nothing in their position to prevent them seeing it sooner than in point of fact they reported it, the cause of the collision was that they did not report it sooner; that is, in effect, that they did not efficiently perform their duty as look-out men. The truth of the matter seems to be that they, like their superiors, did not contemplate the contingency of falling in with an iceberg, and that they therefore too long allowed themselves to imagine that the object they had observed was a cloud only, instead of a cloud in the bosom of which the iceberg was. For these reasons, treating the judgment as stating that the default of the master caused or contributed to the collision, we consider it is incorrect, and we reverse the finding and the sentence that the certificate of the master should be suspended, and we think the certificate should be returned to the master at once.

Sir R. Phillimore.—I am of the same opinion. I think the finding incorrect in so far as it finds that the master has by his conduct caused or contributed to the casualty. I am of opinion that the evidence shows that he did not do so, and, in addition to the remarks of the President on that matter, I would observe that the look-outs did see an object ahead at a time when it might have been avoided, but, unfortunately, instead of at once reporting it to the officer of the watch, valuable time was lost. The look-out men are not before the court, but the master is, and he is said to have caused a casualty; the cause of the casualty was the loss of the valuable time, and that was lost not by the default of the master, but by the default of the look-out men; not by placing the men on the skid bridge, but by the look-out men neglecting to report the iceberg when seen.

E. C. Clarkson applied for the costs.—The Board of Trade have been pronounced to have wrongly suspended the master's certificate; he has been put to great expense in defending himself and clearing himself from the charge of negligence, and he has succeeded. It may be that in ordinary cases in the court below a master is not entitled to costs, as he gets his expenses as a witness from the Board of Trade, and the fact of there being no charge against him, or the charge, if made, being dismissed, may be a reason for him not incurring costs in defending himself against a charge without foundation; but when he has been found guilty below and appeals successfully from that finding, there is no reason why he should not have the costs necessarily incurred by him in establishing his innocence.

Muir Mackenzie, for the Board of Trade, left the question as to costs in the hands of the court.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 20.—Sir James Hannen.—The court decided in this case that, assuming the correctness of the finding of the court below that the master was in default for not placing the look-out in the most efficient position, it did not appear from the evidence that the default caused or contributed to the casualty, and we therefore reversed the finding and the suspension of the master's certificate. On this decision the question arose what direction we should give on the subject of costs, and, as this was the first appeal under the provisions of the Shipping Casualties Investigation Act 1879, we took time to consider whether we could lay down any rule as to costs in this and future cases. We have come to the conclusion that, as the action of the court below in suspending the certificate proceeds on the invitation of the Board of Trade, we ought, where we think that the certificate has been improperly suspended, to give costs to the successful appellant, unless we should be of opinion that he has been guilty of such misconduct as rendered an inquiry as to the suspension of his certificate reasonable. In the present case we do not consider that the master has been guilty of such misconduct, and we therefore direct that the Board of Trade pay him the costs of the appeal. It must be understood that where the appeal is unsuccessful the appellant will, as a rule, be condemned in costs.

The Fanchon.

Mortgage of ship—Charter by shipowner—Mortgagees—Charterer's rights—Arrest—Release.

Where the owner of a ship, which is mortgaged, charters her before the mortgagee takes possession, the mortgagee cannot interfere to prevent the execution of the charter-party unless it will materially injure or impair the value of his security, and if the vessel be arrested in an action of mortgage by the mortgagee, the court will release her on the application of the charterer, unless such injury is shown by the mortgagee.

This was a motion for the release of the Fanchon, which had been arrested by the plaintiff as mortgagee of twenty sixty-fourth shares in the said ship for the purpose of realising a mortgage upon the said ship for 1000*l.* under the provisions of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, sect. 11.

The Fanchon was a barque belonging to the port of Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, and was owned by several persons including one Ryerson, who owned twenty sixty-fourth shares in the barque, and was also managing owner.

On the 6th April 1877 Ryerson mortgaged his twenty shares to one Ford, of Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, to secure the repayment of a loan of 1000*l.* made by Ford to Ryerson, and by the mortgage, which was duly registered, the sum so secured became repayable on the 6th April 1880.

On the 28th March 1880 the Fanchon arrived from the United States at Queenstown with cargo on board, calling there for orders, and immediately afterwards she was ordered to proceed to Hull and there discharge. On the 31st March the agent of the ship in London, acting under instructions from the master, chartered the Fanchon to ship a cargo of cliff stone at Hull and carry the same to Philadelphia, U.S., for a freight of 12*s.* per ton. On the 3rd April the ship arrived at Hull, and there began to discharge her inward cargo. The mortgage before mentioned had, some time during the year 1879, been transferred to Messrs. Smith, Payne, and Co., of London, bankers, and on or about the 3rd April 1880 they gave notice to the ship's agent that they should object to the ship leaving England without their mortgage being paid off, and on the 6th April 1880 they put a shipkeeper in possession of the ship on their behalf; and on the 7th April 1880 they commenced this action, and on the following day the ship was arrested. After the arrest of the ship the charterer began to load the cargo of cliff stone under the charter-party, and the ship was fully loaded and ready to proceed to sea on the 29th April 1880.

The charterer having intervened in the action, gave notice to the plaintiff of a motion to release the vessel to enable her to proceed on her voyage, and affidavits setting out the above facts were filed. In the affidavits filed by the charterer, it was alleged that the charter-party was the best that could be procured under the circumstances, and enabled the ship to proceed to America, and there load a profitable cargo in the ordinary course of her trade, viz., the carriage of bread-stuffs, and that the charter-party would not lessen or injure the value of the security of the mortgagee. The affidavits on behalf of the mortgagees alleged that they had reason to suppose that the charter-party was entered into by the owners in collusion with charterer to get the ship out of the jurisdiction, and prevent the plaintiff from realising his security; that this was shown by the smallness of the rate of freight, and by the hurry in chartering the ship; that Ryerson and Ford were both in liquidation, and the plaintiff would be deprived of all remedy if the ship left England. These allegations were wholly denied by affidavits filed on behalf of the charterer in reply.

E. C. Clarkson, for the charterer, in support of the motion.—The ship was chartered not merely on behalf of Ryerson, but of the other owners also. The latter are the majority of owners, and a mortgagee can have no greater rights to stop the ship than the owner whose shares he holds as security. Hence the plaintiff cannot restrain the ship from going to sea against the interests of a majority of owners. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—But you represent only the charterer here to-day.] But the charterer has made a contract with the majority of the owners by which he acquires their rights to use the ship. The question really is whether a mortgagee can be allowed to impede the execution of a charter-party made whilst the ship is still in the possession of the owners. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Cannot a mortgagee come to the court and ask for a sale? Is not this a danger incidental to chartering?] A mortgagee can sell without coming to the court at all; but he cannot stop the vessel. Here the plaintiff has both stopped and arrested. He has entered into possession, and therefore is owner; how can he object to a charter-party entered into bonâ fide by his co-owners before taking possession? In Collins v. Lamport (34 L. J. N. S. 196, Ch.; 11 L. T. Rep. N. S. 497; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 153), Lord Westbury says that "under the statute, so long as the mortgagee of the ship does not take possession, the mortgagor, as the registered owner of the ship, retains all the rights and privileges of ownership, and all contracts made by him are valid so long as they do not impair the rights of the mortgagee. The same rule is laid down in Johnson v. The Royal Mail Steam Packet Company (L. Rep. 3 C. P. 38 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 445; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 21). Here the charter-party was entered into by the charterers without any notice of the mortgage, and unless it can be shown that it impairs the mortgagee's interest it is binding.

Butt, Q.C. and W. G. F. Phillimore for the mortgagee.—The mortgage appears upon the register as being due upon the 6th April 1880, and the charterers knew or might have known when it was due. The charter-party was dated March 31, 1880, but the loading of the vessel did not commence until after the arrest. The other owners had full opportunity of knowing the date of the mortgage becoming due, and there was no necessity to effect this charter-party six days before that date. The charter-party is made in a hurry to carry a worthless cargo at a low rate of freight. All these facts point to collusion. Collins v. Lamport (ubi sup.) is distinguishable, as there the charter-party contemplated the ship going to her own port, whereas here she is being sent out of British jurisdiction. If they will give bail for safe return, the plaintiff will be satisfied; such bail is usually given in co-ownership actions, but there is no reason why it should not be given to a mortgagee. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—That appears to be contrary to The Innisfallen, L. Rep. 1 Adm. & Ecc. 72; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 71; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 470.] That case does not apply to a mortgagee in possession. If this charter-party were beneficial, the mortgagee might be content, but it is clearly intended to deprive him of his security. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I do not see that you have at all proved the charges of collusion or intent to defeat the rights of the mortgagee. I see great difficulty in distinguishing the case from Collins v. Lamport, ubi sup.] It is a material prejudice to take the ship out of British jurisdiction. The freight is nominal, and the cost of the voyage will take precedent of our mortgage, and pro tanto diminish our security.

E. C. Clarkson in reply.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This case is not without difficulty, and after some consideration I have arrived at the following conclusion. The case relied on as containing the law on the subject is Collins v. Lamport (ubi sup.), in which judgment was delivered by Lord Chancellor Westbury in 1865, and the passage which has been referred to more than once I must mention again: "As long, therefore, as the dealings of the mortgagor with the ship are consistent with the sufficiency of the mortgagee's security, so long as those dealings do not materially prejudice and detract from or impair the sufficiency of the security of the vessel as comprised in the mortgage, so long is there parliamentary authority given to the mortgagor to act in all respects as owner of the vessel; and if he has authority to act as owner, he has of necessity authority to enter into all those contracts touching the disposition of the ship which may be necessary for enabling him to get the full value and full benefit of his property. Therefore the proposition of law is that the mortgagor has full power to deal with the ship, provided he does not materially impair the value of the security. I take it that it lies on the mortgagee to satisfy the court that this charter-party would materially prejudice his security; and I am not satisfied, on reviewing the evidence, that he has discharged this burden of proof. I am inclined to think that, on the whole, he has failed to show that the carrying the charter-party into effect would impair his security. It is a case in which the principle laid down in Collins v. Lamport (ubi sup.) would apply, and I must order the release of the vessel. I do not think it is a case for costs.

THE HJEMMETT.

Towage—Contract—Delay—Extra remuneration.

Where a tug contracts to perform a specified towage service for a specific sum, and, from causes beyond the control of tug or tow, the completion of the contract is delayed, the tug is not entitled to extra remuneration for such delay, provided it was reasonable under the circumstances.

A tug agreed to tow a barque from Sea Reach to London for 13*l. During the towage the barque suffered damage in a collision, for which neither tug nor tow were to blame, but which caused the barque to remain at Gravesend for three days before proceeding to London.*

Held, that the tug was not entitled to any remuneration for attending upon the barque at Gravesend for the three days, beyond the 13*l. agreed upon.*

THIS was an action of towage originally instituted in the City of London Court, but subsequently transferred by order to the Admiralty Division.

The facts which were agreed on between the parties were that, on the 26th Dec. 1879, it was agreed that the Vivid should tow the barque Hjemmett from Sea Reach, where she then was, to London for 13*l.*; that during such towage a collision took place between the Hjemmett and a steamer called the W. R. Ricketts, in which the Hjemmett was injured; that subsequently about 6.30 p.m. the Vivid, with the Hjemmett in tow, arrived at Gravesend, where the Hjemmett anchored; that the Vivid was always ready and willing to tow the Hjemmett to London in pursuance of the agreement, but the captain of the Hjemmett objected to such a course until he had cleared away the wreckage and partially repaired the damage she had sustained, as in the state she was then in it would certainly not have been a prudent course to have towed the vessel to London. The Vivid remained in attendance upon the Hjemmett during the time she was at Gravesend, and it was not until the morning of the 29th Dec. that the Hjemmett, having cleared away the wreckage, was in a position to be towed to London.

The owners of the Hjemmett brought an action against the W. R. Ricketts, in the Admiralty Division, for the damages sustained by the former vessel in the collision, and in that action the W. R. Ricketts admitted her liability.

On the action of collision being brought in the High Court, an application was made to transfer the towage action from the City of London Court to the High Court, and an order was made directing the transfer, and that the cause should be heard without pleadings.

The plaintiffs' claim was for 18*l.*, in addition to the agreed sum of 13*l.*, being an amount equal to three days' demurrage at 6*l.* per day.

There was no formal tender of 13*l.*, but it was agreed by the parties that certain correspondence between the respective solicitors should be read as part of the case, from which correspondence it appeared that the defendants had at all times, since the issue of the summons in the City of London Court been ready and willing to pay the 13*l.*

May 4.—The case came on for hearing.

E. C. Clarkson for plaintiff.—There is no dispute as to the facts. There was a delay at Gravesend whilst the tow was repairing her damages. That delay was not anticipated when the contract was made, and was not caused by any fault on the part of the tug. The only question then is, what extra pay are we to have for the extra service.

Dr. W. G. F. Phillimore for defendants.—The contract was a complete contract to tow from Sea Reach to London, taking the chances of such a voyage. We did not detain the tug at Gravesend. He might have done whatever he wished, provided he was ready to complete his contract to tow to London when called on to do so within a reasonable time. He referred to

The Strathnaver, 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 113; L. Rep. 1 App. Cas. 58; 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 148.

There is no such thing in contemplation of law as extraordinary towage; towage is a contract express or implied to do a certain thing for a certain remuneration; here the thing has been done and the remuneration tendered.

Clarkson in reply.—The Strathnaver (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 113: L. Rep. 1 App. Cas. 58: 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 148) is not in point; there the suit was one of salvage, and it was held not to be salvage, and that the suit being of a specific nature, the plaintiff could not in that suit recover for towage. Here the contract is one of towage, and we ask for towage remuneration, or what is the same, remuneration for the employment of our tugs. If the vessel had come to Gravesend without a tug, or if the contract had been to tow to Gravesend, and whilst lying at Gravesend she had desired the services of a tug, she would have had to pay for those services, and the fact that for her own convenience she had divided the contract to tow to London into two parts and interpolated another service between them, cannot alter the right of the tugs to be paid for those services. It is illusory to say that we might have taken other employment during the delay; we could not tell how long the delay might be, and from the nature of the employment of a tug it would be impossible to take any employment with the liability of having to desist from it at any time when the first vessel might be ready to proceed.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I wish it to be clearly understood that I am not expressing any opinion as to what decision the court would have arrived at if this were a case of salvage grounded on a towage service. The question I have to consider is, whether, there having been a valid agreement to take the vessel in question from Sea Reach to London, the fact of her having been delayed on the road from accident released the tug from her contract, or, on the other hand, renders it necessary to pay the tug an additional sum. The former alternative does not arise, as she has fulfilled her contract and taken the vessel on from Gravesend. The contention of the tug is, that the time spent at Gravesend was a separate service outside the original towage contract, that it was in fact a sort of subsidiary service rendered at the request of the tow outside of and apart from the original service. I do not think that I can consider it in that light, or have power to make such an award, and I must reject the prayer of the plaintiffs, and dismiss the claim, with costs from the time the tender was made. I shall make no order as to the costs, if any, incurred before tender.

(a) This was a case in which an action was brought to recover towage under a contract, by which a tug engaged to tow the Queen of Australia from Fayal to Liverpool for a lump sum, and actually towed her for 900 miles and then left her, having no more coal. The master of the tug might have taken more coal on board at Fayal, and might, after leaving the vessel, have gone back to meet her when he had coaled at the nearest port. It was held that he could recover nothing, as the contract was entire. Adm. Ct. Feb. 18, 1880.—ED.

(Before the Right Hon. Sir R. J. PHILLIMORE.)

THE JUBILEE.

Salvage—Distribution—Distinction between salvage and towage—Steamer's mainshaft broken.

Where a steamship, carrying fore and aft sails only, and not rigged for proceeding under sail alone, breaks the mainshaft of her propeller, and is compelled to take assistance from another ship, which tows her forty miles into a port, the service is of a salvage character, although the service is not attended with any danger to the salvors.

THIS was a claim for distribution of salvage brought by Andrew Collins and eight others of the crew of the steamship Bertha, of 636 tons gross register, and ninety horse power, against J. P. Hornung and Son, of Middlesborough, the owners of the said steamship.

The facts of the case were, that on the 27th Feb. 1878, at about 8 a.m., the Bertha was about forty miles to the south of the Isle of Wight, bound from Dunkirk to Bilboa, in ballast, with a crew of eighteen hands all told, when those on board of her sighted a large steamer about six miles off, showing signals of distress, and the Bertha at once bore down to her, and found that she was the screw steamship Jubilee, of 790 tons gross register, bound from Dieppe to Cardiff, in ballast, and that the mainshaft of her propeller was broken. The masters of the two said vessels agreed that the Bertha should tow the Jubilee to a place of safety, and that the amount to be paid should be settled between the owners of the said vessels, and the Bertha thereupon took the Jubilee in tow, and about 7 p.m on the same day brought her safely into the port of Yarmouth, in the Isle of Wight. The Jubilee carried fore and aft sails only, and was not rigged for proceeding under sail alone. There was a conflict of evidence as to the state of the wind and sea, the plaintiffs alleging that there was a heavy sea on at the time, and that the Jubilee was rolling about in the trough of the sea and altogether unmanageable, while on the part of the defendants the officers of the Jubilee stated that the sea was moderate, that there was but little wind, and that the Jubilee was making about one knot an hour towards the Isle of Wight with the wind dead aft at the time the Bertha came up.

The defendants admitted that they had received 150*l.* in respect of the services thus rendered by the Bertha to the Jubilee, and that the Bertha towed the Jubilee to Yarmouth, but denied that the Bertha rendered any salvage services to the Jubilee, and that they received the said sum of 150*l.* from the owners of the Jubilee as salvage reward, or otherwise than for the loss of time of the Bertha in expediting the voyage and accelerating the progress of the Jubilee. It was also admitted that without the assistance of steam power the Jubilee could not have got into port, even if she had got off a port, but on the other hand it seemed clear that there was no actual danger to the salvors.

J. P. Aspinall for the plaintiffs.—The services rendered in this case cannot be said to have been towage services only. Even granting that the sea was moderate, a large steamship such as the Jubilee with her mainshaft broken forty miles away from the nearest port was a disabled ship and in a position of extreme danger. If the weather had remained fine (and it cannot be presumed in this case that it would have done so for the forty hours which it would have taken the Jubilee to reach the coast of the Isle of Wight) it would have been utterly impossible to manœuvre her so as to bring her into any harbour, and if assistance had not arrived, she would have stranded on the coast. It is absurd then to suppose that services rendered to a vessel in such a predicament were merely to expedite her voyage or accelerate her progress and nothing more, in accordance with the terms in which Dr. Lushington describes a towage service in The Princess Alice (3 W. Rob. 138). The Jubilee was not voyaging to the port of Yarmouth in the Isle of Wight, but to Cardiff, and the master of the Jubilee considered his position one of danger, or he would not have put up flags of distress. In The Reward (1 W. Rob. 174), a sailing vessel which had been driven on the Maplin Sand was backed off by her own sails, and was proceeding to Sheerness to repair with the loss only of two anchors and cables and the starboard end of the windlass and bulkhead carried away, but it was laid down that mere towage service was confined to vessels that had received no injury or damage, and "that mere towage reward is payable in those cases only where the vessel receiving the service is in the same condition she would ordinarily be in without having encountered any damage or accident."

Dr. W. Phillimore (with him H. Lush-Wilson) for the defendants.—The services in this case were rendered only for the purpose of expediting the Jubilee on her voyage. It is true her voyage was to Cardiff, but it had become necessary for her to put into Yarmouth, and the voyage thither became at once part of her voyage. The decision in The Reward (ubi sup.) was considerably modified by Dr. Lushington in The Princess Alice (3 W. Rob. 178), in which case there was evidence of much greater danger than in the present case, and Dr. Lushington held that the services rendered were only for the purpose of expediting the voyage of the vessel, and were only towage services. In this case the Jubilee was making fair progress towards a safe port by means of her sails, and can be compared to a sailing vessel which has lost one of her masts making good progress with those remaining. There were absolutely no circumstances of danger. In The Strathnaver (L. Rep. 1 App. Cas. 58; 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 148; 3 Asp. M.L.C. 116), it was decided that where a vessel is in neither actual nor imminent probable danger a vessel engaged to tow her renders towage and not salvage services. The Jubilee cannot be said to have been in either actual or imminent probable danger, and this case comes far within the principle so laid down in the Strathnaver.

J. P. Aspinall was not called upon in reply.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—In this case the services claimed for were rendered by a vessel called the Bertha to a screw steamship the Jubilee on the 27th Feb. 1878. The question is whether those services were of a salvage or towage character. The contest is between the owners of the Bertha and nine of her crew, and the owners of the vessel contend that this was a service of towage alone, and that the crew are not entitled to a share. The crew contend that it was a salvage service. First of all I will refer to the case cited of The Princess Alice (3 W. Rob. 138), an important case in this court, where there was a broad distinction laid down by Dr. Lushington between salvage and towage services. He says: 'I must consider in the outset what are the principles which distinguish a salvage service from a mere service of towage as they have been laid down and adopted in former decisions of this court. Without attempting any definition which may be universally applied, a towage service may be described as the employment of one vessel to expedite the voyage of another when nothing more is required than accelerating her progress." I should be very sorry indeed if anything I were to say in this or any other judgment were in any way to trench upon that decision. I think, in this case, the circumstances show that something more was required than expedition and something more than mere acceleration of progress. Here was a vessel lying with her mainshaft broken. The great difficulty of a screw steamer is invariably when her shaft is broken. In this case she put up two flags for assistance. I am satisfied that the principle is laid down in many cases that under these circumstances flags are put up on the ship for the purpose of obtaining salvage services. The service therefore in this case was one of a salvage character. Still, however, I agree with what has been said that it was one of a very slight kind and not of a very meritorious description. A sum of 150*l.* has been paid by the owners of the Jubilee to the owners of the Bertha for this service, and, as the service was rendered by steam-power and in accordance with many decisions in this court the vessel is entitled, in such cases, to far the larger amount of salvage, I shall give, in this case to the plaintiffs 20*l.* with costs.

THE MARGARET.

Damage—Collision—Thames bye-laws—Infringement—Penalty—Negligence—Contributory negligence—Causa sine qua non.

An infringement of a bye-law of the Thames Conservancy, subjecting the person infringing it to a penalty, is not of itself such negligence as to render him liable for damages caused by a collision, and much increased by the breach of the bye-law, if the collision itself was not caused by the breach of the bye-law.

If a collision is caused solely by the plaintiff, there is no cause of action against the defendant on account of the damages being increased by the breach of a bye-law on his part.

The Court decides the cause of the collision, and not in the first instance the cause of the damage.

Semble, it is negligence for a dumb barge to be so navigated in the Thames that she comes into contact with another vessel, even if under ordinary circumstances such contact would not result in any damage.

THIS was an action for damages sustained by the dumb barge E. Wo. in a collision with the schooner Margaret.

The collision occurred shortly after midnight on the morning of the 16th Oct. 1879. The Margaret was lying moored to a buoy off Samuda's wharf, in Blackwall Reach, in the river Thames, and was the outside vessel of those lying at the buoy; the tide was flood, and the Margaret lying with her head down stream. The weather was dark but clear. The Margaret's starboard bower anchor was hanging by the cable from the hawse pipe with its stock about 2½ft. or 3ft. above the water.

The E. Wo. was coming up with the tide from the Victoria Docks to Hay's wharf, and had two men on board, and was laden with a cargo of tea. The men on board the E. Wo. saw the riding light of the Margaret at a distance of about 500 yards, but did not row sufficiently far out into the stream to clear her altogether, and the pea of the Margaret's anchor perforated the side of the E. Wo., in consequence of which considerable damage was done to the tea.

June 9.—The case came on for hearing before Sir R. Phillimore and two of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House as assessors.

The argument turned principally on the effect of the following Rules and Bye-laws for the Regulation of the Navigation of the River Thames, allowed by Her Majesty in Council on the 5th Feb. 1872.

19. No vessel shall be navigated or lie in the river with its anchor or anchors a-cockbill, except while fishing such anchor or anchors, or during such time as may be absolutely necessary for getting such vessel under way or for bringing it to anchor.

20. No vessel shall be navigated or lie in the river with its anchor or anchors hanging by the cable perpendicularly from the hawse, unless the stock shall be awash, except during such time as shall be absolutely necessary for catting or fishing the said anchor or anchors, or during such time as may be absolutely necessary for getting such vessel under way.

72. Any person committing any breach of, or in any way infringing any of these bye-laws, shall be liable to a penalty of and shall forfeit a sum not exceeding 5*l.*, which said penalty shall be recovered, enforced, and applied according to the provisions of the Thames Conservancy Acts 1857 and 1864.

At the close of the plaintiffs's case, after a consultation with the Trinity Masters,

Sir R. PHILLIMORE said:—I have consulted with the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House, and they are of opinion that it cannot be said that this collision was caused by the Margaret. The question I have to consider is, which of these vessels caused the collision. The plaintiff alleges that the Margaret caused it, and I do not think that he has made out his case. The only question is, by whose fault did they come into contact? There was nothing to prevent the E. Wo. taking the necessary steps to keep clear of the Margaret, and she did not do so; we have nothing to do with the consequences of her not doing so. The position of the anchor cannot affect the question of which vessel is to blame for coming into collision. I therefore am of opinion that the suit of the E. Wo. should be dismissed; but, as it is possible that the case may be appealed, the defendants can, if they choose, call witnesses.

Clarkson (with him Milward, Q.C.) did not call witnesses, but relied on

The Gipsy King, 2 W. Rob. 537; 5 Notes of Cas. 282; Sills v. Brown, 9 C. & P. 601.

Butt, Q.C. and Bucknell for the plaintiff, owners of the E. Wo.—It cannot be denied that the Margaret is guilty of a breach of the bye-laws; no vessel is allowed to lie in the river with her anchor in any position except regularly stowed, that is, catted and fished, or lowered so far from the hawse pipe that its stock is awash. If the Margaret's anchor had been in the position required by the bye-laws, it would not have touched us, and the accident would not have happened; we should have cleared the vessel herself without any hurt, and we had a right to expect that she would observe the bye-laws. The breach of the bye-laws is in itself negligence on her part, and it was that negligence, and nothing else, which caused the damage. The case of the Gipsy King (ubi sup.) is not similar to this, and principally turns on the practice of pilots on board ordering particular manœuvres. Sills v. Brown (ubi sup.) does not refer to a case where the defendant's negligence in failing to perform a statutory duty causes or contributes to the collision.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is a case of collision which took place between twelve and one on the morning of the 16th Oct. last in the river Thames. The vessels that came into collision were a dumb barge called the E. Wo., rowed by two men, which was going from the Victoria Docks to Hay's wharf with tea, and the Margaret, a schooner of 216 tons register. The Margaret was moored by a chain cable to one of the Thames conservancy buoys. The Margaret was run into by the barge. As to that there can be no dispute, but it has been contended that, having regard to the bye-laws for the regulation of the navigation of the river Thames, the damage was caused by the anchor of the Margaret not being in such a position that its stock should be awash as the bye-laws prescribed it should be. It appears to the Elder Brethren and myself that in this case the Margaret was lying at anchor in a proper place, that she was properly moored, that she carried a proper light which was visible at a considerable distance, that the night was clear and starlight, and that it was the careless navigation of the barge that brought these two vessels into contact in the first instance. The bye-law affecting the question is to this effect: [His Lordship read bye-law 20 set out above, and continued:] It is established in this case that the stock of the anchor was not awash, but was 3ft. or about that distance above the water's edge. This bye-law, therefore, appears to have been infringed, but the penalty for such an infringement is stated in the 72nd rule, which is in the following terms: [His Lordship read bye-law 72 set out above, and continued:] Now it appears to me that a confusion has been made in the argument of counsel for the barge. The question before the court to-day is who was in the first instance guilty of the collision? because without the collision no damage could have been done; and it appears to me—and the Trinity Masters have no doubt whatever—that the careless navigation of the barge in question brought the two vessels into contact. What may have been the consequences of that, and what may be the amount of damage caused by the collision, the collision being the consequence of the careless navigation of the barge, I have nothing to do with. In this view of the case I am fortified by the judgment in The Gipsy King (2 W. Rob. 537; 5 Notes of Cas. 212), and by the charge of the learned judge in Sills v. Brown (9 C. & P. 601). I think it only fair, however, that I should state my opinion, and in forming it I do not rely entirely on those cases, because the circumstances of the cases cited differ somewhat from this. I therefore think it right to state my own opinion that the cause of the collision was the careless navigation of the barge. I do not think it necessary to go into the evidence which establishes that the riding light of the Margaret was clearly visible at a very considerable distance. Therefore I pronounce the barge E. Wo. alone to blame for this collision, and I dismiss the suit with costs.

THE NEERA.

Costs—Reviewing taxation—Discretion of taxing officer—Retainers—Refreshers.

It is the practice in the Admiralty Division to allow retaining fees to both leading and junior counsel.

The practice in district registries in taxing costs should be same as that in the principal registry.

It is a reasonable exercise of the discretion of the taxing officer, with which the court will not interfere, to disallow refresher fees to counsel for the second day when a case has taken part of two days; but the parts together do not amount to a full day.

Harrison v. Wearing (11 Ch. Div. 206; 41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 376) approved.

THIS was an application to the court to review a taxation of costs by the district registrar at Liverpool. A collision had occurred at the entrance of the Sandon Dock Basin between a steam barge or Mudhopper No. 4, belonging to the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, and the screw steamship Neera. Subsequent to the collision salvage services had been rendered to the Mudhopper and Neera by the steam tugs Toiler and Lord Lyons, and five actions were commenced: (1) A damage action between the owners of the Mudhopper and the Neera. (2) A salvage action by the owners of the Lord Lyons against the Mudhopper. (3) A salvage action by the owners of the Lord Lyons against the Neera. (4) A salvage action by the owners of the Toiler against the Mudhopper. (5) A salvage action by the owners of the Toiler against the Neera By an order of the district registrar the second and fourth of the above actions were consolidated, and by a subsequent order the third and fifth were also consolidated with them, and the conduct of the four consolidated actions given to the solicitors for the Toiler, the owners of the Lord Lyons having permission to be represented by one counsel at the hearing. On the 3rd April the damage action came on for hearing, the consolidated actions of salvage being set down for hearing immediately afterwards on the 4th and 5th April. The case is reported (Mudhopper No. 4, ante, p. 103; 40 L.T. Rep. N. S. 462). The damage action was concluded on 4th April, and about 1.15 p.m. on that day the consolidated salvage actions came on for hearing, and were concluded about 12.30 p.m. on 5th April.

The district registrar, in taxing the bill of costs of the plaintiff's solicitors in respect of the Toiler as between party and party, disallowed retainer fees to the leading counsel for the plaintiffs, and also refreshers to counsel for the second day of the hearing.

On the 10th June the plaintiff's solicitors carried in an objection to these disallowances (Rules of the Supreme Court (Costs) Special Allowances and General Provisions, r. 30, 31); and the district registrar, having reconsidered his taxation, adhered to his former decision, and on 29th June stated his grounds and reasons as follows:

3. The plaintiffs have been allowed a retainer fee to one counsel, and it is not usual to allow more than one fee; moreover, it does not appear that the retainer to leading counsel was given before the brief was delivered, and it was therefore really unnecessary.

4. Both consolidated actions were by arrangement heard together. They were called on at about 1.15 on the 4th April, and, after ten witnesses had been examined, they were adjourned to the following day, and were finished on the 5th April about 12.30; thus, taking together, less than a day.

If each action had been heard separately, the question of refresher fees would not have arisen, as the hearing of neither of them would have extended fron one day into another. As the cases did not occupy one full day's time, although the hearing took portions of two days, and acting upon the principle laid down in the judgment of the Master of the Rolls in the case of Harrison v. Wearing (11 Ch. Div. 206; 41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 376), the effect of which was that refresher fees should be allowed to counsel where a case takes more than one day's time, I am of opinion that in this case counsel were not entitled to refresher fees.

On 1st July the motion came on for hearing.

E. C. Clarkson in support of the motion to review.

Squarey, for defendants, opposed.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I shall allow the retainer which has been disallowed in this case. It has always been the practice in the London Registry of this court to allow retainers to leading counsel; and I see no reason why the practice should be departed from. I must, therefore, reverse the decision of the district registrar on this point. I think the dictum of the Master of the Rolls in the case of Harrison v. Wearing (11 Ch. Div. 206; 41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 376) that the taxing masters at common law adopted a reasonable and intelligible rule when they decided "that when the case occupied more than one day—that means more than one day's time, not more than one actual day, for it might occupy portions of two days, but the two portions together might not make a whole day . . . . refreshers might be allowed" is in favour of the decision the Liverpool district registrar has come to with respect to the refreshers in this case; and I do not think that I ought in the circumstances of the case to interfere with the discretion he has exercised in disallowing them. The taxation of the district registrar will therefore stand, except so far as it disallows the retaining fee to leading counsel. There ought not to be a different practice as to taxation of costs in the Liverpool District Registry from that which prevails in the principal registry.

THE CASTLEWOOD.

ON APPEAL FROM THE VICE-ADMIRALTY COURT OF BERMUDA.

Salvage—Apportionment—Master's share—Dangerous navigation—Citation of parties interested—Notice by appellants that no relief will be sought against them—Appearance—Costs.

Where 3500*l. had been awarded for salvage services rendered by a steamship,* 2000*l. was awarded to the owners, and* 700*l. to the master for his skilful navigation in dangerous circumstances; the order of the Vice-Admiralty Court being varied.*

On appeal against apportionment of salvage reward the owners of the salved vessel were cited, and asked for an indemnity for their costs, which the appellants refused, and gave notice that no relief would be applied for against the owners. The owners were held to be entitled to their costs up to the time of such notice.

THIS was an appeal from an order of Josiah Rees, Esq., the Judge of the Vice-Admiralty Court of Bermuda, in a cause of salvage lately pending in that court, instituted and promoted by the appellants, the Quebec and Gulf Ports Steamship Company of the Dominion of Canada, owners of the ship or vessel Canima, and the respondents, the master and crew of the said ship Canima, against the Castlewood and her cargo, for the recovery of salvage in respect of certain services rendered to the Castlewood and her cargo.

The facts proved in the said cause were that the steamship Castlewood of 1227 tons net, left Charlestown, South Carolina, on the 22nd Jan. 1879, bound to Revel, in Russia, with a cargo of 5032 bales of cotton, the value of the ship and cargo together being 80,000*l.* On the night of the 23rd an accident occurred to her propeller, and the next morning it was ascertained that two of the four blades had been broken off. On the 20th she experienced hard gales, with heavy sea, and lost the other two blades, after which the engines were stopped and the ship kept running under sail, and on the morning of the 24th she was brought up with a view of making Bermuda to refit. On the evening of the 1st. Feb. the Castlewood made the Bermuda light, but experienced boisterous weather and was blown off again, and was beating about in the neighbourhood, the ship making more leeway then headway until 3.30 p.m. on the 6th Feb., when a steamer which proved to be the Canima, of 733 tons net, 175 horse-power (nominal), and 31 hands all told engaged in the mail service between Bermuda and New York, was observed going northward. The Castlewood hoisted signals to designate that she required assistance. The Canima ran down towards the distressed vessel, and came up with her when she was about five miles north-east of the north-east ledge of the reefs. The Castlewood was, after some trouble about the hawser, taken in tow, and proceeded with very carefully until about 9.40 p.m. when both vessels came to an anchor. The Castlewood on the next morning, getting up her anchor first, ran towards the Canima, and to avoid collision the latter steamed ahead, and her chain parting, she lost her anchor and chain. After taking pilots on board, the Canima, as she started ahead, parted the stops of the hawser which went over her stern, and in the delay caused thereby, the Castlewood coming down quickly, the Canima had to steam ahead to avoid a collision, and the slack of the hawser caught the Canima's propeller which fortunately cut the hawser in two, as otherwise the engines of the Canima must have been stopped, and a collision would have been inevitable. After much difficulty the Canima again got the Castlewood in tow, and steamed ahead and about half-past eight o'clock entered the Narrows, an intricate and dangerous passage, having a sudden turn in it requiring the greatest care and vigilance even when navigating a ship perfectly under control, but peculiarly dangerous for a ship having in tow a disabled vessel like the Castlewood, and the only channel through the reefs by which a ship of any size can be taken to the naval station at Ireland Isle, and having towed the Castlewood up the main channel to Grassey Bay, the Canima brought her to anchor there at about 11 a.m. on the 17th Feb. 1879. The passage of the Narrows is also difficult in consequence of the chance of the towing steamer running on to the western reef; and it would seem that the difficulty in this instance would be enhanced by the fact of the Canima towing a steamer larger than herself. Under these circumstances the learned judge of the Vice-Admiralty Court of Bermuda, awarded the sum of 3500*l.* as salvage remuneration for the services rendered by the appellants, the owners, and the respondents the master and crew, of the Canima to the Castlewood and her cargo; and by the order appealed against made on the 22nd May, 1879 apportioned it as follows:—To the appellants, as owners of the Canima, 1500*l.*; to the respondent, the master of the Canima, 900*l.*; to the respondents, the crew of the Canima, 1100*l.*

The appellants contended that the said apportionment was erroneous, and that a much larger proportion of the sum awarded ought to have been given to the appellants:

1. Because the Canima herself was by means of her steam power the main agent in rendering the said services.

2. Because the Canima although carrying mails and passengers, was turned back on her voyage and was delayed by rendering the said services.

3. Because the Canima incurred great risk in rendering the said services.

4. Because upon the facts proved in the said salvage clause, a larger proportion than the sum of 1500*l.* ought to have been awarded to the appellants.

The respondent, the master of the Canima, alleged that the navigation of the Bermuda coast is very intricate and dangerous, and that the currents during and after heavy gales set with great force and in various and unknown directions, and that towing the heavily laden Castlewood with the Canima right through these seas required very high qualities of seamanship and much skill on the part of the respondent and the crew of the Canima, and that the said respondent, the master of the Canima, was on deck and directing the navigation of the said vessel throughout; and the said respondent submitted that the judgment of the court below was right, and was fully justified by the evidence, and ought therefore to be affirmed. The respondents, the crew of the Canima, did not appear nor put in a case.

The respondents, the owners of the Castlewood and cargo, alleged that they had been made respondents by the appellants in this appeal, and had been served by them with an inhibition and citation to enter an appearance, and the said respondents submitted that they had been improperly and unnecessarily so made respondents, and so served with inhibition and citation by the appellants.

E. C. Clarkson for the appellants, urged that it was the vessel that ran the risk and performed the service, and it was they as owners who suffered by the delay in connection with the incident, and that on that ground they were entitled to a larger proportion of the salvage.

A. T. Lawrence for the respondent, the master of the Canima, resisted this claim on the ground that the salvage services, required very high qualities of seamanship and much skill; that the responsibility was great and rested solely on the master of the Canima; that very great local knowledge was necessary, and was the principal ingredient in rendering the service; and that the danger and responsibility and difficulty of the task were all augmented by the unfitness of the Canima for the task. The learned counsel also cited

The Enchantress, Lush. Ad. 93;
The Martin Luther, Swab. 289;
Scaramanga and Co. v. Stamp and Gordon, L. Rep. 4 C. P, Div. 316; 41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 191; 4 Asp. Mar. L. C. 161; and quoted from the West Indian Pilot, published by the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, to the effect that the channel called the Narrows, through which the Canima towed the Castlewood, is most difficult and dangerous to navigate.

The judgment of the Court was delivered by Sir R. J. PHILLIMORE.—Their Lordships have carefully considered the authorities cited and the arguments of counsel on both sides, and have arrived at the conclusion that this is a case in which they ought to exercise their own discretion and vary the amounts apportioned in the court below to this extent, They will award 2000*l.* to the owners of the Canima, and 700*l.* to the master. By this arrangement the master will receive rather more than masters usually do, but the facts of the case show that he displayed considerable skill in the navigation of the vessels under the more than usually difficult circumstances under which these services were rendered. Their Lordships will therefore award 2000*l.* to the owners, 700*l.* to the master, and 900*l.* to the crew.

C. Stubbs for the respondents, the owners of the Castlewood, applied for the costs of the said respondents occasioned by this appeal, on the ground that the said respondents had been cited, and an appearance by them was therefore necessary.

It appeared that the appellants' solicitors had asked the said respondents to accept service of the citation, and that the said respondents had offered to accept service on the terms that they should receive an indemnity for the costs incurred by them in so doing, and an undertaking not to make any application against their interests. To these terms the appellants would not agree, but gave notice to the said respondents that they did not intend to ask for any relief against them.

It was contended that it was unnecessary to cite the said respondents, but that although they had no interest in the matter, yet when cited they were bound to appear unless an indemnity was given. Without appearance, it was impossible for them to ask for costs, and costs might have been given against them in their absence.

E. C. Clarkson for the appellants, contra.—The owners of the Castlewood were cited because they were defendants, in case they should have thought that they had something to apply for. As they had nothing, their appearance was wholly unnecessary, more especially when we had given them formal notice that we did not intend to apply for any relief against them.

Stubbs in reply.—Such a notice was not sufficient; they ought to have given us the indemnity asked for.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE. Their Lordships consider that the respondents the owners of the Castlewood are entitled to their costs in this appeal up to the 9th April, the date on which the appellants gave notice that no relief would be sought against the owners of the Castlewood.

COURT OF APPEAL.

SITTINGS AT LINCOLN'S INN.

Reported by C. A. COOK, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

May 6 and 13, 1880.

(Before JAMES, BAGGALLAY, and BRAMWELL, L.JJ.)

Ex parte FALK; Re KIELL.

Stoppage in transitu—Duration of transit—Notice to shipowner— Delivery orders — Constructive delivery—Partial delivery for the whole—Sub-purchase.

Where the master of a ship has still the character of carrier and returns a lien for freight upon the cargo, the fact of a subsale and handing over of a delivery order for the cargo to the sub-purchaser, and actual receipt by him of part, does not put an end to the transitus, and the unpaid vendor has, upon giving the due notice to the master, the right to stop the surplus proceeds payable by the sub-purchaser, after discharging intermediate equities.

Ex parte Golding Davis and Co., Re Knight and Son (42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 270; L. Rep. 13 Ch. Div. 628) followed.

THIS was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Registrar Hazlitt sitting as Chief Judge.

The facts were set out in a statement agreed to between Mr. C. F. Kemp, trustee in Kiell's bankruptcy, and Mr. Falk. From that statement it appeared that Kiell had been a London Merchant, using the style of G. M. Kiell and Co., and Falk was a salt merchant, at Liverpool.

On the 25th March 1878 Kiell entered into a contract with Falk for the purchase of a cargo of salt in the following terms :

> I agree to furnish you cargo Calcutta salt, half and half mats inclusive, for the Carpathian, as per charter-party, at the price of 13*s.* 5*d.* (say thirteen shillings and fivepence) per ton f. o. b. payable as customary charges, 4*s.* 5*d.* in cash on invoice, and balance by your acceptance at four months from date of shipment, i.e., B. L.
> H. E. FALK.

On the 25th April 1878, the salt having been shipped on board of the Carpathian, which had been chartered by Kiell, Falk sent to Kiell bills of lading and invoice amounting to 1263*l.* 0*s.* 8*d.*, of which 415*l.* 12*s.* 2*d.* was for river freight, and drew a four months bill on Kiell for the balance, amounting to 847*l.* 8*s.* 6*d.*

Falk accepted the bill and returned it to Kiell, and paid the 415*l.* 12*s.* 2*d.* The bill was dishonoured.

The cargo of salt was consigned by Kiell to his agents at Calcutta, Messrs. Wiseman, Mitchell, Reid, and Co. Their agents in Great Britain were Messrs. T. Wiseman and Co., of Glasgow, through whom Kiell obtained an advance from the Bank of Scotland, upon the security of the bill of lading endorsed, and a bill of Exchange accepted. by Kiell.

The bill of lading and acceptance were in the ordinary course forwarded by the Bank to their agents at Calcutta, and advised by post by T. Wiseman and Co. to Wiseman, Mitchell, and Co., at Calcutta.

The consignees, as Kiell's agents, according to the usual course of business, sold the cargo before it arrived, and before the 17th July 1878, at Rs. 80 per 100 maunds, guaranteeing to Kiell payment of the proceeds of sale in consideration of a commission of 6 per cent.

On the 20th July 1878 Kiell went into liquidation.

The Carpathian, which sailed from Liverpool on the 21st April, arrived at Calcutta on the 29th July 1878.

On the 27th July Falk served upon the owners of the Carpathian, Messrs. Diarmid, Greenshields, and Co., notice to stop the cargo in transitu, offering to pay freight on delivery to him.

Diarmid and Co. took no action upon this notice till the 31st July, when they telegraphed to Steele and Co., their Calcutta agents, as follows: "Charterers Carpathian failed: unless bill of lading held for value don't deliver."

The arrival of the Carpathian was entered at the Custom House at Calcutta on the 30th July.

On the same day the consignees presented the bill of lading to Steele and Co., and received in exchange delivery orders for the cargo, directing the master of the Carpathian to weigh and deliver the salt to the person who had purchased the cargo "to arrive."

On the 3rd Aug. 1000 maunds of the cargo were weighed and delivered over the ship's side to the purchaser. On the 5th 2800 maunds were similarly delivered, and the delivery continued till the 31st Aug.

The net price realised by the sale of so much of the cargo as was delivered to the sub-purchaser after the 5th Aug. exceeded 1000*l.*

On the 2nd Aug. Falk telegraphed to Balme, Lowrie, and Co., his agents at Calcutta, to stop the cargo in transitu, and on the 5th notice was given accordingly to the captain and to the consignees, offering to pay them the amount of their advances against the cargo, with interest and charges. To prevent inconvenience, it was proposed on Falk's behalf that the consignee's contract should be carried out on possession of the cargo being given up to Falk's agents, they accounting to the consignees for any surplus proceeds of sale that might remain after satisfaction of Falk's claim as unpaid vendor.

Steele and Co. and the captain of the Carpathian declined to recognise anyone as having any title to the salt except the holders of the bill of lading.

On the 10th Sept. the consignees sent to Kiell their account of sales for the consignment of salt, the balance due amounting to 1566*l.* 3*s.* 2*d.*, which they remitted to the Bank of Scotland. The Bank, after deducting the amount due to them in respect of their advance, paid the net balance of 426*l.* 10*s.* 2*d.* to the trustee in Kiell's bankruptcy.

Falk claimed this balance; but Mr. Registrar Hazlitt held that the trustee was entitled to it, on the ground that the transit was completed by the delivery of part of the cargo, so as to be constructive delivery of the whole, and that in any case valuable consideration having been given in the shape of payment in cash and bills to Falk before the stoppage, Falk was no longer an unpaid vendor, and the cargo having been sold to a sub-purchaser, and Kiell having been paid, the rights of third persons who had given value intervened to prevent Falk's right to stop in transitu.

From this decision Falk appealed.

Cohen, Q.C. and F. Thompson for the appellants. —If there had been no pledge of the bill of lading to the bank and no sub-purchase, the notice to stop would operate from the time when the shipowner might with reasonable diligence have communicated the notice to the master or agent. There was a duty on him to do so in his position as bailee. He should have telegraphed at once; that is what would under the circumstances have been reasonable. [James, L.J.—Can a telegram be good notice? It may come from anybody.] Notice to the shipowner was sufficient where notice could not be given to the person in actual possession of the goods. "It is now clearly settled that the vendor's rights are complete on giving the person who has the possession of the goods notice of the vendor's claim to stop the goods at a time when he can obey it, although there is neither an actual taking possession by the person stopping the goods or such an assent on the part of the holder as would amount to a constructive possession:" (Blackburn on Sale, p. 267.) "The notice of the stoppage must be given to the person in possession of the goods, or if to his employer, then under such circumstances and at such time as to give the employer opportunity by using reasonable diligence to send the necessary orders to his servant:" (Benjamin on Sale, 2nd ed., p. 717.) See also

Lytt v. Cowley 7 Taunt. 159;
Whitehead v. Anderson, 9 M. & W. 518.

The notice means, don't deliver. If delivery must take place by reason of a sub-purchase, then notice to the shipowner is good if the transit is not at an end. A vendor who has been nominally paid by a bill may, on the vendor's insolvency, stop in transitu. The shipowners ought to have telegraphed to the master:

Proudfoot v. Montefiore, 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 585; L. Rep. 2 Q.B. 511; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 521; Kaltenbach v. Mackenzie, 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 15, 39; L. Rep. 3 C. P. Div. 467.

The transit was not at an end on the 30th July. The property did not pass till weighing had taken place. If neither property nor possession passed to the sub-purchaser, the transit was not at an end. There was no attornment by the master of the ship to the sub-purchaser. Handing over the delivery order was not equivalent to handing over the bill of lading:

Coventry v. Gladstone, L. Rep. 6 Eq. 44.

A delivery order is proof that the owner is satisfied for freight, and is not equivalent to possession being given:

M'Ewan v. Smith, 2 H. L. C. 309.

The question is not affected by the Factors Act 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 39, s. 5), which provides that "when any document of title to goods has been lawfully indorsed or otherwise transferred to any person as a vendee or owner of the goods, and such person transfers such document by indorsement (or by delivery where the document is by custom, or by its express terms transferable by delivery, or makes the goods deliverable to the bearer) to a person who takes the same bonâ fide and for valuable consideration the last-mentioned transfer shall have the same effect for defeating any vendor's lien or right of stoppage in transitu as the transfer of a bill of lading has for defeating the right of stoppage in transitu." The legal transitus exists as long as the contract of carriage. That contract includes delivery. Delivery of part of a cargo may be delivery of the whole where constructive delivery is possible. But here, where there is to be weighing before delivery, partial delivery cannot be constructive delivery of the whole :

Ex parte Cooper ; Re Maclaren, 40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 105 ; L. Rep. 11 Ch. Div. 68 ;
Ex parte Golding Davies and Co. ; Re Knight and Son, 42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 270 ; L. Rep. 13 Ch. Div. 628.

[James, L.J.—Ex parte Cooper went on this, that the freight was not paid, and it could not be taken that the master meant to deliver the whole cargo and lose his lien.] Here not only was the freight but also the price payable per ton. There cannot be a constructive weighing of the whole :

Hanson v. Meyer, 6 East, 614.

Mere arrival at the destination does not necessarily end the transitus :

Bolton v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company, 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 764 ; L. Rep. 1 C. P. 431.

The buyer may anticipate the end of the transitus, however, and this determines the vendor's right of stoppage in transitu :

James v. Griffin, 2 M. & W. 633.

But giving a delivery order does not determine the transitus. [Bramwell, L.J.—It might have been given if the ship had been spoken at the mouth of the Hoogly.] The vendor is entitled to the surplus proceeds of the purchase money payable by the sub-purchaser after the bank's claim is satisfied. The doctrine of stoppage as to surplus proceeds was stated in Re Westzinthus (5 B. & Ad. 817). It was upheld in Spalding v. Ruding (6 Beav. 376).

Benjamin, Q.C. and G. W. Lawrance (Watkin Williams, Q.C. with them) for the respondent, the trustee.—Notice of stoppage in transitu must be given to the person who has actual custody of the goods. Here notice to the shipowner was not enough ; there was no duty cast upon him of telegraphing that such a notice had been given to him :

Whitehead v. Anderson, 9 M. & W. 508.

But if the appellants rely, as they must in this state of things, upon the notice of the 5th Aug., the answer is that the transitus was then at an end. The handing over of the delivery order was the completion of the transitus. No attornment was requisite :

Factors Act 1877 ;
Crawshay v. Eades, 1 B. & C. 181 ;
Tanner v. Scobell, 14 M. & W. 28 ;
Johnson v. Crédit Lyonnais, 37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 657 ; L. Rep. 3 C. P. Div. 32.

When the documents of title have been dealt with the right to stop is gone, at all events to the extent of the dealing with them :

Lickbarrow v. Mason, 2 T. R. 63 ; Smith's L. C. 8th edit. vol. 1, p. 753 ;
Re Westzinthus, 5 B. & Ad. 817 ;
Spalding v. Ruding, 6 Beav. 376.

Here there was a complete transfer of the property, both legal and equitable ; and before Ex parte Golding Davis and Co. the right to stop the purchase money paid by the sub-purchaser had never been acknowledged. There were dicta in that case supporting such a right, but they were not necessary for the decision. The right of stoppage in transitu ought not to extend beyond the goods themselves :

Turner v. Trustees of the Liverpool Docks, L. Rep. 6 Ex. 543 ;
Ogg v. Shuter, 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 77 ; 32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 114 ; L. Rep. 10 C. P. 159 ; Berndtson v. Strang, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 40 ; L. Rep. 3 Ch. 588 ; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 511.

In this case there was constructive delivery of the whole cargo. It is a question of intention. In Hammond v. Anderson (1 B. & P. N. R. 69) there was a delivery order for a number of bales of bacon lying at a wharf. The purchaser went to the wharf and weighed the whole and took away several bales and then became bankrupt. The vendor sought to stop delivery of the rest, but it was held that the delivery already made was equivalent to a delivery of the whole. In Slubey v. Heyward (2 H. Bl. 504) the defendants, being in possession of bills of lading which had been indorsed to them as sub-vendees of a cargo of wheat, had ordered the vessel to Falmouth with the vendor's consent, and had begun to receive the cargo and had actually got 800 bushels, when the original vendor attempted to stop in transitu, the buyers having become insolvent. The court held that the transitus was ended by the part delivery, which must be taken to be a delivery of the whole, there appearing no intention either previous to or at the time of delivery to separate part of the cargo from the rest. It must be assumed here that the freight was paid, or that the master abandoned his lien for it, by allowing an unconditional delivery of the cargo. [James, L.J.—If the freight had been paid, so important a fact would hardly have been omitted from the agreed statement.]

No reply.

James, L.J.—Here the first thing to be decided is the question, Was the transit at an end at the time when the notice of stopping in transitu was given by the vendor to the master of the ship, so that, if there had been no sub-sale, the vendor would still have had a legal right to stop the goods in transitu? I am of opinion that the transit was not at an end by reason of the partial delivery of the cargo which had taken place, that is to say, neither the obligations nor the rights of the shipowners or carriers had been determined by what they had done. They were still liable, in the character of carriers, for the safe custody of the goods, and the delivery of them to the person who was entitled to them. And they would have had a right to say, We will not deliver another maund of salt until we have been paid our freight. That being so, the transitus was not at an end, and the goods remained in the possession of the master as carrier ; he had not attorned to anyone ; and in that state of things a notice given would have been effectual to stop the goods in transitu as against the original purchaser. And if so, the case is governed by the decision of this court in Ex parte Golding Davis and Co., Re Knight (L. Rep. 12 Ch. Div. 628). Whether that decision was right or wrong, it appears to me that it is binding on me, because I was a party to it. It is an opinion of the Court of Appeal, and it is not open to be reheard, merely because the court now consists in part of the same judges. It seems to me that it is impossible to distinguish between the present case and Ex parte Golding Davis and Co.

Baggallay, L.J.—The real question is whether the transitus was at an end or no. I am of opinion it was not. The goods were in process of delivery ; weighing was necessary before there could be delivery. If so, the principle of Ex parte Golding Davis and Co. applies. We cannot prejudice the rights of third parties who have acquired those rights for value. As regards the surplus, however, the right of stoppage in transitu is well exercised. As to any doubt which I may have expressed in that case, it was merely that on the special circumstances I at first doubted whether there had not been an effectual delivery at Liverpool, and the doubt was entirely removed before the case was at an end.

BRAMWELL, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. There was no effectual stoppage until the person who had the goods was told to stop them. What took place at Liverpool was only telling somebody to cause stoppage. There was no duty as far as I can see on the part of that person to tell the other person to stop. It would be mischievous if a mere make-believe of stopping, telling some one to tell someone else to stop, should be held to be a stoppage. The captain of the ship had possession of the goods as carrier, and had not performed his whole duty as carrier, and therefore had not got rid of his rights; that is to say, he had not lost his lien. Mr. Benjamin was obliged to invent, as he did very ingeniously on the spur of the moment, a new contract between the captain and the sub-purchaser constituted by the delivery orders. But there was in fact no new contract. The old obligation, contract, and rights applied. As to the cases upon the point that part delivery is delivery of the whole in some circumstances, I think myself that if there is not delivery of the whole it is better not to say that there is. As to the case of Slubey v. Heyward (2 H. Bl. 504) it is nearly 100 years old, and I speak of it therefore with respect, but I cannot understand it. It appears that the sub-purchaser paid for the goods, and I cannot see how there could be stoppage in transitu against him. The court seems to have held that the carrier's business was at an end. The note of the case is, however, a very loose one. As to the other case which Mr. Benjamin relied on (Hammond v. Anderson, 1 B. & P. N. R. 69), there is in it not a word about delivery of part of the cargo being equivalent to delivery of the whole. For there the court held that there was an actual delivery of the whole: the man "had actual manual possession of every article, and having weighed them all, he took upon himself to separate them." Lord Mansfield there said: "On a former occasion this court decided that where a part of the goods sold by one entire contract was taken possession of the vendee had taken possession of the whole." But with regard to the case then before the court, what he said was this: "So much having been taken away, and the whole weighed by the bankrupt, it is insisted that the bankrupt had taken possession of the whole. . . . As to those bales which were sent away, the bankrupt had taken actual possession, and therefore no question can arise; and when it is admitted that he had taken possession of a part, how can it be said that he had not taken possession of the whole? The price was entire, and the whole to be paid by one bill." The effect of the decision is shown by the short judgment of Rooke, J., who said: "The facts of this case are too strong to be got over. The whole of the goods was paid for by one bill. A general order was given for the delivery of the whole, and the purchaser under that order went and took away a part. How could he more effectually change the possession?" It was a delivery of the whole cargo, because the wharfinger was holding the whole for the purchaser or his bailee, and with a duty to him. It is manifest here that the transitus was not at an end as to the undelivered part. There having been a sub-purchase, can the right of stoppage in transitu prevail? In one sense no right or interest remained in the original purchaser except that he might have stopped in transitu as against his sub-vendee. The claimant here is the trustee in Kiell's liquidation. Suppose Kiell had not gone into liquidation. Suppose he had said: "I can't pay; the sub-vendee will." What difference does it make that he is in liquidation? I think it is most equitable to allow the stoppage. The case is hardly one to be reasoned about, because there is Ex parte Golding, Davis and Co. But I don't want to shelter myself under its authority. I think it was rightly decided. A man sells goods to another for 500*l.* The money is not paid, when the goods are resold for 600*l.* In former cases it had been decided when instead of a resale there had been a pledge for 600*l.* with a right of sale, that the right of stoppage in transitu could be exercised as to the 100*l.* surplus. What difference does it make that there is a resale instead of a pledge, with right of sale? Why if stoppage is allowed in one case, can it not be allowed in the other? What mischief can be shown? I am at a loss to see any principle which was applicable in the case of Re Westzinthus (5 B. & Ad. 817), and Spalding v. Ruding (6 Beav. 376), and which is not applicable in the case of Ex parte Golding Davis and Co., and to the present case.

ATWOOD v. SELLAR.

Ship and shipping — General average sacrifice— Putting into port to repair—Expenses of warehousing and reloading goods—Pilotage charges on leaving port.

When a vessel has put into port to repair an injury occasioned by a general average sacrifice, the expenses of warehousing and reloading goods necessarily unloaded for the purpose of repairing the injury, and expenses incurred for pilotage and other charges on the vessel leaving the port, are the subject of general average.

The practice of British average adjusters for the last seventy years dissented from.

Judgment of the Queen's Bench Division affirmed.

SPECIAL case stated in an action by the plaintiffs, as owners of the Sullivan Swain, to recover 13*l.* 14*s.* 9*d.*, in respect of a general average contribution from the defendants as owners and consignees of certain goods on board the said vessel.

1. The plaintiffs are the owners of the ship Sullivan Swain, and the defendants are owners and consignees of goods shipped on board the said vessel, on the voyage hereinafter mentioned.

2. The said vessel sailed from Savernake to Liverpool on the 10th Feb. 1877, and encountered severe weather, in consequence of which a general average sacrifice became necessary, and was made, the master being compelled to cut away the foretopmast, the fall of which occasioned further damage to the vessel, which was thereby compelled to put into Charleston on the 21st Feb. 1877, to repair the said damage.

3. In order to effect the said repairs, and to enable the vessel to proceed on her voyage, it was necessary to discharge a portion of the cargo, and expenses were incurred in landing, warehousing and reshipping the same, and further expenses were incurred at Charleston for pilotage, and other charges paid in respect of the ship leaving port and proceeding upon her voyage. The said vessel afterwards completed her voyage, and discharged her cargo at Liverpool.

4. It is, and for from seventy to eighty years past has been, the practice of British average adjusters in adjusting losses in cases where ships have put into port to refit, whether such putting into port has been occasioned by a general average sacrifice, or a particular average loss, to treat the expense of discharging the cargo as general average, the expense of warehousing it as particular average on the cargo, and the expense of the reshipping of the cargo, pilotage, port charges, and other expenses incurred to enable the ship to proceed on her voyage as particular average upon the freight. Cases of putting into port in consequence of general average sacrifice only, and where there is no particular average loss at all, are not of frequent occurrence; but such cases and cases where the substantial cause of the putting into port is a general average sacrifice are sufficiently common to establish a regular practice of treating the expenses in case of a general average sacrifice in the way above described.

5. Average adjusters regulate their rules of practice in accordance with what they consider are the legal principles applicable to the subject. There is an association of average adjusters which holds meetings from time to time at which the rules of practice are discussed and altered or modified with reference to legal decisions.

6. In March 1876 one eminent average adjuster formed the opinion that the practice, as above described, was wrong, and that all such expense as heretofore described up to the time when the ship was again at sea, and had resumed her voyage, ought to be charged to general average; and since March 1876 the said average adjuster has made up adjustments in two or three cases of the kind in accordance with his said opinion; but the practice of British average adjusters as above described has remained unaltered.

7. The case of the said ship, the Sullivan Swain, was put into the hands of the said average adjuster to prepare the adjustment, which he did in accordance with his said opinion, charging the whole of the said expenses to general average, and the plaintiffs have brought this action against the defendants to recover the contribution appearing to be due from them in respect of their goods upon the footing of the said adjustment. The defendants have always been willing to pay a general average contribution upon the footing of an adjustment made up in accordance with the practice of British average adjusters as above described, but deny their liability to pay upon the footing of the said average adjustment which has been so prepared as aforesaid, and this action was brought for the purpose of determining whether or not they are so liable.

8. The plaintiffs contend that, notwithstanding the said practice of British average adjusters, they are entitled to have the whole of the said expenses brought into general average, and to receive a contribution from the defendants accordingly; and the defendants contend, first, that apart from the said practice general average expenditure ceases in such cases when the cargo has been discharged from the ship; and, secondly, that the said practice of average adjusters is a valid and binding custom, regulating the treatment of the said expenses, and the contribution to be paid by the defendants.

The question for the opinion of the Court is: Whether the plaintiffs are entitled to recover against the defendants a contribution in excess of what would be payable according to the said practice of average adjusters as stated in this case.

The Queen's Bench Division (Cockburn, C.J. and Mellor, J., dissentiente Manisty, J.) gave judgment for the plaintiffs: (ante, p. 153; 41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 83.)

The defendants now appealed.

Butt, Q.C. (with him Webster, Q.C. and Fullarton) for the appellants.—Hitherto expenses of warehousing and reloading have not been charged in general average. This is one of those cases where the law accepts the practice. In Phillips on Insurance (3rd edit.), vol. ii., p. 169, the author says: "Though it be admitted that the contract is to be construed according to the laws and usages of the place where it is made, it does not follow that no regard is to be had to the laws and usages of any other place. The reasons given by Lord Tenterden (in Dalgleish v. Davidson) are conclusive to the contrary." The captain has a lien on the goods, and it is a lien to secure the contribution to general average when adjusted. The whole argument on the other side in the court below was based upon the difference between a general and a particular average loss. Once the common danger has ceased, the liability to general average contribution ceases. As soon as the cargo and vessel are separated, the common danger has ceased. It is no answer to the appellants for the other side to say that what they contend for would be a reasonable practice. The appellants rely on the existing practice which is in accordance with the law on the subject. It is said that this is not found to be a practice of merchants and shipowners. Apart from the practice altogether, by English law the appellants are not compelled to contribute to the expenses of warehousing and reloading, because it is not something done against a common peril. Plummer v. Wildman (3 M. & S. 482) is relied on by the other side. But in a subsequent case of Power v. Whitmore (4 M. & S.

149), Lord Ellenborough, C.J. limits the application of that case. He says, "that the language of Beawes in the passage cited (Lex Merc. 166) was very loose, and that the same doctrine, he believed, was not to be found in other writers of equal authority. And he said that general average must lay its foundation in a sacrifice of part for the sake of the rest, but here was no sacrifice of any part by the master, but only of his time and patience, and the damage incurred was by the violence of the wind and weather. That this was not like the case recently before the court (Plummer v. Wildman), where the master was compelled to cut away his rigging in order to preserve the ship, and afterwards put into port to repair that which he sacrificed." In Hallett v. Wigram (9 C.B. Rep. 580) Cresswell, J., says: "Damage done to the ship by stormy and tempestuous weather never yet has been held to be the subject of general average. The pleas adopt the description of the damage in the declaration. They then go on to say that, in consequence of such damage, it became expedient and necessary for the vessel to put back to Adelaide. Could it be said at that time that there was an average loss? The only instance where this has been supposed to be so, prior to the case of Plummer v. Wildman (ubi sup.) is in the passage in Beawes's Lex Mercatoria (p. 245) cited by Buller, J., in Da Kosta v. Newnham (2 Term Rep. 407) where it is said that 'The charges of unlading a ship, to get her into a river or port, ought not to be brought into general average, but when occasioned by an indispensable necessity to prevent the loss of ship and cargo; as, when a ship is forced by a storm to enter a port to repair the damage she has suffered, if she cannot continue her voyage without an apparent risk of being lost; in which case the wages and victuals of the crews are brought into an average from the day it was resolved to seek a port to refit the vessel, to the day of her departure from it, with all the charges of unlading and relading, anchorage, pilotage, and every other due and expense occasioned by this necessity.' But there was no authority in the English law, that I am aware of, until the case of Plummer v. Wildman, which undoubtedly does go to that extent. But Lord Ellenborough was in the next case that occurred anxious to protect himself from being thought to have intended to lay down the principle so largely; he qualifies and explains that case in Power v. Whitmore (ubi sup.) where he states the rule exactly according to what has always been, and still is, understood to be the law as to general average. And Lord Tenterden never meant to lay down the law larger than that. He refers, in Abbott, 8th edit., p. 475, to the Rhodian law. 'The rule of the Rhodian law, he says, 'is this: . . . . From the rule thus established by the Rhodians, various corollaries have been deduced. . . . Thus, if it be necessary to unlade the goods, in order to repair the damage done to a ship by tempest, or by collision with another vessel, so as to enable her to prosecute and complete her voyage, it has been held that the expense of unlading, warehousing, and reshipping the goods should be sustained by general contribution, because all persons are interested in the execution of the measures necessary to the completion of the voyage.' For this he refers—and evidently with an expression of doubt—to Plummer v. Wildman, which, as before observed, was afterwards explained by Lord Ellenborough himself." A dictum of Lord Campbell, C.J. in Hall v. Janson (4 E. & B. 500) will be relied on on the other side. Lord Campbell says, "Now, the expenses necessarily incurred in unloading and reloading the cargo for the purpose of repairing the ship that she may be made capable of proceeding on the voyage, have been held to give a claim to general average contribution, for the acts which occasion these expenses become necessary from perils insured against; and they are deliberately done for the joint benefit of those who are interested in the ship, the cargo, and the freight." But the case with which he was dealing there was a question of particular loss, and, from what is conceded on the other side, that is a wrong dictum. The cases of Job v. Langton (6 E. & B, 779) and Walthew v. Mavrojani (L. Rep. 5 Ex. 166; 22 L. T. Rep. N.S. 310; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O.S. 382) are in the appellants' favour. There the court points out that if the re-loading of the goods is necessary to their safety, as in the case of the stranding of a ship with a perishable cargo on a desert island in a distant region of the globe, the costs so incurred would then be general average, but not otherwise. He also cited

Cohen, Q.C. (J. C. Mathew with him) for the respondents.—If part of the apparel of the ship is sacrificed, and it becomes necessary to put into port and warehouse the cargo, all the expenses of repairs, unloading, warehousing, &c., are general average expenses, but wages are not. All foreign laws and usages are in the plaintiffs' favour. Power v. Whitmore (4 M. & S. 141) and Plummer v. Wildman (3 M. & S. 482) are decisions favourable to the plaintiffs, and Moran v. Jones (7 E. & B. 523; 29 L. T. Rep. O. S. 86) does not affect the present contention. He also cited

Butt, Q.C. in reply.—Where the law is at least doubtful, and where the practice for seventy years has been unimpeached by any positive decision, the courts will uphold the practice. Johnson v. Chapman (ubi sup.), cited by the other side, does not support the proposition that the courts have not been in the habit of regarding the practice. Lowndes on General Average is cited on the other side to show that the practice is different to that of other nations, and therefore unreasonable. But it is admitted that one-half of the English practice, though differing from the practice of other nations, is in accordance with English law. It would produce confusion, therefore, rather than uniformity to alter the other half so as to make it in accord with the practice of other nations. The other side rely upon the case of Plummer v. Wildman (ubi sup.) and a passage in Abbott on Shipping. [BRAMWELL, L.J.—And the reason of the thing? Plummer v. Wildman is no authority. Lord Ellenborough himself says that it was wrong, and Lord Tenterden speaks of it "evidently with doubt" (9 C. B. 580, p. 609). It is submitted that the court will not disturb a course of business uniformly acquiesced in for seventy years.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 24.—The judgment of the Court was delivered by THESIGER, L.J.—The question raised by this appeal is, whether in the case of a vessel going into port in consequence of any injury which is itself the subject of general average, the expenses of warehousing and reloading goods necessarily unloaded for the purpose of repairing the injury, and expenses incurred for pilotage, and other charges on the vessel leaving the port, are the subject of general average also.

The matter came before the court below in the form of a special case, and upon it the court decided in favour of the plaintiffs, who assert that the expenses in question are the subject of general average. The special case states a long-continued practice of British average adjusters in adjusting losses in cases where ships have put into port to refit, whether such putting into port has been occasioned by a general average sacrifice or a particular average loss, to treat the expense of discharging the cargo as a general average, and the expense of warehousing it as particular average on the cargo, and the expense of the reshipment of the cargo, pilotage, port charges, and other expenses incurred to enable the ship to proceed on her voyage, as particular average upon the freight. It was not, however, and could not reasonably be contended for the defendants that the practice could be put so high as a custom impliedly incorporated in the contract between the parties, and during the course of the argument we intimated our opinion, founded on the language of the special case with regard to this practice, and especially the language of the fifth paragraph, that the question between the parties must be decided in accordance with legal principles and authority which the practice of the average adjusters professes to follow. The law governing the case is admittedly English law, for the expenses in dispute arose upon a voyage, the proper and actual termination of which was an English port. As a matter of principle, we are clearly of opinion that the judgment of the majority below in favour of the plaintiffs was right. The principle which underlies the whole doctrine of general average contribution is that the loss immediate and consequential caused by a sacrifice for the benefit of cargo, ship, and freight, should be borne by all. This principle is in the abstract conceded by counsel for the defendants, and its application to the present case is admitted to the extent of allowing the expenses of unloading the goods for the purpose of doing the necessary repairs to the vessel to enable it to proceed on its voyage, to be the subject of general average contribution; but they attempt to distinguish such expenses from those of warehousing and reloading the cargo, and of outward port and pilotage charges by the suggestion that the common danger to the whole adventure is at an end when the goods are unloaded; and that general average ceases at the point of time when the common danger is at an end. The proposition is, as will appear later, sound when applied to cases in which a ship is damaged by the perils of the sea, and before any voluntary sacrifice, such as putting into an intermediate port, is made, the goods are unshipped, and in safety; but its application to a case like the present is not admissible. A vessel which has put into port to repair an injury, occasioned by a general average sacrifice, may be, and generally is, when in port in perfect safety; and if by the expression "common danger" be meant danger of actual injury to vessel and cargo, there is no more danger to the goods when on board the vessel being in port than when stowed in a warehouse on shore; and, indeed, in many cases only a portion of the goods is removed from the vessel in order to do the repairs to her, while the remainder of the goods is left on board. If, on the other hand, by "common danger" be meant the danger of the vessel with her cargo being prevented from prosecuting her voyage, then there is no more reason why the expenses of warehousing and reloading, and the expenses incurred for pilotage and other charges paid in respect of the vessel leaving port and proceeding on her voyage, should not constitute general average, than there is reason for saying that unloaded and warehoused goods should not contribute, as it is clear in a case of a voluntary sacrifice that they must, to the expenses of the necessary repairs to the vessel. Both classes of expenses are extraordinary expenses consequent upon the voluntary sacrifice, and necessary for the due prosecution of her voyage by the vessel with her cargo. Neither class can, as a general proposition, be said to be incurred exclusively for the benefit of either vessel or cargo. In some cases it might be for the interest of a shipowner to terminate the voyage at the port where his vessel puts in to repair a disaster, while it might be all important for the goods owner to have his goods carried on by the same vessel. In other cases the position of the parties in this respect might be reversed; but, however this may be, the going into port, the unloading, warehousing, and reloading of the cargo, and the coming out of port, are, at all events, parts of one act or operation, contemplated, resolved upon, and carried through, for the common safety and benefit, and properly regarded to be continuous. The shipowner is at least entitled to reship the goods and prosecute his voyage with them; and the expenses necessary for that purpose being ex hypothesi consequent upon a damage voluntarily incurred for the general advantage should legitimately be the subject of general average contribution, or, to use the language of Lord Tenterden in his work on shipping: "If the damage to be repaired be in itself an object of contribution, it seems reasonable that all expenses necessary, although collateral to the reparation, should also be objects of contribution; the accessory should follow the nature of its principal." But it is said for the defendants that if this be so, and the principle be carried out to its logical consequences, expenses incurred for wages of crew and provisions should equally form the subject of general average, and that, inasmuch as it is, as they suggest, undeniable that they do not, the principle itself must either be faulty, or at least not recognised in English law. As a matter of fact, it is extremely doubtful whether the expenses for wages of crew or provisions in a port of refuge have ever been disallowed by our courts, as constituting a claim for general average, in a case where the ship has put into the port to repair damage itself belonging to general average; but even if the assertion were correct, the conclusion drawn would by no means follow.

That the principle in question is not faulty we have endeavoured to show in the observations already made, and the view we have taken upon the point is strongly confirmed by the fact that it is recognised and carried to its so-called logical consequences as regards the wages of crew and provisions in all other countries than our own.

That the principle is not recognised in English law is not proved by showing that expenses incurred for wages of crew and provisions have been under certain circumstances disallowed as the subject of general average unless it be shown, which it has not been to us, at the same time that they have been disallowed upon grounds that negative the principle, and it is disproved if it be found that, notwithstanding such disallowance, the expenses in question in this case have been allowed. All that in such a case can be said is, that either the courts have made a mistake in limiting the application of the principle, or that its limitation is due to some real or supposed rule of public policy.

If, then, the question before us stood only upon principle, we should have no hesitation in deciding it according to the principle we have stated, and it at least may fairly be asked what other principle, if it be not correct, is to be substituted in its place. But the authorities remain to be considered; and it is more necessary that they should be examined with attention, seeing that the practice of average adjusters professes to follow them.

In Plummer v. Wildman (3 M. & S. 482), a ship put back into port to repair damage partly caused by a collision with another ship, and partly by a cutting away of part of the rigging of the bowsprit, to which the master was compelled, in consequence of a previous injury due to the collision, and which it was contended for the shipowner was a general average cause. The cargo was necessarily relanded and warehoused in order that such temporary repairs might be done as would enable the ship to prosecute her voyage; and such repairs having been done, and a portion of the cargo sold to defray expenses, the remainder of the cargo was reloaded, and the ship proceeded to her port of destination. Among other expenses claimed as general average were the expenses of repair necessary to enable the ship to prosecute her voyage, the expenses of unloading and reloading the cargo, the master's expenses, at five dollars per diem, during the unloading, repairing, and reloading, and expenses for crimpage to replace deserters during the repairs. The question for the court was whether the case was one of general average, and if so to what extent. It is a little difficult to gather from the judgments in the case what was the exact view of the different members of the court who delivered judgment as to the separate heads of claim. Lord Ellenborough appears to have decided that only the captain's expenses in port and crimpage were to be disallowed. Le Blanc, J. said that the unloading might be general average if it were necessary in order to repair the ship, but leaves it in doubt whether the expenses of reloading would or not follow. Bayley, J. deals only with the question how much of the repairs should be allowed as general average, which was the principal question as regards items. Lord Ellenborough, however, laid down that if the return to port was necessary for the general safety of the whole concern, it seemed that the expenses unavoidably incurred by such necessity might be considered as the subject of general average; and that it was not so much a question whether the first cause of the damage was owing to this or that accident, to the violence of the elements or the collision of another ship, as whether the effect produced was such as to incapacitate the ship without endangering the whole concern from further prosecuting her voyage, unless she returned to port and removed the impediment.

But in the same year as that in which Plummer v. Wildman (3 M. & S. 482) was decided, the case of Power v. Whitmore (4 M. & S. 141) came before the same court. In that case the cause of damage was a peril of the sea, and the ship having in consequence of it been compelled to go into port for the safety of ship and cargo, a claim to have the wages and provisions of the crew during the stay in port, and the expenses of repair treated as general average was made. The claim was however, disallowed, and Lord Ellenborough, in delivering the judgment of the court, took occasion to qualify the proposition laid down in Plummer v. Wildman (ubi sup.), and to explain and justify the decision in that case upon the ground that there the master was compelled to cut away his rigging in order to preserve the ship, and afterwards put into port to repair that which he sacrificed. The judgment then in Power v. Whitmore (ubi sup.) must be taken to recognise that there is, in reference to a port of refuge expenses claimed as general average, a distinction between a case of a vessel putting into a port for repair in consequence of a voluntary sacrifice, and a case of a vessel so putting into port in consequence of an ordinary peril of the seas, although in both cases the putting into port itself may equally give rise to a claim for general average contribution. In Hallett v. Wigram (9 C. B. 580, p. 607), Cresswell, J. in speaking of Power v. Whitmore (ubi sup.), said that Lord Ellenborough had there stated the rule according to what had always been and still was understood to be the law as to general average. Wilde, C.J. (9 C. B. at p. 603) in the same case quoted the following passage from Abbott on Shipping, 8th edit. p. 478: "Thus if it be necessary to unlade the goods in order to repair the damage done to a ship by tempest or by collision with another vessel, so as to enable her to complete and prosecute her voyage, it has been held that the expenses of unloading, warehousing, and reshipping the goods, should be sustained by general contribution, because all persons are interested in the execution of the measures necessary to the completion of the voyage," and added that the reason there assigned might be applicable to the case the author has in his mind, Plummer v. Wildman (ubi sup.), but that as a general proposition it was too large. The Chief Justice then points out that the decision in Plummer v. Wildman had been explained in Power v. Whitmore upon the ground that the expenses were consequent upon a voluntary sacrifice, and then quotes, apparently with approval, the following passage from Abbott, 8th edit. p. 497: "It seems to result from these decisions that if a vessel goes into port in consequence of an injury which is itself the subject of general average, such repairs as are absolutely necessary to enable her to prosecute her voyage, and the necessary expenses of port charges, wages, and provisions during the stay, are to be considered as general average, but if the damage was incurred by the mere violence of the wind or weather, without sacrifice on the part of the owners for the benefit of all concerned, it falls, with the expenses consequent upon it, within the contract of the shipowner, 'to keep his vessel tight, staunch and strong, during the voyage for which she is hired." The actual decision in Hallett v. Wigram (ubi sup.)was, that a claim to general average does not arise where a part of the cargo is sold to raise money at a port to which a ship has put back for the repair of damage incurred by ordinary perils of the sea. That case was decided in 1850, Power v. Whitmore in 1815, and we have therefore the law as laid down by the courts for a considerable portion of the period over which the practice of average adjusters stated in the special case extends, running counter to that practice by recognising, as regards port of refuge expenses, a distinction between cases where a ship puts into a port of distress for repair of damage caused by a voluntary sacrifice, and cases where it so puts in for repair of damage caused by perils of the sea; and admitting in the former case, as a matter of principle, if not of express decision, expenses such as those in question in this case to be the subject of general average contribution.

This distinction in principle is to be found asserted by Benecke, who was a member of Lloyd's, in his valuable work on the Principles of Indemnity in Marine Insurance, published in 1824. At page 191, he says: "If, setting aside all laws and received opinions, the case is examined merely according to the fundamental maxims which regulate general and particular average, it will in the first instance appear evident that not only all the port charges, such as pilotage, harbour dues, lighterage, &c., but also all the charges of unloading and reloading, repairs, and crew's wages will be general average if the ship put into port for the mere purpose of repairing a damage voluntarily incurred for the general advantage. For all these expenses, being the necessary consequences of a measure taken for the general benefit, belong to general average." And then, turning to the case where the port is entered in consequence of a particular damage sustained, by which the vessel is rendered unfit to prosecute her voyage, as where masts, sails, or other requisite apparel are lost in a storm, or a vessel has sprung a dangerous leak, he adds, "all the expenses of entering the port are a subject of general average, being the consequence of a measure voluntarily taken for the preservation of the whole. But as soon as the object of putting the vessel and her cargo in safety is accomplished, the cause for general contribution ceases, for whatever is subsequently done is not a sacrifice for the benefit of the whole or for averting an imminent danger, but it is the mere necessary consequence of a casual misfortune." Benecke then claims the allowance even of wages of crew and provisions where the putting into port is the consequence of a damage belonging to general average. On the other hand, he contends for the disallowance even of the expenses of unloading cargo where it is the consequence of a damage belonging to particular average. In Stevens on Average and Bailey on Average the distinction referred to is not adopted, except as regards the repairs of the ship; but both writers assert as a matter of principle, that where a ship necessarily puts into port to repair damage, whether the original cause of damage be a voluntary sacrifice or an ordinary peril of the sea, the expenses of warehousing and reloading as well as those of unloading the cargo and the outward as well as the inward port charges, should be the subject of general average contribution: (see Stevens, p. 22 and Bailey, p. 119). They look not to the more remote damage which undoubtedly was a particular average loss, but to the proximate act of putting into port for the safety of ship and cargo which would belong to general average, and in answer to the argument that their views if logically carried out would lead to the allowance as general average of the cost of the repair of the ship (Bailey at p. 119), replies that the damage which necessitated that repair being caused by a peril of the sea, the repair should be treated as particular average, but that the ship does not put into the port of refuge because she wants repairs, but because the voyage cannot be continued until she is repaired, or a total loss of ship and cargo will follow if she does not go into port. He adds at p. 120: "The immediate cause of putting into the port of refuge is the impossibility of completing the voyage in her then state or the expected total loss of ship and cargo; the damage which the ship has sustained is the remote cause only, for under other circumstances the crew are not justified in putting into port, although the vessel may have sustained damage which it will be necessary to repair." The views thus expressed are substantially those which are recognised in American law and practice, and they are carried out to the length of including the expense of wages of crew and provisions at the port of refuge in the amount to be contributed for in general average, in all cases where a vessel puts into port for the common safety, whether owing to an injury from a peril of the sea or a voluntary sacrifice: (see Phillips on Insurance, 3rd edit., s. 1322, 6, 8.) To return to the text writers of this country, Mr. Arnould, in his work on Marine Insurance, 3rd edit., vol. 2, p. 789, after discussing the principles relating to general average, says: "From these principles it follows that where a ship has either cut away her masts or rigging, or has been so damaged by a storm that it is necessary for the safety both of ship and cargo to put into a port of distress for repairs, all the expenses inseparably connected with the act of first putting into, and afterwards clearing out of, such a port of distress, give the shipowner a claim to a general average contribution, and this upon the plain ground that these expenses are a necessary consequence of an extraordinary measure taken for the general preservation."

Neither of the already cited cases of Power v. Whitmore and Hallett v. Wigram is a direct authority against the proposition just quoted, except so far as the disallowance of the expenses for wages of crew and provisions in the former case can be said to be such; for, as pointed out, the main subject of contention in those cases was the claim for expenses of repair made, notwithstanding that such repair was in each case rendered necessary in consequence of injury caused by ordinary perils of the sea, and neither the expenses of unloading, warehousing, or reloading cargo, nor port or pilotage charges, came in question. The case of Hall v. Janson (4 E. & B. 24 L. J. 2 B. 97), decided in 1855, is, on the contrary, direct authority in favour of the proposition that the expense of re-loading as well as of unloading cargo constitutes a claim to general average contribution, even though the original cause of putting into port was a particular average loss. There, in an action upon a policy of marine insurance, a count of the declaration states that the ship had been damaged by stormy weather and forced to go into port for repair, in order to enable her to prosecute her adventure and proceed on her voyage, and had there incurred expenses inter alia in and about unloading and reloading cargo which was necessarily unloaded for the repair of the ship. This count was upon demurrer held good as showing the accruing of a general average loss; and Lord Campbell, C.J., in delivering the considered judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench upon the point, said: "Now, the expenses necessarily incurred in unloading and reloading the cargo for the purpose of repairing the ship that she may be capable of proceeding on the voyage have been held to give a claim to general average contribution; for the acts which occasioned these expenses become necessary from perils insured against, and they are deliberately done for the joint benefit of those who are interested in the ship, the cargo, and the freight." And after citing The Copenhagen (1 C. Rob. 289), Plummer v. Wildman and Stevens on Average, as authorities in support of the proposition, he added: "This doctrine is quite consistent with what is laid down in Power v. Whitmore and the other cases relied upon by Mr. Wilde." It is not necessary for us to decide in the present case whether Hall v. Janson was rightly decided, and whether the expenses in dispute in the present case would properly belong to general average, if the original cause of damage to the ship had only been a cause belonging to particular average. If, however, the Court of Queen's Bench, in the judgment just quoted, and the several text writers, other than Benecke, from whom we have quoted, are right in the propositions affirmed by them, and the expenses would in such a case belong to general average, it follows à fortiori that they would so belong when, as is the fact here, the original cause was a voluntary sacrifice, while, on the other hand, even if the proposition laid down in Hall v. Janson, and supported by the text writers referred to were too wide, there would still be left a consensus of opinion to the effect that in such a case as the present at least the expenses in question must be treated as constituting a claim to general average contribution. In either case the practice of the average adjusters as stated in the special case would be erroneous, and it is to be gathered from a recent edition of a modern work on the law of general average, by Mr. Lowndes himself, also an average adjuster of experience (3rd edit. 107), that as regards port of refuge expenses, where the bearing up into port is necessitated by a sacrifice, the principle that they should be treated as general average is apart from his own practice, which gave rise to the present action, at least beginning to be recognised in the practice of adjusters and underwriters. The two cases of Job v. Langton (7 E. & B. 779), and Walthew v. Mavrojani (L. Rep. 5 Ex. 116; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O.S. 382), do not really touch the point. In each of these cases a vessel having been accidentally stranded, so that the damage thereby caused was only a particular average loss was got off and taken into port for repair at considerable expense after the cargo had been unshipped, landed, and warehoused in safety. It was attempted unsuccessfully to make the cargo contribute to such expense as general average. There can be no doubt as to the correctness of the decisions in those cases, for the whole basis of any general average claim was gone as soon as the cargo was unshipped. The vessel was got off and put into port for repair, not to avert a loss to the whole adventure, but to repair the particular average damage. Lord Campbell, C.J. delivered the judgment of the court in Job v. Langton, and in the course of his judgment said, "That the stranding was fortuitous, arising directly from perils of the sea, and that the expenses must therefore, in order to constitute general average, be brought within the category of extraordinary expenses incurred for the joint benefit of ship and cargo." And it is obvious, from the whole judgement, that Lord Campbell not only did not consider that his observations would be applicable to the case of a voluntary sacrifice, but also did not consider that there was any conflict between his then decision and his former judgment in Hall v. Janson. There is nothing in the judgment in Walthew v. Mavrojani which alters the case. The result of this review of the authorities is to confirm the opinion which, apart from authority, we entertain and have already expressed upon the question submitted to us. The practice then of the average adjusters, as stated in the special case, appears to us to be neither founded on true principles nor to be in accordance with the views of the text writers, and, so far as there is case authority upon the matter, it appears to us to be opposed to legal decision. It is a practice too, which has not been, as the practice in Stewart v. West India and Pacific Steamship Company (2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 32; L. Rep. 8 Q. B. 88) was, made a part of the contract between the parties, and therefore constitutes no impediment to our giving effect to the objections to its validity; and, in deciding as we do that the judgment of the majority of the court below was right and should be affirmed, it is satisfactory to us to know that the law as laid down in the judgment of the court below and of this court is placed upon a footing which more nearly assimilates it, in matters in which assimilation is desirable, to the law obtaining in other mercantile and maritime communities.

WAGSTAFF AND OTHERS v. ANDERSON AND OTHERS.

APPEAL FROM THE COMMON PLEAS DIVISION.

Ship—Charter-party—Sale of cargo by master—Agency.

Defendants offered plaintiffs "room" in a certain ship for certain cargo for Callao on certain terms. The next day defendants chartered the vessel for a voyage to Callao.

The charter-party provided that the ship should receive on board at such berth as the charterers might appoint such goods as might be required: that the whole ship should be at the disposal of the charterers for the conveyance of goods; that the master and owners should give the same attention to the cargo, and in every respect remain responsible to all whom it might concern, as if the ship were loaded in her berth by and for the owners independently of the charter; that the master should sign bills of lading as the charterers might require; that the ship should be addressed to the charterers' nominees at Callao, and should proceed thither and deliver cargo; and that the charterers' liability, except for freight, should cease on the vessel being loaded.

On the following day it was agreed between defendants, "acting for owners" of the ship, and plaintiffs, that defendants should receive on board a cargo in accordance with their first offer.

The cargo was shipped, bills of lading were signed, and the ship sailed for Callao, but was driven by stress of weather into Monte Video, where the master improperly sold the cargo.

In an action for conversion of the cargo,

Held (affirming the judgment of Denman, J.), that defendants had not contracted with plaintiffs for the carriage of the goods, nor were they placed in the position of shipowners, so as to be responsible for the act of the master, and therefore they were not liable.

THE plaintiffs were contractors carrying on business under the name of Thomas Brassey and Co., and the defendants, Anderson and Co., were charterers of the vessel F. K. Dumas.

The action was brought to recover damages for the alleged wrongful conversion of certain stone and cement belonging to the plaintiffs, which had been shipped on board the F. K. Dumas.

The plaintiffs, through their brokers, having entered into negotiations with the defendants Moss and Mitchell, who were ship brokers in London, on the 24th June 1872, Moss and Mitchell wrote to the plaintiffs' brokers, as follows:

We now beg to offer you room in the ship F. K. Dumas, hence to Callao, for 750 tons of cement at 30*s.* per ton and 5 per cent., 250 tons of stone at 30*s.* and 5 per cent., the latter not to exceed two tons in each block, the ship to receive cargo on or about the 25th July, and to sail on or about the 25th Aug. next.

On the 25th June 1872, the defendants Anderson and Co., entered into a charter-party by which it was agreed between the master on the part of owners of the good ship F. K. Dumas, and the defendants, that the ship should perform a voyage from London to Callao; that she should be maintained in her class by the owners while under the charter; that she should receive on board at such loading berth as the charterers might appoint all such lawful goods as might be required; that the whole ship should be at the disposal of the charterers for the conveyance of goods, except the space necessary for the crew and stores; that the master and owners should give the same attention to the cargo, and in every respect be and remain responsible to all whom it might concern as if the ship were loaded in her berth by and for the owners independently of the charter; that the master was to sign bills of lading at any rate of freight the charterers might require, without prejudice to the charter-party; that the ship should be addressed to the charterer's nominees at the port of discharge; that the ship, being loaded, should proceed to Callao and deliver the cargo agreeably to bills of lading in the usual and customary manner, the act of God, &c., excepted; the total freight to be paid for the use and hire of the ship was agreed at the sum of 2500*l.*, to be paid as follows, against captain's order, viz., by charterers' acceptance payable at ninety days from the ship's final sailing from Gravesend, or in cash at 5 per cent. discount, at captain's option; but the owners were to accept in satisfaction of freight all bills of lading bearing freight payable abroad not exceeding one-third of the amount of charter; and the charterers' responsibility, except for the freight, was to cease on the vessel being loaded.

On the 26th June 1872 the following agreement was made:

It is this day mutually agreed between Moss and Mitchell, acting for owners of the F. K. Dumas, and Thomas Brassey and Co. (the plaintiffs) that the former shall receive on board in the London Docks 1000 tons of cement in casks $\frac{\text{and}}{\text{or}}$ stone in blocks (the latter limited to 250 tons, and no piece to exceed two tons weight) at the rate of 30*s.* per tons of 20cwt., with 5 per cent. primage thereon freight from London to Callao, the ship to receive the cement on the 25th July, and to sail on the 25th Aug. The barges as they come alongside shall be immediately discharged, say within the usual seventy-two hours, or Moss and Mitchell undertake to pay demurrage on barges; the cargo to be received at Callao as customary, freight to be paid as follows: say, one-half on signing bills of lading less two months discount at 5 per cent. per annum, and the remainder on final discharge at Callao; Brassey and Co. to have the option of shipping two boats not exceeding two tons each. Penalty for non-performance of this agreement 1500*l.*

The acts of Moss and Mitchell, it was admitted, were binding upon the defendants Anderson and Co.

About 1000 tons of stone and cement were shipped, and the vessel sailed; before sailing the master signed bills of lading for the cement and stone "to be delivered at Callao unto" the plaintiffs' "order or their assigns on paying freight for the goods 786*l.* 17*s.* 4*d.*" The sum of 780*l.* 6*s.* 1*d.* (the half freight, minus the discount of 5 per cent. for the two months) was paid by the plaintiffs to the defendants before the ship sailed, leaving the residue, which was the sum mentioned in the bill of lading, to be paid at Callao. The vessel met with bad weather, and was compelled to put into Monte Video, where she was surveyed and condemned. A portion of the cargo was sent on to Callao in other vessels, but the master, without communicating with the plaintiffs, sold the plaintiffs' cement and stone. At the trial, before

Denman, J., the jury found that the master was not justified in selling, and assessed the value of the goods at the time of sale at 1445*l*. The case was argued on further consideration before Denman, J., who gave judgment for the defendants on the ground that they were not responsible for the act of the master in selling.

From this judgment (which is reported ante, p. 163; 41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 227) the plaintiffs now appealed.

Watkin Williams, Q.C., A. L. Smith and Hollams for the plaintiffs.

Butt, Q.C., Cohen, Q.C., and J. C. Mathew for the defendants.

The arguments are sufficiently noticed in the judgments.

BRAMWELL, L.J.—I am of opinion that this judgment ought to be affirmed. In the first place the document dated the 26th June 1872 is on the face of it an agreement made by Moss and Mitchell, "acting for the owners of the F. K. Dumas." There are cases in which it has been held that a signature as agent, where the person signing signs professedly "as agent," does not conclusively exclude personal liability; but I am of opinion that those cases are not applicable to the present. Here the persons signing are ship brokers, and ship brokers do not usually act for themselves. Therefore it becomes manifest on the face of the document, in such a case as this, where it was known that Moss and Mitchell were ship brokers, that on this agreement Moss and Mitchell were not acting for themselves, but were acting for the owners of the vessel. I know that the agreement contains this clause, "The barges as they come alongside shall be immediately discharged, say within the usual seventy-two hours, or Moss and Mitchell undertake to pay demurrage on barges;" but I think that means that Moss and Mitchell acting as agents so undertake. Then if they were acting without authority the only action which could be maintained against them would be one for professing to have an authority which they did not possess, for an agent who has no authority to contract cannot be sued as principal. It seems to me that the document, on the face of it, purports not to bind the defendants as principals, but to bind the ship.

Then it is said that the defendants were acting for the ship and the shipowners, and that an action could be maintained against them if it turned out that they had some interest which might have enabled them to enter into a contract to carry; but it seems to me impossible, on the face of this agreement, to hold that the defendants in any sense undertook that they would carry.

Supposing, however, that difficulty were got over by the plaintiffs, the defendants would still be entitled to say, "What have we undertaken that we have failed to perform?" The agreement states that it is "agreed between Moss and Mitchell, acting for owners of the F. K. Dumas and Thomas Brassey and Co. (the plaintiffs), that the former shall receive on board in the London Docks 1000 tons of cement," &c.; they have done so. Then, after providing for the dates of loading and sailing, it contains the stipulation which I have already read as to the barges. If Moss and Mitchell had no authority to enter into that stipulation, possibly the plaintiffs might have said, "You had no authority to bind your principals to all the terms of the agreement, and therefore we will have nothing to do with it," and might have brought an action against Moss and Mitchell for misrepresentation as to their authority; but I am inclined to think that they had authority, as ship brokers, to agree to that stipulation, and moreover no difficulty has arisen in consequence of that clause. The agreement then goes on to provide for the receipt of the cargo and payment of freight, &c. Every word of that agreement has been complied with by the defendants. I cannot see that the plaintiffs have any right to maintain this action. They set out the charter-party in their statement of claim, because otherwise they could not contend that there was a contract by the defendants to carry, and then the statement of the claim goes on to say, "The defendants thereupon for the purposes of loading the ship at freights to be paid to them and of making profit out of the said ship put the said ship up as a general ship to convey goods on the voyage as aforesaid, and contracted with the plaintiffs amongst other persons as follows." Then the letter is set out, and the statement of claim proceeds thus: "The said defendants entered into the said agreement on their own behalf and for their own purposes and not for the shipowners as therein alleged." I think the plaintiffs can have no right to state that. Then Mr. Williams says, to whom is the freight payable? The answer is, that it is payable to the shipowners. Then this difficulty is put: suppose that when the ship arrived at Callao the plaintiffs had refused to receive the goods and pay the freight, who could have maintained an action against them? The answer to that is, that the shipowners could. It is true that the freight received by the shipowners would be something different from that which the freighters would pay, but that was a matter of arrangement between the shipowners and the defendants. I do not like to invent trusteeships, but I do not think that any necessity for doing so exists here, because it would seem that the figures must have been arranged, so far as this particular lot is concerned, in such a manner that the only persons who have any interest in the receipt of these bills of lading are the shipowners, and therefore there is no necessity to invent, what might otherwise be invented without difficulty, a supposed trusteeship. I say there would be no difficulty in inventing, because if it should turn out that the shipowners received the lump freight it would then be a matter of arrangement between them and the defendants that they should pay it over.

I wish to add that I have no misgiving as to the decision in Colvin v. Newberry (1 Cl. & F. 283). It seems to me to have been rightly decided. I do not think that because a bill of lading is signed by the captain as agent for the ship, a contract is made between the shipowner and the freighter, the freighter having previously arranged with the charterer that the charterer shall carry his goods. I should think that the remedy which the freighter would have would be against the charterer with whom he had entered into the contract of affreightment, and that he would not gain any additional remedy by having taken a bill of lading from the shipowner. It is sometimes said that a bill of lading contains in it a contract, and such is the language of the Bills of Lading Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 111). This statement may in many instances be correct, but to say that a bill of lading contains a contract which supersedes, adds to, or varies the previous contract contained in the charter-party, is a proposition to which I am entirely unable to assent.

I am not satisfied that if this had been a contract of carriage between the charterers and the plaintiffs, the charterers would have been liable for the misfeasance of the captain, although he might have been acting within the scope of his authority in such a way that the owners would have been bound. As to this I express no opinion. It might be that the owner would be liable to the shipper, as the Court held in Ewbank v. Nutting (7 C. B. 797), but possibly he would also be liable to the charterer, who would be bound, in the interest of those with whom he had made some contract of affreightment, to enforce his remedy against the owner, or the captain, or both, and then to account to those with whom he had entered into some contract, although not liable, as the plaintiffs in this case seek to make the charterers liable, as if the misfeasance had been his own act, or that of his agent acting within the scope of his authority. As to this I express no opinion. On the grounds which I have stated I think the judgment ought to be affirmed.

BAGGALLAY, L. J.—I am of the same opinion.

The first question is as to the relations between the plaintiffs and the defendants, and the answer to that question depends upon the construction of the agreement of the 26th June 1872. That document taken by itself seems to me to be nothing more than an agreement entered into by the loading brokers on behalf of the shipowners, whosoever they may be; and so far as any contract was entered into by the defendants with regard to their own acts, I think that contract is limited in the manner stated by Denman, J. in his judgment in the court below, where he says, speaking of the agreement of the 26th June 1872, "It appears to me that it merely amounts to a contract that the owner of the ship shall receive the goods on board and enter into a contract by bills of lading to carry them at certain rates of freight, and that the ship shall sail on or about a certain day named, and that the defendants will pay certain demurrage if the barges are delayed" (ante, p. 166; 41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 230).

If any latent ambiguity arises out of the terms in which the contract is expressed, it appears to me on looking at the letter of the 24th June 1872, which preceded the contract, that there is the strongest evidence that the contract was only intended to be a broker's contract, for the letter was written on one of the printed forms used by the ship brokers, and was addressed to the brokers who acted on behalf of the shippers, and amounted to nothing more than an offer of room for a certain quantity of tonnage at a certain freight. If that construction is the correct one, what rights can the plaintiffs have under the contract if there has been any breach of it? If the contract was not authorised by the shipowners the plaintiffs would only have a right of action for damages for misrepresentation of authority. It could in no respect have the effect of putting the defendants into the position of the shipowners, so as to make them responsible for the acts of the master; and, with regard to that particular part, if it did amount to a contract on the part of the defendants to receive the goods in the sense I have referred to, there is no suggestion that they have committed any breach of any such undertaking on their part.

Then it is contended on behalf of the plaintiffs that construing the contract as made on behalf of the shipowners, having regard to all the circumstances, and to what had taken place between the shippers and Moss and Mitchell and Anderson and Co., that Anderson and Co. had become quasi-owners, that is to say owners of the ship for this particular voyage, and therefore that the contract of the 26th June 1872, which was entered into on behalf of the shipowners, was a contract entered into by them on their own behalf, and in respect of which they are liable. I am of opinion that the provisions of the charter-party entirely negative that view. The effect of the charter-party is this: the shipowners accept from the brokers a lump sum of 2500*l.* in respect of the freight to be earned on this voyage leaving the ship brokers to make a profit or sustain a loss according to what the actual return might be, and in all other respects leaving the shipowners and the master to act as if there were no arrangement.

I am therefore of opinion that the contention that the defendants are to be considered as the true owners of the ship, and are therefore liable to be sued under the agreement of the 26th June 1372, cannot be supported.

THESIGER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

It is argued on behalf of the plaintiffs that the defendants are responsible for the act of the master of the ship in selling the cargo at Monte Video, upon the ground that the master in selling was the agent of the defendant; that being such agent he was acting within the general scope of his authority, and therefore that, although in this particular instance the sale was, as the jury have found unjustifiable, nevertheless the defendants are responsible for the act done by their agent upon the principle which is laid down in Ewbank v. Nutting (7 C. B. 797) and other similar cases. Several propositions are involved in this contention. The plaintiffs have to make out that the master of the ship was the agent of the defendants, and I think they have failed to establish this. The goods in question were carried under a bill of lading, and the master when he signed that bill of lading would primâ facie be acting on behalf of the shipowners, and the shipowners would be the persons who would be liable for the carriage of the goods, and for everything to which the agent would be entitled to bind the shipowners in connection with the goods. But it is open to the plaintiffs to negative this presumption as to the liability of the shipowners, and they might negative it in either of two ways, by showing that the transactions between the ship owners and the defendants were such as in reality to put the defendants in the position of shipowners for that particular voyage, in accordance with the principles laid down in Colvin v. Newberry (1 Cl. & F. 283), or by showing that although the transactions between the shipowners and the defendants had not the effect of putting the defendants in the position of shipowners, nevertheless, the defendants had so conducted themselves, or had so contracted with the shippers of the goods, as to make themselves personally responsible.

In the first place, have the plaintiffs succeeded in establishing that, so far as regards the real transaction between the shipowners and the defendants, the defendants were, for the purposes of this particular voyage, placed in the position of shipowners? I am of opinion that they have not. No doubt there are certain expressions in the charter-party (as, for instance, the paragraph which speaks of the use and hire of the ship, or that which speaks of the whole of the ship being at the disposal of the freighters for the carriage of the goods), which, if read by themselves, would seem to involve the idea that for this particular voyage the defendants were to be placed in the position of the shipowners. But on examining the whole document it becomes apparent that such was not the intention of the parties. There is one clause in the agreement which distinctly negatives the idea that the defendants were to be placed in the position of the shipowners; the clause which I mean is that which provides that the master and owners of the ship shall give the same attention to the crew, and shall in every respect be and remain responsible to all whom it may concern, as if the ship were loaded in the berth by and for the account of the owners independently of the agreement; also near the close of the charter-party there is a provision which, if it were taken by itself, perhaps would not necessarily negative the liability of the defendants as shipowners, but which is very important in favour of the defendants when read with the clause I have just referred to; I mean the provision "That the charterers' responsibility under this charter-party except for freight as provided shall cease on the vessel being loaded."

Shortly, then, what is the meaning of that document? We have in this case foreign shipowners. They have their ship in the port of London, and are desirous of obtaining a full cargo for their ship. They deal with a firm of London ship brokers, to whose responsibility they may well look, and they might reasonably argue in this way: "There is a risk, if we put the ship up as a general ship, of not getting a full cargo; but if we can find a responsible ship broker to guarantee us a certain lump freight, and take the chance of being able to fill up the ship sufficiently to get for himself a freight beyond that lump freight, we are ready, in consideration of the lump freight, to come under all the responsibilities and liabilities that shipowners usually come under." That seems to me, apart from any question of custom, which has not been proved, to be a reasonable agreement, and one which, to judge from its language, the parties contemplated and entered into. This is sufficient to dispose of the question as to whether the real transaction between the parties was such as to substitute the defendants for the shipowners.

But then, in the second place, the defendants might have so conducted themselves and contracted with the shipowners in such a manner as to take upon themselves the responsibilities of shipowners. I do not, however, think that they have done so. Moss and Mitchell were the ship brokers on whose behalf jointly with Anderson and Co. the charter-party was executed by Anderson and Co., and undoubtedly if the letter of the 24th June 1872 is to be looked at as forming part of the contract, it shows very strongly that Moss and Mitchell were acting, not on their own behalf, but as brokers for the ship and shipowners; but, at the same time, we have no right to look at that letter if the document of the 26th June 1872 contained a complete contract for carriage; in that case we could only use the previous letter for the purpose of explaining some latent ambiguity in the agreement. However, I am of opinion that the agreement of the 26th June 1872 does not constitute a complete contract for carriage. It constitutes an arrangement under which Moss and Mitchell, dealing with the plaintiffs, provided for the goods being received on board the ship, with the intention which was common to both parties, and is to be collected from the language used, that when the goods were received on board the ship they should be carried in the ordinary way in which goods are carried under a bill of lading, which, although it is not absolutely the contract, is at all events evidence of a contract on the part of the shipowners under which the goods are carried. In my opinion it is immaterial whether this document, being signed absolutely by Moss and Mitchell, although in the body of the document they speak of themselves as acting for the shipowners, does or does not bind them, for if it does bind them it can bind them to nothing which happens after the goods have been received on board the ship, while, if it does not bind them, then cadit quæstio. It therefore comes to this, that the goods were not carried under any contract under which Moss and Mitchell, or Anderson and Co., were personally liable; but they were carried under a bill of lading signed by the captain in the ordinary way, and binding as between the plaintiffs and the shipowners, whose captain he was.

In my opinion it is clear that the captain of the ship in what he did at Monde Video was not acting on behalf of the defendants, and therefore did not render them responsible. For the reasons which I have given I am of opinion that the judgment of Denman, J. was right, and ought to be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

Forwood v. The North Wales Mutual Marine Insurance Company.

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Marine insurance—Absolute damage caused by perils insured against — Abandonment — Constructive total loss.

A shipowner claimed against the insurance company, of which he was a member, upon a policy of insurance incorporating the bye-laws of the company. A constructive total loss of the ship was admitted, but the defendants disputed the claim on the strength of a bye-law, which provided that, in the event of any ship being stranded or damaged, and not taken into a place of safety, it should be lawful for the directors of the company to use every possible means in their power to procure the safety of the said ship, the owner bearing his proportion of the expense incurred; and that no acts of the company or its agents, under or in pursuance of the power thereby reserved to the company, should be deemed or taken to be an acceptance or recognition of any abandonment of which the assured might have given notice to such company; and that the company, under any circumstances, should only pay for the absolute damage caused by the perils insured against, which in no case was to exceed the sum insured.

Held (affirming the judyment of Lush, J.), that this bye-law was no answer to the action, and the plaintiff was entitled to recover for a constructive total loss.

Appeal by the defendants from the judgment of Lush, J. on further consideration (reported ante, p. 219; 41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 802), holding that the plaintiff was entitled to recover for a constructive total loss on a policy of marine insurance, the material clauses of which are referred to in the judgments in the court below and in the Court of Appeal.

It was admitted on the statement of defence that the plaintiff's vessel was, whilst the policy was in force, damaged by perils of the sea to such an extent that the costs of repairing would have amounted to more than the ship would have been worth when repaired; that a prudent uninsured owner would not have repaired her, but would have sold her unrepaired, and that the plaintiff, within a reasonable time, gave notice of abandonment—that in effect there was a constructive total loss.

The plaintiff was a member of the defendant company, and the contention on their behalf, both in the court below and in the Court of Appeal, was that the bye-laws of the company, which were indorsed upon and incorporated into the policy, had the effect of excluding a claim for a constructive total loss.

The 24th bye-law, on the construction of which the decision turned, was as follows:

Every loss by stranding or otherwise shall, without delay, be made known to the manager, and all protests, vouchers, surveys, and other statements relating thereto shall be sent to the manager and laid before the directors and be subject to the stipulations contained in these bye-laws. In the event of any ship being stranded or damaged, and not taken into a place of safety, it shall be lawful for the directors of the company to use every possible means in their power to procure the safety of the said ship, the owner bearing his proportion of the expense incurred; and any owner or his representative refusing the co-operation of the agents of this company for the safety of such ship, shall suffer a deduction of not less than 25 nor over 50 per cent., as the directors shall determine in the settlement of the claim. And it is hereby provided that no acts of the company or its agents, under or in pursuance of the power hereby reserved to the company, shall be deemed or taken to be an acceptance or recognition of any abandonment of which the assured may have given notice to such company; and the company, under any circumstances, shall only pay for the absolute damage caused by the perils insured against, which in no case is to exceed the sum insured.

Charles Russell, Q.C. and Trevelyan appeared for the defendants, and the Solicitor-General (Sir F. Herschell, Q.C.) and Barnes for the plaintiff.—The appeal was argued together with an appeal from the judgment of Lord Coleridge, C.J. in a case of Forwood v. The Provincial A 1 Mutual Marine Insurance Company, which raised the same point and in which Cohen, Q.C. and Witt appeared for the defendants, and Butt, Q.C. and J. C. Mathew for the plaintiff.

Stringer v. The English Insurance Company, 22 L. L. Rep. N. S. 802; L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 676; L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 599, 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 440, was cited.

Bramwell, L.J.—I think this judgment should be affirmed. We cannot listen to statements of fact as to the intention of the parties when they made these rules, but we must construe the rules according to the language used. This is a valued policy, and would apply to a case of an actual total loss, and the question which we have to decide is whether it applies also to a case of a constructive total loss. The effect of the construction contended for on behalf of the defendants would be to put into the policy, after the proviso that the ship is valued at 3600*l.*, the words "if there is an actual total loss." The policy goes on to provide that the acts of the assurer or assured in recovering, saving, or preserving the property insured, shall not be considered a waiver or acceptance of abandonment. From this provision it is manifest that the parties contemplated that abandonment might be made and accepted. The bye-laws and the policy are one document, and the 24th bye-law contains these words, "And it is hereby provided that no acts of the company or its agents under or in pursuance of the power hereby reserved to the company shall be deemed or taken to be an acceptance or recognition of any abandonment of which the assured may have given notice to such company;" it is admitted that if that clause stood alone there could be an abandonment and a constructive total loss. Then these words come, "and the company under any circumstances shall only pay for the absolute damage caused by the perils insured against, which in no case is to exceed the sum insured;" it is said that these words show that there cannot be a constructive total loss and a right to abandon and claim for such a loss. If these words cannot be construed so, it seems to me that the defendants fail; they can only succeed by showing that the bye-law excludes a constructive total loss in every case. It is manifest that the words, "under any circumstances shall only pay for the absolute damage caused by the perils insured against," cannot have a literal acceptation, and that they are incorrect. The clause is in an improper place, being inserted at the bottom of the rule. It should be a separate rule. I am not sure that Mr. Butt's explanation is not right, when he says that after the word "abandonment" we must read into the rule the words "which the assured has a right to make." But, however that may be, I do think this is certain. This is a valued policy, and a power of abandonment is an ordinary incident to such a policy, and is not to be taken away except by express words.

Baggallay, L.J.—I agree that the judgment ought to be affirmed. The construction contended for by Mr. Cohen and Mr. Russell would exclude all cases of constructive total loss, or at least all cases of constructive total loss by stranding. This would be contrary to the provisions of the policy, by which acts of either party in recovering, saving, or preserving the property insured, "shall not be considered a waiver or acceptance of abandonment;" this clearly contemplates that abandonment may take place. The most material parts of the 24th bye-law are the second and third paragraphs; these provide for a particular class of cases, and give power in such cases to do all that is possible for the safety of the ship. It seems to me, therefore, that any construction which excludes a constructive total loss cannot be applied, nor any construction which applies to all cases except the case of a constructive total loss by stranding. Then the burden is cast on the appellants to show that these words are cut down by the last clause of the bye-law. It seems to me that this is a valid claim on the part of the respondent to recover in respect of a constructive total loss. I cannot accept the construction contended for on behalf of the appellants, for it is inconsistent with the previous provisions contained in the 24th bye-law, and with the words of the policy.

BRETT, L.J.—The first question is whether, under the policy and the rules, which are to be taken as part of the policy, there can be a constructive total loss. I can understand the argument which says there cannot, and the grammatical construction would be so. But it seems to me impossible to say that the framers of the bye-laws had that construction in their contemplation. If we attempt to give that construction, we make the bye-law inconsistent with the policy and with itself. Mr. Cohen says that if the bye-laws are inconsistent with the policy they must overrule the policy; but the words which he relies on are inconsistent with what is contemplated by the sentence immediately before them in the same bye-laws. It seems to me that the words at the end of the bye-law do not apply to a constructive total loss, and that such a loss is within the policy. Can it mean that the insurers shall only pay the value of the ship? That is inconsistent with the notion of a valued policy. As to a partial loss, the percentage on the value insured may be more or less than the actual value of the loss. It does not apply to a constructive total loss. I do not know what it means, but I cannot, as at present advised, accept Mr. Justice Lush's, or Lord Coleridge's, or Mr. Butt's construction. For the reasons I have given I am of opinion that the judgment ought to be affirmed.

BRAMWELL, L.J.—The judgment in both the cases will be that the plaintiff is to recover for a total loss. Judgment affirmed.

SCARAMANGA AND Co. v. STAMP AND GORDON.

Ship and shipping—Assisting ship in distress—Deviation from course—Not in order to save life—Loss of cargo—Liability of shipowner.

The owner of a ship who has contracted not to be liable to the freighters for loss of cargo by perils of the sea, is, nevertheless, liable to them for such loss, during a deviation of her course for the purpose of saving a ship in distress and her cargo, if such deviation was not (or was prolonged until it ceased to be) reasonably necessary in order to save life.

APPEAL of the defendants from the judgment of Lindley, J. upon further consideration. Cause was at the same time shown against a rule nisi for a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence which had been refused by the Common Pleas Division, but granted in the Court of Appeal.

This was an action tried before Lindley, J. and a special jury, at the Easter Sittings 1879. The action was brought on a charter-party, by the freighters of a cargo of wheat against the owners of the steamship Olympias, for the loss of the cargo. By the terms of the charter-party, the Olympias was to proceed with the wheat on board from Cronstadt to the Mediterranean. The excepted perils were the usual perils of the sea. The Olympias left Cronstadt on the 21st Nov. 1877; on the 30th, whilst in her proper course, she sighted and went to the assistance of another ship in distress, called the Arion; and on the same day the master of the Olympias entered into an agreement to tow the Arion to the Texel for a sum of 1000*l.* In pursuance of this agreement, the Olympias took the Arion in tow, and proceeded with her towards the Dutch coast, in so doing deviating from her direct course. During such deviation, on the night of the 22nd Dec. 1877, the Olympias, got ashore near the Terschelling Light, and she and her cargo were utimately lost by perils of the sea. The jury found that the loss of the ship and cargo was not attributable to the negligence of the master of the Olympias; that the deviation of the Olympias was not reasonably necessary in order to save the lives of those on board the Arion; and that such deviation was reasonably necessary in order to save the Arion and her cargo. After argument upon further consideration, Lindley, J. held that the deviation was unjustifiable, and that the plaintiffs were consequently entitled to recover against the owners the value of the cargo: (ante, page 161; 41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 191.)

Herschell, Q.C., Benjamin, Q.C. (Cohen, Q.C. and F. O. Crump with them), for the appellants.—The question here really is how far a deviation in order to save life is a deviation which makes the shipowner liable for a loss to the owner of cargo. [COCKBURN, C.J.—Do you admit that if there had been no lives on board to be saved this would have been such a deviation as to make the shipowner liable?] It is not necessary to deny it here: (Bond v. The Brig Cora, 2 Wash. C.C. 80.) The question that ought to have been left to the jury is whether, under the circumstances, the steps taken by the defendant were a reasonable mode of saving the lives that were in peril. It cannot surely be said that, although you may deviate to save life, you may only save the lives in peril by the one particular mode of taking them off the vessel. There is no English authority directly in point. Davies v. Garrett (6 Bing. 716) is the only case of an action like this. That was an action by a cargo owner against a shipowner for loss after deviation; but there the deviation was a wrongful act, so that it is not in point against us. In Lawrence v. Sydebotham (6 East, 45) Lord Ellenborough, C. J. says: "On the short point of the case my opinion is, that a liberty to chase, capture and man, cannot be extended beyond what is necessary for the performance of those acts, and that the conveying of the prize afterwards does not necessarily arise out of such a liberty. This does not affect the question how far slackening sail from motives of humanity, to succour another ship in distress is allowable; nor is it necessary to touch upon it. Perhaps when such a case does arise, it may be found to be for the general benefit of all insurers (and amongst others consequently for the benefit of those who may raise such an objection) to allow such succour to be given without imputing deviation to the succouring ship. It is not however necessary now to give any opinion on that point. In this case the slackening sail for the purpose of conveying the prize was a deviation which annuls the policy." And in the same case Lawrence, J. says: "As to deviations for the purpose of succouring ships at sea in distress, it is for the common advantage of all persons, underwriters and others, to give and receive assistance to and from each other in distress. But that was not the case here. The prize was in no distress so as to make it necessary to keep her company on that account: nor was that the motive of keeping with her." Again, in The Waterloo (2 Dodson 433), it is not treated as clear that a vessel will lose her insurance by deviating in order to succour a ship in distress. In The Jane (2 Hagg Adm. Rep. 338, 345) the court entertained some doubt as to the positive forfeiture of the insurance in all cases by deviation to assist vessels in distress. In The Orbona (1 Spinks 161) Dr. Lushington says: "It is said that the insurance of the Poictiers was void. That is not true in law; for it is not the law that if one vessel goes out of her way to assist another in distress the insurance is void. [Cockburn, C.J.—There the two men on board could not have navigated the vessel in distress, but with the assistance of four men from the Poictiers, they were able to do so; therefore, the Poictiers going out of her way was the means of saving the two men's lives. Brett, L.J.—Dr. Lushington's language shows that those on board the Poictiers did not know that life was in danger; can the forfeiture depend upon how that turns out?] The true rule is that any vessel seeing the signal of another in distress may go to succour her without deviation. That rule would not apply to the case of a derelict. The succouring vessel may give such succour as is reasonable. She is not restricted to taking the crew off the vessel in distress, and then continuing her course with the rescued crew on board. In Phillips on Insurance, 3rd ed., i., 581, the rule is stated as follows: "Delay or going out of the course to succour those who are in distress, has been invariably held not to be a deviation. . . . Delay or going off the course merely to save the property of others is considered to be a deviation." They also cited

The Beaver, 3 Chr. Rob. 292;
The Deveron, 1 W. Rob. 180.

Butt, Q.C. and J. C. Mathew for the respondents.—The decision in the court below is not an interdiction of assisting vessels in distress; there is still the salvage to be earned, which will act as a sufficient inducement. It is the shipowner, not the owner of the cargo, who gets the salvage. The vessel here was lost during and in consequence of the towage services. As to whether a ship can deviate to save property alone there is no English authority in point. As to The Orbona (ubi sup.), there was in that case danger to life, and further, Dr. Lushington afterwards took a different view. In Papayanni v. Hocquard, The True Blue (L. Rep. 1 P. C. 250), Dr. Lushington, in giving the judgment of the court, says: "It never has been directly decided by any court in this country what is the effect of a deviation, where the object of that deviation has been the performance of salvage service with reference either to life or to property. . . . . Now in these cases, their Lordships have been invited to solve that question. There Lordships beg leave to decline that invitation. . . . . We will only add that in all these cases where the judge considers in his own mind what he ought to do with respect to the amount of salvage to be given he can never forget that there was possibly a risk incurred by those on board the salving vessel in respect to the vacation of policies of insurance, and in regard to actions which might be brought against the owners of the vessel by owners of cargo." That case and Carmichael v. Brodie (L. Rep. 1 P.C. 454) show that The Orbona (ubi sup.) is no authority in favour of the appellants. In Kent's Commentaries, 12th edit,, iii., 313, 314, it is said that. "Stopping or going out of the way to relieve a vessel in distress, or to save lives or goods, may perhaps under certain circumstances not be considered as a deviation which discharges the insurer. Mr. Justice Lawrence intimates in one case (6 East 54) that it might be justifiable; but Judge Peters observed that such deviations were justified to the heart on principles of humanity, but not to the law. If, however, the object of the deviation was to save life, Judge Washington afterwards observed that he would not be the first judge to exclude such a case from the exception to the geueral rule, though he could not extend the exception to the case of saving property." The Brig Cora (ubi sup.) as far as it goes, is an authority in favour of the respondents. In Parsons on Marine Insurance ii., 33-35, the law in America on this subject is thus laid down: "It is quite certain that a delay or a departure from the course to save life on board another vessel, or even to give assistance to those in distress, is not a deviation. Always provided, however, that the change of course or the delay was no greater and no longer continued than the cause for it actually required. . . . . But it seems to be held that a delay or a departure for the purpose of saving property is, under all circumstances, a deviation; perhaps for the reason that, if the property be saved, the salvors may claim out of it a recompense by way of salvage, and in decreeing salvage an Admiralty Court may, and in practice always does, allow for the loss of insurance. A delay for the purpose of towing a vessel is certainly a deviation, unless there are persons on board the vessel towed who can be saved in no other way." In support of this, the author refers to Crocker v. Jackson (Sprague, 141). There, Sprague, J., in delivering his opinion, said: "As the sea and wind were such that the crew of the brig could not be transferred to the La Grange, and both vessels were fast drifting out of their course, the taking the brig in tow was the proper mode of relief. The only serious question is, whether the towing was continued too long. It is urged, in behalf of the respondents, that the object of the captain of the La Grange was pecuniary gain, by earning salvage. But the crew of the brig needed assistance, and it must be presumed that the master was also actuated by a desire to afford them relief. Now, there being a double motive—to relieve distress and to save property—does not render the delay a deviation, nor impair the merit of the act. The law, so far from discouraging the union of these motives, enhances the amount of salvage compensation where the saving of property is accompanied by relief to passengers or crew. But if the towing was continued after it had ceased to be necessary to relieve the distress of the crew, and merely to save property, then it was a deviation; but I am not satisfied that it was so continued." Assuming that deviation to save life is no breach, then the question necessarily arises as to what is a reasonable mode of saving life. The proper question for this jury is, Was this deviation necessary in order to save life?

Cohen, Q.C. in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 20.—The judgment of Cockburn, C.J., Brett, and Cotton, L.JJ., was delivered by Cockburn, C.J.—This is an appeal from a judgment of Lindley, J. after a trial at Nisi Prius. The facts are not in dispute, and lie in a very narrow compass. The steamship Olympias, of which the defendants are owners, having been chartered by the plaintiff to carry a cargo of wheat from Cronstadt to Gibralter, and having started on her voyage, when nine days out, sighted another steamship, the Arion, in distress, and, on nearing her, found that the machinery of the Arion had broken down, and that the vessel was in a helpless condition. The weather was fine and, the sea smooth, and there would have been no difficulty in taking off, and so saving the crew; but the master of the Arion, being desirous of saving his ship, as well as the lives of his crew agreed to pay 1000*l.* to the master of the Olympias to tow the ship into the Texel. Having taken the Arion in tow, the Olympias when off the Dutch coast, on her way to the Texel, got ashore on the Terschelling Sands, and with her cargo was ultimately lost.

Under these circumstances, the plaintiff claims the value of his goods, alleging that the goods were not lost by perils of the sea, so as to be within the exception in the charter-party, but were lost after the wrongful deviation of the defendants' vessel. The defendants plead that the deviation was justified, because it was for the purpose of saving the Arion and her cargo, and the lives of her captain and crew, the ship being in such a damaged condition that she could not be navigated. That there was here a twofold deviation, which, unless the circumstances were such as to justify it, would entitle the plaintiff to recover, cannot be disputed; in the first place, in the departure of the Olympias from her proper course in going to the Texel; secondly, her taking the Arion in tow, which, in the three American cases of Herman v. Western Marine and Fire Insurance Company (15 Louisiana Rep. 516), Natches Insurance Company v. Stanton (2 Smed. & M. 340), and Stewart v. Tennessee Marine and Fire Insurance Company (1 Humph. 242). has been held to be equivalent to a deviation and rightly so, seeing that the effect of taking another vessel in tow is necessarily to retard the progress of the towing vessel and thereby to prolong the risk of the voyage. It is unnecessary to consider how far, if the loss had not been the consequence of the deviation, the mere fact of deviation would render the shipowner liable to the goods owner for loss that ensued after it, as distinguished from its effect in a case of insurance, as there can be here no doubt that the loss not only occurred during the deviation, but was occasioned by its there being the express admission of the master to that effect; and the case therefore comes within the ruling of Davis v. Garrett (6 Bing. 716), the authority of which, so far as relates to a loss of goods occurring during the course of a deviation, never has been questioned.

It becomes therefore necessary to consider how far the grounds on which the defendants seek to justify the deviation can avail them in defence of the action. As regards that part of the plea which seeks to justify the deviation on the ground of its having been for the purpose of saving the lives of the crew of the Arion it is obvious that the defence fails on the finding of the jury, who have found, and beyond question rightly, that the deviation was not reasonably necessary in order to save the lives of those on board. On the other hand, the jury have found that the deviation was reasonably necessary for the purpose of saving the Arion and her cargo. The question for decision is, therefore, whether, when deviation has taken place with the object, not of saving life, but of saving property alone, the ship owner will be exempt from liability to a goods owner where goods have been lost through the deviation. Mr. Justice Lindley, before whom the case was tried at Nisi Prius, gave judgment in favour of the goods owner, the plaintiff, and the case comes before us on appeal from his decision. I am of opinion that his decision was right and ought not to be disturbed.

It is a remarkable fact that, while the commerce and the mercantile marine of Great Britain have been for so many years the largest in the world, the question as to how far a deviation for the purpose of saving life or property renders the shipowner liable to a goods owner, whose goods have been lost through the deviation, has never come before the tribunals of this country, so as to be authoritatively determined; while in the United States, both questions have on several occasions come before the courts, and the law may now be taken to be there settled by judicial decision, as well as by the consensus of jurists. In this country the question, with one exception, has only presented itself incidentally to that of salvage, and cannot be said even in that form to have been brought to the test of judicial decision. The exception in question is to be found in the case of Lawrence v. Sydebotham (6 East, 54), in which the question of deviation to assist a vessel in distress was incidentally touched upon, but was not the point for decision. In that case Lawrence, J. says: "As for deviation for the purpose of succouring ships at sea in distress, it is for the common advantage of all persons, underwriters and others, to give and receive assistance to and from each other in distress. But that," he continues, "was not the case here: the prize was in no distress." This observation, made to meet the argument of counsel was altogether obiter dictum, the question in the cause having no reference to deviation at all, but being whether under a policy authorising the taking of prizes in the course of a voyage, the shortening sail, in order to remain by and protect a captured prize, was within the terms of the policy. The learned judge, it is to be observed, in no way explains what he means by the terms "deviation," or the degree of assistance which is to be understood as to be given for what he terms

"the common advantage." That the question of deviation was not before the court is apparent from the language of Lord Ellenborough, who, after stating what the point really was, says: "This does not affect the question how far slackening sail, from motives of humanity, to succour another ship in distress is allowable; nor is it necessary to touch upon it. Perhaps, when such a case does arise, it may be found for the benefit of all insurers (and amongst others consequently for the benefit of those who may raise such objection) to allow such succour to be given without imputing deviation to a succouring ship. It is not, however, necessary now to give any opinion on that point."

The other cases in which the question has incidentally arisen are all cases of salvage. In the case of The Beaver (3 Chr. Rep. 292) there were conflicting claims, it being insisted on behalf of a king's ship that the ship saved had been a derelict, and had been saved entirely through the assistance of the king's ship. All that Sir William Scott says is, "With respect to the king's ship, I cannot admit the inflamed representation which has been made of their services. It is the duty of every king's ship, and indeed of every other ship, to give assistance, as well against the elements as against the enemy." How far that duty extended or how far it would protect a shipowner from the consequences of a deviation, the learned judge does not say, nor does it appear to have been present to his mind. In the latter case of The Waterloo (2 Dods. 433), in which salvage was claimed by the owners and crews of a ship chartered by the East Indian Company, for salvage services rendered to one of the company's own ships, and in which the claim was resisted on the ground that, by the terms of the charter-party and of the instructions under which the ships sailed, no salvage could be demanded, Sir William Scott, it is true, says: "As to the instructions, they extend no further than to enjoin the duty of assisting other ships belonging to the company; but they do not express that this duty, which it is very proper to enjoin, shall receive no remuneration, whatever be the active merit, whatever be the suffering incurred in performing it. It is the duty of all ships to give succour to others in distress; none but a freebooter would withhold it; but that does not discharge from liability to payment where assistance is substantially rendered." Here again the learned judge is dealing with the subject of duty only so far as it affected the claim to salvage; with its effect in respect of deviation he had nothing to do. Yet it appears to have occurred to him that the deviation might not be without serious consequences in respect of the ship's insurance; for in fixing the amount to be paid for salvage, after dwelling on the merits of the claim, he adds: "Nor can I altogether lose sight of the danger the ship thus incurred of vitiating her insurance, though that may be a questionable point." In the case of The Jane (2 Hagg. 338), where the master of a whaler with a boat's crew had gone, at the risk of their lives, to the assistance of a vessel dismasted and with the sea making a breach over her, and the crew of which had taken to the rigging as their last resource, it being urged on behalf of the owners that they had incurred the risk of forfeiting their insurance, the court (Sir Charles Robinson) is said to have "entertained some doubt as to the positive forfeiture of the insurance in all cases by deviation to assist vessels in distress," evidently looking upon the question as an unsettled and uncertain one. In the later case of The Orbona (1 Spinks 161), Dr. Lushington appears indeed, to have taken a more decided view Referring to the claim for additional salvage, on the ground of the fatal effects which the deviation might have had on the insurance, he says: "It is said that the insurance of the Poictiers was void. That is not true in law; for it is not the law that if one vessel goes out of her way to assist another in distress, the insurance is void." In support of which he refers to what was said by the judges in Lawrence v. Sydebotham (ubi sup.), but which as I have already shown, affords no sufficient authority for the position in question.

In two more recent cases the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council appear, however, to have taken a more doubtful view of the subject than appears to have been entertained by Dr. Lushington in the case just referred to. In delivering the judgment of the Judicial Committee in Papayanni v. Hocquard (L. Rep. 9 P. C. 250 (ubi sup.), the risk run of vitiating the insurance having been urged as a reason for increasing the amount to be allowed for salvage, Dr. Lushington says: "With reference to the uncertainty in which the subject is involved, their Lordships have been invited to solve the question. Their Lordships beg to decline that invitation." "We are of opinion," he continues, "that this question ought to be raised, not incidentally before this, but directly before another tribunal, as the great question at issue, and there receive the most careful deliberation, until at last it comes to a final solution and is set at rest." He adds, however, that in considering the amount of salvage to be given, "The judge can never forget that there was possibly a risk incurred in respect of the vacating of policies, and in regard to actions which might be brought by owners of cargo." In like manner, in the subsequent case of Carmichael v. Brodie (L. Rep. 9 P. C. 461), the Judicial Committee held that the claim of the owners of the ship should be considered with reference to "the doubt whether the insurance might not be vitiated, and whether the owners of the ship might not become responsible to the owners of the cargo for the acts of their servants in deviating from their course to render the assistance, and weakening the crew." thus treating the question of law as to the effect of a deviation for the purpose of rendering assistance as unsettled and uncertain.

The case before us presents itself, therefore, as far as our courts are concerned, as one of the first impression, in which we have to declare, practically I may say, to make the law. I am glad to think that in doing so we have the advantage of the assistance afforded to us by the decisions of the American courts, and the opinions of American jurists, whom accident has caused to anticipate us on this question. And, although the decisions of the American courts are, of course, not binding on us, yet the sound and enlightened views of American lawyers in the administration and development of the law—a law, except so far as altered by statutory enactment, derived from a common source with our own—entitle their decisions to our profound respect and confidence. It is unnecessary to go through the American decisions in any detail. The effect of them is to be found in the well-known text writers, but is nowhere better stated than in the judgment of Mr. Justice Sprague, in the case of Crocker v. Jackson [Sprague (American) Rep. 141]. The result of the American authorities immediately bearing on the question which we have here to decide, may be briefly stated. Deviation for the purpose of saving life is protected, and involves neither forfeiture of insurance, nor liability to the goods owner in respect of loss which would otherwise be within the exception of "perils of the seas." And, as a necessary consequence of the foregoing, deviation, for the purpose of communicating with a ship in distress, is allowable, inasmuch as the state of the vessel in distress may involve danger to life. On the other hand, deviation for the purpose of saving property is not thus privileged, but entails all the usual consequences of deviation. But where the preservation of life can only be effected through the concurrent saving of property, and the bonâ fide purpose of saving life forms part of the motive which leads to the deviation, the privilege will not be lost, because the purpose of saving property may have formed a second motive for deviating. If the lives of the persons on board a disabled ship can be saved without saving the ship, as by taking them off, any deviation for the purpose of saving the ship will carry with it all the consequences of an unauthorised deviation.

In these propositions I entirely concur, as well as in the reasoning by which this view of the law is supported by Lindley, J. in his most able judgment. The impulsive desire to save human life when in peril is one of the most beneficial instincts of humanity, and is nowhere more salutary in its results than in bringing help to those who, exposed to destruction from the fury of winds and waves, would perish if left without assistance. To all who have to trust themselves to the sea it is of the utmost importance that the promptings of humanity in this respect should not be checked or interfered with by prudential considerations as to injurious consequences which may result in respect of a ship or cargo from the rendering of the needed aid. It would be against the common good, and shocking to the sentiments of mankind, that the shipowner should be deterred from endeavouring to save life by the fear lest any disaster to ship or cargo consequent on so doing should fall on himself. Yet it would be unjust to expect that he should be called upon to satisfy the call of humanity at his own entire risk. Moreover, the uniform practice of the mariners of every nation, except such as are in the habit of making the unfortunate their prey, to succour others who are in danger, is so universal and well known, that there is neither injustice nor hardship in treating both the merchant and the insurer as making their contracts with the shipowner as subject to this exception to the general rule of not deviating from the appointed course. Goods owners and insurers must be taken—at all events in the absence of any stipulations to the contrary—as acquiescing in the universal practice of the maritime world, prompted by the inherent instinct of human nature, and founded on the common interest of all who are exposed to the perils of the seas. What would be the effect of such a stipulation, as I have just referred to, if it existed, it is unnecessary for the purpose of the present case to consider.

Deviation for the purpose of saving property stands obviously on a totally different footing. There is here no moral duty to fulfil, which though its fulfilment may have been attended with danger to life or property remains unrewarded. There would be much force, no doubt, in the argument that it is to the common interest of merchants and insurers, as well as of shipowners, that ships and cargoes when in danger of perishing should be saved; and consequently that, as matter of policy, the same latitude should be allowed in respect of the saving of property as of life, were it not that the law has provided another, and a very adequate, motive for the saving of property, by securing a liberal proportion of the property saved to the salvor—a proportion in which, not only the value of the property saved, but also the danger run by the salvor to life or property, is taken into account, and in calculating which, if it be once settled that the insurance will not be protected, nor the shipowner free from liability in respect of loss of cargo, the risk thus run will, no doubt, be included as an element. It would obviously be most unjust, if the shipowner could thus take the chance of highly remunerative gain at the risk and possible loss of the merchant or the insurer, neither of whom derive any benefit from the preservation of the property saved. This is strikingly exemplified in the present case, in which, not content with what would have been awarded to him by the proper court on account of salvage, the master made his own terms, and would have been paid a very large sum, had the attempt to bring the Arion into port proved successful. It is obviously one thing to accord a privilege to one who acts from a sense of duty, without expectation of reward, another to extend it to one who neither acts from a sense of moral duty nor in obedience to what may be thought to be the policy of the law, but solely with a view to his own individual profit.

In the result I am of opinion that, though the deviation of the Olympias, so far as relates to her proceeding to the Arion in the first instance, was justified, the taking the latter in tow, and departing from the proper course in order to take the ship to the Texel, this not being necessary in order to save the lives of the captain and crew, was an unauthorised deviation, and the loss of the plaintiff's cargo having been the direct consequence of the deviation, or, to use the language of Tindal, C.J. in Davies v. Garrett (ubi sup.), "The loss having actually happened whilst the wrongful act was in operation and force, and being attributable to the wrongful act," the defendants cannot avail themselves of the exception in the charter-party, and the plaintiff is, therefore, entitled to judgment. The appeal must, therefore, be dismissed.

I am authorised by my colleagues, Brett, L.J. and Cotton, L.J., to say that they concur in the judgment I have just delivered.

Bramwell, L.J.—I am of opinion that this judgment must be affirmed. The defendant has undertaken to the plaintiff to carry his goods from port to port without deviation, unless for cause justifying such deviation. The defendant has deviated, and so broken his contract, unless he can show such cause. Now, the cause that will justify non-compliance with an undertaking may be express, or implied in the contract itself, or added to it by usage or by some positive law. The cause alleged in this case is, that the deviation was a reasonable one, to save a ship and its cargo from loss and destruction. It is certain that no law orders such a deviation. It is certain there is no usage which adds to the contract a power to deviate for such cause. On the contrary, every opinion is against it; and it is certain that ships which desire to have such a power, or one somewhat like it, expressly stipulate for it, as, for example, for the right to tow vessels. As it is not expressed in the contract between the plaintiff and defendant, the only remaining question is, can it be implied? Now, for my own part, I think it most objectionable to add to the contracts of parties that which they could have added themselves had they been minded. It is to suppose they would have made the contract we make for them, had they only thought of it, a supposition very likely to be wrong. Still, in some cases it is, and must be, done. It is said it must be in this case on the ground of public policy; that is to say, as I understand, that it is for the good of mankind in general, and so for Englishmen, that ships should, without liability to freighters, have power to deviate to save other ships and cargoes. Now, I am by no means sure that this is so. I am by no means certain that more might not be lost than gained by such a power and its exercise. I am certain of this, that the best way to manage the matter is to leave parties to make their own bargains about it. Let the shipowner charge less freight, where he reserves to himself the power, and more, where he does not. I am also certain of this that even if the good of mankind and of this country in particular would be augmented by such a power, and by implying it in a contract, unless expressly excluded, we cannot imply it on the ground of public policy.

If public policy required such power should exist, a charter-party which expressly denied such power would be illegal, and all its provisions void. Can that be maintained for a minute? Public policy requires the enforcement of certain rules as that contracts shall not be illegal nor immoral, that they shall not be in restraint of trade, nor of personal freedom; that they shall not invite to the commission of crime, as an undertaking with a man to pay money to his executors if he commits suicide. But public policy would no more imply such a matter as this and make its exclusion from a charter illegal than it would make an agricultural lease unlawful, because some of the covenants were inconsistent with the most profitable use of the land.

I am of opinion, then, that the defendant has broken his contract without any sufficient excuse or justification, and that this action is maintainable. It will be said that this is a very narrow ground on which to decide the case. It may be; but it is the only ground, and it is not my fault that that is narrow. After all, the question is, had the defendant sufficient justification for breaking his promise? I say no, and that the plaintiff must recover. The question whether a deviation to save life is justifiable is untouched by this opinion. That question depends on different considerations, and different authorities.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Reported by A. H. Poyser, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

May 16 and 27, 1870; March 18, 1880.

(Before Cockburn, C.J. and Lush, J.)

Greer v. Poole and others.

Ship and shipping—Marine insurance—Cargo undamaged—Payment by owner of cargo in discharge of bottomry bond—Loss by perils of the sea—English policy on goods in French ship—Construction.

The plaintiff, the owner of cargo, sought to recover, upon a policy of insurance for a sum paid by him in discharge of a bottomry bond in order to obtain possession of his goods. The bond had been given by the master of the vessel upon the ship, freight, and cargo in order to pay for repairs rendered necessary by a collision with another vessel at sea. The ship and freight proved insufficient to satisfy the bond, and the plaintiff had to pay the deficiency. The plaintiff also contended that, as the goods were on board a French ship, the policy must be construed according to French law.

Held, that the policy, in the absence of stipulation to the contrary, must be construed by English law, and that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover, as the loss upon the cargo was not proximately caused by perils of the sea.

This was an action upon a policy of marine insurance. The material facts are fully set out in the judgment of the Court.

Cohen, Q.C. (J. C. Mathew with him) for the plaintiff.—This was a loss by perils of the sea, for, though the goods were not actually damaged, still they were of necessity pledged to make good such losses, and the owner is entitled to recover just as he would for money paid for salvage:

Dent v. Smith, L. Rep. 4 Q.B. 414; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 868; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 251; Rodocanachi v. Elliott, 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 21, 339; L. Rep. 9 C. P. 518; 31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 239.

By French law the plaintiff would be entitled to recover, and as the goods were on board a French ship French law must prevail:

Lloyd v. Guibert, L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 115; 13 L. T. Rep. N.S. 602; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 26, 383; Ionides v. Universal Marine Insurance Company, 14 C. B. N. S. 259; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O.S. 353.

English Harrison (Watkin Williams, Q.C. with him).—The policy was effected in England with English underwriters, and must be construed by English law. The point that this was not a loss by perils of the sea is concluded by authority:

Powell v. Gudgeon, 5 M. & S. 431;
Sarquy v. Hobson, 4 Bing. 131; 2 B. & C. 7;
Harris v. Scaramanga, 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 339 L. Rep. 7 Ch. 481; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 797.

Cur. adv. vult.

The considered judgment of the court was delivered by

Lush, J.—This was an action on a marine policy on goods on a voyage from Lagos to Marseilles in a French ship. By the terms of the policy general average was to be payable as per judicial foreign statement. The ship having come into collision with another ship put into Gibraltar for repairs. The cargo was undamaged. The master not having funds enough to do the necessary repairs, took up a loan on bottomry upon ship, freight, and cargo. On arrival at Marseilles the bondholder took proceedings to enforce his rights against ship, freight, and cargo, and ship and freight proving insufficient to satisfy the bond, the plaintiff had to pay the deficiency in order to release his goods. A judicial average statement was made out at Marseilles, which however did not comprise the sum paid to the bondholder as the payment had not then been made. The defendant paid into court a sum sufficient to satisfy the claim for particular charges and expenses and general average under the adjustment, and the only question submitted to us is whether the amount paid to release the goods is recoverable under the policy. On the argument Mr. Cohen, who appeared for the plaintiff, feeling that he could not sustain the claim as general average, contended that this was under particular circumstances a loss by perils of the sea, the circumstances relied on being that the French law entitled the owner of the vessel in question to abandon the ship and freight to the bondholders, and thus to release himself from further liability, the French law differing in this respect from English law. Whether this contention is well founded or not is not in our opinion material; for, supposing it to be so, it does not make the loss a loss by perils of the sea. The proximate cause of the loss to which alone our law has regard was the inability of the agent of the shipowner to pay off the charge which he had for want of funds at Gibraltar created on the cargo. The goods sustained no sea damage. It was further contended on behalf of the plaintiff that as the policy was upon goods in a French ship it must be construed as if it had been a French policy, and that under such a policy the loss would have been deemed a loss by perils of the sea. Whether a French policy would have been so construed is again immaterial. It is no doubt competent to an underwriter on an English policy to stipulate, if he thinks fit, that such policy shall be construed and applied in whole or in part according to the law of any foreign state as if it had been made in and by a subject of the foreign state, and the policy in question does so stipulate as regards general average; but except when it is so stipulated the policy must be construed according to our law and without regard to the nationality of the vessel. Our judgment is therefore for the defendants.

COMMON PLEAS DIVISION.

Reported by J. A. FOOTE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Tuesday, May 25, 1880.

(Before Lord COLERIDGE, C.J., GROVE and LOPES, JJ.)

BOLCKOW, VAUGHAN, AND CO. v. YOUNG.

Practice — Interrogatories — Irrelevancy — Order XXXI., r. 5.

The defendant, a shipowner, was sued by the owners of the cargo and charterers for non-delivery of cargo. The defendant alleged that the non-delivery was caused by perils of the sea excepted in the charter-party and bill of lading.

Held, that interrogatories asking the plaintiffs whether the cargo was insured, and if so, with whom, by whom, and to what amount, were irrelevant and therefore inadmissible.

SUMMONS adjourned from chambers by BOWEN, J.

The plaintiffs, Bolckow, Vaughan, and Co., were ironmasters at Hull, and the plaintiffs Houlder Brothers, shipbrokers in London; the defendant being the owner of the steam ship Wolverton. The statement of claim comprised a claim by Houlder, Brothers, as charterers and shippers for the non-delivery at Leghorn of a cargo of steel rails from Middlesborough; and an alternative claim by the plaintiffs Bolckow, Vaughan, and Co., as shippers of the same cargo under the bill of lading. The statement of defence alleged that the non-delivery arose from perils of the sea excepted by the terms of the charter-party and bill of lading; and further pleaded that before and at the time of the wreck and loss of the Wolverton, the plaintiffs respectively had parted with and transferred all interest in the said goods to other persons, and had not respectively any interest whatever therein. The defendants sought to administer interrogatories asking the plaintiffs whether the cargo was insured, and if so, with whom and by whom the insurance or insurances had been effected, and to what amount. On the plaintiffs objecting to answer, a summons for a further answer was taken out and adjourned by Bowen, J. to the court.

Clarkson for the defendant.—These interrogatories are relevant to the issues, and would be the first questions put upon cross-examination. We allege in the pleadings that the plaintiffs had, before the loss, transferred all their interest in the goods, and it is material with regard to this that the interrogatory asking by whom the insurances, if any, were effected should be answered. The action is really brought on behalf of the underwriters, but the court cannot go behind the pleadings to assume that.

J. C. Matthews for the plaintiffs.—The interrogatories objected to are wholly irrelevant. The underwriters are not the plaintiffs on the record; and it has never been the practice to answer interrogatories as to insurance such as this, which are only put for the purpose of creating prejudice.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—I think these interrogatories are irrelevant. If, as Mr. Clarkson says, we are not to look behind the pleadings and see that the action is really on behalf of the underwriters, the case is even stronger against him. That would be the only ground upon which it could be suggested that they were relevant.

Motion refused with costs.

POSTLETHWAITE v. FREELAND.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Shipping—Demurrage—Construction of charter-party—Cargo "to be discharged with all despatch according to the custom of the port."

A charter-party in which there are stipulations as to the loading or discharging cargo in a port is always to be construed as made with reference to the custom of that port; therefore the words "cargo to be discharged with all despatch according to the custom of the port," do not affect the liability imposed on the charterer by the ordinary clause, "cargo to be taken from alongside at the merchant's risk and expense." "Custom" in such a case means a settled and established practice of the port.

In an action brought by a shipowner against the charterer for demurrage at the port of discharge it was proved that from the natural conditions and rules of the port ships must necessarily be discharged into lighters, and that only a limited number of lighters were available.

Held (affirming the judgment of the court below), that the insufficiency of the number of lighters available to discharge simultaneously all the ships lying off the port when the plaintiff's ship arrived there, could not in the absence of any express stipulation as to time of discharge, be considered as an impediment to the due discharge of that ship collateral to or separable from the custom of the port, and that the charterer was not liable for demurrage.

Wright v. New Zealand Shipping Company (ante p. 118; 4 Ex. Div. 165 n., 40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 413) distinguished.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Brett and Thesiger, L.JJ., Cotton, L.J. dissenting), affirming a judgment of the Exchequer Division (Kelly, C.B. and Hawkins, J.) in favour of the respondents.

The case is reported ante, p. 129; 4 Ex. Div. 155, and 40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 601.

The appellant, the plaintiff below, was a shipowner carrying on business at Milton, in Cumberland, and was the owner of a vessel called the Cumberland Lassie; and the respondents (the defendants below) were ship and insurance brokers and commission merchants, of Great St. Helen's, London. The action was brought in respect of a claim of the plaintiff for forty-three days' demurrage of his ship, or in the alternative damages for the detention of the ship beyond the time limited by the charter-party executed between the plaintiff and the defendants. The action was tried before Lord Coleridge, C.J., and a special jury in March 1878, when a verdict was found for the defendants. It appeared that on the 28th April 1875, the defendants chartered the Cumberland Lassie for the carriage of a cargo of about 370 tons of steel rails from Barrow-in-Furness to East London in South Africa. The charter-party provided that the cargo should be brought and taken from alongside the merchant's risk and expense, and it contained the following stipulation: "The cargo is to be discharged with all despatch, according to the custom of the port." It was for the breach of this stipulation that the action was brought. On the 2nd June 1875 the master of the ship signed and delivered to the defendants a bill of lading for the rails, which had been shipped under the charter-party, by which it appeared that the shipment had been made on behalf of the Crown agents for the colonies, and that the rails were consigned to the railway engineer at East London. East London is a "bar" harbour, and vessels of the size of the Cumberland Lassie are obliged to unload a considerable portion of their cargo before they can cross the bar. The discharge of cargo outside the bar is generally effected by means of lighters, which are propelled by manual labour along a rope or warp running from a quay inside the harbour across the bar, and thence to a buoy outside. These lighters are hauled from the main warp to the vessels by means of branch warps, or they are sometimes brought from the main warp alongside the vessel by means of a steam tug. In 1875 the port was unusually crowded with shipping, the Colonial Government having in that year begun to build a railway in the neighbourhood, which necessitated the importation of a large quantity of steel rails and other heavy material of a like kind, no such cargo having been imported into the place previously. In this state of things the Cumberland Lassie arrived at the port on the 31st Aug. 1875, and she was ready to discharge on the 1st Sept. Upon her arrival the agents of the charterer employed the company to whom the warp and lighters belonged to discharge the vessel, but the number of lighters possessed by the latter was wholly insufficient to enable the ships which had arrived to be discharged with expedition, and the result was that the discharge of the Cumberland Lassie was not commenced until the 6th Oct., and was not finished until the 23rd Nov. The plaintiff contended at the trial that the delay which occurred in the discharge of his ship was one for which the charterers were liable. On the verdict being given against him at the trial he applied for a new trial, on the ground that the learned judge had misdirected the jury by not telling them that the risk of not being able to discharge with despatch fell upon the charterers, that the consignees were bound to provide means for discharging the cargo, and upon the further grounds that the defendants did not show that they had used all reasonable or possible means for discharging the cargo, that there was no evidence that the usual number of lighters fit to discharge railway iron were in port, and that there could be no binding custom as to the number of lighters fit to discharge railway iron on account of the recency of the importation of such iron into the port.

The rule for a new trial having been discharged by the Exchequer Division, their judgment was affirmed by the Court of Appeal as above mentioned, and from this judgment the present appeal was brought.

Butt, Q.C., Cohen, Q.C., and Bigham appeared for the appellant, and argued that the main question was whether the number of lighters employed was to be considered part of the "custom of the port." The cargo was to be "discharged with all despatch according to the custom of the port," and the question is, what is a reasonable time under the circumstances. Lord Coleridge, C.J., in summing up, directed the jury that the number of lighters was part of the custom of the port, which we say was a misdirection, for the number of lighters cannot form part of the custom; the words refer only to the method of unloading, not to the time to be employed, otherwise what would be the position of affairs if all the lighters were out of repair? Apart from the custom (which we say only refers to the method of unloading) it would be the charterer's duty to have sufficient lighters to unload the ship in a reasonable time, and the evidence here shews that reasonable diligence was not used. At the conclusion of the arguments, their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

June 7.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Selborne).—My Lords: The question in this case is, whether demurrage is payable for delay in discharging a cargo of steel rails at the port of East London in South Africa, under the following circumstances.

