of its value at the time it went down.

Fragano v. Long (4 B. & C. 210); and Alexander and another v. Gardner and another (1 Bing. N. C. 671; 4 L. J., N.S., 223, C.P.), cited and upheld by the court.

This was error from the decision of the Court of Exchequer in favour of the defendant upon cross demurrers to the declaration and plea. The declaration set out an agreement in writing dated the 25th March 1869, between the plaintiffs therein described as vendors, and the defendant therein described as purchaser, whereby the vendors agreed to ship with every dispatch during the month, and in the customary manner, a cargo of fresh water ice in square blocks, say cargo per result 170 register tons, more or less, at vendor's option, all in good and clean condition, and on the same being duly shipped, the vessel to be despatched with all speed, direct to any port the captain likes best, for orders to unload at one safe place in the United Kingdom; twenty-four hours allowed for waiting orders, lay days to count; the said vendors forwarding bills of lading to the purchaser, "and upon receipt thereof, the said purchaser takes upon himself all risks and dangers of the seas, rivers, and navigation, of whatever nature or kind soever; and the said H. Playford (the defendant), agreed to buy and receive the said ice on its arrival at ordered port, or so near thereunto, &c., purchaser taking the ice from alongside the vessel at his risk and expense at the rate of 25 tons per running day, Sundays excepted, and paying for the same in cash on delivery at and after the rate of 20s. sterling per ton of 20cwt., weighed on board during delivery." The declaration then alleged that the cargo of ice, 284 tons, was duly shipped and dispatched on the voyage, and that a bill of lading was forwarded by the plaintiffs to the defendant, and that he duly received the same; and that afterwards, during the voyage and the continuance of the said risks and dangers, the said cargo was wholly lost by risks and dangers of the seas, within the meaning of the said agreement; that all conditions were fulfilled, &c., yet the defendant had not paid the plaintiffs the value of the said cargo at and after the rate aforesaid. A second breach was assigned in that the defendant did not nor would take upon himself the risks and dangers of the seas and navigation according to the said agreement, whereby the value of the said cargo was wholly lost to the plaintiffs.

The defendant, by his sixth plea, as to the first breach, said that he was always ready and willing to buy and receive the said cargo on the arrival at the ordered port, &c., and to pay cash for the same on delivery thereof, &c., but that the said cargo of ice did not arrive at the ordered port, nor were the plaintiffs ready and willing to, nor did they deliver the same cargo there or elsewhere to the defendant according to the said agreement.

Demurrer and joinder in demurrer to the first count of the declaration, and the like to the sixth plea.

Upon the argument of the demurrers, the majority of the Court of Exchequer (Martin and Channell, BB.) were of opinion, in favour of the defendant, that the contract was not one of insurance, but of purchase, and that under its terms the arrival of the cargo and ascertainment of its weight during delivery, were conditions precedent to the defendant's liability to pay the price or value of it; and that the clause as to "the purchaser taking on himself the risks and dangers of the seas," &c., was to save the plaintiffs from liability in a certain event to an action for non-delivery, and they held that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover. But Cleasby, B., on the contrary, was of opinion that, on the receipt of the bill of lading, the property passed to the defendant as purchaser, and that the cargo was then at his risk and insurable by him, and that a good cause of action was disclosed by the declaration, and that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the amount thereby claimed: (See report of the case below, 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 407; 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 516; 30 L. J. 150, Ex.; L. Rep. 5 Ex. 165.)

The plaintiffs thereupon brought error from the above decision of the majority of the Court of Exchequer.

Points for argument on the part of the plaintiffs: First, that the delivery to and the receipt by the defendants of the bill of lading, after the dispatch of the vessel with the cargo duly shipped, was the only condition precedent to the plaintiffs' request to be paid for the cargo; secondly, that the receipt of the bill of lading by the defendant is equivalent to the receipt of the cargo, according to the terms of the contract; thirdly, that the defendant's liability arose upon the receipt by him of the bill of lading, and that the facts averred in the plea do not avoid such liability; fourthly, that the arrival of the ship at the ordered port is not a condition precedent to the plaintiff's right to have the defendant take upon himself all the risks and dangers of the seas, rivers, and navigation of whatever nature or kind soever; fifthly, that the matters mentioned as excusing, or in denial of the defendant's liability, are matters which, on the true construction of the contract, fall to the defendant alone, and do not affect the plaintiffs; sixthly, that the plaintiff will also contend that the first count of the declaration is good in substance, on grounds similar to those on which they insist that the defendant's sixth plea is bad.

Points for argument on the part of the defendant: First, that the first count of the declaration is bad, because it does not show that the cargo arrived at the place at which the defendant was to purchase and receive the same; secondly, that it shows that such cargo never did arrive at such place; thirdly, that such arrival was, by the terms of the contract between the parties, a condition precedent to the plaintiff's right to sue the defendant for the matters alleged as breaches of his contract; fourthly, that the defendant, by the terms of the contract, was not liable to pay for the cargo until it arrived at the ordered port, or to take upon himself the risks and dangers of the seas and navigation, unless the said cargo so arrived; fifthly, that the said first count, so far as it relates to the said breach, is insensible, because, the cargo having been lost before the same reached the defendant or the ordered port, he cannot be liable to the plaintiffs unless he took upon himself the said risks and dangers; sixthly, that the provision as to the defendant taking upon himself the risks and dangers of the seas, &c., was not intended to impose upon the defendant the doing or performing of any act for the not doing or performing of which he was to be liable to be sued by the plaintiffs, but as a mere condition or limitation of the plaintiff's contract; seventhly, that the defendant will also contend that the sixth plea is good, on the ground that, under the circumstances stated in that plea, the defendant never became liable to pay the value of the cargo; eighthly, that the arrival of the said cargo at the said ordered port was a condition precedent to the plaintiff's right to be paid the value of the same.

Philbrick, for the plaintiffs, now contended that under the words "upon receipt of the bill of lading the purchaser takes upon himself all risks," &c., the property vested in the purchaser at the moment the bill of lading was delivered, and that he, therefore, had the risk upon him; and though it might be hard upon him, it was nevertheless his loss, and he must bear it. The plaintiffs are not common carriers. The majority of the court below seemed to think that the clause casting all risks on the purchaser might be satisfied by holding its meaning to be that, if the cargo were lost then the purchaser should have no complaint against the vendors, on the ground of his not getting what he had bargained for. [BLACKBURN, J.—I agree with you in one sense; but then there is the subsequent clause, by which the purchaser agrees to pay for the cargo on its arrival, and your construction would make him liable to pay for it beforehand.] The principle was much discussed in Taylor and another v. Caldwell and another (The Surrey Music Hall case), in the Queen's Bench, 8 L.T. Rep. N. S. 356; 3 B. & P. 826; 32 L. J. 164, Q. B. [COCKBURN, C. J.—I do not see how you apply that case to the present one.] Even if the contract had been silent on this point and the clause relating to the defendant taking on himself all risks, &c., it would have had just as much effect as the court below have at present put upon it, and the defendant would still be liable on the contract, and it is in that way that that case seems to bear upon the present one. The contract contains two sets of provisions, first, a set of obligations binding on the vendors, and secondly a set of obligations on the part of the purchaser; both sets being correlative, and depending upon the contracts being carried out, that is to say, upon the arrival of the ice. And between these two sets comes the clause relating to the risks of the voyage. It may be admitted that there is an inconsistency between the two sets of clauses, but the different parts of this contract must be read as Cleasby, B. put it in his judgment below. In an ordinary mercantile sense the meaning and import of the words, "the purchaser takes on himself all risks, &c., of the sea," &c., is an assumption of an obligation that he will by insurance, protect himself against the happening of that which by the loss of the cargo, may prevent the vendors from completing their part of the contract. He assumes and takes upon himself the risk. [WILLES, J.—The cases of Fragan v. Long (4 B. & C. 219), and Alexander and another v. Gardner and another (1 Bing. N. C. 671; 4 L. J., N. S., 223, C. P.), do not appear to have been cited below. If the property passed, these cases decisively show that you are right.] The property in the ice passed to the defendant immediately on the bill of lading being delivered to him. He was then in a position to have insured his interest in it, and he ought to have done so, and must take the consequence of neglecting to do so. Arrival at port was not a condition precedent to the defendant's liability to pay.

Littler, for the defendants, contra.—The clause in question as to the risks and dangers of the seas, &c., is in fact a limitation in favour of the plaintiffs of their liability, and is not in any sense an increase of that of the defendant. If the plaintiffs ship the ice in good order, &c., then the defendant absolves them from any liability as to non-arrival of the cargo. It is a limitation on a condition to be performed by the plaintiffs. [COCKBURN, C. J.—If the defendant is not to pay for the ice till he receives it, what risk does he take upon himself?] He engages to absolve the vendor from the consequences of non-delivery by reason of the perils of the seas, &c. [BLACKBURN, J.—It says more than that.] Had this contract been drawn by a lawyer, it might be so, but it is an inartificially drawn instrument. [COCKBURN, C. J.—If people will draw their own contracts, and use words which, ordinarily speaking, can have but one meaning, they must not complain if a court of law so construes them.] It is contended that the effect of this contract is that only the property in so much or such part of the cargo (which, it must be remembered, was a melting cargo) as should arrive at port, passed by the delivery of the bill of lading to the defendant. The cases referred to by Willes, J. are distinguishable.

Philbrick did not reply.

COCKBURN, J.—I am of opinion that our judgment should be in favour of the plaintiffs. I am much disposed to think, though it is not necessary to decide the question upon the present occasion, that the effect of this contract was that the moment the cargo was shipped, and the bill of lading delivered to the defendant, the property thereupon passed to him. And I am confirmed the more strongly in that opinion by the fact that the parties to the agreement have introduced the clause, upon which the present dispute has arisen and the present question turns, immediately after the clause providing for the forwarding of the bills of lading, namely, that from the moment the bills of lading were delivered to the defendant, the latter should take upon himself all the risks and perils attendant upon the conveying of the cargo to the port of its destination. It seems to me that, when one person says to another "I will ship the cargo upon your account, and I will hand you the bills of lading (which are the indicia of the property), and give you the control of it, and you are from that moment to undertake all the risks attendant upon its transfer by sea," it is very strong evidence to show that it was intended by the parties that the property in the cargo, with all its risks, should pass. But I do not think it necessary to decide the case upon that ground. I put it only alternatively. But if that is not the construction and meaning of the contract, I think the true one is this: "If you, the sellers, will undertake to ship me a cargo of ice, and to forward it by a given vessel to London, and hand me the bills of lading, so that I may have the control over the cargo, and the distribution of it, I will engage, when it arrives, to pay you according to what may be the turn-out (that is the technical term, I believe), the value, in fact, of the cargo; and if in the mean time, while it is upon the seas, it shall be lost and perish through the perils of the seas, I will undertake to pay you for it according to what may be estimated to have been its fair value at the time of its going down." That I take to be the true construction of this contract, and I do not think that it was intended to make the stipulation that the cargo should be at the risk of the purchaser, or in other words, to make the liability of the purchaser, to take the risk of the cargo contingent upon the fact of the cargo's arriving or not arriving in this country, which is the proposition contended for on the part of the defendant. If the first construction that I have been disposed to put upon this contract is right, then, the property having passed, the stipulation as to time and mode of payment would seem to have been put in merely with regard to the measure of price; but I do not, as I have already observed, think it necessary to rest my view of the case upon that construction of the contract, although I entertain a very strong opinion about it. It is enough that the contract is such as would be consistent with the second construction, namely, that the defendant undertook that, if the cargo should be shipped and the bills of lading transferred to him, he would pay for it according to what might be a fair estimate of its value at the port of destination at the time it went down.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. My impression is that the effect of this contract is that the property passed; but I do not think that it is necessary to decide that question now. Generally speaking, the risk follows the property, so that when we are discussing what the risk is, it is material to see where the property is. Now, in the present case, the parties have agreed that, whether the property passed or not, the purchaser should, on receipt of the bills of lading, take all the risks and damages of the seas upon himself; yet what risk he took upon himself, if Mr. Littler's contention be correct, I do not at all see, unless it was that he said, "If the goods are lost by the perils and dangers of the seas, I shall take the risk of having lost the property, whether it be mine or not." I can put no other sensible construction on the words which the parties themselves have used. The difficulty in the case is that which was put by the court below, with regard to the clause which specified the time of payment. No doubt it was provided that the defendant was to pay for the ice on the arrival of the ship, and according to what was weighed out and delivered. That was the time provided for payment, and that time never arrived, the ship and cargo having gone to the bottom of the sea. But in the cases to which my brother Willes referred in the course of the argument of Fragano v. Long (4 B. & C. 219), and Alexander v. Gardner (1 Bing. N. C. 671; 4 L. J., N. S., 233, C. P.), it was held that this made no difference, and if the property did perish before the time for payment came, that time being dependent upon delivery, and if the delivery was prevented by the destruction of the property, the purchaser must pay an equivalent sum. So, in the present case, there would be at the time the vessel went down so much ice on board, and, as a matter of probability, during an ordinary voyage a certain quantity would have melted away, for which a reasonable deduction could easily be made; and what the defendant has taken upon himself to pay is the amount which in all probability would have been payable for the ice upon its delivery. It would be much the same amount as upon an open insurance, as my brother Willes has observed; and doubtless the merchants, in inserting this clause, were considering who were to pay the premiums of insurance for insuring the cargo, and the defendant seems to have said, "As soon as the bills of lading come to me I will pay the premiums or stand my own insurer." I am therefore of opinion that the judgment of the court below should be reversed.

COURT OF ADMIRALTY.

Reported by J. P. ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Monday, Feb. 19, 1872.

THE SCOUT.

Salvage—Charterer—Owner—Right to salvage reward—Consolidated suit—Right of plaintiff to be heard separately—Practice.

A charterer hired a ship from her owner under a charter-party, which stipulated that the charterer should bear all expenses, pay the wages of the crew, and all charges incidental to the running of the steamer, except marine insurance, and that the steamer should be delivered up at the termination of the engagement in the same and as good condition as she was at the time of the hiring. The steamer performed salvage services, and, in consolidated suits instituted on behalf of the owner, the charterer, and the master and crew, it was held that, in respect of the services rendered by the vessel itself, the charterer, and not the owner, was, under the charter-party, entitled to salvage reward, as the vessel was at his risk, and he had to bear the expense incidental to the service.

Where salvage suits have been consolidated by order of the court, but it appears that the interest of one of the plaintiffs conflicts with those of the others, the court will give leave for that plaintiff to appear separately by counsel at the hearing.

THIS was a consolidated cause of salvage instituted on behalf of the owners, master, and crew of the paddle steamer Prince Frederick William and J. W. Churchward, the charterer of that steamer, against the steamer Scout and her owners, the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company. The Prince Frederick William was a steamer of 215 tons register and 120-horse power, and was employed in carrying the mails between Calais and Cherbourg. On the 31st Jan. 1871 she left Dover for Calais, and at about 8.20 a.m., near the West Riding Buoy, she came upon a boat making signals for assistance, and found her to be a boat belonging to the Scout. In consequence of information from the boats crew, the Prince Frederick William proceeded towards Cape Grisnez, and at about 9.30 a.m. found the Scout at anchor off the rocks near that place. The Scout had struck on the rocks and had sustained considerable damage, but as the tide made had slipped. She would have sunk had she not been built in water-tight compartments. The weather was thick and foggy, but not rough. The Scout belonged to the defendants, but was also employed in the mail service between Cherbourg and Calais, and was under charter to J. G. Churchward, who had the mail contract. The Scout had left Calais for Cherbourg on Jan. 30th, and had struck the rocks at 2.30 a.m. on Jan. 31st. A Mr. Thomsett was agent at Calais both for the plaintiff Churchward and the defendants. Just as the Prince Frederick William came up Mr. Thomsett arrived alongside the Scout in a small steamer called the Poste, belonging to the defendants. By his orders the passengers and mails were transferred from the Scout to the Poste which proceeded to Calais, and the Prince Frederick William got a hawser on board the Scout and towed her to Calais Roads, which were reached in about two hours, Thomsett going on board the Prince Frederick William. The two vessels anchored in the roads to await the tide, and afterwards got into Calais harbour about 6 p.m. in the same day. The towage service lasted about two hours and a half. The defendant's answer contained, amongst others, the following paragraph :

15. The Prince Frederick William at the time when she was so employed by the said Mr. Thomsett, as aforesaid, was under his control, in his capacity as agent of the plaintiff, J. G. Churchward, and was so employed by the said Mr. Thomsett, as aforesaid, in performance of her duty as a vessel under charter to the plaintiff, J. G. Churchward.

The charter-party of the Prince Frederick William, above referred to, was as follows :—

Kearsney Abbey, Dover, 28 Jan. 1871.

Thomas Sterling Begbie, Esq., owner of P. S. Prince Frederick William, 4, Mansion-place, London, E.C.

Sir,—Referring to the negotiations between Mr. A. B. Godbold and yourself, I agree to charter from you the P. S. Prince Frederick William, from the 30th inst., for the purpose of running between Calais and Cherbourg or other intermediate French ports, and to pay you £40 per week, payable weekly in advance, for the use of the steamer, it being understood and agreed that I am to pay all expenses of the crew, fuel, oil, tallow, dues, repairs and all other costs and charges incidental to the running of the steamer, excepting only marine insurance, which is to be defrayed by you.

It is understood that this charter-party is to continue as long as the steamer is required by the exigencies of the French postal service to run between the above-mentioned ports, but terminable at any time by either party on giving seven days' written notice.

The steamer to be delivered up by me on the termination of her employment under this charter at Dover free of expense to you in the same and as good condition as she is now, reasonable wear and tear excepted.

Captain J. R. Heppert is not to be removed from the command without your consent except in the event of misconduct on his part.

J. G. CHURCHWARD.

The terms of the charter-party under which the Scout was running did not appear. Two suits were originally instituted, each in 800*l.*, and bail was given for 1600*l.*, but by an order of the court was reduced to 800*l.*, and the suits were consolidated.

Bruce applied to the court to be heard separately for the plaintiff, J. G. Churchward, on the ground that his interests were distinct from, and opposed to, those of the other plaintiffs.

The Admiralty Advocate (Dr. Deane, Q.C.), and Clarkson, for the other plaintiffs, objected on the ground that the suits had been consolidated by an order of the court, and were under the conduct of one solicitor.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE gave Bruce leave to be heard separately.

The Admiralty Advocate, for the owners, master, and crew of the Prince Frederick William. Thomsett had no power under the charter-party to give orders to the Prince Frederick William to render this salvage service. The charterer was to pay all expenses, but only such as were incidental to running the steamer upon the mail route and not expense of rendering salvage. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE cited Fenton v. The Dublin Steam Packet Company (8 Ad. & Ell., 835.) There the owners were responsible for damage done, and would have had the right to salvage. This case is even stronger, as the owner is bound to pay all insurances, and is therefore responsible for damage and loss. If this service had delayed the performance of the mail contract, the loss would have fallen on the owners. In the Sappho (L. Rep. 3 Adm. and Ec. 142; 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 711; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 521) the ships belonged to the same owners, whilst here the charter-party does not divest the owners of their rights.

Bruce for the charterer, the plaintiff, J. G.

Churchward.—By the charter the Prince Frederick William was to be delivered up in as good condition as at the time of making the contract, and therefore any damage done to her on this service would be borne by the charterer. He would have borne any loss subject to what might be recovered under the insurance. As the charterer was liable for the damage, he is entitled to the salvage. It has never been decided that deviation to render salvage puts an end to a policy, and it is doubtful whether it would; and it is therefore always an element in considering the risk, and that risk was the charterer's. The charterer is bound to pay the extra expenses and the wages of the crew. A charterer may recover salvage against another vessel of which he is also charterer; The Collier (L. Rep. 1 Adm. & Ec. 83; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 155; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 473). In the absence of the charter of the Scout, it must be presumed to have been in the ordinary form and to have left the ownership in the defendants.