By the charter-party, the appellant's ship Cumberland Lassie was to take on board at Barrow-in-Furness and to deliver at East London "at any safe wharf where ships can always lie safely afloat, as ordered on arrival, or so near thereto as he," i.e., the master, "can safely get," the cargo in question, which was "to be brought to, and taken from, alongside at merchant's risk and expense," and "to be discharged with all despatch according to the custom of the port." For the loading at Barrow a fixed number of days was agreed upon, with demurrage at a fixed rate, if that time was exceeded. East London is a port with a dangerous bar at its entrance, over which ships heavily laden (as this ship was) cannot pass till they are lightened by the discharge of a great part of their cargo. This is done by means of lighters propelled by manual labour along a main rope or warp, running from a quay inside the harbour across the bar to a buoy outside, from which they are hauled to the ship's side by means of branch warps. The main warp, and the whole supply of lighters at the port, were in the hands and under the management of the Colonial Government till 1873, when they were transferred by the Government to a company called the "East London Landing and Shipping Company." It is stated that "prior to 1873 the warp had been the property of the Colonial Government, but in that year it was taken over by the company." Mr. Jameson, a director of the company, gave evidence to the effect that in 1875, and for some time afterwards, they had a control over the use of the warp; and this is consistent with other parts of the evidence, viz., that when the company had once begun the discharge of a vessel, they "would not allow" any interference, even by the Government surf-boats; and that "when the Government" (which seems to have reserved to itself some sort of concurrent right with the company) "had commenced the discharge of a ship, they acted in the same way." The company in 1875 had nine lighters, of which only seven were in working order, and only four were fit to discharge such a cargo as that of the Cumberland Lassie, at the time when that ship arrived. The Government had usually two, and they appear to have brought in three more about that time, or soon afterwards, from Port Elizabeth in Algoa Bay, more than 150 miles off, which was the nearest port where any additional lighters could have been obtained. The rails on board the Cumberland Lassie were shipped on account of the Crown agents in the colony; but I do not find in the evidence any proof that, consistently with the usage of the port (as already described), any of the Government lighters were or could have been made available for the discharge of this particular cargo by any arrangement within the charterer's power. When (as happened on the arrival of this ship, and as seems to have usually happened at the same time of the year) there were more ships lying off the bar than the lighters in the port could simultaneously discharge, every ship was discharged in her turn, according to the order of her arrival, as reported at the port office; one lighter per diem being sent to her on every working day till she could cross the bar. If no lighter was ready, suitable for her particular cargo, she might lose her turn for the day; which, however, did not happen in this particular case. There were twenty-four working days during which the Cumberland Lassie lay idle off the bar at East London, from the 31st Aug. to the 6th Oct. 1875, ready (as far as her master was concerned) to discharge her cargo, but prevented from doing so by the priority in the use of the warp, and of the lighters then available at the port, allowed by the custom of the port to ships which had arrived before her. Her turn came on the 6th Oct., and no complaint is now made of any subsequent delay. The question before your Lordships is, whether demurrage is payable for her detention there during those twenty-four working days?

At the trial before Lord Coleridge, C.J. a verdict was given for the defendants, the charterers, under the direction of that learned judge. A rule nisi was obtained for a new trial; but this, after argument, was discharged by Kelly, C.B. and Hawkins, J. sitting as a divisional court. Their judgment was affirmed by a majority (Brett and Thesiger, L.JJ.) in the Court of Appeal, Cotton, L.J. dissenting. The appeal of your Lordships is from that decision, and my opinion is that the judgment appealed from ought to be affirmed.

There is no doubt that the duty of providing and making proper use of sufficient means for the discharge of cargo, when a ship which has been chartered arrives at her destination and is ready to discharge, lies (generally) upon the charterer. If by the terms of the charter-party he has agreed to discharge it within a fixed period of time, that is an absolute and unconditional engagement, for the non-performance of which he is answerable, whatever may be the nature of the impediments which prevent him from performing it, and cause the ship to be detained in his service beyond the time stipulated. If, on the other hand, there is no fixed time, the law implies an agreement on his part to discharge the cargo within a reasonable time, that is (as was said by Blackburn, J. in Ford v. Cotesworth, 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 195, 468), "a reasonable time under the circumstances." Difficult questions may sometimes arise as to the circumstances which ought to be taken into consideration in determining what time is reasonable. If (as in the present case) an obligation, indefinite as to time, is qualified or practically defined by express or implied reference to the custom or practice of a particular port, every impediment arising from or out of that custom or practice, which the charterer could not have overcome by the use of any reasonable diligence ought (I think) to be taken into consideration. These distinctions are well illustrated by three cases, which were referred to in the arguments at your Lordships' bar. In Randall v. Lynch (2 Camp. 352) the charterer was held liable for demurrage, a particular time being fixed by the charter-party for the discharge of the cargo. In Rodgers v. Forrester (2 Camp. 483), where the contract was to discharge the ship "within the usual and customary time for unloading such a cargo," and in Burmester v. Hodgson (2 Camp. 488), where the court thought this to be the contract which the law ought to imply from the terms of the charter-party, the charterer was held not liable for demurrage. In all those three cases, the circumstances which caused the detention of the ships were the same—viz., the crowded state of the London Docks, in which the ships were, by Act of Parliament, obliged to unload. If your Lordships should agree that the present appeal ought to be dismissed, you will, I think, be adhering to the principle of Rodgers v. Forrester and Burmester v. Hodgson, which do not appear to me to be in principle inconsistent with later authorities.

Two recent cases were much relied upon in the argument of the appellant's counsel at your Lordships' bar—Ford v. Cotesworth (3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 190, 468) and Wright v. The New Zealand Shipping Company Limited (ante, p. 118). Ford v. Cotesworth appears to me to be perfectly consistent with the earlier cases. The judgment of the court of error turned upon a vis major, which the court held to have impeded the master of the ship, as well as the agent of the charterer, from performing his part in the discharge of the vessel. But at the trial the jury was told by Cockburn, C.J. (in my opinion correctly, nor do I perceive that the court of error thought otherwise), that "the question whether the time was reasonable or unreasonable ought to be judged with reference to the means and facilities available at the port, and to the facilities and course of business at the port." In the other case (Wright v. The New Zealand Shipping Company Limited, ubi sup.), which is at first sight much more favourable to the appellant, there were special circumstances on which the decision might very well have been founded, but to these (as it does not appear to me to have been, in fact, founded upon them) I do not more particularly refer. The distinctions between that case and the present (whether the doctrine laid down in it can be suported or not) are, that there no express reference was made in the contract to the custom of the port, and that, if such a reference ought to be implied, no custom or other circumstances existed which would have made it impossible for the charterer, by the use of any reasonable diligence, to have provided himself with lighters for the discharge of the cargo earlier than he did. What the Lords Justices in that case held was (in the words of Cotton, L.J.) that "an obligation was imposed upon the charterer of providing at the port of discharge sufficient appliances of the kind ordinarily used at the port;" and it was expressly added that he would not have been bound to provide appliances which were not in use there, but might be in use at other ports. In the present case it appears to me to be the true result of the evidence that the Cumberland Lassie was discharged with all despatch according to the custom of the port. In the construction of this contract I think that the words "according to the custom," &c., ought to be read in connection with the word "dispatch."

Looking at the natural conditions, and the rules of the port, its distance from any other port, the necessity for the use of the warp, and the control over the warp possessed by the East London Landing and Shipping Company, I do not think that the insufficiency of the number of lighters available to discharge simultaneously all the ships lying outside the bar of East London when the Cumberland Lassie arrived there can be regarded as an impediment to the due discharge of that ship, collateral to or separable from the custom and practice of the port, against which the charterers ought to have provided, or for which they ought (as between themselves and the shipowner) to be held responsible. I therefore propose to your Lordships to dismiss the present Appeal with costs.

Lord HATHERLEY.—[After going through the facts of the case, his Lordship continued]: Now it appears to me from the evidence and the cases cited at the bar, that the charterers (the respondents) have not been in any default in respect of the engagements entered into on their part in the charter-party, viz., "to discharge the ship with all despatch, according to the custom of the port."

The cases show that when a specific time is named, either in words or by necessary implication, the party who has contracted to unload a ship within the limit must bear the loss occasioned by any excess of time, although the delay was not occasioned by any default on his part; for, as was said by Lord Tenterden, in his work on shipping (in a passage quoted by my noble friend opposite) in delivering the judgment of the court in Ford v. Cotesworth (ubi sup.), "he has engaged that it shall be done." But all that is engaged to be done here is "to proceed with all dispatch according to the custom of the port." Such an engagement might not, perhaps, excuse the merchant from the consequence of any unusual accident arising to delay the discharge of the vessel beyond the customary time of discharge (see Barker v. Hodgson, ubi sup., cited in Ford v. Cotesworth), because the merchant has contracted that the discharge shall take place within a given time, viz., that of the usual period for discharge of a like vessel in that particular port, and the shipowner is entitled to have his ship back at the expiration of that time or to be paid demurrage, whatever be the cause of delay. But when the contract merely engages that the merchant shall, with all despatch, according to the custom of the port, unload the vessel, he will be, as it appears to me, fulfilling his contract if he employ all the usual methods of despatch, and especially the warps and lighters usually so employed, and especially when, in fact, a despatch was obtained as great as in the case of any other ship of the same size and burthen. I do not think that the merchant has engaged that he will use any other means of despatch than those used habitually at the port. It is suggested that he should have taken care that the supply of lighters should be adequate without delay to attend to his ship. But this would be to adopt a course which there is no evidence that anybody frequenting the port ever adopted. So far is that from being the case, that no ship is shown ever to have adopted any other course than that which was taken by the defendants; nor has the argument suggested any usual course as having been omitted by the merchant, which will also be a course coinciding with the usage of the port. Any other course would be outside the contract, and if it failed, as it probably might when adopted for the first time, the consequent result would be a breach of the existing contract, to which the demurrage might be attributed. The course taken as to turns seems to me part of the usage.

I agree, therefore, with my noble and learned friend, the Lord Chancellor, that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Lord BLACKBURN.—My Lords: The question in this case, in my mind, depends on what is the true construction of the ordinary clause in a charter-party, "the cargo to be brought to and taken from alongside at merchant's risk and expense," and what is the extent of the implied undertaking on the part of the merchant to provide lighters or other appliances for taking the cargo from alongside. The parties to the charter-party may by any stipulation they please, alter the undertaking which would otherwise be implied; but in the charter-party now before this House I think they have not done so. The only other reference to the discharge of cargo is "the cargo is to be discharged with all despatch according to the custom of the port." I do not think that this alters the question, as the express reference to the custom of the port of discharge is no more than would be implied. For I take it that a charter-party, in which there are stipulations as to loading or discharging cargo in a port, is always to be construed as made with reference to the custom of the port of loading or discharge, as the case may be (see Hudson v. Ede (L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 566; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 698; affirmed (L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 412; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 764; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 521; 3 Id. 114), though it was expressly found in the case that the shipowner and his broker were not aware of the usage.

In the case of Wright v. New Zealand Company (ante, p. 118), the Court of Appeal were of opinion, as Bramwell, L.J. expressed it, that the merchants were bound "to have lighters ready to discharge her forthwith, and were not entitled to excuse the omission on the ground that, at the port of discharge, there was only a certain number of lighters, and when the plaintiff's vessel arrived, other ships belonging to other persons required those lighters, and the defendants got lighters for unloading the cargo as soon as they could." "To my mind," says he, "those circumstances afford no answer to the plaintiff's complaint; the defendants, having undertaken to unload the vessel, were bound to be ready to do it, and to finish it within a reasonable time." And the other members of the court express the same idea. I think that if the true construction of the clause, "cargo to be brought to and taken from alongside at merchant's risk and expense," is that the merchant undertakes to be ready with lighters to discharge the vessel, the subsequent clause inserted in this charter-party for the shipowner's benefit that, "the cargo is to be discharged with all despatch according to the custom of the port," could not have been intended to relieve him from that undertaking. But the question now to be decided, as I think, is whether there is an undertaking to that extent.

The facts which are sufficient to raise the question in the present case are few, and not in dispute. [His Lordship went through the facts of the case and continued:] The case came on for trial on the 13th March 1878, before Lord Coleridge, C.J. and a special jury. The jury were told, and I think quite correctly, that "custom" in the charter-party did not mean custom in the sense in which the word is sometimes used by lawyers, but meant a settled and established practice of the port, and the learned judge then left it to them to say whether there was such an established custom, and if the Cumberland Lassie was unloaded with all despatch under the circumstances. And in leaving this to the jury he told them in effect that they were to take into account the circumstances as they were, though the number of ships was unusually great, and the number of available lighters fewer than could have been worked by the warp. I should observe that it appears to be clear that no lighters could have been obtained from any other port in a less time than was occupied in discharging the ships that had arrived before the Cumberland Lassie; so that no question was raised as to whether, if there had been such, the merchant ought to have obtained them. The only question raised on the facts was that on which Lord Coleridge thus directed the jury. It is not disputed that if the direction was right the verdict for the defendant was justified. It seems to me clear that if the view of the law afterwards laid down by Bramwell and Cotton, L.JJ., and, I incline to think (as reported), Thesiger, L.J. also, in Wright v. New Zealand Company (ubi sup.) is correct, this was a misdirection. The present cause was brought before the Court of Appeal, then consisting of Brett, Cotton, and Thesiger, L.JJ., shortly after that Court, then consisting of Bramwell, Cotton, and Thesiger, L.JJ., had given judgment in Wright v. New Zealand Company. Cotton, L.J., adhered to the view of the law he had taken in that case, and thought there should be a new trial. Thesiger, L.J. distinguished the two cases, not, to my mind, successfully, and thought the direction in the present case right; and, as Brett, L.J., agreed with him, judgment was given for the defendant. The appeal is against that judgment. As the two decisions, that in the present case and that in Wright v. New Zealand Company were almost contemporaneous, and were on applications for new trials in cases tried at the same Assizes, and almost contemporaneously, I think this must be treated as an appeal from both these cases. So that your Lordships have the opinion of Bramwell and Cotton, L.JJ. on the one side, and Brett and Thesiger, L.JJ. on the other, a balance of authority as nearly equal as could well be.

It is very singular, considering how long charter-parties having a clause in this form have been in use, that there should be no direct authority on the subject; but so it is. At least the counsel at your Lordships' bar were able to cite none, and I have not been able myself to discover any. It is almost as singular that the question should at last have been raised in two cases almost at the same time, and that the Court of Appeal should be equally divided in opinion. I think your Lordships must decide on analogy to other cases and on general principles of law; and though I have felt, and still feel, that there is a great deal to be said in favour of the view of the law taken by those judges who are in favour of the appellants, I have come to the conclusion that the ruling of Lord Coleridge and the judgment below were right, and that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

As the merchant, if not himself resident at the port of discharge, at all events has a consignee and correspondent there resident, he presumably knows all about the means and appliances for discharging a ship there better than the shipowner. It therefore seems very reasonable that the shipowner, in making his bargain, should require the merchant to make an estimate of the probable time of discharging the ship, and take on himself the risk of that time being exceeded; and then the shipowner can fix the payment he is willing to take with reference to this; and this has long been done by providing lay days and demurrage for the discharge. In the last edition of Abbott on Shipping published in Lord Tenterden's life, (5th edit.), p. 180, it is said: "The usual clauses purporting that it is covenanted and agreed by and between the parties that a specified number of days shall be allowed for loading and unloading, and that it shall be lawful to detain the vessel for those purposes a further specified time on payment of a daily sum, constitute a contract on the part of the freighter that he will not detain the ship for those purposes beyond the two designated periods; and if he does so detain her he is liable to an action on the contract in the form adapted to the nature of the instrument. If a ship be so detained the daily rate of demurrage mentioned in the charter-party will in general be the measure of the damages to be paid; but it is not the absolute or necessary measure; more or less may be payable as justice may require, regard being had to the expense and loss incurred by the owner, and the amount must be settled by a jury, if the parties cannot agree. And where the time is thus expressly ascertained and limited by the terms of the contract, the merchant will be liable to an action for damages if the thing be not done within the time, although this may not be attributable to any fault or omission on his part, for he has engaged that it shall be done." These last words are put in italics by Lord Tenterden. It still remains the more usual form of charter-party to insert lay days and demurrage days. In many of the cases cited on the argument at the bar the charter-parties were of this nature, and the question only was whether the lay days had begun to run. Tapscott v. Balfour (1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 501) was of this nature; for though the charter-party did not name a specific number of days, it provided that the ship was "to be loaded by the defendants at the rate of 100 tons per working day," and as the burthen of the ship was known, and id certum est quod certum reddi potest, this was equivalent to naming a certain number of days. No question could have been made, if there had been lay days in the present charter-party, that they would have begun to run on the 1st Sept. Neither does Thiis v. Byers (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 147) bear on the present case. The court there says: "We took time to look into the authorities, and are of opinion that where a given number of days is allowed to the charterer for unloading, a contract is implied on his part that from the time when the ship is at the usual place of discharge he will take the risk of any ordinary vicissitudes which may occur to prevent him releasing the ship at the expiration of the lay days." Had there been lay days in this case, that would have had a bearing on the question, whether the days on which the weather prevented lighters from crossing the bar were to be reckoned as lay days or not. The parties can by express agreement prevent any dispute as to this, as was done in Hudson v. Ede (2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 521; 3 Id. 114), though, as that case shows, they may, unless they are cautious, produce results which they did not anticipate. But, for whatever reason, the parties who framed the charter-party in this case, and in that in the case of Wright v. New Zealand Company (ante p. 118) did not choose to have lay days for the discharge of the vessel, and, consequently, it is left to the court to say what is the contract implied by law, not qualified in any way in the charter-party in Wright v. New Zealand Company, and in the present case only qualified, if at all, by the provision that the cargo is to be discharged with all dispatch, according to the custom of the port.

The strongest argument in favour of the appellant is, I think, this: "The merchant," says Lord Ellenborough, C.J. in Barker v. Hodgson (3 M. & S. 217) "is the adventurer who chalks out the voyage, and is to furnish, at all events, the subject-matter out of which the freight is to accrue." And on this principle it was held in that case, and has been held in several others, that there is an absolute contract on his part to furnish a cargo, and that he is bound to pay damages if it becomes impracticable to do so; though it would be otherwise if it became illegal to do so. The cases of Adams v. Royal Mail Steam Packet Company (5 C. B. N. 492) and Kearon v. Pearson (ubi sup.) proceed on this principle. The parties may, and often do, provide, by express qualification, that strikes, quarantine, or other impediments, shall excuse the merchant. And perhaps the same effect may be produced if it appear that the contract was framed with reference to any particular state of things: (Harris v. Dreesman, 23 L. J. Ex. 210.) I am not aware of any case contradicting the doctrine that, in the absence of something to qualify it, the undertaking of the merchant to furnish a cargo is absolute. And if the obtaining lighters or other customary appliances for the discharge of a ship on its arrival was, like the procuring a cargo for loading the ship, a matter which fell entirely on the merchant, so that he might choose his own mode of fulfilling it, I am not prepared to say that on the same principle he ought not to be held to undertake, without qualification, to provide those appliances. And this seems to be the basis of the judgments of Bramwell and Cotton, L.JJ., and, as it rather seems to me, of Thesiger, L.J. also, as then expressed (though he does not adhere now to that opinion) in Wright v. New Zealand Company, and of Cotton, L.J. in the case now at the bar. But I do not think that the undertaking to supply lighters or other appliances to assist in discharging the ship does fall within the same principle as the undertaking to supply a cargo. There is no case in which it has been held so to do; and, as far as I can find, there is nothing in any of the text books in support of the doctrine that it does; and, as it seems to me, what authority there is (I agree it is not very direct), is against the position. In Rodgers v. Forrester (2 Camp. 483) the charter-party expressly stated that "the said freighter should be allowed the usual and customary time to unload the ship or vessel at her port of discharge." The facts appearing to be that the cargo (wines) was of such a nature that it was usual and customary to unload in a bonded warehouse, and that the delay in this particular case was owing to an unusual crowd of shipping in the docks, Lord Ellenborough's ruling was that the usual and customary time was that which would be taken to discharge into a bonded warehouse in the then state of the docks. In Burmester v. Hodgson (2 Camp. 488), which came on before Mansfield, C.J. three days afterwards, the point was still more clearly raised. There was no charter-party, the question arising on a bill of lading; but as the defendants were consignees of the whole cargo of brandies, that did not, I think, make any difference. The bill of lading was silent as to the period of discharge. It appeared that the ship entered the docks and did not complete her discharge for sixty-three days. "It appeared," says the report, "to be the invariable practice to bond cargoes of this sort. Even when the cargo is bonded, if the docks are not overcrowded twenty or twenty-three days are a sufficient space of time for unloading." Mansfield, C.J. said: "Here the law would only raise an implied promise to do what was in Rodgers v. Forrester stipulated for by an express covenant, viz., to discharge the ship in the usual and customary time for unloading such a cargo. That has been rightly held to be the time within which such a cargo can be unloaded in her turn into the bonded warehouses. Such time has not been exceeded by the defendant. If the brandies were to be bonded they could not be unloaded sooner, and the defendant seems to have been as anxious to receive as the plaintiff was to deliver them." This was an express decision that the merchant was not responsible for the forty days' delay occasioned by the unusually crowded state of the docks. I cannot see on what principle the merchant can be responsible for the lighters being too few to unload the unusual number of ships, if he is not to be responsible for the dock being too small to unload the same unusual number. In Ford v. Cotesworth it was held that the contract implied by law was not, as Mansfield, C.J. held, a contract to discharge in the usual and customary time, but one that the merchant and shipowner should each use reasonable despatch in performing his part. But this does not in the least affect the point for which the ruling in Burmester v. Hodgson is in this case valuable—that in considering what is reasonable despatch under the circumstances, the number of ships there, though unusually large, is one of the circumstances to be taken into account. In Taylor v. Great Northern Railway (L. Rep. 1 C. P. 385) it was laid down that a "reasonable time" meant what was reasonable under the circumstances. Byles, J. there says: "My brother Hayes treats ordinary time and reasonable time as meaning the same thing; but I think reasonable time means a reasonable time looking at all the circumstances of the case. The delay in this case was an accident, as far as the defendants were concerned, entirely beyond their control, and therefore I think they are not liable." This is, I think, right and applicable to the present case. The only other case which it is necessary to notice is Ashcroft v. Crow Colliery Company (2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 397). There the regulations of the docks, which were known to both parties, were, amongst others, "No coal agent to be allowed to load more than two flats at the cranes at the same time, nor to have more than three vessels in the docks loading and to load at the cranes at one time." By the charter-party the vessel was to load in the docks: "To be loaded with the usual despatch of the port." The facts were that the defendants acted as their own coal agents, and had at the time thirteen ships which had priority over the plaintiffs'; and the ship was in consequence kept outside the dock for thirty days after she was at the disposal of the defendants before the dock company would admit her. The decision of the court was that the contract was to load with the usual despatch, and that this self-imposed liability on the part of the charterers to do so was no defence, even if the plaintiffs had known of it, which in fact they did not. I think this, which is probably right, has no bearing on the present case.

The result is, that I come to the conclusion that the ruling of Lord Coleridge was right, and that the appeal should be dismissed with costs. This is hard on the shipowner, who is in no default, and who probably never would have entered into a charter-party in these terms if he had thought he thereby incurred such a risk of delay. All that a court of law can do is to construe the contract as the parties have made it, so as to make it as clear as can be what the legal effect of such a contract is. The parties can, by altering the terms of their contracts in future, avoid any inconvenience that arises from that construction. It is no doubt not an easy thing to introduce a new form of contract into mercantile use, but it can be done.

Order appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed with costs.

THE OVARENSE; REG. AND LOGGIE v. CASACA AND OTHERS.

Slave trade—Seizure—Portuguese ship in British port—Reasonable cause of suspicion—5 Geo. 4, c. 113, ss. 4, 9—6 & 7 Vict. c. 53—36 & 37 Vict. c. 88, ss. 3, 4, 5, 17—39 & 40 Vict. c. 36, s. 267 —Treaties with Portugal of 1842, Arts. 1, 2, 9, 10; of 1871, Art. 3.

The treaty with Portugal concerning the slave trade relates to seizures on the high seas and not in port or territorial waters.

Evidence which may justify a seizure on the high seas is not sufficient when the vessel is in harbour and there is an opportunity of examining her papers.

Sect. 4 of the Slave Trade Act 1873 does not apply to Portuguese vessels seized in a British port.

The presence of the articles enumerated in the treaty, and the Slave Trade Act 1873, as primâ facie evidence of slave trading, do not prevent a seizor of a vessel in port being condemned in costs and damages, if with reasonable care he could have satisfied himself that the vessel's employment was lawful.

The Ricardo Schmidt (L. Rep. 1 P. C. 268; 4 Moore P. C. 121) approved.

THIS was an appeal from the decision of the judge of the Vice-Admiralty Court at Sierra Leone, by which on 9th Nov. 1877 he had decreed the restoration of the Portuguese brig Ovarense to her owners, and condemned the seizor, who was inspector-general of police in Sierra Leone, in costs and damages for the seizure and detention.

The appeal was only against that portion of the decree which condemned the appellant in costs and damages.

The Ovarense had been seized by the appellant whilst at anchor in the harbour at Freetown, Sierra Leone, on the 5th Dec. 1876, on the following grounds—(1) For having on board a large quantity of water, and an extraordinary number of vessels for holding water, more than necessary for the use of the crew, fourteen men all told, no certificate having been produced to him (the seizor) showing that security had been given that the empty casks were for lawful trade. (2) For having on board three krooboys said to be slaves. (3) Also more mats than were necessary for the use of the crew. (4) A large quantity of rice, seventy bags.

The evidence was taken before the registrar of the Vice-Admiralty Court on the 17th Feb. 1877, and on several subsequent days up to the 20th June 1877, and various documents were put in on behalf of the claimant to prove that the trade in which the Ovarense was engaged was a legitimate trade of carrying free emigrants from various places on the coast of Africa to the Portugese island of St. Thomas. These documents consisted of: (1) a royal passport, setting out the dimensions of the ship and the names of her owners, Fernando de Olivera Bello and Manoel Roderigues Formigal, which was dated the 9th June 1870, and viseéd at the various ports she had visited between that date and the 25th Sept. 1876, the last visé being given at St. Thomas, to proceed to Sierra Leone and Liberia, in the course of which voyage she was seized; (2) The ship's articles, dated Lisbon, 14th June 1876, for a voyage to St. Thomas for ten months, and to return to Lisbon; (3) a charter-party dated at St. Thomas, 23rd Sept. 1876, by which the Ovarense was chartered to Francisco Ferreira de Moraes, for the purpose of being used by him in the conveyance of passengers and labourers; (4) a license by the Governor of St. Thomas to charter Moraes to engage labourers as agents for passengers in St. Thomas, dated the 21st Sept. 1876; (5) A licence to the captain of the Ovarense to carry labourers in the ship to the number of 368, or, if certain alterations were made, 400, dated the 21st Sept. 1876; (6) the ship's manifest, containing a statement of the cargo on board, dated the 25th Sept. 1876; (7) the bill of lading of the said cargo, dated the 25th Sept. 1876; (8) (a) a letter from the Governor of St. Thomas to the Portuguese consul at Sierra Leone, stating the nature of the voyage in which the Ovarense was engaged, and requesting him to afford her every protection. Evidence was also given of the law in force at St. Thomas at the time to show that slavery was not in existence, and that the importation of slaves was forbidden, but that a system was in force for the legal introduction of free labourers from the coast of Africa, and also of "An Act authorising the appointment of shipping masters of the several ports of entry in Liberia." enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Republic of Liberia, to regulate the arrangements for the shipment of native African labourers, from the Republic to places beyond its limits, and also of certain contracts under which the three krooboys and other passengers were shipped on board the Ovarense.

On consideration of the verbal evidence and of those documents, and of the law on the subject, the learned judge of the Vice Admiralty came to the conclusion that the questions for his decision were: (1) Was Mr. Loggie duly authorised to visit, seize, and detain? (2) Had he reasonable grounds for suspicion? (3) Were any of the particulars mentioned in the schedule (to the Act of 1873) found on board or in the equipment? (4)

(a) Referred to in the judgment as (6).

Was the vessel fitted out for or engaged in the slave trade? (5) If not so fitted out or engaged, was there a "probable cause" for seizure or for proceeding to adjudication? (6) If so engaged or fitted out, had her owners a guilty knowledge thereof to justify condemnation of the vessel and of the goods; and had the charterer a guilty knowledge also to deprive him of the goods belonging to him?

As to (1), no question was raised, Mr. Loggie having a deputation or commission from the governor, as his deputy; and as to (6), there was no evidence to show a guilty knowledge—assuming the vessel to have been engaged in the slave trade—on the part of her owners, and therefore the vessel must be restored; as to (2), that Mr. Loggie had no "reasonable grounds of suspicion;" as to (3), that the particulars found on board mentioned in the schedule were accounted for; also (4), the vessel was engaged in the importation of free negroes; and as to (5), there was no "probable cause" for seizure or proceeding to adjudication, and therefore pronounced that the seizor had failed to support his libel, and that the claimants had established their plea, and that his decision must be according to the prayer in the plea—Restoration of the brig Ovarense, her tackle and apparel, and the goods and effects on board, and of the two surviving krooboys alleged to be slaves, with damages and expenses against the seizor, to be paid by him to the owners and also to the charterers of the vessel, with full costs of suit; and an interlocutory decree was drawn up to that effect on the 9th Nov. 1877.

From this decree an appeal was entered to the Privy Council on behalf of her Majesty the Queen and James Craig Loggie, to which appeal the captain and owners of the Ovarense, Manoel dos Santos Casaca, Manoel Roderigues Formigal, and Ferando de Olivera Bello, appeared as respondents. The charterers, Moraes, did not appear as a respondent.

The appellants' case asked for the decree to be set aside, so far as it awarded damages and costs against James Craig Loggie, for the following reasons:

(1) Because the brig was at the time of the seizure fitted out for purposes of and engaged in the slave trade within British jurisdiction.

(2) Because, even assuming that the brig was not in fact fitted out for the purposes of and engaged in the slave trade, the brig was a vessel on reasonable grounds suspected of being engaged in or fitted out for the slave trade, which it was, under the Slave Trade Act 1873, sect. 3, lawful for the seizor to visit, seize, and detain for adjudication.

(3) That under the whole circumstances of the case as appearing from the evidence, the seizor is by virtue of the slave Trade Act 1873, sect. 4, exempt from all claim for damages and costs in respect of the visitation, seizure, or detention of the brig or otherwise.

(4) Because the learned judge of the Vice-Admiralty Court has put a wrong construction on the Slave Trade Act 1873, sect. 4, and in consequence given a decree inconsistent with the provisions of that section.

(5) Because the decree is, in so far as it is appealed from, contrary to the weight of the evidence.

(6) Because it was the duty of the learned judge, under the Slave Trade Act 1873, sect. 17, and the Customs Laws Consolidation Act 1876, sect. 267, to certify that there was reasonable or probable cause for the seizure of the brig by the seizor.

The respondents' case claimed to have the appeal dismissed for the following reasons:

(1) Because it was proved that the Ovarense was an emigrant ship, duly licensed according to the regulations prescribed by the Government of Portugal.

(2) Because the Ovarense was not in fact engaged in the slave trade within British jurisdiction, and therefore there was no jurisdiction under the Slave Trade Acts to seize the Ovarense.

(3) Because the Ovarense was not a merchant vessel within the meaning of the 5th and 10th clauses of the first schedule to the Slave Trade Act 1873.

(4) Because the quantity of water other than that contained in the two tanks and nine casks entered in the manifest of the Ovarense, and the empty casks other than those above-mentioned, and those which had contained stores, were taken on board in the harbour of Freetown for lawful purposes, and it was not necessary that any certificate should be produced for the said casks until the said vessel cleared out from and was leaving the said port of Freetown.

(5) Because the said thirty-two mats were not more than sufficient for the use of the crew, and the seizor had no ground at the time of the seizure for supposing that they were more than sufficient.

(6) Because the case fell within the proviso to the 4th section of the Slave Trade Act 1873, and by virtue of that proviso the respondents were entitled to damages, expenses, and costs.

(7) Because, it was proved that the three kroomen on board the Ovarense were not slaves, and because the seizor at the time of the said seizure had no reasonable ground for believing them to be slaves.

(8) Because if the seizor, before seizing the said ship, had made due inquiry from the master of the said ship, he could and would have received information sufficient to account for the existence of the said three kroomen and the said rice, water, casks, and mats on board the said ship, and to have shown that the said kroomen and things were on board the said ship for lawful purposes, and that the said ship was not engaged in the slave trade.

(9) Because after the said seizure, and before the libel of the appellants was brought into the court below the appellant James Craig Loggie had or ought to have had from the claim of the respondents and the affidavits in support thereof, and from inquiries which he made or ought to have made thereon, full information as to the true character and employment of the said vessel.

(10) Because there was no reasonable ground and no probable cause for suspicion that the Ovarense was engaged in the slave trade, and it was in the power of the said James Loggie, and it was his duty by application to the governor or acting Portuguese consul at Sierra Leone, to have obtained all necessary information to have satisfied a reasonable mind that the Ovarense was not engaged in the slave trade.

(11) Because, even on the assumption, which is denied, that the original seizure was made under circumstances which entitled the captors to immunity from condemnation for damages and costs, there was no possible excuse for the subsequent proceedings of the captors, whereby the vessel was detained for more than eleven months from the date of the seizure on the 5th Dec. 1876, till her restoration under the decree of the 9th Nov. 1877, and on this ground alone the appellants are justly responsible for the damages and costs decreed against them.

(12) Because the said decree was and is right.

April 6.—The appeal came on for hearing. The enactments and treaties relied on on either side were as follows:

5 Geo. 4, c. 113, An Act to amend and consolidate the Laws relating to the Abolition of the Slave Trade 1824.

Sect. 4. And be it further enacted that (except such special cases or for such special purposes as are in and by this Act permitted) if any person shall fit out, man, navigate, equip, despatch, use, employ, let, or take to freight, or on hire, or contract for the fitting out, manning, navigating, equipping, despatching, using, employing, letting, or taking to freight or on hire any ship, vessel, or boat, in order to accomplish any of the objects or the contracts in relation to the objects, which objects and contracts have hereinbefore been declared unlawful, such ship, vessel, or boat, together with all her boats, guns, tackle, apparel and furniture, and together likewise with all property, goods, or effects found on board belonging to the owner or owners, part owner or part owners of any such ship, vessel, or boat, shall become forfeited to and shall be seized and prosecuted as hereinafter is mentioned and provided.

Dealing in Slaves on the High Seas, &c., to be deemed Piracy.

Sect. 9. And be it further enacted, that if any subject or subjects of His Majesty, or any person or persons residing or being within any of the dominions, forts, settlements, factories, or territories now or hereafter belonging to His Majesty, or being in His Majesty's occupation or possession, or under the government of the United Company of Merchants of England trading in the East Indies, shall except in such cases as are in and by this Act permitted after the 1st Jan. 1825, upon the high seas, or in any haven, river, creek, or place where the admiral has jurisdiction, knowingly and wilfully carry away, convey, or remove, or aid or assist in carrying away, conveying and removing any person or persons as a slave or slaves, or for the purpose of his, her, or their being imported or brought as a slave or slaves into any island, colony, country, territory, or place whatsoever, or for the purpose of his, her, or their being sold, transferred, used, or dealt with as a slave or slaves, or shall after the said 1st Jan. 1825, except in such cases as are in and by this Act permitted upon the high seas, or within the jurisdiction aforesaid, knowingly and wilfully ship, embark, receive, detain or confine, or assist in shipping, embarking, receiving, detaining, or confining on board any ship, vessel, or boat, any person or persons for the purpose of his, her, or their being carried away, conveyed, or removed as a slave or slaves, or for the purpose of his, her, or their being imported or brought as a slave or slaves into any island, colony, country, territory, or place whatsoever, or for the purpose of his, her, or their being sold, transferred, used, or dealt with as a slave or slaves, then and in every such case the person or persons so offending shall be deemed and adjudged guilty of piracy, felony, and robbery, and being convicted thereof shall suffer death without benefit of clergy, and loss of lands, goods, and chattels, as pirates, felons, and robbers upon the seas ought to suffer.

The Slave Trade Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 88).—Seizure of Slave Ships—Visitation and Seizure by Cruisers, &c., of suspected Slave Ships.

Sect. 3. Where a vessel is on reasonable ground suspected of being engaged in or fitted out for the slave trade, it shall, subject in the case either of the vessel of a foreign State or of the commander or officer of a cruiser of a foreign State to the limitations, restrictions, and regulations, if any, applicable thereto, contained in any existing slave trade treaty made with such State, be lawful:

(a) If the vessel is a British vessel or is engaged in the slave trade within British jurisdiction, or is not a vessel of a foreign State, for any commander or officer of any of Her Majesty's ships, for any officer bearing Her Majesty's commission in the army or navy, for any officer of Her Majesty's Customs in the United Kingdom, Channel Islands, or the Isle of Man, for the governor of a British possession, or any person authorised by any such governor, and for any commander or officer of any cruiser of a foreign State authorised in pursuance of any existing slave trade treaty; and

(b) If the vessel is the vessel of a foreign State, for any commander or officer of any of Her Majesty's ships when duly authorised in that behalf in pursuance of any treaty with that State, and for any commander or officer of any cruiser of that foreign State, to visit and seize and detain such vessel and to seize and detain any person found detained or reasonably suspected of having been detained as a slave for the purpose of the slave trade on board any such vessel, and to carry away such vessel and person together with the master and all persons, goods, and effects on board any such vessel for the purpose of bringing in such vessel, person, goods, and effects for adjudication.

All vessels, slaves, persons, goods and effects which may be forfeited under the enactments with which this Act is to be construed as one as hereinafter mentioned may be visited, seized, and detained by any commander, officer, governor, or person authorised by this section to seize a British vessel.

Vessels equipped for Traffic in Slaves to be deemed engaged in the Slave Trade.

Sect. 4. Where any of the particulars mentioned in the first schedule to this Act are found in the equipment or on board of any vessel, visited, seized, or detained in pursuance of this Act, such vessel shall, unless the contrary be proved, be deemed to be fitted out for the purposes of and engaged in the slave trade, and in such case, even though the vessel is restored, no damages shall be awarded against the seizor under this Act in respect of such visitation, seizure or detention, or otherwise upon such restoration.

Provided that this section shall not extend to the vessel of any foreign State except so far as may be consistent with the treaty made with such State.

Jurisdiction of Courts in regard to Slave vessels, Slaves' Goods and Effects.

Sect. 5. The High Court of Admiralty of England and every Vice-Admiralty Court in Her Majesty's dominions out of the United Kingdom, shall have jurisdiction to try and condemn or restore any vessel, slaves' goods and effects alleged to be seized, detained, or forfeited in pursuance of this Act, and on restoring the same to award such damages in respect of the visitation, seizure, and detention of such vessel, goods and effects, and of any person on board such vessel, and in respect of any act or thing done in relation to such visitation, seizure, or detention, or in respect of any such matters, and in any case to make such order as to costs as, subject to the provisions of this Act, and of any existing slave trade treaty, the court may think just.

Provided, that nothing in this section shall give to any court any jurisdiction inconsistent with any existing slave trade treaty over a vessel which is shown to such court to be the vessel of any foreign State, and which has not been engaged within British jurisdiction in the slave trade, but where any vessel of a foreign State is liable to be condemned by a British slave court, such court shall have the same jurisdiction as if she were a British vessel. Each of the said courts shall have the same jurisdiction in regard to any person who has been seized, either at sea or on land, on the ground that he has or is suspected to have been detained as a slave, for the purpose of the slave trade, as the court would have under this section if he had been so detained on board a vessel that was seized and brought in for adjudication.

Protection of Persons authorised to seize.

Sect. 17. All persons authorised to make seizures under this Act shall, in making and prosecuting any such seizure, have the benefit of all the protection granted to persons authorised to make seizures under any Act for the time being in force relating to Her Majesty's Customs in the United Kingdom, in like manner as if the enactments granting such protection were herein enacted and in terms made applicable thereto.

Sched. 1.—Equipments which are prima facie Evidence of a Vessel being engaged in the Slave Trade.

First. Hatches with open gratings instead of the close hatches which are usual in merchant vessels.

Secondly. Divisions or bulkheads in the hold or on deck more numerous than are necessary for vessels engaged in lawful trade.

Thirdly. Spare plank fitted for being laid down as a second or slave deck.

Fourthly. Shackles, bolts, or handcuffs.

Fifthly. A larger quantity of water in casks or in tanks than is requisite for the consumption of the crew of the vessel as a merchant vessel.

Sixthly. An extraordinary number of water casks or of other vessels for holding liquid, unless the master shall produce a certificate from the custom house at the place from which he cleared outwards, stating that a sufficient security had been given by the owners of such vessel that such extra quantity of casks or of other vessels should only be used for the reception of palm oil or for other purposes of lawful commerce.

Seventhly. A greater quantity of mess tubs or kids than requisite for the use of the crew of the vessel as a merchant vessel.

Eighthly. A boiler or other cooking apparatus of an unusual size and larger, or fitted for being or capable of being made larger than requisite for the use of the crew of the vessel as a merchant vessel, or more than one boiler or other cooking apparatus of the ordinary size.

Ninthly. An extraordinary quantity either of rice or of the flour of Brazil manioc or cassada, commonly called farina or maize, or of Indian corn, or of any other article of food whatever beyond what might probably be requisite for the use of the crew, such rice, flour, maize, Indian corn, or other article of food not being entered on the manifest as part of the cargo for trade.

Tenthly. A quantity of mats or matting larger than is necessary for the use of the crew of the vessel as a merchant vessel.

Eleventhly. Any other equipment, article, or thing which is declared by any existing slave trade treaty to be primâ facie evidence of a vessel being engaged in the slave trade.

The second schedule repeals certain previous enactments relating to the slave trade, and (inter alia) 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 60, and 5 Geo. 4, c. 113, except ss. 2, 11, part of s. 12, and ss. 39, 40, 47.

The Customs Consolidation Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 36). As to Claim by Owners of Goods seized.

Probable cause may be certified in bar.

Sect 267. When in any information or suit relating to any seizure, a verdict or judgment shall be found for the claimant, if it shall appear to the judge or justice before whom the same was heard, that there was reasonable or probable cause of seizure, and such judge or justice shall so certify on the record or information, such certificate may be pleaded in bar to any action, indictment, or other proceeding against the seizor; and in case any action, indictment, or other proceeding shall be brought to trial against any person on account of any seizure (whether any information be brought to trial for the condemnation of the same or not) and a verdict shall be given for the plaintiff, if the judge or justice before whom such action, indictment, information, or other proceeding shall be tried or heard, shall certify in the record, information, or other written proceeding, that there was reasonable or probable cause for seizure, the plaintiffs shall not be entitled to more than twopence damages, nor to any costs; nor shall the defendant be fined more than one shilling; and the production of such certificate, or a copy thereof, verified by the signature of the officer of the court, shall be sufficient evidence of such certificate.

The Treaty between England and Portugal, 3rd July 1842. Incorporated in an Act for carrying into effect the Treaty between Her Majesty and the Queen of Portugal for the Suppression of the Traffic in Slaves (6 & 7 Vict. c. 53).

Art. 9. Any vessel, British or Portuguese, which shall be visited by virtue of the present treaty, may lawfully be detained, and may be sent or brought before one of the mixed commissions established in pursuance of the provisions thereof, if any of the things hereinafter mentioned shall be found in her outfit or equipment, or shall be proved to have been on board during the voyage in which the vessel was proceeding when captured, namely:

Then follows a list of articles identical with those enumerated in the first ten paragraphs of the first schedule to the Slave Trade Act (ubi sup.), and concludes:

Any one or more of these several things, if proved to have been found on board, or to have been on board during the voyage on which the vessel was proceeding when captured, shall be considered as primâ facie evidence of the actual employment of the vessel in the transport of negroes or others for the purpose of consigning them to slavery, and the vessel shall thereupon be condemned, and shall be declared lawful prize, unless clear and incontestably satisfactory evidence on the part of the master or owners shall establish to the satisfaction of the court that such vessel was at the time of her detention or capture employed in some legal pursuit, and that such of the several things above enumerated as were found on board of her at the time of her detention, or had been on board of her on the voyage on which she was proceeding when captured, were needed for legal purposes on that particular voyage.

Art. 10. If any of the things specified in the preceding article shall be found in any vessel which is detained under the stipulations of this treaty, or shall be proved to have been on board the vessel during the voyage on which the vessel was proceeding when captured, no compensation for losses, damages, or expenses consequent upon the detention of such vessel shall in any case be granted either to her master or to her owner, or to any other person interested in her equipment or lading, even though the mixed commission should not pronounce any sentence of condemnation in consequence of her detention.

Convention between Great Britain and Portugal 1871, Additional to the Treaty of 1842.

Art. 3. It is agreed that in the case of a British vessel visited by a Portuguese cruiser being detained as having been engaged in the traffic in slaves, or as having been fitted out for the purposes thereof, she shall be sent for adjudication to the nearest or most accessible British colony, or shall be handed over to a British cruiser if one should be available in the neighbourhood of the capture; and that in the corresponding case of a Portuguese vessel visited by a British cruiser being detained as having been engaged in the traffic in slaves, or as having being fitted out for the purposes thereof, she shall be sent for adjudication to the nearest or most accessible Portuguese colony, or shall be handed over to a Portuguese cruiser, if one should be available in the neighbourhood of the capture. All the witnesses and proofs necessary to establish the guilt of the master, crew, or other persons found on board of any such vessels, shall be sent and handed over with the vessel itself, in order to be produced to the court before which such vessel or persons may be brought to trial. All negroes or others (necessary witnesses excepted) who may be on board a British or Portuguese vessel for the purpose of being consigned to slavery, shall be handed over to the nearest authority of the Government whose cruiser has made the capture. They shall be immediately set at liberty and shall remain free, the Government to whose authority they may be delivered guaranteeing them their liberty. With regard to such of these negroes and others as may be sent in with the detained vessels as necessary witnesses, the Government to which they have been delivered shall set them at liberty as soon as their testimony shall no longer be required, and shall guarantee their liberty. When a detained vessel is handed over to a cruiser of her own nation, an officer in charge, and other necessary witnesses and proofs shall accompany the vessel.

Sir J. Holker (Attorney-General) and Dicey for appellants.—This vessel was engaged in the slave trade, or there was at all events reasonable and probable cause to suppose that she was so. [Butt, Q.C. takes the objection that, as the restoration of the vessel was not appealed against, it was not competent to the appellants to contend that the vessel was engaged in the slave trade, and therefore ought to have been condemned. The Committee overruled the objection.] The law applicable to the case is in the unrepealed portion of 5 Geo. 4, c. 113, and the Slave Trade Act 1873 (36 and 37 Vict. c. 88), and in the terms of the Treaty with Portugal of 1842, and the subsequent Convention of 1871. If the articles mentioned in the schedule to the Slave Trade Act 1873 are found on board, that in itself justifies a seizure and sending in for adjudication (Art. 9; and 36 & 37 Vict. c. 88, ss. 3 & 4); and even if the ship is released no damages are to be given (Art. 10; and 36 & 37 Vict. c. 88, s. 4). That these articles were found there can be no doubt on the evidence; but besides this, the trade carried on by this vessel was virtually, if not actually, the slave trade; the accommodation was altogether insufficient for the number of persons proposed to be carried, and the payments made for the krooboys' services were made not to the krooboys themselves, but to their parents or alleged parents, or to the head men of the tribe, and therefore the krooboys were not free agents in the matter; and in any case the presence of the casks and other indicia of the employment of the vessel in the slave trade on board the Ovarense justifies the seizure, and should prevent the seizor being condemned in costs and damages:

The Winwick, 2 Moo. P. C. C. 19.

The reason why these indicia could not be held to justify such a seizure presumably was, because the Act at that time in force did not so speak of them except where the seizure was at sea; but that is no longer the case, and therefore the seizure was justified:

The Ricardo Schmidt, L. Rep. 1 P. C. 268.

This vessel being within British jurisdiction comes under the provisions of sects. 3 (a), 4, and 5 of the Slave Trade Act, 1873, and the provisions of the treaty with Portugal do not apply, since they only refer to the right of search and seizure on the high seas. No treaty is necessary to regulate the relations of this country with foreign ships when in our ports, but they are subject to such laws as we may choose to make; this principle is recognised in the preamble to the Territorial Waters Jurisdiction Act 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 73), and that Act was passed without any treaty being made with the States whose ships and subjects are affected by it. The judge who tried the case was, under the circumstances, bound to certify under the Slave Trade Act 1873, sect. 17 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 88), and the Customs Consolidation Act 1876, s. 267 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 36), and therefore the claimant can only recover nominal damages and no costs.

Butt, Q.C., E. C. Clarkson, and E. Law, for the respondents.—The vessel was properly restored with costs and damages; she was engaged in a perfectly legitimate trade, and her papers were of such a nature as to satisfy the officer who seized her of the fact, had he taken the proper precaution of seeing them before seizing the vessel. This vessel, being a Portuguese vessel, does not come under clause (a) of sect. 3 of the Slave Trade Act 1873, unless actually engaged in the slave trade at the time; as the seizure was not made by a naval officer, it was not made under clause (b) of sect. 3 of the Slave Trade Act 1873; she must therefore have been seized under the final clause of sect. 3, that is, under the provisions of the former Slave Trade Acts; but there is no limitation of liability on the ground of the seizure being reasonable in that clause. If the vessel is forfeit by reason of her being engaged in the slave trade, she may be seized, but this vessel is not engaged in the slave trade, and is therefore not forfeit, and therefore ought not to have been seized; the seizure in such a case is made at the peril of the seizor, and rightly, for it is possible for an officer when the ship is in port to examine the circumstances of suspicion with care, whereas a naval officer boarding a vessel at sea cannot be expected to see more than those indicia which under the schedule to the Act, and by the Treaty of 1841, will constitute "reasonable cause." This is further shown by the fact that, when a naval officer makes the seizure of a foreign ship, the vessel has to be sent for adjudication to the port of her own country under the provisions of the supplemental convention with Portugal of 1871, by which the mixed commissions to try slave cases were abolished, subject to which sect. 3 of the Slave Trade Act 1873 is to be construed. There is nothing in clause (a) about reasonable grounds, and those words cannot be read into the Act of Parliament. The seizure, therefore, is not made under the Act of 1873 at all, and therefore sect. 4 of that Act does not apply. But even assuming that it does apply to such a seizure as this, it does not apply to us, for here the "contrary is proved;" that is, we have proved that she was not engaged in or fitted out for the slave trade; and, moreover, the proviso takes a foreign vessel out of its operation as it is not consistent with the terms of the treaty by which the vessel was to be sent to the port of her own country for adjudication. Even if the presence of the articles enumerated in Schedule 1 to the Act of 1873 constitute under that Act reasonable ground for a seizure, they only do so in case of the seizure of a foreign ship, when the seizure is made in the course of a voyage, that is at sea, and by a naval officer (Art. 9 of Treaty of 1841). The difference is pointed out by the judgment of the court in the case of The Ricardo Schmidt (L. Rep. 1 P. C. 268), where Lord Westbury says (p. 280): "I need not point out . . . . that there was a great necessity for laying down clear and definite rules, as they are laid down in the statute 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 60, for the purpose of guiding captors at sea, for then the transaction is of necessity a hurried one, admitting of no very minute examination; and the Legislature, therefore, defines certain things in that statute which, if they are not plainly accounted for, shall constitute an amount of probabilis causa sufficient to exempt the captor from consequences even if the vessel be not condemned. But when you come to the case of a ship lying at anchor in a British harbour, and having been there for some time, not manifesting the smallest indication of anxiety to quit the harbour . . . . the obligation on a seizor to justify what he has done is a very strict obligation, and one that cannot be discharged by a reference to circumstances which per se have not an overpowering weight on the mind at the time when the seizure was made." If the Act of 1873 goes further than 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 60, for seizure when a vessel is in harbour (in making the presence of the articles in Schedule 1 a reasonable ground), it can only do so with reference to British vessels, as with reference to foreign vessels it is subject to the treaties, and the treaty with Portugal only allows the presence of these articles to be reasonable ground of seizure when found at sea, and as the sections of the Act are of a highly penal character they must be interpreted strictly. Besides, many of the articles mentioned in the schedule are such as would render an ordinary passenger steamer liable to seizure if their presence is in any case to be reasonable ground for such seizure. Such a vessel certainly carries more water than needed for her crew and has open hatches. The schedule only applies, in fact, to a vessel professing to carry cargo, not to one whose business was shown by her papers to be the carriage of emigrants. But even if the seizure in the first instance was justified, the subsequent detention was not; the seizor might have found out all about the ship immediately, and the nature of the trade she was engaged in, and did in fact become aware of it very shortly after seizing, and yet he detained the vessel for months awaiting the decision of the Vice-Admiralty Court, and the damages have been caused by that detention for which there can be no excuse. The section of the Customs Consolidation Act does not apply, as it refers to seizures for alleged breach of customs regulations in the United Kingdom, and not to slave seizures in colonial ports.

Dicey in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 6.—The judgment of the court was delivered by

SIR ROBERT PHILLIMORE.—This is an appeal from so much of a decree of the learned judge of the Vice-Admiralty Court of Sierra Leone as awarded damages, expenses, and costs to the respondents against the appellants. The decree was made in a cause brought by the appellants against the Portuguese vessel called the Ovarense, of which the respondent Manoel dos Santos Casaca was master, and the respondents Manoel Roderigues Formigal and Fernando de Olivera Bello, of Lisbon, merchants, were the sole owners, and against her tackle, apparel, and furniture, and the goods, wares, merchandise, and moneys on board the same, and against three alleged male slaves, Grando, Panik, and Yoroba, seized by James Craig Loggie, as liable to forfeiture under the provisions of the statutes 5 Geo. 4, c. 113, and 36 & 37 Vict. c. 88 (the Slave Trade Act 1873).

The Ovarense was seized by James Craig Loggie on the 5th Dec. 1876, whilst lying at anchor in the harbour and port of Freetown in Sierra Leone. Mr. Loggie was duly authorised by the Governor of Sierra Leone, to seize, detain, and arrest all vessels which should or might be liable to be forfeited for any offence committed against the provisions of the said Acts of Parliament.

The Appellants proceeded by libel, and alleged that the brig Ovarense being in the harbour of Freetown, in British waters, was engaged in and fitted out for the slave trade, having on board three slaves and a larger quantity of water than was requisite for the consumption of the crew of the brig as a merchant vessel, and an extraordinary number of empty casks for which no certificate was produced that security had been given that these casks were for lawful traffic, and also seventy-three bags of rice and thirty-two mats; such rice and mats being as alleged more than necessary for the use of the crew; and that the brig had shackles concealed on board on her arrival, which were afterwards removed; that Manoel dos Santos Casaca and Francisco Ferreira de Moraes were not engaged in emigration according to law, but were engaged in the slave trade; that the aforesaid three slaves were carried away by Francisco Ferreira de Moraes, from Cape Palmas, to be dealt with as slaves; and they prayed that the said ship and slaves should be forfeited, and Manoel dos Santos Casaca condemned in costs.

In reply the Respondents filed their plea alleging that the said brig was not engaged in or fitted out for the slave trade, but was an emigrant vessel, duly licensed as such, and that the three persons on board were not slaves, but free immigrants, destined for the Portuguese island of St. Thomas where slavery did not exist; that the rice was in the brig's manifest; that the thirty-two mats were old mats which had been left in the said brig from the last voyage, having been used to line the said brig when laden with coffee, as is usual; that of the water two tanks and nine puncheons were in the manifest, and the remainder had been taken on board in the harbour of Freetown after the arrival of the said brig; that of the empty casks some had contained stores, and the remainder had been taken on board in the said harbour of Freetown after the arrival of the said brig, and that therefore the certificate mentioned in the libel was not required by law until the said brig cleared out of the said harbour; and that there never were any shackles on board; and the plea prayed that the suit should be dismissed, and the brig, tackle and goods, and the three alleged slaves should be restored, and the seizor condemned in costs, losses, damages, demurrage, and expenses.

It may be as well to dispose at once of a point which was raised on the argument, that the judge had not certified under the Customs Consolidation Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 36), s. 267, that there was reasonable cause for the seizure of the brig. Their Lordships are clearly of opinion that the provisions of the Act in question do not in any way affect the present case.

A great many witnesses were examined both on behalf of the seizor and of the claimant. The evidence was generally of an unsatisfactory kind and resulted in a great conflict of testimony. But, after taking some time to consider the written depositions and documentary evidence, the learned judge of the Vice-Admiralty Court, on the 9th Nov. 1877, pronounced judgment in favour of the respondents (the then claimants) and "decreed the said brig, goods, wares, merchandise, and two of the said three boys, Grando and Yoroba, called slaves, surviving at the time of the passing of the said sentence to be restored to the claimant on behalf of himself and of Manoel Roderigues Formigal and Fernando de Olivera Bello for the brig, her tackle, apparel and furniture, and on behalf of the said Francisco Ferreira de Moraes for the goods, wares, merchandise, and moneys, and for two of the said three boys, called slaves, Grando and Yoroba, surviving at the time of the passing of the said sentence, and condemned the said seizor in costs and damages."

From this condemnation in costs and damages, though not from the release of the ship herself, the seizor has appealed. In arguing the case before the court, his council have maintained that there was evidence which would have justified the condemnation of the ship, though, in the absence of proof of the guilty knowledge of the owners, such a condemnation, according to the law laid down upon the subject could not be enforced. They have, nevertheless, used the evidence which, as it was alleged, ought to have enured to the condemnation of the ship, in support of his (the seizor's) claim to be relieved from that part of the sentence which condemned him in costs and damages.

There are two questions of mixed law and fact which their Lordships are called upon to decide. In order to arrive at this decision it becomes necessary to consider and construe some of the statutes relating to the slave trade, and the treaty as to this subject between England and Portugal; and first with regard to the statutes.

The learned judge of the court below rightly observed that "before the passing of the Act (36 & 37 Vict. c. 88), the statute 5 Geo. 4, c. 113, was the law by which we were to be guided in cases of slave-dealing within British waters and jurisdiction, and under that law, and in accordance with decisions pronounced in cases coming under it, the captors were bound to prove, in order to condemn the vessel, not only that she was actually engaged in the slave trade, or fitted out for the purposes of the slave trade, but that the owners of the ship were cognisant of the fact or had a guilty knowledge thereof, and also that the owners of the cargo on board had a guilty knowledge of the fact, to justify a forfeiture of their goods, but that if there was probable cause for the seizure—that is, if from all the surrounding circumstances there was, to a reasonable mind, a fair and reasonable suspicion that the vessel was engaged in or fitting out for the purpose of the slave trade, then—although the vessel were restored, no damages could be awarded against the seizor."

The next statute which has to be considered is the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 53, which came into operation in Aug. 1843. That statute carried into effect a treaty between England and Portugal for the suppression of the traffic in slaves, which had been concluded the 3rd July 1842. The first and second articles of the treaty which is set forth in the schedule to the Act, are as follows: "(1.) The two high contracting parties mutually declare to each other that the infamous and piratical practice of transporting the natives of Africa by sea for the purpose of consigning them to slavery is, and shall for ever continue to be, a strictly prohibited and highly penal crime in every part of their respective dominions, and for all the subjects of their respective Crowns. (2.) The two high contracting parties mutually consent that those ships of their royal navies respectively which shall be provided with special instructions, as hereinafter mentioned, may visit and search such vessels of the two nations as may upon reasonable grounds be suspected of being engaged in transporting negroes for the purpose of consigning them to slavery, or of having been fitted out for that purpose, or of having been so employed during the voyage in which they are met by the said cruisers; and the said high contracting parties also consent that such cruisers may detain and send and carry away such vessels in order that they may be brought to trial in the manner hereinafter agreed upon; and in order to fix the reciprocal right of search in such a manner as shall be adapted to the attainment of the objects of this treaty, and shall at the same time prevent doubts, disputes, and complaints, it is agreed that the said right of search shall be exercised in the manner and according to the rules following. Certain articles are then described, which, if found on board of or in the equipment of any vessel visited in pursuance of the treaty, are declared to be primâ facie evidence that the vessel was actually engaged in the slave trade, and by Article 10 it is declared that "If any of the things specified in the preceding article shall be found in any vessel which is detained under the stipulations of this treaty, or shall be proved to be on board the vessel during the voyage on which the vessel was proceeding when captured, no compensation for losses, damages, or expenses consequent upon the detention of such vessel shall, in any case, be granted either to her master, or to her owner, or to any other person interested in her equipment or lading, even though the mixed commission should not pronounce any sentence of condemnation in consequence of her detention." Among these articles are mentioned, shackles, bolts, or handcuffs, an extraordinary number of empty casks, an extraordinary quantity of rice and mats. These are the articles specified in the libel.

They are also mentioned in the first schedule of 36 & 37 Vict. c. 88, as amongst the equipments which are primâ facie evidence of a vessel being engaged in the slave trade. This statute, entitled, "An Act for consolidating with amendments the Acts for carrying into effect treaties for the more effectual suppression of the slave trade, and for other purposes connected with the slave trade," was passed on the 5th Aug. 1873. It is a statute which is by no means perspicuously worded, and which has not as yet undergone any judicial construction. The 3rd section enacts that "where a vessel is on reasonable grounds suspected of being engaged in or fitted out for the slave trade, it shall," subject to certain restrictions, "be lawful" for certain authorised persons, among whom is, as in this case, the governor of a British possession, "to visit, and seize, and detain such vessel, and to seize and detain any person found detained, or reasonably suspected of having been detained, as a slave, for the purpose of the slave trade, on board any such vessel, &c.

The first and principal question is, whether the Ovarense was seized on reasonable grounds of suspicion of her being engaged in the slave trade. What were the facts relating to this vessel at the time when she was seized? The first and not the least important fact is, that she was seized in harbour and not upon the open seas; and here it may be well to cite the language of Lord Westbury delivering the judgment of the Privy Council in a similar case (The Ricardo Schimdt, 4 Moore's P. C. 136: L. Rep. 1 P. C. 268). The law at that time stood, it is true, under 5 Geo. 4. c. 113; but the reasoning is not inapplicable to the present case. "We have, therefore," his Lordship says, "no circumstances here to which any particular weight or force is to be given by law, as under 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 60, would be the case, but we have a case, to be judged of under all the circumstances, whether any person going on board a ship lying in the harbour of Sierra Leone and examining her—going over her—could, from the mere circumstance of the number of water casks, be warranted in arriving at the conclusion that this ship was intended to be engaged in the slave trade. I need not point out, what was very well commented upon by one of the counsel for the appellant, that there may be great necessity for laying down clear and definite rules, as they are laid down in the statute 5 & 6 Will. c. 60, for the purpose of guiding captors at sea, for there the transaction is of necessity a hurried one, admitting of no very minute examination; and the Legislature, therefore defines certain things in that statute, which, if they are not plainly accounted for, shall constitute an amount of probabilis causa sufficient to exempt the captor from consequences, even if the vessel be not condemned. But, when you come to the case of a ship quietly lying at anchor in a British harbour, and, having been there for some time, not manifesting the smallest indication of anxiety to quit the harbour, but actually and plainly engaged in bonâ fide trade within the harbour, the obligation on a seizor to justify what he has done is a very strict obligation, and one that cannot be discharged by a reference to circumstances which per se have not an overpowering weight on the mind at the time when the seizure was made." The Ovarense arrived in the port of Freetown without any apparent circumstance of guilt attaching to her conduct; she remained there quietly, there was no restraint as to persons leaving or coming on board her, she seemed to have been in no hurry to get away. It certainly was, on the face of it, a strange thing to select a British port for the visit of a slave-trading vessel, in order, among other things, to take in an excessive quantity of water, and, as alleged, with some slaves actually on board. The general defence on the part of the owners of the Ovarense is, that she was equipped with the object of facilitating the immigration of free labourers from the West coast of Africa into the Portuguese island of St. Thomas, and it must be borne in mind that many of the articles are ancipitis usus—that is, are equally necessary for the carrying on of the guilty slave trade and for the purpose of innocent immigration. Slavery, even in the modified form established by a decree having the force of law of the 25th Feb. 1869, had been abolished in St. Thomas by a law passed on the 29th April 1875, to come into operation a year after publication. An immigration ship would, of course, require a greater number of empty casks and a greater quantity of water than would be necessary for the crew, and the presence of some shackles on board would be no necessary indication of slave-trading. It appears that the Ovarense, a brig of 309 tons, was chartered in Sept. 1876, by one De Moraes, for the purpose of taking immigrants to St. Thomas, and, on the 26th Dec., cleared out for the port of Liberia and Sierra Leone—(the Governor of St. Thomas gave the captain a letter, addressed to the Portuguese consul at Sierra Leone, informing him that the Ovarense was licensed to carry 368 freemen, or 400 men, if a small half-deck could be added)—to take water at Sierra Leone for that number. She sailed from St. Thomas, with a list of passengers signed by the proper Portuguese authority. On the 2nd Dec. 1876 she arrived in the harbour of Freetown, Sierra Leone; she had taken in six kroomen at Cape Palmas, three of whom were alleged to be slaves. On the 4th Dec. the captain entered his vessel at the customs, and left with the acting Portuguese consul the ship's papers. Early on the 5th Dec. Mr. Loggie came on board the Ovarense. He paid three visits to the vessel on that day, and at the last visit seized the vessel, and brought the three kroomen on shore. The Portuguese consul swears that he received all the ship's papers soon after the arrival of the vessel in harbour. His evidence is as follows: "The captain came to me first on the 3rd Dec. in the morning. I never went on board the Ovarense. I heard on the 5th Dec. she had been seized. On hearing this I went to the Custom House, and from thence to the governor. I saw the collector before I went to the governor. I went alone to the governor officially as consul for Portugal; it was Governor Kortright. I saw him. I had some official conversation with the governor as to the Ovarense. I had seen the governor officially before this on the 30th Nov. and the 3rd Dec. 1876 respecting the Ovarense. After this I left his Excellency. On the 6th Dec. I wrote a letter to his Excellency on the subject of the Ovarense, and to that letter I received an answer. On the same day I wrote a second letter to his Excellency, to which I received no answer. Loggie came to me about the Ovarense first on the 7th or 8th Dec., but I am not certain on which day. He came alone. He applied to me for the papers of the Ovarense. He said he had come to the Portuguese consul, not to his friend Becaise, and wished to have the papers of the Ovarense shown to him. I told him I could not show them because he brought no authority. I told him the best thing he could do would be to apply to the governor, and on the governor saying he (Loggie) might see the papers, I would hand the papers to the governor. Nothing more passed, and Loggie went away. I never told Loggie, on that or any other occasion, "that there was no certificate as aforesaid from the Custom House at the place from which the said master cleared outwards, stating that a sufficient or any security had been given by the owners of such vessel that such extra quantity of casks and other vessels for holding liquid should only be used for the reception of palm oil, or for other purposes of lawful commerce." I never told him a word about this. I had no conversation with him about a certificate. Loggie came to me again about the Ovarense; this was about four or five days after the seizure, but I can't recollect the exact day. On this occasion he asked me to give him the ship's papers, because his proctor wanted to see them; and that he (Loggie) would give a receipt for them. This is what he told me at first. I refused to give the papers. Loggie then said that Mr. Lewis, his proctor, would give the receipt, and that I need not be afraid. I told him I was very sorry, but that all the papers he required were in the governor's hands; that I had handed them to the governor, and that even if I had them I could not hand them either to himself or his proctor. Loggie did not come to me again about the Ovarense. I am sure he never came to me before the 7th Dec. to ask any information about the Ovarense. I might have seen Loggie on the 3rd Dec., but not to speak to. I did not see him on the 4th Dec., and I had no conversation with him before the 7th Dec."

The papers lodged at the Consulate as before mentioned and produced in evidence were:—1. A royal passport dated Lisbon the 9th June 1870, with twenty-two visés thereon, showing a trading of the Ovarense between the ports of Lisbon and Rio de Janeiro, Pernambuco, Bahia, and the Portuguese island of St. Thomé, the last visé being St. Thomé the 25th Sept. 1876, for a voyage to the ports of Liberia and Sierra Leone. 2. The brig's articles. 3. The charter-party between the owners and Moraes, to take labourers to St. Thomas from the ports of Liberia and Sierra Leone, Moraes, the charterer, binding himself to furnish water casks and water, to make a half-deck for an additional number of labourers to make up 400, the Ovarense being computed to carry without such additional half-deck 368 persons; also to provide a person to take charge of these free labourers, and a doctor and medicine, and to pay monthly to the owners, as freight, one conto of reis equal to 222*l.* 4*s.* 6*d.* 4, 5. The licences to Moraes and the captain to import free labourers into St. Thomas already referred to. 6. The letter from the Governor of St. Thomas to the Portuguese consul, also already referred to.

If Mr. Loggie, before resorting to the serious step of seizing the ship, had taken the ordinary precaution of consulting the ship's papers and communicating with reference to them with the consul and the captain, he could not have failed to see that she was licensed to import free labourers, which would account for the articles found in her, and that he would not be justified simply from the fact that such articles were on board her in seizing this foreign vessel "as being engaged in or fitted out for the slave trade within British jurisdiction." With regard to the allegation that the brig herself was constructed and furnished or fitted out to carry slaves, the ship's papers and the charter-party would have shown, and there seems to be no reasonable ground for disbelieving them, that she was chartered and intended to carry immigrants, and was not engaged in the slave trade. And even if the original seizure could be justified, the subsequent detention of the vessel was wholly inexcusable. Much stress was laid upon the presence on board the vessel of the three Kroomen alleged to be slaves, and the information concerning them which had been given to the seizor, as constituting reasonable grounds for the suspicion that she was a slaver. Their Lordships are of opinion that the appeal cannot be maintained on this ground. They have already observed that the seizor had the means, which he neglected, of informing himself of the true character of the vessel, and of the true condition of those Kroomen. Had he done so, and had even all the evidence which was afterwards given on his part touching those Kroomen been present to his mind (which it was not), all that he could reasonably have inferred was, that the men in question had been, in some sort, kidnapped on board, with the object of carrying them to St. Thomas (an island where slavery had ceased to exist) as free labourers imported under the immigration law then prevailing; but such an inference or belief would not have justified the seizure or detention of the vessel under the treaty or the Slave Trade Act 1873, such supposed kidnapping, however reprehensible, being for a purpose other than that "of consigning the men to slavery." It may be that the immigration law of St. Thomas may not be sufficiently stringent, or that its provisions may not be duly observed; but defects in the law, or breaches of its provisions by Portuguese subjects, however deplorable, though they might be properly made the subject of diplomatic remonstrance to the Portuguese Government, are not grounds for seizing a vessel under the Portuguese flag as a slaver within the meaning of the treaty and the statute. In saying this their Lordships are assuming that on this part of the case the evidence given for the seizor was more credible than that opposed to it. That, however, was not the conclusion of the judge below, and their Lordships are not prepared to say that he was wrong. The evidence taken altogether certainly affords grounds for the conclusion that the story of the kidnapping was a malicious fiction got up by one of the other kroomen who had been charged by Moraes with theft and put under confinement.

There remains for consideration the 4th section of the 36 & 37 Vict. c. 88. That section is as follows: "Where any of the particulars mentioned in the first schedule to this Act are found in the equipment or on board any vessel visited, seized, or detained in pursuance of this Act, such vessel shall, unless the contrary be proved, be deemed to be fitted out for the purposes of and engaged in the slave trade, and in such case, even though the vessel is restored, no damages shall be awarded against the seizor under this Act in respect of such visitation, seizure, or detention, or otherwise upon such restoration." Much argument was addressed to their Lordships as to the effect and meaning of the terms contained in the section, and the case for the appellants was mainly, though by no means entirely, rested upon it, it being contended that the words "no damages shall be awarded" contained an enactment of positive law, which, whether harsh or not, left no option to the court upon the matter, unless, indeed, the proviso at the close of the section rendered the enactment inapplicable to this foreign vessel. The words of that proviso have been most carefully considered by their Lordships. They are as follows: "Provided, that this section shall not extend to the vessel of any foreign State, except so far as may be consistent with the treaty made with such State." This provision contains a plain proposition of international law, with respect to the general effect of the law of one foreign State upon the vessel of another. It has been contended, however, that Portugal has, by treaty with England, consented that the particular articles mentioned in the first schedule of this Statute, when found on board a Portuguese vessel in port, shall be considered as primâ facie evidence of her being engaged in the slave trade. But, upon a careful examination of the Portuguese treaties, their Lordships are of opinion that the consent on the part of Portugal relates only to vessels upon the high seas, and does not extend to vessels in a foreign port or foreign territorial waters. All the provisions in the treaties point to this conclusion. The visitation is to be conducted by a naval officer whose rank is carefully specified; and with a view, formerly, of bringing in the vessel for adjudication before a court of mixed commission, and now, of sending her to the nearest or most accessible Portuguese colony, or handing her over to a Portuguese cruiser, if one be available in the neighbourhood of the capture. Their Lordships are of opinion, therefore, that this 4th section cannot be extended to a Portuguese vessel lying in British waters, inasmuch as it is not consistent with the treaty made with that State.

Upon the whole, it appears to their Lordships that the learned judge of the court below came to a right conclusion, both as to the facts and the law applicable to them, and they will humbly advise Her Majesty that the appeal be dismissed with costs.

COURT OF APPEAL.

SITTINGS AT LINCOLN'S INN.

Reported by J. P. Aspinall and F. W. Raikes, Esqs., Barristers-at-Law.

Tuesday, April 20, 1880.

(Before James, Baggallay, and Bramwell, L.JJ.)

APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (ADMIRALTY.)

County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), ss. 25 and 26—Appeal from Court of Passage of Liverpool exercising Admiralty jurisdiction—Security for costs.

The appeal from the Court of Passage at Liverpool exercising Admiralty jurisdiction is under the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), s. 26, and security for costs must be given before the instrument of appeal is lodged.

This was an appeal against an order made upon summons by the learned judge of the Admiralty Division of the High Court, dismissing with costs an appeal from the Court of Passage of the borough of Liverpool, on the ground that security had not been given for the costs of the appeal, as required by the 25th and 26th sections of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71).

The original action was brought for wages by James Hagerty and three others against the steamship Ganges and the owners thereof, on the Admiralty side of the Court of Passage of the borough of Liverpool, and judgment was given in it on the 8th March 1879, in favour of the defendants, the owners of the Ganges.

On the 18th March 1879 the plaintiffs lodged an instrument or notice of appeal in the Admiralty Registry of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division of the High Court of Justice against the above-named judgment.

The respondents, the owners of the Ganges, appeared under protest, and on the 22nd April 1879 took out a summons calling upon the appellants to show cause why the said appeal should not be dismissed with costs, the appeal being bad in law by reason of security for costs of the appeal not having been given pursuant to sect. 26 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71). It was a fact that no security for costs had been given.

On the 26th April 1879 the summons was heard by the registrar, who referred the matter to the judge, who on the 6th May 1879 dismissed the appeal with costs, with leave to appeal to the Court of Appeal, the appellants to be at liberty to appeal again from the Court of Passage on giving security for costs within ten days, and to elect which course they would pursue within ten days. The appellants adopted the former course, and on the 17th May 1880 gave notice that they would appeal to the Court of Appeal against the order of the learned judge of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division, dismissing the appeal from the Court of Passage.

The appeal came on for hearing on the 20th April 1880.

The words of the 25th and 26th sections of the County Court Admiralty Jurisdiction Act (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), on which the argument principally turned, are as follows:

25. The Court of Passage of the borough of Liverpool shall, upon an Order in Council being made, which shall appoint the County Court of Lancashire holden at Liverpool to have Admiralty jurisdiction, have the like jurisdiction, powers, and authorities as by that order are conferred on the said County Court; but nothing herein shall be deemed to enlarge the area over which the jurisdiction of the Court of Passage extends, or to alter the rules and regulations for holding the said court, or to take away or restrict any jurisdiction, power, or authority already vested in that court; and fees received in that court under this Act, shall be dealt with as fees received in that court under its ordinary jurisdiction.

26. An appeal may be made to the High Court of Admiralty of England from a final decree or order of a County Court in an Admiralty cause, and by permission of the judge of the County Court from any interlocutory decree or order therein, on security for costs being first given, and subject to such other provisions as general orders shall direct.

Dr. W. Phillimore for the appellants.—Although the Court of Passage has by sect 25 the like jurisdiction, powers, and authorities as were bestowed on the County Court of Lancashire holden at Liverpool, by the Order in Council conferring Admiralty jurisdiction on that court, yet there is nothing in either the 25th or 26th sections to show that it was intended that a different method of procedure was to be adopted by the Court of Passage exercising Admiralty jurisdiction from that adopted by it in other matters under the provisions of the special Act relating to the Court of Passage (the Court of Passage Procedure Act 1853). In fact, the following section, which regulates appeals from County Courts, is studiously silent as to appeals from the Court of Passage, although it cannot for a moment be contended that the Court of Passage was out of the mind of the framer of the section, seeing that the whole of the previous section relates to it alone. The 26th section speaks only of a County Court in an Admiralty cause, and neither mentions the Court of Passage nor "any court having a like jurisdiction as a County Court," and the logical meaning of the 26th section cannot possibly be extended to include the Court of Passage. An exactly analogous case is that of Harper v. Pole (L. Rep. 3 Eq. 752), in which Stuart, V.C. decided that, although the County Courts Equitable Jurisdiction Act (28 & 29 Vict. c. 99) gave the Sheriff's Court of the City of London a like jurisdiction to that given to the County Courts, yet there was no appeal from the judge of the Sheriff's Court to the Vice-Chancellor. Further, the words "on security for costs being first given," on which this case turns, only apply to appeals from interlocutory decrees in the case of County Courts, and not to appeals from final decrees. There is no provision again that the security shall be given before the instrument of appeal is lodged. It is quite sufficient if the security is given before the hearing comes on, and The Forest Queen (L. Rep. 3 Adm. 299; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O.S. 508), which was relied upon by the appellants in the court below, does not contradict this.

J. P. Aspinall, for the respondents, was not called upon.

James, L. J.—I do not think that there can be any doubt as to the interpretation of the sections of the County Court Admiralty Jurisdiction Act now before us. The 25th section enacts that, on an Order in Council being made appointing the County Court of Lancashire holden at Liverpool to have Admiralty jurisdiction, the Court of Passage shall have the like jurisdiction, powers, and authorities as are conferred by that order on the said County Court. Now no one has disputed that such an order was made, and the Court of Passage now has the like jurisdiction with the County Court at Liverpool in Admiralty causes. But it has been contended that, whilst it has the jurisdiction, there is no provision in the Act for appeals from its decisions to the Admiralty Division of the High Court, and that such appeals can only be had under the provisions of the Act relating to the Court of Passage, and Harper v. Pole (L. Rep. 3 Eq. 752) has been cited in support of the contention. But it seems to me that the intention of the Act clearly is that appeals in Admiralty causes in the Court of Passage should be heard in the same manner as appeals in similar causes in the County Courts. Then it was contended that, if there was such an appeal, sect. 26 only requires security for costs to be given in appeals from interlocutory orders, but that construction of the words of the section does not accord with their plain meaning, which applies equally to appeals from final decrees. Then it is contended that under the words of the section security may be given at any time before the hearing of the appeal; in other words, that the word "appeal," in the 26th and 27th sections, means the hearing of the appeal and not the lodging of the instrument of appeal. Now I am of opinion that an appeal is commenced when the party takes the first step in the appeal, whether by lodging his instrument of appeal or by giving notice to the other side, as he may be required by the practice of the courts in which he is proceeding, and that such commencement of the appeal is what is meant by the word "appeal" in these sections. Hence security for costs must be given before the appeal is commenced, and I cannot attach any weight to the last contention of the learned counsel. The case he cited, that of The Forest Queen (3 Mar. Law Cas. 508; L. Rep. 3 Adm. 299), is against his contention. There I find the learned judge saying that "the words of the section rendered it imperative that security for costs should be given in the court below to found the jurisdiction of the High Court of Admiralty;" and I quite agree with the learned judge, and I do not see how any instrument of appeal can be allowed to be lodged before the jurisdiction of the court appealed to is founded. I think then that the order of the learned judge of the court below must be confirmed, and this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

The Milanese.

APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (ADMIRALTY).

Damage—Collision—Fog—Duty of vessel when near a fog bank—Both to blame—Costs.

It is the duty of a vessel, when in the vicinity of a fog bank, to make the signals prescribed by Art. 10 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, to warn vessels within it of her presence.

When at night a masthead light is seen, but no side lights, it is an indication to an approaching vessel that the lights are those of a steamer whose side lights are obscured by fog.

Where the Court of Appeal varies the decision of the court below by finding both vessels to blame for a collision, there will be no order as to the costs, but each party must bear his own costs of the whole litigation.

Circumstances under which the Court of Appeal will overrule the decision of the court below on a question of fact considered and explained.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division, by which the judge of the High Court of Admiralty had found the steamship Milanese alone to blame for a collision which took place between her and the sailing ship Bokhara off Folkestone about 6 p.m. on the 10th Nov. 1879.

The action was tried on the 14th, 15th, and 16th Jan. 1880.

Butt, Q.C., Clarkson, and Stokes for the plaintiffs, owners of the Bokhara.

Webster, Q.C., Dr. W. G. F. Phillimore, and Stewart for the defendants, owners of the Milanese,

The argument of counsel was principally directed to the state of the weather at the time of the collision, and as to the efficiency of the look-out in both ships.

The circumstances of the case, and the evidence adduced in respect of the weather, sufficiently appear from the judgment which was delivered by Sir Robert Phillimore, after consultation with the Trinity Masters and consideration.

Jan. 22.—Sir R. Phillimore.—In this case the vessels that came into collision were the Bokhara, a ship of 1143 tons, on a voyage from Antwerp to New York with a cargo of iron rails, and a steamship, the Milanese, on a voyage from Boston to London with a cargo of cattle. The place of collision was about five miles off Folkestone. The stem of the Milanese struck the starboard side of the Bokhara in the after part of the forerigging and she sank, but her crew were saved on board the Milanese. The ship complains that the steamer did not get out of the way and ported improperly. The steamer complains that the ship was going at too great a rate of speed, and that she did not sound her foghorn. The course of the ship was W.S.W.; her speed was five knots, and she was going down Channel. The steamer's course was S.E., the usual course up Channel, and she was going at a speed of between three and four knots an hour. The wind was N.W.

In this case there are certain admitted or proved facts which it is useful to bear in mind. The Bokhara tacked about 4.30 p.m.; she afterwards kept her course; she carried proper lights; it was sunset at 4.17 p.m.; the collision happened as nearly as possible at 6 o'clock p.m. on the 10th Nov. 1879.

The Bokhara did not blow her fog horn; the night was one of unusual darkness, in that respect not bad for seeing lights; but the main contention is as to the amount and character of the special fog or mist apart from the general darkness. The evidence as to the fog is derived from lighthouses, from those on board each vessel, and from independent testimony.

It may be as well to dispose in limine of this question as to the lighthouses. We have carefully considered the lighthouse logs, and the evidence which they afford with respect to the distances of the lighthouses from the place of collision is as follows: South Sand light vessel distant eleven miles; South Foreland lights eight miles; Dover pier five and a half miles; Folkestone pier four and a half miles; Dungeness point eighteen miles; Varne light vessel five and a half miles. Then as to the weather described in the lighthouse logs. According to the log of the South Foreland high light, at six o'clock it was "overcast, misty, drizzling rain;" according to the South Foreland low light, at six o'clock it was "cloudy and misty;" according to the Dungeness light, at six o'clock it was "overcast, misty, drizzling;" according to the Varne light, at six o'clock it was "overcast, misty," and there is an entry which means "visibility of distant objects;" according to the South Sand Head lightship, "at 3.30 came on thick fog, sounded the horn, sunset," which was 4.17; "thick fog, sounded the horn, 5.45 fog cleared, discontinued the horn, 6 blue sky, cloudy misty." There is no doubt that during the course of the day and in the afternoon the weather had been foggy in the upper part of the Channel. It had shown itself in what one of the witnesses called "lumps," and another "patches."

The question is, what was the state of the weather a short time before six o'clock and at six o'clock in the place and in the immediate neighbourhood of the collision? The entries in the logs tend, though they are not conclusive on the point taken by themselves to disprove the existence of any such fog or mist as would require the sounding of a foghorn at or near the time and place of the collision.

The course of the ship was W.S.W. close-hauled on the starboard tack, on which she put herself when near the South Sand Head lightship, with a speed of five knots going down Channel, and when about four or five miles off and abreast of Folkestone the master, pilot, and look-out were on deck. The master says that at this time the look-out reported a bright light two or three miles off, and two points on the starboard bow. The look-out about two minutes after reported, "I can see her green light, she is a steamer." And he, the master, then walked to windward and shortly afterwards saw the red light about three-quarters of a mile off. The ship continued her course without any change. The steamer struck the ship on her starboard side a little abaft the fore-channel, about right angles, she cut four or five feet into her, causing her to sink within about five minutes afterwards, and the time of this collision it is admitted was about six o'clock. The master of the ship denies that there was any fog at this time, and also denies having heard any whistle before the collision.

It has been contended that the master has sworn falsely as to the report from the look-out; that a man named Frederiksen was on the look-out, and that he had made no such report. It appears that Bath, the chief mate, had taken the place of Frederiksen for a short time and made the report in question. I think that, according to the evidence in my notes, he reported the green light as well as the bright light, but at all events the master appears to have noticed all the lights. The pilot, Wieman, saw the bright light three or four miles off, and a minute or two afterwards heard the green light reported, and thought the steamer would pass starboard side to starboard side; he then saw her shut out her green light and show her red light, being distant then about three-quarters of a mile off. He said also that he could see all the lights on shore, which appeared to be an exaggerated statement. It is not unimportant to observe that the crew of the ship were employed in furling the mainsail shortly before the collision. Frederiksen, the look-out, who had been relieved by the mate, had been sent aft to assist in clewing up the sail; he heard the mate report the bright light. He resumed his look-out after the sail had been clewed up, and the mate had returned to the poop before the collision occurred: he never saw any other than the white light before the collision. Knudsen, the second mate, confirms generally this evidence. Jorgensen, who was on deck, says that he heard the mate report a light on the starboard bow, that he was employed in furling sail, and heard no other report. He says, "There was no fog at all. Clear weather, but much dark." Tonnsen, who was at the wheel, heard the report, "Light forward on the starboard bow," twelve or fourteen minutes before the collision. He was ordered to put the helm hard up, but there was no time to do so. He says there was no haze after 4.30. The master of the tug Victoria, Reader, says it was the darkest night he ever experienced. It is unnecessary to go through the evidence of the other witnesses, who confirm generally the evidence as to the state of the atmosphere being such as not to require the sounding of the fog-horn; but one witness, Hansen deserves notice. He was a Norwegian and pilot of the Metcalfe, which was bound down Channel in company with the Bokhara, and was about half a mile to leeward of her at about six o'clock, when he saw several bright lights, and the Bokhara's light. He also heard a steam whistle and the barking of a dog, which is proved to have been on board the Bokhara; he says there was no fog, but a little haze; he saw the Varne light at six o'clock, about six miles off, and the light on the Grisnez. I must here mention that Heywood, the master of the tug Peabody, a witness called on the part of the steamer, both in his evidence before the court and in a statement made to the opposite side, speaks of seeing an unusual cluster of lights S.S.E. of him at a mile and a half distance, and to his being surprised, as he thought fishermen could not be out on such a night. Williams, a witness also produced on the part of the steamer, and the mate of the Peabody, says that he saw a cluster of lights "all of a heap;" they were on the starboard beam, about a mile distant, and he thought it remarkable; and speaking of the state of the weather, he said it had been foggy in the daytime in patches, but he did not call it fog then, but misty or thickish haze.

This fact of the cluster of lights becomes important because it is in evidence that directly after the collision lights were hung over the bows of the steamer to assist the men in escaping from the sinking ship, and, as has been stated, the collision took place about six o'clock.

I now turn to the case of the defendants. Dewdney, the master of the steamer took a pilot about 4.30 p.m. off Dungeness. He went on at full speed at eight knots and a half an hour. At 4.30 it was hazy, but he kept full speed till 5.30, when he went half speed till a quarter to six, then he slowed. The weather became much thicker, and the pilot said he would go no further, and that he must bring her head round to tide and anchor. For that purpose the helm was put hard a-port, and orders given to prepare the anchor. This he says was about ten or twelve minutes before the collision. That brought her head S.E., at which time the green light of the Bokhara was seen eighty or ninety yards off, and the collision took place in less than a minute. He says he blew the whistle at twenty minutes to six, and at frequent intervals he heard the whistles of other steamers. At 6.20 the wind became more northerly, and it was "very, very clear." Walker, the pilot, confirmed in every material particular this statement. The same observation applies to Hambly, the mate. With regard to Mowatt, who was the only look-out on the upper deck, he says at four o'clock it was hazy, and as it got dark the weather thickened with fog or smoke; that their whistle was blown, and that he heard other whistles, and at 5.30 it lightened up, but shut down afterwards very thick; that he reported a green light on the port bow, judging it to be a hundred yards off; that he did not wait for an answer, but called out "Ship standing across our bows." In cross-eximanation this witness said that he had seen a white light on his starboard bow, and also a red light on his port bow, and that he reported them; these must have been seen before the Bokhara's lights were seen. It is to be observed that neither the master nor pilot have mentioned the circumstances of these lights. M'Gregor, the engineer, said that he received an order to go slow at 5.35, and to stop and go astern full speed at six. Conway, who was at the helm from four to six, said that he got an order to hard a-port when the light of the Bokhara was reported. Gibbs, the boatswain, who was getting the anchor ready, said there was a thick mist which he called "a Scotch mist," that he heard no other whistle but that of his own ship, and that only once or twice. Benjamin also says that he heard their own whistle, but no others. There are various independent witnesses who speak to the state of the weather, and who all agree that the weather was thicker in shore than it was in the offing. Camburn, a pilot in charge of the Fanny, refused to swear that it did not clear up at a quarter to six, having previously said that it cleared up about six, and that he had no recollection of having sounded his horn that evening. With respect to the other witnesses who were called, it is not necessary to specify their evidence in detail; they relate principally to the state of the weather, and show that the fog was of a partial character.

Upon the whole, a careful analysis of the evidence leads us to the conclusion that for a short time before the collision and at the collision the weather, though misty, was not so foggy as to prevent the lights of the Bokhara being seen by those on board the Milanese, and that if they were not so seen it was in consequence of the deficiency of the look-out on board the Milanese.

We are further of opinion, and indeed it is a necessary consequence, that the atmosphere was not such as to necessitate and render imperative the sounding of a foghorn by those on board the Bokhara, and we do not think that in the circumstances the speed at which the Bokhara was going about five knots, was excessive or unjustifiable.

I pronounce the Milanese alone to blame for this collision.

With regard to the plea of compulsory pilotage, as I have decided that there was a deficient look-out on board the Milanese, the pilot had not the assistance which he had a right to expect and receive, and therefore, according to the principles of decided cases, the plea of compulsory pilotage cannot prevail.

From this judgment the owners of the Milanese appealed, and the appeal came on for hearing on the 19th July, and was heard on that and the following day.

Webster, Q.C. and Dr. W. G. F. Phillimore for appellants.—The judgment of the court below is wrong, because there was under the circumstances conclusive evidence of a want of proper look-out on board the Bokhara; either the weather was clear as they say, in which case they ought to have seen our side lights; or it was foggy, as we say, in which case they ought to have blown their foghorn; the fact that they saw our masthead light and the general condition of the weather ought to have apprised them of the fact that our side lights were shrouded in fog. They were also guilty of negligence in carrying too much sail and going too fast, having regard to the weather. There was no negligence on the part of the Milanese; she was, notwithstanding the nature of her cargo and the importance of getting it into harbour as soon as possible proceeding with the utmost circumspection, and was going dead slow, and just about to anchor on account of the fog, and blowing her steam whistle to warn vessels of her presence; her look-out was proper, but it was not possible to see the Bokhara on account of the fog; the fact that the Bokhara could not see our side lights shows that a person on our deck, and therefore in the fog which shrouded them, could not see her.

Butt, Q.C. and Stokes (with them Clarkson) for the respondents.—There is a conflict of testimony as to the condition of the weather, but the preponderance of the evidence both from the shore and from independent persons on other ships is that there was no fog at the time of the collision: we had seen the lights of the Milanese nearly a quarter of an hour before the collision, and there was no such state of the weather as to require us to blow a foghorn. The Milanese may have come through a fog bank, and whilst in it thought of anchoring, but the manœuvre which she performed for the purpose of coming out from the shore for the purpose of anchoring brought her out of the fog bank; this manœuvre corresponds with the way in which we saw the lights. [James, L.J.—We cannot say that the fog was so thick that the Milanese was not in fault for not seeing you sooner, but the question remains whether you were not also in fault.] There is only the evidence of one vessel signalling for fog, and that shows that there was no fog where we and the other vessels from whom witnesses have been called were. [Brett, L.J.—If the weather was not foggy, why did you shorten sail by furling your mainsail, and why did the Milanese propose to anchor?] Our furling the mainsail was a measure of ordinary prudence. On such an evening, no doubt, the weather was misty, and might become foggy during the night.

Webster, Q.C., in reply.

James, L.J.—The issue between the parties in the case is admitted on both sides to be purely one of fact. The learned judge of the court below decided that issue entirely in favour of the Bokhara and against the Milanese. This court has frequently expressed its opinion that when the decision of the court below of a question of fact depends on the credibility to be attached to the statements of witnesses, it will not disturb the finding, the court below having the opportunity of observing the demeanour of those witnesses which this court has not. But it has been well pointed out in this case by the counsel for the appellants, that the decision here did not rest or depend on the demeanour of witnesses, but was determined by inferences drawn from facts which have been stated, though with exaggerations, by both sides. There can be no doubt that the Milanese was manœuvring to come to an anchor on account of the fog, and so far the Milanese has made out a fair case, if the fog was so dense that she could not see the Bokhara. But it appears to us, and in that opinion the assessors coincide, that it was possible for the Milanese to have seen the Bokhara an appreciable, if not even a considerable time. We are satisfied that the cloud or fog in which the Bokhara was was not so dense as to altogether hide her, for she must have been sailing very close to the edge of the bank of fog. The Bokhara must have known that other vessels in it would be hidden from her. The Bokhara, moreover, admits that she did see a white light, and I do not believe she at any time saw the red or green light of the Milanese. That should have indicated to her the presence of a fog bank or something of the sort hanging low down in the water, and she ought to have used a foghorn to indicate her position to vessels in it, and from whose sight her side lights would be obscured by it. I therefore am of opinion that both vessels are to blame for this collision.

Brett, L.J.—I agree in the opinion that we should not overrule the decision of the court below on a question of fact, unless we find something clearly proved in the case which enables us to see that in the decision in which we cannot agree. In this case there are two governing facts: (1) that the Milanese was about to anchor on account of the fog; (2) the Bokhara was shortening sail. I cannot believe that the Bokhara saw everything which it is stated she did see; had she done so, it is not credible that she would have acted as she did. On these two points being proved, it is clear what the decision should be. There is a conflict of testimony as to the weather from other ships in the neighbourhood. But the fact remains that the steamer, for the purpose of anchoring, was about to throw herself across the navigable channel; therefore she should have taken more than ordinary precaution, and it does not appear that she did so; had she had a careful look-out she would have seen the Bokhara sooner. But the sailing ship had also under the circumstances a duty to perform. She must have known that there was a fog in front of her, from seeing the white light of a steamer over it without seeing the side lights, and that she did know it is proved by her shortening sail. She must have known therefore that her side lights were not visible to vessels in it, and it was therefore her duty to apprise them of her presence by blowing a foghorn, even if she was not herself actually in the fog, though in my opinion she had actually entered the fog at the time the collision took place.

Cotton, L.J.—I agree in the opinion that both of these vessels are to blame for the collision. As we differ from the court below, I think it right to add that I do not give entire credit to either set of witnesses. In all these cases witnesses do not come into court intending to speak untruthfully; but involuntarily they give a colour to circumstances in favour of their own side, and especially they make a confusion as to the precise time at which events occur. There is no doubt that at the time of the collision there was a fog on shore, but beyond a certain distance from the shore there was very little, from the evidence of vessels in the neighbourhood. It appears certain that the Milanese must have been in it, and that the collision took place at or just within the edge of the fog. The Milanese was in fault for not seeing the Bokhara sooner. But, I do not believe that the witnesses for the Bokhara are correct in stating that they could see the coloured lights of the Milanese at the time at which they state that they did see coloured lights, but that those they saw were on another occasion. I therefore think she was also to blame for not adopting the usual precautions in a fog.

In answer to an application as to the disposition of the costs.

James, L.J.—We are of opinion that wherever we vary the decision of the court below by finding both vessels to blame, the rule should be that no order is made as to costs either below or on appeal; that is, that each party should bear their own costs of the whole litigation.

The Sir Robert Peel.

PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY APPEAL (ADMIRALTY).

Practice—Evidence—Experts—Nautical assessors.

Where the court is assisted by nautical assessors evidence of experts on questions of nautical science and skill may properly be rejected.

Semble, where an objection is taken to the exclusion of evidence by the judge of the Admiralty Court, the proper course is to apply to the Court of Appeal for a new trial on that ground, and not to tender the evidence afresh in the Court of Appeal.

This was an appeal from a judgment of Sir Robert

Phillimore, by which, on the 5th March 1880, he had found the Sir Robert Peel alone to blame for a collision which took place in the river Thames on the afternoon of the 17th Nov. 1877, between that vessel and the Canada.

The Canada was a screw steamer of 4276 tons register, and the Sir Robert Peel a screw steamer of 209 tons register. Both vessels were going down Woolwich Reach, and the collision occurred by the port bow of the Sir Robert Peel and the starboard quarter of the Canada coming into contact. The damage actually done by the collision was very small, but afterwards the Canada ran into vessels lying in the tiers, and into the Woolwich steamboat pier, doing very considerable damage. At the hearing in the court below the defendants tendered evidence of experts in the river navigation to show that there was a certain draught or suction between a large and small vessel, but the Court ruled the evidence to be inadmissible on the ground that it was an invasion of the province of the Trinity Masters assisting the court.

The judgment of the court below, after discussing the evidence, continued:—This collision, it appears to us, must have been caused either by the starboarding of the Sir Robert Peel or by the porting of the Canada. Looking to all the evidence we are of opinion that the Canada did not port her helm, and that the Sir Robert Peel did starboard. We are of opinion, in the circumstances, especially having regard to the clear state of the river, that the Canada was not going at reckless speed, and that the Sir Robert Peel is alone to blame for the collision.

July 20.—The appeal came on for argument.

Dr. W. J. F. Phillimore (Benjamin, Q.C. with him) for the appellants.—The evidence of experts was improperly rejected by the learned judge below; he finds, as a matter of fact, that we starboarded and so caused the collision. The evidence, if admitted, would have shown that the apparent starboarding, i.e, the canting of our head to port, was occasioned by the suction from the stern of the Canada. [Brett, L.J.—If such a suction is a known fact, you ought to have ported to counteract it and so keep your course.] Our duty is to keep our course, and that we do by making no alteration. [Brett, L.J.—You cannot now raise the question before us in this way. You appear to have submitted to the ruling of the judge, and not to have taken any formal objection.] We have given notice of our intention to call further evidence, and it is in the discretion of the court to receive it or not: (Order LVIII., r. 5.) [Brett, L.J.—But that applies to evidence which for some reason was not or could not be tendered below. Where evidence has been rejected without proper cause, the proper course would be to apply to us for a new trial: (Order XXXIX., r. 1 (Dec. 1876, r. 5) 1 a (March 1879, r. 4) 3.] This is not the usual case of the rejection of evidence; it could not be said that the evidence tendered was immaterial, but only that, owing to the peculiar constitution of the Court of Admiralty in trying these questions, it was inadmissible. No doubt the practice of the Trinity Masters is to inform the court on questions of nautical skill; but this is a question rather of physical science on which the Trinity Masters themselves should be informed before they can bring their minds to discuss the nautical skill necessary under the circumstances. [James, L.J.—It was not tendered as scientific evidence in the court below.] That the evidence is admissible in the Admiralty Court is shown by The Ann and Mary (2 W. Rob. 189), where Dr. Lushington says: "The opinions of . . . men of science on points of science generally when a clear statement of the whole of the facts has been laid before them, is admissible evidence in this as well as other courts;" though in that case, the question being purely nautical, he did not allow the evidence to be given, on the ground that it would only incumber the proceedings. He then proceeded to argue the case on the merits.

Butt, Q.C. and Clarkson, for the respondents, were not called on.

James, L.J.—This is an appeal from the decision of the Admiralty Court on a question of fact purely, and the court will not depart from the rule it has laid down that it will not overrule the decision of the court below on a question of fact in which the judge has had the advantage of seeing the witnesses and observing their demeanour, unless they find some governing fact which in relation to others has created a wrong impression, and there is no such governing fact in this case. As to the alleged improper rejection of evidence, the evidence tendered was that of alleged experts on a matter of nautical skill. It is very important to adhere to the rule laid down by Dr. Lushington in the case of The Ann and Mary (2 W. Rob. 187), (a) where he says: "It would be most inconvenient and injurious to the ends of justice if, in cases where the court always has the benefit of, and derives the greatest assistance from, the opinions on nautical points of the Trinity Masters, the proceedings were allowed to be incumbered by any evidence by way of opinion on such points."

Brett, L.J.—The practice of the Court of Admiralty with respect to evidence on points of nautical science is different from that of other courts. In other courts questions of nautical skill and science as to the management and movement of ships may be proved by the evidence of experts. But that is not the way in which the Court of Admiralty is instructed in such matters. It has other means of instruction through the presence of nautical assessors. If the judge of that court were sitting by himself without the assistance of assessors, the case might be different; but when he is assisted by assessors he is instructed by them on such matters. The assessors are not part of the tribunal, it is true, but the judge acts on their opinion and advice with regard to technical questions of nautical skill. The evidence therefore tendered in this case was properly rejected. I wish, however, to limit my observations

(a) On this subject Dr. Lushington says in The Gazelle (2 Notes of Cases, 41), at a time when the evidence in the Admiralty Court was taken by affidavit: If it was intended . . . . to say that, with regard to matters of nautical practice and experience, you are to be guided by the affidavits in the case, I utterly deny the applicability of that argument. You are to decide this question with reference to your own knowledge of the science and experience you possess, and I hope it will never be contended that your judgment is to be influenced by affidavits from other nautical persons, swearing that, in their opinion, this or that was proper to be done. Sure I am that it would lead to the greatest confusion and uncertainty rather than to any satisfactory determination."

as to the evidence of experts to questions concerning the management of the manœuvres of ships. The Court of Admiralty would of course rightly receive evidence of experts on other subjects, such, for example, as the loading of ships, a matter not strictly within the provision of the nautical assessors. I concur with the judgment of James, L.J. on the merits of the case.

COTTON, L.J.—I concur; the presence of nautical assessors is intended to dispense with nautical evidence as to the management of ships.

BURNS v. NOWELL.

Pacific Islanders Protection Acts 1872 and 1875—Carrying native labourers by sea without a licence—Seizure of vessel—Voyage commenced before Act passed—Reasonable grounds of suspicion—Protection afforded to persons acting in pursuance of Act—35 & 36 Vict. c. 19, ss. 3, 6, 9, 16, 18, 19, 20—38 & 39 Vict. c. 51.

The defendant, an officer in command of one of Her Majesty's ships, bonâ fide believing that there was reasonable cause for suspecting that an offence under the Pacific Islanders Protection Act had been committed, seized and detained the plaintiff's vessel, as carrying native labourers on board without a licence. At the time of her seizure the plaintiff's vessel was not employed in the commission of any offence within the intent and meaning of the statute, she having taken the labourers on board before the Act making a licence necessary was passed.

Held, upon the construction of the Pacific Islanders Protection Acts 1872 and 1875, that the plaintiff could not recover damages from the defendant, it being the defendant's duty to do as he did.

THIS was an action brought to recover damages for the seizure and detention of the plaintiff's schooner Aurora by the defendant, a lieutenant in the navy. The Aurora started from Sydney in the year 1871, under the command of Capt. Bennett, on a trading and fishing expedition among the South Sea Islands. At Simbo, in the Solomon Islands, and at some other places in the same group, Capt. Bennett shipped certain natives, who were employed during the voyage, partly in working the vessel and partly on shore in trading, and partly in fishing and diving. These natives did not sign articles, but they were shipped with their own consent, and Capt. Bennett agreed to take them back at the end of their service to the islands from which they had embarked. Whilst the Aurora was absent on this voyage, the Kidnapping Act 1872 (a) (35 & 36 Vict. c. 19) was passed, and was proclaimed and came into force in the Australian colonies. Capt. Bennett did not hear of the Act until August 1873, when he was told of its having come into force by the captain of a vessel which he met with on his return voyage. The Aurora then proceeded on her return voyage, and when off Simbo she fell in with the Sandfly, which was commanded by the defendant, who, finding the natives who had been shipped at Simbo still on board, seized the Aurora and her cargo, on the ground that she was engaged in the commission of an offence against the Kidnapping Act. The Aurora was taken into Cleveland Bay, which is in the jurisdiction of the Brisbane Court of Queensland, and part of the cargo was transshipped and taken to Sydney. Proceedings were instituted in the Vice-Admiralty Court of Sydney, but the suit was dismissed on the ground that the court had not jurisdiction.

At the trial, Lord Coleridge, C.J., ruled that the only question for the jury was, whether at the time of the seizure and detention the defendant had reasonable grounds for suspecting that the Aurora was employed in contravention of either the 3rd or 9th sections of the 35 & 36 Vict. c. 19. The jury answered this question in the affirmative, and a verdict was directed to be entered for the defendant. Subsequently, the Queen's Bench Division granted a rule nisi for a new trial, on the ground of misdirection, and of the verdict being against the weight of evidence; but, after argument, the rule was discharged.

The plaintiff now appealed.

By 35 & 36 Vict. c. 19, s. 3:

It shall not be lawful for any British vessel to carry native labourers of the said islands, not being part of the crew of such vessel, unless the master thereof shall, with one sufficient surety to be approved by the governor of one of the said Australian colonies, or by a British consular officer appointed by Her Majesty to reside in any of the said islands, or by any person appointed by either of those officers, have entered into a joint and several bond in the sum of five hundred pounds, to Her Majesty, her heirs and successors, in the form contained in Schedule (A.) to this Act annexed, or in such other form as shall be prescribed by the Legislature of any of the Australian colonies in respect of vessels sailing from the ports of such colony, nor unless he shall receive a licence in the form contained in schedule (B.) to this Act annexed from any such governor or British consular officer.

Schedule (B.):

Licence for the carriage by sea of native labourers.—A.B., master of the vessel more particularly described below, having duly given to Her Majesty Queen Victoria the bond required by the Kidnapping Act 1872, for the prevention of kidnapping and the due observance of the requirements of the said Act, I do hereby, in exercise of the authority for that purpose conferred on me by the said Act, license the said vessel to carry not more than native labourers from to . Should this vessel be found to answer the subjoined description, and appear to be strictly engaged in the lawful pursuit of the above-mentioned object, it is the direction of Her Majesty's Government that she shall not be obstructed in the prosecution of her present voyage, nor in the shipment or loading of her native passengers. This licence shall not be transferable, and shall be available only for the voyage from to aforesaid, and for a period not exceeding days from the date hereof. Description of the vessel above referred to. Signature of the governor or consul, as the case may be. To the respective flag officers, captains, and commanding officers of Her Majesty's ships, and to all others whom it may concern.

By sect. 6:

All the provisions of this Act with respect to the detention, seizure, bringing in for adjudication before any Vice-Admiralty Court, trial, condemnation, or restoration of vessels suspected of being employed in the commission of any of the offences enumerated in the 9th section of this Act shall, mutatis mutandis, apply to any British vessel which shall be found carrying such native labourers without a licence or in contravention of the terms of any licence which may have been granted to the master thereof.

(a) By 38 & 39 Vict. c. 51, the title of this Act is changed to "The Pacific Islanders Protection Act 1872."

By sect. 9:

If a British subject commits any of the following offences, that is to say:—1. Decoys a native of any of the aforesaid islands for the purpose of importing or removing such native into any island or place other than that in which he was at the time of the commission of such offence; or carries away, confines, or detains any such native for the purpose aforesaid, without his consent, proof of which consent shall lie on the party accused. 2. Ships, embarks, receives, detains, or confines, or assists in shipping, embarking, receiving, detaining, or confining, for the purpose aforesaid, a native of any of the aforesaid islands, on board any vessel either on the high seas or elsewhere, without the consent of such native, proof of which consent shall lie on the party accused . . . he shall for each offence be guilty of felony, and shall be liable to be tried and punished for such felony in any Supreme Court of Justice in any of the Australian colonies, &c.

By sect. 16:

Any British vessel which shall upon reasonable grounds be suspected of being employed in the commission of any of the above offences may be detained, seized, and brought in for adjudication upon the charge of being or having been so employed or fitted out as aforesaid, before any Vice-Admiralty Court in any of Her Majesty's dominions by any of the following officers; that is to say: . . . . (3) Any commissioned officer on full pay in the naval service of the Crown, subject nevertheless to any special or general instructions from the Admiralty or his superior officer.

By sect. 18:

The Vice-Admiralty Court before which any vessel is so brought for adjudication shall have full power and authority to take cognisance of and try the charge upon which such vessel is brought in, and may on proof thereof condemn the vessel and cargo, or either, as the case may be, as forfeited to Her Majesty, or may order such vessel and cargo, or either of them, to be restored with or without costs and damages, as to the court shall seem fit; and in any such proceedings the said court shall have such powers to issue commissions for the examination of witnesses, and to give directions in respect thereof, as are herein-before vested in the Supreme Courts of the Australasian colonies; and the said court shall, in addition to any power given to it by this Act, have in respect of any vessel or other matter brought before it in pursuance of this Act, all powers which it has in the case of a vessel or matter brought before it in the exercise of its ordinary jurisdiction.

By sect. 19:

When any detention or seizure shall be made under this Act, and proceedings instituted in any Vice-Admiralty Court in respect of such detention or seizure, it shall be lawful for the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, if to their discretion it shall seem meet, to direct payment to be made of the whole or any part of the costs, damages, and expenses which may be incurred in such proceedings.

By sect. 20:

Subject to the provisions of this Act providing for the award of damages in certain cases in respect of the seizure or detention of a vessel by the Vice-Admiralty Court, no damages shall be payable, and no officer or local authority shall be responsible, either civilly or criminally, in respect of the seizure or detention of any vessel in pursuance of this Act.

The Pacific Islanders Protection Act 1875 (38 & 30 Vict. c. 51) authorises the granting of a licence for the employment of natives at sea, and, in schedule B. gives the form of the licence:

A. B., master of the vessel more particularly described below, having shown to my satisfaction that he is engaged in a fishery, industry, or occupation in connection with such vessel, and having given the bond to Her Majesty required by the Pacific Islanders Protection Acts 1872 and 1875, I do hereby, in exercise of the authority for that purpose conferred on me by the said Acts, license the said vessel to employ in the said fishery not more than native labourers from the day of to the day of

The remainder of the licence is the same as that for the carriage by sea of native labourers, with the exception that "employment" is inserted between "shipment, or."

Wills, Q.C. and Edwyn Jones, for the plaintiff.—At the time the natives were taken on board in Jan. 1872, the Kidnapping Act had not been passed. At that time, therefore, it would have been impossible for the master to have obtained a licence to carry them in accordance with sect. 3. These natives were taken on board as part of the ship's crew; at all events, it was a question for the jury whether they were so or not. The defendant, to bring himself within the protection of the Act, must have bonâ fide believed in the existence of such a state of things, as, if it had existed, would have justified the seizure. That was not the case here. [Bramwell, L.J.—Sect. 20 provides that no damages shall be recovered, and no officer shall be responsible in respect of the seizure or detention of any vessel in pursuance of the Act. That must apply to a case where there was not a reasonable cause, but where the officer acted bonâ fide.] They cited

Cur. adv. vult.

March 16.—The judgment of the court (Bramwell, Baggallay, and Thesiger, L.JJ.) was delivered by Baggallay, L.J.—It is not, in our opinion, necessary for the decision of this appeal to determine whether the schooner Aurora was, at the time of her seizure by the defendant, employed in the commission of any of the acts which are made offences by the Kidnapping Act 1872; for it appears to us that, even upon the assumption that no such offence had been committed, the defendant cannot be held responsible to the plaintiff in respect of the seizure and detention of the vessel, and that this appeal must consequently be dismissed. We will presently express our opinion upon the question, whether any such offence had in fact been committed, as we deem it only fair to the plaintiff, as the owner of the Aurora, and to Capt. Bennett, her master, that we should do so; but we propose, in the first place, to consider the nature and extent of the protection afforded by the Act to those commanding officers of Her Majesty's ships, who, in the discharge of their duties, seize and detain vessels suspected of being employed in the commission of such offences.

Sect. 16 of the Act authorises any commissioned naval officer on full pay to detain, seize, and bring in for adjudication before a Vice-Admiralty Court any British vessel, which shall upon reasonable grounds be suspected of being employed in the commission of any of the offences enumerated in section 9 of the Act; and by sect. 6 this provision is made applicable to any British vessel, which shall be found carrying native labourers in contravention of the provisions of sect. 3; and by sect. 20 it is provided that no officer shall be responsible either civilly or criminally in respect of the seizure or detention of any vessel in pursuance of the Act. The first question then, which we have to consider is what meaning should be attributed to the words "shall upon reasonable grounds be suspected," as used in sect. 16 of the Act, and "in pursuance of the Act," as used in sect. 20.

It has been contended by Mr. Wills, on behalf of the plaintiff, that an officer detaining or seizing a vessel, cannot properly be considered either as having reasonable grounds to suspect that an offence has been committed, or as acting in pursuance of the Act, unless he believes in the existence of facts, which, if they did actually exist, would be sufficient to establish the commission of the offence; and, in support of this contention, he has referred to decisions and dicta in cases in which notice of intended action having been required by law to be given to persons sought to be made responsible for having exceeded their powers, questions have arisen as to the circumstances under which such persons are entitled to notice. We are, however, unable to accede to the argument based upon the supposed authority of these cases. We do not doubt their value as guides for the decision of cases of a similar character, but the words which we have now to interpret are contained in a statute of a very special character, and their true meaning can only be arrived at by a consideration of the general scope of the statute, and of the circumstances under which, and the purposes for which, it was avowedly passed. To adopt the limited construction contended for by Mr. Wills, would render the Act almost a dead letter; the practical effect of so doing would be to make the justification of the officer depend, in almost every case, upon the offence having been in fact committed; and he would consequently have to discharge his duty at the risk of being held responsible in damages, should he make a mistake in applying a newly-made law to a state of facts believed or suspected by him to exist, but as to the existence of which he can, speaking generally, have but very slight means of informing himself. We cannot suppose that the Legislature intended to place an officer, upon whom it imposed duties of so important and so responsible a character, in a position of such risk and peril.

In our opinion an officer should be considered to have had reasonable grounds for suspicion, if at the time of the seizure he reasonably believed in the existence of a state of circumstances which, in his honestly formed opinion, amounted to the commission of an offence under the Act. And this view of the interpretation which should be adopted is supported, not only by the general terms in which sect. 20 is expressed, but also by the provisions contained in sects. 18 and 19 for making compensation to those who may suffer by reason of an improper seizure or detention; and though it may be urged, and perhaps with some justice, that the compensation so provided is not adequate to meet all the cases which may arise, in which justice would appear to require that compensation should be made, the fact that any such compensation is provided strongly supports the view that it was not intended by the Legislature that the officer should remain liable for the consequences flowing from an honestly intended discharge of his duty.

From the evidence in this case it is clear, and it is not disputed, that the defendant believed, and with good reason, in the existence of a state of circumstances which in his opinion not only authorised him to seize the Aurora, but imposed it upon him as a duty to do so, and such being the case he was, in our opinion, fully justified in seizing and detaining her.

It is, however, necessary to notice another point raised on behalf of the plaintiff, which was to this effect: That it was the duty of the defendant to have taken the Aurora and her cargo before a court of competent jurisdiction for adjudication; that, had this course been adopted, it would have been within the power of the court to have done justice to the plaintiff by restoring both ship and cargo, and by awarding him damages for the seizure and detention; that in consequence of the proceedings having been instituted in the Vice-Admiralty Court at Sydney, to which port the cargo had been forwarded, though the vessel had been left in Cleveland Bay, within the jurisdiction of the Brisbane Court of Queensland, the proceedings had been rendered nugatory, the judge having decided that the Court at Sydney had no jurisdiction in the matter, and that for this alleged neglect of duty, and the consequent loss to the plaintiff, the defendant was liable in damages. Now, with reference to this claim, we think it is sufficient to say that no such claim is put forward by the pleadings; but, apart from this omission, which perhaps might be removed by amendment, if the circumstances would justify an amendment, it is clear to us that the trans-shipment of the cargo and the sending it to Sydney, whilst the ship was left in Cleveland Bay, was an arrangement acquiesced in, if not suggested by the plaintiff or those who acted on his behalf. It is also to be observed that we have no evidence before us to show with whom the responsibility rested of instituting proceedings in a Vice-Admiralty Court, or as to whether the defendant had anything to do with it.

Being then of opinion, for the reasons which we have stated, that the defendant cannot be held responsible for the seizure of the Aurora, we proceed to consider whether at the time of her seizure she was employed in the commission of any offence within the meaning and intent of the Kidnapping Act 1872.

As regards the offence alleged to have been committed (by an acting in contravention of the provisions of sect. 3 of the Act 1872) we should have been prepared to express a confident opinion that no such offence had been committed if the answer to the question had depended upon the construction of that section alone apart from any considerations arising out of the provisions of the subsequent Act of 1875. The term of licence given in schedule B. to the earlier Act points to the carriage of native labourers, as passengers from one place to another, and is not, as is recognised in the Act 1875, applicable to such an employment of native labourers as that in which the natives on board the Aurora were engaged, and there was, in our opinion, much force in the argument of Mr. Wills that the natives on board the Aurora were part of the crew of that vessel. But the Act of 1875 is to be construed as one with the earlier statute; and, reading the two together, we think that the reasonable conclusion is, that to carry native labourers without a licence for the purpose of their being employed in the manner in which the natives shipped on board the Aurora were in fact employed is constituted an offence within the meaning of sect. 3 of the Act of 1872, and that this must be considered to have been the true construction of the section, not only as from the time when the later Act was passed, but from the time when the earlier Act came into operation. But the question remains whether, having regard to the fact that all the natives who were on board the Aurora at the time of her seizure had been shipped some months before the Act of 1872 was passed, and to the other circumstances, which we shall presently mention, there was a carrying by that vessel within the meaning of sect. 3. The form of licence given in schedule B. to the Act of 1872 purports to license the vessel to carry a limited number of native passengers from one specified place to another within a limited space of time, and the form given in schedule B. to the Act of 1875 purports to license the vessel to employ a limited number of native labourers from one specific date to another, so that the carrying in the one case and the employment in the other has a specified commencement and a specified termination. Now, inasmuch as the carrying of the native labourers on board the Aurora commenced before the Act of 1872 was passed, a licence for the commencement of such carrying was not only not necessary, but could not have been obtained; and the subsequent carrying of the natives until they were removed from the Aurora upon her seizure by the defendant was a continuous proceeding, during which the vessel was never within the jurisdiction of the governor of any Australian colony or consular officer competent to grant a licence. Under these circumstances, we should be disposed to hold that the carrying of these natives on board the Aurora, inasmuch as it commenced before the Act came into operation, was not a carrying within the meaning of sect. 3, even when viewed with the additional light thrown upon it by the Act of 1875.

It may, however, be suggested that the carrying, though not unlawful in its commencement, became so when the Act came into operation, notwithstanding the ignorance of the master that any such Act was in force, and though it was then out of his power to obtain a licence. But before a continuous act or proceeding, not originally unlawful, can be treated as unlawful by reason of the passing of an Act of Parliament by which it is in terms made so, a reasonable time must be allowed for its discontinuance and though ignorance of the law may of itself be no excuse for the master of a vessel who may act in contravention of it such ignorance may nevertheless be taken into account when it becomes necessary to consider the circumstances under which the act or proceeding alleged to be unlawful was continued, and when and how it was discontinued with a view to determine whether a reasonable time had elapsed without its being discontinued. Now the natives who were on board the Aurora had been shipped by Capt. Bennett under agreements, by which he was bound to take them back at the end of their service to the several islands from which they had embarked: and at the time when he first became aware that the Act of 1872 was in force, he had completed his voyage so far as its fishing and other trade purposes were concerned, and was on his way to land the natives in pursuance of his agreement with them, and then to proceed to Sydney; and to this it must be added that when the Aurora was seized, which was but a few days after Capt. Bennett had first heard of the Act being enforced, he had already landed some of the natives and was within a few miles of the island of Simba, at which and at other islands of the Solomon group he was about to land all that he had on board. It appears to us impossible to suggest any course more proper for Capt. Bennett to have adopted than that which he did adopt, though he probably adopted it as in accordance with his usual practice on such voyages, and not for the purpose of avoiding the commission of an illegal act, as he does not appear to have had any clear idea of the provisions of the Act of 1872 until informed of them by the defendant. Had he put the natives on shore at the island nearest to him at the time when he first heard of the Kidnapping Act, he would not only have broken his contract with them, but would have been guilty of an act of cruelty in all probability as great as any which it was the avowed object of the Act to prevent.

For these reasons we have come to the conclusion that the carrying of the native labourers on board the Aurora was not, under the circumstances to which we have referred, a carrying within the intent and meaning of the 3rd section of the Act of 1872, and consequently that the Aurora was not at the time of her seizure employed in the commission of any offence within such intent and meaning.

With reference to the suggested commissions of some one or more of the offences enumerated in sect. 9 we have but few remarks to make. It appears to us sufficient to refer to the several circumstances to which we have already drawn attention to negative the existence on the part of the plaintiff or Capt. Bennett, or of any other person for whose acts the plaintiff can be held responsible, of any such purpose as is contemplated by sect. 9, and is essential to the constitution of the several offences therein mentioned. Our judgment proceeds on this, that the defendant acted in pursuance of the statute, bonâ fide believing that there was reasonable cause of suspecting that an offence under it had been committed, and that it was his duty to do what he did.

Judgment affirmed.

(Before Bramwell, Baggallay, and Thesiger, L.JJ.)

Dixon v. Whitworth; Dixon v. Sea Insurance Company,

Marine insurance—Salvage expenses—Not within sue and labour clause in policy—Insurable interest—Description in policy.

D. entered into an agreement by which he was to receive 10,000l. if he succeeded in transporting from Egypt and erecting uninjured in London an obelisk belonging to the British nation. D. expended 4000l. in constructing a vessel or case for the obelisk, in properly stowing it therein, and in providing for its transport. He then insured the obelisk and the vessel it was in with one underwriter for 2000l., and with another for 1000l. The vessel and obelisk had to be cast off in a storm in the Bay of Biscay by the steamship that was towing them. Another steamer subsequently found them, and towed them into Ferrol, where they were refitted, and were afterwards towed to London. The salvors brought an action in the Admiralty Division of the High Court, and were awarded 2000l. salvage, the obelisk being estimated at 25,000l. D., having paid the sum awarded, brought actions to recover this payment from the underwriters. The policies, which were against total loss only, contained a provision that the vessel and obelisk, "for so much as concerns the assured," should by agreement be valued at 4000l., and a sue and labour clause in the ordinary form.

Held, on the authority of Aitchison v. Lohre, in the House of Lords, that the underwriters were not liable to repay D. the 2000l. awarded as salvage, salvage expenses not being within the sue and labour clause.

Appeal from the judgment of Lindley, J. on further consideration (40 L.T. Rep. N.S. 718; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 138.

These were actions brought by an assured against the underwriters of two marine policies, in respect of losses occasioned by the accident which befel the Cleopatra obelisk on her voyage from Alexandria to this country.

The facts are sufficiently set out in the head-note.

Lindley, J. gave judgment in both actions for the plaintiff: the defendants now appealed.

C. Russell, Q.C. (J. C. Mathew with him) for the appellants.—These policies are expressed to be "against the risk of total loss only." The sue and labour clause is in the ordinary form in both policies. "And in case of any loss or misfortune, it shall be lawful for the assured, their factors, servants and assigns, to sue, labour, and travel for, in, and about the defence, safeguard, and recovery of the said goods and merchandises, or any part thereof, without prejudice to this insurance, to the charges whereof we the assurers will contribute each one according to the rate and quantity of his sum herein assured." It was upon the construction of that clause that Lindley, J. gave judgment against the defendants. He had then some authority for doing so in the decision of the Court of Appeal, in Lohre v. Aitchison (3 Q. B. Div. 558; 38 L. T. Rep. N. S. 802; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 11); but that has been since overruled in the House of Lords (L. Rep. 4 App. Cas. 755; 41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 323; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 168). The learned judge based his judgment upon the ground that, although the services were rendered independently of the assured, and not by any agents of his, yet as they were services for the preservation of the res, they were recoverable. The contention on behalf of the defendants was that the onus lay on the plaintiff of making out either a total loss, or a liability under the sue and labour clause, and that the facts showed that there was neither. It was further contended that in no event were the defendants liable for the whole sum; that they could not be liable for more than two twenty-fifths. In Lowndes on General Average, 2nd edit., p. 298, the law is stated to be in accordance with this contention. "An underwriter's liability, whether for general average, or under the sue and labour clause, is a liability, not absolutely to pay the whole, but to contribute. If, therefore, that which is really saved by the sacrifice or expenditure is something more than the policy value of the thing insured, the expense must be divided rateably between the value saved to the insurer, and the value saved to the assured or to some third party. If, for example, a cargo which is valued in the policy at 5000*l.* is saved by this means, and if the real value of that cargo in the market is 6000*l.*, the insurer is only liable to pay five-sixths of the general average or expense." The judgment of Lindley, J. is not consistent with the judgments of the House of Lords in Lohre v. Aitchison (ubi. sup.). [He was stopped by the Court.]

Butt, Q.C. for the respondents.—The decision in Aitchison v. Lohre, in the House of Lords, is that salvage expenses do not come within the suing and labouring clause of a policy of marine insurance. The contention for the respondents is now that this is not an insurance of the iron case and obelisk, but of the chance of earning 10,000*l.*, under the plaintiff's agreement with Mr. Wilson, by its safe arrival. Then Aitchison v. Lohre would, it is submitted, not apply. This is like an insurance on freight. Kidston v. The Empire Marine Insurance Company (15 L. T. Rep. N.S. 12; 16 L. T. Rep. N.S. 119 & 286; L. Rep. 2 C.P. 357; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O.S. 400 & 468) would be relied on by the respondents. [Bramwell, L.J.—Is not this like an insurance on profits? And is not that an insurance on the res?] It has been so held. If the terms of the description in the policy are relied on, the case cannot be argued; but it was said in the court below that the description in the policy would not be insisted upon by the underwriters if the real insurable interest was something different.

J. C. Mathew, for the appellants, states that the description in the policy will not be waived.

HALL v. JUPE.

Marine insurance—Constructive total loss—Whether sufficient evidence to be left to the jury—Stringent necessity for sale by the master—Order XXXIX., r. 3.

A ship, while coming out of harbour, struck on a reef on the morning of the 6th of October 1876, and in order to get her off it was necessary to discharge a portion of the cargo. The master agreed with G., who was the only person at the harbour who had the requisite number of men, to lighten the vessel and get her off. Under this agreement about eight men worked for two hours without succeeding. G. then persuaded the master to call a survey of the vessel and sell her, and, in pursuance of the report of the survey which was made by G., the master sold the ship and cargo to G., at 6 p.m. on the same day on which the ship struck, for a very small sum. At the time of the sale the weather was fine, and the vessel was in no more danger than she had been in from the time she struck; but if the wind veered round to the south or west, the vessel would have broken up in a short time. As soon as G. purchased the ship he sent a sufficient number of men to discharge the cargo, and on the second high tide after the vessel struck she was floated. She was subsequently repaired and made seaworthy for about 20*l*. In an action against the underwriter on a policy of insurance on the vessel, the plaintiff claimed for a constructive total loss.

The learned judge at the trial ruled that there was no evidence upon which the jury could reasonably find the urgent necessity for the sale of the ship at the time of the sale, which alone could justify the sale, that is, that at the time there was no reasonable evidence of a total loss, and he withdrew the case from the jury, and ordered the verdict and judgment to be entered for the defendant.

Held, by Lord Coleridge, C.J., that the ruling was right, and that the only question was whether the ship was at the time she was sold constructively lost, and there was no evidence from which a jury could reasonably find this. The evidence must be limited to the stringent necessity of the sale, not to the question whether the sale was made under circumstances under which a prudent uninsured owner would have made it.

Held, by Grove, J., that the sole question was, not whether the circumstances were such as to justify the sale, but whether the circumstances detailed in the evidence were such as to afford sufficient evidence to be laid before a jury that the sale was justifiable, and that it was not a case which should have been withdrawn from a jury. There was reasonable evidence upon which, in the absence of any answer, the jury might find a verdict.

Quœre, whether the word "misdirection" in Order XXXIX., r. 3, applies to a nonsuit.

THIS was an action on a time policy, which had been effected by the plaintiff with the defendant, amongst other underwriters, on a vessel called the Highflyer, valued at 2800*l*., and the plaintiff claimed for a constructive total loss. The case was tried before Lord Coleridge, C.J., at the previous London Michaelmas sittings, and the facts are as follows:

On the 5th of Oct. 1876, while the Highflyer was going out of Tub Harbour, on the coast of Labrador, she struck upon a rock or reef close to the shore. She was going out on the top of high tide, but the tides were rising tides, and in order to get her off it was necessary to lighten her by discharging a portion of the cargo. Tub Harbour is quite a small place, and practically only inhabited during certain seasons of the year, when fish are cured and loaded there. At the time the vessel struck there was a person named Green at the harbour, with about thirty or forty men under him, engaged in the fishing business. He had loaded the Highflyer, and was the only person who had a sufficient number of men to render effectual assistance in lightening the vessel and getting her off the reef, and there was no magistrate or person of authority in the place. On the same day that the vessel struck the master entered into negotiations with Green for the purpose of lightening the vessel and getting her off, and ultimately Green agreed for the sum of 200*l*. to give all the assistance he could get. Green sent eight men, who continued to work for about two hours, but very slowly and unfairly, and subsequently the master was persuaded by Green to cancel the agreement and call a survey of the vessel. When the vessel struck there was a strong breeze blowing, and it was stated by some of the witnesses that the mainmast had started out of the keelson, got loose, and was raised about an inch; that the combings of the main hatch had broken, and that they were afraid the vessel would break in halves. The second mate stated that half an hour before the survey he examined the vessel, and found the butts on the outside, abreast of the mainmast, open, so that he could put his fingers in; that the covering board and water ways were the same, and the mast partners opening, and the wedges coming up; that the vessel was making more water, and that in his opinion she might be broken up in the morning, and be worth nothing then. The survey was made about three-quarters of an hour before low water, and the weather was then fine. The captain and some of the men said that if the wind veered round to the south or west the sea would have heaved in, and the vessel would have broken up in a short time. Green made the survey, together with some men whom he brought with him, and it was drawn up in the following terms:

> We find the mainmast raised one inch, and the main combings parted, and the deck plank opening. Pronounce the vessel unseaworthy, and advise to sell, for the benefit of all concerned, both ship and cargo.

At six o'clock on the evening of the same day on which the vessel struck, the master sold both ship and cargo to Green. At that time the weather was fine, and the ship was in no greater danger than she had been. The ship was sold for 140*l*., and the cargo for 400*l*. The cargo alone was stated to be worth 2000*l*., and part of it was at the time of sale safe on shore. As soon as Green had purchased the ship and cargo, he sent a sufficient number of men to discharge the cargo, and on the second high tide after she had struck he succeeded in floating the vessel. She was subsequently repaired for about 20*l.*, and made seaworthy, but she was said to be misshaped. At the end of the plaintiff's case the learned judge ruled that there was no evidence upon which the jury could reasonably find the urgent necessity for the sale of the vessel at the time she was sold, and he accordingly withdrew the case from the jury, and directed the verdict and judgment to be entered for the defendant.

Watkin Williams, Q.C., for the plaintiff, subsequently obtained a rule nisi to set aside the verdict and judgment and for a new trial, on the ground that the learned judge ought to have left the case to the jury upon the evidence as to whether the master had done everything he could to prevent the necessity of selling the ship.

Charles Russell, Q.C. and Myburgh showed cause against the rule.

Butt, Q.C. and J. C. Matthew argued in support of the rule.

Cur. adv. vult.

GROVE, J.—This was a case which was tried before Lord Coleridge. It was an action upon a marine policy of insurance upon ship. The ship, in coming out of a port on the coast of Labrador, struck upon what has been called a rock in some parts of the evidence, and in other parts a reef.

The case for the plaintiff was, that the ship was very much damaged and was likely to go to pieces, if not actually going to pieces, when she was sold, and sold by the master at an extremely reduced value, to a Mr. Green; and the sole question in the case, as it was argued before us, was not whether the circumstances were such as to justify the sale, but whether the circumstances detailed in the evidence were such as to afford sufficient evidence to be laid before a jury that the sale was justifiable.

I have in this case the misfortune to differ in opinion from my Lord but, upon the view I have been compelled to take of it, I cannot say it was a case that should have been withdrawn from a jury. It may be that I am prejudiced by my early education in these matters, and that I take a different view from that of judges younger than myself who have taken part in the more recent practice of the law; but I am bound to give my opinion to the best of my power, and it does seem to me that there was evidence to be laid before the jury. It was not a case within the principle on which the cases, of which Ryder v. Wombwell (17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 609: 37 L. Rep. 3 Ex. 90; 37 L. J. 47, Ex.; 16 W. R. 515) is the principal, were decided; and I cannot agree with my Lord's view of a nonsuit being directed.

Now, the facts detailed in evidence (I am only taking the plaintiff's evidence) are that the vessel struck upon a reef; that she was fixed there; that she was on the reef amidships; that her butts parted so that, according to the evidence of more than one witness, you could put your hand between them; that the mast was loosened and raised, according to one witness, an inch, according to two others, I think, two inches out of its place, and that the partners of the mast were damaged. (I understand the partners to be the wedges which are put round the mast, and that, as they had become separated from the mast, the mast was to some extent detached and loose in the ship, but that in their belief, and according to the best judgment they could form, the ship was likely to go to pieces in a very short time.) Barr, the mate, says in respect to the position of the ship, the vessel could not be got off, as she was breaking up. He says he examined the vessel, and found the butts on the outside abreast the mainmast open so that he could put his fingers in. The covering board and water-ways the same, and the mast partners opening and the wedges coming up. Then he says: "By the mast partners I mean thick and stronger decking round the mast. The vessel was making a little more water. We tried the pumps." Then he says: "The vessel was hanging on a rock amidship, and he thinks the captain did all in his power. It was too much risk to wait for the next high tide." There is a good deal more to that effect, both by this witness and three others, including the captain of the vessel. Reading that evidence through, and viewing what were the probabilities at the time or soon after the time of this vessel striking, or stranding, as they call it, upon the reef (and it may be fairly called stranding) what could be well done, and what would be the best thing to be done at the time? Now, I do not wish at all to exaggerate or to say the case for the plaintiff was a strong one, that is to say, in one sense of the word, which I shall presently explain, but I cannot help thinking there was some primâ facie case to go to the jury. There are witnesses who say there was no alternative but to sell her, and they all express that opinion and give their reasons for it. Now, it appears a Mr. Green came on board, and the master entered into an agreement with him that for 200*l.* he, Green, would bring assistance and help to get the vessel off. He did not bring the assistance which after events proved he might have done. He brought a few men. They are differently numbered by different witnesses; but I do not think the maximum goes to eight. Subsequent events show they could have done more, and I am almost satisfied Green was not honest in the matter. I have not enough evidence to satisfy me that the master was party to anything wrong, but he seems, as far as I can judge, to have been taken in by Green. He could not get much assistance. His own men were said to be drunk, and Green brought a few who worked languidly. Under these circumstances he sold the vessel and cargo for 600*l.*, a very small portion of the value; and the question is whether there was anything to go to the jury that such a sale was right under the circumstances or could be justified. One of the witnesses says the vessel was perfectly broken in two, and other expressions are used, and it is said that the weather came on very hard for an hour or two, and they could not get her off. The weather subsequently calmed, and about the time the ship was actually cleared the weather was much calmer. I will not go into what subsequently happened, because first of all I wish to comment upon the evidence as it stood at the trial as to the acts done at the time. This agreement with Green to supply men to assist was certainly not properly complied with, and it was subsequently cancelled apparently by the persuasion of Green.

It is said in favour of the nonsuit that the captain should have insisted upon his agreement. It is very doubtful whether upon his agreement, if he had insisted, Green would have done much to assist him, and the probable thing is, Green was looking for a bargain for himself. I do not see anything to satisfy me the captain knew of that, and I do not see any evidence to show anything like a corrupt bargain between the master and Green. I have given a very short outline of that of which there was a great body of evidence, and I now come to the counter matters disclosed upon the plaintiff's evidence. There were spring tides, and the tides were rising; therefore there was a better chance of floating the vessel on each tide, but, as we know when a vessel is stranded the increase of tide drives her in further, particularly if there is any wind, and it is not anything like a certainty she will be got off. In this case at the next high tide but one she stranded nearly at the full of the tide, having been actively cleared, every possible appliance being put to her. Now she was repaired by Green, and the repairs cost only about £20. That is certainly very strong evidence to show that these men exaggerated the state of the vessel. After the vessel was repaired it is said she never was the same vessel as she was before. She was hogged and misshaped, she was not put into the same form as she was before, but showed a substantial defect after the repairs were effected. That is pretty nearly an outline of the case. It may have been only a speculation, but I am inclined to think it was something more than a speculation on the part of Green that he knew he could bring assistance to bear which the captain did not know of or could not get, and as soon as he made this bargain he brought all this labour to bear upon the vessel, and at the second high tide got her off.

The question then is whether there was sufficient to say that there was no evidence to go to the jury. Now a case which goes very far indeed, and in its facts is very similar to the present case, is a case in the Privy Council of the Cobequid Marine Insurance Company v. Barteaux (32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 510; L. Rep. 6 P. C. 319; 23 W. R. 392, 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 536). In that case the facts were in many respects similar, but there there was no evidence that the ship was making water, or that she was considerably logged, or that she was badly strained; indeed, the reverse was the case. I should have said that in the present case a survey was held upon this vessel by four people, Green being one of them; they condemned the vessel as being unseaworthy, which in itself would not be sufficient, because a vessel being merely unseaworthy would not justify a sale, and they recommended the vessel should be sold for the benefit of all concerned. One of the differences between this case and that of the Cobequid Marine Insurance Company v. Barteaux is, that ample assistance there could have been procured. Although this case of the Cobequid Marine Insurance Company v. Barteaux would be very much more in point if we were deciding the question of the verdict being against the evidence (and I may say this is a second trial in this case, and that after the first trial, the court granted a rule on that point), it has still an important bearing upon the question we have now to decide. Sir Henry Keating in giving judgment says: "Now their Lordships entirely agree with the learned judge in their inability to discover on the evidence for the plaintiff himself why those efforts were not made and inasmuch as, to justify the sale, those efforts ought to have been made, there seems to be strong reason for ascertaining how far another jury would agree in the very sound and sensible opinions expressed by the majority of the court themselves"—that is the court from which the appeal came—"or whether they would coincide in the view taken by the former jury. Of course their Lordships would be slow to advise a new trial where there was substantial conflict of evidence. In the present case the record does not disclose the fact whether the Chief Justice expressed himself dissatisfied with the verdict. It does not state the fact either way that he expressed himself to be satisfied or dissatisfied. That he was not perfectly satisfied with the verdict their Lordships can perhaps collect from the passage just read, and which must be taken to be the expression of the opinion of the Chief Justice himself. But in an ordinary case, although the non-expression of the dissatisfaction upon the part of the judge is generally looked upon as forming a serious obstacle to ordering a new trial yet at the same time it is plain that the evidence was such that there is ground for the belief that the jury really did act without giving that weight which they ought to do to the evidence that was laid before them; there is no reason whatever why a new trial in the interest of justice should not be directed." Now this is the part that appears to me to be important upon the point I am addressing myself to. "In this case," says Sir Henry Keating, "it would be too much to say that there was no evidence of the stringent necessity that would have justified a sale. Had there been no evidence there would have been a misdirection, but their Lordships are of opinion, having regard to the evidence given of the absence of those efforts upon the part of the master, which efforts would alone justify a valid sale—that is a sale that should be valid against the insurers—that the verdict of the jury as given was undoubtedly against the weight of the evidence." So that in this case the judges say by the mouth of Sir Henry Keating, it would be too much to say there was no evidence of the stringent necessity which justified the sale. I may say this court, instead of granting a new trial in this case on the ground of misdirection, if there had been no evidence in support of the plaintiff's case, would have entered judgment for the defendant. They would not have sent the case down for a new trial unless they considered there was some evidence for the consideration of the jury.

Now in the present case two points were suggested: one was that, if a verdict was wholly unsatisfactory to a judge and the court, a judge would be entitled on a second trial to nonsuit. That was not pressed, and I must say I do not agree with that. If that was so, the whole course of our legal procedure would be changed; because in such cases as that, instead of sending it down for a new trial, they would at once enter judgment for the defendant. Therefore it does not appear to me that the argument can be sustained, namely, that a mere decision of the court that the verdict was unsatisfactory and against the weight of evidence would be sufficient to ground a nonsuit upon.

Then another point that was urged was, that Order XXXIX., r. 3, of the Judicature Act applied, and that, if the court thought that no substantial wrong or miscarriage had occurred, they could uphold the nonsuit. This is the first time this point has occurred, and upon this I give my opinion with very sincere diffidence, because it is a matter entirely new, but I cannot bring my mind to that construction of Order XXXIX., r. 3. The words of the order are these: [The learned Judge here read the rule of the order.] No doubt, in one sense of the word, perhaps in a fair sense, nonsuiting where the judge ought not to nonsuit is a misdirection, but I cannot help looking to the object of this Act. The object of this Act, as I have always understood, was to prevent that which frequently occurred before, and that which really was a matter of serious injury to litigants, when, because a judge might have misdirected in some particular which might be comparatively small with regard to the actual substantial merits and justice of the case, yet, as the court could not say absolutely as a matter of certainty that it might not have influenced the jury's mind in giving their verdict, a new trial was ordered. I have no doubt that was what this was intended to vary, and the word "misdirection" here does not mean misdirection in the sense of withdrawing a case from the jury altogether, and the judge deciding it himself; but misdirecting the jury in the direction which the judge gives; and that opinion is confirmed in my mind by sect. 22 of the Judicature Act. It seems to me, that in the contemplation of the Act, a judge is not to withdraw a case from a jury if there is anything that can be called a case to go to the jury. That helps my view, that the word "misdirection" in this rule does not apply to a nonsuit. The consequences if it did would be very extraordinary; that is to say, they would to my mind change nearly the whole of our procedure, because it would come to this, that, if a judge was dissatisfied with a verdict, and at all events if the court agreed with him, the case would be wholly removed from the jury. If the court are dissatisfied with the verdict, and think it decidedly wrong, and if the judge nonsuits and withdraws the case from the jury, and the court say no substantial wrong can have occurred because they are of opinion the verdict would have been entirely unsatisfactory, they place themselves in the position of the jury, and therefore, unless there were affidavits of fresh evidence, the court could avoid a second trial, and possibly even in the first trial, if the judge thought the verdict would be wrong if given for the plaintiff, he might nonsuit the plaintiff. I do not think that was contemplated by the Act, and, if it had been contemplated that judges should have absolute control over the verdicts of juries, I think it would have been more clearly expressed.

Now, as to what is called reasonable evidence, nothing is more difficult to decide, We have repeated instances of judges differing as to whether there is reasonable evidence. Since the time I have been on the bench there have been differences of opinion both in this court and in the Court of Appeal on that question. I can only say in this case, it seems to me there was, within the meaning of Ryder v. Wombwell (17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 609; L. Rep. 3 Ex. 90; 37 L. J. 47, Ex.), not a mere scintilla of evidence, but reasonable evidence upon which, in the absence of any answer, the jury might find a verdict. If the evidence of the witnesses stood alone, I should say distinctly there was reasonable evidence for the jury, but there are things that conflict with that evidence. That the vessel was repaired for a small sum, for instance, is a very strong fact. Still there was a conflict of evidence. We must look at Ryder v. Wombwell, which is the leading case upon the subject. There the evidence, which the judges held in the Exchequer Chamber was not fit to be submitted to a jury, was to my mind absolutely ridiculous; it was a case for the supply of necessaries, as they were called, to a minor. The necessaries were a handsome goblet of gold and silver to be presented to a marquis, and which the jury held to be a necessary, and certain diamond and ruby studs for a shirt. It was said there that the evidence must be reasonable, that is something that would affect the minds of reasonable men that it was not an extravagance; and they held that the jury could not come to any rational conclusion in supposing that such things as this goblet and these jewelled shirt studs could be necessaries. They might as well have supposed a coach and four or a yacht were necessaries for a young man. I do not say that is conclusive, but I think it tends to show the ground upon which the court went, and that the court would not remove from the jury a case where there was evidence upon which, if uncontradicted, whether by the opposite side or the conflict of the evidence in itself, the jury might act. There is a great disadvantage in some cases with regard to trial by jury, especially where there are complicated questions. In this case I cannot bring my mind to the conviction that there should have been a nonsuit. I am better satisfied in coming to this opinion, as it will make no difference, my Lord being of a different opinion, and the rule will drop, and if the Court of Appeal should decide that a nonsuit can be directed in such a case as this, I shall be by no means dissatisfied.

I should like to add, that there is one expression which is used in the case of Cobequid Marine Insurance Company v. Barteaux, that I intended to allude to. It is an expression used in quoting from Parsons, that even exceeding peril would not justify a sale. I apprehend that the court must have meant by that, peril in the shape of prospective danger, because, if not, supposing this vessel actually going to pieces, there could be no sale until the vessel was actually destroyed. I do not think they meant to go that length. No doubt a sale should not be effected except upon stringent necessity; still it cannot be a necessity which does not arise until the vessel is practically destroyed. A sale is a very dangerous thing to encourage on the one hand; but, on the other hand, if there is no sale it may be the underwriters or the owners of the vessel may very much suffer.

Lord Coleridge, C.J.—For the reasons I will state as clearly as I can, I am still obliged to adhere to the opinion I expressed at the trial. If I had thought the point to be decided was that to which my brother Grove has directed attention, I am not at all sure I should not have come to his conclusion; but I venture to think the point is not that to which my learned brother has directed his judgment, and that as to the point upon which I did decide I was right, and that it was the true point to decide.

Now this was an action for the purpose of fixing the insurers to pay their proportions on a total loss of a ship not totally lost in fact, but said to be totally lost to the owners by reason of a sale. The sale therefore could only be justified, in my apprehension of the law, if at the time it took place there was at least a constructive total loss of the ship. It is not a question of whether a total loss was imminent, it is not a question of whether the person who sold bonâ fide thought there would be a total loss, but whether there was a total loss, and the question I have to consider is whether there was evidence on that point. To that point alone was my ruling directed, and on that point alone did I consider, and do I now consider, whether there was evidence or not. I find I ruled in these precise terms: "I think there is no evidence upon which the jury could reasonably find the urgent necessity for the sale of the Highflyer at six o'clock on the 6th Oct., the time of the sale, which alone could justify the sale; that is, that at that time there is no reasonable evidence of a total loss." Now that is the point of law I decided, and that is the point only, as it appears to me, as to which the existence or non-existence of evidence is to be considered.

It is not for me to define the law upon that subject. I apprehend the law to be established. Formerly there was great doubt, and if the old cases and old books be looked at, it will be found I am by no means exagerating the statement when I say there was great doubt whether under any circumstances the master had a right to sell. It was a right obviously capable of great abuse, it was a right for which there was in former times no distinct authority, and indeed in some of the cases it will be found that in the earlier books it had been laid down the other way, that there was no authority to the master under any circumstances to sell the ship so as to fix the insurers. As between himself and his owners it is a totally different matter. That state of the law was modified by subsequent decisions, and I suppose by the general feeling, convenience and reason, that affected the great judges who have in fact created our mercantile law. But the point always to be decided, as I apprehend, is not, as I have said, the imminence of peril, not the bonâ fides of the person who sells believing the peril is imminent, but the existence of a state of facts which at the time of the sale makes the ship constructively totally lost, and unless there is evidence given of that state of facts the owners, whatever they may do between themselves and their captain, cannot sue the insurers as for a total loss when the ship has been sold.

The question here therefore is, where there was a sale of a ship under circumstances which I will presently very shortly express, whether it can be said there was any evidence, subject to the observations I will make upon Ryder v. Wombwell (17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 609; L. Rep. 3 Ex. 90; 37 L. J. 7, Ex.), of that fact to be left to the jury.

I put aside, with all respect, as having nothing to do with that point, the opinions of persons given with regard to the state of the ship earlier in the day. The question is, whether at six o'clock on the night of the 6th Oct. the ship was constructively totally lost. Now at that time she was not making water, there had been no jettison; as a matter of fact within five or six hours she was got off the rock, and she was repaired for 20*l*. Those are undisputed and indisputable facts in the case, and it appears to me to be wholly unnecessary to consider what was the true effect of the evidence of the mate and other people as to the parting of the timbers, and as to the starting of the masts and soon. They referred to another part of the day, if true—I mean if given honestly; and whether given honestly or not, are proved by the indisputable facts of the case to have been pure mistakes, because the ship was got off; the ship was not totally or constructively totally lost, and was repaired for a trifle. Now it appears to me that, if I am right in saying that the question is, whether the ship was constructively lost when she was sold, there was no evidence in this case from which a jury could reasonably find such a matter as that. If the question had been whether the master acted bonâ fide, and thought that there was a total loss at that time, I admit that this evidence, though it is to my mind exceedingly unsatisfactory, might properly have been submitted to the jury, and ought not to have been withheld from them; but in my view, for the reasons I have given, that is not the point to be considered.

Now am I right in so limiting the point that was for me to consider? I find in this case that has been referred to a judgment delivered, as I took the liberty to say in the argument, not only by a great, but by a very cautious lawyer, a person whose statements are always to be taken with the greatest possible confidence, and I find him stating this: "With reference to the law upon the subject, there seems now to be no doubt whatever, and it cannot be questioned that the master under circumstances of stringent necessity may effect a sale of a vessel, so as thereby to affect the insurers. That he can only do so in cases of such stringent necessity has been laid down in a great variety of cases unnecessary more particularly to be referred to, as they are well summarised in the work of Mr. Parsons, at page 147, where he also takes the distinction between the rule, that a sale is justified by stringent necessity only and what was sometimes supposed to be a rule, that the sale would be justified if made under circumstances that a prudent owner uninsured would have made it." I apprehend therefore, that the evidence must be limited to that which is the point ascertained by the true rule, the fact of stringent necessity, not to the question of whether the sale was made under circumstances that a prudent uninsured owner would have made it. "He distinguishes," says Sir Henry Keating, "between the two, and establishes upon satisfactory authority that whilst what a prudent owner would have done under the circumstances, if uninsured, may illustrate the question as to how far there was a stringent necessity for selling, yet that the rule is that there must be a stringent necessity." That is, it must exist, as I understand it, at the time of the sale, and to that point only is evidence admissible in a case of this kind. "In Arnould on Insurance, the circumstances that will justify the master in selling seem to be well and clearly put, and to be quite borne out by the authorities that are cited in support." Then he says afterwards (the facts in this case are not the same as the facts in the Privy Council): "In judging of the questions how far the sale was justified by stringent necessity, of course the state of the vessel, that is not the reported state, but the true state of the vessel, becomes an important element for consideration."

What was the true state of the vessel here upon the uncontradicted evidence? That she was not totally lost, and that she was repaired for 20*l.* How can it be possibly said there was any evidence in the face of those admitted facts, if I am right in saying that was the only point to be considered? How can it be said there was any evidence to go to the jury, that this ship, which was never constructively totally lost, and which was repaired for 20*l.*, was constructively totally lost at the time of the sale? If I am right in saying the true point is what I contend it to be, there was no evidence in this case. The greater part of the evidence to which my learned brother has referred (and his comments upon that evidence are such as I should make and in which I agree) is apart from the question which alone has to be considered in this case, and is really irrelevant to the question for decision by us.

Now, that being so, what is it that ought to guide a judge in refusing to submit a case to a jury? I quite admit not only his mere opinion, because it is not the law it should be so. As long as juries sit where there is evidence which by law is fit for their consideration, whatever conclusions a judge may draw from it, he must allow a jury to draw theirs; and if their conclusion, in the opinion of the court, is thought wrong, it must be set aside, and if that conclusion is very wrong, and very prejudiced, it will be set aside, as I have heard great judges in earlier days say, toties quoties. The court will not have a verdict forced upon them by perversity or prejudice; but I quite agree, where there is evidence fit for consideration of the jury, it must be submitted to them. I am not at all prepared to differ from the principle my learned brother has laid down, which, for the reasons I have given, I do not think applicable to this case. Now, in the case of Ryder v. Wombwell (17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 609; L. Rep. 3 Ex. 90; 37 L. J. 47, Ex.), to which he has referred, I find a very sensible observation, if I may so say, made by a court not only of a co-ordinate authority, but by a court of appeal, which is binding upon us, and I submit, and submit cheerfully ex animo, to the law as laid down in that case. The first question was, whether there was any evidence to go to the jury that either of the articles were necessaries for an infant in the state of life in which the young man was. "Such a question," the court says, "is one of mixed law and fact. In so far as it is a question of fact it must be determined by a jury, subject, no doubt, to the control of the court, who may set aside the verdict, and submit the question to the decision of another jury; but there is in every case, not merely in those arising on a plea of infancy, a preliminary question which is one of law, namely, whether there is any evidence upon which the jury could properly find the question for the party on whom the onus of proof lies. If there is not"—here I myself will interpose words which are not in the report, but to make it more clear—"if there is no evidence upon which the jury could properly find, the judge ought to withdraw the question from the jury, and direct a nonsuit if the onus is on the plaintiffs or direct a verdict for the plaintiff if the onus is on the defendant." It was formerly considered necessary in all cases to leave the question to the jury if there was any evidence, even a scintilla, in support of the case; but it is now settled that the question for the judge, subject, of course, to review, is, as is stated by Maule J. in Jewell v. Parr (13 C. B. 909; 22 L. J. 253, C. P.), not whether there is literally no evidence, but whether there is none that ought reasonably to satisfy the jury that the fact sought to be proved is established. In Toomey v London and Brighton Railway Company (3 C. B. N. S. 146; 27 L. J. 39, C. P.) Williams J. expresses the same idea thus: "It is not enough to say that there was some evidence. A scintilla of evidence clearly would not justify the judge in leaving the case to the jury; there must be evidence on which they might reasonably and properly conclude that there was negligence." In Wheelton v. Hardisty (29 L. T. 385; 8 E. & B. 262; 26 L. J. 265, C. B.), in the considered judgment of the majority of the court, it is said: "The question is whether the proof was such that the jury would reasonably come to the conclusion that the issue was proved." This, they say, is now settled to be the real question in such cases by the decisions in the Exchequer Chamber, which have, in our opinion, so properly put an end to what had been treated as the rule, that a case must go to the jury if there were what had been termed a "scintilla of evidence." Therefore, in this case, in the Exchequer Chamber, adopting the dicta of Maule and Williams, JJ., and adopting the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench in Wheelton v. Hardisty, they say the true question is, whether the proof was such that the jury would reasonably come to the conclusion that the issue was proved. I adopt that rule in the fullest sense. On that I say no more.