Milward, Q.C. (W. G. F. Phillimore with him), for the defendants.—The service cannot be called a salvage service, or, at any rate, it is so small that it ought to have been brought in the County Court. The sum in which the suits were instituted was excessive.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The court regrets that this case should have come here at all; it should have been settled out of court by arrangement between the parties. This was a claim for salvage service rendered by the steamship Prince Frederick William to the steamship Scout, and I am of opinion that an undoubted salvage service has been performed. [His Lordship then stated the facts.] The service, however, was of a very slight character. There was no danger either to the salving vessel or to her master and crew. It was rather a towage service elevated into a salvage service by the risk that would have been run by the Scout if she had been left where she was. Now with regard to the rights of the respective claimants to recover salvage reward, The Collier (sup.) and The Sappho (sup.) show that the master and crew have a right to recover in this case, although the two vessels may have been in the hands and at the absolute disposal of the same person as owner, so long as their services were not included in the terms under which they served; but the question as to who is entitled here to recover as owner is more difficult. Looking, however, at the terms of the charter-party under which the Prince Frederick William was then running, I am of opinion that the charterer was pro hac vice owner. He had to bear all expenses, to pay the wages of the crew, and in case of damage to the vessel, would have been bound under the charter to repair her. He was bound to deliver her up to the general owners in good condition. He would have suffered loss, and not the general owner, in case the contract to carry the French mails had been broken. As I consider the service very trifling, I shall award to the charterer, master, and crew the sum of 30*l.* Now, as to costs. Although I do not consider this case ought to have come here, still I think that, considering the circumstance that there was a question of law to be decided, the plaintiffs are entitled to some costs, and I shall therefore exercise the useful power that this court has always exercised, and award the sum of 25*l. nomine expensarum*, which will approximate to the sum that they would have been entitled to if the suit had been brought in a County Court. As to the owner, Mr. Begbie, he has no claim for salvage at all, and therefore his suit, as far as he himself is concerned, is dismissed with costs. The salving ship was the chief agent in the salvage, and therefore the sum will be apportioned thus: 20*l.* to the charterer, and 10*l.* to the master and crew.

Where a solicitor in a cause in the Admiralty Court has acquired, by order of the court under 23 & 24 Vict. c. 127, s. 28, or otherwise, a lien for his costs upon a ship, as for property recovered or preserved by his exertions, or upon its proceeds in court, his lien takes precedence of liens for necessaries supplied after the institution against the ship of the cause in respect of which he is intitled to costs, but not of liens for necessaries supplied before the institution of that cause.

His lien takes precedence of the lien of the master of the ship for his wages where the master is also part owner, and has instructed him to defend the cause.

THIS was a motion made on behalf of W. Jenkins, a solicitor, for the payment to him out of the proceeds of the sale of the German vessel, the Heinrich, then in court, of his costs incurred in defending the vessel in a suit for damage to, and non-delivery of cargo instituted against her and her freight by the owners of cargo lately laden on board of her. Mr. Jenkins successfully defended the vessel in the suit, from which she was dismissed with costs: (see 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 914; ante, p. 79.) That suit (No. 5459) was instituted on Sept. 15, 1870.

On 10th Nov. 1871, a suit of necessaries (No. 5874) was instituted against the Heinrich on behalf of Messrs. J. F. and A. Alexander, and their claim was pronounced for by the court 19th Nov. without prejudice to other claims, and was referred to the registrar and merchant; the vessel was sold in this suit, and the proceeds brought into court.

On 20th Dec. 1871, a cause of necessaries (No. 5936) was instituted against the Heinrich on behalf of Messrs. Van Weenan and Co., the ship's agents at Falmouth, and on Feb. 6, 1872, this claim was pronounced by the court without prejudice to other claims. On 20th Jan. 1872, a cause of wages (No. 5983) was instituted against the proceeds of the Heinrich, on behalf of Jacob Heinrich Krull, late master of the vessel; and this was also pronounced for by the court. On 16th Jan. 1872, the court, upon a motion upon affidavits alleging that the shipowners were foreigners, and unable to pay, after hearing counsel for the defendant in the original suit (No. 5459), and for the various claimants, pronounced that the solicitors for the defendants were entitled (under 23 & 24 Vict. c. 127, s. 28) to a charge upon the Heinrich or her proceeds when paid into court, and also upon the balance of freight remaining in court, in exoneration for his and his agents' taxed costs, charges, and expenses in reference to the above suit (No.

5459), reserving all questions of priority, and ordered the costs to be taxed. On 15th Feb. 1872, the taxed bill of costs was filed, and amounted to 60*3l.* 5*s.* 9*d.* In the cause of necessaries (No. 5936), some of the supplies had been furnished before and some after the institution of the cause on behalf of the owners of the cargo (No. 5459). In the other cause of necessaries (No. 5874) all the supplies were furnished after the institution of cause (No. 5459). The master of the Heinrich, plaintiff in cause (No. 5983), was also part owner, had instructed the solicitor, and also ordered the necessaries. The balance of proceeds in court was insufficient to pay even the taxed costs. The owners of cargo were bankrupt, and had scheduled the taxed costs given against them in their suit. The amount of the dividend on these costs was 314*l.*

Clarkson in support of the motion.—The solicitor has a lien upon the proceeds for his costs, and is entitled to priority over the claim for such necessaries as were supplied after the institution of the cause by the owners of cargo if not over such as were supplied before. The shipowners employed the solicitor to protect the ship from that suit, and he succeeded. He is entitled to the same priority as the owners of cargo would have had if they had succeeded. He has preserved the res against which these claims for necessaries are made, and, if these had been sufficient to satisfy all, would have preserved it for them, and is therefore entitled to priority. Persons supplying necessaries to a ship under arrest do so at their peril, and must forego their claim against the res if the proceeds are insufficient. Independently of the charge given by the court under the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 127, s. 28, a solicitor has a lien upon the res preserved.

Bayford, for claimants in cause (No. 5936).—Under the statute no lien exists until the declaration is made by the court, and the lien can only attach then. Our supplies have preserved the solicitor's security, and we have a maritime lien; (The Ella A. Clark (Bro. & Lush. 32; 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 119; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 325). A solicitor can have no better claim than the shipowner as against material men, who are not benefited by the success. If the owners of cargo had succeeded, they could only have recovered damages subject to the maritime lien for necessaries. Before the solicitor can claim for costs against the proceeds he should attempt to obtain the dividend declared by the owners of cargo, in respect of their taxed costs. No lien can attach before the work, in respect of which it is claimed, is done, without express enactment, and, therefore, part of this claim, at any rate, only attaches from the date of the dismissal of the suit, and is subject to other claims.

Shepherd for the claimants in cause (No. 5874), and for the master (No. 5983).—A solicitor's lien is not on the same footing as a maritime lien and cannot be enforced as against third parties. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE cited The Jeff Davis (L. Rep. 2 Adm. & Ecc. 1; 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 151; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 555.) That case was against a person who had only the same rights as the owner, and is against the decision of the Court of Exchequer: (Hurff v. Edwards, 1 H. & N. 171.) The master is entitled to be paid for wages due previous to his employment of the solicitor.

the owners of cargo are due not to the solicitor but to his clients. He is not bound to seek payment of this money and so incur expense. Haymes v. Cooper (sup.) was a question between a solicitor and third parties. The master was a part owner, and cannot have his claim preferred to that of a solicitor whom he employed.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—In this case the sum in court is inadequate to meet the demands made upon it by the various claimants, and the sole question for my decision is whether Mr. Jenkins, the solicitor for the owners of the Heinrich, is entitled to be paid his costs in priority to the other claimants. The Heinrich is a foreign ship, her owners are foreigners, and I think enough appears upon the papers before me to show that they are unable to pay the costs due to their solicitor. The Heinrich was arrested in this court in a suit instituted under the 6th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, and the plaintiffs in this suit would, if successful, have absorbed every farthing of the sum now in court. Mr. Jenkins defended the suit, and defended it successfully, and therefore has, I think, both equitably and under the statute placed himself in the position of a person who has preserved the property. But as the proceeds of the property are now in court and under the control of the court, I think that the question as to their proper distribution is to be decided not merely by looking at the words of the statute, but upon general principles. Having regard to the rights which solicitors in this court have always enjoyed, and to the principles laid down in Haymes v. Cooper (33 L. J. Ch. 488) and The Jeff. Davis (L. Rep. 2 A. & E. 1), I think the solicitor for the owners of the Heinrich is entitled to priority over all claims for necessaries supplied after the institution of the original suit by the owners of cargo. But I must not be understood as intimating that the solicitor is entitled to priority over the claims in respect of necessaries supplied before the institution of the original suit or over claims in respect of money advanced to pay dues incurred before the institution of the original suit. As regards the claim of the master, it is clear that he cannot enforce his claim for wages to the prejudice of the claim of the solicitor he himself employed, more especially as he is also part owner.

THE MARPESIA.

Collision—Inevitable accident—Issue raised by pleadings—Onus of proof—Costs.

Inevitable accident in point of law is that which the party charged with the offence could not possibly prevent by the exercise of ordinary care, caution, and maritime skill.

The Virgil (2 W. Rob. 201) followed and approved.

Where, in a cause of collision, the defence of inevitable accident is raised, the onus of proof lies in the first instance upon the plaintiffs, who must establish that blame does attach to the vessel proceeded against. The onus attaches to the defendants only after a primâ facie case of negligence and want of due seamanship has been shown against them.

The Bolina (3 Notes of cases, 210), followed and approved.

If a party to a collision suit intends to rely upon a particular act of negligence he is bound to set out that act in his pleadings, and it is not sufficient that the act may be included in an allegation in the pleadings which does not clearly express their intention, as the not having stated it is likely to mislead the other party and prevent him coming to meet that case.

Two sailing vessels were meeting end on in a dense fog and sighted each other at a distance of about 200 yards. The defendants' vessel having been close hauled on the port tack was then preparing to go about, and had eased off her head sheets. Both vessels immediately ported but came into collision. The plaintiffs' petition alleged that the defendants' vessel neglected to port, and it was proved in answer to a question by the Judge of the Admiralty Court that the head sheets of the defendants were not again hauled aft. On this evidence the vessel was found to blame, on the ground that she had not executed all the proper manœuvres which she might have executed after sighting the other vessel. Only one minute elapsed between the time of sighting and the collision.

Held (reversing the decision of the court below), that the collision was the result of an inevitable accident, the defendants' vessel having done all that could be effected by ordinary care, caution, or maritime skill in the short space of time that elapsed; and that the plaintiffs, if they meant to rely upon the head sheets not having again been hauled back, ought to have alleged that fact in their petition, the allegation of the neglect to port not sufficiently indicating the nature of the charge.

The rule of the Admiralty Court in cases where a collision is found to be the result of inevitable accident, is to make no order as to costs, unless it can be shown that the suit was brought unreasonably and without sufficient primâ facie grounds, and this rule is followed by the Court of Appeal.

The London (Bro. & Lush, 82; 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 348; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 398), followed.

THIS was an appeal from the High Court of Admiralty in a cause of damage by collision, instituted on behalf of the owners of the barque America (the respondents), and of her cargo, against the ship Marpesia. The petition of the respondents (the plaintiffs) in the court below was as follows:—

1. The America was a barque of 379 tons register, or thereabouts, and at the time of the occurrence hereinafter mentioned, she was manned by a crew of thirteen hands, all told.

2. On the 20th May 1870 the said vessel left Queens-town, bound for Glasgow, with a cargo of sugar.

3. At about ten a.m. of the 21st May 1870, the said vessel, in the prosecution of her said voyage, was about six miles from the Saltee's Lightship. The wind was moderate, from about S.W. by S., the tide was flood, and there was a thick fog on the water. The America was proceeding at the rate of about four knots an hour, heading about E. by S., a good look-out being kept on board of her, and her fog horn being sounded every three minutes, or oftener.

4. Under these circumstances, a vessel, which afterwards proved to be the Marpesia, was observed by those on board the America, at a short distance off, and apparently right ahead of that vessel, or nearly so.

[Priv. Co.]

THE MARPESIA.

[Priv. Co.]

5. The helm of the America was at once ported, but although those on board the America shouted to the Marpesia to port, the latter vessel came on, and struck the America on the port side, near the main rigging, and did her so much damage that the America at once sank, and with the cargo was totally lost.

6. Notwithstanding the thick fog that prevailed before and at the time of the said collision, those on board the Marpesia improperly neglected to sound the fog horn on board that vessel, in violation of the regulations in that behalf made and provided.

7. The Marpesia was proceeding at an improper rate of speed considering the state of the weather.

8. A good look-out was not kept on board the Marpesia.

9. Those on board the Marpesia improperly made default in not porting the helm of the said vessel.

10. The helm of the Marpesia was improperly starboarded.

11. The Marpesia improperly made default in not keeping out of the way of the America, as she was bound to do.

12. The aforesaid collision, and the consequent loss and damage to the plaintiffs, was caused by the circumstances in the six last preceding articles mentioned, or by some one or more of them, or otherwise by the default, negligence, and improper conduct of those on board the Marpesia, and was not in any way caused by those on board the America.

The appellants' (the defendants) answer in the court below was as follows :

1. On the 20th May 1870 the ship Marpesia, navigated by James Hounsell and a crew of thirty hands, left the port of Liverpool, laden with a general cargo, bound to Melbourne, South Australia.

2. The Marpesia proceeded in the prosecution of her said voyage, and at about ten a.m. of the 21st of the said month was in St. George's Channel, with the Saltees Light-ship, bearing about N.W., distant about six miles, and was proceeding close hauled by the wind on the port tack, with the mainsail and cross-jack furled, heading about west by north, or west north-west. The wind was S.W., a moderate breeze, and there was a thick fog. The tide was flood, and of the force of about two knots an hour. The Marpesia had her fog horn sounding at short intervals, and a good look-out was being kept on board of her.

3. At such time the helm of the Marpesia was put down for the purpose of bringing her from the port on to the starboard tack; and whilst she was in the act of staying, a vessel, which proved to be the America, was seen ahead a short distance off. The America was proceeding, under all square sail, with the wind on her starboard quarter. The helm of the Marpesia was immediately put hard-a-port, but the vessels came into collision, the Marpesia's jibboom taking the America's port main-rigging, and then the stem and port bow of the Marpesia taking the port side of the America, between the main and mizen rigging.

4. Save as herein appears, the defendants deny the statements contained in the petition in this cause.

5. The America was sailing under too great a press of sail, and at an improper speed.

6. The America neglected to keep out of the way of the Marpesia.

7. Those on board the America did not sound their fog horn.

8. The said collision was occasioned or contributed to by all or some of the matters set forth in articles 5, 6, and 7 of this answer.

9. The said collision was not in any way occasioned by any neglect or improper navigation on the part of the Marpesia; but, so far as she was concerned, was the result of inevitable accident.

The cause came on for hearing in the Admiralty Court on March 29th and 30th 1871, before Sir R. Phillimore, assisted by Trinity Masters. Witnesses were examined for both the plaintiffs and the defendants, the effect of whose evidence is sufficiently given in the judgments of the Court of Admiralty and of the Judicial Committee. The Admiralty Court held the Marpesia solely to blame, and deliver the following interlocutory decree:—

Sir R. Phillimore.—This is a cause of collision between two vessels, the America and the Marpesia. It took place about ten o'clock on the 21st May in last year (1870), not very far from what is called the Saltees Light-ship, on the south coast of Ireland. The Marpesia ran into the America abaft the main rigging with so much violence that she sank in a very short time and with her cargo was totally lost. Now, it has been truly said that there are points in this case which are common to both parties, and which are either admitted or have been proved by the evidence. The state of the wind is admitted to have been either S.W. by S. or S.W.; the difference is immaterial in its bearing on the circumstances of the case. The course of the America was E. by S., and the course of the Marpesia was W. by N. $\frac{1}{2}$ N. before she attempted to go into stays. Therefore I entirely agree with the opinion of the counsel on both sides, that the vessels must be considered as meeting vessels, and the rule of navigation, that both vessels should port their helms for the purpose of avoiding a collision should be applied to them. In the course of things, during the examination of the witnesses it has become tolerably clear that the America could not by any construction be held to blame for this collision; and it has been very properly admitted, as I expected it would be, by the counsel for the Marpesia, that the defence of the Marpesia must rest upon the accident being inevitable. The America was right in doing what she did, namely, in porting as soon as the Marpesia became visible. She ported, and came up from E. by S. to S.S.E., somewhat about five points. That there was at this time a thick fog is, I think, a matter beyond controversy. The main question is, whether if the Marpesia had been properly navigated, with a proper look out, she would not have seen the America in time to have avoided the collision by porting her helm. I understand her case to be this, that after sounding with the lead to ascertain her position, she was heading W. by N. $\frac{1}{2}$ N., that she luffed, and came up about two points, and then, while she was still under her starboard helm, intending to go into stays, she saw the head sails of the America emerging from the fog. Now, the distance at which the vessels were mutually visible appears to me, on a fair balance of the evidence, to be between 250 and 300 yards. The America, as I have said, had time, after sighting the Marpesia, to come up five points. The Marpesia, having luffed and come up two points, and being under a starboard helm, says that she had eased off her head sheets, as I understood her, and swung her crossjack, and then she discerned the America, and put her helm to port, and went off two or three points, and it is admitted that her sails were full at the time of the collision. Now I have no doubt myself, and the elder brethren of the Trinity House confirm me in this opinion, that the Marpesia could not be said to have been in stays in the sense of being out of command. All the circumstances show that she was in sufficient command to have obeyed the rule of navigation. The question therefore is, Did she take the proper measures for putting that rule into due execution? Now, she ported her helm, but I am instructed by the Elder Brethren that if she had accompanied that manœuvre by hauling aft the head sheets again, and letting go all the lee braces (and it is to be observed that all her hands were on deck at the time), in all probability she would have avoided the collision, and, at all events, have placed herself in a position of having done all in her power to prevent the accident. Not having done so, I must hold that she failed to execute the proper manœuvres, which, after sighting the America, it was competent for her to have executed, and, therefore, that she is to blame for this collision.

PRIV. CO.]

THE MARPESIA.

From this decree the owners of the Marpesia appealed, on the following amongst other grounds: First, because the evidence proved that the collision was the result of inevitable accident; secondly, because the evidence proved that the America was seen as soon as it was possible for those on board the Marpesia to see her, and that proper measures were immediately taken by the Marpesia; thirdly, because, owing to the short distance at which the America was seen, there was not sufficient time for the head sheets of the Marpesia to have been hauled in and her lee braces let go; fourthly, because there was not time for such measures to have been taken effectually, and so as to have avoided the collision; fifthly, because the judgment does not find, as a fact, that it was under the circumstances possible for those on board the Marpesia to have avoided the collision.

The respondents in their case on appeal submitted that the decree was right on the following amongst other grounds: First, because it is proved by the evidence that the America was not in any way to blame for the collision, and that the collision was not an inevitable accident by reason of the Marpesia being in stays or otherwise; secondly, because the aforesaid evidence shows that either there was not a good look out kept on board the Marpesia, or that if the America was observed as soon as she ought to have been by those on board the Marpesia, then that the helm of the Marpesia was not duly ported, nor proper steps taken to give effect to and assist the porting of the helm.

Butt, Q.C. and Clarkson for the appellants.—We contend that this collision was the result of inevitable accident. It could not have been avoided by the exercise of ordinary care, caution, and maritime skill: (The Virgil, 2 W. Rob. 201, 205). Our ship did everything in her power to avoid the collision, considering the time that elapsed between the America coming into view and the blow: (The Europa, 14 Jurist, 627; The Lochlibo, 3 W. Rob. 310, 318). The ground on which the judgment proceeds is that we did not do all we could to make our vessel answer her port helm. This was not raised by the plaintiffs, but by the court; and if the plaintiffs intended to rely upon it, they were bound to have stated it in their pleadings, so as to give us an opportunity of meeting their allegation by evidence. The court was not entitled to give judgment on an issue which was not raised by the pleadings: (The Ebenezer, 2 W. Rob. 206, 209; The Speed 2 W. Rob. 225, 227.) The plaintiffs were bound to prove their case secundum allegata.

Milward, Q.C. and Cohen for the respondents.—The sole point we now raise is whether the Marpesia was bound or not to assist her helm by her sails as found by the court below. We withdraw all other charges against her. First, with respect to the pleadings: The ninth article of our petition in the court below alleged that the Marpesia neglected to port her helm. This allegation refers not merely to the act of putting the helm itself to port, but to all other measures which a seaman would, in the exercise of his nautical skill, adopt for the purpose of throwing his ship's head to starboard, and so assisting his port helm. It was not necessary to allege in specific terms that the Marpesia neglected to haul aft her head sheets, as this was a part of the manœuvre of porting her helm, and would have assisted the ship in more effectually answering her helm. Secondly, with respect to inevitable accident: The rule at common law seems to be that a plaintiff is bound to give prima facie proof that the defendant is guilty of negligence, even where the defence of inevitable accident is set up, and not until that is done is the onus of proof shifted to the defendant; but in the Admiralty Court, where inevitable accident is pleaded, it is the practice for the defendants to begin, and the onus is therefore thrown upon them. The appellants are bound, therefore, to satisfy your Lordships that they did all they could to avoid the accident, and we contend that they have failed to do so. Thirdly, with respect to the default of the appellants—we contend that the evidence shows that there was a want of ordinary care and nautical skill on the part of the Marpesia in not taking the steps pointed out in the judgment below to avoid the collision. If the judgment of the court should go against us, we ought not to be condemned in costs, as we had good ground for instituting this suit:

The London, Bro. & Lush. 82; 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 348; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 398.

Butt, Q.C., in reply.—The rule at common law and in the Admiralty Court, as to the onus of proof, is the same. The plaintiffs are bound to show a prima facie case of negligence: (The Bolina, 2 Notes of Cases, 208.) They have failed here to establish any such case, and we are, therefore entitled to judgment.

Feb. 14.—The judgment of the court was delivered by Sir JAMES COLVILLE.—This is a case of collision brought by the owners of the barque America against the owners of the ship Marpesia, the America having been run down by the Marpesia in St. George's Channel on the 21st May 1870. The points raised by the appeal lie in an extremely narrow compass. It is admitted on all hands that the collision took place in daylight, about ten o'clock in the morning, but in a very thick fog, in which the vessels could only discern each other at a very short distance. It is found by the learned judge of the Admiralty that the distance at which they could have been visible to each other was not more than from 250 to 300 yards. It is now admitted on the side of the Marpesia that no blame is attributable to the America; and it would further appear that neither in the court below nor now is it seriously contended that the Marpesia was in fault in any of the particulars which are specially stated in the petition of the America, unless it be in one to be afterwards considered. It is no longer contended that she was proceeding at an improper rate of speed considering the state of the weather. It is no longer contended that a good look-out was not kept on board that vessel; nor is it now contended that her helm was improperly starboarded, or that she made default in not keeping out of the way of the America as she was bound to do. The only point which is now made by Mr. Milward is, that it cannot be said that those on board the Marpesia did not make default in not porting the helm of their vessel within the proper sense to be attached to those words. The clear and admitted facts of the case seem to be these: The vessels were proceeding one down the Irish Channel and the other up the Irish Channel in a thick fog. They could not have seen each other at a distance of more than 300 yards. Their lordships are rather disposed upon the evidence to say that 300 yards is an extreme limit, and that the distance within which each was visible to the other was probably nearer 200 yards. The combined speed of the vessels would seem upon the evidence to have been about eight knots an hour, and the result of this state of things is, that not more than a minute, if so much as a minute, must have been the time which elapsed between the sighting of the two vessels by each other and the actual collision. It is further admitted that the two vessels were proceeding in such a manner as that, under the sailing rules, each would be bound to port its helm; that they were in fact approaching each other stem on. It is also established by the evidence, that immediately before the Marpesia, which had been close hauled on the port tack, sighted the America she was proceeding to tack. It may be a question how far she had gone in a manoeuvre, but she had put down her helm, and had come up two or three points, and was in the act of altering her rigging in order to complete the operation of tacking. When, however, the two vessels sighted each other, her helm was shifted, and put, as they were bound to put it, hard-a-port. In that state of things, what is attributed to the Marpesia by the judgment, and substantially the only fault that has been imputed to her at the bar, is that she did not do something more than port her helm; that she did not take steps, which it is assumed she might have taken, in order to put the foresails into such a position that the full pressure of the wind whilst she was under the port helm would come upon them; and also to ease the pressure of the wind upon the after sails of the vessel; the result of which operation would have been, that she would have paid off more rapidly under the port helm than she did; and in that way, as it is contended, might have gone clear of the America. The finding of the learned judge in the court below on this point is in these words:—"Now she ported her helm, &c." (their Lordships here set out the latter part of the judgment of the court below). It is to be observed that the judge does not in terms find that the collision would have been avoided, if she had done that which it is stated she omitted to do. His finding is only that in all probability she would have avoided the collision, and that at all events she would have been in a position, in which her owners might have said more unanswerably that she had done all in her power to prevent the accident. As far as their Lordships can see, the negligence thus imputed was not made a point in the cause, until the learned judge, acting upon the advice of the elder brethren, gave his judgment. The omission is not expressly alleged in the pleadings as a culpable omission on the part of the Marpesia. Mr. Milward contends that it is included in the allegation that she did not port her helm, because he says that if she had done what she omitted to do to her sails, she would have answered the port helm more effectually. But it appears to their Lordships that, if that was the case intended to be made, the pleadings ought to have stated it, and not having stated it was likely to mislead the parties and prevent their coming to meet that case. Now do their Lordships find that the point was really raised by the cross-examination? There was, no doubt, a good deal of cross-examination of the captain and one of the other witnesses as to the discrepancies between the evidence they gave at the trial, and the statements in the log as to what had been done with the cross-jack yards and other parts of the rigging; but it seems to their Lordships that that cross-examination was directed rather to show that the ship was not, as had been stated in the log, and in the case originally put forward by the captain, almost at rest as if she had been at anchor, and that the operation of the tacking had gone so far that she might be said to be technically "in stays," and therefore not under control; and, consequently, that the cross-examination was directed to show that there was a greater speed upon her than was admitted. The only place in which their Lordships can find that the point was directly raised in the evidence, was in the examination by the court, not of the captain, but of the mate, at page 39 of the case, and there, no doubt, the court asks the question, "Were the head-sheets let go?" The answer is, "Eased off." That would only go to show what was the state of the vessel at the time. The court then goes on to ask, "And when were they hauled back again?" The answer is, "Never hauled back at all, not until we struck." If that omission were intended at the time to be treated as culpable negligence, one would have expected that the examination would have been continued in order to give the parties an opportunity of explaining the fact. But as far as their Lordships can see, it was mainly on these questions and answers that the elder brethren suggested, and the learned judge found, that there had been a culpable omission on the part of the Marpesia. In consequence of one of the arguments at the Bar, it seems desirable to say something as to the burthen imposed upon a vessel that seeks to excuse itself for a collision on the ground of inevitable accident. Mr. Milward suggested that there is some difference of practice between the Court of Admiralty and the courts of common law in that matter. Their Lordships, however, cannot find that there is any such difference. They take the law as they find it laid down by Dr. Lushington in two cases. In the case of the Bolina (3 Notes of Cases, 208), Dr. Lushington says, "With regard to inevitable accident, the onus lies on those who bring a complaint against a vessel, and who seek to be indemnified. On them is the onus of proving that the blame does attach upon the vessel proceeded against, the onus of proving inevitable accident does not necessarily attach to that vessel; it is only necessary when you show a prima facie case of negligence and want of due seamanship." Again, in the case of the Virgil (2 W. Rob. 205), the same learned judge gives this definition of inevitable accident:—"In my apprehension, an inevitable accident in point of law is this, viz., that which the party charged with the offence could not possibly prevent by the exercise of ordinary care, caution, and maritime skill. If a vessel charged with having occasioned a collision, should be sailing at the rate of eight or nine miles an hour, when she ought to have proceeded only at the speed of three or four, it will be no valid excuse for the master to aver that he could not prevent the accident at the moment it occurred; if he could have used measures of precaution that would have rendered the accident less probable." Here we have to satisfy ourselves that something was done or omitted to be done, which a person exercising ordinary care and caution and maritime skill in the circumstances, either would not have done, or would not have left undone, as the case may be. Their Lordships, considering the admitted time which elapsed after the two vessels had sighted each other to have been not more than a minute, and the state in which the Marpesia was, in attempting to go about, have failed to come to the conclusion that the captain was to blame for having omitted to do that which the judgment seems to find that he might have done. It is a question entirely of navigation, and therefore it is one upon which they have felt at liberty to consult the gentlemen who assist them; and they have been confirmed in the opinion, which they would have formed themselves from all the circumstances of the case, it being the opinion of those gentlemen that the time was so short that the omission to do that which has been said ought to have been done with the rigging and the sails cannot be imputed as negligence, or anything approaching to negligence, in the master of the Marpesia. It may be observed that this view of the case is in some measure confirmed by a statement of the master of the America, who, in his examination before the receiver of wreck said, "There was no time to alter sails on either vessel, and the only precautions were confined to the helm." Their Lordships having, for these reasons, come to the conclusion that the collision in this case was one of those unfortunate accidents in navigation which no ordinary care, caution, or maritime skill could have prevented, are compelled to dissent from the finding of the learned judge of the Admiralty that the Marpesia was solely to blame. They will therefore humbly recommend Her Majesty to allow the appeal, to reverse the judgment of the court below, and to dismiss the suit. Their Lordships will consider the subject of costs.

[Priv. Co.]

THE MARPESIA.

On the following day their Lordships added:—With regard to the question of costs which was reserved yesterday, their Lordships have considered that matter. They find that in the case of The London (Bro. & Lush. 82), Dr. Lushington stated:—"In this case the court has found that the collision was an inevitable accident, and pronounced against the damages; and the only question now is whether the plaintiff ought to be condemned in costs. I quite agree with Mr. Brett that on principle costs ought to follow the event;" (that is also their Lordships' view); "but if there is any set rule of practice, it is necessary to abide by that. I have caused inquiry to be made, and I find that in these cases of inevitable accident the usual practice, the general rule I may call it, has been to make no order as to costs, as I had occasion to state in the Itinerant (2 W. Rob. 231.) But looking to all the cases, it is clear that the court still holds, and will on occasion exercise, a discretionary power to condemn in costs. Thus in the Thornley (7 Jurist, 600), I ordered the plaintiff to pay costs, saying that he had not sufficient ground for bringing his action. I deem myself, therefore, free to consider the circumstances of the case; and I must say that, considering the collision took place on a most tempestuous night, a night in which in this one place eight vessels were wrecked, the plaintiff had good reason to think the collision was a mere accident which could not have been avoided, and that he was unduly rash in bringing his action." Their Lordships therefore conceive that the general rule of the Court of Admiralty is in these cases to make no order as to costs, and that in order to justify an exception to that rule it must be shown that the action was brought unreasonably and without sufficient prima facie grounds. In the present case they cannot say that there were not such grounds. The case is one in which the unsuccessful party might fairly suppose there was ground to impute blame to the other, and seek to have that question tried. Therefore there will be no costs in the court below; and as the party came here to support the decree which he had obtained, there will be no order as to the costs of this appeal. The order, therefore, which their Lordships will recommend Her Majesty to make is that the appeal be allowed, that the judgment of the Court of Admiralty be reversed, and that in lieu thereof a judgment be made declaring that the collision was the result of inevitable accident, and ordering that the suit be dismissed without costs, and that each party do bear their own costs of this appeal.

Appeal allowed.

WILSON v. WILSON.

Mortgage of ship—Right to freight—Priority—Notice.

A, mortgaged a ship, then on her outward voyage, to B., and the mortgage was duly registered. Three days before the mortgage of the ship, A, mortgaged the homeward freight to C., but C. omitted to give notice of such mortgage to B.

Held, that B. was entitled to the homeward freight.
Lindsay v. Gibbs (22 Beav. 522), observed upon.

In May 1866, Joseph Wilson, a merchant in Liverpool, was the sole owner of a ship named the Kenilworth, then on a voyage from Liverpool to Calcutta, and in the course of business he had dealings with the Union Bank of Liverpool.

On the 15th May 1866 he executed to the bank a mortgage of the Kenilworth, in the statutory form, as security for advances, and this mortgage was duly registered on the 18th. On the same 15th May the plaintiff, Mary Wilson, who was the mother of Joseph Wilson, at his request, executed to the bank, as a further or collateral security, a mortgage of certain shares which she held in another ship named the Refuge.

On the 12th May 1866, three days before the mortgage of the Kenilworth, Joseph Wilson executed a deed of assignment, by which, in consideration of his mother granting the mortgage to the bank of her shares in the Refuge, he assigned to her all his right and interest in the freight and earnings of the Kenilworth on her voyage from Liverpool to Calcutta, and also in all succeeding or intermediate voyages.

On the arrival of the Kenilworth at Marseilles, which was her port of destination on her return voyage from Calcutta, the captain received instructions from the plaintiff to dispose of the cargo and receive the freight on her behalf, but the bank, immediately on the ship's arrival, by their agent, put a lien on the ship and freight, and subsequently received payment of the freight upon an understanding that they should account for it to the plaintiff. The question in this suit was whether the freight earned by the Kenilworth on her homeward voyage from Calcutta to Marseilles belonged to the plaintiff under the above-mentioned deed of assignment, or to the bank under their mortgage.

It did not appear from the evidence that any formal notice of the assignment was given by the plaintiff to the bank prior to their mortgage. Joseph Wilson, however, stated that on the 16th, the day after the mortgage, he mentioned to the defendant, James Wilson, the manager of the bank, that he had already mortgaged the freight; but James Wilson positively denied that either he or the bank had had any notice whatever of the assignment to the plaintiff.

In June 1866, Joseph Wilson became insolvent, and executed a deed for the benefit of his creditors.

Glasse, Q.C. and Wintle, for the plaintiff, contended that she was entitled to the homeward freight, and cited Glasse, in reply.

THE VICE-CHANCELLOR.—The point which I have to decide is probably one of considerable importance on a point of mercantile law, but I cannot say that I feel much doubt about it. In the year 1866 Mary Wilson, a widow lady of Liverpool, had a son Joseph Wilson, who traded as a merchant in that town. He had dealings with the defendants, the Union Bank of Liverpool. I collect that he was in considerable straits for money, and he therefore applied to the bank to make him advances upon security. He was the sole owner at that time of a ship named the Kenilworth, which was upon her outward voyage to Calcutta. His mother, the plaintiff, was part owner of another ship called the Refuge. In order to improve the position of the bank, and to induce them to make more advances to Joseph Wilson than they would otherwise have done, he applied to his mother to give them, by way of collateral security, as the bill sets out, her interest in the ship named the Refuge. Now that collateral security, I rather collect, meant a security in addition to the security upon the ship Kenilworth; but I agree with Mr. Glasse in this—I do not think it is distinctly brought home to the plaintiff that she did know of the fact of the ship Kenilworth being mortgaged to the bank; that is not, as far as I can find out, distinctly proved, although I am bound to say I think there is very little doubt of the fact. It is stated that it was a collateral security, and what collateral security it was, except a collateral security of the ship Kenilworth, I am unable to discover. But, however, that was on the 15th May 1866. The case is that Joseph Wilson, being the sole owner of the Kenilworth, mortgaged it in the usual way to the bank as a security for whatever might become due from him to them. That mortgage, of course, would not be available without registration; but it is stated by the answer that it was duly registered. The date is not stated, but Mr. Cotton has stated (and I suppose it is not much in dispute, if at all) that the date of the registration was the 18th May, three days after the mortgage. Now then, on the 18th May, at all events, the bank had a complete mortgage on the ship Kenilworth; but, three days before the mortgage of the ship Kenilworth, the plaintiff, Mrs. Wilson, had taken from her son an instrument in this form: [The Vice-Chancellor read the deed of assignment above-mentioned, and continued:] This instrument gave her, in the most ample manner, security on the freight to be earned by the ship Kenilworth. There is no dispute between the parties—at least the bank does not raise any question—as to the right to the outward freight from Liverpool to Calcutta. I take it that that is because it is stated by Joseph Wilson that the whole of the cargo belonged to himself; and therefore, being the owner of the ship, and also being the owner of the cargo, no freight would have to be paid. Of that fact I collect the bank were aware, at all events they admit it; they do not set up any claim to the outward freight. But what is in dispute between the parties is the right to the homeward freight, the freight earned by the ship Kenilworth on the return voyage from Calcutta, not to Liverpool, but to Marseilles which was her port of destination on her return voyage. Now then, is the plaintiff, as assignee of the freight, or are the defendants, as mortgagees of the ship, entitled to this homeward freight? That freight, like any other property—freight not yet earned, for it is the case here that the freight was not yet earned, the ship being on her outward voyage, and not on her homeward voyage, in respect of which the charter-party was not entered into—may be the subject of assignment in equity, cannot be disputed, and has not been disputed in this case. Therefore, so far as this question depends on the right of the assignee to the freight, the title of the plaintiff is perfectly clear, because she had an assignment of it for value, and that assignment would operate on the freight when it was afterwards earned. So far the case is free from any difficulty. But then the contest is between the plaintiff as the assignee of the freight, and the defendants as mortgagees of the ship. Then, what is the position of the mortgagee of a ship? First of all, before I go to that, I will dispose of the question whether the defendants had or had not, notice of the deed of the 12th

WILSON v. WILSON.