Supposing then the point I decided to be right—If I am wrong upon the point I decided the whole judgment of course falls—but supposing the point I decided to be the right point to be decided, namely, was there in fact urgent necessity at six o'clock on the 6th of October for the sale, which alone could fix the insurers, I confess I am wholly unable to see what evidence there was in this case from which a jury could reasonably, without perversity, have come to any such conclusion. I therefore think, upon the authority of this case, upon the authority of the case in the Privy Council, upon the authority of the case in the Exchequer Chamber, and founding my judgment also upon the older cases, as showing the great importance of maintaining the rule that these sales are not to take place unless the stringent necessity arises, I am of opinion that the ruling in this case was right, because the ruling I adhere to is the ruling I wrote down at the time, considering the words of it, and to those words I now upon deliberation adhere.

Other questions have been raised in this case which I do not know, from the point of view I take, if it is at all necessary to consider. It is suggested something may turn upon the third rule of Order XXXIX. of the Judicature Act of 1875. Certainly, if I was to decide the case upon that question, I should desire time to consider whether the court were of opinion that any "substantial wrong" had been done. I confess I should desire time to consider whether this rule was not in its terms pointed to cases such as this. The rule is that the new trial should not be granted on the ground not only of the improper admission or rejection of evidence, but also on the ground of misdirection; and this clearly means misdirection other than improperly admitting or receiving evidence—It refers to something done by the judge beside or apart from the evidence in the case, and I should rather suppose that the rule was pointed at those instances which, if I may say so, were, I will not say a discredit, but which gave occasion to non-professional comments, and sometimes professional comments, upon the administration of justice when there was some small evidence to go to a jury, and when a judge had withheld it on the ground that if they had believed such trumpery evidence he and everybody else who heard the case would have been dissatisfied, and yet it was necessary to grant a new trial. I apprehend it is to prevent such a case as that that the word "misdirection" was put in as well as improper rejection or reception of evidence. But, for the reasons I have given, I do not think it necessary to decide that point.

I take my stand upon the direction I gave at the trial upon the point which I say I conceive it was necessary to make out, that is, the existence of a constructive total loss at six o'clock on the 6th of October, of which not only does it appear to me there was no evidence, but against which, and disproving which, there was conclusive evidence. I am therefore of opinion that this direction was right, and that the rule should be discharged.

As the Court was divided, the rule dropped.

THE ALHAMBRA.

Breach of charter-party—"To a safe port, or as near thereunto as she can safely get and always lie and discharge afloat"—Carriage of goods—Delivery—Lightening outside port—Port of Lowestoft.

By the terms of a charter-party a ship was to take in a full cargo at Baltimore, and proceed to Falmouth for orders, thence to a safe port in the United Kingdom, or as near thereunto as she could safely get and always lie and discharge afloat. The ship drew 16ft. 6in., and was ordered to Lowestoft, a harbour where the average low water is 11ft., but, according to the general custom of the port, vessels drawing more than 11ft. can be and commonly are lightened in Lowestoft Roads. The master, without going to Lowestoft Roads, put into Harwich, and declined to proceed further. The consignee gave the master notice that he was willing to lighten the ship in the Lowestoft Roads so as to enable her to enter and lie always afloat, but the master declined to proceed, and the consignee accepted delivery at Harwich under protest, and was put to expense in forwarding the cargo.

Held, that the ship committed a breach of the charter-party, as it would have been both reasonable and safe for the ship to have allowed herself to be lightened in the roads.

THIS was an action by Wm. Everitt and Sons, of Lowestoft, the consignees of a cargo of grain on board the barque Alhambra, against the owners of the Alhambra, for damages for breach of charter-party.

The Alhambra was a Norwegian barque, with no owner, or part owner, in England or Wales, and the proceedings were in rem.

According to the allegations of the statement of claim, the master of the Alhambra agreed by a charter-party, dated 8th Nov. 1879, to charter the Alhambra to Messrs. James Knox and Co. as agents for Messrs. Borrowman and Co., of London, for a voyage from Baltimore to Queenstown or Falmouth for orders, thence to a safe port in the United Kingdom, or as near thereunto as she could safely get and always lie and discharge afloat; lighterage, if any, always at the risk and expense of the cargo. The charterers, in pursuance of the said charter-party, shipped 3015 quarters of Indian corn, for which the master signed bills of lading. The ship arrived at Falmouth on 27th Dec. 1879; on 5th Jan. 1880 the plaintiffs, Wm. Everitt and Sons, of Lowestoft, purchased the cargo from Messrs. Borrowman and Co., who were then the owners of the cargo, and Messrs. Borrowman and Co. indorsed the bill of lading to the plaintiffs, who thereby became the owners of the cargo, and the assignees of the bill of lading within the meaning of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), s. 6; on the same day the master of the Alhambra received orders to proceed to Lowestoft but refused to do so, and proceeded to Harwich, where the plaintiffs accepted delivery under protest, being put to great expense in procuring other vessels to convey the cargo from Harwich to Lowestoft.

The statement of defence alleged that Lowestoft was not a safe port within the true intent and meaning of the charter-party, and was not a safe port where the Alhambra could always lie and discharge afloat, and was not a port into which the Alhambra could safely get, and proceeded:

5. Before the master of the Alhambra proceeded with the Alhambra and her cargo to Harwich, he offered the plaintiffs to proceed therewith to Lowestoft Roads, which are outside of Lowestoft, upon the plaintiffs giving him a guarantee against consequent disasters, or to go to any safe discharging place other than and more convenient to the plaintiffs than Harwich to be selected by the plaintiffs, but the plaintiffs refused to give such guarantee and to select any such other discharging place, and the said master after such refusal proceeded with the Alhambra and her cargo to Harwich and there discharged it, and the plaintiffs there accepted delivery of it under protest as alleged. Lowestoft Roads would not have been a safe place of discharge for the Alhambra. Harwich was as near to Lowestoft as the Alhambra could safely get and always lie and discharge afloat.

The reply of the plaintiffs after joining issue was as follows:

2. The plaintiffs further say that the ordinary and customary mode of delivery and discharge at Lowestoft, for vessels of the size and draught of water of the Alhambra, carrying grain cargoes, is, that such vessels discharge into lighters in Lowestoft Roads a part of their respective cargoes sufficient to lighten such vessels and enable the same to enter the said port, and thereupon enter the said port and there discharge the remainder of their said cargoes, always afloat, and that for all such vessels delivering and discharging in manner aforesaid the port of Lowestoft is a safe port, and a port within which they can always lie and discharge afloat, and into which they can safely get, and the plaintiffs say they they were always ready and willing, and in fact offered to the master of the Alhambra, to take delivery in such ordinary and customary mode as aforesaid, and to lighten the Alhambra at the expense of the plaintiffs; and the plaintiffs say that, under the circumstances aforesaid, the port of Lowestoft was within the true intent and meaning of the said charter-party a safe port and a port where the Alhambra could always lie and discharge afloat, and a port into which she could safely get, and that the Alhambra could have safely delivered her said cargo at Lowestoft in such customary mode as aforesaid, and that the said master was bound to proceed to the said port of Lowestoft, and there discharge without any such guarantee as that in the 5th paragraph of the statement of defence mentioned.

3. The plaintiffs further say that if the Alhambra could not safely enter the port of Lowestoft and there lie and discharge always afloat within the meaning of the said charter-party, and as alleged in the last preceding paragraph (which the plaintiffs aver she could), she could safely get to Lowestoft Roads, and there lie and discharge always afloat, and such roads were and are a safe place of discharge for the Alhambra within the true intent and meaning of the said charter-party, and the Alhambra was by the said charter-party bound to proceed to such roads as being as near to the said port of Lowestoft as she could safely get and there discharge without any such guarantee as that in the said 5th paragraph of the statement of defence mentioned.

The further facts of the case sufficiently appear in the judgment save as follows:

The plaintiffs proved that they had eight or ten lighters waiting ready to lighten the Alhambra as soon as she arrived, holding from thirty to thirty-two tons each, and that inside the harbour they had all the modern appliances for unloading vessels coming in on a flood tide, and requiring lightening before low water, and that they had removed as much as 200 tons of grain from a vessel in six hours. The master of the Alhambra said that when he had discharged 220 tons at Harwich the whole cargo being 640 tons, his vessel drew twelve feet. It was also given in evidence that timber vessels had been lightened in the roads by discharging through the port holes only a few inches out of the water.

Milward, Q.C. and J. P. Aspinall appeared for the plaintiffs, and Butt, Q.C. and E. C. Clarkson for the defendants.

Butt, Q.C. for the defendants, objected to evidence of the custom of the port to lighten vessels in the roads on the ground that "a safe port" is a port in which a fully loaded vessel can always lie afloat, and evidence of custom was therefore wholly irrelevant.

The learned judge decided to receive the evidence subject to the objection.

Milward, Q.C. for the plaintiffs.—A safe port is not necessarily a port in which a vessel can always lie afloat when fully laden. On the contrary, a vessel is bound to wait for an opportunity of getting to the place of discharge:

Schilizzi v. Derry, 4 E. & B. 873; 24 L. J. 193, Q.B.;
Bastifell v. Lloyd, H. & C. 388; 31 L. J. 413, Ex.;
Parker v. Winlo, 7 E. & B. 942.

A vessel is also bound to allow herself to be lightened, even if there is no custom of lightening:

Hillstrom v. Gibson, 8 Scotch Sess. Cas. (1870), p. 463; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 362; and Capper v. Wallace, L. Rep. 5 Q.B. Div. 163; 42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 130; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 223.

Butt, Q.C. for the defendants.—A safe port where a vessel can always lie afloat, is a port in which a fully laden vessel can lie afloat at all times of the tide. In all the cases cited for the plaintiffs, the port is mentioned in the charter-party by name, and the charter-party is not, as in this case "for orders for safe port." Hillstrom v. Gibson (ubi sup.) is an exception, and is a Scotch case. The judge in Capper v. Wallace, in the Queen's Bench, looked on it with great suspicion, and their judgment was in opposition to it, the facts being somewhat distinguishable. It is also distinguishable because the port was accepted in that case, and the plaintiffs thus estopped themselves from denying that it was a safe port. In Hillstrom v. Gibson (3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 302 and 362) the Court of Session was not unanimous, and the balance of authority is nearly equal. If Hillstrom v. Gibson is admitted as an authority for the plaintiffs, it is only an authority for lightening a vessel to the extent of one-fifth. while Capper v. Wallace (ubi sup.) decided that to lighten to the extent of one-third was unreasonable. In this case the facts are conclusive, that it was unreasonable to expect the Alhambra to lighten in the roads. It would have been necessary to take out much more than one-third. If the plaintiffs wished it, they ought to have given a guarantee. The master was certainly not bound to place himself in a position in the harbour where, if the plaintiffs had failed to take out a certain quantity between high and low water, the Alhambra would have taken the ground.

Milward, Q.C. in reply.—As to the contention that there is a distinction between the cases in which a port is inserted by name in the charter-party and those in which a port is afterwards named by the charterers when a port is named at the port of call, the bill of lading is to be read as if it had originally contained the name of that port. The master was guilty of negligence in not going to see or taking measures to ascertain whether Lowestoft was a safe port. He acted on information received from a pilot whom the defendants have not called. The plaintiffs could not be expected to give any guarantee when they had clear rights under the charter-party.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 27.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—As this is the first case of the kind which has come before this court, I have taken a few days to consider my judgment upon it. The Alhambra, a Norwegian barque of the burden of about 469 tons, was chartered at Baltimore in the United States of America to go from that place to Queenstown or Falmouth for orders, and thence to a safe port in the United Kingdom or certain ports on the continent, or as near thereunto as she could safely get and always lie and discharge afloat. It was provided also among other things that lighterage, if any, should be always at the risk and expense of the cargo. The cargo consisted of Indian corn in bulk and in ship's bags. The ship sailed to Falmouth, at which port she arrived on the 5th Jan. 1880. At the same date the cargo was sold by Borrowman and Co., who had bought it, to Messrs. Everitt and Sons, to whom the bill of lading was duly indorsed. No port was mentioned in the charter-party, but Messrs. Everitt and Sons gave orders to the master of the Alhambra to proceed to Lowestoft, and there discharge the cargo. On the 5th Jan. 1880 the following letter was addressed to Capt. Corneliussen, the master of the Alhambra, at Falmouth: "Sir,—We have just received a communication by telegraph, of which the following is a copy: 'From Borrowman, Phillips, and Co., London, to G. L. Fox and Co., Falmouth. Please order Alhambra with maize from Baltimore to proceed to Lowestoft.' We report Alhambra to Lowestoft for discharge. Yours respectfully, for G. L. Fox and Co., Anderson C. Wilson." This was followed by a letter of the next day: "Falmouth, 6th Jan. 1880. To Capt. Cornliussen, of the Alhambra, Falmouth. Sir—We have just received a communication by telegraph, of which the following is a copy: 'From Borrowman, Phillips and Co., London, to G. L. Fox and Co., Falmouth. Insist upon Alhambra proceeding to Lowestoft for discharge. Give captain notice owners of cargo will hold him responsible for any and all losses incurred by his delay.' Yours respectfully, for G. L. Fox and Co., Anderson C. Wilson." On the same day the captain telegraphed to the harbour master at Lowestoft: "What draught water can safely always afloat discharge?" and he received the answer from Capt. Massingham, the harbour master at Lowestoft: "16ft. average high water, eleven low; soft muddy bottom; never known vessel to take harm Lowestoft harbour." On the 6th Jan. also the captain telegraphed to Borrowman and Co. as follows: "If you will give solid guarantee against all consequences will proceed to Lowestoft Roads; if not I will protest against your order and proceed Harwich, if you cannot give me another safe discharging place more convenient for you to receive my cargo according to charter-party. Telegraph reply." Of the proposal for a guarantee I think no notice was taken by Borrowman and Co., who were quite justified in refusing to enter into a new contract, which this would have been, and in abiding by the contract already made. On the 30th Jan. the plaintiffs Everitt and Co. sent the following letter to the captain of the Alhambra: "Sir,—Take notice that, as I am the consignee of the cargo of maize now laden on board your vessel, I require you forthwith to proceed to Lowestoft, and deliver such cargo to me there according to the terms of the charter-party and bill of lading; and take further notice that I am prepared to pay freight as provided by the charter-party, and at my own expense to lighten your vessel in Lowestoft Roads sufficiently to enable her to lie always afloat in Lowestoft harbour, if necessary, should her draught of water so require." The captain went on to Harwich and there discharged his cargo. The plaintiff Everitt wrote as follows: "Sir,—Take notice that I receive the cargo laden on board your vessel, and consigned to me at Lowestoft under protest in Harwich harbour, reserving my right to proceed against you to recover the damage which I have sustained and may sustain in consequence of your refusing to proceed to Lowestoft, and there deliver your cargo according to the terms of your charter-party."

Upon this state of facts the plaintiffs claim damages for the breach of contract. The defendants maintain that there was no breach of contract incurred at all, and that Lowestoft harbour was not a safe port in which the cargo could be discharged. It appears that the Alhambra drew 16ft. 6in. of water when laden, 8ft. or 9in. without a cargo, and 11½ft. in ballast. Lowestoft Roads afford a safe and good anchorage, sheltered from all winds but a S.E. wind. Tansley, a pilot residing at Lowestoft, said he had seen 200 sail in the roads. The discharge in the roads appears to be usual. On Monday, the 19th, the day on which the Alhambra arrived off Lowestoft, the morning high water was 17ft., the evening high water 15¼ft., and the low water 11½ft. On 20th Jan., at high water in the morning tide, there were 16ft. 9in., and in the evening tide 16ft 3in., and at low water 12ft. 9in. in the morning and 13ft. 3in. in the evening. On Wednesday, the 21st Jan., there were 17ft. 6in. at high water in the morning, so that it would appear that on the morning tide of the 19th and 21st the Alhambra could have entered, if not wholly without lightening, with but very little. In the evening of the 21st the high tide was 15ft. 6in., and the low tide 13ft. 6in., so that by a lightening of the cargo by 3ft., the Alhambra could have entered at low tide on that day. The vessels that entered which required a depth of 16ft. of water did usually take the ground, but there was a soft bottom. The evidence is that no injury was ever done to vessels so entering. The general custom certainly is for vessels to lighten in the roads and then go into port. It appears that the Alhambra sailed for Lowestoft on 15th Jan., and on the 19th sighted the place and took a pilot on board when abreast of Lowestoft about five or six miles off. The captain never went nearer to Lowestoft, or ascertained by personal inspection the state of the port, and his pilot has not been examined, but it would seem that the captain sailed with him some distance, and then took a Harwich pilot on board and went to Harwich. It is contended by the defendants, first, that Lowestoft is not a safe port within the meaning of the charter-party, where a ship can lie and discharge always afloat; and, secondly, that the Alhambra was not bound to discharge in the roadstead in order to enable her to enter the port to the extent the evidence shows she must have done in this case.

Various cases were cited by counsel, but the law as applicable to the case now before me appears to be laid down in the following judgments.

In Schilizzi v. Derry (4 E. & B. 873) the defendant had agreed by a charter-party that the ship then in London should proceed to Galatz or Ibrail, or so near thereunto as she might safely get, and there load a cargo for the plaintiff's factors and therewith proceed to a port in the United Kingdom, unless prevented by causes usually excepted. The ship arrived at the mouth of the Danube on Nov. 5, and found that there was not enough water for her to cross the bar. It was not safe for her to remain off the mouth later than Dec. 11, and on that day she proceeded to Odessa, and took in a cargo from other parties. After the 7th of the following January there was enough water to enable the ship to cross the bar and sail to Galatz. Campbell, C.J. said in that case: "I am really unable to entertain any doubt of the plaintiff being able to recover. As to the first plea, the meaning of the charter-party must be that the vessel is to get within the ambit of the port, though she may not reach the actual harbour. Now could it be said that the vessel, if she was obstructed in entering the Dardanelles, had completed her voyage to Galatz? There can therefore be no doubt as to the first issue. Then as to the second issue, were the defendants prevented by dangers and accidents from completing their voyage? Clearly not. For though from the 5th Nov. to the 7th Jan. the vessel could not cross the bar at the Sulina mouth of the Danube, yet she might have done so after the 7th Jan., and would have then reached her port of destination." Crompton, J. said: "I cannot see any doubt. There is a positive contract to proceed to a port unless prevented by dangers and accidents of the sea; that must mean prevented from doing so at all. It would be most dangerous to hold that a temporary obstruction put an end to the obligation."

The case of Bastifel v. Lloyd (1 H. and C. 393), in 1862, was an action on a charter-party by which the plaintiff and defendant agreed that the plaintiff's ship Bebec should proceed to Llanelly and take on board a cargo of culm, and being so loaded should therewith proceed with all convenient speed to Cole's Wharf, Rochester, or so near thereto as she might safely get, and deliver the same on being paid freight. The ship arrived with her cargo at Rochester on the 24th Oct., and was moored to the buoys about 500 yards from and opposite to Cole's Wharf. On the 25th Oct. the master gave the defendant's agent notice that the vessel was ready to discharge her cargo, and he desired the master to come alongside Cole's Wharf. At that time there was not sufficient water to enable the vessel to come alongside the wharf. The state of the tide did not allow the vessel to be removed to Cole's Wharf until the 4th Nov., and on the following day she commenced discharging her cargo. In an action for demurrage it was held that the master was bound to take the vessel alongside Cole's Wharf. Bramwell, B. said: "I cannot help thinking that the defendant is right when he says that the vessel was bound to go alongside the wharf. As pointed out by the Lord Chief Baron, the object of the charterer was to save the expense of lighterage. Suppose the shipowner found that he could not get alongside the wharf for two or three days he would clearly have been bound to wait until he could then safely get there. He has undertaken to go alongside Cole's Wharf, unless the want of safety renders it necessary that he should stop short of that place. It is admitted that by waiting a short time he not only could but did get there. It might be different if there were only one or more tides in the year which would enable a vessel to reach the wharf, but it is not necessary to say what the master might do in that case. As it is, convenience and common sense are in favour of the defendant."

In the Scotch case of Hillstrom v. Gibson (ubi sup.), which is, I believe, considered the leading case on the subject, and which was decided in Feb. 1870, the master had become bound, under his charter-party, to proceed to Glasgow, "or as near thereunto as the ship might safely get and lie afloat at all times of the tide." On arriving at a point off Greenock, known as the Tail of the Bank, it was found that she could not, with her full cargo, lie afloat in Glasgow harbour at all times of the tide. The consignee, who was at hand, requested the master to discharge what was necessary to lighten the ship—that is, one-fifth of the cargo—and to proceed with the residue to Glasgow. The majority of the court held that this was a reasonable request; that it was in the course of the master's duty to proceed with the residue to Glasgow, and that he could not claim demurrage for the time taken in reaching that port. Lord Kinloch, in delivering judgment, says: "I think the words 'as she may safely get' are reasonably to be construed to mean 'as it is possible to take her with safety,' and this possibility must be construed with reference to the usual mode of accomplishing such safety. If the obstacle to her proceeding was a bar at the mouth of the harbour, I cannot think that the master would be entitled to refuse the lightening, and to insist on delivering the whole cargo in the open sea, and the proceeding at the Tail of the Bank was not in any sound sense a delivery of the cargo; it was a lightening for the purposes of navigation. Had the proposal been to take out four-fifths of the cargo at the Tail of the Bank, and to go on with the remaining fifth, the shipmaster's argument would have had a great deal more of plausibility, for in such a case a great deal may depend on the difference of more and less; it may draw that very distinction between lightening and discharging which is all important in the case."

In the case of Nelson v. Dahl (L. Rep. 12 Ch. Div. 568; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cases 172), where there was a provision in the charter-party that the ship should be brought to a particular place or "as near thereto as she may safely get," it was laid down that in such a contract it must be considered whether the obstruction to the ship entering the dock was of a temporary or permanent nature, so that an obstruction must be considered a permanent one which cannot be removed in a time which is reasonable having regard to the interests of the ship or of the consignee, and this doctrine as to a temporary obstruction not being a sufficient impediment to the execution of the contract was applied to the case of overdraught of a vessel in the following case.

In Capper v. Wallace (L. Rep. 5 Q. B. Div. 163; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 223) it was agreed by the charter-party that the ship was to take in a full cargo and proceed therewith to a safe port on the Continent between Havre and Hamburg as ordered, or as near thereunto as she might safely get; the cargo was to be brought to and taken from alongside at the merchant's risk and expense. The ship was ordered by the charterers to Koogerpolder, in Holland. Koogerpolder was some way up a canal, and the ship, with a full cargo, drew too much water to proceed up the canal. No arrangement had been made by the charterers or consignees for taking delivery of any part of the cargo at the mouth of the canal. It seems that one-third of the cargo had to be unloaded in order to enable the ship to proceed up the canal. As this was done the plaintiffs first claimed pilotage, harbour dues, and other expenses of going into port as well as demurrage, but afterwards limited their claim to what it would have cost to lighter the whole. Lush, J. (with Manisty, J.), in delivering the judgment, said: "It cannot we think be laid down as an inflexible rule that, when a ship has got as near to the port as she can get, and the only impediment to proceeding further is overdraught, the master is under all circumstances entitled to consider the voyage at an end; he is bound to use all reasonable means to reach the port. The words 'as near thereto as she can safely get' must receive a reasonable and not a literal application. The overdraught may be such, and the cargo so easily dealt with that the surplus may be removed, and the ship sufficiently lightened without exposing her to extra risk or to any prejudice, and without substantially breaking the continuity of the voyage; and in such a case, if the consignee is at hand to receive the surplus cargo, and so relieve the overdraught," as he was in the case before us, "we are of opinion that it would be the duty of the master to lighten the ship and proceed to the port. This is the principle laid down by the court in the case of Hillstrom v. Gibson (ubi sup.)." Applying the principles of law enunciated in these decisions to the facts and circumstances of the case before me, I am of opinion that the breach of contract alleged by the plaintiffs is established, and the defendants must pay the damages consequent upon such breach. I give judgment for the plaintiffs with costs.

THE RADNORSHIRE.

Practice — Interrogatories — Preliminary Acts — R. S. C. Order XIX., r. 30—Order XXXI., r. 5 (Nov. 1878, r. 3.)

Interrogatories may be administered under Order XXXI., r. 5 (Nov. 1878, r. 3) concerning matters on which information is obtained by Preliminary Acts, Order XIX., r. 30.

A general interrogatory will be struck out as vexatious if too vague in its character to admit of a precise answer.

THIS was a motion by the plaintiffs, owners of the ship or vessel Paria, to strike out interrogatories delivered to them by the defendants, owners of the Radnorshire.

The interrogatories related to the circumstances of the collision which was the cause of the action, and the first thirteen were as to matters on which information would ultimately be supplied by the Preliminary Acts (Order XIX., r. 30) of the plaintiff when that document was opened.

The fourteenth interrogatory was in the following terms:

Is there any act, command, fact, matter, or thing not disclosed in your answers to the above interrogatories which it is material for the defendants to know for the purpose of defeating your claim in this action, or for the purpose of rendering you liable for all or such of the damage resulting from the collision mentioned in the statement of claim? If yea, set it forth, state where it happened and who can depose to the same.

April 13.—E. C. Clarkson, for plaintiffs in support of the motion.—These interrogatories are contrary to the practice of the court. The Preliminary Acts were specially arranged to get one party's statement of the facts of a collision free from the other party's statements, so as not to enable either to build up a case on that stated by his opponent; and this practice has been persevered in since the passing of the Judicature Acts:

The Biola, 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 185; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 125.

The plaintiffs can only interrogate a party to the action who, not having been on board, probably knows nothing about the circumstances of the collision except by report.

Milward, Q.C. and Hilbery, for defendants, in opposition to the motion.—The Biola (ubi sup.) is not now in point. The order in that case was made under the original rules under the Judicature Act, but those rules were repealed, and the present rule (rule 3, Nov. 1878) substituted. It cannot be alleged that these interrogatories are exhibited "unreasonably or vexatiously," or that any one of them is "scandalous," and therefore we are entitled to administer them, and the court has no power to set them aside or strike them out. The object of discovery is to enable us to see what the plaintiffs' case really is, and therefore whether we have or have not a case. The information supplied by the Preliminary Act will come to us too late, and moreover we prefer to have our opponent's case stated on oath.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—It is true that these interrogatories are of a nature quite novel in the practice of this court, but, as the spirit of Judicature Acts is to assimilate the practice of the different divisions as far as possible, and as the first thirteen interrogatories are such as would be allowed elsewhere, I do not see how I can grant the application to strike them out. They have not been exhibited unreasonably or vexatiously, and they certainly cannot be considered scandalous. I think, however, the fourteenth interrogatory is too vague in its tenor, and I shall order it to be struck out.

THE SILESIA.

Salvage—Agreement—Setting aside—Exorbitancy—Costs—Evidence.

The court will set aside an agreement for salvage which is obviously unreasonable and exorbitant, even if made bonâ fide and not under compulsion.

Where an agreement is set aside, and an award of salvage made, each party will pay their own costs.

Instructions from an owner or his agent to his ship's master not to salve property is evidence as affecting the risk run by the salvor.

Semble, the fact that the plaintiffs have claimed in the alternative of the agreement being set aside, an award of salvage remuneration, does not entitle them to the costs when such an award is made.

Semble also, if the defendants made a tender, which tender was pronounced for, and the agreement set aside, they would be entitled to costs subsequent to tender.

THIS was an action for salvage instituted by the Société Anonyme de Navigation Belge-Americaine, the owners, and the crew of the Belgian mail steamer Vaderland, against the German screw steamer Silesia, for salvage services rendered to that vessel on the 26th March 1880 and following days.

The Vaderland was a screw steamer of 2748 tons register, with engines working up to 1800 horse power, and manned by a crew of seventy-six hands. At the time these services were rendered she was on a voyage from Antwerp to Philadelphia, laden with a general cargo and 274 passengers. She was besides carrying mails for the Belgian Government under a subsidy, by the terms of which she incurred penalties for delay and deviation. She was of the value of 50,000*l.*, and her cargo 20,000*l.*

The Silesia was a screw steamer of 3156 tons gross register, and manned by a crew of ninety-five hands. At the time the services were rendered she was on a voyage from New York to Hamburg, laden with a general cargo, and carrying besides mails, specie, and sixty-two passengers. The ship was valued at 49,000*l.*, the cargo at 56,000*l.*, specie 958*l.*, and passage money and freight about 2640*l.*

On the 21st March the Silesia had broken her main shaft, and on the 26th March 1880, at 8 a.m., being then about three hundred miles from Queenstown, was observed by those on board the Vaderland flying a signal for assistance. The Vaderland steamed towards her, and the captain of the Silesia came on board the Vaderland, and, after some discussion an agreement was drawn up in German and witnessed by the chief officer of the Vaderland and was signed by both captains, of which the following is the translation referred to in court at the trial:

At sea 26—3—80, on board the steamer Vaderland. We, Carl Berthold Richard Ludvig, captain of the German steamer Silesia; H. E. Nickels, captain of the Belgian steamer Vaderland, have this day made agreement as follows:—Capt. Nickels engages to assist the Silesia with broken shaft, disabled, and tow her to Queenstown to anchorage. For this service Capt. Ludvig makes his company responsible for the above-named service for the sum of 15,000*l.*

Afterwards the Vaderland took the Silesia in tow and towed her to an anchorage outside Queenstown, and then went inside the harbour and sent out tugs, who brought the Silesia into harbour.

The statement of claim, after setting out the facts briefly set out above, concluded with the following claim:

The plaintiffs claim (1) the sum of 15,000*l.* salvage pursuant to the said agreement and the condemnation of the defendants and their bail in such sum and in costs. (2) In the alternative such an amount of salvage as the court may think fit to award and the condemnation of the defendants therein and in costs. (3) Such other and further relief as the case may require.

The statement of defence admitted that salvage services had been rendered, but, as to the agreement, said so far as is material.

(3) The agreement . . . was, as the defendants say and submit, an inequitable one, and was only signed by the master of the Silesia under compulsion and because the master of the Vaderland threatened to leave the Silesia and proceed upon his voyage unless the said agreement was signed by the master of the Silesia. The master of the Silesia at the time when the said agreement was being discussed repeatedly stated that the sum demanded was, in his opinion, much too large, and proposed to the master of the Vaderland that the amount to be paid for services to be rendered should be left to be settled between the owners of the two vessels.

(6) . . . They deny that the plaintiffs have any claim under the agreement, but they submit to pay such an amount of salvage as the court, upon consideration of all circumstances, may deem just.

No tender was made by the defendants.

June 23.—The case came on for hearing.

Butt, Q.C. and Clarkson for the plaintiffs.

Webster, Q.C. and Dr. W. G. F. Phillimore for the defendants.—In the course of the examination of the captain of the Vaderland, he stated that he informed the captain of the Silesia that he had instructions from his owners not to deviate except to save life. On being asked whether in fact he had such instructions and how they were given, the question was objected to by the defendants on the ground that instructions from the owners of the Vaderland to their master could not be evidence against the Silesia, but the objection was overruled, and it appeared that the instructions were contained in a letter of instructions from the agents of the plaintiffs' company in Philadelphia, and is as follows:

Philadelphia, July 25, 1879.

Capt. H. E. Nickels, s.s. Vaderland, Philadelphia.

Dear Sir,—A recent legal decision has confirmed the views heretofore entertained by many that a steamship that deviates from its voyage to save property did so at its peril. You will therefore consider that your orders now are to make no deviation except to save life. This you are expected to try to accomplish under all circumstances which you may consider justifiable, having in view a proper regard for the safety of your own steamer, her passengers and crew. You will, of course, understand that the order is not intended to apply to deviations which in your judgment are advisable for the safety of your own steamer, her passengers or cargo, or for the safety of any other of the steamers of our line.—Yours truly, PETER WRIGHT and SON, general agents.

Butt, Q.C.—There is nothing in the nature of this agreement to induce the court to set it aside. There was no extortion as in the case of The Medina (L. Rep. 1 P. D. 272; 2 P. D. 5; 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 918; 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 779; (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 219, 305); both masters were aware of the circumstances of the case, and it was doubtless a most valuable service. As it turned out, the service was rendered more easily than was probably in the contemplation of the parties when they made the agreement, but that is no reason for setting it aside. There is no doubt that it was a valuable service efficiently rendered, and the court will not set aside the agreement merely because it is a large sum. The values are large and the risks great, especially to a vessel having passengers and mails on board:

The Helen and George, Sw. 386.

Webster, Q.C. and Clarkson.—The court will not uphold an agreement which, for want of equity, shocks its conscience, and where there is besides practically compulsion. The master of the Vaderland in effect says if you won't agree for so much, I will leave you. He refuses to leave the matter to be settled by the owners or by the court. Under the circumstances the captain of the Silesia, being in charge of so valuable a ship, and with the responsibility of so many lives on him, was bound to sign any agreement and trust to the court to do justice. The case is in fact though not so bad a one perhaps, as The Medina (ubi sup.), yet of the same description and to be decided by the same principles.

In the course of the argument it was agreed by the parties that, in the event of the agreement being set aside, and an independent award of salvage made, the defendants would, in addition to such award, pay to the plaintiffs any sum not exceeding 1150*l.* which the Belgian Government might exact from them then under the provision for penalties for delay in carrying the mails.

Sir ROBERT PHILLIMORE.—This is a case of salvage service of very considerable merit, and upon that point there is no dispute whatever. The only question for the court to decide is whether, having regard to all the principles on which salvage remuneration is awarded, the sum of 15,000*l.*, the sum agreed upon between the two captains, is so exorbitant as to induce the court to set the agreement aside.

The short history of the case is this. The Vaderland, a screw steamship of 2748 tons register, with engines of 300 horse power working up to 1800, was on a voyage from Antwerp to Philadelphia, laden with a general cargo, and carrying mails and 274 passengers. That there were these passengers on board is a most important element in this case. The mails were carried under a subsidy with the Belgian Government, and the owners of the Vaderland were under penalties not to deviate or delay; the Vaderland had a crew of seventy-six hands, and her value, added to the value of her cargo and freight was 72,000*l.* The vessel to which the salvage services were rendered was the Silesia, and she had sixty-two passengers on board, with a crew of ninety-five hands, and was of 3156 tons gross register, and, with her cargo and freight, was of the value of about 108,000*l.*, and was going from New York to Hamburg, and at the time when the accident happened she had got within 340 miles, or thereabouts, of Queenstown. On the morning of the 21st March in this year the Silesia broke her propeller or screw shaft in the stern tube, and the consequence was that she became utterly inefficient, so far as her steam power was concerned. The weather was fine and the sea was smooth, but, after tossing about for four or five days, and only about seven miles off the place at which the accident happened, she hoisted signals of distress. On the 26th March the Vaderland bore down upon her. What passed between the two captains it is better to state in their own words, both having regard to the importance of the principles involved, and the great value of the salved ship herself. The statement of Capt. Nickells, of the Vaderland, is as follows: "Ludvig, the captain of the Silesia, asked me to tow him into a safe port. I said I could not do it, because I had instructions from my owners. Then he said, 'What am I to do? I cannot steer the ship.' After a little while I said, 'I will break my instructions for 20,000*l.*' He said that was rather too much, and mentioned 12,000*l.*" That is a statement denied by the other captain. "I said I would not run the risk for that money, then he made an offer of 15,000*l.*, and I said yes." Capt. Ludvig's account is this: "Capt. Nickells took me into his room, and I said I had been trying to sail for five days, but, having the wind against me, I could make no way. I thought I had better not try any longer, and I requested him to tow me. Nickells said he had instructions not to tow any ship, as they had been taken in before, except for a certain sum of money, and then to give him a written agreement. I asked what he wanted. I said we had a case a couple of years ago, and we had to pay 4000*l.* for it, and 5000*l.* would be about the money. He said "No, 20,000*l.*" I said I was astonished, as it was an enormous sum, and they would never pay so much. I insisted on 5000*l.*, and he insisted on 15,000*l.* I thought it was a great sum, and he threatened to leave me unless I signed for 15,000*l.* The agreement was in these words. [His Lordship then read the agreement set out above and continued:] The Vaderland took the Silesia in tow, and in about three days they accomplished the 340 miles to Queenstown, and at the end of six days the Vaderland had again reached the vicinity of the spot where she had fallen in with the Silesia. That was the time she lost, and it was very strongly contended on her behalf that she had rendered herself liable to penalties under her mail contract for the deviation she had made from the course of her voyage. On that I may observe that the question as to these penalties has been disposed of by an arrangement made in court between the parties and which is in these words. [His Lordship then read the agreement between the parties, referred to above, and proceeded:] So far, therefore, this question is disposed of.

The captain of the Silesia in his evidence referred to instructions given him not to deviate from his voyage or delay the ship to render any assistance to vessels other than those belonging to his own company, except for the purpose of saving life; on the other hand, the bills of lading and policies of insurance provide for liberty to the Vaderland to "assist all vessels in all situations." I do not think that these instructions to the master of the Vaderland can be pressed as affording any guide to the court in ascertaining the amount of salvage remuneration to be awarded for the services rendered.

There is a large sum mentioned as the estimated loss on the charter of the screw steamer Helvetius, which was employed in consequence of the derangement of the service in which the Vaderland was employed. The loss on this head I do not estimate at more than 500*l.*

The question the court has to consider is whether the agreement made between the captains is one which is so exorbitant that in accordance with the decided cases and the principles on which they are founded, the court ought to set it aside. I should say that, in order to assist the court in arriving at a conclusion upon the subject, it is necessary to consider, and I have considered carefully with the assistance of the elder brethren of the Trinity House, whether the owners of the Silesia would or would not have been justified in calling for the assistance of the Vaderland and in accepting the terms which the captain of the Vaderland asked. After the best consideration of the case, and considering the principles of other analogous cases, I have come to the conclusion—and the elder brethren agree with me—that the sum specified in the agreement is so exorbitant that the court ought to exercise its equitable jurisdiction and not to assist in the carrying of it out. Looking to all the circumstances of the case, I have come to the conclusion that the proper sum to award as salvage remuneration will be 7000*l.* to cover everything but the penalties. The question of costs must stand over for argument.

June 29.—The question of costs came on for argument.

E. C. Clarkson for plaintiffs.—There is no reason why the ordinary rule that a successful plaintiff gets costs should be departed from. Our claim is not merely on the agreement, but in the alternative for such sum as the court may think right, and we have been awarded 7000*l.* If the defendants had made a tender which the court had upheld of that sum, we should not be entitled, but they have refused to pay anything till forced to do so by the judgment of the court. In the case of The Cargo ex Woosung (35 L. T. Rep. N.S. 8; L. Rep. 1 P. D. 260; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 50, 239), where the Court of Appeal set aside an agreement as excessive and inequitable, it nevertheless gave the costs in this court to the plaintiffs, whose agreement was set aside, but in whose favour an award was made, and that is precisely the case here. In the case of The Medina (34 L. T. Rep. N.S. 918; 35 L. T. Rep. N.S. 779; 1 P. D. 275; 2 P. D. 5; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 219, 305), it is true that no costs were given, but that was an exercise of discretion on the part of the court varying the general rule, because of the peculiar circumstances of the case. The agreement was extorted from the captain of the salved vessel, as if he did not agree he would have seen 500 people drowned before his eyes; and the court stigmatises the conduct of the salvor as little better than that of a pirate. Here there is no attempt at extortion. The salved ship was in no immediate danger, and there is no mala fides or misconduct on the part of the salvor. If we had not set up the agreement at all, but only claimed for the salvage in the ordinary way, there being no tender, we should have had to call our witnesses to prove the services and the loss sustained by us in rendering them.

Dr. W. G. F. Phillimore for defendants.—The court will follow the judgment of the Court of Appeal in the case of The Medina (ubi. sup.). It is incorrect to say that the costs were not allowed in that case on account of the conduct of the salvor. The principle is laid down for all cases by James, L.J. He says: "On one side there was salvage to be paid, and on the other side there was an attempt to set up an agreement, and it was right that there should be no costs on either side." In the case of The Cargo ex Woosung (ubi. sup.) costs were given because the defendants alleged misconduct on the part of the salvors and failed to prove it; and besides, it appears to have been the result of agreement between the parties, and not the decision of the court, that the plaintiffs should have costs below and defendants costs of the appeal. In The City of Manchester (42 L. T. Rep. N.S. 521; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 106) the Court of Appeal decided that there should be no costs where, the case being divisible into two issues, the plaintiff succeeds on one and fails on the other, and that is in accordance with the decision of the same court in the case of The Medina (ubi. sup.).

Sir ROBERT PHILLIMORE.—I am of opinion that on the principle on which The Medina (ubi. sup.) was decided by me and affirmed by the Court of Appeal, each party must pay his own costs.

The following is the form of the decree:

The judge being assisted by Capt. John Sydney Webb and Capt. W. Woolcott, and having heard counsel on both sides, and the defendants having undertaken, in the event of the court deciding against the agreement pleaded by the plaintiffs, to pay, in addition to the salvage awarded by the court, any fines not exceeding the sum of 1152*l.*, which may be enforced by the Belgian Government against the owners of the Vaderland in respect of delay in the mail service of the said Government during the six months ending the 30th June inst., pronounced the sum of 7000*l.* to be due to the plaintiffs for the salvage services by them rendered to the steam vessel Silesia and her cargo, the said sum to include all expenses, other than the fines aforesaid incurred by the said plaintiffs in rendering such services, and he condemned the defendants and their bail in the said sum of 7000*l.* and the amount of the said fines not exceeding 1152*l.* as aforesaid, but he reserved the question as to costs.

Dated the 24th June 1890.

The judge having heard counsel on both sides on the reserved question as to costs, directed each party to pay his own costs of the action.

COURT OF APPEAL.

SITTINGS AT WESTMINSTER.

Reported by P. B. HUTCHINS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Nov. 11, 12, 13, and 15, 1880.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Selborne), COCKBURN, C.J., and BRETT, L.J.)

THE WEST INDIA AND PANAMA TELEGRAPH COMPANY LIMITED v. THE HOME AND COLONIAL MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY LIMITED.

APPEAL FROM THE COMMON PLEAS DIVISION.

Marine insurance—"Adventures and perils of the seas, and all other perils, losses, and misfortunes"—Damage by explosion of boiler—Liability of underwriters.

Plaintiffs' steamer was insured by a time policy against "adventures and perils . . . . of the seas . . . fire . . . . and of all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that have or shall come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the aforesaid subject-matter of this insurance, or any part thereof."

The steamer was damaged while at sea by the bursting of the boiler, which took place in consequence of the plates being worn too thin to resist the pressure of the steam.

This condition of the plates was due to the negligence of those who had charge of the boiler in omitting to clean and inspect it at proper intervals.

In an action against the underwriters:

Held (affirming the judgment of Baggallay, L.J.), that the damage caused by the bursting of the boiler was covered by the policy, and plaintiffs were entitled to recover.

THIS action was brought on a policy of marine insurance, effected by the plaintiffs with the defendants on the plaintiffs' steam-vessel Investigator, which was used for telegraphic purposes in the seas between the island of St. Thomas and the continent of America.

The Investigator was insured for 5000*l.*, the insurance being declared to be upon

Hull, stores, &c. valued at	£75
Paying out and picking up machinery, cable, stores, for picking up, repairing, &c., valued at	4000
Machinery, boilers, &c., valued at	3500
	£15,000

The policy was a time policy "for and during the space of twelve calendar months from the 6th May 1878 to the 5th May 1879, both days inclusive."

The clause in the policy stating the perils insured against was as follows:

> And touching the adventures and perils which the said company are made liable unto or are intended to be made liable unto by this insurance, they are of the seas, men-of-war, fire, enemies, pirates, rovers, thieves, jettisons, letters of mart and counter-mart, surprisals, takings at sea, arrests, restraints, and detainments of all kings, princes, and people of what nation, condition, or quality soever, barratry of the master and mariners, and of all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that have or shall come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the aforesaid subject-matter of this insurance, or any part thereof.

The trial was commenced before Baggallay, L.J., without a jury, at the Hertford summer assizes, in 1879, and the further hearing was then adjourned, and afterwards took place in the Rolls Court. After taking time to consider, the Lord Justice, on the 8th Sept. 1879, delivered a judgment, in which he stated the facts which had been proved as follows:—"The following are the circumstances under which the accident occurred. On the 8th Jan. 1879 the Investigator was lying in the port of St. Thomas, and her master having received orders to proceed to repair a break in the telegraphic cable between St. Thomas and San Juan, Porto Rico, weighed anchor about half-past ten on the morning of that day, and set-on easy. After making some fifteen revolutions, her engines were stopped to allow of the vessel's head canting round, and, within a few seconds of their being so stopped, the port boiler burst, gutting the middle of the ship, and blowing up her decks; a considerable portion of the boiler fell overboard, carrying away the port bulwarks, and doing much other damage to the ship, to the particulars of which damage it is unnecessary now to allude. By great exertions on the part of her crew, aided by the crews and boats of other vessels lying in the port, the Investigator was got into shoal water. She did not sink, but the wreck of her hull was ultimately sold for 250*l*., and the present action has been brought to recover the loss sustained by the plaintiffs in respect of her hull and stores. . . . . From the evidence, it appears that the general thickness of the iron shell of the boiler had been reduced, at the part where it gave way, from its original thickness of at least three-eighths of an inch to less than one-eighth of an inch, and that such reduction was due chiefly to the action of bilge-water upon its external surface, and to some—though to a less—extent by the accumulation of sediment and dirt, in the form commonly known as "scale," on the inside: that it was the duty of the engineering staff of a steam-vessel to frequently examine both the inside and the outside of their boilers, and to keep them free from these causes of corrosion, and, for that purpose, to keep down the bilge-water by the pumps, and to remove the scale from the inside."

After fully reviewing the evidence the Lord Justice arrived at the conclusion that "the explosion was occasioned by the negligence of those who had charge of the boiler, and that such neglect consisted—first, in omitting to clean out the boiler at proper intervals; secondly, in omitting to make frequent and careful inspection of the boiler inside and out; thirdly, in allowing the bilge-water to accumulate and to wash the outside of the boiler plate; and fourthly, in working the boiler at a pressure of 50lbs., which was greater than was consistent with its age and condition.

The Lord Justice then stated that in his opinion the bursting of the boiler was a peril insured against by the policy, and gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

The defendants appealed.

Nov. 11, 12, and 13.—Benjamin, Q.C. and Arbuthnot for the defendants.—The defendants are not liable on the true construction of the policy. The bursting of the boiler does not come within the words "adventures and perils of the seas," nor is it covered by any of the other words describing the particular perils insured against, nor by the general words at the end of the clause, for it is not a peril ejusdem generis with any of those particularly described. The case is one of first impression in the courts of this country, and the American decisions, which are referred to and relied on by Baggallay, L.J. in his judgment (Administrators of Isaac Perrin v. The Protection Insurance Company, 11 Ohio Rep. 147, and Citizens Insurance Company of Missouri v. Glasgow, 9 Missouri States Rep. 496), cannot be considered as authorities. Moreover in this case the proximate cause of the loss was the inherent defect or unseaworthiness of the boiler itself, and this defective condition of the boiler was caused by ordinary wear and tear. It must be admitted that in a time policy there is no warranty of seaworthiness, and therefore, if the loss is caused by any peril insured against, the underwriters are liable, although the vessel is unseaworthy; but, if the unseaworthiness is itself the cause of the loss, the underwriters are not liable.

Cohen, Q.C. and J. C. Mathew for the plaintiffs.—The loss by explosion of the boiler is a loss insured against in this policy, for, if not strictly within the words "adventures and perils of the seas," it is a loss of a like nature, within the meaning of the rule laid down by Lord Ellenborough, C.J., in Cullen v. Butler (5 M. & S. 461), and is therefore covered by the general words. The general words cover all perils incident to navigation, including those arising from the improper navigation of the vessel, and in the case of a steamer improper navigation includes improper management of the boiler and engines. Here it is shown by the evidence that the explosion was caused by the negligence of those who had charge of the boiler, and if explosion is a peril insured against the underwriters are clearly liable for it, though caused by negligence:

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 15.—Lord Selborne, L.C.—The question in this case is, whether a loss by the explosion of a boiler was or was not covered by a time policy on the steamship Investigator, dated the 6th May 1878. The insurance was for twelve months from that date, "in port and at sea, at all times, and in all services, situations, and circumstances." The risks to which the appellants were made liable were described in the ordinary form "of the seas, men-of-war, fire, enemies, &c.," and of all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that have or shall come to the hurt, detriment, and damage of the aforesaid subject-matter of this insurance, or any part thereof." The ship, when about to leave the port of St. Thomas on the 8th Jan. 1879, was reduced to a wreck (though not submerged or filled with water) by a sudden explosion of her boiler in ordinary weather. The underwriters disputed their liability on two grounds: first, that such an explosion was not a peril insured against, within the true meaning of the policy; and, secondly, that (assuming it to be so) this particular explosion happened because the boiler was worn out, and that they were not liable for any loss due to that cause. But these grounds of defence were overruled at the trial (without a jury) before Baggallay, L.J., and judgment was given for the plaintiffs, the assured. The present appeal is from that judgment.

Assuming (as for the purpose of this decision I think it right to assume) that such an explosion is not, properly speaking, "a peril of the seas," and that it cannot be brought within any of the other particular perils enumerated in the policy, the main question is, whether it is within the general words with which the specification of the risks insured against concludes, "and all other perils, losses, and misfortunes," &c.

The principles of construction applicable to those general words, in policies of this description, was explained by Lord Ellenborough in the case of Cullen v. Butler (5 M. & S. 461), cited during the argument. "As they must," he said, "be considered as introduced into the policy in furtherance of the objects of marine insurance, and may have the effect of extending a reasonable indemnity to many cases not distinctly covered by the special words, they are entitled to be considered as material and operative words, and to have the due effect assigned to them in the construction of this instrument; and which will be done by allowing them to comprehend and cover other cases of marine damage of the like kind with those which are specially enumerated, and occasioned by similar causes." He proceeded to refer to an observation of Emerigon to the effect that phrases more or less similar have been introduced into various continental forms of policies to prevent doubts and disputes as to the extent and application of what the writer described as "the general rule that assurers answer for all loss and damages that happen on the seas." It is unnecessary to consider whether such a description of "the general rule" is not too wide, because the canon of construction laid down by Lord Ellenborough if reasonably understood, is sufficient for the solution of the present question.

In Devaux v. I'Anson (5 Bing. N. C. 519) similar general words were held by Tindal, C.J., and the other judges of the Court of Common Pleas, to cover damage to a ship occasioned neither by wind nor water, but by the strain on her timbers of cables employed by workmen to remove her from her berth in a dry dock, in which she had been placed for necessary repairs.

I think it is at least as proper to hold that in the case of a steamship they cover damage occasioned by the explosion of the boiler in which the motive power necessary to her navigation is generated. What the winds are to a sailing vessel steam is to a steamer; and it is as reasonable that marine insurers should bear the risks incident to a navigation by that kind of power, whether from excess of pressure in the boiler, or from defects of safety valves, or from neglect or mismanagement making that dangerous which otherwise would not be so, as that they should bear losses occasioned by excessive pressure of winds and defects or mismanagement of a ship, sails, or tackle. I agree, therefore, on this point with the judgment of Baggallay, L.J., and with the decision in the Supreme Court of Ohio to which that learned judge referred.

Upon the second point the only material facts appear to be, that, either through the access of bilge-water without, or through the accumulation of "scale" within, the boiler, certain parts of the lower plate of the boiler had become worn in an unusual manner, and to an extreme degree of thinness; that this was the cause of the liability of the boiler to resist a degree of steam pressure not otherwise extraordinary or improper; and that this unusual wearing away of the plate might have been prevented by proper care. It is certain that, when the policy was effected, this defective condition of the boiler (in whatever degree it may have then existed) was unknown to the assured. The defect was not until several months after the date of the policy sufficient to prevent the boiler from doing its usual work; though, being progressive, it eventually led to the explosion. These facts cannot, in my judgment, amount to more than what was assumed by the House of Lords in Dudgeon v. Pembroke (L. Rep. 2 App. Cas. 284), viz., that the ship was unseaworthy, and that such unseaworthiness (unknown at the date of the policy to the assured) was the causa sine quâ non of the loss. That was a case on a time policy like the present; and the House decided that the assured on these assumptions were entitled to recover. That decision binds us.

So far as negligence on the part of those who ought to have examined and attended to the state of the boiler may be an element in the present case, the same authority, as well as Dixon v. Sadler (5 M. & W. 405; 8 M. & W. 895), shows that it is immaterial. The appeal must be dismissed with costs. The Lord Chief Justice of England agrees with this conclusion; and, though he is not responsible for my words, I understand him also to agree in the substance of the reasons which I have given.

Brett, L.J.—This case has been argued with remarkable force on both sides. It is a case in which I have found considerable difficulty but, in the result I have come to the same conclusion as the Lord Chancellor and the Lord Chief Justice. The first question is, whether, assuming an explosion of steam to be so far the proximate cause of the damage as to be within the rule applicable to marine insurance, this is a loss which is insured against in an ordinary policy in the form of the present. The question so stated is a question of the mere construction of an English policy. It has been said on behalf of the defendants that no perils are insured against except such as are external to the ship. It is said on the other side that all fortuitous circumstances are insured against, including negligence on the part of the captain or crew of the vessel. To my mind the latter contention is too wide, and the former is too narrow. A policy of marine insurance is to be construed like any other mercantile instrument. When there are particular terms and a general phrase following them, the general phrase must be construed with reference to the particular words, and not as if it stood alone. On the other hand, the argument, which seeks to restrict the words of the policy as desired by the defendants, is founded on a fallacious interpretation of the words "perils of the sea." It is true that some judges have used the words "external force," but, with deference, the word "external" seems to me to be surplusage, for it is difficult to see how damage caused by wind, sea, lightning, or anything similar, could be internal. The term "perils of the sea," as has been settled by decision, includes only sea damage or violence of the elements, and does not apply to all accidents happening at sea from whatever cause they may arise. Therefore, so far as the argument here was made to rely upon the first term of the perils insured against, it seems to me that we are not at liberty to say that this peril was within that term.

But that is not the only term in the policy, and new terms have been introduced from time to time. The last general phrase which is used here has been in all policies of marine insurance from the beginning, but many of the particular words which precede it have been introduced from time to time, and the effect of the introduction of new particular words into a policy is to alter the general words, and make them include something which they did not include before; that is, perils not the same as those included in the new words introduced, but of a like kind with them; so by adding to the particular words you introduce a new term into the policy, and also make it include perils like those described by the new term introduced. As to the possibility of holding that under the general terms may be included all losses which may happen during a voyage by fortuitous accidents, the contrary is decided by authority, for in Cullen v. Butler (5 M. & S. 461) Lord Ellenborough, one of the greatest masters of this branch of the law said that in an English policy the general words comprehend and cover other cases of marine damage of the like kind with those which are specially enumerated, and occasioned by similar causes. I can imagine many cases which would come within the definition of losses by fortuitous accident, and yet would not be within the general phrase in the policy. For instance, take the case of a policy on casks of spirits; by negligence or accident a cask is stayed and the spirits contained in it lost: that clearly would not be within the policy. Or take the case of a vessel which sails on a voyage with a perishable cargo; the captain and crew are attacked by some epidemic sickness, and are unable for a considerable time to work the ship properly, which causes so long a delay on the voyage that the cargo is spoiled: It seems to me that there is nothing in an English policy to cover such a loss. It follows that I am unable to agree in the larger definition to which I have referred. The Lord Chief Justice suggested during the argument that the words might cover that without exposure to risk of which navigation could not take place; but on consideration I cannot agree with the suggested definition. Lord Ellenborough and Lord Tenterden have limited the general words to other perils, not of the same kind, but of a like kind; I think, therefore, that the passage from Emerigon, which has been cited, was in all probability correct as to many foreign policies, and was correct as to the general view of underwriters and merchants at the time when it was written, but it does not apply to an ordinary English policy. It is valuable as showing that, subject to the limitation which I have mentioned, the general words ought to receive a large construction. If the clause enumerating the particular perils insured against in this policy contained only the words "perils of the sea," I should think that this would not be a peril of a like kind with those specially enumerated. Unless the special clause had contained the word "fire," I think this would not be a peril of a like kind. I have had some difficulty in bringing my mind to see that it is a peril of a like kind to those enumerated, so as to bring it within the general phrase, but on consideration I think it is similar to the perils specified in this way: an explosion often ends in fire, and fire often causes an explosion which blows up the deck. In this way I think there is sufficient likeness to enable us to say that an explosion, although it is only an explosion of steam, is within the general terms of the policy. Therefore, on the construction of the policy, I think that a loss caused by explosion of steam is a loss caused by a peril insured against.

The next point is this: Assuming that loss by explosion of steam is insured against, it is said that this loss is not covered for other reasons. It is said that it was caused by the infirmity of the boiler, and therefore by the infirmity of the subject-matter insured. It is necessary to consider therefore what the actual loss is,

The plaintiffs have not claimed for the loss of the boiler itself, and, as I think, rightly; for if there had been no explosion they could not have recovered for the boiler, which was worn out, and if they could recover for the boiler at all, they could only recover the difference between the value of the boiler just before the explosion and its value after the explosion, which would be nothing, for the boiler at the moment before the explosion was worth nothing at all. What they are seeking to recover for is the damage to the ship. Now the infirmity of the boiler by itself did not cause this damage, nor did the steam by itself, and therefore the loss is not merely a loss caused by the infirmity of the boiler, and it is not caused by the introduction of the steam, but by the explosion, which was the proximate cause. Therefore, if the explosion is a peril insured against, the loss is a loss for which the plaintiffs are entitled to recover.

Then it is alleged on behalf of the defendants that the explosion was caused by the infirmity of the boiler, which infirmity was caused by the negligence of the crew; that is, that the cause of the explosion was the unseaworthiness of the boiler. That argument means that, if the causa proxima of the loss is caused by negligence or unseaworthiness, that is a defence to an action on the policy. As far as negligence is concerned, this contention has often been overruled.

The other point occurred to Lord Blackburn at the trial of the action of Dudgeon v. Pembroke, and he left certain questions to the jury in order to raise it. It is true the jury did not answer these questions, but the case was argued throughout as if they had answered them. That case is, to my mind a clear decision, that if the proximate cause of the loss would not have occurred but for unseaworthiness, this is no defence. Another argument is, that the loss was the result of mere wear and tear; but the damage was done to the whole of the ship, and even if the boiler had been brought into the state in which it was by mere wear and tear, I should think the case would be within Dudgeon v. Pembroke (ubi sup.), but it is not necessary to decide this, because to my mind it seems clear beyond all doubt upon the evidence that the damage to this boiler was not mere wear and tear. It was urged that it was so because the boiler was of a certain age; but surely no such rule is applicable. The question of a certain age must depend upon the thickness of the particular boiler, upon the nature of the material of which the boiler is made, and upon the amount of work done by the boiler within the given time. Here it seems to me that the evidence shows that, if it had not been for either negligence or inadvertent want of examination, and want of cleaning the boiler from time to time, the boiler would not have been in the condition in which it was at the time of the explosion. The infirmity of the boiler was not the result of mere wear and tear, but was hastened either by negligence, or by inadvertent and accidental omission to inspect the boiler; therefore that point does not arise on the facts. For these reasons I agree that the judgment ought to be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Bills of lading—Sets of three—Rights of indorsee—Entry under second bill—Liability of warehousemen.

The consignees and owners of a cargo to arrive in London indorsed and delivered the first of three bills of lading to the plaintiffs as a collateral security for money advanced. These bills of lading had been signed by the master of the ship in the usual set, marked respectively "First," "Second," and "Third," and they represented the goods as deliverable to the said consignees or their assigns, that freight was made payable in London, and that the master had affirmed to three bills of lading, "the one of which bills being accomplished, the rest to stand void." When the ship arrived the consignees made entry of this cargo, and it was placed in defendants' warehouses. The master on the same day lodged with the defendants a copy of the manifest of the cargo, with an authority to defendants to deliver the goods to the holders of the bill of lading; and, on the following day, notice to detain the cargo until the freight should be paid. Upon receipt from the consignees of the second of the bills of lading, the defendants entered the consignees in their books as enterers, importers, and proprietors of the goods, and after removal of the stop for freight, delivered the goods to persons other than the plaintiffs, on delivery orders signed by the consignees, the plaintiffs having no knowledge of any dealings with the cargo.

Held, by Bramwell and Baggallay, L.JJ. (Brett, L.J. dissenting), that the defendants were not liable to the plaintiffs in an action to recover the value of the goods.

Judgment of Field, J. reversed.

This action was brought by the plaintiffs, as indorsees and holders of a bill of lading, to recover the value of certain goods which had been deposited with the defendants, and which the defendants had delivered to other persons.

The facts are fully stated in the judgments.

The trial took place at Guildhall, in December 1879, before Field, J., without a jury, when judgment was reserved.

On 23rd Jan. 1880, Field, J. delivered a judgment in favour of the plaintiffs, which is reported 42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 90; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 220.

The defendants appealed.

June 12, 14, 15, 17 and 18.—The appeal was argued by Watkin Williams, Q.C. and Pollard for the defendants, and by the Solicitor-General (Sir F. Herschell, Q.C.) and J. C. Mathew (Bompas, Q.C. being with them) for the plaintiffs.

The arguments are sufficiently referred to in the judgments.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 19.—The court being divided in opinion, the following judgments were delivered:—

Brett, L.J.—This case seems to me to be one of unusual difficulty. The solution of it depends so entirely upon a minute examination of the business and legal effect of each step in the transactions described in it between the various parties, that it seems to me to be necessary to state those successive steps with considerable particularity. The sugar which is the subject-matter of the litigation, was shipped in Jamaica by one Elliot, and consigned to Messrs. Cottam, Morton, and Co., merchants in London, as owners. The captain signed three copies of a bill of lading in ordinary form, dated the 16th April 1878, in favour of Cottam, Morton, and Co., or their assigns, deliverable on payment of freight. On the 15th May 1878, whilst the ship was at sea, Cottam, Morton, and Co. obtained an advance from the plaintiffs, who are bankers in London, and in respect of such advance, indorsed one copy of the set of the bills of lading, and handed it to the plaintiffs, with a letter of charge, in the following form: "15 May 1878.—We beg to apply for an advance of 13,000*l.*, to be repaid on or before the 15th July 1878, on bills of lading in schedule over leaf, to be lodged with you as collateral security. We may, with your consent, substitute other bills of lading for all or any of the bills of lading now lodged by us. We further agree that the total of our indebtedness to you in respect of this advance and any other advances from you to us on bills of lading, or any other account, shall be regarded as collaterally secured by all bills of lading lodged by us with you, and in your possession from time to time. In the event of default being made in payment of this or any other advance from you to us at due date or in other case of need, you are at liberty to realise all the produce represented by the bills of lading in your possession." The ship arrived on the 27th May, and went into the East and West India Docks, belonging to the defendants, the Dock Company. Cottam, Morton, and Co. entered the goods at the Custom-house, and afterwards perfected such entry. On the 28th May, the captain, with the knowledge, and at the request of Cottam, Morton, and Co., landed the sugar, and deposited it with the defendants—the freight not being paid. The captain landed at the same time the whole of his cargo, chartered partly for other people. At the time of so doing, the captain lodged with the defendant a copy of his manifest, the copy being made by entries on a form of manifest distributed by the defendants. The names of Cottam, Morton, and Co., and others were entered in the manifest as "consignees" of the goods severally consigned to them. At the bottom of the defendants' forms of manifest there was a printed statement, as follows: "I declare the above to be a true copy of the manifest of the cargo of the above ship, and hereby authorise the East and West India Dock Company to deliver the same to the consignees, as above, or to the holders of the bills of lading." In the present case, the words "to the consignees, as above," were struck out, and the captain signed the order as an authority in terms to deliver the same "to the holders of the bills of lading." On the back of the form of manifest was a memorandum for the guidance of captains and owners of all vessels entering the East and West India Docks to discharge their cargoes, in respect to making their reports and completing their manifests. "The report of the ship and of the cargo must be made at the Custom-house within twenty-four hours after her arrival; and two true copies of the manifest of the cargo must be delivered into the general office of the East and West India Dock Company at the dock-house, &c. No ships can receive their rotation, or be allowed to break bulk, until their cargoes are duly entered, and such cargoes will be landed in due succession, according to the strict order in which the manifests are delivered at the general office. Care must be taken that the names or firm of the consignees agree with the bills of lading." "Notice to detain the cargo for freight, and for subsequently removing the stop, should be given in the printed forms, which may be obtained at the general office." "By the Act of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, s. 68, &c., goods landed in the docks and lodged in the custody of the company are subject to the same claim for freight as such goods were subject to and liable to while the same were on board the vessel, and upon due notice in that behalf being given, will be detained accordingly." "No goods can be stopped for freight after the documents for delivery have been issued." Upon the landing of goods in their docks and delivery of them into their custody, the defendants were in the habit of having a copy of the bill of lading of the goods entered on a form of bill of lading of their own. On the back of this form was a memorandum: "When the consignee in the manifest is not the holder of the bill of lading, or the goods are reported as consigned to order, the bill of lading must be produced, and a duplicate or true copy thereof deposited, except for East India produce; in such cases the originals only can be accepted." "Particular attention is necessary in the regularity of the indorsements, as the company's officers cannot pass any bill of lading on which the authority of the shipper to the holder is not deduced by a complete and accurate chain of indorsements." "In all cases of informality in bills of lading, from want of indorsement, &c., or of them being lost, application must be made to the court by letter, stating the circumstances and inclosing any documents which will show the title to the goods. In every such case the applicant must engage to indemnify the company by bond or otherwise, as the court may direct." On the 29th May, the captain lodged with the defendants a stop order for the freight, pursuant to 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, s. 68: I hereby give you notice to detain, &c., the goods, except samples, &c., until the freight, &c., shall be paid, &c." In the present case, Cottam, Morton, and Co., instead of filling up at the time of the landing of the goods, as above described, a bill of lading form of the defendants, so as to make it a copy of the bill of lading of the sugar, brought, on the 31st May, and handed to the defendants one of the copies of the bill of lading of the sugar. Whereupon the defendants made an entry in a column of their books of the name Cottam, Morton, and Co., under the heading "Proprietor by bill of lading or transfer order." The copy of the bill of lading thus handed to the defendants was not indorsed. On the 7th June, on payment of the freight by Cottam Morton, and Co., the stop for freight was taken off by authority of the captain's agents. On the 3rd July, Cottam, Morton, and Co. gave a delivery order of the sugar to Williams and Co., which order was, on presentation to the defendants, accepted by them, and on it they afterwards delivered the sugar to Williams and Co, Cottam, Morton, and Co. filed their petition for liquidation on the 15th August. The plaintiffs demanded the sugar of the defendants, producing to them the indorsed bill of lading, but could not obtain delivery, the sugar having been already delivered to Williams and Co.

The first step to be considered is the advance by the plaintiffs to Cottam, Morton, and Co., the indorsement in respect of it of the bill of lading by Cottam, Morton, and Co., and the signing by them, and acceptance by the plaintiffs, of the accompanying letter of charge. The business effect was according to the manifest intention of the parties, as it appears to me, to give to the bank, until the advance should be repaid, the security of the goods, but in such a manner as that the borrowers of the advance might in the meantime deal with the goods to a certain extent as owners of them. They were to have the power of making contracts as to their ultimate disposal; they might, on the arrival of the ship, so far as the plaintiffs were concerned, select the wharf or dock in which the goods were to be deposited until the freight should be paid; they might perfect the entry at the Custom-house; they might do everything with regard to the goods which an unshackled owner might do except take them into their own possession, or deliver them actually into the possession of any other persons than the plaintiffs, to be held by such persons otherwise than subject to the plaintiff's right of actual possession, immediately the freight should be paid. As between the plaintiffs and Cottam, Morton, and Co., the freight was not to be paid by the latter until they had redeemed the bill of lading from the plaintiffs. I think this is so, because, if the other copies of the bill of lading had been destroyed, as they ought to have been, the dock company would not have, as a matter of fact, delivered to Cottam, Morton, and Co. without the production of a copy of the bill of lading, which must then have been the redeemed one reindorsed by the bank. Cottam, Morton, and Co. would not in regular course have deposited any copy of the bill of lading with the dock company: they would have made a copy of the bill of lading on a form of the defendants. The power left to Cottam, Morton, and Co. was, according to the intention of the parties, not a power to act as agents for the plaintiffs, but a power to act on their own behalf in respect of the conditional equitable interest in the goods still left by the agreement in them. The legal effect of the transaction, in my opinion, was, that by the indorsement of the bill of lading the legal property in the sugar was transferred to the plaintiffs, and as between them and Cottam, Morton, and Co. a legal right to the immediate actual possession of the sugar by the plaintiffs on the arrival of the ship; but by the letter of charge there was left to Cottam, Morton, and Co. an equitable right to resume the legal and absolute ownership of the sugar on repayment of the advance, and an equitable right that the plaintiffs should not for a specified time exercise any right of ownership over the sugar; but that Cottam, Morton, and Co. might exercise any such rights which would not be inconsistent with the validity of the plaintiff's security.

The relation between two such parties was likened by Willes, J., in Meyerstein v. Barber (ubi sup.), to that between a pledgor and pledgee of goods where the goods under pledge are left in or given into the actual custody of the pledgor to be used by him, but are held to be nevertheless in the constructive possession for the purpose of the validity of the pledge of the pledgee, inasmuch as without such possession there could be no valid pledge, which was nevertheless intended to be valid. I think, however, that he was speaking of the likeness of the business views in the two cases, and not of the legal view.

To say that an indorsement of a bill of lading for an advance is only a pledge, seems to me to be inconsistent with what has always been considered to be the result of Lickbarrow v. Mason (ubi sup.), namely, that such an indorsement passes the legal property.

It is suggested that the endorsement of a bill of lading when accompanied by such a letter of charge has not the same fulness of effect in passing the property as if there were no such letter of charge. But, upon consideration, I am of opinion, that an indorsement of a bill of lading for an advance does by the mercantile law of England pass absolutely the legal property in the goods to the indorsee, and a consequent right in law of immediate actual possession against all the world except someone who may have an independent superior legal right of temporary possession. The right of the borrower of an advance on an indorsement of a bill of lading is, in my opinion, an equity which exists only between him and the lender. I think the indorsement of a bill of lading for an advance has by the law merchant the same effect as a bill of sale has by the common law to pass the legal property in goods, and in either case an equity may be reserved which was still an equity though recognised by the common law courts. The plaintiffs, therefore, on the indorsement of the bill of lading to them, had, as against Cottam, Morton, and Co., and all the world, the legal property in the sugar, and as against Cottam, Morton, and Co., and all the world, except the shipowner, a legal right at common law to immediate actual possession of the sugar on the arrival of the ship. The shipowner, until the freight should be paid, had a superior legal right to temporary possession; but, on payment of the freight, the legal right to immediate possession would be in the plaintiffs, and in them alone. Cottam, Morton, and Co., as between themselves and the plaintiffs, had an equitable right to deal with the sugar as if they were still the owners of it, in any way not inconsistent with the safety of it, as a security to the plaintiffs; but any taking or giving of possession by them, otherwise than as subordinate and subject to the plaintiffs' power to take immediate actual possession, would be inconsistent with such safety. The equity existed solely as between the plaintiffs and Cottam, Morton, and Co. There was nothing to raise an equity between the plaintiffs and anyone else. As regards all other people, the sugar was absolutely and unconditionally, in law and in equity, the sugar of the plaintiffs, to which, on payment of the freight, unless some other independent right should have accrued, they would have a right of immediate actual possession. No dealing between Cottam, Morton, and Co. and other persons, unauthorised by the plaintiffs or by the law, could affect the plaintiff's rights of property and possession.

By the indorsement of the bill of lading, the plaintiffs, as it seems to me, acquired also another legal statutable right, and incurred a corresponding legal statutable liability. By the Bill of Lading Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 111), ss. 1 and 2, "Every indorsee of a bill of lading, to whom the property in the goods therein mentioned shall pass upon or by reason of such indorsement, shall have transferred to and vested in him all rights of suit, and be subject to the same liabilities in respect of such goods, as if the contract contained in the bill of lading had been made with himself. Nothing herein contained shall prejudice or affect any right to claim freight against the original shipper or owner, &c., &c." It was suggested for consideration that this statute might only apply where the indorsement and the attendant circumstances passed a complete clean transfer, untrammeled by any limitation either at law or in equity. But this cannot be without adding words to the enactment for which there appears no necessity. If in the case supposed it is assumed that the legal property in the goods has passed upon or by reason of the indorsement, the words of the statute, construed in their ordinary sense, are satisfied, and then the enactment in its ordinary sense must take effect. If it be true to say that the property does not pass, that there is no more than a pledge wherein the property does not pass, then I think the Bill of Lading Act does not apply. But as I have said, I am of opinion that the property does pass. As the statute is in my opinion applicable, the rights of suit under the contract against the shipowner, that is, the right to performance of the contract by the shipowner are transferred to the indorsee. If it were not for the subsequent part of the enactment the meaning of the word "transferred" would be that all rights and liabilities under the contract would arise and exist between the shipowner and the indorsee, and would cease between the shipowner and the original shipper and owner. All such rights and liabilities are so "transferred," that is to say, so arise and so cease, except such as are reserved by the proviso in sect. 2. No right is reserved to the original owner or shipper except the right to stop in transitu. Therefore, by virtue of the statute, the original owner or shipper has lost all accruing claims and rights to performance under the contract against the shipowner, and all such claims and rights are transferred to the indorsee. By the indorsement, therefore, Cottam, Morton, and Co. lost all rights to insist on any performance by the shipowner of the bill of lading contract, and such rights as against the shipowner were transferred to the plaintiffs, accompanied by liabilities.

As between the plaintiffs and the shipowner, the latter retained his lien upon their goods for his freight, but was bound to them, on payment of his freight, to fulfil the bill of lading obligations as to the delivery of the goods, i.e., as it seems to me, unless something intervened to relieve them, to deliver to the plaintiffs or their assigns.

The next step in the transaction which was discussed was the entry at the Custom-house. That was conducted by Cottam, Morton and Co. They might properly do so, as far as the Customs statutes were concerned, as original consignees or importers, although they had subsequently to the shipment indorsed the bill of lading. Such being the law, no one could properly be misled from the fact of their so doing into a belief that they had not indorsed the bill of lading for an advance. It follows that the fact of their conducting the Customs entry had no legal effect on the plaintiffs' rights, if any, against either the shipowner or the defendants.

The next step therefore to be examined is the deposit of the sugar for custody with the defendants, accompanied by a stop order for freight given by the captain. Assuming even that the deposit with the defendants was a deposit in fact accepted by them at the request of Cottam, Morton, and Co., and not by the sole order of the captain, the question is, what was the legal effect of the whole of that step of the transaction. If the delivery by the captain to the defendants was equivalent to a delivery to Cottam, Morton, and Co., the captain thereby lost his lien for freight. Yet if the delivery to the defendants was a delivery to them as agents of Cottam, Morton, and Co., it was equivalent to a delivery to Cottam, Morton, and Co. If the defendants accepted the goods simply as agents for Cottam, Morton, and Co., they could only have a right of action for rent against Cottam, Morton and Co., and could have no right to hold the plaintiff's property as by virtue of a lien for rent available against the plaintiffs. It is obvious, as it seems to me, from these considerations, as also even more clearly from the references in terms to the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act, which are contained in all the documents as to the reception of the sugar by the defendants, and the stop for freight by the captain, that all the three parties, the merchants, the captain, and the dock company, were dealing with the sugar not under contracts expressed, or to be implied, but solely under and subject to the enactments contained in the statute (the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, ss. 66 to 67). It follows that the legal rights and liabilities of each were those enacted by the statute, and depend as to their effect upon the true legal construction of the statute. The statute does not deal with the case of a delivery of goods to a person ready to take delivery after paying freight. It deals with the case of no such person being ready to take delivery. If the goods are landed and deposited under the statute they are assumed by it to be so landed and deposited by the captain. "Where," says sect. 67, "the owner of any goods imported in any ship" ("owner" being said by the interpretation clause to include every person who is for the time being entitled, either as owner or agent for the owner, to the possession of the goods), where the owner "fails to make entry thereof or having made entry thereof to land the same, or take delivery thereof, &c." . . . "the shipowner may make entry of and land or unship the said goods at the time, in the manner, and subject to the conditions following." A landing under this section is therefore a landing by the shipowner. The place in or into which, if he lands, he must deposit the goods is then stated. . . . The shipowner in landing goods by virtue of this enactment shall place them in or on some wharf or warehouse. "If at the time when any goods are landed from any ship and placed in the custody of any person as a wharf or warehouse owner" (which is a landing under the statute, and therefore is a landing by the shipowner) "the shipowner gives to the wharf or warehouse owner notice in writing that the goods are to remain subject to a lien for freight; or other charges payable to the shipowner, &c. . . . the goods so landed shall in the hands of the wharf or warehouse owner continue liable to the same lien, if any, for such charges as they were subject to before the landing thereof." And then the section deals with the obligation or duty of the wharfinger. "And the wharf or warehouse owner, receiving such goods (i.e., receiving under the statute), shall retain them until the lien is discharged, &c." (sect. 68). "If the lien is not discharged, &c., the wharf or warehouse owner may, and if required, &c., shall sell the said goods" (sect. 73). "In every case of any such sale the wharf or warehouse owner shall apply the moneys received from the sale as follows: first, in payment of duties; secondly, of expenses of sale; thirdly, of rents, rates, and charges due to the wharf or warehouse owner in respect of the said goods; fourthly, of the amount claimed as due for freight; and the surplus shall be paid to the owner of the goods" (sect. 75). "Whenever goods are placed in the custody of a wharf or warehouse owner under the authority of this Act, the said wharf or warehouse owner shall be entitled to rent in respect of the same, and shall also have power from time to time, at the expense of the owner of the goods, to do all such reasonable acts as in the judgment of the said wharf or warehouse owner are necessary for the proper custody and preservation of the said goods, and shall have a lien on the said goods for the said rent and expenses" (sect. 76). Now the person who is assumed to deliver the goods to the wharfinger or warehouseman, when they are treated as delivered under this statute, is the shipowner. If there were any contract with the wharfinger or warehouseman outside the statute, it must then be between him and the shipowner. There is no express contract by the shipowner to be liable to an action for rent or charges. Can it be implied that the captain who intends to sail away intends to bind himself or his owners to a contract, or that the wharfinger who knows the rights given to himself by the statute, and that the captain intends to sail away, has a right to suppose or does suppose that the captain intends to bind himself or his owners to a contract? The statute imposes in terms no contract, but it gives certain rights by way of remuneration to the wharfinger or warehouseman. These rights being so given, there seems nothing from which a contract giving any other rights can be inferred to be given by the statute. There is no contract, therefore, with the shipowner. None is given by the statute with the original consignee of the goods, or with the real owner of the goods. There is nothing from which any contract giving a right to sue for rent or charges can be inferred with either of them. There is therefore no such contract. There is no contract with any one. The remedies of the warehouseman or wharfinger are the power of sale and the lien given by the statute. Both of these take effect upon the goods, that is to say, both are effective only against him to whom the goods belong, that is to say, against the real owner of the goods at the time of the sale. There is no specific statement in the statute as to the person for whom the wharfinger or warehouseman is to hold the goods at the moment the stop for freight is taken off, no specific enactment as to the person to whom he is to deliver the goods. If he sells, the person for whom he is to hold the surplus is "the owner of the goods" (sect. 75). That must be the person whose property is sold, i.e., the real owner at the time of the sale. It follows, as it seems to me, that by the only reasonable intendment which can be made, and an intendment must be made, the wharfinger or warehouseman, by virtue of the statute, holds from the time the stop for freight is taken off, for, and is then and afterwards bound to deliver to, the real owner of the goods. If it is held that he may deliver to any one else, he may have the captain's lien and his own paid off by the owner of the goods, against whose interest such lien is alone effective, and may nevertheless deliver the goods to the person who is no longer owner.

If the wharfinger or warehouseman thus holds, as I think he does, under the statute and according to its enactments, he is not in the same position as the shipowner was whilst the goods were on board. He has different rights and different liabilities. He is not the mere agent of the shipowner. There is nothing that I can see in the statute which would authorise him to give back the goods to the shipowner. There is nothing which would make the shipowner liable for any acts of the wharfinger or warehouseman. The shipowner has no longer charge or power or liabilities with regard to the goods. He has only his right of lien for freight. The relation of the wharfinger or warehouseman to the goods is a statutory relation, with statutory rights and liabilities attaching to him, and to him alone. The statute does not give any rights to the shipowner except the right of lien after he has landed and delivered the goods. It imposes no liabilities on the shipowner. There is nothing affecting the plaintiffs' rights other than the effect produced on them by the statute. The only way in which they could have been affected by the statute would have been that their goods might have been detained or sold for the freight and charges. They were not detained or sold for either, but were sold and given up in a way not authorised by the statute.

If I am right in saying that the wharfinger or warehouseman is not identified with the shipowner, the question raised as to the right of the shipowner to deliver to the person first presenting to him a copy of the bill of lading does not arise. The bill of Lading Act does not transfer the rights and liabilities of the contract in the bill of lading from the original shipper to the indorsee, so that they should arise between him and the wharfinger or warehouseman, but only so as that they should arise between him and the shipowner. But if the defendants could rely upon the rights given to the shipowner as against the indorsee of the bill of lading by the transfer of the bill of lading contract, I do not think that the shipowner would have been excused, as against the plaintiffs, for a delivery to the order of Cottam, Morton, and Co., upon the production of the copy of the bill of lading held by them, after they had effectively and validly indorsed the whole bill of lading by indorsing a copy of it to the plaintiffs for value.

It cannot be, I think, fairly said that the plaintiffs were guilty of laches in not obtaining possession of all three copies of the bill of lading. All the courts so stated in Meyerstein v. Barber (ubi sup.), and every one conversant with business knows that no such thing is ever done.

But it is said that the captain has the right, by virtue of the words in the bill of lading, "the one of which being accomplished, the others to stand void." Can it be maintained that the meaning of these words is to impose a duty, or to give a right to the captain, under all circumstances, to deliver to the person who first presents to him a copy of the bill of lading? If so, he may, or, as they are part of the contract, must so do, although the real indorsee is present and satisfies the shipowner that he is the real indorsee; yet that was not contended, nor could it in my opinion be reasonably contended. If so, although the captain is informed by his owner, and by the real indorsee, and by the indorser during the voyage, that the bill of lading has been indorsed for value, and that his contract liability to deliver to the assigns of the indorser, has thereby by virtue of the Bill of Lading Act become a contract liability with the indorsee to deliver to him or to his assigns, he may fulfil that contract with the indorsee by delivering the goods to a person who is not the assignee of the indorsee, nor even the legal assignee of the indorser. The known practice of merchants to accept an indorsement of one copy of the bill of lading without requiring delivery of the other copies is inconsistent with this view. If the indorsement of the first copy indorsed is made whilst the ship was at sea, and made for payment of a price or an advance, the copy remaining with the captain or purser cannot in fact be then delivered up, and the indorsement of the copy to hand, if the contention be valid, would be, as it seems to me, an idle security, and the meaning of the words cited from the bill of lading, must, I think, be "the one of which bills being rightly accomplished, the other to stand void," a wrongful delivery to one of the copies of the bill cannot be an accomplishment of it intended by the contract, and is not therefore an accomplishment within the contract. This is contrary to the dictum of Dr. Lushington in the case of The Tigress (Browning and Lush. p. 36). I must respectfully differ from that dictum; it was not necessary for Dr. Lushington carefully to consider the words, neither was it for Lord Loughborough, in Lickbarrow v. Mason (ubi sup.). In both cases the observations are mere passing observations. I think the observation of Lord Westbury was merely by way of caution. The decision in H. Blackstone, if it means that the captain has a wayward choice cannot, I think, be held to be even reasonable. I am, therefore, of opinion, that the delivery of this sugar by the defendants to Williams and Co. was a wrongful delivery as against the plaintiffs who were the owners of the sugar, and who were entitled to immediate possession of it from the defendants. There was a misdelivery by the defendants of the plaintiffs' property with intent to deal with the property.

I do not think that the difficulties arising in the case of Hollins v. Fowler (ubi sup.) exist in this case. In this case the defendants delivered the goods to Williams and Co. as the property of Williams and Co., intending to pass the property to Williams and Co., when they were bound to hold them for and to deliver them to the plaintiffs alone. By the notices contained in their own habitual documents which I have set out at the beginning of this judgment, it is shown clearly, as it seems to me, that they undertook to consider and deal with the question of the right of property in the person who should demand delivery of goods placed in their custody under the statute. They assumed to deal with the delivery according to the right of property.

To sum up, then, the reasons on which my opinion is founded, they are, that Cottam, Morton, and Co., by indorsing the bill of lading, passed the legal property in the sugar to the plaintiffs, reserving to themselves nothing but an equity of redemption; that upon such an indorsement so passing the legal property, the Bills of Lading Act transferred the contract between the shipowner and Cottam, Morton, and Co. into a contract between the shipowner and the plaintiffs; that consequently the plaintiffs were in law the absolute owners of the sugar, with a contract from the shipowner to deliver to them upon payment of freight. The shipowner was bound by contract to deliver to the plaintiffs, but with a right by statute to hand the sugar according to the terms of the statute to a dock company if the freight was not paid on arrival. The shipowner did hand the plaintiff's sugar to the defendants. He handed it under and according to the statute, and the defendants accepted the sugar, the plaintiff's sugar, under and according to the statute, and there was no contract between the defendants and the plaintiffs, or between the defendants and the shipowner, or between the defendants and Cottam, Morton, and Co. The defendants were bound by a statutory duty to hold the sugar until the freight was paid, and when it was paid to hold it for and deliver it to the plaintiffs, the holders of the bill of lading, and the defendants, contrary to such duty, and therefore, wrongfully, delivered the plaintiffs' sugar to Williams and Co. That is a conversion. If the defendants could be said to be in the same position as the shipowner, a similar delivery by the shipowner would have been a conversion. I am of opinion, for these reasons, that the judgment of Field, J. should be affirmed.

Bramwell, L.J. (judgment read by Baggallay, L.J.)—This case is, I think, one of very great difficulty—a difficulty arising from there being an unreality in the delivery of the goods in question to the plaintiffs, that delivery being symbolical. An unreality in the alleged cause of action, viz., a conversion of those goods to the use of the defendants, which, as a matter of actual fact, is untrue, from the unusual facts of the case, and, as far as I am concerned, from a want of an intimate and familiar acquaintance with the practice of merchants and bankers, shipowners and warehousemen, the Customs, the other matters which have to be considered. It is not necessary for me to state the facts—my brother Brett has favoured me with his judgment, where they are, as I think, correctly stated, save that, with submission, I cannot quite appreciate them as he does.

I do not think that the property in the sugars was passed to the plaintiffs with an equity of redemption or some other equity in Cottam and Co. I think that what took place was a pledge at common law, with a right in the plaintiffs to sell in certain events, and with a common law right to redeem in Cottam and Co. I think if there had been, instead of a symbolical, an actual delivery of goods from Cottam and Co. to the plaintiffs on the same terms, as, for instance, of a case of diamonds, that the general property would not have been transferred, but would have remained in Cottam and Co. The plaintiffs having only a special property and right of possession, I cannot think that any action could have been maintained against them under the Bills of Lading Act for the freight, nor any action by the dock company for warehouse rent, or charges, or otherwise, supposing such action would lie against some one. The plaintiffs, however, by the handing over to them of the bill of lading indorsed under the agreement, acquired special property and right of possession. And I cannot doubt that, as against an actual wrong-doer and against any person who had actually converted the sugars to his own use, as by consumption or sale, or dealt with them under a claim of title, they might have maintained an action such as the present, as they would have been able to do if the supposed case of diamonds had been taken from them and delivered to a person who sold them or used them, and would not give them up.

Why, then, is not this action maintainable? The plaintiffs have a special property, and the defendants have disposed of the goods in a way they had no right to do. My difficulty is to see that the plaintiffs have made out the latter part of the proposition. It must be remembered that this is an action for conversion. If the defendants have disposed of the goods according to the terms on which they received them, having no notice of any claim, title, or right other than that of the person from whom they received them, it is clear that they have not converted them to their own use, that they are not guilty of a conversion—indeed, have done nothing wrong. A man steals a chattel and takes it to a carrier to be carried to A., and there delivered to X. The carrier takes, carries, and delivers the chattels accordingly; it is clear and settled law that he would not be guilty of a conversion. A case more like the present would be where the chattel was taken by mistake, and handed to the carrier and then carried and delivered by him. In that case clearly the carrier would not be liable to the true owner. Have the defendants done anything more than the equivalent of this? This involves an examination as to who it was from whom they received the goods, and on what terms did they receive them?

In my opinion, in such cases as these, as a rule, where there are no special circumstances a warehouseman receives the goods from the ship or ship's captain on the terms of holding them for the ship till the freight is paid, and there and thenceforth of holding them to deliver to such person as the shipowner or captain would have been justified in delivering them to under the bill of lading. This is Willes, J.'s opinion in Meyerstein v. Barber (ubi sup.). This, however, is subject to further considerations arising out of the particular facts of this case, to which I shall afterwards call attention. I think these are the general terms on which such warehousemen as the defendants receive goods with a stop for freight, and, with submission, I think nothing turns on any statute, private or public. This also seems to me the opinion of Willes, J. (ubi sup.) I think the question is the same as it would be if the goods had been warehoused in the private warehouse of the shipowners, or of any other warehouseman, where, consistently with Customs laws and regulations, they could have been warehoused, or if they had been left on the quay where the ship discharged, but in the custody of someone who was not to give them up till the freight was paid. I cannot think that the duty and right of the shipowner were other and different because he discharged his cargo instead of keeping it on board, and I cannot think that the warehouseman undertakes a different duty to that of the shipowner. I set no value on the company having struck out from the manifest the word "consignee." For "deliver to the consignee or holder of the bill of lading" is the same as "deliver to the holder of the bill of lading." For "deliver to the consignee" means "deliver to him if he is the holder of the bill of lading." Of course some light is thrown on the matter by the terms of the various statutes, as showing what are the mercantile usage and practice; but I cannot think that the case is governed by them.

Then, would the captain of the ship have been justified in delivering the goods to Cottam and Co. on production of their bill of lading, and tender of the freight? I cannot bring myself to say he would not. I think if that is to be said it should be by the ultimate Court of Appeal. Nearly a century and a half ago it was held in a much stronger case, viz., when the captain had notice of the true title, that he was justified in preferring the holder of one bill of lading to the holder of another really entitled. That decision was approved in Lickbarrow v. Mason (ubi sup.), and by Dr. Lushington in The Tigress. It was not disapproved in Meyerstein v. Barber, and it is the undoubted practice to deliver without inquiry to any one who produces a bill of lading.

Then there are the words of the bill of lading, "one of which being accomplished, the other two to stand void." It struck me in the argument of the case that the terms of the bill of lading were against this contention, because the bill of lading says the goods are to be delivered to it, or order, or assignees, in this case to Cottam and Co. or assignees, and that ought to be read to Cottam and Co., or, if they assign, to their assignees, and that the meaning of "one being accomplished, the other two to stand void," is, as my brother Brett puts it, one being rightly accomplished, the other two to stand void. I will not say that is not a possible meaning. The bill of lading could not mean, to be delivered to them though they have assigned, or to their assignees, whichever presents the bill of lading. Another argument occurred to me, viz., suppose a bill of lading so indorsed and stolen, would a delivery to the thief, the bearer, be a good delivery; if not, why was this? If a carrier received goods to carry to A. and hold till called for by X., and Y. came and represented himself to be X., a delivery to Y. would be a misdelivery and a conversion according to the authorities. If so, why was not this? An answer given is that in the case supposed the thief would not be the lawful owner of the bill of lading, and Y. would be committing a fraud and a crime, viz., obtaining goods under false pretences, whereas here Messrs. Cottam have lawful possession of them. I may observe, however, that Y. in the case put is not necessarily guilty of a crime; he may bonâ fide believe that the goods were for him, that he is entitled to represent X. Still he would be a tortious holder of the bill of lading, which Cottam was not. I confess to be very much embarrassed by these arguments pro and con. Looking as I do on a bill of lading as a mere receipt for the goods, I should construe it as my brother Brett does. But, whatever their weight, there are the authorities to which I have referred, and there is the undoubted practice I have mentioned of delivering the goods to him who presents a bill of lading; and there is the possibility expressed in Meyerstein v. Barber that the captain might not be liable in respect of a delivery under such circumstances. If liable on his contract to carry and to deliver to the consignee or his assignee, he would be liable as in a conversion. He is indeed endeavouring to perform his contract; but so is a carrier who delivers to Y., believing him to be X., to whom he was to deliver. I may notice that, in the case before Lee, C.J., (Fearon v. Bowers (ubi sup.), the action was in detinue against the captain, which would have been maintainable if trover would have been, and e converso. On these grounds, I should hesitate long before deciding for the plaintiffs.

But there are other considerations in this case, which, I think, entitle the defendants to judgment. We are judges here of fact and law. Cottam and Co. retained the bill of lading in their hands with the assent of the plaintiffs, who had notice by the terms of the one deposited with them that there were two other originals, and which they must or ought to have known were, or that one would be, in Cottam and Co.'s hands. The plaintiffs, according to my view knew that the absolute property remained in Cottam and Co., and that they, the plaintiffs, were only pledgees. The plaintiffs in no way interfere or act on the arrival of the ship. This can be and is done by an assignee of a consignee, who watches for the announcement of the ship's arrival. But Cottam and Co. act as the consignees and persons entitled to the cargo, enter the goods at the Customs, direct where they shall be warehoused, pay the freight, and take such steps at the docks as owners would do. Cottam and Co., by the agreement with the plaintiffs, were to insure the goods in their own name against fire, receive the sum insured if there was a loss, and pay it to the plaintiffs. I cannot doubt, and I find that all this was done with the consent of the plaintiffs. I have no doubt they intended that should be done which was done, except, perhaps, the giving of the delivery order to Williams. I impute no laches to the plaintiffs. I have no doubt that nothing they intended to do was left undone by them, and that they intended Cottam to do what he did, except, perhaps, as I have said, to give the delivery order to Williams. The general property in the goods was, as I have said, I think, in Cottam and Co., and, as my brother Brett says, it was intended that Cottam and Co. should do all the owner's acts, that they should have power to sell and give immediate delivery orders, and that the goods should not be entered in the plaintiffs' name at the docks, so that on a sale by Cottam and Co. either the delivery order would have had to be given by Glyn and Co. or a transfer made by them to Cottam and Co., and then a delivery order given by them. The plaintiffs never supposed they were to be liable for freight or warehouse rent, or that they were in any way to see to the goods. They might, if they had thought fit, have watched the arrival of the ship and landed the goods; they might have required a transfer from Cottam and Co., or given notice to the defendants of their title. They did nothing, and they did nothing for a long time after Cottam and Co.'s insolvency, and then they inquired about the goods in a way showing that they had trusted to Cottam and Co. and did not know their own position and rights. It is said that to hold this is to say they had no security. That is not so. They had a perfectly good title against a vendee of Cottam, against an execution creditor, and against a trustee in bankruptcy, saving the question of reputed ownership, as to which I am by no means certain they would have any answer to a claim by such trustee. I am by no means satisfied that these goods were not in the reputed ownership of Cottam and Co. with the plaintiffs' consent within the bankruptcy law. I think Cottam and Co. had with their consent taken upon themselves the sale and disposition as owners of these goods, and that which shows that shows also the state of facts which gives rise to this defence. I have said that perhaps Cottam and Co. ought not, without the plaintiffs' leave, to have given the delivery order for these goods to Williams. Undoubtedly it could not have been intended that the goods pledged should be sold and transferred if of any considerable amount. But I cannot help thinking that as to a small parcel like the present no difficulty would have been made, and that it would not have been necessary for Cottam and Co. to run to the plaintiffs for leave to dispose of a hogshead of sugar. Certainly I have no doubt, and find as a fact, that according to the contemplation of both parties the sale might be first and the leave asked for, if at all, afterwards. This being my view of the facts, I come to the conclusion that with the assent of the plaintiffs (though I think that not necessary), the defendants received the goods to hold for the ship till the freight was paid, and then to hold at the order and disposition of Cottam and Co.; consequently that delivering them to Cottam and Co.'s orders was no conversion of which the plaintiffs can complain, and that the judgment must be reversed.

I say the assent of the plaintiffs is not essential, because, if Cottam warehoused the goods in their names without the plaintiffs' assent, it might be wrong in Cottam, but a delivery by the defendants to Cottam would not be a conversion.

It is scarcely necessary to add that I find no fault with the eminent firm who are plaintiffs for bringing this action. A wrong has been done by Cottam and Co., and the question arises on whom is the loss to fall? The plaintiffs are advised not on them but on the defendants, and have accordingly properly brought this action; I could not blame them for so doing, unless I blamed them for adopting an opinion which I have come to several times in the course of the arguments and consideration of this case.

I am sorry that in the conclusion I differ from my brother Brett, but it is not a difference on any principle of law, but one in our appreciation of the facts. He considers that the defendants received the goods to hold, after payment of freight, for the person entitled to present possession as against all the world. I think on the particular facts of this case that the defendants received them with the consent of the plaintiffs to deliver them, after payment of freight, to Cottam and Co., or their order. I think it would be very hard if it were otherwise, and while I admit on the one hand that hard cases make bad law, I contend on the other hand that the fact that a case is hard is primâ facie proof that it is not law. The plaintiffs are not without remedy; they have one against Cottam and Co. and another against Williams, unless, indeed, they are taken to have authorised the delivery to them. If they have authorised that, it is clear they have none against the defendants. It is said that the defendants might have protected themselves by requiring the second bill of lading; the answer is that is not customary. Further, the plaintiffs might have protected themselves that way and many others.

I cannot agree with my brother Field's judgment, which I have most carefully studied. He does not view the facts as I do. Further, as to the law, he says, and says most truly, that treating the defendants as bailees of Cottam and Co., they had no better title than Cottam. But, with great respect, I cannot agree to the consequence he puts. The same would be true of a carrier who carried for the thief a stolen chattel, but the carrying and delivering would not make a conversion or any wrongful act. The defendants did not act as on a title.

The same conclusion in favour of the defendants may, I think, be arrived at in a different way. This is an action for conversion; the alleged conversion is a delivery to the order of Cottam and Co. If the defendants received the goods to deliver to the order of Cottam and Co., then the delivery to their order is no conversion whether Cottam had authority so to deal with the goods or not. Now, I think Cottam had such authority from the plaintiffs intentionally, though whether intentionally or not is unimportant. But suppose Cottam had not actually such authority, I still think they were permitted by the plaintiffs to have the appearance of it, and that the plaintiffs cannot be heard to say that Cottam had it not; still further, if Cottam had no authority, actual or apparent, and if their assumption of it was wholly wrongful, yet even then, if all the defendants did was to receive from Cottam to deliver to their order, and delivered accordingly, they are not guilty of a conversion. Supposing that not to be so, a more difficult question would arise. If all that appeared was that the ship landed the goods with a stop for freight, then no doubt it must be taken that the defendants received the goods on the terms in which the ship, or captain, delivered them to the defendants. What were they? It cannot be supposed that the captain delivered the goods to the defendants to deliver to any one to whom he would not be justified in delivering them, and so the question would arise whether he would have been justified by a delivery to a de facto lawful holder of a bill of lading. This, for the reasons I have given, I think we need not determine.

Baggallay, L.J.—The action in which this appeal is brought is founded upon an alleged conversion by the defendants of certain sugar and rum forming part of the cargoes of three vessels, the Mary Jones, the Tropic, and the Anglo-Indian, and which in the spring of 1878 had been shipped by the said vessels from the West Indies, and consigned to Messrs. Cottam, Morton, and Co., of London. The circumstances affecting the goods shipped by each of the vessels were, so far as the present action is concerned, in all respects similar, and the arguments, both on the trial before Field, J. and on the present appeal, were confined to the case of some twenty hogsheads of sugar which had been shipped by the Mary Jones. I shall confine my observations to these goods, and in doing so, I shall abstain from entering into any details of the facts, as they have been already fully stated by Brett, L.J. It must, however, be borne in mind that on the 15th May, whilst the vessel was still at sea, Messrs. Cottam, as consignees of the goods, delivered one part of the bill of lading, duly indorsed, to the plaintiffs, as a collateral security for an advance of 13,000*l*., to be repaid on the 15th of July; that the vessel arrived in the port of London on the 18th May, when the goods were landed and delivered into the custody of the defendants, and that eventually, though in ignorance of the plaintiffs' title or of any claim on their part, the defendants delivered them to Messrs. Williams under an order signed by Messrs. Cottam, and dated the 2nd July.

Several questions of great interest and of more or less difficulty have arisen in the course of the arguments; of such questions the principal may be stated in the following terms: 1. What are the duties and corresponding responsibilities of a shipowner, acting through the master of his ship, when a demand is made for the delivery of goods, accompanied by a tender of the amount of freight due in respect of them by a party producing the ostensible indicia of ownership, but having in fact no right or title to them by reason of his having previously delivered to another party, for value, an endorsed part of the bill of lading? and 2. What are the duties and corresponding responsibilities of a dock proprietor or warehouseman into whose custody the goods have been delivered, under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1862, who, whilst in ignorance of any previous or other dealing with the goods, is in like manner applied to for their delivery by a party who is apparently the true owner? Are such duties and responsibilities similar to, or in what respects do they differ from, the duties and responsibilities of a shipowner under the circumstances just mentioned?

Field, J., who tried the action without a jury, gave judgment for the plaintiffs on the 23rd Jan. 1880, and from his judgment the present appeal is brought.

Now, I take it to be clear that upon an application of well-recognised and established principles to the admitted facts of the present case, the following propositions are unquestionable: 1. That the effect of the delivery by Messrs. Cottam to the plaintiffs on the 15th May of the indorsed bill of lading, the other parts of the original set of three not having been previously dealt with, was to pass to the plaintiffs the property represented by it, and to confer upon them the right to the possession of such goods upon the arrival of the Mary Jones in the port of London, subject, nevertheless, to the payment of the freight due to the shipowner. 2. That it was immaterial that the bill of lading so indorsed was the first, or rather, that numbered as "first" of the set, and that the plaintiffs would have acquired an equally good title to the goods if the bill of lading so indorsed had been that numbered "second" or "third" of the set, provided the others had not been previously dealt with. 3. That it was not necessary for the plaintiffs to give any notice to the master of the Mary Jones, or to the defendants as owners of the docks where the goods were warehoused after being landed from the vessel, or to do any other act in order to perfect or assert their title to the goods as against persons acquiring possession of or laying claim to the same under any subsequent dealings with the other parts of the bill of lading or any delivery order obtained from the consignees or any persons claiming under them. The principles involved in these three propositions were affirmed by the House of Lords in Barber v. Meyerstein (ubi sup.), if any affirmation were necessary of what appear to have been previously well-recognised principles of mercantile law.

It is a consequence of the principle involved in the third of these propositions that every person who makes an advance upon a bill of lading without ascertaining in whose custody the other parts remain, does so at the risk of such other parts having been previously dealt with; and in like manner every person who, after the bill of lading has been accomplished, makes an advance upon a delivery order without inquiring as to the bill of lading, does so at the risk of the property in the goods having been passed to some other person by virtue of the bill of lading. The party making the advance in either case runs this risk, and must take the consequences if the result turns out to his detriment. That he can protect himself, if he thinks fit, against such risks is clear from the report of the case to which I have already alluded of Barber v. Meyerstein (ubi sup.) In that case, the Chartered Mercantile Bank of India not only took the precaution of having all three parts of the bill of lading delivered to them at the time of their making the advance, but, as a further protection, lodged a stop order upon the goods in the warehouses, and by the adoption of these precautions prevented any dealing with the goods until their stop was released. Moreover, Meyerstein, when making his advance, after the claims of the bank had been satisfied, and the three parts of the bill of lading had been returned to the consignees, obtained two of the three parts of the bill of lading, and only did not press for the third because he was led to believe, or was under the belief, that it was still in the hands of the master.

It would follow from these considerations that in the absence of any modifying circumstances, which may, though I am not aware that they do, exist in the present case, the title of the plaintiffs to the goods, and their right to recover their value as against Messrs. Williams, who have obtained possession of them under the delivery order of Messrs. Cottam, would be clear. Both parties ran the risks to which I have adverted; neither of them made or deemed it necessary to make any inquiry as to the custody of the other parts of the bill of lading. In the case of the plaintiffs, their confidence was well founded. Their title has not been interferred with by reason of the other parts of the bill of lading having been previously dealt with, but as regards Messrs. Williams, their claim to the goods could not prevail against that of the plaintiffs, to whom the property in the goods had passed under their indorsed part of the bill of lading.

Though, however, it was not necessary for the plaintiffs to give any notice, or to do any act to perfect their title as against Messrs. Williams, considerations of a very different character would arise if the plaintiffs had by any act or conduct on their part led or induced Messrs. Williams to believe that Messrs. Cottam had authority to deal with the goods as their own. At first sight it appears somewhat strange that no notice was given by the plaintiffs to the master of the vessel or to the defendants not to part with the goods otherwise than to themselves, and still more so that it was not until some time after Messrs. Cottam had gone into liquidation that the plaintiffs made any claim in respect of the goods or any inquiry about them; but it is not suggested that in so acting or abstaining from acting the course pursued by the plaintiffs was different from the usual practice of bankers who make advances on bills of lading. The practice has doubtless been adopted for the convenience of those engaged in like mercantile transactions, and it is based upon the confidence of the banker that the consignees will neither fraudulently nor negligently so deal with the goods as to occasion him loss in respect of his advance, and to some extent, perhaps, upon a confidence in the solvency of the consignee. In the present case, had Messrs. Cottam remained solvent no difficulties would have arisen; their liability to the plaintiffs would have been clear, and they would doubtless have discharged themselves from it. That it was within the contemplation of the plaintiffs that Messrs. Cottam would, or might, to some extent, and without any previous communication with the plaintiffs deal with the goods as their own, appears to me to be beyond doubt.

But assuming the rights of the plaintiffs against Messrs. Williams to be clear, the question remains whether it is equally clear, as the respondents have contended, that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover from the defendants the value of the goods delivered by the defendants to Messrs. Williams and Co. I think they are not so entitled, and I proceed to state the grounds upon which I have arrived at this conclusion.

In Barber v. Meyerstein, though it was held that the legal ownership of the goods acquired by Meyerstein, who, in consideration of an advance to the consignees, first got the bill of lading, must prevail, as against Barber, who was the holder of a subsequently taken part of the same set, the question was left open whether a shipowner might not be excused who, having no notice of an earlier dealing with a bill of lading, delivered the goods to a person who produced to him another part, which had been subsequently dealt with. In the course of his judgment Lord Westbury said: "It might possibly happen that the shipowner having no notice of the first dealing with the bill of lading, may, on the second bill being presented by another party, be justified in delivering the goods to that party. But, although that might be a discharge to the shipowner, it will in no respect affect the legal ownership of the goods, for the legal ownership of the goods must still remain in the first holder for value of the bill of lading, because he had the legal right in the property." It is quite true, as has been pressed upon us in argument, that the judgment in Barber v. Meyerstein was in no respect based upon the distinction, so suggested by Lord Westbury, between the position relatively to the first holder for value of a bill of lading, of a person who, by virtue of another part of the same bill subsequently dealt with, has acquired possession of the goods represented by it, and that of a shipowner who, in ignorance of the existence of a first holder, has delivered the goods to a person producing the ostensible indicia of title to them; but in my opinion such distinction is not only not inconsistent with general principles, but is based upon an equitable foundation. Let us examine it a little closer. The party who upon the hypothesis obtains possession of the goods, obtains possession of that to which he has no legal title, though he, as well as the first holder, may have given valuable consideration for it. For convenience, or for some other reason satisfactory to himself, he abstained at the time when he made his advance from making those inquiries which, if made, might have protected him. He must have known, or he must be presumed to have known, that, as he had not all the parts of the bill of lading, it was at least possible that some other part had been previously dealt with, and that, if so, the claim under it would be entitled to preference over his own; and in the event the possibility becomes a reality. Has he any equity which should prevail against the legal title of the first holder? I think not. But the position of the shipowner who, in ignorance of any previous dealing with the bill of lading, delivers the goods to the consignee or to a person producing an indorsed part of a bill of lading, is very different. He acts strictly in accordance with his contract. There is no question of title as between him and the first holder whose rights have been interfered with; if responsible to the first holder at all, he is responsible in respect of something which he has improperly done or omitted to do. What course can be suggested as proper to be pursued by the shipowner acting through the master, other than that of delivering the goods to the person who, either as consignee or as holder of an indorsed bill of lading, tenders the freight and demands such delivery? Upon the hypothesis there is no rival claimant; there is nothing in the surrounding circumstances to suggest a title to the goods in any person other than the party claiming them. Is the master to inquire of the party before him whether there is an absent legal owner? Is he to insist upon a production of all the other parts of the bill of lading, even though a plausible reason be assigned for their not being produced? Is he under such circumstances to deliver the goods at the peril of having to account for their value in the event of the alleged reason for the non-production of the several parts of the bill of lading proving to have been fraudulently or otherwise falsely assigned; or is he to refuse to deliver them if he desires to keep himself free from loss? Furthermore, is he to pursue the same course with reference to every separate consignment of which his whole cargo may be made up? It would be impossible for a shipowner to carry on his business if he were to adopt the only course which prudence would dictate in such a position of responsibility. And the question naturally suggests itself, why should the shipowner be required to take all these precautions for the protection of a first holder who has not thought it necessary to take any precaution for his own protection?

In the view which I take of this case it is unnecessary to consider whether the decision in Fearon v. Bowers (1 H. Bl. 364) is one which should be followed in the present day. In that case there were rival claimants for the goods, and the effect of the decision, as it has been commonly understood, was, that the master had under such circumstances a right to deliver to whichever he thought proper, and would be fully discharged by a delivery to either. That decision was cited with approval by Lord Loughborough in Lickbarrow v. Mason, and by Dr. Lushington in the case of The Tigress; and though the case of The Tigress was cited during the argument in Barber v. Meyerstein in the House of Lords, no dissent from the principle involved in it was expressed in any of the judgments. But notwithstanding the weight of authority to which I have just referred, I should, as at present advised, hesitate before adopting the rule that the master has in all cases an unlimited right of selection between rival claimants. I, however, readily adopt the more guarded suggestion of Lord Westbury, that the shipowner who is ignorant of any previous dealing with the bill of lading may be justified in delivering the goods to the party presenting the ostensible indicia of ownership. Adopting this view of the responsibilities of the shipowner, I should have had no hesitation in holding that, if the goods had remained on board the Mary Jones instead of being landed, he would have been discharged by the delivery of them to Messrs. Williams upon a delivery order of Messrs. Cottam after payment of the freight.

In the present case, however, we have to deal not with the acts or defaults of the shipowner, but with the acts of a dock company, into whose custody the goods have been delivered.

On the part of the appellants, the defendants the dock company, it has been contended that, under the circumstances of the present case, their responsibilities to the plaintiffs as first holders of the bill of lading were the same as were those of the shipowner whilst the goods remained on board his vessel, and that, inasmuch as the master or the shipowner would not have been responsible to the plaintiffs for the value of the goods if delivered from the vessel to Messrs. Williams upon the directions of Messrs. Cottam, the defendants are in like manner free from any responsibility to the plaintiffs in respect of their delivery to Messrs. Williams upon the order of Messrs. Cottam. In my opinion this contention is well founded. It appears to me that, in the absence of any special circumstances, of which I can find no trace in the present case, the considerations to which I have already adverted as applicable to the responsibilities of the shipowner apply with at least equal force to the responsibilities of the dock proprietor, in whose warehouse the goods are deposited after being landed from the vessel.

The respondents, however, contend that the responsibilities of the defendants in respect of the deposit of the goods in their warehouse were regulated by the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1862, and that under such provisions the defendants were bound to hold the goods (subject to duties, to their own claim for rent, and to the shipowner's claim for freight), for the rightful holder of the bill of lading; and that inasmuch as the plaintiffs alone filled that character, the delivery of the goods to Messrs. Williams was a wrongful dealing with the goods for which the defendants are responsible to the plaintiffs. In support of this contention it has been urged that the deposit of the goods was not made upon the instructions or at the instance of Messrs. Cottam, as ostensible owners of the goods, but by the master availing himself of the statute and with the view of securing a continuance of his lien for freight after the goods were landed and warehoused, and that it was understood and intended by him, as also by Messrs. Cottam and the defendants, that the goods should be dealt with under the provisions of the statute.

Having regard to all the facts and circumstances of the case, I have arrived at the conclusion that the landing and warehousing of the goods was the result of an arrangement between the three parties, the master as representing the shipowner, Messrs. Cottam the consignees and ostensible owners of the goods, and the dock company, and it may I think be assumed that the master in entering into such arrangements intended to secure a continuance of his lien for freight upon the goods after they were deposited in the defendants' warehouses, and to obtain the benefit of all the provisions of the statute in that behalf; he was within the terms of the statute when he landed the goods, for, though entry had been made, the owner had failed to land or to take delivery of them; his notice of stoppage for freight was expressed to be given under the provisions of the statute, as was also the subsequent notice of removal after the freight had been paid.

What then was the effect of the arrangement so entered into by the master, Messrs. Cottam, and the dock company, and of the landing and warehousing of the goods consequent thereon? It appears to me that the rights of all parties and their responsibilities also were thenceforth regulated by the provisions of the statute so far, but so far only, as such provisions were applicable to the circumstances of the case; but that in all other respects their rights and responsibilities were the same as they would have been had no such statute been in force.

If this be so, to what extent were the provisions of the statute applicable? It would appear to have been the object of the Legislature to enable the shipowner, in a case in which the owner was not ready to take delivery, to land and warehouse the goods, and at the same time to preserve his lien for freight; but that it was not intended to interfere with the rights or responsibilities of persons interested or claiming to be interested in the goods further than was necessary to attain that object. Under its provisions the shipowner may in certain events land the goods and deposit them in a warehouse and by giving notice to the warehouse owner that the freight in respect of such goods has not been paid, may secure a lien upon them for its amount whilst they remain in the warehouse, and in the event of such lien not being discharged a sale may, or, at the instance of the shipowner, must, be made by the warehouse owner; should such a sale be made the warehouse owner is to hold the surplus of the proceeds, after discharge of duties, rent, and freight, for the holder of the bill of lading. It may well be in the present case that, if the lien for freight had not been discharged, the defendants would have exercised the power of sale given to them by the statute, and the several provisions of the statute applicable to such a state of circumstances would then have come into force; but there was no occasion for the exercise of any such power, inasmuch as the freight had been paid, and the purpose for which the captain had concurred in the landing and warehousing of the goods had been accomplished. The defendants had doubtless acquired under the statute a lien for their rent, and for any expenses incurred by them in respect of the goods; but such lien could only be enforced in the usual way, viz., by detaining the goods until the claim was satisfied.

I can find nothing in the statute which in terms, or, in my opinion, impliedly declares or directs that, after satisfaction of the shipowner's lien, and of their own, the dock company shall hold any goods delivered to them under its provisions for the holder of the bill of lading. On the contrary, it appears to me that after such satisfaction it was incumbent upon the dock company, and especially so in the absence of any notice of right or title to the goods in any other person, to deal with them as directed by those who were the ostensible owners of them at the time of their deposit, and who as such ostensible owners had concurred in placing them in their custody, and that by so dealing with the goods the defendants have not come under any liability to the plaintiffs in the present action.

It has been further, or rather in the alternative, contended on the part of the respondents that the defendants should be regarded as the bailees of Messrs. Cottam, and that so regarded they could have as against the plaintiffs no better title than their bailors, and could in no way justify the delivery of the goods upon their order, and this view of the case appears to have been regarded by Field, J. as its true result. That the goods were landed and deposited in the defendants' warehouse at the instance of Messrs. Cottam, though with the concurrence of the captain, is, in my opinion, in accordance with the proved and admitted facts of the case. I assent also to the proposition that the defendants acquired no better title to the goods than that of Messrs. Cottam, but there is no question in the present case of any title to the goods in the defendants; it is clear that they never had any, nor has it ever been suggested that they had.

The only question, as it appears to me, upon the hypothesis of the defendants being the bailees of Messrs. Cottam, is, whether the defendants, having in their possession goods delivered to them by and as the goods of Messrs. Cottam, and to be disposed of according to the order of Messrs. Cottam, though in fact being the goods of the plaintiffs, can be held liable to the plaintiffs for disposing of them upon the order of Messrs. Cottam. I am of opinion that they cannot; they dealt with the goods in the ordinary course of their business as dock proprietors and warehousemen, and in the manner and for the purpose for which they were deposited with them.

It is doubtless true, as was pointed out by Field, J. in his judgment, that the facts of the present case are in many respects different from those in Hollins v. Fowler (ubi sup.); indeed, in that case it was held that there had been a conversion; but adopting the general views expressed by Lord, then Mr. Justice, Blackburn, in the course of the answer given by him to the question submitted to the judges by the House of Lords, I can arrive at no other conclusion than that the defendants have not in the present case been guilty of conversion. I agree therefore with Bramwell, L.J. in holding that the appeal must be disallowed.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

EXCHEQUER DIVISION.

Reported by W. E. Gordon, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

June 14 and 29, 1880.

(Before Pollock, B.)

The Marine Mutual Insurance Association Limited v. Young and another.

Marine mutual insurance association—Company, incorporated and registered—Construction of rules of—Policy, form of—Common seal of company and signature of manager—Subscribing names of members unnecessary—Contract between assured and company—Stamp Act (30 & 31 Vict. c. 23), s. 7.

Where the rules of a mutual insurance company provide that a member making default in payment of contributions shall forfeit all claims for losses or average under his policies, but shall remain liable for his contributions, a member making default cannot in an action for contributions counter-claim for the losses and averages sustained by him.

Where a mutual policy is issued duly stamped by a limited company, it is sufficiently signed under the stamp Act (30 & 31 Vict. c. 23), s. 7, if it is sealed with the seal of the company and authenticated by the manager.

Further Consideration.

Action brought to recover the sum of 166*l.* 16*s.* 6*d.*, the balance of an account for premiums and calls alleged to be due from the defendants to the plaintiffs upon certain policies of insurance effected on three ships of the defendants called the Athol, Fanny M. Carvill, and Laura and Isabel.

The plaintiffs were a company, limited by guarantee, and not having a capital divided into shares, which was incorporated and duly registered under the Companies Acts.

The company was established for the mutual insurance of ships belonging to its members, and a person became a member by insuring any ship, or share or shares in a ship, in pursuance of the articles of association and the rules annexed thereto.

The following are the material parts of the policy of insurance, the rules indorsed in the policy, and the articles of association referred to in the judgment of the court:

Now this policy of insurance witnesseth that in consideration of the premises, and of the observance by the said insured of the said rules, the Marine Mutual Insurance Association Limited do hereby agree with the said insured that the members of the said Class 2—Marine Mutual—shall, according to the provisions of the articles of association of the said association, and the rules of the said class, as such rules are endorsed on this policy and subject to the proviso hereinafter contained, be subject and liable to pay and make good, and shall pay and make good, all such losses and damages as are hereinafter expressed, which may happen to the ship hereinafter named, and may attach to this policy, in respect of the sum of 800*l.* hereby insured, which insurance is hereby declared to be upon the ship called the Athol, valued at 1000*l.* . . . . Provided always, and it is hereby specially agreed that the association, under all their policies of insurance of the said class, shall be liable in the whole only to the extent of so much of the funds as the said association is able to recover from the members of the said class, and their respective executors and administrators liable for the same, and which, under and by virtue of the articles of association and of the rules of the said class, are for the time being applicable for the purpose of paying claims under this and other policies issued in respect of the said class.

Rule 4.—Liability of members.—That the members of this class shall severally and respectively, not jointly or in partnership, nor the one for the other of them, but each only in his own name, insure each other's ships or shares of ships from noon of the 20th day of February 1877, or from the date of entry of each vessel respectively, until noon of the 20th day of February then next, and from that time until noon of the 20th day of February in the next succeeding year, and so on from year to year, unless notice to the contrary be given as hereinafter mentioned, against all losses, perils, and damages of what nature or kind soever which may be sustained or received by their respective ships, or caused or done by them, except for personal injury, loss of life, or when on the voyages, in the trades, or under the circumstances hereinafter particularly excepted.

Rule 4.—Rate of premiums.—That in order to provide for payment of claims, the manager shall be entitled, and is hereby empowered to levy contributions and draw for at two months date from 1st March, 1st June, 1st September, and 1st December, one-fourth part of the annual premiums, ... such contributions to form a fund for that purpose. Provided always, that if the losses and expenses for the year exceed the amount of premiums so realised, the deficiency shall be made good by an additional call or calls pro ratâ on the premiums paid, to be drawn for in like manner, which the members of this class shall respectively be bound to contribute and pay to the manager. But should the premiums so realised exceed the losses and expenses incurred, then the surplus to be returned in proportion to the amount of premium respectively contributed by them.

Rule 6.—Payment of premiums.—That the manager's drafts on any member of this class for his proportion of the annual estimated premium, and for any additional percentage thereon, shall be duly accepted, payable in London, and punctually paid when due; and if any member shall neglect, admit, or refuse to accept any such drafts, or to pay his contributions thereto, he shall thenceforth forfeit all claims for or in respect of any loss or average under his policy or policies effected therein; but he shall still remain liable to contribute to all losses and averages which may occur during the period for which any such policy was originally granted, and the manager is hereby authorised and empowered to sue for the amount due from any defaulting member.

Rule 21.—Renewal of policies.—That any member intending not to renew his policy on its expiration at the next succeeding Feb. 20th, shall give to the manager notice in writing of such intention twenty days at least before such expiration; and if such notice shall not be given then such policy shall be renewed, except in cases where the committee may deem it improper to renew the same, when they shall cause a similar notice to be given to the parties concerned; but in either case, when a ship may be at sea on the expiration of the policy, the manager shall, if required by the assured, grant a new one from that date until the ship's arrival at her next port of destination or until arrival at her port of destination in the United Kingdom.

Article 39.—Every engagement or liability of a member of the association in respect of any insurance or protection shall for all purposes relating to enforcing such engagement or liability be deemed to be an engagement or liability by or on the part of such member to the association and not to any other member or members, and all moneys payable thereunder shall be paid to the association.

Article 40.—All claims in respect of insurances shall be made and enforced against the association only, and not against any members thereof, but the association shall not be liable to any member or other person for the amount of any loss, claim, or demand, except to the extent of the funds which the association is able to recover from the members or persons liable for the same, and which are applicable to that purpose.

The policies issued by the plaintiffs were sealed with the common seal of the association, authenticated by the signature of the manager, and the rules indorsed thereon were made subject to the articles of association.

By a duly stamped policy, dated 13th March 1878, the plaintiff insured the defendants' ship Athol for 800*l.* from noon of 20th Feb. 1878 to noon of 20th Feb. 1879, and by 5th Feb. 1879 the defendants, while so insured, became liable to the plaintiffs for arrears of contributions, under this and other policies, in the sum of 160*l.* 36*s.* 8*d.*, and the plaintiff's manager thereupon drew drafts upon the defendants, as provided by rule 6 (sup.) for contribution, but the defendants dishonoured them.

Previous to the 20th Feb. 1879, while the ship Athol was on her homeward voyage, the defendants gave the plaintiffs' manager notice, as required by rule 21, to renew the policy on that ship until arrival at her port of destination in the United Kingdom, but the policy was not renewed nor was a new one issued by the plaintiffs as the defendants were defaulting members within rule 6.

The ship Athol arrived at her port of destination on the 11th April 1879, having sustained general and particular average losses during her voyage, which losses, amounting to 197*l.* 7*s.* 4*d.*, the defendants counter-claimed to be entitled to set off against the plaintiffs' claim.

At the trial, before Pollock B., without a jury, it was contended on behalf of the defendants that the policy was void within 30 & 31 Vict. c. 23, s. 7, inasmuch as it did not specify the names of the subscribers or underwriters, and on other grounds which the learned judge reserved for further consideration.

By 30 & 31 Vict. c. 23, s. 7, it is provided that:

No contract or agreement for sea insurance (other than such insurance as is referred to in the 55th section of the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act 1862) shall be valid unless the same is expressed in a policy; and every policy shall specify the particular risk or adventure, the names of the subscribers or underwriters, and the sum or sums insured; and in case any of the above-mentioned particulars shall be admitted, such policy shall be null and void to all intents and purposes.

June 14.—Tindal Atkinson (with him, Meadows White, Q.C.) for the defendants.—The policy is void, as it is not subscribed in the manner provided by the statute. It merely has the common seal of the association affixed, authenticated by the signature of the manager of the association, and where an agent subscribed a policy "per procuration" of the several members of the association, it was held that the policy had not been subscribed within the meaning of the statute:

Re Arthur Average Association, 34 L. T. Rep. N.S. 388; 3 Ch. Div. 522; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 245;
Evans v. Hooper, 33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 374; 1 Q. B. Div. 45.

Next, the policy merely discloses a contract between the defendants and the members of class 2, whose names are not, but ought to be, set out in the policy. The association does not agree to pay the amount insured in case of loss—it merely covenants that the members of class 2 shall pay and make good any losses sustained by the defendants, and the sum to be so paid and made good is limited to the amount of funds that can be recovered from the members of that class. The funds of the association are in no way made liable, and the covenant only amounts to a guarantee that certain persons, whose names are not specified in the policy, should insure the defendants' ship; and in order to satisfy the provisions of the statute, the names of the members of class 2 ought to be set out. This is not a policy at all:

Re Arthur Average Association; Ex parte Hargrove, L. Rep. 10 Ch. App. 542; 32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 713; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 530 and 570;
Gray v. Pearson, L. Rep. 5 C. P. 569; 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 416.

As to the defendants' right to recover on their counter-claim, rule 21 gives them an unconditional right to have the policy renewed by the plaintiffs.

H. Matthews, Q.C. (with him Francis Turner) for the plaintiffs.—If it is decided that a mutual club cannot register itself under the Companies Acts and validly subscribe policies there will be an end to all clubs of this kind. It is stated in Arnould on Marine Insurance, p. 151, that "contrary to an opinion formerly existing, and even expressed on the bench (Bromley v. Williams, 32 Beav. 177), that a policy was unnecessary to the validity of such insurances, it is now the law that no such insurance is valid unless expressed in a stamped policy, and unless such policy shall specify each of the following particulars, viz., the particular risk or adventure, the names of the subscribers or underwriters, and the sum or sums insured."

Re The Arthur Average Association, 32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 713; L. Rep. 10 Ch. App. 542; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 530, 570.

Also, at p. 154, it is said that "all these various companies may now be registered under the Companies Act 1862, and thereby obtain the advantages suitable to each, as provided under that statute. By doing so, they retain all property, and all rights, interests and obligations in connection with property; their rights and liabilities in respect of debts, obligations, and contracts; and the peculiar modifications impressed on their constitution—and their rights and liabilities in connection therewith—by the statute, charter, or deed under which they may be formed. Moreover, any stipulation or condition in any policy affecting the liability of members, or of the funds of any company, remains in full force and effect, notwithstanding registration of the company under that Act:"

Edwards v. Aberayron Mutual Shipping Insurance Society Limited, 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 457; 1 Q. B. Div. 563; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 154.

It is true that here the engagement of indemnity is a limited one, and that no individual member can be sued by an assured who has suffered a loss, but the association has an interest in the contract, and can compel payment by the various members in the manner prescribed by the rules and articles of association.

T. Atkinson replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 29.—Pollock, B.—This action, which was tried before me at Guildhall without a jury, is brought by the Marine Mutual Insurance Association Limited against the defendants to recover the sum of 160*l.* 16*s.* 6*d.* for calls alleged to be due from the defendants as members of the association in respect of three ships, called the Athol, the Fanny M. Carvill, and the Laura and Isabel, which were insured by the defendants in the plaintiffs' association. The defence set up by the defendants is, that there was no policy sufficient within the provisions of the statute 30 & 31 Vict. c. 23, s. 7, whereby any contract was created between the plaintiffs and the defendants, and that, therefore, the plaintiffs cannot recover in this action.

The policy which created the contract between the plaintiffs and the defendants was, as far as is material to this case, in the following form. [His Lordship, after reading the policy, the rules indorsed thereon, and the articles of association which have been set out above, continued:] The result of this policy, coupled with the rules and the articles of association to which I have referred, appears to me to be to create a good and sufficient contract of insurance between the plaintiffs and the defendants, whereby the defendants are bound to pay calls in the manner pointed out by rule 4, and the plaintiffs on their part become insurers of the ships entered by the defendants in the association, although in the case of loss the defendants can only recover from the plaintiffs to the extent to which the association is able to recover contribution from the members. Such I take to be the true construction of the documents to which I have referred, and I see no ground for holding that the policy is voided by 30 & 31 Vict. c. 23, s. 7.

At common law, any individual or association of individuals might be insurers of ships; but in the beginning of the last century it was thought expedient, partly with the view of preventing the evil which arose from insurance by insufficient persons, and partly to enable the Government to raise money by the sale of a monopoly, to prohibit any partnership or association insuring, except two corporations, which in the year 1720 received charters from the Crown, under the titles of the Royal Exchange Assurance and the London Assurance. This statute was repealed in the year 1824 by 5 Geo. 4, c. 114, but even during its existence there was nothing to prevent mutual insurance associations, or clubs as they were sometimes called, mutually insuring ships belonging to their members, either with or without policies; and the fact that but two companies were allowed to insure was probably one of the reasons which led to the establishment of such mutual associations. In many of these associations no policy was used at all, but the contract was created merely by the printed rules of the association and the entering of his ship by a member.

Since the passing of the Stamp Act (35 Geo. 3, c. 63) a question has arisen whether such an agreement for the insurance of ships could be valid unless a duly stamped policy was drawn up and executed. In Bromley v. Williams (sup.) the Master of the Rolls appears to have considered that no policy was necessary. In the case, however, of the London Marine Assurance Association (sup.) the contrary was held. To prevent all doubt upon the subject, the Stamp Act (30 & 31 Vict. c. 23,) s. 7, provides that "no contract or agreement for sea insurance shall be valid unless the same is expressed in a policy, and every policy shall specify the particular risk or adventure, the names of the subscribers or underwriters, and the sum or sums insured; and in any case any of the above-mentioned particulars shall be omitted in any policy, such policy shall be null and void to all intents and purposes." This provision is purely for fiscal purposes, and, looking at the history and existence of mutual insurance associations to which I have already alluded, it does not appear to me that it was intended to, or that by its language it does, interfere with such a policy as the present. There is here a policy which has been properly stamped under this statute; and that part of section 7 which requires that the names of the subscribers or underwriters shall be expressed is, I think, sufficiently complied with by the affixing to the policy of the common seal of the plaintiffs' association, authenticated by the manager.

In the course of the argument, I was referred by the defendants' counsel to the case of Re Arthur Average Association (L. Rep. 10 Ch. App. 542; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 530, 570), but that case has no bearing upon the present. The association there was not registered or incorporated, and the policies being signed only by the managers "per procuration" of the several members, it was held that they were void under 30 Vict. c. 23, s. 7, because they did not specify the names of the subscribers or underwriters. The association had no legal existence. In the present case, the plaintiffs being a limited company, are a corporation, and as such are properly represented by their common seal.

It was further argued, however, for the defendants that the policy by its language disclosed only a contract between the defendants and the other members of the association. This does not appear to me to be a proper construction of the policy coupled with the rules. The contract of assurance is with the association, the association having a right to call upon all the members for contribution, and protecting itself by the provision contained in the policy that the association is to be liable only to the extent of the funds so recovered from the members. This in truth puts the association nearly in the same position as was a joint-stock company in which the company was the contracting party as insurers, and the members of the company were liable to the extent of their shares.

For these reasons I think that the plaintiffs are entitled to my judgment for the amount claimed.

The defendants, however, have set up by way of counter-claim that they are entitled to recover from the plaintiffs the amount of 197*l.* 7*s.* 4*d.* as an average claim upon the ship Athol. To this the plaintiffs made answer that the policy upon the Athol had run out by effluxion of time, and that the defendants had failed to renew it under rule 21. That there had been such an effluxion of time was admitted by the defendants, but it was said that when the time ran out the ship was at sea, and that the plaintiffs had, by the conduct of their manager and by correspondence, continued to treat the vessel as insured, and that they had waived the compliance by the defendants with the provisions of rule 21. No doubt letters passed between the plaintiff's manager and the defendants which treated the question whether the vessel was insured or not as still open; but this cannot, in my judgment, be taken to amount to a waiver by the plaintiffs of their right to have the premium paid; nor do I think that by such letters they are estopped from setting up this defence to the defendants' counter-claim. In the result, therefore, I find that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover from the defendants upon their claim to the extent of 160*l.* 16*s.* 4*d.*, with costs; and that upon the defendants' counter-claim judgment must be entered for the plaintiffs, with costs.

Judgment accordingly.

THE STORMVART MAATSCHAPPY NEDERLAND v. THE PENINSULAR AND ORIENTAL COMPANY. THE VOORWARTS; THE KHEDIVE.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Ship—Collision—Merchant Shipping Act 1873, sect. 17—Regulations for preventing Collisions at sea, Art. 16.

The Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85) enacts (sects. 17), "If in any case of collision it is proved to the court before which the case is tried, that any of the regulations for preventing collision contained in or made under the Merchant Shipping Acts 1854 to 1873 has been infringed, the ships by which such regulations has been infringed shall be deemed to be in fault, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that the circumstances of the case made departure from the regulation necessary."

Art. 16 of the regulations made under the Merchant Shipping Act 1862 provides, "Every steamship when approaching another ship, so as to involve risk of collision, shall slacken her speed, or if necessary stop and reverse."

The V. and the K., two large steamers, were approaching each other in opposite directions; a wrong manœuvre on the part of the V. made a collision imminent. The captain of the K. starboarded his helm and gave the order to stand by the engines; two minutes afterwards he ordered engines to stop and reverse, and a minute and a half afterwards the collision took place. It was proved that he had acted with ordinary care, skill, and nerve as a seaman, and stopping and reversing at once would not have prevented the collision.

Held (reversing the judgment of the court below), that the C. not having complied with the reyulation, and not having shown any necessity for departure from it, must, under the above section be held to be in fault.

The Hibernia (31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 805) and The Fanny M. Carvill (32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 646) approved.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (James, Brett, and Cotton, L.JJ.), varying a decision of the judge of the Admiralty Division (Sir R. Phillimore).

The action arose out of a collision between the Voorwarts, a large steamer belonging to the appellants, a Dutch company, and the Khedive, a still larger vessel belonging to the respondents, by which both were much damaged.

The collision took place about 7.40 p.m. on the 23rd May 1878, in the Straits of Malacca, off the island of Penang, and it appeared from the evidence that the weather was fine, and the vessels first sighted each other at a distance of several miles. The Voorwarts was then heading W. half N., and the Khedive E.N.E., and they appeared about to pass each other safely, green light to green light; but when they were about half-a-mile apart the Voorwarts suddenly ported her helm, and threw herself across the bows of the Khedive, and rendered a collision imminent. The captain of the Khedive ordered the helm to be put hard a starboard, and the engineer to stand by the engines. Two minutes afterwards he ordered them to stop and reverse, and a minute and a half afterwards the collision took place. The judge of the Admiralty Court, assisted by nautical assessors, held that the Khedive had not complied with Art 16 of the regulations for preventing collisions at sea, and therefore held that both vessels were in fault, under sect. 17 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873.

There were cross appeals to the Court of Appeal, which was also assisted by nautical assessors, and the assessors, in answer to a question put to them, said that the right manœuvre would have been to stop and reverse at once, but that the captain of the Khedive in fact gave such orders as a captain of ordinary care, skill, and nerve might fairly as a seaman be excused for giving under the circumstances. The Court of Appeal thereupon found the Voorwarts solely to blame for the collision, and from this decision her owners appealed to the House of Lords.

The case is not reported below, except upon a point of practice as to staying proceedings pending an appeal to the House of Lords, in 5 P. Div. 1, and 41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 392.

The Solicitor-General (Sir F. Herschell, Q.C.), Milward, Q.C., Webster, Q.C., and W. G. F. Phillimore appeared for the appellants.

Butt, Q.C., Watkins Williams, Q.C., and Clarkson for the respondents.

In addition to the case mentioned in the judgment of their Lordships, the case of The Magnet (L. Rep. 4 A. & B. 417; 32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 129) was also referred to.

At the conclusion of the arguments, their Lordships took time to consider their judgments.

July 23.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:

Lord BLACKBURN.—My Lords: This was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal varying a judgment of the Admiralty Division. The Voorwarts, a large steamer belonging to the appellants, came into collision with the Khedive, a large steamer belonging to the respondents, in the channel that lies north of the island of Penang. Both sustained heavy damage, and each asserted that the misfortune was wholly to be attributed to the misconduct of the other vessel, and that their own vessel was free from blame. The claim and counter-claim were tried before the Judge of the Admiralty, with two nautical assessors. The Judge of the Admiralty, in giving the reasons for his judgment, observed that the evidence was, as is not unusual, very conflicting, and that he had not been able to reconcile it with the supposition that both parties intended to speak the truth. But he did not think it necessary to say which story was true. For taking the evidence given on behalf of the Voorwarts to be honest, he and his assessors came to the conclusion that the conduct of the second officer, who was in charge, seeing a steamer approaching in an opposite direction, relinquishing such charge to the third officer at the very time when his vessel was actually manœuvring, and going below to his dinner, was very reprehensible, and that the Voorwarts was to blame for want of a proper look-out, which, looking at the evidence, I understand to mean a proper look-out during the time the third officer was in charge, and for not stopping her speed after the change from red light to green (which, of course, means, even on the supposition that there was such a change on the part of the Khedive, and that the evidence on the other side, which denied that there was any such change, was not trustworthy), he then adds: "With respect to the counter-claim of the Khedive, we are of opinion that it is unnecessary to consider whether the statements of her witness with respect to the bearings of the lights, especially of the green lights of the Voorwarts, be or be not accurate, for we think that the provisions of Art. 16 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea apply to the Khedive as well as to the Voorwarts, and that the Khedive ought, in the circumstances, to have stopped and reversed, or at least slackened her speed at a distance and at a time which would have prevented the collision. The policy and principle of the rule in question is clearly to inculcate the necessity of immediately taking the speed off the vessel when in such proximity to another vessel as to render a collision probable. I therefore pronounce both vessels to blame."

Both parties appealed to the Court of Appeal, which also was assisted by nautical assessors. The judges of appeal did inquire into the question which the court below had thought it unnecessary to consider. They came to the conclusion that the facts were more accurately described by the witness for the Khedive than by the witness for the Voorwarts, and that the vessels were at least three and a half miles apart, were approaching each other, green light to green light, with so large a bearing as to make it certain that if both kept their course they would have passed without any danger of a collision. Brett, L.J., in delivering the judgment of the Court of Appeal, says: "We are of opinion that those vessels continued to approach each other in that way till they were within the vicinity of each other, not farther at the most than a mile from each other. Probably they were somewhat less than a mile, and being in that position, green light to green light, starboard bow to starboard bow, on opposite and parallel courses, at so short a distance as that the Voorwarts suddenly put her helm hard aport and so came suddenly towards the other ship, which up to that moment had been in a state of safety. Up to that moment there was no occasion whatever for the other ship to have slowed its speed or altered its manœuvres in any way. The Khedive was perfectly justified up to that moment in continuing at full speed, because the vessels were so approaching that there was no danger of collision, if they had kept on; but the master of the Voorwarts, from want of look-out probably, and then from fear of suddenly finding himself in the vicinity of another ship, performs the wrong manœuvre—the absolutely wrong manœuvre—he puts his helm hard aport. It was noticed by those gentlemen who advised us that this was not merely caused by his want of look-out, but by his want of presence of mind; but there was also a want of due care in navigation in this case, that a superior officer to him, having been on the deck, at the time the steamers were approaching each other, left it; whereas in their judgment, in which we entirely agree, a senior officer, when ships are approaching in that way, ought not, being on the deck, to have left it. However that may be, there was an absolutely wrong manœuvre by the Voorwarts, bringing the ship from a state of safety into one of sudden and imminent danger. The captain of the Khedive, on seeing this manœuvre, gave orders to put his own helm hard a-starboard, and at the same moment he gave the order to stand by the engines. He did not at that moment give the order to stop the engines, or to reverse them at full speed. The helm was put hard a-starboard, the engineer did stand by the engines, it was but for the space of a minute, or perhaps somewhat more than a minute, that the captain of the Khedive ordered the engines to be stopped and reversed at full speed. Directly that order was given they were stopped and reversed at full speed and they were reversing at full speed at the moment of the collision. The engines of the Voorwarts had not been stopped even, but were going full speed ahead until the two ships were in collision. That the Voorwarts therefore was to blame, and greatly to blame, cannot be doubted. The question must remain whether those on board the Khedive were guilty within the rule that I have endeavoured to enunciate, from a want of ordinary care and skill in what they did. We are advised, and we are of opinion, that up to the time when the Voorwarts put her helm hard aport, and brought the ships into sudden danger, there was nothing wrong on the part of those who were in command of the Khedive, or of those on board of her. We are advised, and are of opinion that, under the circumstances, and in the position of those two ships, it was quite right that the helm of the Khedive should be put hard a-starboard. But then comes the question whether the captain ought not, at the time he gave the order to put the helm hard a-starboard, to have ordered the engines to be stopped and reversed. It was obvious that at that moment there were two steamships approaching each other in great danger of collision; it is obvious, therefore, that the rule of navigation applied unless there were something which made it necessary for the safety of the navigation that the rule as to stopping and reversing should not be acted upon. Upon that of course we are bound to consult the gentlemen who advise us, and the question which we put to them was 'Was it a right manœuvre, under the circumstances, on the part of the captain of the Khedive to order the engineers to stand by the engines, or was the right manœuvre then to order the engines at once to be stopped and reversed?' the answer was as might have been expected, that The right manœuvre would have been to order the engines at once to be stopped and reversed."

My Lords, at your bar there was a lengthened argument on the evidence, the counsel for the appellants urging every argument that could be produced to lead your Lordships to draw the conclusion that the Voorwarts was not to blame, to the extent at least to which the Court of Appeal thought she was, or at least that the Khedive was not free from blame up to the time when the Voorwarts put her helm hard aport. I should not, even if my own judgment would have been the other way, like to differ on a question of fact from those who had the assistance of nautical assessors, but, as far as I am able to form an opinion, I agree with the Court of Appeal. I will indicate the principal reason why I do so. There is a conflict of testimony on this point. The second officer says, that exactly at 7.30, that is about fifteen minutes before the collision, he saw a blue light from the Khedive, and almost at the same instant, and just before the third officer relieved him, he had passed the order to port, having just then, as he says, seen the red light about half a point on his starboard bow, and, as he judged, four or five miles off. But it was not on that account that he gave the order to port, but because his vessel had fully a couple of degrees to the west of the course he was steering W.$\frac{1}{2}$N., and he ordered the helm a little bit to port to bring her back to her course. The third officer, who was coming up to relieve him, thought the order to port was not heard, and repeated it loudly. This brought out the captain, who also says he saw the red light, but on his port bow, and the chief officer who was there, but not on duty, also says that he saw the red light on the port bow. It is to be observed that neither the captain nor the chief officer stayed long enough to have more than a glimpse of this red light, but still there were four witnesses who say that they then saw the red light, and if they are to be believed, the head of the Khedive must at this time have been more towards the Voorwarts than the captain of the Khedive had desired, for, when he ran down towards the white light, which he then thought might be the stationary light of a pilot boat, he gave orders that it should be kept half a point on the starboard bow, and he thought this order was obeyed; but I do not myself think it improbable that the vessel did for a short time head a point farther south than was intended. But even if the third officer was right in thinking that at this time the Khedive, then at a considerable distance, showed her red light, that would in no way exonerate him from the obligation to keep a good look-out on the Khedive lights whilst they were approaching nearer, and it was on the manœuvres of the two ships during the ten minutes or so that elapsed between the time when the third officer was left alone in charge and the time when he gave the order to put her helm hard aport that all depended. The case of the Khedive, which the Court of Appeal believed, was, that when the blue light was burnt out the vessels were six or seven miles apart, which is farther apart than the officers of the Voorwarts say, and that the head of the Khedive was immediately put on her old course E.$\frac{1}{2}$N., whilst they watched the lights of the Voorwarts and first saw for an instant the red light of the Voorwarts and directly after her green light, the vessels being then about six miles apart and the time about 7.28. Then the helm was put to starboard, and the vessel's head brought to E.N.E., the green light of the Voorwarts being seen two and a half to three points on the starboard bow; and then the vessels for ten or twelve minutes continued to run nearly parallel, green light to green light, till the Voorwarts suddenly showed her red light, being then half a mile to three-quarters of a mile off. If this is accurate, the conclusion is irresistible that the third officer of the Voorwarts had kept no look-out at all during these ten minutes, having taken it for granted that the Khedive was continuing with her red light towards him, until he suddenly saw the green light, and then lost his presence of mind and did the very worst thing he could do. The third officer says he did keep a look-out, and that the Khedive red light continued visible till a blue light was burnt on board the Khedive, that whilst it was burning the lights of the Khedive were obscured, and when the light went out he saw the green light, and immediately put his helm hard to port. The Khedive did, it is admitted, after its first blue light proved a failure, burn a second blue light, but this was done whilst they were yet uncertain whether the white light of the Voorwarts was the moving light of a steamer or the stationary light of a pilot boat, and therefore whilst the vessels were several miles apart. If the third officer speaks true the second blue light was burned when the vessels were within a mile of each other. This I think incredible. I do not know if all the noble and learned Lords who heard the argument agree with me in attaching so much weight to the time when the blue light was shown, but I believe they all agree that this House must act on the opinion of the Court of Appeal, that the Khedive was not to blame until after the collision was imminent, or perhaps I should say inevitable.

But there arises a question of great general importance on which the judges of appeal have reversed the judgment of the Court of Admiralty. In what follows I assume the story of the witnesses of the Khedive to be the truth, and that everything done by the Khedive was right until the Voorwarts suddenly ported, being then within three-quarters of a mile. Captain Steward gives this evidence in chief:—He saw the red light. Mr. Burt: How did she bear on your starboard bow at that time? A. About three points.—Q. Did you give any order? A. Yes.—Q. What was it? A. Hard a-starboard.—Q. What would have happened supposing you had hard ported instead? A. We should have come nearly stem on.—Q. In other words, was it in your judgment safe then to port? A. My professional judgment was that it was not safe to port.—Q. And you gave the order hard a-starboard? A. Hard a-starboard,—Q. Did she keep her red in view, or did you ever see the green again before the collision? A. No, kept the red in view.—Q. Besides ordering hard a-starboard, did you give any other orders? A. Stand by below, stand by the engines.—Q. When was that given? A. At the same time that hard a-starboard was given.—Q. What was your next order? A. About a minute later I gave the order to full speed astern.—Q. Did you judge, at the time you gave the order full speed astern, that the collision could be avoided or not. A. I considered it inevitable then.—Q. When you ordered your helm hard a-starboard, with what view did you give the order? A. With the view of endeavouring to bring the ships parallel, or as nearly as possible parallel, to lessen the force of the collision.—Q. I presume you knew, when she changed from green to red, what helm she was under? A. Yes.—Q. What was it? A. Evidently hard a-port.—Q. You have said that you gave the order afterwards to reverse your engines, or put them full speed astern: was that order obeyed? A. It was, the telegraph answered immediately.—And afterwards in cross-examination: Q. You say that you ordered hard a-starboard, and you at the same time ordered the engineers to stand by? A. Yes, to stand by.—Q. Is that so, at the same time? A. At the same time.—Q. You had seen then that the Voorwarts was porting? A. Yes.—Q. And, according to your account, porting suddenly? A. Porting suddenly. Q. Was that the only order which you then gave to the engines, to stand by? A. That was the first order that I gave to the engines.—Q. Was that the only order you then gave? A. At that moment, yes.—Q. Then your engines continued until a minute later "full speed ahead?" A. Yes, two minutes later.—Q. Then two minutes after you saw she was porting, you continued your engines full speed ahead? A. Yes. —Q. What for? A, In the hopes of going off in parallel courses; my head was going off sharp, and I was in hopes, by continuing on my course, that we should come parallel, or, at any rate, lessen the force of the collision; the further I could get off, and the longer I could keep on, the more likely it was that we should keep clear.—Re-examined by Mr. Butt: Q. One word upon that last question—you say you kept your engines going ahead for a little time after the order to stand by. She was swinging round under her starboard helm? A. Starboard helm.—Q. Will she continue to swing round faster under that starboard helm if you stop her, or if you keep the engines going ahead? A. Keeping the engines going ahead she would swing faster; the greater the speed the faster she obeys the helm.—Q. Whatever the other ship did you did stop and reverse before the collision? A. Yes, a minute.— Q. And you were going astern at the time of the collision? A. Yes.

The evidence I accept as quite accurate. The phrase "a minute" in the examination in chief and "two minutes" in the cross-examination are no discrepancy. The captain had other things to think of than the precise length of time. Allan, who was in the engine-room, and who would have to enter the times in his log, says he looked at the clock in the engine-room, and that by it the order to turn astern full speed was given a minute and a half after the order to stand by the engines, and that the collision was three minutes after the order to stand by the engines.

As I stated before, the judges of appeal had the advantage of having nautical assessors, whose advice they could ask on anything the court thought important. This House has not that advantage, and must act on the answers given to the questions actually asked. The nautical assessors, as appears by what I quoted before, advised the Court of Appeal that the order to put the helm hard a starboard was right, but that the order full speed astern ought to have been given at once, by which I understand them to mean, not merely that to go on full speed was in contravention of the 16th Article of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, but that it was bad seamanship in itself; and this was in conformity with the opinion of the Court of Admiralty. But the judges of appeal thought this did not dispose of the case, and they asked and obtained the advice of their assessors on a further question. To avoid any mistake as to what was asked and what was answered, I will read the words of the judgment on this part of the case. After saying that the assessors said that the right manœuvre was not to order the engineer merely to stand by the engines, but the right manœuvre would have been to order the engines at once to be stopped and reversed, Brett, L.J. proceeds: "Therefore, at that moment, the captain of the Khedive did not do what was absolutely the right thing. Moreover, if he did break the rule of navigation, by breaking that rule at that moment, there is no doubt that he put the property and the liability of his owners into the greatest jeopardy. We do not desire in the least to encourage the idea that the captain of a steamer, when there is danger of a collision with another, should break from this rule to stop and reverse. It is a most valuable rule, and must be obeyed if it possibly can be, and those who disobey it must be made liable for that disobedience unless they can, under very peculiar circumstances excuse themselves. But, having regard to what I have before stated, we then asked our advisers the following question 'If this order which he gave was not absolutely right under the circumstances (that is the order only that the engineers should stand by the engines), was that such an order as a captain of ordinary care, skill, and nerve might be fairly as a seaman excused for giving under the circumstances in which this captain was placed? Those circumstances, as was well known to those who advised us, were that at a distance of not more than a mile the ships were starboard bow to starboard bow, approaching on opposite courses, so as not to involve risk of collision, and at that distance those on board the Voorwarts suddenly put their helm hard aport, so as to bring them suddenly towards the Khedive, and so put the Khedive into a position of sudden unexpected critical danger. Therefore the question comes to be whether, the captain of the Khedive being so suddenly placed in such a critical position, it can be said that he was guilty of a want of ordinary care and skill under such circumstances in hesitating for the space of a minute whether he would order his engines to be reversed full speed. And I cannot help stating that that hesitation might involve this view, the ships being in such a position, if those on board the Voorwarts had, from doing the wrong thing, resolved in a moment to do the right thing, then it might be that the going ahead full speed of the Khedive would give them more room to get right again from what they were doing; but still we are advised and are of opinion that he did the wrong thing under the circumstances. But in answer to that last question, those advisers have advised us that the captain of the Khedive might be, as a seaman, fairly excused for that hesitation of a minute, and if so, we are of opinion that, although he broke the rule, and although he did not do that which was the best thing to do, yet in respect of that hesitation of a moment (I will not say for a moment—for a minute) to do the best thing, he is not to be found guilty of a want of ordinary care and skill and nerve under those difficult circumstances in which he was placed. If that be so, those who conduct the case of the Khedive have proved that those on board the Voorwarts were guilty of negligence in the legal sense, and have satisfied the court that those in charge of the Khedive were not guilty of negligence, or want of ordinary care, skill, and nerve, which contributed to the accident. I must say that those who advised us are of opinion that the vessels, when this manœuvre of the Voorwarts was made, were so close that, considering the size of the vessels, considering the speed at which they were both then justifiably going, considering that they were screw ships of the largest calibre, and that they were then so close, the circumstances of stopping and reversing, in the opinion of our advisers, would not have had a material effect on either ship." I may observe that this does not appear to have been the opinion of the judge of the Admiralty and his assessors, for they say that it might have prevented the collision. Brett, L.J. proceeds: "If so, the collision was inevitable when the Voorwarts performed her wrong manœuvre, and if so, even if the captain of the Khedive was wrong, he would not be wrong in any manner contributing to the accident. But without differing from these gentlemen, we do not think it right to put this decision quite alone upon that view of theirs—rather upon the other; it being manifest that that view of theirs goes a long way to justify the other view, namely, that if this was done at a time when the vessels were so close in their opinion a collision was inevitable. If it were not quite inevitable it is obvious that it was done at a time that brought the captain of the Khedive suddenly and without warning into a most critical position of danger. It is upon that ruling only that we desire to base this judgment; and on that rule, and on our decision with regard to that rule we are of opinion that the owners of the Voorwarts are solely liable for this collision and that damages must be awarded accordingly." James, L.J. added: "The Lord Justice has communicated to us what the judgment would be, we were well aware of it, and I need not say that that is the judgment of the court. I may perhaps be allowed to add that, if a heavy van drives along the street and make the horse of a carriage unmanageable, I cannot hold that the coachman is to blame if he pulls the wrong rein."

I may observe that the terms in which the question is asked seem to me hardly to do Captain Steward justice. He at once, on seeing the red light, took in the situation. He thought, and was right in thinking, that the Voorwarts was crossing his bows, and that within five minutes from that time, if he did nothing, he must come stem on upon her, and probably send her to the bottom. He did not hesitate, but at once made up his mind that the best thing to do was to put his helm hard to starboard with a view to endeavour to bring the ships parallel, or as nearly as possible parallel, to lessen the force of the collision, and in this the nautical assessors (in the Court of Appeal) say he was right; and, as far as I am competent to form an opinion, I should say that if he had not done so the Voorwarts would probably have been sunk, and so that by so doing he probably prevented a great loss of life, and diminished the loss of property. He did not reverse his engines, which was an error; but, as I think I must understand the answer of the nautical assessors, that was such an error as a seaman might under such circumstances commit, without proving thereby that he was deficient in care, skill, or nerve; and this the judges of the Court of Appeal thought justified them in reversing the judgment of the Court of Admiralty, and finding the Khedive free from blame.