May, when they took the mortgage of the 15th May, because, if they had notice that the plaintiff was the assignee of the freight to be earned by the ship either on the outward voyage or on the homeward voyage, there is an end of their title, and consequently that point has been contested, and considerably contested, whether they had or had not notice. Now upon that subject, considering all the surrounding circumstances, I entirely agree with Mr. Cotton's observations that it was the bounden duty of this lady or her agent, considering the circumstances of this transaction altogether, to give notice of it when the collateral security was given. I can only come to the conclusion that she, or those who were acting for her, did know of the transaction with the bank, and therefore it was their bounden duty to give notice to the bank that, in taking the mortgage of the ship, they were not to have all ordinary rights of a mortgagee of a ship, but that the freight of the then voyage, that is, whatever the ship might earn before she came back to the port of her return, was already pledged to the plaintiff. Was such notice given or not? Joseph Wilson says it was. He is the only witness who proves the fact. Now, first of all, I must look on Joseph Wilson's evidence, under the circumstances, with considerable doubt. He was evidently under a bias to do the best he could for his mother. The correspondence shows he was anxious to do that after the money was gone, and I must look upon his evidence with grave doubt. But the fact of that notice having been given is most positively and distinctly denied by the defendant James Wilson, who was the manager of the bank, in his answer. I think his statement is completely confirmed by Joseph Wilson, because the important period as to his notice having been given or not, was on or before the 15th May; and Joseph Wilson's statement is, that on the 16th, not in a business-like manner, but to Mr. James Wilson as he came out of the bank, he mentioned that he had already mortgaged the freight. But the 16th was too late; the bank had advanced their money or given credit for it on the 15th. I am therefore satisfied, on the weight of evidence, that no notice whatever of this assignment of freight was given to the bank, and they are therefore in possession as mortgagees of the ship, whatever title that may give them without any notice whatever of any prior incumbrance on the ship or the freight. Then what is the position of a mortgagee of a ship? I take it that there is a perfect analogy (and cases have been cited, and very important ones, to that effect) between the mortgagee of land and the mortgagee of a ship. We know perfectly well that a mortgagee of land has a right, from the very day of his mortgage, to receive the rents. We also know that if he does not choose to enter into possession, or give notice to the tenants, but regards his security as sufficient, and allows the mortgagor to receive the rents, those rents can never be recovered back again as rents. The mortgagor has a continuing right to receive the rents until the right is intercepted by some act on the part of the mortgagee, and the payment of the rents by the tenants to the mortgagor, notwithstanding the mortgage, is perfectly valid and binding. So I take it to be perfectly clear that the mortgagee of a ship has a continuing right to receive all the earnings of a ship, that is, the freight, either under a charter-party or without a charter-party; he is entitled, just like the mortgagee of land, whenever he thinks fit, to enter into possession; and if the ship has earned money, he has a right, before the goods are delivered in respect of which that money is earned, to give notice to the consignee, the person having to pay the freight, or to the charterer, who may be a perfectly distinct person, and ordinarily is perfectly distinct from the one who has to receive the goods, that he requires the freight to be paid to him. Now this is very distinctly laid down in many cases, and all agree upon it, but the recently decided case of Brown v. Tanner (sup.) shows it clearly. It is quite true, as Mr. Glasse stated, that that case arose upon the question of an assignment of a freight subsequent to the mortgage of the ship; but in deciding that case the present Lord Chancellor, then Lord Justice, said, "It is now settled beyond all dispute that the mortgagee of a ship becomes entitled to all the rights, and liable to all the debts, of an owner from the time of his taking possession. Amongst the rights so accruing to him is that of receiving all freight remaining due when possession is taken." In Rusden v. Pope (sup.), where there was a difference of opinion, three of the learned judges being of one opinion, and Bramwell, B. being of another, Martin, B. expresses himself thus—"Now it has been held for many years, and frequently decided, that the effect of a mortgage of a ship, under a contract for earning freight, is to transfer the freight to the mortgagee. The freight becomes his property as a chose in action, and the case of Kerswill v. Bishop (2 C. & J. 529) is a direct decision to this effect. But, in analogy to the case of real property, it is rightly held that though the mortgagee takes the accruing freight as his property, yet payment to the mortgagor is good payment. If, however, the mortgagee intervenes at any time before payment, he has a right to do so: he asks for his own property." That is like the rent of land, which is the mortgagee's own property, if he chooses to consider it so. So the freight earned by a ship is his own property if he chooses to receive it. Then Martin B. continues, "What entitles him to receive the freight is the communication of the fact that he is mortgagee, and that he claims it as such; and taking possession is only one mode of communicating the fact. I entirely dissent from the proposition that he is entitled because he does any act in earning the freight, for he usually does nothing; and it has been frequently pointed out that his right depends, not on contract, but on property. I think the law on this point is beyond doubt." Channell, B., says, "Now, it is true that some cases use the expression that the ship must be earning freight, but I take it to be clear that the freight passes with the assignment of the ship, and though to enable the mortgagee to establish his right to the freight, it is necessary that he should do some act, yet as soon as he does an act to show that the mortgagor is not his agent, he is immediately entitled to have it paid to him." The Lord Chief Baron also says, "The law is established, that the mortgagee of a ship takes at once under his mortgage all the rights of the mortgagor, except the right to be paid freight, and to that he is not entitled till he enters into possession, or does something equivalent to it." The same law is laid down by the Master of the Rolls in the case of Lindsay v. Gibbs (sup.), which has been so much relied upon by Mr. Glasse and Mr. Wintle, but in which, I confess, I fail to find a single line in the slightest degree favourable to their case. There the case depended upon a gross omission of a mortgagee of a ship to register his mortgage. I have already pointed out that on the 18th May there was no valid mortgage given until the mortgage was registered; but on the 18th May it was registered, and then the title of the mortgagee was in every respect complete. In the case of Lindsay v. Gibbs it all turned on the omission of the mortgagee to register, and the right to the freight, and the question was whether the right to the freight was in the mortgagee, or in the mortgagor until registration. The Master of the Rolls says that those who claimed under the mortgage before registration were entitled to it, and that the mortgagee could only have a title as from the time he registered his security. It does not go beyond that. The Master of the Rolls lays down the rule in much the same way as all the other judges, that the mortgagee of a ship is entitled to the freight. Now, then, what was done in this case? The ship was on her homeward voyage. Joseph Wilson had failed in the month of June, and compounded with his creditors, and a deed was executed in that month of June, that is, a month after this security was given. The parties knew perfectly well that this ship was about to arrive. They sent out, and Joseph Wilson, who was very anxious after this failure, naturally, to do all he could for his mother, to reimburse her the money and the risk which she had incurred for him, sends out an agent to Marseilles. A great many letters are written by both parties, and arrive at Marseilles, are sent to the consulate, and there remain until the captain of the ship comes into Marseilles and receives them. But in the mean time the bank were not inactive. They were desirous of realising all they could, and they sent out to a very active agent, a very intelligent man, and a man who appears to have done his business remarkably well, for he was not satisfied with going on board the ship when she came into port, but he actually sent out, before the ship got into port, an agent, who boarded the ship. The ship went ashore, she was stranded in fact, and there remained two or three days. At length she came into port, and then, for the first time, the captain goes to the consulate and receives the plaintiff's letters. But in the mean time, to my mind it is clear, the defendants had done everything they could possibly have done to take possession of the ship. I do not think it material whether they took possession of the ship or not, because as owners of the ship, being mortgagees of the ship without notice, they had, in my opinion, a clear prior title to the plaintiff. They had a right at any time, until the money was paid which was owing by the mortgagors, to intercept it, and say that that money must be paid to them. That was quite sufficient in my opinion, before the money was paid, because it was arranged most reasonably afterwards between the parties that a certain house in Marseilles should receive the money without prejudice to any question, and the money has been deposited. Now, under these circumstances, it appears to me perfectly clear that the mortgagee of the ship without notice of any assignment of the freight, carries with it the absolute right to receive the freight. It is in vain for the mortgagee of the freight, who has allowed the mortgagee of the ship to take place without notice, to set up any claim, and it appears to me in this case that the mortgagees, the bank, have done all they possibly could. It is very true that the Master of the Rolls in the case of Lindsay v. Gibbs, says that where there is a charter-party, inquiries should be made, and notice should be given. I am disposed to think that that is rather a dangerous doctrine, because I think the mortgagee of a ship has a right to say, "I am going to take the ship; I am going to realise my security: I know nothing of anything whatever besides, for nobody has given me any notice." I am rather disposed to think that if he takes a mortgage of the ship and registers it, he is not bound to make any further inquiries. But, however, the Master of the Rolls says that when he knows there is a charter-party he should inquire of the charterer whether he has received notice of any incumbrance. That may be so, but it was impossible for these defendants to do that, because there was no charter-party. The ship was on her outward voyage with a cargo which was solely the property of Joseph Wilson. He could not give notice, and had no opportunity of doing so; they knew nothing of the charterer at Calcutta; they seem to have done everything they reasonably could, whilst the plaintiff, unfortunately, by her agent, omitted to do that very plain duty which devolved upon her; that is to say, having taken this mortgage of the freight on the 12th May, she omitted to give notice to the mortgagees of the ship until three days afterwards, of which mortgage I must assume she was aware. Under all these circumstances, therefore, I am sorry to be obliged to come to the conclusion that the plaintiff wholly fails, and consequently, that the bill must be dismissed with costs.

GEIPEL AND OTHERS v. SMITH AND ANOTHER.

Charter-party—Restraint of princes—Blockade of port of discharge—Impossibility of performance. A blockade of the port of destination, of which there is no chance of termination within a reasonable time, operates as a dissolution of an executory contract of affreightment, containing the exception, restraints of princes and rulers, and where the shipowner obtains intelligence of the existence of the blockade after the contract is made, but whilst it is still executory, and before he has laden his cargo, he is justified in treating the contract as an entire contract to load and carry to the port of destination, and, as such, impossible of performance, and is, therefore, not bound to perform part of the contract by proceeding to load his cargo.

To a declaration for a breach of a charter-party whereby the defendants agreed that their ship should, with all convenient speed, proceed to a spot as directed by the plaintiffs, and, having there loaded a cargo of coals, should, as soon as wind and weather permitted, proceed to Hamburg and there deliver the same "restraints of princes and rulers" (amongst other things) excepted, the defendants pleaded, in various pleas, that before any breach war was being carried on between Germany (wherein the said port of Hamburg was situated) and France; that Hamburg was blockaded by the French fleets; and that defendants were ready to perform their contract so far as they were not hindered and prevented by any of the excepted causes.

Held, on demurrer, that the blockade was a "restraint of princes and rulers," and, therefore, that the defendants were justified in refusing to carry out the contract. The performance of the whole undivided contract being rendered impossible by one of the excepted causes, the defendants were not bound to perform a part of it, viz., the loading of the ship. (a)

DEMURRER to pleas.

Declaration on a charter-party, whereby it was agreed between the plaintiffs and defendants that the defendants' vessel the Martindale being tight, staunch, and strong, and every way fitted for the voyage, should with all convenient speed sail and proceed to a port as directed by the plaintiffs or their agent, and there take on board a full and complete cargo of coals not exceeding what she could reasonably stow and carry, over and above her tackle, apparel, provisions, and furniture, and being so loaded, the captain should immediately call at the office of the plaintiffs or their agents and clear with them at the Custom House, also sign bills of lading without qualification as they present them, but without prejudice to the said charter-party, and then as soon as wind and weather should permit, should proceed to Hamburg, and there deliver the same to the said freighters or assigns, they paying the freight for the same at a certain agreed rate, the act of God, Queen's enemies, restraints of princes and rulers, fire, and all and every of the dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation, of whatsoever nature or kind during the said voyage, always excepted, the brokerage of 2½ per cent. on account of freight to be due on signing the said charter-party, and in case of the breach or non-performance of the said charter-party, the defendants or the captain to pay to the plaintiffs 100*l.*, as and for liquidated damages. And the plaintiffs say that they did and were ready and willing to do all things, and all conditions precedent were fulfilled, and all times elapsed necessary to entitle, and nothing happened to disentitle the plaintiffs to have the defendants observe and fulfil the terms of the said charter-party, and to maintain this action for the breach thereof hereinafter mentioned; yet the defendants before any breach by the plaintiffs of the said charter-party, and although not prevented

(a) This question was considered by Lord Stowell in The Tutela (6 C. Rob. 177). That was a prize case, the vessel having been seized by the British for attempted breach of blockade. One defence set up that the master, although he had remonstrated with the shipper against pursuing his intended voyage, had been compelled to proceed by the shipper, as he had signed the charter-party before knowing of the blockade. In giving judgment, Lord Stowell said: "He (the master) seems to have entertained no doubt upon that point (the blockade), but to have acted only under an opinion, that because he had signed the charter-party he was bound to proceed. I conceive the law is not so, but that he would have been justified in refusing to go on. As in all other contracts that become illegal, he might have protested against being any longer bound by the charter-party." The ship was condemned.

by any of the said expected perils, causes, manners, or things, absolutely refused to observe and fulfil the terms of the said charter-party and to let their said ship take or carry any goods of the plaintiffs to the said port of Hamburg, and gave notice to the plaintiffs that they absolutely refused to do, and they would not observe or fulfil, and absolutely renounced the said charter-party, and wrongfully and in violation of the said charter-party, discharged the plaintiffs from directing the said ship to sail or proceed to any port, and from otherwise observing and fulfilling the terms of the said charter party, and renounced the said charter-party, and thereby wrongfully broke and violated the said charter-party, and by reason of the premises the plaintiffs became and were unable to have the said charter-party observed and fulfilled by the defendants, and uselessly incurred great expense in and about procuring cargo for the said ship, and were prevented from sending the said goods to Hamburg, and lost divers large profits, &c.

Pleas. (5.) That after the making of the said charter-party, and before any breach thereof, a war was being carried on between the peoples of Germany, wherein the said port of Hamburg was situated, and the peoples of France; and the said port of Hamburg was then blockaded by the fleets of France; and her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen, by her royal proclamation, enjoined all her subjects to maintain a strict neutrality between the said belligerent peoples, and not to commit any act contrary to or in violation of the law of nations; and the defendants say that they were and are British subjects, and that the ship was a British ship, and the said cargo was a cargo to be carried to and delivered at the said port of Hamburg. Wherefore, the further performance of the said charter-party became and was illegal, and the defendants, as they lawfully might, refused further to carry out the same. (6.) That after the said charter-party was entered into, and before any breach thereof by the defendants, a state of war arose and existed as in the last plea mentioned, and the said port of Hamburg became and was blockaded by the French, and her Majesty the Queen published a proclamation as aforesaid, and thereupon the defendants, having notice of the said blockade, and of the said proclamation of her Majesty, refused to allow the said ship to receive a cargo for the purpose of then carrying the same to the said blockaded port while the same was so blockaded, and of running the said blockade with the said cargo for the purpose of delivering the same at the said port during the continuance of the said blockade, which is the said breach complained of, and not otherwise. (7.) That after the said charter-party was made, and before any breach by them of the said charter-party, a state of war existed, and the said port of Hamburg was blockaded, and her Majesty, the Queen, published her proclamation as in the 5th plea stated, and the defendants say that they were ready and willing to perform the said charter-party on their part, so far as they might lawfully, and so far as they were not hindered and prevented by any of the said excepted causes; and the defendants say that the said ship could not have received a cargo, nor could the said charter-party have been carried out and fulfilled within a reasonable time in that behalf, except by the said ship receiving a cargo for the purpose of carrying the same to the said blockaded port, and of running the blockade with the said cargo, and of delivering the same at the said port whilst so blockaded; wherefore the defendants refused to carry out the said charter-party.

The plaintiffs demurred to these pleas, and the defendants joined in demurrer.

Cohen in support of the demurrer, contended that the facts stated in the pleas disclosed no defence to the action. The mere fear of the capture of their ship did not justify the defendants in throwing up the contract and refusing to send their ship to the port of loading. It is not a municipal offence by the law of nations for a neutral to carry on trade with a blockaded port. (The Helen, L. Rep. I Adm. & Ecc. 1; 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 305.) Prize courts have, no doubt, decided that if a vessel starts with the intention of going to a blockaded port for the purpose of running the blockade, she is liable to be captured; but it must not be assumed as a fact that if the defendants' vessel had left Newcastle she must of necessity have been captured. Restraint of princes does not mean fear of restraint. In Hadley v. Clarke, 8 T. R. 259, where the defendants contracted to carry the plaintiff's goods from Liverpool to Leghorn, and on the vessel's arriving at Falmouth in the course of her voyage, an embargo was laid on her "until the further order of council," it was held that the embargo only suspended and did not dissolve the contract between the parties; and that even after two years, when the embargo was taken off, the defendants were answerable in damages to the plaintiff for the non-performance of their contract. Lawrence, J., said: "It was incumbent on the defendants, when they entered into this contract, to specify the terms and conditions on which they would engage to carry the plaintiffs' goods to Leghorn. They accordingly did express the terms, and absolutely engaged to carry the goods, 'the dangers of the seas only excepted.' That therefore is the only excuse which they can make for not performing the contract. If they had intended that they should be excused for any other cause, they should have introduced such an exception into their contract. In Paradise v. Jane (Al. 27) this distinction is taken: 'Where the law creates a duty or charge, and the party is disabled to perform it, without any default in him, and hath no remedy over, there the law will excuse him; but when the party by his own contract creates a duty or charge upon himself, he is bound to make it good, if he may, notwithstanding any accident by inevitable necessity, because he might have provided against it by his contract.' So in this case, there was one accident against which the defendants provided by their contract; they might also have provided against an embargo, but we cannot vary the terms of this contract; and the defendant must be bound by the terms of the contract that they have made." That case decides that an impossibility of performing the contract for even two years will not rescind it altogether. An authority to the same effect is Atkinson v. Ritchie (10 East, 530). There the master and the freighter of a vessel agreed that the vessel should proceed to St. Petersburg, and there load from the freighter's factor a complete cargo of hemp and iron, and proceed therewith to London and deliver the same. The master, after taking in half a cargo at St. Petersburg, sailed away on a general rumour of a hostile embargo being laid on British ships by the Russian Government, and it was held that he was liable in damages to the freighter for the short delivery of the cargo, though the jury found that he acted bonâ fide, and under a reasonable and well-grounded apprehension at the time; and a hostile embargo and seizure was, in fact, laid on six weeks afterwards. This case shows clearly that fear of the restraint of princes is a very different thing from actual restraint. "No exception," said Lord Ellenborough, C.J., "(of a private nature at least) which is not contained in the contract itself, can be engrafted upon it by implication as an excuse for its non-performance. It has been contended that the exception contained in this contract of 'restraint of princes and rulers during the voyage,' excuses the not taking on board a complete cargo in this case. But without considering whether this provision respecting restraint of princes, &c., be at all applicable by way of excuse for the non-performance of this part of the master's stipulated duty, viz., the taking on board a complete cargo; yet, at any rate, the restraint meant must be an actual and operative restraint, and not a merely expected and contingent one, as this at most only was." [LUSH, J.—There was there only a mere apprehension on the part of the master. Here there was an actually existing blockade.] But at the time the defendant threw up the contract there was only a fear or apprehension that the blockade would last more than a reasonable time. Though as a matter of fact, the blockade did ultimately last an unreasonably long time, that cannot excuse the defendant; an event occurring after the breach of contract cannot excuse that breach. Such an event may, no doubt, seriously affect the question of damages, and may possibly reduce them to a merely nominal sum, but it cannot excuse or justify the throwing up of the contract. [COCKBURN, C. J.—When it is perfectly clear to both parties that the blockade must last a longer time than either of the parties would consider reasonable, does not that justify the defendants' refusal?] That would no doubt be so if the matter were perfectly certain; but it is not stated that it was clear to both parties, and at the time of the defendants' refusal to go on with the contract it could not be said to be clear that the blockade would have lasted beyond a reasonable time. In Spence v. Chodwick (10 Q. B. 517) to a declaration alleging that plaintiff had shipped on board defendant's ship at Gibraltar, and bound for London, calling at Cadiz, certain goods to be carried to London, and there delivered, the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation, of whatsoever nature or kind soever, save risk of boats, &c., excepted, and further alleging a breach, the defendant pleaded that the ship in the course of her voyage called at Cadiz, and was then within the jurisdiction of the officers of customs there, and of a certain court of Spain; that while the ship was there, the goods were, according to the law of Spain, lawfully taken out of the ship by the said officers, against the will and without the default of the defendant, on a charge of suspicion of their being contraband, according to the law of Spain, and were confiscated by a decree of the said court upon the charge aforesaid. It was held on demurrer that this plea alleged no excuse within the express exceptions in the contract; that the decree of confiscation was in itself no answer, and that it did not appear to have been incurred through any default of the plaintiff. "In my opinion," said Lord Denman, C.J., "we should do very ill if we were to tamper with the rules of construction which have always been applied to such exceptions (as those contained in the contract). Those rules were laid down originally with reference to the interest of the individuals who are parties to these contracts, and not to any notions of general policy; and they are rules now well understood. I will merely refer to the judgment of Lord Ellenborough in Alkinson v. Ritchie (ubi. sup.), which completely disposes of this part of the argument." Patteson, J., observed, "At what time the law was made, and whether the goods were contraband per se, or because so by something done or omitted in respect of them, we do not know. But I disclaim minute considerations of this sort: it was for the defendant to bring himself within the exception in his contract; and he has not done so." So Wightman, J., "The defendant here was prevented by inevitable necessity from performing his contract. But he might have provided in his contract against the consequences of such a contingency; he has not done so, and is without excuse." [COCKBURN, C.J.—The act which caused the confiscation was one done in contravention of the local law: it did not come within the expression "restraint of princes," which is applicable to acts of state.] That was not the ratio decidendi in that case, but rather that impossibility of performance resulting from inevitable necessity does not excuse the breach of contract to deliver the goods. The law on the subject is thus stated in Leake on Contracts, p. 361: "Where the performance of the promise becomes absolutely impossible subsequently to the making of the contract, and there is no express provision in the agreement to meet such an event, the general rule seems to be that the contract remains binding notwithstanding the supervening impossibility. This is a rule of construction founded on the grammatical meaning of the general undertaking contained in the agreement, but it gives way to an implication of a contrary intention. . . . Accordingly it has been frequently laid down to the effect that where there is an absolute contract to do a thing, not in itself unlawful, the contractor must perform it or pay damages for not doing it, although in consequence of unforeseen accidents, the performance of his contract has become unexpectedly burthensome, or even impossible."