I am sorry to be obliged to say that I come to a different conclusion. I feel how hard it is when, on the view I take of the facts, Captain Steward showed so much skill and nerve, and did so much good, to say that his owners should be made liable to a heavy payment in consequence of a venial error on his part; but the view I take of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85, sect. 17) is such as to compel me to advise your Lordships that this should be done.

In the case of The River Wear Commissioners v. Adamson (2 App. Cas. 743; 37 L. T, Rep. N. S. 543; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 145) I expressed my view of the common law in these terms: "The owner of the injured property must bear his own loss, unless he can establish that some other person is in fault and liable to make it good. And he does not establish this against a person merely by showing that he is the owner of the carriage or ship which did the mischief, for the owner incurs no liability merely because he is owner. But he does establish such a liability against any person who either wilfully did the damage, or neglected that duty which the law casts upon those in charge of a carriage on land and a ship on the water, to take reasonable care and use reasonable skill to prevent it from doing injury, and that this wilfulness or neglect caused the damage, and if he can prove that the person who has been guilty of either stood in the relation of servant to another, and that the fault occurred in the course of his employment he establishes a liability against the master also." I should add, to prevent possible misapprehension, that although apart from statute law, the duty which the court casts upon him who has the management and control of a ship at sea is the same as that which the law casts on those who have the management of a carriage on shore, namely, to take reasonable care and to use reasonable skill to prevent it from doing injury, yet that the different nature of the two things makes a great difference in the practical application of the rule. Much greater care is reasonably required from the crew of a ship, who ought to keep a look-out for miles, than from the driver of a carriage, who does enough if he looks ahead for yards; much more skill is reasonably required from the person who takes the command of a steamer than from one who drives a carriage.

The earlier part of the judgment of Brett, L.J. expresses the rule of common law to the same effect, though in other language, and I need not say that so far I quite agree with him. And I agree also in what he says that a man may not do the right thing, nay, may even do the wrong thing, and yet not be guilty of neglect of his duty, which is not absolutely to do right at all events, but only to take reasonable care and use reasonable skill; and I agree that, when a man is suddenly and without warning thrown into a critical position, due allowance should be made for this, but not too much. If, to take the example James, L.J. gives, the driver of a van cracking his whip makes the horses of a carriage suddenly unmanageable, the fact that the driver of the carriage pulled the wrong rein would be much less cogent evidence of want of reasonable skill or reasonable care on his part than if he did the same thing when driving along in the ordinary way, but it would still be evidence.

It was on the application of this last principle that the Court of Appeal reversed the judgment of the Admiralty Court in the case of The Bywell Castle (4 P. Div. 219; 41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 747; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 207). In that case no question arose as to the infringement of any of the statutable directions, and the question was entirely one of degree, how much allowance should be made for the suddenness of the thing when determining whether there was a want of reasonable care and reasonable skill.

But the Legislature has thought fit from time to time to make enactments as to what vessels shall do; it is obviously desirable that one ship when seeing another should know what it is to be expected that she will do. These directions are to be followed, and, to secure that they will be observed, the Legislature made provisions which have been varied from time to time. That in the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict, c. 104, s. 298) was in these terms: "If in any case of collision it appears to the court before which the case is tried that such collision was occasioned by the non-observance of any rule," &c., "the owner of the ship by which such rule has been infringed shall not be entitled to recover any recompense whatever for any damage sustained by such ship in such collision, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that the circumstances of the case made a departure from the rule necessary."

On the construction of this and similarly worded enactments, it had been held in Tuff v. Warman (5 C. B. N. S. 573; 27 L. J. 322, C. P.) that though the plaintiff had infringed the rules, and by his neglect of duty brought the vessel into danger, yet if the defendant could by reasonable care have avoided the consequences of the plaintiffs' neglect but did not, and so caused the injury, the plaintiff could recover, as under such circumstances the collision was not "occasioned by the non-observance" of the rule. This prevented the statute from producing the effect which those who framed it wished; but nothing was done till attention being apparently called to the subject by the case of The Fenham (L. Rep. 3 P. C. 212; 23 L. T. Rep N. S. 392; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 484), sect. 17 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85) was passed in the following words: "If in any case of collision it is proved to the court before which the case is tried that any of the regulations for preventing collision contained in or made under the Merchant Shipping Acts 1854 to 1873, has been infringed, the ship by which such regulation has been infringed shall be deemed to be in fault, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that the circumstances of the case made departure from the regulation necessary."

The regulations which come into question in this case are, Art. 16: "Every steamship when approaching another ship so as to involve risk of collision shall slacken her speed, or if necessary stop and reverse; and every steamship shall when in a fog go at a moderate speed." Art. 19: "In obeying and construing these rules due regard must be had to all dangers of navigation; and due regard must also be had to any special circumstances which may exist in any particular case rendering a departure from the above rules necessary in order to avoid immediate danger." Art. 20: "Nothing in these rules shall exonerate any ship, or the owner, or master or crew thereof, from the consequences of any neglect to carry lights or signals, or of any neglect to keep a proper look-out, or of any neglect of any precautions which may be required by the ordinary practice of seamen, or by the special circumstances of the case."

The change made in the language of the enactment cannot have been made without an object, and one object I think must have been to take away what was the ratio decidendi in Tuff v. Warman (ubi sup.); and another to render it unnecessary to have resort to an artificial rule as to the inference to be drawn from evidence, as in The Fenham (ubi sup.). Since that statute was passed there have been two important decisions of the Privy Council upon its construction, The Hibernia (31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 805; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 454) and The Fanny M. Carvill (32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 646; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 478, 565), which are not reported in the Law Reports. There has not been, as far as I can learn, any case in the Court of Appeal requiring it to consider the case of the statute till the present, (a) and most unfortunately the reasons which induced the court in the present case to pass it over as irrelevant are not given.

It is never satisfactory to come to the conclusion that the opinion of another is wrong without appreciating the reasons which led to that opinion. Here your Lordships are forced to do so, for the Court of Appeal has not given those reasons.

In The Fanny M. Carvill (ubi sup.) it is said in the Privy Council: "In construing the clause in question it is to be observed that the Act of 1873 did not repeal, nor was it a substitute for, the Merchant Shipping Acts of 1854 and 1862. On the contrary, sect. 2 declares that it is to be construed as one with them. Now sect. 298 of the Act of 1854 and sect. 29 of the Act of 1862 provide each that in certain cases of the infringement of the sailing regulations, those guilty of the infringement shall incur certain consequences. But each contains the qualification that the collision shall appear to the court to have been occasioned by the non-observance of the regulation infringed. When, therefore, in sect. 17 of the Act of 1873, the Legislature omitted this qualification, it must be presumed to have done so designedly, and at all events to have intended that it should be no longer incumbent upon the opposite party to prove that the non observance of the regulations in part contributed to the collision. Nor does it appear to their Lordships that the 17th section of the Act of 1873 can be taken merely to shift the burden of proof by raising a presumption of culpability to be rebutted by proof that the non-observance of the regulations did not in fact contribute to the collision, because the preceding section, the 16th, clearly shows that where the Legislature intended only to raise a presumption capable of being rebutted by such proof, it used apt words to express that intention. Their Lordships, therefore, conceive that, whatever be the true construction of the enactment in question, that which would take the case out of its operation by mere proof that the infringement of the regulation did not in fact contribute to the collision is inadmissible. They conceive that the Legislature intended at least to obviate the necessity for the determination of this question of fact, often a very nice one, upon conflicting evidence." The rest of the judgment proceeds on a question not raised by the facts in the present case.

But I quite agree in this view of the law, and it renders it unnecessary to consider the last finding of the nautical assessors, on which the Court of Appeal did not act, or to inquire whether they, or the judge of the Admiralty Court, took the right view of the facts. I think further that, where a sudden change of circumstances takes place which brings a regulation into operation, though the thing prescribed by the regulation is not done by the person in charge, yet the regulation can hardly be said to be infringed by him till he knows, or ought to have known, and but for his negligence would have known, of the change of circumstances. But it would be doing Captain Steward great injustice to say that he failed to observe the change of circumstances. He at once took in the situation, and was aware that there was risk of a collision, and that it was imminent if not inevitable, and he acted with great promptitude and skill, so as greatly to alleviate the violence of that inevitable collision. But he did not stop and reverse, nor even slacken his speed, and there he departed from the course prescribed by Art. 16 of the regulations; nor was there anything in the circumstances rendering a departure from this rule necessary in order to avoid immediate danger. Even if it would, in the absence of such a positive rule, be better seamanship to keep way on the ship in order to make her more manageable, which is not clear, the Legislature has thought it better to prescribe the course which must be followed. I feel, though very sorry for it, obliged to advise your Lordships to allow this appeal, and to restore the order of the Admiralty Division.

Lord Watson.—[After going through the evidence, his Lordship continued:]—Assuming it to be proved, as I think it is, that the Voorwarts was guilty of fault in unjustifiably steering across the bows of the Khedive, the appellants contend that the Khedive must also be held to have been in fault, and that the decree of the judge of the Admiralty Division ought therefore to be restored. They do not assert that the officers navigating the Khedive were guilty of negligence or fault in the sense of the common law; but they do assert that the Khedive infringed Art. 16 of the Regulations for preventing Collisions at Sea, by failing to slacken speed, or stop and reverse at a time when the vessels were in imminent danger of collision; and they maintain that under the provisions of sect. 17 of 36 & 37 Vict. c. 85, the legal consequence of such infringement is that, for the purposes of the present case, the Khedive must be deemed to have been in fault.

The experts in the Court of Appeal are of opinion that the absolutely right manœuvre on the part of the captain of the Khedive would have been to stop and reverse immediately after the red light of the Voorwarts was seen. They are of opinion that the captain did, for the minute and a half after that light became visible, adopt not the better, but the less expedient manœuvre, although they do not think the adoption of the better would have materially affected the collision.

I must now advert to those statutory provisions in respect of which it is contended that the Khedive must be deemed to have been in fault. The enactments especially founded on by the appellants are to be found in Art. 16 of the regulations embodied in the Act of 1862 and sect. 17 of the Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment Act of 1873. In construing these enactments I think it may be useful to consider what has been the course of legislation for the avowed purpose of preventing collisions at sea. The Merchant Shipping Act of 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104) enacted certain rules in regard to lights, fog signals, and the courses to be steered by vessels meeting and passing each other, and for enforcing the observance of these statutory rules it was provided by sect. 298 that where, in any case of collision, it appeared to the court that the collision was occasioned by the non-observance of any of them, the owner of the ship by which the rule was infringed should not be entitled to recover any recompense for the damage sustained by his ship, unless it were shown to the satisfaction of the court that the circumstances of the case rendered a departure from the rule necessary. The Legislature had not, as yet, made any regulation touching the speed of meeting vessels. The Amendment Act of 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63) repealed by sect. 2 and schedule A. the rules, and also sect. 298 of the Act of 1854, and by sect. 25 and schedule C. enacted a new code of regulations for preventing collisions at sea, power being given to Her Majesty to alter or add to them from time to time, on the joint recommendation of the Admiralty and the Board of Trade. Art. 16 of the regulations, which is still in force, provides that "every steamship when approaching another ship, so as to involve risk of collision, shall slacken her speed, or if necessary stop and reverse; and every steamship shall when in a fog go at a moderate pace." By sect. 29 of the Act of 1862 it was enacted that "if in any case of collision it appears to the court before whom the case is tried that such collision was occasioned by the non-observance of any regulation made by or in pursuance of this Act, the ship by which such regulation has been infringed shall be deemed to be in fault, unless it be shown to the satisfaction of the court that the circumstances of the case made a departure from the rule necessary." The Amendment Act of 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85) made no change in the regulation as to speed, but it repealed (sect. 33) sect. 29 of the Act of 1862, and in lieu thereof enacted (sect. 17) as follows: "If in any case of collision it is proved to the court before which the case is tried that any of the regulations for preventing collisions contained in or made under the Merchant Shipping Acts 1854 to 1873 has been infringed, the ship by which such regulation has been infringed shall be deemed to be in fault, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that the circumstances of the case made departure from the regulation necessary."

I think it is impossible, upon a careful consideration of these successive enactments, to avoid the inference that the Legislature did not intend, in certain specified circumstances, to leave mariners to decide for themselves, but, on the contrary, intended to prescribe rules to be observed by all in these circumstances, and that no one was to be excused for non-compliance, or exempted from the statutory consequences of non-compliance with the rules, in circumstances to which they were applicable, unless he could bring himself within a statutory exception. I am also of opinion that in enacting these regulations, and in fencing them with provisions as to the consequence of non-observance, the Legislature was not declaring or even relying upon any known principle of law, but was deliberately creating many new duties, with relative responsibilities, unknown to the common law. It is further apparent that the repeal of sect. 29 of the Act of 1862, and the substitution for it of sect. 17 of the Act of 1873, must have been intended to increase the stringency of the statutory regulations. The interpretation of sect 17 of the more recent Act, so far as required for the decision of the present case, does not appear to me to be attended with difficulty. If a vessel at or about the time of collision with another infringe a statutory rule which was in the circumstances applicable, and if it be not established that a necessity existed for departing from the rule, the vessel so infringing must, in terms of the statute, be held to have been in fault.

Now, on the asumption that the Khedive did infringe Art. 16 of the regulations, it has not been suggested, and it certainly is not proved, that the captain of the Khedive was constrained to depart from it by any necessity, real or supposed; and if that which I have assumed were conceded, I should have no hesitation in applying the provisions of sect. 17 to the case, and holding that the Khedive was in fault.

It therefore becomes necessary to consider whether Art. 16 was or was not infringed by the Khedive. Apart from statutory qualifications or exemptions, to which I shall immediately refer, it does not seem doubtful that during the period of a minute and a half which elapsed between the order to "stand by" and the order to "stop and reverse" the Khedive was within the rule established by Art. 16, and disobeyed it. At the time the order to "stand by" was given, the two vessels were not only approaching each other "so as to involve risk of collision," but were seen and known to be so by the captain of the Khedive. Had it been possible to hold upon the evidence that the period in question was so brief, and the Voowarts' sudden change of course so startling, that the captain could not be fairly expected to suppose, and did not realise the fact, that a collision was imminent before he gave the order to "stop and reverse," I should in that case have acquitted the Khedive of fault on the ground that Art. 16 could not be reasonably held to apply before the moment at which it was actually obeyed. But the captain's own testimony excludes that inference, because he distinctly avows that he at once saw the risk of the collision, but instead of giving obedience to the rule, he steered so as to diminish the violence of the concussion which he anticipated. Art. 16 is expressed in terms absolute and unqualified: but it is rightly contended for the Khedive that it must be read in connection with Art. 19, which runs as follows: "In obeying and construing these rules, due regard must be had to all dangers of navigation, and due regard must also be had to any special circumstances which may exist in any particular case, rendering a departure from the rules necessary in order to avoid immediate danger." This article undoubtedly introduces certain important qualifications of the rule enacted by Art. 16; but I do not think the case of the Khedive can be brought within either of the exceptions which it creates. There is nothing in the case to suggest any danger of navigation, a due regard to which would have led to a disregard of Art. 16. The only existing danger was the very danger to which the rule applies, to prevent which it had been enacted. And there is just as little room for the suggestion that there existed any special circumstances which rendered it necessary for the Khedive to continue at full speed, instead of slowing, or stopping, or reversing, in order to avoid immediate danger. I am accordingly of opinion that the Khedive being within the rule of Art. 16, and not within any of the statutory exceptions to that rule, infringed it; and seeing that it has not been proved to my satisfaction, that the circumstances of the case made a departure from the rule necessary, I consider myself bound by the provisions of sect. 17 of the act of 1873 to hold that the Khedive was in fault.

It was not without hesitation that I ventured at first to differ from the opinions expressed by the learned judges of the Court of Appeal. But fuller consideration of the case has satisfied me that the principle upon which they decided in favour of the Khedive is inconsistent with the policy and provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act. The principle, as I understand it, may be thus formulated: When two vessels, A. and B., are approaching near to each other under steam, each steering a proper course, and A. is suddenly, by a wrong manœuvre of B., placed in a position of critical danger, and exposed to the obvious risk of collision, A. shall not be deemed to be in fault by reason of her captain not having given the order to slacken speed, or to stop and reverse, provided it is established to the satisfaction of the court that a captain of ordinary care, skill, and nerve might be fairly excused in the circumstances for not having given such order. I have possibly failed to give adequate expression to the principle which is so elaborately expressed in the opinion of Brett, L.J., who in this case delivered the judgment of the Court of Appeal; but I think I am justified in stating that his Lordship did not decide in favour of the Khedive because she was not within Art. 16, or because she was within any exception expressed in the statutes, but solely because he held it to be proved that the departure from the rule, in the circumstances in which the captain of the Khedive was placed, did not imply such want of care and forethought as would constitute negligence or fault at common law on the part of a seaman of average skill and nerve. I cannot accept the principle thus affirmed by the Court of Appeal, because it practically substitutes for the statutory definition of fault the old rule of common law, which, in my opinion, the statutory enactments were intended to supersede. The result of adopting the principle must be that, whenever the risk of collision has been occasioned by the faulty manœuvre of one of the two approaching vessels, the other vessel will be exempted from the statutory test of liability. Antecedent fault on the part of one of the colliding vessels must characterise a very considerable proportion of the cases of collisions at sea; and I think it may be assumed that sudden and imminent risk of collision is frequently due to that cause. To abrogate the statutory rule in such cases would be tantamount to defeating the leading purpose of its enactment. It was enacted with a view to obviate the risk and minimise the results of collision; and the more imminent the risk the more imperative is the necessity for implicit obedience to the rule. The argument was very fairly pressed upon us that the Legislature cannot have intended to push the rule to such harsh extremities as to hold that a vessel was in fault whose captain had done all that could be expected of a seaman of ordinary nerve and skill. With that argument I cannot agree. It appears to me that it was the deliberate policy of the Legislature to compel sea captains, when their vessels are in danger of collision, to obey the rule and not to trust to their own nerve and skill; and that it was an essential part of the same policy to admit of no excuse for non-observance of the rule, short of satisfactory evidence, either that the captain was constrained to disobey it by other perils of the sea, or that he adopted a course which, in the circumstances, was better than that prescribed by the rule. And for my own part, I cannot think the Legislature has acted unwisely in applying a uniform statutory test to all such cases, instead of leaving them to be decided by the variable test of "fault," as ascertained in each case with the aid of nautical opinion. The present question does not appear to be directly ruled by any previous decision of the Court of Appeal; and I therefore regret that the Lord Justices did not criticise, or even refer to, the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Acts; because it may be that the grounds upon which their Lordships set aside these enactments as inapplicable to the case of the Khedive have not been brought fully under the notice of the House. In the cases of The Hibernia (ubi sup.) and The Fanny M. Carvill (ubi sup.) the point did not arise for decision before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council; and it is very satisfactory to find that in both these cases the view taken by the learned Lords of the policy and effect of the safety clauses of the Merchant Shipping Act was in complete accordance with the judgment which your Lordships propose to pronounce, in which I concur.

Lord Hatherley.—My Lords: The case before us embraces two heads for consideration. The first is, whether there has been any negligence, either by breach of rules or otherwise, on the part of the Khedive, the vessel sued by the owners of the Voorwarts. The second question is, whether the Voorwarts itself was not guilty of violating the regulations of the Merchant Shipping Act, or whether, at all events, it did not contribute to the mischief.

Both the learned judge of the Admiralty Court, assisted by nautical assessors, and the learned judges of the Court of Appeal, also assisted by nautical assessors, were clearly of opinion that as regarded the Voorwarts it was in fault in many particulars. I see no reason why their decisions should not be affirmed by your Lordships.

The question came to be what was to be said with reference to the position of the Khedive. All seems to have proceeded perfectly smoothly until there was this sudden change of direction on the part of the Voorwarts, by putting the helm hard a-port, which brought the vessels nearer to each other at once, and ultimately brought about the collision. The question being put to the nautical assessors, there was no difference of opinion in the court below that the regulations for preventing collisions between steam-vessels at sea, especially Art. 16. had not been observed. That is the rule by which, when there is imminent danger, as there was in this case, of immediate collision, each person in charge of a ship is put under the responsibility of slackening speed, or, if necessary, stopping and reversing the engines. When we come to inquire what was done by the Khedive upon the extraordinary act I have described being done on the part of the Voorwarts, we find that the captain with great promptness and readiness, first of all starboarded the helm, and then, finding a collision likely to take place, he gave the order to stand by the engines.

The main question which comes before us is reduced to this, whether he should have gone beyond that, and said or done either more or less at that time. This question has been referred as a special question to the nautical assessors by the Court of Appeal, and what the Lords Justices say is this, that although the nautical assessors said that to a certain extent what was proper had been done, yet they went on to say that the captain at the same time ought to have ordered the stopping and immediate reversal of the engines. The question as Brett, L.J. said, was whether there was a necessity established for departing from the rule, and upon the answer given by the nautical assessors the conclusion is that no such necessity was shown. It appears to me that the learned judge has somewhat extended the exceptions from the liability to be deemed in default. He adds to those exceptions which are specified this other exception, "unless the captain can prove to the satisfaction of the judges who have to determine the case that he acted as a resolute seaman with good nerve," and so on. Now I apprehend that really the concluding observations which were made by Lord Watson citing the cases of The Hibernia (ubi sup.) and The Fanny M. Carvill (ubi sup.), dispose exactly of this view, which appears to have been taken by the learned Lord Justice. If you can show that you could not adhere to the rule without producing danger, that is one of the specified exceptions. If you can show that there was an absolute necessity for doing what you did, or for omitting what you omitted to do, then again you are exempted; and it is thus left open to you to show that you did not contribute to the mischief. Perhaps it is not astonishing that some little degree of confusion should arise from the numerous dealings with these Acts of Parliament, and the various changes in their wording. But in a case of immediate danger, where a collision appears to be inevitable, and all depends upon the course of action immediately pursued, nothing can be more important than that those who have charge of the navigation of a vessel should know that, if they depart from the rule which is laid down with sufficient distinctness, they must prove not only to their own satisfaction, but also to the satisfaction of the court which has to decide the question, that what was done was necessary for the purpose of avoiding immediate danger.

Now one remark occurs here, which is this, that these rules must be looked at very much from this point of view; they are general rules to be adopted by all persons having charge of the navigation of vessels, with the exceptions which have been pointed out. This rule is not laid down merely for the sake of the vessel commanded by the man who breaks it, but for the sake of the vessel commanded by the man approaching at a distance, who has no right or reason to suppose that he will break it. If the rule is observed every person will know precisely what he is to do, and will say, "I will carry out my directions entirely with that knowledge which I possess." On the other hand, if the court allows these rules lightly to be departed from, the result will be the very evil which the Act was intended to prevent. As I have just said, these are general rules, laid down to govern any person who has charge of a vessel, both for the sake of the safety of his own vessel and for the sake of the safety of the vessels approaching him. A strong instance of the importance of observing them occurs in this very case. If the rule had been acted upon, from the steady course which the two vessels were holding it would in all probability have led to a successful issue, but the disregard of the rule with reference to the porting of the helm caused the one vessel to steer on to the other, and that very danger was produced which the rule was intended to prevent. Therefore I think that the regulations having been departed from by the Khedive, that vessel must be deemed to be in fault, unless the master produces a statutory exculpation and proves it to the satisfaction of the court. That does not appear to have been done in this instance. It follows that the course we must take must be to restore the judgment of the Court of Admiralty, and to reverse that portion of the decree of the Court of Appeal which exempts the Khedive from liability. The motion which I should suggest to your Lordships, if you see fit to accede to it, would be, that the decree of the Lords Justices be reversed so far as it exempted the Khedive from liability, and so far as it relates to paying the costs of the proceedings below, and that the order of the Court of Admiralty be restored.

Decree of the Court of Appeal reversed so far as it varied the decree of the Court of Admiralty, and the judgment of the Court of Admiralty restored; the appellants to have the costs of the appeal to this House.

Ship and Shipping—Authority of master to sell—Cargo in a wrecked ship.

The master of a general ship becomes agent for the sale of the cargo—that is, has an authority to sell, so as to bind the owners of the goods entrusted to him for carriage to their port of destination—only where there is a necessity for that course; and it lies on those who claim title to the cargo as purchasers from the master to prove that he, before selling, used all reasonable efforts to have the goods conveyed to their destination, and that he could not by any means available to him carry the goods, or procure the goods to be carried, to their destination, as merchantable articles, or could not do so without an expenditure clearly exceeding their value after their arrival.

The Jupiter T., an Austrian general ship, was on a voyage from Singapore to New York wrecked on a rock off Cape Padrone, about eight hundred yards from the mainland and about fifty miles in a direct line from Port Elizabeth, the nearest place of importance. She contained a cargo consisting partly of pepper and partly of slabs of tin. The master and crew got ashore the next day. A survey of the ship was made from the shore only, after which the master, acting bonâ fide and on the advice of the Austrian Consul at Port Elizabeth, who, with other persons, had come to Cape Padrone, sold the ship and cargo, as they stood jammed on the rock, by auction. Neither the owner of the ship nor the owner of the cargo had an agent at Port Elizabeth, the master had no money at his command wherewith to hire men or vessels for salving the cargo, and he never went to Port Elizabeth, or made any effort to procure funds to enable him, or attempted to induce others, to salve the cargo. The evidence was conflicting as to whether tenders would have been made for salving the cargo if the master had advertised for such tenders.

Held (affirming the decision of Jessel, M.R.), that no such necessity was shown for the sale as to authorise the master to sell or make him the agent of the owners of the cargo for that purpose.

ABOUT the 2nd March 1875 the Austrian barque Jupiter T., of which L. Ivancich was master, sailed from Singapore to New York laden with a cargo worth about 40,000*l.*, consisting principally of slabs of tin, pepper, gambia, and copal.

On the 19th April 1877 she was wrecked on some rocks off Point Padrone, the eastern pointof Algoa Bay (within the Colony of the Cape of Good Hope), about 800 yards from the mainland and about fifty miles in a direct line from Port Elizabeth, the nearest port and place of importance, and a two days' journey overland (about eighty miles) from the scene of the wreck. The following day the master and crew got ashore. No reasonable mode of getting the ship off the rocks was suggested, and it was admitted that there never was any prospect or possibility of getting her off.

On the 21st and 22nd April the weather was rough, and the master remained ashore. On the 23rd April the master got on board and recovered the ship's papers. For more than a week the weather remained fine, though it was not very good on the 28th and 29th.

Soon after the 19th April the master communicated with A. Allenburg, the Austrian Consul at Port Elizabeth, but the master never went to Port Elizabeth, nor did he take any steps to procure the salving of the ship or cargo. Neither the shipowner nor the owner of the cargo had an agent at Port Elizabeth, and the master had no money with which to pay for salvage.

Allenburg sent two persons from Port Elizabeth to survey and report on the ship and cargo, and they, without leaving the shore, on the 24th April, made a report in which they recommended that the ship and cargo should be sold. The master also took Allenburg's advice to the same effect, and advertised the ship and cargo for sale.

The ship and cargo were sold by auction on the 30th April to Lamb Brothers, merchants at Port Elizabeth for 9500*l.* The day of the sale was very fine, and many persons, attracted by reports of the value of the cargo, attended the sale.

Lamb Brothers purchased on behalf of themselves and on behalf of other persons who together formed a syndicate. It was found that the sale was made bonâ fide. The purchaser, before the 19th June, when the vessel broke up, saved between 14,000*l.* and 15,000*l.* worth of cargo.

There was no general market for tin at or near Port Elizabeth, and about 2489 slabs of tin were sent to England for sale.

On hearing that the ship had stranded the owners of the cargo abandoned all their interests to the plaintiffs (the Atlantic Mutual Insurance Company and several other insurance companies who had insured the cargo), as upon a total loss, and the bills of lading were assigned to them.

The plaintiffs claimed, in the present action, a declaration against the defendants the purchasers and consignees of the cargo, that the tin received by those of the defendants to whom the tin was consigned belonged to the plaintiffs, and that the proceeds of sale of the tin might be paid to the plaintiffs.

The action came on for hearing before Jessel, M.R. on the 13th June, 1879.

Benjamin, Q.C. and W. G. F. Phillimore (Roxburgh, Q.C. and C. Stubbs with them), for the plaintiffs.—The master has no right to sell except in case of extreme necessity. He has no discretion as to selling. There is no question of whether it is wise to sell or better for the interests of all concerned. The master's duty is to save the cargo, or such part as is not perishable, and then to communicate with the owners of the cargo. The tin in this case was not perishable. If it was reasonably possible to salve, it was the master's duty to do so. In the case of a captured cargo which had been recaptured Lord Ellenborough, in directing the jury, said the captain had no right to sell the cargo to enable him to pay the captor's eighth, but was bound to have tried seriously and deliberately every other expedient to raise money before disposing of any part of the goods entrusted to his care. He said also that sale of the cargo was only to be resorted to in the last extremity, when every other expedient had failed, and every other resource was hopelsss. The Court of King's Bench, on a motion for a new trial, affirmed Lord Ellenborough's view:

Underwood v. Robertson, 4 Camp. 140.

[Jessel, M.R.—That is law to this day.] If the cargo be perishable, although the voyage is at an end, it is better for the owner that the cargo should be sold than left to perish, and the master in such a case may sell the whole. Necessity alone can justify the sale:

Freeman v. East India Company, 5 B. & Ald. 617.

[Jessel, M.R.—If there is a right to sell the cargo there is the right to sell the ship.] Yes. The cargo cannot be sold unless it is perishable without selling the ship. Here the cargo was in a ship which could not have been got off the rocks. The cargo could only be recovered by salving, and it was the master's duty to salve. [Jessel, M.R.—Is there any reported case in which the facts were the same?] No such case has been found, but the principle is covered by the decision in Cobequid Marine Insurance Company v. Barteaux (32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 510; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 536; L. Rep. 6 P. C. 319), where it said that the exercise by the master of the power of selling the ship was jealously watched by the court. [Jessel, M.R.—The observations do not seem to apply to the sale of cargo. There are some differences between a sale of the ship and a sale of the cargo.] If the cargo is perishable the master is not bound to tranship, although he has the means of doing so. But if the cargo is not perishable and it can be saved, the master may not sell. [Jessel, M.R.—As far as I know, that question has never arisen in the case of a wreck. It has been said, and I agree, that where the master can bring the cargo home in his own ship, he must endeavour to do so, by every reasonable means; but where a vessel is wrecked, is he bound to bring the cargo home? As I understand Lord Stowell's observations, there is no such duty. The master is not compellable to tranship, and the question is whether the principle of the cases does not all relate to the master's duty to carry out the venture.] If the ship cannot be saved, but the cargo can be saved, the master may please himself whether he will tranship the cargo. The cargo belongs to the owner, and the master is a stranger to it:

The Gratitudine, 3 C. Rob. 240

[Jessel, M.R.—There Lord Stowell says that the character of agent and supercargo is forced on the master by the general policy of the law, unless the law means that valuable property is to be left in his hands without protection, and that in some cases he may exercise the discretion of an authorised agent. And he says that, in emergency, the master must exercise his judgment whether he will tranship or sell.] In the case of perishable cargo there is no choice. If the cargo is not perishable there is a third course—to store and await the owner's orders. [Jessel, M.R.—Lord Stowell says that where the cargo is not perishable the master must, if he can, repair his ship, and proceed with the cargo according to the original terms of the venture, and that if he cannot raise the money he may sell or hypothecate the cargo; that is, sell part or hypothecate the whole.] Here the power of sale had not arisen, as there was no necessity. It is for the owner to say where the sale of the cargo shall take place, and the master cannot deprive the owner of his discretion. All the cases show that the master cannot change his position of carrier until every other method has been exhausted. [Jessel, M.R.—If a carrier agrees to carry goods by a given coach to a certain place, and the coach, while standing in the inn yard, is burnt, but the luggage is saved, the carrier's duty is to take care of the luggage.] Yes; and where a ship is destroyed the master must take care of the cargo, and not sell it. [Jessel, M.R.—Is it not a question of necessity for change of character, instead of a question of necessity for sale?] Yes. The master may make a bargain for the salving of the ship and cargo, or the cargo alone, and he does so as a carrier. [Jessel, M.R.—Does he not make that bargain, or throw over goods to lighten the ship, in the changed character of agent of the owner forced on him by unexpected circumstances?] No, for if he throws over goods he carries the remainder of the goods on in his original character. [Jessel, M.R.—I do not think that follows. In the case of ransom of a captured ship, after ransom he carries on the goods as agent, that is, as carrier, and something else?] He has no right to change his character without the owner's consent. [Jessel, M.R.—Then the next question is what necessity will justify the sale?] The discretion to sell is not to be exercised till all other means have been exhausted. The master must hypothecate if he can, rather than sell. He must in case of wreck land the goods by salvors. [Jessel, M.R. referred to Farnworth v. Hyde, 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 395; Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 187, 429; L. Rep. 2 C. P. 204, 226.] The most extreme necessity only will justify a sale. It is not enough to show imminent peril:

Royal Assurance Company v. Idle, 8 Taunt. 755; 3 Brod. & Bing. 151 n.

[Jessel, M.R.—If the goods are in peril, has the master any discretion whether the goods can be salved or not, if he thinks that salving will produce less than sale?] No; but there was no exercise of discretion here. The master never tried to find out whether the cargo could be salved. If money could be found for the purchase, money for salving, which would not have been so large an amount, could have been found. A part of the cargo might have been offered, though the captain had no money. The person who purchased knew the master had not done his duty. The master's right to bargain for salving is unlimited, except that the Court of Admiralty may interfere where an exorbitant price has been paid. [Jessel, M.R.—The evidence shows that, if salving had been effected, the salvors would have wanted 150 per cent. profit, and the Privy Council would think that exorbitant.) If the cargo had not been advertised for sale, but the master had left the people to salve according to a bargain or on their own terms, the cargo would not have been left to perish. In the United States, it has been held that a master has power to sell both ship and cargo, in certain cases of absolute necessity:

Post v. Jones, 19 Howard, 150.

It is no defence here for the master to say that all the merchants in Port Elizabeth were not in the habit of salving, and therefore salving could not be got.

Chitty, Q.C. and Marten, Q.C. (Romer with them) for the defendants.—The circumstances justified the master in going to sale. There was a commercial necessity, and in the absence of fraud the sale is good. According to Lord Stowell's judgment in The Gratitudine, the master had passed into a new character, that of agent for sale of the cargo. When the cargo is in imminent peril, the master must exercise a discretion, and adopt that course which a wise and prudent man is bound to take. [Jessel, M.R.—Necessity means absolute necessity in the strict sense of the word—that no other course is reasonably open.] The captain tried to get a salvage company together. [Jessel, M.R.—The common usage is to put out tenders for salvage. If a captain is wrecked on the Goodwins—a very good illustration—he does not try to sell; he makes a bargain with the vessels that come to salve the vessel. It lies on the defendants to prove that salvage at a fair price could not be obtained.] The master may sell an injured ship when there is no prospect of bringing her to the termination of the voyage:

Hunter v. Parker, 7 M. & W. 332.

A distinction was there attempted to be drawn between perishable and non-perishable goods. [Jessel, M.R.—I am not sure that pepper is perishable in a commercial sense. It does not spoil in a few days.] "Perishable" means perishable so far as the manner of perishing is concerned. A shilling dropped into the sea would not perish, but it would be lost to all intents and purposes. If the cargo was actually lost, the master could sell. [Jessel, M.R.—That may introduce a new difficulty—whether the master could sell on behalf of the underwriters.] There is no distinction in the cases on the subject. The master then becomes their agent. The master here abandoned the goods. [Jessel, M.R.—That could not give him a right to sell.] It shows the state of the cargo. It was necessary to advertise the sale. People would not have come such great distances for the sake of making tenders to salve. Having advertised the sale, the master was bound to sell; and the evidence clearly shows that selling was the right course to adopt. It is sufficient if the captain exercises his judgment:

Cammell v. Sewell, 5 H. & N. 728, 744; 2 L.T. Rep. N. S. 799.

If the master had salved, the terms would have practically amounted to a sale. Salvage would not have been a profitable transaction in this case for the underwriters.

Jessel, M.R.—Now that this case has been fully discussed, it appears to me that very little dispute is possible, either as to facts or as to law. As to fact the case is clear. [His Lordship stated the material facts, and continued:] As far as I know on this point the colonial law does not differ from English law. If it had differed it was the duty of the defendants to prove the difference, and that duty has not been discharged by them; consequently I must assume that there is no difference upon this subject between the law of the colony and the English law.

I have to consider a case of cargo in a wreck.

The cargo consisted chiefly of what might be described as non-perishable goods. There was a small portion of cargo which might or might not be described as perishable according to circumstances, but the bulk of the cargo and the bulk of the value was certainly not perishable. In fact a very large portion consisted of metal, which metal, the tin, is the subject of the present action. Although there was the possibility of the cargo being lost, the probability in the opinion of all concerned was that a considerable portion would be saved. That has a very important bearing upon the question. What was the duty of the master? Upon this point I have not quite so much authority as I have upon other points in the case. There is a statement in one case that it is the duty of the master to employ all reasonable means he can to save the cargo, and with that I entirely concur, but that does not quite conclude the question.

In considering this question we must come back to principle, and see what the relation of the master is to the owner of the cargo. The master is the agent of the shipowner or ship charterer as the case may be, who is the carrier of the goods. He is the agent of the carrier. The carrier of the goods, as such, has a plain duty to perform, namely, to carry the goods to their destination. As a rule the bills of lading except certain perils, including perils of the sea, for which the carrier at common law would be responsible as a carrier, unless he made another bargain; but it is so usual and almost universal to except these perils, that one may say that it has almost become part of the law, and one assumes they are excepted, so that the carriers are not insurers, that is, they are not insurers by express bargain.

Therefore, when the cargo is in a state of peril, the primary duty of the carrier is, if the cargo cannot be forwarded in the vessel, by reason of the wreck of the vessel, to endeavour to save the cargo. I think there can be no question that that is the primary duty of the captain. Then we have, in addition to that duty, the mercantile usage and practice, as proved by the evidence of the defendants, as to the manner in which that duty is to be performed. Now, upon that there can be no possible question. When a vessel is wrecked, the ordinary duty of the master is to do his best to arrange for the salvage of the cargo. That, according to the evidence, is the universal mercantile usage, and it points out what the master is to do in case of wreck. He may take, no doubt, three courses; but as a rule there is only one. As a general rule the salvors come to the master, and he either makes a bargain with them to salve the cargo, or he leaves them to salve, trusting to the amount of their remuneration being afterwards settled by arbitration or by the Admiralty Court.

The next point I have to consider is, by mercantile usage, what kind of bargain he makes, and it appears by the evidence that the usual bargain is for a percentage on the proceeds or value of the cargo, where he makes a bargain at all. He sometimes makes a bargain for a lump sum, and exceptionally, for a portion of the cargo in specie, but that is so exceptional that I think it can be left out of the account. It appears to me to be confined to certain parts of the world, and is done in very rare and extraordinary circumstances. You may take the meaning of the usual course to be, that he bargains for a share or a percentage of the proceeds of the value of the cargo. That share is ascertained upon the arrival of the cargo salved at the nearest port. Sometimes it is sold there, if the place is a market or a place of sale generally, or if the goods are such as we have here, metal, such as cannot be disposed of conveniently abroad, it is forwarded to London, and the value is ascertained either at the port or by sale in London. Of course, before the salvors part with their cargo, they get security that they will be paid their share. In the case of a colonial port like Port Elizabeth there were plenty of merchants who, on the tin being delivered to them, would advance the necessary sum, being remunerated by the charges afterwards to be settled. I am satisfied there would be no difficulty, if the tin were once landed, in obtaining the necessary amount, on behalf of the owners, to satisfy the salvors.

According to the general law, there is one case in which the cargo, although it does not belong to the carrier, may be sold by the carrier or the agent of the carrier. That is a case of necessity. The judges have been very careful about this necessity. They have said that, as a general rule, it must be necessity with an adjectiva. I do not know that necessity is made any stronger by the use of the adjective, but I find in almost all the cases that the judges, being very anxious that the law should not be misunderstood, have used an adjective in describing the kind of necessity. It has been called "stringent necessity," "absolute necessity," "extreme necessity," "unavoidable necessity," and that seems to be necessity itself; but they are all emphatic terms to show what they mean by necessity. Then again, it has been treated in another way, and they say, "Does it mean that otherwise the cargo owners would get nothing?" So that, if the cargo, though not absolutely perishable, though not absolutely liable to destruction, will yet not pay the cost of transmitting it to the port of destination, that is a necessity, because necessity means getting something substantial for the owners of the cargo. If you will get nothing for it, or nothing substantial, that is necessity; but has any judge laid it down as necessity when you can secure the salvage in specie, and for thousands of pounds of cargo? Then the right to bargain for salvage being a right exercisable by the marine carrier, if I may call him so, precludes the necessity for a sale where that right can be reasonably exercised.

I agree you may put an absurd and extreme case. You may say the risk is so great that no human being will salve at all, and that possibly a speculator might be found to give a nominal sum for the cargo. It is not necessary to decide that case, but I should not recommend any master of a ship to sell a cargo for five dollars under any circumstances whatever. It sounds to me rather in the nature of a joke than as a serious case of sale. But when you come to speak of peculiar circumstances, there may be a case where, after a wreck, salvage is not possible and sale is possible, although primâ facie the case would not exist; for, where people will buy they will salve, it being cheaper for them to salve, as they pay no purchase money. They only pay in the one case the expense of salvage, and in the other case they pay the expense of salvage plus the purchase money; consequently, as a general rule, where the purchase money is substantial, they prefer to salve, and it is very difficult for me to imagine a case of real necessity because, if there is a conspiracy amongst the persons at any common port not to salve—if there is anything like an arrangement that on no terms will they salve—I do not call that a case of necessity. The master's duty in that case is plain. He may, if he cannot make an arrangement for salvage, leave them to salve on any terms they think fit. I do not think for a moment that, with vessels and appliances at hand, any body of merchants would leave a cargo worth 30,000*l.* or 40,000*l.* to perish if they had the means to save it. I do not think the master in such a case would run any great risk in leaving it to the ordinary rule of salving, and I think those who say that the master was under the necessity to sell must prove that necessity.

Then, in order to find the necessity, as I understand the law the master must use every reasonable means of endeavouring to avoid the necessity. One judge says he must use every means in his power. In the present case the master did nothing of the kind. When the vessel was wrecked he sent for the Austrian consul at Port Elizabeth, and appears to have left the matter in his hands. The Austrian consul seems to have been under the impression (perhaps it is Austrian law, I do not know) that it was a right thing to sell—that is, if the cargo could not be landed at the spot near where the wreck was lying, it should be sold. If, instead of taking a tender at the auction, the master had called for tenders for salvage, it seems to me that the commercial men of the place would have been bidding against each other, and offered to salve the cargo even at less than a quarter. But there are other advantageous terms. The salvors stop when they like, and, when they find they cannot get on, they give notice to the master that they cannot salve any more, and they could have been paid only what they actually saved. They would not be obliged to go on at an expense. They would only have lost the difference, if there were any, between the money laid out and the proportion of the goods saved. It is therefore a more advantageous bargain.

It is said, indeed, and I agree, that there is a jurisdiction in the Admiralty Court to review unconscionable bargains, as there is in equity where unfair bargains, are obtained by taking undue advantage of the distress of the man entering into the bargain; but I am quite sure that no respectable merchant would for a moment say that he would be deterred from entering into salvage operations by reason of that wholesome jurisdiction, because he would not for a moment wish to take undue advantage of the distress of the master of the vessel, and it is only undue advantage that is interfered with by the Admiralty Court. The policy of the Admiralty Court always has been, and no doubt always will be, on the side of liberality towards salvors, in order to induce persons who sometimes risk their lives, and always risk their property, to enter into these adventures for the purpose of saving the property of the shipowners or carriers with the prospect of a handsome remuneration.

It appears to me, therefore, looking at it in this way, to be quite clear that a bargain for salvage might have been made, and not merely have the defendants not shown impossibility, but this evidence proves possibility. The only thing against it is this, it is not usual at Port Elizabeth. I hope it will be so in future. I hope in future they will think at Port Elizabeth that it is the duty of the master to save the cargo for the owners—that that is his primary duty, and that it is the duty of the merchants and boat owners, and others to use the means at their disposal for the purpose of aiding the master to perform his duty. I am satisfied that they did not think that they were doing wrong, that they purchased bonâ fide—that is, in the sense of believing that the master was entitled to sell, and not with a view of injuring the ship or cargo in any way. That being so, I must make the order which is asked for.

The defendants appealed.

Chitty, Q.C. and Marten, Q.C. (Romer with them) for the appellants.—There is no doubt that a master may sell cargo in case of necessity:

Australian Steam Navigation Company v. Morse, 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 357; L. Rep. 4 P. C. 222; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 407.

The case cited was approved by Brett, L.J., in Acatos v. Burns, L. Rep. 3 Ex Div. 282, 291a.

The master could not communicate with the owners, and had to exercise the discretion which he possessed whether he should salve or sell:

The Gratitudine, 3 C. Rob. 240.

"Necessity," in respect of hypothecation by the master is analogous to its meaning in other parts of the law:

The Karnak, 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 159; L. Rep. 2 P. C. 505; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 103, 276.

There seems to be no authority on the question when there has been a total abandonment. [Thesiger, L.J. referred to Royal Assurance Company v. Idle, 3 Brod. & B. 151; 8 Taunt. 723; Read v. Bonham, 3 Brod. & B. 147.] A difficulty in raising money to obtain salvage is a material circumstance in an inquiry whether there has been necessity.

The Australia, Swa. 480;
The Margaret Mitchell, Swa. 332, 337.

The course, suggested, by the Master of the Rolls of trusting to the chance of some one offering to salve, could not have been adopted with justice to the owners of the perishable part of the cargo.

Roxburgh, Q.C. and Dr. W. G. F. Phillimore (Benjamin, Q.C. and C. Stubbs with them) for the respondents.—The master can sell only in cases of extreme necessity:

Hayman v. Molton, 5 Esp. 65;
Freeman v. East India Company, 5 B. & Ald. 617;
Acatos v. Burns. sup.;
The Segredo, 1 Spinks, 36.

The American authorities are to the same effect:

Hall v. Franklin Insurance Company, 9 Pickering, 466;
3 Kent's Com. 237.

[Thesiger, L.J.—If the master must either sell or obtain salvage service, and a competent person advises a sale, is not that a case of necessity? James, L.J.—What ought the master to have done?] He ought to have advertised the loss in order to induce persons to attempt salvage in the ordinary way, trusting to getting a fair allowance from the Admiralty Court if no agreement could be come to.

The powers of a master are ample as to entering into salvage contracts; he may apply part of the cargo in payment for such service:

Marvin on Wreck and Salvage, 140.

If the master had entered into an equitable contract with the salvors, the owners might have got it set aside:

The Theodore, Swa. 351;
The Firefly, Ib. 240.

Salvage was possible, and there was such negligence about the sale as to throw a doubt on the bona fides of the contracting parties.

Cur. adv. vult.

After the adjournment, Thesiger. L.J, died, and the parties agreed to accept the judgment of James and Cotton, L.JJ., without prejudice to the right of any party to appeal to the House of Lords if dissatisfied with the judgment of the Court of Appeal.

On the 30th Nov. 1880 the following judgment of James and Cotton, L.JJ., was delivered by Cotton, L.J. [after stating the material facts]:—The question which we have to determine is, whether under the circumstances the master had power to bind the owners of the cargo by a sale. There is no decision or direct authority as to the power of the master of a wrecked vessel to sell the cargo while in the wreck. The cases in which the right of the purchasers of cargo from the master has come in question, have been where the cargo has been on shore.

The case of Idle v. Royal Exchange Assurance Company (8 Taunt. 755) was indeed pressed upon us as a case of the sale of a vessel and of the cargo while still on board it. In that case there had been such a sale, but the only point which arose and was decided (the sale of cargo not being questioned by the owners) was the right to recover on a policy of insurance of the freight—which depended on the question whether the master had properly abandoned the voyage. Undoubtedly there are expressions in the judgment which favour the appellants' contention in the present case, but it appears from a note to Read v. Bonham (3 Brod. & Bing. 151) that when the case came on in error a venire de novo was ordered, on the ground that it did not appear from the special verdict that the sale was necessary. This cannot be treated as an authority in favour of the appellants.

The rule, laid down in the cases in which sales of cargo have been questioned is, that the master becomes agent for sale of the cargo, that is, has authority to sell so as to bind the owners of the goods entrusted to him for a different purpose—namely, carriage to their port of destination—only where there is a necessity for that course, and that it lies on those who claim title to cargo as purchasers from the captain to prove that this necessity clearly existed; further, that it is not sufficient to prove that the master thought he was doing the best for all concerned, or even that the course adopted was, so far as can be ascertained, the best for all concerned: (see Tronson v. Dent, 8 Moore P. C. Cases, 419; Acatos v. Burns, sup.) The principle is that the master is authorised by the owners only to convey the goods to the port of discharge; and that nothing but necessity can justify or authorise him to adopt any other course of action. We do not enter into the question whether what will justify a sale is to be called extreme, or stringent, or the strongest necessity, or commercial necessity. In our opinion, purchasers of cargo from a master cannot justify the sale unless it is established that the master used all reasonable efforts to have the goods conveyed to their destination, and that he could not, by any means available to him, carry the goods or procure the goods to be carried to their destination as merchantable articles, or could not do so without an expenditure clearly exceeding their value after their arrival at their destination.

Here the sale was of the ship and cargo as an entirety, and a large and valuable part of the cargo was tin, which, if saved from the wreck, would have been practically uninjured, and certainly capable of being sent on in a merchantable state. The question therefore is, whether it is established that the master could not, with the means available to him, have landed or procured to be landed at least this portion of the cargo.

The owner of neither ship nor cargo had any agent at Port Elizabeth, and the captain had no money at his command to enable him to hire men or vessels, and other appliances necessary to save the cargo. The appellants rely on the evidence given by divers witnesses to the effect that no person or firm in Port Elizabeth would, without security (which the master could not give), have supplied him with the funds necessary to save the cargo from the wreck. There were also several witnesses who said that in their opinion, if the master had advertised for persons to save the cargo, no tenders would have been obtained.

But there are witnesses who express a somewhat different opinion. One of them says that, if an interest in the cargo saved had been offered, funds would probably have been forthcoming: and another says that his firm would have worked the salvage if the percentage offered had been sufficent to tempt them, and suggests half the cargo salvage as a percentage which he would have required. It is true, he says, that the percentage would have been so large that he did not think the captain would have been justified in giving it. But this is only his opinion as to what it would have been advisable for him, under the circumstances, to do, and this is not the question on which the decision of the present case must depend. The captain never went to Port Elizabeth, and made no effort to procure funds to enable him to save the cargo, or to induce others to undertake the salvage. The purchasers showed that they were willing to try to save the cargo, and to pay 9500*l.* on the terms of being entitled to the wreck and cargo saved, and the competition at the sale, and the circumstances that, immediately on the fact of the wreck being known at Port Elizabeth, several firms sent representatives to the wreck, in our opinion, show that the merchants of Port Elizabeth were not deficient in speculative enterprise.

It is, in our opinion, under these circumstances, impossible to hold that it is established that the captain could not have induced some person to undertake the salvage of the cargo. Certainly, the master did not use all means within his power, or make any effort either to procure funds for enabling him to save the cargo, or to induce others to save the cargo. For both reasons we are of opinion that it is not shown that there was such necessity for the sale as would authorise the master to sell or make him the agent of the owners for that purpose.

We have dealt with the case as if the sale had been of cargo only and the cargo all belonged to the same owner. In fact the sale was of wreck and cargo, and this ship was a general ship in which the different portions of the cargo belonged to different owners. What was in substance sold was the chance of recovering the cargo, and the chances of recovering the several portions thereof were very different. It is difficult to see how, as against the owners of the goods practically not perishable, the master could, under any circumstances, justify the sale, in one mass, of the chances of saving both the perishable and non-perishable portions of the cargo and the vessel. In our opinion the appeal fails and must be dismissed.

APPEAL FROM PROBATE. DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (ADMIRALTY).

Collision—Cause of damage—Contributory negligence—Both to blame—Practice of Admiralty Division—Division of damages—36 & 37 Vict. c. 66, sect. 25, sub-sect. 9—Thames Conservancy Rules.

Where a plaintiff by his negligence causes a collision which would not have caused damage except for the negligence of the defendant he is not disentitled to recover damages altogether, but is by the practice of the Admiralty Division only allowed to recover half the loss he has sustained.

In cases of collision between ships a mere contact without damage gives no right of action; the cause of action is the damage sustained by one ship through the negligence of those on board another.

A breach of the Thames Conservancy Rules which causes damage to others navigating the river, is evidence of negligence on the part of those guilty of the breach, and is not merely an act rendering the guilty party liable to the penalty provided by the rules.

This was an appeal from a judgment of Sir Robert Phillimore, by which he had, on the 9th June 1880, found the dumb barge E. Wo alone to blame for a collision which took place between the barge and the schooner Margaret in the river Thames on the 19th Oct. 1879.

The case is reported in the court below (42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 663; 5 P. Div. 238; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 276), where the circumstances of the collision and the rules and bye-laws relied on are fully set out.

March 22.—The appeal came on for hearing.

Butt, Q.C. and F. W. Raikes (with them Bucknill) for the appellants.—There is no evidence that the E. Wo would have come into contact with the Margaret at all had it not been for the improper position of the anchor of the latter vessel, and if so, the Margaret was the sole cause both of the collision and the injury. Moreover, a mere touching is no evidence of negligence in a crowded river, any more than it is for one person to rub against another in walking along a crowded street. But even if the court should be of opinion that we had no right to be where we were, such negligence does not disentitle us to recover for damages, which were solely caused by the negligence and improper conduct of the Margaret. A trespasser can, under certain circumstances, recover damages for injuries caused solely by the wrongful act of the owner of the property:

Lynch v. Nurdin, 1 Q. B. 29.

A collision, without any damage occurring, is no cause of action. There is no such thing as a verdict for nominal damages caused by a collision, and even at common law, though "a trespasser is liable to an action for the injury which he does . . . . he does not forfeit his right of action for an injury sustained:"

Barnes v. Ward, 19 L. J. 195, C. P.; 9 C. B. 392.

Here we have done no damage, and therefore no action or counter-claim can lie against us, but we have sustained serious damage by the defendant's default to comply with the bye-laws, and therefore he is liable to us. [Brett, L.J.—In ordinary cases, the cause of the collision and the cause of the damage are identical, and therefore the question usually is, did the defendant contribute to the accident? But your contention is that the question should be, strictly speaking, did the defendant contribute to the cause of damage?] Yes; moreover, in the Admiralty Court, and now in all causes of maritime collision (S. C. J. Act 1873, s. 25, sub-sect. 9), contributory negligence is no defence to the whole cause of action, as, even if proved, it only results in reducing the damages by one half, and therefore one of the cases (Sills v. Brown, 9 C. & P. 601) on which the learned judge of the court below appeared to rely is not really in point here. In the other case, that of The Gipsy King (2 W. Rob. 537, 5 Notes of Cases 282), the question which the court had to decide was whether the defence of compulsory pilotage was made out, and therefore any observations of the learned judge who tried the case on the question now before the court are mere obiter dicta. As to the fact of a penalty being prescribed by rule 72 of the Thames Bye-laws (42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 663; 4, Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 276), for such a breach as that of which the Margaret was guilty, that cannot possibly prevent a party injured from recovering in a civil proceeding; if it did there would be no civil proceedings at all for collision in the Thames, as the rules of navigation for preventing collisions at sea made under the statute are not in force, but similar ones which are prescribed by those bye-laws. The court must decide not what was the cause of the collision, but what was the cause of the damage; the amount of the damage is referred to the registrar and merchants, but they must be told on what basis they are to assess it. In this case, there being no counter-claim or cross action, the Margaret having sustained no damage, we are unable to get before the registrar at all. But the case very frequently arises where, though one party is liable to pay for the damages arising out of a collision, the party who has sustained damage may, by his subsequent conduct, have enhanced it; whether he has done so or not is a question for the court, and not for the registrar and merchants, and that shows that the real question is the cause of the damage, not merely the cause of the collision.

Milward, Q.C. and E. C. Clarkson, Q.C. for the respondents (after receiving an intimation that the court was of opinion that the barge was negligently navigated).—If there had been no collision there would have been no damage, and therefore no cause of action; the collision was caused by the negligent navigation of the barge, and therefore damage ensuing, though it would, had the Margaret sustained damage, have given a right of action, gave no such right to the E. Wo, by whose negligence alone the collision was caused:

The Gipsy King (ubi sup.).

[Cotton, L.J.—Is not the claim of the E. Wo for damage sustained by her coming into contact with your anchor, which was improperly placed? Brett, L.J.—If the effect of the collision had been to drive the anchor, placed in the position in which it was, into the Margaret instead of into the barge, could you have recovered?] The E. Wo would not have touched the anchor if she had been properly navigated, and therefore the position of the anchor was not the cause of the accident, but the negligent navigation of the E. Wo, and the E. Wo has therefore no right to say that "part of that mischief would not have arisen if you had not been guilty of some negligence;" here the immediate cause of the accident was the negligent navigation of the E. Wo, and the position of the anchor of the Margaret did not contribute to it, and therefore the E. Wo has no cause of action:

Greenland v. Chaplin, 5 Ex. 243; 19 L. J. 293, Ex.

The question in a collision action is whether the servants of the plaintiff by their improper conduct substantially contributed to the occurrence causing the injury:

Sills v. Brown, 9 C. & P. 601.

[Brett, L.J.—If the anchor had not been where it was there would have been no occurrence causing injury] There would have been a collision, and that is the occurrence causing the injury; "the collision is the primary cause of the damage, and" the court will not "look further, with a view to ascertain how much of the damage was occasioned by the anchor, or by any other part of the vessel;"

The Gipsy King, 5 Notes of Cases, 282, at p. 292; 2 Will. Rob. 537, at p. 547.

Butt, Q.C. in reply.—It is no answer to say that a collision, a mere contact, would have happened in any case; the damage which is the cause of action was solely and exclusively caused by the negligence of the defendant's servants.

James, L.J.—We have no doubt that this barge was negligently navigated. We must consider in this case what the nature of the action was, and the point before us would hardly arise if the cause of action were pleaded fully. The action is by the owners of the barge, who say, "Your anchor was in an improper place, and by reason of that my barge came into contact with it; it made a hole in my barge, water came in, and did a great deal of damage." That is the cause of action. The damage was done immediately by the contact of the improperly placed anchor with the barge. Would it have been a conclusive answer to say, "True it is I had my anchor improperly placed, and true it is it came into contact with your barge, and, if the anchor had not been there, no damage could have been done; but you are the person who led to the wrong, because, if you had not been improperly navigated, the collision would not have happened and the damage would not have occurred, and therefore it was you who caused the damage." It appears to me that that cannot be a justifiable defence. The defence as pleaded would be, "True it is my negligence caused your damage, but your negligence led to my negligence causing it." There can only be what is termed "contributory" negligence where there is negligence which contributes substantially to the cause of action. Where there is negligence which does so contribute, both parties are equally at fault, and both parties, through their own fault, cause the damage, and where this is the case, by the Admiralty rule, the damages are divided. The decision of Dr. Lushington, to which attention has been called (The Gipsy King, 5 Notes of Cases, 282; 2 W. Rob. 537), was on the point whether, where the damage actually was done by the cause that was alleged, and there was negligence about the anchor, that negligence would have made the ship liable in a case where a pilot was on board by compulsion of law. What was said in the judgment of that case on the point now before us was but an obiter dictum of the learned judge, for whom we have all respect, on a matter that does not seem to have arisen before him. On the true principle, the question in our opinion is, whether the negligence of one party or of both parties causes the whole damage, and not whether it may contribute to and enlarge the amount of damages.

Brett, L.J.—It seems to me that it was the duty of the court below to determine what was the legal liability of the parties, and in order to do that the court has to deal with the cause of action, and to determine whether there is any liability on the part of the defendant with regard to the cause of action, and if so what is the legal character of that liability. Now the cause of action in collision cases is not merely the fact of the ships having come into contact with one another—for that is no cause of action—but that damage, in the sense of injury, was caused to the property of the plaintiff by reason of the collision. Usually, however, it is sufficient for the court to find that there was a collision in point of fact, and that that collision or impact was caused by the negligence of the defendant. In 999 cases out of 1000 that is sufficient, because there has been some damage done; but strictly, in order to establish a cause of action, the court must find not only that there was a collision, and that it was the result of the negligence of the defendant, but also that some damage was done; then the liability of the defendants is made out, and a cause of action is established.

But in the Court of Admiralty that by itself did not establish what was the extent of the liability of the defendant. If it be asserted that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, what is the question the court has to decide? To my mind, strictly stated, it is whether the party has by negligence of his own contributed to the injury which is the cause of action, and not merely to the collision, as in a case like this, where it may be that, though both parties have not contributed to the collision itself, yet they have contributed to the injury, so that the act of one of them causes some damage to the other. Then the liability of the defendant is not entirely removed, but the damages are to be divided according to the Admiralty rule. Then where liability is sought to be imputed to the defendant, it signifies not whether the plaintiff or the defendant is guilty of the contributory negligence.

In this case you have the fact that the collision was caused by the negligence of the barge, and I cannot see myself that the impact of the two vessels together was contributed to by anything done on the part of the schooner. There would, however, have been no damage at all, and no cause of action at all so far as the E. Wo was concerned, but for the fact of the anchor being placed as it was, which was a wrongful act. The Margaret is therefore to blame, and had not the E. Wo been also to blame the schooner would have been liable for the whole of the damage done. But the E. Wo was to blame for navigating as she did, and by reason of this negligence on her part she came into contact with the anchor of the Margaret, and contributed to the damage. The barge and the schooner were both wrong, and therefore, according to the practice of the Court of Admiralty, the damages must be equally divided. The actual decision in the case which has been cited (The Gipsy King, ubi sup.) shows that the anchor there was found, as a fact, to have been properly catted, and therefore a statement by the learned judge as to what might have been the liabilities of the parties if it had been improperly placed are of necessity mere obiter dicta.

Cotton, L.J.—I entirely concur in the judgments already given, and will only add that it appears to me that the case is this. The E. Wo says (1) Your anchor caused the damage; (2) Your anchor was wrongly placed where it caused the damage. Those two facts being proved the plaintiff is entitled to recover, but the plaintiff was also in default for navigating negligently so as to come into contact with the Margaret and contribute to the damage, and therefore by the Admiralty Division must therefore be reversed, and, as in our opinion both vessels are to blame for the collision, the plaintiff will be entitled to recover half the damages sustained, the amount of the damage being referred to the registrar and merchants. No costs will be allowed either in the court below or on appeal.

Rivaz v. Gerussi and others.

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Marine insurance — Open policy — Fraudulent declaration of goods at less than their value— Concealment—Materiality—Action to set aside policies on ground of fraud.

In marine insurance it is not sufficient to disclose the facts material to the risks considered in their own nature, but all should be disclosed which would effect the judgment of a rational underwriter governing himself by the principles and calculations on which underwriters in practice act.

Defendants effected two open policies of insurance on goods to arrive, and declared goods on these policies, after arrival, at less than the true value. Defendants afterwards effected two more open policies to follow the previous policies.

In an action by an underwriter to set aside the two later policies on the ground of fraud, the jury found that the declarations of value made on the earlier policies were false and fraudulent, and were material to the subscription of the later policies, that plaintiff was induced by these declarations to subscribe the later policies, that defendants concealed the amounts which had been on risk and insured by the earlier policies, and that the matters so concealed were material.

Held, that there was evidence to support the findings of the jury, that plaintiff was entitled to have the policies set aside, and defendants were not entitled to a return of the premium which they had paid.

Judgments of Field, J., and of the Queen's Bench Division, affirmed.

The plaintiff, suing on behalf of himself and other underwriters, sought to have two policies of marine insurance cancelled and set aside under the following circumstances.

One of the defendants carried on business at Patras under the name of M. Gerussi; the other defendants carried on business in London under the name of Gerussi Brothers and Co. M. Gerussi used in the ordinary course of business to consign shipments of fruit from Greece and the Ionian Islands to Gerussi Brothers and Co. for sale.

The following policies were effected at Lloyd's by the defendants to cover fruit and produce from Greece and the Ionian Islands to London or Liverpool by any steamer or steamers in which such might be shipped from time to time, and which were to be declared and valued as interest might appear: (1) a policy dated 3rd Sept. 1875 for 25,000*l.*; the slip was signed 24th Aug. 1875: (2) a policy dated 1st Oct. 1875 for 20,000*l.* to follow and succeed the first policy; the slip was signed on 18th Sept. 1875; (3) a policy dated 7th Oct. 1875 for 20,000*l.* to follow and succeed the second policy; the slip was signed on 1st Oct. 1875; (4) a policy dated 3rd Nov. 1875 for 20,000*l.* to follow and succeed the third policy; the slip was signed on 5th Oct. 1875. The plaintiff subscribed all these four policies.

On the 5th Nov. 1875 the steamer Vindamora, having on board a shipment of fruit from M. Gerussi at Patras, consigned to Gerussi Brothers and Co. in London, was sunk, and the cargo lost. The defendants made claim in respect of this loss of 12,500*l.* on the third policy (that of 7th Oct.), that being the amount alleged by them to be open on that policy, and 5270*l.* on the fourth policy (that of 3rd Nov.) In consequence of these claims the present action was brought.

The statement of claim alleged that in investigating the claims made by the defendants it was discovered that the declarations and valuations made on the policies in respect of previous shipments were false and fictitious, and that previous to the loss of the Vindamora the said policies had been filled and exhausted by previous shipments insured by the said policies for very large amounts, which shipments had arrived safely, and that the defendants had fraudulently concealed and abstained from declaring the amounts which had been so previously insured by the said policies, and had declared some of such shipments at a less sum than the true value thereof, and at a less sum than the value at which the same respectively had been at risk on and insured by the said policies during the respective voyages; that during the currency of the first and second policies, and before the third and fourth policies were effected, the defendants had systematically concealed and omitted to declare on the two first mentioned policies the value of the interests from time to time insured thereby, and which arrived safely, and that the third and fourth policies were effected for the purpose of continuing such wrongful and fraudulent practices; that at the time of effecting the third and fourth policies the defendants concealed the improper declarations herein before mentioned from the underwriters, and when the plaintiff and the other underwriters underwrote such last-mentioned policies respectively they were entirely ignorant of the facts relating to such declarations, and they would not have underwritten the said policies if they had known the said facts.

The plaintiffs claimed:

1. That it may be declared that the policies of the 7th Oct. and the 3rd Nov. respectively were obtained by fraud and concealment of material facts, and that such policies may be respectively set aside and cancelled, or that an account may be taken of the shipments which have been at risk and insured by the said policies of the 3rd Sept., the 1st Oct., the 7th Oct., and the 3rd Nov. respectively, and of the values which ought to have been declared in respect thereof and that the declarations on the said policies respectively may be varied or rectified accordingly.

2. That the defendants may be restrained from dealing with or transferring the policy of the 3rd Nov. 1875.

3. Such further and other relief as the circumstances of the case may require.

The trial took place before Field, J. in London, during the Michaelmas sittings 1879. The following five questions were left to the jury, and were all answered in the affirmative.

1. Did the defendants declare any of the shipments prior to the Vindamora, at less sums respectively than the values at which the same shipments had been at risk and insured by their policies?

2. Did they make such declarations falsely and fraudulently, and were such declarations material to the subscriptions of the said policies, and were the plaintiffs induced thereby to subscribe them?

3. Did the defendants conceal and abstain from declaring the amounts which had been on risk and insured by their policies?

4. Was it material to the risk taken by the underwriters to be informed of the matters so concealed and abstained from being declared?

5. Were the policies of 7th Oct. and 3rd Nov. taken out by the defendants with the fraudulent intention of declaring goods upon them at less than the value at which they ought to have been declared?

There was also a finding that risk had been incurred to the extent of 72,659*l.* on the four policies.

On these findings Field, J. gave judgment for the plaintiff.

A rule for a new trial was discharged by the Divisional Court (Cockburn, C.J., and Field and Manisty, JJ.).

The defendants appealed from both these decisions.

The Attorney-General (Sir H. James) and Benjamin, Q.C. (Romer with them) for the defendants.—There is no evidence to support the findings that the declarations were material, and that the underwriters were induced by them to subscribe the policies. Although any fraudulent misrepresentation will vitiate a policy, mere concealment has not that effect, unless it is a concealment or a material fact:

Ionides v. Pender, 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 266; 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 547; L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 531.

The true doctrine as to concealment is that laid down in 2 Duer on Insurance, p. 390: "Those facts only are necessary to be disclosed which, as material to the risks considered in their own nature, a prudent and experienced underwriter would deem it proper to consider." [Brett, L.J.—in delivering the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench in Ionides v. Pender (ubi sup.), Blackburn, J., dissented from that proposition, and added: "But the rule laid down in Parsons on Insurance (vol. 1, p. 495), that all should be disclosed which would affect the judgment of a rational underwriter governing himself by the principles and considerations on which underwriters do in practice act, seems to us a sound one. We do not think any of the cases cited by Duer are in contravention of it."] The declarations on the earlier policies could not be material with regard to the later policies:

Stephens v. Australasian Insurance Company, 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 458; 27 L. T. Rep. N.S. 585; L. Rep. 8 C. P. 18.

There was no misrepresentation at the time of effecting the later policies, and this distinguishes the present case from Sibbald v. Hill (2 Dow. 263). The fifth finding of the jury is immaterial, for a mere intention to commit a fraud cannot vitiate a policy. This is the reason why in fire policies it is expressly stipulated that a fraudulent claim shall prevent the insured from recovering. Therefore, there has not been either such fraudulent misrepresentation as to vitiate the policies or concealment of any material fact.

Butt, Q.C., Webster, Q.C., J. C. Matthew, and Lindsay, for the plaintiffs, were not called on.

Baggallay, L.J.—This is an action brought by an underwriter, who seeks to have it declared that two policies of marine insurance, which are open policies on shipments to be afterwards declared, were obtained by fraud and the concealment of a material fact, and to have them set aside. In the view which I take of the case it is unnecessary to consider the alternative claim made by the plaintiff. A series of policies was obtained to cover fruit and other produce, to be brought from Greece and the Ionian Islands, in the year 1875. There were four open policies: the first was dated 3rd Sept. 1875, and the second 1st Oct.; the two subsequent policies, which are the subject of the present action, were dated 7th Oct. and 3rd Nov., being based upon slips which were signed on the 1st and 5th Oct. respectively. On 5th Nov. 1875 the steamer Vindamora was sunk in the Thames, and her cargo was lost. In respect of this loss a claim was made on the last two policies, which led to the present action. It was the practice of the defendants to make declarations on policies for a less amount than the amount for which they ought to have made them; that is to say, the earlier policies were exhausted to a larger extent than appeared for the earlier policies extended to larger sums than appeared from the defendants' declarations. It appears from the findings of the jury that the declarations actually made were brought to the notice of the underwriters. The second finding shows that the underwriters knew of the declarations which had been made on the previous policies at the time when they subscribed the two later policies. That finding is, that the declarations were false and fraudulent, and were material to the subscription of the later policies, and that the underwriters were induced by them to subscribe those policies. The third finding is, that the defendants concealed and abstained from declaring the amounts which had been at risk and insured by the previous policies; and the fourth finding is, that what was so concealed was material. Therefore there was non-disclosure of facts which were found by the jury to be material to guide an underwriter as to whether he would accept the risk or not, and as to whether he would demand a higher premium. This being so, I cannot say that there has not been non-disclosure of a material fact within the intent and meaning of the decisions.

Brett, L.J.—The question which we have to decide is, whether these policies should not be declared to be invalid on the ground that there had been fraud and a concealment of a material fact. The question is the same as would have arisen if the present defendants, on a loss occurring after the 1st Oct., had sought to recover the amount of the insurance money from the present plaintiffs. The concealment alleged was this: there were two policies on produce coming from abroad on ship or ships to be declared, and these two policies were to succeed other named policies; there were improper declarations of the value of the produce shipped, which were not only improper in the sense of being incorrect, but were also fraudulent, for after the arrival of the ships the defendants declared on a smaller value than they ought to have declared on. The object of the defendants was, having paid the premium on these former policies, to make them cover too much, so that apparently there was more to run out on the earlier policies than there really was. Thus the underwriters (assuming the alleged state of things on the former policies to be made known to them) would be naturally led to suppose that, inasmuch as declarations must first be made on the former policies, the two later policies could not be made effective until there had been shipments to a certain amount upon the other policies, and that to a considerable sum, whereas there was a very small sum upon the former policies to be realised, so that the two later policies would be called into effect much sooner than the underwriters would be induced to anticipate. The jury have found that there has been concealment of a matter calculated to affect the minds of reasonable underwriters, as to whether they would insure or not, and as to the amount of the premium. It was argued on behalf of the defendants that there was no evidence that knowledge as to the matter so concealed could be material, because it is said that it did not affect the risk of the voyage, and a passage from Duer was cited to show that a fact, the concealment of which would avoid the policy, must be a fact which might add to or diminish that kind of risk. There is a decision of the House of Lords which is quite contrary to that proposition (Sibbald v. Hill, 2 Dow. 263); the same argument was used there unsuccessfully. I think the true proposition is that laid down in Phillips on Insurance, sect. 531, which it seems to me must be expanded, not in compliance with the passage which has been cited from Duer, but as explained in 1 Parsons on Insurance, p. 495. Blackburn, J., in Ionides v. Pender (ubi sup.), also appears to have been of opinion that Duer was wrong on English law, and Phillips and Parsons were right, and this view is in accordance with the decision of the House of Lords already referred to. Therefore, the real question seems to be this: can we say that it is an unreasonable finding that reasonable underwriters could be governed by the amount of the declarations on the former policies? It seems to me that, so far from the finding being unreasonable, the matter is one which would govern the decision of any reasonable underwriter. Therefore a fact was concealed, which the jury within the rule of law could find to be material. Also the concealment was fraudulent, for the defendants knew that the knowledge of this matter was important, and they kept it back. Therefore there ought to be no return of the premium, and the verdict and judgment are right.

Cotton, L.J.—I understand the findings of the jury to involve that the plaintiffs knew the amount which had been declared on the previous policies, and the question which has to be decided is this, can the subsequent policies be maintained? It is contended on behalf of the defendants that there can be no concealment which would vitiate the policies unless facts are concealed "which, as material to the risks considered in their own nature, a prudent and experienced underwriter would deem it proper to consider." No doubt the law is so laid down by Duer in the passage which has been referred to in the argument, but that view is not adopted by the House of Lords in Sibbald v. Hill (ubi sup.), nor by the Court of Queen's Bench in Ionides v. Pender (ubi sup.). Here it is found that the underwriters were induced to enter into the subsequent policies by the declarations which were made as to the shipments which had been insured by the previous policies. I think we should not question the finding of the jury, which shows that it was a material fact to be known what was the real amount which was running on the previous policies. We cannot say that there was nothing on which they could find this. I agree therefore that the verdict and judgment are right.

Judgment affirmed.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Reported by H. D. BONSEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Saturday, March, 1881.

(Before GROVE, J.)

BATTHYANY v. BOUCH.

Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 55—Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), s. 3—Agreement to transfer a ship—Action thereupon by registered owner.

The plaintiff brought an action against the defendant upon a written agreement whereby the plaintiff agreed to sell and the defendants to buy a yacht for 2600*l.*, and claimed specific performance of the agreement, or in the alternative 2600*l.*, and damages for breach of the agreement.

The defendant in his statement of defence alleged that the agreement was not a bill of sale, nor was it registered as required by the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854, and pleaded the statute in bar of the action.

The plaintiff demurred to this part of the statement of defence on the ground that an agreement for the sale of a ship does not require to be registered.

Held, that sect. 55 of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854 applies to the actual instrument by which a ship is transferred, and not to an agreement to transfer; and therefore the agreement need not be registered, and may be enforced by the registered owner.

Demurrer allowed.

THIS was a demurrer to a part of the defendant's statement of defence.

The statement of claim was as follows:

1. On or about the 29th Feb. 1880 it was agreed in writing by and between the plaintiff and defendant that the plaintiff should sell to the defendant, and the defendant should buy of the plaintiff a certain yacht, known as the Kriemhilda, whereof the plaintiff was the registered owner, at and for the price of 2600*l.*, on condition that the said defendant should be at liberty to rescind the said agreement should the yacht prove unsound.

2. The plaintiff says that he has always been ready and willing to perform the said agreement on his part, and did all things necessary to be done on his part to entitle him to have the said agreement carried out by the said defendant.

3. The said defendant waived his right to a survey, and took possession of the said yacht, and put his crew on board.

4. Afterwards the said defendant neglected and refused to retain possession of the said yacht, and neglected and refused to carry out the said agreement, and neglected and refused to pay the said price and denied and repudiated his liability to carry out the said agreement, and the plaintiff claims (1) A decree of specific performance; (2) In the alternative 2600*l.*; (3) Damages for breach of the agreement; (4) Such further or other relief as the nature of the case may require.

The first paragraph of the statement of defence is all that is material to the present case, and was as follows:

1. The defendant does not admit that the plaintiff was the registered owner of the said yacht, or that any agreement in writing was ever entered into. If any agreement in writing was entered into it was the plaintiff by the imposition of the new condition next hereinafter mentioned, and not the defendant, who prevented such agreement from being carried out. In any case such agreement was not a bill of sale, nor was it registered, nor did it contain a sufficient description of the yacht as required by the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854, and on these grounds and so far as it relates to any such agreement the defendant pleads this statute in bar of this action

The plaintiff demurred to the last sentence of the first paragraph of the statement of defence on the ground that the agreement for the sale of a ship does not require to be registered, and on the ground that the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854 does not contain any provisions requiring special description of a ship to be inserted in an agreement for the sale of a ship, and does not contain any provisions which can be pleaded in bar to the action.

Gainsford Bruce, for the plaintiff, in support of the demurrer.—I admit at once that in order to pass the property in a ship a registered bill of sale is necessary, but in this case it is only an agreement to do that which when done must be done by bill of sale. The 55th section (a) of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854 obviously applies to the actual transfer of the ship, not to an executory agreement for the sale of a ship. If it did apply, it would come to this, that you could never have an agreement for the sale of a ship. I believe under the former Acts which were much more stringent than these, it was held that you could not have an executory agreement for the sale of a ship without a form in accordance with the Act. The Liverpool Borough Bank v. Turner (1 J. & H. 159; 30 L. J. 379, Ch.; 29 L. J. 827. Ch.), was decided upon the 66th section (b) of the Act of 1854, which relates to mortgages. [GROVE, J.—Does any case go to the length of saying that an agreement to mortgage must be registered?] I think the case of the Liverpool Borough Bank v. Turner does go the length of that; but there is a difference between an agreement to transfer and an agreement to mortgage. The words of the former statute 8 & 9 Vict. c. 89, s. 34, are very different from the present. In that section are the words, "Otherwise such transfer shall not be valid or effectual for any purpose whatever, either in law or in equity," and these words are omitted

(a) 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 55, "A registered ship or any share therein when disposed of to persons qualified to be owners of British ships shall be transferred by bill of sale, and such bill of sale shall contain such description of the ship as is contained in the certificate of the surveyor, or such other description as may be sufficient to identify the ship to the satisfaction of the registrar, and shall be according to the form marked E. in the schedule hereto or as near thereto as circumstances permit, and shall be executed by the transferor in the presence of and be attested by one or more witnesses."

(b) 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 66: "A registered ship or any share therein may be made a security for a loan or other valuable consideration, and the instrument creating such security, hereinafter termed 'a mortgage,' shall be in the form marked L. in the schedule hereto or as near thereto as circumstances permit, and on the production of such instrument the registrar of the port at which the ship is registered shall record the same in the register book."

from the Act of 1854. All the cases which can be cited in support of the defendant's contention are cases decided on the prior Acts, except the case of the Liverpool Borough Bank v. Turner (ubi sup.), and that was on a question of mortgage, and on a different section of the Act, and there is a substantial difference between the two sections. Although the Act has been in force since 1854 there is no case deciding that a contract for the sale of a ship is invalid unless by bill of sale and registered, and certainly the words of the 55th section standing alone would not convey that meaning. But I submit that the Act of 1862 puts the matter beyond all doubt. That Act was partly passed in consequence of the case of the Liverpool Borough Bank v. Turner (ubi sup.), and in order to get rid of the effect of that decision. The 3rd section (a) of that Act gives a definition of the expression "beneficial interest." He also cited Stapleton v. Haymen, 2 H. & C. 918.

Cohen, Q.C, and Assheton Cross for the defendant.—The difficulty in the way of Mr. Bruce's argument with reference to the 3rd section of the Act of 1862 is that the section only provides that "equities may be enforced against registered owners and mortgagees," but does not provide for the case of equities being enforced by registered owners. Here it is the registered owner who is seeking to obtain specific performance, and not a person against a registered owner; the reason is that before a person can enforce the performance of a contract for the purchase of a ship he must show that he is qualified to be the owner. As against the registered owner, the contract could be enforced. That I admit. Beneficial interest means the interests of persons who are not registered owners. There is no need of the State to protect the beneficial interests of the registered owner. [GROVE, J.—According to your argument, no agreement can be made for the sale of a ship without all the necessary formalities of a bill of sale.] Yes, it can, because trusts are recognised, and the registered owner having agreed to sell the ship is a trustee for the purchaser. [GROVE, J.—That is, the contract of sale is unilateral, which seems strange.] But by the provisions of the statute that is so. There is no distinction between transfers and mortgages. The words "beneficial interests" in sect. 33 of the Act of 1854 apply to all beneficial interests of persons who are not registered owners. Equities will only be enforced by persons who have beneficial interests against registered owners, and cannot be enforced by registered owners. They cited

Hughes v. Morris, 21 L. J. 761, Ch.;
Duncan v. Tindal, 13 C. B. 258;
McCalmont v. Rankin, 22 L. J. 554, Ch.;
Union Bank of London v. Lenanton, 3 C. P. Div. 243; 30 L. T. R. 698; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 500.

Gainsford Bruce in reply.—If sect. 55 of the Act of 1854 stood alone I should succeed, and the only authority cited against me is on another section and different words. The case of the Liverpool Borough Bank v. Turner (ubi sup.) is really no longer binding, in consequence of the Act of 1862. [GROVE, J.—There are some strong dicta in that case to show that the learned judges who decided it thought there was no difference between mortgages and transfers.] But the case was actually decided on the section relating to mortgages, and then the Act of 1862 was passed for the express purpose of getting rid of that decision. There is a substantial difference between sect. 55 and sect. 66 of the Act of 1854. Every contract by way of mortgage comes within sect. 66, because it is a security; but it by no means follows that, under the other, which says that you shall transfer a ship without certain formalities, you cannot therefore agree to transfer without the same formality. An agreement to mortgage is a security, but an agreement to transfer is not really a transfer in equity; it only gives the parties a right to enforce the transfer. Sect. 100 of the Act of 1854 shows that beneficial interests are not limited, as Mr. Cohen contends, but are general, and it clearly recognises beneficial interest apart from legal ownership.

GROVE, J.—This demurrer arises in this way. The statement of claim alleges that it was agreed in writing between the plaintiff and defendant that the plaintiff should sell to the defendant, and the defendant should buy of the plaintiff a certain yacht whereof the plaintiff was the registered owner, for the price of 2600*l.*; and that the defendant refused to carry out this agreement. In answer to the statement of claim, the only part of the statement of defence to which I need allude is the first paragraph, and that part of it only which says that "In any case such an agreement was not a bill of sale, nor was it registered, nor did it contain a sufficient description of the yacht, as required by the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854, and on these grounds, and so far as it relates to any such agreement, the defendant pleads this statement in bar of this action." That part of the statement of defence is demurred to on the ground "that an agreement for the sale of a ship does not require to be registered, and on the ground that the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854 does not contain any provisions requiring any special description of a ship to be inserted in an agreement for the sale of a ship, and does not contain any provisions which can be pleaded in bar to the action."

I shall not decide here what portion of relief the plaintiff is entitled to. I have not to decide that. What I have to decide is, whether that part of the statement of defence affords a valid defence to the action. I am of opinion that it does not, and that this demurrer must be allowed.

The main section relied on for the defendant is the 55th section of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854: "A registered ship, or any share therein, when disposed of to persons qualified to be owners of British ships, shall be transferred by bill of sale; and such bill of sale, &c." The first part only of the section is material, and certainly reading that section by itself, I should have no doubt whatever in saying that it applied to the actual instrument by which the ship was to be transferred and not an agreement to transfer. It would never have occurred to me that it prohibited persons from entering into an agreement, the one to sell and the other to buy a ship, but that it related solely to the instrument of transfer.

(a) 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, s. 3: "It is hereby declared that the expression 'beneficial interest,' whenever used in the second part of the principal Act includes interests arising under contract and other equitable interests; and the intention of the said Act is that without prejudice to . . . . equities may be enforced against owners and mortgagees of ship in respect of their interest therein, in the same manner as equities may be enforced against them in respect of any other personal property."

But the case does not depend upon the section standing alone if it did I should have felt no doubt about the case. Upon another section, the 66th, which relates to mortgages there has been a decision in the case of The Liverpool Borough Bank v. Turner (ubi sup.) by two very distinguished judges, Lord Hatherley (then Wood, V.C.) and Lord Campbell, and they decided substantially on these grounds, that the words in the Act of 1854, relating to mortgages, were not inconsistent with those in the previous statutes, on which it had been held that a mortgage was void in law and in equity, unless the conditions of the statute were complied with. They held that contracts came within the statute. Now, that judgment would be binding on me if I was deciding a question on sect. 16; whatever my own opinion might be I should be absolutely bound by that decision.

But then there are two reasons alleged why it is not binding upon me. One is that it is not a decision on sect. 55 but on sect. 66 which relates to mortgages and not transfers of ships. The 66th section is, so far as is material, as follows: "A registered ship, or any share therein, may be made a security for a loan or other valuable consideration, and the instrument creating such security hereinafter termed a mortgage, shall be in the form. &c." In The Liverpool Borough Bank v. Turner (ubi sup.), Wood, V.C., and subsequently Lord Campbell, on appeal, held that under that section a registered British ship could not be made security for a loan except by mortgage, and that must be registered. But then it is said that decision only applies to sect. 66, and that there is a material and substantial difference between that section and sect. 55. There is some difference, no doubt, but I was particularly affected by the expressions of Wood, V.C., in his judgment in the Liverpool Borough Bank v. Turner (ubi sup.), with reference to it being the same whether the ship was sold or mortgaged; and Lord Campbell, though he does not speak so emphatically, says something to the same effect. By that I am not bound, as the decision was not upon the subject of transfer, though of course I should pay great attention to the opinions of judges of such high authority. If I can find a rational distinction between the two sections, it is my duty to exercise my own discretion.

I am of opinion that there is a distinction, and one quite sufficient to induce me to think that I am not bound by the obiter dicta in the case of the Liverpool Borough Bank v. Turner (ubi sup.). There is a difference, as has been pointed out by Mr. Bruce, between a security and a transfer. The section which relates to transfer does not say that anything should be included in the word "transfer" beyond that which it really amounts to; but the word "security" ex vi termini, includes equitable and legal mortgages. The learned judges, who seem to have put sales and securities on the same ground, did so without having it argued. All they had their minds directed to was sect. 66, and their attention was not drawn to the difference of the words and meaning between that section and sect. 55; if it had been I do not feel sure that they would have come to the same conclusion. There has been an expression of doubt thrown upon the case of the Liverpool Borough Bank v. Turner (ubi sup.) by a judge of high authority (Pollock, C.B. in the case of Stapleton v. Haymen (ubi sup.).

But there has been a subsequent statute passed —the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act of 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63)—in part at all events to remedy the decision in that case, at least, there is a good deal to show that the Act was passed with that object. Now, in the case of the Liverpool Borough Bank v. Turner beneficial interests were considered by Wood, V.C. to be only those which applied to aliens and foreigners; but by the Act of 1862 it is enacted thus: It is hereby declared that the expression 'beneficial interest' whenever used in the second part of the principal Act includes interests arising under contracts, and other equitable interests; and the intention of the said Act is that without prejudice to . . . . . equities may be enforced against owners and mortgagees of ships in respect of their interest therein, in the same manner as equities may be enforced against them in respect of any other personal property." Therefore, whenever beneficial interests are mentioned in the second part of the Act of 1854, they expressly include interests arising under contracts.

Mr. Cohen says that is true, but the second part of the section merely enables persons who have rights against registered owners to enforce them, but does not enable registered owners to enforce rights against other persons; that is, there is no correlative right given to registered owners. It would certainly be a very unusual thing if an Act provided that the parties to a contract should not have correlative rights, and, although I will not go so far as to assert there are no such cases, I certainly cannot call any to mind at the present time. All Mr. Cohen says is that the Statute of Frauds is an instance of that; but the Statute of Frauds only provides a legal mode of giving evidence of a contract; it does not create the contract, and therefore does not apply to this question at all.

Then the question is, are the words of the statute so peremptory that, although no reason can be shown for them, I must act upon them? I do not think that is so. In the first part of the section there is a direct recognition of beneficial interests, where mentioned in the former Act, and I think it is not true that those beneficial interests only apply to persons claiming against the registered owner. This appears from sect. 100: "Whenever any person is beneficially interested otherwise than by way of mortgage in any ship or share therein registered in the name of some other person as owner, the person so interested shall, as well as the registered owner, be subject to all pecuniary penalties imposed by this or by any other Act on owners of ships or shares therein, so, nevertheless, that proceedings may be taken for the enforcement of such pecuniary penalties against both or either of the aforesaid parties with or without joining the other of them." That evidently treats a person who is beneficially interested in the same category as the owner, and therefore I think that in the first part of sect. 3 of the Act of 1862 beneficial interest applies whether as owner or against an owner.

It would certainly be a very startling thing if the construction which the defendant seeks to put upon the statute were to be given to it, for there could be no dealing with a ship at all. Persons could never agree to transfer a ship until they had actually transferred it; or in other words, they could not agree at all, and this would certainly be a very strong view to take where the words of the statute themselves import no such meaning. Therefore, I think the demurrer must be allowed.

THE SINQUASI.

Damage—Compulsory pilotage—Tug and tow.

The person in charge of a ship in tow is not bound to direct every movement of the vessel towing, but may allow the towing vessel a discretion as to the way in which other vessels are to be passed.

Where a collision is caused by a tug executing a wrong manœuvre, the fact that the person in charge of the ship was a pilot employed by compulsion of law, and gave no orders, does not relieve the owners of the ship in tow from liability. (a)

THIS was an action instituted by the Company of Proprietors of the Regent's Canal against the owners of the sailing-vessel Sinquasi, for damages done by that vessel on the afternoon of the 4th Oct. 1879, whilst proceeding up the river Thames in tow of a steam-tug, to a jetty or pier of the plaintiffs at the entrance of the canal.

The defendants relied exclusively on the fact that, at the time of the collision, the Sinquasi was "in charge of a duly licensed Trinity pilot, whose employment at the time and place was compulsory by law," and that "the said collision, and the damage consequent thereon, were caused solely and exclusively by some neglect or default on the part of the said pilot . . . . and not otherwise."

On the 19th July, the cause came on for trial before Sir R. Phillimore and Trinity Masters.

The pilot, by whose default the accident was alleged to have occurred, was called as a witness by the plaintiffs, and he stated that whilst coming up the river from Gravesend, where he had taken charge of the Sinquasi, he had given orders to the tug when he thought it necessary, but that he allowed her to pursue her own course in clearing passing vessels, so long as that course was a correct one; that in Limehouse Reach, in consequence of the number of craft, the navigation became difficult, and that, without orders, the tug, on approaching the Regent's Canal basin, ported to pass to the northward of some vessels, thereby towing the Sinquasi towards the pier at the entrance of the basin; that he was obliged to port the helm of the Sinquasi to follow the tug and clear the craft, and that, though as soon as possible afterwards he starboarded, the Sinquasi did not answer her starboard helm in time to clear the pier. He further stated that it was not necessary for the tug to have ported at all.

Butt, Q.C. and E. C. Clarkson for the plaintiffs.—The error which caused this collision was that of the master of the tug. The pilot committed no error; it is not his duty to be continually telling the tug not to alter her helm, he has only to give directions when it is desirable to alter it. The tug master, during the time of his employment, stands to the owner of the vessel in tow in the relation of servant to master, as much as a sailor on the look-out or at the helm does, and therefore the owners are liable for his mistake or default.

Myburgh and Wood Hill for defendants.—The duty of a pilot is to direct the navigation of the ship, and to give orders how to pass each particular obstruction. It was a neglect of duty on his part not to give directions to the tug how to pass the vessels, and he cannot get rid of the consequences of his neglect by saying that it is not his custom to give such directions. By allowing the master of the tug to pursue such course as he thought best in passing other vessels, he delegated his authority in directing the navigation of the ship to the tug master, and was therefore responsible for his acts as much as if they were his own. Moreover, if the tug was wrong to port, the Sinquasi was wrong also; he ought at once to have countermanded the manœuvre, which he did not do till they were past the craft, and therefore he adopted the act of the tug master:

The Duke of Sussex, 1 Notes of Cas. 161; 1 W. Rob. 270.

E. C. Clarkson in reply.—The master of the tug is bound to use reasonable care and skill. The pilot has a right to expect it from him, and that he will, in the absence of express orders, use that care and skill:

The Robert Dixon, 5 P. Div. 54; 42 L. T. Rep. N. S 344; Asp. Mar Law Cas. 246.

An ordinary helmsman has, for the purpose of keeping a ship on her course, constantly to be moving the helm without special directions; but if, in the absence of orders, he altered the course and caused a collision, the owners would be liable.

Sir ROBERT PHILLIMORE.—This is a case arising out of a collision which took place between twelve and one o'clock in the afternoon on the 4th Oct. 1879. The barque Sinquasi, the vessel proceeded against in this action, was going up the river Thames in tow of a steam-tug called the Warrior, and struck the jetty or pier of the plaintiffs, and did considerable damage. The owners of the Sinquasi admit that that vessel came into collision with the pier-head of the plaintiffs, and did other damage complained of, but they contend that the Sinquasi did the damage through the negligence of a Trinity House pilot, whose employment was compulsory by law, and that therefore such pilot was alone to blame for the collision. Now the question mainly turns upon the conduct of the tug towing the Sinquasi in porting her helm and going to the north of the dumb barge and two sailing barges which were going up the river. A great deal of argument has been expended upon the fact of whether there was room sufficient for the tug and the Sinquasi to have gone between the dumb barge and the sailing barges. It is admitted that, if there was sufficient room to pass between the barges, it was the duty of the tug to tow between them, and we are of opinion that there was sufficient room. Upon this point the evidence of Allen, another pilot, was material. He was rowing across the river from north to south, and had a full opportunity of seeing what passed, and he swore positively that there was plenty of room between the barges. This statement is confirmed by the persons who were on the pier-head. It is denied by the witnesses for the defendants, but we have more confidence in the witnesses produced by the plaintiffs. It was therefore a wrong manœvvre on the part of the tug to port, and this was primarily the cause of the collision. It has been said that the pilot delegated his authority, not in terms but in conduct, to the master of the tug. We are not of that opinion. It is not necessary, in our judgment, that the pilot should be giving orders perpetually for every movement of the helm of the tug. When the tug suddenly ported without the order of the pilot the Sinquasi had no option but to follow her. The tug was the servant of the Sinquasi, and the Sinquasi is responsible for what the tug did. We believe the pilot starboarded as soon as he could after clearing the dumb barge. The Sinquasi, having regard to her length, could not recover herself in time to prevent the collision. In the opinion of the court the Sinquasi is to blame for the collision, which was not caused by any default of the pilot.

(a) The case of The Gipsy King (5 Notes of Cases p. 288) was not cited in the course of the argument. It is there stated by Dr. Lushington "that, if the course pursued by the steam-tug is in conformity with the direction of the pilot, or not against his directions, and a collision takes place, the pilot is responsible, and not the owners of the steam-tug, which ought to obey the pilot."

THE ROSALIE.

Collision—Vessel hove to—Vessel close hauled on the starboard tack—Regulations for preventing Collisions at Sea, Art. 12.

Where a vessel hove to with her tiller lashed a-lee, and with the wind on the port side, forereaching one and a half knots an hour, is crossing another vessel close-hauled on the starboard tack and a collision occurs, the first vessel is to blame for not keeping out of the way under Art. 12 of the Regulations; but the second is also to blame if she sees, or ought to see, that the first vessel is not taking steps to keep out of the way, and fails to take any steps in her power to avoid the collision.

THIS was an action brought by George Strowger, the owner, and others the crew of the fishing dandy Young Alonzo, of Lowestoft, of 27 tons register, against Messrs. Cory and Sons, of Cardiff, the owners of the Rosalie, a three-masted schooner of 219 tons register for the recovery of damages arising out of a collision between the said two vessels.

The facts were as follows:—About 8.30 on the 28th March 1880 the Young Alonzo left Plymouth on a mackerel fishing voyage, and after sailing about a mile outside the breakwater was hove to on the port tack under double-reefed mainsail forecloth jib forsail, and storm mizen, with her sheets hauled a-weather; and her tiller lashed three parts down, and so remained waiting for the weather to moderate. The wind was blowing strongly from the east, the weather was fine and clear, and the tide was ebbing, and at 11.20 the Young Alonzo heading S.E. had forereached at the rate of about one and a half or two knots an hour. to about six miles south of the breakwater. About this time the Rosalie, on a voyage from Newport to Caen, was approaching the same place close-hauled on the starboard tack heading N.N.E., and proceeding at the rate of five knots an hour. The crew of the Young Alonzo did not see the Rosalie until she was about a cable's length distant on the starboard side, when they hailed without effect, and the Rosalie struck the Young Alonzo amidships on the starboard side, and sunk her immediately, with her nets and gear and the crew's effects. The crew of the Rosalie saw the Young Alonzo about a mile off, but having the wind on the starboard side took no steps to avoid collision until it was inevitable, when they put the helm of the Rosalie hard down at about a ship's length distant and proceeded to lower her fore-and-aft sails which apparently dropped about the time she struck the Young Alonzo. The crew of the Rosalie had not observed that there was no one at the tiller of the Young Alonzo.

Art. 12 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea is as follows:

> When two sailing ships are crossing so as to involve risk of collision, then, if they have the wind on different sides, the ship with the wind on the port side shall keep out of the way of the ship with the wind on the starboard side.

J. P. Aspinall (with him F. W. Raikes), for the plaintiff.—Art. 12 of the Sailing Rules does not apply to the case of a vessel hove to. When a vessel is hove to, and it is or ought to be clear to another that she is so—as it must have been in this case, in broad clear daylight, if a proper look-out was being kept on the Rosalie—it is the duty of that other vessel to keep out of the way. In The James (Swab. 55), the Confucius was lying to close-hauled on the port tack, her helm lashed a-starboard, and the James was also lying to close-hauled on the starboard tack, her helm a-port—each vessel being a little on the port bow of the other, a collision ensued by which the port bow of the Confucius was stove in and she sank. In that case it was held that the Confucius was to blame for not having ported her helm in time, and the James for not having thrown back her headyards when the collision was probable, and the damage was therefore divided. As the Sailing Rules do not apply to vessels hove to, the James contains the rule of law on the subject, and, although prior in date to the Sailing Rules, has not been affected by them. In The Underwriter (L. Rep. 2 App. Cas. 386; 36 L, T. Rep. N. S. p. 155; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. p. 361) it was decided by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council that a vessel on the starboard tack close-hauled approaching another apparently on the port tack is nevertheless bound to keep out of the way so soon as she ascertains that the other vessel is unmanageable and unable to obey the ordinary rule of the road at sea. This collision occurred in broad daylight, and the Rosalie ought to have seen at a great distance that the Young Alonzo had no one at the tiller, and that she was hove to from the position of her sails.

E. C. Clarkson (with him Myburgh) for the defendants.—It is absurd to say that the Young Alonzo travelling at the rate of two knots an hour was hove to. This case is clearly under Art. 12, and however the case of The James might have influenced this case before the Sailing Rules were published it does not apply now. By Art. 12 the Young Alonzo ought to have ported, and is solely to blame for not having done so. Had the Rosalie done anything else than keep her course she would have rendered herself to blame if a collision had ensued. In The London (6 N. of Cas. 29; Pritchard's Digest, vol. 1, p. 185) it is reported that when two vessels are in danger of collision in broad daylight, one of them lying to dead with her head to windward, if the other, in order to avoid a collision, should there be a possibility of avoiding it, does more than she is bound to do, the court will view that with great approbation. In this case the Rosalie was right in keeping her course, and any other manœuvre on her part would have been a subject for the approbation of the court, but she was not bound to do anything. As for The Underwriter (ubi sup.), in that case the vessel with which the Underwriter collided was not hove to, but was tacking and missed stays, the court finding that tacking was a proper manœuvre, considering her position with relation to the Underwriter, so that in her case the other vessel was wholly unmanageable, while in this case the Young Alonzo could have been manœuvred almost immediately. This is an essential difference between the two cases. Besides, in The Underwriter, the Privy Council found in circumstances exactly similar to those in this case that the proper manœuvre was for a vessel to starboard her helm and bring her head to the wind, and this was exactly what the Rosalie did.

J. P. Aspinall in reply,

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is a case of collision between two vessels, the Rosalie and the Young Alonzo, which happened in Plymouth Sound on the 27th March last between six and seven miles to the south of the breakwater. The question is, which of these vessels or whether both are to blame. First of all it is clear to us that the Young Alonzo was hove to; and, secondly, that the Rosalie was close-hauled on the starboard tack. I am of opinion that Art. 12 of the Sailing Rules applies to this case. It says: "When two sailing ships are crossing so as to involve risk of collision, then, if they have the wind on different sides, the ship with the wind on the port side shall keep out of the way of the ship with the wind on the starboard side." The Young Alonzo had the wind on her port side, and the Rosalie had the wind on her starboard side. The Young Alonzo ought to have released her tiller, and I am therefore of opinion that the Young Alonzo is to blame. Then there is the question of the Rosalie. She might have done something under the circumstances to avoid the collision, and ought to have seen the state of affairs on board the Young Alonzo in time to do something. She ought to have seen that there was no one at the tiller of the Young Alonzo when at a considerable distance, and might then have either ported and brought her own head to the wind, which was considered to be the proper manœuvre in the case of the Underwriter, or she might have starboarded and gone under the stem of the Young Alonzo. She did nothing. Under these circumstances I find both vessels to blame.

THE LONGFORD.

Salvage—Incidence—Specie—Cargo.

Salvage is payable out of ship, freight, and cargo at risk without distinction as to the nature of the cargo.

Specie contributes towards salvage in the same proportion as ship, freight, and other cargo. (a)

THIS was a consolidated action of salvage brought by the owners, masters, and crew of four steamtugs, the Mersey King, the Knight of Malta, the Rover, and the Royal Alfred, belonging to the port of Liverpool, against the City of Dublin Steam Packet Company, the owners of the Longford, a paddle steamer of 476 tons register, with engines of 300-horse power nominal, and against the owners of her cargo and freight.

Three different actions were commenced by the Mersey King and the Knight of Malta, and by the Rover, and by the Royal Alfred respectively, but after delivery of statement of claim they were consolidated, leave being reserved for the Royal Alfred to appear separately by one counsel at the trial.

At the time of the circumstances on which the action was grounded, the Longford was on a voyage from Dublin to Liverpool with a crew of twenty-six hands, 136 passengers, 50,000*l.* in specie, and a cargo of general goods and live stock. The value of the Longford was agreed upon as 14,000*l.*, and of her total cargo 58,000*l.*, and the value of the tugs was about 5000*l.* each

The specie on board the Longford was the property of the Bank of Ireland, who in conjunction with the Corporation of the Royal Exchange Assurance, the underwriters and insurers of it, delivered a separate statement of defence in respect thereto.

The plaintiffs alleged that on Aug. 17, 1880, the Longford was in the river Mersey making for her berth at the north end of the Liverpool Landing Stage, when she struck the stem of the s.s. Baltic which was lying at anchor in the river, with her starboard sponson, and continued grazing the Baltic with her starboard quarter till she got clear. This caused such serious damage to the Longford that she began to make water rapidly. The plaintiffs' tugs thereupon proceeded to the Longford, and the Royal Alfred was made fast on her starboard quarter, about forty passengers immediately got on board the Royal Alfred, and the Longford and the Royal Alfred, with the other tugs attending, reached the landing stage. The Longford, however, was here admittedly found to be sinking, and was ordered away from the stage, and the four tugs then made fast on either bow and quarter, and towed the Longford to the dock wall and skilfully manœuvred so as to lay her alongside the dock wall, where she sank in shallow water, about twenty minutes after the collision.

The defendants, the owners of the Longford and her cargo and freight, other than the specie, pleaded that after the collision,

3. Whilst the Longford was proceeding to the stage, the plaintiffs' tugs put off, and approaching the Longford, hampered her movements, and finally the Mersey King improperly threw herself across the bows of the Longford, which had to stop her engines to avoid a collision. The other tugs then took up such positions that it was impossible for the Longford, which was under perfect command, to go ahead without risk of a collision.

5. With the way the Longford had upon her, and without any assistance from the tugs or any of them, the Longford, shortly after the collision, reached the stage, her starboard bow touching or nearly touching the stage. A rope was thrown from the Longford to the stage, and was hauled on the stage for the purpose of being made fast, but some one hailed the captain to take the Longford to the Dock Wall, and the captain determined to do so; it being then reported to him by the engineer that the Longford was making water, and he would have been able to do so without assistance if he had not been hampered by the tugs.

9. As to the specie, the defendants, the owners of the Longford, and of her general cargo and freight, say that the said specie was and is the property of the Bank of Ireland, and at the time of the alleged services was in charge of a clerk of the said bank, and that the defendants, the owners of the Longford, are in no way responsible for the keeping or delivery of the said specie, and that the said specie having been taken on shore by the said clerk before the arrest of the Longford, and before the undertaking to put in bail in any of the said actions, the said defendants and the bail are not liable to the plaintiffs or any of them in respect of the said specie, or any part thereof.

The plaintiffs thereupon proceeded against the owners of the specie by way of monition, and cited the Bank of Ireland to appear and defend the suit, and the Bank of Ireland and the Corporation of the Royal Exchange Assurance then appeared and filed a separate statement of defence, which also alleged that the Longford, if she had not been hampered by the tugs, could and would with her own engines have reached either the landing stage or the dock wall, and then proceeded:

6. The clerk in charge of the said 50,000*l.* landed therewith from the Longford without aid or assistance from any of the tugs or their crews; nor did he, nor did anyone authorised in that behalf, request or accept any aid, service, or assistance of any kind soever, either to, or for, or in respect of the said 50,000*l.*, or the protection, landing, or delivery thereof, or for or on behalf of himself or of these defendants from the said tugs or their crews, or any or either of them:

and they further said that the said gold was never in danger of loss or damage, and

10. Alternatively these defendants say, that if any services were rendered by the said tugs (which they deny), they were not salvage services in fact, nor were they nor any of them efficacious as such, because if the alleged services had not been rendered, no other or further or more serious consequences or damages could or would have ensued than did in fact ensue after and notwithstanding the rendering (if any) of the alleged services.

The case came on for trial before Sir R. Phillimore on Feb. 16, 1880. and it appeared in evidence that in the collision with the Baltic a large hole, extending below the water's edge, was cut in the side of the Longford abaft the starboard sponson, and another large hole in the starboard quarter; that the rope from the Royal Alfred was made fast by the mate of the Longford before reaching the stage; that the clerk left the Longford with the specie at the stage, together with a few passengers, and that the Longford, after being towed to the dock wall, settled down about twenty minutes after the collision, the rest of the passengers and the cattle being then removed by the tugs.

The further material facts of the case appear in the judgment.

Butt, Q.C. (Kennedy with him) for the tugs Mersey King, Knight of Malta, and Rover, contended that the services did not indeed take up any length of time, but that if they were efficient, the fact that they were rapidly rendered should rather increase than diminish the reward. No distinction could be drawn between the gold and the rest of the cargo. Even if it could be fished up if lost, still there was great risk of its being lost. If a thing is once sunk so that it will cost anything to get it up again, it is totally lost in law, and the salvors are entitled to reward.

E. C. Clarkson, for the Royal Alfred, contended that the services could only have been rendered by steam power.

Dr. Deane (Gainsford Bruce with him), for the Longford and her general cargo and freight, contended that it was unnecessary for the plaintiffs to have commenced three actions, that if the Longford wanted any assistance four tugs were too many, and that if there were any services they were trifling.

Cohen, Q.C. (Pollard with him), for the specie, contended that it appeared from the evidence that the Longford was capable of reaching the stage without assistance, and that the services consisted in towing the Longford from the stage to the dock wall. There were two questions: first, what should be awarded in toto; and, secondly, what ought to be awarded in respect of the ship and what for the cargo and what for the specie. If the cargo salved is a perishable cargo, a larger amount is awarded in respect of it than if it is not perishable. In this case, if the ship had sunk, the gold could have been recovered by divers at a trifling expense. If the court makes any award in respect of life salvage, the gold is liable to contribute towards it in the same proportion as the ship; but with respect to the saving of property, a separate award must be made for the specie, and it ought not to contribute for its full value. It was not exposed to any substantial risk; the only risk was the cost of recovering it if it had sunk, and the award must be made on that risk, and not as if it were a perishable cargo worth 50,000*l.* Further, the ship and the cargo must each pay its own share, the ship for itself and the cargo for itself, and the cargo cannot be called on to pay any of the ship's share:

The Pyrennee, B. & L. 189.

In The Emma (2 W. Rob. 319; 3 Notes of Cases, 114), Dr. Lushington says: "With respect to silver and bullion, it is true that a distinction is wisely and properly permitted, and this upon the consideration that it is more easily rescued and preserved than more bulky articles of merchandise."

Butt, Q.C.—The words in The Emma are purely obiter dicta. The Emma was a timber laden ship and there was no bullion in the case, and Dr. Lushington would never have uttered them if he had had before him the previously decided case of The Jonge Bastiaan (5 C. Rob. 322), in which a vessel was warped off a rock by a smack, and placed in such a position that the master was able to take away certain bullion, but subsequently sunk, and was weighed up and salved by other smacks. At the trial, it was contended for the owners that the bullion which the master had taken away with him should not contribute, but the court overruled that objection, and pronounced for a salvage of the whole property. In The Vesta (2 Hagg. 193) it is clearly laid down that "the difference of danger to which property is exposed would be a difficult criterion to apply in most cases. The buoyancy of articles may vary in the river and on the sea, and on the high seas the consequence may not be very different to the owner whether the articles sink or float away . . . Suppose a casket of jewels on board which could be saved with great facility, it could not in such a case be contended that the salvors could only be entitled to a small gratuity for carrying it on shore. To uphold such a notion would lead to preference in saving one part of a cargo before another. The more usual rule has been to make a valuation on ship and cargo."

Cohen, Q.C. in reply.—The Jonge Bastiaan and The Vesta (ubi sup.) do not establish an universal rule. Here the specie was not on the high seas, and would certainly have been recovered immediately from the Longford had that vessel gone down at the moment of collision. The Emma is sufficient to show that there is a practice to draw a distinction between bullion and other cargo. The more general rule is to order ship and cargo to contribute in the same proportion; but where the court sees fit, it can do otherwise, and it is unjust that bullion should in such a case as this contribute like other cargo.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is a case of salvage service rendered in August last in the river Mersey to the steamship Longford, of 1000 tons gross and 476 net register. The Longford was on a voyage from Dublin to Liverpool, laden with a general cargo, passengers, and live stock. It appears that at the time of the day on which the service was rendered the Longford had, by careless and bad navigation, impaled herself on the stem of the Baltic, in consequence of which she received a wound of a very serious character in her side and was most seriously injured.

Perhaps the best course to adopt in this part of the judgment would be to refer to the log, which contains this entry:—"On the 16th of August sailed with passengers, cargo, and cattle, wind east, fresh breeze; passed the Collingwood Dock at 7.20 a.m. on the 17th; proceeded to landing stage, weather hazy, and while swinging to the tide, passing between two large steamers, our ship did not come round so quickly as I expected, when we fouled the White Star steamer Baltic at anchor in mid-river, her stem damaging our plates on the starboard side; ship commenced to fill with water; kept the engines at full speed to reach the dock wall. The tug Mersey King took our rope and towed us to the wall of the Prince's Dock, steamer Rover taking passengers and luggage; Mersey King, Royal Alfred, and Rover taking cattle. About this time passengers commenced to jump on board the tugs." There is no doubt, therefore, that this vessel was in the most imminent danger of sinking. She steamed across the river to the Prince's Landing Stage, and she was attended by four tugs of about the same size—the Rover, the Mersey King, the Knight of Malta, and the Royal Alfred. When she got over to the other side, at the north end of the landing stage, she was towed by the Mersey King ahead of her to the dock wall, where she was beached and sank.

Now the merit of this service consisted in its promptitude, and not in the length of its duration. It may be well that a very great reward should be given to merit, nothwithstanding the short duration of the service, if it appears that the vessel was in danger. It is said in this case that more tugs were employed than were needed, but it may be more easy to say this after the danger is over than at a time when such a calculation cannot be made with nicety. It appears to me that these tugs are entitled to equal shares in the award.

There were 162 lives on board, 182 cattle, and specie to the amount of 50,000*l.*, and the value of the whole amounted to 72,000*l.* There was undoubtedly in this case a salvage service rendered to both life and property. The defences originally set up were two: that the tugs, instead of assisting, hampered the vessel; and that the Mersey King improperly placed herself across the bows of the Longford. Both these defences required proof, and the defendants have failed to prove them. The court, therefore, has to consider what is the proper amount of salvage remuneration to be awarded.

Now there has been much discussion as to whether the 50,000*l.* in specie, which was on board the Longford, ought to contribute towards the amount awarded by the court in respect of this service in the same proportion as the ship and the rest of the cargo. It appears that the specie being in bags and otherwise protected from loss, was not exposed to the same peril of being entirely lost as it would have been if the circumstances had been different. Among the authorities cited as to the proportion in which bullion ought to contribute to the award was a dictum of Dr. Lushington, in the case of The Emma (ubi sup.). In that case salvage services had been rendered to a ship and her cargo, but as regards the ship the salvage had been settled out of court, and the only property proceeded against was the cargo, and in the judgment of Dr. Lushington, as reported in 2 W. Rob. 319, there is the following passage: "Now in this class of cases the ordinary usage of the court, which is well known to every person who has practised in it, is to take the whole value of the ship and cargo and assess the amount of the remuneration upon the whole, each paying its due proportion. I am not aware, excepting in the instance of silver or bullion, that any distinction has ever been taken, or that parties have been permitted to aver that the services were of greater importance to the ship than they were to the cargo, and therefore that the ship should bear the lesser burthen, or vice versâ. Such a distinction, if acknowledged, would in many cases lead to intricate litigation and to questions of great nicety, which it would be exceedingly difficult for the court to adjust. With respect to silver and bullion, it is true that a distinction is wisely and properly permitted, and this upon the consideration that it is more easily rescued and preserved than more bulky articles of merchandise." The case of The Emma is not, however, the only authority on the question, for during the argument the attention of the court has been drawn to other cases material to the point, and especially to the case of The Jonge Bastiaan (ubi sup.), decided by Lord Stowell in 1804, where salvage services have been rendered to a derelict vessel, a portion of the cargo of which had been composed of bullion, and the same contention was raised as in the present case, but was not sustained by the court.

From a consideration of these cases it is clear to me that, if in the case of silver or bullion any such exception as that referred to in the case of The Emma, existed in practice, some mention would have been made either of such exception or of any authorities tending to support it. The cases, however, as reported, contain nothing to lead to the conclusion that specie salved is not in the same position as any other salved cargo. It appears to me that the court would be involved in great difficulty if it admitted any other principle in these cases than that every description of property salved must, whatever be its nature, contribute equally in proportion to its value towards payment of the amount of salvage remuneration awarded. It must be understood that I make my judgment in this case under that principle. The defendants must contribute to the award I am about to make in proportion to the value of the salved property belonging to them respectively.

I shall award 1200*l.* as the entire amount of salvage remuneration, to be equally divided among the four steam-tugs. In other words the owners, master, and crew of each steam-tug will be entitled to 400*l.*

E. C. Clarkson, for the plaintiffs, the owners of the Royal Alfred, applied for costs, on the ground that the statements of claim delivered by the other plaintiffs entirely ignored the services of the Royal Alfred, and it became necessary in consequence for the Royal Alfred to appear separately. Otherwise the claim of the Royal Alfred might have been entirely thrown out. If the court only allowed one set of costs, the owners of the Royal Alfred ought to receive a fourth share. The other plaintiffs would in any case have been obliged to call the witnesses called by the Royal Alfred, and their expenses ought to be allowed.

Dr. Deane, for the Longford, argued that the defendants ought only to pay one set of costs.

Butt, Q.C., for the other plaintiffs, contended that the claim of the Royal Alfred might have been consolidated in the same way as the others. The owners of the Royal Alfred never communicated with the other plaintiffs, and the only result of introducing the Royal Alfred into the pleadings of the other plaintiffs would have been to make them embarrassing. He admitted that it would have been necessary to call the witnesses called by the Royal Alfred in any case.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—It appears to me that, if the owners of the Royal Alfred had sent their instructions and stated their case to the solicitors employed by the other tugs, all these actions might have been consolidated. I shall allow the Royal Alfred only those costs which would have been incurred had the actions been so consolidated.

PIRIE AND CO. v. MIDDLE DOCK COMPANY.

Shipping—General average—Damage by water to extinguish fire—Loss of freight.

Where a cargo of coals is shipped to be carried to S., and there delivered on payment of freight, and a fire breaks out spontaneously in the coals, and portions are thrown overboard, and the remainder so wetted and damaged by water poured upon them to extinguish the fire, that they have to be discharged, and sold at a port of refuge, and the freight upon them is wholly lost: The shipowner is entitled to a contribution in general average for the lost freight, and there is no claim on account of the cargo; first, because there is no loss on account of it; secondly, because the vice in it is the cause of the sacrifice.

The right to general average is not founded upon contract, or the relations created by contract, but upon a rule of the common law and upon the principle of the ancient maritime law.

THE facts of the case, proved and admitted at the trial, were as follows:—By a charter-party entered into on May the 13th 1877 between the plaintiffs, merchants in London, and the defendants, the owners of the vessel Attila, it was agreed, amongst other things, that that ship should proceed to the river Tyne and load a cargo of coal for the plaintiffs, and then proceed to Singapore or Penang as ordered, there to discharge the cargo, certain perils excepted. Freight was to be paid on the quantity delivered. A cargo of 1430 tons having been loaded at Newcastle, the Attila sailed thence on July 16th. She was properly ventilated fore and aft, and during the voyage the hatches were taken off as often as possible. On Nov. the 16th, when inside the Straits of Sunda, seventy or eighty miles from Anjer, the captain found that smoke was coming out of the forward ventilator. On removing the main-hatch he found smoke rising at three different places, and, being alarmed for the safety of his ship and cargo, he caused a large quantity of water to be poured down the hold. In order, if possible, to get at the seat of fire, a portion of the cargo, amounting to some fifty tons, was jettisoned. Though water was poured on the coals continuously for three days, smoke continued to rise from the hold up to the time of the arrival of the Attila at Batavia, which was at 5 p.m. on the 18th. On the following day the captain commenced to discharge the cargo into lighters, and on the vessel being then surveyed, the surveyors, who were appointed by the British Consul at Batavia, recommended that the vessel should be towed into the inner roadstead, and the cargo at once discharged. This was done, and the fire-engine was kept constantly at work for the first half of the twenty days occupied in so discharging the coals. It was found to be utterly impossible to reship the cargo for Singapore or Penang, and it was therefore sold at Batavia, in accordance with the recommendation of the surveyors, realising 1149*l.* 3*s.* 8*d.* Of this sum the defendants paid to the plaintiffs 500*l.*, and offered before action brought to pay a further sum of 352*l.* 4*s.* An average statement was prepared at Batavia, but not acted upon, as, by the charter-party, the average had to be settled in London, according to the custom at Lloyd's. The average staters in London, employed by the defendants to prepare the statement on behalf of the underwriters of the ship and freight, claimed in general average on behalf of the shipowner the sum of 667*l.* 15*s.* 8*d.*, being one half of the estimated amount of the freight which the ship would have earned if she had carried the cargo to its destination, and they charged that amount in the statement of general average as arising from, and in consequence of the damage done to the cargo by the means adopted to extinguish the fire, viz.: the saturation of the cargo by water. This made a general average contribution, payable by the cargo, of 339*l.* 1*s.* 2*d.* The underwriters on cargo were not satisfied with this adjustment, and the average adjusters then employed by them excluded altogether the loss of freight from the general average column. The present action was brought by the plaintiffs to recover the balance of the proceeds of the sale of the cargo at Batavia, which the defendants claimed by way of set-off, to retain as representing the contribution by the cargo in general average for the loss of their freight.

Cohen, Q.C., and A. L. Smith were counsel for the plaintiffs.

Butt, Q.C. and Barnes for the defendants.

April 4.—Watkin Williams. J. delivered a written judgment to the following effect:—The action was brought by the plaintiffs, who are merchants in London, against the defendants, who are the owners of the ship Atilla, to recover the net proceeds of certain cargo sold by them in a damaged state at a port of refuge. The defendants did not dispute their liability to account to the plaintiffs for the proceds of the cargo, and they had in fact paid to the plaintiffs a large portion of the amount, but they claimed to be entitled to retain the amount now in dispute on account of a set-off or counter-claim for a general average contribution from the cargo for the loss of freight, under the following circumstances: On the 30th May 1877, by a charter-party, it was agreed between the defendants, owners of the ship Atilla, and the plaintiffs as merchants, that the vessel should load a cargo of coals in the Tyne, and proceed therewith to Singapore, and there discharge the cargo, certain perils excepted, the freight to be paid on the quantity at the rate of 20*l.* per keel, "average claims, if any, to be settled in London according to the usage of Lloyds." The vessel loaded a full cargo of coals in bulk according to the charter-party, and set sail on the 16th July. Nothing of importance occurred upon the voyage until the 16th Nov., when an unusual sulphurous smell was observed coming up the ventilator forward. The hatches were taken off, and the hold was found to be full of smoke, and, on further examination, the coals were found to be on fire on the starboard side and after part of main hatch. The crew threw water on the spot, and discharged cargo overboard to endeavour to get at the seat of the fire. The same proceeding was continued on the 17th, and on the 19th the vessel was towed into Batavia. The jettison of cargo and the pouring of water upon it continued more or less during the whole time. Both these expedients were adopted for the purpose of saving the ship and cargo, which were in great peril of total destruction, from the fire; and the ship and a large portion of the cargo were in fact saved by the operation. Upon the arrival at Batavia, a survey was held upon the ship and cargo, and the surveyors recommended that the entire cargo should be discharged. A considerable portion of the cargo was found to have been completely charred and burnt, and the remainder so damaged by the saturation with water, that it was practically impossible to forward it to its destination; and the surveyors recommended as the best course that the cargo should be all sold, and it accordingly was sold, and realised net the sum of 1149*l.* 3*s.* 8*d.* This was, in fact, the best and only practicable course to be adopted.

It must be taken as a fact that a certain portion of the coal was entirely destroyed, also that the fire was not general, but confined to a particular part, that the ship and whole adventure was in imminent peril of being destroyed by fire, and that the jettison of a portion of the cargo and the saturation of other portion saved the ship and a large portion of the cargo from destruction, and that the adventure came to an end at Batavia under the circumstances above described.

It was admitted by the counsel on both sides that the whole of the freight — that of the cargo which was destroyed by fire and that which was jettisoned, as well as that of the cargo which was saved, but which was too much damaged to be forwarded to its destination —was totally lost. Under these circumstances the plaintiffs, the merchants, claim to be entitled to the net proceeds of the cargo, and the defendants, not disputing the plaintiffs' general right to receive such proceeds, claim the right to deduct therefrom a contribution in general average towards the lost freight of so much of the saved cargo as was damaged by water, but excluding that damaged by fire.

Two average statements were prepared, one by Messrs. Davidson, Son, and Lindley, on behalf of the shipowners, and another by Messrs. Manley, Hopkins, and Son, on behalf of the merchants, each professedly made up according to the usage of Lloyd's in London. Each of these statements treated the case as one giving rise to claims for general average. The values of the saved ship and cargo were inserted as contributories towards the general average claims, and amongst the claims for contribution were inserted the value of the jettisoned cargo, the towage of the ship into Batavia, the expense of discharging the cargo, and a number of other items usual in such cases. Each of the average staters also included in their statement the cargo itself, as an interest entitled to claim contribution; but both concurred in not carrying forward any actual claim, upon the ground that, for the reason presently stated, there was no loss. The reason was as follows: The cargo realised at Batavia net the sum of 1149*l.* 3*s.* 8*d.*, after payment of all charges and expenses, not, of course, including freight, because, ex hypothesi, no freight was due. If the cargo had reached its destination, it would have sold for 2151*l.* 17*s.* 3*d.*, but the charges, including freight, would have amounted to 1335*l.* 11*s.* 4*d.*, leaving a net balance only of 816*l.* 5*s.* 11*d.*, on which account both the average staters treated the case as one of no loss upon cargo. Up to this point both average staters agree, and there is no reason to doubt that so far the statements are in accordance with usage at Lloyd's.

We now come to the disputed item. Messrs. Davidson, Son, and Lindley inserted amongst the claims for contribution in the general average column the sum of 667*l.* 15*s.* 8*d.* on account of the freight of the cargo damaged exclusively by the water, and in consequence sold at Batavia. Messrs. Manley, Hopkins, and Son excluded altogether the loss of freight from the general average column.

Mr. Cohen, for the merchants, contended that this was not a case for general average at all, that this was not a voluntary sacrifice of cargo and freight, to save the adventure, but that the water was poured on to the coals to preserve as much as possible of them from the impending destruction by fire, which had commenced through spontaneous combustion, and must have inevitably destroyed the whole quantity if it had not been wetted. He contended that in substance the cargo was practically lost past redemption, and that what was preserved was in the nature of salvage or wreck. And he contended further that if the lost freight was a subject for contribution in the general average, then the merchant was entitled to claim a contribution in respect of the cargo, the freight of which was then brought in, because, by the very hypothesis, the freight was only lost because the cargo was lost; and he cited Shepherd v. Kottgen (3 Asp. Mar. L.C. 544; 37 L. T. Rep. N.S. 618; L. Rep. 2 C.P. Div. 585) and Johnson v. Chapman (19 C.B. N.S. 563.)

Mr. Butt, for the shipowner, contended that the case was clearly one of general average, and that in fact both average staters had so treated it; that if the contention on the other side was well founded, the jettison of the cargo was no more a general average loss than the loss of freight and upon the same principle, that if the principle contended for were to prevail, general average would in most cases be abolished altogether, because in the majority of cases the ship and the whole adventure were in imminent danger of being immediately lost at the time when the sacrifice is made which averts the peril. He cited Parsons on Marine Insurance, chap. 5, sect. 2, where the views of Mr. Benecke are criticised and disapproved of. With respect to the cargo, he said it was not necessary to dispute the principle contended for, and he pointed out that both average staters had acted upon it in their statements, but had carried nothing out into the general average column, because there was no loss in fact.

There is also the further possible view that, if the cargo is considered to have suffered alone through the damage by water, the cargo may nevertheless be not entitled to claim a contribution in the general average, because it was through its own inherent vice the real cause of the whole misfortune and sacrifice.

Mr. Lindley, who was called as a witness for the owners, stated that he had never known a similar case in his experience, and, so far as he was aware, there was no usage of Lloyd's applicable to the case.

I have therefore to determine the question according to general principles of law. In my judgment the shipowners are entitled under the above circumstances to a contribution in the general average for the loss of the freight, in respect of which they make their claim, for the following reasons.

It is material to bear in mind that the claim in this case is not one made by the owner of destroyed cargo against the shipowner, and resisted by the latter upon the ground either that the cargo was in fault, or that there was no real sacrifice by reason of the cargo having been already inevitably lost, but a claim by the shipowner to be entitled as against the merchant whose goods had been saved, to bring into the general average the freight alleged to have been sacrificed by an operation which saved the ship and a large part of the cargo, and at the same time caused the total loss of the freight.

This may also be a convenient place to mention that the lost freight, if it becomes a subject of contribution in the general average, bears its own share of the loss with the other contributing interests.

It seems to me that the only question in the case is whether the operation of pouring the water upon the coals under the above circumstances, and so rendering them unfit to be forwarded to their destination—causing a total loss of the freight to be earned by their delivery at their destination—can be considered as a voluntary sacrifice of the freight of the coals so wetted within the true principles of general average.

In order to solve this question, it is necessary to consider what are the true principles upon which the right to a general average contribution is founded.

This right and its correlative obligation are not founded upon any contract, nor do they arise out of any relation created by contract between the parties: they spring from a rule of law applicable to all persons who chance to have interests on board of a ship at sea exposed to some common danger, threatening the safety of the whole. It is a law founded upon justice, public policy, and convenience, and rests, as Mr. Parsons says in his Maritime Law, vol. 1, p. 286, upon reasons which are so obvious that it is not surprising to find that it is older than any other law or rule in force. It formed part of the ancient marine law of Europe. It was incorporated into the Roman civil law from the code of Rhodes. This ancient code, which was the prevailing law at least a thousand years before the Christian era, is probably all lost with the exception of this one article, which is preserved in the Digest in the form of a rubric in the following terms: "De lege Rhodiâ de jactu. Lege Rhodiâ cavetur, ut, si levandæ navis gratiâ jactus mercium factus est, omnium contributione sarciatur quod pro omnibus datum est." "Concerning the Rhodian law of jettison. By the Rhodian law care is taken that, if for the sake of lightening the ship a jettison of merchandise is made, that which is given for all shall be made good by a contribution of all." This says Parsons (Maritime Law, p. 286), is the foundation of the law of general average, and all besides this consists only of the rules which have been devised to carry this principle into its proper effect in the great variety of cases and through the many consequences which belong to its application. This principle of law must, in my judgment, be regarded as incorporated in and forming part of the unwritten common law of England. The principle is thus laid down by Malyne in the "Lex Mercatoria," published in 1656, and Molloy in his work, "De Jure Maritimo," published in 1744: "Ships being freighted at sea are often subject to storms and other accidents in which by the ancient laws and customs of the sea, in extreme necessity the goods, wares, guns, and whatsoever else shall be thought fit, may in such extremity be flung overboard. The ship arriving in safety, the remainder must come into the average, not only those goods which pay freight, but all those that have obtained safety and preservation by such ejection, even money, jewels, and such like are not exempted." And Molloy goes on to say that "King William the Conqueror and Henry I. ratified this law concerning goods cast overboard by mariners in a storm in imitation of the ancient Rhodian law 'De jactu.'" This is confirmed also by Bracton, lib. 2, fol. 41 b. n. 3; also by Selden in his work "De Dominio Maris," chap. 24, p. 428. It is further confirmed by a statement in 1 Rymer Fœdera, 3rd ed. p. 240, that Edward I. in 1285 sent to the Cinque Ports letters patent declaring what goods were liable to contribution; yet this law does not appear in any statute or written ordinance of English law. Emerigon, in his famous treatise published in 1783, in writing upon this subject, says, "The ancient laws of the seas are the sources whence those should draw who wish to recur to principles. These include rules so much the more sure that they are derived from the nature of things, and these rules form a part of the Law of Nations. They belong consequently to every age and every country." I consider, therefore, that in solving the present question, which is stated never to have been before decided, I am bound to resort to the principles of the maritime law as expressed in the maxim from the code of Rhodes and as expounded in the various works of authority upon the subject.

Let us see what are the contentions put forward in the present case on the part of the merchants who resist the claim to the general average.

First, it is said that the act of destruction of cargo and the consequent loss of freight was not a general average operation at all, because it was brought about or rendered necessary by the spontaneous combustion and inherent vice of the cargo itself, and was therefore a particular average and not a general average act, and for this the judgment of Willes, J. in Johnson v. Chapman (sup.) was cited. In that case cotton had been shipped in a damp state, and in consequence and without external accident burst into a flame, and was on that account thrown overboard, and it was held that the merchant had no claim to contribution on account of the jettison. The application of the principle of that case to the present involves a complete fallacy. All that that case decides is that if the owner of the interest sacrificed was himself in fault, and was the cause of the danger which necessitated the sacrifice, he must bear the loss himself, and could not throw it as a general average on the whole adventure, or, as it has been expressed in one of the decisions, he cannot take advantage of his own wrong. This is strictly in accordance with the maritime law, and had been laid down in several previous decisions. See the cases of Worms v. Storey (11 Exch. 427), Schloss v. Heriot (1 Mar. L. C. O. S. 335: 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 246; 14 C. B. N. S. 59), The Norway (2 Mar. L. C. O. S. 168, 254; 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 50; Brown & Lush, 377), Robinson v. Price (13 Asp. Mar. L. C. 321, 407; 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 354; L. Rep. 2 Q. B. Div. 91). In truth, if the principle of Johnson v. Chapman (sup.) has any application to the present question, it is entirely opposed to the contention of the merchant, because he is endeavouring through the fault of the cargo to escape from the claim of the shipowner, who was not in fault, to a contribution on the loss of his freight.

The next contention on the part of the merchants was that this was not a case of general average, because there was in fact no sacrifice of cargo and its incidental freight, inasmuch as the cargo having taken fire, was practically already lost past redemption, and the sacrifice was committed, not for the safety of the adventure, but for the sole benefit of the cargo, and to lessen its destruction; and for this proposition was cited the great authority of Mr. Benecke, and also the practice and custom of British average adjusters, as found in the case of Stewart v. The West India and Pacific Steamship Company (27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 820; 8 L. Rep. Q. B. 88). Benecke says: "If the master's situation were such that but for the voluntary destruction of a part of a vessel or furniture the whole would certainly unavoidably have been lost, he could not claim a restitution, because a thing cannot be said to have been sacrificed which had already ceased to be of any value." Again, Baily on General Average (2nd edit. p. 40), in referring to this rule of the average stater says: "Damage done to cargo by pouring water down upon it, in order to extinguish a fire which has not touched the goods, is excluded from general average." The contention in support of the disallowance is that it is a moral certainty that the fire would consume the cargo if it be not extinguished by throwing water on the cargo, and so the cargo is in no worse position, although the rest of the adventure be saved by the operation. Mr. Baily in the work referred to (pp. 81, 82), in expressing his dissent from this practice, says: "In defence of this practice no valid reason can be urged; it is based on an erroneous idea that a general average cannot arise when the degree of danger is so great that it amounts to a moral certainty of total loss and on a fanciful distinction between the degree of danger existing in the case of fire and the degree existing when a vessel is on her beam ends or on the point of foundering—a distinction which the ingenuity of argument may draw, but which will not bear the test of common sense." Parsons, in his work on Insurance (vol. ii. p. 287), in commenting on the above passage in Benecke says: "We cannot think that this passage in Benecke rests upon any good reason, and if applied in the terms in which he expresses it, it would exclude nearly all the cases which are regarded both in law and in practice as general average ones. Indeed, these cases may be generally described as cases in which ship and cargo are exposed to a common peril, by which the whole would be certainly and unavoidably lost unless a part be sacrificed to save the rest, and this sacrifice being made, the residue or a part of it is saved."

There can be no doubt that, according to the universally accepted principles of general average, the following conditions must concur in order to give rise to a claim for contribution: 1. There must be a common danger. 2. There must be a necessity for the sacrifice. 3. The sacrifice must be voluntary. 4. It must be a real sacrifice, and not a mere destruction or casting off of that which had become already lost and consequently of no value. 5. There must be a saving of the imperilled property through the sacrifice.

The question in a case like the present arises from the necessity of drawing the line, marking the logical distinction between the necessity for the sacrifice on the one side, and the hopelessness of saving the sacrificed property on the other.

Emerigon says, chap. xii. s. 29, "It is not enough that a jettison has been made; that measure must have been forced on those resorting to it by the fear of perishing, and a panic terror will not excuse the captain who has had recourse to jettison, without being forced to it by real danger." On the other hand, in a case in the American courts (Crockett v. Dodge, 3 Fair. 190), a vessel laden with lime was hauled out into the stream and scuttled because the lime was on fire. The lime was destroyed at once, and the ship was saved, but it was held that the ship did not contribute for the lime, because the lime could not possibly be preserved, and the ship was saved by only hastening its destruction. It has been decided in America in the case of Nelson v. Belmont (5 Duer 310), and in the case of Nimick v. Holmes (25 Pennsylv. 366), that where a cargo is on fire, and water is poured down to extinguish the fire, and goods are thereby injured which the fire had not reached, they are to be contributed for. Lowrie, J., in the latter case, said, the danger is a common one, and the cost of the remedy must be common. It was a sacrifice for the common safety, for it was intentionally injuring or destroying all that part of the cargo that could be thus effected by water in order to save the rest. In the case of Stewart v. West India and Pacific Steamship Company (sup.) in 1872, in which a quantity of bark had been injured by pouring water down the hold to extinguish an accidental fire, Cockburn, C.J., and Mellor and Quain, JJ., expressed their opinion that, according to the common law, the case was one of general average, but the parties having agreed that average was to be adjusted according to British customs, and the case finding that it was the custom at Lloyd's not to treat such a loss as one of general average, the decision was necessarily against the claim. However, in a subsequent case in the year 1878 (Achard v. Ring, 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 422; 31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 647), the existence of this custom was challenged, and upon a trial before a special jury in London, the custom was negatived, and the principle of the common law and of the maritime law, as recognised by all commercial nations, was applied to the case, and the plaintiffs recovered a contribution in general average for damage done to their goods by the scuttling of the ship to extinguish a fire; and since that time this custom and practice has been discontinued and finally abandoned at Lloyd's. The still more recent case of Attwood v. Sellar (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 153; 41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 83; 4 Q. B. Div. 342) dealt a further blow to the supposed British customs and usages which were said to differ and distinguish the law of general average in England from that universally accepted; and it may now be considered as fairly established that this important branch of our commercial law is governed by the principles of the common law of England, embracing within it the principles of the general maritime law.

Applying these principles to the facts of this case, I find that the ship and the whole adventure were in imminent danger of destruction from the fire which had broken out in one part of the cargo of coals; that it was prudent and necessary to throw over a portion of the coals to get at the seat of the fire, and to pour down water, both upon the burning coals and also upon all the rest of the coals, including those that were distant from the fire, as well as those adjoining it, for the purpose of arresting and extinguishing the fire and saving the ship and cargo; and also that all the operations were prudent and necessary with the same view, and that the water was poured down with this purpose and intention, and that the operation was successful in saving the ship and a very large portion of the cargo; and, further, that the operation involved a voluntary sacrifice for the benefit and safety of the adventure of a certain portion of the freight, viz, so much as related to cargo damaged by water, and not within the immediate reach of the fire, and which was too much damaged by water to be forwarded to its destination so as to earn freight. These conclusions, upon the principles above stated, establish the claim of the owners of the freight to a contribution in general average from the owners of the other interests, and entitle the defendants to judgment.

Ship—Charter-party — Construction — "So near thereto as she may safely get"—Physical obstruction—Liability of charterer.

The primary obligation of a ship under charter is to proceed, if possible, to the place named in the charter-party; but it is not necessary, in order to free the ship from this obligation, and to substitute an alternative destination, that she should be prevented by a permanent physical obstruction, if the obstruction is such as to cause a delay so unreasonable as to make the prosecution of the voyage impossible from a mercantile point of view.

Where by a charter-party it is provided that a ship shall carry a cargo of timber from the Baltic to the Surrey Commercial Docks, "or so near thereto as she may safely get and lie always afloat," and shall deliver the same on payment of freight, "the cargo to be received at port of discharge as fast as steamer can deliver," and when she arrives in the Thames the Surrey Commercial Docks are so crowded that she cannot be received in them, and it appears from the evidence that she cannot be admitted for many weeks, the delay is so great as to make it unreasonable for the ship to wait for admission into the docks, so that the alternative in the charter-party comes into operation, and the voyage is at an end when the ship is moored in the river ready to discharge her cargo, and the charterers' liability begins from that date.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (James, Brett, and Cotton, L JJ.), reversing a judgment of Jessel, M.R.

The case is reported in 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 172; 41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 365; and L. Rep. 12 Ch. Div. 568.

The action was brought by the respondents, who were the owners of the steamship Euxine, against the appellants, who were timber merchants in London, to recover demurrage and other charges in respect of the ship under circumstances which appear from the head-note above, and from the judgment of Lord Blackburn.

The action was tried before the Master of the Rolls, who gave judgment for the defendants, but his judgment was reversed, as above mentioned.

In the court below the plaintiffs contended that there was a custom of the timber trade in the port of London for the merchants to provide berths for the discharge of cargoes, but this contention was abandoned on the appeal to the House of Lords.

C. Russell, Q.C., A. L. Smith, and R. T. Reid appeared for the appellants, and argued that the ship had never reached the place named in the charter-party from no fault of the charterer, and consequently the voyage was never completed so as to make the demurrage payable. The words in the charter-party apply only to a permanent physical obstruction. The master was bound to go into the dock if it was not actually unsafe to do so.

Benjamin, Q.C, Cohen, Q.C., and Rigby, for the respondents, argued that the ship had in fact arrived when she had got as near the dock as it was practically possible to bring her. The delay was unreasonable in a business sense, and if one party must suffer it should be the charterer, who ought to have provided a proper place for discharging the cargo.

A. L. Smith was heard in reply.

In addition to the cases referred to in the judgments, the following were also cited in argument:

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

Jan. 13.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:

Lord BLACKBURN.—My Lords: The question in this case is, whether the defendants have broken the contract into which they have entered with the plaintiffs, and the first matter to be considered is, what was that contract? It is contained in a charter-party, dated on June 21st, 1877, in a printed form, filled up in writing, made between the plaintiffs, owners of the Euxine steamship, and the defendants, by which it is agreed that the Euxine should proceed to a port named, and there load from the defendants a full cargo of deals. This was done, and there is no dispute about that part of the contract. The charter-party then proceeds that the Euxine, "being so loaded, shall therewith proceed to London Surrey Commercial Docks, or so near thereto as she may safely get, and lie always afloat, and deliver the same on being paid freight," at a specified rate, certain perils mentioned always excepted. The other provisions which are material are as follows: "The cargo to be supplied to the steamer at port of loading as fast as she can take the same on board, Sundays and legal holidays excepted, and to be received at port of discharge as fast as steamer can deliver as above; and ten days on demurrage, over and above the said laying days, at 30*l.* per day, payable day by day, it being agreed upon that, for the payment of all freight, dead freight, and demurrage, the owner shall have absolute charge in lien on said cargo; the cargo to be brought to and taken from alongside the ship at merchants' risk and expense." The Euxine was not delayed on her voyage by any of the excepted perils referred to in the charter-party, but, on her arrival at the entrance of the Surrey Commercial Dock, she was refused admittance.

The plaintiffs tried to prove that there was a custom in London as regarded this trade such as should be tacitly incorporated in the written contract; but in this they failed, and consequently the liabilities which the parties have by the contract taken upon themselves must depend upon what is the true construction of the charter-party. The plaintiffs contended in the court below that, by such a charter-party as this, the merchant undertook to procure the ship admission into the dock. Neither the Master of the Rolls, nor the judges in the Court of Appeal, took this view of the charter-party, and it was not much urged at your Lordships' bar. I think it is clear that it is untenable.

The legal effect of the contract, in my opinion, so far as regards the shipowner, is, that he bound himself that his ship should, unless prevented by some of the excepted perils, proceed to the discharging place agreed on in the charter-party. That was in this case the Surrey Commercial Dock, which must, I think, mean inside the dock, with an alternative, "or so near thereto as she may safely get, and lie always afloat." The first part of the alternative has not been fulfilled. The question in the cause is, whether the second part of the alternative has been fulfilled or not. The legal effect, as regards the obligation on the merchant, is that he bound himself, on the ship arriving at the place where she is to deliver, to take the cargo from alongside, and for that purpose to provide the proper appliances for taking delivery there. If, as both parties wished and expected, she got to a discharging berth within the dock, the merchant was, by himself, or the dock company as his agents, to provide proper means for landing the cargo on the quay. If the ship might not get safely further than the entrance of the dock, and was entitled to require the merchant to take delivery in the river, which is what, it is said by the plaintiffs, has happened in this case, the merchant must provide lighters or other craft to take the cargo from alongside, unless it is arranged by the parties that instead she should go into some other dock. If the ship had been permitted to get into the dock and lie there, but had been unable to get to a discharging berth, the merchant might have brought lighters to her and taken delivery in the middle of the dock. Whether he was bound to do so or not I do not say, for it is not necessary to decide what would have been the rights and liabilities of the parties if she had been admitted inside the dock gate, as this did not in fact happen.

I will only observe that, though in the printed form it is said, "and ten days on demurrage over and above the said laying days," there are no laying days provided in this charter-party in the sense in which I understand these words, and the ten days on demurrage could only begin after the ship had been at the place where the merchant ought to have taken delivery long enough for the merchant to be in default for not having completed the discharge. There is no period specified in this charter-party within which the merchant has engaged that the ship should at all events be discharged. which is what I understand by laying days. I think, therefore, that the cases, such as Brown v. Johnson (10 M. & W. 331), deciding when laying days commenced, have no direct bearing on such a charter-party as this.

Both parties agreed in naming the Surrey Commercial Docks in the charter-party as the dock to which the steamer was to go. I can see nothing amounting to a contract, either on the one side or the other, to procure the ship admittance, nor has any authority been cited to the effect that such a contract is implied. If the charter-party had left it free to the merchant to select a dock, it might well be that he was bound to select one into which admittance could be procured. Ogden v. Graham (1 B. & S. 773; 31 L. J. 26, Q. B.) is an authority in favour of that position. And in Samuel v. The Royal Exchange Insurance Company (8 B. & C. 119), where the merchant directed the shipowner to proceed to the King's Dock at Deptford, and the ship arrived near the dock gates while there was much ice, but the merchant was not able to procure an order to admit it for some days, Lord Tenterden, C.J. ruled that, if the ship remained there waiting for an order to admit, it was an unreasonable delay, which would discharge the underwriters, but otherwise if the delay was on account of the ice. That authority seems to point the same way. I do not, however, pronounce any decision on this, as it is not the case now before the House. I only mention it to prevent it being said that what I now say would be applicable to such a case.

But where, as in this case, the dock was named from the beginning by both parties, the refusal of the dock authorities to let the ship inside the dock gates was the fault of neither party. They ought to have foreseen that it might happen that the dock company would, owing to the exigencies of their traffic, refuse to admit a steamer for some time; in fact, it appeared from the evidence that before the charter-party was made both parties knew that the number of timber-laden steamers was so unusually great at this time that it was very likely to happen that they would refuse for a long time. They might have made any new provision on which they could agree. If they had in terms said that, in the event of something for which neither party was responsible rendering it impossible to get into the dock at all, or without a delay so great as to render it unreasonable to wait, the shipowner would, unless excused by some of the excepted perils, bring his ship to a discharging place in London, as near as might be to the dock and deliver there, and that the merchant should take the cargo there and pay the freight, they would have come to as prudent an arrangement as could well be devised. They preferred to keep unaltered the old form, "or so near thereto as she may safely get," and be bound by whatever the legal effect of that might be.

The facts on this part of the case were that it was the practice of the Surrey Commercial Dock Company to give orders for the admission of steamers to their dock to discharge there, which were in practice generally on the application of the charterer or his representative made either before or after the arrival of the steamer. By giving such an order the dock company agreed to admit the steamer, and on the production of the order she was as soon as practicable admitted into the dock. The company in practice limited the number of orders to so many steamers as they at that time thought they could accommodate with discharging berths. On the 16th July Messrs. Dahl, having probably heard by telegraph that the Euxine was about to start, applied for an order for her admission. The superintendent of the docks, Mr. Ross (who died before the trial), wrote the two following letters: "July 19, 1877. Gentlemen, referring to the inclosed orders for steamships Euxine and Chatsworth, I beg to inform you that on looking over ths list of Gravesend orders I have accepted, I fear I have rather exceeded the number of steamers for which I can safely provide accommodation during the months of July and August. Under these circumstances you may, perhaps, think it advisable in your interest to arrange for the vessel to be discharged elsewhere." "July 25, 1877. Gentlemen, I much regret to be again compelled to return the inclosed order for the Euxine from Soderhamn, but on going round the docks to-day I find my position is even worse than I anticipated. The quays are so loaded with goods that it will be impossible for me to afford the vessel anything like the usual steamboat despatch." On the arrival of the Euxine, the ship's agent applied to the dock company to take her in, but was refused, the company having declined to give the order for her admission previously. It appeared in the evidence that there was plenty of room in the dock for the ship to lie afloat inside the dock, but that the company would not admit her until they saw a prospect of being able to give her a discharging birth within a reasonable time. The legal advisers of the defendant thought (whether correctly or not, it is not necessary to decide) that, if once admitted within the dock gate, the merchants would be answerable for all subsequent delay, and the defendant pressed Mr. Griffin, the secretary of the dock company, not to let the Euxine enter the docks until they could give her a discharging berth. The secretary, to relieve his mind, on Aug. 7th, sent a telegram to the superintendent in those terms: "Can you give Euxine immediate discharging berth? If not, on no account admit steamer into dock." This was relied on by the plaintiffs as proving that the defendant hindered the steamer from entering the dock. But it is clear, from the evidence of Mr. Griffin, the dock secretary, that the dock authorities, in their discretion, refused to admit any steamers other than those they had already engaged for, though there was plenty of room for them to lie without discharging, until there was a prospect of giving them discharging berths; and that he refused to admit the Euxine on Aug. 7th because he could not then give her a discharging berth, and not on account of the defendant's request; and, on being asked the question expressly, he says that he had no prospect of being able to give a berth after a short delay, or within any reasonable time. The dock authorities, it seems to me, acted very prudently and properly in what they did, but even if they were wrong the defendant was not responsible for this. Though the secretary must have known at the time he gave his evidence when, as it really turned out, a steamer arriving on the 7th Aug. could have had a discharging berth, neither side asked that question. He does say that if it had been admitted into the dock to lie afloat, it would, in the then state of the traffic, have been five weeks before the ship could have been discharged into lighters there, from which it would seem that it would have been longer before it could have got a discharging berth; and, as demurrage was at 30*l.* a day, it is obvious that the consequences of the delay would have been serious. I may observe that the anxious desire of the defendant that the steamer should not be admitted within the dock gate, when he believed, whether rightly or wrongly, that the doing so would fix him with the cost of the delay, is evidence that he believed that the delay would be important. The plaintiffs' legal advisers wrote to the defendant the following letter, and received the following answer: "Aug. 7th, 1877.—We are instructed to inform you that the ship Euxine, chartered by you, is ready to discharge. The Surrey Commercial Docks Company have declined to allow the vessel to enter their dock, as they, we learn, intimated to you several days ago. The ship's lay days begin to-morrow. Should she not be discharged by you with the usual despatch, you will be held answerable for demurrage. Your lighters should be alongside, as you have been already informed, by the first thing to-morrow morning. The cargo would be discharged in two or three days. This notice is given you that you may take such steps as you think right to expedite the unloading of the ship." "Re Euxine, Aug. 8th, 1877.—Our legal advisers tell us to say in reply to your favour of yesterday that the ship is chartered for the Surrey Commercial Docks, and that when the vessel is there we will be prepared to fulfil your clients' contract with us, and take delivery of the cargo. The notice given by you is one which you have no power to give, and which we are not called upon to obey. If the captain enters into a contract to go to a particular dock, he must go there, and it is no business of the receivers that the dock, at the time of his arrival, is full and cannot take him in. He must wait till there is room." Some attempts were made to come to an amicable settlement, which unfortunately failed, and both parties stand on their legal rights. It is perfectly plain to my mind that the ship did not fulfil the primary engagement in the charter-party to proceed to the Surrey Commercial Dock by merely proceeding to the gate of that dock; but if, under the circumstances, she had, on Aug. 7th, fulfilled the alternative of proceeding "as near thereto as she may safely get," the merchant was, by his agreement, to take the cargo from alongside at his risk and expense, and there was no reason why he should not have to bear all the damage occasioned by his refusal to comply with the request to send lighters alongside, which, on the assumption that she had got as near thereto as she could safely get, was what he had undertaken to do.

Two questions arose on these points: First, whether the Euxine could have got into the dock without such a delay as would have been unreasonable, taking into account the nature of the transaction and the interests of both parties; that was a question of fact to be determined on the evidence. Secondly, whether, supposing that fact to be found in favour of the plaintiffs, the Euxine had got as near thereto as she might safely get, within the meaning of the contract; that was question of law, depending on the construction of the written contract.

As far as regards the question of law, it is not material when, or by whom the question was first raised, your Lordships having to decide it according to law. But as regards the question of fact depending on the evidence it might be material when it was raised, for if the point had not been raised at all by the plaintiffs, it would have been possible enough that the defendants refrained from calling further evidence which would have altered the case. But in fact it appears, by the shorthand-writer's note, that this was distinctly stated in the opening as part of the plaintiff's case, so that there was ample opportunity for the defendant to produce whatever evidence he could to show that the delay in the present case would not have been unreasonable.

I certainly understand from his judgment that the Master of the Rolls thought it quite immaterial whether the incapacity to get into the dock was produced by a matter threatening the safety of the ship, or by some other matter. In this the judges of the Court of Appeal all agreed with him, and so do I. But he thought it immaterial whether the delay was long or short, if it would at some time come to an end. In this the judges of the Court of Appeal differ from him. I think it far the most difficult question in this cause, but I agree with the judges of appeal.

Had the words in the charter-party been "as near thereto as she may get," it would have been open to a charterer to contend that the ship must get as far as it was possible, however dangerous it might be. I do not think it would have been successfully so contended, but those who originally framed this clause prevented the possibility of such a contention by inserting the word "safely." In the absence of authority, and construing the words in their ordinary sense, I think that is the only effect of the introduction of the word "safely." I think if a ship cannot get at all it cannot get safely. And there is no authority for putting any other construction on these words.

It is singular enough, considering how long this has been a common form, that there is not, as far as I can learn, anything said about its construction, either in the text-books or in any decision in our reports before Shield v. Wilkins (5 Ex. 304) as late as 1850. It would seem that in practice no difficulty had been found in putting a sensible meaning on this clause, so as to avoid disputes. Since 1850 there have been a few cases, all of which, I believe, were cited in the argument, but the decision in Shield v. Wilkins (ubi sup.) had no bearing on this case.