BLACKBURN, J.—In the present case there is both an exception of restraint of princes and an actually existing restraint of princes. There was no 'ber in Spence v. Chodwick.] It is submitted that there was no restraint of princes in the present case which could justify the defendants' breach of contract. It is not easy to see how a blockade can be so considered any more than an actual embargo, and that has been held not to excuse the breach of contract. [BLACKBURN, J.—But is not an embargo a restraint of princes as far as it goes?] Undoubtedly as far as it goes; and it is not contended that the defendants would not have been justified in refusing to carry the goods at once, if the plaintiffs had insisted on their doing so. What is insisted on is, that they were not justified in throwing up the contract before a reasonable time had elapsed. [COCKBURN, J.—Where there is no good in waiting, cannot the matter be treated as if a reasonable time had elapsed?] The rescission of the contract must be by consent of both parties. Suppose it had turned out that the blockade was put an end to in a short time, and the contract could then be performed within a reasonable time, would the defendant be justified in doing what he did? If not, why should he be excused, because it turned out afterwards that the blockade did last an unreasonable time?

Watkin Williams (with him Blake Steele) for the defendant.—On the substantial question, as it appears on the declaration and pleas, it is submitted that the defendants have shown a good defence to the plaintiffs' claim. The contract is an entire one, to proceed to Newcastle, and thence carry a cargo of coals to Hamburg; and the breach alleged is that the defendants wrongfully discharged the plaintiffs from the contract. The defendants acknowledge the making of the contract, but say that before any breach of it a war broke out between France and Germany, the port of Hamburg was blockaded and it became practically impossible for them to go there without running themselves against the blockade. If it were proved that the defendants had gone to Newcastle and loaded, and then said, "we will not go further as we cannot do so without rendering ourselves liable to capture," that would be a complete justification of their conduct. The case is thus reduced to this narrow point, whether in a contract, which is one entire contract, if an impediment arises which excuses or prevents the performance of the entire contract, the defendant is nevertheless bound to go through the intermediate stages merely in order to bring himself face to face with the impediment which prevents him going further and completing his contract? It is submitted that he is not bound to do so by law any more than by common sense. This follows as a corollary from the decision in Hochster v. De la Tour (2 El. & Bl. 678). If it is clear that the initial steps would, if taken, be in the end nugatory, the law will not compel a person to take them. In Avery v. Bowden (5 El. & Bl. 714; in error 6 El. & Bl. 953) the defendant, by charter-party, agreed to load a cargo on plaintiff's ship at Odessa, and to a count for not loading the defendant pleaded that before cause of action arose war was declared between Russia and Great Britain, which rescinded the contract. It appearing that after the ship had arrived, and before declaration of war, defendant's agent had repeatedly told the master that he, the agent, had no cargo for the ship and that he had better go away; but the master continued to require a cargo till the declaration of war was known at Odessa, which was before the ship's laying days had expired. It was held that the refusal of the agent before the time for loading had expired, not being acted on as a renunciation of the contract, was not a cause of action, and that the plea was therefore proved. There are authorities to the effect that the mere existence of a blockade of itself dissolves the charter-party. In Scott v. Libby 2 Johnson's Reports (New York Supreme Court), 336, it is stated in the marginal note that "a blockade of the port of destination dissolves the charter-party and all claim for freight under it is gone." It is laid down in Abbott on Shipping, 11th edit. (p. 458) referring to this case, "With respect to blockade of the port of destination, it has been decided by the Supreme Court of New York that it operates a complete dissolution of the contract. That decision proceeded on the broad ground that what has become unlawful by the general law of nations cannot be lawfully done by the subjects of any particular state." It must be confessed, however, that the case hardly bears out the broad proposition based upon it: the decision merely being that a shipowner who, owing to blockade of the port of destination, has not delivered the cargo, has not earned freight. The facts of the case were that a vessel was chartered on a voyage from New York to St. Domingo and back to New York, the charterer to pay an entire sum for the whole voyage in sixty days after the return of the vessel to New York. On arriving in sight of St. Domingo, the vessel was turned away by a British cruiser on account of the ports being blockaded; and the vessel therefore returned to New York with her original cargo. The owners of the vessel refusing to deliver the cargo until the freight was paid, it was held, in action of trover brought to recover the goods, that no freight was due. The blockade, in the present case, must be taken to be an effectual one. "The rule," it is said in Abbott on Shipping, p. 461, "is, that after knowledge of an existing blockade, it is not lawful to go to the very station of blockade under pretence of inquiry. Here in Europe, where the different states have constant intelligence, and may be said to live, as it were, under one roof, it never can be permitted that a ship shall sail with a knowledge of the blockade, under pretence of further inquiry at the spot blockaded; and, lingering near a blockaded port, when it shows an intention of entering the port, is as much a breach of the blockade as continuing in the course to it after notification;" citing the Elizabeth (1 Edw. 189.) Had the defendants set out on the voyage from Newcastle to Hamburg they would have run almost a certain risk of capture before reaching the latter port; and, where a contract is an entire one, whatever excuses a person from performing the whole of it ought equally to excuse him from performing a part. In Medeiros v. Hill (8 Bing. 231) the evidence showed that the blockade had ceased to be a real and effective one long before the charter-party was entered into. (Naylor v. Taylor, 9 B. & C. 718; and Hadley v. Clark (sup.) were also referred to.) It is laid down in Parsons' Law of Shipping, p. 332, that "If a blockade be formally notified to a nation, all the citizens thereof must take notice of it at their peril. No ship is bound to enter a port which is actually blockaded. If the blockade be only an-intention, or by decree, it is only what is called a paper blockade; and it is now settled that it is no breach of the law of nations to enter the port, and a ship might insist upon its right to go there, and a shipper might insist that the ship should carry his cargo thither. But as a ship is bound not to break an actual blockade, and if it does is forfeited by the law of nations, so it is not bound to incur any actual and substantial danger in attempting to do so, if the port is imperfectly blockaded. Nor has it any right to incur such danger, and jeopardise the cargo, for the purpose of earning its freight. And it is no breach of law for a vessel to sail for a port which is known to be blockaded, with the hope of finding the blockade terminated, or with the purpose of waiting at sea or in a neighbouring port, until the blockade shall terminate; a ship, therefore, may do this. But we should doubt whether a ship would have a right to insist upon carrying a cargo to a blockaded port for such purpose, or whether a shipper could insist that his cargo should be carried, unless the facts were such as showed clearly that the blockade would continue only for a short time, and that the sailing on such a voyage for such a purpose was clearly reasonable and prudent." And he adds: "These remarks apply to the case where the blockade becomes known after the contract of affreightment is made." After remarking that the danger from war having broken out between other countries, neither dissolves nor suspends the contract, he adds: "Perhaps it would have that effect if it became imminent and extreme, so as to make the execution of the contract involve the certain, or even the probable loss of ship and cargo," as was the case in the present instance. Pole v. Cetcovich (9 C. B. N. S., 430) is also an authority in favour of the defendants' contention: (Hills v. Sughrae, 15 M. & W. 253; Paradine v. Jane, Alley's Rep. 26; and Williams v. Lloyd, Sir Wm. Jones' Rep. 179, were also referred to.) The English rule of law, that if a man contracts unqualifiedly to do a thing, he must do it or answer in damages, no matter what event may occur to render the contract impossible of performance, is opposed to that of all continental actions. This rule is thus stated by Pothier (tom. ii. p. 402, edit. 1781—"Charte-partie," s. 4, § 98), says: "Neanmoins si avant le départ du vaisseau, sans le fait ni la faute de l'une ni de l'autre des parties, mais par quelque accident de force majeure, le contrat ne pouvoit plus s'exécuter, il seroit résolu de plein droit, sans qu'il fut besoin qu'il intervint aucun consentement des parties. L'Article 7, du Titre des Chartes-Parties (Ordonnance de la Marine, Louis XIV., Lib. III. Des Contrats Maritimes, tit. 1, Art. 7) en contient un exemple. Il y est dit: 'Si avant le départ du vaisseau il arrive interdiction de commerce, guerre, représailles ou autrement, avec le pays pour lequel il étoit destiné, la charte-partie sera résolue sans dommages et intérêts de part ni d'autre.' L'Équité de cette disposition est évidente. Cette interdiction de commerce avec le pays pour lequel le navire étoit destiné, empêche que la charte-partie ne puisse être exécutée, et par conséquent cet accident doit la résoudre de plein droit, aucune des parties ne peut prétendre contre l'autre des dommages et intérêts pour l'inexécution du contrat, cette inexécution ne pouvant être imputée à aucune des parties." The present case comes directly within the principle of Bailey v. de Crespigny (19 L. T. N. S. 618; L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 180). There the lessor of premises demised, covenanted with the lessee, that neither the lessor nor his heirs or assigns should, during the term, permit any messuage, dwelling house, &c. (certain specified erections excepted), to be built on the ground fronting the demised premises. To a declaration alleging, as a breach of this covenant, that the lessor afterwards assigned the land to a railway company, who erected on the ground fronting the demised premises certain buildings not amongst those excepted, the lessor pleaded that the land was compulsorily purchased by the railway company under the powers of their Act, and that the erections complained of were such as were reasonably required by the company for the purposes of their undertaking; and it was held that the lessor was not, under the circumstances, liable for breach of the covenant. "The substantial question raised," said Hannen, J., delivering the considered judgment of the court, "is whether the defendant is discharged from his covenant by the subsequent Act of Parliament which put it out of his power to perform it? We are of opinion that he is so discharged, on the principle expressed in the maxim, Lex non cogit ad impossibilia.

Cohen in reply.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I am of opinion that our judgment ought to be for the defendants. I won't say that the pleas are all and every one of them sufficient to raise a defence; but the main question to be decided is whether, upon the admitted facts of the case, the plaintiff is entitled to recover. The declaration is on a charter party, by which the defendants agreed to proceed with all convenient speed to Newcastle, the place of loading the coals, and there having loaded a cargo, to proceed as soon as wind and weather would permit to the port of Hamburg, and there deliver the same, "the act of God, Queen's enemies, restraints of princes," &c., excepted. The pleas show that after the making of the charter-party war having broken out between the French and German nations, the French Government proceeded to declare the port of Hamburg to be blockaded, and followed up that declaration by an effectual blockade; and the question is whether that brought about a state of things which justified the defendants in throwing up the charter party. Now, the charter party contains stipulations for the performance of several things by the defendants. They were first to go to a spout and load a cargo of coals there; then they were to proceed to Hamburg as soon as wind and weather should permit, and there deliver the cargo. Now it is quite true that the defendants might have gone to a spout, and there loaded a cargo: there was no obstacle to prevent their doing that. But there was an obstacle in the way of their proceeding thence to the port of Hamburg. Now, I do not consider it necessary on the present occasion to consider the larger proposition contended for by Mr. Williams, on the authority of continental codes, namely, that in the absence of such an express exception as "restraints of princes," we should by implication import such a term into the contract made by the parties. I base my judgment on the exception expressly contained in the contract, namely, on the exception of "restraint of princes." Is it a sufficient justification of the defendants' refusal to carry out the contract that a blockade existed of the port of Hamburg? Does that term come within the designation "restraint of princes?" I think it does. It is an act of a sovereign state, one of the belligerent parties. A person may succeed in running a blockade notwithstanding the efforts of the blockading squadron. Nevertheless, we must take it that in the eye of the law an effectual blockade existed of the port of Hamburg; that that did amount to a positive obstacle in the way of fulfilling the contract, and, arising from an act of state of one of the belligerent parties. I am of opinion that it constituted a "restraint of princes," which would apply to the exception contained in the charter-party. I think, therefore, that there was in this case a "restraint of princes," and that the defendants were justified in saying that they were not called on to perform the contract. But then Mr. Cohen says that the expression "restraint of princes" applies to the whole contract, and that the contract must be read thus: that whereas the ship was to go to Hamburg when wind and weather permitted, subject to the restraint of princes, when that restraint, once existing, is removed, the vessel is to go when wind and weather permits. If we are to construe the contract in that way, I think the consequence would be monstrous—to hold that if a blockade should last for an unusually long time, the defendants would be bound to keep their vessel idle all that time until the blockade should cease. It must be taken, if you are to construe the contract in that way, that the restraint of princes must have an end within a reasonable time. The defendants meet the plaintiffs' claim by saying, "It was impossible in the present case that the contract should be performed within a reasonable time; granted that the restraint of princes must be only for a reasonable time, then I should be bound to start; but having lasted an unreasonable time I am not so bound." It may well be that if he failed to make out such a plea, he would have to answer for it; but as the case now stands, I think the defence a good one. Where there is no rational probability that the obstacles will be removed within a reasonable time, that furnishes, I think, a sufficient answer. Then it is further contended that the contract is divisible into two parts, and perhaps it is; and if the performance of the whole is impossible, looking at the reason and convenience of the thing it is quite obvious that that should excuse the performance of the part. What object could be attained, or what benefit be derived from the shipowners going through part of the undertaking when the whole could not be performed? The view I take of it is that the contract is one entire one, and that anything which justifies a breach of the whole will apply equally to a breach of part. It is admitted that the defendants could not, without violating the blockade, take the cargo to Hamburg, its destination; and the contract being one entire one, whatever justifies a breach of the contract to carry the cargo there justifies a breach of part of that contract. The case put by Mr. Williams by way of illustration in the course of his argument is, I think, much to the purpose. If I undertake to convey goods from London to York, which it is impossible to do if a certain bridge on the way is broken down and cannot be repaired within a reasonable time; if the bridge is actually broken down, and I know it, I am not bound to perform part of the contract by carrying the goods as far as the bridge, in order that at some future time I may be able to perform the rest of it. I think, then, the defendants in the present case could not be called on to load the cargo in question when there existed an insuperable obstacle to its being carried to the port of destination; and our judgment must, therefore, be for the defendants.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. Upon all the substantial matters involved I agree that judgment must be for the defendants, and that they are right. I have some doubt, however, as to whether the fifth plea is good, and, indeed, I am inclined to think that on it judgment should be for the plaintiffs. But that is a mere question of form, and affects only costs. By the charter-party the ship is to proceed with all convenient speed to a spout and there load a cargo of coals, and then, as soon as wind and weather should permit—which means, I apprehend, nothing more than with reasonable speed and despatch—should proceed to Hamburg; and on this last the exception is engrafted of, amongst other things, the "restraint of princes." Whilst the contract was still executory, war broke out between France and Germany, and an effectual blockade of the port of Hamburg was effected by the French, so that the defendants could not bring the cargo to Hamburg without breaking the blockade and evading the restraint of the Emperor of the French. I have been unable to see how that blockade can be regarded otherwise than as a restraint of princes. Then comes another question. If whilst the blockade existed there was a "restraint of princes" which excused the performance of the contract, the moment the blockade was raised were not the defendants bound to carry out their contract? If the blockade had existed only for an hour or two, or for a very short time, I do not think it would put an end to the contract; but I cannot agree with Mr. Cohen's contention that, however long the blockade might have existed, even if it had lasted as long as the blockade of Toulon, some eight or nine years, I think, or as long as some of the blockades in the War of Independence between the United Provinces and Spain; that after that enormous time the owners of the ship and cargo should be obliged to have them ready in order that the contract might then be carried out. It seems to me monstrous and inconvenient to hold such a position, the consequence being to frustrate the very object of the contract, which is one for the prompt transport of the shipper's goods, and the remunerative employment of the shipowner's vessels. Such a state of affairs, in my opinion, not only produces a delay in the fulfillment of the contract, but puts an end to it altogether. The case of Touteng and another v. Hubbard (3 Bos. & Pull. 291), if I do not misapprehend it, is a decision to that effect. There the vessel, a Swedish one, was chartered in Dec. 1800, to sail in the island of St. Michael's, and bring home a cargo of fruit, the charter-party containing the usual exception against restraints of princes. An embargo having been laid on Swedish vessels by the British Government, the vessel was detained till the 19th of the following June, after which time it went to St. Michael's, and then claimed to recover the freight against the British merchant; but the Court of Common Pleas, in its decision, said: "No, you are not entitled to it: the exception of restraints of princes is introduced into the charter-party not for the benefit of the merchant, but of the master." The object which the merchant had in view would have been altogether frustrated if the contrary had been held. It would be a monstrous thing if a party could, under such a contract, be obliged to load a cargo at any time whatever in sæcula sæculorum. Whilst the contract is still executory, the object of both the parties to it depends very greatly upon time. The goods owner—it is hard to say when his period can be said to have come; but he is entitled to get his cargo within a reasonable time, that being a matter to be determined by a jury. It would be monstrous to hold that the time might last, in case a blockade should take place, for ten or twelve years. A cargo would inevitably deteriorate in that time. A cargo of coals would deteriorate; so would a cargo of corn, and still more one of fruit. On the other hand there would be the obvious hardship on the shipowner of making him keep his ship lying up in dock, waiting till the news should come of the blockade having been raised, his ship meantime rotting. The intention of each party was to carry on a commercial undertaking within a reasonable time; and if the restraint of princes lasts beyond a reasonable time, it seems to me that a shipowner is entitled to sail away, and treat the contract as at an end. Taking this view of the matter the 6th plea puts the case thus: That the plaintiffs asked the defendants to take their cargo and go and break the blockade, that is to carry out the undertaking, notwithstanding that a restraint of princes did exist. Then comes the 7th plea, which says, in effect, that the blockade lasted so long that the defendants were not able to receive a cargo, or carry out the contract without running the blockade. This is the meaning of the plea, whether the fact, as therein asserted, be true or false. Mr. Cohen says that this plea does not answer the declaration, though it would affect the question of damages. It seems to me that as the events turned out, the plea would not be a bad one on general demurrer, but constitutes an entire defence to the action. For I take it that where a contract is still executory, the defendant may say, "I am not going to do what I bound myself to do, because I know that you, the plaintiff, will never be ready and willing to perform your part of the contract." That, I take it, would be quite competent for the defendant to say and do, if it turned out in the end that he was right in his opinion. If the defendant says, "I am so confident that the blockade never will be raised within a reasonable time that I will chance the matter; I will take the risk of my opinion turning out correct"; then if the chances turn out against him, and the blockade is raised within a reasonable time, the plaintiff will have a good cause of action against him, he, the plaintiff, being then ready and willing to put his cargo on board. But in the present case it has happened that the defendants were right in their opinion, the blockade not having been raised within a reasonable time; and it having turned out that they were right in the judgment they formed, there never came a time when the plaintiffs would have the smallest benefit from the contract. Different considerations would influence our judgment in a case where the contract was executed, but whilst a contract is still executory I think time is of the essence of the contract.