In Schilizzi v. Derry (4 E. & B. 873; 25 L. T. Rep. O. S. 66) the ship under the charter-party was bound to proceed to Galatz or Ibrail, or so near thereto as she might safely get, and load a cargo of grain. The ship having arrived at the Sulina mouth of the Danube, which is ninety miles below Galatz, and still farther from Ibrail, the master found the water on the bar unusually low, so that he could not safely cross the bar until it rose, and gave notice that he required the merchant to load his cargo there, a place where it was neither customary or reasonable to load cargo. The decision as far as regards this point was that, as Lord Campbell, C.J. said, "The meaning of the charter-party must be that the ship is to get within the ambit of the port, though she may not reach the actual harbour. Now could it be said that the vessel, if she was obstructed in entering the Dardenelles, had completed her voyage to Galatz?" In Metcalfe v. The Britannia Ironworks Company (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 313; 1 Q. B. Div. 613; 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 796; affirmed on appeal 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 407; 2 Q. B. Div. 243; 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 451) it was actually contended that the shipowner, who had contracted that his ship would go to Taganrog, or so near thereto as she could safely get, and there deliver the cargo, was entitled to require the merchant to take delivery at Kertch, 300 miles from Taganrog, and that the ship had completed her voyage because she was obstructed in entering the sea of Azof; but the court, both below and in the court of error, agreed with the prior decision in Schilizzi v. Derry (ubi sup.). I think it plain that neither of those decisions touch the present case. Whether the language which Lord Campbell used is quite the most accurate to express his idea may be doubted, but in the case at bar it was both reasonable and customary to unload ships in that part of the river to which the Euxine had come, and the docks adjoining.

In Parker v. Winlow (7 E. & B. 942), and Bastifell v. Lloyd (1 H. & C. 388; 31 L. J. 413, Ex.) where the charter-party was to proceed to a wharf in a tidal harbour, which could not be reached during the neap tides, or as near as she might safely get, it was held that, the ship arriving during the low tides, the master was bound to wait for the higher tides, on the ground that his contract was to go to the wharf, if it could be reached in the ordinary course of navigation, and that the shipowner took on himself the risk of delay from the ordinary course of navigation. The delay in the case at bar was not in the ordinary course of navigation.

Hillstrom v. Gibson (3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 302, 362; 8 Court of Sess. Cases, 3rd series, 463) in Scotland, and Capper v. Wallace (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 223; L. Rep. 5 Q. B. Div. 163; 42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 130) were cases where the ship could get to her primary destination if she discharged a part of her cargo so as to lighten her. The majority of the Court of Session thought that, as the quantity of cargo which the ship had to discharge to enable her to lie always afloat at Glagow was small, it was reasonable for her to discharge as she did, and she was bound to do so. Nothing was decided in that case as to the alternative. The Court of Queen's Bench in the latter case held that whether the ship might insist on the whole cargo being taken at the spot where it was necessary to lighten her, as being the nearest to which she could safely get, or was bound to go farther, depended on whether it was reasonable in all the circumstances to lighten her to the necessary extent, which they thought was not the case.

These are all the cases which were cited in the argument, and, as far as I know, all the cases which exist, in which anything has been said as to the construction of this clause. And I do not think any of them is an authority for putting a different meaning on the words from that which they would bear in their natural sense, which, I think, is that which I have already expressed.

The question whether a prevention causing delay for any time, however long, but which would terminate, would amount to a prevention within the meaning of the clause, is a much more difficult question. There is no authority directly bearing on the construction of this clause, except Capper v. Wallace, which was decided after the decision of the Court of Appeal in the present case, and adds no weight to it; but there are decisions so far analogous that they establish the principle on which the Court of Appeal acted, and which, I think, they applied rightly.

It is quite true that the words of the contract are "as she may safely get;" and nothing is said expressly about getting without unreasonable delay; but in Moss v. Smith (9 C. B. 94), Maule, J., speaking of what constitutes a total loss of a ship as against an underwriter, after stating that the shipowner must repair the ship if possible, says: "It may be physically possible to repair the ship, but at an enormous cost, and there also the loss would be total; for in matters of business a thing is said to be impossible where it is not practicable, and a thing is impracticable when it can only be done at an excessive or unreasonable cost. If a ship sustains such extensive damage that it would not be reasonably practicable to repair her, seeing that the expense of repairs would be such that no man of common sense would incur the outlay, the ship is said to be totally lost." Though the particular case was a policy of insurance, Maule, J. speaks generally of mercantile contracts.

And on this principle it was held in Geipel v. Smith (1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 268; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 404; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 361), by the whole court, and in Jackson v. The Union Marine Insurance Company (2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 435; L. Rep. 8 C. P. 572), by a majority in the Common Pleas, and in the same case in error by a majority of the Court of Exchequer Chamber (2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 435, 441; L. Rep. 10 C. P. 125; 31 L. T. Rep. N.S. 789), that a delay in carrying out a charter-party caused by something for which neither party was responsible, if so great and long as to make it unreasonable to require the parties to go on with the adventure, entitled either of them, at least while the contract was executory, to consider it at an end. I said, in Geipel v. Smith (ubi sup.): "Very different considerations arise where the cargo is already on board, or, as in Hadley v. Clarke (8 T. R. 259), is already on the voyage; but while the contract still remains executory, I think time is so far of the essence of the contract as that matter which arises to cause unavoidable but unreasonable delay is sufficient excuse for refusing to perform it." I still think that there is a distinction between the cases, for when the shipowner has got the merchant's cargo on board, he cannot simply put an end to his contract; he must do something with the cargo. But in this case the parties have provided for what is to be done with it. If the ship cannot get into dock, she is to go as near as she may safely get, and there deliver. It certainly seems to me that any cause that would excuse the ship from going into the dock if the contract was wholly executory, must be sufficient to excuse her, and so bring the alternative into operation, when the cargo is on board.

There was a dissenting minority in Jackson v. The Union Marine Insurance Company (ubi sup.), and some previous authorities are perhaps not quite consistent with the decision. It is no doubt competent to your Lordships to reconsider that case, and to decide contrary to it. I think it was rightly decided, but I can only refer your Lordships to the judgment delivered by Bramwell, B., in that case, in the reasoning of which I then concurred and still concur, and to which I have nothing to add.

The only remaining question is whether the evidence in this case is such as to lead your Lordships to concur in the finding of fact by all the judges in the Court of Appeal, that the delay would have been in this case so great as to make it unreasonable to call on the shipowner to wait. The shipowner would, I think, be bound to go into the dock if he could do so by waiting a reasonable time, but not if he could only do so by waiting an unreasonable time. It is quite true that a question of reasonable or unreasonable must always be a question of more or less, and therefore of uncertainty, but that, I think, cannot be helped. I do not pretend to lay down any precise rule as to what is reasonable or what is not. I think the main elements to be considered are, what would be the effect on the object of the contract, and the damage to each party caused by the delay; and if the result be to lead those who have to decide the question to think (to adopt the language of the Master of the Rolls) that it is absurd to suppose that two commercial men entering into a contract to charter a steamer to go to a dock, or as near thereto as she may safely get, should mean that she was to wait outside so long, they ought to find it unreasonable. In the present case it was agreed in the written contract that the cargo was to be received as fast as steamer can deliver. And though I do not agree with what is suggested by Cotton, L.J., that this cast the duty on the merchant of discharging the vessel as quickly as if she had obtained admission to the Surrey Commercial Docks, it certainly showed that both parties knew that a prompt despatch was of great consequence to the steamer, and 30*l.* per day being mentioned as demurrage, it was known to each that the loss by a day's delay would be at least that sum, so as to show that a prompt despatch was to a great extent the object of the contract. It does not appear distinctly how long it would have taken to unload the steamer with lighters in the river, nor what it would have cost the merchant, but it does appear that the steamer was willing to go into the Millwall Dock, where she could have been discharged at the same cost as in the Surrey Dock, in about the same time. The defendant refused to assent to this, and I do not think he was bound to assent. He refused because he thought, not that the cargo would be worse, but that the value of it would be diminished so as to make him a loser by about 120*l.* Assuming this to be so, he required the steamer to wait for a period uncertain in its length, but certainly exceeding five weeks. and five weeks at 30*l.* a day would represent a loss to the shipowner of more than 1000*l.* I cannot think that reasonable. The result is, that I come to the conclusion that the judgment should be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed with costs.

Lord WATSON.—My Lords: This is a case of importance, seeing it involves the construction of a clause which has long been of common occurrence in contracts of affreightment. [His Lordship went through the facts of the case, and continued:] Various questions were argued in the courts below, but the only issue raised between the parties in this appeal is, whether the Euxine, on 7th Aug. 1877, had, as was found by the Court of Appeal, completed her voyage in terms of the charter-party. It is not maintained by the respondents, the owners of the Euxine, that the vessel had proceeded to the Surrey Commercial Docks. On the contrary, their contention is that it had become impossible, in the sense of the charter-party, for her to obtain admission to the dock, and, consequently, that she must be held to have completed her voyage whenever she reached her moorings at the Deptford Buoys, seeing that she was then as near to the dock as she could safely get and lie afloat. The appellants, on the other hand, contend that, by the conditions of the charter-party, the Euxine was bound to proceed to her primary destination, unless prevented by some permanent physical obstacle. They further maintain that the circumstances which occasioned the exclusion of the Euxine did not constitute an obstacle either of a physical or of a permanent character, and that the vessel was therefore bound to wait, at owner's risk, until the obstruction was removed, and then to enter the dock for the purpose of discharge. Both parties seemed to concede, and I think it may be taken as settled law, that when, by the terms of a charter-party, a loaded ship is destined to a particular dock, or as near thereto as she may safely get, the first of these alternatives constitutes a primary obligation, and, in order to complete her voyage, the vessel must proceed to and into the dock named, unless it has become in some sense "impossible" to do so. It is only in the case of her entrance into such dock being barred by such "impossibility" that the owners can require the charterers to take delivery of her cargo at a place outside the dock. When a vessel in the course of her voyage is stopped by an impediment occurring at a distance from the primary place of discharge, it has been decided that she cannot be held to have got "as near thereunto as she could safely get," and therefore cannot claim to have completed the voyage in terms of the second alternative. See Schilizzi v. Derry (ubi sup.), also Metcalfe v. The Britannia Ironworks Company (ubi sup.). It was observed by Lord Campbell, C.J., in the former of these cases, that the meaning of these words in the charter-party, "so near the port of lading as the ship may safely get," must be that she "should get within the ambit of the port, though she may not be able to enter it." In the present case, it does not admit of dispute that the Euxine, when lying at the Deptford Buoys, was as near to the Surrey Commercial Docks as she could safely get, if it be assumed that it had become, within the meaning of the charter-party, "impossible" for her to get into the dock. The appellants maintained that there can be no impossibility within the meaning of the contract, unless the vessel is stopped by an impediment which is both physical and permanent; but I greatly doubt whether, in any fair construction of the charter-party, it is necessary that the obstruction should be of a purely physical character; and I also doubt whether there be any foundation in fact for the appellants' contention. The exclusion of the Euxine from the Surrey Docks in Aug. 1877, was owing to a rule made by the statutory authorities entrusted with the administration and control of the docks. It is not suggested that the rule was in excess of their powers, or that it was not capable of being legally enforced. And I am of opinion that an order emanating from the proper authority, which, if disregarded, would lead either to the dock gates being shut against the vessel, or to her being summarily turned out of the dock, if she did get into it, does in reality constitute a physical obstacle.

The controversy between the parties appears to me accordingly to be narrowed to this issue—whether the obstacle which the Euxine encountered was of such permanency as to render it impossible within the meaning of the charter-party, for her to get into the Surrey Commercial Docks.

In providing alternative destinations, the charter party does not express the condition upon which the second alternative becomes substituted for the first. It does not in terms express any distinction between the alternatives; and that the first is to be regarded as the primary destination to which the chartered vessel must, if possible, proceed, is, I apprehend, an inference based upon what is known to be the ordinary course of shipping business, and on the presumption that both parties would, from considerations of common interest, have agreed to that effect if they had made it a matter of express contract.

The question before the House must also, in my opinion, be determined by some such reasonable considerations. A permanent obstacle can in no reasonable sense be held to mean an obstacle which will remain for ever. There must in every case be some limit of time within which an obstacle ceasing to exist cannot be regarded as permanent, and beyond which a continuing obstacle ceases to be temporary. It may be very difficult to fix that limit, which will obviously vary with the circumstances of each case and the terms of the charter-party; but I do not think the same difficulty exists in regard to the principle upon which it ought to be determined. I have always understood that when the parties to a mercantile contract, such as that of affreightment, have not expressed their intentions in a particular event, but have left these to implication, a court of law, in order to ascertain the implied meaning of the contract, must assume that the parties intended to stipulate for that which is fair and reasonable, having regard to their common interests, and to the main objects of the contract. In some cases that assumption is the only test by which the meaning of the contract can be ascertained. There may be many possibilities within the contemplation of the contract of charter-party which were not actually present to the minds of the parties at the time of making it; and when one or other of these possibilities becomes a fact, the meaning of the contract must be taken to be, not what the parties did intend, for they had neither thought nor intention regarding it, but that which the parties, as fair and reasonable men, would presumably have agreed upon if, having such possibility in view, they had made express provision as to their several rights and liabilities in the event of its occurrence.

I am of opinion that the question at issue in the present appeal must be solved in that way, and that the Euxine cannot be held to have completed her voyage on the 7th Aug., unless it be established that the delay which would have taken place before she was admitted to the Surrey Docks would have been so great that the parties, had they anticipated and provided against its occurrence on the 21st June 1877, would not, as reasonable men of business, have arranged that the vessel should wait outside the dock at owner's risk until a berth was ready for her. I adopt the view of Brett, L.J., that the shipowner must bring his ship to the primary destination named in the charter-party, "unless he is prevented from getting his ship to that destination by some obstruction or disability of such a character that it cannot be overcome by the shipowner by any reasonable means, except within such a time as, having regard to the adventure of both the shipowner and the charterer, is, as a matter of business, wholly unreasonable."

None of the authorities cited in the course of the argument, with the exception of two which I shall shortly notice, appears to me to have any material bearing upon the question before the House. Most of these authorities related to the question whether had she been permitted to enter the dock, the Euxine would have completed her voyage, and would have been at the charterer's risk as soon as she was moored there, or not until she reached a discharging berth alongside the quay. There being no proper lay days stipulated in her charter-party, it might in that event have been plausibly contended that the Euxine fell within the principle of decision in Burmester v. Hodgson (2 Camp. 483), and not within the rule established in Randall v. Lynch (2 Camp. 352). But it does not appear to me to be necessary to decide the point, because the Euxine never did get into dock; and I do not think that its decision one way or another would be of any assistance in determining whether it was impossible for her to get there.

The cases of Parker v. Winlo (ubi sup.) and Bastifell v. Lloyd (ubi sup.) come somewhat nearer to the present, although their bearing upon it is not very direct. It was there held that the shipowner, having contracted in the knowledge, or at least with the means of knowledge, that the primary place of discharge specified in the charter party was a tidal port, was bound to take the risk of the tides being unfavourable when his vessel arrived, and to complete the voyage by proceeding to that place at spring tides. It appears to me to be a reasonable inference from these decisions that no impediment arising in the ordinary course of navigation to a particular port or dock, or arising in the usual and ordinary course of management of a particular port or dock, and not lasting beyond ten days or a fortnight, is to be regarded as permanent obstruction; but that the ship must wait, and proceed to its primary destination before the charterer can be required to take delivery of the cargo. But I do not think that much aid can be derived from these decisions in determining what shall be held to constitute a permanent obstacle in a case like the present.

In Geipel v. Smith (ubi sup.) and Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Company (ubi sup.) certain points were decided in regard to the effect of unreasonable delay arising from causes not imputable to any of the parties, and so far these cases appear to me to have a very close analogy to the present. In each of these cases there had been an impediment in the way of the chartered vessel, in consequence of which she did not go to her port of loading. That impediment, which arose in the first case from a blockade, and in the second from shipwreck, was temporary in this sense, that it would have been quite possible for the one vessel to have proceeded to her place of loading after the blockade was raised, and for the other after her repairs were completed. In Geipel v. Smith the charterer raised an action of damages for breach of contract against the shipowner; but the Court of Queen's Bench being satisfied that the ship could not have reached her destination within a reasonable time without running the blockade, held in law that the contract of the charter-party was thereby discharged. In Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Company, the shipowner preferred a claim for lost freight against the underwriters, who resisted it on the ground that the charter-party remained in force notwithstanding the mishap that had befallen the ship, and that the plaintiff was entitled to demand either specific performance or damages from the charterer. At the trial of the cause the jury, in answer to questions put to them by the presiding judge, found that the time necessary for repairing the ship, so as to make her a cargo-carrying ship, was so long as to make it unreasonable for the charterers to supply the cargo agreed upon at the end of such time; and also that the time was so long as to put an end, in a commercial sense, to the commercial speculation entered upon by the charterers. A verdict was entered for the defendants, leave to move being reserved to the plaintiff; and the case was thereafter argued on a rule before the Court of Common Pleas, under an agreement that the defendants should be at liberty to argue that the findings of the jury were against the weight of evidence. The majority of the Common Pleas took substantially the same view of the facts as the jury had done, and held that the delay occasioned by the getting off and repair of the ship was so unreasonable as to terminate the adventure, and that the plaintiff was accordingly entitled to recover under his policy on freight. And upon appeal the Court of Exchequer Chamber, with a single dissentient voice, affirmed the judgment. It was precisely the same question which arose from decision in these two cases; and, if I understand them aright, it was in both decided that this delay in loading a cargo would have been so unreasonable, so inconsistent with the presumable views and intentions of both the contracting parties, that the charter-party could no longer be held binding on either of them. No doubt in these cases the contract had not passed the executory stage; but, seeing that unreasonable delay in reaching the place of loading, when occasioned by no fault of either of the parties, is effectual to discharge such a contract altogether, I conceive that, à fortiori, a similar delay in reaching the primary place of discharge ought to have the effect of enabling the vessel to complete her voyage by proceeding to the alternative destination.

That leaves only the question of fact, whether the state of the Surrey Commercial Docks in Aug. 1877 was such as would have unreasonably delayed the discharge of the Euxine within that dock. Had I been called upon to decide that question in the first instance, I should have had great difficulty in coming to any conclusion satisfactory to my own mind. I agree that the question is sufficiently raised by the pleadings, and that it was in view of the parties, and was actually discussed in the course of the argument which is interwoven with the evidence in this case, although it is not noticed in the judgment of the Master of the Rolls. But I cannot resist the impression that in their anxiety to prove or disprove the alleged custom of the port, which has now been eliminated from the case, the parties have omitted to direct their evidence to many points upon which it would have been, in my opinion, desirable that a judge unacquainted with the port of London should receive information. In the absence of such information I have done my best to sift the evidence, and the result is that I am not disposed to differ from the Court of Appeal. I think it may be taken as proved that the block occasioned by the great demand for steamship berthage in Aug. and Sept. 1877, although that was rapidly becoming the normal condition of the Surrey Docks in the preceding months of June and July, was due not to ordinary but to exceptional causes. And, seeing that on the 4th Aug. the authorities could not undertake within a month, or any other given time, to admit the Euxine into the dock, and even on the 23rd Aug. they were not in a position to give a more definite and satisfactory undertaking, it appears to me to be safe to conclude that the length of time for which the Euxine must have waited in the port of London in order to discharge in the Surrey Docks would have been in excess of any delay which either the shipowner or the charterer, at the time of entering into the charter-party, could reasonably have contemplated. I am therefore of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal ought to be affirmed.

COURT OF APPEAL.

SITTINGS AT WESTMINSTER.

June 1 and 30, 1880, and March 7, 1881.

(Before Bramwell, Baggallay, and Brett, L.JJ.)

Burnand and others v. Rodocanachi, Son, and Company.

Marine insurance—Valued policy—War risks—Money paid to the United States under the Geneva Award—Compensation to American subjects in respect of loss exceeding insurance—Rights of underwriters—Effect of American Act of Congress.

Plaintiffs, underwriters in England, underwrote a valued policy, including war risks, on cargo belonging to defendants, shipped on board a United States vessel. The real value of the cargo was more than the amount named in the policy. The cargo was destroyed by the Confederate cruiser Alabama, and plaintiffs paid the amount named in the policy to defendants as for an actual total loss.

In pursuance of the Geneva Award, made under the Treaty of Washington, the British Government paid a sum of money to the United States Government in respect of losses caused by the Alabama. An act of Congress was passed establishing a court for the distribution of this money. The Act provided that no claim should be allowed for loss in respect to which the party injured had received compensation from insurers, but that if such compensation was not equal to the loss suffered, allowance might be made for the difference; that no claim should be allowed in favour of any insurer, either in his own right or as assignee or otherwise, unless he showed that his losses by war risks exceeded his gains in respect of war risks; and that no claim should be allowed in favour of any person not entitled at the time of loss to the protection of the United States.

Defendants claimed under this Act, and recovered for the difference between their actual loss and the amount insured.

Plaintiffs sued defendants for the amount so recovered.

Held (by Bramwell and Brett, L.JJ., Baggallay, L.J. dissenting, and reversing Lord Coleridge, C.J.), that, although the value in the policy was conclusive as between the parties, the sum awarded by the United States court to defendants was not part of the salvage of the cargo insured, and therefore defendants did not hold it as trustees for the underwriters, and plaintiffs were not entitled to recover.

Action by the plaintiffs, English underwriters, against the defendants, owners of a cargo shipped on board a United States vessel, on which the plaintiffs had underwritten a valued policy including war risks, and which had subsequently been destroyed by the Confederate cruiser Alabama.

The nature of the plaintiffs' claim, the facts of the case, and the material clauses in the Act of Congress under which the defendants had received compensation, are fully stated in the judgment of Lord Coleridge, C.J., before whom the action was tried without a jury on the 1st June 1880.

The Attorney-General (Sir Henry James) and Hon. A. E. Gathorne Hardy for the defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 30, 1880.—Lord Coleridge, C.J.—In this case 15,000*l.* has been paid by the plaintiffs to the defendants on a valued policy effected with the plaintiffs at a premium covering the war risks, the subject of the insurance. The cargo of the ship Lamplighter, a cargo of tobacco, was totally destroyed by the Alabama. The loss of the cargo of the Lamplighter formed one of the items of the claim made by the United States against Great Britain, which claim was dealt with by the Treaty of Washington in May 1871, and by the award subsequently made at Geneva, under that treaty. When the sum awarded under that arbitration had been paid by Great Britain to the United States, it was dealt with, and payments were made out of it to claimants by a court constituted under an Act of Congress passed in 1874, the provisions of which Act undoubtedly bound the court and the suitors in it. In that court the defendants were suitors, and were awarded by the court a sum of many thousand pounds under the provisions of the 12th section of the Act of Congress, which it is important to set out in full. It provides that "No claim shall be admissible or allowed by said court for any loss or damage for or in respect to which the party injured, his assignees or legal representatives, shall have received compensation or indemnity from any insurance company, insurer or otherwise; but if such compensation or indemnity so received shall not have been equal to the loss or damage so actually suffered allowance may be made for the difference. And in no case shall any claim be admitted or allowed for or in respect to unearned freights, gross freights, prospective profits, freights, gains, or advantages, or for wages of officers or seamen for a longer time than one year next after the breaking up of a voyage by the Acts aforesaid; and no claim shall be admissible or allowed by said court by or on behalf of any insurance company or insurer either in its or his own right, or as assignee or otherwise in the right of a person or party insured as aforesaid, unless such claimant shall show to the satisfaction of said court that during the late rebellion the sum of its or his losses in respect to its or his war risks exceeded the sum of its or his premiums or other gains upon or in respect to such war risks, and in case of any such allowance the same shall not be greater than such excess of loss; and no claim shall be admissible or allowed by said court arising in favour of any insurance company not lawfully existing at the time of the loss under the laws of some one of the United States; and no claim shall be admissible or allowed by said court arising in favour of any person not entitled at the time of his loss to the protection of the United States in the premises, nor arising in favour of any person who did not at all times during the late rebellion bear true allegiance to the United States."

Two things are clear from the facts as applied to this section: (1) that the defendants got their money from the court on the proof, or allegation at least, that their actual loss in respect of the cargo of the Lamplighter exceeded the compensation or indemnity paid them by the plaintiffs under the policy; and (2) that the money could not have been obtained from the court either by the plaintiffs suing in their own name, or by the defendants suing on the plaintiffs' behalf; and the question is, now that the defendants have obtained the money under these circumstances, can the plaintiffs recover it from them? in other words, have the defendants obtained the money under circumstances which make them in respect of it trustees for the plaintiffs?

Two points arise: (1) Is the value in the policy which has been paid absolutely conclusive, in case of actual total loss, between the parties to the policy? (2) Was the payment of their money to the defendants more than a free gift, a pure act of grace on the part of the United States?

As to the first question, there has been an actual total loss, a positive complete destruction of the thing insured; and I think that, in this case, the valuation in the policy is conclusive between the parties. They have by agreement settled the value, and not left it open to future inquiry and dispute as between themselves (Shawe v. Felton, 2 East, 109); per Lord Abinger, delivering judgment in Young v. Turing (2 M. & G. at p. 601). It is conclusive between the parties in respect of all rights and obligations which arise upon the policy (Bruce v. Jones, 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 280; 7 L. T. Rep. N. S. 748; 1 H. & C. 769; 32 L. J. 132, Ex.), and (a very strong case on this point, though perhaps not so strong upon the other) North of England Insurance Association v. Armstrong (3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 330; 21 L. T. Rep. N.S. 882; L. Rep. 5 Q.B. 244). Even the cases which it is said show the valuation not to be for all purposes conclusive, are, when looked at carefully, and their principle considered, no exceptions to the general rule. Irving v. Manning (6 C. B. 391) shows, indeed, that, in ascertaining whether or not there has been in fact a constructive total loss, the valuation in the policy is to be disregarded on principles of sense and justice; but where the fact of the constructive total loss is aliunde established, the valuation in the policy fixes conclusively the sum which the insurers are to pay. If, then, there was in this case any right in the defendants, it arose out of the subject matter of the insurance, and the valuation in the policy was conclusive between the plaintiffs and defendants.

But, secondly, was there any right? Was the awarding of the money by the United States court merely a free gift of the money, a mere act of grace on the part of the United States Government? If it were, I am of opinion that this action would clearly be not maintainable, and, at first sight, there is much to be said for the contention that it is a mere act of grace. The money out of which this is paid to the defendant is a sum of money paid by Great Britain to the United States, from one sovereign state to another; and Rustomjee v. The Queen (34 L. T. Rep. N.S. 278; 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 190; 1 Q.B. Div. 487; 2 Q.B. Div. 69) is a distinct authority for holding that money being paid by one sovereign state to another in respect of war losses occasioned by the paying state to the subjects of the receiving state, gives no legal right whatever to a particular subject of the receiving state, compensation for whose loss has been paid to that state, capable of being enforced in any court against the Sovereign or the Government of that state. It is therefore no doubt clear that the defendants could have had no legal claim capable of being enforced against the United States in their sovereign character.

But it seems to be equally clear, as the result of great authorities both in England and in America, that, if a country puts a fund of this sort in course of distribution by regular process amongst such of its subjects as are morally entitled to share in the fund, then what their subjects so recover they recover as a right, not perhaps enforceable by law, but yet with such a character of moral equity about it as makes them in respect of what they so recover trustees for those who in equity and justice are entitled to it. This appears to me to have been held in principle by Lord Northington, Lord Hardwicke, and Chancellor Kent, when Chief Justice of New York. The cases of Blaauwpot v. Da Costa (1 Eden, 130), Gracie v. Cockran (1 Ves. sen. 98), and Randal v. New York Insurance Company (8 Johnson's N.Y. Rep. 237) appear to me clearly to show that these great lawyers would have held the defendants in this case liable. The language of Lord Hardwicke and Lord Northington appears to me to show that there is a right to the benefit or the result of which the insurers are entitled. The language of Chancellor Kent, it may be said, is extra-judicial, for there was not such right in existence in the case before him. It is so; but the judgment is considered, and the deliberate opinion of Chancellor Kent is an opinion to which great deference is due.

If this money had been received by the defendants before the plaintiffs had been sued, or if the cargo had not been physically destroyed, but had been captured and restored by the United States in specie, could it be maintained that the full amount of the policy would nevertheless have been due from the plaintiffs? I think it could not, yet in principle there is no distinction between the cases.

It has been said that the Act of Congress prevents the plaintiffs from recovering. Probably in the American court that is so; but the Act of Congress cannot affect the rights of litigants in English courts, and if the defendants are possessed of money to which, according to the principles of English law the plaintiffs are entitled, an English court must give it to the plaintiffs, although it may have been the intention of the American statute by which the defendants got the money that the plaintiffs should not have it. For these reasons I give judgment for the plaintiffs.

The defendants appealed from this judgment.

March 7.—The Attorney-General (Sir H. James) and Hon. A. E. Gathorne Hardy for the defendants.—The plaintiffs are not entitled to recover here, for the sum awarded to the defendants by the United States Government was not a sum to which they had any claim that could have been enforced at law if the Government had not been willing to allow it. This distinguishes the present case from The North of England Insurance Association v. Armstrong (3 Mar. L. C. O. S. 330; 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 822; L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 244), and there is this further distinction, that in that case damages for the loss of the vessel had been recovered by the owners in the underwriter's name, whereas here no claim by, or on behalf of, the underwriters could have been supported in the American court. Randal v. Cockran (1 Ves. sen. 97) and Blaauwpot v. Da Costa (1 Eden. 130) do not support the judgment of Lord Coleridge. In those cases the money received by the owners was received as salvage, and there was nothing like the Act of Congress here to prevent its having that character, or to interfere with the claim of the underwriters. It is true that the Act of Congress is in no way binding on the English Courts, but it shows the character of the compensation received by the defendants. The dictum of Kent, C.J., in Gracie v. New York Insurance Company (8 Johnson's N.Y. Rep. 237), where he speaks of the United States Government as becoming a trustee, is extra-judicial and is not correct, for the Government could not be liable as a trustee would. Simpson v. Thomson (3 Asp. Mar. L. C. 567; 38 L. T. Rep. N.S.; 3 App. Cas. 279) shows that the plaintiffs, being underwriters, cannot assert a right to this kind of compensation for the loss of the property insured. where such compensation could not have been recovered by the owners.

Butt, Q.C. (Cohen, Q.C. and Hollams with him) for the plaintiffs.—The present case is governed in principle by North of England Insurance Association v. Armstrong (ubi sup.). In Simpson v. Thomson (ubi sup.) Lord Cairns, C. says: "I know of no foundation for the right of underwriters, except the well-known principle of law, that where one person has agreed to indemnify another, he will, on making good the indemnity, be entitled to succeed to all the ways and means by which the person indemnified might have protected himself against, or reimbursed himself for, the loss;" and in Stewart v. Greenock Marine Insurance Company (2 H. of L. Cas. at p. 183), Lord Cottenham, C. says: "In all cases in which the subject is not actually annihilated the assured is entitled to claim, and claiming as upon a total loss, must give up to the underwriters all the remains of the property recovered, together with all benefit and advantage belonging or incident to it, or rather, such property vests in the underwriters." Both these statements of the law are, in point here, and the latter decision shows that, to entitle the underwriters to any advantage incident to the property insured, there need be no existing right in the assured to such benefit at the time of the loss. Here there was no right in the defendants as against the United States Government at first, but when the Act of Congress passed, it gave him a right. Unless it can be said that the awarding of compensation is a pure matter of grace and bounty on the part of the United States Government, and not incident to the insurance, the underwriters are entitled. This is no more an act of bounty and grace than was the action of the British Government in the cases of the Spanish reprisals, Randal v. Cockran and Blaauwpot v. Da Costa (ubi sup.). The United States Government, by passing the Act of Congress, have appropriated money to the defendants' claim to compensation. Then, as to the contention that the plaintiffs' claim is excluded by the terms of the Act of Congress, surely that Act cannot deprive English underwriters of their rights in English Courts of Justice.

Gathorne Hardy replied.

Bramwell, L.J.—I cannot (though I say so with the greatest respect) think that the judgment of Lord Coleridge is right; and, although the court is not unanimous, it seems to me that it would be useless to take time to consider our judgment, for what we have to decide is a short point, and there is no complication in the case. Lord Coleridge thought that there were only two points which it was necessary to consider, for he said in the course of his judgment: "Two points arise: first, Is the value in the policies which have been paid absolutely conclusive in case of actual loss between the parties to the policies? and secondly, Was the payment of this money to the defendants more than a free gift, a pure act of grace on the part of the United States."

Now I venture to think that there is a third, and a most important point, which is this: Suppose this was a free gift, was it a gift which could be called a portion of the salvage of the thing insured?

I agree with the reasoning and the conclusion of Lord Coleridge on the other points; and, agreeing with his reasoning, I should have thought that if the money had been awarded because the cargo was taken by the Alabama, simpliciter, it would have been a portion of the salvage, and the present case would have been within the principle of the cases referred to and relied upon in his judgment.

But then arises the third question, which was omitted in Lord Coleridge's judgment, namely, Was this given as salvage? I am clearly of opinion that it was not. In considering this question, we must look at the Act of Congress. It says that no claim shall be allowed for any loss in respect of which compensation or indemnity has been received from insurers, but that if an owner insures by a valued policy for an amount which is under the real value of the property insured, he shall receive nothing for the policy, but for the under-insurance he shall receive an indemnity. I may use Mr. Hardy's argument as to this question. Suppose there were a subscription or a grant of money awarded for the purpose of encouraging people to insert moderate values in valued policies, and that a person received an indemnity for a loss from the sum so subscribed or awarded, it seems clear to me that this would not be salvage. Suppose the cargo got safe into port after payment had been made for a loss, so that the owners received the benefit of the full value of the cargo, in such a case as that could the insurers recover back more than the amount which they had paid under the policy? Again the defendants might go before this court in America, and ask for more compensation on the ground that they had not been really indemnified if the plaintiffs are entitled to recover in this action. On a state of facts like that in the English cases which have been referred to, Blaauwpot v. Da Costa and Randal v. Cockran, and that referred to by Kent, C. J. in Gracie v. The New York Insurance Company, if proceedings had been taken in the name of the underwriters saying, "We are entitled and we will make the assured a defendant if he will not support our claim," they would have had a cause of action against him; but in the present case could an action be maintained by the underwriters in the United States? Not for a moment. It is said that the Act of Congress cannot take away the rights of parties in the English courts. That is true, but this money was given under the Act, and it seems to me that in the distribution of it the maxim Cujus est dare ejus est disponere applies. I am of opinion that this money is not salvage, and that the defendants are entitled to keep it, and are not bound to hand it over to the underwriters, and therefore that the judgment ought to be reversed.

Baggallay, L.J.—I have the misfortune to differ from my learned colleagues in this case, for I think that the view adopted and the reasons given by Lord Coleridge are correct, and I agree with them. If the distribution of this money were a mere act of grace on the part of the United States Government, it is clear that there would be no case made out on the part of the plaintiffs; but I cannot distinguish the present case from the cases of the Spanish reprisals, to which our attention has been called (Blaauwpot v. Da Costa and Randal v. Cockran). No doubt the Goverment, both in those cases and in the present, could have done as they thought fit, and conld not have been compelled to distribute the money; but they have done so, and in the present case, just as in the others, the fund is directed to be distributed among the persons who may be found to be entitled to receive a share of it. Therefore in those cases persons in a similar position to that of the present plaintiffs have been held entitled to recover. It is said here that the money paid by the United States Government was not paid in respect of anything covered by the insurance, but in respect of the difference between the amount of the insurance and the real value of the cargo. But this is a valued policy, and bearing in mind the principle laid down in The North of England Insurance Association v. Armstrong (ubi sup.) I think the underwriters are entitled to recover. It is clear that the claims before the United States Commissioners were made in respect of the loss of the Lamplighter, and the destruction of the cargo belonging to the defendants, which was the subject matter of the insurance. Therefore in my view this appeal ought to be dismissed.

Brett, L.J.—If we had not had plenty of time to consider the point, I should think it right to reserve judgment, as the court is not unanimous. This money was in the first place recovered by the American Government from England by treaty. The United States Government did not bind itself in any way as to the disposal of the money, and there was no obligation on it to give any of that money to the present defendants. Therefore there was a sum of money in the hands of the Government, and there was no obligation binding the Government as to its disposal. The Government was at liberty to make a gift of it to any person, bnt was not bound to do so.

If it had been paid over as a portion of the salvage, it may be that the mere fact that there was no obligation on the part of the Government would not prevent the money from being payable to the underwriters. That may be the effect of the cases before Lord Hardwicke and Lord Northington—Randal v. Cockran and Blaauwpot v. Da Costa—but I doubt if that is the principle of those decisions. I should think the principle must be that the Government had recovered the money for the assured; but if that were so, the money could not be recovered from the Government. If these decisions proceeded on the supposition that the money was a pure gift on the part of the Government, and was handed over to the assured as such, I could not follow the reasoning, and, unless we are bound by the decisions, I should say that we ought not to follow them. If the money was paid over in the present case as part of the salvage of the property insured, these cases might be authorities in favour of the contention on behalf of the plaintiffs.

In my opinion, however, the true principle is that the United States Government did not pay this money as salvage, that it was paid, not for the loss of the goods, but as a gift, because the owners of the goods were not insured to the full value of what they had lost. The Government would have paid the owners of the goods if they had not been insured at all, or if they had entered into a policy, but could not recover from the underwriters. The payment was not in respect of the loss, but because the owners were not fully insured.

The present case is quite different from the English cases to which I have already referred, because here the money could only be recovered in America before one court. If the present defendants had sued in that court, stating that they were suing for the underwriters, or if the underwriters had sued in their own names not one penny could have been recovered. In the English cases, if the assured had declared that he was suing as trustee for the underwriter, or if the underwriter were suing in his own name, the person so suing would recover all the money; but then the Government would pay as matter of salvage. Here the assured could not recover on behalf of the underwriters. I am of opinion that the Act of Congress makes it a free gift, whatever money is paid, because the owners are underinsured, and therefore that this is distinguishable from the English cases, and the judgment ought to be reversed.

THE LEON.

Pleading—Demurrer—General maritime law—Foreign law—Lex loci—Lex fori.

Collisions between ships when one or both are foreign, on the high seas, are questions communis juris, and liabilities created by them are to be decided by the general maritime law of liability as administered in the court where the cause is tried.

By general maritime law the liabilities of the ship and of the owners are identical for damages arising from collision.

A collision took place on the high seas between a British and a Spanish ship; both vessels sank. The English owners commenced a suit against the Spanish shipowners, who had an office in England. The Spanish shipowners appeared, and pleaded that by Spanish law there was no personal liability.

Held, a bad defence, as the liability was governed by general maritime law and not by Spanish law.

THIS was a demurrer to a portion of a statement of defence.

The plaintiffs, the owners of the British steamship Harelda, brought an action against Olano, Laringa, and Co., owners of the steamship Leon, for damages sustained by them from a collision between the Harelda and Leon, on the high seas, on the 6th Jan. 1881.

Both the Harelda and the Leon had sunk with their cargoes in consequence of the damage sustained in the collision.

Messrs. Olano, Laringa, and Co. were merchants carrying on business in Spain and at Liverpool, and the Leon was sailed under the flag of Spain.

The writ in the action, which was in personam, was issued on the 10th Jan., and on the 20th an appearance was entered for the defendants.

The statement of claim delivered on the 1st March alleged that "the collision was caused by the neglect or default of those on board the Leon."

The statement of defence, delivered the 25th March 1881, besides denying the negligence and charging that the "collision was caused by the negligent and improper navigation of the Harelda," also contained the following paragraphs:

1. About 2.30 a.m. on the 6th Jan. 1881, the screw steamship Leon, of 1650 tons register, of which the defendants, who were and are subjects of the King of Spain and domiciled in Spain, were part owners . . . . was off the coast of Portugal about twelve miles from the shore.

10. The defendants further say that before and at the time of the said collision the Leon was a Spanish ship sailing under the Spanish flag, and wholly owned by subjects of the King of Spain, and that if the said collision was occasioned by an improper or negligent navigation of the Leon (which the defendants deny) it was wholly occasioned by the negligence of the master or mariners of the Leon, and not by such owners, or the defendants, or any of them, and that by the law of Spain in force at the time of the happening of the said collision and now, the masters and mariners of a ship, and not the owners, are liable in damages in respect of a collision occasioned as in the statement of claim alleged, and by such law the defendants are not liable in respect of the damages proceeded for in the action.

The plaintiffs joined issue on the defence so far as the merits of the case were concerned, and also demurred to paragraph 10 in the following terms:

2. The plaintiffs also demur to paragraph 10 of the statement of defence, and say that the same is bad in law, on the ground that the matters therein afford no defence in law to the plaintiffs' claim, in whole or in part, and on other grounds sufficient in law to sustain this demurrer.

The demurrer was argued on the 10th and 11th May.

Benjamin, Q.C. and Myburgh in support of the demurrer.—The defence raised by paragraph 10 is bad in law. It is immaterial what the law of Spain is; when a collision takes place on the high seas, the liability of the parties is governed by the general maritime law, though the measure of it is ruled by the law of the place where the case is tried. In The M. Moxham (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 95, 107; 1 P. D. 107; 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 559), the defence of Spanish law was held valid, but because it was damage done to real property while in Spain, not on the high seas. Before the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea had been adopted by other nations, and before conventions had been made concerning them, and whilst therefore they were only a portion of the municipal law of this country, it was held that they did not apply to a collision between a British and foreign ship on the high seas, even when tried in this country:

The Saxonia, Lush. 40; 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 6; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 192.

"Generally, when a collision takes place between a British and foreign vessel on the high seas, what law shall a Court of Admiralty follow? As regards the foreign ship, for her owner cannot be supposed to know or to be bound by the municipal law of this country, the case must be decided by the law maritime, by those rules of navigation which usually prevail among nations navigating the seas where the collision takes place. If the foreigner comes before the tribunals of this country, the remedy and form of proceeding must be according to lex fori:"

The Zollverein, Swab. 96, at p. 99.

It is a rule of general maritime law that when a collision takes place the ship which has wrought the wrong is liable for its consequences; that is, if the ship were here she could no doubt be sued. In fact the owners are here and have appeared; they are sued simply as merchants at Liverpool. It may be that they are in one capacity Spaniards and subjects of the King of Spain, as alleged in the defence, but they are also merchants carrying on business at Liverpool, and under the protection of the laws of England, and therefore subjects of the Queen of England, and liable to be sued here by ordinary process. "If a man went into a foreign country upon a visit, to travel for health, to settle a particular business, or the like, it would be hard to seize upon his goods; but a residence not attended with these circumstances ought to be considered a permanent residence: (Boyd's Wheaton, s. 321.) The character of a British merchant is gained by residence, as in this case, for the purposes of trade:

The Indian Chief, 3 Ch. Rob. 12.

Even assuming that the owners of the ship were Spaniards, and only Spaniards, the case would be governed by general maritime law as administered in this country; and if they are, in consequence of the residence, British merchants, then the case is to be decided by English law, if that should differ from general maritime law, but there is no pretence for saying it should be governed by Spanish law.

Webster Q.C. and E. C. Clarkson, Q.C. against the demurrer.—Our statement in paragraph 1 of a Spanish domicile is not demurred to, and therefore for the purposes of this argument it must be taken to be admitted. It is perfectly true that by general maritime law the ship is liable for the results of a collision, and that also is the rule of Spanish law, and had it been material it might have been so stated in the 10th paragraph. but as the ship is lost the liability is immaterial. But the question of the liability of a shipowner for the acts of a ship's master is no part of general maritime law. It is a question of principal and agent, to be decided by the law of the flag which establishes and regulates that relation:

The General Steam Navigation Company v. Guillon, 11 M. & W. 877;
Story's Conflict of Laws, s. 423 h;
The Mary Moxham, 1 P. Div. 43, 107; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 95, 191.

By general maritime law there is no arbitrary limitation of liability, and if that law is to prevail a foreign ship could not in any case, nor a British ship in case of collision with a foreign ship, take advantage of the British statutes, which enact the arbitrary limitation of 8*l.* per ton. In case of damages arising to goods on board the law of the flag does certainly apply:

Lloyd v. Guibert, L. Rep. 1 Q. B. Div. 155; 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 602; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 26, 283.

The law which we set up is the law of many maritime states; it is certainly the law in Holland.

The Dundee, 1 Hagg. 120, at p. 128.

This is a personal action against certain Spanish subjects for the consequences of the act of another Spanish subject, and it is in the power of the Government of Spain to say how far he shall be liable for such acts. Suppose a collision between two Spanish ships on the high seas tried in this country, could the court give a remedy to either which neither possessed before his own tribunals? Our English law of limitating liability would not apply to foreign ships at all, nor to English vessels in collisions with foreign ships, were it not for the express words of the amending statute (Merchant Shipping Act 1862) which the courts are bound to obey:

The Amalia, 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 805; Br. & Lush. 151.

Sir ROBERT PHILLIMORE.—This is a case in which it appears an English vessel was run down by a Spanish vessel on the high seas and was sunk. She brought her action against some of the owners resident in this country, and the defence they set up in the tenth paragraph of their statement of defence is: "that before and at the time of the said collision the Leon was a Spanish ship sailing under the Spanish flag, and wholly owned by subjects of the King of Spain and that if the said collision was occasioned by any improper or negligent navigation of the Leon it was wholly occasioned by the negligence of the master or mariners of the Leon and not by such owners or the defendants or any of them, and that by the law of Spain in force at the time of the happening of the said collision and now, the master and mariner of a ship, and not the owners, are liable in damages in respect of a collision occasioned as in the statement of claim alleged, and by such law the defendants are not liable in respect of the damage proceeded for in the action." This plea is demurred to, and the question is whether the demurrer can be sustained or not.

A great deal has been said upon the question of what law is applicable to this case. Now there is no doubt as to the existence of the general maritime law, and in the few observations I shall make it is not necessary to go very abstrusely into the subject, because two cases of recent date seem to dispose of the question.

In the first place, it has not been denied that if the res had been seized in this case the liability to damages could not be denied. In the case of The Druid (1 W. Rob., at p. 399), the learned judge, Dr. Lushington says: "The liability of the ship and the responsibility of the owners in such cases are convertible terms; the ship is not liable if the owners are not responsible, and vice versâ. No responsibility can attach upon the owners if the ship is exempt and not liable to be proceeded against.

What then is the responsibility of the owners? In the same volume, in the case of The Volant (1 W. Rob., p. 387, and 1 Notes of Cases, p. 503), Dr. Lushington says: "By the ancient maritime law, the owners of a vessel doing damage were bound to make good the loss to the owners of the other vessel, although it might exceed the value of their own vessel and the freight. For the purpose of enforcing this obligation the owners of the damaged vessel might resort either to the courts of law or to the Admiralty Court, and if they preferred the latter they had the choice of three modes of proceeding, viz.: against the owners, or against the master personally, or by proceeding in rem against the ship itself. The Court of Admiralty has jurisdiction over the whole subject-matter of damages on the high seas and the arrest of a vessel is only one mode of proceeding;" and "supposing the ship doing the damage to have sunk or been lost immediately after the collision," as in this case, "I know of no reason why an action could not be maintained in this court," although the ship could not be arrested. "The jurisdiction of the court"—the High Court of Admiralty—"does not depend upon the existence of the ship, but upon the origin of the question to be decided, and the locality."

(a) With regard to the case of the Volant it should be observed that, on reference being made to it in the course of the argument, the learned judge observed that he had a note to the case by Dr. Lushington, stating that the report in Notes of Cases was correct where it differed from that in W. Rob. He also observed that The Girolamo (3 Hagg. 169) was a very doubtful authority.

It can make no difference that the defendants' vessel was at the time of the collision under a foreign flag, because "all causes of collision are causes communis juris." (The Johann Friederich, 1 W. Rob. 35, at p. 40.) In the case of The Wild Ranger (7 L. T. Rep. N. S. 725; Lush. 553; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 206, 275) Dr. Lushington said: "The court has found that the Wild Ranger, an American vessel, by improper navigation came into collision on the high seas with a British ship, and the ordinary decree has passed condemning the owners of the American vessel in the damages." In The Zollverein (Swabey, at p. 99) Dr. Lushington says: "Generally when a collision takes place between a British and a foreign vessel on the high seas, what law shall the Court of Admiralty follow? As regards the foreign ship, for her owners cannot be supposed to know or to be bound by the municipal law of this country, the case must be decided by the law maritime, by those rules of navigation which usually prevail among nations navigating the seas where the collision takes place; if the foreigner comes before the tribunals of this country, the remedy and form of proceeding must be according to the lex fori."

I am of opinion, without going further into the erudition and research connected with this question of general maritime law, that these authorities independently of others that may be cited are sufficient to enable the court to pronounce that the demurrer must be sustained and with costs, the paragraph demurred to struck out, and that the plaintiffs are entitled to the costs of the demurrer.

SPAIGHT v. TEDCASTLE.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN IRELAND.

Ship—Tug—Damage—Contributory negligence—Pilot.

A tug belonging to the respondent was engaged to tow a ship belonging to the appellants to harbour. The ship was in charge of a pilot compulsorily employed. The tug attempted to tow the ship across a bank, instead of going round it, and the ship struck on the bank and sustained damage. In an action brought by the shipowners against the owner of the tug, it was proved that the pilot signalled to the tug to change her course, but did not cast off the tow rope on finding his signals disregarded, and in the opinion of the nautical assessors he was "negligent, supine, and inactive."

Held (reversing the judgment of the court below), that this did not amount to contributory negligence on the part of the ship, and that her owners were entitled to recover for the damage sustained.

The Julia (Lush. 224; 14 Moo. P. C. 210) approved.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal in Ireland (Ball, C. and Deasy, L.J., Fitzgibbon, L.J. dissenting), which had affirmed a judgment of the Court of Admiralty in favour of the respondent.

The action was brought by the owners of the ship Ruby against the owner of the steam-tug Toiler, to recover damages for negligence in towing the Ruby.

On the 9th Dec. 1878 the Ruby arrived off the Kish light in Dublin Bay on a voyage from Quebec, and engaged the Toiler to tow her into Kingstown Harbour. The weather was squally, and the Ruby was in charge of a licensed pilot, compulsorily employed. The master of the Ruby, after engaging the tug, left the deck, the vessel being in charge of the pilot. There is a bank in the bay called Burford Bank, and the tug attempted to tow the ship across it. The pilot thought that it would not be safe to do so, and signalled to the tug to alter her course, which she did; but afterwards, in spite of his signals, she altered again, and the Ruby grounded on the bank and sustained injury. The action was brought to recover damages for the injury so sustained.

The judge of the Admiralty Court, who was assisted by nautical assessors, thought that the evidence disclosed contributory negligence on the part of the Ruby, and gave judgment for the defendant, which judgment was affirmed by the Court of Appeal as above mentioned.

The owners of the Ruby then appealed to the House of Lords.

Butt, Q.C., Boyd, Q.C. (of the Irish Bar), and Ram, appeared for the appellants.

Cohen, Q.C. and Martin Burke (of the Irish Bar), for the respondent.—In addition to the cases mentioned in the judgments The Diana (1 W. Rob. 131) and The Duke of Manchester (2 W. Rob. 470) was referred to.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

March 7.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Selborne).—My Lords: I have had an opportunity of seeing the detailed examination of the evidence in this case which will be submitted to your Lordships by Lord Blackburn; and your Lordships have before you the full discussion which that evidence received from the learned judges in the court below. My view of the main conclusions to be derived from that evidence being the same as that taken by Fitzgibbon, L.J., and by my noble and learned friend, I do not think it necessary to occupy your Lordships' time by going in detail over the same ground.

There is an important point of law which, for some reason which I do not at present understand, was not argued at your Lordships' bar, but which it would have been necessary to consider if your Lordships had taken the same view of the effect of the evidence which was taken by the majority of the judges in the court below. It seems to have been assumed that the plaintiffs, the owners of the Ruby, would have been answerable for contributory negligence, not only of their own captain and crew, but of the pilot, whose employment was compulsory by law. If in any case which may hereafter occur it should be necessary to determine the question, the statute 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 388, and the opinions delivered in this house in the recent case of The Clyde Navigation Company v. Barclay (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 390; 1 App. Cas. 790; 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 379) will require attention. But, for the present purpose, I think your Lordships may properly deal with this case as if the employment of the pilot had not been compulsory.

Great injustice might, in my opinion, be done if, in applying the doctrine of contributory negligence to a case of this sort the maxim, Causa proxima, non remota, spectatur, were lost sight of. When the direct and immediate cause of damage is clearly proved to be the fault of the defendant, contributory negligence by the plaintiffs, cannot be established merely by showing that, if those in charge of the ship had in some earlier stage of the navigation taken a course, or exercised a control over the course taken by the tug which did not effectually take or exercise, a different situation would have resulted, in which the same danger might not have occurred. Such an omission ought not to be regarded as contributory negligence, if it might, in the circumstances which actually happened, have been unattended with danger but for the defendants fault, and if it had no proper connection as a cause with the damage which followed as its effect. The question is not, in my opinion, whether it would have been wiser for the master of the Ruby to prevent the tug from taking such a course in the direction of the south buoy as might bring her as near as she actually came to the bank. If, taking that course (which the master of the tug, on his own responsibility, deliberately and voluntarily did), all danger might have been avoided by proper conduct and management on the part of both vessels at the proper time, the master of the Ruby was, in my judgment, entitled to assume that the master of the tug knew what he was about and would do what was necessary to avoid getting too close to the bank, unless the contrary manifestly appeared. At the critical time the Ruby made all the signs which were possible to the tug, and if they had been followed (as at first they were), I think it is the just conclusion from the evidence that no damage would have occurred. Upon the evidence I cannot see my way to hold that the Ruby then omitted anything which she ought to have done, or did anything which she ought not to have done. She did not contribute, by act, sign, or omission, to the determination of the master of the tug to starboard again after he had ported, and so to carry the Ruby across the bank, which was the cause of the damage. This was the fault or error of the master of the tug only. I cannot hold that, in the difficult circumstances of that moment, it was contributory negligence on the part of the Ruby not to cut herself adrift from the tug; I am by no means sure that the damage would not have been greater if this had been done, or that, in that case, such a course of action might not, more plausibly, have been represented as contributory negligence.

My conclusion is, that the judgment under appeal ought to be reversed, and I so move your Lordships.

Lord BLACKBURN.—My Lords: This was a cause of damage, instituted by the appellants, as owners of the barque Ruby, in the High Court of Admiralty of Ireland, against the respondent, as owner of the steam-tug Toiler, to recover damages, because the Ruby was run aground on a shoal in the bay of Dublin, called "Burford Bank," in consequence, as is alleged, of the negligent performance of that duty which the owner of the Toiler had taken upon himself by having, through his master, entered into a contract to tow the Ruby. It is not in dispute that a contract of towage was entered into, nor that while the Ruby was being towed by the Toiler she took the ground, and sustained serious damage; and it is not in dispute that at that time the Ruby was in charge of a duly licensed pilot, whom she was obliged to employ, pilotage in the Bay of Dublin being compulsory.

The judgment delivered by Lord Kingsdown in a case in the Privy Council, reported under the name of The Julia (Lush. 224), and also under the name of Bland v. Ross (14 Moo. P. C. 210) clearly and accurately states the law applicable here. In that case the tug sued the ship for damages for a collision. Lord Kingsdown says, "When such a contract is made the law would imply an engagement that each vessel would perform its duty in completing it; that proper skill and diligence would be used on board of each, and that neither vessel, by neglect or misconduct, would create unnecessary risk to the other, or increase any risk which would be incidental to the service undertaken, If, in the course of the performance of this contract, any inevitable accident happened to the one, without any default on the part of the other, no cause of action would arise; such an accident would be one of the necessary risks of the engagement to which each party was subject, and create no liability on the part of the other. If, on the other hand, the wrongful act of either occasioned any damage to the other, such wrongful act would create a responsibility on the party committing it, if the sufferer had not, by any misconduct or umskilfulness on her part, contributed to the accident."

He states the four questions which arose in that case. Three of them are material for the consideration of this case: "1. Did the accident arise from the misconduct of the ship? 2. Did the tug by any misconduct on her part contribute to the accident? or, what is in truth but another form of the same question, could she by using due diligence have avoided it? 3. If both these questions are decided in favour of the tug, can the ship escape the consequences of her misconduct on the ground that it is to be imputed solely to the pilot, and in no degree to the master or the crew?"

In the case of the Julia those three questions were disposed of on the evidence. The first two, merely changing the parties from "tug" to "ship," and vice versâ, were disposed of in this case by the judge of the Admiralty Court and his assessors, who found first that the accident arose from the misconduct of the tug. The onus probandi on the first issue lay on the plaintiffs below, and as the duty of the tug was to carry out the directions received from the ship, and the pilot who was in charge of it, the tug would not be guilty of neglect of duty by pursuing an injudicious course, if it was pursued in obedience to the pilot's orders. So far as this issue is concerned the misconduct or want of skill on the part of the pilot is relevant; but I think the counsel for the respondent hardly denied that there was ample evidence to justify the finding of this issue for the plaintiffs.

The second question the judge and his assessors answered in favour of the defendant, that the ship, by misconduct on her part, contributed to the accident. On this issue the burden of proof lay strongly on the defendant. I cannot but think that there was a misapprehension on the part of those who tried the cause below as to what would constitute contributory negligence; on this I will observe when I come to deal with the facts.

The third question, as is stated by Lord Kingsdown, does not exactly arise here; but I think that the evidence is such as to raise this question: supposing the first question to be decided in favour of the ship, and the second question also to be decided in favour of the ship as far as regards the conduct of the captain and crew, and all those for whose negligence the owner of the ship would be responsible to third persons, on the ground stated in Quarman v. Burnett (6 M. & W. 509), that they were persons whom "he had selected as his servants from the knowledge of, or belief in, their skill and care, and whom he could remove for misconduct, and who were bound to obey his orders," can the tug escape the consequences of its misconduct on the ground that the pilot, whom the shipowner did not select, but was compelled by law to take, and for whose misconduct he would not have been liable to third persons might, if he had exercised proper skill and care, have avoided the consequences of the tug's misconduct, and failed to do so? This is disposed of by the judge of the Admiralty Court in Ireland, in a single line. He says, "The ship, as I take it is affected by the pilot's conduct." This is not a self-evident proposition.

The majority of the Court of Appeal in Ireland thought the judge of the Admiralty Court right, on the authority of Smith v. St. Lawrence Tow Boat Company (2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 41; L. Rep. 5 P.C. 308; 28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 885). which however seems to me a decision that it was not a breach of duty in the tug in that case to pursue a course which the pilot in charge at least consented to, is he did not order it; and The Energy (L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 48; 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 601; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 503), which does not seem in point. To these I may add the case of Thorogood v. Bryan (5 C. B. 115; 18 L. J. 336, C. P.), in which the Court of Common Pleas, consisting of very able judges, decided in 1849 that a passenger on a public conveyance was so far identified with his own conveyance that he could not recover for an injury sustained by him from the negligence of a third person, if there was contributory negligence on the part of those conducting the conveyance on which he was a passenger. Maule, J. gives reasons which are certainly not applicable to the case of a pilot whom the shipowner is compelled to take. He says: "On the part of the plaintiff it is suggested that a passenger in a public conveyance has no control over the driver; but I think that that cannot with propriety be said. He selects the conveyance; he enters into a contract with the owner, whom, by his servant the driver, he employs to drive him. If he is dissatisfied with the mode of conveyance he is not obliged to avail himself of it. The passenger is not without remedy. But as regards the present defendant he is not altogether without fault. He chooses his own conveyance, and he must take the consequences of any default of the driver whom he thought fit to trust." This decision was very much questioned by the learned editors of the fourth edition of Smith's Leading Cases. Their remarks on it, and the subsequent cases in which it has been discussed, are collected at page 300 of the seventh edition of that work, in the note to Ashby v. White. But the decision itself has never been actually overruled. The precise question, whether the principle on which it proceeds, if sound, is applicable to the case of a pilot, has never, that I can find, been discussed, though in The Energy it seems to have been acted upon.

Fitzgibbon, L.J. in the present case glances at what is my difficulty, along with a good many others which perhaps had more weight with him, when he says, "I regret that this case is the first to lay down that the captain of a tug who has contracted to bring a ship to harbour with reasonable care may, against orders or without orders, wilfully drag her over a bank which he knows to be dangerous, though he sees the pilot whom he is bound to obey vehemently endeavouring to convey some signal to him, and indicating that the ship is going aground, and that the owner of the ship so treated is to be deprived of all redress because the pilot, whom it is not even in his power to select, had not the foresight, or the presence of mind, or the courage, to cast his ship adrift, and at the approach of night, against a high wind, with a rising tide, let her take the chance of avoiding alone the consequences of the admitted misconduct of the tug which was employed to conduct her safely home. I can only say that I entirely dissent from such a conclusion," The counsel for the appellants did not rest their case on this point of law, and it was not argued at your Lordships' bar. It is one of general importance, and if it were necessary to decide it either way, I should wish to hear a further argument on that point. But before putting the parties to that expense, I think it right to inquire whether, even if the ship is for this purpose affected by the pilot's conduct, a proposition which I neither affirm nor deny, the owner of the tug did in this case satisfy the onus cast on him of showing that there was contributory negligence on the part of the ship. I have come to the conclusion that he did not. [His Lordship went through the evidence in detail, and continued:]

On this evidence two questions arise: first, did the pilot make such signals that it was negligence and want of skill in the master of the tug not to understand and at once obey? That the pilot meant to give him such signals is clear; and I should be strongly disposed to draw the conclusion that he did so, but it is of course possible that he might have lost his head altogether, and have made unintelligible signs; and those who heard the witnesses and saw the pantomime described on the notes as "witness made the signs with his hands," had better means of forming a judgment on this than I have. But I think this is not material, for all are agreed that the master of the tug did at last obey, and port his helm. Then the next question is, if he had continued to follow that course would the Ruby have gone clear of the bank? She had got too near, dangerously near to the bank, and I think it at least very doubtful if a vessel under canvas only could then clear the bank. But with the aid of a tug both to bring the ship's head round more quickly, and to assist in checking the way of the ship towards the bank, which was not to leeward, a vessel assisted by a tug might get clear of the bank after she could no longer do so under canvas alone. I should have liked to have more distinctly the opinion of the naval assessors on this point, which is one of seamanship, but I cannot find that they were asked, and probably, from not knowing the perhaps artificial rules by which the law of contributory negligence is regulated, they did not think it of so much importance as I think it was. Was the course which the tug then for a short time took one which could, if pursued, have taken the vessel clear? The master of the tug himself says that it would, and I find no one who says to the contrary.

If this was so, and I think we must take it to be so, there would have been no accident if the tug had not starboarded her helm. Was that negligence? I think it was very gross negligence. The master excuses it by saying that the Ruby not having followed him he thought he must have misunderstood the previous signals. Now I think that the evidence is very strong that the Ruby did follow him; and if he thought she did not, it must have been because, on the most lenient construction of his conduct, he did not wait to see whether she was doing so or not. I quite agree with what Lord Kingsdown said in The Julia (ubi sup.) as to the advantages which those who see the witnesses have in forming an opinion as to anything depending on a conflict of testimony, and on the propriety of not setting aside their decision without strong grounds. And I agree that this observation has still more force where the question is one of seamanship, and the court below has the assistance of nautical assessors. I am perfectly aware of what would be the probable fate of a ship which was trusted to my pilotage, and would therefore never think of acting on my own notions of what ought to be done, if I found that opposed to the opinion expressed by nautical assessors. But I do not think I have differed from them in holding that the starboarding of the helm by the tug was negligence, and was the cause of the accident. I also accept the finding that the pilot was "negligent, supine, and inactive," and that all the more readily because I have myself come to the same conclusion. And I will not quarrel with their finding that the captain of the Ruby was to blame in quitting the deck, though I am by no means clear that I should have come to that conclusion myself. But no negligence which was over before the tug negligently starboarded her helm could be contributory negligence in the sense which is required to relieve the tug from the consequences of that negligence. Be it that there was negligence in the ship, and those for whom the ship was responsible, in letting her get so dangerously near the bank before her helm was ported, as complete as the negligence of those who, in Davies v. Mann (10 M. & W. 546), left the fettered donkey dangerously rolling in the road, it forms no defence to an action against the persons who, by want of proper care, have injured the ship. To make a defence on this ground it must be shown that the injured party, or those with whom, for this purpose, he is identified, might by proper care subsequently exerted have avoided the consequences of the defendant's want of proper care. I do not think that, in this case, the pilot had presence of mind or skill, so as to know whether there was anything that could be done or not, but I am unable to see what a skilful person in charge could then have done. It is said that he might have thrown off or cut the tow rope and wore ship under canvas, and the assessors say that he could have done so, and ought to have done so, on what they call the first occasion, when he was half a mile or so further from the bank. But they do not say that there was still space enough to do so after the tug starboarded, and I rather think, with Fitzgibbon, L.J., that by implication they, finding he was to blame for not doing so on the first occasion, express an opinion that he was not to blame for not doing so on the second; and the evidence of the second mate is clear, that it was too late, that the space was too short. I do not attach much weight to the evidence of the pilot, but he says the same.

It is then said that the Ruby might have tacked, and so got off safe. No case of this sort was made on the evidence, the only question asked being of one witness, whether the ship could have then tacked, and he answered "No." But, says the judge of the Admiralty Court, "There was a second occasion, and that was when the Ruby got closer and in more dangerous proximity to the bank. That was the second time the pilot was imperatively called upon to act. The assessors are of opinion that, with the assistance of the tug, the Ruby could have tacked and gone in a south-easterly direction, and so been in safety. It strikes me as odd that this question was not put to any of the witnesses but one, and that was to the second mate, and he says that she could not have tacked; if he meant that unassisted she could not have tacked, then to this the assessors agree. But the witness was not asked whether she could, with the tug's assistance, have tacked. The assessors are of opinion that she could; that the pilot should have given orders for that purpose, and that he is culpable for not having done so. These are the two instances; but the assessors' opinion is that from first to last he was negligent." I should like to have asked the assessors whether, if the ship being so near the bank as she was, had tried to tack and failed, she would not have come on the bank broadside, and at least run the risk of a far more serious accident than actually occurred; and if they had answered, as I have little doubt they would, that it was so, I would then have asked them if a person of competent skill—I do not mean this pilot, who they clearly thought had not competent skill—but if a person of competent skill having charge of the Ruby at that time, knowing where the bank was, and knowing that the person in command of the tug was one to whom it was, to say the least, difficult to convey orders, and who was not very quick at obeying them, might not, without showing any want of skill, come to the conclusion that it was best to follow the tug and go over the bank, hoping that the ship would not have much injury from touching in going over the bank, rather than to try what was a somewhat delicate manœuvre, which if it failed, was likely to cause a much worse accident?

No such question was asked, and I cannot tell how the assessors would have answered it. I think that, unless that question was answered in the negative, no case of contributory negligence was made out, even on the assumption that the ship was for this purpose identified with the pilot. The onus certainly lay strongly on the tug to make out this, and I think, on the evidence, it is not made out. I therefore come to the conclusion that, without expressing any opinion either one way or the other on the question of law, the judgment should be reversed.

COURT OF APPEAL.

SITTINGS AT LINCOLN'S INN.

APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (ADMIRALTY.)

The Alhambra.

Charter-party—"To a safe port, or as near thereunto as she can safely get and always lie and discharge afloat"—Carriage of goods—Delivery—Lightening outside port—Port of Lowestoft.

Where, by charter-party, a vessel is to call for orders for a safe port (or as near thereunto as she can safely get), and always lie and discharge afloat, she is entitled to be sent to a port which she can enter loaded, and in which she can always lie and discharge afloat at all times of the tide; and, if she be ordered to a port in which she cannot do so, she is entitled to proceed to the nearest port to the said port in which she can do so, and there discharge.

Decision of Sir R. Phillimore in the court below reversed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Sir R. Phillimore given in the Admiralty Division on the 27th July 1880.

The facts of the case are fully set out in the report of the case in the court below (43 L. T. Rep. N. S. 31; 4 Asp. Mar. L. C. 334).

Butt, Q.C. (with him Clarkson, Q.C.).—A "safe port" means that a vessel can always lie afloat. If she grounds it is not a safe port. The question is whether Lowestoft is a safe port. Now, it is proved that, whenever big ships go to Lowestoft, they either lighten in the roads or go into the harbour and ground. Again, safe port means a safe port for the ship with the cargo which she is carrying, and drawing the draft of water she is actually drawing. [Brett, L.J.—If a ship does not steer properly, would the charterers be bound to name a port into which she could enter? It is to be presumed of course that they would not know anything of her bad steering powers.] I only contend here that a safe port means a port where a vessel drawing 16ft. 6in. with her cargo can lie always afloat. The judgment in the court below [reads judgment] was founded wholly on the cases cited there, and especially on the Scotch case of Hillstrom v. Gibson (8 Sc. Sess. Cas. 463; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 302, 362). That case does not really affect my position, inasmuch as in that case the master always treated Glasgow as his port of discharge, and never attempted to refuse it. Here he refused from the first to accept Lowestoft. [Brett, L.J.—The court in Hillstrom v. Gibson finds that the master was bound to lighten and go forward. Does not that involve the proposition that the duty of the master under the charter was to go to Glasgow?] No; the obligation to go to Glasgow did not arise under the charter-party. The decision was not that the master was bound to go to Glasgow, but that after he had accepted Glasgow he was bound to go there if he could by reasonable lightening get there. There is no decision that Glasgow was a safe port within the meaning of the charter-party. [Brett, L.J. — Your argument is then that, although a master may be able to enter a port and discharge always afloat by a little lightening, he is not bound to do it.] Yes; I go to the full extent of that proposition. In this case, however, there is no need to go so far, because we were called upon to unload an unreasonable quantity. In Capper v. Wallace (L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 163; 42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 130; 4 Asp. Mar. L. C. 223) Lush, J. considered one-third too much. [Cotton, L.J.—In that case the port of Koogerpolder was accepted in the bill of lading.] Yes; that is my contention as to that case with respect to my first point, that the master of the Alhambra was entitled to a port where she could discharge always afloat. I am now contending that, if your Lordships are against me on that, the Alhambra would have had to discharge an unreasonable quantity. Hillstrom v. Gibson (ubi sup.) is only against me to the extent that a lightening of one-fifth is not unreasonable. Now, when she had discharged 220 tons she drew 12ft.; her full cargo was 639 tons. [Brett, L.J.—Is not Shield v. Wilkins (5 Ex. 304; 19 L. J. 238, Ex.) in your favour? There Pollock, C.B. says the vessel need not have crossed the bar at all.] It is so. [He was then stopped by the Court.]

Millward, Q.C. and J. P. Aspinall for the respondents.—All that Shield v. Wilkins decides is that, if the Alhambra had been bound by charter-party to go to Lowestoft, or so near thereto as she could safely get, and there load a cargo, she would have had two courses open to her: she might have gone in and taken what she could and then have gone out and waited for the rest; or alternatively have waited outside, and insisted on the whole of her cargo being brought to her there. She was ordered at Falmouth to proceed to Lowestoft, and the matter then stood just as if Lowestoft had been inserted in the charter-party or bill of lading. [BRETT, L.J.—I doubt whether you had a right to order him to Lowestoft at all; and, secondly, I very much doubt whether you did as a fact at Falmouth order him to the roads.] She was only in the roads for a temporary purpose. She had not arrived at her final place of discharge. Her insurance policies would still have been running on. The learned judge below found that it is customary at Lowestoft for vessels of this size to allow themselves to be lightened in the roads. [BRETT, L.J.—If we say that Lowestoft Roads are not part of the port of Lowestoft, custom would not be admissible. JAMES, L.J.—At any rate it would not be a customary mode of discharging in the port. COTTON, L.J.—I understand you to contend that a safe port means a port which is safe for a ship partially unloaded outside according to the custom of the port.] We do not call the lightening an unloading or a portion of the delivery for the purpose of saying that it is the final place of delivery. It is a process to enable her to complete her voyage. JAMES, L.J.—Then you contend that a safe port means a port which a little not unreasonable manipulation at a place not unreasonably distant will enable a vessel to enter without risk, and the appellants say, We will have no port except where we can lie afloat at low tide safely, with all our cargo on board.] That is the contention.

JAMES, L.J.—I am of opinion that the question in this case depends upon what construction is to be put upon the charter-party, and that is a mere construction of the words used. The charterers had the right to order the ship to proceed to a safe port—any safe port—or as near thereto as she can safely go, and there lie with her cargo always afloat, and discharge. On the construction of the whole of the charter-party the plain meaning is, that she is to be sent to a port, to a safe port; that is, a port in which a position of safety was to be got, and moreover a port into which the ship could safely get and always lie and discharge afloat. She has contracted to go to such a port only, and not to that port with a little variation. In making the charter-party the shipowner says: "I will go to that port if I can get there; if I cannot get there I will get as near thereto as I can safely get and lie afloat and discharge, whether at Lowestoft or not, so long as I go to a safe port." Now it is conceded that Lowestoft was not a port in which a ship of the size and burthen of the ship in question could safely go when she was drawing 16ft. 6in. It is admitted that at low water at Lowestoft there is not more than 11ft. and sometimes less: that was not in my opinion a safe port. A safe port is not a port in which a vessel can lie with safety, merely by reason that there is something outside the place in which the ship can lie afloat, and in which she can discharge a part of her cargo, as is contended ought to have been done in this case. It may be all very well that that should be done in some cases, but that is not the contract the parties entered into. The contract was to go to some place of safety for a ship of such burthen, and which complies with the other requisites. I am of opinion, therefore, that the defendants are entitled to the judgment of the court.

BRETT, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question is, what was the sort of port to which, when the ship arrived at Falmouth for orders, the charterer or his agent had the right to order the ship to go. The first necessity was to order her to go to a port in the sense in which that word is used in seamanlike language; secondly, that it should be a port in which she might always lie and and discharge afloat, and according to my view, the meaning is, it should be a port in which, from the moment she entered into it, in the condition in which she was entitled to go into it, she should be able to lie afloat until the time of final discharge. The condition in which she was entitled to go in would be the condition of a fully loaded vessel, and she was not bound to unload before, but to go into port. The meaning then must be a port in which she shall, when fully loaded, be able to lie afloat, and to lie afloat from that moment until discharged in a reasonable way. But there is something more than that; it must be safe. Therefore, if ordered to a port where she could lie afloat from the beginning to the end of her discharge, yet if it were not a safe port, she was not bound to go to it at all. The question is whether Lowestoft was a port to which, taking that construction of the charter-party, the consignees were entitled to order her to go. They ordered her to go to "Lowestoft." The meaning of that is, not to go to Lowestoft Roads, but to the harbour. Therefore the question must be whether Lowestoft harbour was a place in which she could enter fully loaded, and lie afloat and unload. In my opinion it was not. It was said she could have done it if she had partially unloaded in Lowestoft Roads at a distance from the harbour, and a custom to do so was vouched. It seems to me that that custom is inadmissible, because it related to a thing to be done before the ship got to Lowestoft. Therefore it seems to me that that was a thing she was not authorised to do. Shield v. Wilkins (ubi sup.) is an authority in point. I will reserve my opinion as to the Scotch case, as the question there decided does not arise here.

COTTON, L.J.—I am also of the same opinion. In my opinion the true construction of the charter-party is, that a safe port means a safe port for a vessel loaded. Shield v. Wilkins is exactly in point. The port must also have been safe. The only question is, whether Lowestoft was such a place, or whether there was anything as regards the custom to justify the charterer in ordering the ship there; and the further question is, whether Lowestoft means the road. The roads are not part of the port. The charterer has ordered the ship to go to the port. Must not that mean the harbour where the ship can safely unload always lying afloat? That will not entitle the charterer to say that the ship shall go to the roads. As to the custom, it is when the ship has got to the port the unloading will be according to the custom of the port. In this particular case the construction of the contract must be, that the ship in a loaded state shall safely go in and unload and discharge, and that is varied by this, that at this particular port ships do lie outside and take out part of their cargoes. The custom is in no way admissible as a construction of the charter-party. When the port is fixed the custom may regulate certain things to be done, but in my opinion the custom of a port to which a ship shall go cannot apply in this place.

James, L.J.—I only wish to say a word as to the custom. The custom attempted to be established in this case is, that Lowestoft does not mean Lowestoft, but something else.

PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY APPEALS (ADMIRALTY).

Jurisdiction—Practice—Bail—Foreign judgment—Maritime lien—Action in rem—Action in personam.

The Admiralty Division of the High Court of Justice cannot entertain an action in rem on a foreign judgment in personam for damages arising out of a collision.

Semble, a foreign judgment in rem for damages by collision can be sued upon in England in rem.

Bail given to answer judgment in a cause where the appearance is under protest will not be discharged on account of a change in the indorsement on the writ of summons, which renders the protest of no avail.

These were appeals from judgments of Sir R. Phillimore on two motions. The argument and judgment on the first is reported The City of Mecca (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 187; 5 P. Div. 28; 41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 444). That judgment was appealed from, and in the first instance, came before the Court of Appeal, consisting of James, Brett, and Cotton, L.JJ., on the 26th July 1880, when, it being represented by defendant's counsel that further important evidence had been filed since the hearing below, the following order was made:

The Court of Appeal having heard counsel for defendants (appellants), counsel for the plaintiffs (respondents) not being present, ordered that the action should be remitted to the judge of the court below, with directions to rehear the defendants' motion to set aside the summons, on the further evidence filed since the 25th Nov. 1879, the date of the order appealed from, and with power to deal with the costs of this application.

The motion was accordingly reheard by Sir R. Phillimore, on the 28th and 30th July, when, after fresh evidence as to the nature of the judgment of the Portuguese court, and of the law of Portugal, and hearing

Benjamin, Q.C. and E. C. Clarkson for the defendants, and Webster, Q.C. for the plaintiffs, the following order was made:

The judge having heard counsel further hereon directed the defendants' motion to set aside the proceedings in the action to stand over. He further directed (the defendants' counsel objecting thereto) that the indorsement of claim upon the writ of summons should be amended by altering the same into an indorsement of claim for damage by collision, reserving all questions as to costs, but gave leave to the defendants to appeal from this order.

The indorsement on the writ was then amended as follows:

"The plaintiff's claim is for damage by collision;" and subsequently a further amendment was made, so that the indorsement ran as follows:

"The plaintiffs claim 25,000*l.* against the steamship City of Mecca and her owners, for damages occasioned by a collision which took place off Capo Espichel, on the coast of Portugal, in the month of Jan. 1875."

On the 23rd Nov. defendants moved the court to "rectify this indorsement" by making it "comply with the direction to amend the same given," by order of the 30th July 1880.

Benjamin, Q.C., Butt, Q.C., and Clarkson appeared in support of the motion, and argued that the addition of the words "and her owners" in the indorsement on the writ of summons in an action in rem was intended to cover the circumstance of the judgment of the court in Portugal being in personam, and was therefore an attempt to enforce a personal judgment of a foreign tribunal by proceedings in rem.

Webster, Q.C., G. Bruce, and Dr. W. G. F. Phillimore, for plaintiffs, argued that the presence of the words objected to made no practical difference in the cause of action or method of proceeding.

The Court made the following order:

The judge having heard counsel on both sides directed plaintiffs to amend the indorsement in the writ of summons in this action by striking out the words "and her owners," but made no order as to costs.

Previously to this motion the plaintiffs had, on the 15th Nov., filed a statement of claim in the action, which statement the defendants moved to strike out by another motion on the same day.

Butt, Q.C.—The statement of claim is irregularly filed. We have never absolutely appeared in the action. The original motion to strike out the writ of summons is still pending by the order of the 30th July, which we say, and have just proved in the former motion, has not been complied with. We could not file a petition on protest, though our appearance hitherto has been on protest, until the matter of the writ was settled. That is now settled by the order just made, and we shall at once appear absolutely to the action, which will now go on like any other collision action.

Webster, Q.C.—We are perfectly in order. We amended our writ in accordance with the order of the court; the difference made to-day is quite immaterial, and the defendants failing to appear to that writ, and also failing to file a petition on protest, we are justified in proceeding under the default rules.

Sir R. Phillimore.—The statement of claim was irregularly put upon the file. The plaintiffs ought not to have filed their statement of claim whilst the motion to amend the indorsement on the writ was still pending, the complaint being that the defendants had not obeyed the order of the court of the 30th July 1880. An absolute appearance having now been entered, the next step is obviously for the plaintiffs to deliver anew the statement of claim; and the following order was made:

The judge having heard counsel on both sides, directed the statement of claim filed by the plaintiffs in the action to be taken off the file, but made no order as to the costs of the motion.

Webster, Q.C. then moved for an order to consolidate two actions: one, that in which the orders had already been made, by the owners of the Insulano against the City of Mecca; and the other by the underwriters of the Insulano against the same ship. If the two actions are kept distinct, the evidence needed on the main question of foreign law, which is very expensive, will have to be taken twice over on precisely the same point.

Butt, Q.C.—We will agree to an order that the evidence in one suit shall be taken as evidence in the other.

A further motion to strike out the statement of claim in the second action was postponed.

On Tuesday, the 7th Dec. 1880, the court was moved to stay all proceedings in both actions until a preliminary act had been filed (Order XIX., r. 30). On hearing the motion in the first action (Cotesworth and others v. Owners of the City of Mecca) the Court made the following order:

The judge having heard counsel on both sides, directed plaintiffs to file the preliminary act within fourteen days, with leave to the defendants to plead and demur, or otherwise object to the statement of claim within eight days after the said preliminary act shall have been filed, and he condemned the plaintiffs in the costs of this action.

On the 25th Jan. 1881 the court was moved in both actions:

To strike out or reject the plaintiffs' statement of claim delivered in this action on the 29th Nov. 1880, upon the ground amongst others that the said statement of claim is a departure from the cause of action set out in the writ, and at variance with the understanding arrived at between the parties to the action, and carried out by order of the court, as to the form and nature of the action, and to allow to the other defendants a fortnight's time to plead and demur if necessary, and to condemn the plaintiffs in the costs consequent upon the delivery of the said statement of claim, and of and incident to this application.

The statement of claim stated that the collision had occurred, but gave no details of the circumstances, but pleaded the foreign judgment against the City of Mecca.

Butt, Q.C., Benjamin, Q.C., and Clarkson for the defendants.—We object altogether to the statement of claim in its present form; the plaintiffs are still attempting to enforce a personal judgment by a proceeding in rem. They must either, if they choose to proceed at all on this personal judgment, do so in the ordinary way by a personal action and release the ship, or if they choose to arrest the ship, they must proceed, as in any other ordinary collision cause in rem, setting out the facts concerning the collision on which they rely, and giving us an opportunity to traverse these facts; here they only plead that a collision took place, which no one can deny, and that by a competent court we were found to blame for the collision, and pray judgment against us.

Webster, Q.C., G. Bruce, and Dr. W. G. F. Phillimore.—Nothing has taken place either by agreement or understanding, or by order of the court, to preclude me from my right of pleading in the present form. Whether the judgment of the Portugese court was in rem or in personam, matters not here; it is a judgment for damage by collision, and damage by collision confers a maritime lien; a maritime lien thus exists upon the ship, which I make operative by arresting the ship, and then I plead the judgment in the ordinary form.

In the result the following order was made:

The judge having heard counsel on both sides, rejected defendants' motion to strike out or reject the statement of claim, but gave them leave to plead and demur to the said statement of claim within twenty-one days, and further he refused to remit the parties to the position in which they stood prior to the amendment of the writ of summons, and directed the costs of this motion to be costs in the action.

This was one of the orders appealed from.

In addition to the proceedings set out above, the Court of Admiralty was moved on the 3rd Aug. 1880 to discharge the bail given in the original action.

E. C. Clarkson.—The bail in this case rendered themselves liable for what damages might be recovered in a suit in which it was sought to enforce a personal judgment abroad by a suit in rem here; the appearance was under protest to the jurisdiction, and the risk the bail ran in that action was very slight, but the whole basis of the action is now changed; there is no doubt that in its present form the court has jurisdiction to entertain this suit, and that is not the liability we incurred when we gave bail. The original suit was by underwriters, who have no locus standi in this court, to sue in rem on a foreign judgment in personam; now it is an ordinary suit for damage by collision.

Webster, Q.C.—The bail are not parties to the suit, and therefore cannot be heard to object to any change introduced in the proceedings. "The sureties are not parties in the original suit, and they are not entitled to interfere in any stage of the proceedings:"

The Harriett, 1 W. Rob. p. 253; 1 Notes of Cases, p. 337.

[E. C. Clarkson.—I appear for the defendants in the cause as well as for the bail.] If the defendants adhere to the protest to the jurisdiction they should have filed a petition on protest, but the time to do so has expired, and therefore the appearance is absolute, and their bail bound. But moreover the bail represents the res (The Wild Ranger, Br. & Lush. 87; The Nied Elwin, 1 Dod. at p. 53), and nothing that has taken place in the cause would have released the res had it remained under arrest. It is the warrant of arrest that the giving of bail is substituted for, not for the writ of summons, and therefore no amendment of the writ affects the position of the bail. It is not necessary that the cause of action in which bail is given should be identical with that which ultimately is tried:

The Skipwith, 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 20; 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 43,
The Princess Royal, 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 328; L. Rep. 3 A & E. 27; 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 39.

In the latter case the præcipe to institute, which under the old practice occupied the same place in a cause in rem that the writ of summons does now, was amended so as to alter the form of action, but it was never attempted to be set up that the bail should be discharged. But the case is even stronger since the Judicature Acts, as now any indorsement on the writ may be amended:

Order III., r 2;
Order XXVII., r. 2;
Wilson Jud. Act, 2nd edit. p. 108.

Besides, the form of the bail bond is absolute, and in this case the defendant has as yet only appeared on protest, therefore he cannot at all events allege that the cause of action has changed unless he puts himself in order by an absolute appearance.

E. C. Clarkson in reply.

Sir R. Phillimore.—I am satisfied, both on the authorities cited as to the practice of this court before the Judicature Act, and also by references made to the Judicature Act itself, that I ought not, at the present stage of affairs, to discharge the bail, and I therefore dismiss the motion, but, as the question is primæ impressionis, I shall make no order as to costs.

On the 23rd March the appeal from the order of the 25th Jan. 1881 (ante) came on for hearing before Jessel, M.R., James, and Cotton, L.JJ., when it appearing that there was a misunderstanding amongst the parties as to what had taken place on the hearing of the various motions in the court below, Jessel, M.R. said:—Great costs have already been thrown away on the various proceedings in this case. To avoid still greater expense, we are of opinion that it will be best to clear away all that has taken place since the appeal on the original motion came before the court in July last; that is to say, we will hear the original motion on the new evidence. The former order of this court of the 26th July 1880 (ante) will be discharged by consent, and all the questions of cost will be dealt with by the Court of Appeal, both those of the original motion and those incurred since that motion was on the former occasion before this court.

On the 4th May the original motion thus reinstated "to set aside all proceedings" (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 187; 41 L. T. Rep. N.S. 445; 5 P. Div. 29) came before the court, consisting of Jessel, M.R., Baggallay and Lush, L.JJ.

The evidence before the Court of Appeal consisted of the translation of the various judgments in Portugal, translations of several articles of the Commercial Code of Portugal referred to in these judgments, and affidavits of Portuguese advocates as to the nature and effect of the proceedings in the action for damages in Portugal.

The various judgments of the courts in Portugal so far as they are material to the question at this time before the court are as follows:

Civil Proceedings in the Supreme Court of Lisbon.

1. Petition by Bensaude and Co., agents for the Insular Navigation Company (Empreza Insulano de Navigaçao) owners of the Portugese steamer Insulano . . . as agents for the company assured . . . stating that the vessel was insured in 7000*l.* by Lloyd's of London, that she was wholly lost by collision with the City of Mecca, that the City of Mecca was solely to blame for the collision; that Lloyd's "purpose bringing their action for compensation against whomsoever may be liable for the fault or neglect, which they will institute in the competent tribunal;" that it is the duty of the owners and their agents to act for Lloyd's and praying that an "embargo may be effected for the aforesaid sum on the hull, rigging, and tackle of the English steamer City of Mecca, and notice of the embargo given to the port and custom authorities."

2. Sentence on the said petition dated 24th Feb. 1875, granting the embargo, permitting it to be substituted by a sufficient bond and giving thirty days for the institution of the action.

3. Petition on appeal from the sentence of embargo by David Anderson, the captain of the City of Mecca, and the consignees of the steamer in Lisbon.

4. Sentence on the appeal, dated 6th March 1875, allowing the appeal and discharging the embargo, "because it is one of the essential requisites to enable the court to decree, that the certainty of the debt should be proved. . . . which certainly it could not possess without having verified by competent experts that the ship ran into was unable to avoid the collision of the vessel running into her, . . . and moreover because, assuming the hypothesis that the vessel that ran foul of the other should be declared liable to make good the damages caused by the collision, such debt cannot be deemed as privileged with a view to laying on the embargo."

5. Petition on appeal from the decision of the Supreme Court discharging the embargo to the Supreme Trial by Bensaude and Co.

6. Sentence of Supreme Tribunal affirming decision of Supreme Court dated 25th June 1875.

7. Sentence of the Tribunal of Commerce at Lisbon, dated 17th Dec. 1876, stating that W. Cotesworth, T. A. White and others, underwriters of the London Lloyd's, and Bensaude and Co., in the capacity of representatives of the Empreza Insulano de Navigaçao, owners of the steamer Insulano, the first on their own behalf, and the second in the capacity of underwriters who have not forwarded a power of attorney, have come before the tribunal against David Anderson, captain of the English steamer City of Mecca, George Smith and Sons, of Glasgow, and William Graham, jun. and Co., of Lisbon, the former the owners and the latter the consignees of the said vessel, alleging that Lloyd's underwriters of London insured the Portuguese steamer Insulano for the sum of 7000*l.*, that the steamer was totally lost in consequence of a collision, and that the plaintiffs had paid the 7000*l.*, that the collision was entirely and exclusively due to the captain of the City of Mecca; that the defendants William Graham and Co. disclaimed liability altogether for the matters claimed; that the defendants object to the jurisdiction on the ground that the cause of action arose on the high seas outside Portuguese territory, and that the defendants are all foreigners; and also that on the merits of the case the defendants were not liable, the collision having been caused by the Insulano, and adjudging "the defendants in this action, William Graham, jun. and Co., to be incompetent," and therefore dismissing them from the suit; finding the plaintiffs and the rest of the defendants competent parties, and adjudging "the said action to be well founded and proved, the counter-charges to be unfounded and not proved," and in conformity thereunto condemning "the defendants David Anderson and George Smith and Sons jointly and severally to pay to the plaintiffs the amount claimed with interest. . . . ."

8. The judgment of the Court of Appeal (Relaçao), dated 2nd March 1878, on an appeal by the defendants against the judgment of the Tribunal of Commerce, dismissing the appeal, and affirming the decree of the Tribunal of Commerce.

9. The judgment of the Supreme Tribunal dated 21st June 1879, on an appeal from the judgment of the Court of Relaçao, further affirming that judgment and the judgment of the Tribunal of Commerce.

Benjamin Q.C., Butt, Q.C., and Clarkson, Q.C., in support of the motion. There are two questions: first, is this foreign judgment not a judgment in personam; secondly, even if it is not a judgment in personam, can it be enforced here by proceedings in rem? The words of this judgment do not create a charge on the res, only a personal liability on the captain and owners. [Jessel, M.R.—You say that, assuming the courts in this country may enforce the judgment, yet that the Court of Admiralty may not make use of all its special remedies for the purpose.] There was an attempt to make this in some sort a proceeding in rem in Portugal, but it was not permitted; it appears that the law of Portugal does not permit or recognise proceedings in rem. At the time these judgments were given the res was not in Portugal at all, nor any bail representing the res. The plaintiff may either have the advantage of proceedings in rem here by proceeding as in an ordinary collision suit, or he may proceed on his foreign judgment by an ordinary personal action, but he cannot combine the two in the way here attempted.

Webster, Q.C., G. Bruce, and Dr. W. G. F. Phillimore, for the plaintiffs, owners of the Insulano and others, in opposition to the motion.—Damage by collision constitutes, by the general maritime law common to all civilised nations, a maritime lien; the proceeding before the Tribunal of Commerce was "for the purpose of enforcing a maritime lien," and therefore a "proceeding in rem:"

Castrique v. Imrie, 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 454; L. Rep. 4 H. of L. 447; 23 L. T. Rep. N.S. 43.

In this country a maritime lien can be perfected at once by arresting the ship, subject of course to an action for damages if the arrest is ultimately proved to have been wrongful; but in Portugal, though the maritime lien exists, it cannot be perfected by the arrest and sale of ships until after judgment has been obtained. [Jessel, M.R.—A judgment to settle the fact that the vessel is liable, not the amount of that liability.] Certainly; therefore, our attempt to arrest the vessel before getting that judgment was premature, but now we are in possession of the judgment and are in a position, if the ship was in Portugal, to arrest and sell without further action; it is therefore beyond doubt a judgment in rem in Portugal, and therefore can be sued upon by proceedings in rem here. It is not correct to say that it is the nature of the process which confers a maritime lien; it matters not whether the process is in rem or in personam, it is the fact of the collision which gives a maritime lien. By the affidavits in this case it appears that this judgment could be enforced by the sale of the ship, if in a Portuguese port, even if she had changed hands and come into the possession of an innocent purchaser, and that is the test of a maritime lien:

The Europa, 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 337, 420; Br. & Lush. 89; 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 368.

Jessel, M.R.—This is in form an appeal from a decision of Sir Robert Phillimore. It is not so in fact, because the facts that are before us are totally different from the facts which were before him. He decided that there had been a judgment in rem by the Portuguese court having jurisdiction in Admiralty; that an action, being brought on that judgment in the High Court, might be brought as an action in rem—that is, as an action against the ship—and might be enforced in the way in which process in this action was enforced by an arrest of the vessel. The owners appeared under protest, and asked to set aside all those proceedings, and he decided against them on that ground. It is hardly necessary to read his judgment, but I think it is only fair, arriving, as I do, at a different conclusion on the present facts, to read this to show that that is what he really said. He said (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 187; 41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 448; 5 P. Div. 33): "The court is now called upon to be aidant to the enforcement of a judgment in rem given by the Portuguese court." And then he said: "Although there is no direct precedent on the point, it is clearly for the interests of justice that this court should . . . having its hand upon the res, not take it off until the sentence be executed." That is the foundation of his judgment. It appears that the real facts of the case were not before him at all. There was an affidavit on a most important point—that the proceedings in Portugal were in rem—by a clerk to the solicitors. I am far from saying that it was purposely erroneous, but it did lead to an erroneous conclusion in the mind of the learned judge, and it probably would have led any other person to an erroneous conclusion. It now appears that, by the law of Portugal, there is no such thing as an action in rem. It does not exist at all. What the reason may be is immaterial to inquire, and the reason given is certainly a very odd one, but still the fact is quite plain; this is what is said by a gentleman of great eminence in Portugal, a Portuguese advocate, and president of the Association of Advocates in Lisbon, and he has practised as an advocate since 1840, and he says that modern Portuguese law does not accept in terms the distinction of actions in rem and in personam, because Portuguese law deals little in doctrine. Whether that reason is satisfactory to his mind, or not, I do not know. I am afraid it is not satisfactory to mine. The fact, however, being so, the course of procedure seems to be this. They bring a personal action against the owners and the captain, who are both liable for the collision; and when they have got judgment in that action, if the owners and captain do not pay, and if the vessel, after the judgment, comes within the jurisdiction of the Portuguese court, they enforce their personal judgment as against the vessel, under the doctrine of the law of nations, which is stated by the two advocates, whose affidavits are before the court, to be part of the law of Portugal, that damage arising from collision gives a maritime lien on the vessel which is in fault, and that the lien dates from the time of collision, and of course is not created by the judgment, which merely ascertains the amount of the damages, and also decides, if it be disputed, whether there is any lien at all, that is, whether there is any fault or liability on the part of the vessel. That being so, the judgment in this case was given actually against the captain and owners by name, and there is no other judgment, and the present action is brought on that judgment, and on that judgment only. There was in reality in Portugal an attempt to seize the vessel by arrest, which attempt failed, because, as I have already said, the Portuguese law does not allow the arrest of a vessel before the damage is ascertained, and therefore the embargo, as it is called, was discharged, and there was no arrest of the vessel, nor does it appear that it has since come within the jurisdiction of the court of Portugal, nor is there any decree asserting a maritime lien or order directing a charge on the vessel, or directing the sale of the vessel. It appears to me clear that this judgment is a personal judgment in a personal action. Then it may be said, what is there to argue? The argument presented to us by the respondents is this: First of all, it is alleged that the action in Portugal was an action for enforcing a maritime lien; secondly, that whatever the terms of the judgment might be, it was a judgment for enforcing a maritime lien, and therefore a judgment in rem, and that that being so it was a judgment binding the vessel in the courts of every civilised country under the international law. But I find the simple answer is, that it is not an action or proceeding to enforce a maritime lien. Nothing of the kind appears on the proceedings. There is no suggestion from beginning to end that the ship is liable, there is no declaration that the ship is liable, and it does not appear on the proceedings that the ship was even within the jurisdiction at the time the action was commenced against the owners. An action for enforcing a maritime lien may, no doubt, be commenced without an actual arrest of the ship, but there is no suggestion that they intended anything of the kind, and in fact the law does not allow it. An action against a ship, as it is called, is not allowed by the law of Portugal. You may in England and in most countries proceed against the ship. The writ may be issued against the owner of such a ship, and the owner may never appear, and you get your judgment against the ship without a single person being named from beginning to end. That is an action in rem, and it is perfectly well understood that the judgment is against the ship. In the present case the judgment does not affect the ship at all unless the ship should afterwards come within the jurisdiction of the Portuguese court, and then it can be made the foundation of a proceeding by which you can arrest the ship and get it condemned. Therefore it seems to me to be plain that this is a personal action, as distinguished from an action in rem, and any attempt to make it out something else because the law of Portugal does not allow actions in rem is to change the real nature of the action to meet the exigencies of those who want to make the judgment of the court of Portugal go further than it in fact does. It appears to me, therefore, that there is no longer the same state of circumstances as that on which the judge in the court below decided, for the judgment is not a judgment in rem either in form or circumstances, neither is the action an action in rem. Reference has been made to the case of The Bold Buccleugh (7 Moore P. C. Cas. 267), from which I will read a few words of the judgment delivered by Sir John Jervis. At page 284 he says: "Having its origin in this rule of the civil law a maritime lien is well defined by Lord Tenterden to mean a claim or privilege upon a thing to be carried into effect by legal process, and Story, J. explains that process to be a proceeding in rem, and adds that wherever a lien or claim is given upon the thing, then the Admiralty enforces it by a proceeding in rem, and indeed is the only competent court to enforce it. A maritime lien is the foundation of the proceeding in rem—a process to make perfect a right inchoate from the moment the lien attaches; and whilst it must be admitted that where such a lien exists a proceeding in rem may be had, it will be found to be equally true that in all cases where a proceeding in rem is the proper course there a maritime lien exists which gave a privilege or claim upon a thing to be carried into effect by legal process." Then he refers to what occurred in that case, and adds that an action was brought in Scotland against the owners by name, very much like the action in the foreign court in this case; but there is something in addition, because in Scotland when the ship comes within the jurisdiction they arrest the vessel to secure the debt and then—and this applies exactly to this case—"the arrest of the steamer was only collateral to secure the debt." They did not get so far in Portugal. They tried but failed; then he says, "We have already explained that in our judgment a proceeding in rem differs from one in personam, and it follows that the two suits being in their nature different the pendency of one cannot be pleaded in suspension of the other." That is, the formal proceedings in Scotland were against the person, although the vessel was arrested as security for the debt. It is really the form of the proceedings which must be looked at to ascertain whether it is a proceeding in rem or in personam. The case before us is much stronger than The Bold Buccleugh, as here the attempt to arrest the vessel failed altogether. For this reason it seems to me we should go further than we should be warranted by any principle in going if we said that the judgment was not a personal judgment and that the court was entitled to order the arrest of the vessel as if it were an action in rem and a judgment in rem. Therefore I consider this appeal ought to be allowed.

Baggallay, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In the early part of Jan. 1875 a collision took place off the Portuguese coast between the British ship City of Mecca and a Portuguese ship called the Insulano. On the 1st Sept. 1875 the action was commenced in Portugal with reference to proceedings to enforce the judgment in which this present appeal is brought. It would appear that in the year 1878 or 1879 an action was brought in the Admiralty Court in England, when the writ in that action was issued it had this endorsement upon it: "The plaintiffs' claim is upon a judgment of the Tribunal of Commerce of Lisbon, and the plaintiffs claim 25,000*l*." That judgment of the Tribunal of Commerce at Lisbon was a judgment pronounced on the 17th Dec. 1876, and which condemned the defendants, the owners of the City of Mecca, jointly and severally to pay to the plaintiffs "the amount claimed with interest from the date of disbursement." It was an action brought by the owners of the Insulano, and also by the underwriters who paid certain claims under policies upon the ship; therefore it seems to me impossible to say, looking at the form of the judgment itself, that it was any more than a personal action, a judgment against the defendants personally for the payment of a specific sum of money. But before this writ was issued an application was made to the judge of the Probate Division for liberty to issue the writ, and to proceed to arrest the ship, and an affidavit was then made which I am willing to accept was made in ignorance of the true state of the case, alleging that the action commenced in the Portuguese courts had been a proceding in rem as far as regards the ship. The defendants never seemed to be aware that this was not the case, until after the matter had been disposed of by the judge of the Probate Division, when an application was made to him to set aside the writ. He proceeded, as I read his judgment, entirely on the footing that the proceedings in Portugal had been proceedings in rem. For reasons that have been assigned by the Master of the Rolls, and which it is unnecessary for me to repeat, it appears to me that there is no question but that the proceedings before the Tribunal of Commerce in Portugal were entirely personal proceedings—proceedings in personam. No doubt proceedings of a different character were commenced in the Civil Tribunal of Portugal, and those proceedings preceded the judgment of the Tribunal of Commerce. In the first instance in the Civil Tribunal an embargo was obtained by the parties who were plaintiffs both in those proceedings and also in the action before the Tribunal of Commerce, and an order was obtained to arrest the ship, and the ship was only released by giving security, but those proceedings were made the subject of an appeal, and ultimately by the final Court of Appeal the decision of the court of first instance was reversed on the two grounds to which reference has already been made, the one that it was not within the ordinary jurisdiction of the court to grant an embargo unless it were established that the ship was to blame, so far differing from proceedings in the English Court of Admiralty, in which, whilst the matter is in doubt, the ship may be arrested or security given if the ship is allowed to go, but in Portugal it is not the law, while there is a doubt, to do so; and the law of Portugal is so stated in the judgment of the Supreme Court. That was one ground for discharging the embargo. The second I must confess appears to be one more difficult to understand. Whatever might be the effect of that particular reason, which can be only well understood by an examination of the particular article of the code to which reference has been made, one thing is clear, that proceedings may be taken in the Civil Tribunal in Lisbon, by which the arrest of a ship can be obtained, and such a proceeding would be a proceeding in rem according to my view. The attempt to take such proceedings in this case was made but failed, and it was decided that they could not be taken except after proof that the City of Mecca was alone to blame—after which proof it was not done, probably for the best reason, that the ship was no longer within the jurisdiction, and it would therefore be useless to commence such proceedings. I am at a loss to understand on what ground, now that we have got these facts which were not before Sir Robert Phillimore, it could be established otherwise than that the proceeding before the Tribunal of Commerce was in personam and not in rem. One argument I do not desire to pass over, which was addressed to us by Mr. Gainsford Bruce; it was this, that in an action on a foreign judgment, the English Court of Admiralty will proceed in rem wherever the foreign tribunal has established a maritime lien. I do not think it can be denied that the proceedings in this case established a maritime lien, but that is a different thing from saying that they were proceedings in rem. Mr. Bruce was unable to produce any authority, nor do I think any can be found, for the proposition he advanced. It appears to me that this action on a foreign judgment was initiated in rem under a mistake, and that the appeal should be allowed.

Lush, L.J.—The question which we have to decide, apart from all technicality, is whether the arrest of the vessel by process out of the Court of Admiralty was a wrongful arrest; that depends, I think, on whether the proceedings in the Court of Portugal were proceedings in rem. It is part of the law of nations that courts of admiralty in different countries have the power to condemn vessels and order them to be sold for the satisfaction of a maritime lien. Maritime liens are recognised by all civilised nations and damage by collision is classed among them, and had this been a judgment in rem, that is to say a judgment condemning the ship and ordering the ship to be sold in order to satisfy this maritime lien, that judgment would have been recognised in this country and every other civilised country, and it is most important that proceedings under which the sale of another person's vessel takes place should show on the face of them the authority by which that property is to be diverted from the owner, because the title by purchase under proper authority is recognised by all nations, but the title depends on the circumstances under which the sale takes place, and it is therefore important that the judgment should show on the face of it that the proceedings are against the vessel, and not merely against the owners as such, or the captain; that the proceedings have in contemplation the ultimate sale of the ship, and that the judgment orders the ship to be sold, and if this does not appear on the face of the proceedings, then the title of the purchaser has nothing to support it. It is most important, not a mere matter of form but a matter of substance, that the decree under which the sale is attempted to be justified should be shown on the face of the proceeding. Now upon the face of this judgment there is not a word about the ship from beginning to end. It is well known that the owner of a vessel that has suffered by collision with another has two remedies: he may bring an ordinary action against the captain or owner of the other vessel and recover damages; or he may sue in rem in the Court of Admiralty and make the ship pay one or the other. It has been given in evidence before us that the Court of Admiralty has been abolished in Portugal and its jurisdiction to try cases of collision transferred to a Court of Commerce, and that there is no power now in that country to institute what are called actions in rem. That is what I collect from these proceedings. Whether there is or is not such a power seems, however, to be immaterial. There certainly is a proceeding by which a vessel can be laid under an embargo, that is arrested, if an action is brought against the captain, in order to secure payment of damages, but whether that can be carried out by proceedings in rem I do not know nor does it strike me to be material. But what is material in considering an action of this nature claiming damages alone is, that there is nothing about the ship from the beginning to the end. According to the practice in continental courts the article of the code upon which the court founds its judgment is set out in the judgment itself, and the article which is the most prominent one and on which the judgment of the Tribunal of Commerce is based, says (Art. 1567 of the Commercial Code): "In the event of a vessel being run into by another through the fault of the captain or of the men composing his crew, the entire damage occasioned to the collided vessel and her cargo must be borne by the captain of the ship which caused it;" and further on the judgment says, "consequently the disposition of article 1567 of the Commercial Code which ordains that in the event of a collision through the fault of the captain or crew the entire damage must be borne by the captain of the ship causing such damage is entirely applicable to the defendant David Anderson, the captain of the City of Mecca, and that the defendants, the owners of the City of Mecca, are bound collectively according to what is laid down in article 1339 of the said code." The action in Portugal was brought against the captain and owners and also against the consignees, and the Tribunal give some special judgment in reference to the consignees, which I need not read, and they then quote the two articles already referred to in giving judgment against the captain and against the owners of the vessel. Then the judgment proceeds to say: "I adjudge the said action to be well founded and proved, the counter-charges unfounded and not proved, and in conformity therewith I condemn the defendants, David Anderson and George Smith and Sons, jointly and severally to pay to the plaintiffs the amount claimed with interest from the date of disbursement, and I do also condemn them to pay the legal penalty both in respect of the petition in the libel and of the petition in the counter-charges." There is not a word about condemning the ship, nor do I see how they could condemn the ship. The ship had been improperly arrested in the first instance because it was found by the Supreme Court that the plaintiff in the action had not performed the conditions by which alone an embargo could be laid on the vessel; that is to say, it was not proved to the satisfaction of the court at that stage of the proceedings that the fault of the collision was entirely due to the City of Mecca, and thereupon the court discharged the vessel from the arrest, and the vessel went away. I do not see how it was possible for them to carry out and execute a maritime lien when they had not possession of the thing. The vessel was away, in England, I believe. It was an English vessel, and it naturally left the Portuguese coast, and if a purchaser were bound to prove his title, under the decree of that court, in this case he could not quote a single word of this judgment or of any judgment in the world, that would justify a sale of that ship. It is a judgment purporting to be a judgment against the persons of the captain and owners, and if they ever find them within their jurisdiction they may execute, according to the process they have at their command, the judgment against them individually. But as to executing the judgment against the ship, I doubt, if the ship were found there now, that they could do it. But even if they found the ship there, and they could without further process seize the ship and sell it in satisfaction, that would not make this to be a judgment in rem which any court in this country could be called on to execute. For these reasons, therefore, I am of opinion that the action is entirely unjustified in this form, and as not merely has the writ been issued, but also the vessel has been arrested, and therefore the owners of the vessel were deprived of their rights of having full command of that vessel by these proceedings, I think we are well warranted in coming to the unanimous conclusion that the proceedings were wrong, and in not waiting for the further development of the matter by further litigation, but in at once saying that the proceedings ought to be set aside.

Baggallay, L.J. added:—I think I ought to express my entire adoption of the definition of proceedings in rem and in personam as quoted by the Master of the Rolls from the case of The Bold Buccleugh (ubi sup.) But I think there is one additional passage as to maritime liens that should be read, viz.: "This claim or privilege travels with the thing into whosesoever possession it may come. It is inchoate from the moment the claim or privilege attaches, and when carried into effect by legal process by a proceeding in rem relates back to the period when it first attached."

Benjamin, Q.C.—The order of the court will be to set aside the writ and all subsequent proceedings, including the bail bond.

Webster, Q.C.—It will be sufficient if all proceedings subsequent to writ are set aside and the writ amended.

Jessel, M. R.—Does any question arise on the Statute of Limitations?

Webster, Q.C.—The collision occurred on the 1st Jan. 1875, and therefore the question on the statute arises with regard to that, but the judgment not being perfected for a considerable time subsequent to that date no question arises with regard to it.

Jessel, M.R.—The order will be to set aside the writ and all subsequent proceedings; the defendants are entitled to all the costs.

The second motion was then proceeded with, which was an appeal from a similar order of Sir R. Phillimore in an action by other parties against the City of Mecca; but on its appearing that the motion in the Court of Admiralty from which this was an appeal had been made subsequently to the original motion to set aside the writ and was therefore affected by the order of the Court of Appeal of 23rd March 1881 (ubi sup.), and as the writ in that case was in the usual form of a collision action, it was ordered that in that case the writ should stand, all proceedings subsequent to the writ be set aside, and the costs be costs in the cause.

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Marine insurance—Freight—Construction of charter-party—Loss by perils of the sea.

Where a ship is chartered by the Admiralty Commissioners for three months certain, and thenceforward until notice given, the charter-party containing a clause entitling the charterers on the ship becoming incapable to perform efficiently the service contracted for, to put her out of pay, and before the expiration of three months the ship strikes on a rock, and is thereupon put out of pay and discharged from the service and the ship is insured for three months on "freight outstanding," the underwriters knowing of the existence of the charter-party, but not knowing its terms, the loss of freight is not a loss by perils of the sea, and the shipowners are not entitled to recover it under the policy.

Action on a policy of insurance on freight.

On 20th Feb. 1879 a charter-party was entered into between the Commissioners of the Admiralty of the one part and C. T. Ellis (acting on behalf of the plaintiffs, who were the owners of the steamship City of Paris) of the other part.

The following are the material provisions of the charter-party.

It was witnessed that the commissioners had hired and taken to freight the City of Paris.

For service and employment as a transport on monthly hire for the space of three calendar months certain, and thenceforward until the commissioners for executing the office of Lord High Admiral aforesaid, for the time being, shall cause notice to be given to the said second-named party, his executors or administrators, or to the master or other person having charge of the said ship, that she is discharged from Her Majesty's service, such notice to be given when the ship is in port in the United Kingdom. And the said second-named party doth covenant and agree with the said commissioners in manner following; that is to say, that the said ship shall at all times during the continuance of this charter be strong, firm, tight, staunch, and substantial, both above water and beneath, and in every respect seaworthy and properly manned, fitted, stored, furnished, equipped and found at the proper cost and charge of the said owners. . . . . In consideration of which covenants and conditions, it is agreed by the said commissioners for and on behalf of Her Majesty in manner following; that is to say, that the said second-named party shall be allowed for the hire and freight of the said ship at the rate of 25s. per ton per calendar month . . . during such time as the said ship shall be continued in Her Majesty's employ, and shall duly and efficiently perform the service for which she is hereby engaged—that the said second-named party shall, on signing and sealing hereof, be entitled to receive a bill made out and registered according to the usage of the navy for one calendar month's freight upon account and in part payment according to the rate and tonnage aforesaid, provided it be certified by the inspecting officer that the said ship is ready to proceed on Her Majesty's service. And after the said ship shall have been in the service two calendar months from the commencement of the said service, and the said second-named party shall have produced to the said commissioners a certificate in the required form, the said second-named party shall be entitled to receive a further bill for a moiety of one month's freight upon account in manner aforesaid; and after the said ship shall have been in the said service three calendar months, and the said second-named party shall have produced to the said commissioners such certificate as aforesaid, the said second-named party shall be entitled to be paid a further bill for another moiety of one month's freight upon account, and each month after during the ship's continuance in the said service. If such certificate as aforesaid shall have been produced, the said second-named party shall be entitled to receive a further bill for one month's freight on account, and shall be paid the balance of freight on the passing in the office of the requisite accounts and documents after the discharge of the said ship, all which aforesaid payments shall be made in England by bills payable in three days from and after the respective dates thereof by Her Majesty's Paymaster-General. Provided always, and it is hereby agreed and declared, that if at any time or times hereafter it shall be made to appear to the said commissioners that any delay has been caused or has accrued by breach of orders, by neglect of duty, or that the said ship became incapable from any defect, deficiency, breach of orders, or from any cause whatsoever, to perform efficiently the service contracted for, then and in every such case it shall and may be lawful to and for the said commissioners to retain in arrear the pay of the ship for two months. . . . . and to put the said ship out of pay, or to make such abatement by way of mulct out of the hire or freight of the said ship as they shall adjudge fit and reasonable. . . . . Enters into pay the 18th day of February 1879.

On the 22nd Feb. 1879 the plaintiffs effected a policy on "freight outstanding," the insurance to last "at and from and for and during the space of three calendar months, commencing the risk on the 20th Feb. 1879 and ending on the 19th May 1879, both days inclusive."

The defendants underwrote this policy, knowing that the City of Paris had been chartered by the Government, but not being acquainted with the terms of the charter-party.

The City of Paris was employed under the charter-party in the transport of troops to South Africa.

On the 21st March 1879 she struck upon a rock at or near the Cape of Good Hope, and sustained serious injury, in consequence of which she was put out of pay.

On the 17th April 1879 the senior naval officer at the Cape of Good Hope discharged the City of Paris from Her Majesty's service. When so discharged she was at the Cape of Good Hope. She was repaired, and received a certificate of efficiency on the 14th May.

The plaintiffs brought this action against the defendants on the policy of insurance, alleging a loss, caused by perils insured against by the policy, of freight covered by the policy, which the plaintiffs would have earned between the 21st March and 19th May 1879 if the City of Paris had not been put out of pay and discharged as above mentioned.

At the trial the jury were discharged by consent.

Brett, L.J. gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

The defendants appealed.

March 17 and April 4.—The appeal was argued by C. Russell, Q.C., and Cohen, Q.C. (J. G. Barnes with them) for the defendants, and by Gully, Q.C. and French for the plaintiffs.

The arguments used are sufficiently stated in the judgment of the court. The following authorities were referred to:

Cur. adv. vult.

April 13.—Bramwell, L.J. read the judgment of the court. The first question argued in this case turned on the clause in the charter-party that "if at any time it shall be made to appear to the commissioners that the ship became incapable from any defect or cause whatsoever to perform efficiently the service contracted for, then it shall be lawful for the commissioners to retain in arrear the pay of the ship for two months and to put the ship out of pay." The ship having become disabled by perils of the sea, and requiring repairs, the doing of which would last a considerable time, the commissioners, acting under this clause, did put the ship out of pay, and so the plaintiffs said the freight was lost, and lost by perils of the sea. The defendants answered that either the commissioners had no power to do what they did, and if not the freight was not lost; or that they had, and if so the freight was not lost through the perils of the sea, but through the peculiar powers given to the charterers. This argument supposes that the charter-party may be read as though set out in the policy. No doubt it not only may, but must be looked at, and for the purposes of this question at least may be read as though set out in the policy. But what then? The question still arises, Was the loss of the freight a loss by perils of the sea? We are of opinion that it was not. We are of opinion that but for the particular clauses in the charter-party freight would have continued to be earned, notwithstanding perils of the sea. It must be carefully borne in mind that the hiring was not for three months merely, but was for an indefinite time, viz., till notice should be given by the commissioners when the ship should be in a port in the United Kingdom, with a provision that the minimum term of hiring should be three months. Now it is clear, on reason and authority, that but for the clause enabling, if it does enable, the commissioners to put the ship out of pay, she would have continued on it till she returned to the United Kingdom and was discharged, including the time necessary for repairs. That this is so is strengthened by the consideration of the provision in the charter-party "that the ship shall at all times during the continuance of the charter-party be strong, firm, tight, staunch, and in every respect seaworthy." For that involves repairs necessary being done to the ship during the time included in the charter-party. But for the clause in question, therefore, the time in the charter-party would have run during the time of those repairs, and until the ship was discharged in a port in the United Kingdom. The perils of the sea therefore have not caused the loss of freight. They are the causa sine quâ non, but not the causa causans, not the proximate cause of the loss. Suppose there had been a clause that the ship might be put out of pay if she stranded, and she had stranded, and not been injured, but put out of pay. That would have been a loss in one sense by perils of the sea, no less than this, but clearly not covered by the policy. Mr. French, however, took another point. He said, and apparently correctly, that the charter freight accrued de die in diem, but only while the ship "duly and efficiently performed the service," that perils of the sea had prevented such due and efficient performance, and so the freight was lost by such perils. We are of a different opinion. There is no exception of perils of the seas in the charter-party to excuse the shipowner, but the clauses which say when he shall be liable, by implication exclude a liability caused by perils of the sea. Those words "duly and efficiently perform," &c., do not constitute a condition precedent; that is manifest from this, that if they did, then, though the service was rendered, but not duly and efficiently, the plaintiffs would not be entitled to any payment. For example, if through mismanagement or even misfortune, five weeks were consumed in doing what could be done in four, no payment would be due. This cannot be. The remedy in such case is by cross action or putting the ship out of pay, the power to do which makes the construction contended for the less needful and probable. Further, the payment is to be monthly, and the second payment is to be after the ship has been two months in the service from the commencement of the service, and is to be a moiety of one month's freight. This is inconsistent with the contention of Mr. French. It may be asked what is the meaning of the words. The best answer I can give is to say about the same as the meaning in a lease of the words that "the lessee well and truly paying rent and performing covenants may quietly enjoy," &c. We think then that the plaintiffs fail on this ground also, and that the judgment must be reversed. This renders it unnecessary to consider other questions; but we may add, we are quite of opinion that this policy includes such a freight as that in the charter, viz., a time freight.

Judgment reversed.

(Before Kay, J.)

Banner v. Berridge.

Statute of limitations—Mortgage of ship—Sale by first mortgagee—Claim by second mortgagee for an account—Express or constructive trust—Acknowledgement—Interest payable in advance.

In January 1873 L. mortgaged a ship in the statutory form to B. By a contemporaneous agreement it was provided that interest should be payable in advance on the 1*st Jan. and the* 1*st July, and that six months' interest should be paid in lieu of notice if the mortgage was paid off.*

In February L. executed a second mortgage of the ship to K. and Co. In September both L. and K. and Co. went into liquidation. On the 10th Dec. 1873 B. contracted to sell the ship under the power of sale given him by the Merchant Shipping Act (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 71. On the 8th March 1880 the trustee in K. and Co.'s liquidation commenced an action against B. for an account of the sale moneys. B. pleaded the Statute of Limitations.

Held, that on a sale by a mortgagee there is no express trust of the purchase monies received by him in favour of the mortgagor. That there is a constructive trust of the surplus only, and that the court will not after the expiration of the statutory period allow evidence to be gone into to show that there was a surplus for the purpose of raising such trust.

Letters written by B. and his agent were relied upon as containing an acknowledgement sufficient to take the case out of the statute.

Held, that the letters contained an admission by B. that there was an account pending and requiring settlement between the parties, and from this the court would, if necessary, infer a promise to pay the balance which should be found due, but that the letters further contained a promise to pay such balance, and took the case out of the statute.

The first mortgagee claimed the six months interest which under the agreement became payable in advance on the 1st Jan. 1874, two days before he received the purchase money, as interest due or payable in lieu of notice.

Held, that this claim was inequitable and could not be allowed.

ON the 7th Jan. 1873 John Lacy, being the registered owner of all the shares in the steamship Georgian, executed a mortgage thereof in the statutory form provided by the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 71, to secure 18,000*l.*, and the balance of an account current.

On the same day an agreement was executed by Berridge and Lacy, which provided, among other things, as follows:

That the said John Lacy shall pay to the said Richard Berridge interest on the sum from time to time due on this security half-yearly, in advance, on the first days of January and July, at the following rates brought down to the first day July next, at the rate of 12½ per cent. per annum, and after that date at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum.

And that the said John Lacy shall be at liberty at any time, in the event of the loss of the ship or otherwise, to repay to the said Richard Berridge the principle amount then due on the security of the said s.s. Georgian on payment of six months' interest in advance, in addition to the principal and interest due at the date of payment. And the said John Lacy shall also be at liberty to repay to the said Richard Berridge the said principal sum of 18,000*l.*, and amount due to him on account current at any time after the expiration of six months from the date hereof, upon giving six months' notice of their intention so to do, or upon his paying to the said R. Berridge six months' interest in lieu of such notice.

On the 5th Feb. 1873 the said John Lacy executed a second mortgage of the said ship to Messrs. J. and H. Keyworth and Co., to secure the payment of the balance of an account current. This mortgage was duly registered on the 10th Feb. 1873, and notice thereof given to Berridge on the 1st Sept. 1873.

On the 2nd Sept. 1873 both Lacy and Keyworth and Co. presented petitions for liquidation. W. H. Banner was appointed trustee in Keyworth and Co.'s liquidation.

In Nov. 1873 Berridge took possession of the ship. On the 10th Dec. 1873 he contracted to sell the ship, and received the deposit. On the 3rd Jan. 1874 he or his agent received the balance of the purchase money, which was more than sufficient to pay what was due upon his mortgage.

A number of letters were written by W. H. Banner to Berridge asking for an account. On the 28th Aug. 1874 Berridge wrote to Banner:

In accordance with the promise given you, I herewith inclose statement of Circassian and Georgian accounts, in reference to which I will furnish any explanation required, and all necessary vouchers are at your order for examination. There is a sum of 839*l.* 1*s.* 1*d.* standing to the credit of Mr. Preston and Mr. Banner awaiting final settlement. I have been to Messrs. Hollam and Co.'s offices to-day for their bill, but could not obtain same.

On the same day Berridge wrote again:

Since writing to you to-day I find that there is a further sum in the hands of Mr. Preston of 95*l.* 4*s.* 10*d.*, the balance of the captain's account.

The account sent with the first of these letters contained items charged against Banner of 69*l.* 8*s.* 2*d.*, for interest due to Berridge, in lieu of notice on a former mortgage, by Lacy, of a ship called the Retriever, which had been lost at sea, and of 828*l.* 12*s.* for six month's interest on the money due on the Georgian mortgage on the 1st Jan. 1874, in lieu of notice. The account thus made out showed a balance due from Berridge of 329*l.* 8*s.* 10*d.*, but there was added at the foot of the account a sum of 500*l.* to meet a claim of Messrs. Griffiths, Tate, and Co., on account of the Georgian, and an item of which the amount was left open for Hollams and Co.'s law charges. The sum of 839*l.* 1*s.* 1*d.*, referred to in the letters, represented earnings for freight and had been paid into a joint account pending the settlement of other claims against it.

On the 30th Oct. 1874 Cooper, as agent for Berridge, wrote to W. H. Banner:

I am requested by Mr. Berridge to state that he has been expecting to hear from you in reference to his letter of the 28th Aug., and account accompanying same, and that he would be obliged by your informing him if you are prepared to receive the balance.

After this letter the matter appeared to have been allowed to drop. H. W. Banner died in March 1878, and the plaintiff J. S. H. Banner was appointed trustee in Messrs Keyworth and Co.'s liquidation in his place, but it was not till Nov. 1879 that his solicitors again wrote to Berridge for an account. In consequence of this letter an interview took place between Banner's solicitors and Berridge, at which it was alleged that Berridge promised an account. On the 23rd Dec. 1879 Banner's solicitors again wrote for the account, and also asked for an authority to Preston to concur in the payment out to the plaintiff of the 839*l.* 1*s.* 1*d.* above referred to. On the 30th Dec. 1877 Berridge wrote in answer:

Since my removal here my papers have been in a very confused state, I will endeavour to find those relating to the Georgian, and as soon as I have done so will write you thereon. The whole matter should be disposed of at the same time.

On the 3rd Jan. 1880 Berridge again wrote to the plaintiff's solicitors:

In compliance with your request I inclose a copy of Mr. Preston's account, by which you will see how the sum of 17,739*l.* 0*s.* 4*d.* was arrived at. The vouchers for payment will be at your service for examination at any time. There will be some debit on Circassian account to charge to the Georgian account.

Some further correspondence passed, which was not relied on as containing any acknowledgement of a debt. On the 8th March 1880 J. S. H. Banner commenced this action for an account of the sale and other moneys received by Berridge, and of his mortgage debt, and for payment of the balance due from him to the plaintiff as trustee of Messrs. Keyworth and Co., the second mortgagees.

The defendant Berridge pleaded the Statute of Limitations as a bar to the action. The Merchant Shipping Act (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 71, enacts that > Every registered mortgagee shall have power absolutely to dispose of the ship or share in respect of which he is registered, and to give effectual receipts for the purchase money, but contains no directions as to the disposal of the purchase money, and the statutory form, in which the mortgage to Berridge in this case was executed, contains no power of sale or declaration of trust of the proceeds.

Rigby, Q.C. and Warmington for the plaintiffs. —As to the defence of the statute, a mortgagee selling under a statutory power becomes a fiduciary agent for the mortgager or second mortgagee:

Tanner v. Heard, 29 L. T. Rep. 257; 23 Beav. 555.

The relation between them creates an express trust, and the statute has no application at all. [KAY, J.—The court has been very reluctant to regard a morgagee as a trustee:

Kirkwood v. Thompson. 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 446, 811, 2 H. and M. 392; 2 De J. & S. 613.]

There and in Re Alison (40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 93, 234; L. Rep. 11 Ch. Div. 1) and other similar cases it was attempted to make the mortagee a trustee of the land mortgaged. Locking v. Parker (27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 635; L. Rep. 8 Ch. 30) is a direct authority that the mortgagee is trustee of the proceeds of a sale under his power. The statute is no bar where a man holds chattels as trustee for another, and it is not necessary that the trust should be expressed in writing if the circumstances make it clear that there was a trust:

Wilson v. Tooker, 5 Bro. Par. Ca. 193;
Burdick v. Garrick, 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 502; L. Rep. 5 Ch. 233; Kemp v. Westbrook, 1 Ves. sen. 278.

But if the statute does apply, there is more than sufficient acknowledgement in the letters to take the case out of the statute. Berridge's letters acknowledge that there is an account which requires settlement, and from that the court will imply a promise to pay:

Prance v. Sympson, Kay, 678;
Re River Steamer Company; Mitchell's Claim, 25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 319; L. Rep. 6 Ch. App. 822.

Even if a promise to pay is required, Cooper's letter as Berridge's agent, which is now sufficient (Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 19 & 20 Vict. c. 97, s. 13), amounts to a direct promise to pay the balance. They also referred to

Colledge v. Horn, 3 Bing. 119;
Edmonds v. Goater, 15 Beav. 415;
Quincey v. Sharpe. 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 395; L. Rep. W. N. 1876, p. 34.

No case is made for tacking anything due on the mortgage of the Retriever to that of the Georgian. The defendant is clearly not entitled to the six months' interest he claims in lieu of notice. Such interest could only be payable when the mortgage was put an end to by the act of the mortgagor. Here the defendant has taken possession and himself realised his security.

Northmore Lawrence (Higgins, Q.C. with him) for the defendant.—The clear distinction between an express and a constructive trust has been observed all through the cases as applying to personalty as well as realty. In Beckford v. Wade (17 Ves. jun. 97), where the doctrine was clearly laid down as to real estate, the Master of the Rolls referred with approval to Andrews v. Wrigley (1 Bro. C. C. 124), where the doctrine was applied to leaseholds. In Petre v. Petre (21 L. T. Rep. 136; 1 Drew. 371) Kindersley, V. C. defines an express trust within the meaning of the statute as one declared by some written instrument. In Re Hindmarsh (1 L. T. Rep. N. S. 475; 1 Dr. & Sm. 129), Knox v. Gye (L. Rep. 5 Eng. & Ir. App. 656), and Watson v. Woodman (L. Rep. 20 Eq. 721), the statute was held to apply though they were the clearest possible cases of constructive trust. In Burdick v. Garrick (ubi sup.) there was a power of attorney so worded as to clearly create an express trust. As to the supposed acknowledgement, in all the cases quoted no account was or had been sent. Here we sent in an account showing a balance in our favour. Even if the defendants have a right to strike off the items entered as open, and so show a balance against us, the account can only be an admission that the balance is due and no more. The offer to produce vouchers in our subsequent letter is merely an offer to show how the result was arrived at. There is nowhere any admission of a liability to account. The only authority in favour of my friends contention is the dictum of Mellish, L.J. in Burdick v. Garrick (ubi sup.). In Prance v. Sympson (ubi sup.) the Vice-Chancellor found in the letter relied on an express promise to pay; that is really an authority on my side. And all the authorities show that a mere admission that an account is outstanding is not enough:

Francis v. Hawksley, 33 L. T. Rep. 182; 1 El. & El. 1052;
Routledge v. Ramsay, 2 Ad. & El. 221;
Hart v. Prendergast, 6 L. T. Rep. 173; 14 M. & W. 741; Spong v. Wright, 9 M. & W. 741;
Williams v. Griffiths. 3 Ex. 335.

Interest in advance is expressly stipulated for by the terms of the contract. It was due before we received the purchase money of the ship, and we were entitled to retain it.

Rigby, Q.C. in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 25.—KAY, J.—Two questions arise in this case which are of some interest, and upon which I propose to give my opinion. The action is by the trustee in bankruptcy of the second mortgagee of the ship Georgian, against the first mortgagee and the trustee in bankruptcy of the mortgagor who has disclaimed, the ship, which has been sold, not having produced enough to pay the first and second mortgagees in full. The principal question is whether the action is barred by the Statute of Limitations, or by laches, following, as the Courts of Equity do, the analogy of that statute. The dates are these: [His Lordship stated the dates of the mortgages, sale of the ship, and commencement of action, and proceeded:] Now to this action the Statute of Limitations was pleaded, and the first reply to that plea is, that Berridge was bound by an express trust in respect of these moneys which he had received, and that therefore the statute does not apply. As to express trust, there is none in this case in writing. In the ordinary case of a power of sale in a mortgage the power of sale expresses that the mortgagee, when he receives the purchase money, shall hold it upon trust to defray expenses, then to pay himself what is due upon his mortgage, and lastly, to pay the surplus to the mortgagor. Nothing of that kind was expressed in this case. The power of sale is the statutory power under the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and the only section which has any reference to the matter is the 71st, which is in these words: [His lordship read the section as set out above.] It is plain that there is a mere expression that the registered mortgagee shall have power to sell and give receipts, and there is certainly no express trust there of the purchase moneys. Then I was referred to certain cases, of which I will mention one or two, as being decisions, or something which might help a decision, that a mortgagee selling under that power becomes affected with an express trust of the purchase money. One of them is Tanner v. Heard (29 L. T. Rep. 257; 23 Beav. 555). [His Lordship read the head-note of that case and proceeded:] But I observe in the judgment that the Master of the Rolls very carefully indeed puts this case not at all upon the ground of a mortgage, but on a further and distinct ground. He says: "The plaintiff says the mortgage was paid off, that the defendant was a trustee for him of the surplus, that the ship was sold on behalf of both parties, that a balance has been found against the defendant in taking the accounts; and that consequently the costs (it was only a question of costs) ought to abide the result. I am of opinion that this not a case in which the principles which obtain in a suit between mortgagees are applicable. I think it distinguishable. It is a case of this description. The defendant was first mortgagee of a ship, the plaintiff was the second; the defendant with the sanction and authority of the plaintiff sold it at Amsterdam, and received the proceeds of the sale. Being entitled in the first place to the amount due on his mortgage and the expenses of the sale of the ship, and there being a surplus, he was bound to account to the plaintiff in the character of trustee." If I understand those words, the master of the Rolls most carefully distinguishes the case from the ordinary case of a mortgagee, and holds that there was a trust because the ship was sold by arrangement between two persons who were both of them interested in the subject-matter of the sale; the ship being sold by one, and the proceeds of sale coming into the hands of that one, he became a trustee of the results of those proceeds. Therefore I cannot take that as an authority for saying that a mortgagee selling a ship under the statutory power of sale becomes an express trustee of the surplus. The other case referred to upon this subject was Kemp v. Westbrook (1 Ves. sen. 168). But that I find again is a totally different case, because it was not properly the case of a mortgage at all, but of a pledge of goods, and there seems to have been no power of sale. Therefore I do not derive from that any authority which helps me at all in this case. Then I have to look at what upon general principles constitutes an express trust. Upon that point I am referred to Petre v. Petre (21 L. T. Rep. 136; 1 Drew. 371); there Kindersley, V.C., commenting upon the 25th section of the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, the section referring to express trusts (which I may mention because it would seem now to be extended expressly to personal estate by sect. 25, sub-sect. 2, of the Judicature Act), says: "The 25th section is also confined to express trusts, that is, trusts expressly declared by a deed or will, or some other written instrument." If that were a complete and exhaustive definition of an express trust, it is beyond all question this case would not come within it. He goes on to say: "It does not mean a trust that is to be made out by circumstances; the trustee must be expressly appointed by some written instrument, and the effect is, that a person who is under some instrument an express trustee, or who derives title under such a trustee, is precluded, how long soever he may have been in enjoyment of the property, from setting up the statute. But if a person has been in possession, not being a trustee under some instrument, but still being in under such circumstances that the court on the principles of equity would hold him a trustee, then the 25th section of the statute does not apply, and if the possession of such a constructive trustee has continued for more than twenty years" (of course he is speaking of land) "he may set up the statute against the party who, but for lapse of time, would be the right owner. That is the construction I put upon the 25th section of the statute." I have said I do not think that is an exhaustive definition of an express trust. It would confine express trusts in that section of the Act to trusts which are expressed in writing, but the case to which I am going next to refer shows that the meaning of the expression can hardly be limited to that extent. However, it is very valuable (as everything which fell from Kindersley, V.C. was) as an attempt to draw the line between express and constructive trusts. The other case to which I refer is that of Burdick v. Garrick (22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 502; L. Rep. 5 Ch. 233). There Lord Hatherley says: "It would, indeed, be a strange thing if this court should be obliged to hold that if a person, for instance, were to deposit plate or jewels with his bankers, intending to be absent from home for a great number of years, and those chattels were converted by his bankers to their own use in fraud of the owner, and he were to come back at the end of seven or eight years, he is utterly remediless, either in the shape of an action at law or of a suit in this court, because the dealing with his property has been in the nature of an agency. I apprehend the true rule applicable to these cases is to be found in the case of Foley v. Hill (2 H. of L. Cas. 28), where it is clearly stated by Lord Cottenham, who distinguishes between the confidence reposed in a factor or agent and the confidence reposed in a person who is merely in the position of a banker. A mere banker who takes charge of his customer's money is not in any fiduciary relation to him with respect to the particular coins or notes deposited, because it is the ordinary course of trade to make use of them for his own profit. He does make use of them, and he invests the money deposited with him, and his customer does not require from him the very coins or exchequer bills which he deposited with him. But in the present case we have an agent who is entrusted with these funds not for the purpose of being remitted when received to the principal, but for the purpose of being employed in a particular manner in purchase of land or stock, and which moneys the factor or agent is bound to keep totally distinct and separate from his own money, and in no way whatever to deal with or make use of them. How a person who is entrusted with funds under such circumstances differs from one in any ordinary fiduciary position I am unable to see. That being so, the Statute of Limitations appears to me to have no application to the case." That obviously enlarges the definition which Kindersley, V.C. gave, and points out that a man may be bound by an express trust where moneys, which in no sense belong to him and in which he has no kind of interest, or goods, plate, or jewels, are placed in his hands by the real owner as depositee of them, and that without any writing or even expression in words that it was to be in trust. That would come, according to Lord Hatherley's dictum here, within the definition of express trust, and that seems extremely reasonable, and therefore one must consider that the express trust is somewhat larger than what Kindersley, V.C. defines it to be, in the case which I have been referred to. Now in this case of Burdick v. Garrick there could be no kind of doubt about there being an express trust, because the alleged trustee there was a person to whom a power of attorney had been given to collect moneys belonging to the donor of such power, and with them, amongst other things, to purchase land, and procure it to be conveyed to the donor of the power of attorney, and to invest the residue of such moneys in certain securities, either in the name of such donor, or in the name or names of other persons in trust for him. Therefore, in that particular case there was as plain an expression of trust as could well be; but still the remarks I have read from Lord Hatherley's judgment go much further, and show that there may be an express trust without any actual expression in words where property and money, wholly and solely belonging to the person who deposits, is deposited with another person for the benefit of the depositor. Then, that being the nature of an express trust, the question I have to consider is, whether these facts which I have mentioned bring this case within that doctrine. In the first place, we cannot help remarking that this not an entirely analogous case, because the moneys which would come to the hands of the mortgagee, upon the exercise of the power of sale, were not moneys in which he had no interest. They were moneys in which he had a very large interest, moneys which, if the security should happen to be deficient, would wholly belong to him. This consideration led me to suggest, during the argument, a reference to a case which shows how very reluctant the court is to hold a mortgagee to be a trustee to all intents and purposes. The case referred to was Kirkwood v. Thompson, before Lord Hatherley, who there adopted and approved the language of Wigram, V.C., in Dobson v. Land (8 Hare, 216), in which case the Vice-Chancellor refused to hold that a mortgagee in possession, who had insured the property in the absence of covenant, was a trustee of the policies for the mortgagor. Now in this case of Kirkwood v. Thompson Lord Hatherley had to consider a state of things where a mortgage was entirely in the form of a trust for sale, and a second mortgagee had bought the mortgaged property under that trust for sale, and Lord Hatherley says: "The defendants, no doubt, were trustees for sale, but until they do sell they cannot on that account be put in a worse position. I see no difference between the case of an ordinary mortgage and that of a trust for sale. It is not such a trust as would enable the mortgagor to file a bill to have the property sold, because the discretion as to selling or not is in the mortgagee alone. On the other hand the mortgagee cannot file a bill to foreclose, but is limited to his remedy by sale, and that distinctly makes no difference in his position, which is that of mortgagee." Now, that certainly was a very strong decision, because there was, so far as words can go, the most explicit and express trust that can possibly be imagined; but, nevertheless, though the trust was so very explicit and express upon the face of the deed, Lord Hatherley held that the true relation of the parties was that of mortgagor and mortgagee, and he would disregard the very words and hold that a mortgagee was not to all intents and purposes a trustee notwithstanding such express words. That case came before the present Court of Appeal in Locking v. Parker (27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 635; L. Rep. 8 Ch. 30), where the facts as stated in the marginal note were these: [His Lordship read the head-note of that case and continued:] There had been there possession taken more than twenty-one years before the filing of the bill, and nothing in the way of acknowledgment within the meaning of the Act, but there had been certain sales under that trust for sale, and the mortgagee had received the money. "It is said," says James L.J., "however, that there is an express trust in the deed with reference to the sale moneys. The Solicitor-General in his argument admitted that there might be an express trust with reference to the sale moneys in exactly the same way as when a mortgagee sells under the powers of a common mortgage. In that case, when the estate has been sold, there is an express trust of the surplus money for the mortgagor, and if there had been any allegation in this bill, or any evidence that there were any surplus moneys, the bill might have been sustained for those surplus moneys. But this is not the frame and intention of the bill. The bill prays the execution of the trusts of the indenture, and is in substance a bill for the redemption of the estate which, under the circumstances, cannot, according to the view we have taken, be sustained." In the earlier part of his judgment he quotes the words I have read from Kirkwood v. Thompson, and continues: "If I may be permitted to say so, I entirely concur not only in those words, but in the spirit of those words, that it is not for a court of equity to be making distinctions between forms instead of attending to the real substance and essence of the transaction. Whatever form the matter took, I am of opinion that this was solely a mortgage transaction between the mortgagor and Lysimachus Parker," who was the person entitled to the mortgage money. I have, therefore, a series of decisions—there are other cases to the same effect, but none, so far as I am aware, in the least degree contradictory—showing that, even where the words of the mortgage express a trust in the most clear and explicit manner, the court is very loth to hold the mortgage to be a trust to all intents and purposes. As I read this last case, where, under an ordinary power of sale, there is an express trust of the moneys to be received by the mortgagee, that is not a trust which the mortgagor can enforce at all, except as to the surplus. Where a trust is so expressed, he may say, The mortgagee is a trustee for me of the surplus. But I am dealing with a case where there was no such trust expressed at all, and I have to say whether there is a relation between mortgagor and mortgagee, which is to such an extent fiduciary that, in the absence of any such words, I am to hold there was an express trust binding the mortgagee, in case he sells, in favour of the mortgagor or second mortgagee, which is the same thing. Of course I must look at the consequences. If at any time—at least within twenty years, at any time, that is, until, according to the ordinary rules of equity, a presumption of payment would arise—the mortgagor or second mortgagee might commence an action against the first mortgagee, alleging that he had sold and that there was a surplus, and require him to account, and that, although there had been no acknowledgment of the existence of any surplus, or of the mortgagor's right to sue in any shape or way within those twenty years after the sale, that is a very serious position in which to put the mortgagee, and, in the absence of distinct authority, I should be very reluctant to hold that to be the case. But I hold the true result of these decisions to be this, that, in this particular case, where there is no trust expressed, either in writing or verbally, of the proceeds of the sale, no trust can possibly arise until it is shown there is a surplus. Then I am disposed to hold that there is sufficient fiduciary relation between the mortgagor and mortgagee to make the mortgagee constructively a trustee of the surplus. But that seems to me to be a case not of express trust at all, but of constructive trust; that is to say, a trust which only arises upon proof of the fact that there was a surplus in the hands of the mortgagee after paying himself. And if that be so, the ordinary rules of a court of equity would apply, that nobody would be allowed to enter into evidence to raise the question of constructive trust after the statutory period had expired. In this case, that is to say, after six years had expired, without acknowledgment of the mortgagor's title or of there being any surplus, from the time when the money had been received by the mortgagee, a court of equity would not allow parties to enter into evidence for the purpose of showing that there was a surplus in order to raise the case of constructive trust; so that the case of constructive trust does not help the present plaintiff. Accordingly, I hold that the reply on the ground of express trust fails, that the true relation of the parties would be that, if there were a surplus, the mortgagee might constructively be held to be a trustee of that surplus, but that it would be impossible, after the lapse of six years from the receipt of that money without acknowledgment, to allow the plaintiff to enter into evidence for the purpose of making out that constructive trust; and accordingly the statute is a bar, or rather the court of equity, acting upon the analogy of the statute, would prevent this case of constructive trust being raised. The other reply was this, that there had been sufficient acknowledgment since the receipt of the money to enable the plaintiff to avoid the bar of the statute. As to the law upon that subject several cases were referred to, one of which is Prance v. Sympson (Kay, 678). In that case the plaintiff, being solicitor and promoter of a railway company, appointed the firm of A'Beckett and Sympson, in which he and the defendant were both partners, solicitors to the company, upon the terms of dividing the profits. Afterwards he wrote to the defendant for an account. The question was whether the defendant's answer amounted to an acknowledgment, and Lord Hatherley says: "The answer to that letter is, 'I have had a long talk with my partner about this matter; he says and insists that there is a large balance owing to him, but I have put the matter right with him, and you and I must go into it and settle the account.' It may be said that there is some ambiguity in this, but the following words entirely remove it, and I should have thought, even without them, that settling the account meant paying any balance that might be due; the letter however continues, 'It is necessary we should sit down to this matter, and put it on the square.' What can that mean but an engagement that any balance that might be due should be paid? . . I am of opinion that these letters contain a sufficient acknowledgment of the existence of an unsettled account, and a sufficient promise to settle it in the sense of payment to take this case out of the statute." Now that case I take to be a decision, that in the letter there was not merely the admission of an unsettled account—a pending account which ought to be settled—but also an engagement to pay what might be found due on settling that account. However, a different view seems to have been taken of it by one of the most learned judges we ever had, every word of whose judgment is always deserving of the greatest possible attention. In the case of the River Steam Company, Mitchell's claim (25 L. T. Rep. N.S. 319; L. Rep. 6 Ch. 822), Mellish, L.J. refers to Lord Hatherley's judgment in Prance v. Sympson, and says: "There the Vice-Chancellor, as it appears to me, acted strictly in accordance with the rule." Those words are very important, because in what follows I venture to express, with great diffidence, a doubt whether he has quite accurately given the effect of Prance v. Sympson. But whether he has or not, he says that his version is strictly in accordance with the rule. He goes on: "That was a case of taking an account which could only be taken in a court of equity, and there was a letter admitting that the account must be taken, and that there was a right to have it taken. From that the Vice-Chancellor inferred that there was a promise to pay what might be found due on the taking of that account, just as here we might infer from the promise to refer to arbitration a promise to pay what the arbitrators might have found due if the arbitration had taken place. With that all the other authorities are perfectly consistent." Now I ventured to say that I doubted whether that is a precisely accurate description of Prance v. Sympson, because it seems to me, if I understand the language of the Vice-Chancellor, that he there found, not merely an admission that there was a pending account which must be settled, but also words besides which amounted to a promise to pay. But, be that as it may, this case of the River Steamer Company (ubi sup.) shows in the plainest possible manner that it was Mellish, L.J.'s opinion that if there was an admission that an account must be taken, and that there was a right to have it taken, it would be consistent with all principles, and with the previously decided cases, that you must infer from that a promise to pay. And if I may venture to express my own opinion, that seems quite reasonable. I suppose there is no doubt about the law that, if there be an unqualified admission of a debt, that acknowledgment implies a promise to pay. And surely it seems quite as reasonable where there is an unqualified admission that there is a pending account between two parties—pending that is in the sense that it is not a settled account binding upon them, but an account which either party is at liberty to examine—to say that that is an admission from which you may infer a promise that when the account is settled the balance shall be paid. Now, with that preface, I come to the letters which are in question in this case, and I have to see whether they bring this case within the rule. [His Lordship read the letter of the 28th Aug. 1874.] Now in this letter was inclosed an account which has been put in evidence, and which brings out a balance of 329*l.* 8*s.* 10*d.* due from Berridge to the second mortgagee as representing the mortgagor subject only to a claim entered on the other side, "Griffiths, Tate, and Co's claim, paid on account of Georgian, 6th May 1873, 500*l.*" and Hollams' and Co.'s law charges, which are left in blank. So that, on the face of the account sent, there is an admission that upon that account, unless those two claims swept away the balance, there was a balance due to the plaintiff, the second mortgagee. Besides that there is a clear admission that it was a pending account unsettled, because he says, in reference to this account, "I will furnish any explanation required, and all necessary vouchers are at your order for examination." Moreover, there is a reference to "a sum of 839*l.* 1*s.* 1*d.* standing to the credit of Preston and Banner, awaiting final settlement." Therefore, I have no hesitation whatever in holding that this letter and the account sent in it are a most clear admission of a pending account, and more, that they amount to an admission that there will in any event, unless Hollams and Co.'s law charges should be very large, be a balance due to the second mortgagee, because to the 329*l.* has to be added the 839*l.*, which would more than cover the 500*l.* of Griffiths' claim. That letter was written within six years before the commencement of this action, and if the matter stood there I should have no hesitation in holding that it is a sufficient acknowledgment to take the case out of the statute. But the matter does not rest there, because on the same day Berridge writes again to the same persons. [His Lordship read the second letter of the 28th Aug. 1874, set out above.] That would swell the amount due to the second mortgagee. And then comes a letter of the 17th Oct. 1874, from Cooper, who was Berridge's agent, and whose letter since the Mercantile Law Amendment Act (19 & 20 Vict. c. 97), s. 13, may be a sufficient acknowledgment. [His Lordship read the letter set out above.] If there was the smallest doubt as to the meaning of the former letters, that puts it beyond question that now Mr. Berridge was prepared shortly after the letters of the 28th Aug. to pay over the balance. I suppose the claims of Griffiths and Co. and Hollams' law charges had been settled some other way or were abandoned. There are certain other letters which are material. The correspondence seems to have gone to sleep till the 24th Nov. 1879, when the matter was wakened up again by a letter from Messrs. Martin, the plaintiff's solicitors. [His Lordship read the other letters set out above, concluding with Berridge's letter of the 30th Dec. 1879, ending with the words, "The whole matter should be disposed of at the same time."] Now, what does that mean? It can only have one meaning, viz., There is a pending account between you and me. Probably there will be something due to you; perhaps not. The account has to be settled, and the whole matter has to be disposed of at one time; and when you ask me to concur in handing over money to you, I defer doing that until the account is finally settled, and when it is so settled there is to be a proper payment. Then the correspondence continues, and there is only one other letter I care to notice. [His Lordship read Berridge's letter of the 3rd Jan. 1880.] Every line of that letter, the offer to produce vouchers, and the statement that there would be another item to be entered in the shipping account, shows that Berridge treated the account as being a perfectly open and unsettled account. I cannot in the least doubt that the result of this correspondence (and I am entitled to take it altogether if it be necessary) is a clear admission not only that there was a pending account which must be settled in the sense of having the account properly taken and vouched, but also a clear promise which is, I think, sufficiently expressed, that whatever is found due upon the taking of that account will be paid by Berridge. Therefore I do not think it necessary to call in aid the words of Lord Justice Mellish's judgment in The River Steamer Company's case (ubi sup.), and I have not the least hesitation, looking at this correspondence, in holding that the Statute of Limitations is avoided in this case by there having been sufficient acknowledgment within the six years; and accordingly I shall direct an account to be taken of the Georgian mortgage in the usual form against a mortgage in possession, which possession was taken on the 10th Dec. 1874. There are two other questions which I have to dispose of. I am asked to decide whether two items entered in this account are properly chargeable against the second mortgagee. The first of these is for interest in lieu of notice due upon the Retriever. Now, the Retriever was posted as missing at Christmas 1871, and the insurance upon her was paid to Berridge. Therefore, more than a year before the sale of the Georgian, the Retriever disappeared altogether. The subject of the mortgage was gone, the moneys which represented it had been received by Berridge, and the only mode by which any moneys due in respect of the Retriever would be brought into the Georgian account would be on the principle of consolidation. No argument was addressed to me of that sort, and I suppose the case of Re Raggett, Ex parte Williams (44 L. T. Rep. N. S. 4; L. Rep. 16 Ch. Div. 116), would be conclusive against it. The short point there decided was that, after one mortgage property had ceased to exist, there could be no consolidation of the mortgage debt. That would apply to this case, and prevent anything on account of the Retriever mortgage being brought into this account. The other point is this. The account claims six months' interest on the balance due on the Georgian mortgage from the 1st Jan. 1874, in lieu of notice. The contemporaneous agreement executed the same day as the mortgage provided that interest should be paid upon the sum due upon this security half-yearly, in advance, on the 1st Jan. and on the 1st July. Therefore, on the 1st Jan. 1874, half a year's interest would be payable in advance under that agreement. But before the 1st Jan. 1874, viz., on the 10th Dec. 1873, Berridge had contracted to sell the Georgian, and had received the deposit. The purchase was to be completed within thirty days, which would extend over the 1st Jan. 1874. The balance of the money was not actually received until the 3rd Jan. 1874. Now, the question is whether I can allow a mortgagee, who has voluntarily sold the mortgaged property before the day upon which the interest becomes payable in advance, but has not received the money, to claim the interest payable in advance when he receives the balance of the purchase money, more than enough to pay him, two days after the day fixed for payment of the interest in advance. I conceive that—this not being a case in which the mortgagor was paying off the mortgage, or in which he had requested anything to be done at all in the matter, but a case in which the mortgagee was acting of his own mere motion in realising the subject of the mortgage—it would be in the last degree inequitable to allow him to have six months' interest for a period during the whole of which, except two days, he would have the mortgage money in his own pocket. Therefore, upon the ground that it is an inequitable claim, and one of those inequitable claims which the court always watches very jealously in a case between mortgagor and mortgagee, I disallow that six months' interest, and allow Berridge interest down to the 3rd Jan. 1874 upon the moneys from time to time due on the mortgage.

THE LOVE BIRD.

Collision—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at sea, Art. 12.—Mechanical foghorn—36 & 37 Vict. 85, s. 17—"Necessary departure"—"Possible" contribution to collision—Both to blame.

The neglect of a steamship to stop and reverse in a fog on hearing a mouth foghorn ahead of her will render her to blame for a collision with the sailing ship sounding the foghorn; but the sailing ship is also to blame if she does not use the mechanical foghorn provided for by the sailing rules, art. 12 (Sept. 1880), as such a foghorn might possibly have given the steamship earlier warning, and the neglect to use it cannot be excused unless circumstances rendered a departure from the rule necessary: (Merchant Shipping Act 1873, 36 & 37 Vict. c. 85, s. 17.)

The neglect to use a mechanical foghorn is not excused by the fact that the sailing ship left port before the regulations came into force, if the master at the time of sailing knew that the rules would come into force during the voyage.

THIS was an action brought by Wilhelm August Sarnow and others, the owners of the barque Pansewitz, of 333 tons register, against the owners of the Love Bird, a screw steamship of 438 tons register, for the recovery of damages caused by a collision which took place between the two vessels about 5.30 a.m. on the 4th Sept. 1880, in the North Sea, about one hundred miles to the south-west of the Skager Rock. There was a thick fog at the time, and the Pansewitz stated in her preliminary act that "the foghorn was duly sounded according to the regulations for a vessel with the wind abaft her beam, and on the whistle of the Love Bird being heard the horn was again sounded with three blasts in succession, and the Pansewitz was kept on her course, and when the Love Bird was made out she was loudly hailed;" while the Love Bird in the same document admitted that "on hearing the Pansewitz's trumpet the second time her engines were stopped and put full speed astern, and directly the vessel was sighted the helm was kept to starboard." The Pansewitz charged the Love Bird with going at an immoderate speed and neglecting to keep a good look-out, and stop and reverse, and keep out of the way of the Pansewitz, while the Love Bird pleaded, among other contentions which were not established, that the Pansewitz neglected to comply with article 12 of the Sailing Rules, and that as far as the Love Bird was concerned the collision was the result of inevitable accident. Article 12 of the rules, which came into operation on the 1st Sept. 1880, is as follows:

> A steamship shall be provided with a steam whistle or other efficient steam sound signal, so placed that the sound may not be intercepted by any obstruction, and with an efficient foghorn, to be sounded by a bellows or other mechanical means, and also with an efficient bell. A sailing ship shall be provided with a similar foghorn and bell.

The Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85). s. 17, is:

> If in case of collision it is proved to the court that any of the regulations for preventing at sea has been infringed, the ship by which such regulation has been infringed shall be deemed to be in fault, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that the circumstances of the case made departure from the rule necessary.

It appears that the Pansewitz was at Dieppe until nearly the end of August, and that she had a copy of the new sailing rules on board at that time. There was no evidence that a mechanical foghorn could not be obtained at Dieppe.

The further material facts of the case appear in the judgment.

The following cases were also cited:

The Hibernia;
The Fanny M. Carvill;
The Khedive

Butt, Q.C. (with him Myburgh) for the plaintiffs.—The Love Bird was alone to blame for this collision. In her preliminary act she admits it was not until she heard the Pansewitz's trumpet the second time that she stopped. The evidence shows that she heard it quite clearly the first time and she then knew, and must be taken to have known, that there was a sailing vessel ahead, and that there was a risk of collision, and yet she continued to go ahead, without even slackening her speed. If the Love Bird had stopped when first she heard the trumpet, there would have been no collision. She did not, and the sole cause of the collision was her persisting in going on in spite of her knowledge of the position of the Pansewitz. Had it been clear weather, and had the Love Bird known the position of the Pansewitz by actually seeing her, and nevertheless run her down, the Pansewitz would not have been to blame for not having a foghorn. In other words, in a case where sufficient warning was given and disregarded, it cannot be said that the absence of greater, that is, more than sufficient warning, could have possibly contributed to the collision. Besides this rule came into operation after the vessel started on her voyage, and at the time she so started. She was not bound to have, and had not such a foghorn on board. Surely this is a case in which the exception contained in the 17th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85) applies, and the court should be satisfied that circumstances rendered a departure from the rule necessary. It was not only necessary to depart from the rule, but impossible to do otherwise.

Clarkson, Q.C. and Dr. Phillimore for the defendants.—It is absurd to say that the absence of the mechanical foghorn could not possibly have contributed to the collision. When we heard the trumpet of the Pansewitz, we were so near that it was impossible for us to avoid her. The first time the trumpet of the Pansewitz was heard it was heard only faintly, and we concluded, and were justified in so doing, that she was at a considerable distance, and that there was no risk of collision. Had the Pansewitz been furnished with a mechanical horn, as she ought to have been, she would have conveyed the sound we first heard from a considerable distance—a distance at which there would have been no risk of collision, and from the distance at which she actually was would have conveyed a much greater volume of sound. We were justified in considering that there was no risk of collision when we first heard the trumpet, and when we heard it the second time we did all that was possible, but it was too late to avoid the collision. The collision was on the side of the Love Bird inevitable accident. It is no defence for the Pansewitz to say that she had not one on board when she sailed. She knew, or ought to have known, the rules were coming into operation, and ought to have provided herself with one beforehand. Besides, she could probably have got one at Dieppe.

Butt, Q.C. in reply.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—In this case I have consulted with the Elder Brethren, and we have no doubt whatever that the steamer is to blame for this collision. There was a thick fog from the land, and she heard the foghorn faintly or loudly according to the evidence, three blasts, nearly ahead, and she proceeded on her course, neither stopping or reversing her engines, which it was clearly her duty under the circumstances to have done. She is therefore to blame for this collision. But it remains to consider whether the sailing vessel is not also to blame. Now the rules on this subject came into operation on the 1st Sept. last, and the important rule, the 12th, is to this effect: "A steamship shall be provided with a steam-whistle or other efficient steam sound signal, . . . and with an efficient foghorn to be sounded by a bellows or other mechanical means, and a sailing ship shall be provided with a similar foghorn and bell." There is no dispute that the sailing vessel in this case was not provided with such a foghorn as is provided by this rule. Her case is, that she was at Dieppe on the 28th Aug. when the rules had not yet come into operation. But she was perfectly aware that they would come into operation after she left Dieppe, and her evidence is that she had a copy of the rules on board on the last day of the month at Dieppe. Her excuse, however, is that there was not a foghorn on board at the time she sailed. There is no evidence that there was not one to be got at Dieppe, and the judgment of the court would not excuse a vessel, knowing, as she did, that the rules would come into operation on the day they did, for not having an efficient foghorn on board. I am therefore very sorry to say that though it operates severely upon the sailing vessel, I cannot bring it under the exception in the Act "unless the circumstances of the case made a departure necessary." The Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85), s. 17, enacts' "If in any case of collision it is proved to the court before whom the case is tried that any of the regulations for preventing collisions at sea under the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854 have been infringed, the ship by which such regulations have been infringed shall be deemed to be in fault unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that the circumstances of the case made a departure from the regulations necessary." There are several judicial decisions which have been applied to this 17th section, and they have decided that, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, if by any possibility a non-compliance could have contributed to the collision, the party neglecting the rule is to blame. I am sorry to say that this section of the statute applies to the case before me. I cannot see, nor can the Elder Brethren of Trinity House see, that by no possibility could the presence of a foghorn have prevented the collision, for it might possibly have given more warning to the other vessel. Therefore I am bound to say that the steamer is to blame, and that the other vessel is equally in fault. There will be no costs on either side.

PREHN v. BAILEY AND OTHERS.

Raising wreck in the Thames—Salvage—General average—Contribution by cargo owner—Thames Conservancy Acts.

Where a ship carrying cargo is sunk in the Thames by collision occurring through her own negligence and limits her liability under the Merchant Shipping Acts, and her owner, upon ship and cargo being raised by the Thames Conservancy under their special Acts, pays the cost of raising to the Conservancy, and hands over the cargo to the owner thereof upon an undertaking by the latter to pay all general average and other charges legally falling on the cargo, the shipowner cannot recover any contribution from the cargo owner in respect of raising the cargo.

The raising of ship and cargo under the Wrecks Removal Act 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 16) is not a salvage service giving a claim to general average, and, even if it were, the negligence of the shipowner would preclude him from recovery, as he would thereby profit by his own wrong.

THIS was an action brought by William Prehn, the owner of the steamship Ettrick, of the port of London, against William Bailey and all other the owners of the steamship or vessel St. Petersburg, her tackle, apparel, furniture, cargo and freight, and against the master and crew of the St. Petersburg, and also against Robert Somenthal and Company, and Ferdinand Duboc, the owners of the cargo on board the Ettrick for the limitation of the liability of the Ettrick in respect of the losses and damages arising out of a collision which occurred between the Ettrick and the St. Petersburg on the 5th March 1880 off Gravesend in the river Thames in consequence of which the St. Petersburg was damaged, and the Ettrick so much damaged that she sank with her cargo.

The plaintiff admitted that the collision was occasioned by the bad navigation of the Ettrick, but pleaded that no loss of life or personal injury was caused by the collision, and that the collision occurred without his actual fault and privity, and also paid into court 1972*l.* 6*s.* 6*d.*, being 8*l.* per ton of the registered tonnage of the Ettrick, with interest from the date of the collision; and claimed that the liability of the Ettrick should be limited to that amount, that all actions against her in respect of the said collision should be stayed, and that directions should be given for ascertaining the several persons entitled to claim against the said sum.

Judgment was given by Sir R. Phillimore, 20th July 1880, in the terms claimed by the plaintiff; and thereupon the plaintiff and defendant, pursuant to Order XXXIV. of the Judicature Act 1875, concurred in stating the following special case:

1. This is an action, commenced on the 25th May 1880, by the owner of the steamship Ettrick, to limit his liability in respect of the losses and damages arising out of a collision between the steamships Ettrick and St. Petersburg, on the 5th March 1880, in consequence of which collision the Ettrick sank, with all her cargo, in Gravesend Reach, in the river Thames.

2. The plaintiff is the owner of the Ettrick, and Ernest Emil Wendt, D.C.L., is, for the purposes of this special case, to be considered the owner of 293 bales of wool, forming part of the cargo on board the Ettrick at the time of the collision, and a defendant in this action.

3. In the present action, the plaintiff admitted that the collision was occasioned by the bad navigation of the Ettrick, and claimed (inter alia) a declaration that he and the Ettrick were not responsible in damages in respect of the loss, or damage by reason of the collision to an amount exceeding 8*l.* per ton of the registered tonnage of the Ettrick. A copy of the pleadings herein is marked "A.," and is to be considered as forming part of this special case.

4. The usual judgment in limitation actions was made on the 28th July 1880, a copy of which is to be considered as a part of this special case.

5. By this judgment the plaintiff was pronounced entitled to the limited liability, as claimed on payment by him into court of the sum of 1972*l.* 6*s.* 6*d.*, and certain interest; and inquiries were directed to ascertain the persons entitled to claim upon the said sum.

6. The plaintiff has paid into court the said sum as required, and the inquiries directed were proceeded upon in the Registry, and it thereupon appeared, as the fact was that the said Ernest Emil Wendt, D.C.L., was entitled to claim in respect of the 293 bales, and he has claimed herein accordingly against the said fund so paid into court.

7. In the month of March 1880 the Thames Conservancy, by virtue of the powers vested in them by statute, raised the said vessel Ettrick, at the place where she had sunk, and the principal part of the cargo, including the said bales of wool was raised in her, and upon an undertaking being given on behalf of the owners of the Ettrick to the Thames Conservancy to pay the costs of raising, the said vessel Ettrick and her cargo were handed in their damaged condition to the plaintiff. The wool was damaged, and liable to further deterioration from its wet condition.

8. The said Ernest Emil Wendt, D.C.L., applied to the plaintiff for immediate delivery of his said bales of wool, but the plaintiff as the owner of the Ettrick, refused to give up the said bales without receiving an undertaking that the said Ernest Emil Wendt, D.C.L., would pay him freight and all general average and other charges that might legally fall on the said bales of wool.

9. The plaintiff accordingly gave up the said bales of wool to the said Ernest Emil Wendt, D.C.L., on an undertaking being entered into by the said Ernest Emil Wendt, D.C.L., in the terms of the following letter:

March 27, 1880.

To the owners of the Ettrick.

Dear Sirs,—In consideration of your giving me delivery order for the bales of wool specified at foot (so far as you are able) for the purpose of immediate sale in London, I hereby undertake to pay you freight on same as though the wool had been delivered at Gravelines. I also undertake to pay all general average or other charges that may legally fall on the wool.

Yours truly, E. E. WENDT.

10. The value of the Ettrick when raised was 1100*l.* The expenses of raising her with her cargo amounted to about 400*l.*

11. The plaintiff has claimed from the said Ernest Emil Wendt, D.C.L., as owner of the said bales of wool, 124*l.* 15*s.* 2*d.*, as the proportion of the expenses of raising the Ettrick with her cargo, which he alleged to be due from him as general average, salvage, or otherwise on the said bales or in respect thereof.

12. The expenses of raising the Ettrick and her cargo were not enhanced by any expenses specially incurred for raising the said defendant's bales of wool.

13. The plaintiff has claimed against the fund in court for the amount of 124*l.* 15*s.* 2*d.*, which he alleges to be due for general average salvage or otherwise from the said Ernest Emil Wendt, D.C.L. or to fall on the said wool as aforesaid, and he also claims in the alternative to be paid the said amount by the said Ernest Emil Wendt, D.C.L. as owner of the said goods irrespective of the said fund in court.

The questions for the opinion of the court are (1) Whether under the circumstances above set forth the plaintiff is entitled to the said sum of 124*l.* 15*s.* 2*d.*, or to any and what sum by way of general average, contribution, salvage, or otherwise; and if so (2) Whether the plaintiff is entitled to prove against the said fund in court as aforesaid in respect of such sum or any part thereof or otherwise in respect of the matters aforesaid; (3) Whether the plaintiff is entitled to be paid the said sum or any and what sum by the said Ernest Emil Wendt, D.C.L. personally.

The court is to have power to order such accounts, average statements, or inquiries (if any) as the court may think right to be taken or made; and if the court shall be of opinion in favour of the plaintiff such decree, judgment, or order shall be made as the court shall think right, either for proof against the said fund in court or payment by the said Ernest Emil Wendt, D.C.L. personally of such sum and costs, if any, as the court shall determine. If the court shall be in favour of the said Ernest Emil Wendt, then the court shall make such decree, judgment, or order, in his favour as to the said court shall seem fit.

Dr. Phillimore for the plaintiffs.—It is true that before the Merchant Shipping Acts a shipowner by whose negligence a cargo entrusted to him for the purpose of being carried had been sunk would have been unable if he had salved the cargo to recover anything either in respect of salvage in the cargo or personally from the owner, otherwise the law would have been allowing him to profit by his own wrong. But the Merchant Shipping Act alters this by direct legislation. The law as it existed was found to bear heavily on shipowners whose servants were guilty of negligence, and the Merchant Shipping Act was therefore passed and provided directly that under such cases a shipowner should be able and limit his liability to 8*l.* per ton of his ship's tonnage and should then not be liable for anything further, in fact should cease to occupy the position of a wrongdoer. If the owner of the Ettrick had offered to pay the ship's proportion of the cost of raising the ship and cargo, and refused to pay anything for the cargo, he would have been entitled to receive his ship; and if Dr. Wendt had refused to pay the cargo share of the costs the Thames Conservancy would have sold the cargo, and taken it, and handed the surplus to Dr. Wendt. In that case Dr. Wendt would not have been able to recover anything more from the owner of the Ettrick beyond his proportion of 8*l.* per ton. He would simply have had his claims against the fund in court. The owner of the Ettrick is not liable for more than the sum limited by statute in respect of his wrongful account. When he has paid that he has done all that is necessary: (Chapman v. The Royal Netherlands Steam Navigation Company, 4 Asp. Mar. L. C. 107; L. Rep. 4 P. D. 157.) Having paid this he found himself with a ship at the bottom of the Gravesend Reach and in that ship was a cargo belonging to another person. He paid a certain sum to the Thames Conservancy partly for raising his own ship, which part he clearly had to pay for himself, and the remainder for Dr. Wendt's cargo, which he as clearly paid as Dr. Wendt's trustee, and which he ought therefore to recover from Dr. Wendt. The matter in fact resolves itself into this, a third person salved the plaintiff's ship with Dr. Wendt's cargo in it and the plaintiff is entitled to a general average contribution from Dr. Wendt to repay the salvage expense.

Myburgh (with him Stubbs) for the defendants.—The question does not turn upon limitation of liability at all. The plaintiff undertook to convey Dr. Wendt's wool to Gravelines instead of which, by the wrongful act of his servant, it was sunk in Gravesend Reach. Under the Thames Conservancy Act (20 & 21 Vict. c. cxlvii.), and the Wrecks Removal Acts 1877, it then became the duty of the plaintiff to raise the ship or allow the Thames Conservancy to raise it for him and repay them. The ship was raised under these Acts, and it made no difference to the cost that Dr. Wendt's wool was in her. If the Thames Conservancy had then sold the Ettrick as they might have done under their statutory powers the ship would have defrayed the cost, and there would have been no charge on Dr. Wendt's cargo. The plaintiff however paid for the raising of the ship and gave up the cargo in order to obtain the freight. The plaintiff undertook to carry the wool to Gravelines, and it was his duty to do all that he could to do so. If he had salved the wool himself he could not so far have profited by his own wrong as to claim salvage. The case is exactly the same now, for the plaintiff has been called upon to pay for the salvage of his ship, and is endeavouring to recover a general average contribution towards it from the cargo, although his own negligence made the salvage of the ship necessary. Cur. adv. vult.

SIR R. PHILLIMORE.—This is a special case which the plaintiff and defendant have concurred in stating pursuant to the Judicature Act 1875, Order XXXIV. The steamship Ettrick came into collision in Gravesend Reach with the steamship St. Petersburg, and the Ettrick sank with all her cargo. The Ettrick admitted that she was alone to blame for this collision and claimed in the usual way to limit her responsibility to 8*l.* per ton of her registered tonnage. This sum was found to amount to 1978*l.* 6*s.* 6*d.* with some interest and was paid into court. Inquiries were made to ascertain the persons entitled to claim upon this sum. It appeared that Dr. Wendt, D.C.L. was entitled to claim in respect of 393 bales of wool part of the cargo, and he has made his claim accordingly.

Shortly after the collision the Thames Conservancy, by virtue of certain statutable powers, raised the Ettrick with the principal part of her cargo, including these bales of wool; and, upon an undertaking given by the owner of the Ettrick, who is the plaintiff in the liability action, to pay the costs of the raising of the vessel, she and her cargo in a damaged condition were given up to the owner of the Ettrick. Dr. Wendt applied to him for the immediate delivery of his bales of wool; and on Dr. Wendt giving an undertaking to pay the freight and all charges that might legally fall on the wool he obtained possession of it. The value of the Ettrick when raised was 1100*l*., the expenses of raising ship and cargo amounting to about 400*l*., and these expenses were not enhanced by any expenses specially incurred for raising Dr. Wendt's bales of wool. The owner of the Ettrick claims from defendant 124*l*. 13*s*. 2*d*. as the latter's proportion of the expenses of raising the ship with her cargo, and he now claims, not against the fund in court, which alternative his counsel has abandoned, but from Dr. Wendt personally, as owner of the wool; and the questions for the opinion of the court now are, first, whether the owner of the Ettrick is entitled to 124*l*. 13*s*. 2*d*., or to any and what sum by way of general average contribution, salvage, or otherwise; and secondly, whether the owner of the Ettrick is entitled to be paid the said sum, or any and what sum, by Dr. Wendt personally.

It was contended first on behalf of the owner of the Ettrick that, although apart from the statutory limitation of his liability, he would have been liable to have paid this 124*l*. 13*s*. 2*d*. having once paid into court his 8*l*. per ton, he is entirely purged of his liability as a wrongdoer, and stands in the position of an innocent party; and that to hold Dr. Wendt not liable for this 124*l*. 13*s*. 2*d*. would be to make the plaintiff liable in respect of loss and damage to ships' goods and merchandise, and other things by reason of the improper navigation of his vessel, the Ettrick, to an amount exceeding the statutory limitation by that sum. In support of this position the case of Chapman v. The Royal Netherlands Steam Navigation Company (ubi sup.) was cited.

It was contended, in the second place, that the owner of the Ettrick, having a right to be treated as an innocent party, was entitled to claim from Dr. Wendt the sum in dispute as a general average contribution to defray the expenses of salvage services rendered by a third person, that is to say by the Thames Conservancy.

On behalf of Dr. Wendt it was contended that the case did not turn upon the effects of the statutory limitation of liability. The owner of the Ettrick contracted to take the wool to Gravelines, instead of which by the fault of his servants it was sent with the ship to the bottom of Gravesend Reach, and it then became the duty of the owner to raise the vessel, the expenses of doing which it is admitted were not enhanced by raising also the bales of wool. This duty was imposed upon the owner either by the Thames Conservancy Act 1857, a private Act (20 & 21 Vict. c. cxlvii.), or by the Removal of Wrecks Act 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 11) or by both. It was contended that if the Conservancy authorities had, as it was competent for them to have done, sold the ship it would have produced ample funds to defray the cost of raising, and there would have been no charge on Dr. Wendt's cargo. I must here observe that the 6th section of the latter Act (40 & 41 Vict. c. 16) prescribes that the proceeds of sale arising from ship and cargo shall be regarded as a common fund. As a matter of fact, however, the ship and cargo having been delivered up by the Thames Conservancy to the plaintiff the 6th section never came into operation. The cargo, it is to be observed, was given up by the plaintiff to Dr. Wendt in order to get the freight, and an undertaking to pay the freight was given.

It was also contended on behalf of Dr. Wendt that if the owner of the Ettrick had himself salved the property he could not have claimed salvage, and that he could not do so now that someone else had salved it. In support of these contentions certain cases were cited. In Schloss v. Heriot (1 Mar. Law C. O. S, 335: 3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 246; 15 C. B. N. S. 59; 32 L. J. 211, C. P.) the plaintiff was a shipowner, and his actionable negligence was holden to be a bar to a claim against a shipper of goods to recover his proportion of an average loss caused by such negligence. In Cargo ex Capella (2 Mar L. C. O. S. 552; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 800; L. Rep. 1 A. D. & E. C. 356) Dr. Lushington says: "The question for me to determine is whether, when a collision has taken place between two vessels, and both vessels are held to blame, one of them can sue for salvage, for having saved the cargo of the other from the perils consequent on the collision. I do not seek for authorities, but I look to the principle which ought to govern the case. In my mind the principle is this, that no man can profit by his own wrong. This is a rule founded in justice and equity, and carried out in various ways by the tribunals of this country, and never, so far as I am aware, departed from by any English court. The application of this rule to the present case is obvious. The asserted salvors were the original wrongdoers; it was by their fault that the property was placed in jeopardy. The rule would bar any claim by them for services rendered to the other ship which was a co-delinquent in the collision, but the present claim it is to be observed is a demand for salvage against the cargo the owners of which were perfectly innocent. I pronounce against the claim." The Norway (2 Mar. L. C. O. S. 168, 254; Brown. & Lush. 377, 404; 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 57; 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 50; 3 Moore P. C. C., N. S. 245) was also cited, but in this case the facts were very complicated, and portions of the judgment of the Admiralty Court were reversed on appeal; and although I see no reason to question the soundness of the principles of law laid down by Dr. Lushington, on page 393 of Browning and Lushington's Reports, with respect to the responsibility of a shipowner for cargo jettisoned in consequence of the negligence of his servant, I do not rely on that case.

It was further strenuously denied that there was really any salvage properly so called, but simply the performance of a duty under one or both of the two statutes before mentioned; and if there was no salvage, there could be no general average, and if no general average, then no lien attached to the wool, and the case of Schuster v. Fletcher (3 Asp. Mar. L. C. 577; 38

L. T. Rep. N. S. 605; 3 Q. B. Div. 418; 47 L. J. 530, Q. B. Div.) was relied on. In that case Cockburn, C.J. said: "Here the shipowner had an interest in getting the ship off and bringing the cargo into port, in order that he might earn his freight, and he cannot be allowed to throw the cost of his proceedings on the shippers. A great deal of what he has done was in performance of his own contract. He was bound to use every effort to convey the cargo safely to its destination, and could only give up the task when it became hopeless." These observations appear to me applicable to the present case. If the contention of the owners of the Ettrick were well founded the result substantially would be that he having broken his contract by damaging the cargo and not bringing it to the port of destination, and having limited his liability for this wrong, would be entitled nevertheless to a pecuniary contribution from the cargo towards defraying the expenses incident to raising the ship in which the cargo was. Thus the cargo owner would suffer a double injury, first, by limitation of the wrongdoer's liability, which debars him from a restitutio in integrum; and, secondly, by compelling him to pay a portion of the cost of repairing the mischief caused by the wrong. At this manifestly inequitable conclusion the court would arrive with great reluctance.

In my judgment, however, there was no salvage service properly so called, but a simple performance of a prescribed duty, and if there were a salvage service the limitation of the owner's liability would not entitle him to demand from Dr. Wendt any contribution to it. Upon the whole and after careful consideration of the argument and the cases relied upon, I am of opinion that the owner of the Ettrick is not entitled to the sum of 124*l.* 15*s.* 2*d.*, or to any sum by way of general average, and that he is not entitled to be paid these or any other sum by Dr. Wendt personally. I pronounce therefore in favour of Dr. Wendt, and I condemn the plaintiff in the costs of this special case.

(Before Sir R. PHILLIMORE and NAUTICAL ASSESSORS.)

THE AID.

Practice—Province of Nautical Assessors—Appeal from County Court.

Where a judge differs from the opinion of the Nautical Assessors, who assist him, he is bound to give judgment in accordance with his own opinion.

The function of the Nautical Assessors is only to advise the judge on questions of nautical science and practice, not to give a verdict on the facts of the case.

THIS was an appeal from the City of London Court, in a cause in which, on the 15th Dec. 1880, the judge of that court had given judgment for the plaintiffs, owners of the cutter yacht Lily.

The plaintiffs' particulars in the action alleged that the collision took place between the steam-tug Aid and the Lily, in Bugsby's Reach in the river Thames, between two and three p.m. on the 31st July 1880.

The Aid was going down the river with two barges in tow, and one of the barges struck the Lily, and brought her in contact with the tug, and, in consequence, the Lily sank. There was a conflict of testimony as to whether the Lily had, or had not, asked for a friendly tow down the river from the Aid.

The learned judge was assisted by Nautical Assessors, whose presence had been required by the defendants.

After hearing the evidence, and C. Hall for the plaintiffs, and Myburgh for the defendants, and consulting with the Nautical Assessors, the learned judge delivered a judgment, of which the material parts are as follows:

THE COMMISSIONER.—In this case I regret to find that the Nautical Assessors and I differ in opinion. It is a case involving more than 50*l.*, and I suppose there must be an appeal. I am in an extreme difficulty, and I would prefer not to give either a formal judgment nor any explanation of the points on which we differ or the causes thereof. One of the Nautical Assessors thinks that the yacht was unmanageable, that it was not properly managed, and that it had no steerage way at all. That conclusion he has arrived at from the facts. I venture to differ from him [then, after dealing with the question of the admissibility of certain evidence tendered in the case, he proceeded:] Dealing with the facts, however, before us, there is no doubt that in point of law it was the duty of the tug to avoid the yacht; but the difficult question we have to decide is, whether there was an inducement—what may be called a good-natured invitation—to the tug to come close to the yacht on its way down the river, so as to afford the little yacht (that which, I suppose, every tug would be willing to do) a more rapid passage down the river by giving her a friendly tow. It is not necessary to impute perjury to either set of witnesses; there may have been forgetfulness on both sides; but it is to me difficult to think that this tug and the two barges should for several hundred yards follow this little yacht, and when overtaking it wilfully run it down, for that is what the plaintiffs' case amounts to. I am disposed to believe that the captain of the tug was willing and intended to give the yacht a friendly tow down, and that what followed was the result of accident. Whether it resulted from the yacht approaching too near the tug, or whether it resulted from a misconception of the speed at which the tug was going, or from a misconception of the time that would be required to attach a rope to the tug, so as to enable it to take the yacht in tow, I do not know. [After discussing the evidence for and against the probability of this view of the case, he proceeded:] I am bound to say that the Nautical Assessors are not satisfied that that proposition—as to the towage—is made out affirmatively, and in that opinion I am not sure that I ought to differ from them. It is indeed the great difficulty under which I labour. The Nautical Assessors are just as well qualified as I am to form an opinion on the evidence as to which set of witnesses are to be believed. Now both the Nautical Assessors look at the matter in perhaps a stricter way than I do, and consider the tug ought to have avoided the collision, and that the justification for not doing so, that they were invited to approach, is not made out to their satisfaction. As I have already said I am in this difficulty. Am I to act on my own judgment, or am I to defer to the opinion of the Nautical Assessors who differ from me? Probably the Nautical Assessors draw the correct conclusion from the nautical facts, and probably the conclusion that I draw, which is the view of the defendants, is drawn more from what may be called human nature than from nautical facts. That being so, I think I ought to defer to the opinion of the Nautical Assessors, and allow the judgment of the court to be entered for the plaintiffs; but at the same time it is due to the defendants to say that though I do not dissent from I do not concur in that judgment. I must order judgment in this case to be entered for the plaintiffs. I think the question is a mixed one of nautical conclusion and fact, and therefore I am bound to give all weight to the opinion of the Nautical Assessors. I am sorry to differ from them, but I unquestionably do so.

On the 22nd Dec. 1870 the court was moved to allow a new trial, and reference was made to the case of The Granton (70 LAW TIMES, p. 63); but on the judge expressing an opinion that the way in which judgment should be entered where the judge differed from the assessors should be decided by the Court of Appeal, the motion was dismissed, costs to be costs in the cause, and the appeal was brought.

March 5.—The appeal came on for hearing.

At the close of the appellants' argument,

Sir R. PHILLIMORE said:—I need not trouble the counsel for the respondents. This is an appeal from the decision of the learned judge of the City of London Court in an action of collision. The collision took place between the yacht Lily and the steam-tug Aid, which was towing two barges. Both vessels were going down the river Thames, and the collision took place off Blackwall. The parts of the vessels that came into contact were the stem of the port barge with the taffrail of the Lily. No lives were lost, but the Lily sank in consequence of the collision.

The first question to be decided is, on which vessel was the duty of getting out of the way cast. Clearly it was the duty of the steam-tug to get out of the way of the yacht. The owners of the steam-tug do not deny this, and, indeed, by their evidence they practically admit it; but their defence is, that those on board the Lily invited the Aid to give the Lily a friendly tow, that in consequence of this invitation in these circumstances the Aid kept on her course, and that the Lily is to blame for having brought about the collision. There is a conflict of evidence in this case. [His Lordship, after reviewing the evidence at length, proceeded:] I put it to the Elder Brethren whether this evidence affords proof of any conduct on the part of the yacht that contributed to the collision, and in their opinion the yacht was in no way to blame. The opinion that the yacht was not to blame was in the judgment of the court below a wrong judgment. The opinion of the learned judge of the court below was that it had been proved that there had been a friendly invitation by those on board the yacht for a tow. In fact, the learned judge of the court below believed the story of the steam-tug, and the Nautical Assessors by whom he was assisted disbelieved it. The learned judge was bound to give a judgment in accordance with his own opinion, but he took an erroneous view of his duty, and ordered judgment to be entered in accordance with what was not his own opinion.

It is clear that in all these cases the responsibility of the decision rests upon the judge. It may have been his duty, according to the circumstances of the case, to give more or less weight to the opinion of the Nautical Assessors. On questions of nautical science he would be guided by their opinion, but not contrary to his own opinion. In cases of what may be called common evidence, it is not his duty to ask the opinion of the assessors at all. He may ask their opinion on questions within their nautical experience, but in this case it appears that the Nautical Assessors were of a different opinion to the opinion formed by the learned judge himself on the whole case. This is the view I take on this part of the case; but I must remember that, apart from all questions as to the duty of the learned judge of the court below, and the manner in which the decision of that court was arrived at, the main question to be decided in this appeal is whether that decision was or was not, in the opinion of this court, wrong either in law or in fact, and in the result, after consultation with the Elder Brethren, I have arrived at the conclusion that the decision was right, though the reasoning was wrong, and therefore I must dismiss the appeal with costs.

APPEAL FROM WRECK COMMISSIONER.

Wreck—Report — Decision—Reasons — Annex to report—Merchant Shipping Act 1854, s. 242—Merchant Shipping Act 1862, s. 23—Merchant Shipping Act, 1876, s. 29—Shipping Casualties Investigation Act, 1879, s. 2; Shipping Casualties Rules 1878, 20, 22, App. Form No. 3—Shipping Casualties (Appeals and Rehearings) Rules 1880, rr. 5, 6—Practice—Evidence of experts.

The decision given by the judge after an investigation into a casualty dealing with the certificate of an officer must be given in open court, but need not be accompanied by reasons, and if he gives reasons the officer is not entitled to a copy of the shorthand writer's notes of those reasons, for the purpose of an appeal. The court when hearing an appeal will look to the report and the annex thereto.

Where the court is assisted by assessors, the evidence of experts as to the propriety of steering a certain course will not be received.

Quœre, whether the court will consider matters of default not referred to in the report or annex.

THIS was an appeal from a decision of the Wreck Commissioner, by which he had, on the 25th May 1881, found the master of the Kestrel in default for the stranding of that vessel, and suspended his certificate for three months.

On the 21st June 1881 the court, Sir J. Hannen and Sir R. Phillimore, were moved by Butt, Q.C. on behalf of the appellant (1) to allow fresh evidence to be given on the hearing of the appeal; (2) for a copy of the shorthand writer's notes of the judgment delivered by the Wreck Commissioner in court; and (3) for an early day to be fixed for the hearing of the appeal.

Verney appeared for the Board of Trade.

The following were the rules, &c., referred to in the argument:

The Shipping Casualties Rules 1878.

R. 20. Except when the certificate of an officer is cancelled or suspended, in which case the decision shall always be given in open court, the judge may deliver the decision of the court either viva voce or in writing; and if in writing it may be sent or delivered to the respective parties, and it shall not be necessary to hold a court merely for the purpose of giving the decision.

R. 22. At the conclusion of the case the judge shall report to the Board of Trade. Form of the report will be found in the Appendix, No. 3.

Appendix.

The following forms shall be used as far as possible, with such alterations as circumstances may require, but no deviation from the prescribed form shall invalidate the proceeding, unless the judge shall be of opinion that the deviation was material.

The Shipping Casualties (Appeals and Rehearings) Rules 1880.

R. 5. Copy of Report where Certificate Affected. Where the certificate of a master, mate, or engineer has been cancelled or suspended, the Board of Trade shall, on application by any party to the proceedings, give him a copy of the report made to the Board.

R. 6. Appeals.—Every appeal under sect. 2 of the Shipping Casualties Investigation Act 1879 shall be subject to the conditions and regulations following, namely:

(g) The evidence taken before the judge from whose decision the appeal is brought shall be proved before the Court of Appeal by a copy of the notes of the judge, or of the shorthand writer, clerk, secretary, or other person authorised by him to take down the evidence, or by such other materials as the Court of Appeal thinks expedient; and a copy of the evidence, and of the report to the Board of Trade, containing the decision from which the appeal is brought, and of the notice of the general grounds of the appeal, shall be left with the officer for the time being appointed for that purpose by the Court of Appeal before the appeal comes on for hearing. For the purpose of this rule, copies of the notes of the evidence and of the report shall be supplied to the appellant on request by the judge or other person having charge thereof, on payment of the usual charge for copying.

(h) The Court of Appeal shall have full power to receive further evidence on questions of fact, such evidence to be either by oral examination in court, by affidavit, or by deposition taken before an examiner or commissioner. Evidence may also be given, with special leave of the Court of Appeal, as to matters which have occurred since the date of the decision from which the appeal is brought.

Butt, Q.C., in support of the motion.—It appears from the Shipping Casualties (Appeals and Rehearings) Rules 1880, No. 6 (h.), that fresh evidence of matters occurring before the original investigation may be given, as a matter of course; but, as there is no established practice as yet, and as it is clear that leave must in certain cases be obtained, we thought it better to apply for direction as to the fresh evidence.

The second part of the motion is, however, more important; the decision in this case most certainly affected the certificate of an officer, and therefore, by Rule 20 of the Shipping Casualties Rules 1878, the decision was obliged to be given in open court; and the appellant is, under the Shipping Casualties (Appeals and Rehearings) Rules 1880, r. 5, entitled to a copy of that decision. I have affidavits from persons present at the investigation which say that the report absolutely made to the Board of Trade varies in important particulars from the decision given in court; and I desire to lay before the court on the appeal the reasons for which the judge below suspended this officer's certificate, as I contend those reasons were erroneous or insufficient. We can only obtain from the Board of Trade the report ultimately made to them concerning this casualty, and cannot get the judgment delivered in court to which we say we are entitled.

Verney, for the Board of Trade, did not oppose the application for leave to bring fresh evidence, saving all just exceptions to the evidence when tendered, and it was agreed that the appeal should be heard on the 27th June. He was not called on as to the second part of the motion.

Sir J. HANNEN.—I am of opinion that although the first ground of the application—namely, leave to adduce further evidence on the appeal—should be granted, the second, for a copy of the shorthand writer's notes of the judgment, should be rejected. The Shipping Casualties Rules 1878 (No. 20) say that, where the certificate of an officer is cancelled or suspended, the decision shall be given in open court; but that does not require that all the reasons for the decision which should be so delivered are subsequently to be embodied in the report; (Shipping Casualties Rules 1878, No. 22, and Appendix, Form. 3.) The judge may of course explain at the time the reasons for his decision, but he is under no obligation to do so. If the judge gave some reasons when delivering his judgment which he afterwards came to the conclusion were not sound, but was able to support the judgment by reasons which were perfectly sound, then when an appeal is brought the Court of Appeal would have to determine on the evidence brought before it under the provisions of the Shipping Casualties (Appeals and Rehearings) Rules 1880, r. 6 (g), with such assistance as it could get from the report to the Board of Trade, that is, not from the bad reasons which the judge had abandoned, but from the good ones which he had retained.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I am of the same opinion, and have no doubt whatever on the subject.

June 27.—The appeal came on for hearing. The following is a copy of the report to the Board of Trade containing the decision appealed from:

KESTREL (S.S.)

The Merchant Shipping Acts 1854 to 1876.

IN the matter of the formal Investigation held at Westminster on the 25th May 1881, before H. C. Rothery, Esq., Wreck Commissioner, assisted by Capt. Hight and Capt. Methven, as assessors, into the circumstances attending the stranding of the steamship Kestrel, of London, on Burhou Island, west of Alderney, on the 15th April 1881.

Report of Court.

The court, having carefully inquired into the circumstances of the above-mentioned shipping casualty, finds, for the reasons annexed, that the stranding of the said ship was due to the negligent navigation thereof by Robert Cox, the master, in having set and steered a course from the Royal Sovereign lightship so as to pass too near to the Caskets, instead of keeping her well out in mid-channel; and, having thus been brought within the range of the indraught of the race of Alderney, she was set by the current to the southward on to Burhou Island.

For these wrongful acts and defaults the court suspends the certificate of the said Robert Cox for three months from this day.

The court is not asked to make an order as to costs.

Dated this 25th day of May 1881.

Annex to the Report.

This case was heard at Westminster on the 25th May 1881, when Mr. Verney appeared for the Board of Trade, Mr. Batham for the owners, and Mr. Nelson for the master of the Kestrel. Six witnesses having been produced by the Board of Trade and examined, Mr. Verney handed in a statement of the questions upon which the Board of Trade desired the opinion of the court. Mr. Nelson having produced a witness, was then heard on behalf of the master; and Mr. Verney having replied for the Board of Trade, the court proceeded to give judgment on the questions on which its opinion had been asked. The circumstances of the case are as follows:

The Kestrel is an iron screw steamship, belonging to the Port of London, of 956 tons gross and 615 tons net register, and is fitted with engines of 155 horse power. She was built at Dundee in the year 1878, and at the time of the casualty which forms the subject of the present inquiry she was the property of the General Steam Navigation Company, Mr. Richard Cattarns, junior, being the managing owner. She left London at about 1.15 p.m. of the 14th April last, bound to Bordeaux, with a crew of twenty-six hands all told, twenty passengers, and about 500 tons of cargo, and at about 12.40 a.m. of the following day was abreast of the Royal Sovereign lightship, bearing north, distant about half a mile. She was then laid upon a W. ½ S. course by the wheelhouse compass, and was kept going at full speed, making ten knots, the weather being fine, the sea smooth, and the wind light from the S.W. At about 9 a.m. there was a haze upon the water, with occasional patches of fog, but the vessel was continued on a W. ½ S. course, still going full speed, until 12.30 p.m., the master and chief officer being on the bridge, and a look-out man stationed forward on the top gallant forecastle, when land was suddenly observed ahead at the distance of only a ship's length, upon which the master immediately ordered the helm to be put hard aport, and signalled to the engine room to "Stop, and reverse full speed;" but they had not time to get the helm hard over before the vessel struck. The place where she had grounded was afterwards found to be on Burhou Island, a little to the westward of the Island of Alderney. As the tide was falling, all attempts to get the vessel off then proved fruitless; but no time was lost in launching the boats and in putting the passengers ashore on Burhou Island, whence they were shortly afterwards transported to Alderney. At about 5.30 p.m. the same day, the tide having arisen sufficiently, the vessel floated, and she was thereupon taken into Alderney. The cargo was then taken on in another ship to Bordeaux, but the vessel herself was obliged, after some temporary repairs had been done to her, to return to London, where, on being docked, it was found that she had two holes in her forehold and one in the double bottom, under the main hold, and that a portion of the keel had been knocked off.

These being the facts, the first question upon which our opinion has been asked is, "Whether, after passing the Royal Sovereign lightship, a due and proper course was set and steered?" It is admitted that the course set and steered from off the Royal Sovereign lightship was W. ½ S. by the wheelhouse compass. The master, however, told us that, owing to the deviation of the wheelhouse compass, that course would be equivalent to a west course magnetic. His evidence, however, was not quite consistent on this point; for, in the first place, the deviation card for the wheelhouse compass showed no deviation on a west course, so that to make a west course magnetic it would seem that he should have steered a west course by the wheel house compass. Again the master stated that it was his intention to pass within eight or ten miles of the Caskets; now a W. ½ S. course magnetic would take him from eight to ten miles of the Caskets, whereas a west course magnetic would take him some twenty miles from them, which is a further proof that the course which the master intended to make was W. ½ S., and not west magnetic. Now I am advised by the assessors that W. ½ S. magnetic, which would take him from eight to ten miles of the Caskets, was not a proper course, and that the proper course from the Royal Sovereign lightship was west magnetic, which would take him some twenty miles from the Caskets, right down mid-channel, where the tide was fair up and down and clear of the indraught of the race of Alderney. It was said by Mr. Nelson that at the distance of twenty miles the lights at the Caskets could not be seen, nor indeed would they have been visible at only eight or ten miles in the then state of the weather, there being, as we are told, a haze on the water with occasional patches of fog, which would prevent objects being seen until they were at a comparatively short distance off, Barhou Island, as we know, not having been seen until they were within a ship's length of it. The assessors are of opinion that the vessel should have been kept on a west course from the Royal Sovereign lightship, which would have taken them some twenty miles to the north of the Caskets, and that that was the extreme southerly limit of the vessel's proper course, and that in steering W. ½ S., so as to pass within eight or ten miles of those dangerous rocks, as the master says he intended to do, he was going quite out of his course.

The next question that we are asked is, "Whether those responsible for the navigation of the Kestrel took proper measures to ascertain her position from time to time during the morning of the 15th April?" Within a very short time after leaving the Royal Sovereign lightship they would pass Beachy Head, and from that point there would be no land, and no light to guide them. The lead, too, would not help them, as there is deep water close to Burhou Island, the same as there is in mid-channel. But this only made it the more necessary that a proper course should be set and steered from the Royal Sovereign lightship, a course which would take them well down mid-channel, with the tide fair up and down the Channel, and out of reach of the set of the current to the south.

The third question which we are asked is, "Whether, having regard to the state of the weather, the Kestrel was being navigated at too great a rate of speed, and whether there was any neglect of the precautions required by the ordinary practice of steamers, or by the special circumstances of the case?" It appears to us that the master is in this dilemma: either the weather was so foggy that it was not possible to see the island until they were within a ship's length of it, and in that case he would not have been justified in going at full speed, which we are told was 10 knots an hour; or it was not very foggy, and in that case it is difficult to account for the island not having been seen until they were within a ship's length of it, unless, indeed, there was a very bad look-out being kept on board. In either case the master would seem to have been guilty of a neglect of the ordinary precautions required from seamen for the safe navigation of their vessels.

The fourth question upon which our opinion is asked is, "Whether the master and officers are or either of them is in default?" It is not pretended that any person other than the master is to blame for this casualty, he having been on the bridge and in charge of the vessel at the time when she ran aground. Accordingly the Board of Trade has asked that his certificate should be dealt with. We were told that this master has made the voyage from London to Bordeaux, as master, no less than 81 times (55 times being in this vessel) and that for three years before that he had served as chief officer on board vessels running on the same line. The way in which he accounted for the casualty was this: he said that there had been five or six weeks of easterly winds, and that two days before leaving London there had been westerly winds; that the long continuance of easterly winds had drained the Channel, and that with the westerly winds the water would come in with a rush, and taking the vessel on the starboard bow, as she was heading down the Channel, would set her to the southward, and thus bring her within the range of the race of Alderney. Seeing, however, that according to the master's own statement the easterly winds had ceased, and westerly winds prevailed for two days before he left London, and that one tide would be sufficient to adjust the difference in the water levels caused by the long-continued east winds, the explanation hardly appears to be satisfactory. The true cause of the casualty would rather seem to be that the master chose to lay the vessel on a course to pass too near to the Caskets, instead of keeping her at a distance of at least twenty miles from those dangerous rocks. This, too, was the more incumbent at that time, as it was very near full moon, so that the tides would be at their highest, and consequently the southerly set of the current through the race of Alderney at its strongest. The assessors tell me that every book of instructions warn mariners not to approach too near to the Caskets; and bound as he was outside of Ushant, he had no right to have approached within twenty miles of them. Seeing, however, that the master appears to have behaved extremely well after the vessel struck, and that he received a certificate from the passengers speaking in high terms of his conduct, after the casualty, we shall suspend his certificate for only three months.

At the conclusion of the case the master was requested to give up his certificate, but, by the advice of his solicitor, Mr. Nelson, he refused to do so, it being, Mr. Nelson stated, his intention to enter an appeal from the order of suspension.

The court was not asked to make any order as to costs.

In addition to the rules already set out, the following enactments were referred to in the argument on the appeal:—

Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104).

Board of Trade may cancel or suspend Certificates in certain Cases.

CCXLII. The Board of Trade may suspend or cancel the certificate (whether of competency or service) of any master or mate in the following cases; (that is to say,)

(2.) If upon any investigation conducted under the provisions contained in the eighth part of this Act, or upon any investigation made by a naval court constituted as hereinafter mentioned, it is reported that the loss or abandonment of or serious damage to any ship or loss of life has been caused by his wrongful act or default.

The Merchant Shipping Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63).

S. 23. The following rules shall be observed with respect to the cancellation and suspension of certificates; (that is to say,)

(1.) The power of cancelling or suspending the certificate of a master or mate (by the 242nd section of the principal Act conferred on the Board of Trade) shall . . . . vest and be exercised by the Local Marine Board, magistrates, Naval Court, Admiralty Court, or other court or tribunal by which the case is investigated or tried, and shall not in future vest in or be exercised by the Board of Trade.

(3.) Every such board, court, or tribunal shall, at the conclusion of the case, or as soon afterwards as possible, state in open court the decision to which they may have come with respect to cancelling or suspending certificates, and shall in all cases send a full report upon the case, with the evidence, to the Board of Trade, and shall also, if they determine to cancel or suspend any certificate, forward such certificate to the Board of Trade with their report.

(4.) It shall be lawful for the Board of Trade, if they think the justice of the case require it, to re-issue and return any certificate which has been cancelled or suspended, or shorten the time for which it is suspended, or grant a new certificate of the same or any lower grade, in place of any certificate which has been cancelled or suspended.

The Merchant Shipping Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 80).

S. 29. . . It shall be the duty of a wreck commissioner, at the request of the Board of Trade, to hold any formal investigation into the loss, abandonment, damage, or casualty (in this Act called a shipping casualty), under the eighth part of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and for that purpose he shall have the same jurisdiction and powers as are thereby conferred on the justices, and all provisions of the Merchant Shipping Acts 1854 to 1876, with respect to investigations conducted under the eighth part of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, shall apply to investigations held by a wreck commissioner.

The Shipping Casualties Investigation Act 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 72).

S. 2. Rehearing of and appeal against investigation into shipping casualty or misconduct of officer.—(1) Where an investigation into the conduct of a master, mate, or engineer, or into a shipping casualty, has been held under the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, or any Act amending the same, or under any provision for holding such investigation in a British possession, the Board of Trade may, in any case, and shall, if new and important evidence which could not be produced at the investigation has been discovered, or if for any other reason there has in their opinion been ground for suspecting a miscarriage of justice, order that the case be reheard, either generally or as to any part thereof, and either by the court or authority by whom it was heard in the first instance, or by the wreck commissioner, or in England or Ireland by a judge of Her Majesty's High Court of Justice exercising jurisdiction in Admiralty cases, or in Scotland by the Senior Lord Ordinary, or any other judge in the Court of Session whom the Lord President of that court may appoint for the purpose, and the case shall be so reheard accordingly.

(2) Where in any such investigation a decision has been given with respect to the cancelling or suspension of the certificate of a master, mate, or engineer, and an application for a rehearing under this section has not been made or has been refused, an appeal shall lie from the decision to the following courts; namely,

(a) If the decision is given in England or by a naval court, the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division of Her Majesty's High Court of Justice:

(b) If the decision is given in Scotland, either division of the Court of Session:

(c) If the decision is given in Ireland, the High Court of Admiralty, or the Judge or Division of Her Majesty's High Court of Justice exercising jurisdiction in Admiralty cases.

(3) Any rehearing or appeal under this section shall be subject to and conducted in accordance with such conditions and regulations as may from time to time be prescribed by general rules made under sect. 30 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1876.

Butt, Q.C. and Dr. W. G. F. Phillimore for the appellant.—The report of the court suspends the master's certificate for the specific act of setting and steering a course from the Royal Sovereign lightship to pass too near the Caskets. It is for this wrongful act or default, and no other, that the certificate is suspended; and that is a wrong finding. The wreck commissioner finds on this part of the case that the master ought to have shaped a course to pass twenty miles from the Caskets; but, if he passed at that distance, he would see neither the rocks by day nor the lights by night; the light is only visible fifteen or sixteen miles. (He proposed to call evidence to show that the court below was wrong in supposing that one tide would equalise the level of the waters in the Channel after a long continuance of easterly winds, and also to show that the course steered was a usual one.) [Sir J. HANNEN.—As to the first point proposed to be proved by fresh evidence, I may say that it does not appear from the annex to the report that that opinion of the wreck commissioner was arrived at by the advice of his assessors, and I may say that our assessors do not agree in the opinion expressed; and, on the second point, I understand the practice of the Court of Admiralty to be—and it is a practice which commends itself to my mind—where the court is assisted by assessors, as we are, that it is not proper to have the evidence of individuals on points like this as to whether or not they have steered such and such a course. It may be that such a course was, under the circumstances in which they were placed, a right and prudent course. What we have to decide is whether, under the circumstances in the present case, the course was a proper one; and on that point our assessors will give us their advice.]

If the court should be of opinion that it is not imprudent to steer within eight or ten miles of the Caskets, there is no other charge against the master. We are appealing from "the decision which shall always be given in open court" (Shipping Casualties Rules 1878 No. 20; Merchant Shipping Act 1826, sect. 23, sub-sect. 3)—that is, from the report itself. The annex is "the full report upon the case" spoken of in the same section, but it does not concern us. The wreck commissioner's duty is not only to deal with officers' certificates; he may hold an inquiry, and must then make a report even when certificates are not touched. This certificate is not suspended on the ground that it was imprudent to continue at so high a rate of speed in the intervals of fog antecedent to the stranding; besides, as the certificate of no officer could be touched unless there is a "loss or abandonment, or serious damage to any ship, or loss of life" (Merchant Shipping Act 1854, sect. 242, sub-sect. 2), such imprudence, even if proved, could be no ground for suspending a certificate. The powers of the wreck commissioner are still the same as those conferred on the Board of Trade by the Act of 1854. They are transferred first from the Board of Trade to magistrates and others by the Merchant Shipping Act 1862, sect. 23, sub-sect. 1, and finally vested in the wreck commissioner by the Merchant Shipping Act 1876, sect. 29. This is decided by the case of Ex parte Storey (3 Asp. Mar. L. C. 549; 3 Q.B. Div. 166; 38 L. T. Rep. N. S. 29).

Middleton and Verney, for the Board of Trade, on the court expressing some doubt as to what their powers were of modifying a sentence, pointed out that the Board of Trade had always power under the Merchant Shipping Act 1862, sect 23, sub-sect. 4, to modify a sentence, and expressed a strong opinion that the Board would use that power in the event of any expression of opinion by the court. The court is not confined to the reasons given in the report itself for the suspension of an officer's certificate. It is not necessary to give any reasons at all in that report or in the decision given in open court. In the form of report (Shipping Casualties Rules 1878, Appendix, No. 3) no reasons are given, but all the reasons are to be contained in the annex to the report; therefore the reasons which are given in the report itself are mere surplusage. But, even if the court were confined to the reasons given in the report, it is quite sufficient to support the judgment that the appellant was found to blame, not only for setting the course he did, which under the circumstances might be quite justifiable, but for keeping it, notwithstanding fog and other circumstances which rendered it imprudent. But the court was not so confined. The ship was stranded and lost by the default of the master, and the court will look at the reasons which led the wreck commissioner to consider a default proved.

Butt, Q.C. in reply.

Sir J. HANNEN.—I would have desired for personal and other reasons to have taken a little time to put my judgment into better shape than I can do now; but having regard to the fact that the master is in a state of suspense as to whether or not his certificate be kept from him, and as my learned brother and myself are agreed upon the principle on which our decision is to proceed, I give my judgment and the reasons without further delay.

Now, there is a subsidiary question here as to what is the decision from which the appeal takes place; that undoubtedly may, under some circumstances, be a question of considerable importance. It seems to me that it would be a great hardship upon the master if the decision were limited to a simple finding that he had been guilty of wrongful acts and defaults for which his certificate was suspended. It has been contended that the statute would be complied with if the decision contained no more than that, but it is not necessary for us to determine whether it be so or not, because there can be no doubt that, if the report is distinguished from the annex to the report, it contains a finding that the master had been guilty of particular wrongful acts and defaults that is to say, in the negligent navigation of the vessel, "in having set and steered a course from the Royal Sovereign lightship so as to pass too near to the Caskets, instead of keeping her well out in mid-channel; and having thus been brought within the range of the in-draught of the race of Alderney she was set by the current to the southward on to Burhou Island." Now we have come to the conclusion upon the advice as to certain questions of fact given to us by the assessors, that the master was guilty of a wrongful act and default in steering; that is to say, in continuing to steer the course he did from the Royal Sovereign lightship instead of keeping the vessel more out in mid-channel.

Now an attempt has been made to put a certain construction upon the language used by the commissioner in the annex to his report. It has been argued—but if the argument can be sustained it leads to an absurdity—that the commissioner meant to say that, under no possible circumstances, even in broad daylight, smooth water, and freedom from haze, it was safe to go at a less distance than twenty miles from the Caskets. That appears to be a forced construction of the language. The wreck commissioner was directing his attention to the fact that the master says he was steering a course which would take him seven or eight miles in one point of view, and in another point of view twenty miles from the Caskets. The vessel did, in fact, in a fog run aground upon this island. Then the master's justification is this—not the justification he intends to put forth, but—that "I had such and such reasons to believe this was a safe course, and there was no necessity for me to make any deviation in my course or slacken the speed at which I was going." It is with reference to that supposed contention of the master that the decision of the commissioner is given, namely, that this was not the proper course to steer if it was to be persisted in under all circumstances.

Now, we are advised by the assessors that this was not a wrong course originally, because if it were fine weather, in the ordinary course of things it would bring him within sight of the light of the Caskets during the night, or within sight of the rocks if approached during the day in clear weather. But we are advised that, if it were right for him to start upon that course, it was not right for him to continue that course during a fog and at the speed he did. Then, with regard to the admitted fact of the accident, we are advised that, having regard to the state of the weather, the Kestrel was being navigated at too great a speed, and that this was the cause of the disaster.

I am therefore of opinion that the disaster arose from the wrongful act of the master in navigating the vessel at this full speed, and that he had continued to steer that course in circumstances which, whatever justification there might have been for shaping it, ought to have led him to deviate from it and to give a greater berth to the rocks, which he must have known he was in danger of being driven near to on that course. It is obvious that the only reason why the distance of seven or eight miles is given is to allow for contingencies, one of which was the cause of this disaster. The only object of giving the finding of the court is to guard against contingencies of this kind. The question we have to consider is whether the commissioner is wrong under the circumstances, and whether the master had a right to persist in that course without deviating from it, though the circumstances had materially been altered, as the vessel was in a fog; and we are of opinion that he ought not to have continued that course. For these reasons I am of opinion, and my learned brother agrees with me, that the decision of the commissioner must be affirmed, but he is of opinion—and I see no reason to differ from him, and my experience on questions of this kind is not so great as his—that the punishment was more severe than the circumstances warranted. We therefore recommend that the remainder of the suspension be remitted, seeing that the master has already had his certificate suspended for a month or thereabouts, and that that is a sufficient punishment to mark the extent of the wrongful act of which he has been guilty.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I concur in the judgment, and for the same reasons.

Middleton.—I have no authority now for saying what the Board of Trade will do, but I have no doubt they will give effect to your Lordship's suggestion. Will you allow costs?

Sir J. HANNEN.—I think, under the particular circumstances of this case, as we have considered the sentence was more severe than the circumstances called for, there should be no costs allowed.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Ship—Collision—Evidence.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (James, Brett, and Cotton, L.JJ.), reported in 4 Asp. Mar. L. C. 318; 43 L. T. Rep. N.S. 107, which had varied a judgment of the judge of the Admiralty Court.

The action arose out of a collision between the steamship Milanese and the sailing ship Bokhara, which took place off Folkestone about 6 p.m. on the 10th Nov. 1879, by which the Bokhara was sunk. The facts and evidence are fully set out in the judgments in the court below.

The judge of the Admiralty Court found that the Milanese was alone to blame for the collision, and decreed accordingly, but, on appeal, the Court of Appeal found that both vessels were to blame.

The owners of the Bokhara then appealed to the House of Lords.

Butt, Q.C., Clarkson, Q.C. and Stokes appeared for the appellants.

Webster, Q.C., and Phillimore for the respondents.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

June 14.—Their LORDSHIPS held, upon the facts and evidence, that the judgment of the Court of Appeal was right, and dismissed the appeal, with costs.

APPEAL FROM PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (ADMIRALTY).

Damage—Collision—Rules for navigation of river Thames—Steamships passing points in river—Waiting—Stopping.

A steamship navigating the Thames against the tide is always bound to obey Rule 23 of the Thames Conservancy Rules 1880, and on approaching one of the points there named to wait until vessels then approaching it with the tide have passed clear of her.

Whether vessels are also to observe Rule 22 and pass port side to port side, depends upon whether the vessel navigating against the tide is close to the shore when waiting for the one approaching with the tide to pass her, or so far out as to allow the latter to pass port side to port side.

The expression "passed clear" in Rule 23 means "passed clear of the waiting ship."

Semble, where the point to be passed is on the north side of the river, with a flood tide, or on the south side with an ebb tide, if the vessel navigating with the tide has her green light open when ahead of the vessel waiting, the 23*rd Rule alone applies, and the vessels will pass clear starboard side to starboard side; otherwise both rules apply.*

Steamships rounding a point in the river Thames are not bound to stop or reverse because at one moment they are approaching a vessel coming in the opposite direction where there is no risk of collision if both vessels continue the curvilinear courses they are then on.

This was an appeal from the decision of Sir R. Phillimore, by which on the 1st Feb. 1881 he had found the Libra alone to blame for a collision which took place between that vessel and the Joseph Ricketts off Tilburyness, in the river Thames, about 5.30 p.m. on the 11th Nov. 1880.

The circumstances of the collision appear sufficiently from the judgment given in the case. The principal question argued was as to the construction of the following Rules and Bye-laws for the Regulation of the Navigation of the River Thames, sanctioned by Order in Council of the 18th March 1880.

Bye-laws and Rules for the Navigation of the River between Yantlet Creek and Teddington Lock.

Rules as to Speed and Mode of Navigation.

14. Every steam-vessel when approaching another vessel so as to involve risk of collision shall slacken her speed, and shall stop and reverse if necessary.

Bye-laws and Rules regulating the Navigation of the River between Yantlet Creek and a line drawn from Blackwall Point to Bow Creek.

Steering and Sailing Rules.

22. When two steam-vessels, proceeding in opposite directions, the one up and the other down the river, are approaching one another so as to involve risk of collision, they shall pass one another port side to port side.

23. Steam-vessels navigating against the tide shall, before rounding the following points, viz. Coalhouse Point, Tilburyness, Broadness, Stoneness, Crayfordness, Cold Harbour Point, Jenningtree Point, Halfway House Point, or Crossness, Margaretness, or Tripcock Point, Bull Point or Galleonsness, Hookness, and Blackwall Point, ease the engines, and wait until any other vessels rounding the point with the tide have passed clear.

The action was brought by the owners of the s.s. Joseph Ricketts, which vessel was coming up the river with the flood tide, against the s.s. Libra, which was going down against the tide, the Libra counter-claiming for the damages she had sustained.

Myburgh and Dr. W. G. F. Phillimore for the plaintiffs.

Butt, Q.C. and Clarkson for the defendants.

The case was heard on the 28th Jan. and 1st Feb. by Sir R. Phillimore and Trinity Brethren.

Sir R. Phillimore.—This is a case of collision of some importance, because it calls upon the court for the first time to put a construction upon some of the new steering and sailing rules for the river Thames.

The collision took place in the Northfleet Hope, between five and six o'clock on the evening of the 11th Nov. last year. The state of the weather appears to have been fine and clear, and the tide was first quarter flood, and running about two knots an hour. The vessels that came into collision were the Joseph Ricketts and the Libra, both steamships. The blow was dealt on the starboard side of the Libra, in front of the bridge, by the stem of the Joseph Ricketts. The Joseph Ricketts, which is owned by the plaintiffs in this case—there is a counter-claim—was a steamship of 449 tons, with engines of 90-horse power, and manned by a crew of sixteen hands, and she was proceeding in the river Thames on a voyage from Hartlepool to London, with a cargo of coal. The Libra was a steamship of 617 tons register, and she was going from London to Hamburg in ballast, with a crew of thirty hands, in charge of a duly licensed pilot. One of these vessels therefore—the Joseph Ricketts—was going up the river; the other—the Libra—was coming down, and the tide, as I have already observed, was the first quarter flood. Now the collision took place somewhere about 200 yards or 250 yards above Tilburyness. (a) Those on board the Joseph Ricketts observed the masthead and red light of the Libra about three-quarters of a mile off, and about two points on the port bow, coming down the Reach. The Joseph Ricketts ported and then steadied, and was proceeding, as she says, to pass the Libra port side to port side, when the Libra opened her green light; the helm of the Joseph Ricketts was thereupon put hard a-port, and her engines stopped and reversed, but the Libra shut in her red light and struck the stem of the Joseph Ricketts with her starboard side just in front of her midships. The Libra says that she was proceeding down Northfleet Hope, and that she saw the masthead light of a steamship, which proved to be the Joseph Ricketts, over Tilburyness, from half to three-quarters of a mile off, and bearing on the port bow of the Libra.

(a) Tilburyness is on the north shore, therefore vessels coming up the river round it under a port, and vessels going down under a starboard helm.

The statement of these facts introduces the consideration of the rules which apply to the case, and in my judgment both the 22nd and 23rd of the Rules for the Navigation of the River Thames apply. The 23rd rule should be read first, according to the history of this case, and so far as is material the rules are in these words. [His Lordship here read Rules 22 and 23 which are set out above and continued:] The object of these rules appears to the court to be, to get rid of the many former difficulties with respect to vessels rounding points, and also as to vessels meeting each other so as to involve risk of collision.

In our judgment the Libra did ease her engines, but did not wait, as required by the 23rd rule. She pleads in the 12th paragraph of her preliminary act (Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1875, sch. 1, Order XIX., r. 30 (m), that she was kept on her course, and that when she saw the red light of the Joseph Ricketts, her helm was put, when about 300 or 400 yards off, hard a-starboard, and her engines reversed full speed astern. This appears to have been half a minute before the collision, and she had at that time way enough on her, it is to be observed, to run into the shore. By the manœuvre of starboarding, the Libra ran across the bows of the Joseph Ricketts, and thereby, in our judgment, occasioned the collision.

It is complained on behalf of the defendant that the Joseph Ricketts ported too much and into the slack tide; but in our opinion the Libra was not justified in attempting to cut in between the Joseph Ricketts and the shore. It appears by the evidence that the Libra had gone off two points under her starboard helm at the time of the collision. Now, had she put her helm a-port when she saw the red light of the Joseph Ricketts, she would have gone off two points to starboard, and the collision would in all probability have been avoided. It appears from the evidence that the Libra well knew all along that the Joseph Ricketts was rounding the point under the port helm. The pilot of the Libra says that, when the Joseph Ricketts got two and a half points on the Libra's starboard bow, he saw all three lights of the Joseph Ricketts, showing that the Joseph Ricketts was under a port helm, and it was apparent that when the Joseph Ricketts had passed the point, she was still continuing under a port helm. In pursuing that course she—the Joseph Ricketts—obeyed, in our judgment, the 22nd rule, and intended to pass port side to port side, which she would have done but for the Libra starboarding. I pronounce the Libra alone to blame.

From this decision the owners of the Libra appealed, and the appeal came on for hearing before Jessel, M.R., Brett and Cotton, L.JJ., and Nautical Assessors, on July 19.

Butt, Q.C. and Clarkson, Q.C. for the appellants.

Webster, Q.C. and Myburgh for the respondents.

Jessel, M.R.—In this case the first point for consideration is on the construction of the rules for the navigation of the river Thames; and the second point as to the conduct of the respondents.

The point of construction is this—whether, when the 23rd rule applies, the 22nd does or does not. Now, in the first place, it must be remembered what these rules are; they are Rules and Bye-Laws for the Navigation of the River Thames, issued under an Act of Parliament, and, therefore, to construe them is simply to read them literally and apply to them the same construction as to every other instrument; and you must not, notwithstanding any inconvenience it may occasion, give up the literal meaning; they must be construed literally, if possible. Are the rules themselves inconsistent? One is, "When two steam-vessels, proceeding in opposite directions, the one up and the other down the river, are approaching one another so as to involve risk of collision, they shall pass one another port side to port side." That is the general rule, but it does not necessarily mean that it shall be applied to every case. The next rule is, "Steam-vessels navigating against the tide shall, before rounding the following points (which are named), ease their engines, and wait until any other vessels rounding the point with the tide have passed clear." I think that means till vessels have passed clear of the waiting vessel. That seems to me to be the fair meaning of the rule; because it is to pass clear. What, then, is the meaning of the rule, that the vessels are to wait? They may wait and ease their engines in slack water out of the way of vessels coming up with the tide. In that case it may be that the 22nd rule does not apply, because the event contemplated by the rule has not happened; they are not approaching so as to involve risk of collision. Then there is no inconsistency in the case, for Rule 22 does not apply, because, as I said before, there is nothing for it to apply to. But if, instead of being close to the shore, the vessel has to wait in mid-channel, then I can understand that the rule applies, because a vessel coming up may be approaching so as to involve a risk of collision, and, if so, there is no reason why we should not apply the rule. It may very well pass the other vessel port side to port side. I can see no inconsistency or any difficulty in that.

Upon the facts of the case as found by the judge, and very probably not disputed, he has found that the Libra was nearer mid-channel than to the shore, and that she starboarded her helm, and by doing that caused the collision. If that is so, it was her conduct that was the cause of the collision.

The second point was this It was said that under Rule 14, "Every steam-vessel, when approaching another vessel so as to involve risk of collision, shall slacken her speed, and shall stop and reverse if necessary," and the question was whether the Joseph Ricketts came under this rule at any time before the Libra starboarded her helm. As I understand the evidence, she did not; for I understand that there was no danger of collision, no chance or any risk of collision involved until the Libra starboarded her helm; and the moment that happened the engines of the Joseph Ricketts were stopped and reversed. Therefore it appears to me that the 14th rule does apply, and was obeyed by the Joseph Ricketts. Under all the circumstances the decision of the court below ought to be affirmed.

Brett, L.J.—I think that the evidence proved that the two vessels sighted each other when one was above and the other below the point, and that they were so near the point that the 23rd rule applied, and I think that the Libra was not at that time close to the north shore, and in slack water; in fact, it must be taken, according to the finding of the judge of the court below, that she was so far off that if she had done nothing at all there was room for the Joseph Ricketts to have passed port side to port side; and I think that when the Joseph Ricketts had come round the point under a port helm, she found the Libra so far out from the north shore that she was somewhere on her port side, and if the Joseph Ricketts had been going on a straight course when they were seen near to each other, it would have been right for the Joseph Ricketts to have stopped and reversed. The peculiarity of the case is that the Joseph Ricketts was coming round under a port helm, and those on board the Libra could see at the moment that she was on the port side. Under those circumstances there was no danger of a collision if both vessels had remained as they were.

It has been argued by Mr. Butt that the Libra did nothing wrong; that she obeyed the 23rd rule; and if she was within that rule, the 22nd rule did not and could not apply. It is argued that the rules are inconsistent with each other. I do not think that that is a right construction. I think the intention of the 23rd rule is this, when vessels are approaching points in the river Thames, to prevent, if possible, the state of things arising that will make the 22nd rule applicable; but, nevertheless, if a state of things does arise to make the 22nd rule applicable, there is nothing in the 23rd rule to prevent the 22nd rule applying. It was said, if the 23rd rule was obeyed, the vessel going against the stream must always be waiting in slack water. I do not say that it cannot be obeyed without that result. All that the 23rd rule says is—When it is likely that they may meet on the point, that the vessel which is going against the tide shall wait. I think the meaning is that the shall so far check her speed as to prevent her coming to the point at the same time as the other vessel; and therefore the one going against the tide, and which has not come up to the point, is to wait on that side of the point, and not only wait until the other has passed the point, but until the other vessel has passed her. If she was in such a situation as to obey the rule when the other vessel was coming round this point, it is obvious that if she was close under the point where her green light would be to the southward, the other vessel coming round will come round outside her, and they will be green light to green light, the vessel going against the tide being close in shore. Under those circumstances the 23rd rule would be obeyed, and the 22nd not applicable. Then there is nothing for the vessel coming with the tide to do but to keep on; but if the vessel coming against the tide is not close in, but so far off that there is room for the other vessel to pass port side to port side, then the vessel coming against the tide may obey the 23rd rule and wait, but she is waiting so far out in the river that there is room to pass port side to port side. If that is so, the 22nd rule is applicable because they may be approaching so as to run risk of collision, and their duty is to pass port side to port side. Therefore it is true to say the 23rd rule applies whether the 22nd does or not. The truth is that they are independent rules, and that it depends on the circumstances of each case whether the 22nd rule does apply after the 23rd is obeyed.

It seems to me that these vessels ought to have passed port side to port side. That is what they were doing, and if they had continued their courses they would have passed port side to port side. The vessel found to blame does not content herself with obeying the 23rd rule, but she broke the 22nd, and broke it by starboarding her helm and preventing the other vessel from going port side to port side. It has been urged upon us that, in obeying the 23rd rule, the vessel could not obey the 22nd; in other words, if brought to a complete standstill, in order to obey the 23rd rule, it would not have any effect on her, either by starboarding or porting, if she had no motion in the water. But no vessel is bound to do impossibilities.

AKERBLOM v. PRICE.

APPEAL FROM THE EXCHEQUER DIVISION.

Ship—Salvage—When pilot entitled to salvage reward—Practice—Verdict—New trial—Judgment.

To entitle a pilot to salvage reward the ship he assists must be in such distress as to be in danger of being lost, and such as to call upon him to run such unusual danger, or incur such unusual responsibility, or exercise such unusual skill, or perform such an unusual kind of service, as to make it unfair and unjust that he should be paid otherwise than upon the terms of salvage reward.

Where an uninjured vessel is off a coast unknown to the crew, in a gale, and cannot beat to windward, and is being driven towards dangerous sands, and pilots put to sea at considerable risk, and guide her to a safe anchorage, money paid to the pilots for their services is a payment for salvage, and the owners of the vessel are entitled to general average contribution from the owners of cargo.

Where in such a case a jury finds that the services are pilotage, and a Divisional Court directs a new trial, the Court of Appeal will, if it appears that all the materials are before it upon which to decide the case, go farther than the Divisional Court, and set aside the verdict for the defendants the owners of the cargo, and enter judgment for the plaintiffs without another trial.

Judgment of the Divisional Court, directing a new trial, varied by entering judgment for plaintiffs.

THIS was an action brought by the owners of the Norwegian brigantine Ailo against the owners of cargo to recover a general average contribution.

In Sept. 1878 the Ailo, bound for Barrow-in-Furness, was driven by a heavy gale past her port and into Morecambe Bay. She was there assisted and guided to a safe anchorage by pilots, who put out to her assistance under circumstances which are fully stated in the judgment of the court.

The only question before the Court of Appeal was whether, as between the plaintiffs and the defendants, a sum of 100*l.* paid by the plaintiffs to the pilots for their services ought legally to be treated as a payment for pilotage services, in which case the plaintiffs would have no claim against the defendants; or as a payment for salvage services, in which case the plaintiffs would be entitled to recover.

At the trial Pollock, B. left this question to the jury, who found that the services were only pilotage services.

A rule for a new trial was made absolute by Denman, J. and Pollock, B., and the defendants appealed.

May 9.—Henry Matthews, Q.C. and J. A. Cross, for the defendants, argued in support of the appeal.

Day, Q.C. (Pollard with him), for the plaintiffs, did not conclude his argument, being stopped by the Court. The arguments are stated in the judgment. The following cases were referred to:

The Frederick, 1 W. Rob. 17;
The Bomarsund, Lushington, 77;
The Joseph Harvey, 1 Ch. Rob. 306;
The Æolus, 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 516; 28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 41; L. Rep. 4 A. & E. 29;

The Anders Knape, 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 142; 40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 684; 4 P. Div. 213.

BRAMWELL, L.J.—There must be a new trial unless on consideration we think that we have materials before us to decide the case.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 3.—BRAMWELL, L.J.—All we will say now is, that we are of opinion that the judgment must be that the plaintiffs recover. A written judgment stating our reasons will be delivered.

June 20.—The judgment of the court was delivered by BRETT, L.J,—In this action, brought by the plaintiffs as shipowners to recover from the defendants, as assignees of cargo, a general average contribution, the question in dispute was reduced to be whether a sum of 100*l.* paid by the plaintiffs to certain pilots could be legally treated by the plaintiffs as against the defendants as a payment for salvage services, or whether the plaintiffs as against the defendants were entitled to say no more than that the payment was for services which, however meritorious, were only pilotage services. If the first case were made out the plaintiffs would be entitled to succeed; if the second, the whole payment must be borne by the plaintiffs as the shipowners, and the defendants would be entitled to succeed.

The case was tried before Pollock, B. and a special jury. Two questions were left to the jury, with one only of which it is necessary to deal. The jury found that the services were only pilotage services. Upon a rule for a new trial on the ground of misdirection, and as for a verdict against evidence, the Divisional Court made the rule absolute. The appeal is against that order. Upon the hearing, it appearing to us that we had all the materials before us upon which to decide the case—that is to say, that we had all the evidence of direct facts before us, and that there remained only the question of what inferential fact ought to be drawn from those facts—we considered ourselves bound to go further than the Divisional Court, and to order that the verdict for the defendants should be set aside, and judgment should be entered for the plaintiffs without another trial.

The facts proved beyond controversy were, that the vessel, bound for Barrow-in-Furness, was by the violence of the wind and sea driven to leeward of her port into Morecame Bay; that by reason of the same violence of wind and sea the vessel could not beat to windward so as to make her port, or even remain where she was, but was being driven more and more to leeward towards dangerous sands; that her captain and crew were ignorant of the locality; that the vessel, unless guided to some part of the bay in which she might take the ground or lay in comparative safety, must almost inevitably have been lost; that the pilots, seeing her peril, put to sea from harbour in order to assist her; that by going to sea in such a storm they ran no inconsiderable danger of losing their own vessel and their lives; that being unable, by reason of the height of the sea, to board the vessel, they led her, by preceding her and signalling to her, to a safe anchorage in the bay; that (and it is a strong indication of the opinion of all present of the urgency of the position) no mention was made from the vessel or by the pilots of any port to which the vessel should be steered. The vessel had a pilot signal flying when the pilots put off and when they approached the vessel; and the vessel had not suffered any damage to her hull, spars, or sails.

Upon these practically undisputed facts it was argued for the plaintiffs that the jury ought in reason to have found for them, on the ground that the ship was in distress, and that from that fact alone, when it exists, however great or small the distress, pilots are not bound to render any service to a ship, except upon the terms of receiving salvage reward, and that the pilots in this case had not agreed to render services on any other terms.

It was argued for the defendants that the jury were entitled, and even bound, to find for them, because the vessel was not herself damaged; and that unless a ship be herself damaged, pilots are bound to serve her on request as pilots, and, if they do serve her, are entitled to be paid only for pilotage service.

Cases were cited from the Admiralty reports on behalf of the plaintiffs, in order to support in its entirety the proposition enunciated for them. These cases were criticised on behalf of the defendants, in order to show that in all of them there was in fact some damage to the ship itself besides its being otherwise in distress. It cannot be denied that the terms used by Dr. Lushington in The Frederick (1 W. Rob. 16) and The Elizabeth (8 Jurist, 365), and several other cases, if accepted literally, support the plaintiffs' view. Equally, it cannot be denied that the criticism on them made on behalf of the defendants is in fact correct.

The difficulty of dealing with Admiralty reports by way of authority is, that there is no necessity in that court that the judge should, in the exposition of the grounds of his judgment, discriminate strictly between the proposition of law, which is to be satisfied by all the facts of the case, and the rule of interpretation of the direct facts of maritime vicissitudes given in evidence, by which he desires to bind himself and his successors as to the inference of fact he and they ought as a general rule to draw from those facts. The latter use of authority is inapplicable as such to a trial by jury, because a jury does not disclose the reason why its members have drawn any particular inference of fact, but a jury may be well assisted by having the reasoning of great judges of the Admiralty Court explained to them.

Upon careful consideration we cannot adopt, as a rule of law, or as a proper rule for drawing an inference of fact, the abrupt rule suggested for the defendants. The rule enunciated by Dr. Lushington requires to be divided into its elements of law and fact before it can be applied to a trial by jury. The fundamental rule of administration of maritime law in all courts of maritime jurisdiction is that, whenever the court is called upon to decide between contending parties upon claims arising with regard to the infinite number of marine casualties, which are generally of so urgent a character that the parties cannot be truly said to be on equal terms as to any agreement they may make with regard to them, the court will try to discover what in the widest sense of the terms is under the particular circumstances of the particular case fair and just between the parties. If the parties have made no agreement the court will decide primarily what is fair and just. The rule cannot be laid down in less large terms, because of the endless variety of circumstances which constitute maritime casualties. They do not, as it were, arrange themselves into classes of which à priori rules can be predicated. If the parties have made an agreement the court will enforce it, unless it be manifestly unfair and unjust but if it be manifestly unfair and unjust, the court will disregard it and decree what is fair and just. This is the great and fundamental rule.

In order to apply it to particular instances the court will consider what fair and reasonable persons in the position of the parties respectively would do, or ought to have done, under the circumstances. In the case therefore of pilots claiming salvage reward, the ultimate proposition with regard to the pilots to be determined by the tribunal which has to decide between the pilot and shipowner is, would a fair and reasonable owner, and a fair and reasonable pilot, if they had had to agree, have agreed under the circumstances that the services to be performed should be performed for ordinary pilotage fees, or even extraordinary pilotage reward, or for salvage reward? Would a fair owner have insisted on requiring the necessary services for ordinary pilotage fees, or even a higher rate of pilotage payment? Would a fair pilot have refused to perform the necessary services unless upon the terms of a salvage reward? In such a dispute to be determined by a judge and jury, these, besides the question of the position of the ship, are the questions to be left to the jury. In this case for instance, the questions for the jury were: Was the ship in a position of imminent danger of being lost? Was she saved from such danger by the acts of the pilots? Were the acts of the pilots, by reason of the weather and the position of the ship, made so different in danger or responsibility from the ordinary acts of service of pilots as that no fair and reasonable owner would have insisted on requiring such service for other than salvage reward? In a dispute to be determined by a judge, in a court of admiralty or otherwise these are the propositions which are to be applied to the particular facts of the case. It follows that there can be no such rigid rule of law, or of interpretation of facts as is suggested on behalf of the defendants. It follows that the meaning of the phrase "in distress" used by Dr. Lushington is not to be interpreted in the rigid manner suggested on behalf of the plaintiffs. Suppose a ship previously reduced by accident to such a stage of unseaworthiness as makes it expedient or necessary that she should enter a port of refuge, as by a leak or the loss of a mast, but is approaching such port in moderate weather, and so that she can enter it, if steered a right course, with ease, notwithstanding the damage done to her, can it be pretended that it would be reasonable and just, within the tests above enunciated, that a pilot conducted her into port should be treated as a salvor? Yet she would be an unseaworthy ship, a damaged ship, a disabled ship, and in a sense a ship "in distress." Suppose, on the other hand, the ship, as a ship, to be intact, no damage to hull, spars, or sails, but driven by the most violent weather, without power of resistance, within half a mile of an ironbound leeward coast, with no possibility of escape from immediate total destruction but by entry into a narrow, and to the crew unknown, haven of the coast, and suppose the weather and position to be such that, with all the knowledge and skill of the best pilot, there would still be the greatest danger that he and the ship might be lost; could any fair person say that a fair master would ask a pilot to come on board and assume such a responsibility and risk, or consider that, being on board, he should exercise such a responsible duty and run such a risk as has unexpectedly arisen for any other than salvage reward? These hypothetical cases show that it is not the mere fact of injury to the hull, masts, or sails of the ship which is to govern, but that the tribunal must determine whether, under all the circumstances of the particular case, the service which the pilot has entered upon, or has unexpectedly found imposed upon him, was rendered so different in responsibility, or danger, or kind from the ordinary service of a pilot as to make it impossible that any fair owner should have insisted upon his being paid otherwise than by a salvage reward; or whether, although there was some increased responsibility or danger or unusual kind of service, any fair pilot would have refused to enter upon the service, or to continue to perform the service, unless paid otherwise than by a fair compensation for pilotage services. That a pilotage service may be turned by subsequent casualties into a service to be compensated by salvage reward is thus laid down by Dr. Lushington: "The law I have laid down in more than one instance on this point is, that if, in the performance of a contract of towage, an unforseen and extraordinary peril arise to the vessel towed, the steamer is not at liberty to abandon the vessel, but is bound to render her the necessary assistance, and thereupon is entitled to salvage reward. I am of opinion that these rights and obligations incident to a contract of towage are implied by law, and that the law thereby secures equity to both parties and the true interests of owners of ships. A similar law holds with respect to a pilot; certain emergencies occurring which require extraordinary service, he is bound to stay by the ship, but becomes entitled to salvage remuneration, and not a mere pilotage fee:" (The Saratoga, Lush. Rep. p. 231.) It must be remembered that, in order to found a claim for salvage reward, it is absolutely essential that the ship should be in imminent danger of being lost, and should by the service be saved from such danger. It may be said, therefore, and we think would be truly said in fact, in almost every, if not in every case, that whenever the ship is in such danger the service of the pilot must necessarily be different in kind, responsibility, or danger from the ordinary service of a pilot. That, however, is a different proposition from either the one suggested for the plaintiffs or that suggested for the defendants. It is consistent with the view that the true interpretation of the phrase used by Dr. Lushington is that the ship must be, not merely in distress in a general sense, but in such distress as to alter the service of the pilot to the extent above suggested. It leaves the rule of law to be that in order to entitle a pilot to salvage reward, he must not only show that the ship was in some sense in distress, but that she was in such distress as to be in danger of being lost, and such as to call upon him to run such unusual danger, or incur such unusual responsibility, or exercise such unusual skill, or perform such an unusual kind of service, as to make it unfair and unjust that he should be paid otherwise than upon the terms of salvage reward.

It seems to us perfectly clear that the services of the pilots in this case were within the rule thus laid down, and that the payment to them ought to be considered, as between the plaintiffs and defendants, as a payment of salvage reward. We have thought it right to give our reasons at length, but we might decide this case by saying that the service rendered was one which the pilots were not bound to render. It was a danger they were not bound to encounter. Next, that the service was not one of pilotage. It was not a piloting to any port or place, but a taking out of—a salving from—danger.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Reported by H. D. BONSEY and W. P. EVERSLEY, Esqrs. Barristers-at-Law.

(Before LINDLEY, J.)

PITMAN v. THE UNIVERSAL MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY LIMITED.

Marine insurance—Time policy—Partial loss—Principle upon which loss is to be ascertained.

Where an insured vessel is stranded and got off, and the owners, on the underwriters refusing to accept abandonment, sell her, this being the best for all concerned, the correct mode of ascertaining the proportion of loss to be made good by the underwriters is to compare the value of the sound ship at the port of distress with her value there when damaged, and to apply this proportion to her real value at the commencement of the risk if the policy be open, or to her agreed value if the policy be valued.

The estimated cost of repairs, though rejected as a direct measure of loss, may be the measure of the difference between the ship's sound and damaged values if no other measure can be found for arriving at the loss really sustained, but if more reliable evidence of the amount of such loss exists, the estimated cost of repairs ought not to be adopted for the purpose of arriving, even indirectly, at the measure of the loss sustained.

The assured is never bound to abandon; he can always repair if he chooses, and refrain from insisting on a total loss.

If the assured does repair the ship, bonâ fide and with reasonable discretion, the cost of the repairs be the measure of the loss.

FURTHER CONSIDERATION.

The plaintiffs were the owners of the barque Thracian, 530 tons register, which in Oct. 1871, being classed A 1 at Lloyd's until 1879, sailed from Newport, in Monmouthshire, on a voyage to Launceston, in Tasmania, where she arrived on the 15th Feb. 1875 and discharged her cargo.

By a policy of insurance bearing date the 3rd June 1875 the plaintiffs caused themselves to be insured at and from the date of vessel sailing from Launceston for and during the space of twelve calendar months, in port or at sea, in docks and on ways, at all times, in all places, upon the ship, valued at 3700*l.*, against perils of the seas and all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that had or should come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the ship, or any part thereof, the ship being warranted free from average under 3*l.* per cent. unless general or the ship stranded; and the defendants, for a premium of 105*l.*, paid to them by the plaintiffs, subscribed the policy for 1000*l.* and became insurers thereon to the plaintiffs for that amount on the ship; and it was agreed between the plaintiffs and defendants that the insurance should commence and be from the 23rd March 1875 to the 22nd March 1876, both days inclusive as appeared by a memorandum inscribed on the policy.

The vessel sailed on the 23rd March 1875 for Launceston in ballast for Newcastle, in New South Wales, where she arrived on the 3rd April 1875 and she sailed thence with a cargo of coals on the 6th May 1875 for Singapore, where she arrived and discharged her cargo in the month of June 1875.

Being then at Singapore, she was on the 16th June 1875 chartered to proceed to Moulmein, and there take in a cargo of teak and proceed to Queenstown or Plymouth for orders, which charter would have produced a gross amount to the plaintiffs of 4750*l.*

The vessel sailed on the voyage under the charter from Singapore to Moulmein on the 24th July 1875, and arrived off that port on the 10th Aug. 1875, and while in charge of a duly licensed pilot, in passing up the river to the port of Moulmein, took the ground, and remained aground until the 14th of the same month, when she was got off and towed up to Moulmein.

The plaintiffs determined to abandon the vessel, but the underwriters declined to accept her. The plaintiffs then obtained the best advice they could as to the cost of repairing her, and decided not to do so, but to sell her, and, having made some slight repairs, they sold the ship and stores for 3897*l.*

In the statement of claim the plaintiffs alleged that the ship was by perils insured against by the policy injured and damaged to an extent exceeding three per cent. within the meaning of the policy, and the defendants' proportion of the average loss and of the expenditure necessarily incurred by the plaintiffs in consequence of grounding, getting off, and towage of the vessel, and in docking, undocking, and otherwise in consequence of the injury for which the defendants as insurers were liable to the plaintiff in respect of the sum of 1000*l.* insured by them, amounted to the sum of 781*l.* 7*s.* 10*d.*, and they claimed this sum as a partial average loss under the policy. The defendants paid 245*l.* into court, and denied that the plaintiff had sustained any loss or damage in respect of the subject-matter of insurance by perils insured against.

The question in dispute between the parties was the principle upon which the loss was to be ascertained, the plaintiffs contending that it was to be measured by what it would have cost to repair the ship and make her as good as she was before she was injured, deducting one-third to allow for new materials instead of old; and the defendants, that it was to be measured by the difference between the value of the ship when sound and what she sold for when damaged.

July 4.—LINDLEY, J.—This is an action on a time policy for a partial loss, and the question I have to decide is the principle upon which the loss is to be ascertained, it being agreed that all questions of figures shall be referred to some gentleman versed in adjustments. The facts which are material are few and simple [reads the statement of claim, sects. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 7, containing the facts above set out].

The vessel injured grounded on her way to Moulmein, and after remaining aground four days in some peril, she was got off and towed to Moulmein. She was there examined and was found to be seriously injured. The plaintiffs resolved to abandon her to the underwriters, and gave notice of abandonment. The underwriters, however, declined to accept her, and required the plaintiffs to repair her. The plaintiffs did not insist on their abandonment, but, acting on the best advice they could obtain, determined not to repair her, but to sell her, and, after making some slight repairs, they accordingly did sell her and her stores for 3897*l.*

Upon the evidence before me, and having regard to the want of proper dock accommodation and appliances at Moulmein, and the high charges there, I have come to the conclusion that the cost of repairing her so as to make her as good as she was before she grounded would have been about 5500*l.*, which is more than her value when repaired, such value being 4500*l.* or thereabouts. I have further come to the conclusion that it was not practicable to examine her bottom and to repair her temporarily so as to enable her to continue her voyage in safety without docking her and expending much more upon her than such temporary repairs would justify. In other words, I find as a fact that a prudent uninsured owner would have done what the plaintiffs did, and that they did what was best for all interested in selling her in her damaged state, and substantially as she was when brought into a place of safety.

Under these circumstances the plaintiffs have brought an action against the defendants to recover the amount of the loss sustained by the plaintiffs by reason of the injury to the ship by her stranding. The plaintiffs are clearly entitled to recover something, and the question is how much? The plaintiffs claim 781*l.* 7*s.* 10*d.* The defendants have paid into court 245*l.* The difference between the parties is attributable not to any dispute about figures, but to the circumstance that they differ entirely as to the principle upon which the calculations are to be based. The plaintiffs contend that the loss to be made good is to be measured by what it would have cost to repair the ship and make her as good as she was before she was injured, but deducting one-third of that cost so as to allow for new materials instead of old; whilst the defendants contend that this is an entirely erroneous principle, and that the loss to be made good is to be measured by the difference between the value of the ship when sound and what she sold for when damaged. The question for my decision is, which of these two principles is correct. It is certainly remarkable that the question thus raised should never have been yet decided. But such seems to be the case, and it consequently becomes necessary to consider the question on principle.

The first thing which strikes the mind on a consideration of the foregoing statement is that, apparently at least, if not really, the plaintiffs are contending for a right to be indemnified against a loss which they have not in fact sustained. The repairs, the cost of which the plaintiffs seek to make the measure of their loss, were not in fact made. It becomes necessary, therefore, to be careful before a hypothetical as distinguished from an actual loss is held to be the loss in respect of which the plaintiffs are entitled to indemnity.

The plaintiffs' contention is based upon the following assumptions: (1) that they might have repaired if they had chosen; (2) that if they had repaired the cost of repairs would be the measure of their loss; and (3), that it is immaterial to the defendants whether the repairs were actually effected or not.

The first of these assumptions I take to be well founded: the assured is never bound to abandon; it is for him to determine whether he will do so or not; he can always repair if he chooses, and refrain from insisting on a total loss: see Peele v. Merchants Insurance Company (3 Mason, 27), a case in which the rights of an assured in the event of stranding were elaborately examined by Mr. Justice Story.

The second assumption is also well-founded if the repairs are made bonâ fide and with reasonable discretion. Nothing can be stronger than the language of Mr. Justice Story on this point. In the case just cited he says (p. 63); "The insured is in no case bound to abandon. He may in all cases elect to repair the damage at the expense of the underwriters, and if he acts bonâ fide and with reasonable discretion, there is no decision yet pronounced which declares that he shall not be entitled to a full compensation, however great it may be, even if it should equal or even exceed the original value of the ship, and until such a decision is made the direct terms of the policy seem strong enough to justify such a claim." (See also 2 Arn. Ins. 1022, 3rd ed. 2; and 2 Phill. Ins. sect. 1426.) But although this unquestionably is true, still, if the repairs are so extensive and so out of proportion to the value of the ship when repaired as to show a want of bonâ fides, or a total disregard of what is reasonable, it is by no means clear that their cost could be thrown on the underwriter. In fact it is tolerably plain that they could not. The language of Maule, J. on his head in Stewart v. Steele is extremely cogent and valuable. He said: "As to the supposed duty of the underwriters to pay for the repairs, that is a mere fallacy; and the frequent statement of the proposition will not make it less fallacious; the law casts no such duty upon them. The assured is entitled to recover the amount by which the ship is deteriorated in consequence of the accident." This appears to me to be perfectly accurate, and I adopt it accordingly.

The third assumption, viz., that, as the plaintiffs had the right to repair the ship and to recover the cost from the underwriters, it is immaterial to them whether the right is exercised or not, is in my opinion entirely erroneous and opposed to the true principles of contracts of indemnity. Against what do the underwriters agree to indemnify the assured? Surely against such losses as he may in fact sustain by reason of the perils insured against. That this is so is plainly proved by those cases which decide that, where a ship has been injured and not repaired, the assured must wait until the expiration of the risk before he can sue the underwriters for the loss sustained. The assured has no vested right of action when the injury is sustained. If in such a case the ship is lost whilst the policy is running by a peril not insured against, the assured has no right of action at all; and if she is lost by a peril insured against the insured can only claim for a total loss; he cannot claim both for a total loss and for the previous partial loss, as he may, if the damage has been actually repaired. Compare Stewart v. Steele (5 Scott, N. R. 927); Livie v. Janson (12 East, 648); Lidgett v. Secretan (ubi sup.) These cases are conclusive to show that the events which have happened, and not those which might have happened, are to be regarded. Apart from all authority, I should have thought it plain that a loss actually sustained under circumstances which did happen is to be preferred as a measure of indemnity to a loss which would have been sustained under circumstances which did not happen, and the cases to which I have referred show that this principle is recognised as well in cases arising under marine insurance policies as in other cases of indemnity.

Upon principle, therefore, it appears to me that the plaintiffs' contention cannot be supported.

It is, however, said to have authority and practice in its favour. The authorities referred to are Knight v. Faith (ubi sup.) and Lidgett v. Secretan (ubi sup.); the practice is that of underwriters. In Knight v. Faith the ship was damaged and sold unrepaired for 72*l.* 10*s.* The assured claimed for a total loss, but as there was no destruction of the ship, and no notice of abandonment, it was held that the assured could only recover for a partial loss. The proper mode of ascertaining the amount of this loss was not discussed, but there is a passage in Lord Campbell's judgment at p. 669 which I will read: "We therefore think that in this case the ship insured sustained a partial loss from which the assured ought to be indemnified. But they have left us entirely in the dark as to the amount of that indemnity; their counsel has contended that even on the footing of a partial loss the verdict ought to stand for the full amount of the sum insured and interest. However, if there has not been a total loss of the ship, actual or constructive, with notice of abandonment, it lies upon them to show the extent of the injury which the ship sustained from the accident, together with the sum which would be required for repairing, and from this there would be the usual deduction of one-third new for old. There having been no notice of abandonment, although the ship subsisted as a ship, we cannot proceed upon the supposition that she could not be repaired, and the partial loss must be calculated on the same principles as if she had actually been repaired and proceeded on her voyage, or had foundered at sea without having been repaired soon after the policy expired. 'Such a calculation,' says Benecke, vol. 2, p. 449, 'cannot be governed by any general rule, but must be decided according to circumstances and upon a casual estimate in which no great precision can be expected, since it is extremely difficult after the ship has perished to obtain a precise knowledge of the condition in which the ship was at the termination of the fixed time. But this difficulty can never be a ground for freeing the insurer from liability.' The difficulty is not greater than was experienced in Hare v. Travis (7 B. & C. 14), where there having been a policy upon pearl ashes at and from Liverpool to London, and the ship having deviated by going into Southampton, and the pearl ashes having been injured by sea damage both before and after the deviation, but never having been examined till they arrived in London, it was left to the jury to say what amount of damage they had sustained while protected by the policy." What ultimately became of this case I have not been able to ascertain; but I cannot regard it as an authority for the proposition that the estimated cost of repairs is in all cases the true measure of loss to the owner of a ship injured and sold without being repaired. Such estimated cost may or may not be the best measure of loss, and in Knight v. Faith, where the ship sold for next to nothing, it is quite possible that the estimated cost of repairs was a juster measure of the assured's right to indemnity than any other which could be suggested. Where such is the case the estimated cost of repair will naturally be the basis of the underwriter's calculation, and it may so often happen in practice that this is the proper basis as to lead to the habit of regarding the estimated cost of repairs as the true basis in all cases of the kind under consideration. But care must be taken not to be misled by this circumstance, and not to mistake the rule for the principle on which it is founded. In Lidgett v. Secretan (ubi sup.) the court does not appear to sanction the proposition contended for by the plaintiffs. In that case the ship was insured by two policies for two successive voyages, viz., out and home. On the voyage out she was stranded and injured. She was partially repaired, and after the risk covered by the first policy had expired, and after the risk covered by the second policy had commenced, but before her repairs were completed, she was destroyed by fire. The court decided that, although the ship was ultimately lost, and the plaintiff was entitled to recover under the second policy for a total loss, he was also entitled to recover under the first policy the diminished value of the vessel occasioned by her stranding. The estimated cost of repairs was merely referred to as a mode of estimating such depreciated value; and so far is this case from being an authority for the plaintiffs that it amounts in my opinion, to a strong authority against them. Mr. Justice Willes, on p. 526, says: "The true principle I apprehend to be this: the owners are not to get anything which they did not lose by the vessel striking on the reef, they are to get the amount of the diminution in value of the vessel at the end of the first risk—the difference between her then value and what she would have been worth but for the damage she had sustained. In arriving at that result, I do not see how the arbitrator can avoid taking into consideration the expenses which would have to be incurred in order to put the vessel into a proper state of repair; but he must do this only for the purpose of arriving at the diminution of the value at the expiration of the risk. That, of course, must be subject to all just allowances." The judgment of Sir Montague Smith in that case is to the same effect. The practice relied upon by the plaintiffs was not proved; indeed, the witnesses called to prove it said they had no experience of any settled usage applicable to the case of a damaged ship sold without being repaired.

For the reasons and under the circumstances above stated I am of opinion that the principle contended for by the plaintiffs is erroneous, and that, in substance, the principle contended for by the defendants is correct. The loss sustained by an assured by the stranding of the ship is primâ facie the depreciation in her value caused by the stranding. Before she stranded she was worth a certain sum; after she stranded she was worth less; the difference between these sums, if it can be ascertained, will be the true measure of the assured's loss, unless he can be shown to have sustained a greater or less loss between the stranding and the expiration of the risk covered by the policy. That this is so in the case of goods is well established; but in point of principle, and for this purpose, there is no distinction between ships and goods, except that goods being saleable, their sound and damaged values can be readily ascertained by a sale, whilst the values of sound and damaged ships have generally to be ascertained by estimates. This is the view taken by the best text writers (2 Arnould on Ins. 2nd edit. sect. 365; and see the rule as to ascertaining damage to the extent of 50 per cent. in America, 3 Kent's Com. 330 & 331; Phillips on Insurance, sect. 1539); and by Story, J. in Peele v. Merchants' Insurance Company (3 Mason, 27) already referred to. So also the judgments in Stewart v. Steele and Lidgett v. Secretan support the same view.

Whether the values to be ascertained and compared are the values at the same place or at different places, and whether they are to be ascertained at the commencement of the risk, or at its termination, or immediately before and immediately after the injury is sustained, are questions to be considered; and, having regard to the authorities just referred to, the correct mode of ascertaining the proportion of loss to be made good by the underwriter appears to be to compare the value of the sound ship at the port of distress with her value there when damaged, and to apply this proportion to her real value at the commencement of the risk if the policy be open, or to her agreed value if, as in the present case, the policy be valued.

Such being the principle by which to be guided, it remains to apply it to the case before the court, and to ascertain the value of the ship at Moulmein in her sound and damaged states and to consider the effect of her sale. For these purposes the declared value in the policy must be disregarded; for although such value is conclusive for the purpose of determining how much the defendant may ultimately have to pay, it does not preclude either party from proving the true amonnt of loss sustained: (Young v. Thuring, 2 Man. & Gr. 593.) The estimated cost of repairs, though rejected as a direct measure of loss, might be the measure of the difference between the ship's sound and damaged values if no other measure could be found for arriving at the loss really sustained; but in this case other and more reliable evidence of the amount of such loss exists, and the estimated cost of repairs ought not therefore to be adopted for the purpose of arriving even indirectly at the measure of the loss sustained. The evidence as to the value of the ship when sound stands thus. The plaintiffs say she was worth 4000*l.* at the commencement of the risk; the defendants are content to adopt this statement. At this date the ship was at Singapore. The time which elapsed between the commencement of the risk and the stranding of the vessel was very short; and the time which elapsed between her stranding and sale was also very short; and there is no reliable evidence to show that the value of the sound ship at Moulmein at either of these two periods was greater than her value a short time before when she was at Singapore, and the risk commenced. In the absence of such evidence her sound value at Moulmein ought, in my opinion, to be taken to be 4000*l.* In coming to this conclusion I do not forget that her value when thoroughly repaired has been estimated at 4500*l.*, nor do I overlook the argument that, as she fetched 3800*l.* in her damaged condition, she must have been worth at Moulmein, when sound, much more than 4000*l.* I regard the estimate of 4500*l.* as little better than a guess, and I cannot assume that, if she had been thoroughly repaired, according to Mr. Hopper's estimate, she would not have been more valuable than she was before she stranded, even after making the customary allowance of one-third new for old. The argument deduced from the price she fetched is plausible, but not convincing. I am not at all sure that she did not fetch more than she was worth, and although what she did fetch is conclusive as regards one element in the calculation, I do not regard it as a reliable starting point from which to draw an inference as to her sound value. Upon the evidence before me I hold that value to be 4000*l.*

The value of the ship when damaged has next to be ascertained. But the object of this inquiry must not be lost sight of. That object is to ascertain the loss sustained by the plaintiffs, and they have fixed this element in the calculation by what the ship actually sold for. The underwriters may, no doubt, show, if they can, that their loss has not been so great as they allege, but the assured cannot possibly increase his actual loss by saying that he would have lost more if the ship had not sold for so much as she in fact realised. This, I apprehend, is what the present Lord Justice Lush meant when he said in Lohre v. Aitchinson (ubi sup.): "If, instead of repairing, the owner chooses to sell the ship in her damaged condition, he fixes his loss at the difference between what she was worth at the commencement of the risk and what she sold for." For these reasons it ought to be held that for all the purposes of this action the value of the ship when damaged cannot exceed what she actually sold for. But even for the purposes of this action the actual price she fetched will not be her exact value, for the price was no doubt enhanced by the repairs done to her before sale, and a proper allowance for these must be made. I merely mention this to prevent its being overlooked.

The sound value of the ship being taken at 4000*l.*, and her damaged value being what she sold for, less such deduction as ought to be made in respect of her repairs before sale, the proportion of loss sustained by the plaintiffs by reason of the depreciation in value of the ship will be ascertained. To this will have to be added whatever other sums are properly chargeable against the underwriters; and when the final proportion of loss on this basis has been arrived at, it must be applied to a ship of the declared value of 3700*l.*, and the defendants' proportion of the loss thus calculated will be what he will have to pay.

Having now explained the principle upon which the amount payable by the defendant is to be ascertained, so far as that amount depends on the point submitted to me, I give judgment for the plaintiffs for such sum as the arbitrator agreed upon shall award to be payable by the defendants, regard being paid to this decision; and I reserve the costs of the action until after he shall have made his award.

ROBERTSON v. AMAZON TUG AND LIGHTERAGE COMPANY LIMITED.

Contract—Ship and shipping—Agreement to perform services with instruments supplied by other party—Implied contract of fitness—Warranty.

Where one party to a contract engages to perform certain services for the other party with the means to be provided by such other party, there is an implied warranty that such means are reasonably fit for the purpose for which they have been provided.

The plaintiff R. R. made an agreement with the defendant company that he would take out from H. to P. a steam-tug towing six barges, together with a small assisting steamer. The defendant company was to provide both the steamers, and R. R. certain of the crew of the steam-tug. The limit of time for the voyage was seventy days. The steam-tug was proved to be quite unfitted for the task of towing the barges across the Atlantic, and the small steamer took refuge at B. during the first storm, and her captain refused to rejoin R. R. In consequence, the voyage lasted 105 days, and three of the barges never reached their destination. R. R. brought this action for loss of time and profit, to which the defendant company answered that he had no cause of action, as he had undertaken the risk of the voyage, and counter-claimed against him for losses alleged to be due through his default or negligence.

Held, that under the circumstances the defendants when providing the means for enabling the plaintiff to carry out his portion of the contract, impliedly undertook that they were reasonably fit for the purpose for which they were supplied, and that the plaintiff had a good cause of action.

FURTHER CONSIDERATION.

This was an action tried before Lord Coleridge, C.J. at Westminster, in April 1878, and reserved for further consideration.

The facts of the case are as follows:

The plaintiff is a master mariner of the merchant navy, and the defendants a registered company; and in June 1877 the defendants were desirous of having six barges towed from the Humber to Para, in the Brazils.

The plaintiff in undertaking the superintendence and management of the voyage signed the following document:

I, Robert Robertson, hereby agree to take steam-tug towing six sailing barges from Hull, and one small steamer from the Downs, the latter named, to assist when required, to Para, Brazils, providing and paying crews of officers, sailors, stokers, and trimmers (forty-one men all told), also provisions for all on board for seventy days, and finding nautical instruments and charts for the navigation of the above said steam tug, steamer, and six barges, the company paying pilotage from Hull to sea. All surplus stores to be left on board to be taken over by and to be the property of the company. I hereby undertake to do all the above, and hold the company harmless in regard to the return of the above crew from Para. Expenses for which shall be borne by me wholly from the date of the arrival of the vessels in Para for the sum of ten hundred and twenty pounds, £100 of which shall be payable to me on signing contract, and a further sum of £600 before leaving Hull, for which I shall give guarantee satisfactory to the company. The balance of £320 to be paid by the company's agent in Para on their being satisfied that no claims exist against the company in regard to me, Captain Robertson, or my crew.

(Signed) ROBERT ROBERTSON.

The defendants provided the steamer Villa Bella as the towing steamer, and the Galopin as assistant steamer. It was proved at the trial that the boiler and engines of the Villa Bella were very much out of order and repair, and that altogether she was not reasonably efficient for the purposes of the voyage.

It was also proved that the Galopin was a small steamer of about three tons burthen, and that when caught in a storm in the Bay of Biscay, her captain left the towing steamer Villa Bella, and put in for shelter at Brest, and refused to join the plaintiff, though subsequently ordered by the defendants to do so. Owing to the slowness of the Villa Bella, the voyage was protracted to a period of 105 days, and frequent stoppages were necessitated. Three of the barges never arrived out at Para, but one was left at Vigo, and two broke away and drifted to Barbados.

The defendants paid the expenses incurred by reason of the voyage being delayed over the seventy days, and had paid the plaintiff the sum of 856*l*. The plaintiff claimed in this action the balance of the 1020*l*., and 1000*l*. as further damages, while the defendants denied their liability to the plaintiff, but counter-claimed against him for a considerable sum as expenses to which they had been put by reason of the non-fulfilment of the contract by the plaintiff, and paid 10*l*. into court as sufficient to satisfy the plaintiff's claim.

Butt, Q.C. (E. Pollock with him) for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff is clearly entitled to maintain this action, and the defendants have no real defence to it; they have brought an action against the shipping company for selling them such a worthless vessel as the Villa Bella, and when they were successful in it the plaintiff brought this action. There are no authorities strictly on this point, but ordinary principles of law would support the plaintiff's contention. The defendants gave the plaintiff a steamer wholly inefficient for the purposes intended, and the small assisting steamer was unfit, and she deserts at the moment when most she is required; either she was unfit, or she improperly deserted; and when ordered to rejoin her captain refused. So utterly unfit were the plaintiff's means for carrying out his part of the contract that the voyage lasted 105 days, and only three of the barges were brought safely to Para. It is not contended that the Villa Bella was reasonably fit. There is no real difference between the present case and that of a charterer chartering a ship which turns out wholly unseaworthy. Are the defendants entitled to send a ship wholly unfitted for the purposes of the voyage?

K. E. Digby for the defendants.—The real contract was that the plaintiff should take out a particular steamer to Para, and it was only an incident that she should tow out these barges with it. The question then is, were the defendants bound to furnish a ship fitted for the voyage, i.e., was there any undertaking on the part of the defendants to the plaintiff that the boilers and engines of this ship were in a fit and proper state for the purposes of the voyage. The plaintiff, if he is to recover at all, must recover on a warranty of reasonable fitness, for the first time. [Coleridge, C.J.—Yes; you go on the general law, but I wish to see if this specific contract is to be so construed. Suppose after entering into this agreement, the plaintiff had come to the conclusion that he could not safely take this ship across the Atlantic, you say he would be bound to go?] Yes; prior to signing the contract he might have seen and examined the ship, but he did not. There is nothing to take this agreement out of the ordinary contract of shipowner and captain:

Couch v. Steel, 23 L. J. 121, Q. B.; 3 El. & Bl. 402.

[Coleridge, C.J.—This is a case of a person engaging to do a particular act with a specified instrument to be supplied by another person.] The plaintiff was hired by the defendants and was to be paid for by the run. Another case in point is

Steel v. Lester and Lilee, 3 Asp. Mar. L. C. 537; 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 642; 3 L. Rep. C. P. Div. 121; 47 L. J 43, C. P.

[Coleridge, C.J.—I do not think it is.] The Villa Bella was not primarily a steam-tug, but was intended for the river Amazon traffic, and as before said, the towing of the barges was a mere incident of the voyage. As to the Galopin, the contract was that she should assist when required; she was under independent command, but to assist when required; there is, however, no warranty or undertaking that she shall continue the whole voyage:

Taylor v. Caldwell, 3 B. & S. 826.

Butt, in reply.—This case differs from Couch v. Steel (ubi sup.). The plaintiff is no servant of the defendants, but a responsible person who is to provide a crew and provisions for a whole fleet; the plaintiff employed his crews, and was their paymaster. The Villa Bella is described in the contract as a "tug," so that disposes of her not being supplied for the purposes of towing these barges to Para. The argument of the defendants amounts to this, that though it was impossible for the plaintiff to perform the contract, yet he may be sued for the non-performance. As to the Galopin, the defendants have clearly committed a breach of contract.

Coleridge, C.J.—The point raised in this case is one of considerable importance, and the contract to be construed is, as far as I am aware, to be construed by the courts for the first time. If there had been any authorities on the point I should have taken them into account as to what judgment I should deliver, and so would have taken time to consider my judgment; but none of the cases cited have any bearing on this case, and I decide at once. This is a most peculiar contract, and I must decide the case on the construction of the contract inter partes; it involves the relationship of one party to a contract who undertakes for a consideration to perform within a specified time certain services with the instrument or means supplied by the other party to the contract for such services. The only two points that arise are, first, whether or not there was any implied contract or undertaking on the part of the defendants that the Villa Bella, the steam tug in question, should be reasonably fit for the duty for which she was to be employed; secondly, have the defendants broken their contract or not by not assisting by means of the second steamer, the small one, the plaintiff when requiring its assistance, as by the contract he was entitled to require. As to the first point we must look to the circumstances of the case for its construction; for such construction it is necessary to consider the different possible interpretations. Its words might receive a different interpretation to that put on them by the plaintiff, and if so looked at might alter the conclusions at which one might arrive. Now the plaintiff was a man who had performed a similar voyage two years before, but with a smaller number of barges, two, I think, and had performed it in safety. It was agreed that he should take this particular steam-tug, the Villa Bella, and it was a contract to take her from Hull to Para. Was there then any contract on the part of the defendants that the Villa Bella was fit for the voyage? I do not wish to represent that there is an absolute warranty that the ship was seaworthy in the general sense of the word. The case of Couch v. Steel (ubi sup.), decided on very good grounds the contrary. The plaintiff undertakes to conduct the fleet across the Atlantic; that is to do under particular circumstances particular work. He furnishes a great deal of the necessaries incidental to the voyage—not the engines or engineers—but he engages the sailors, stokers, and trimmers, from Hull to Para. There must be an undertaking on the part of the defendants that the Villa Bella was reasonably fit to do the work on which she was to be engaged. The plaintiff was entitled to say, "I had an instrument supplied by the defendants to do this work, and such instrument ought to have been reasonably fit to do it." The contrary contention seems full of difficulties, insuperable difficulties to my mind. Suppose the Villa Bella undoubtedly incompetent to fulfil the task assigned to her, and with terrible danger to life, occupies a period beyond all time in the contemplation of the parties, a year we will say, instead of seventy days; yet the captain would be liable, and he would be met with the statement, "You took the risk and must abide by it," so that nothing could he recover for the valuable time spent by him, and for losses incurred by making good the defects, and paying for expenses brought about by the protracted voyage. If the plaintiff at an earlier stage had made himself acquainted with the state of this steamer, and had refused to perform the duties imposed on him on the ground of the impossibility of carrying out the contract, it was said in argument that he would be held liable for such refusal. Now, either the grounds of his refusal would be no answer—the impossibility being short of a physical impossibility; or they would be an answer to an action at the suit of the defendant company. This shows that there was an implied contract on the part of the defendants that the Villa Bella should be fit for the purposes of the voyage, and, therefore, an undertaking on the part of the defendants that the Villa Bella should be reasonably fit for the services the plaintiff undertook to perform in her. Secondly, as to the Galopin. The defendants did agree to provide a steamer to assist the plaintiff in towing the barges, but the Galopin did not assist, but on the first rough weather left him and steamed back to Brest, because, it is said, it would have been dangerous to the lives of those on board to continue out in the open while such a storm was raging. This reason might be valid between the captain of the Galopin and his employers, but not between the plaintiff and the defendants. She was required to assist but did not. Further, should I be wrong as to that particular incident of the Galopin's conduct, and the reason assigned be an answer to the plaintiff's contention, there is yet the other point to be considered, namely the refusal of the Galopin's captain to rejoin the plaintiff which is a complete answer. If the defendants sued the master of the Galopin, he might have an answer to the suit; but what in his mouth might be a good defence to such action cannot avail the defendants in resisting the claim now made upon them by the plaintiff. On both grounds, therefore, I must give judgment against the defendants, to the effect that this action is maintainable. The question of amount must be considered elsewhere.

SWANSTON v. LISHMAN.

ON APPEAL FROM SIR R. PHILLIMORE.

Shipowners—Co-ownership—Action against managing owner—Discovery of documents—Partnership.

In an action against a managing owner of ships for an account he cannot protect himself against setting out books and documents relating to the ship accounts in his affidavit of documents, or in answer to interrogatories, by alleging that the account and books are kept by a firm of which he is a member, and that the action is brought against him in his individual capacity only, but he must discover all documents, whether in his possession or in that of his firm.

THIS was an appeal against a decision of Sir R. Phillimore, sitting in the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division, refusing to order further and better answers to interrogatories.

The action was brought by the plaintiff as part owner in several ships against the defendant as managing owner of the same ships, for an account. The statement of claim alleged that the defendant was managing owner of the ships, and as such received the earnings and made the disbursements thereof, and also received insurance moneys and purchase moneys in respect of certain of the ships, and that the defendant had been applied to for accounts, and had refused to render them, and that accounts were outstanding between the plaintiff and the defendant, and the plaintiff claimed that the defendant should be ordered to file proper accounts in the registry, or render the same to the plaintiff, and that the accounts should be referred to the registrar and merchants, and the balance (if any) found due to the plaintiff should be paid to the plaintiff by the defendant. In his statement of defence the defendant admitted that he was managing owner of the ships, but denied that he had ever received any moneys or made any disbursements in respect of them, and he denied that any application had been made to him by the plaintiff for accounts, and that there were any accounts outstanding.

On the 6th April 1881 the defendant made the usual affidavit of discovery, in which he said that the only documents in his possession were the papers in the action, and further that "all accounts relating to the ships mentioned in the writ herein were kept by Messrs. John Hall & Co., the brokers and agents employed by the ships named in the writ herein, and the said John Hall and Co. have the said accounts and documents," and that, "in my individual capacity, in which alone I am sued in this action, I have had no transactions with the plaintiff respecting the matters in question in this action."

The plaintiff thereupon administered to the defendant interrogatories, in the answers to which the defendant admitted that he was a member of the firm of John Hall and Co., that he was registered as managing owner of the ships in question, but only nominally; that he did not individually manage the ships, but the firm of John Hall and Co. managed them on behalf of the co-owners, and that the said firm received all the moneys, and made all the disbursements relating to the said ships. The fifth and sixth interrogatories were as follows:

5. Did not the said firm during the periods in the statement of claim mentioned, and do they not now keep certain, and if so what, books, papers, and documents containing entries and particulars of all receipts and disbursements relating to the ships in the statement of claim mentioned, or to some, and which of them, and by what names or titles does the said firm call the said books, papers, and writings, and each of them respectively?

6. Are not the said books, papers, and writings, in your custody, or under your control as a member of the said firm, and have you not as such member access to the same, and if not, why not?

The defendant answered these interrogatories as follows:

5. I decline to answer the fifth and sixth interrogatories, as they are irrelevant to the subject-matter of this action, which is brought against me in my individual capacity, and not as one of the members of the said firm of John Hall and Company.

The plaintiff then took out a summons, calling upon the defendant to show cause why he should not deliver further and better answers to the fifth and sixth interrogatories. This summons was heard in court on the 5th July 1881, and the judge, after hearing counsel on both sides, refused to make any order, and condemned the plaintiff in the costs of the summons.

From this decision the plaintiff appealed.

J. P. Aspinall, for the appellant, stated the facts, and was then stopped by the Court.

Dr. Phillimore for the respondent.—It cannot be material to this action to set out what books are in the possession of John Hall and Co. The action is against the defendant alone, and the fact that he is a member of the firm does not oblige him to discover his firm's books. [Jessel, M.R.—You admit that the defendant is an accounting party. Can you refuse to discover books because some other persons are also accounting parties with you? You cannot get rid of your obligation in this way.] The books would only show that John Hall and Co. had an account with the plaintiff, not that the defendant alone had an account. [Jessel, M.R.—How can you say that? The plaintiff may find, on opening the books, that an account was kept between the plaintiff and the defendant. He must have the chance of seeing that. There is no rule plainer than that a person, whether a partner or not, must discover all books which relate to the matters in question, whether he is accountable alone or with others.] In the case of Murray v. Walter (Craig & Phillips, 114), it was held that discovery would not be enforced against a partner of documents which were in the joint possession of himself and of the other partners. [Jessel, M.R.—That related to production of documents, and not to discovery. The rule as to discovery is the exact contrary to that as to production. You must set out every document you have in your possession, whether you are bound to produce them or not, and I have even known a Chancery judge threaten to order a defendant to set out verbatim all relevant portions of documents where he attempted to protect himself against production by alleging joint possession of himself and partners. Besides, in this case the plaintiff really sets up that the firm of John Hall and Co. were the defendant's agents to keep the ship's accounts.] I submit that the court will not order discovery where production will not be ordered hereafter.

The Court ordered that the defendant should make further and better answers to the fifth and sixth interrogatories setting out all the documents in the possession of John Hall and Co. relating to the ships in question, and that the plaintiff should have the costs of the appeal and of the summons in the court below.

Ship and shipping—Jettison of deck cargo—Claim to contribution—Contract with shipowner.

Where a general ship is carrying cargo both above and below deck, and there is no custom to carry goods on deck and the voyage is not a coasting voyage, the owner of the deck cargo that has been necessarily jettisonep in the course of a voyage can have no claim for contribution against the shipowner or the other cargo owners, although the contract between him and the shipowner specifies that the goods are to be carried on deck.

Johnson v. Chapman (2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 404; 19 C. B. N. S. 563) distinguished. (a) Judgment of Lush and Manisty, JJ. reversed.

These were two actions brought by cattle-dealers carrying on business in America against the owners of the British steamship Gladys for a general average contribution under the following circumstances. In April 1878 the following agreement was entered into between the plaintiff Wright, and Tucker and Co. acting for the defendants:

It is this day mutually agreed between Joshua T. Tucker and Co., agents of the British steamer Gladys, now lying in the port of New York, of the first part, and George Wright, party of the second part, that the party of the first part agrees to let to the party of the second part, the upper deck of the steamer Gladys, except so much as is necessary for the proper working of the vessel in the master's judgment, for a cargo of cattle to be landed at Portsmouth, England; and the party of the second part agrees to furnish the said vessel not exceeding one hundred (100) head of cattle, or as many as the master decides to take, and to pay the said vessel in advance, on signing bills of lading, the sum of four pounds fifteen shillings (4*l.* 15*s.*) per head. Vessel not responsible for mortality or accident of any nature or kind, and only to supply necessary water for the cattle—the party of the second part furnishing fodder, fittings, and attendants, vessel giving free passage and victual to attendants, not exceeding five, and cabin passage and fare for one superintendent. The said party of the second part also agree to pay the master a gratuity of twenty pounds (20*l.*) Br. stg. on signing bill of lading.

Cattle to be put on board and landed at risk and expense of party of second part, and to be taken from alongside vessel immediately on arrival at Portsmouth.

New York, 17th April 1878.

In pursuance of this agreement the plaintiff Wright shipped on board the Gladys fifty-three head of cattle. The plaintiff Gordon, under an agreement with Wright and the defendants, shipped forty-seven head of cattle. The plaintiffs received a bill of lading in the ordinary form, providing that the cattle should be delivered in good order and condition, "the dangers of the seas only excepted." It contained in the margin the following memorandum:

Not accountable for mortality, or for any accident or injury of any kind or nature whatever.

During the voyage a storm arose, and the master threw overboard all the cattle; they having been shipped on the deck in accordance with the contract.

The action came on for trial before Brett, L.J., but, there being no dispute as to the necessity of the jettison of the cattle for the safety of the ship, the facts were not gone into, and the Lord Justice directed a verdict and judgment to be entered for the plaintiff, on the authority of Johnson v. Chapman (19 C. B. N. S. 563; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 404).

The Queen's Bench Division (Lush and Manisty, JJ.) having refused a rule for a new trial, the defendants appealed.

The Court of Appeal (Lord Coleridge, L.C.J., Bramwell and Baggallay, L.JJ.) granted a rule for a new trial on the ground that the Lord Justice had misdirected the jury, by telling them that the plaintiffs were legally entitled to claim general average for the jettison of the deck cargo under the contract between the parties.

The rule now came on for argument.

March 15.—C. Russell, Q.C., and Bigham, for the plaintiffs, showed cause.—The first question is, whether the defendants escaped liability by reason of this being a deck cargo. All the cases go upon some usage, which amounted to notice to the shipowner that the goods were being carried on the deck, except Johnson v. Chapman (2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 404; 35 L. J. 23, C. P.), which went upon contract. It was held that the shipowners had assented in that case. In 2 Parsons on Marine Insurance, c. 5, s. 3, p. 218, n. 2, it is said that "the reason why, for goods laden on deck, neither contribution nor general average in case of ejection can be claimed, is, that they themselves increase the danger of the navigation, and are taken on board under an implied agreement that they shall be sacrificed, if it be necessary to eject." Again, in Goold v. Oliver 2 M. & Gr. 225, n.): "The reason why this article refuses compensation for goods on the deck being damaged or thrown overboard is that, as they must necessarily embarrass the working of the ship, the presumption is that they were thrown overboard before any absolute necessity of so doing, and merely because they hindered and embarrassed the working of the ship." These reasons do not apply where the deck-load does not increase the danger of navigation, as in the case of steamers; and, where the reasons do not apply, the rule does not. Secondly, if the jettison of the deck cargo gives rise to a claim in general average, what interests must contribute? There does not seem any ground for saying that owners of cargo under the deck must contribute. But, if the principle is that the calculation of general average is to be, not of the interests saved, but of the interests saved of those that were parties to the arrangement, it seems to follow that each of these parties to the arrangement should contribute to the loss according to their respective shares as if there were no other interests saved. They cited Milward v. Hibbert 3 Q. B. 120; 11 L. J. 137, Q. B.

Benjamin, Q.C., and Myburgh (with them Gully, Q.C.), for the defendants, in support of the rule.—The owner of a deck-load is not entitled to general average. The underwriters think it is of the utmost importance that the law on this point should be the same in England as it is in all other civilised countries. This is not so much a contract of carriage as a demise of the upper deck. The law does not encourage the carrying of a deck cargo, except where there is a custom, and therefore does not allow a claim for contribution to the owner of deck cargo except by custom. In all the cases cited, except Johnson v. Chapman (ubi sup.), there was a custom: the custom rebuts the impropriety. The only question argued in Johnson v. Chapman was whether the timber had become a wreck before it was jettisoned; the dictum of Willes, J. was not the ground of the decision. [Lord Coleridge, L.C.J.—In Milward v. Hibbert (ubi sup.) Lord Denman says: "The practice appears to have been, not to lay it down as law, that as to goods stowed on deck, the owners of them shall be excluded from the benefit of general average, but to receive the evidence of commercial men respecting the usage of trade, the general understanding of those engaged in it, and in insuring, which may obviously vary, and require from time to time fresh evidence and different explanations. . . . . Now it is obvious that there may be valid reasons for stowing goods on deck; indeed some goods could be stowed in no other place, such as timber, and, on some voyages, live animals; and they may certainly be there stowed with proper skill and care, so as not to be in the way of the crew in their operations. These matters of fact may vary with every different trade, or even with every single adventure. The danger of a crew being tempted to throw overboard goods on deck before the ship is in danger is quite insufficient; that danger must depend on their weight and bulk, the manner of stowage, and many other particulars. The argument would prove too much; for it would apply to whatever goods may be nearest at hand, and consequently likely to be the soonest sacrificed." That is quite as much in point as Johnson v. Chapman (ubi sup.). There was no custom alleged there.] All that was held in Millward v. Hibbert was that the mere fact of goods being stowed on deck is not a good plea, because they may be stowed on deck under a usage which will entitle them to general average. In an American case, decided in 1854, Lawrence v. Minturn (17 Howard Rep. 100), Curtis, J., delivering the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States says: "The courts of this country and England, and the writers on this subject, have treated the owner of goods on deck, with his consent, as not having a claim on the master or owners of the ship, in case of jettison. The received law on the point is expressed by Chancellor Kent, with his usual precision, in 3 Com. 240: 'Nor is the carrier in that case (jettison of deck load) responsible to the owner, unless the goods were stowed on deck without the consent of the owner, or a general custom binding them, and then he would be chargeable with the loss.' . . . . The law which we intend to lay down is this: that if the vessel is seaworthy to carry a cargo under deck, and there was no general custom to carry such goods on deck in such a voyage, and the loss is to be attributed solely to the fact that the goods were on deck, and their owner had consented to their being there, he has no recourse against the master, owners, or vessel, for a jettison rendered necessary for the common safety, by a storm, though that storm, in all possibility, would have produced no injurious effect on the vessel if not thus laden." [Lord Coleridge, C.J.—But he says afterwards: "His right to contribution is not involved in this case."] The principles laid down are as applicable to a claim to contribution as they were to the claim in that case, which was against a shipowner for damages for non-delivery of a deck cargo on the ground of the breach of an implied contract that the ship was able to carry a particular deck load. It is said here that the consent of the shipowner has the same effect as usage; but the two things are entirely different. It would really be a subject of regret if England stood alone in her jurisprudence on this subject. They cited

Cur. adv. vult.

May 16.—The judgment of the court (Lord Coleridge, L.C.J., Bramwell and Baggallay, L.JJ.) was delivered by Bramwell, L.J.—In these cases the plaintiffs seek to recover against the defendants, ship and freight owners, a contribution as or in the nature of general average in respect of the goods of the plaintiffs jettisoned for the safety of ship and cargo. It is all-important to note that the plaintiffs' goods were deck cargo, loaded on deck with their assent, on a general ship, not one chartered to them, no doubt at a lower freight than if they had been, as we suppose they might have been, below deck; and that there is no custom alleged bearing upon the case. Now, when such sacrifice is made, as was here, for the common good, as a rule it comes within general average, and must be borne proportionately "by those interested." It is not necessary to say what is the origin or principle of the rule, but, to judge from the way it is claimed in England, it would seem to arise from an implied contract inter se, to contribute "by those interested." To this rule there is an exception, viz., deck cargo jettisoned is not entitled to general average contribution. There, again, the reason or principle is perhaps not important. Such is the law. The reason, amongst others, however, assigned is, that deck cargo is a dangerous cargo, certain to be jettisoned before any other, and liable to be unduly jettisoned owing to the facility of doing it when cargo under hatches would not be. So that if we treat general average as matter of implied contract, that ought not to be implied where risk and benefit are not in fair proportion. If as a matter of positive law that is the reason which caused the exception, then if the goods jettisoned are loaded on deck without the shippers' consent, the shipowner is liable to the goods' owner; if with his consent, still other cargo owners will not be. To this exception, however, there are two exceptions, which perhaps resolve themselves into one, viz., that coasting vessels are without the exception, and also those cases where by custom the deck cargo is one customary in the trade, and perhaps also from the port. It is said that there is a further exception, viz., where by agreement with the shipper the cargo is shipped on deck. We are of a different opinion. In the first place the exception is stated by all writers and authorities as extending to the case of deck cargo, whether loaded on deck with or without the owner's consent. It is put in a dilemma: that if without, there is a remedy against the shipowner; if with, it is the act of the cargo owner that has made his goods subject to extra risk, so that it is not fair that other cargo should be on a footing with his. No reason can be given for the claim as of general average. It struck me for the moment that there was no difference between a custom and a particular agreement, because customs are incorporated in agreements, unless expressly negatived, and are therefore part of them. But to this the obvious answer was given by Mr. Benjamin that, whatever may be the agreement between deck cargo owner and shipowner, the other cargo owners are no parties to it, nor bound to inquire into it, or notice it, as they are bound to take notice of a custom. Then it is said that it is established by authority. We think it is not. We are dealing now with the plaintiffs' claim as one of general average, that is to say, of a right to contribution from ship, freight, and cargo. The first case relied on is Milward v. Hibbert (3 Q.B. 120). That was an action against underwriters by shipowners to recover what the shipowners had had to pay as a contribution by way of general average for goods jettisoned; and all that was decided was, that a plea saying that it was a deck cargo which was jettisoned was bad, "for not shewing that such loading was improper under the circumstances." It may be observed that the voyage was a coasting voyage, viz., from Waterford to London. The judgment begins (p. 131): "The plea assumes that in no case whatever can the shipowner recover from the underwriter the value of goods loaded on deck." It then discusses a passage in an edition of Lord Tenterden on Shipping, published after his death, showing it varies from what was said in editions in his lifetime, and says that the general rule is not so large as is stated in the later edition. The judgment then proceeds (p. 136): "Now it is obvious there may be other and valid reasons for stowing goods on deck," and finishes thus: "It seems to the court, for the reason assigned, that the mere fact of stowing them on deck will not relieve the underwriter from responsibility, inasmuch as they may be placed there according to the usage of trade, and so as not to impede the navigation or in any way increase the risk." It was not averred in the plea that there was no such usage and that the risk was increased, and so the plea was held bad. That case has no bearing on the present: consistently with the plea there might have been and in fact probably was, the custom. Here we know there was none. The other case relied on by the plaintiffs was Johnson v. Chapman (19 C. B. N. S. 563). That was not a case of general average. The plaintiffs had chartered the defendants' ship, loaded the whole cargo, part of which by the charter was to be and was deck cargo, and were held entitled to a contribution from the ship, and with reason. They were not seeking it from other cargo owners, but from the shipowner, who shared the benefit and ought in reason to share the risk of the deck cargo. As Mr. Benjamin pointed out the counsel for the shipowner never contested the plaintiffs' right if it was a case of sacrifice. The counsel for the plaintiffs indeed did contend for what was not contested: why one cannot see, unless to show that though deck cargo, it was not wreck but sacrificed. But what is the judgment. "The question is, what is wreck?" (p. 581). Willes, J. discusses that. Then he says (p. 583): "In this case there was a deck cargo, and the first observation naturally would arise upon its being a deck cargo, and upon the exception with regard to deck cargoes, but that is taken out of the case most effectually by reference to the charter-party. This is an action by the shippers of cargo against the shipowner, and the charter-party contemplates a deck cargo. It is not suggested that there is any statute to make a deck cargo illegal, therefore it seems something more than custom to have deck cargoes. I think it was from Quebec, but it is not necessary to refer to any custom affecting the voyage, because according to the contract between the parties, there was to be a deck cargo. Then immediately you find that the deck cargo is within the contemplation of the parties, you must deal with it as if shipping a deck cargo was lawful. When you have established that it is a deck cargo lawfully there by the contract of the parties, it becomes subject to the rule of general average." Now certainly that last sentence gives some colour to the plaintiffs' contention. But the learned judge should be understood as speaking in relation to the subject-matter. It was not a claim for general average as against any other than the shipowner. It was a particular claim against him, and it is said to be subject to the "rule" of general average. If Willes, J. had said that it could have been maintained against other cargo owners, had there been any, it would have been wholly extra judicial, for there were none. But he did not say nor mean to say so. For he says, "The deck cargo was within the contemplation of the parties," which would not be true of other cargo owners. The case then was not one of general average. It was as though the plaintiffs were owners of such cargo, and A. owner of other cargo, and A. had agreed to contribute if deck cargo was jettisoned. In the case before us Mr. Russell felt the difficulty of maintaining the claim as one of general average, viz., one to which ship and other cargo should contribute. "For," said he "if you hold other cargo not liable to contribute, at all events do not take it into account as diminishing what ship and freight are to contribute." Now, it seems to us, there is positively no reason nor colour of authority for saying other cargo owners should contribute here. They are bound by no agreement they have made. But then it may be said, and Mr. Russell so contended in the alternative, "Let ship and freight contribute in some proportion." It remains to consider whether the claim in this form can be maintained; that is to say, not as one of general average, but of particular right against the shipowner to contribution. It is put in two ways: first, as though there was not other cargo; secondly, as though there was the value, though not liable to contribute, to be taken into account in ascertaining what ship and freight should contribute. First let us consider the claim to contribution against ship and freight owner as though there was other cargo not, however, to be made liable. Now, why should the shipowner be taken to have agreed, that when deck cargo was sacrificed, not for his exclusive benefit, but for the benefit of him and others, he would bear a proportion of loss as though he alone was benefitted? There is no general law or rule of general average applicable to such a case. To maintain the plaintiff's claim one must imply a particular agreement by the defendants; that if the plaintiffs' cattle were jettisoned for the common good, the defendants would bear a loss proportioned to the value of their ship and freight as compared with the cattle, i.e., ship and freight worth 99,000*l.*, cattle worth 1000*l.*, other cargo 1,000,000*l.*; defendants are to pay ninety-nine per cent. of the loss. Why? We see no reason. In the case of Johnson v. Chapman (ubi sup.), the plaintiffs and defendants got all the benefit from the jettison; not so here. In that case all subject to general average was brought into the account; here it would not be. Then take the other way the claim is presented, viz., the claim to recover from ship and freight owners such a sum as the plaintiffs would get from them if entitled to general average from all. To take the figures as before, plaintiffs' cattle 1000., ship and freight 90,000*l.*, other cargo 1,000,000*l.* plaintiffs would be entitled to about 90*l.* from defendants. Again we ask why, and for what reason? There cannot be a doubt that the cattle freight was less than it would have been if they had been, as we have said we suppose they might have been, under deck. Here again there is no general law or rule applicable to the case, an agreement must be implied, and we ought not to imply agreements, which parties can expressly make if they please, without some very strong reason for so doing. We see none, nor authority. We prefer to hold that the plaintiffs shipped their cattle as they did, without bargaining for compensation from any one if they were jettisoned, and must bear all the loss themselves, at least without such rights to contribution as they are now claiming. We must add, we think it very undesirable our law should differ from that of other nations, as we think it would if we decided otherwise. There is no authority in our law that we can find to justify the claim in any of the three ways in which it is made, while the law and practice of foreign countries are decidedly to the contrary: (Parsons' Maritime Law, 307; Emerigon, c. 12, s. 42.) The latter expressly says there is no remedy against the master, if with consent of the merchant the goods are on deck. See also Lowndes on Average, and the various codes cited by him, some of which, however, seem to make no distinction as to deck cargoes. It is to be remembered that the plaintiffs make no complaint of any breach of the contract to carry, no complaint that their goods were improperly jettisoned, or that other goods might have been jettisoned with equal advantage to the ship, the owner of which might have been entitled to general average, or the jettison of which or part of which might have diminished the necessary jettison of the plaintiffs' goods. Their claim is for general average or contribution in the nature of general average. We are of opinion that the judgment must be reversed. This judgment is not in opposition to any opinion of the learned judge at the trial. He expressed none; the facts were not even stated to him. He was asked to and did give judgment for the plaintiffs, to raise the question which has been discussed here.

Judgment reversed.

BRADFORD v. SYMONDSON.

Marine insurance—Re-insurance—Policy made after ship's arrival—Lost or not lost—Contract made in ignorance of facts—Risk—Attachment of risk—Insurable interest.

A voyage policy effected by way of re-insurance on the cargo of a vessel, lost or not lost, which has, unknown to both parties, arrived at the port of destination, and landed her cargo undamaged before the making of the policy, is a good contract of insurance, and the underwriter is entitled to the premium which the assured has agreed to pay.

A. insured a cargo by the Alata, lost or not lost, from P. to R. Subsequently, and after the Alata was due at R., A. effected a re-insurance of the cargo with B. for the same voyage and risk at a high premium. At the time of the re-insurance the Alata had arrived at R., and discharged her cargo undamaged, but both A. and B. were in ignorance of this. In an action by B. for the premium which A. had agreed to pay:

Held, that B. was entitled to recover: (1) The voyage having commenced under the conditions necessary to make the underwriters liable, the risk attached, although the chance of loss during the performance of the voyage was at an end. (2) (Bramwell, L.J. dubitante) As the risk attached, it followed that A. had an insurable interest, his interest as soon as the second policy attached being precisely the same as that of the cargo-owner under the first policy.

THIS was an action by an underwriter at Lloyd's to recover a premium of seventy-five guineas per cent. upon a policy of marine insurance effected by the defendant.

The statement of claim alleged that on the 23rd Dec. 1879 the defendant effected a policy of marine insurance, in the ordinary form, for 1500*l.*, at a premium of seventy-five guineas per cent., on cargo by the vessel Alata, lost or not lost, at and from Philadelphia to Rochfort, against risks and perils of the seas, and all other perils, losses or misfortunes that had or should come to the hurt, or detriment or damage of the said subject-matter of re-insurance or any part thereof, and the said policy was therein declared to be a re-insurance.

The 5th paragraph of the statement of defence was as follows:

On the 14th of November 1879 the Alata arrived at Rochfort, and the said insured voyage was at an end, and the risk under the said policy had run off, and there was no longer any risk or liability of any kind under the said policy, and neither the defendant nor the Phœnix Insurance Company had any interest at risk, or was under any liability of any kind in respect of the Alata or under the said policy.

The following admissions were agreed upon between the parties:

1. That, on the 3rd of October 1879, the Phœnix Insurance Company of New York executed the policy of insurance of that date, marked "A." on cargo by the Alata, from Philadelphia to Rochfort, and became liable to the assured in respect of the risks covered thereby.

2. That, on the 23rd of December, the defendant, a broker at Lloyd's, effected with the plaintiff the policy marked "B.," which was executed by the plaintiff.

3. That the said policy, marked "B.," was effected by the defendant, as agent for the said Phœnix Insurance Company of New York, for their use and benefit, and on their account, as a re-insurance on the said cargo which they had so insured by the policy marked "A."

4. That the Alata sailed from Philadelphia to Rochfort on the 1st of October 1879, with the said cargo on board, and that, after she had sailed, nothing had been heard of her by any of the said parties until after the policy marked "B." was effected.

5. That the ordinary course of a voyage from Philadelphia to Rochfort is six weeks.

6. That the said vessel arrived safely at Rochfort on the 14th of November 1879, discharged the cargo, and sailed thence on the 18th of December 1879, no claim of liability having arisen on the said policy marked "A.," and that, at the time of effecting the said policy marked "B.," the plaintiff and the Phœnix Insurance Company did not know of the arrival and of the safety of the said vessel and her cargo.

7. That the defendant has not paid to the plaintiff the premium of seventy-five guineas per cent.

The action was tried by Lord Coleridge, C.J., without a jury, and he gave judgment for the plaintiff. The defendant now appealed.

Benjamin, Q.C. and French for the defendant.—The plaintiff ran no risk, as the goods had arrived safely long before the re-insurance was effected; he cannot, therefore, recover the premium. In Tyrie v. Fletcher (2 Cowp. 666) Lord Mansfield says that there is a general rule established that "Where the risk has not been run, whether its not having been run was owing to the fault, pleasure, or will of the insured, or to any other cause, the premium shall be returned; because a policy of insurance is a contract of indemnity. The underwriter receives a premium for running the risk of indemnifying the assured, and whatever cause it be owing to, if he does not run the risk, the consideration for which the premium or money was put into his hands fails, and therefore he ought to return it." [Bramwell, L.J.—There is a distinction between the cases supposed there and this case. Lord Mansfield is referring to cases where the risk has never attached. Brett, L.J.—The question here would be lost or not lost within the time mentioned in the policy; it does not matter when the policy is made.] If the party insuring can possibly lose at the time that the policy is made, then it is good. [Brett, L.J.—You do not rely on the fact of the vessel having returned, but on the fact of the vessel having returned in safety.] Exactly. In Oom v. Bruce (12 East, 225) Lord Ellenborough says: "There is no reason why they should not recover back the premiums which they have paid for an insurance from which, without any fault imputable to themselves, they could never have derived any benefit." It is admitted that if a loss had occurred during the voyage the policy would have attached. That is provided for by the insertion of the words "lost or not lost;" and it is put upon that ground in Sutherland v. Pratt (11 M. & W. 296), by Baron Parke, who says, "The simple question is, whether it is any answer to an action on a policy on goods (lost or not lost), that the interest in them was not acquired until after the loss. We are of opinion that it is not. Such a policy is clearly a contract of indemnity against all past as well as all future losses sustained by the assured, in respect to the interest insured. It operates just in the same way as if the plaintiff having purchased goods at sea, the defendant, for a premium, had agreed that, if the goods had at the time of the purchase sustained any damage by perils of the sea, he would make it good." In 1 Parsons on Insurance, 505, the law on the subject is thus laid down: "The premium, although due and payable in one sense as soon as the policy is made, is, in another, not due unless that risk is incurred for insurance against which the premium is paid. If, therefore, there be no such risk, the premium cannot be claimed if it has not been paid, and, if it has been paid by cash or by a note, it must be returned. This rule gives to the insured the power of avoiding the contract, in whole or in part, after it is made; because this contract is, substantially, a promise by the insurers to indemnify the insured against a certain risk, if that risk be incurred, and a promise of the insured in return to pay the premium to the insurers if their promise of indemnity attaches. If no part of the risk attaches, either because no part of the goods is shipped, or because no part of the voyage takes place, or because the insurance was predicated on a fact about which the parties were mistaken, or because the insured had no interest, or because the vessel was unseaworthy and consequently the risk never attached, the whole premium is returnable. And, generally, the premium is to be returned if the risk never commenced on account of a breach of warranty." The same author recognises the fact that an insurer may be liable for a loss that has already been incurred: "The insurers can, if such be the intention and agreement, make themselves responsible for a loss which has already happened when the policy is made" (2 Parsons on Insurance, 44). But that rests, as he says, on the express agreement of the parties. In 2 Arnould on Insurance, 5th edit. 1057, the law is laid down as follows: "In case the risk had no inception, whatever may have been the cause, even the neglect or fault of the assured himself, provided it be not his actual fraud, the premium is by law to be returned. The general law maritime agrees with our own on this point, and is based on the same principles." In 1 Arnould on Insurance, 5th edit., 235, speaking of the clauses of the policy, it is said. "As policies are frequently effected on ships and goods whilst they are in foreign ports, or at sea, it being then uncertain whether they be not actually lost before the policy is effected, these words, 'lost or not lost,' are inserted as a matter of course." It is true that the author goes on to say, "The clause, however, though never omitted, does not appear to be in all cases strictly necessary." On the other side, the following passage in 2 Park on Insurance, c. xix., 8th edit., p. 766, will be relied on: "If the ship be arrived before the policy is made, and the underwriter is acquainted with the arrival, but the insured is not, it should seem the latter will be entitled to have his premium restored, on the ground of fraud. But, if both parties be ignorant of the arrival, and the policy be (as it usually is) "lost or not lost," I think, in that case, the underwriter should retain it, because, under such a policy, if the ship had been lost at the time of subscribing, he would have been liable to pay the amount of his subscription." That is the doctrine of Pothier, Emerigon, and the other civil law writers, but it does not prevail here. If it did, Oom v. Bruce and Hentig v. Staniforth (5 M. & S. 122; 4 Camp. 270) were wrongly decided. [Brett, L.J.—Here the risk was run during the time insured, but was not running at the time the policy was made. In Oom v. Bruce the risk was never run.] The second point is, that the ship having arrived, the defendant's interest in it was at an end; he had, therefore, at the time of the making of the policy, no insurable interest. If so, he cannot be called upon to pay the premium. "The rule in fact is, that, if through mistake, mis-information, or any other innocent cause, an insurance be made without any interest whatsoever, the assured is entitled to recover back the whole premium:" (2 Arnould on Insurance, 5th edit., p. 1066.) [Bramwell, L.J.—If the defendant had known of the arrival of the ship, he had no insurable interest, and could not have insured. Does it make any difference that he did not know?] It is submitted that it does not. When he agreed to pay this premium he had no insurable interest. The two questions—viz., whether the risk ever attached, and whether the defendant had an insurable interest—are not the same. Because, if as a matter of fact the risk was over, then there was no insurable interest. The state of a man's mind cannot be looked to to see if he has an insurable interest. That depends on the facts. That both parties thought the ship still ran a risk cannot really affect either question. [Baggallay, L.J.—We must regard the fact of the high premium that was paid. Will not a reasonable construction of the words "lost or not lost" cover the facts of this case? No doubt it would be something in the nature of a wager; but is not that what it really amounts to?] They also cited

Routh v. Thompson, 11 East. 428.

Cohen, Q.C. and Hollams for the plaintiff.—A policy of insurance covers past as well as future losses. It is said that the cargo having arrived safely the policy is void. There is no such condition expressed in the policy, and none such will be implied by the law. In the cases of Oom v. Bruce and Hentig v. Staniforth, cited on the other side, the policy had never attached. Here it did attach. For the purpose of the argument the defendant may be treated as the owner of the cargo, it makes no difference that he was only the insurer. [Brett, L.J.—Can a time policy be made to cover a time which is at an end when the policy is made?] Yes, unless the Stamp Acts prevent it. It is said that it makes no difference what is in the mind of the parties; but it makes all the difference. Concealment or even innocent misrepresentation makes the contract void. It is not a question whether any risk is in fact run or not. No risk is run if the ship has gone to the bottom before the insurance is made; yet in such a case the policy is admittedly good. It is said that the consideration has wholly failed here; but it has not. The consideration for the premium is the undertaking to indemnify against past and future losses; and the underwriter in this case did undertake so to indemnify. The consideration is not that he will in any event indemnify, because there may be nothing to indemnify. Sutherland v. Pratt, and the passage cited by the other side from Parke, B.'s judgment in that case, is directly in favour of the plaintiff's contention here. It shows the construction to be put on the words "lost or not lost." In 3 Kent's Commentaries, 12th edit., p. 259, there is the follwing passage: "The form of the policy in England and the United States contains the words 'lost or not lost;' and if the subject insured be lost or has arrived in safety when the contract is made, it is still valid if made in ignorance of the event, and the insurer must pay the loss or not pay it as the case may be. This is laid down by the foreign jurists as a general principle of insurance, without reference to those words which are said to be peculiar to the English policies." In many French policies there occurred, according to Emerigon, the words bonnes ou mauvaises nouvelles; and it is said that "lost or not lost" is merely a translation of that. In 2 Arnould on Insurance, 5th edit., 1064, the author says: "It never has been doubted, and indeed on principle is abundantly clear, that the premium must be returned whenever the policy is rendered void by the fraud of the underwriter. As if an insurance be made on a certain voyage 'lost or not lost, when the underwriter, at the time he subscribes the policy, privately knows that the ship has arrived safe, he will be bound to restore the premium." The instance there given is from the case of Carter v. Boehm (3 Burr. 1905, 9), where Lord Mansfield says: "The policy would equally be void against the underwriter, if he concealed; as if he insured a ship on her voyage which he privately knew to be arrived; and an action would lie to cover the premium." It is a fair inference that, in the opinion of Lord Mansfield and of Arnould, if the fact of arrival was not known to the underwriter, the premium would not be recoverable. The French and German law is in accordance with the plaintiff's contention: (French Code de Commerce, Art. 366, 7; German Code, Art. 789.) There is also an authority in English law directly in point, but not reported. (a) In the present case it is not accurate to say that the insurance was effected upon the supposition that the voyage was not at an end; it was doubtful. The evidence at the trial was that the underwriter said, "I think there is a very good chance of the ship's arrival not having been reported. I will do it on the chance." [Benjamin, Q.C.—That evidence was objected to as being conversation. Brett, L.J.—I suppose Mr. Cohen says that a policy made on a ship overdue is always made on the assumption that she may have arrived. But is that so? Is not the assumption that she has not arrived, but that she may not be lost? Bramwell, L.J.—Supposing she was not overdue, but by a very fast passage she had arrived the day before? Brett, L.J.—Does not overdue mean that she has not arrived?] No, overdue only means not yet heard of. As to the admissibility of the evidence that is objected to, there is no contract in writing here to pay the premium. The policy says that the premium is paid. It has been held that the underwriter cannot recover the premium from the assured, even if he is a party to the policy. The contract to pay the premium is a contract on the part of the broker who effects the insurance, and the policy is not the contract, although it is evidence of it. As to the other point, there was an insurable interest here. There is no distinction between the owner and the underwriter of the cargo. If no goods are shipped the premium (if it has been paid) is recoverable, because there never was a time when the assured could have suffered loss. [Baggallay, L.J.—The argument on the other side goes to this extent, that if there was found to be 20*l.* worth of damage to the goods, the plaintiff would be entitled to receive the premium; but if no damage, he is not entitled to it.] A policy of re-insurance attaches from the moment that the original policy of insurance attaches. There is no distinction, such as is attempted to be drawn on the other side, between loss and liability. Whether a loss has happened or the liability has terminated makes no difference. A wager is good, though the event be over. A policy of insurance is only a wagering contract that is legal. In Emerigon, c. xv., s. 3, edit. translated by Meredith, p. 635, it is said, "If there is no fraud, and one of the parties is not better informed than the other, the least uncertainty of the event, fortunate or unfortunate, suffices to render the insurance valid."

Benjamin, Q.C. in reply.—Emerigon confuses fraud and want of interest. The passage last cited continues at p. 636. He there states that he was consulted in 1781 on an insurance made at Marseilles on the cargo of a vessel already arrived in the port of that town, and that the insurer contended that the premium was due to him, because at the time of signing the policy he did not know of the return of the vessel, but that he (Emerigon) was of a contrary opinion, stating that the risk on goods of a vessel already arrived at the port of its destination had never been made by itself the subject of a maritime insurance. According to the contention on the other side, the policy of re-insurance attached before it was made. A policy cannot attach before it is made, although it may create a liability for an antecedent loss. By English law, if one party agrees to pay a premium in consideration of the other party accepting a liability when in point of fact there is no liability, there is no consideration and the contract is at an end.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 1.—Brett, L.J.—This was an action for the recovery of the premium on a policy of insurance, and it is defended on the ground that the policy never attached. The plaintiff underwrote the policy in question by way of re-insurance of the cargo of the Alata from Philadelphia to Rochfort, which had been originally insured by the defendant. At the time that the reinsurance was effected the Alata had sailed from Philadelphia to Rochfort, and had arrived in safety and (as we must now assume) without any damage whatever to the goods on board. The cargo had been landed undamaged, and the voyage was at an end. At that time both parties supposed that the Alata had not arrived, and that she was overdue. The great question that was argued was whether the policy by which the re-insurance was effected ever attached. Now, it is true that at the time that this policy was entered into the risk which was the subject-matter of the policy was determined in fact, and was determined in fact to this extent that there could be no loss. But this was a policy of re-insurance by the defendant to cover his liability for any loss incurred by the original assured. The risk insured by him was in terms the risk under which he stood by the policy made by him during the voyage described in such policy. During the whole time of the voyage described in the original policy the risk of the defendants continued. Therefore, the risk described in this policy did exist during the whole time of the voyage. Is it, then, a good objection to the claim for this premium, that when the present policy was in fact made the question of loss or no loss was in fact determined? I think it is not, because the objection would apply equally to the case of a policy on a ship being entered into, lost or not lost, where that question had been in fact already determined. Take the case of such a policy. If the vessel is lost when the policy is made, the risk which is the subject-matter of the policy is determined in fact, because the loss has already occurred before the policy is entered into. Consequently, if the argument is true, the fact of the vessel being lost at the time of the policy being entered into would destroy the policy. But that is not so. The dicta go as far as this, that if both parties knew that the subject-matter was lost at the time when they entered into the policy, and the policy in terms covers that loss, the policy is good. It was said by Lord Mansfield that if a ship had been passed (at the time when the passing of a ship had no effect other than an honourable undertaking) when the parties where ignorant of the loss, and when the loss was known to both parties a policy was entered into, it would be a good policy. Therefore, the fact that the question of loss or no loss has been determined before the making of the policy is no objection to the policy upon principle. As to authority Mr. Benjamin was bound to admit that almost every writer on insurance law was against his contention. Emerigon was against it. Mr. Benjamin objected to Emerigon, but he is always cited as an authority, although he is not always correct, and his opinion is to be carefully considered before it is rejected. Park on Insurance was against it, and Park on Insurance has always been considered as an authority. Phillips is against it, and of all authorities on insurance law Phillips is the most to be relied on. Arnould is against it. Then we have the high authority of Willes, J. in the case of Natusch v. Hendewerk, which is directly in point. That was an action for the premium paid on effecting a policy, and it was held that the fact (unknown to both parties at the time) of the voyage being ended did not prevent the risk from attaching. Therefore, it seems to me both on principle and authority that the mere fact of the voyage insured having been at an end did not prevent the policy of re-insurance from attaching. But if so, the premium is due. When a policy has once attached, the premium is due, and no relief can be given in respect of it. Then it was said that the defendant had no insurable interest. But if this policy attached, it attached in respect of the voyage insured under the first policy. The question of insurable interest therefore comes to be the same question as whether the policy did attach. If it attached, the defendant's interest attached at the same time and for the same period as that of the original assured. The conclusion I come to is this, that where the subject-matter insured has been or will be at risk when the policy is made, the policy attaches, if the risk has been properly described in the policy. The judgment for the plaintiff was therefore right.