LUSH, J.—I am authorised by my brother Mellor [who had just left court] to say that he entirely concurs in the judgment already delivered; and I have only to say the same for myself, having nothing to add to what has been said.

MOSS v. THE MERSEY DOCKS AND HARBOUR BOARD.

Measurement of registered tonnage—Mistake—Payment under compulsion.

By the defendants' Acts of Parliament, all vessels entering into or leaving their docks are liable, according to the tonnage burden thereof, and are compelled to pay certain fixed dues to the defendants. By the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, s. 26, whenever the tonnage of any ship has been ascertained and registered in accordance with the provisions of that Act, the same shall thenceforth be deemed to be the tonnage of such ship, and be repeated in every subsequent registry thereof, unless any alteration is made in the form or capacity of such ship, or unless it is discovered that the tonnage of such ship has been erroneously computed; and in either of such cases such ship shall be re-measured, and the tonnage determined and registered according to the rules in that Act contained. By sect. 27 re-measurement may be made upon desire of the shipowner. By sect. 29, the Commissioners of Customs are empowered to make certain modifications and alterations in the tonnage rules prescribed by the Act. Under that section the Commissioners of Customs in 1860 made regulations, which had the effect of increasing the registered tonnage of the plaintiff's ships. In 1865 these regulations were, by the Exchequer Chamber, declared to be contrary to the Act of Parliament, and invalid.

This action was brought to recover the excess of rates paid in accordance with these invalid regulations, over the amount which would have been due under the Merchant Shipping Act.

Held, that the action could not be maintained.

This action was commenced on the 30th March, 1871, and was brought to recover from the defendants the sum of 143l 4s., which had been paid by the plaintiffs to the defendants under the circumstances hereinafter stated, and interest on such sum at 5l. per cent. per annum from the date of the writ until payment. By the consent of the parties, and by the order of a judge, the following case was stated for the opinion of the court without pleadings:—

1. The plaintiffs are the owners of a line of steam vessels trading between Liverpool and the Mediterranean.

2. The defendants are the trustees of the Liverpool docks, which are managed by the defendants as a public trust for public purposes exclusively.

3. By various Acts of Parliament the defendants are empowered to charge tonnage rates for harbour and dock purposes upon vessels using the said docks; the amount of such rates being proportionate to and estimated upon the registered tonnage of such vessels. The plaintiff's steamers when at Liverpool use the defendants' docks.

4. By the 23rd section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, it is enacted that "in every ship propelled by steam or other power requiring engine room, an allowance shall be made for the space occupied by the propelling power, and the amount so allowed shall be deducted from the gross tonnage of the ship ascertained as aforesaid (i.e., by section 21), and the remainder shall be deemed to be the registered tonnage of such ship, and such deduction shall be estimated as follows." The section then describes the mode in which such deduction shall be estimated.

5. By the 29th section of the same Act it is further enacted that "The Commissioners of Customs may, with the sanction of the Treasury, appoint such persons to superintend the survey and admeasurement of ships as they think fit, and may, with the approval of the Board of Trade, make such regulations for that purpose as may be necessary, and also with the like approval make such modifications and alterations as from time to time become necessary in the tonnage rules hereby prescribed, in order to the more accurate and uniform application thereof, and the effectual carrying out of the principle of admeasurement therein adopted."

6. On the 23rd Oct. 1860, the Commissioners of Customs, with the approval of the Board of Trade, issued the following order: "In pursuance of the powers granted by the 29th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, the board, with the approval of the Board of Trade, direct, with a view to the more accurate and uniform application of the principle of granting a certain allowance to steamers for their propelling power, that, in lieu of the rule set forth in sect. 23 of the Merchant Shipping Act, and in paragraphs 4, 5, 6, 18, 20 of instructions to measuring surveyors of 1855, the following rule be adopted in future."

7. The said rule contained in the said order prescribed the manner in which the tonnage of the space occupied by the propelling power should be ascertained, and directed that the amount so ascertained should be deducted from the gross tonnage of the vessel, in order to ascertain the registered tonnage. Such rule is fully set out in the decision of the Court of Exchequer Chamber in the City of Dublin Steam Packet Company v. Thompson (L. Rep. 1 C. P. 358-9: 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 412); and in the court below (34 L. J. 317-8, C. P.; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 247.)

8. The effect of adopting the method of estimating the registered tonnage of vessels prescribed by the said rule of the 23rd Oct. 1860, was to allow a smaller deduction in respect of the space occupied by propelling power than the deduction allowed by the 23rd section of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854, and consequently to increase the registered tonnage of steam vessels measured according to the said rule of Oct. 1860.

9. The plaintiff's vessels were measured according to the directions contained in the new Customs House Order of the 23rd Oct. 1860; and only the exact space occupied or required to be inclosed for the proper working of the boilers and machinery was allowed the one-half; and three-quarters of the tonnage of the said space as directed by the 23rd section of the said Act was disallowed.

10. From the date of the publication of the said order until the date of the decision of the above-mentioned case of The City of Dublin Steam Packet Company v. Thompson, the plaintiffs from time to time paid to the defendants in respect of the use of the said docks by the plaintiffs' steamers rates calculated upon and proportionate to the registered tonnage of such steamers as stated in the register of the respective vessels, such tonnage having been ascertained in the manner prescribed by the said rule of Oct. 1860.

11. Such rates were estimated and paid by the plaintiffs in the following manner: The plaintiffs filled up a printed form stating the tonnage of the vessel in respect of which the rates were due, and the amount of the rates calculated on such tonnage, and they then sent to the defendants the form so filled up, together with the money so shown to be due.

12. The total amount so paid by the plaintiffs between the dates mentioned was 143l 4s. in excess of the amount which they would have paid during the same period if the registered tonnage of such steamers had been ascertained according to the rule laid down in the Merchant Shipping Act 1854.

The question for the court is whether the plaintiffs are entitled to recover the said sum of 143l 4s. and interest from the defendants.

If the court is of opinion that the plaintiffs are so entitled, judgment is to be entered for the plaintiffs for 143l. 4s. and interest from the date of the writ, and costs.

If the court should be of a contrary opinion, judgment is to be entered for the defendants with cost.

Butt, Q.C. (with him Baylis) argued for the plaintiffs.—Although these payments were made under a mistake of law, the plaintiffs acted under compulsion, and may recover; by sect. 253 of the Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act 1858, 21 & 22 Vict. c. xcii., “while any dock tonnage rates or harbour rates remain unpaid in respect of any vessel liable thereto, the collector of such rates shall not receive any further or other entry in respect of such vessel, and the board may cause such vessel to be detained until all such rates shall have been paid.” In Morgan v. Palmer (2 B. & C. 729), the action was brought to recover from the Mayor of Yarmouth a sum of money which the plaintiff had paid him for granting his annual licence as a publican. It was argued that, even if the defendant were not entitled to this fee, the payment having been voluntary, it could not be recovered back in an action for money had and received. Abbott, C.J., agreed, p. 734, “that such a consequence would have followed had the parties been on equal terms. But if one party had the power of saying to the other, ‘that which you require shall not be done, except upon the conditions which I choose to impose,’ no person can contend that they stand upon anything like an equal footing.” Similarly in Steele v. Williams (8 Ex. 625), where the defendant, a parish clerk, demanded and received payment for liberty to search the register book, which demand he had no right to make, it was held that the payment was not voluntary so as to preclude the plaintiff from recovering the amount; and per Platt, B., and Martin, B., when money is paid under an illegal demand colore officii, the payment can never be voluntary.

Gully for the defendants.—First, these charges were rightly made, although the measurement was erroneous. By sect. 26 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, “whenever the tonnage of any ship has been ascertained and registered in accordance with the provisions of this Act, the same shall thenceforth be deemed to be the tonnage of such ship, and be repeated in every subsequent registry thereof, unless any alteration is made in the form or capacity of such ship, or unless it is discovered that the tonnage of such ship has been erroneously computed; and in either of such cases such ship shall be re-measured, and the tonnage determined and registered according to the rules hereinbefore contained in that behalf.” Now in the Mersey Docks Acts Consolidation Act 1858, the first section which treats of the rates to be paid by ships, viz., the 230th, enacts that “all vessels entering into or leaving the docks shall be liable, according to the tonnage burden thereof, to pay to the board,” &c. The tonnage burden, therefore, upon which payment is to be made, must be upon the registered tonnage for the time being, whether correct or not. By sect. 27 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, re-measurement may be made upon desire of the owner. Secondly, assuming these were not the proper payments to make under the invalid regulation, it must be shown that they were obtained under some false pretence before they can be recovered; Cox v. Prentice (3 M. & G. 344.) Moreover, the defendants are a public body, and are bound to lay out their receipts for the benefit of all ships which enter their docks. They have long before this expended all the sums which it is now attempted to recover, and it would be contrary to æquum et bonum, as Mansfield, C.J., said under similar circumstances in Brisbane v. Dactes (5 Taunt. 162), if the defendants were compelled to pay them back.

Butt in reply.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I think our judgment must be for the defendants. The matter does not depend, in my opinion, upon a mistake at all, but upon the statutory power which the defendants enjoy to exact payment for tonnage. The local Act of 1858 makes all vessels liable to the defendants’ board according to their tonnage burden. This means the registered tonnage, which by the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, s. 26, is to be deemed the tonnage of a ship, unless it is discovered that the tonnage of such ship has been erroneously computed. The erroneous computation in this case was not discovered until after the payment of these rates, the recovery of which is now sued for. Moreover, the ascertaining of the tonnage of ships coming into the docks is nothing with which the defendants have to do. It is for the shipowner to obtain a re-measurement of his ship if there is an erroneous computation, and the defendants carry out their duty by charging rates upon the ships which come into their docks according to the tonnage entered upon the register. This is the tonnage upon which the dues must be paid. If, as it has turned out here, the measurement has been erroneously computed, it is a matter between the owners of each ship and the customs authorities, and the owners should have got the computation corrected. It is certainly no business of the docks company. Independently of the fault of the shipowner, there does not seem to me to have been any mistake, either of law or fact, on the part of the persons who received this money; the mistake was made by a third party, the Commissioners of Customs, upon which the owners thought fit to act. This third party is the first to blame for the mistake; but the next is the shipowner, who represented an erroneous computation to the defendants as the true one. As I think, the tonnage of a vessel is a question of fact, and not of law; but it appears to be a matter entirely between the owners and the Customs, and, under these circumstances, the money which has been paid to the defendants cannot be recovered.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. In 10 & 11 Vict. c. 27, a general mode of ascertaining tonnage rates is provided; that Act is not incorporated in the Mersey Docks Acts, but the words in the 230th section of the Consolidation Act 1858 make all vessels in the docks liable, according to the tonnage burden. These words have, I think, the same effect as the general provision of the other Act; and the certified tonnage in the register of each vessel is to be that upon which the rates are to be paid. By sect. 26 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, the tonnage of a ship ascertained and registered according to the provisions of that Act shall be deemed to be the tonnage of such ship, unless it is discovered that the tonnage of such ship has been erroneously computed. The parties have acted as if the tonnage of these ships, as it appeared upon the certified register of each, had been computed according to law. The computation now turns out to have been erroneous, but these payments were all made before that was discovered, and it is not necessary to determine whether the computation was a mistake of law or of fact. The fault was that of the shipowners, who neglected to correct the measurement, and to amend the register. The defendants are therefore entitled.

LUSH, J.—I am of opinion that this payment was made under no mistake at all. The plaintiffs paid the amount of rates which were due according to the certified register. That register was wrong, and the plaintiffs say it was no fault of theirs. Until the mistake was corrected, the register was to guide the charges of the defendants, and it was the business of the plaintiff rather than the defendants to amend the register.

RICHARDS v. GELLATLEY AND OTHERS.

Practice—Inspection of documents.

In an action for making false and fraudulent representations with respect to a ship, whereby plaintiff was induced to take passage in her, and was afterwards obliged (as were many other passengers) to leave her on discovering the falsehood of the defendants' representations, inspection was refused of the letters which the other passengers, who had been obliged to leave the ship with the plaintiff, had written to defendants; also of letters of the captain of the ship to the defendants, written after plaintiff left the ship, relative to plaintiff and his leaving the ship; also of letters to defendants (who were agents for the ship) from the owner of the ship, written after plaintiff had left the same.

THE first count of the declaration was on a contract, by which, in consideration of a sum of money paid by plaintiff to defendants for a passage in a ship from London to Madras, the defendants promised the plaintiff that the said ship was in a fit state, tight, staunch, &c. Breach: that the said ship was not in a fit state, &c., whereby the plaintiff, after proceeding a short distance in her, was unable to go further, and so lost the benefit of the money paid.

The second count alleged that the defendants, by fraudulently representing that the said ship was in a fit state, &c., to go to Madras, induced the plaintiff to pay them a sum of money as passage money for himself and wife to Madras; whereas the said ship was not in a fit state, &c., whereby &c.

The third count was also for fraudulent misrepresentations as to the ship.

Pleas: First, Non assumpsit; secondly, exoneration and discharge; thirdly a denial of the breaches; fourthly, to second and third counts, not guilty.

Issue thereon.

It appeared that the plaintiff took his passage in the ship to proceed to Madras, but her fittings and arrangements were so bad, and she behaved so badly at sea, that plaintiff, on the ship running into Cowes on her way down the Channel, left the ship on the 21st Dec. 1870. Some of the other passengers also left with him. The defendants were the agents for the ship, and plaintiff had negotiated with them for his passage money, and had paid them his passage money. Plaintiff and the other passengers on disembarking at Cowes wrote to the defendants complaining of the state of the ship, and demanding compensation. The plaintiff's affidavit stated that compensation had been paid to some of them. On the plaintiff and the other passengers leaving the ship, and subsequently, the captain of the ship had written to the defendants relative to the plaintiff and his leaving the ship; he had also forwarded to them a report of the pilot respecting the ship, dated 21st Dec. 1870. The defendants had also received two letters from the owner of the vessel, subsequently to the plaintiff leaving her. The defendants, in answer to interrogatories, admitted the receipt of these letters.

A summons having been taken out by the plaintiff, for inspection of these letters, Cleasby, B. made the following order:—"Upon hearing counsel on both sides, I do order that on payment of 6s. 8d. costs, and 4d. per folio for copy, the plaintiff or his attorney or agent, be at liberty to inspect and take a copy of, or extracts from the documents set forth in the defendants' affidavit in answer to interrogatories sworn herein, except letters of other passengers and letters of captain and owner subsequent to the 21st Dec. 1870, without prejudice to an application to the court in respect of letters of other passengers."

Murphy now moved to vary this order by striking out that part which excluded the plaintiff from inspecting the letters of other passengers, and the letters of the captain and owner, subsequently to 21st Dec. 1870. The letters of the other passengers would afford materials for the cross-examination of the defendants and their witnesses, and would assist the plaintiff in establishing his case against the defendants on the second and third counts.

WILLES, J.—I think this application must be refused. There was at one time a notion that a person who had received a letter was bound to answer it, unless he was willing to have it assumed that he admitted the truth of the statements contained in it. But that has long ago been exploded. Lord Wensleydale, in one of his judgments, speaks of the absurdity of acting on any such rule, except in cases where some duty is created by the special relation between the parties, in respect of the matter dealt with in the letter; as in case where a passenger calls upon the carrier for an explanation for something connected with the carriage. The correspondence in this case between the defendants and other passengers is entirely apart from the contract on which the plaintiff is suing, and arose upon matters as to which every passenger had a right to address the defendants. I think that something more than the mere fact that other letters were written is required to oblige the defendants to produce those letters. I cannot, therefore, see that the learned Baron was wrong as to the letters of the other passengers. With respect to the letters written by the captain and owner, subsequently to the plaintiff leaving the ship, I think the learned Judge was also right in refusing inspection, as they fall within the rule laid down in Woolley v.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. Letters written after the commencement of an action are not admissible. The same remark applies to letters written with a view to compromising claims made by other persons.

BRETT, J.—As to the passengers' letters, Mr. Murphy does not suggest that they would be admissible under the count in contract, but he says that they would bear upon the counts for fraudulent misrepresentation. What the plaintiff has to prove under these counts is, that the defendants made representations which were false in fact and false to the knowledge of the defendants; and what Mr. Murphy now suggests is, that the letters of the other passengers, complaining of the state of the ship, are admissible, and that the plaintiff has a right to inspect them, as they may be admissible in evidence. But they cannot be given in evidence to prove what it lies on the defendant to prove, and we ought not to allow inspection of them, merely because they might furnish the plaintiff with material for the cross-examination of the defendants. They cannot be wanted for any orthodox purpose, but solely for the purpose of creating a prejudice, by showing the jury that the defendants have paid some small claims made against them. As to the captain's letters, they were not letters written in the ordinary course of business, but letters written with especial reference to the matters now in dispute. It seems to me that the letters from the owner of the ship to the defendant are within the same rule. On this ground I think that the order of Cleasby, B. was right on this point also, and that it ought not to be disturbed.

Rule refused.

NOTARA AND ANOTHER v. HENDERSON AND OTHERS.

Ship and shipping—Damage to cargo—Duty of master as to goods damaged on voyage—Excepted peril.

Plaintiffs shipped on board the defendants' steamship a cargo of beans to be carried from Alexandria to Glasgow, under a bill of lading, excepting the usual "perils of the sea," &c. The vessel after sailing at Liverpool, having been damaged by a collision in the Mersey, not caused by any default of the defendants, was obliged to run ashore to prevent her sinking, and the beans were wetted by the sea water in consequence of the collision, and the vessel had to remain for some days in a graving dock at Liverpool for the purpose of repairing the damage done to her. Plaintiffs, who were at Liverpool, requested the defendants' agent to give up the beans on payment of pro rata freight, but the defendants' agent refused to deliver them except on payment of the entire freight, and the vessel proceeded on her voyage to Glasgow, where the beans, on their arrival, were found to be greatly deteriorated in value in consequence of having been so long left in their state of saturation with salt water. The beans might, at Liverpool, have been removed to warehouses for the purpose of being spread out and dried, and such accommodation might have been found within half a mile of the graving dock, and this would have materially checked the process of decomposition. The expense of unshipping, drying, and reshipping would have been particular average payable by the owner of the cargo. An action having been brought by the plaintiffs to recover the amount of the damage caused to the cargo of beans by neglecting to do this:

Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench) that the taking of the beans on to Glasgow was under the circumstances of the case, unjustifiable, and rendered the shipowners liable for the loss thereby occasioned to the plaintiffs; the facts of the case showing that the beans might have been taken out, dried and reshipped without unreasonably delaying the whole adventure.