Baggallay, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

Bramwell, L.J.—I will add a few words in confirmation of what has been said by my brother Brett. On the question of whether the policy attached, I think it did. The fallacy in the defendant's argument arises from the double meaning of the word risk. That means both the voyage commenced with necessary conditions to make the underwriters liable, and also the chance of loss during its performance. In the latter sense there was no risk at the time of re-insurance. But that is not the sense in which the word is used by the authorities. It is used in the first sense I have mentioned, and in that sense it clearly existed in this case. There was therefore a risk such that if the premium had been paid the defendant could not have recovered it back. Suppose it had been known to both parties that the ship had arrived for twenty-four hours, and still the defendant had been minded to re-insure, and had done so at a low premium, it cannot be doubted that the premium would have to be paid. If that is true of twenty-four hours, it is equally so of twenty-four or any other number of days, and if it is true when both parties know, it is equally true when they do not. I think, therefore, the policy attached. All the authorities, as my brother Brett says, who have expressed an opinion on the matter are in favour of this view; and the utmost that can be said of the others is, that they do not decide it one way or the other. It is said that the same considerations determine the other question in favour of the plaintiff. On this I confess I am not so clear. It is said that the interest of the defendant was in his possible liability, and that the existence of a loss being uncertain to his knowledge, he might insure against it. I am not altogether satisfied on this. Suppose an insurance warranted free from capture, and suppose a re-insurance on the same terms on the same voyage, but the ship was captured before re-insurance, would the insurer have an insurable interest? I doubt it. But as my brethren do not, and as I only doubt, I concur on this point also.

Judgment affirmed.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Reported by M. W. McKELLAR Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Wednesday, June 22, 1881.

(Before Lord COLERIDGE, C.J. and MANISTY, J.)

HUGHES (app). v. SUTHERLAND (resp.).

Shipping — Equitable owner — Exemption from penalty for engaging seamen or apprentices— 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, ss. 55, 100, 146, 147—25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, s. 3.

Where a person has bonâ fide purchased one sixty-fourth share of a British ship, but the share has not been transferred to him by bill of sale, nor has he been registered as owner, and he has engaged and supplied an apprentice to be entered on board the said ship, he is not liable to be convicted under the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, s. 147, sub-sect. 1, on the ground that he is, by reason of the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act 1862, s. 3, an owner of the ship.

The word "owner" must be construed with reference to the subject matter and context of each provision of the Merchant Shipping Act.

THIS was a case stated under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, by Sir. R. Carden, Alderman and Justice of the Peace for the City of London, upon his refusal to convict the defendant Sutherland upon the information of the appellant, an officer of the Board of Trade, in a penalty for breach of sect. 147, sub-sect. 1 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104).

By sect. 55 of that Act:

A registered ship or any share therein, when disposed of to persons qualified to be owners of British ships, shall be transferred by bill of sale.

By sect. 100:

Whenever any person is beneficially interested, otherwise than by way of mortgage, in any ship or share therein registered in the name of some other person or owner, the person so interested shall, as well as the registered owner, be subject to all pecuniary penalties imposed by this or by any other Act on owners of ships or shares therein, so nevertheless, that proceedings may be taken for the enforcement of any such pecuniary penalties against both or either of the aforesaid parties, with or without joining the other of them.

By sect. 146:

The Board of Trade may grant to such persons as it thinks fit, licences to engage or supply seamen or apprentices for merchant ships in the United Kingdom, to continue for such periods, to be upon such terms, and to be revocable upon such conditions as such Board thinks proper.

By sect. 147:

The following offences shall be punishable as hereinafter mentioned (that is to say);

(1) If any person not licensed as aforesaid, other than the owner or master, or a mate of the ship, or some person who is bonâ fide the servant, and in the constant employ of the owner, or a shipping master duly appointed as aforesaid, engages or supplies any seaman or apprentice to be entered on board any ship in the United Kingdom, he shall for each seaman or apprentice so engaged or supplied incur a penalty not exceeding twenty pounds.

(2) If any person employs any unlicensed person, other than persons so excepted as aforesaid, for the purpose of engaging or supplying any seaman or apprentice to be entered on board any ship in the United Kingdom, he shall for each seaman or apprentice so engaged or supplied incur a penalty not exceeding twenty pounds, and if licensed shall in addition forfeit his licence.

(3) If any person knowingly receives or accepts to be entered on board any ship any seaman or apprentice who has been engaged or supplied contrary to the provisions of this Act, he shall for every seaman or apprentice so engaged or supplied incur a penalty not exceeding twenty pounds.

Of this act, Part ii., Registry, consists of sects. 17 to 108 inclusive, and Part iii., Masters and Seamen, consists of sects. 109 to 290 inclusive.

By the merchant Shipping Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), sect 1, the Act is to be construed with, and as part of, the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, thereinafter termed the principal Act.

By sect. 3:

It is hereby declared that the expression "beneficial interest," whenever used in the second part of the principal Act, includes interests arising under contract and other equitable interests; and the intention of the said Act is that without prejudice to the provisions contained in the said Act for preventing notice of trusts from being entered in the register book or received by the registrar, and without prejudice to the powers of disposition and of giving receipts conferred by the said Act on registered owners and mortgagees, and without prejudice to the provisions contained in the said Act relating to the exclusion of unqualified persons from the ownership of British ships, equities may be enforced against owners and mortgagees of ships in respect of their interest therein, in the same manner as equities may be enforced against them in respect of any other personal property.

It was found, as facts in the case, that on 8th Dec. 1880 Messrs. McIntyre being the registered owners of forty-eight shares, and Mr. Grimond, being the registered owner of the remaining sixteen shares of the registered British ship Aphrodita, Messrs. Oswald, Mordaunt and Co., the actual owners of the whole ship, although not then nor at any time the registered owners, entered into a contract with Mr. Price for the sale of the ship.

On the following day (9th Dec.) Price agreed with the respondent and defendant Sutherland to sell him one sixty-fourth share for 150*l.*, and this was found, as a fact, to have been a bonâ fide purchase by Sutherland, who on 1st Jan. 1881 paid to Price 5*l.* on account of the said share.

On the 29th Jan. 1881 Grimond, the registered owner of sixteen shares, transferred his interest by bill of sale to Price, but continued to be registered owner with Messrs. McIntyre.

On the 3rd Feb. 1881 the respondent Sutherland, who was not licensed by the Board of Trade under the 146th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, advertised for apprentices, and, in consequence, on the 12th Feb. a man named Axtell called upon him with the view to apprentice his son. The respondent stated that he had a ship sailing in a fortnight, and sent him to Price, with whom the premium was agreed. On the 19th Feb. the amount of agreed premium was paid to Price, and the apprenticeship deed was entered into by Price and the two Axtells, father and son.

On the 28th Feb. Messrs. McIntyre transferred their forty-eight shares to Price by bill of sale, but their names were not then removed from the register.

On the 3rd March, Price, by bill of sale, transferred one sixty-fourth share in the ship to the respondent, and afterwards the respondent paid Price the balance of the 150*l.* agreed upon, but this share was never registered in Sutherland's name.

On the 4th March Price registered himself as sole owner of the whole ship, and on the 7th March he registered himself as managing owner, describing himself as registered sole owner.

The Alderman at the hearing decided that Sutherland was, upon those facts, an owner of the ship, and refused to convict him. The question for the court was whether this decision was right.

A. L. Smith argued for the Board of Trade.—The facts are not sufficient to exempt the respondent from the penalty imposed by sect. 147, subsect. 1 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854. He was not the owner of the ship on the 12th Feb., for at that time he had not fulfilled the preliminaries required by statute, and could not have obtained specific performance of the contract to make him owner. An equitable mortgage upon shares in a ship was held to be invalid under the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 in the Liverpool Borough Bank v. Turner (1 J. & H. 159; affirmed on appeal, 2 D. F. & J. 502); and the case of the Union Bank of London v. Lenanton (3 Asp. Mar. L. C. 600; L. Rep. 3 C. P. Div. 243) is a further confirmation that no interest in a British ship can be transferred except by bill of sale. The Amendment Act of 1862, sect. 3, does not touch this point, because it relates only to part of the principal Act, and does not include this section 147, which is in the third part. The decision of the Liverpool Borough Bank v. Turner was not questioned in either of the two cases subsequent to the Amendment Act 1862: European and Australian Royal Mail Company Limited v. Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company (2 Mar. L. C. O. S. 351; 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 704) and Stapleton v. Haymen (2 H. & C. 918). No doubt it has been held in Meiklereid v. West (3 Asp. Mar. L. C. 129; L. Rep. 1 Q. B. Div. 428) that the word "owner" does not necessarily mean registered owner; but it has never been held for any purpose that a person can be an owner of a ship unless legally constituted by the transfer required by statute.

Besley for the respondent.—This case is concluded against the apellant by the finding of fact that the respondents purchase was bonâ fide. The quantity of his interest was of no consequence. Here Price's position was the same as the respondent's, and, if the appellant's contention be good, Price ought to have been convicted under this 147th section. But it has been held that even a registered owner is no longer an owner so as to be liable for an allotment note under sect. 169 if the temporary ownership be entirely handed over by a charter-party. In Meiklereid v. West, and more recently in Batthyany v. Bouch (4 Asp. Mar. L. C. 380; (50 L. J. 421, Q. B.), it was held that the case of Liverpool Borough Bank v. Turner has no application, at all events since the Amendment Act of 1862, to agreements to transfer, whatever effect it may continue to have upon mortgages. It could never be supposed that a charterer of a ship was bound to obtain a license in order to engage a crew.

A. L. Smith in reply.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—I am of opinion that the decision of the magistrate was right and should be affirmed. The section of the Merchant Shipping Act (147th) was passed to prevent crimping, and it interferes with freedom of contract in order to protect a class of persons peculiarly subject to imposition. The construction of the section therefore ought not to be narrowed so as to exclude a matter clearly within the mischief aimed at. Here the state of things on the 12th Feb., when the respondent did an act which was clearly prohibited by the statute, unless he comes within the exception, appears to have been this: the registered owners of the ship were quite different persons from and in no way connected with, the respondent. It is admitted that he was not then or ever afterwards a registered owner of any share in the ship; it is also admitted that at the time he was not a legal owner in the sense that the share which he afterwards held had not then been transferred to him by bill of sale according to the requirement of sect. 55 of the Act 1854. He had, however, before the transaction in question bonâ fide, and not colourably, purchased a share in the ship from a man named Price who, although not at the time of the purchase, before the alleged offence, had become legal owner of a third of the ship and subsequently acquired the remaining shares, and also, became registered owner of the whole ship. The question for us is whether the respondent, being neither registered nor legal owner, was yet such an owner of this ship on the 12th Feb. as to give him a claim for exemption from the application of the first clause of this 147th section. I think he was such an owner. Under the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 in Liverpool Borough Bank v. Turner (1 J. & H. 159, and 2 De G. F. & J. 502), the question how far equities could be enforced arose before Wood, V.C. who, in an elaborate judgment, held that under an agreement for sale or mortgage not accompanied by the formalities prescribed, no such interest passed as would justify the court in decreeing specific performance. Lord Campbell on appeal affirmed the decision of the Vice-Chancellor, and the case is therefore one of high authority. In 1862, probably in consequence of that case, it was by sect. 3 of the Amendment Act of that year "declared," not further enacted, "that the expression beneficial interest, whenever used in the second part of the principal Act, includes interests arising under contract, and other equitable interests; and the intention of the said Act is that without prejudice," amongst other things . . . . "to the powers of disposition and of giving receipts conferred by the said Act or registered owners or mortgagees" . . . . "equities may be enforced against owners and mortgagees of ships in respect of their interest therein in the same manner as equities may be enforced against them in respect of any other personal property." Since that Amendment Act equitable interests in ships have been recognised, and I gather from Stapleton v. Haymen (2 H. & C. 918) that Pollock, C.B. and the other members of the court concurred in holding that an equitable right of property can be created in a ship by an unregistered bill of sale. In the present case, therefore, we must take it that the respondent was an equitable part owner of the ship in having a contract enforceable in equity for the purchase of one sixty-fourth share. For the purpose of another proceeding under this Act it has been held that for the issue of an allotment note a registered owner, when he has assigned all his interest in the ship temporarily by a charter-party is not liable, although the words of the section applying thereto (the 169th) name the persons upon whom the liability is cast as "the owner or any agent who has authorised the drawing of the note" (Meiklereid v. West, 3 Asp. Mar. L. C. 129; L. Rep. 1 Q. B. Div. 428). This case is effectual so far as it shows that the word owner, for which the Act gives no definition, must be construed with reference to the subject matter and the context of each provision in which it is used. With regard to the point raised here, the respondent's position is the same as that of a charterer, and it is difficult to suppose that where, under a charter-party of a large ship for a long period, the charterer has a real interest in and the whole management of the ship and crew, he could be convicted in a penalty of £20 for every seaman and apprentice whom he might engage. It seems clear to me that a wide meaning must be given to the word "owner" in this exception, and that a person having an equitable interest in a share of a ship must be exempt from the penalty as much as a legal or even a registered owner. For these reasons this appeal must be dismissed.

MANISTY, J.—I am of the same opinion. By sect. 147 sub-sect. 1, several persons are exempted from the penalty imposed, and amongst them the owner of the ship. It is admitted that a person who had by law a share in the ship duly transferred to him although not a registered owner, might be exempted by these words, but it is contended that the merely equitable holder of a share cannot be included. A charterer by demise would, upon this contention, be liable to a penalty for engaging a seaman. I cannot imagine a stronger illustration of the difficulty which such an interpretation might cause. Some light may be gathered as to the meaning intended for the word "owner" from the exemption of a "person who is bonâ fide the servant and in the constant employ of the owner." Such an owner must be any person having a beneficial legal or registered interest in the ship.

JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

(Present: Sir BARNES PEACOCK, Sir MONTAGUE E. SMITH, Sir ROBERT P. COLLIER, and Sir RICHARD COUCH.)

THE BRINHILDA.

Practice—Appeals — Time — Preemption — Jurisdiction and practice of Calcutta High Court in Admiralty and Vice-Admiralty.

The time for appealing from the judgment of a Vice-Admiralty Court is governed strictly by the rules and regulations made by Order in Council June 27, 1832, no rules having been made as yet under 25 Vict. c. 24, ss. 23, 24, and 30 & 31 Vict. c. 45, s. 18.

The time for appealing from any Court of Admiralty jurisdiction is also limited to fifteen days by the practice of the court.

In any Admiralty or Vice-Admiralty cause the right of appeal to the Privy Council is perempted by any proceedings being taken by the appellant under the decree to be appealed from.

THIS was a motion by the respondents, the British Steam Navigation Company, owners of the ship Ava, to dismiss an appeal by the owners of the ship Brinhilda from a decree of the High Court of Calcutta finding both vessels to blame for a collision which took place in the Bay of Bengal. The case has been heard in the first instance before a single judge of the High Court, who found that the collision was the fault of both vessels, and that the Brinhilda was liable to answer for half the damage done to the Ava, the whole of the damage done to that vessel being agreed at 50,000*l*. From this decree an appeal was carried to the High Court, consisting of Garth, C.J. and Pontifex, J., who on the 23rd July 1880 varied the order of the court below by directing that the owners of the Brinhilda should be allowed to deduct half the damage sustained by that vessel. Subsequently to this decree the owners of the Brinhilda, the present appellants, summoned the owners of the Ava before the registrar to assess the amount of the said damages.

The notice of appeal was given, as set out in the judgment of the court, on the 2nd Sept. 1880, and subsequently the respondents appeared to the appeal under protest.

The enactments governing appeals from Vice-Admiralty Courts to the Privy Council are:

2 Will. 4, c. 51 (An Act to regulate the Practice and the Fees in the Vice-Admiralty Courts abroad, and to obviate doubt as to their Jurisdiction), 23*rd June* 1832.

Preamble. . . . It shall be lawful for His Majesty, with the advice of his Privy Council, from time to time to make and ordain such rules and regulations as shall be deemed expedient touching the practice to be observed in suits and proceedings in the several Courts of Vice-Admiralty at present or hereafter to be established in any of His Majesty's possessions abroad . . . . and also from time to time, as shall be found expedient, to alter any such rules, regulations, and fees, and to make any new regulations. . . .

Rules and Regulations touching the Practice and Proceedings in the Courts of Vice-Admiralty abroad, 27*th June* 1832.

Sect. 35. Appeals.

All appeals from decrees of the Vice-Admiralty Courts are to be asserted by a party in the suit within fifteen days after the date of the decree, which is to be done by the proctor declaring the same in court; and a minute thereof is to be inserted in the assignation book. And the party must also give bail within fifteen days from the assertion of the appeal in the sum of 100*l.* sterling to answer the costs of such appeal.

In all cases, however, in which an appeal is asserted except respecting slaves, the judge may proceed to carry his sentence into execution, provided the party in whose favour the decree has been made give bail to abide the event of the appeal, by two sureties in the amount of the value of the property or subject in dispute, together with the further sum of 100*l.* sterling to answer costs in the event of the same being awarded by the Superior Court. The party appealing, having complied with these regulations, is then to cause the judge and registrar to be served with an inhibition from the High Court of Admiralty restraining them from further proceeding in the cause, and also with a monition to transmit the process.

This process will consist of a fair copy of the proceedings under the seal of the Vice-Admiralty Court, to be made and signed by the registrar, at the expense of the party ordering the same, which is to be transmitted to the Superior Court, pursuant to the monition.

The proceeds, if in court, or in the hands of any individual, must, on a special monition for the purpose being served, be remitted to the registrar of the High Court of Admiralty or Court of Appeal.

3 & 4 Will. 4 c. 4 (An Act for the better Administration of Justice in His Majesty's Privy Council) 1833.

Sect. 20. And be it further enacted that all appeals to His Majesty in Council shall be made within such time respectively within which the same may now be made, when such time shall be fixed by any law or usage, and when no such law or usage shall exist, then within such time as shall be ordered by His Majesty in Council; and that, subject to any right subsisting under any charter or constitution of any colony or plantation, it shall be lawful for His Majesty in Council to alter any usage as to the time of making appeals, and to make any order respecting the time of appealing to his Majesty in Council.

March 15, 1881, the motion came on for hearing.

Woodroffe in support of the motion.—This appeal purports to be made under rule 35 of the Rules and Regulations of Will. 4, 27th June 1832, and therefore under the Vice-Admiralty jurisdiction of the court; if so, the appellants are clearly out of time, and have now no right of appeal:

The Aquila, 6 Moore P. C. 102.

Sect. 6. The High Courts Act 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 104).

Sect. 9. Each of the High Courts to be established under this Act shall have and exercise all such . . . Admiralty and Vice-Admiralty . . . jurisdiction, original and appellate, and all such powers and authority for and in relation to the administration of justice in the presidency for which it is established, as Her Majesty may by such letters patent as aforesaid grant and direct.

(a) The High Court at Calcutta obtains its jurisdiction in Admiralty under the following enactments:—

Court, and which appears to be transferred to the High Court by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 104, s. 9, and here the cause of action, the collision, arose on the high seas in the Bay of Bengal, beyond that jurisdiction, and therefore the Admiralty jurisdiction does not include the case. But even if the case were within the Admiralty jurisdiction, the appellants having acted under the decree in summoning the respondents to go before the registrar and merchants to assess damages, are now, in accordance with the practice of all Courts of Admiralty jurisdiction, or governed by the civil law, perempted from appealing :

The Aquila, 6 Moo. P. C. 102;
Lloyd and another v. Poole, 3 Hagg. Ecc. 477;
The Hydroos, 5 Moo. Ind. App. 137;
The Ship Clifton, 2 Knapp P.C. 375; 3 Hagg. Adm. 117.

And in such a case the proper course for the respondents to pursue is to move to quash the appeal at once, without waiting to raise the objection at the hearing:

Truman v. Dent, 8 Moo. P. C. 419.

The High Court could in no case have power by its rules, made under its patent, to alter those made under the Act of the Imperial Parliament regulating appeals; but, moreover, these appeals are expressly left untouched by recent Indian legislation : (Act VI. 1894, Act X. 1877; s. 616.)

Butt, Q.C. (Benjamin, Q.C. and Clarkson with him) for the appellants. If the appeal was out of time the objection should have been taken in the High Court at Calcutta, where it was asserted, and not here. The fact that no objection was taken creates a presumption that the method of appeal was correct, and is a waiver by the respondents of a merely technical objection. Besides, the time for appealing should be reckoned from the date at which the appellants could get a copy of the decree, that is, from the time at which it was drawn up, and not from the date of the decision in court. The Civil Procedure Code requires a copy of the decree to be attached in all cases to the appeal, and therefore it could not be asserted till the decree was drawn up. The appeal is within the time required by that code, and there has been no laches in asserting the appeal, therefore the court, which no doubt has power to allow the appeal to be heard, even if out of time (The Hydroos, 5 Moo. Ind. App. Cas. 137), will exercise that power here. The objection that the appellants have perempted their right of appeal by going before the registrar is highly technical, besides, under the circumstances of this case, where in any event there were damages to be assessed on both sides, their act was an involuntary submission to the direction of the court.

Letters Patent 14th May 1862.

Sect. 31. And we do further ordain that the said High Court of Judicature at Fort William, in Bengal, shall have and exercise all such civil and maritime jurisdiction as may now be exercised by the said Supreme Court as a Court of Admiralty, or by any judge of the said court as Commissary to the Vice-Admiralty Court, and also such jurisdiction for the trial and adjudication of prize causes and other maritime questions arising in India as is now vested in any commissioner or commissioners appointed by us or our predecessors, under the powers given by an Act passed in the session of Parliament held in the 39th and 40th years of the reign of his late Majesty King George III., "for establishing further regulations for the government of the British territories in India, and the better administration of justice within the same.

Woodroffe in reply.

The judgment of their Lordships was delivered by Sir BARNES PEACOCK.—This is a motion on the part of the British Indian Steam Navigation Company, the owners of the ship Ava, to release and dissolve the inhibition and citation issued in a certain pretended appeal of the above-named appellants, and to dismiss or quash the said appeal for want of competency, or to grant the respondents leave to file an act of protest on petition against the admission of the said pretended appeal. The suit came before the High Court, in the exercise of its original jurisdiction. It was brought by the owners of the steamship Ava against the Brinhilda for a collision which took place in the Bay of Bengal. The High Court, in its original jurisdiction, held that there was negligence on both sides, and consequently that half the damages which resulted to the owners of the ship Ava were to be paid by each of the parties. The damages were assessed at 50,000*l*., which would leave 25,000*l*. to be borne by the owners of the Ava themselves, and 25,000*l*. to be paid by the owners of the ship Brinhilda. The parties appealed to the High Court in the exercise of its appellate jurisdiction, and that court affirmed the decision of the first court so far as it was held that there was negligence on the part of each of the ships; but they thought it right to amend the decree by declaring that, instead of the owners of the Brinhilda paying the full sum of 25,000*l*., being one half the damages sustained by the owners of the Ava, they should be allowed to deduct half the damages which they had sustained by the injury to their ship, and that it should be referred to the registrar of the court to assess those damages. That decision was pronounced on the 23rd July 1880. The parties went before the registrar for the purpose of assessing the amount, and it appears by the report of the registrar that the damages were assessed at 3000*l*. with the consent of both parties. On the 2nd Sept. 1880 a notice of appeal was given, which was recorded as follows: "Pursuant to rule 35, of the rules and regulations made and ordained by his late Majesty King William IV. in Council, in pursuance of the 2 Will. 4, c. 51, Mr. Phillips, advocate for the impugnment, appears and declares his intention of appealing to the Privy Council against both the decrees made in this cause." The rule referred to is in these words: "All appeals from the decrees of the Vice-Admiralty Courts are to be asserted by the plaintiffs in the suit within fifteen days after the date of the decree, which is to be done by the proctor declaring the same in court, and a minute thereof is to be entered in the assignation book, and the party must also give bail within fifteen days from the assertion of the appeal in the sum of 100*l*. sterling to answer the costs of such appeal." (a) The judg-

(a) It may be observed that, though the rule here in question has not been revoked, it appears by the following enactments to be in contemplation to do so.

The Vice-Admiralty Courts Act 1863 (26 Vict. c. 24).

Sect. 23. The time for appealing from any decree or order of a Vice-Admiralty court, shall, notwithstanding any existing enactment to the contrary, be limited to six months from the date of the decree or order appealed from; and no appeal shall be allowed where the petition of appeal to Her Majesty shall not have been lodged in the registry of the High Court of Admiralty and of Appeals within that time, unless Her Majesty in Council ment was delivered on the 23rd July 1880, and consequently the notice on the 2nd Sept. was not an assertion within fifteen days from the date of the decree. It has been urged that the decree was not drawn up in writing and signed by the court until some considerable time afterwards, and that the petitioners could not appeal without annexing a copy of the decree to their petition of appeal. But the rule of annexing a copy of the decree to the petition of appeal refers to appeals which are preferred under the Code of Civil Procedure, Act VIII., of 1859; it does not apply to appeals preferred or asserted under the 35th section of the rules of Will. 4. (a) The words "after the date of the decree," according to their Lordships' view of the rule, do not mean after the date when the decree is drawn up in writing, but after the date on which the decree or sentence is pronounced by the Vice-Admiralty or Admiralty Court, as the case may be. The words which are constantly used in Acts which refer to decrees in the Admiralty Court are "the pronouncing of the sentence or decree." Their Lordships therefore think that the "date of the decree" did not mean the date on which the decree was reduced into writing and signed by the court, but the date on which the High Court delivered their judgment and expressed what the decree was. If the petitioners intended to appeal, they ought, in accordance with the rule, to have asserted their appeal within fifteen days from the date of the decree, by declaring in court that they intended to appeal, and that they did not do. It is important in Admiralty proceedings that notice of appeal should be given within a short period. When a ship is sued it is usually arrested, and unless it is released upon bail it is detained by an officer of the court. It is therefore important, if a party intends to appeal from the decision of the Admiralty Court, that notice should be given within a certain limited time, and that time, with regard to Vice-Admiralty cases, is fifteen days from the date of pronouncing the decree. The collision took place in the Bay of Bengal, and therefore it may be a question whether the High Court was exercising Vice-Admiralty or Admiralty jurisdiction; but that is not material, for if the case was tried in the Admiralty jurisdiction the appeal ought to have been asserted, according to the rules of the Admiralty Court, (a) within fifteen days. The petitioners have stated in their petition that they asserted the appeal in accordance with the 35th rule of Will. 4. The assertion was too late, and consequently the appellants had no right to appeal. Further, they appeared before the registrar for the purpose of carrying out the order of the High Court in assessing the damages which they had sustained by the injury which had been done to the Brinhilda, and acted without protest. It is said that they were obliged to go before the registrar; but they might have appealed and got an inhibition, or if not, they might have appeared before the registrar under protest. The owners of the Brinhilda took out the summons to compel the owners of the Ava to appear before the registrar for the purpose of acting under the decree of the High Court and assessing the amount of damage sustained by the owners of the Brinhilda. That, of itself, according to the decision to which we have been referred (The Ship Clifton, 3 Knapp P. C. 375; 3 Hagg. Adm. 117) would be a sufficient ground for preventing the petitioners from appealing. Their Lordships therefore think that the owners of the Brinhilda have not put themselves into a position to appeal, as a matter of right, against the decision of the High Court. The question before their Lordships is not whether they should recommend Her Majesty to grant an appeal as a special matter of favour. That they could do only if a petition were presented to Her Majesty, and referred to the Judicial Committee to report their opinion thereon. Under these circumstances their Lordships think that the motion ought to be granted, and that the petition of appeal ought to be set aside. It is unnecessary to do more than set aside the petition of appeal; upon that being done, the relaxation of the inhibition will issue as a matter of course. Their Lordships therefore will humbly report to Her Majesty that the petition of appeal ought to be dismissed. The appellants must pay the costs of this motion and of the appeal.

shall, in the report and recommendation of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, be pleased to allow the appeal to be prosecuted, notwithstanding that the petition of appeal has not been lodged within the time prescribed.

Sect. 24. The Acts enumerated in the schedule hereto annexed marked B. are hereby repealed to the extent therein mentioned, but the repeal thereof shall not affect the validity of any rules, orders, regulations, or tables of fees heretofore established and now in force, in pursuance of the Act 2 & 3 Will. 4 c. 51; but such rules, orders, regulations, and tables of fees shall continue in force until repealed or altered under the provisions of this Act.

The Vice-Admiralty Courts Act 1863 only applies to certain Vice-Admiralty courts enumerated in schedule A. of the Act, amongst which are none of the courts in the East Indies; but sect. 23 is expressly extended to them by the Vice-Admiralty Courts Act Amendment Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 45).

Sect. 18. The limitation of the time allowed for appeals contained in the 23rd section of the Vice-Admiralty Courts Act 1863 shall be held to apply to all decrees or orders pronounced in any Vice-Admiralty court now established or hereafter to be established in any of Her Majesty's possessions in India.

No new order has however as yet been made under the Vice-Admiralty Courts Act 1863, or under 3 & 4 Will. 4 c. 41 (ubi sup.), and therefore sect. 35 of the rules of Will. 4 still govern the time for appealing.

(a) Act X. of 1877, s. 615. . . . Nothing in this chapter (appeals to Privy Council) applies to any matter of . . . . Admiralty or Vice-Admiralty jurisdiction. . . .

COURT OF APPEAL.

SITTINGS AT LINCOLN'S INN.

Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and F. W. RAIKES, Esqs., Barristers-at-Law.

Wednesday, July 20, 1881.

(Before JESSEL, M.R., BRETT and COTTON, L.JJ.)

PREHN v. BAILEY AND OTHERS.

Limitation of liability—Salvage—General average—Wreck Removals Act 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 16)—Thames Conservancy Acts (20 & 21 Vict. c. cxlvii. s. 86, and 33 & 34 Vict. c. cxlix. s. 27)—Contribution by cargo owner—No man can profit by his own wrong.

Where a ship carrying cargo is sunk in the Thames in consequence of a collision caused by her own negligence, and her owner limits his liability under the Merchant Shipping Act 1862, s. 54, and the Thames Conservancy raise the ship and cargo under their special Acts and deliver them to the shipowner on payment of the expenses of raising, the shipowner has no lien on the cargo and no claim against the cargo owner for the cargo's proportion of the cost of raising.

THIS was an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment of Sir R. Phillimore delivered on the 5th April 1881 in a special case which the parties to this action had concurred in stating pursuant to Order XXXIV. of the Judicature Act 1875. The facts of the case, together with the special case and the judgment appealed against, are fully set out in the report of the case below (44 L. T. Rep. N. S. 817; 4 Asp. Mar. L. C. 428).

The following sections were referred to in the course of the argument:

The 86th section of the Thames Conservancy Act 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. cxlvii. s. 86):

When and so often as any vessel shall be sunk or stranded in the river, it shall be lawful for the conservators, and they are hereby required, in case the master of such vessel shall refuse or neglect to weigh and raise the same, after notice in writing requiring him so to do, and within the time to be mentioned in such notice, to cause any such vessel to be weighed and raised, or if it shall be found impracticable to weigh and raise the same (of which impracticability they shall be sole judges), to cause such vessel to be blown up or otherwise destroyed, so as to clear the river therefrom; and in case such vessel shall be weighed and raised, to cause the same, and the furniture, tackle, and apparel thereof, or of any part thereof respectively, and also all or any part of the goods, wares, merchandise, chattels, and effects which may be found on board the same, to be sold by public auction or otherwise, and by and out of the proceeds of such sale to pay the charges and expenses of weighing and raising such vessel, or the blowing up or otherwise destroying the same, and clearing the said river therefrom, and also the charges and expenses of such sale, rendering any overplus to the owner or other person who by law shall be entitled to the same; and in case the proceeds of such sale shall be insufficient to defray the charges and expenses of weighing and raising such vessel, or of the blowing up or otherwise destroying the same, and clearing the river thereof, the deficiency shall be paid to the conservators by the master or owner of such vessel on demand, and in default of payment may be recovered in the same manner as any penalty imposed by this Act is directed to be recovered.

Also the 27th section of the Thames Navigation Act 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. cxlix. s. 27):

With respect to vessels sunk or stranded in the Thames, the conservators in case of emergency (of which emergency they shall be sole judges) shall perform the duties, and exercise the powers imposed on them by sect. 86 of the Thames Act of 1857 without having given such notice as in that section directed.

And the 4th, 6th, and 8th sections of the Removal of Wrecks 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 16):

4. Where any vessel is sunk, stranded, or abandoned in any harbour or tidal water under the jurisdiction of a harbour or conservancy authority, or in or near any approach thereto, in such manner as in the opinion of the authority to be, or be likely to become, an obstruction or danger to navigation in that harbour or water, or in any approach thereto, the authority may take possession of and raise, remove, or destroy the whole or any part of the vessel, and may light or buoy any such vessel or part until the raising, removal, or destruction thereof, and may sell, in such manner as they think fit, any vessel or part so raised or removed, and also any other property recovered in the exercise of their powers under this Act, and may out of the proceeds of such sale reimburse themselves for the expenses incurred by them under this Act, and shall hold the surplus, if any, of such proceeds in trust for the persons entitled thereto.

Provided as follows:

(2.) At any time before any property is sold under this Act, the owner thereof shall be entitled to have the same delivered to him on payment to the authority of the fair market value thereof, to be ascertained by agreement between the authority and the owner, or, failing such agreement, by some person to be named for the purpose by the Board of Trade, and the sum paid to the authority as the value of any property under this provision shall for the purposes of this Act be the proceeds of the sale of that property.

6. The provisions of this Act shall apply to every article or thing, or collection of things being or forming part of the tackle, equipment, cargo, stores, or ballast of a vessel in the same manner as if it were included in the term "vessel," and for the purposes of this Act any proceeds of sale arising from a vessel and from the cargo thereof, or any other property recovered therefrom, shall be regarded as a common fund.

8. The powers conferred by this Act shall be deemed to be in addition to and not in derogation of any other powers for the like object.

Millar, Q.C. and Dr. Phillimore for the appellants.—When the owner of the Ettrick had obtained a judgment under the Merchant Shipping Act limiting his liability, he then ceased to be liable for anything further in respect of the damage brought about by the wrong doing of those in charge of his vessel. Now if the Ettrick and her cargo had been wholly lost in consequence of this collision, the owner of the Ettrick would have paid 8*l.* per ton on the registered tonnage of his vessel of which the owner of the cargo on board of her would have received his due proportion and the matter would have been ended. But it was not so. The Thames Conservancy proceeded to raise the Ettrick and her cargo under the Wreck Removals Act 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 16), under the 6th section of which Act the proceeds of sale arising from a vessel and from the cargo thereof or any other property recovered therefrom is to be regarded as a common fund, out of which the authority raising the vessel are under the 4th section to reimburse themselves. [Myburgh called attention to the 8th section, which is as follows: "The powers conferred by this Act shall be deemed to be in addition to and not in derogation of any other powers for the like object."] The vessel was raised under the Wrecks Removal Act. No notice was given as was necessary under the Thames Conservancy Act 1857, s. 86. [Myburgh.—There is a section in the Act of 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. cxlix. s. 27) which dispenses with notice. Jessel, M.R.—There is nothing in the general Act to interfere with the powers vested in them under the private Acts, and they must therefore be taken to have raised it under their private Acts.] They had powers under the general Act, and under that Act they were trustees of the balance; the effect of the Act is that the charges and expenses of raising ought to be levied pro ratâ on ship and cargo. [Jessel, M.R.—The special case refers to the private Acts.] In any case the owner of the Ettrick has paid all he is liable to pay. [Jessel, M.R.—As damages?] This matter is really damages; the amount fixed by the Legislature is the measure of what the shipowner is liable for the negligence of his servants. In The Northumbria (L. Rep. 3 Ad. & E. 12) the principle is correctly laid down: "In these statutes (the Merchant Shipping Acts) the Legislature introduced a new principle, the object of which was to give some protection to the owner against the wrong doing of his servant the master of the vessel. They preserved the principle of restitutio in integrum in cases where, with his actual fault and privity, the damage had been inflicted on the sufferer; but, with this exception, they limited his liability, to a certain definite sum. In the latter case, therefore, this limited amount took the place of restitutio in integrum." Under these circumstances the cargo must contribute pro ratâ to the cost of raising the ship and cargo, and the owner of the Ettrick is entitled to recover from the owner of the cargo its proportion of the expense. Suppose this sinking were the result of accident, and the conservators had sold the ship and cargo, they would just have repaid themselves the charges and expenses of raising them, and then paid over the proceeds pro ratâ to the owners of ship and cargo. [Cotton, L.J.—It does not seem to me that the owners of the cargo could have sued the conservators.] Under the Thames Conservancy Acts the conservators have possession of the ship and cargo, and it is their duty to hand it back to the owners of the ship; and, if the shipowners have a right to say that the cargo is liable to contribute to the expenses of raising it, it is subject to a lien:

Hingston v. Wendt, 3 Asp. Mar. L. C. 126; 34 L. T. Rep. 181; L. Rep. 1 Q. B. Div. 367.

[Jessel, M.R.—That was a salvage service.] No; an extraordinary service to the cargo. It was not salvage, because the services were not performed by a volunteer; nor general average, because they were not for the benefit of the whole adventure:

Notara v. Henderson, 1 Asp. Mar. L. C. 278; 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 577; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 442; L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 347; 7 Q. B. 225.

Such would have been the position of the appellant if the collision had been the result of accident. And his position is the same now, for, by the payment of the statutory amount of 8*l.* per ton, he has become innocent again in the eyes of the law. In Chapman v. Royal Netherlands Steam Navigation Company (4 Asp. Mar. L. C. 107; L. Rep. 4 P. D. 157; 40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 433) a similar attempt was made unsuccessfully to defeat the object of the Merchant Shipping Acts. There Baggallay, L.J. says (p. 170): "If the contention of the respondents is well founded, the plaintiffs, instead of having their liability limited to 8*l.* per ton upon the registered tonnage of the ship, will also lose the amount in which the respondents have been condemned, and will be exactly in the same position as regards the amount of loss they will have to bear as they would have been in had they been held alone to blame—that is, they will have to pay the 8*l.* per ton and bear the loss of all the damage done to their own ship. . . . I think that the view contended for by the plaintiffs is more in accordance with the true construction of the Merchant Shipping Act 1862, upon which as it appears to me, the whole question turns." And Cotton, L.J. says (p. 185): "The effect of the order appealed against is to deprive the plaintiffs of the amount of half the damage occasioned to their vessel, for which the defendants were in the Admiralty Court declared to be liable, and it does so for the purpose of satisfying a portion of the amount of the damage sustained by the defendants, which, under the Acts referred to, is to be provided solely out of the fund in court." These cases show that a man who has paid 8*l.* per ton has, in the eyes of the law, given restitutio in integrum. The Cargo ex Capella (2 Mar. L. C. O. S. 552; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 800; L. Rep. 1 Ad. & E. 356) and the other cases cited in the court below do not apply, because we are in the position of innocent parties, and have simply taken these goods from the Thames Conservancy to preserve them from a forced sale.

Myburgh and Stubbs, for the respondents, were not called upon by the court.

Jessel, M.R.—This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment of Sir R. Phillimore, delivered after argument on a special case agreed upon by the parties. In consequence of a collision caused by her own bad navigation, the Ettrick sank in the Thames, with all her cargo. Her owner obtained a judgment in a limitation action, limiting his liability to 8*l.* per ton, and paid the required sum into court. The Thames Conservancy, by virtue of the powers vested in them by statute, raised the vessel and the principal part of her cargo, including certain bales of wool belonging to the respondent, the expenses of raising the vessel and cargo not being enhanced by any expenses specially incurred for raising the wool, and upon an undertaking being given on behalf of the owner of the vessel to pay the costs of raising her, the vessel and her cargo were handed in a damaged condition, and liable to further deterioration, to the owner of the vessel. The respondent did not wish his cargo to go on in the ship, and contracted to take his cargo there, and the owner of the vessel delivered it up to him on his undertaking to pay all charges that might legally fall on it. Under these circumstances the shipowner seeks to recover 124*l.* 15*s.* 2*d.*, as the cargo owner's share of the expenses of raising the ship and cargo, and which sum the cargo owner declines to pay. In this refusal the court below has declared the cargo owner to be justified, and I agree with the decision there arrived at. In this case the cargo owner has not received the value of his cargo from the shipowner. If he had done so, other questions might arise. The shipowner, has, however, instead of making good the cargo owner's loss, proceeded under the 54th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1862, s. 54 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, s. 54), which is as follows: "The owners of any ship, whether British or foreign, shall not, in cases where all or any of the following events occur without their actual fault or privity, that is to say (1) where any loss of life or personal injury is caused to any person being carried in such ship; (2) where any damage or loss is caused to any goods merchandise, or other things whatsoever on board any such ship; (3) where any loss of life or personal injury is by reason of the improper navigation of such ship as aforesaid caused to any person carried in any other ship or boat; (4) where any loss or damage is by reason of the improper navigation of such ship as aforesaid caused to any other ship or boat, or to any goods, merchandise or other things whatsoever on board any other ship or boat, be answerable in damages in respect of loss of life or personal injury, either alone or together with loss or damage to ships, boats, goods, merchandise, or other things to an aggregate amount exceeding 15*l.* for each ton of their ship's storage, nor in respect of loss or damage to ships, goods, merchandise, or other things, whether there be in addition loss of life or personal injury or not, to an aggregate amount exceeding 8*l.* for each ton of the ship's tonnage," and has paid into court a sum amounting to 8*l.* per ton on each ton of his ship's tonnage. Now, this section which I have read does not alter the property in the wool at all, and it therefore continues to be the property of the respondent. The shipowner, however, says that the words of the section are equivalent to saying that he, the shipowner, having paid his 8*l.* per ton, is to be in the same position as if he had never been guilty of default or negligence. I cannot see that. If he had himself raised the ship and cargo after paying his 8*l.* per ton, he could not have held the cargo and claimed a lien upon it for his proportion of the cost of raising. That the ship and cargo were raised by a third person, whom the plaintiff has reimbursed, in my opinion makes no difference to the plaintiff's position. But, in the second place, it is contended that the ship and cargo are rateably liable under the words of the Acts under which the Thames Conservancy raised this vessel; but the Thames Conservancy Act 1857 (20 and 21 Vict. c. xlvii., s. 86, vide sup.) does not say so. The injury to navigation, to prevent which is the object aimed at in that Act, is done by the vessel, and not by the goods on board her. The vessel is therefore to be sold first, and the object of selling the furniture and cargo is to make up what is not paid by the ship. The ship is primarily liable, and the cargo only secondarily. In this case the value of the ship was sufficient to repay the services rendered by the Conservancy. The general Act (Wrecks Removal Act 1877, vide sup.) does not, in my opinion, alter the case, as the 8th section preserves the local Acts.

BRETT, L.J.—In this case a collision occurred caused by the fault of the shipowner, who proceeded to limit his liability under the Act for that purpose, and obtained a declaration in the usual form, and here that matter ended. After that, something else occurred which is not affected by that Act of Parliament. The Thames Conservancy proceeded to raise the vessel. Now they might have raised it without any Act of Parliament at all as salvors, but they did actually raise it under a private Act, under which they had power to sell the ship to pay the expenses incurred in raising it, but being reimbursed by the shipowner they did not exercise the power of sale, but handed back the ship and the cargo in her to the shipowner. Now the shipowner had no express authority to pay anything for the cargo owner, but he says that he is entitled to receive from the cargo owner a rateable proportion of the amount paid by him to the Conservancy, because he had a promise from the cargo owner to pay if he waved his lien and gave up the cargo to him. This the respondent denies, and affirms that his promise was only to pay if and what he found he was by law liable to pay. The question then becomes, was the respondent legally liable to pay these charges? If the plaintiff had not been in fault, I think he might have recovered this as general average, but not where the loss was caused by his own default. Can he then claim it under the provisions of the statute under which the ship was raised, and which also provides for the payment of the expenses so incurred? The shipowner contends that under that Act he is only liable pro ratâ, that he voluntarily paid the cargo's proportion of the expense to the Conservancy, and therefore had a lien on the cargo for it. But it is not so. Under the Act (20 & 21 Vict. c. xlvii. s. 86) the Conservancy are to repay themselves from the ship first, then from the cargo. Besides, the principle which prevents his recovering general average would prevent him from suing in the nature of general average, as in Hingston v. Wendt (ubi sup.) and Notara v. Henderson (ubi sup.). The only question remaining is, whether the statute which limits the liability of the plaintiff also purges him from his negligence and default. Why should it do so? The statute is tyrannical enough as it is. The 8*l.* per ton will not reimburse him for the value of his wool, and there is no reason why the effect of the statute should be extended. Its effect is to limit the payment of the shipowner for the damage his negligence has caused to 8*l.* per ton of his ship's tonnage. Beyond that it purges nothing.

COTTON, L.J.—The first question to be disposed of in this case is, was the contract contained in the undertaking given by the respondent to the plaintiff and set out in the special case a new contract? It appears at once that it was not a new contract, but was only to pay all charges that might legally fall on his cargo; this then must be a claim for salvage or general average. But it would be contrary to all the rules of equity to say that a person who has caused loss should recover from an innocent party. Does, however, the Merchant Shipping Act 1862, s. 54, make any difference to his position? It seems to me that it does not. The words of the section are clearly, "he shall not be answerable in damages," and go no further; neither is it our duty to extend them further. It has been contended that Chapman v. Royal Netherlands Steam Navigation Company (ubi sup.) is an authority for extending it further; but to my mind it is not so, and the question there seems to me to be whether the judgment in a case where both vessels are found to blame is to be considered one judgment or two. Much argument, too, has been expended on the Thames Conservancy Act, but that Act could not have been intended to alter the rights of the ship and cargo inter se, but says that the ship is liable to be sued by the Conservators; although it is true that the cargo is liable to make up the deficiency should the ship be insufficient.

The Cito.

APPEAL FROM PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (ADMIRALTY).

Derelict—Freight—Pro ratâ—Abandonment.

Where a vessel is abandoned and becomes a derelict, the owners of cargo on board are entitled to treat the contract of affreightment as abandoned, and are entitled, until the shipowner again gets possession of his ship, to have the cargo delivered to them at any port into which it may be brought by salvors, on giving bail to cover an award of salvage, without payment of any freight to the shipowner.

Quœre, as to rights of property in derelict pending adjudication.

This was an appeal from the decision of Sir Robert Phillimore, by which he had given leave for the cargo of the Cito, which vessel with the cargo on board had been brought into the port of Falmouth by salvors, to be released from arrest without the payment of any freight, or bail being given to answer the claim of the salvors, and on the owners of cargo undertaking to keep an account of sales of cargo.

The Cito was a Norwegian barque, and while in the course of a voyage from Wilmington to Rotterdam, laden with a cargo of resin, had been abandoned by her crew, in consequence of bad weather; subsequently she was fallen in with by the Colonist, another Norwegian barque, which put a salvage crew on board and brought her into the port of Plymouth. On her arrival the salvors arrested the ship and cargo by process in the Admiralty Court in a suit for salvage. An appearance was entered in the first instance by the owners of the Cito, and subsequently, but before the ship had been released, by the owners of the cargo laden on board her, who, on the 27th July 1881, moved the court to release the cargo at once on the owners of it giving bail to the salvors, but without any payment for freight to the shipowners. The application was opposed by the shipowners, but granted by the court, the cargo owner to give bail for 1150*l*., and undertaking to keep an account of the sale of the cargo. From this decision the owners of the Cito appealed.

Dec. 1, 1881.—The appeal came on for hearing.

Butt, Q.C. and Stubbs for owners of ship.—Nothing has happened to disentitle the shipowner to carry the cargo to its destination. This case is different from The Kathleen (2 Asp. Mar. L. C. 367; L. Rep. 4 A. & E. 269: 31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 204). There the cargo was deteriorating in value, and it was necessary that it should be discharged and sold, and therefore the shipowners could not have completed the contract of carriage either in their own or any other ship, and therefore could only have been entitled to freight pro ratâ on a new implied contract, and the court held that such contract could not be implied in the circumstances of that case. Moreover, The Kathleen (ubi sup.) is not an authority binding this court. We submit that, first, if a vessel is brought into a port other than that of her destination as a port of refuge, whether by her own crew or with the assistance of others, or as a derelict, the shipowner has a right to carry the cargo to its destination, if he is able to do so, either in his own ship or another; secondly, if the owner of the cargo requires his cargo to be delivered to him at the port of refuge, he can only have it, in the absence of a special contract, on the payment of full freight; thirdly, if the cargo is delivered to him by order of the court, the court will presume a new implied contract to pay freight pro ratâ. If the owner of cargo takes away his cargo from the owner of the ship before the latter has completed his contract with respect to it, the latter is prevented from completing the contract by the act of the former, and therefore, on well-recognised principles of law, the former is bound to pay the full amount he has contracted to pay as much as if the contract had been completed. [Brett, L.J.—If the owner of cargo repossesses himself of the cargo against the will of the shipowner, pending the completion of the contract, the whole freight is due. But is the case the same if the cargo is delivered to him out of the custody, not of the shipowner but of the court?] That can make no difference; the possession of the court is only on behalf of the shipowner. Here the shipowner has offered to give bail, that is, to become responsible for the cargo. [Cotton, L.J.—Unless the owners of the ship had possession of the cargo they could not carry it on.] The Court of Admiralty had no jurisdiction in this case at all; it is a question on a contract of affreightment between shipowner and cargo owner, and the suit is one between salvor and property salved. An abandonment of the ship, whether temporary or final, does not dissolve the contract of affreightment:

The Cargo ex Galam, Br. & L. 167.

The value of the cargo here is its original value, plus the freight to be paid for its carriage here, and the cargo owner has increased the value of his cargo by that amount at the expense of the ship. The act of the cargo owner in moving the court to make an order which prevents the shipowner fulfilling his contract comes within the principle laid down by the Privy Council in The Cargo ex Galam (ubi sup.). [Brett, L.J.—You say that the act of the Admiralty Court on motion by the cargo owner is the act of the cargo owner.] For the purposes of this case it is. At all events, if the original contract has from any cause fallen through, yet, seeing the cargo owner has undoubtedly derived a benefit from our act, the court will, as in the case of The Soblomstein (2 Mar. L. C. O. S. 436; L. Rep. 1 A. & E. 293; 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 393), imply a new contract to pay some freight, which amounts in fact to freight pro ratâ itineris. An abandonment of the ship does not dissolve the contract of affreightment; we abandoned the ship, not the contract. If the abandonment of the ship was premature or wrongful we should be liable on the contract; therefore an abandonment of the ship cannot be equivalent to an abandonment of the contract. Suppose a vessel to be abandoned, say, after a collision, and subsequently the crew fall in with her again, and, finding her position not so bad as they at first had reason to suppose, go on board again, and bring the ship into port, could it be said that they had abandoned the right to freight? Yet, so far as the original abandonment was concerned, the act and intention would be precisely the same as when they do not, but others do, fall in with the ship and bring her into port. The court will not assume an abandonment of the contract. In The Teutonia (1 Asp. Mar. L. C. 32, 214; L. Rep. 4 P. C. 182; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 48) the law is laid down by Mellish, L.J: "Their Lordships are of opinion that they ought not to hold that the contract between the parties has become impossible of performance, and is therefore to be treated as dissolved, if by any reasonable construction it can be treated as still capable in substance of being performed." There is no authority for saying freight is lost in case of derelict, in such cases actions for salvage are always brought against freight as well as against ship and cargo. The Kathleen (ubi sup.) was partly based on a supposed vesting of the property in derelict vessels in the Crown, but that is not the case; the Crown takes possession, not for itself, but for the owner should he appear, and to protect the rights of those who have benefited him. In certain cases the owner can himself institute a suit against the salvor (Merchant Shipping Act 1854, s. 468), and in that section he is called the owner of the property, though the property is wreck or derelict and in possession of the Crown by its officer the receiver of wreck. In this case both vessels—the salvor and the crew salved—are foreign, and both sailing under the same flag, that of Norway. Moreover the contract of affreightment is governed by the flag (Lloyd v. Guibert, 2 Mar. L. C. O. S. 26, 283; L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 115; 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 602), and it is incumbent on the owners of cargo to show that the circumstances of the case are considered by the law of Norway to work an abandonment of the contract of affreightment, and that by that law they are entitled to the cargo without payment, and they have not shown it.

Myburgh and Raikes for the owners of the cargo.—This case is practically an appeal from the statement of the law laid down in The Kathleen (ubi sup.), but the case here is even stronger than in The Kathleen. There the shipowners had brought the cargo very nearly to its destination, when by no fault of theirs their ship was so injured as in their opinion to render an abandonment of her necessary. Here the vessel was abandoned on the threshold of its voyage, only three days after leaving port. What pro ratâ freight can be claimed for such an infinitesimal part performance of a voyage? The persons who have practically brought our cargo to England are salvors, and we shall have to pay freight to them under the head of salvage, in awarding which the increase in the value of the property by its being in England instead of America will be considered, and for that purpose we are required to keep an account of sales. There is, therefore, no question of pro ratâ freight; it is either the whole freight on the ground that we have wrongfully prevented the shipowner from fulfilling a contract which he was entitled to fulfil, or it is nothing on the ground that the contract was abandoned, and that almost at its commencement. Whatever rights in the cargo vested in the shipowner, such rights were only in consequence of the possession of the ship, and on the abandonment of that possession were lost. On the salvors taking possession of the ship they obtained possession of the cargo, though not of the contract of affreightment which was a personal one, and on their proceeding against ship and cargo in the Court of Admiralty, the officer of the court obtained a similar possession on behalf of the Crown. There was then no connecting link between ship and cargo except that of physical contact. The Crown were in possession of ship for its owners and its salvors, and of the cargo for its owners and its salvors, and will deliver each to its proper owner on his satisfying the claims of the salvors in respect to it. [Brett, L.J.—Suppose the shipowner appears, but the cargo owner does not, at the port of refuge, and the shipowner gives bail in respect of ship and cargo, and carries both to their destination; what do you say would be the position of the parties as to payment of freight?] Under those circumstances a new contract of carriage would have arisen, and the cargo owners would be bound to pay a reasonable amount for the carriage of the goods. But if the owner of the cargo claims it before the owner of the ship has recovered possession of it by giving bail for it or otherwise, he is entitled to have it without any payment at all. Suppose a valuable cargo to be abandoned, and the owner of cargo becoming aware of it himself salved it and brought it into port, could it be said that he was not entitled to take it out of the ship without payment of freight? That derelict property at sea vests in the Crown, and that pending adjudication private rights of property are divested, is shown by the case of Rex v. Property Derelict (1 Hagg. Adm. Rep. 383). In cases of derelict the property is gone from the owner and is in the Crown, which, however, as an act of grace, waives its right and gives back the property to the owner of it in payment of satisfaction to the person who took possession of the property when derelict, not for himself but for the crown. [Brett, L.J.—The abandonment and subsequent seizure by salvors no doubt changes the possession, but does it change the property?] It is not important here whether it does or no. The right of the shipowner to freight is an incident of his continuing in possession whilst the contract of affreightment is pending, and not necessarily of the ship being his property.

Stubbs in reply.

Brett, L.J.—I am of opinion that this appeal must be dismissed. Many interesting points have been discussed during the argument on which I do not think it necessary to give an opinion. It has been said that a ship so abandoned as to become a derelict and subsequently seized in such a way as to make the seized ship a droit of the Admiralty, causes the property in such a ship so seized to be altered. That proposition is stronger than the one which it is necessary to affirm in the present case in order to support this order and to uphold the decision in The Kathleen (L. Rep. 4 A. & E. 269; 31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 205), and I am not prepared to say that the property is in such case so altered; I assume for the present that it is not. It is then said that the abandonment of a ship so as to leave it to a derelict puts an end to the contract of affreightment. I am not, however, at present prepared to hold thus. Suppose a case of wrongful abandonment, it is obvious that in such a case the contract would not be at an end, for the owner of the cargo could sue the shipowners, on the contract, for the wrongful abandonment. But it seems to me, in order to determine this case, sufficient to say that by an abandonment of a ship and cargo without any intention to retake possession, the shipowner has so far abandoned the contract as to give the other party—the cargo owner—a right to treat the contract as abandoned if he should elect to do so. In the circumstances of this case the salvors of the ship brought her into the Court of Admiralty, so that the owners of the ship cannot have possession and cannot enforce the contract against the owners of the cargo. Now before the shipowner again gets possession of the ship the owners of the cargo claim to be allowed, bail being put in to answer the claim of the salvors, to release the cargo, and take it out of the ship at Falmouth and have it delivered to them there, instead of allowing it to be carried to the original destination at Rotterdam, so that they elect to consider the contract of affrightment at an end; but the shipowner endeavours to prevent the cargo owners from doing this, and claims to have the ship and cargo re-delivered to him, that he may complete his contract of affreightment. It seems to me that the Court of Admiralty would have been wrong to deprive the owner of the cargo of the right to treat what the shipowner has done as an abandonment of the contract of affreightment; but that on the contrary, the court was bound to allow the cargo owner to exercise that right, and that is what this order does. This decision does not deal with the case of a ship which has been abandoned and brought in and dealt with without any interference on the part of the owner of the cargo; it is not necessary to determine that case now, and we do not decide it. It follows from what I have said that a cargo owner who has not done any tortious act is not in such a case as this liable to pay pro ratâ freight or any freight at all.

Cotton, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think, on the facts of the case, the order of the Admiralty Court was right. There was an abandonment of the ship, and this amounts, I think, to an abandonment, so far as the shipowner can abandon it, of the contract of carriage; so that it is not open to the shipowner to take any objection to the conduct of the owner of the cargo, who might agree if he so choose with the salvors to carry on the cargo. It is true that the shipowner could not by his own act put an end to the contract of affreightment. but his conduct gave a right to the owner of the cargo to say that the shipowner had abandoned the contract of affreightment, and to take other measures to dispose of the cargo. Acting on this view of the case, I give no opinion as to what would be the judgment of the court if the shipowner had again got possession of the ship and had made a settlement with the salvor. I am of opinion that the order before us by which the court was held that the ship must satisfy the claims of the salvor against herself without retaining the cargo was right and must be upheld.

Lindley, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The effect of abandonment gives the owner the right to treat the contract of affreightment as terminated. The only doubt in my mind was whether this was altered by the appearance of the shipowner to give bail for ship and cargo, but that doubt has been dispelled.

ADMIRALTY BUSINESS.

Nov. 3 and 11, 1881.

(Before Sir R. Phillimore.)

The Gaetano and Maria.

Bottomry—Foreign law—General Maritime law.

A contract of bottomry is governed by the general maritime law as administered in the place where the bond is payable.

It is no answer to cargo owners sued on a bottomry bond, and setting up a defence that the master of the ship had not taken proper steps to apprise them of his necessity, that such communication was not necessary by the law of the country to which the ship belonged.

The Hamburg (Br. & Lush. 253) followed.

This was a demurrer to a portion of the defence in a bottomry action.

The statement of claim set up a claim on a bottomry bond given by the master and part owner of the Italian vessel Gaetano and Maria, at Fayal, in the Azores, into which port he had put in distress, whilst on a voyage from New York to London, laden with a cargo consigned to the latter place. The bond purported to be on ship, cargo, and freight.

No appearance was entered for the owners of the ship and freight, but the owners of the cargo appeared and alleged (inter alia) that the bond was invalid as against the cargo in consequence of the master not having communicated with the owners of it, he having opportunity to do so.

To this defence, the plaintiff on the 18th July 1881 delivered an amended reply as follows:

4. And by way of further reply to the several allegations in the said paragraph (6), the plaintiffs say that by the law of Italy, to which country the Gaetano and Maria belonged at the time that the bottomry bond in question was executed and at the time when it became due, the bottomry contract had to be entered into and the said bottomry bond had to be executed, as they in fact were in the presence and with the intervention and sanction of the Italian consul or consular agent at the port of Fayal, and that upon these being so entered into and executed, they became and were valid and effectual to bind both ship and cargo without any previous communication being made by the master to the owners of the ship or to the owners of the cargo.

5. In the alternative the plaintiffs say, in answer to the allegations in the same paragraph, that by the law of Italy, to which country the Gaetano and Maria belonged at the time aforesaid, a bottomry contract can be lawfully made and a valid bottomry bond can be executed without any previous communication with the owners of ship or the owners of cargo, and that all the formalities and conditions required by the Italian law in order to make a good and valid bottomry bond were complied with and satisfied before the said bottomry bond was executed.

To this reply the defendants, on 21st July 1881, delivered a rejoinder and also demurred. The rejoinder was simply a joinder of issue, and the demurrer was as follows:

2. The defendants also demur to paragraphs 4 and 5 respectively of the reply, and say that the same are and each of them is bad in law upon the ground that the matters therein respectively alleged afford no answer to the allegations in paragraph 6 of the said defence, and on other grounds sufficient in law to support the demurrer.

Nov. 3.—The demurrer came on for argument.

Butt, Q.C. and Myburgh for the defendants in support of the demurrer.—This question is not governed by the law of Italy, but by general maritime law (The Hamburgh, Br. & Lush), 253; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 327) as administered in the place where the bond is payable (Ibid.). That law, as administered in England, is that before a master of a ship can hypothecate the cargo, he must, where it is possible so to do, communicate with the owners of the cargo (Ibid.). Therefore it is no answer to our defence, that we were not in fact communicated with, that by the law of Italy such communication was unnecessary. The principle of The Hamburgh (ubi sup.) has been recently upheld by the Privy Council in the case of Kleinwort and Co. v. The Cassa Marittima of Genoa (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 358; L. Rep. 2 App Cas. 156; 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 118); and though the judgment in Lloyd v. Guibert (2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 26, 283; L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 115) will probably be quoted as an authority on the other side, it is in fact strongly in favour of our contention, as Willes, J. in his judgment expressly distinguishes cases such as this, and also distinguishes between a case of hypothecation and one of sale of the cargo arising from necessity. It is almost essential, moreover, in such a peculiar maritime contract as that of bottomry, that it should be governed by the maritime lex fori, for, if not, by which of the several municipal laws should it be governed? The cargo, as in this case, was shipped by a citizen of the United States, to be consigned to an Englishman in England, and the captain, in his capacity of agent of the owner of the cargo, may be considered as of the same nationality as that owner, the flag of the ship was that of Italy, the place at which the bond was made was Portuguese territory, and it might well be that the lender of the money might be a Spaniard. Why should not the law of the lender's nation govern the contract as well as that of the borrower? The only law this court, sitting as a court of international jurisdiction, will administer in maritime matters is the general maritime law:

The Leon, 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 404; L. Rep. 6 P. Div. 148; 44 L. T. Rep. N.S. 613.

Charles Hall, Q.C. and Dr. W. G. F. Phillimore for the plaintiffs.—This court is governed by the law laid down in the Exchequer Chamber in the case of Lloyd v. Guibert (ubi sup.); any observations in that case with regard to bottomry are merely obiter dicta. The decision in that case is, that in maritime contracts entered into between persons of different nationalities, in the absence of agreement to the contrary, the parties must be taken to have contracted according to the law of the flag of the ship with reference to which the contract is made. This is also in accordance with the law in America:

Pope v. Nickerson, 3 Story (Amer.) Rep. 165.

Myburgh in reply,

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 11.—Sir ROBERT PHILLIMORE.—The argument in this case arose upon demurrer, and the facts material to the demurrer, and taken for the purposes of the argument as true, are as follows: The Gaetano and the Maria, an Italian ship laden with cargo and bound for London, being in distress, put in at Fayal in the Azores; whilst there her master finding it necessary to raise money for the expenses of the ship, executed a bottomry bond for 2330*l.* 2*s.* 7*d.* purporting to bind ship, freight, and cargo, to one Antonio Caeltro, who thereupon advanced to him the above sum. The money was made payable together with the maritime premium thereon, upon the safe arrival of the ship at her port of discharge. The bond was duly executed in the presence and with the sanction of the Italian consular agent at Fayal. Before executing the bond, the master did not communicate with the defendants, who were then and still are the owners of the cargo, although it was reasonably practicable for him to do so. Antonio Caeltro subsequently indorsed the bond to the plaintiffs, who are the present holders of it. The Gaetano and Maria shortly afterwards proceeded on her voyage, and in May last arrived safely with her cargo at the port of London, and this action against her was commenced by the plaintiffs. It is now contended by the plaintiffs that, as the ship is an Italian ship, and as the bottomry contract was duly entered into in the presence and with the sanction of the Italian consular agent, the case must be governed by the law of the ship's flag, that is, by the law of Italy, under which the master would have authority to bind the cargo owners by his bottomry bond, though executed without previous communication with them, whether such communication were practicable or not. The contention of the defendants is, that their liability must be determined by the general maritime law as administered in England, and that under that law the bottomry bond in the circumstances of the present case would not be valid against them. I am of opinion that the point raised is decided in favour of the defendants by the judgment of Dr. Lushington in The Hamburg (1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 327; Brown. & Lush. Adm. 259, 261, 272). In that case the question was the validity as against cargo owners of a bottomry bond entered into by the master of a German ship, in circumstances very similar to those of the present case, and it was laid down by Dr. Lushington, who relies on Lord Stowell's judgment in The Gratitudine (3 C. Robinson, 240), and on the case of The Buonaparte (8 Moore P.C. 459), that the general maritime law as administered in England was to be applied, and not the lex loci contractus, nor the law of the ship's flag. This decision was affirmed on appeal by the Privy Council. The judgment of the Exchequer Chamber in Lloyd v. Guibert (2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 26, 283; L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 115) was cited by the plaintiffs as impugning the authority of this decision, but Willes, J., who delivered that judgment, expressly recognises and distinguishes the decision in The Hamburg. Moreover the question in Lloyd v.

Guibert was, by what law a contract of affreightment, and not the right of a master to hypothecate cargo, should be governed. The plaintiffs also relied upon the case of Pope v. Nickerson (3 Story's Reports 465), decided in the Circuit Court of the United States in 1844. There are some observations of Story, J. in this case which may appear to favour the plaintiffs' contention, but I am clearly of opinion that I am bound by the decisions of the Privy Council and of this court to which I have referred. The proposition of law is clear that communication by the master with the cargo owners, if reasonably practicable, is necessary in order to constitute an agency for the purpose and enable him to hypothecate the cargo. The Hamburg recognises it as settled law, and the question is put beyond doubt by the more recent case of Kleinwort, Cohen, and Co. v. The Cassa Marittima of Genoa (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 358; L. Rep. 2 App. 156; 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 118), in which the previous decision on this subject were referred to. I give judgment on the demurrer for the defendants.

(Before Sir R. PHILLIMORE and TRINITY MASTERS.)

THE KILLEENA.

Salvage—Derelict—Volunteers—Ineffectual efforts—Abandonment.

Where volunteers navigate a derelict for a time, and on falling in with another vessel abandon her, they are not entitled to salvage award.

THIS was a consolidated salvage action brought by the owners, masters, and crews of the barque Beatrice, of 521 tons register, belonging to the port of Galveston, U.S., the North German Lloyd screw steamship Leipzic, of 1609 tons register, belonging to the port of Bremen, and the Norwegian barque Nora, of 783 tons register, against the barque Killeena, her cargo and freight, and her owners intervening.

The Killeena, a barque of 795 tons register, belonging to the port of Glasgow, and built of iron, left New York on 20th Aug. 1880, bound for Liverpool, laden with a cargo of 1160 tons of Indian corn, and 389 bales of cotton, and manned by a crew of eighteen hands all told.

On the 6th Oct. she encountered a heavy gale of wind, and took so heavy a list to port that the master caused the mainmast and subsequently the foremast to be cut away in order, if possible, to right the ship. The mizentopmast was also carried away. But although she righted somewhat when relieved of her masts, she still continued to have a heavy list to port, and finding that she was unmanageable and could not be navigated into port without steam assistance, on the 9th Oct., her master and crew abandoned her in latitude 48° 10′ N. and longitude 15° 54′ W. The hull of the Killeena was not damaged below the deck, and she was making no water. On the 12th Oct. the Norwegian barque Nora, which was proceeding from Quebec to Barrow, with a cargo of deals, and a crew of sixteen hands, all told, fell in with the Killeena, and put five men on board of her, who proceeded to rig up a jurymast, and used their best endeavours to get sail on her. The Nora, after keeping company with the Killeena for some hours, proceeded on her voyage. The five men on board the Killeena continued to navigate her for three days, until on 15th Oct. the barque Beatrice sighted her with her ensign flying at her gaff with the Union Jack downwards, and bore down upon her, and the Nora's men, then being exhausted by their exertions, requested to be, and were, transferred to the Beatrice, which vessel put another salvage crew on board of the Killeena and took her into tow. The Killeena was then in latitude 49° 0′ N. and longitude 12° 13′ W. The Beatrice then, and the salvage crew put on board by her, together with the steamship Leipzic, which afterwards fell in with the Killeena, performed valuable salvage services to her, the only dispute for the court to decide in their case being as to the amount to be awarded. In the case of the Nora the question arose as to whether she or the men placed by her on board the Killeena were entitled to be rewarded at all for their services. The owners of the Nora pleaded in addition that their vessel was in a damaged condition, and was seriously imperilled by parting with the five men placed on board the Killeena, that much extra labour was thrown upon the remainder of the crew of the Nora, and before the completion of her voyage she had to take assistance which otherwise she would not have needed.

J. P. Aspinall for the Nora.—The owners of the Nora and her master and crew are entitled to salvage reward for their services. As to the owners they were absolutely out of pocket by the stores supplied to the Killeena, by the time of the Nora's voyage being lengthened, and by the cost of the assistance she was obliged to take, and further, the vessel being in a damaged condition and short-handed, ran considerable risk. As to the master and that portion of the crew which remained on board the Nora, they underwent much extra labour and some extra risk to enable the others to perform services to the Nora; and if the Nora was at all benefited by their labours (and her change of position between the time the men went on board and the time they were taken off shows that she was benefited, and, in addition to that, a jurymast had been rigged up, which was afterwards utilised to bring her into port), no subsequent act on the part of the salvage crew could take away from them their right to be rewarded. As to the salvage crew, they actually benefited the Killeena by rigging up a mast and sailing her some distance, and when they were taken off exhausted, they enabled the Beatrice to spare a salvage crew without danger to herself in case of bad weather, and so continued to render service to the Killeena.

E. C. Clarkson for the Beatrice.

Webster, Q.C. (with him Dr. Phillimore) for the Leipzic.

Cohen, Q.C. (with him Myburgh) for the Killeena.—The Nora is not entitled to salvage award. They attempted a task which was beyond their courage, and when the Beatrice sighted them they begged to be taken off; and, as far as they are concerned, the Killeena would never have been rescued at all, but would have been totally lost. The Jonge Bastiaan (5 C. Rob. 322) governs this case. In that case the court awarded salvage award to prior salvors solely on the ground that they had not abandoned the vessel in distress, and laid the law down clearly that had they done so they would not have been entitled to any reward.

J. P. Aspinall (in reply) for the Nora.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is a case of salvage service rendered to a vessel which was abandoned by her master and crew. The Killeena was a barque of 795 tons, and left New York on the 26th Aug. last year, bound to Liverpool, with a cargo of Indian corn. On the 6th Oct. she encountered a heavy gale, and took so heavy a list to port that her master caused the mainmast and and foremast to be cut away, and, finding that she became unmanageable and could not be navigated, her master and those on board left her, and on the 9th Oct. she was abandoned. She kept about in the Atlantic Ocean until the 12th, when she was sighted by a Norwegian ship called the Nora, which put a crew of five hands on board. On the 15th Oct. those men who went on board from the Nora were frightened, and determined to abandon the vessel, and they hoisted the Union Jack, and that attracted the attention of the Beatrice. There is here a most important question — whether the Nora is entitled to anything for her services. Now, to refer to the principles of law, they are laid down in the case of The Undaunted (Lush. 90): "Salvors who volunteer go out at their own risk for the chance of earning reward, and, if they labour unsuccessfully, they are entitled to nothing. The effectual performance of salvage service is that which gives them a title to salvage remuneration. But if men are engaged by a ship in distress, whether generally or particularly, they are to be paid according to their efforts made, even though the labour and service may not prove beneficial to the vessel." Now, there is no doubt that some decisions have laid down this doctrine, that where a set of salvors have done some acts which tend to an ultimate salvage of a vessel, they are entitled to some remuneration, but there is a circumstance in this case most material to consider. The four men and the boy who were put on board from the Nora, deliberately, according to the evidence, when the Beatrice had answered the signal, abandoned and deserted the vessel. It appears to me that the Killeena was a derelict vessel, and her crew deliberately determined to leave her. Four men were found with better heart and courage to take their places and do what was necessary for her preservation. It seems to me that the words of Lord Stowell, in The Jonge Bastiaan (5 C. Rob. 324), are applicable to this case. That was a case of salvage; and he says: "It appears that the vessel was stuck fast upon a rock with her bottom beaten in, and her rudder lost, when the first salvors went to her assistance, in a very heavy sea, and succeeded in warping her off. She sunk afterwards, it is true; but it is not on that account to be said that the first salvors had lost her again, or that they had abandoned their interest in her. They did not stay by the vessel; but it cannot be supposed that, having risked so much for her recovery, they meant to desert her, while others were employed in their sight in weighing her up and in saving the cargo." Now, that was the reverse of this case. Here they did not stay by the vessel, and they had not the slightest intention of assisting her. It appears to me that it would be contrary to the principles upon which salvage remuneration is awarded to allow the Nora's people to appear as salvors in this case, because they were, according to the evidence, turning their backs and running away from the danger to which the vessel was exposed. The men on board the Beatrice had as much reason to be alarmed; but they persevered, and their courage deserves to be rewarded. I am clearly of opinion that the Nora is not to be considered as a salvor in this case. There are two other vessels—the Beatrice and the Leipzic—whose services are to be considered. The Beatrice towed the vessel from the 10th to 26th, and then stood by and lost sight of her upon the 27th. The Leipzic, on the 9th Nov., spoke the Killeena, and offered her services, which were accepted, and after a towage of two days and six hours, she was brought safely into harbour, and thereby very valuable assistance was rendered. The first thing the court has to consider is, what is the sum or the total value out of which the services of the salvors are to be rewarded? It is 12,663*l.*, and out of that I shall award 4,200*l.* The Beatrice ran great risk in order to save the vessel, and deviated from her course, being thus delayed in the performance of her voyage. I shall apportion to the Leipzic 1200*l.*, and the remaining 3000*l.* to the Beatrice—300*l.* to the master, to the four men placed on board 200*l.*, to the rest of the crew 1200*l.*, and to the owners 1300*l.*, the plaintiff Cunningham, of the Beatrice, to have a double share.

THE CHILIAN.

Collision—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea—Art XII.—Mechanical foghorn—36 & 37 Vict. c. 85, s. 17—Necessary departure—Accident to mechanical foghorn.

Where the mechanical foghorn of a sailing ship breaks down, and a mouth horn is made use of in its place, the departure from Art. XII., of the Regulations is necessary, and the vessel is not to blame.

THIS was an action brought by Peter Isberg and others, the owners of the late vessel Carl Konow, and the owners of the freight due for transportation of the cargo lately laden on board her, and her master and crew proceeding for their personal effects against the steamship Chilian and her freight for the recovery of damages caused by a collision which took place between the two vessels, shortly before 5.30 p.m. on the 10th April 1881 in the Irish Channel, about fifteen miles east of the Tuskar Rock. The Carl Konow was a Norwegian barque of 491 tons register, and at the time of the collision was on a voyage from Philadelphia, which port she left on the 24th March 1881, to Newry in Ireland, with a cargo of wheat, manned by a crew of twelve hands, all told. The Chilian is a screw steamship, owned by the West India and Pacific Steam Shipping Company, belonging to the port of Liverpool, of 1306 tons register, and with engines of 250-horse power nominal, and at the time of the collision was on a voyage from Baltimore to Liverpool with a cargo of general merchandise, manned by a crew of forty-five hands, all told.

The case put forward on behalf of the Carl Konow was that, shortly before 5.30 p.m. on the 10th April 1881 she was in the course of her voyage in St. George's Channel, from ten to fifteen miles to the eastward of the Tuskar Rock, the weather being foggy, with a light breeze from the E.N.E. and the tide ebb, and that she was at that time under top sails, topgallant sails, foresail, jib, and foretopmast staysail, heading about S.E., close hauled on the port tack, making from two to two and a half knots an hour, keeping a good look-out and duly sounding the regulation sound signals for fog, and that under these circumstances those on board her observed the Chilian about a quarter of a mile off a little before the beam on her starboard side heading for the Carl Konow, and that the Carl Konow was kept on her course under the expectation that the Chilian would keep out of her way, and her foghorn blown loudly, but that the Chilian, apparently without altering her course, came on, and with her stem struck the starboard side of the Carl Konow just abaft the mainmast, doing her so much damage that she shortly sank with her cargo and the personal effects on board her, and the Carl Konow alleged that the Chilian was not keeping a good look-out, was being navigated at an improper rate of speed and failed to slacken her speed and stop and reverse when approaching the Carl Konow.

The Chilian, in her statement of defence, agreed so far as was material with the Carl Konow as to the state of the weather, and pleaded that just before the collision she was heading about N.E. by E., with her engines going dead slow, and making about five and a half knots an hour, keeping a good look-out, and sounding her whistle at short intervals; that, under these circumstances, those on board her heard the faint sound of a foghorn on the port bow and apparently close to, and her helm was ported and her engines stopped and reversed full speed, and shortly afterwards a schooner was seen on her port side going clear in an opposite direction; and whilst the schooner was so passing, the Carl Konow was seen about a ship's length ahead crossing the bows of the Chilian on the port tack, and the Chilian's engines were kept reversing and her helm was put hard a-starboard; but, notwithstanding, the Chilian with her stem struck the Carl Konow on her starboard side between the main and mizen rigging, and the Chilian alleged that those on board the Carl Konow improperly neglected to comply with the provisions of Article XII. of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

Art. XII. is as follows:

Article XII. A steamship shall be provided with a steam whistle or other efficient steam sound signal, so placed that the sound may not be intercepted by any obstructions, and with an efficient foghorn to be sounded by a bellows or other mechanical means, and also with an efficient bell. A sailing ship shall be provided with a similar foghorn and bell. In fog, mist, or falling snow, whether by day or night, the signals described in this Article shall be used as follows, that is to say:

(b) A sailing ship under way shall make with her foghorn, at intervals of not more than two minutes, when on the starboard tack one blast, when on the port tack two blasts in succession, and when with the wind abaft the beam three blasts in succession.

The Carl Konow, by her reply, joined issue, and further pleaded:

(2) The plaintiffs say that the Carl Konow, on leaving Philadelphia, was provided with an efficient foghorn to be sounded by mechanical means, and also with a mouth foghorn. A few days before the collision with the Chilian the piston of the mechanical foghorn was found to be working a little loose. The mouth foghorn, a powerful brass American horn, was accordingly from that time used on board the Carl Konow, when necessary, instead of the mechanical foghorn, and it was being used before and at the time of the collision. From the time of leaving Philadelphia until the collision the Carl Konow had touched at no port, and her master had had no opportunity of procuring any other foghorn.

The further facts of the case appear sufficiently in the judgment.

Clarkson, Q.C. (with him Dr. Phillimore and Stubbs) for the plaintiffs.—The facts of this case take it out of the operation of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85), the 17th section of which is: "If in any case of collision it is proved to the court before which the case is tried that any of the regulations for preventing collision contained in or made under the Merchant Shipping Acts 1854 to 1873 has been infringed, the ship by which such regulations has been infringed shall be deemed to be in fault, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that the circumstances of the case made departure from the regulation necessary." In this case it was necessary for the Carl Konow to depart from the regulation; in fact, it was impossible for her to do otherwise. A mechanical foghorn was on board when the Carl Konow started, and subsequently got out of order. The master of the Carl Konow afterwards, up to the time of the collision, did everything in his power to conform to the provisions of Article XII. of the Regulations. This is therefore not a case of wilful departure from the rules, which will cause the court to declare the Carl Konow to blame. Neither was it an inevitable accident. The evidence shows that the weather was not so thick but that, if the Chilian had been navigated at a moderate speed, and a good look-out had been kept on board of her, and, if she had been smartly handled, the collision might have been avoided.

Nelson appeared for the owners of the cargo laden on board the Carl Konow.

Butt, Q.C. (with him Myburgh) for the defendants.—The Carl Konow was to blame for this collision.—The court cannot take into consideration such facts as the plaintiffs rely on in this case. If once the excuse is admitted it will be a rare thing for a sailing ship to have her mechanical foghorn in working order. It is much less trouble to use the old mouth-horn, and sailing vessels will not fail to make full use of any opportunity afforded them by a lax interpretation of the rule. Besides, if the court allows the excuse to be good, it really comes to a question as to which of two innocent parties is to be held to blame, for if the steamer heard a faint sound of a foghorn she was entitled to suppose it was at some distance, as it would have been had a proper mechanical horn been used. Really, however, the Chilian did all she could possibly have done in this case. She was proceeding carefully at a low rate of speed, and while avoiding one sailing vessel got so close to another in the thick fog as to make it impossible to avoid a collision:

Clarkson, Q.C. in reply.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is a case of collision in which I have thought it necessary to have a long conference with the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House. The vessels that came into collision were the Carl Konow, a sailing barque, and the Chilian, a screw steamer. It seems that the time of the collision was somewhere about 5.30 p.m., on the 16th April in this year, and the place of the collision was ten or fifteen miles to the eastward of the Tuskar Rock; the exact distance has not been ascertained. The direction of the wind was E.N.E., and the weather (which is a most important circumstance in this case) is said by the Carl Konow to have been foggy, and by the Chilian to have been a thick fog. The parts of the vessels which came into contact were the stem of the Chilian and the starboard side of the Carl Konow abaft the mainmast and between the main and mizen rigging. The Carl Konow was a Norwegian barque, of 491 tons register, and left Philadelphia on the 24th March last, with a crew of twelve hands, and in the course of her voyage, when she had come to what she describes as fifteen miles off the Tuskar Rock, the weather came on foggy. She was under topsails, topgallantsail, foresail, jib, and foretopmast staysail, heading about S.E.; and she says in her case that she saw the Chilian, on her starboard side, a quarter of a mile off, and she was kept on her course expecting the Chilian would keep out of her way, but the Chilian ran into her. The Chilian was a screw steamer of 1306 tons register, and was bound from Baltimore to Liverpool. She says she was heading about N.E. by E. with her engines going dead slow. The Carl Konow was close-hauled on the port tack; and the Chilian says she heard a faint sound of a foghorn on the port bow, and her helm was ported, and her engines stopped and reversed, and shortly afterwards a schooner was seen on her port side, and going clear in an opposite direction; and while the schooner was so passing the Carl Konow was seen about a ship's length off, nearly ahead, and crossing her bows; that her engines were reversed, and her helm put hard a-starboard; but, notwithstanding, a collision took place. The Carl Konow ascribes the collision to improper navigation on the part of the Chilian, and to her neglect of the 17th and 18th Rules for Preventing Collisions at Sea. The 17th rule is, "If two ships, one of which is a sailing ship and the other a steamship, are proceeding in such directions as to involve risk of collision, the steamship shall keep out of the way of the sailing ship;" and the 18th, "Every steamship, when approaching another ship, so as to involve risk of collision, shall slacken her speed, or stop and reverse, if necessary." The defence of the steamer is mainly that, on account of the density of the fog, the accident was inevitable, and she has also contended that the Carl Konow improperly neglected to comply with Article XII. of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea. There is no doubt that it was the duty of the steamer to keep out of the way of the barque; and the question is, whether the defences which she sets up are sufficient to excuse her for having caused the damage in this case. The first question we have had to consider is the law with respect to the foghorn. The account given by the captain is that the ship was furnished with a mechanical foghorn at Rotterdam, and she had three other horns on board. He went from Rotterdam to Philadelphia, and left there on the 24th March. On the 15th April he discovered that this mechanical foghorn was not a proper and efficient one. He says: "The first time I tried the mechanical foghorn I found that it was in want of repair." That was the day before the collision, which took place upon the 16th. Now the words of the statute (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85, s. 17) are: "If in any case of collision it is proved to the court before which the case is tried that any of the regulations for preventing collision contained in or made under the Merchant Shipping Acts 1854 to 1873 has been infringed, the ship by which such regulation has been infringed shall be deemed to be in fault, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that the circumstances of the case made departure from the regulation necessary. Now the barque does comply with the regulation so far as the purchasing of a foghorn is concerned. Article XII. says: "A steamship shall be provided with a steam whistle or other efficient steam sound signal, so placed that the sound may not be intercepted by any obstructions, and with an efficient foghorn to be sounded by a bellows or other mechanical means, and also with an efficient bell. A sailing ship shall be provided with a similar foghorn and bell." Now she had the foghorn on board, which her captain had purchased at Rotterdam, where he had selected from amongst others the best he could get. He made a trial of it, and sailed with it to Philadelphia, and then, unfortunately, he discovered some accident had befallen it, and he then had recourse to the mouth-horn. Now it has been said that here is a disobedience of the 12th Article, and that therefore the case falls under the statute to which I have referred. Under these circumstances it becomes necessary to consider whether the circumstances of the case made a departure from the regulation necessary. The damage to the horn was not discovered until the 15th, and the collision took place upon the 16th. On the whole, I am of opinion that the circumstances of the case did render a departure from the rule necessary in this sense, that some accident had befallen the instrument that was in itself a right and proper instrument, and had been placed on board the ship after a due trial, and some accident had befallen it on the road, which is not accounted for. The captain made use of a mouth-horn in its place, and I think it would be a very severe construction of the Act in these circumstances to hold that the barque was in fault, and I think that the defence on that ground cannot be sustained. There remains to consider the other defence, which I should say is the main question, namely, whether it is an inevitable accident. Now that there was a fog is pretty certain. The question is as to the degree of the thickness. Was it so thick as to render vessels unable to be seen at a greater distance than 300 or 400 feet from each other? We think it was not. Then the question is whether the steamer ought not to have stopped at an earlier period. The captain came on deck on hearing the telegraph bell ring, and then the engines were going ahead. The steamer continued until she was within 200 feet of the barque, and one schooner had passed so close that she could be seen. We think that the steamer must have heard the foghorn, according to the evidence. We think that in these circumstances the captain ought not to have continued his speed of not less than five knots, which was greater than was necessary for a vessel in these circumstances, and I must therefore pronounce the Chilian alone to blame.

THE MAID OF KENT.

Collision—Consequential damage—Original jurisdiction—Practice—Reference to registrar and merchants.

It is not the invariable practice of the Admiralty Division in cases of damage to refer questions of consequential damage to the registrar and merchants.

The court will in each case consider whether the question of consequential damage is one which ought to be decided by the court itself, with the assistance of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House, or one which ought to be referred to the registrar and merchants.

The court will be influenced in coming to its decision by economical considerations, and by the presence of questions requiring for their decision the nautical knowledge of the Elder Brethren.

THIS was an action brought by Richard Calvert Haws and others, the owners of the barque Kate Covert, against the owners of the paddle steamship Maid of Kent, to recover damages sustained by them in a collision which occurred between the Kate Covert and the Maid of Kent shortly before 6 p.m. on the 7th Feb. 1881, not far from the mouth of Dover harbour.

The plaintiffs' statement of claim alleged that at the above-mentioned time the barque Kate Covert was lying at anchor in Dover bay by her port and starboard anchors with her proper riding light duly exhibited and burning brightly, and keeping a good look-out, the wind at such time blowing a gale from the south and the tide being a little after high water, and that at such time the defendants' steamship the Maid of Kent, being at the time under steam, ran against and with her mainmast fouled the jibboom of the Kate Covert and caused the Kate Covert to drag her anchors and to go upon the Mole Rocks, and thereby damage was done to the Kate Covert and she was compelled to take salvage assistance, and great losses and expenses had to be and were incurred by the plaintiffs, and that the collision was occasioned by the negligence and mismanagement of those on board the Maid of Kent.

In answer to this the defendants, in their statement of defence, pleaded that, on the afternoon of the day in question, their paddle steamship Maid of Kent, a vessel of 171 tons register, belonging to the port of London, employed in the mail service between Dover and Calais, and manned by a crew of eighteen hands, was in Dover harbour, and that about 5.30 p.m. the Maid of Kent, having to run as the night mail boat that night, and having to leave the harbour while the tide served, left the harbour, the weather at that time being thick with rain, and there being a gale blowing from the S.S.W. with a heavy sea from the south, and the tide being nearly slack, as it was shortly after high water, and that the Kate Covert was anchored at that time about 150 or 200 yards from the mouth of the harbour bearing about S.E., there being also other vessels anchored near the mouth of the harbour; and that, as the weather was so bad as to make it imprudent for the Maid of Kent to lie alongside the Admiralty Pier till her time came for actually receiving passengers and mails, her master prepared to moor her to the innermost mooring buoy outside the harbour, and in the course of manœuvring for the purpose of carrying this out, a good look-out being kept on board the Maid of Kent, and she being very carefully navigated, it became necessary for the Maid of Kent to steer out to sea, and her course was so shaped as to pass well clear of the Kate Covert, and that she had got right ahead of her in safety when a very heavy sea struck her on the starboard side and carried her, notwithstanding all the efforts of those on board her, on to the jibboom of the Kate Covert, which damaged the Maid of Kent's foremast funnel, and was itself damaged. The statement of defence then proceeded:

5. In and by reason of this collision the Kate Covert sustained no other damage save the loss of her jibboom and some other slight damage to her upper works. It is not true that the Maid of Kent, by colliding with her, caused the Kate Covert to drag her anchors or to go upon the Mole Rocks, or to receive the damage thereby alleged to have been sustained, or to take the salvage assistance mentioned in the third paragraph of the statement of claim. The defendants do not admit that the Kate Covert dragged her anchors at any time after the collision, or that she went on to the Mole Rocks. If she did it was not owing to the collision with the Maid of Kent.

7. The defendants say that the collision was an inevitable accident, and was not caused or contributed to by any negligence of the defendants or those on board the Maid of Kent. They further say that in any event they would be liable only for the aforesaid damage to the jibboom and upperwork.

On this statement of defence the plaintiffs joined issue.

At the trial of the action, which came on on the 9th April, the defendants' counsel proceeded, in cross-examination of the master of the Kate Covert, to put the question: "Would not the Kate Covert have gone aground on the Mole Rocks if there had been no collision?" To this question the plaintiffs objected on the ground that it could only be material on the question of consequential damage, which, according to the practice of the court, had to be referred to the registrar and merchants, and that the question was therefore irrelevant to the issue before the court.

Butt, Q.C. (with him Clarkson, Q.C.) in support of the objection.—In this case there arises a question of consequential damage, and it has always been the practice of this court to refer such questions to the registrar and merchants. The plaintiffs have merely to prove that they sustained loss by the default of the defendants, and they are then, by the practice of the court, entitled to a reference. If it had been the practice for the court to decide these questions at all, that course would certainly have been adopted in such cases as The Thuringian (1 Asp. Mar. L. C. 263), and The Flying Fish (Br. & L. 436), but there is no mention of such a course there. In this case the plaintiffs have relied on that established practice, and are not prepared with evidence in support of their case of consequential damage. There is sufficient reason for the practice. If in all cases it was necessary for plaintiffs to be prepared to go into such questions at the trial, many unnecessary witnesses would have to be brought up in case they should be required, and the expense of damage actions would be greatly increased. It can make no difference to the practice of the court that the question of consequential damage appears on the pleadings.

Webster, Q.C. (with him Dr. Phillimore), for the defendants, against the objection.—The plaintiffs are right to the extent that it is the general practice of the court to refer questions of consequential damage to the registrar and merchants, but this is only the general, and not the universal, rule. Instances of cases in which the court itself has entertained such questions are to be found. In The Mellona (3 W. Rob. 7), and The Linda (Swab. 306), questions similar to those involved in the present case as to the management of injured vessels after collision arose, and the court, with the assistance of Trinity Masters, decided them without reference. There is no difference between those cases and the present. In all of them alike questions of nautical skill and management have to be decided, and the court, having nautical experts specially to assist it in deciding such questions, is the proper, and only proper, tribunal to decide them. It is useless for the plaintiffs to plead surprise, for the whole question is raised on the pleadings, and they ought to have been prepared to meet it.

Butt, Q.C. in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 11.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—In this case of the Kate Covert against the Maid of Kent a question has arisen as to the practice of the court in cases of consequential damage, and the question was argued on Saturday last, when a good many cases were referred to upon the point, and the court reserved its judgment, which it will now deliver. The question which the court really has to determine is, whether it is competent for the court in every case of this kind to decide the question of consequential damage, or whether it is not rather the practice to refer it to the registrar and merchants. The general competency of the court to decide upon questions of this description is not denied, but the point raised—though not expressly raised upon the pleadings—was, whether in all cases and all circumstances it is the practice of the court to send a matter of consequential damage to be tried by the registrar and merchants. This point has not been expressly decided, and it may very well be that in some cases such a question should be transferred to the registrar and merchants, and that in other cases it should not be. In some cases, for instance, considerations of economy or the presence of questions requiring for their decision a knowledge of nautical affairs might make it very desirable that the matters involved in them should be decided by the judge of the court, with the assistance of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House. Now the cases cited by the plaintiffs I need not go into, because they do not prove more than that under the special circumstances of those particular cases the questions of consequential damage arising in them were considered such as might fitly and properly be referred to the registrar and merchants. But the cases referred to by the defendants fully establish the proposition, that the court has full power to deal with questions of this description with the assistance of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House. The case of The Mellona (3 W. Rob. 7, 13, was cited from William Robinson's Reports, and The Linda (Swa. 306) from Swabey's Reports, and many more cases were cited, but it is not necessary to refer to them for the purposes of the present case. In the case of The Aline (5 Monthly Law Mag. 302) the plaintiffs, whose vessel had sustained loss by collision on a voyage to St. Petersburg, at the hearing claimed certain consequential damages caused, as they alleged, by their vessel being detained for repairs in this country beyond the Baltic season, and Dr. Lushington said he would require it to be satisfactorily proved that every possible exertion had been made to get the cargo to St. Petersburg, and come back again before the close of the season, and not having sufficient evidence before him to decide whether this had been done, referred the question of consequential damage generally to the registrar and merchants. That was all that was decided in that case. Again, in the earlier case of The Eolides (3 Hagg. 367) Sir John Nicholl appears to have taken evidence at the hearing respecting damages done to the cargo on board the plaintiffs' vessel, and stated to have been in consequence of the collision, and to have rejected the claim on the ground that the plaintiffs appeared to have waited two tides without having done anything during that period to stop a leak. In both these cases I have just mentioned the court itself dealt with the question whether there was on the facts any claim for consequential damage which could be sustained. In the present case, then, it is competent for the court to deal with and decide the question of consequential damage. It remains to be considered whether in this case it is proper for the court, with the assistance of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House, to entertain that question, or whether it ought rather to refer it to the registrar and merchants. In the present case the statement of claim contains the allegation that by reason of the collision damage was done to the Kate Covert, and she was compelled to take salvage assistance, and great losses and expenses had to be and were incurred by the plaintiff. There the plaintiffs clearly plead consequential damage. This is met by the following averment, in the fifth paragraph of the statement of defence, that "in and by reason of the collision the Maid of Kent sustained no other damage save the loss of her jibboom, end some other damage to her upper works"; and the paragraph then goes on to say more specifically that "it is not true that the Maid of Kent by colliding with her caused the Kate Covert to drag her anchors, or to go upon the Mole Rocks, or to receive the damage thereby alleged to have been sustained, or to take the salvage assistance mentioned in the statement of claim;" and in the last paragraph of the statement of defence the defendants say that "the collision was an inevitable accident, and was not caused or contributed to by any negligence of the defendants, or of those on board the Maid of Kent, and they further say "that, in any event, they would be liable only for the aforesaid damage to the jibboom and upper works;" that is to say, that they are not liable for consequential damage. I am of opinion that it is proper in this case that the court itself should entertain this question of consequential damage and decide upon it, assisted as it will be by the advice of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House. Indeed it was not denied that the court, assisted by the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House, would in this case be a better tribunal to decide the question of consequential damage than the registrar and merchants, as the Elder Brethren would bring to bear on it that nautical knowledge which they undoubtedly possess, but which may or may not be possessed by the registrar and merchants. I am of opinion that the court itself can and ought to go into the question of consequential damage in this case at the present stage of the proceedings, and that the practice of the court will not be interfered with by this being done, and I shall therefore rule accordingly.

The further hearing of the case was then proceeded with, and before the defendants' case had commenced it was agreed by both sides that judgment should be entered for the plaintiffs, with damage 60*l.* and costs.

THE REIHER.

Collision—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, Art. XI.—Overtaking vessels—Light astern—Apprehension of danger.

A vessel is not bound by Art. XI. of the Regulations to show from her stern a white light or a flare-up light to a vessel overtaking her, unless there is ground for the apprehension of danger from the overtaking vessel.

THIS was an action brought by the owners of the fishing dandy John Ivory, of Lowestoft, against the North German Lloyd, the owners of the steamship or vessel Reiher, of Bremerhaven, for damages resulting from a collision which occurred between the two vessels about 5.30 a.m. on the 30th Nov. 1880 in the North Sea. The plaintiffs averred that their vessel, a fishing dandy of twenty-eight tons, was, shortly before the time of the collision, in the North Sea, about twenty-five miles E.N.E. of Lowestoft, manned by a crew of eleven hands, and with about five thousand herrings on board, the weather being then clear and starlight, the tide flood, and there being a breeze from the W.S.W. The John Ivory was lying to on the starboard tack under whole mainsail storm jib and drift mizen, heading about S.S.W., and making little headway, her regulation side lights being duly exhibited and burning brightly, and a good look-out being kept. Under these circumstances those on board of her perceived the white light and shortly afterwards the green light of the Reiher at a considerable distance astern on the starboard quarter, and shortly afterwards the green disappeared and the Reiher opened her red light, and was then in a position to pass all clear on the starboard side of the John Ivory; but when not far off she suddenly altered her course again and opened her green light, shutting in her red, and though a flare-up was shown to her she came on at a considerable rate of speed, and with her stern struck the starboard quarter of the John Ivory and did her great damage, and caused her master to be drowned.

The defendants pleaded in defence that, shortly before the time of the collision, the wind being about W.S.W., blowing a fresh breeze, and the weather fine, but very dark, with passing clouds, and the sea rough, the Reiher, a screw steamship of 920 tons register, was, during the prosecution of a voyage from Breuerhaven to London, in the North Sea, off Yarmouth, being laden with a general cargo, and manned by a crew of twenty-two hands and passengers, steering about W. by S. half S., and proceeding at the rate of about six knots per hour, with the proper regulation masthead and side lights duly exhibited and burning brightly, and keeping a good look-out, and that at such time a dark object was seen on the starboard bow, and the helm of the Reiher was starboarded a little, and then steadied, and shortly afterwards a vessel with no light visible, which proved to be the John Ivory, was seen a little on the starboard bow, at the distance of half a ship's length, and almost immediately afterwards a flare-up light was seen to be shown on board of her: and that the Reiher then immediately stopped and reversed, and her helm was put hard-a-starboard, but the Reiher, with her port bow, touched the starboard quarter of the John Ivory, and did some slight damage to her upper work; and that (inter alia) those on board the John Ivory did not show a white light or a flare-up light from her stern in due time before the said collision in accordance with Art. XI. of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

There was some conflict in the evidence as to the state of the weather, plaintiffs averring that it was fine and clear and starlight, and the defendants stating in their preliminary act that it was dark but clear, and in their statement of defence that it was fine, but very dark, with passing clouds.

The plaintiffs' witnesses further gave evidence to the effect that the green light of the Reiher when first seen about ten minutes before the collision, was on the port quarter of the John Ivory, and about one mile distant, and that in about five minutes her lights changed and she opened her red light, being then about half a mile off, and in about three minutes more she shut in her red and showed her green light again; that a flare-up was immediately shown, the steamship still being at some distance, but that nevertheless the collision took place.

On the other side it was alleged by those on board the Reiher that the course of the Reiher was altered a little, her helm being starboarded because the look-out man said he thought he saw a dark object on the water, and that some little time afterwards the flare-up light of the smack was seen ahead just on the starboard bow, and the collision immediately took place. One of the defendants' witnesses, who was on the bridge during the whole of the time in question, stated that he did not believe that the dark object seen by the lookout man was the John Ivory. The further facts of the case appear in the judgment.

Dr. Phillimore (with him Dr. Deane, Q.C.) for the plaintiffs.—In this case the John Ivory did everything which it was necessary for her to do under Art. XI. of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea. Art. XI. is as follows: "A ship which is being overtaken by another shall show from her stern to such last-mentioned ship a white light or a flare-up light." This rule must be reasonably interpreted. It cannot be contended that it is the duty of a vessel to show a white light or a flare-up light to every vessel which is passing across her stern, or passing in any direction out of sight of her side lights. If a vessel is passing astern of another on a course at right angles to her course, and suddenly changes her course so as to become an overtaking vessel, the duty of showing a light astern does not devolve on the vessel being overtaken until after the change of course involves danger of collision. In this case, as long as the Reiher kept her red light open, there was no danger of collision; the Reiher was passing safely across the John Ivory's stern at some distance, and there was consequently no obligation at that time on the John Ivory to show a light. Suddenly, however, the Reiher, either in consequence of seeing something dark on the water, as her own witnesses say, or for some other reason, saw fit to change her course; this opened out her green light to the John Ivory, and then, and not till then, arose the duty of showing a stern light. This she did as soon as possible, but it was too late then to avert the collision. If a good look-out had been kept on board the Reiher, the Reiher would have been able to see the John Ivory on such a night as the evidence shows this to have been, and those on board the latter vessel had a right to assume that they were seen until the Reiher steered directly in the direction of the vessel. The Reiher is therefore solely to blame for this collision. She disobeyed the rule which made it her duty to keep out of the way, while the John Ivory did everything that was required by the rules, and cannot therefore be said to have contributed to the collision.

Clarkson, Q.C. (with him J. P. Aspinall).—There is nothing in the collision rules to release the John Ivory from the obligation placed upon her by the 11th article. The Reiher was in every sense of the word an overtaking vessel. The course of the John Ivory was S.S.W., and she was going very slowly through the water, while the Reiher was going at the rate of six knots. According to the evidence of those on board the John Ivory the green light of the Reiher was seen about ten minutes before the collision about one mile distant, and about one point on the port quarter of the John Ivory. Five minutes later the Reiher was half a mile distant—as she would be at the rate she was going—and the John Ivory had got exactly on to her course, where both her lights were visible, and, crossing that course, opened out the red light of the Reiher, which was coming steadily on her course, being well behind the John Ivory's side lights. This being the case, it is obvious, and should have been so to those on board the John Ivory, that if both vessels pursued their respective courses for the next five minutes they would come into dangerous proximity to one another; in fact they were so nearly approaching the same spot that the slightest change of course on the part of the Reiher might bring them into collision. It cannot be said that this is a case in which the Reiher ought to have been kept in ignorance of the position of the John Ivory, nor that the 11th rule does not apply. The John Ivory was clearly bound by that rule to show a light astern, and the collision was caused by her failing so to do. If this rule is to be held to apply only to cases in which the courses of vessels are actually converging, it will only apply to a very small proportion of the cases it was intended to cover. It is submitted that, according to the true construction of this rule, a vessel is bound to show a light to any vessel astern, which by any manœuvre on her part might cause danger of collision, and not only in cases where there is actual reason to apprehend a collision unless one of the vessels changes her course.

Phillimore in reply.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is a case of collision which happened on the 30th Nov. last, off the coast about twenty-five to thirty miles E. N.E. of Lowestoft. The direction of the wind was W.S.W., and the state of the weather, which is not unimportant in this case, was stated in the preliminary act of the plaintiffs to be fine and clear. The result of the evidence is that it was fine and clear, but starlight. The vessels that came into collision were the John Ivory, a fishing smack of twenty-eight tons burthen, and the other vessel was the Reiher, a screw steamer of 920 tons register. The John Ivory, the fishing vessel, was lying to on the starboard tack, under whole mainsail storm jib and drift mizen, heading about S.S.W. The Reiher was coming with a cargo from Bremerhaven to London. The parts of the vessels which came into collision were the stem of the Reiher with the starboard quarter of the John Ivory. Now, the articles of the sailing rules that apply to this case are the 11th and the 20th. The 11th says that a ship which is being overtaken by another shall show from her stern to such last-mentioned ship a white light or a flare-up light, and the 20th rule says that, every ship, whether a sailing ship or a steamship, overtaking any other shall keep out of the way of the overtaken ship. The articles appear to apply to this case. The Reiher was an overtaking ship. It was therefore the duty of the steamer to keep out of the way of the dandy fishing smack, and it was the duty of the dandy to have shown a light over her stern if there was ground for the apprehension of damage from the overtaking vessel. The first question we have had to consider is, was a flare-up exhibited in sufficient time on board the dandy to warn the steamer of her position? It appears to us that the steamer ported her helm, and therefore, inasmuch as her red light was shown, there was no necessity for the dandy to have shown a flare-up light at the time, because she had a right to assume that the steamer had seen her. With regard to the conduct of the steamer, it is to be observed that the night was not so dark that the dandy could not have been seen at the time of the collision, and if she had either decided on porting or had decided on starboarding, and kept on one or the other courses, she might have gone clear; but she first ported and then starboarded; and had she adhered to her first porting, in our judgment, all would have been right. Therefore, I pronounce the Reiher alone to blame.

CORY AND OTHERS v. BURR.

Marine insurance — Barratry — Smuggling — Seizure by Revenue officers—Warranty free from seizure.

Where a policy of marine insurance for a named time enumerates, amongst the perils insured against, "men-of-war, enemies, pirates, rovers, thieves, surprisals, takings at sea, arrests, restraints and detainments of all kings, princes, and people, of what nation, condition, or quality soever, barratry of the master and mariners," there being also a warranty "free from capture and seizure and the consequences of any attempts thereat," and the officers of the ship insured by the policy, are arrested by Spanish revenue officers for smuggling tobacco on board, and proceedings are taken to procure sentence of condemnation and confiscation of the ship at a Spanish port, an underwriter of the policy is not liable for expenses incurred in resisting the proceedings of the Spanish revenue officers.

THIS was an action brought by the plaintiffs to recover from the defendant under a policy of marine insurance subscribed by the defendant a proportion of the amount of a general average contribution and of particular charges and expenses incurred by the plaintiffs in respect of the subject-matter of insurance, and, pursuant to order, the following case was stated for the opinion of the court:

1. The plaintiffs, at the several times hereinafter mentioned, were the owners of the steamship Rosslyn, and the defendant is an underwriter at Lloyd's. On or about the 30th May 1878 the plaintiffs effected a policy of marine insurance for 3500*l.*, which the defendant subscribed for the sum of 100*l.* on the said steamship the Rosslyn, the ship valued at 12,000*l.* and machinery valued at 6000*l.* for the space of twelve calendar months at and from the 30th May 1878 to the 29th May 1879, both days inclusive.

2. A copy of the policy accompanied the case, and was to be taken as part thereof, the material parts of which were as follows:

Touching the adventures and perils which we, the assurers, are contented to bear and to take upon us in this voyage, they are of the seas, men-of-war, fire, enemies, pirates, rovers, thieves, jettisons, letters of mart and countermart, surprisals, takings at sea, arrests, restraints, and detainments of all kings, princes, and people of what nation, condition, or quality soever, barratry of the master and mariners, and of all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that have or shall come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the said goods and merchandise and ship, &c. or any part thereof.

After the attestation clause and before the signature there were several clauses, amongst them the following:

Warranted free from capture and seizure and the consequences of any attempts thereat.

3. At the time of effecting the policy and thence until and at the several times thereinafter mentioned, the plaintiffs were interested in the subject-matters of insurance to the full amounts insured thereon, and the policy was made by the authority and for the use and benefit of the plaintiffs.

4. On the 23rd May 1879 the vessel, being then covered by the policy, was at the port of Gibraltar in ballast, and was ordered by the plaintiffs' agents at Gibraltar to proceed at once and direct to the port of Bilbao in Spain, for the purpose of there loading a cargo.

5. On the night of the 23rd May 1879 the master took on board eight tons of tobacco, which were brought on board by two British subjects, and which the master knew were intended to be smuggled into Spain by the said British subjects, and the said master, in order to assist the said British subjects in smuggling the said tobacco into Spain, undertook in consideration of 30*l.* paid to him by them to deliver the said tobacco on board another vessel at sea.

6. The master in entering into this agreement and on shipping the tobacco as aforesaid, and in causing the said vessel to proceed to sea with the said tobacco on board to be delivered as aforesaid, acted against the interest and contrary to the express instructions of his owners, and with the intention of benefiting himself, and exposed his ship, as he well knew, to the risk of being seized by Spanish revenue officers.

7. The said ship left Gibraltar at 5.30 a.m. of the 24th May 1879 with the said tobacco on board, and at 11 p.m. of that day, being then off the coast of Spain, the master caused the engines to be stopped for a time, and the said ship afterwards proceeded dead slow, looking for the vessel on board of which the said tobacco was to be delivered in pursuance of the undertaking mentioned in the fifth paragraph.

8. If it is a question of fact whether the conduct of the master in acting as aforesaid was barratrous, the arbitrator who stated the case found that it was.

9. While the said ship was so proceeding as in the seventh paragraph mentioned, two craft came alongside with Spanish revenue officers on board, who seized the ship and took her into Cadiz.

10. On the arrival of the vessel at Cadiz, the master and crew were placed under arrest on a charge of smuggling, and proceedings were taken to procure sentence of condemnation and confiscation of the ship. The plaintiffs incurred heavy expenses in resisting the said proceedings against the said ship.

11. In order to procure the restoration of the said ship, the plaintiffs were compelled to pay a large sum of money, and but for this payment the ship would have been confiscated and wholly lost to the plaintiffs. There was no other mode of rescuing the ship. The defendant's proportion of the said payments and expenses incurred by the plaintiffs amount to 8*l.* 18*s.* 11*d.*

The question for the opinion of the court was, whether the sum of 8*l.* 18*s*, 11*d.* was payable by defendant to the plaintiffs?

If the court should be of opinion in the affirmative, then judgment was to be entered for the plaintiffs with costs. If the court should be of opinion in the negative, then judgment was to be entered for the defendant with costs.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 9.—FIELD, J.—This is an action brought to recover from the defendant his proportion of a loss in respect of the ship Rosslyn, insured by the defendant and other underwriters on a time policy. The policy enumerated the ordinary perils insured against, and also contained a warranty against "capture and seizure." The facts were stated in a special case, and raised the question which was argued before us whether the loss was to be treated as a loss by barratry of the master, in which case it was within the assurance effected by the policy and so recoverable, or whether it was a loss by capture and seizure, and so within the warranty as an excepted peril. The facts were as follows: On the night of the 23rd May 1879 the master of the Rosslyn, in consideration of 30*l.*, took on board at Gibraltar eight tons of tobacco, which he was to deliver on board a vessel for the purpose, as he knew, of being smuggled into Spain. It was admitted that this was "barratry" of the master within the meaning of the policy, that by it he exposed his ship, as he well knew, to the risk of being seized by Spanish revenue officers. The ship having left Gibraltar with the tobacco on board was so seized and taken into Cadiz, where the master and crew were placed under arrest on a charge of smuggling, and proceedings were taken to procure sentence of condemnation and confiscation of the ship. To prevent this result the plaintiffs incurred heavy expenses, and were compelled to pay a large sum of money to get back their ship, and it was to recover the defendant's proportion of these payments and expenses, amounting to 8*l.* 18*s.* 11*d.*, that this action was brought. Now, the ordinary maxim applicable to losses by perils assured against when in the chain of causes the loss may be referred to more than one of those perils, is to assign it to its proximate and not its remote cause, and in a case, therefore, where a ship insured under a policy limited to capture and seizure, and not extending to perils of the sea was driven on a hostile coast by those perils, and so became a prize to a captor, the loss was held to be within the policy, no separate loss having occurred before the happening of that event: (Green v. Elmslie, Peake's N.P. 278.) But the case of loss by barratry does not fall within this general rule, and to recover for a loss so caused it is not necessary that the barratrous act should be, and indeed it hardly ever is, the proximate cause of loss, and therefore a loss traceable remotely to, may be recovered as a loss by, barratry. Thus, in the case of a ship being dashed to pieces by the sea and lost in consequence of drifting caused by a barratrous act, it was held that the loss might be recovered for, either as a loss by perils of the sea or by barratry: (Heyman v. Parish.) So, also, a loss by capture which was made by reason of a barratrous agreement for that purpose entered into by the master with the captor, was held recoverable as a loss either by capture or barratry, at the option of the assured: (Arcangelo v. Thompson.) But in the cases thus decided there was not, as in the present case, any warranty against the proximate cause of loss—i.e., the capture and seizure—and they do not, therefore, go far enough to establish the plaintiffs' right in this case. Neither does it appear to me that the cases of Vallejo v. Wheeler and American Insurance Company v. Dunham, cited on the part of the plaintiffs, establish their contention, the grounds of those decisions not extending beyond the wording and effect of the policies in those cases, which are not similar to the one which we have to decide upon. In the present case it was admitted by Mr. Cohen in argument that the loss might possibly have been recovered for as barratrous, if there had been no warranty in the policy, but the question in this case is whether, upon the true construction of the policy, the loss was covered by a peril assured against or by one excepted, and in deciding that question we are bound, according to the ordinary rules of construction, to give effect to the whole policy, and if any construction sought to be put upon it would have the effect of rendering any of the language used null or ineffective, that construction must be condemned. Now, it has been held that where there is a warranty such as this, and the ship being by perils of the sea placed in such a position as to be exposed to capture, and is captured, the loss is to be assigned to the proximate cause, the capture, and not to the remote cause, the perils of the sea, and so is within the exception: (Livie v. Janson, 12 East, 648; Green v. Elmslie.) In Livie v. Janson there was a warranty "free from American condemnation." The master sailed out of port in breach of an American embargo, and having sustained partial sea damage was seized and condemned by the American Government for the breach, and this was held a total loss by the excepted peril; Lord Ellenborough saying that the substantive loss was imputable to such latter peril only, and not to the preliminary sea damage. The consideration of these authorities, and the application of the well-known principle that a contract of assurance is one of indemnity and indemnity only, leads me to the conclusion that the loss in the present case is imputable to the excepted peril. It was correctly alleged by Mr. Cohen in the argument that capture and seizure are not in terms enumerated perils, but are and may be included in, or caused directly or remotely by, a great many of the perils actually enumerated; e.g., perils of the seas may be the remote cause of it, as in the case of Green v. Elmslie; or more frequently perils by men-of-war, or enemies, or pirates. In these or similar cases to hold that a capture caused by, or the direct result of any of, these perils is not within the exception, would, it seems to me, be to deprive the latter of its whole or at least a good part of its effect and value. As Mr. Cohen pointed out, the warranty is not an extension, but a limitation of the contract of assurance. Capture and seizure therefore, although not specifically included in the catalogue of perils insured against, must be found in some of them, and may be found in many, and amongst others (as the case shows) they may be the consequence of barrratry which led to the act by which in truth the loss happened. Until the seizure by the Spanish authorities, although a barratrous act had been committed, there had been no loss, and had the captain not been overhauled there probably never would have been any. It was the seizure that brought the loss into existence. The true mode of construction is, I think, to read the clause in which the perils are enumerated and the barratry together, and then it will stand thus: "Assurer liable for loss by barratry except such barratry as ends in or causes capture and seizure." This construction gives effect to all the words used. There is capture and seizure as found in the warranty, and there may be acts of barratry which do not result in seizure, and are therefore properly assured against without exception. On the contrary, Mr. Myburgh asks us to read it thus: "Free unless caused by barratry," but if so, why not also read in all the other perils capable of producing seizure, and so render the exception nearly or absolutely nugatory? I think therefore that, reading the whole policy, the true contract is, that if there is a loss directly caused by capture and seizure, as was the case here, the loss is not the less imputable to the excepted peril because it might remotely have been due to the barratrous act. My judgment is therefore for the defendant, with costs.

Cave, J.—I also am of opinion that the defendants are entitled to succeed. The master was clearly guilty of barratry, which led to the seizure of the vessel, and there was therefore a loss by barratry; but a loss which primâ facie was within the warranty. It was, however, contended, on behalf of the plaintiffs, that there having been a loss by barratry, they were entitled to recover, although the proximate cause of the loss arose from seizure, and in support of this contention Vallejo v. Wheeler was cited. In that case the vessel was assured by a voyage policy, and the master having barratrously deviated, it was held that the insurer was liable for a loss by perils insured against, whether such loss happened during the fraudulent deviation or afterwards. The ground on which it was held that the insurer was liable for loss by a peril happening after the fraudulent deviation was that, as there was a deviation, the owner, if not secured against the barratry of the master, would have lost his insurance by the fraud of the master. Now, if in this case it could have been shown that the owner could not have recovered upon a policy against loss by seizure by reason of the barratrous conduct of the master, the principle of Vallejo v. Wheeler would have applied. But it is clear from the cases of Arcangelo v. Thompson, Heyman v. Parish, and Blyth v. Shepherd, that the law is not so, and that under the circumstances of this case, the insurer could have recovered under a policy against loss by seizure. The case of The American Insurance Company v. Dunham was also cited on behalf of the plaintiffs. In that case it was held that, upon a policy against (amongst other perils) barratry of the master, the assured was entitled to recover damages sustained in consequence of the seizure and detention of the vessel and cargo by reason of prohibited goods having been found on board belonging to the master, shipped by him for the purpose of being smuggled, notwithstanding a clause in the policy that the insurer should be free from charge in consequence of seizure or detention for or on account of any illicit or prohibited trade. The ground of that decision, which was founded on Havelock v. Hancill, was that the warranty extended only to the acts of the assured and of those acting with his knowledge and consent. It is clear that that ground cannot apply here, and if, because perils from barratry are insured against, it is to be held that the warranty against seizure does not extend to a seizure which is barratrous, or which is the natural result of barratry, it might equally be contended that, because perils from enemies are insured against, the warranty against capture does not extend to capture by an enemy. In Kleinworth v. Shepard there is an obitur dictum of Lord Campbell which tends to support the view I take. In that case there was the same warranty as here, and Lord Campbell in his judgment, while discussing what is a seizure within the warranty, says: "If the crew intending to turn pirates were to murder the captain and run away with the ship, would not this be a loss by seizure?" and it is evident from the context that in his opinion it would have been. If therefore a seizure which is in itself the barratrous act is within the exception, why is not a seizure which is not the barratrous act, but only the result and consequence of it?

Hopper and another v. Wear Marine Insurance Company.

Marine insurance — Beginning of adventure — From the loading on board—Loss of lighters alongside.

Where shipowners by a policy insurance caused "themselves to be insured, lost or not lost, at and from Libau to Bordeaux, upon freight (valued at interest), of and in the vessel Hawthorn, beginning the adventure upon the said goods or freight from the loading thereof on board the said ship at Libau, and to continue and endure during the said vessel's abode there, and until the said vessel shall have arrived at Bordeaux, and the said goods shall be safely delivered from the said ship," and during the loading at Libau a portion of the cargo, which was in lighters alongside and about to be transferred to the vessel, was by reason of the perils of the sea wholly lost and the shipowners prevented from earning the freight insured, it was held, upon demurrer, that the shipowners could not recover.

This was a demurrer to a statement of claim which was as follows:

1. The plaintiffs are shipowners at Sunderland, in the county of Durham, and are the owners of a certain steamship called the Hawthorn, which, at the time of the making of the policy of insurance hereinafter mentioned, was chartered to carry a cargo from Libau to Bordeaux.

2. The plaintiffs, by their agents, Messrs. T. and H. Crosby, by a certain policy of insurance made on the 13th

Dec. 1879, and intended to operate from that date, but by mistake dated the 13th Dec. 1880, did make assurance and did cause themselves to be insured, lost or not lost, at and from Libau to Bordeaux upon freight (valued at interest) of and in the vessel Hawthorn, beginning the adventure upon the said goods or freight from the loading thereof on board the said ship at Libau, and to continue and endure during the said vessel's abode there, and until the said vessel should have arrived at Bordeaux, and the said goods should be safely delivered from the said ship. And it was provided by the said policy that it should be lawful for the said ship to proceed and sail to and touch and stay at any ports and places whatsoever in the course of her said voyage for all necessary purposes, without prejudice to the said assurance. Touching the adventures and perils which the defendant company was contented to bear and did take upon itself in such said voyage, they were of the seas and other perils usually inserted in policies of assurance, and of all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that had or should come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the said goods or freight, or any part thereof. And it was by the said policy declared and agreed that the interest of the assured under the said assurance should be and was on freight, and it was agreed that all average claims should be settled according to the laws of England. Provided, nevertheless, that the capital stock and funds of the defendants should alone be liable to answer and make good all claims under or by virtue of the said policy. By the said assurance the defendant company bound itself to the plaintiffs for the true performance of the premises, confessing itself paid the consideration due unto it for the said assurance as specified in the said policy, and the defendant company subscribed the said policy for 600*l.*, and became insurers thereon to the plaintiffs for that amount on freight.

3. The said steamship Hawthorn duly proceeded to Libau, and commenced at Libau loading a cargo of oats as per charter-party, to be carried from Libau to Bordeaux pursuant to the said charter-party. After the said loading had commenced a portion of the said cargo, which had been delivered to the plaintiffs to be carried on the said insured voyage, was in lighters which were alongside the said vessel, and was about to be transferred from the said lighters to the said vessel, when, by reason of the perils of the sea, the said lighters and the said portion of the cargo laden on board of them were wholly lost, and the plaintiffs were unable to obtain other cargo except at a lower rate of freight than that stipulated for by the said charter-party, and were prevented from earning the freight they otherwise would have earned on the said insured voyage, and the freight which the plaintiffs would otherwise have earned in respect of the goods so lost as aforesaid; and a loss was incurred by the plaintiffs within the meaning of the said policy.

4. The said freight was insured with other underwriters, and the proportion of the said loss which is recoverable from the defendant company amounts to 77*l.* 8*s.* 7*d.*

5. All things have been done and happened, and all conditions have been performed, and all times have elapsed to entitle the plaintiffs to be paid out of capital, stock, and funds of the defendant company the sum of 77*l.* 8*s.* 7*d.*, yet the defendants have neglected and refused to pay the same, and the same remains and is due and unpaid.

The plaintiffs claim:
1. The said sum of 77*l.* 8*s.* 7*d.*
2. Such other sum as they may be entitled to recover.

This statement of claim was demurred to on the ground, amongst others, that the loss described did not come within the perils insured against.

Manisty (with J. Edge) argued for the defendants.—The commencement of the defendants' risk is defined in the policy by the words "beginning the adventure upon the said goods or freight from the loading thereof on board the said ship at Libau." The freight could not be insured, therefore, until the goods for which the freight was charged were actually on board the ship. There is no clause in this policy, which is to be found in some others, covering perils to craft used for loading the ship. In the case of Beckett v. West of England Marine Insurance Company (1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 185; 25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 739), the plaintiff, the shipowner, effected an insurance on freight at and from Lagos, and the policy contained a clause whereby the defendants, the insurance company, agreed that the insurance should "commence upon freight and goods or merchandise aforesaid from the loading of the said goods or merchandise on board the said ship or vessel at as above." In that case the ship was lost on her way out, and before she had shipped any of her homeward cargo, and it was held that, although, as in this case, the subject of insurance was chartered freight, yet the plaintiff could not recover. [Stopped by the Court.]

Gainsford Bruce for the plaintiffs.—This was an insurance upon freight "at and from Libau" for goods from the loading thereof on board the ship. These words must surely refer to the chartered freight which was incurred from the commencement of the loading. The risk must have attached as soon as something was done towards earning the freight. Here some part of the cargo was actually on board when the other part was lost, and it cannot be contended that there was no insurance on the chartered freight until the whole cargo was on board. It may perhaps be that by this policy no risk attached to the goods insured until they were on board, but the freight chartered for these goods must necessarily become a liability to the defendants as soon as the loading of the goods commenced. [MATHEW, J.—The same words are used in the policy with respect to goods and freight. Why should they not be interpreted in the same way in both cases?] The freight becomes due upon delivery of the goods. [MATHEW, J.—If this be chartered freight, I fail to see how there can have been any loss.] That would depend upon the charter-party, and it cannot be considered on this demurrer. In the case of Montgomery v. Eggington (3 T. Rep. 362) the ship was driven from her moorings and lost when about a fourth of her cargo was put aboard, and it was held that the shipowner was entitled to recover the whole freight upon a valued policy on freight. In Jones and another v. Neptune Marine Insurance Company (1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 416; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 702; 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 308), where the words "from the loading" were held to mean from the completion of the loading, it was observed that the policy did not contain the words "at and from" in respect of the place of loading. And even upon an insurance upon goods, in Mellish v. Allnutt (2 M. & S. 106) Lord Ellenborough is reported to have said at p. 110, "To construe the subsequent words from the loading thereof aboard the said ship to mean only the same thing as being loaded, would be giving them no effect."

MATHEW, J.—I think Mr. Bruce can make no answer to this demurrer. The words of the policy on this point seem to be clear. It is not disputed that the effect in regard to the goods is to omit from the adventure all goods not actually on board the ship; and I see no reason to apply a different rule to the freight. If any loss of chartered freight has occurred, the defendants cannot be liable for it in respect of those goods which never got on board the plaintiffs' ship. The words "from the loading thereof" exclude the goods not actually loaded, and also the freight for them.

CAVE, J.—I am of the same opinion.

THE BUCKHURST.

Collision—Regulations for preventing Collisions at Sea, Art. 6—Lights—Ship adrift—Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85) sect. 17 —Inevitable accident—Necessary departure from regulations—Possible contribution to collision.

Where a sailing vessel broke adrift from her anchors in very bad weather, and about one hour and a half afterwards, during a large part of which time she had been bumping over sands, thereby injuring herself so as to be unmanageable, drove into another vessel at anchor, having in the meantime neither put up her side lights nor three red lights:

Held, that the collision was an inevitable accident, and that under the circumstances of the case she was not to blame for not carrying her side lights or the three red lights prescribed by Art. 5 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, the circumstances being such as to render a departure from the rule necessary and their absence not possibly contributory to the collision.

The action was dismissed without costs.

THIS was an action in rem, instituted by the owners of the brig Creole against the ship Buckhurst and her freight, and against her owners intervening, to recover damages sustained by the Creole in a collision which occurred between that vessel and the Buckhurst between eight and nine p.m., on the 18th Jan. 1881, in the Penarth Roads.

The plaintiffs alleged in their statement of claim that shortly after eight p.m. on the 18th Jan. 1881 the Creole, a brig of 275 tons register, manned by a crew of eight hands all told, in ballast, was brought up with two anchors in Penarth Roads with a proper riding light duly exhibited, the weather at that time being dark, with a gale blowing from the E.N.E., a heavy sea running, and the tide running about half a knot, it being nearly high water; and that at such time the Buckhurst, which was under sail but carrying no lights, ran against, and with her bowsprit and stem struck the Creole on the starboard side in the way of the foremast and seriously damaged her; and the plaintiffs alleged that the collision was caused by the negligence of those on board the Buckhurst in improperly neglecting to keep out of the way of the Creole, and to comply with the provisions of Art. 6 (lights for sailing ships) of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

In answer to this the owners of the Buckhurst alleged in their statement of defence that the Buckhurst, a ship of 1877 tons register, manned by a crew of thirty-five hands all told, bound on a voyage from Cardiff to Bombay with a cargo of coals, left the Penarth Docks on the morning of the 10th Jan. 1881, in tow of a tug and in charge of a duly licensed pilot, and that in consequence of the weather becoming unsettled her master thought it prudent to come to an anchor in the outer roads, which he did, and remained at anchor until the morning of the 18th Jan., when she was riding to her port anchor with ninety fathoms of cable out, and to her starboard anchor with sixty fathoms out, with her riding light duly exhibited and burning brightly, and an anchor watch set and kept, the wind at such time blowing a gale from the E.N.E., varying, and with hurricane force, accompanied by thick blinding snow, and the tide being about high water; and that about 6.30 p.m., during a heavy squall, the port cable parted, and shortly afterwards the starboard cable also parted. Efforts were made at once to wear ship and to get out to sea, and at about seven p.m., the weather having become worse and there being a very heavy sea running, the Buckhurst struck heavily on Cardiff Sands, and whilst working over the sands received injuries which caused her to make a great deal of water and damaged her rudder, thereby rendering her helpless and unmanageable, and in this helpless condition the Buckhurst was drifting towards Penarth Beach, the hurricane and blinding snow still continuing, when about eight p.m. the Creole was observed at anchor at a distance of about 100 yards, a little on the port bow of the Buckhurst, and the helm of the Buckhurst was then put to starboard as far as its damaged condition would permit. The mizen staysail was hauled down, and main and cross-jack yards squared and geared in to try and pay the ship off, but notwithstanding the Buckhurst came into collision with the Creole, her jibboom and headgear crossing the deck of the Creole and carrying away her masts. After clearing the Creole, the Buckhurst drove ashore on Penarth Beach with eight feet of water in her hold, and there remained for some time, filling with water each tide. The owners of the Buckhurst therefore pleaded that so far as the Buckhurst was concerned the collision was the result of inevitable accident.

On this statement of defence the plaintiffs joined issue, and further replied that if the Buckhurst was in a helpless and unmanageable condition as alleged, those on board of her neglected to comply with Art. 5 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

The defendants' evidence materially substantiated the allegations contained in their statement of defence, and the further material facts proved appear in the judgment.

Butt, Q.C. (with him Nelson) for the plaintiffs.—The defendants in this case are in a dilemma. The Buckhurst must have been either manageable or unmanageable. If she were manageable when those on board of her found that her cables had parted and that she was no longer at anchor, they ought to have taken down the riding lights and put up the proper regulation lights for a vessel under way. According to their own account it was more than an hour after the Buckhurst broke adrift before they sighted the Creole, and there was therefore ample time for them to have put up the regulation lights. If on the contrary she was unmanageable, she ought to have put up three red lights according to the provisions of Art. 5 of the regulations, which was intended to meet such a case as this. It cannot be said that the absence of these lights could by no possibility have contributed to the collision, for if those on board the Creole had seen them they would have been able to take some steps to keep out of the way of the Buckhurst and allow her to pass clear of them.

E. C. Clarkson and Myburgh for the defendants.—This collision must be held to have been the result of inevitable accident. The evidence is conclusive that the fearful state of the weather was the sole cause of the collision, and the court will not attach any weight to what is merely a technical objection, and hold that the omission of those on board the Buckhurst to put up these lights could by any possibility have contributed to the collision.

Butt, Q.C. in reply.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is a case of collision in the Penarth Roads, which happened between eight and nine o'clock on the 18th Jan. last. The vessels that came into contact were the brig Creole, a small vessel of 275 tons register, lying at anchor in these roads, and the Buckhurst, a vessel of 1877 tons register, manned with a crew of thirty-five hands and laden with a cargo of coals, which was also at anchor in these roads, with her riding light exhibited and burning brightly. According to the evidence, at about six o'clock in the evening the port cable parted, and afterwards the starboard cable, and she struck heavily on the Cardiff Sands, and whilst working over the sands received some injuries which made her unmanageable. There is no question at all in the opinion of the Elder Brethren that no blame attaches to the Creole. The state of the weather was of the worst possible description, and they think that the accident was inevitable. But it is contended that the Buckhurst did not carry her side lights, and that, therefore, though the accident might otherwise have been inevitable, she is to blame for the collision, notwithstanding the state of the weather and the other circumstances of the case. Now, the rule is laid down and cannot be altered, that where by any possibility a non-compliance with any of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea might have contributed to the collision, the vessel which has not complied with the regulation is to blame. Now, the Buckhurst was on the sands till about twenty minutes before the time of the collision; and I have asked the Elder Brethren whether it was her duty during that time to put up her side lights, and they are of opinion that it was not, and that it would have misled other vessels if she had done so. The 17th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85) provides that the ship by which the regulations have been infringed shall be deemed to be in fault, unless the circumstances of the case show a departure from the regulations to have been necessary; and as it is the opinion of the Elder Brethren that so far as concerns the time referred to when this vessel was on the sands she ought not to have put up her side lights, and that if she had done so either then or after she got off the sands, she might have misled the other vessel, it appears to me that the circumstances of the case made a departure from the regulations necessary. Moreover, in our opinion, the non-carrying of the side lights could not by any possibility have contributed to the collision. As to the charge of not carrying three red lights when she got afloat, considering the position of the two vessels and the state of the weather, we do not think that the absence of these lights could by any possibility have contributed to the collision. The Elder Brethren are of opinion that the collision could not have been avoided in the dreadful state of the weather. Therefore I dismiss the suit.

Nelson for the plaintiffs.—This action ought to be dismissed without costs. In cases of inevitable accident the general rule is to make no order as to costs:

The Itinerant, 2 W. Rob. 244.

It is true that the court has a discretionary power, but in this case it cannot be contended in the face of the absence of the regulation lights on board the Buckhurst that the plaintiffs had no sufficient ground for bringing this action.

E. C. Clarkson for the defendants.—It is true that the general rule is to make no order as to costs, but cases abound in which plaintiffs have been condemned in the absence of good reason for bringing their action:

The Thornley, 2 W. Rob. 244;
The London, Br. & L. 82.

In this case the weather being, as the evidence shows, as bad as possible, the plaintiffs knew quite well that the collision was inevitable, and were unduly rash in bringing this action without sufficient ground. Moreover, it is the ordinary practice of all the divisions of the High Court, when a plaintiff fails to prove that which he undertakes to prove, to dismiss his action with costs. In this case the plaintiffs came here to prove that the collision occurred by the default of the Buckhurst and have failed to do so. In The Swansea (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 115; 4 P. D. 115) the Court of Appeal deprecate the existence of one rule as to costs in one branch of the High Court of Justice and another rule in another branch. This court ought to follow the universal rule and condemn the unsuccessful plaintiff in costs.

Nelson, in reply, was stopped by the Court.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Having regard to the special circumstances of the case, and that the only light exhibited on board the Buckhurst was her anchor light, I do not think it can be said that the action ought not to have been brought. I think this is a case in which there ought to be no costs.

THE GUY MANNERING.

Damage — Collision — Suez Canal — Compulsory pilotage—Regulations—Concession.

The employment of a pilot in the Suez Canal, though compulsory, is not of such a nature as to exempt the owners of a ship from liability for damage done to another ship by the negligence of such pilot.

By the Regulations of the Suez Canal a pilot is to advise the master of the ship, but the master remains responsible for the navigation of the ship.

The Regulations for the Navigation of the Suez Canal, establishing such a relationship between master and pilot, are not ultra vires, so far as appears from the extract from the Act of Concession set out in the case.

THIS was a special case stated for the opinion of the court whether, under the circumstances therein set out, the defendants were exempt by reason of the compulsory employment of a pilot from liability for the consequences of a collision which took place in the Suez Canal.

The special case was as follows.

SPECIAL CASE.

1. This is an action for damages by collision, brought by the plaintiffs as owners of the British screw steamship Wistow Hall, of 1729 tons register, against the British screw steamship Guy Mannering, of 2317 tons register, whose owners have appeared and are the defendants.

2. The collision occurred on the afternoon of the 4th Dec. 1880 in the Suez Canal. The Wistow Hall and the Guy Mannering were both proceeding in the same direction, namely, towards Suez, the Wistow Hall being the headmost vessel. The Wistow Hall had to stop her way in order to allow some vessels coming from Suez to pass, and it was the duty of the Guy Mannering to stop her way also, so as not to run into the Wistow Hall; but the proper measures were not taken in time on board the Guy Mannering, and before her way was stopped she forged ahead into the Wistow Hall, so that her stem cut into the stern of the Wistow Hall, and did the damage complained of.

3. The facts are that upon the occasion in question the engines of the Guy Mannering were stopped, but she still went on ahead with the way she had had previously; that the master of the Guy Mannering saw that his vessel was approaching too close to the Wistow Hall, and informed the pilot of it, and suggested to him that the engines should be moved astern. The pilot, however, refused to give the order to the engines, whereupon the master, having more than once suggested to the pilot to give the order, gave it himself, but too late, and, though it was obeyed, the collision ensued. The plaintiffs admit that the collision was solely caused by the pilot's negligence.

4. The defendants admit that this collision was caused by the bad navigation of the Guy Mannering, and that her master and crew were their servants but they claim to be exempt from liability for it on the ground that they were compelled by the law in force in the Suez Canal, to which all vessels passing through the said canal are subject, to give up charge of the navigation of their ship to one of the pilots employed by the Suez Canal Company, whom they had taken on board, and on the ground that the collision was entirely occasioned by his bad navigation.

5. The provision for the employment of pilots in the Suez Canal is contained in Article 4 of the "Regulations for the Navigation of the Suez Maritime Canal," which article is as follows; "Every vessel measuring more than one hundred (100) tons gross must take on board a company's pilot for the whole length of the canal, who will indicate all particulars concerning the passage through. The captain is held responsible for all groundings and accidents of whatsoever kind resulting from the management and manœuvring of his ship. Pilots place at the disposal of captains of vessels their experience and practical knowledge of the canal, but, as they cannot be specially acquainted with the defects or peculiarities of each steamer, and her machinery in stopping, steering, &c., the responsibility as regards the management of the ship devolves solely upon the captain."

6. The plaintiffs admit that these regulations are lawfully in force, and that the pilot taken on board the Guy Mannering was a company's pilot, and was on board her by virtue of these regulations.

7. Copies of the statement of claim and statement of defence, and of the regulations for the navigation of the Suez Maritime Canal, are annexed to and are to be taken as part of this special case.

8. The question for the opinion of the court is, whether the defendants are liable or are exempt from liability for the aforesaid bad navigation of the ship.

9. If the defendants are liable, judgment is to be entered for plaintiffs with costs, and with the usual order for reference of the damages to the registrar and merchants.

10. If the defendants are exempt from liability, judgment is to be entered for them with or without costs, or with such portion of the costs as to the court may seem just.

STATEMENT OF CLAIM.

1. The plaintiffs are the owners of the screw steamship Wistow Hall of 1729 tons register, which at the time of the matters hereinafter stated was bound on a voyage from Liverpool to Bombay viâ Suez, with a crew of seventy hands, all told, and a cargo of general merchandise.

2. On the afternoon of the 4th Dec. 1880 the Wistow Hall was in the Suez Canal. There was no wind. The weather was fine and clear. There was no tide perceptible. The Wistow Hall was the third in a line of vessels going to Suez.

3. The Guy Mannering was next behind her, about three-quarters of a mile off. About 3.20 p.m. the Wistow Hall was coming out of the narrower part of the canal into Lake Timsah, when it was seen that the canal signals were up ordering the whole line of vessels to wait in the lake in order to allow some vessels coming from Suez to get out of the canal into the lake. The vessels in front of the Wistow Hall and the Wistow Hall accordingly stopped. The whistles were sounded, and it was the duty of those on board the Guy Mannering to see what the vessels in front were doing and to stop also. But the Guy Mannering did not stop, or did not stop in time, and notwithstanding that the engines of the Wistow Hall were put on full speed ahead when it was seen that the Guy Mannering continued to approach, the Guy Mannering came on so fast that she struck the Wistow Hall, and her stem cut into the stern of the Wistow Hall and did her great damage.

4. A good look-out was not kept by those on board the Guy Mannering.

5. Those on board the Guy Mannering negligently and improperly omitted to stop her in due time, and to keep her out of the way of the Wistow Hall.

6. Those on board the Guy Mannering broke Article 20 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

7. Those on board the Guy Mannering improperly neglected to comply with Article 18 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

8. The collision was caused by some or all of the matters and things stated in the 4th, 5th, 6th, and 7th paragraphs hereof, or otherwise by the negligence of the defendants, or of those on board the Guy Mannering.

9. The collision was not caused or contributed to by the plaintiffs, or by any of those on board the Wistow Hall.

The plaintiffs claim as follows:

1. Judgment against the defendants and their bail for the damage occasioned to the plaintiffs by the collision, and for the costs of this action.
2. Such further and other relief as the nature of the case may require.

STATEMENT OF DEFENCE.

1. Shortly before 3.30 p.m. on the 4th Dec. 1880 the steamship Guy Mannering, of 2817 tons register, of which the defendants are the owners, whilst on a voyage from London to Kurrachee, laden with a general cargo, fully manned, and with a duly licensed pilot on board, was in the Suez Canal. The wind at the time was light and variable, and the weather was clear. A good look-out was being kept.

2. The Guy Mannering was being steered straight through the canal, going at an easy speed under the direction of the said pilot, the Wistow Hall being right ahead as she had been for some time, distant about half to three quarters of a mile from the Guy Mannering. Under these circumstances the Wistow Hall was seen suddenly to stop right in the fairway of the canal, the pilot's attention was drawn to her, the whistle was sounded, and the engines reversed full speed astern, but notwithstanding this the stem of the Guy Mannering came into collision with the stern of the Wistow Hall, and did her some damage.

3. Save as above admitted, the defendants deny the allegations in the statement of claim.

4. The collision was not caused or contributed to by the defendants, or by any of those on board the Guy Mannering.

5. By the laws in force at the time and place of the collision the Guy Mannering was compulsorily in charge of a duly appointed pilot, whom the defendants did not select, and had no power of selecting.

6. If the collision was not the result of inevitable accident, it was exclusively caused or contributed to by the negligence and default of the said pilot on board the Guy Mannering, all of whose orders were duly obeyed and complied with.

The following articles contained in the copy of the "Regulations for the Navigation of the Maritime Suez Canal," attached to the special case, were also commented upon in the course of the argument and judgment.

These regulations are to come into force on and after the 1st July 1878. Previous regulations are hereby annulled.

Extract from the Act of Concession, dated 5th Jan. 1856.

Art. 14. We hereby solemnly declare for ourselves, and for our successors, under reserve of ratification by H.I.M. the Sultan, the Great Maritime Canal from Suez to Pelusium and ports belonging to it henceforth and for ever open, as neutral passages to any merchant vessel crossing from sea to sea without any distinction, exclusion, or preference whatever from persons or nationalities against the payment of dues, and execution of regulations established by the said universal company granted for the working of the said canal and its dependencies.

Art. 17. To indemnify the company for the expenses of construction, maintenance, and working, devolving upon them by these presents, we authorise the company henceforth, and during the whole term of their lease as determined by clauses 1 and 3 of the preceding article (a), to establish and levy for the passage through the canals and ports thereunto appertaining navigation, pilotage, tonnage, tracking, or berthing dues, according to the tariffs which they shall be at liberty to modify at all times upon the following express conditions: (1) That these dues be collected without exception or favour from all ships, under like conditions. (2) That the tariffs be published three months before they come into force, in the capitals and principal commercial ports of all nations whom they may concern. (3) That for the special navigation due the maximum tolls shall not exceed ten francs per ton of capacity on vessels and per head of passengers.

(a) Art. 16. "the preceding article," does not appear in the copy of the regulations attached to the special case.—[REP.]

Art. 1. Before entering the canal captains of ships shall bind themselves, on receiving a copy of the present regulations, to abide by and conform themselves in all points to all required arrangements made in view of the execution of these regulations.

Art. 4. (Set out above in the text of the special case.)

Art. 5. Whenever ships intending to proceed through the canal shall have dropped anchor either at Port Said or Suez, the captain must enter his ship at the Transit Office, and pay all dues for passage, as also for pilotage, towage, and berthing when such be the case; a receipt for the same shall be delivered to him, which will serve as justification whenever required. The following written information to be handed in by the captain: Name and nationality of the ship; name of the captain; names of the owners and charterers . . . . draft of water . . . .

Art. 7. All ships entering the canal are to be prepared by bracing their yards forward, running in their flying jib and jibbooms, and swinging their boats on board. In addition to their two bow anchors they must carry at the stern, ready for letting go at the request of the pilot a strong kedge, with a stout hawser bent on sufficient to hold the ship.

Art. 8. . . . . (6) When two vessels proceeding in an opposite direction are in sight of each other, they must both decrease their speed, and hug the starboard shore, or stop if so required by the pilot.

Art. 9. When circumstances arise that oblige a ship to stop during her passage through the canal, and when a siding is not at hand, which must always be reached if possible, the captain must make fast ahead and stern to the weather bank, showing the proper signal by day, and two lights by night, forward and aft, as already mentioned. In the event of a grounding, the agents of the company alone shall have the right to direct all operations by which a vessel is to be floated off again, to unload and tow the vessel as may be necessary, by means of the plant and stock which the company has at hand, at the expense of the vessel, unless it be regularly proved that there was an insufficient depth of water in the canal, or that erroneous directions by the pilot had caused the grounding.

Art. 10. The following prohibitions are hereby notified: (1) . . . . (2) The anchoring of a ship in the canal, except through unavoidable circumstances, and then only with the consent of the pilot.

Art. 13. The pilotage charges for traversing the canal are levied according to draft of water, and are . . . . pilotage charges for entering the port of Port Said, and leaving the same are fixed as follows: . . . . The payment of the pilotage charged for entering the port of Port Said and leaving the same is compulsory on every ship measuring one hundred (100) tons gross and upwards.

Feb. 14.—The case now came on for argument.

Dr. W. G. F. Phillimore for plaintiffs.—The question here is, whether owners are exempted from liability for the acts of a pilot who is on board their ship by compulsion of law, but by the same law is not in charge of the navigation of it. Here it is obvious that the management of the ship is not within the control of the pilot; it is expressly reserved by the regulations to the control of the master. Both principle and authority require the pilot to be in charge to exempt the owners. In sect. 376 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 the provision is that the penalty for not taking a pilot is to be levied on a master who pilots his ship "after a qualified pilot has offered to take charge of such ship;" and in sect. 378 of the same Act the master is directed to "give the charge" of piloting his ship to the first qualified pilot who offers his services. The Halley (3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 131; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 879; L. Rep. 2 P.C. 193), which will probably be relied on by the defendants, is really an authority in favour of the plaintiffs, as the basis of the decision of the Judicial Committee was that the pilot was compulsorily "in charge." That was the form of pleading, and for the purposes of that argument it had to be taken as proved. Selwyn, L.J., in delivering the judgment of the court, says: "Their Lordships agree with the learned judge in his statement of the common law of England with respect to the liability of the owner of a vessel for injuries occasioned by the unskilful navigation of his vessel while under the control of a pilot whom the owner is compelled to take on board, and in whose selection he had no voice; and that this law holds that the responsibility of the owner for the acts of his servant is founded upon the presumption that the owner chooses the servant, and gives him orders which he is bound to obey; and that the acts of the servant, so far as the interests of third parties are concerned, must always be considered as the acts of the owner. This exemption of the owner from liability where the ship is under the control of what has been termed a "compulsory pilot" has also been declared by express statutory enactments." Here the pilot has no control whatever. Other articles of these regulations show that in certain circumstances his consent is necessary before the master can do some things, that is a necessary provision for the preservation of the canal itself; but in no case can the pilot order anything to be done. His duty is merely to advise the master. He is, in fact, not a pilot at all within the definition of the Merchant Shipping Act, for he has not the "conduct" of the ship at all (Merchant Shipping Act 1854, s. 2). To avail themselves of the exemption from liability the defendants must show, not only that the person was on board by compulsion of law, for that would apply to a gendarme or a custom-house officer on board for police or revenue purposes, but that he was imposed on the owners to take charge of the navigation of the ship, and that they were bound to obey his orders, and that in consequence of obedience to those orders the injury was caused; if they were not bound to obey his orders, but to act for themselves, his neglect to give orders is no excuse for them.

Butt, Q.C, and Nelson for the defendants.—These pilotage tolls are levied by permission of Government, and it is ultra vires on the part of a private company, such as the Suez Canal is owned by, to take advantage of the tolls and not to render the service; it is an attempt to get rid of their liability for the acts of their servants which cannot be supported, and is contrary to law in this country. If they levy pilotage dues they must render pilotage service, and what pilotage service is is well known and is moreover defined by sect. 2 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854. But even if the rules are not ultra vires, the defendants are none the less exempt from liability, for whatever the pilot's rights and duties were there can be no doubt that in fact he was acting in charge of the vessel's navigation, and it is admitted that his employment, whatever the nature of it was, was compulsory by law; he was fulfilling the functions of a pilot de facto, if not de jure, and was conducting a vessel in a district in which his employment was compulsory (Lucy v. Ingram, 6 M. & W. 302; General Steam Navigation Company v. British and Colonial Steam Navigation Company (3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 168, 237; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 581; L. Rep. 4 Ex. 238), and it is admitted that the collision and injury caused by it was solely occasioned by his default.

Phillimore in reply.—The General Steam Navigation Company v. British and Colonial Steam Navigation Company was a decision on sect. 388 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, but the section is in Part III. of the Act, and by sect. 330 its operation is limited to the United Kingdom. Lucy v. Ingram was a decision under the former Pilotage Act (6 Geo. 4, c. 125), which Act was repealed by the Merchant Shipping Repeal Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 120), and is also open to the objection that it cannot apply in the territorial waters of another country; the rights of the parties are governed here by the common law alone as affecting the relationship of master and servant. As to the regulations in respect of the functions of a pilot being ultra vires, if that were so there would be no legal compulsion on the defendants to take a pilot at all, and therefore the defence of compulsory pilotage would fall to the ground altogether. But in arguing the case the validity of the regulations must be taken to be admitted. Paragraph 6 of the case (ubi sup.) is an admission by the plaintiffs against themselves, and the defendants cannot now rebut it.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb 21.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The question for the opinion of the court is, whether the defendants are liable or are exempt from liability for the aforesaid bad navigation. The defendants maintain that, inasmuch as the pilot was taken on board by compulsion of law, the master was not responsible for the bad navigation of the ship which caused the collision. It must be remembered that this exemption from liability is founded upon the principle that the pilot is taken by compulsion of law, and that to him is committed the sole charge of the ship. These at least are the propositions of British law, which were relied upon by the defendants; but in the present case it is expressly declared in the 4th article of the Suez Canal Regulations that the duty of the pilot is to act as the adviser of the captain in matters requiring local and practical knowledge of the canal, but that the responsibility as regards the management of the ship devolves solely upon the captain. This regulation appears to me to alter the usual relations of the master and pilot, and to take away the reason of the law upon which the exception rests. It has been urged on behalf of the defendants that this regulation is ultra vires, and therefore bad, and much has been said upon article 17 of the Act of Concession of the 5th Jan. 1856, which authorises the company to establish and levy pilotage and other dues, and it was urged that these pilotage dues must mean dues to be levied in respect of persons who should exercise all the usual functions of a pilot according to British law, and should take the entire charge of the navigation of the ship. I am unable to assent to these propositions; I am of opinion that I must assume that these canal regulations were made by competent authority, and were not ultra vires; and moreover, if they were ultra vires, the pilot taken on board would not have been taken on board, in accordance with them, by compulsion of law. I have only the 14th and 17th articles of the Act of Concession of 1856 before me. From them I cannot infer any legal disability on the part of the company to frame the regulations in question. Upon the whole, I am of opinion that the defendants are liable for the bad navigation of the ship and the damages consequent thereon.

CHASTEAUNEUF v. CAPEYRON AND ANOTHER.

ON APPEAL FROM THE SUPREME COURT OF MAURITIUS.

Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), ss. 55-60—Transfer of property in ship—Sale by licitation—Registration.

The transfer of a British ship is not governed by the rules applicable to movables in general, but by the express provisions of the Merchant Shipping Acts.

A sale of a ship under an order of the Supreme Court of Mauritius (by licitation, in accordance with the practice there) is not a transmission of the ship "by any lawful means other than by a transfer according to the provisions of this Act," within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, sect. 58, and the Registrar of Shipping is not bound, in a case where the register shows the ship to be mortgaged, upon the production of a declaration and a statement under that section, without a bill of sale or release for the mortgage, to register the purchasers as owners without incumbrance or at all.

This was an appeal from an order made by the Supreme Court of the Mauritius, Ellis and Leclezio, J.J., dated the 17th April 1879, by which it was ordered that the appellant should register the respondents as owners of a certain British barque called the Barentin, and expunge from his books certain entries which appeared on the register against the said ship.

The appellant was collector of customs, and as such registrar of shipping at Port Louis, in the Mauritius. The respondents were merchants at Port Louis, and were naturalised British subjects.

On the 7th March 1877 there was registered, at Port Louis, in the books of the appellant as such registrar of shipping, the British barque Barentin, and Aimé Docinthe was at that time sole registered owner thereof.

On the 28th June 1877 a mortgage of the said barque to Henri Capeyron, Emile Coeffic, and John Ferguson, jointly to secure $8000, with interest at 9 per cent., was duly registered by the appellant.

Subsequently one Eliacin François died, and among his papers was discovered a secret document or instrument known to the law of the Mauritius as a contre lettre, which was in the words and figures following:

Reçu de M. E. François la somme de six mille deux cent huit roupies pour payer la barque Barentin, payable avec interêts at 12 per cent.; je reconnais que M. E. François possède la oitié du Barentin bien que son nom ne figure pas sur le registre.

Port Louis, 17 Janvier 1877.

(Signé) A. DOCINTHE.

Under the law of the Mauritius, apart from the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, this document would have had the effect of making the said Eliacin François joint owner with the said Aimé Docinthe of the Barentin.

One of the heirs of the said Eliacin François thereupon commenced a suit in the Supreme Court against the said Aimé Docinthe and the other heirs of the said Eliacin François for a sale by licitation of the said barque, and on the 6th Nov. 1878 such sale was ordered by the court.

A sale by licitation is, according to the law and practice of the Supreme Court of the Mauritius, the vente d'une chose possédé en commune par plusieurs, whenever the thing in question is incapable of division, and is ordered by the court as a matter of course without any inquiry as to the title of the parties applying if the persons claiming ownership desire it, and it is binding only on the parties to the suit, and is not a procedure in rem. This was the course pursued in this case, and the register of shipping was not consulted.

The sale was proceeded with in accordance with the Code du Commerce (197 et. seq.), and on the 27th Feb. 1879 the sale took place under the said order before the master of the Supreme Court in accordance with the rules of the court, and in the result the said barque was sold for the sum of Rs. 3520 and expenses to the respondents jointly. This sum was paid into court.

Thereafter Jules Delange, on behalf of himself and his co-respondent herein, applied to the appellant to register their names as owners of the barque under the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and to erase the entry relating to the mortgage from the register. At the time of this application Jules Delange produced to the appellant a copy of the memorandum of sale containing the charges, clauses, and conditions thereof, and requested the appellant to grant the respondents a free title, that is, without any mortgage, the purchase money having been deposited in court. The appellant refused to register the respondents as owners of the said barque, on the ground that a bill of sale and declaration of ownership and the mortgage deed with a receipt for the mortgage money endorsed thereon were not produced, and that there had been no sufficient compliance with the provisions of sects. 55—75, of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854.

The respondents, after this refusal, applied upon affidavit to the Supreme Court, which, on the 13th March 1879, after hearing counsel for the respondents, granted a rule calling on the appellant and the above-mentioned mortgagees "to show cause why the collector of customs should not register in his books the British barque the Barentin, under the names of Capeyron and Delange, of Port Louis, merchants, who have, according to a judgment of adjudication of the master of this court, purchased the same on a sale by licitation thereof on the 27th Feb. last, prosecuted at the request of the heirs of François against Aimé Docinthe; and, further, why the inscriptions which appear in his books against the said ship should not be erased from the books, inasmuch as the said Capeyron and Delange have, in compliance with the conditions of sale, and with the master's order, deposited in the master's office the full amount of their purchase price."