There is a duty on the part of shipowners, through the master, to take active measures to prevent the cargo from being spoilt by damage originally occasioned by sea accidents without fault on their part, and for the proximate and unavoidable effects of which accident they are exempt from responsibility by the terms of the bill of lading; where the taking of such measures is reasonably practicable under all the circumstances of the case.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 16.—The judgment of the court was now delivered as follows by WILLES, J.—This is an action by the shippers of beans on board a steamship called the Trojan, for a voyage from Alexandria to Glasgow, against the shipowners, for an alleged neglect of the master to take reasonable care of the beans by drying them at Liverpool, into which port the vessel was driven for repairs, by an accident of the sea, from the direct and proximate effect of which the beans were wetted; and from the remote effects of which, for want of drying, they were further seriously damaged. The bill of lading was subject, amongst other exceptions, to the following, viz.: "loss or damage arising from collision or other accidents of navigation occasioned by default of the master or crew, or any other accidents of the seas, rivers, and steam navigation, of whatever nature or kind, excepted;" and it gives "liberty during the voyage to call at any port or ports to receive fuel, to load or discharge cargo, or for any other purpose whatever." The vessel, in the course of her voyage, stopped at Liverpool, and on the 24th Oct. 1868, on her way out, came, without any fault, into collision with another vessel. The result of the collision was that she was driven ashore in an exposed place, where the beans became soaked with salt water, and the vessel herself received an injury which made it necessary that she should put back to Liverpool for repairs. She was there put into a graving dock for that purpose on the 27th, and temporarily repaired, in order to proceed to Glasgow. For the purpose of lightening the ship, and to facilitate the repairs, about one-fourth of the beans were transhipped into lighters, and for a like purpose other part was removed and spread out in the after part of the ship. When the ship was repaired, the beans were, without being dried, or otherwise looked after, replaced in their wet state. On the 30th Oct. the ship proceeded to Glasgow. The beans were materially damaged by not being dried at Liverpool. The beans which at Liverpool have been removed to warehouses, for the purpose of being spread out and dried, and such accommodation might have been found within half a mile of the graving dock. This would have caused a material benefit to the beans, and materially checked the process of decomposition. The expense of unshipping, drying, and reshipping, according to the finding in the case, which must be regarded as a finding in fact, would have been particular average, payable by the owner of the cargo; and that must be taken, therefore, to have been a reasonable and proper course to pursue, so far as the shippers' interest was concerned. It is not stated in the case what risk, trouble, expenses, or delay, the drying would have caused. In the absence of any statement that either was unreasonable, and acting upon the power of "drawing inferences," given by the special case, the court below appear to have arrived at the conclusion of fact, that the unshipping, drying, and re-shipment of the cargo were, under the circumstances, as to time and otherwise, reasonable and proper acts to be done by the person having charge of the cargo, assuming that there was any legal duty imposed upon him to take active steps for that purpose. During the stay of the vessel at Liverpool, the shippers, who were on the spot, called the shipowners' attention, through their agent, also on the spot, to the state of the beans, and to the fact that they would be seriously injured unless dried at once, and they requested that either the beans should be taken out and dried, and then reshipped for Glasgow, or that they should be delivered at Liverpool at a proportionate freight, so that the shippers might dry them for themselves. The shipowners refused to accede to either alternative. They offered to deliver at Liverpool, upon being paid the whole freight, but insisted that, unless the whole freight was paid, they had a right to retain and carry on the beans undried, and getting worse for want of drying as they were, in order to earn the whole freight upon arrival at Glasgow, provided the beans arrived in specie, whatever might be their condition. The shippers refused to pay more than the freight pro rata, and the shipowners took on the beans without drying them, and thereby occasioned further damage to the beans, which, quite exclusive of the damage proximately and necessarily caused by the collision, and limited to the consequence of the neglect to dry (of course calculated after allowing for the estimated expense of unshipping, drying, and reshipping), has, by consent, been assessed at 666*l.* 1*s.* 5*d.* The value of the cargo at Glasgow, but for the collision and its results, proximate and remote, would have been 3500*l.* The value in the state in which it arrived was 1167*l.* 7*s.* 8*d.* The entire loss caused, whether proximately or remotely, by the collision was, therefore, 2332*l.* 12*s.* 4*d.*, out of which the remote loss caused by neglect to dry amounts to 666*l.* 1*s.* 5*d.* The shippers do not claim in respect of the damage necessarily caused by the collision and its unavoidable results, but only for the estimated aggravation of that damage by reason of nothing having been done in the way of drying to arrest or mitigate decomposition, and for that amount (666*l.* 1*s.* 5*d.*) they obtained judgment in the Court of Queen's Bench. Upon that judgment the shipowners have assigned error, alleging that they were entitled to retain and take on the beans in their wet state, and were not bound to do anything to check the damage occasioned by the collision. The case was very fully and ably argued by Mr. Field, for the defendants, and Mr. Milward for the plaintiffs, before the Lord Chief Baron, Martin, Channell, and Cleasby, B.B., and Willes, Byles, and Keating, JJ., and we took time to consider our judgment. The question thus raised is a compound one of law and fact; first, of law, whether there be any duty on the part of the shipowners, through the master, to take active measures to prevent the cargo from being spoilt by damage originally occasioned by sea accidents, without fault on their part, and for the proximate and unavoidable effects of which accident they are exempt from responsibility by the terms of the bill of lading; and secondly, of fact, whether, if there be such a duty, there was, under the circumstances of this case, a breach thereof in not drying the beans. The law, up to a certain point, is clear and well settled by authority. The shippers, though upon the spot, were not entitled to the possession of the beans for any purpose without paying the full freight to Glasgow. That freight was not due, but the shipowners were entitled to retain the goods as a security for earning it. The offer of pro rata freight may have been reasonable, but it was one which the shipowners were not bound to accept; and it must be treated as an attempt to compromise, not affecting the rights of the parties, though it may bear upon the reasonableness of the course pursued, assuming such reasonableness to be material in determining the question of neglect. It was argued for the shipowners, that the fact of the shippers being upon the spot negated any implied duty on the part of the master, as agent of necessity to take care of the goods; but this argument will not bear examination. The shippers were present, but they could not lawfully touch the goods without leave. The shipowners refused to let them do so without payment of a sum not yet earned, and insisted upon retaining the goods, with the rights and consequently the duties of the original bailment, whatever those might be. The shippers thereupon insisted upon the goods being properly taken care of by the shipowners, who retained the control of them as a pledge for their freight. That a duty to take care of the goods generally exists cannot be doubted, and the question raised is, whether it extends to incurring expense and trouble in preserving the cargo from destruction or serious deterioration from the consequences of sea accident, for which originally the shipowners were not liable, by unshipping and drying it, where that is a reasonable and ordinary course to take, and would certainly have been adopted by the shippers if the whole adventure had been under their control and at their risk. It is remarkable that, upon a question so familiar to persons conversant with maritime affairs, and which has so constantly to be considered from another point of view in settling claims upon policies of insurance, the reported authorities in this country, so far as regards the mutual rights and liabilities of shippers and shipowners, should be so rare. The only case in which it was much discussed is that of Tronson v. Dent (8 Moo. P. C. 419). That was an action by shipper against master for non-delivery of goods pursuant to a bill of lading. The vessel, the Erin, left Calcutta for Hong Kong partly laden with opium, suffered damage by collision, and was obliged to put into Singapore for repair. The repair lasted twelve days. Part of the opium was damaged by salt water to such an extent that the master, acting honestly, thought proper to sell it, and the amount realised by the sale was paid into court. The shipper, however, insisted upon recovering the value of the opium at the port of discharge, and proceeded to trial when evidence was given that the opium might have been carried on in specie—at least, if dried during the stay for repairs. The Chief Justice directed the jury in effect that, if the master could “with reasonable exertion” have brought on the damaged opium in the marketable state of opium, either in the Erin, or in some other vessel, he should have done so. The jury found for the plaintiff, and an appeal was brought to the Judicial Committee upon, amongst other grounds, misdirection, and that the verdict was against the weight of evidence. The direction was criticised in the judgment delivered by Sir John Patteson as follows:—“An objection that is made to his summing up is with respect to these words, ‘with reasonable exertion;’ and it is assumed that, by the words ‘reasonable exertion,’ he told the jury that it was the master’s duty to have transhipped the goods, or at least, that it was his duty to have dried the opium, and if it took two months to have dried the opium, it was his duty so to have done after he himself had left the place, because he clearly was not bound to keep the ship there for the purpose of doing so. If the ship could have been repaired in twelve days, of course he could have gone on at the end of those twelve days; but he was bound to get somebody to attend to the drying of the opium, and then to forward it to Hong Kong. I think it is a great stretch of ingenuity to say the words ‘reasonable exertion’ means all that. I do not know what the words ‘reasonable exertion’ actually and necessarily import; but certainly there was some exertion, which it was the master’s duty to have made on that occasion. It is stated, I think, by foreign authorities, that it is the master’s duty to transship; but doubt is raised as to that, and in our courts it should seem to be considered that he is quite at liberty to do so, if it turns out, in the opinion of the jury, that it was the proper course of dealing with the goods, but that he is not positively bound to do so. If his own ship cannot carry them on at all, he may either leave goods which are not perishable, or sell goods which are in their nature perishable, which cannot be carried on, which must, of course, be sold; but that is not the case here. But although he may not be bound to transship, he is at liberty to do so. In other cases it has been held that he ought to take all proper care of the cargo; but there is no authority that I know of which distinctly shows that he is bound to lay out a great deal of money in order to endeavour to repair the damage done to the cargo, either by drying or in any other way. While the cargo is there he may not have the means of doing so. He is bound to ventilate it, and so on; but that, I apprehend, is while it is on board the ship, and I think, if I am not mistaken, there is some case of a ship in Ireland where there was a cargo of corn, and the question was, whether it could be kiln-dried, and whether the master was bound to kiln dry it there. The case did not turn on whether he was bound to do so, but, if I remember the case, he had done it, and the question was whether he was at liberty to do so. It was clear he was at liberty to do so; and here he would have been at liberty to have taken steps to dry this opium during the twelve days he was at Singapore. Whether he was bound to do it or not, need not be determined in this case, nor do I find that it was laid down by the judge, at least, I cannot collect from his language here that he laid down to the jury that the master was bound to do any such thing, but merely that he was bound to use reasonable exertion to have brought the opium on. It is, in order to be carried on, taken out of the vessel. Therefore, if by reasonable exertion he could have dried the outside of the chests, and put them back into the vessel afterwards to be taken to Hong Kong, he was bound surely to use that reasonable exertion at all events.” . . . “On the whole question, I think we should be justified in saying that he really did tell the jury that he was not bound to transship or to lay out a great deal of money in the drying of the opium, but that he was bound to carry it on if it could be carried on in a merchantable state.” Upon this construction the direction was sustained, and the judgment was affirmed. The judgment of the Judicial Committee, though it does not define the duty of the master, does not disaffirm his duty to take reasonable care, whether passive or active, to save and preserve a cargo damaged by sea accidents. The effect of the decision appears to be that the duty of the master to use reasonable exertion, to preserve the goods, if necessary, by drying them, so as to make them capable of being taken on in specie, was recognised, though the limit of the duty was left unsettled. It was suggested, indeed, that the duty of taking active measures, such as ventilating the cargo, ordinarily applied to doing so on board the ship, and that under no circumstances was the master bound to lay out a “great deal of money” (limit not stated), in drying the cargo. It was assumed that the master was not bound under the circumstances of the case, to delay beyond the time necessary for the repairs of the vessel. This assumption, however, can hardly be taken as intended for a proposition of law universally applicable, but rather as applicable to the circumstance that the opium then in question was only a part of the cargo, and that delay would be unreasonable to persons equally entitled to consideration as the plaintiff. The existence of such duty to take active measures for the preservation of the cargo from loss or deterioration in case of accident is, however, distinctly recognised in the maritime law in one important particular, wherein it follows the civil law, which, though it be not recognised as jus commune, either here or abroad, in mercantile or maritime affairs (see Baldasseroni Leggi e Costumi del Cambio, 31) has been the source of many valuable rules, namely, that the master may incur expense for the preservation of the cargo, and may charge such expense against the owner of the cargo in the form of particular average. This maritime right is, in one point of view, analogous to that of salvage, and it may be urged that the services in respect of which it is rendered should, as in the case of salvage, be looked upon as optional, and not obligatory. There is, however, this marked distinction, that the master, as representing the shipowner, has the charge of the goods under contract for the joint benefit of the shipowner and shipper, and falls within the class of persons who are under obligation to take care of and preserve the goods as bailees: (Pothier, Obligations, Part I., Cap. II., Art. I., § I., No. 142, and Nantissement, Cap. I., Art. 2, No. 29, et seq.; and as to extraordinary expenses, Cap. III., Nos. 60, 61; and also under the special head of care imposed upon masters, Lonages Maritimes, Charte-partie, Part I., Sect. 2, Art. 2, § 5, No. 31.) This obligation on the part of the master has been commonly recognised, both in respect of preserving goods on board in a state of safety by pumping, ventilation, and other proper means, and of saving goods which by accident have been exposed to danger. Thus, even in case of wreck, it is laid down, in a work on sea laws, approved by Lord Stowell (1 Hagg. Adm., p. 232) that the master "ought to preserve the most valuable goods first, and by attention and presence of mind endeavour to lessen the evil, and save, or help to save, as much as possible": Jacobson, book II., chap. 1, p. 112. It is recognised in the French Code generally, in Art. 222, and as to the right to charge the cargo with particular average, for extraordinary expenses incurred to preserve it, in Art. 403; in the Spanish Code, in Art. 735, as to like expenses; and in the German Mercantile Code (see translation in Maritime Legislation, by Wendt: Longmans and Co.), with its usual good sense and fulness, in Art. 504; where the duty of the master to take care of and preserve the cargo for its owners, at their expense (Art. 722), in case of accident, and for avoiding or lessening the loss thereby occasioned, is specially enforced and provided for, to an extent, perhaps, beyond what our own law has yet been held to recognise. The master is to take every possible care of the cargo during the voyage, in the interests of all concerned. When special measures are required to avoid or lessen a loss, he is to protect the interests of the owners of the cargo, as their representative, under their direction, if possible, otherwise according to his own discretion, giving an account of what he has done. He is, in such cases, specially authorised to discharge all or part of the cargo. In extreme cases, to avert considerable (erheblicher) loss, on account of imminent deterioration or other causes, he may resort to sale or hypothecation to procure means for its preservation or transport. He is to reclaim it in case of capture or detention, and to take all extra physical or judicial steps for its recovery, if otherwise taken out of his charge. There are unquestionably cases in which the exercise of such a duty would be incumbent upon the master, as representing the owners of the ship and for their interest, as, for instance, in the case of a perishable cargo so damaged by salt water that it could not, in its existing state, be taken forward in specie to the port of discharge, so as to earn the freight, but which could, at an expense considerably less than the freight, be dried and carried on. In such a case, to earn the freight, it might be for the interest of the owner of the ship to save the cargo by drying. To sell it, or abandon it, would give no right to freight, pro rata, against the owner of the cargo, nor any right to recover against the underwriter upon freight: (Mordy v. Jones, 4 B. & C. 394, recognised in Philpott v. Swann, 11 C. B. N. S., 281; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 151). In Mordy v. Jones (ubi sup.), the cargo was so damaged that it would have cost more than the freight, though less than the value of the cargo, to restore it, and no question arose as to the right of the owner of the cargo because he consented to the sale. But we are at present supposing a case in which it would have been for the shipowner's interest to dry and save the goods; as, if the freight were 1000*l.*, the expense of drying 100*l.*, and the rest of the voyage so long that, but for the drying, fermentation would destroy the specific character of the cargo before arrival. In such a case, if the process were also for the benefit of the owner of the cargo, the expenses would have fallen, according to the ordinary practice, upon the cargo as particular average. It is clear, therefore, that there are cases in which it is the duty of the master to save and dry the cargo, even as between him and his owner, though the expense of his performing that duty fall upon the cargo saved. Can it be that this duty of taking care of the cargo by active measures if necessary, at the expense of the cargo, is owing only to the shipowner, or that it is other than a duty to take reasonable care of the cargo, both in its sound state, and in arresting the damage to which it has become liable by accident of the sea, for the benefit of all who are concerned in the adventure. In the result it appears to us that the duty of the master in this respect, is not, like the authority to transship, a power for the benefit of the shipowner only to secure his freight (De Cuadra v. Swann, 16 C. B., N. S., 772), but a duty imposed upon the master, as representing the shipowner, to take reasonable care of the goods intrusted to him, not merely in doing what is necessary to preserve them on board the ship during the ordinary incidents of the voyage, but also in taking reasonable measures to check and arrest their loss, destruction, or deterioration by reason of accidents, for the necessary effects of which there is, by reason of the exception in the bill of lading, no original liability. The exception in the bill of lading was relied upon in this court as completely exonerating the shipowner, but it is now thoroughly settled that it only exempts him from the absolute liability of a common carrier, and not from the consequences of the want of reasonable skill, diligence, and care, which want is popularly described as "gross negligence." This is settled, so far as the repairs of the ship are concerned, by the judgment of Lord Wensleydale in Worms v. Storey (11 Ex. 430), as to her navigation, by a series of authorities collected in Grill v. General Iron Screw Collier Company (L. Rep. 1 C. P. 600; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 476; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 485; 2 Mar. Law. Cas. O. S. 362; 3 Ib. 77), and as to her management so far as affects the case of the cargo itself, in Laurie v. Douglas (15 M. & W. 746), where the court (in a judgment unfortunately not reported at large), upheld a ruling of Pollock C. B., that the shipowner was only bound to take the same care of the goods as a person would of his own goods, viz., "ordinary and reasonable care." These authorities, and the reasoning upon which they are founded, are conclusive to show that the exemption is from liability for loss which could not have been avoided by reasonable care, skill, and diligence, and that it is inapplicable to the case of a loss arising from the want of such care, and the sacrifice of the cargo by reason thereof, which is the subject matter of the present complaint. It was also argued that, if there was any default of duty, it was the fault of the master exclusively, and not of the shipowners. This argument might have had some plausibility, if the vessel had been wrecked or abandoned, and the objectionable conduct of the master had not taken place in the course of his employment, and for the supposed benefit of his owners. The master is the general agent of the owner for the purpose of the voyage, and for the exercise of that agency is instructed with powers, to be used at his discretion, in which the owner who selects him is satisfied to confide. If, therefore, the master exercises a power which circumstances might justify, so that it is within the general scope of his functions, and it turns out that the facts do not warrant its exercise in the particular instance, as, for instance, if he unnecessarily throw goods overboard in a panic, or sell goods without justifying need, the owners are held liable for his acts, according to the rule Omnia facta magistri debet prestare qui eum preposuit, Pothier, Louages Maritimes, Charte-partie, Part I., Sect. 2, Art. 3, No. 48; Ewbank v. Nutting (7 C. B. 797); and for a like reason they must be liable for his culpable omissions. For these reasons we think the shipowners are answerable for the conduct of the master in point of law, if, in point of fact, he was guilty of a want of reasonable care of the goods in not drying them at Liverpool. This raises, in the end, the question of fact, whether there was a breach of the duty thus affirmed; a question which, though properly one for a jury, we are, under the powers given in the special case, to draw inferences of fact, and the 32nd section of the Common Law Procedure Act 1854, bound to determine. It is obvious that the proper answer must depend upon the circumstances of each particular case, and that the question whether active special measures ought to have been taken to preserve the cargo from growing damage by accident, is not determined simply by showing damage done and suggesting measures which might have been taken to prevent it. A fair allowance ought to be made for the difficulties in which the master may be involved. The performance of such a duty, whether it be for the joint benefit of the shipowner and the shipper, or for the benefit of the shipper only, could not be excused by reason of insignificant delay not amounting to deviation, and there are many cases of reasonable delay in ports of call, for purposes connected with the voyage though not necessary for its completion, which do not amount to deviation. It could not be insisted upon if a deviation were involved. The place, the season, the extent of the deterioration, the opportunity, and means at hand, the interests of other persons concerned in the adventure, whom it might be unfair to delay for the sake of the part of the cargo in peril; in short, all circumstances affecting risk, trouble, delay, and inconvenience, must be taken into account. Nor ought it to be forgotten that the master is to exercise a discretionary power, and that his acts are not to be censured because of an unfortunate result, unless it can be affirmatively made out that he has been guilty of a breach of duty. In the present case the circumstances affecting the propriety of drying the beans are not stated in detail, and a good deal is left to our general knowledge and experience. It is common knowledge that beans are a cargo which specially suffers from damp, that the effects of the damp spread and are aggravated from hour to hour, that such a cargo, therefore, if damp, ought to be dried, if reasonably possible, and not sent on in a state of fermentation. It must be taken from the finding as to particular average, that such drying would have been a reasonable and prudent course in the interest of the shippers, and one which they would have been sure to take if they had been owners of the whole adventure. The facts stated are all in favour of the conclusion that the beans might have been dried during an insignificant delay, at a moderate expense, which there would have been no difficulty in providing from or upon the credit of the shippers; and no circumstance is stated to show any special risk, trouble, inconvenience, or other objection. The master thought proper, as he was entitled to do, to reject the offer of the shippers to take the beans out of his hands upon terms not unreasonable, and insisted, as he was entitled to do, upon keeping them in pledge for the future freight; and, having done so, he thought proper to reship and replace a large part of them, and put to sea with them in a state in which no prudent or reasonable man would have shipped or put to sea with them, taking the risk of their arriving at Glasgow just in the state of beans, so as to carry full freight for the shipowners, but largely deteriorated by the fermentation during the transit. We thus agree with the court below that the duty exists in law, and that, under the circumstances, the breach of duty is sufficiently made out in fact, and that the defendants, as shipowners, are liable in damages. The judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench must therefore be affirmed.

[Ex. Ch.]

[Ex. Ch.]

THE THURINGIA.

[ADM.]

COURT OF ADMIRALTY.

Reported by J. P. ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

March 11, 12, 13, and 22, 1872.

THE THURINGIA.

Collision—Damages—Objection to registrar's report—Rule of consequential damages—Duty of master of injured vessel—Unjustifiable abandonment.

Where a collision takes place between two vessels by the negligence of the crew of the defendants' vessel, whereby the plaintiff's vessel is injured, and afterwards and before any effort has been made to save the plaintiff's vessel the master and crew unjustifiably abandon her, and she is consequently totally lost, the defendants will not be liable for such total loss of the plaintiff's ship, but only for the expense which would have been incurred in making good the actual damage occasioned by the collision.

The master and crew of a vessel injured by collision are bound to show ordinary courage and nautical skill in endeavouring to save their vessel from total loss, and the defendants will not, on a reference to the registrar and merchants to assess the damages, be held liable for any loss which might have been avoided by the exercise of such ordinary skill and courage.

Semble, that in the Admiralty Court the burden of proving that the total loss resulted immediately from want of ordinary nautical skill and courage, and not directly from the collision, lies upon the original wrongdoers.

Semble, that where an exorbitant claim is made before the registrar and merchants for the value of the injured vessel, and the abandonment is held unjustifiable, the plaintiffs will be condemned in the costs of the reference.

Although it is the duty of every vessel, whether British or foreign, to render assistance to another which she has injured in collision, the rule will not compel a ship to remain alongside another so injured, so as to run risk of capture by an enemy's fleet.

The T., a North German steamer, ran into the W., a British steamer, eighteen miles off the coast of Heligoland. The crew of the W. immediately got on board the T., but some of them returned and found that the W. was injured, and was making water. The W. was built in watertight compartments, and the water did not reach her engines or fires. The T. lay by her for an hour, and then observing a French man of war approaching (France was then at war with Germany), hailed those on board the W., and they at once abandoned her, and the T. steamed away. The W. was approached by the French ship, and was seen by her afloat for three or four hours after the collision; the T. was found to blame for the collision, and the usual reference was made to the registrar and merchants to assess the damages, and they found that the plaintiffs (the W.) were only entitled to such sum as would have been required to repair the vessel if she had been taken to a place of safety, and to compensation for loss of contracts during the time of repair.

Held (affirming the report), that the abandonment of the vessel was unjustifiable, and that the master and crew had shown a want of ordinary nautical skill and courage in not attempting to save the W., and that her owners were therefore only entitled to recover as for a partial loss.

THIS was an appeal on objection to the registrar's report in a suit of damage by collision instituted by the owners of the British steamship J. B. Watt, and of her cargo, against the North German steamship the Thuringia. The collision cause was heard on the 19th Jan. 1871, and the Thuringia was found solely to blame, and the cause was referred to the registrar and merchants to assess the damages, and the reference came on for hearing on 26th May, and again on 2nd June 1871, and evidence was heard on both days.

The plaintiffs claimed as for a total loss, alleging the value of the vessel herself to be 18,480*l.*, and the loss of contracts, goods, and sailors' personal effects to be 961*l.* 6*s.* 2*d.*, making a total of 19,441*l.* 6*s.* 2*d.* The defendants resisted this claim, on the ground that the master and crew of the J. B. Watt improperly abandoned her, and that if she had not been so abandoned she might have been brought into a place of safety, and would not have been totally lost; and that her owners were, therefore, entitled only to such sum as would have been sufficient to restore their vessel to the state she was in before the collision, and to compensate them for loss of her services during the time it would have taken to repair her. On 13th June the registrar reported to the court that there was due to the plaintiffs the sum of 2750*l.* with interest, and that the plaintiffs should be condemned in the costs of the reference. This sum was made up of 250*l.* for temporary repairs, 1750*l.* for permanent repairs, and 750*l.* for compensation during the period of the vessel's detention whilst undergoing repairs. To this report the registrar annexed his reasons. The report fully sets out the facts of the case, and is as follows:

REPORT.

"The main question which we have to decide is, whether the master and crew of the J. B. Watt were or were not justified, under all the circumstances of the case, in abandoning their vessel after the collision. If they were, the owners will be entitled to full compensation for their losses; if not, they can only claim the amount which it would have cost them to restore the vessel to the state in which she was previous to the collision. In the latter case, we should have to inquire whether salvage assistance would or would not probably have been required to get the vessel into a place of safety, what would have been a reasonable amount to pay for those services, what the cost of the repairs, and what a proper compensation to the owners for the loss of the services of their vessel during the time the repairs were going on, and until again she was in a fit state to undertake a new voyage. All these, I need hardly observe, would be very difficult questions to decide, seeing that we have in fact no reliable evidence before us, no survey, nothing but the somewhat loose statements of unskilled witnesses as to the nature and extent of the damage sustained; and the estimate that we could form on the subject would of necessity be of a very rough and unsatisfactory character.

"The question, however, which we have first to consider is, whether the abandonment of the J. B. Watt was or was not justifiable.

"It seems that the J. B. Watt was a screw steam vessel of 777 tons gross, or 500 tons net, and that she belonged to the port of West Hartlepool. She was a comparatively new vessel, having been completed in the month of March 1870, and was on her return voyage in ballast from Hamburg, where she had discharged a cargo of coals, when at about half-past one in the afternoon of the 14th Oct. in the same year the collision in question in this cause occurred.

"The Thuringia, on the other hand, was a very large steam vessel of 1944 tons, and belonged to the Hamburg and American Steam Packet Company. She was bound to Hamburg, and approached the J. B. Watt for the purpose of obtaining information as to the position and movements of the French fleet. In doing so she rounded to under the J. B. Watt's stern, and came up under her port side; and by some mismanagement, into the particulars of which it is not necessary to enter, she ran with her stem into the J. B. Watt's port quarter about 6ft. abaft the bridge. A good deal of evidence was given as to whether it was a hard blow or a soft one; the witnesses on board the J. B. Watt declared it to have been a very severe blow; on the other hand, those on board the Thuringia says that it was very slight, that it was little more than a graze, and hardly perceptible to those on board. This discrepancy in the evidence of the two sets of witnesses is not very difficult to understand, when we remember the very great difference in size between the two vessels, and the fact that it was with the stem that the blow was given by the Thuringia, and that it was in the side that it was received by the J. B. Watt. But, however this may be, it is admitted by both parties that the side of the J. B. Watt was cut through down to from one to two feet of the water's edge, the hole being in the shape of the letter V, narrow at the bottom and widening upwards.

"So far both sides are agreed, but it is here that the difference between them arises; the witnesses for the J. B. Watt representing the damage to the ship's side to have been very extensive, and to have extended below the water line; the witnesses from the Thuringia representing it as being a clean cut, well above water mark, and at the lowest point so narrow that it was only possible to introduce the hand edgewise into it. And it may make the evidence of the witnesses more intelligible if I here describe generally the construction of the J. B. Watt.

"According to the evidence and the plans which have been laid before us, it seems that the J. B. Watt was divided into five compartments by four watertight bulkheads. The centre compartment contained the engines and boilers; forward of this were two compartments, a small one in the bows called the forepeak, and between it and the engine room, the forehold; aloft the engine were also two compartments, first a large one called the after hold, and behind it the lazaret; running fore and aft along the middle line of the after hold was a square box or tunnel, called by the witnesses the tunnel or screw alley, containing the shaft which connects the engine with the propellers. Under the fore and after holds were large iron tanks, the tops of which formed the flooring of the fore and after holds respectively; they were intended to hold, and at the time of the collision did hold water for ballast. The tanks did not extend under the engine compartment.

"I will now proceed to state, so far as my notes will enable me to do so, the tenor of the evidence given by the witnesses, who were produced on behalf of the J. B. Watt. The first witness examined was the master, George Dixon. He stated, that at the time of the collision he was on the fore part of the bridge, that he came aft, ordered the engines to be stopped, and then looked at the damage over the side, and from what he saw thought that she was cut right down to the water's edge. He then looked down the fore hatch of the after hold and saw the water coming in at the ship's bilge, and he says that the top of the tank was broken and was sticking up. He says that he then went on deck and ordered the boats out, as he thought the vessel could not swim long. The crew left in two of the vessel's boats, and shortly afterwards the master left in the third boat, but before doing so he says that he took a second look at the damage, and he then observed that everything was beginning to get covered, and that the water was nearly but not quite up to the top of the screw alley.

"On his way he met a boat coming from the Thuringia, with the first officer and second engineer of that vessel, and a pilot named Irvin. He pulled alongside the Thuringia, and asked the master of that vessel to take the J. B. Watt in tow, but which it seems could not have been done without incurring the risk of capture by the French fleet, which was in the neighbourhood. Dixon then returned with his chief mate and engineer to the J. B. Watt, where they found the three persons belonging to the Thuringia, who had preceded them. What the master then did he does not say, further than that he got together some of his things, some silver spoons, forks, cigars, &c.; and on the mate of the Thuringia being hailed from that vessel to return they all left the J. B. Watt, and as soon as they were on board the Thuringia, that vessel steamed away as fast as she could to avoid capture by one of the French ships of war, which was seen to have been detached in pursuit of her.

"On cross-examination, Dixon admitted that it was a little time, a very short time, after the collision when he ordered the boats to be got out. He stated that his vessel steamed between eight and a half and nine knots an hour, that he had left Heligoland at 11.30 a.m. that day, or about two hours before the collision, that the weather was fine and bright, the sea smooth, and that there was a light wind from the north. He said also, for the first time, on cross-examination, that the bulkhead, which separated the engine-room from the after hold, appeared to be started away from the ship's side; he could not say what was the size of the rent, but it appeared to be wider than would be just sufficient to enable you to get your hand through. He said also on re-examination that the water went through the rent into the engine-room; but to what extent he could not say, and it was clearly impossible for him to do so, as he admitted that he had not been in the engine-room at all.

"I think that I have stated all the material parts of the master's evidence, except that he was cross-examined a good deal in regard to certain statements in the protest, where it was said, that 'when they left the vessel first the bottom of the gash on her port side was two and a half feet from the water line,' and 'that when they left her the second time the water was washing into the gash.' The master had also stated before us that the J. B. Watt, when they finally left her, was drawing nearly fifteen feet of water, and he was asked to reconcile it with the statement in the protest that she then drew only thirteen and a half feet aft. He admitted that he had given instructions for the protest, and that it had been drawn up by Mr. Turnbull, the plaintiff's solicitor, but he could give no explanation of the difference between the statements in the protest and his present evidence.

THE THURINGIA.

"The next witness examined was Thomas Smith, the chief officer. He speaks to the extensive nature of the damage in the ship's side about six feet abaft the bridge. In contradiction, however, to the master, he said, that the bottom of the rent or cut did not extend down to the water's edge, but was about one and a half feet above it, and that below that point and under water the bilge was smashed in. He also said that the bulkhead, which separates the engine room from the after hold, was started away from the ship's side; that the joints and rivets were started; but he gives no more information than the master as to the extent of this damage. He said that, as soon as he had inspected the damage, he went on deck to help to get the boats out, and that then he took a second look at the damage through the hatch in the after hold, and saw that the water was nearly level with the top of the tunnel alley, and he left in the boat with the master. This man afterwards returned with the master and engineer to the J. B. Watt, and he and the engineer appear to have gone down into the engine room, and to have there found the chief mate and engineer of the Thuringia. He says, indeed, that the water was coming into the engine room, between the end of the bulkhead and the ship's side, but not so far as appears in any great quantity, nor is it pretended that there was ever at any time much water in the engine compartment. All that the mate ventures to say on this point is that, before he left the J. B. Watt the first time, he raised one of the stoke hole plates, and saw the water nearly on a level with the plate; but he does not say that he found any more water there when he returned. He asserts very positively that the donkey engine was set on before they left the vessel the first time, but admits that it was stopped when they got back to her. He says also that, when they left her the last time, the water in the after hold was about four feet above the top of the screw alley; but he does not say that he took any soundings; he only says that he judged it to be about four feet above the screw alley.

"The other witnesses examined on behalf of the J. B. Watt were William Peacock, the carpenter, John Tiplady, the boatswain, Frederick Erle, a seaman, and John Goldsmith, a master mariner and pilot, who was a passenger on board the J. B. Watt at the time of the collision. All these witnesses speak to the extensive nature of the damage in the after hold and to the water coming in there; and the last witness, who left the ship with the master says that the water was nearly to the top of the tunnel. But none of these witnesses apparently went into the engine room, and none of them returned to go on board the J. B. Watt after the Thuringia's people had boarded her.

"Such, then, was the evidence produced before us on the part of the J. B. Watt. In reply, three witnesses were produced from the Thuringia, viz., John Peter Neilsen, chief mate, Henry Averborg, the second engineer, and Mathew Lamont Irvin, the pilot. These were the three persons who went from the Thuringia to the J. B. Watt to inspect her condition.

"Neilsen, the chief mate, says, that when they boarded the vessel the rent or hole in the ship's side was from eight inches to one foot above the water line; that he did not see any damage in the bilge below the water mark. He very properly declined to swear that there was not any damage there; all that he would say was, that he saw no appearance of there being any. He admits that there was a good deal of water in the after hold, but swears positively that it was not 4ft. above the top of the tunnel, as had been stated by the mate of the J. B. Watt, for he says that he could see the top of the tunnel. He adds that he took a shovel, and having fastened a piece of string to it, dropped it on the starboard side of the tunnel, and found the water to be four spans or about 2ft. 8in. deep. The mate further stated that he saw the water wash in as the vessel heeled over, but he admits that this could hardly account for all the water that he saw in the after hold. He says that the pilot Irvin called his attention to the vessel's helm, and that they lashed the helm to port in order to bring the vessel's head up to the wind. He can't say whether the donkey engine was going when they got on board, but he distinctly says that it was going when they finally left her. This was about three-quarters of an hour after the collision. He says that when they left her she was about 3½ft. or 4ft. down by the stern.

"Henry Averborg was the next witness examined, and his evidence was very important, more especially when taken in connection with the evidence, of the first and second engineers of the J. B. Watt at the former trial, but who, I may observe, were not produced before as at the reference. Averborg says that as soon as he got on board he went into the engine room; that he found the door of the mouth of the tunnel open, and that there was a little water coming in from the tunnel into the engine room. He says that he shut the door, that the flow from it was thereby stopped, and that no more water came into the engine room after that. He says that he examined the state of the engines, and found that there was a pressure of 80lbs. to the inch, that there was no water in the gauge, and that the donkey engine was not going. He says that the engineer of the J. B. Watt came down about ten minutes after him; that he showed him the state of the engines; that the engineer then set on the donkey engine; that there was no difficulty in doing this, and that it was set on for the purpose of filling the boilers. He further says that he went down into the stokehole; that there was no water there, and that he called the attention of the engineer of the J. B. Watt to the fact; that he blew off the steam from the boilers, the pressure being dangerously high, and that they left the donkey-engine going. When asked on cross-examination, he declined to swear that the bulkhead was not started from the ship's side; but he stated that no water came from the after hold through the bulkhead into the engine room, and that what water came in was through the mouth of the tunnel, and that that ran on to the floor of the engine room, and thence down into the bilge; but that when the door was shut no more water came in.

"The third witness was Irvin, the pilot. He stated that he went on board with the chief mate and second engineer of the Thuringia; that on getting on board he immediately went with the engineer into the engine room. He speaks to the door at the mouth of the alley being open, and to the water 'lipping in,' as he calls it, through the opening, but he says, that when the door was closed no more water came in, either there or at any other place; he also speaks to the furnace doors being shut, and to the pressure of steam in the boilers being very great. He then says that he went on deck and saw the master of the J. B. Watt coming on board; that he spoke to the engineer of that vessel, and that they went down together into the engine room; that they had some conversation, and that the donkey-engine was set going. He says that he went up on to the bridge and lashed the helm to port; that he then went with the mate of the Thuringia, and sounded the water in the after hold with a shovel, and found it to be four spans or 2ft. 8in. deep. He adds that he could just see the top of the tunnel, and that they sounded by the side of the tunnel, but on the starboard side: and in cross examination he says that he saw about 6in. of the tunnel. The way he explained the presence of water in the screw alley was, that probably it was not water tight, and that the water in the after hold would consequently find its way into the alley, and thence out of the mouth into the engine room. This, I am informed by the merchants, is not at all improbable.

"All the witnesses on both sides speak to the vessel being still a float when they last saw her, which would be for some two hours after the collision, for it is clear that it was about an hour after the collision before the Thuringia finally steamed away, and she continued in sight for nearly another hour, sufficient, at all events, to see whether she was still afloat or not. But the matter does not rest here, for we have an affidavit on the point from a Mons. Senez, a commander in the French navy, which I had no hesitation in admitting. This gentleman's evidence is, that on the 14th Oct. last he was second in command of the French ship of war Heroine, which was then cruising in company with the French fleet in the neighbourhood of Heligoland. He says that between two and three o'clock in the afternoon, owing to certain manœuvres which appeared suspicious on the part of a large steam vessel, the Heroine was ordered by the French Admiral to proceed toward her. On their approach the steam vessel, which could have been no other than the Thuringia, steamed off at full speed, and they then observed another vessel, which proved to be the J. B. Watt, which had apparently been damaged in a collision. He says that on the way they picked up the boat of the J. B. Watt. He describes the injury as being in the form of a V, and extending to between forty and fifty centimetres of the water, and says that the stern was deep in the water, but not to an extraordinary degree. He says that the Heroine remained for about twenty-five minutes near the J. B. Watt, and then steamed away again to rejoin the French fleet. He says that he continued to watch the J. B. Watt, and that at half-past five o'clock, at which time they were about twelve miles away from her, she was still afloat, and that as the night was approaching, and they were distancing her, he lost sight of her.

"Commander Senez adds that he asked to be allowed to go on board the vessel, but that the captain refused his permission, saying that he