The time for showing cause was enlarged, and ultimately, on the 25th March 1879, the appellant appeared before the Supreme Court, by counsel appointed by the Procureur-General, and showed cause against the said rule being made absolute, and it was ordered that the said cause should be referred, and it was then referred to the Ministère Public for his conclusions, and he, on the 10th April 1879, informed the court that he was satisfied to leave the matter to the decision of the judges of the Supreme Court.

On the 17th April 1879 it was ordered by the Supreme Court that the appellant should register in his books the said barque under the name of Messrs. Capeyron and Delange, upon the production of the memorandum of conditions under which the said sale by licitation took place before the Master of the Supreme Court, together with the award of that officer, and upon the said Messrs. Capeyron and Delange making and signing the declaration and statement required by sect. 58 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and by form marked H in the schedule thereto. And it was further ordered that the appellant should erase from his books the inscriptions which appeared therein against the said ship, the creditors having accepted to exercise their rights upon the sale price deposited with the Master of the Supreme Court.

The appellant thereupon wrote to the colonial secretary for instructions from the Governor of the Mauritius in the matter, and pending His Excellency's answer did not make the registration and erasures as required.

On the 29th April 1879, before the instructions had reached the appellant, upon the application of the respondents, the appellant was ordered by the Supreme Court to appear before the said court to show cause why his person should not be attached for disobedience to the said rule of court of the 17th April, with costs against him.

On the 30th April 1879 the appellant accordingly appeared by counsel, and it was ordered that he should be allowed forty-eight hours, in order to comply with the said rule, and the case was further adjourned for further proceedings to the 2nd May 1879.

The appellant, under the above circumstances and although he had not yet received instructions from the Governor of the Mauritius, obeyed the order of the court.

On the 2nd May 1879 the appellant again appeared by counsel before the said Supreme Court, and it was ordered that the said rule of the 29th April should be discharged, and that the respondent should recover against the appellant the costs incurred up to the execution by him of the judgment of the court.

There has been no local legislation affecting the registry of owners of ships, and the registration thereof is wholly governed by the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and the Acts incorporated therewith.

This appeal was then brought from the order of the 17th April 1879, and the orders based thereon.

The Attorney-General (Sir H. James, Q.C.) and A. L. Smith appeared for the appellant.

The respondents did not appear, and the appeal was consequently heard ex parte.

In addition to the cases referred to in the judgment, the case of the Union Bank of London v. Lenanton (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 600; 3 C. P. Div. 243; 38 L. T. N. S. 698) was cited in the course of the argument.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

Jan. 21, 1882.—Their LORDSHIPS gave judgment as follows: This is an appeal from a rule made by the Supreme Court of Mauritius, whereby it was ordered that the collector of customs at Port Louis in Mauritius do register in his books the British barque Barentin under the name of Messrs. Capeyron and Delange, of Port Louis, and whereby it was further ordered that the said collector of customs do erase from his books the inscriptions which appear therein against the said ship, the creditors having accepted to exercise their rights upon the sale price deposited with the master of the court. That rule was obtained upon the application of Messrs. Capeyron and Delange, the respondents, who claimed as purchasers of the barque at a sale by licitation. The appellant was the collector of customs at Port Louis, and in that capacity was registrar of British ships at that port. The barque was a British ship, and was registered at Port Louis in the name of Aimé Docinthe, a British subject, as the sole proprietor thereof, and in the names of Henry Capeyron, Emile Coeffic, and John Ferguson, as joint mortgagees, for $8000, with interest at 9 per cent. The sale by licitation was ordered by the Supreme Court in a suit in which Marie Léonie Lilia François, as one of the heiresses of the late Jean Eliacin François, deceased, was plaintiff, and Aimé Docinthe, the registered owner of the barque, and the guardian and sub-guardian respectively of certain minors, heirs of the said Jean Eliacin François, were defendants. In the order for the sale made in that suit it was directed to take place before the master of the court according to law, and in the conditions under which the sale was directed by the court to take place, the sale was described as a judicial sale as regards the heirs François, and by licitation as regards Aimé Docinthe, of the barque Barentin, therein described as belonging for one-half to the estate and succession of the late Jean Eliacin François, and the other half to Aimé Docinthe. Neither the judgment of the Supreme Court by which the sale was ordered nor the grounds upon which it was based are before their Lordships. The registrar was ordered to register the barque under the names of the respondents upon the production of the memorandum of conditions under which the sale by licitation took place before the master, together with the award of that officer, and upon the making and signing by the respondents of the declaration and statements required by sect. 58 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and by form marked H in the schedule thereto. It would be unnecessary, even if their Lordships had the means for so doing, to inquire into the validity of the order for sale; that order was binding upon the parties to the suit, and the substantial question to be determined in this appeal is, whether the registrar of British ships was bound to register as owners of the barque the purchasers under the award of the master made upon the sale by licitation. Their Lordships have had the benefit of the arguments of the learned Attorney-General and Mr. Smith on behalf of the appellant, but the respondents did not appear. Their Lordships have carefully considered the case, and have arrived at the conclusion that the registrar was right in refusing to register the respondents as owners of the barque, and to erase from his books the inscriptions contained in the register against the barque in the names of the mortgagees. The determination of the question so far as it relates to the obligation on the part of the registrar to register the respondents as owners, depends principally upon the proper construction of the 55th and 58th sections of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104). The 55th section enacts that a registered ship, or any share therein, when disposed of to persons qualified to be owners of British ships, shall be transferred by bill of sale, and such bill of sale shall contain such description of the ship as is contained in the certificate of the surveyor, or such other description as may be sufficient to identify it to the satisfaction of the registrar, and shall be according to the form marked E in the schedule to the Act, or as near thereto as circumstances permit, and shall be executed by the transferor in the presence of, and be attested by, one or more witnesses. By sect. 57 it is enacted that every bill of sale for the transfer of any registered ship, or any share therein, when duly executed, shall be produced to the registrar of the port at which the ship is registered, together with the declaration required by sect. 56 to be made by a transferee, and that the registrar shall thereupon enter in the register book the name of the transferee as owner of the ship or share comprised in such bill of sale. By the 58th section it is enacted that if the property in any ship, or in any share therein, becomes transmitted in consequence of the death or bankruptcy or insolvency of any registered owner, or in consequence of the marriage of any female registered owner, or by any lawful means other than by a transfer according to the provisions of the Act, such transmission shall be authenticated by a declaration of the person to whom such property has been transmitted, made in the form marked H in the schedule to the Act, and containing the statements thereinbefore required to be contained in the declaration of a transferee, or as near thereto as circumstances permit and in addition a statement describing the manner in which and the party to whom such property has been transmitted. The form marked H contains forms applicable to the cases of bankruptcy, insolvency, death, and marriage respectively, but no form applicable to any other means of transmission. In each of these cases, the marriage, the bankruptcy or insolvency, or the death of the registered owner has to be declared, and by sect. 59 the declaration has to be accompanied with the proof required by that section of the transmission by such means of the property in the ship or in the share thereof from the registered owner to the person entitled by such transmission; and then by sect. 60 it is enacted that the registrar, upon the receipt of such declaration so accompanied as aforesaid, shall enter the name or names of the person or persons entitled under such transmission in the register book as the owner or owners of the ship or share therein in respect of which such transmission has taken place, and such persons, if more than one, shall, however numerous, be considered as one person only as regards the rule thereinbefore contained relating to the number of persons entitled to be registered as owners. The latter portion of the section refers to the enactment in sect. 37 that, subject to the provisions with respect to joint owners or owners by transmission, not more than thirty-two individuals shall be entitled to be registered at the same time as owners of any one ship. So strictly were the provisions of the earlier statutes relating to the transfer of British ships interpreted, that it was held by Lord Eldon that the doctrine of implied trust in a court of equity could not be extended to the case of a British registered ship where the title accrued by an act of the parties other than a transfer made in accordance with the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Acts, see Ex parte Yallop, 15 Ves. 60, and Curtis v. Perry, 6 Ves 749. His Lordship, however, drew a clear distinction between such a case and a trust implied by law not arising out of an act in which the parties claiming the beneficial interest had joined. In the case of Curtis v. Perry, 6 Ves., his Lordship, at p. 746, said, "I desire it to be distinctly understood that I give no opinion upon the effect of these two Acts of Parliament in cases of trusts implied by law and not arising out of an act in which the contracting parties join." And again, in Ex parte Yallop, 15 Ves., at p. 70, "The case of Curtis v. Perry, though it does not rule this case, furnishes a strong intimation of my opinion that the distinction between trusts by operation of law unconnected with acts of the persons claiming interests, and trusts, in a sense perhaps by operation of law, but arising out of acts of the parties not regulated by the Act of Parliament, is founded on principle." The decision in Ex parte Yallop was followed in the case of The Liverpool Borough Bank v. Turner, decided by Lord Hatherley, then Wood, V.C. in 1 J. & H. 159; and 29 L. J. 827, Ch., upheld on appeal by Lord Campbell, L.C. (1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 21; 3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 84 and 494). In that case the Vice-Chancellor pointed out a distinction between the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and the former statutes, viz, that in the former statutes the Legislature declared that an unregistered contract should have no effect at law or in equity, and that those words were left out in the Act of 1854, and this after they had been the subject of express decision. But, notwithstanding that distinction, it was held that an unregistered contract to assign an interest in a ship, when required as a security for past and future advances, was inoperative even in equity. In his judgment in that case Wood, V.C. referred to sect. 58 with reference to the contention that the Legislature, in the Act of 1854, intended to depart from its general policy of requiring all transfers to be effected by the specified methods: he said, "The phrase which strikes me as the strongest in favour of such a contention is that which is found in the 58th sect. which speaks of the transmission of the property in a ship by death, bankruptcy, marriage, or by any lawful means other than by a transfer according to the provisions of this Act. That is certainly a very strong expression, but the phrase must be looked at in connection with the context, because the transmission is directed to be authenticated by a declaration in the form marked H in the schedule which contains forms of statement that the owner is a natural born subject, and also certain forms applicable to the transmission by death, marriage, bankruptcy, and insolvency." Then, after referring to sects. 59 and 60, his Honour proceeded: "It is clear that these provisions cannot possibly apply to a contract for the sale of a ship, and whatever may have been pointed at by the words 'transmission by any lawful means other than by a transfer according to the provisions of the Act,' it could not have been intended that any person should be at liberty to go to the registrar with a contract for sale in his possession and insist upon having it registered." The above decisions are referred to not for the purpose of showing that a beneficial interest cannot now be created by implication or by a contract neither registered nor made according to the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, but for the dicta of and the principles laid down by the learned judges in constructing the earlier statutes. The law has been altered by the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 3, s. 63, passed since those cases were decided. By that section it is enacted that the expression "beneficial interest," whenever used in the second part of the principal Act (i.e., the Act of 1854), includes interests arising under contract and other equitable interests, and the intention of the said Act is that without prejudice to the provisions contained therein for preventing notice of trusts from being entered in the register book, or received by the registrar, and without prejudice to the powers of disposition and of giving receipts conferred by the said Act on registered owners and mortgagees, and without prejudice to the provisions contained in the said Act relating to the exclusion of unqualified persons from the ownership of British ships, equities may be enforced against owners and mortgagees of ships in respect of their interests therein in the same manner as equities may be enforced against them in respect of any other personal property. It may be assumed for the purpose of argument, that, as regards ordinary movables, the award of the master to a purchaser on a sale by licitation vests the property in him without any deed or other conveyance, and that according to the law of Mauritius, there is no distinction between legal and equitable estates. But the transfer of a British ship is not governed by the rules applicable to movables in general, but by the express provisions of the Merchant Shipping Acts, which make a clear distinction between the legal estate and mere beneficial interests in a British ship. It must be borne in mind that, by sect. 43 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, it is enacted that no notice of a trust, express, implied or constructive, shall be entered in the register book or receivable by the registrar. It may be admitted that the sale by licitation without a conveyance by bill of sale created a beneficial interest in the purchasers; but the question is not whether the sale by licitation created a trust for or a beneficial interest in the purchasers, but whether it created such an interest in them as rendered it compulsory upon the registrar to register them as owners. That still depends upon the proper construction of the 58th section of the Act of 1854. Their Lordships are of opinion that the words "or by any lawful means other than by a transfer according to the provisions of this Act." in that section must be restricted and construed as comprehending only transmissions of the same nature as those previously enumerated in the section. If this were not so, they would include any assignment by a registered owner not made according to the provisions of sect. 55 of the Act of 1854, and would in effect nullify the provisions of that section. It must be observed that there is a clear distinction made in sects. 55 and 58 between a "transfer" and a "transmission;" the same distinction is also made in sects. 73 and 74, and the form L in the schedule as regards the transfer and transmission of mortgages. In their Lordships' opinion, a transmission, in order to be of the same nature as a transmission by bankruptcy, insolvency, death, or marriage, must be a transmission by operation of law, unconnected with any direct act of the party to whom the property is transmitted, and that a transmission to a purchaser at a sale by licitation is not such a transmission, inasmuch as it is connected with, and is the direct consequence of, an act of the person who applies for the order, and another act of the person who purchases, and to whom the property is transmitted. This view of the case is supported by sect. 103, clause 3, when read in conjunction with sect. 55; for if a transfer by a judicial sale to a purchaser not qualified to be the owner of a British ship were a transmission, there would be no reason for placing him in a different position from a purchaser under sect. 55. In the present case the purchasing and paying the purchase money for the ship by the purchasers was the act upon which the master's award was based, and admitting that the adjudication and award of the master passed a beneficial interest to the purchasers without any further conveyance, the interest was not such as to entitle them to be registered as owners. Further, it may be remarked that so long as Docinthe was registered as sole owner, the interest of the heirs François could not have been such as would have entitled a purchaser of it under a judicial sale to be registered as the owner of it. In the case of The Sisters, heard before the High Court of Admiralty in 1804 (5 Rob. Adm. Rep. 155), Lord Stowell observed, "According to the ideas which I have always entertained on this question, a bill of sale is the proper title to which the maritime courts of all countries would look. It is the universal instrument of transfer of ships in the usage of all maritime countries, and in no degree a peculiar title deed or conveyance known only to the law of England. It is what the maritime law expects, what the Court of Admiralty would, in its ordinary practice, always require, and what the Legislature of this country has now made absolutely necessary, with regard to British subjects, by the regulations of the statute law." This, no doubt was before the introduction of the transmission section, but the remark is applicable to all cases in which ships are transferred by purchase and sale, by whomsoever the sale is effected. It may be stated, in corroboration of the view of the case taken by their lordships, that upon a sale of a ship in execution of a judgment the sheriff passes the property by bill of sale and their Lordships understand that, although upon the sale of a ship by order of the High Court of Admiralty in a judgment in rem, the vessel becomes the property of the purchaser, it is the practice for the purchaser to procure a bill of sale from the marshal or commissioner, in order to entitle him to be registered in accordance with the Merchant Shipping Act 1854. The above view of their Lordships renders it almost unnecessary to say a word as to the order to erase the names of the mortgagees from the register, except that it is clearly invalid; but it may be pointed out that the mortgagees were no parties to the proceedings for sale by licitation; that that proceeding was not a judgment in rem; that the mortgagees were not called upon by the rule nisi to show cause against it; and that the only consent on the part of the mortgagees to forego their rights against the ship, and to exercise their rights upon the sale price, was upon the hearing of the rule nisi. Such a consent was not an act which would have justified the Registrar in making an entry on the register under sect. 68 of the Act of 1854, that the mortgage had been discharged; still less did it render it obligatory upon him, or even authorise him, to erase the mortgages from the register, Such a proceeding, even if the mortgages had been discharged in the manner pointed out by the Act, would have been wholly unwarranted. There is no provision in the Acts which authorises the registrar to erase entries of mortgages upon their being discharged, and it would be in violation of the principle of the Registration Acts to erase any entries which appear on the face of the register. For the above reasons their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty to rescind the order above mentioned, and to order that the rule to show cause of the 13th March 1879 be discharged, with costs. The respondents must pay the costs of this appeal.

COURT OF APPEAL.

SITTINGS AT WESTMINSTER.

Reported by J. P. Aspinall, F. W. Raikes, and A. H. Bittleston, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Monday, March 6, 1882.

(Before Brett, Cotton, and Holker, L.JJ., assisted by Nautical Assessors.)

THE ODESSA.

APPEAL FROM PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (ADMIRALTY).

Damage—Collision—Thames Conservancy Rules—Vessels meeting.

Whether "two steam-vessels proceeding in opposite directions, the one up and the other down the river Thames, are approaching one another so as to involve risk of collision," within rule 22 of the Thames Conservancy Rules, is in all cases a question of fact for the court, and is not subject to the same interpretation as that given by Art. 15 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea for vessels meeting end on or nearly end on.

When two steam-vessels are proceeding in the Thames in such directions that their respective courses if continued will bring them so near each other as to cause a risk of collision, rule 22 of the Thames Conservancy Rules is imperative and both vessels must so manœuvre as to pass port side to port side.

Semble, when two steam-vessels are proceeding one up and the other down the river, and have their green lights only in sight each to each, and bearing one point on each other's starboard bows at a distance of a quarter of a mile, they are approaching so as to involve risk of collision, and are both bound to port their helms to pass port side to port side.

Semble, if each had the other's green light three points on the starboard bow they would not be approaching so as to involve risk of collision.

Observations on the difference of the rules for the navigation of a river and those for preventing collisions at sea.

This was an appeal from a decision of Sir R. Phillimore, by which on the 7th April 1881 he had found the steamship Murton alone to blame for a collision which took place in Gravesend Reach of the river Thames on the 22nd Nov. 1880 between that vessel and the steamship Odessa.

The plaintiffs, the owners of the Murton, by their statement of claim alleged that the Murton, whilst coming down Gravesend Reach about 5 p.m. on the 22nd Nov., the wind being a light breeze from S.W., the weather hazy, and the tide first quarter ebb, was heading about E.S.E., and going about three knots through the water, and that the masthead and green light of a steamship, which proved to be the Odessa, and a white light on board her, used as a signal for the Custom-house boat, were seen at a distance of about a quarter of a mile, and bearing about one point on the starboard bow of the Murton, and that thereupon the helm of the Murton was starboarded a little, and the Murton proceeded so as to pass the Odessa starboard side to starboard side: but the Odessa as she came nearer shut in her green light and opened her red light, and caused immediate danger of collision. The helm of the Murton was put hard a-starboard, and her engines set on full speed ahead; but the Odessa with her stem struck the starboard quarter of the Murton and did her considerable damage.

The defendants traversed several of these allegations in the defence and counter-claimed for the damage they had sustained in the collision. At the hearing it appeared from the evidence of the plaintiffs' witnesses that the steam whistle of the Murton was not blown.

The rules referred to in the arguments and judgments were:

Rules and Bye-laws for the Regulation of the Navigation of the River Thames. Order in Council, 18th March 1880.

Bye-laws and Rules for the Regulation of the Navigation of the River between Yantlet Creek and Teddington Lock.

Rules concerning Lights.

4. The lights mentioned in the following rules and no others, shall be carried in all weathers from sunset to sunrise.

5. A steam-vessel when under way shall carry (a) On or before the foremast . . . . a bright white light . . . (b) On the starboard side a green light. . . . . (c) On the port side a red light. . . . . (d) The said green and red lights shall be fitted in such a manner as to prevent these lights from being seen across the bows.

Rules as to Speed and Mode of Navigation.

14. Every steam-vessel when approaching another vessel so as to involve risk of collision shall slacken her speed, and shall stop and reverse if necessary.

Bye-Laws and Rules regulating the Navigation of the River between Yantlet Creek and a line drawn from Blackwall Point to Bow Creek.

17. When two steam-vessels are in sight of one another and are approaching with risk of collision, the following steam signals shall be intimations of the course they intend to take: (a) One short blast of the steam whistle of about three seconds duration to mean, "I am directing my course to starboard, and intend to pass you port side to port side," the use of this signal shall be optional; (b) Two short blasts of the steam whistle, each of about three seconds duration to mean "I am directing my course to port and intend to pass you starboard side to starboard side. This latter signal shall not be used in the case provided by rule 22, when that rule can be obeyed; but it shall be compulsory to use this signal when a departure from that rule is necessary to avoid immediate danger.

Steering and Sailing Rules.

22. When two steam-vessels proceeding in opposite directions, the one up and the other down the river, are approaching one another so as to involve risk of collision, they shall pass one another port side to port side.

24. Steam-vessels crossing from one side of the river towards the other side shall keep out of the way of vessels navigating up and down the river.

Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea. Order in Council, 9th Jan. 1863.

Art. 13. If two ships under steam are meeting end on or nearly end on so as to involve risk of collision, the helms of both shall be put to port, so that each may pass on the port side of the other.

Order in Council, 30th July 1868.

The said two articles 11 and 13 respectively only apply to cases where ships are meeting end on or nearly end on in such a manner as to involve risk of collision. They consequently do not apply to two ships which must, if both keep on their respective courses, pass clear of each other.

The only cases in which the said two articles apply are where each of the two ships is end on or nearly end on to the other; in other words, to cases in which by day each ship sees the masts of the other in a line or nearly in a line with her own; and by night to cases in which each ship is in such a position as to see both the side lights of the other.

The said two articles do not apply by day to cases in which a ship sees another ahead crossing her own course, or by night to cases where the red light of one ship is opposed to the red light of the other; or where the green light of one ship is opposed to the green light of the other; or where a red light without a green light, or a green light without a red light, is seen ahead; or where both green and red lights are seen anywhere but ahead.

Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea. Order in Council, 14th Aug. 1879.

Art. 15 is the same as art. 13 of the regulations of 9th Jan. 1863, with the addition of the explanatory regulation of 30th July 1868, both of which are given above, with the exception that instead of in the earlier rule, "the helms of both shall be put to port," the expression used is "each shall alter her course to starboard."

Butt, Q.C. and Clarkson, Q.C. for the plaintiffs, owners of the Murton, after the close of their evidence, and on an intimation from the Court that the case had not been clearly made out.—It is customary, even if not compulsory, in the Thames for vessels to keep to the starboard side of the mid-channel, that is, for those coming up to keep to the north shore, and those going down to the south shore; in that case they will pass port side to port side. We are coming down to the south of mid-channel, and see a vessel coming up still more to the south. She is showing a special light not authorised by the regulations, but which we know indicates that she is signalling for a Custom-house officer, and they are stationed on the south shore. We see that vessel's green light on our starboard bow, and, if she had continued on her course, there could have been no collision; and therefore rule 22 does not apply. We starboarded our helm to give her more room, but there being no risk of collision, it was not necessary to give the sound signal prescribed by rule 17 (b); the collision was solely caused by the wrongful act of the Odessa in porting when the vessels were in a position of safety. If vessels with green lights open on the starboard bow, that is in a position of safety, green to green, are to port across each other's bows, to comply with rule 22, it will not prevent but cause collisions.

Webster, Q.C. and Bucknill, for defendants, owners of Odessa, elected not to call witnesses.—This is clearly a case of meeting ships within rule 22. It is immaterial whether they were on the south side or north side of the river; if they were approaching so as to cause risk of collision, each was bound to port. We did port; they starboarded. The fact that they thought it necessary to do something shows they thought there was some risk. Besides they gave no proper sound signal, as required by Art. 17 (b) of the Thames Conservancy Rules, to show that they intended to act otherwise than under rule 22.

Sir R. Phillimore.—I pronounce that this is a case in which the 22nd rule is applicable. Here are two steam-vessels proceeding in opposite directions, the one up and the other down the river, and approaching so as to involve risk of collision. They should have passed one another port side to port side, instead of which in this case the helm of the Murton was put a-starboard, and the intention on her part was to pass starboard side to starboard side. The whistle ought to have been used, but it was not used. On the whole, I am of opinion, and the Elder Brethren agree with me, that this is a case in which rule 22 is applicable. I think, therefore, that it is unnecessary to consider whether there was also a breach of rule 17. I find the Murton to be to blame for the collision, and I pronounce for the owners of the Odessa both in the action and on the counter-claim.

From this judgment the plaintiffs appealed.

March 6, 1882.—The appeal came on for hearing.

Butt, Q.C. and Myburgh, Q.C. for appellants.—The decision of the court below was clearly wrong. The case is clearly one of green light to green light, and therefore one in which there is no risk of collision if both keep their course. This rule of the Conservancy must be subject to the same construction as the similar rule for preventing collisions at sea; its language is only different to adapt it to the turns of a river; but here the collision was in a straight reach, and therefore it is subject to precisely the same construction as at sea. In consequence of a decision of Dr. Lushington that vessels were meeting when a green light of one was open on the starboard bow of the other (The Cleopatra, Swabey, 135), the original rule (13) of the regulations made in 1862, that when vessels were meeting "end on or nearly end on" each was to port, was explained by Order in Council of the 30th July 1868 to apply only when meeting "in such a manner as to involve risk of collision," which is the same expression as is used in the rule of the Conservancy, and that is further explained by the same Order in Council to mean that it only applies . . . . by night to a case in which each ship is in a position to see both side lights of the other ship, which was not the case here. The same Order in Council further says expressly that the article does not apply, that is, that there is no risk of collision when by night "the green light of one ship is opposed to the green light of the other," which is precisely this case. There was therefore no obligation on the Murton to port her helm so as to pass the Odessa port side to port side, and to do so would be most dangerous. The fact that the starboard side rule for narrow channels contained in the New Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea is not expressly incorporated in the Conservancy rules shows that it is not intended that vessels should always pass port side to port side. There being no obligation to do so, and no risk of collision in not doing so, there was no harm in the Murton, ex majore cautelâ, starboarding a little, but that starboarding not being done to avoid a collision, or caused by danger of a collision, or in the words of the rule itself (17 b), "to avoid immediate danger," there was no obligation to use the sound signal. That there was no obligation to port with a green light open is further shown by the decision in The Ericsson (Swabey, 35), which, though a decision upon the repealed section (296) of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, is applicable to this case of vessels meeting. That rule 22 in the Conservancy Rules is not always applicable to the cases of vessels meeting, one going up and the other down the river, is shown by the recent case of The Libra (4 Asp. Mar. L. C. 439; L. Rep. 1 P. Div. 139; 45 L. T. Rep. N. S. 161).

Webster, Q.C. and Bucknill, for the respondents, were not called on.

Brett, L.J.—It seems to me that in this case we must affirm the decision of the learned judge of the court below. I take that judgment to be, that the position of the vessels, even as given by the witnesses for the Murton, was in the opinion of the assessors below such, not that there must have been a collision if they proceeded in the courses they were then upon, but that there would have been risk of collision in this sense—that, if the vessels had kept on, they would have passed so closely to each other that any small obstruction in the river, or slight variation in their course, would have caused a collision. In other words, they were in such a position that, if they had continued their courses, there would have been reasonable risk of a collision. Now, it is said that the vessels were going on nearly parallel courses, and that they were a quarter of a mile off when they saw each other's green light. That is true. But how did each vessel see the green light of the other? Those on board the Murton saw the green light of the Odessa, a point on their starboard bow. That might be, although the vessels were not on exactly parallel courses; but if one vessel was only slightly pointing to the other the two vessels might have crossed one another's course. It is only on the supposition that both vessels would keep on parallel courses that they would pass each other without collision. Mr. Butt says that so long as green light was to green light there would be no danger of a collision; and he says, if we hold to the contrary, that will be making a hard and fast rule. On the contrary, I think that, if we adopted his theory, we should be making a hard and fast rule. Whether there is risk of collision must be a question of fact and skill, to be decided by the learned judge, with the assistance of assessors, on the evidence brought forward. If the vessels had been three or four points off, showing green light to green light, I would say that there was no risk of collision; but when you come to two points, I do not know exactly what the risk would be. But when you come to one point, it seems to me, as far as I can understand the matter—and I have heard it very often discussed, and evidence given on the point—that it is very difficult to show that there is not risk of collision. With three points there is hardly any risk, but even then it must depend on the circumstances of the case. Well, in the court below the judge, with the assistance of assessors, has come to the conclusion, as I gather from the judgment in the case, that there was risk of collision, and he adds: I am of opinion, and the Elder Brethren agree with me, that this is a case in which the 22nd rule of the Navigation Rules of the River Thames applies." I understand that they agreed upon this—that in fact, the vessels were in such a position that there was the risk of a collision. Our attention has been called to the sea rule, which would have applied in this case elsewhere than in the river Thames, and that the words "end on" which appeared in these rules are omitted from the 22nd rule of the Rules for Thames Navigation: but there is a good reason why the words "end on" are omitted from the Thames rules. The sea rules and those rules are naturally different. I think I know why this, the 22nd Thames rule, is different from the sea rule. The difference is owing to the considerations arising from the narrow width of the river Thames. It is very difficult for two vessels, one going up the river and the other going down, not to be nearly "end on." Therefore those words are not necessary, and vessels are supposed to keep so wide apart at sea that the sea rule would not apply to navigation in the river Thames. The whole question is one of fact; and the whole point to be decided in this case is, whether the vessels were in such a position when they sighted each other that there was a risk of collision. The moment that that question of fact is decided, in all circumstances the rule becomes absolute that the vessels must port their helms. In the present case the Murton starboarded her helm, and the other vessel, the Odessa, ported. That being so, I am of opinion that the decision of the court below must be affirmed.

Cotton, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Mr Butt said that this 22nd rule had no application unless the vessels were "end on," as explained by the Order in Council of 1868. In my opinion it would be wrong to say that this rule had no application in this case. The facts of each particular case must be decided as they arise, whether in the river under the Thames Navigation Rules or at sea under the sea rules. When two vessels are proceeding in opposite directions so as to involve risk of collision, the 22nd rule of the Thames Rules must apply; but, whether the rule applies, all depends upon the question of fact. If there is a risk of collision, the rule applies; but it is a question of fact to be decided in each case. The bearing of each vessel, and her distance, must be carefully considered; and on these facts it must be decided whether or not there was risk of collision. This is a question upon which the assessors can assist us, and I have asked them as to the risk of collision in the present case; and they have answered that there was risk of collision from the first. They hold that, if the two vessels had gone on in the course in which they were proceeding, the slightest accident might have brought about a collision. The Murton has not obeyed the rule to be adopted under such circumstances, and therefore she is to blame for the collision. The judgment of the court below must therefore be affirmed.

Holker, L.J.—I think this case falls under rule 22 of the Rules for Regulating Navigation on the River Thames, and I think it highly probable that the words "end on" were deliberately excluded from this rule. I concur in the judgment.

Brett, L.J.—I may add that I agree with what Mr. Butt has said on the question of a risk of collision at sea, and if the words "end on" were inserted in this rule, it would be subject to the same interpretation as the rule at sea; but whether there is a risk of collision on either a river or at sea, is a question which must be decided on the evidence. Each case is to be determined in the same way according to the facts brought to light as to the relative position of the vessels.

(Before Bramwell, Brett, and Cotton, L.JJ.)

Robertson v. The Amazon Tug and Lighterage Company.

Contract between master and shipowner—Specific ship—Implied warranty as to efficiency.

The plaintiff agreed to take a named steam-tug, towing six sailing barges, from Hull to the Brazils, paying and providing for the crew, and furnishing all necessary instruments. The defendants agreed to pay for these services 1020*l. After she had started the boilers and engines of the steam-tug in question turned out to be considerably out of repair, and in consequence the voyage occupied sixty days more than it would otherwise have done. The fact of the engines being out of repair was not known to either party at the time of the contract.*

Held (Bramwell, L.J. dissentiente), that there was no implied warranty by the defendants that the tug should be reasonably efficient for the purposes of the voyage, Judgment of Lord Coleridge, C.J. reversed.

The plaintiff, a master mariner, brought this action against the defendant company for an alleged breach by them of a contract, the terms of which are expressed in the following document:

I, Robert Robertson, hereby agree to take steam-tug, towing six sailing barges, from Hull, and one small steamer from the Downs, the latter-named to assist when required, to Para, Brazils, providing and paying crew of officers, sailors, stokers, and trimmers (forty-one men all told), also provisions for all on board for seventy days, and finding nautical instruments and charts for the navigation of the above said steam-tug, steamer, and six barges, the company paying pilotage from Hull to sea; all surplus stores to be left on board to be taken over by, and to be the property of, the company. I hereby undertake to do all the above, and hold the company harmless in regard to the return of the above crew from Para, expenses for which shall be borne by me wholly from the date of the arrival of the vessels in Para, for the sum of 1020*l.* sterling, 100*l.* of which shall be payable to me on signing contract, and a further sum of 600*l.* sterling before leaving Hull, for which I shall give guarantee satisfactory to the company, the balance of 320*l.* sterling to be paid by the company's agent in Para, on their being satisfied that no claims exist against the company in regard to me, Captain Robertson, or my crew.

(Signed) Robert Robertson.

London, July 12, 1876.

The steam-tug supplied by the defendants under this contract was the Villa Bella, which had been named to the plaintiff at the time of the contract, and during the voyage it turned out that her boilers and engines were very much out of repair. In consequence the voyage took considerably longer than was contemplated by the plaintiff, and he brought this action to recover the loss that he had thereby incurred.

The action was tried by Lord Coleridge, C.J. without a jury, who gave judgment, upon further consideration, for the plaintiff, the amount of damages to be referred.

From this judgment the defendants now appealed.

Sir Hardinge Giffard, Q.C. and Kenelm Digby for the defendants.

Butt, Q.C. and Edward Pollock for the plaintiff.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 5.—Bramwell, L.J.—I am of opinion that the judgment should be affirmed. We disposed on the hearing of that part of the case which relates to the Galopin, holding that in respect of it the plaintiff had a cause of action, if he could prove any damages resulting from the breach of contract in relation to that tug caused by its desertion from the enterprise. It remains to consider the question as to the larger tug. Now the plaintiff's complaint was not that the vessel was unfit for the voyage and work; that it was not properly built or strong enough; nor did he complain that the machinery or boiler was inadequate, not of the best make, or a good make, or strong or large enough. Had such been his complaint, then I think it ought to have failed, because his engagement was with respect to specific things, and he took them for better or worse. It is admitted that this was so, and rightly admitted. For in the same way as it might be shown that, on the sale of a horse or carriage, a particular horse or carriage was meant, so might it be shown in this case that a specific and definite vessel and specific and definite barges were meant. The plaintiff's complaint was that he had agreed upon a lump sum to take this vessel, towing several lighters, to the Brazils, that it was important to him that the vessel and apparatus should be efficient, as the faster he went the more he gained, and the slower he went the less he gained or the more he lost. He proved as a fact that the boilers were out of order, that they were sufficient in themselves, but needed repairs, and that in consequence it took him much longer to perform his undertaking than it otherwise would have done. The defects, the want of repair, were obvious—obvious to anyone who had looked at or tried the boilers. The question is, if this gives a cause of action. I am of opinion that it does. The contract of the defendants was to deliver to the plaintiff the tug and barges, with and in relation to which he was to perform a certain work, or bring about a certain result, for the profitable doing of which the efficiency of the tug was all important. The case seems to me the same as a contract of hiring, and as all contracts when one man furnishes a specific thing for another which that other is to use. The man so letting and furnishing the thing does not, except in some cases, undertake for its goodness or fitness, but he undertakes for the condition being such that it can do what its means enables it to do. Thus, if a man hired a specific horse and said he intended to hunt with it next day, there would be no undertaking by the letter that it could leap or go fast; but there would be that it should have its shoes on, and that it should not have been excessively worked or used the day before. I am asked where I find this rule in our law; I frankly own I cannot discover it plainly laid down anywhere. But it seems to me to exist as a matter of good sense and reason, and it is, I think, in accordance with the analogous authorities. I am afraid that the nearest is the dictum of Lord Abinger in Smith v. Marrable (11 M. & W. 5). "No authorities were wanted," "the case is one which common sense alone enables us to decide." The subject is treated in Story on Bailments, sec. 383. And certainly according to what is said there, if this had been a case of letting to hire the defendants would be liable. But as Story says, speaking of the letter's obligations (sect. 392); "It is difficult to say (unreasonable as they are in a general sense) what is the exact extent to which they are recognised in the common law. In some respects the common law certainly differs." This is so. What Story mentions, however, does not effect the principle I contend for. I have referred to some of Story's authorities; I may also refer to Merlin, Répertoire, Bail, sect. 6. Smith v. Marrable (11 M. & W. 5); and Wilson v. Finch Hatton (36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 473; L. Rep. 2 Ex. Div. 336), are favourable to the plaintiff's contention. In the former case is Lord Abinger's reference to "common sense." But, as to these two cases, I am afraid "common sense" has differed much in different people, and it is certainly remarkable that in the latter case the Lord Chief Baron refers to the plaintiff as "a lady who generally resides in the country coming to town for the season, sending her carriage, horses, and servants," &c., and proceeds, "therefore it is abundantly clear that it was in contemplation of both parties that the house should be ready for her occupation." Even if both parties "contemplated" that, I do not know it follows that they "agreed." The cases of Readhead v. Midland Railway Company (16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 485; L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 412) and Hyman v. Nye (44 L. T. Rep. N. S. 919; L. Rep. 6 Q. B. Div. 685) do not help. They and similar cases show that where there is an undertaking to supply an article not specific, the article must be "as fit for the purpose for which it is hired as care and skill can make it." The article here was specific, but I think the same reasoning which leads to that conclusion shows that when the article is specific, it must be supplied in a state as fit for the purpose for which it is supplied, as care and skill can make it. It was asked in the course of the argument, whether the defendants would have complied with their agreement, had there been no rudder to the ship—if, as was suggested, a ship is not a ship without a rudder, or if some of its copper was off if it was a coppered ship, or if there was a large hole in the deck or no covering to the hatchways? I think it impossible to say that there was not a duty on the defendants to have the tug free from such defects, and consequently impossible to say that there would not be in such a case a breach of their implied agreement. So I think there is now, and that the judgment must be affirmed.

Brett, L.J.—I am sorry that in this case I cannot agree with the judgment of Bramwell, L.J. The case was tried before Lord Coleridge without a jury, and Lord Coleridge was of opinion that, under the circumstances, there was an implied warranty that the larger tug was reasonably fit for the purposes for which it was to be used. The contract between the plaintiff and defendants was in writing, and the only parol evidence which was admissible to my mind for the purpose of construing the contract was evidence to show what was the subject-matter of the contract. That evidence showed that the defendants were the owners of the large tug the Villa Bella and of the smaller vessel the Galopin, and that they were desirous that these tugs should proceed to the Brazils with certain barges. The larger vessel, the Villa Bella, was named to the plaintiff at the time of the contract, and, although I do not think it is material, the plaintiff had an opportunity of seeing it. That at once makes the contract a contract with regard to that specific vessel. Now the plaintiff, being a skilled mariner and master, undertook by this contract to take the command of the expedition to the Brazils, and to conduct the large tug, the Villa Bella, and the barges across the sea. He was to be supplied, of course, with the means of working the large tug and also the smaller vessel, but he undertook amongst other things to provision the crews, and further he undertook to conduct this expedition for a fixed sum. It therefore was most material to him to calculate what would be the time in which he should in all probability perform the voyage. The larger tug, the Villa Bella, at the time when the contract was made, had been kept during the winter in a state which is not infrequent, that is to say, sunk in the water, which may not be so bad for the vessel itself, but it certainly is very deleterious to the engines. She was, in fact, a vessel with engines considerably damaged, but she was the vessel which the plaintiff undertook to conduct across the Atlantic. I agree with my Lord that there is an analogy, and a somewhat close one, between this case and the case of a person hiring some chattel for the purpose of using it. I think it would be true to say, as in the case he puts of the horse, that where a person hires a specific thing for the purpose of using it, there is an implied contract on the part of the latter that he will, in the meantime, keep the thing, as I should say, in repair, that is, he will not, by want of reasonable care after the contract is made, allow it to become worse than it was at the time the contract was made. But with great deference to him, I think that the facts of this case do not raise the point upon which his judgment rests. The Villa Bella was a vessel with damaged engines at the time the contract was made, it was that vessel with these engines, such as they were, that the plaintiff undertook to conduct across the Atlantic. Now I think there would be an implied contract on the part of the defendants that they would not, by want of reasonable care, allow that vessel with its damaged engines to get more out of repair at the time the voyage was to commence than it was at the time that the contract was made. I think they were bound by an implied contract to take all reasonable care to keep the vessel as good and as efficient for the work it was to do as it was at the time the contract was made. But it would be to say that they were bound to make it better than it was at the time of the contract, if it is to be said that they were bound to hand it over to the plaintiff in a state reasonably fit for the purpose of the work it was to do. Now, as I understand my Lord, he would not imply such a contract as that, but if he would, I must say that, with all deference, I cannot agree to it. When there is a specific thing, there is no implied contract that it shall be reasonably fit for the purpose for which it is hired or is to be used. That is the great distinction between a contract to supply a thing which is to be made, and which is not specific, and a contract with regard to a specific thing. In the one case you take the thing as it is, in the other the person who undertakes to supply it is bound to supply a thing reasonably fit for the purpose for which it is made. Therefore, it seems to me that the judgment of my Lord really does, I believe, come to what was the opinion of Lord Coleridge, although in words he negatives it. It seems to me that he holds that the defendants were bound to supply this large tug in a condition reasonably fit for the purpose for which the contract was made, and the breach upon which he relies really is that it was not so fit, whereas it seems to me that there was no such implied contract. I wish to put my view as plainly as I can. If there had been evidence in this case that, after the contract was made, the machinery, from want of reasonable care by the defendants, had become in a worse condition than it was at the time of the contract, I should have thought that there would have been a breach of contract, for which the defendant would have been liable. But I find no such evidence. The only misfortune about the tug was that the machinery at the time the contract was made was in such a condition that the vessel was not reasonably fit for the purpose of taking barges across the Atlantic. Therefore, the misfortune which happened was the result of a risk which was run by the plaintiff, and of which he cannot complain, and consequently he has no cause of action as regards the Villa Bella. The plaintiff is thus reduced in order to maintain his action, to show that he suffered damage by the desertion of the Galopin. He is entitled to nominal damages in respect of such desertion, and, if he can prove that he suffered any substantial damage by reason of it, then the nominal damages will be increased accordingly.

Cotton, L.J.—This is an action for breaches of a contract, and the breaches related to two matters. One of them related to the smaller vessel, the Galopin, and that we disposed of at the time the case was argued, and we did so on the ground that on the fair construction of the written contract there was a contract on the part of the defendants that the smaller steamer, which was not named, the Galopin, should assist when required by the plaintiffs, and that she deserted the expedition, and that there was a breach as to that part of the contract. Our judgment was reserved as to that part of the plaintiff's claim which sought to recover damages for loss sustained by the inefficiency of the Villa Bella. This inefficiency was attributed to the fact that the boilers of the Villa Bella were not sufficiently powerful for the engines, and principally to the fact that the boilers were in a bad condition, in consequence of what had happened to the tug before she became the property of the defendants. The defendants were not aware of these defects, and the plaintiff cannot recover on the ground of false representation. He must recover, if at all, on the ground of breach of warranty. The contract does not contain in express terms any warranty, and there is some uncertainty as to the form of the warranty on which the plaintiff relies. It must be either, as urged in argument, and held by Lord Coleridge, that the Villa Bella was a vessel reasonably fit for the service to be performed, or, as I understand Bramwell, L.J. to hold, the Villa Bella and her engines were in a reasonable state of repair, and otherwise in a condition fit for the service, so far as that vessel and her engines could be so. The plaintiff tendered evidence to show that there was such a contract between the parties. But parol evidence is not admissible to construe the contract; and, even if in such action it would be open to the plaintiff to reform the contract, the evidence would not establish what is essential for such a case, viz., that both parties agreed to a contract not expressed in the written document. But evidence is admissible to show what the facts were with reference to which the parties contracted, and thus to enable the court to apply the contract. The evidence showed that at the time of the contract the defendants were proposing to send out the Villa Bella, and that this was known to the plaintiff. The contract must therefore be dealt with as one made with reference to an ascertained steam vessel. Though the contract contains no warranty in terms, the question remains whether there are in it expressions from which, as a matter of construction, any such warranty as that relied on by the plaintiff can be inferred. In my opinion, this is not the case. The question remains, does the contract put the plaintiff and defendants into any relation from the existence of which the law, in the absence of any actual contract, implies such a warranty as is relied on by the plaintiff? In my opinion, it does not. The plaintiff was to be master of the Villa Bella, but the law does not, as against the owner, imply in favour of a captain or master any warranty of the seaworthiness or efficiency of the vessel: (Couch v. Steel, 3 E. & B. 402.) Here, however, the plaintiff is more than master. It has been suggested that plaintiff is in the same position as the hirer of an ascertained chattel, and the defendants in the same position as the person who lets the chattel for hire. There is at least a doubt what warranty the law implies from the relation of hirer and letter to hire of an ascertained chattel. But, however this may be, in my opinion the relation of the parties here is different. The plaintiff here contracts with the defendants for a sum to be paid by them to take a vessel and barges to South America, with liberty to use the vessel as a tug. I say with liberty, for it can hardly be said that it would have been a breach of contract on his part not to use the motive power of the tug, but to tow both the Villa Bella and the barges to their destination. If the vessel were not at the time of the contract ascertained and known to both parties, probably the contract would imply such a warranty as is relied on by the plaintiff. But a contract made with reference to a known vessel, in my opinion, stands in a very different position. In such a case, in the absence of actual stipulation, the contractor must, in my opinion, be considered as having agreed to take the risk of the greater or less efficiency of the chattel about which he contracts. He has to determine what price he will ask for the service or work which he contracts to render or to do. He may examine the chattel and satisfy himself of its condition and efficiency. If he does not, and suffers from his neglect to take this precaution, he cannot, in my opinion, make the owner liable. He must, in my opinion, be taken to have fixed the price so as to cover the risk arising from the condition of the instrument which he might have examined if he had thought fit so to do. It may well be that, where parties enter into such a contract as that which exists in the present case, there is an implied contract that the owner of the chattel will not after the agreement, and while the chattel remains in his possession, use or treat it in any way which will render it unfit for the service which has to be performed, and that he will take such care of it as is reasonable, having regard to the purpose for which it is under the contract to be used. But, in the present case, the inefficiency of the Villa Bella arose not from any improper use of the vessel by the defendants, or any neglect on their part to take care of it after this contract, but from defects which, though unknown to the plaintiff and defendants, existed at the date of the contract. The cases of Smith v. Marrable (ubi sup.), and Wilson v. Finch Hatton (ubi sup.), or at least the judgments in those cases, have been relied on in support of the plaintiff's case. Each of those cases arose on a contract of hiring, and in each the hirer was defending himself against a claim for damages in respect of a refusal on his part to perform his contract of hiring, while in this case the plaintiff who is (in my opinion, erroneously) said to be in the position of hirer, is suing for damages. In those cases, if there was an implied condition that the thing, a furnished house, was fit for the purpose for which it was let, by reading into the contract to take the house "if fit for habitation," the defendant was excused. Here the plaintiff must establish that there was a warranty to that effect. In my opinion the plaintiff cannot establish that there was such a warranty as that on which he must rely, and the defendants are, as regards this part of the claim, entitled to have the judgment reversed.

APPEAL FROM PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (ADMIRALTY).

Salvage—Amount—Apportionment—Deviation—Discretion of judge—Circumstances under which Court of Appeal will interfere—Statutory signal of distress.

The Court of Appeal will alter an award of salvage made by the court below, where there is reason to believe that the court below has not taken into consideration the circumstance that rendering a salvage service to property alone constitutes a deviation in point of law, however small the deviation may be in point of fact.

In a service mainly rendered by the steam power of the salving ship, and which had occasioned a deviation in point of law, and in rendering which the crew are exposed to some peril, an apportionment of two-thirds to the shipowner and one-third to the master and crew altered to five-ninths to the shipowners and four-ninths to the master and crew, and the total award increased from 600l. to 900l.; owners' share increased from 400l. to 500l.; master's share increased from 80l. to 100l., crew's share increased from 120l. to 300l.

This was an appeal of the plaintiffs from a decision of Sir Robert Phillimore assisted by Elder Brethren of the Trinity House, by which, on the 28th July 1881, he had awarded the sum of 600*l.* for the salvage services rendered by the s.s. Ariel and her crew to the s.s. Farnley Hall. The plaintiffs were the owners, master, and crew of the s.s. Ariel, which was a vessel of 1108 tons gross registered tonnage, with engines of 550 effective horse power, and of the value of 13,000*l.* Her crew consisted of the master, first and second mates, first, second, and third engineers, and seventeen hands, including two lads. The Farnley Hall was a screw steamship of 941 tons register, and of the value of 12,000*l.*

On the 19th Nov. 1880 the salving vessel, the Ariel, which was under a time charter, and laden with a cargo of pig-iron and coal, on a voyage from Troon in Scotland to Savona in Italy, suffered some damage to her engines and boats in a gale of wind.

About noon on that day she observed the Farnley Hall near the island of Porquerollas on the south coast of France. The Farnley Hall had a signal flying, consisting of three flags, which meant "want assistance;" the signal not being urgent the Ariel continued on her voyage, when the Farnley Hall hoisted a signal, consisting of two flags, N.C., all two-flag signals being, by the International Code, urgent signals, and which means "In distress, want assistance," and which signal is especially provided as a signal of distress by the Merchant Shipping Act 1873, sect. 18 (a).

(a) Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85) 18.—The signals specified in the first schedule to this Act shall be deemed to be signals of distress.

Any master of a vessel who uses or displays, or causes or permits any person under his authority to use or display, any of the said signals, except in the case of a vessel being in distress, shall be liable to pay compensation for any labour undertaken, risk incurred, or loss sustained in consequence of such signal having been supposed to be a signal of distress, and such compensa-

Thereupon the Ariel altered her course and went to the Farnley Hall.

The Farnley Hall was found to be broken down, though her engineers were engaged in repairing the damage, and it was alleged she could have been able to steam a little in some hours time, and did in fact succeed in turning the engines before the Ariel began to tow. The wind and sea were high, but she was at a distance from the shore, variously stated at from one to four miles. It was also disputed whether the direction of the wind was such as to drive the Farnley Hall towards the shore or not.

The boat of the Farnley Hall was used to bring the hawsers from one ship to the other. The following agreement was entered into by the masters of the ships:

S.S. Farnley Hall, 19th Nov. 1880:—The s.s. Farnley Hall having become totally disabled through the breaking of the thrust bearing and forward coupling bolts of main shafting four miles off Porquerollas Island, thereby placing the steamer in a dangerous position, with a S.W. gale, and showing urgent signals requiring assistance, was fallen in with by the s.s. Ariel, in a heavy sea, at noon on the 19th Nov, 1880, it was agreed by Capt. Armstrong, of s.s. Ariel, that he should take hold of the Farnley Hall on the following conditions, i.e.: 100*l.* to be paid to the owners of s.s. Ariel for the bonâ fide, attempt to tow Farnley Hall to Savona, and the whole award for the service rendered to be settled by the respective owners. (Signed) N. Lowther, Master s.s. Farnley Hall. To the owners of s.s. Farnley Hall.

Please settle the claim as per agreement on other side. —N. Lowther, Master of s.s. Farnley Hall. Robert Irvine and Co.

The case came on for hearing before Sir R. Phillimore and Elder Brethren of the Trinity House on the 27th July 1881.

Dr. W. G. F. Phillimore and Verney for plaintiffs, owners, master, and crew of the Ariel.

Butt, Q.C. and Myburgh for defendants, owners of the Farnley Hall.

Sir R. Phillimore.—This is a meritorious case of salvage, in which I have had the advantage of consulting with the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House upon the various questions which arose with respect to the damage done to the ship to which the services were rendered. The services began on the 9th Nov. 1880. The salving vessel was the Ariel, an iron screw steamship of 1180 tons gross, and of the value of 13,000*l.* The vessel to which the services were rendered was also a screw steamship called the Farnley Hall, of something less than 1000 tons, and of the value of 12,000*l.* She was in ballast, and therefore there is no question of cargo or freight. On the 19th Nov. the Ariel, which was bound with a cargo of coals froom Troon in Scotland to Savona in Italy, received considerable injuries to herself. About 1 a.m. of that day there was a heavy gale and high sea, and the sea struck the starboard side of the deck-house and broke in the doors over the engine-room and stokehole, flooding the stoke-hole. About 4 a.m., the gale still continuing, the Ariel was running under reefed foresail and topsail, and at 8 a.m. it was found that most of the steam-pipe covers and beds were washed away from the deck. About noon of that day the Ariel sighted the Farnley Hall near the island of Porquerollas, and, after going round her once or twice, I think, took her in tow. The Farnley Hall had urgent signals applying for assistance. The first thing the court has to consider is the danger of the position in which the Farnley Hall was when the Ariel came up to her. I have consulted with the Elder Brethren upon that point especially, and they are of opinion that the Farnley Hall was in a position of very great danger. Having regard to the nature of the coast, and to the fact that the wind was on shore and the island within a mile under her lee, it is evident that she was in a position of great peril, and that from this peril she was rescued by the Ariel. The mischief which had occurred to the Farnley Hall is stated very clearly both in the agreement set out in the statement of claim and in a letter from her master to her owners, to which I will just refer. In the letter the master writes: "On Wednesday, the 18th, I left Savona bound to Palmores; weather fine, strong sea. All went well until 11.30 p.m. on Thursday night, when off Porquerollas light—it is about eight or nine miles—that being the entrance to the Gulf of Lyons, the sea very heavy and the wind on the land, the engines were running heavy; the coupling bolts broke at the fore end of the shaft, causing the thrust block to break right in two totally disabled the ship. We drifted to within a mile of the land. At daylight we hoisted signals for assistance. About 2 p.m. of the 19th (Friday) we saw a steamboat, it bore down to us. The captain came on board. We were then four or five miles from the land. He told me he was bound to Savona, and would tow us there. I inclose the following agreement made betwixt us." There is not the least suggestion in the letter that the agreement was not fairly and honestly made. The agreement in question was in the following terms: [His Lordship here read the agreement set out above, and continued:] Another circumstance has to be considered in this case, which is the danger incurred by the two ships and by the men of the Ariel in getting the ropes on board, which the Elder Brethren estimate as a service of great value, and consider that a very considerable danger was incurred in performing that necessary operation. The Farnley Hall was towed, it is true, to the port of Savona, to which the Ariel was bound, and therefore the argument for increasing the remuneration which arises in some cases does not arise in this. The salving vessel did not go out of her way, but went directly on her own course to the port to which she was destined. The services lasted altogether about twenty-eight hours, and the distance the Farnley Hall was towed was somewhere about 120 or 130 nautical miles. I have already said that the position from which the Farnley Hall was rescued was one of danger, and I should add to that that it appears to us that, but for the aid of the Ariel, the Farnley Hall would have had very great difficulty indeed in avoiding running on the rocks, or some part of the lee shore, and although she might have escaped, the chances were very much against her, having regard to the state in which her propeller was, and her impaired means of locomotion. Taking all these things into con-tion may, without prejudice to any other remedy, be recovered in the same manner in which salvage is recoverable.

Schedule I.—Signals of Distress: In the daytime. The following signals, numbered 1, 2, and 3, when used together or separately, shall be deemed to be signals of distress in the daytime.

2. The International Code signal of distress indicated by N C sideration, and that there is no tender, and that the value of the Farnley Hall is 12,000*l.*, I shall make what is, in my opinion, and in that of the Elder Brethren, a fair award if I pronounce 600*l.* to be the amount of remuneration in this case. I think the proper apportionment to make will be to give 400*l.* to the owners, 80*l.* to the master, and the rest to the crew.

From the award the plaintiffs appealed on the ground of its insufficiency.

March 7.—The appeal came on for hearing before Brett, Cotton, and Holker, L.JJ., assisted by two nautical assessors.

Dr. W. G. F. Phillimore and Verney for the appellants.—The award is insufficient. Appeals in salvage cases were, it is true, discouraged by the Privy Council, but that was because of the great expense attending them; that reason no longer exists, as appeals to this court are not attended with the same expense as appeals to the Privy Council. But even the Privy Council would interfere where they considered the award either too little by one-third:

The Scindia, L. Rep. 1 P. C. 241; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 232;
The True Blue, L. Rep. 1 P. C. 250; or too much by two-fifths:

The Amerique, 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 460; 31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 854; L. Rep. 6 P. C. 468; and we say that this award ought to be increased by more than one-third. The learned judge based his award partly on the ground that there had been no deviation; but that is not the case, as the fact of delaying the voyage or going out of the way to save property when such a course was not necessary to save life, or even if necessary to save life if such a course was persevered in to save property when there had ceased to be danger to life, is such a deviation as to render all policies void, and to defeat the usual exceptions in contracts of carriage, and therefore the judge should have taken that fact into consideration:

Scaramanga v. Stamp, 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 161, 295; 42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 840; 5 C. P. Div. 295.

[Brett, L.J.—The judgment finds as a fact that "the men of the Ariel in getting the ropes on board" performed "a service of great value," and "that a very considerable danger was incurred in performing" it, and he gives 120*l.* to be divided amongst twenty-two of them, which, considering that several are officers and would take larger shares, would leave scarcely 4*l.* apiece for the seamen.] That is true, and it is an insufficient sum considering that the fact of the Ariel in her damaged condition being taken so near a dangerous coast really imperilled the lives of all on board her; but, if the court increases the award to the seamen, it will increase the award in a similar proportion to the ship. In all these cases where the principal salvor (so to speak) is the steam power of the ship, without which the salved vessel could not have been rescued, and which also brought her safely into a port where she could be repaired, the court is in the habit of apportioning the sum awarded, two-thirds to the ship (that is, to the owners) and one-third to the master and crew:

The Cleopatra, L. Rep. 3 P. Div. 145;
The Castlewood, 42 L. T. Rep. N.S. 702; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 278.

Butt, Q.C. and Myburgh, Q.C. for respondents.—The award in this case is, to say the least, liberal. The defendants are not concerned with the apportionment. If the court thinks the crew have not got a sufficient share, it can direct a different division, but the total amount is quite enough. There was no danger to the Ariel in performing the service, and the danger, if any, to which the Farnley Hall was exposed was already passed when the Ariel took her in tow. The judgment is incorrect in finding she was within a mile of the shore. She had been perhaps within a mile, but at the time she was taken in tow she was four or five miles off the land. It is so stated in the captain's letter, which letter the learned judge adopts as a correct statement of fact in his judgment. Six hundred pounds would be a liberal reward for the services in any event, but here a smaller award would have been quite sufficient, seeing that the salvor has by agreement altered the nature of the service; a salvage service proper is carried out on the principle "no cure no pay," but here the salvor was to get 100*l.* in any event. No doubt the rendering of that service was technically a deviation, but that is not the question the learned judge was dealing with. He means that there was little loss of time and no great extra expenditure of coals and stores as there would have been if the vessel had been taken to a port out of the route of the salving vessel, e.g., if she had turned back and taken her to Toulon or Marseilles, which no doubt would have been more convenient for the salved vessel, and for which convenience she would have paid more; besides it is well known that steamers' bills of lading and charter-parties, if not policies of insurance, almost invariably at the present time contain a clause giving "liberty to assist and tow vessels in distress," and there is no evidence that the charter-party and bills of lading of the Ariel did not contain this usual provision. If the salvors proposed to enhance their claim on the ground of such technical deviation, they should have given evidence of some facts from which it could be shown that they incurred any and what risk in law. There is certainly nothing so inequitable as to "shock the conscience of the court:"

The Carrier Dove, 2 Moore P. C. Cases, N. S. 254.

Dr. W. G. F. Phillimore in reply.

Brett, L.J.—In this case we labour under the great difficulty of having to interfere with the action of the court below in awarding compensation for salvage, because it is against our desire to interfere in such cases, and we do not wish to deviate from a rule which we have laid down. The circumstances of this case, however, seem to us somewhat peculiar. The steamship Farnley Hall in this case was in great danger of becoming a wreck upon the rocks, because she had just suffered from the storm of the night, which might have returned at any moment. If the help of the Ariel had not come to hand, she would have been, in my opinion, in great danger of going on the island. I am of that opinion, notwithstanding the argument of Mr. Butt to the contrary. Another steamer, the Ariel, however, came to her assistance, and that steamer had a cargo on board which was certainly not perishable; but if there had been any delay in its delivery or loss of it, the owners of the Ariel would have been liable. It was a disagreeable cargo—one of pig iron and coals. The Ariel, seeing the signals of distress, put herself into a dangerous position. She had to wait for hours before she could get the ropes from the Farnley Hall on board. The danger then was certainly over; but during the time of this operation the Ariel was in great danger. All the time the Farnley Hall was in danger of drifting on islands and on a lee shore, and at the time was in an almost helpless condition. In fact, for a time, both the ships were in a dangerous position. There were twenty-three men on board the Ariel, and if only 200*l.* was to be distributed among the captain, the first and second mates, the chief engineer and the second engineer, and the crew, it would go but a short way. To the crew—as distinguished from the officers—who did the greater part of the work, the allowance of the court below would not amount to 4*l.* per man. It has been said that the Ariel did not go out of her course to tow the Farnley Hall into Savona, in Italy, as she was going there; but she was not bound to go out of her way and expose herself to danger, and by deviating from her course she was causing delay and danger to her cargo. It took her much longer to complete the voyage than if she had not rendered assistance to the Farnley Hall. If this vessel had met with another storm, which was not unlikely, she might have become a total wreck. We think that the learned judge in the court below has not given due consideration to the circumstances of the case, and to the danger to the cargo of the Ariel which was risked. This is a case which does not come within the ordinary rules, and therefore we must consider the case as it presents itself. We think that the salvage in this case ought to be increased from 600*l.* to 900*l.*, and we desire to apportion it as follows: 500*l.* to the owners of the Ariel, 100*l.* to the captain, and 300*l.* among the crew, who did the major portion of the manual labour in connection with the towing of the Farnley Hall off the shore.

Nov. 4, 5, and 9, 1881.

(Before Sir R. PHILLIMORE and TRINITY MASTERS.)

THE CACHAPOOL.

Collision — Launch — Reasonable notice — Necessary precautions—River Mersey—Compulsory pilotage—"Proceeding to sea"—Mersey Docks Acts Consolidation Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. xcii.), ss. 138, 139.

Where a launch was about to take place in the river Mersey at high water, and the usual general notice had been given, and the launch was dressed with flags and all usual precautions taken, and in due time before the launch a tug proceeded to a vessel lying at anchor off the place where the launch was about to take place and warned her thereof, and subsequently in sufficient time offered to tow her out of the way; but, owing to the conduct of those on board the vessel at anchor, whose pilot was aware before she anchored that the launch was about to take place, that vessel was still in the way, when the launch, which was delayed as long as it was prudent to do so, took place, and the launch struck the vessel and sank her: it was held that the owners of the launch had taken every possible precaution and were not to blame for the collision, and that the vessel at anchor was alone to blame.

Semble, a vessel at anchor in the track of a vessel about to be launched is bound to get out of the way of the launch if she has had warning of the launch in due time and facilities for moving out of the way in time (such as a tug offering and being ready to tow her), are afforded by those in charge of the launch.

When a vessel leaves a dock in the Mersey on her voyage to sea and receives slight injuries to a yard-arm, necessitating repairs, and in consequence is anchored under the directions of the pilot in the river, intending to go to sea on the next day, the pilot remaining in charge, but on the next morning before resuming her voyage and whilst still at anchor she gets into collision and does damage to another vessel, she is not "proceeding to sea" within the meaning of the 139*th section of the Mersey Docks Act Consolidation Act* 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. xcii.), and the pilot is not in charge by compulsion of law.

THIS was an action in rem instituted by the owners of the barque or vessel Gladstone, the owners of her cargo, and her master and crew, against the screw steamship Cachapool, and against the owners thereof intervening, to recover damages in respect of injuries sustained by the Gladstone in a collision which occurred between that vessel and the Cachapool about 10.30 a.m. on the 9th Aug. 1881 in the river Mersey.

The plaintiffs' statement of claim was as follows:

1. The plaintiffs are the owners, master, and crew of the late barque or vessel Gladstone.

2. On the 8th Aug. 1881 the Gladstone, which was a barque of 334 tons register belonging to the port of South Shields, left the Salthouse Dock, Liverpool, manned by a crew of eleven hands all told, and in charge of a duly licensed pilot, for the port of Liverpool. The Gladstone was laden with a cargo of salt in bulk, and was bound for Viborg in Russia.

3. Shortly after leaving the said dock, and whilst in the course of proceeding to sea on the said voyage, the said barque was, by direction of the said pilot, brought to an anchor in the river Mersey about abreast of Tranmere Ferry landing stage.

4. At about 10 a.m. on the 9th of the said month the weather was fine and clear with a fresh breeze from about north-west by north, and the tide was last quarter flood and of the force of about four knots, and the Gladstone was lying at anchor in the same place, when a tug called the Hercules came to the Gladstone and told those on board her that a launch was going to take place from a building yard on the Cheshire side of the river, and asked the pilot of the Gladstone if the said ship was not in the way. The Gladstone could not then be moved without assistance, and those on board inquired if the Hercules had authority to and would help to move her.

5. The Hercules, which was in attendance at the launch, and employed by the defendants and their servants, who had the conduct thereof, declined at that time to render any assistance in moving the Gladstone, and went away.

6. Shortly afterwards the Hercules returned to the Gladstone, and at the request and by the direction of those on board the said tug the tow rope of the Gladstone was passed on board the Hercules, which commenced to tow the barque, and the helm of the Gladstone was ported to sheer her out into the river, but the Hercules getting out of position and nearly carrying away the Gladstone's head gear, slipped the hawser.

7. The hawser was then again passed on board the Hercules, which again began to tow; but before the Hercules had towed the Gladstone ahead of her anchor the launch, which proved to be the Cachapool, belonging to the defendants, left the ways and approached the Gladstone at great speed, and caused risk of collision, and, notwithstanding orders were given to veer away the Gladstone's chain, the Cachapool with her stern struck the Gladstone on the port side, doing so much damage that the Gladstone sank almost immediately, and, with her cargo, and the effects of her master and crew, became a total loss.

8. Those in charge of the Cachapool and of the said launching operations improperly neglected to keep a good look-out.

9. The Cachapool was improperly launched, having regard to the position of the Gladstone prior to and at the time of the said launch, and the state of the wind and tide.

10. Those in charge of the Cachapool and of the said launching operations improperly neglected to supply the Cachapool with efficient anchors and cables, and improperly neglected to take proper measures and precautions for checking, controlling, arresting, or directing the course and speed of the Cachapool, and improperly neglected before the collision to bring her up or to keep her clear of the Gladstone.

11. Those in charge of the Cachapool and of the said launching operations improperly neglected to give due notice of the said launch taking place, and improperly neglected to take due and proper precautions for the safety of vessels lawfully in the neighbourhood of the said launch.

12. The said collision and the damages consequent thereon, were caused by the neglect, or default, or want of proper care and skill on the part of those having charge of the Cachapool, and of the said operations for launching her, and were not caused or contributed to by those on board the Gladstone.

In answer to this, a statement of defence was filed by the owners of the Cachapool in the following terms:

1. The defendants admit that the barque Gladstone left the Salthouse Dock, Liverpool, on the 8th Aug. 1881, and that she brought up to an anchor in the river Mersey about abreast of the Tranmere Ferry landing stage on the same day.

2. About 7.5 a.m. on the 9th Aug. 1881, 10 a.m. on that day being the time appointed for the launch in the statement of claim referred to, those in charge of the launch sent the tug Hercules to warn those in charge of the barque Gladstone and of other vessels to move their ships, as they were in the way of the proposed launch. The Hercules gave such warning first to the Gladstone, but those in charge of the Gladstone refused at that time to move. The Hercules went on to the other vessels, which moved, and then came back to the Gladstone and advised her to sheer to the eastward, so as to drag her anchor and go to the southward with the tide and get clear of the launch. At this time the tide was running flood. Those on board the Gladstone, however, refused and neglected to do anything.

3. Later on the Hercules returned to the Gladstone and offered to tow her out of danger, and asked for a hawser. After some delay those on board the Gladstone passed a hawser on to the Hercules, which at once began towing her out of the way to the north and east, but in consequence of those on board the Gladstone neglecting to assist by heaving on their anchor the Hercules got out of position and had to slip the hawser.

4. The Hercules went back to the Gladstone to get her hawser again, but those on board the Gladstone then for a long time refused to give the Hercules a hawser. When they did give the Hercules a hawser again, she at once went ahead, towing to the north and east, and the Gladstone was moved ahead by her.

5. When those in charge of the launch saw the Gladstone being thus towed ahead it was considerably past the time appointed for the launch, which could not with safety to life and property be further delayed, and the launch was let go from the ways. Very shortly afterwards it appeared that the Gladstone had been brought up by her chain, and that the launch was moving in the direction of the Gladstone. The anchor of the launch was then let go immediately, the Hercules towed away at the Gladstone and got her ahead of her anchor, and the Gladstone was hailed to pay out chain. Those on board the Gladstone neglected to pay out chain, and the anchor of the launch dragged and she with her stern struck the port side of the Gladstone about the main rigging, and suffered considerable damage. This was about 10.30 a.m. The Gladstone unfortunately sank in a few minutes.

6. Save as aforesaid, the defendants deny the several allegations in paragraphs 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7 of the statement of claim. Those in paragraphs 8, 9, 10, 11, and 12 they deny altogether.

7. The date of the said launch had been fixed for several days, and the defendants had given all the usual and necessary notices of the same. The launch and the Hercules and other vessels in attendance were dressed with flags. Those in charge of the Gladstone knew, or had full notice and means of knowing, of the intended launch, and that it could not with safety be postponed, and had ample time to move her or cause or suffer her to be moved out of the way, but they neglected and refused to do so until it was too late.

8. Those on board the Gladstone improperly neglected to move her out of the way, and improperly refused and delayed to take the assistance offered by the Hercules.

9. Those on board the Gladstone neglected to get in chain on her anchor so as to suffer her to drag her anchor, and when she was being towed, and it was too late to get in chain for this purpose, they neglected to pay out chain and to take any steps so as to enable the Hercules to tow her further ahead of her anchor and into a position of safety.

10. The collision was caused by some or all of the matters and things stated in the 7th, 8th, and 9th paragraphs thereof or otherwise by the negligence of the plaintiffs or of those on board the Gladstone.

11. The collision was not caused or contributed to by the defendants, or by any of those on board the Cachapool.

And the defendants repeated the allegations contained in their statement of defence, in their counter-claim, and counter-claimed for the damage suffered by them in the collision.

On this the plaintiffs joined issue, and in their reply to the counter-claim, after denying the allegations, therein further said that, if and so far as the said collision was occasioned by any neglect or default on the part of those on board the Gladstone, such collision was solely occasioned by some default or incapacity on the part of the said pilot, who was a duly qualified pilot acting in charge of the Gladstone within a district where the employment of such pilot was compulsory by law within the true intent and meaning of sect. 388 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854.

The 137th and 139th sections of the Mersey Docks Acts Consolidation Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. xcii.) are as follows:

Sect. 138. If the master of any vessel shall require the attendance of a pilot on board any vessel during her riding at anchor, or being at Hoylake or in the river Mersey, the pilot so employed shall be paid for every day or portion of a day he shall so attend the sum of five shillings, and no more, provided that the pilot who shall have the charge of any vessel shall be paid for every day of his attendance whilst in the river; but no such charge shall be made for the day on which such vessel, being outward bound shall leave the river Mersey to commence her voyage, or, being inward bound, shall enter the river Mersey.

Sect. 139. In case the masters of any vessels, being outward bound, and not being a coasting vessel in ballast or under the burthen of one hundred tons, for which provision is otherwise made, shall proceed to sea, and shall refuse to take on board or to employ a pilot, he shall pay to the pilot who shall first offer himself to pilot the same the full pilotage rate that would have been payable for such vessel if such pilot had actually piloted the same into or out, as the case may be, of the said port of Liverpool, together with all expenses incurred in recovering the same.

It appeared in evidence at the hearing that the Gladstone had on the previous day left the Salthouse Dock, Liverpool, with a pilot on board, intending to proceed to sea, but shortly after leaving the basin she received some slight injury to one of her yardarms which necessitated repairs, and the pilot therefore brought her to anchor off the Tranmere Ferry, remaining on board and in charge, intending to proceed to sea the next morning. On the part of the owners of the launch, it was proved that they had taken all the usual precautions. Notices had been posted for some time before in the pilot office and elsewhere, the launch was dressed with flags by 7 a.m. and tugs were in attendance, one of which, the Hercules, proceeded to the Gladstone immediately after nine o'clock, and warned her that the launch was going to take place, the tug then proceeded to warn other vessels and then returned to the Gladstone. As to what occurred from that time to the time of the collision the evidence was conflicting, and the result will be found in the judgment.

Butt, Q.C. (with him Myburgh) for the plaintiffs.—If a vessel is lying in a river and refuses to move, another ship is not justified in running into her:

Davies v. Mann, 10 M. & W. 546.

The Gladstone was lawfully there on Aug. 8, and continued there on the 9th, and anything running into her and disturbing her occupation of that part of the river was clearly to blame. Assuming that the notice was sufficient, if the Gladstone had been moving up or down the river, it would have been her duty to keep clear of the launch. But the Gladstone was occupying a position in the river to which she was entitled, and, so long as she continued to occupy it, those in charge of the launch ought not to have proceeded with it to the danger of the Gladstone. At any rate, the latter were bound, if they wished to go on with the launch and the Gladstone was in the way, to provide in due time for the towing away of the Gladstone, and they were to blame for launching the vessel or for proceeding with the launch so far that they could not stop before the Gladstone was out of the way. It was the duty of the owners to have taken such precautionary measures as would have prevented a collision, they ought not to have calculated on the Gladstone moving sufficiently quickly to avoid the launch. They were bound to be certain of safety. The notice was not sufficient:

The Andalusian, 4 Asp. Mar. L. C. 22; 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 204; L. Rep. 2 P. Div. 231.

On the evidence we were ready to move if the tug would have towed us, but she alleged that she had no orders and refused to do so until too late. In any case, the owners of the Gladstone are not responsible, as that vessel was proceeding to sea in charge of a duly licensed pilot:

The City of Cambridge, 2 Asp. Mar. L. C. 193, 239; L. Rep. 3 Adm. & Ec. 161; 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 781; L. Rep. 5 P. C. 451.

Cohen, Q.C. (with him Dr. Phillimore), for the defendants.—In this case every reasonable precaution was taken by the owners of the Cachapool. It is true that in The Andalusian (ubi sup.), the putting up of a notice in a pilot house was held to be insufficient in itself, and that that could not avail as a substitute for other precautions, but in that case no other precautions were taken, while in the present case all other possible precautions were taken in addition to that. The Gladstone was not justified in remaining in that place so as to stop the launch. The tug did not offer a rope on her first visit, but proceeded to warn other vessels, but on the second she offered to tow her away, and would have done so long before the collision, but for the conduct of the Gladstone in refusing a rope, and in refusing to get her anchor up. The Gladstone was not proceeding to sea within the language of the 139th section of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. xcii.) It is plain from the 137th section that the employment of the pilot was optional on the master.

SIR R. PHILLIMORE.—This is an action arising out of a collision which happened in the river Mersey at about twenty-five minutes past ten o'clock on the morning of the 9th Aug. last about abreast of the Tranmere Ferry. The vessels that came into collision were the Gladstone and a launch. The Gladstone was lying at anchor with her head down the river ready to go to sea, and was about abreast of the Tranmere Ferry stage. The launch was a vessel named the Cachapool, and with her stern-post she struck the port side of the Gladstone near the main rigging, and the Gladstone sank almost immediately after the collision. The law with respect to the notice that must be given by vessels about to be launched has been several times discussed in this court, and for that purpose I will only cite the case of The Glengarry, (2 Asp. Mar. L. C. 230; L. Rep. 2 P. Div. 235; 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 341). In that case, in which I gave judgment, I said: "There is no doubt whatever as to the law which has been laid down for a considerable period and always observed in this court, namely, that it is the duty of those who launch a vessel to do so with the utmost precaution, and to give such notice as is reasonable and sufficient to prevent injury happening from that event, and that the burthen of proof lies on them. There is no doubt at all that those who defend the cause of the launch have the obligation cast upon them of showing that it took place in such circumstances as ought with reasonable precautions on the other side, not to have brought her into collision. What is reasonable notice must of course depend very much on the facts of each case." To that law so laid down I intend to adhere in the judgment I am about to deliver in this case. The dates and times in the case are not immaterial. It is pleaded in the 4th article of the statement of claim that at about 10 a.m. the weather was fine and clear, "and the Gladstone was lying at anchor when a tug called the Hercules came to the Gladstone and told those on board her that a launch was going to take place." That is a misstatement of nearly an hour and a quarter, and the time is made very material in the history of this case. It appears that flags were up at seven o'clock, and the vessel was not launched until after ten o'clock, and it is alleged, and has been admitted, that notice was given at nine o'clock, the collision not taking place until 10.30. The questions are, Whether the notice was sufficient, which it is admitted to be; whether there was any misconduct on the part of the launch; and whether the Gladstone was to blame. The Elder Brethren say, and I agree with them, that the conduct of the pilot appears to be reprehensible. He appears to have been quite indifferent as to what was taking place on shore. According to his own showing he had seen the notice posted in the pilot office as to the launch, and on the morning of the collision he came on deck at nine o'clock, and, if he was vigilant, it was his duty to get out of the way, to have got clear, and have been towed over to the north-east, and, if necessary, to have let his starboard anchor go. The Elder Brethren are of opinion that this launch was delayed as long as it was prudent to do so. It has been contended that it was the duty of the owners of the launch to have taken such precautionary measures as would have prevented a collision taking place; but it was well known that the launch was about to take place at high water—that was, at ten minutes past ten o'clock. It appears to us that every reasonable precaution was taken by them, not only by the decorations of the vessel, but by sending notice to all steamers and vessels in the river near the spot that a launch was going to take place. The Hercules tug came up between nine and five minutes past, and warned the Gladstone to get out of the way of the launch, which was about to take place. The Gladstone contends that no offer was made as to being towed and the tug admits that she made no such offer. She went away to look after some other vessels, and returned in about five minutes, and after her return she offered to tow the Gladstone. It appears upon the evidence that when the tug came the second time and offered to take the hawser of the Gladstone, the pilot said, "I will not give it you but the captain may if he likes." From fifteen to twenty minutes was wasted in arguing about the question of towing the vessel out of the way. A question which has been much considered is whether, even after the vessel was taken hold of by the tug at half-past nine or a quarter to ten o'clock there was any contribution to the mischief in consequence of what the Gladstone did, that is, in the interval when the tug was made fast to her. The Elder Brethren are of opinion that if the Gladstone had, on the Hercules first making fast, assisted in the operation by getting her anchor with ordinary speed so as to enable her to be towed away at once, the result would have been different. The Gladstone was obstinate, and if she had allowed the tug to take her to the north-east she would have been clear. For this the Elder Brethren think the Gladstone was to blame. We are of opinion that notice was given of the launch to the Gladstone, and that her conduct was such that she was alone to blame for the collision. With regard to the plea of compulsory pilotage, it does not appear that the Gladstone was a vessel going to sea so as to come within the operation of sect. 139 of the Mersey Docks Act as to pilotage, so that the owners are not relieved upon that ground.

THE BREADALBANE. (a)

Collision—Article 11 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea — Light astern—Binnacle light—Crossing ship—Overtaking ship.

The provisions of article 11 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, that a ship being overtaken by another shall show from her stern a light, are not complied with where the only light astern is the binnacle light in the binnacle.

Semble, that where two ships are on converging courses, with the difference of a point and a half, the one having the other on her quarter four or five points abaft the beam, they are crossing ships, and not within the overtaking rules.

This was an action in rem. instituted by the owners of the cargo laden on board the brig Conrad at the time of her loss, and the master and crew of the said brig proceeding for their effects, against the ship or vessel Breadalbane, her tackle, apparel, and furniture, and against the owners intervening, to recover the damages sustained by the Conrad in a collision which took place between that vessel and the Breadalbane during the night of the 21st Oct. 1881, off the coast of Cornwall, a short distance to the north and west of the Longships.

The case on behalf of the plaintiffs was that the Conrad, a brig of 322 tons register, bound at the time of the collision on a voyage from Cardiff to Stockholm, with a crew of ten hands and a cargo of coal, was shortly before 11 p.m. on the 21st Oct. 1881 off the coast of Cornwall, the Longships Lighthouse bearing about south by east, there being a strong wind from about south-east by south, the tide about two hours flood of the force of about two knots an hour. The Conrad was at the time under fore and main lower topsails, reefed upper main topsail and fore topmast staysail and reefed main staysail, and was sailing close-hauled on the starboard tack, heading about east by north, and making about one and a-half knots an hour. Under these circumstances those on board the Conrad observed a full rigged ship about half a mile off, and bearing about four points abaft the starboard beam. This ship, which was the Breadalbane, had either no lights or bad lights. She was watched, and was seen to be off the wind, and heading for the Conrad, and to be overtaking her, and coming down upon her, with the wind and sea, and a collision was imminent. The helm of the Conrad was put to starboard, and then her lee braces were let go, and her weather main braces were hauled in, and she was paying off. But by this time the Breadalbane, which was very high out of the water, had got near enough to take the wind out of her sails. The fore-topsail of the Breadalbane then blew away, and, though she was hailed to set more canvas, those on board had refused or neglected to do so, and as she drew ahead the main topsail of the Conrad filled, the latter came up a little into the wind, and the Breadalbane with her lee main-yard caught the weather braces of the fore topsail yard, and the two vessels became entangled and remained working against each other in the heavy sea till the Breadalbane had done the Conrad so much damage that she sank with everything on board. Shortly after the two vessels separated, the master and crew having previously saved themselves by getting on board the Breadalbane, and the plaintiffs alleged that those on board the Breadalbane did not keep a good look-out, and improperly neglected to keep out of the way of the Conrad, and that the Breadalbane was undermanned and not under proper control, and was not carrying and did not set proper canvas, and that the collision was wholly caused by those on board the Breadalbane.

On the other hand it was alleged in the statement of defence filed on behalf of the owners of the Breadalbane, that about midnight on the 21st Oct. 1881 their vessel, the Breadalbane, a ship of 1427 tons register, was, whilst in the prosecution of a voyage from Hamburg to Cardiff, in ballast in the English Channel off the Longships, which bore about south, and that at that time it was blowing a strong gale from about south-east. The tide was about flood, running with a force of about two knots an hour, and the Breadalbane, which was under lower main topsail and lower fore topsail, was hove to, close-hauled on the starboard tack, heading about north-east by east half east, making about one knot an hour. Her regulation sidelights were duly exhibited and burning brightly, and a good look-out was being kept on board of her. Under these circumstances the green light of the Conrad was seen at a distance of about a quarter to half a mile, and bearing about five or six points abaft the port beam. The Breadalbane was kept on her course, and a bright light was shown over her stern, and when the Conrad, which was overtaking the Breadalbane, was seen to be approaching on the port quarter of the Breadalbane so as to involve risk of collision, the Conrad was loudly hailed to put her helm hard up, but the Conrad continued to approach, and with her starboard cathead struck the port quarter near the mizen rigging of the Breadalbane, doing her considerable damage, and the defendants alleged that the collision was caused by the Conrad, which was an overtaking ship, improperly neglecting to keep out of the way of the Breadalbane, and counter-claimed for the damage sustained by that vessel in the collision. The evidence produced at the hearing was extremely conflicting, each vessel contending that the other was the overtaking vessel. It appeared that no special light was shown from the stern of the Conrad to satisfy Art. 11 of the Regulations, but the usual binnacle light was burning.

Article 11 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea is as follows:

> A ship which is being overtaken by another shall show from her stern to such last mentioned ship a white light or a flaming light.

C. Russell, Q.C. (with him Myburgh) for the plaintiffs.—The Breadalbane was, on the evidence, an overtaking ship. The binnacle light of the Conrad was amply sufficient to satisfy Art. 11 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea. A white light is all that is required by that rule, and such a light as the binnacle light is sufficient to satisfy it.

Webster, Q.C. (with him Dr. Phillimore).—The Conrad is in this case solely to blame. The evidence shows that she was sailing faster than the Breadalbane, and overtaking her. She had more sail set, and, according to her own story, was heading E. by N., and must have been from one point to one point and a half free from the wind, whereas the Breadalbane was sailing as close to the wind as possible. Even if the vessels were crossing, the Conrad is to blame. Lastly, taking the Conrad's version of the facts, she violated Art. XI. of the regulations by neglecting to show astern a white light in compliance with that rule. The binnacle light was clearly insufficient.

Russell, Q.C. in reply.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is a case of collision, which took place at eleven o'clock at night on the 21st Oct. in this year, between a Swedish brig and a sailing ship off the coast of Cornwall, off the Longships Lighthouse. The direction of the wind was about S.E. by S. The vessels which came into collision were a brig called the Conrad, of 322 tons register, bound from Cardiff to Stockholm, with a crew of ten hands and a cargo of coal, and a ship called the Breadalbane, manned by a crew of seventeen hands, of 1427 tons register, on a voyage from Hamburg to Cardiff, in ballast, which ran into the starboard side of the brig and sank her. The action is brought by the owners of the cargo of the Conrad, and the owners of the cargo contend that the collision was caused by the Breadalbane neglecting to take proper steps to keep out of the way of the Conrad; and, on the other hand, the defendants contend that it was caused by the Conrad not keeping out of the way of the Breadalbane. Now, it appears that the Conrad was heading about E. by N., and was close-hauled on the starboard tack; and that the Breadalbane was heading N.E. by E. ½ E., also close-hauled on the starboard tack. The speed of the vessels was between one and two knots an hour. The Conrad says she saw the Breadalbane about half a mile off, and about four points abaft the starboard beam, and the Breadalbane says she saw the Conrad from a quarter to half a mile off, about five or six points abaft the port beam. The Elder Brethren advise me that, if either of these statements be true, considering there was one and a half points of difference between them, these vessels were crossing and not overtaking ships. In this view of the case the Elder Brethren think that the Breadalbane was alone to blame, because she was to windward, and one and a half points off the wind, whilst the Conrad was close hauled. But this is not the case set up in the pleadings, nor argued before me. The contentions of the Conrad has been that one of the two vessels was overtaking the other, and that therefore the overtaking vessel was bound to keep out of the way. A careful consideration of the evidence leads us to the conclusion that the Breadalbane was, owing to the loss of her sails, brought into close quarters with the other vessel, and came bodily down upon her and sunk her. Now article 11 of the Sailing Rules provides that, "a ship which is being overtaken by another shall show from the stern of the last-mentioned ship a light or a flare-up light." We are clearly of opinion that the binnacle light of the Conrad did not comply with the rule as to carrying a stern light, The rule does not provide that it is to be a fixed stern light, and the placing of a binnacle light cannot satisfy the statute and the rule, because the light itself could not be seen, but only the reflected rays of it. The Conrad, therefore, would be to blame, and cannot recover unless this disobedience of the rule did not contribute to the collision. The Elder Brethren are of opinion that the showing of the light could not have any weight in this case, and could not possibly have contributed to the collision. Looking to the whole of the evidence, that of the Conrad is the most trustworthy. It only remains to say which vessel is to blame, and whether, as is the opinion of the Elder Brethren, they were crossing vessels, or whether they were overtaking vessels as pleaded, we think that the Breadalbane is alone to blame for the collision, and I pronounce accordingly.

MacADAM (app.) v. THE MASTER AND CREW OF THE SAUCY POLLY (resps.); THE MAC.

Salvage—Appeal from justices—Merchant Shipping Act—Mudhopper—Definition of ship—Used in navigation—Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), ss. 2, 460-465.

A mudhopper barge used for dredging a river and not propelled by oars is not used in navigation, and is therefore not a ship within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, ss. 2 and 458, unless she habitually goes to sea, and hence magistrates have no jurisdiction in salvage proceedings against such a vessel under sect. 460 of that Act, unless it is shown that she habitually proceeds to sea.

THIS was an appeal brought by James Nicholl Macadam, the owner of the hopper barge Mac, under the 464th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), from an award of the justices of the peace for the borough of King's Lynn, in the county of Norfolk, made on the 31st Oct. 1881, in pursuance of sects. 460 and 461 of the same Act, adjudicating upon a claim made by Henry Petts, the master of a fishing smack called the Saucy Polly, of the port of Great Yarmouth, and trading from the port of King's Lynn, on behalf of himself, the owner, and the rest of the crew of the said smack, against James Nicholl Macadam, of No. 1 New Bridge-street, Blackfriars, in the city of London, engineer and contractor, for a certain amount of salvage not exceeding 1000*l.* for that on the 15th Oct. 1881 a certain ship, boat, or barge, being a hopper barge called the Mac, belonging to the said James Nicholl Macadam, was in distress, a wreck derelict drifting on the sea, in a place known as the Wash, between the counties of Norfolk and Lincoln, and that the said Henry Petts and seven other fishermen, being the crew of the Saucy Polly, rendered certain services in respect of the said hopper barge by rescuing and conveying the same to the port of King's Lynn; and ordering James Nicholl Macadam, on notice of the award, to pay Henry Petts the sum of 50*l.* for services of every description as aforesaid rendered by himself and the others of the crew of the Saucy Polly.

It appeared from the evidence taken before the justices on behalf of the respondents, the alleged salvors, that on Monday, the 10th Oct. 1881, the dandy fishing smack Saucy Polly, of thirty-one tons register owned by Mathew Chase, of Lynn, in the county of Norfolk, belonging to the port of Yarmouth, and manned by a crew of nine hands all told, left Lynn for the fishing grounds off Boston, and was fishing off Boston until the evening of Thursday, the 15th Oct. On Thursday night a gale sprung up, and the smack was moored in the Wash in a place called the Cots from two to three miles from Boston shore. During the whole of Friday it was blowing a hurricane, the wind veering from W.N.W. to N.N.W., and the smack continued at her moorings. Soon after midnight on Friday the master of the smack was called up, there being then a moderate breeze from the W.N., with a heavy sea, and all hands went on deck. The Mac was then seen by those on board the smack to be drifting from the eastward to the westward, and the crew of the smack then proceeded to the Mac, and finding that she was dragging her anchor, and that there was no one on board, boarded her, and subsequently obtaining a spare anchor and chain from the smack anchored her until the morning and then towed her to Lynn Harbour and moored her there. It further appeared that the barge was a hopper barge, and that she had a rudder and was steerable; that there was a pole which could be used as a mast on which a small sail could be fixed, and that the pole could also be used to hoist a light on; that the barge was seventy-three feet long, and ninety-three feet wide, and constructed of iron plates three-sixteenths of an inch thick, rivetted throughout, air-tight compartments at side, cabin at each end, hopper fitted with lifting doors and apparatus complete; that a vessel like the barge was usually towed, having no propelling power, but that she would drive by wind and tide. She was used for dredging purposes.

On behalf of the appellant the owner of the Mac, witnesses were called to prove that the barge was purchased in Holland for 383*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*, and was towed across, that she was not navigable, and not fitted with masts or sails, and had no propelling power. The rest of the appellant's evidence was directed to the slight amount of danger in which the barge was in the locality in which she was found.

Notice of appeal to the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division was given by the owner of the Mac on the 8th Nov. 1881, and the grounds on which the appellant principally relied were stated to be the following:

1. That the justices had no jurisdiction to hear and adjudicate upon the said claim.

2. That there was in the circumstances of the case no such jurisdiction in any justice.

3. That the hopper barge was not a ship or boat, and was not in distress or a wreck.

4. That the said Henry Petts and the rest of the crew of the Saucy Polly did not render any services to the Mac as alleged.

5. That the said Henry Petts and the rest of the crew of the Saucy Polly are not entitled to any salvage in respect of any act or thing done by them.

6. That if they are so entitled the amount adjudged to be paid to them by the said award is excessive.

The appeal came on for hearing before Sir R. Phillimore on the 1st Feb. 1882.

The following sections of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), were cited in argument :

Part of sect. 2. "Ship" shall include every description of vessel used in navigation not propelled by oars. "Wreck" shall include jetsam, flotsam, logan, and derelict, found in or on the shores of the sea or any tidal water.

Sect. 458. Whenever any boat or ship is stranded or otherwise in distress on the shore of any sea or tidal water situate within the limits of the United Kingdom, and services are rendered by any person,

(1) In assisting such ship or boat ;
(2) In saving the lives of the persons belonging to such ship or boat ;
(3) In saving the cargo or apparel of such ship or boat or any portion thereof ;

And whenever any wreck is saved by any person other than a receiver within the United Kingdom ;

There shall be payable by the owners of such ship or boat, cargo, apparel, or wreck to the person by whom such services or any of them are rendered, or by whom such wreck is saved, a reasonable amount of salvage, together with all expenses properly incurred by him in the performance of such services or the saving of such wreck, the amount of such salvage and expenses (which expenses are hereinafter included under the term salvage) to be determined in case of dispute in manner hereinafter mentioned.

Sect. 460. Disputes with respect to salvage arising within the boundaries of the Cinque Ports shall be determined in the manner in which the same have hitherto been determined; but whenever any dispute arises elsewhere in the United Kingdom between the owners of any such ship, boat, cargo, apparel, or wreck as aforesaid, and the salvors as to the amount of salvage, and the parties to the dispute cannot agree as to the settlement thereof, by arbitration or otherwise, then if the sum claimed does not exceed two hundred pounds, such dispute shall be referred to the arbitration of any two justices of the peace resident as follows ; (that is to say,)

In case of wreck, resident at or near the place where such wreck is found :

In case of services rendered to any ship or boat, or to the cargo, or apparel belonging thereto, resident at or near the place where such ship is lying, or at or near the first port or place in the United Kingdom into which such ship or boat is brought after the occurrence of the accident by reason whereof the claim to salvage arises. . . . .

And every dispute with respect to salvage may be heard and adjudicated upon on the application either of the salvor or of the owner of the property salved, or of their respective agents.

Dr. Phillimore for the appellants.—The Mac is a vessel used for deepening the Witham by dredging, and the evidence in this case shows that no salvage services were rendered to her. She would have taken no harm if left alone, and her owners were rather injured than otherwise by their vessel being taken to King's Lynn. [Evidence read and chart put in.] Further, the magistrates had no jurisdiction in this case. Their jurisdiction is derived solely from the 459th and 460th sections of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 [reads section]. This barge is, on the evidence, neither ship, boat, nor wreck under those sections. To bring the case within these sections there must be either "a wreck" or "a ship or boat stranded, or otherwise in distress on the shore of a sea or tidal water." The Mac was not on the shore. Further, the Mac was not a ship at all :

The C. S. Butler, L. Rep, 4 A. & E. 238 ; 31 L. T. Rep. N.S. 459; 2 Asp. Mar. L. Cas. 408.

The definition of a ship is to be found in the 2nd section of the Merchant Shipping Act. The Mac cannot be said to be a "ship" under that definition, because she is not used in navigation. A chance going to sea will not satisfy this definition ; it must be the real business of the vessel. Again, if the Mac is a ship, the justices of King's Lynn have no jurisdiction. The accident was the drifting, and when brought up by the second anchor she was in safety, and was then lying in safety within the limits of Boston harbour. Under the section, therefore, the dispute ought to have been decided by the Boston and not by the King's Lynn justices.

Bucknill for the respondents.—The Mac is a mudhopper, and it is a matter of general knowledge that she must perpetually be going to sea to deposit the mud she raises from the bottom of the river. She goes to sea then, and she is pulled by steam power, and not propelled by oars, and she is therefore a ship within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act. In Ex parte Ferguson (L. Rep 6 Q. B. 280 ; 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 96 ; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 8) Blackburn, J. says : "What then is the meaning of the word 'ship' in this Act ? It is this, that every vessel that substantially goes to sea is a ship. I do not mean that a little boat going out for a mile or two to sea would be a ship ; but where it is its business really and substantially to go to sea, if it is not propelled by oars, it shall be considered a ship for the purposes of this Act. Whenever the vessel does go to sea, whether it goes to sea for the purposes of fishing or anything else, it would be a ship." The Mac, whose business it is to go to sea constantly to deposit mud is clearly within this definition. As to the jurisdiction of the Lynn justices, it is sufficient to establish their jurisdiction that the vessel was brought into the port of Lynn, it being impossible, on account of the wind, for the Saucy Polly to tow her into Boston. Again, it has been argued that the Mac was not "a ship or boat stranded or otherwise in distress on the shore of a sea or tidal water." This has long ago been decided in favour of the respondents. In The Leda (Swab. 40) Dr. Lushington says : "What did the Legislature mean by the words 'otherwise in distress on the shore of any sea ?' It is clear that the Legislature did not mean stranded only, for that expression precedes it, 'on the shore,' is, as I admit, a very ambiguous term. I do not think that being 'in distress on the shore' means that the property, ship, or goods should be exactly on the shore itself, and I think so for several reasons : first, because if such were the true meaning, it would be difficult to distinguish such case from stranding, and the statute evidently contemplates a case of distress distinguished from stranding : secondly, because, independently of other expressions, which in some degree tend to the same conclusion, the 459th section refers to wreck, and the definition of wreck in the statute, and the nature of wreck so described, shows that it cannot be confined to what has touched the land. For these reasons I have come to the conclusion that the words 'in distress on the shore of any sea' in the 458th section refer to vessels in distress in the vicinity of the shore, provided it be within the limits of the United Kingdom, and that it is not confined to what touches the shore itself."

Dr. Phillimore in reply.—There is nothing in the evidence to show that this vessel substantially goes to sea.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I do not see my way in this case to say that this mudhopper was used in navigation. I think that this is certainly a vessel "not propelled by oars," but there is no evidence before me that she was "used in navigation," as required by the statute. There is no evidence that she habitually went to sea. I must therefore decide that the magistrates had no jurisdiction, and I do so on that ground only, that I have no evidence before me that the vessel was used in navigation. I allow the appeal with costs.

THE R. L. ALSTON.

Collision—Rules for the Navigation of the River Tees, Art. 22—"Interpretation"—"Maximum speed of six miles an hour"—Through the water—Over the ground.

In rule 22 of the Rules for the Navigation of the River Tees, providing that "no steamship shall at any time be navigated in any part of the river at a higher rate of speed than a maximum speed of six miles an hour," the speed mentioned is speed through the water and not over the ground, and a vessel exceeding that speed through the water is to blame if a collision ensues to which such speed contributes.

THIS was an action in rem instituted by the owners of the steamship Lady Mostyn, and by the owners of her cargo against the steamship R. L. Alston, and her owners intervening to recover the damages sustained by the Lady Mostyn in a collision which took place between that vessel and the R. L. Alston between 1 and 2 a.m. on the 6th Nov. 1881 in the river Tees below the fourth buoy light on the east side.

The plaintiffs alleged that at about 1.50 a.m. on the day of the collision their vessel, the Lady Mostyn, a screw steamship of 467 tons register and of 80 horse-power nominal, whilst on a voyage from Middlesbrough to Llanelly with a cargo of pig iron, and manned by a crew of fourteen hands all told, and in charge of a Tees pilot, was proceeding down the river Tees on her way to sea, the weather at the time being fine with a moderate breeze from the west-south-west. The statement of claim then proceeded: The tide was about the last quarter flood, and of the force of about three knots an hour; and the Lady Mostyn was proceeding down the river, and keeping on the starboard side of the river, which was her proper side. Her regulation and masthead lights were duly exhibited, burning brightly, and a good look-out was being kept. At such time, and when the Lady Mostyn was in the vicinity of the sixth buoy beacon, and making about five knots over the ground, the red and masthead lights of a steamer, which afterwards proved to be the R. L. Alston, were seen about two miles distant, and bearing about two points on the starboard bow of the Lady Mostyn. As the Lady Mostyn was rounding the bend of the river in the vicinity of the fourth buoy light the R. L. Alston opened her green light on the port bow withal, and the Lady Mostyn, having rounded and steadied the R. L. Alston shut in her green light, and approached with her masthead and red lights only open as if intending to pass on the port side of the Lady Mostyn as she could and should have done, but she suddenly opened her green light, and approached so as to render a collision imminent, and although the engines of the Lady Mostyn were stopped and reversed full speed, and her helm hard-aported, the R. L. Alston, which just before the collision shut in her red light, at great speed, with her stem struck the port side of the Lady Mostyn a little forward of her fore-rigging, and did her so much damage that her master was compelled to run her aground opposite the place of collision to prevent her sinking in deep water; and the plaintiffs alleged that a good look-out was not kept on board the R. L. Alston, and that she was not navigated on the starboard side of mid-channel, although it was safe and practicable, contrary to article 21 of the Regulations, that her helm was improperly starboarded before the collision, and that she did not stop and reverse in due time, and further that she improperly neglected to comply with the provisions contained in clauses 17, 18, and 19 of the bye-laws made by the River Tees Conservancy, and that the collision was caused by the neglect or default of those on board the R. L. Alston.

The defendants on their side pleaded that shortly before 2 a.m. on the day of the collision, their vessel, the R. L. Alston a steamship of 452 tons nett and 900 tons gross register, bound on a voyage from Riga to Middlesbrough, with a crew of fifteen hands and a cargo of sleepers, was in the river Tees in charge of a licensed Tees pilot. The wind was about south-west, a moderate breeze. The weather was fine but hazy, the tide was last quarter flood, of the force of about one knot an hour. The R. L. Alston, under steam, was proceeding up on the north or starboard side of the river, heading about south-west half south, and between three and four knots an hour. Her regulation lights were duly exhibited and burning brightly, and a good look-out was being kept on board her. In these circumstances, and as the R. L. Alston had got up to about the third buoy, and was proceeding onwards to the fourth buoy, those on board of her observed the green and masthead lights of the Lady Mostyn about a mile off, and bearing about south-west by west. The R. L. Alston kept on her course along the north side. The Lady Mostyn drew nearer and opened her red right, and the helm of the R. L. Alston was put hard aport, but the Lady Mostyn rapidly approached the R. L. Alston, and a collision occurred, the port midships of the Lady Mostyn rather before the bridge striking the R. L. Alston and forcing the R. L. Alston ashore on the north side and doing her great damage, and the defendants alleged that the Lady Mostyn did not keep a good look-out, and that she was on her wrong side of the river, and that her helm was not ported sufficiently or in due time, and that she disobeyed rules 17 and 18 of the bye-laws and rules in force for the navigation of the river Tees, and that the collision was caused by the neglect or default of the Lady Mostyn, and the defendants counter-claimed against the owners of the

The following clauses of the bye-laws of the River Tees Conservancy were cited in the course of the case:—

17. Every ship navigating the river shall keep the starboard side, so that the port helm may always be applied to clear vessels proceeding in the opposite direction.

18. Every steamship, when approaching another ship on an opposite course, or from an opposite course or from an opposite direction shall, before approaching within thirty yards, slacken her speed, and keep as near as possible to the starboard side of the river, so as to afford the greatest facility for passing the approaching ship.

22. No steamship shall at any time be navigated in any part of the river at a higher rate of speed than a maximum speed of six miles per hour.

23. Whenever there is a fog no steamship shall be navigated in any part of the river at a higher rate of speed than three miles per hour.

The plaintiffs' evidence corroborated the plaintiffs' statement of claim as to the fact that the tide was running up at the rate of three knots per hour, and that the Lady Mostyn was going down the river at the rate of five knots over the ground, which was equivalent to eight knots through the water; and at the close of it Webster, Q.C., for the defendants, submitted that the Lady Mostyn was to blame thereon for the collision for a breach of rule 22 of the bye-laws of the Tees Conservancy, which prescribed that no vessel should at any time be navigated in any part of the river at a higher rate of speed than a maximum rate of six miles an hour. It was then agreed that this point should be argued before the defendants' witnesses were called, and thereupon Webster, Q.C. (with him Dr. Phillimore) for the defendants.—In this 22nd rule a rate of six miles per hour must mean six miles per hour through the water. The rule obviously intends to establish a fixed rate of speed, and it could not have been the intention of the conservancy that vessels should have to watch the tide, and be continually increasing and decreasing their speed. The usual and only meaning of such a phrase as six miles per hour with respect to ships is six miles through the water.

Butt, Q.C. (with him Myburgh) for the plaintiffs.—The meaning of these rules must be gathered from local circumstances, and from the other rules. The evidence is that the tide in the Tees sometimes runs up at the rate of four knots an hour. Now, if the meaning of the rule is "six miles an hour through the water," a vessel meeting this tide could only go at the rate of two miles an hour over the ground, while another vessel with the tide could come towards her at the rate of ten miles an hour without disobeying the rule. This is palpably absurd, and the true meaning is, "six miles over the ground." Vessels need not be always altering their speed. The rule merely gives a maximum speed which must not be exceeded. It is further clear from the following rule, the 23rd, which provides for fog, that the meaning must be over the ground. That rule provides a maximum speed of three miles an hour. Consequently, if the meaning were "through the water," a vessel could not advance at all against a four-knot tide, and vessels going with the tide could approach vessels at anchor at a speed of seven knots an hour. The rule could not have had this intention. Further, the evidence shows that we had by stopping and reversing reduced our speed to six knots in sufficient time before the collision to satisfy this rule, even if the meaning is "through the water."

Webster, Q.C. in reply.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—In this case the Lady Mostyn was going at the rate of eight miles an hour a few seconds before the collision, whereas clause 22 of the bye-laws of the river Tees Conservancy is as follows: No steamship shall at any time be navigated in any part of the river at a higher rate of speed than a maximum rate of six miles per hour. It is contended, however, that although she was going through the water at a speed of eight miles, yet as she was meeting a tide running at the rate of three knots she was only going at the rate of five miles an hour over the ground, and was therefore not infringing the rule I have read. I think I must put the natural construction upon the words of the rule. The rule was framed by the Tees Conservancy with reference to the local circumstances to which it had to be applied, and that which the framers of the rule had in their minds was, I think, that the velocity of the speed should not exceed six miles an hour, and that vessels should not be navigated so that their maximum speed should exceed six miles an hour with reference to other vessels navigating in the same fluid. The rule cannot mean that vessels have to decrease their speed as the tide increases, and I am therefore led to the conclusion that the framers of the clause contemplated going through the water, and not over the ground. I therefore pronounce that the Lady Mostyn did in this case contribute to the collision.

Webster, Q.C.—Under these circumstances the defendants admit that they are also to blame, and offer no evidence.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I pronounce both vessels to blame.

THE DOUGLAS.

Damage—Collision—Wreck—Possession and control—Liability of owner—Conservators—Public nuisance—Private injury—Duty to give warning.

Where a vessel, through the negligence of those in charge of her becomes a wreck and a dangerous obstruction in a navigable river, it is the duty of those originally in charge of her, though not actually in possession at the time, to take steps to warn approaching vessels of her position.

Semble, this duty attaches until the wreck is removed or taken possession of by competent authority.

The D., in consequence of a collision caused by the negligence of those in charge of her, sank in the river Thames. Some hours afterwards the M. N. ran into the wreck, which was not marked in any way. The owners of the D. were held to blame, and not to be excused by reason of the impossibility of any person remaining on board the wreck, or by having given notice of the wreck to the proper authority.

THIS was an action in rem to recover damages sustained by the s.s. Mary Nixon, in consequence of a collision between that vessel and the steamship Douglas, whilst the latter was lying sunken in Gravesend reach in the river Thames about midnight on the 26th-27th Oct. 1881.

About 6 p.m. on the day previous to the collision in question in this action, the Douglas, while proceeding down the river Thames, had come into collision with a screw steamer called the Duke of Buckingham whilst the latter was lying at anchor, and subsequently had been in collision with another screw steamer called the Orion. In consequence of these collisions the Douglas had sunk in the river. Each of the vessels, Duke of Buckingham and Orion, had brought actions against the Douglas in respect of the said collisions, and the Douglas had been found alone to blame in respect of each of them; and it was formally admitted for the purposes of this action that the collision with the Duke of Buckingham, which caused the Douglas to sink, was caused by the negligence of those on board the Douglas.

The statement of claim alleged (inter alia).

7. No lights or warning of any sort were exhibited on or near the wreck of the Douglas, and there was nothing to warn those on board the Mary Nixon of the said wreck.

13. The Douglas, in the position in which she sank, was an obstruction to navigation, and was a source of danger to vessels navigating the river.

14. The plaintiff says that in the circumstances aforesaid it became and was the duty of the defendants to warn approaching vessels of the said wreck.

15. The defendants were guilty of negligence in causing their vessel to become an obstruction and a danger to navigation in the river.

16. The defendants were guilty of negligence in not taking means to warn approaching vessels of the obstruction aforesaid.

To these allegations the defendants made the following defence:

4. As soon as possible after the said collision (with the Duke of Buckingham) a white light was placed in the main rigging of the Douglas as a warning to approaching vessels, which light remained there until the Douglas sank.

5. After the Donglas sank, and before the Mary Nixon struck upon the sunken wreck of the Douglas, a reasonable time to exhibit lights or a warning on or near the wreck of the Douglas had not elapsed.

6. The Mary Nixon was warned of the fact that the Douglas lay sunk in the river, and of her position, by hailing from another vessel in sufficient time to have enabled her to avoid the Douglas.

8. As an alternative defence the defendants say that at the time when the Mary Nixon struck the Douglas, the Douglas was a wreck lying sunk in the bed of the river Thames, and that before and at the time when the Mary Nixon struck the Douglas, the defendants had wholly ceased to have the possession, management, and control of the same.

On these defences the plaintiffs joined issue, and the cause came on for trial on the 19th April, when witnesses were examined on both sides.

Butt, Q.C. and Bruce for the plaintiffs, owners of the Mary Nixon.—When a vessel is, in consequence of her own default or negligence, sunk in such a place as the Gravesend Reach of the river Thames, it is the duty of her owner and his servants to take measures (a) to prevent what, if no measures are taken, is almost inevitable, the collision of other vessels with the wreck. This is, in fact, practically admitted by the defendants. When they say in paragraph 5 of the defence that a reasonable time had not elapsed, it implies that if a reasonable time had elapsed it was their duty to take some measures. If the only question is whether, considering the time which had elapsed, it was reasonable or not for the defendants to have taken some steps, surely in a place like this, close to Gravesend, it is reasonable to suppose that a light might have been exhibited from some parts of the masts which were above water as a warning to vessels, or a boat stationed to give such warning, seeing that the original accident had taken place six hours before the one which has given rise to this action. The alternative defence of paragraph 8 (ubi sup.) cannot avail the defendants; there was no such abandonment of the Douglas in this case as is contemplated by those words on which the defendants rely. Here it is obvious that, though temporarily dispossessed of the possession of the ship by the fact of her being under water, there was an animus revertendi when she should be raised. The vessel was neither a derelict in a legal sense nor abandoned as a total loss to the underwriters, nor parted with, as by a sale, to any other persons. There is no direct authority for saying that under such circumstances as these a shipowner is bound to mark the position of a wreck; but such authority as there is, when properly considered, tends in that direction, as indeed common sense, apart from any direct authority, must require. In Brown v. Mallett (5 C. B. 599) it was held, indeed, that when a vessel was sunk by accident, and without any default in the owner or his servants in a navigable river, there was no obligation on the owner to take steps to make its position known; but that was on the ground that what had happened to the owner was a private disaster, giving rise possibly to a public injury, but for which disaster he was not responsible, as it happened without default on his part: but that is not the case here, where the public injury is caused by the wrongful act of the defendant in the first instance. No doubt, when the possession of the wreck and its control are taken out of the hands of the defendant by the conservancy under their statutory powers, his duty to mark its position would cease; but that event did not occur till the next morning, some ten hours after the accident happened. Even when the accident causing the obstruction is inevitable, and not as in this case the result of the wrongful act of the owner of the ship creating the obstruction, the owner of the ship is bound to give warning of the obstruction: White v. Crisp (10 Ex. 312; 23 L. J. 317, Ex.) It is clear from both the cases cited that the actual physical possession of the ship is not the limit of the proprietor's liability to give warning, for it is said in Brown v. Mallett, and quoted with approval in White v. Crisp, that "his liability is the same whether his vessel be in motion or stationary, floating or aground, under water or above it; for in all these cases the vessel may continue to be in his possession, and under his management and control." The cases only show that when the proprietor has divested himself altogether of his property, either by sale or abandonment, or has been dispossessed either temporarily or permanently by proper authority, that his liability ceases, and this is consistent with Harmond v. Pearson (1 Camp. 515). Further, it must be noted here that the cause being in rem, the defendants, by appearing to protect their interest in the ship, admit that they had not abandoned her at the time. For the plaintiffs it is immaterial who was the person responsible for leaving the wreck in the position in which it was, and not taking steps to warn others. Our suit is against that person whoever he was, and the defendants by appearing to defend admit the property, and therefore the responsibility to have been theirs.

(a) The following rule of the Thames Conservancy appears to prescribe the measures to be taken in such cases: Order in Council, 18th March, 1880, rule 9: "All vessels when employed to mark the positions of wrecks or other obstructions shall exhibit two bright lights, placed horizontally not less than six nor more than twelve feet apart."—[REP.]

Myburgh, Q.C. and Bucknill for the defendants. —If the court should be satisfied that the Mary Nixon was hailed by someone before coming into collision with the wreck, she cannot recover from us, even if we were not the people who hailed her. But the only duty to mark the position of a wreck is of a public nature: (Brown v. Mallett, ubi sup.) That being so, it is immaterial what was the cause of the nuisance; the only question is the existence of the nuisance. It can therefore make no difference who was to blame in the first instance for the wreck of the Douglas. The only question is, whose duty was it, if it was the duty of anyone, to mark the position of the wreck? It was our duty, no doubt, so long as we were in possession, and we fulfilled it; but when we were dispossessed by the vessel sinking, that duty ceased so far as we were concerned, devolving then on the Thames Conservancy in the interests of the public:

The Ettrick, 6 P. D. 127, sub nom. Prehn v. Bailey and another, 4 Asp. M. L. C. 428, 465; 45 L. T. Rep. N. S. 399.

Whatever duty then devolved on us was satisfied by our exhibiting a light whilst we remained in possession, and as soon as we were forced to abandon possession, giving notice of the fact to the proper authorities, the Thames Conservancy. For any accident which happened before the Conservancy took charge, no one is liable, supposing the Conservancy to have shown due diligence; it is a public misfortune. The legal liability is an incident attaching to the control of the vessel: (White v. Crisp, ubi sup.) Negligence in causing the wreck has nothing to do with the question of liability, because the negligence is not the proximate cause of the accident.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 25.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is an action of damage in consequence of a collision between the screw steamship Mary Nixon and another screw steamer, the Douglas, that occurred in Gravesend Reach, at midnight, on the 27th Oct. 1881. The Douglas had previously come into collision with the steamship Duke of Buckingham, and had in consequence, sunk. It is admitted for the purposes of the case that the collision with the Duke of Buckingham was due to the negligent navigation of the Douglas. At the time of the collision with the Mary Nixon, the Douglas was lying sunk in the river, about mid-channel, with one of her masts above the water. The contention of the Mary Nixon was, that it was the duty of the defendants, the owners of the Douglas, to warn approaching vessels of the wreck, and that no such warning was given, and therefore that she was responsible for the damage. The defence of the Douglas is, that a white light was placed in her main rigging within a reasonable time; that the Mary Nixon was warned by hailing from another vessel in sufficient time to enable her to avoid the Douglas; and, as an alternative defence, that the defendants had wholly ceased to have possession, management, or control of the Douglas and therefore were not responsible. To deal first with the facts: I am of opinion that no sailing on the part of the Douglas is proved. I have consulted the Trinity Masters, and I agree with them in their opinion, that a reasonable time had elapsed between the collision with the Duke of Buckingham and the collision with the Mary Nixon for giving some warning to approaching vessels of the position of the Douglas, and that the means for such warnings could have been obtained without difficulty. It appears that a light was put in the main rigging of the Douglas after her collision with the Duke of Buckingham, which light remained till the Douglas sank; but at the time of the collision with the Mary Nixon there appears to have been no light exhibited and no kind of warning given. I have now to deal with the question of law arising on these facts. The plaintiffs contend that the Douglas, having had her lights knocked out by the previous collision, was bound to adopt some measures of warning, by lights, or otherwise, to approaching vessels. The defendants say that, there being no persons left on board the Douglas, it was not the duty of any private person to give such warning, but that it became a matter for the intervention of public authority; that, during the period between the crew leaving the ship and the intervention of public authority, the risk, however unfortunate, must be borne by the public; and that in this case, although there was an animus revertendi, still the control and possession of the ship had been given up. I confess I listened to this argument with great alarm. The consequences of such a doctrine are fraught with danger to the interests of navigation, and also to human life. It is, however, not necessary, with the view which I take of this case, to decide the exact point where the private obligation ends, and that of the public authority begins. Two cases were relied upon, Brown v. Mallett (5 C. B. 599), and White v. Crisp (10 Ex. 312; 23 L. J. 317, Ex.). The principles of law applicable to cases of this description appear to me to be contained in the judgment of Alderson, B. in White v. Crisp, there, citing the opinion of Maule, J. in Brown v. Mallet, he says, "that it is the duty of a person using a navigable river with a vessel of which he is possessed, and has the control and management, to use reasonable skill and care to prevent mischief to others," and he adds that "his liability is the same whether his vessel be in motion or stationary, floating or aground, under water or above it." Now, in my opinion, it has been proved that the possession, management, and control of the Douglas was not abandoned by the defendants and the master and crew; and, consequently, that their duty continued up to the time of the collision with the Mary Nixon. I must therefore pronounce for the plaintiffs, with costs.

THE CLAN GORDON.

Demurrer — Compulsory pilotage — Public Act— Private Act—Repeal—Incorporation—10 Vict. c. 27, ss. 5, 74; 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 388; 27 & 28 Vict. c. cclxvii., ss. 2, 39.

A section in a private Act cannot by implication repeal a provision of the common law or of a public statute.

A private Act rendering the owner of a ship, &c. liable for any damage caused, permitted, or suffered to be done wilfully or carelessly by such ship, &c., by any person having the care of such ship, &c., does not render the owner liable where the damage has been done by the negligence of a pilot whose employment on board such ship was, at the time and place, compulsory by law.

Semble, for the purposes of such a private Act a pilot employed by compulsion of law is not a person having the care of the ship on board which he is so employed.

THIS was a demurrer to a portion of a statement of defence.

The action was brought in rem by the New Brighton Pier Company against the steamship Clan Gordon for damages done to the New Brighton Pier by the Clan Gordon coming into collision with it on the 4th Oct. 1881.

The plaintiff company is incorporated under an Act of Parliament, the material parts of which are set out below in the statement of claim, paragraph 2 of which is as follows:

2. By sect. 39 of the said Act, if any person having the care of any ship, boat, barge or other vessel, should wilfully or carelessly cause, permit, or suffer any damage or injury to be done to the said pier or works by any such ship, boat, barge, or other vessel, then and in every such case the owner or owners of every such ship, boat, barge, or other vessel was made answerable, and liable to make satisfaction to the plaintiff for all such damage or injury.

Then follow allegations that the Clan Gordon by the negligence of those in charge of her came into violent contact with the pier, doing the damage complained of. To this claim the statement of defence pleaded (inter alia):

2. The defendants deny that this damage was permitted or suffered by any person having the care of the Clan Gordon within the meaning of the statute relied upon in the second paragraph of the statement of claim.

3. The defendants also say that before and at the time of the said collision, and at the time when the said damage was caused, the Clan Gordon was in the charge of a duly licensed pilot, whom the owners and master of the Clan Gordon were bound by law to employ, and put their vessel in charge of within the meaning of sect. 74 of the Harbour, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847.

4. The defendants further say that the collision and damage were not caused or contributed to by any negligence of the defendants, or of their servants, or of any person other than the duly licensed pilot, who was, as aforesaid, by compulsion of law, in charge of the Clan Gordon, and who was directing and controlling the management and navigation of the Clan Gordon. They admit that the collision and damage were caused by the Clan Gordon being brought improperly near the plaintiffs' pier, or by her being brought so near at an improper rate of speed; but they deny all the other allegations in paragraph 5 of the statement of claim.

To these three paragraphs the plaintiffs demurred,

On the grounds that the said pilot was a person having the care of the Clan Gordon within the meaning of sect. 37 of the New Brighton Pier Act 1864, and that the defendants, as owners of the Clan Gordon, are answerable for the damage carelessly caused by him, and on other grounds sufficient in law to sustain this demurrer.

April 25.—The demurrer came on for argument. The enactments on which the argument principally turned were the following:

The Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847 (10 Vict. c. 27).

Sect. 5. Form in which portion of this Act may be incorporated in other Acts.—For the purpose of incorporating part only of this Act with any Act hereafter to be passed, it shall be enough to describe the clauses of this Act with respect to any matter in the words introductory to the enactment with respect to such matter, and to enact that the clauses so described, or that this Act with the exception of the clauses so described, shall be incorporated with such Act, and thereupon all the clauses of this Act so incorporated shall, save so far as they shall be expressly varied or excepted by such Act, form part of such Act, and such Act shall be construed as if such clauses were set for the time with reference to the matter to which such Act relates.

Sect. 74. Owner of vessel answerable for damage to works.—The owner of every vessel or floating timber shall be answerable to the undertakers for any damage done by such vessel or floating timber, or by any person employed about the same, to the harbour, dock, or pier, or the quays or works connected therewith, and the master (a) or person having the charge of such vessel or floating timber through whose wilful act or negligence any such damage is done shall also be liable to make good the same; and the undertaker may detain any such vessel or floating timber until sufficient security has been given for the amount of damage done by the same; provided always, that nothing herein contained shall extend to impose any liability for any such damage upon the owner of any vessel where such vessel shall at the time when such damage is caused be in charge of a duly licensed pilot, whom such owner or master is bound by law to employ and put his vessel in charge of.

Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104).

Sect. 388. (b) Limitation of liability of owner where pilotage is compulsory.—No owner or master of any ship shall be answerable to any person whatever for any loss or damage occasioned by the fault or incapacity of any qualified pilot acting in charge of such ship within any district where the employment of such pilot is compulsory by law.

The New Brighton Pier Act 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. cclxvii.)

Sect. 2. 8 & 9 Vict. cc. 16 and 18; 10 & 11 Vict. c. 27; 23 & 24 Vict. c. 106; and 26 & 27 Vict. c. 118, incorporated.—The Companies Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, and part 1 of the Companies Clauses Act 1863, the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, with respect to the purchase of land by agreement only, the Lands Clauses Consolidation Acts Amendment Act, 1860, and the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847 shall be incorporated with and form part of this Act, save and so far as any of the clauses and provisions of those Acts and parts respectively are expressly varied or excepted by or are inconsistent with the Act: Provided nevertheless, that the sections of the last-mentioned Act numbered 16, 17, 18, 19, and 25 shall not be enforced for the purposes of the Act, except in so far as the same may be called into operation by the Lord High Admiral of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or the commissioners for executing the office of Lord High Admiral aforesaid.

(a) Master, by the definition clause (sect. 2), shall be understood to mean the person having the command or charge of the vessel for the time being.

(b) Sect. 388 is the final section of Part V. of the Act, the application of which part is by its first section (sect. 330) limited to the United Kingdom.

Sect. 39. Shipowners to be answerable for damage done by their servants.—If any person having the care of any ship, boat, barge, or other vessel, shall wilfully or carelessly cause, permit, or suffer any damage or injury to be done to the said pier or works by any such ship, boat, barge, or other vessel, then and in every such case the owner or owners of every such ship, boat, barge, or other vessel shall be answerable and liable to make satisfaction to the company for all such damage or injury.

W. R. Kennedy (with him Webster, Q.C.), for the plaintiffs, the New Brighton Pier Company, in support of the demurrer.—Compulsory pilotage is no legal defence in this case, for two reasons: (1) The object of sect. 39 of the New Brighton Pier Act was to override the general law of compulsory pilotage. Had it not been so it would have been sufficient to incorporate sect. 74 of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847 simply, and this would have been effected by sect. 2 of the New Brighton Act; but sect. 74 of the general Act is inconsistent with sect. 39 of the New Brighton Act, and therefore by the operation of sect. 2 of the New Brighton Act is excepted from the general incorporation of the general Act with the local Act. (2) The pilot has the charge or direction of the navigation of a ship, but the master continues at all times to have the care of her. There is nothing unreasonable in the proposition that the pier being in a sense public property, or, at all events, a work for the benefit of the public, should be entitled to a protection which is denied to private property. The words of the local Act of 1864 are plain and obvious, and in their natural sense would cover damage done by a ship no matter who is in fault for that damage, and the shipowner may have his remedy over against the pilot if he (the shipowner) pays in such a case in the first instance. No doubt the defendants will rely on the case of The Conservators of the River Thames v. Hall and another (L. Rep. 3 C. P. 415; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 361; 3 Mar. L. C. O. S. 73), but that was on a section of a local Act very differently worded from the one in this Act on which we rely. No douht a pilot is a "person employed in or about" the ship; but, as the relationship of master and servant does not exist between the compulsory pilot and the "master or owner" of the ship, therefore the summary method of recovery over did not apply to a compulsory pilot, and therefore he was held not to be included in the clause on which the case was decided. It appears, from the judgment of Lord Blackburn in The River Wear Commissioners v. Adamson (3 Asp. M. L. C. 242, 521; 2 App. Cas. 743; 37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 543), that, if the special provision of the Merchant Shipping Act had not been inserted in sect. 74 of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, compulsory pilotage would have been no defence in the case then under consideration, notwithstanding the common law doctrine of agency, and the special provision of sect. 388 of the Merchant Shipping Act. For certain purposes the master remains responsible, notwithstanding the presence of a compulsory pilot, as e.g., when the duty is laid on the "person in charge" to stand by after a collision (3 Mar. L. C. O. S. 242; The Queen, L. Rep. 2 A. & E. 354; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 855), and it is his duty to supersede the pilot if incompetent or incapable: (The Duke of Manchester, 4 Notes of Cases, 582.) The act of running down a pier is an act of such gross negligence or incompetency that it would be the duty of the captain to supersede the pilot, and prevent such a thing being done, and therefore there is nothing inequitable in requiring the owner to pay for damage which the master could and ought to have prevented.

Butt, Q.C., Cohen, Q.C., M'Leod, Q.C., and Dr. Phillimore, contra.—The general Act is to be incorporated (sect. 5) except where "expressly varied or excepted." Sect. 74 of that Act is not "expressly varied or excepted" by sect. 39 of the private Act, and therefore they must be read together, and the exception of compulsory pilotage remains. Doubtful words in a private Act cannot repeal a general enactment without express words; the section may not have any reference to the case of a pilot at all. The marginal note speaks only of servants. It may have been enacted to render owners liable for the "wilful" misconduct of their servants, for which, without it, they would not be so liable:

The Druid, 1 W. Rob. 391;
The Ida, Lush 4; 1 L. T. Rep. N. S. 417.

The irresponsibility of an owner where a pilot is employed by compulsion of law exists in the common law, and is declared by sect. 388 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and it is not competent for a private local Act to repeal a general public Act. Besides, a pilot is not a "person having the care of the ship," and therefore the section is not applicable at all when the damage is done by the negligence or default of the pilot. To bring the case within the enactment it would be necessary to show negligence on the part of the captain, or of some person for whose due performance of his duties the captain is responsible. In any event the demurrer is bad as a question of pleading so far as it relates to paragraph 4 of the defence.

Kennedy in reply.—A section of an Act passed in 1847 cannot be prospective so as to govern the principles on which the Act in which it occurs is to be incorporated in Acts passed by future Parliaments. The principle of incorporation laid down by it is general, and in 1864 the Legislature, in passing the New Brighton Act, allowed a somewhat diffent principle of incorporation to be adopted for the purposes of that Act. Sect. 39 of the private Act does not repeal sect. 74 of the general Act, nor sect. 388 of the Merchant Shipping Act, except locally, for vessels actually coming into contact with the pier. If the Act is to be read as if the master was the person referred to alone as having the care of the ship, then the owners would not be responsible for damages occasioned by the negligence of a look-out man, or a helmsman, or of an inferior officer.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I am of opinion that this demurrer cannot be sustained, and that it must be overruled. In order to sustain it it was necessary for the counsel, who has argued this case with great ability, to contend that by implication sect. 388 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854

(17 and 18 Vict. c. 104) and sect. 24 of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847 (10 Vict. c. 27) were repealed so far as the New Brighton Pier is concerned. That is a conclusion to which the court would be very loth to come, and very anxious to avoid if possible. I am of opinion that sect. 74 of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847 remains unaffected by this private Act, the New Brighton Pier Act 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. clxvii.); and, further that the argument of Mr. Butt with respect to the description of the person having the care of a ship, boat, barge, or vessel does not properly or necessarily apply to a pilot. I am of opinion that the argument, which, speaking in general terms, is neither more nor less than that the general law upon the question of compulsory pilotage, and sect. 74 of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847 are repealed by implication by sect. 39 of the New Brighton Pier Act, cannot be sustained, and I dismiss the demurrer with costs.

THE VESTA.

Compulsory pilotage—Foreign ships—Differential dues—6 Geo. 4, s. 125, ss. 59, 60; 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, ss. 332, 333, 358, Table U.; 24 & 25 Vict. c. 47, ss. 2, 10, 11, 14; 39 & 40 Vict. c. 36, s. 141 —Orders in Council 18*th Feb.* 1854 and 1*st Nov.* 1862.

Pilotage is compulsory on a foreign ship carrying passengers and trading between London and ports between Boulogne and the Baltic.

The Order in Council of the 18*th Feb.* 1854, extending the exemptions from compulsory pilotage, applies only to British vessels.

A charge for compulsory pilotage on a foreign ship is not a differential due within the meaning of the Harbours and Passing Tolls Act 1861, and is therefore not abolished by that Act.

The Hanna (2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 434; L. Rep. 1 Ad. & Ecc. 283; 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 334) followed.

THIS was an argument of a question of law arising in the case which had been ordered under Order XXXIV.

The question was whether the Vesta was or was not in charge of a pilot by compulsion of law.

The Vesta is a German steamship of considerable size. At the time in question she was in Blackwall Reach in the river Thames, bound on a voyage from London to Hamburg with a cargo, and also with passengers on board.

Under these circumstances, and whilst she had a duly licensed Trinity House pilot on board, she came into collision with the barge Audacious; and this action was brought against her to recover the damages sustained in the collision, to which the defence of compulsory pilotage was (inter alia) set up.

The argument turned principally upon the construction of the following enactments:

The Pilotage Law Amendment Act 1825 (6 Geo. 4, c. 125).

Sect. 59. Masters of certain ships may pilot same, so long as not assisted by any unlicensed pilots.—Provided always, that for and notwithstanding anything in the Act contained, the master of any collier, or any ship or vessel trading to Norway, or to the Cattegat or Baltic, or round the North Cape, or into the White Sea, on their inward or outward voyages, or of any constant trader in coals from the ports between Boulogne inclusive and the Baltic (all such ships and vessels having British register, and coming up either (a) by the North Channel, but not otherwise), or of any Irish trader using the navigation of the rivers Thames and Medway, or of any ship or vessel employed in the regular coasting trade of the kingdom, or of any ship or vessel wholly laden with stone from Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, Sark, or Man, and being the production thereof, or of any ship or vessel not exceeding the burthen of sixty tons, and having a British register, except as hereinafter provided, or of any other ship or vessel whatever whilst the same is within the limits of the port or place to which she belongs, the same not being a port or place in relation to which particular provision hath heretofore been made by any Act or Acts of Parliament or by any charter or charters for the appointment of pilots, shall and may lawfully, and without being subject to any of the penalties of this Act imposed, conduct or pilot his own ship or vessel when and so long as he shall conduct or pilot the same without the aid or assistance of any unlicensed pilot or other person or persons than the ordinary crew of the said ship or vessel.

Sect. 60. His Majesty may authorise certain ships to be conducted without pilots, &c.—Provided also, that from and after the passing of this Act it shall and may be lawful for His Majesty, by and with the advice of his Privy Council, or by any order or orders in council, to permit and authorise ships and vessels not exceeding the burthen of sixty tons, and not having a British register, to be piloted and conducted without having a duly licensed pilot on board, upon the same terms and conditions as are by this Act imposed on British ships and vessels not exceeding the like burthen.

Order in Council, 18*th Feb.* 1854. (a)

Regulation for the extension of the exemptions from compulsory pilotage now existing under the provisions of the 59th section of the Act 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, submitted by the Corporation of the Trinity House for the con-

(a) Though not directly referred to in the argument it may be as well to note that the order in Council of the 18th Feb. 1854 was made under the provisions of sect. 21 of the Pilotage Amendment Act 1853, after reciting which section, given below, it proceeds to recite that the Trinity House have submitted rates of pilotage in lieu of those in force under 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, and likewise certain regulations for the extension of exemptions from compulsory pilotage then existing, and for the conduct of the pilot service of the port of London, it then recites that such rules and regulations are reasonable, and approves them; then follow the regulations given in the text. Sect. 9 of the same Act appears also to be germane to the subject of differential dues, and is therefore also appended.—[REP.]

The Pilotage Law Amendment Act 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 129).

Sect. 9. Rates on foreign vessels claiming benefit; reciprocity treaties.— . . . . All rates or prices which may be lawfully demanded or received by any pilots under the government of the said Trinity House for the pilotage of foreign vessels, the owners, masters, agents, or consignees of which claim, by virtue of any treaty of reciprocity, to be entitled to the privileges of British vessels, shall be recoverable from the same persons, in the same manner, and subject to the same conditions from whom and subject to which pilotage rates on British vessels are recoverable under the 44th and 45th sections of the said Act (6 Geo. 4, c. 125).

Sect. 21. Power to pilotage authorities with consent of Her Majesty to make and extend exemptions from compulsory pilotage.—It shall be lawful for every pilotage authority, by regulation or bye-law made with the consent of Her Majesty in Council, from time to time to do sideration of Her Majesty in Council, pursuant to 16 & 17 Vict. c. 129, s. 21.

The masters of the undermentioned ships and vessels shall, subject to the provisions contained in the 59th section of the Act of Parliament 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, in respect of the employment of unlicensed persons, be exempted from compulsory pilotage, viz.:

Of ships and vessels trading to Norway, or to the Cattegat, or Baltic, or round the North Cape, or into the White Sea, when coming up by the South Channels:

Of ships and vessels trading to ports between Boulogne (inclusive) and the Baltic on the outward passages, and when coming up by the south passages:

Of ships and vessels passing through the limits of any pilotage district on their voyage from one port to another port, and not being bound to any port or place within such limits, nor anchoring therein.

Sect. 332. Power of pilotage authorities to make and extend exemptions from compulsory pilotage.—Every pilotage authority shall have power, by bye-laws made with the consent of Her Majesty in Council, to exempt the masters of any ships, or of any classes of ships, from being compelled to employ qualified pilots, and to annex any terms or conditions to such exemptions, and to revise and extend any exemptions now existing by virtue of this Act or any other Act of Parliament, law, or charter, or by usage, upon such terms and conditions, and in such manner as may appear desirable to such authority.

Sect. 333. Powers of pilotage authority.—Subject to the provisions contained in the fifth part of this Act, it shall be lawful for every pilotage authority by bye-laws made with the consent of Her Majesty in Council from time to time, to alter all or any of the following things within its districts; that is to say,

(5.) To alter and reduce rates of pilotage.—To fix the rates and prices or other remuneration to be demanded and received for the time being by pilots . . . . or to alter the mode of remunerating such pilots . . . . so that no higher rates or prices be demanded or received from the masters or owners of ships in the case of the Trinity House than the rates and prices specified in the table marked U. in the schedule hereto . . . .

TABLE U.

Rates of pilotage to be demanded and received by qualified pilots for piloting ships within the undermentioned limits.—The table contains a variety of charges depending on the distance the vessel is piloted, and the draught of water, and has the following note:

NOTE I.—Foreign ships are to pay one fourth more than British ships, except where privileged to enter the ports of the United Kingdom upon paying the same duties of tonnage as are paid by British ships, in which case such ships are to pay the same rates of pilotage only as are payable by British ships.

Sect. 353. Compulsory pilotage, in what mode to be enforced.—Subject to any alteration to be made by any pilotage authority in pursuance of the powers hereinbefore in that behalf given, the employment of pilots shall continue to be compulsory in all districts in which the same were by law compulsory immediately before the time when this Act comes into operation; and all exemptions from compulsory pilotage then existing within such districts shall also continue in force . . . .

Sect. 379 makes certain alterations in and extensions of the exemptions for compulsory pilotage in the London district and in the Trinity House outport districts, but only in the case of ships not carrying passengers, and therefore not applicable to the present case.

An Order in Council was made on the 1st Nov. 1862, which, after reciting sect. 333 of the Merchant Shipping Act set out above, approves another table of pilotage rates differing in detail from Table U., and not containing Note 1 of that table.

The Harbours and Passing Tolls Act 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 47).

Sect. 2. In the construction of this Act the following expressions shall have the meanings hereby assigned to them, unless such meanings are inconsistent with the context, that is to say . . . .

Differential Dues.

The expression "differential dues" shall include any dues, rates, or taxes levied on foreign ships, or on goods carried in foreign ships, which are not levied under like circumstances on British ships or on goods carried in British ships; and shall also include any excess of dues, rates, or taxes levied on foreign ships, or on goods carried in foreign ships, over the dues or taxes levied under like circumstances on British ships or on goods carried in British ships, excepting always such duties as the Commissioners of Customs may be empowered to levy for the use of Her Majesty under any Act of Parliament in the events therein mentioned.

Part IV.—Abolition of Differential Dues and Compensation therefor.

Sect. 10. Abolition of differential dues.—All differential dues shall cease and be abolished on and after the 1st Jan. 1862.

Sect. 11. Compensation for differential dues, when to cease.—All payments which would, but for such abolition, have been made out of public moneys by way of compensation for differential dues under the authority of the Acts enumerated in the 2nd schedule hereto annexed, or of any other Act or Acts relating to such dues, shall continue until the 1st Jan. 1872, and shall then cease.

Sect. 14. . . . . No rates or dues of any kind shall, in pursuance of the power hereby given, be made payable in respect of any foreign ships . . . over and above the rates and dues made payable under like circumstances in respect of British ships. . . . .

Sched. 2 contains (inter alia) 59 Geo. 3, c. 54 s. 9, and 8 & 9 Vict. c. 90, s. 9.

An Act to carry into effect a Convention of Commerce concluded between His Majesty and the United States of America, and a Treaty with the Prince Regent of Portugal, 1819 (54 Geo. 3, c. 54)

Sect. 8. Duties leviable on American and Portuguese vessels entering the ports of this kingdom to be the same as those payable on British vessels.—And whereas by the aforesaid Convention it is provided that no higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any of the ports in any of His Majesty's territories in Europe, on the vessels of the United States of America, than shall be payable in the same ports on British vessels. And whereas a similar provision was made in a treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, concluded between His Majesty and His Royal Highness the Prince Regent of Portugal, dated the 19th day of February 1810; and whereas certain rates and duties, under the denomination of light duties, pilotage, ballast, buoyage, and beaconage rates, harbour duties and other dues, are now payable by law, charter, special privilege, or grant, to the corporation of Trinity House of Deptford, Stroud, &c. . . . . on foreign ships and vessels over and above the rates and duties payable on British ships; and whereas it is expedient that the object of the said treaties should be effectually carried into execution; be it therefore enacted that no higher or other rates or duties shall be levied on ships or vessels of the United States of America or on Portuguese ships or vessels entering or touching at any of the ports of the United Kingdom, or of His Majesty's territories in Europe, all or any of the following things in relation to pilots and pilotage within the respective districts; viz.:

(4) To exempt the masters of any ships or vessels, or of any classes of ships or vessels, from being compelled to employ pilots, and to make any terms or conditions to such exemptions, and from time to time to revoke or alter any exemptions so made, and to revise and extend any exemptions now existing by virtue of any Act of Parliament or charter, upon such terms and conditions and in such manner as such authority with such consent as aforesaid may think fit.

than are now or which may become hereafter payable on British ships.

Sect. 9 gives compensation to the various corporations and persons affected by sect. 8 out of the Consolidated Duties of Customs.

An Act for granting Duties of Customs, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 90).

Sect. 9. From and after the ratification of any treaty heretofore made by Her Majesty or any of her royal predecessors subsequently to the enactment of the said Act (59 Geo. 3, c. 54) or of any treaty which may hereafter be made by Her Majesty, her heirs and successors, with any such foreign power, in which treaty has been or shall be contained provisions similar to those recited in the said recited Act, all and every the provisions, clauses, matters, and things in the said recited Act contained shall apply and extend to the trade and shipping of such foreign powers respectively as fully and effectually to all intents and purposes as to the trade and shipping of the said United States, and of the said kingdom of Portugal, and also shall apply and extend to differential duties or charges on goods imported or exported in the ships of such foreign powers as well as to differential duties on the ships of such foreign powers.

The Customs Consolidation Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 36).

As to Coasting Trade.

Sect. 141. Foreign ships in coasting trade subject to same rules as British ships, and foreign ships employed in the coasting trade not to be subject to higher rates than British ships.—Every foreign ship proceeding either with cargo or passengers or in ballast or any voyage from one part of the United Kingdom to another, or from the islands of Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, Sark, or Man, to the United Kingdom, or from the United Kingdom to any of the said islands, or from the said islands to any other of them, or from any part of any of the said islands to any other part of the same, shall be subject, as to stores for the use of the crew and in all other respects, to the same laws, rules, and regulations to which British ships when so employed are now subject; but no such foreign ship, nor any goods carried therein, shall, during the time she is so employed, be subject to any higher or other rate of dock, pier, harbour, light, pilotage, tonnage, or other dues, duties, tolls, rates, or other charges whatsoever, or to any other rules as to the employment of pilots, or any other rules or restrictions whatsoever, than British ships employed in like manner or goods carried therein, any law, charter, special privilege, or grant to the contrary notwithstanding; nor shall any body corporate or person having or claiming any right or title to any such higher or other rates, duties, tolls, or other charges as aforesaid, be entitled to any compensation in respect thereof under any law or statute relating thereto, or otherwise howsoever.

April 18.—The point of law came on for argument.

Phillimore and Bucknill for the plaintiffs, the owners of the barge Audacious.—The sole question is whether pilotage is or is not compulsory for this vessel. She is a foreign vessel carrying passengers and cargo, bound from London to Hamburg. No doubt, if she was a British vessel under such circumstances she would be under no obligation to take a pilot. The Moselle (2 Asp. Mar. L. C. 586; 32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 570), and cases cited therein, especially The Earl of Auckland (Lush. 164, 327; 1 Mar. L. C. O. S. 27, 177; 3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 786; 5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 558), show that all the exemptions granted by 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, and by the Order in Council of Feb. 1854, continue as exemptions in force at the time of the passing of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, notwithstanding the repeal of the former Act itself by the Merchant Shipping Repeal Act 1854. The question is, whether the fact of this vessel being a foreign vessel disentitles her to exemption which had she been British she would no doubt be entitled to. We say that she is entitled to exemption on two grounds: (1) Because the Order in Council of Feb. 1854 applies to foreign as well as British vessels; and (2) even if it does not, the abolition of differential rates on foreign vessels by the Harbours and Passing Tolls Act 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 47) renders it illegal to levy a compulsory pilotage rate on foreign ships to which British ships are not liable. With reference to the Order in Council, it is to be observed that it does not follow the wording of sect. 59 of the Pilotage Act 1825. There certain vessels are exempted under certain conditions. The conditions are in some respects incomplete e.g., in exempting "constant traders from ports between Boulogne and the Baltic," only when bound "inwards," and "coming up either by the North Channel, but not otherwise," the wording of which provision shows there has been some oversight in the section. Therefore the Order in Council was made to get rid of those anomalies primarily, but also to extend the exemptions to foreign vessels, and therefore the exemptions are stated indifferently for ships and vessels of all nations. If the Order in Council applies only to British vessels, then the last exemption given by it, and which is altogether different from any previous exemptions under the Act of Geo. 4, involves the anomaly that a foreign vessel bound up channel from a foreign port to Antwerp might, on a subsequent visit to a British port, be compelled to pay pilotage dues, having passed through a pilotage district, whilst a British vessel doing the like would be exempt. If, however, for the sake of argument it be assumed that the Order in Council of 1854 was intended to apply only to the classes of vessels mentioned in the Pilotage Law Amendment Act 1826 (6 Geo. 4, c. 125, s. 59), yet now all foreign vessels are entitled to claim the same immunity as British vessels in the like circumstances. The compulsory pilotage chargeable on a foreign vessel, and not a British vessel is a differential due within the definition of sect. 2 of the Harbours and Passing Tolls Act 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 47), and is therefore abolished by sect. 10 of that Act. This is stated expressly with reference to Newcastle-on Tyne (Pritchard's Adm. Digest, 2nd edit. vol. 1, pp. 456, 457, and Parliamentary Paper, No. 264 of 1863, p. 68), and must be so in all other cases. Sect. 11 of the Harbours and Passing Tolls Act 1861 makes a special provision for compensation to persons entitled to differential dues under various Acts of Parliament which are enumerated under sched. II. of the Act; that schedule contains (inter alia) 59 Geo. 3, c. 54, s. 9, and that section refers to persons entitled to compensation under sect. 8, which, giving the grounds of compensation, includes pilotage dues, so far as the United States and Portugal are concerned, as such dues were inconsistent with treaties of reciprocity with those states. This special provision for the United States and Portugal became unnecessary when the Harbours and Passing Tolls Act 1841 did that for all nations which had been done by the special Act for those nations, and by 8 & 9 Vict. c. 90, s. 9, for other nations, and the provisions in the general Act superseded those in the special Acts. But it shows that pilotage is a rate, and a differential rate when charged on foreign ships and not on British vessels, and therefore compensation for a definite period is given by the general Act (s. 11) for its abolition, such as was given for an indefinite period in the case of specially favoured nations by special Acts. That which makes pilotage compulsory in point of law is merely the obligation to pay a rate, whether the pilot were employed or not:

Sect. 353 Merchant Shipping Act 1854;
The Agricola, 2 W. Rob. 10.

Pilotage is expressly specified as a rate in table U of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 made in pursuance of sect. 333 of that Act, and moreover a differential rate between British and foreign ships is expressly mentioned in the note to that table.

Butt, Q.C. and Stubbs.—The Order in Council was obviously made to provide for a casus omissus in the Pilotage Act (6 Geo. 4, c. 125) as to voyages on which British ships were to be exempt. That Act is expressly limited to ships having British registers, except in the case of vessels on coasting voyages where it was unnecessary at the time (A D. 1825) to say anything about British registers, as the trade was not open to any vessels except British vessels. If the Order in Council applies to foreign vessels this extraordinary anomaly will appear, that whereas British and foreign vessels alike are exempt under the Order in Council when trading to ports between Boulogne and the Baltic, &c., when coming up by the South Channels, or on their outward voyages by either North or South Channels, yet as the Pilotage Act (6 Geo. 4, c. 125) is the only authority for an exemption when vessels are coming up by the North Channel, and then only when such vessels have British register, a foreign vessel under such circumstances is still bound to take a pilot if coming by the North Channel, though free to come without one up the South Channel, and a similar anomaly appears in the case of vessels "trading to Norway, &c." There is besides direct authority for considering the Order in Council only subsidiary to sect. 59 of the Pilotage Act:

The Earl of Auckland, ubi sup.

On the second point, compulsory pilotage cannot be called in strictness a rate; it clearly is not a charge, for, in discussing this very point, i.e., whether a foreign vessel was under a treaty of reciprocity exempted from compulsory pilotage when a British vessel would have been exempt, Dr. Lushington says, "compulsory pilotage is not a charge upon vessels, but rather a regulation for their benefit:"

The Hanna, 2 Mar. Law Cas. O.S. 434; L. Rep. 1 Ad. & Ecc. 283, 290; 15 L. T. Rep. N.S. 334.

Moreover, even if it be a rate at all, it is not a rate within the meaning of a "differential due" in sect. 2 of the Harbours and Passing Tolls Acts 1861, for that only includes a rate levied on a foreign ship, &c., whereas this is a penalty upon the captain or owner. Sects. 363, 523 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 show that the ship is only liable in the ultimate result for pilotage dues where the services of a qualified pilot are obtained, whereas compulsory pilotage is the obligation to pay for a pilot whether his services are obtained or not. A difference as to the obligation to employ a pilot is not a differential due, though a difference in his scale of payment is; therefore the note which appears in table U. of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, making foreign vessels in all cases pay one-fourth more than British vessels, does not appear in the revised rates authorised by Order in Council, 1st Nov. 1862, i.e., the year after the passing of the Harbours and Passing Tolls Act 1861. (For the Order in Council, see Maude & Pollock, 4th edit., vol. 2, Orders in Council, p. 74.) Where it has been the intention of the Legislature to put foreign vessels on the same footing precisely as to compulsory pilotage as British vessels, it has been found necessary to pass a statute expressly to do so, as sect. 141 of the Customs Laws Consolidation Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 36) in regard to the coasting trade, where the compulsory employment of a pilot is not spoken of as a pilotage rate, but as another rule "as to employment of pilots."

Phillimore in reply.—By 8 & 9 Vict. c. 90, s. 9, the provisions of the special Act of 59 Geo. 3, c. 54, concerning the United States and Portugal, was extended to other countries with which treaties of reciprocity were or might be made, and there the provisions as to rates which include payments for pilotage are expressly spoken of as differential duties and charges, the precise words used in the Harbours and Passing Tolls Act 1861, which repeals all such differential dues. The Hanna (ubi sup.) is no authority on this point, because the Harbours and Passing Tolls Act 1861 was not referred to either in argument or judgment, and therefore could not have been before the court.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 25.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This was a case of collision between the sailing barge Audacious, and the screw steamship Vesta, which took place last September in the lower part of Blackwall Reach. The defendants' ship was a German vessel, and therefore not having a British register, but having on board passengers and cargo, and was bound from London to Hamburg. It was admitted at the trial, for the purposes of this argument, that the collision was due to the fault of the pilot on board the Vesta; and the only question for decision at present is, whether or not the pilot was taken on board by compulsion of law. The plaintiffs contended that there was no such compulsion, and founded their argument on two grounds: First, that previously to the passing of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, the Vesta would have been exempt under the 6 Geo. 4, c. 125 s. 59, coupled with an Order in Council of the 18th Feb. 1854, and it is admitted that sect. 353 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 preserved all previously existing exemptions; secondly, that pilotage dues or rates are "dues, or rates or duties" within the meaning of the Harbour and Passing Tolls Act 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 47), which Act abolishes all differential dues, and that to impose the pilotage on foreign vessels where it is not imposed on British vessels would be to impose a differential due. I will deal first with the contention of the plaintiffs founded upon the Act of Geo. 4, and the Order in Council. The 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, s. 59, provides that "the master of any collier or any ship or vessel trading to Norway or to the Cattegat or the Baltic, or round the North Cape, or into the White Sea, on their inward or outward passages, or of any constant trader inwards from the ports between Boulogne (inclusive) and the Baltic, all such ships and vessels having British registers, and coming up either by the North Channel, but not otherwise" (whatever this may mean), "shall and may lawfully, and without being subject to any of the penalties by this Act imposed, conduct or pilot his own ship or vessel." The clumsy and careless language of this section leaves two important omissions. No provision is made—first, for vessels trading outwards to the ports between Boulogne and the Baltic; and, secondly, for vessels coming up by the south channels, the north being the only one mentioned. The Order in Council is intituled "A regulation for the extension of the exemptions from compulsory pilotage now existing under the provisions of sect. 50 of the Act 6 Geo. 4, c. 125;" and it provides that the exemption from compulsory pilotage shall be allowed to masters "of ships and vessels trading to Norway or to the Cattegat or Baltic or round the North Cape or into the White Sea, when coming up by the south channels; of ships and vessels trading to ports between Boulogne (inclusive) and the Baltic on their outward voyages and when coming up by the south passages; of ships and vessels passing through the limits of any pilotage district on their voyages from one port to another port, and not being bound to any port or place within such limits or anchoring therein." The plaintiffs contend that the words "ships and vessels" mean all ships and vessels foreign as well as British. It is somewhat strange that no judicial decision as to the meaning of these words should have been given, but such I am informed and believe is the case. If the plaintiffs' construction be right, the order, which was clearly intended to remedy a defect, would have introduced a new one, inasmuch as the court would not be bound to hold that if a foreign ship trading to ports between Boulogne and the Baltic were coming inwards by the North Channel, and not outwards, she would not be exempt at all, the exemption in the Order in Council being expressly confined to vessels on their outward voyages, and when coming up by the south passages. The exemption does not exist under the 59th section of the Act of Geo. 4, which expressly relates to British ships alone. In other words, according to this construction, by the joint operation of that section and of the order, a foreign ship would be liable to compulsory pilotage when coming in by the North Channel, and exempt when going out by any passage or coming in by the south passage. I am of opinion that this absurdity cannot be intended, and that the Order in Council does not apply to foreign vessels, but the words "ships and vessels" must mean British ships and vessels which alone are dealt with by the statute to which this order is subsidiary, and of which it is explanatory. I think, moreover, that this was the opinion to which Dr. Lushington inclined in the cases of The Earl of Auckland (Lush. 164, 387; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 27, 177; 3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 786; 5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 558), and of The Hanna (2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 434; L. Rep. 1 Ad. & Eccl. 283; 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 334). I now come to the second point relied upon by the plaintiffs, namely, that all differential dues are abolished by the Harbours and Passing Tolls Act 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c, 47), and that a pilotage due imposed on a foreign ship which is not imposed on a British ship would be a differential due, and, therefore, ceased to exist. The sections relied on are the 2nd, 10th, and 11th. By the 2nd section the term differential duties includes any dues, rates, or taxes levied on foreign ships, &c., which are not levied, under like circumstances, on British ships, and the plaintiffs contend that that term would include compulsory pilotage. To this argument I cannot accede. In the first place, the Act clearly did not comtemplate the subject of compulsory pilotage at all, and it would be a very forced construction of the statute to hold that any regulation on the subject was indirectly affected by it. In the next place, the subject seems to be already disposed of by Dr. Lushington's judgment in the case of The Hanna (ubi sup.) already referred to. In that case reliance was placed on the expression contained in a convention of commerce between this country and Sweden. Dr, Lushington, referring to the 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, s. 59, as showing that the exemption under that section could not apply to a vessel not having a British register, said, "But the plaintiffs would escape from this difficulty by invoking a convention of commerce and navigation between this country and Sweden in March 1826, that is to say, a few months before (a) the passing of the 6 Geo. 4, c. 125. The second section of the Convention is as follows: British vessels entering or departing from the ports of the kingdom of Sweden and Norway, and Swedish and Norwegian vessels entering or departing from the ports of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, shall not be subject to any other such ship duties or charges than are or shall be levied on national vessels entering in or departing from such ports respectively. The plaintiffs contend that compulsory pilotage was a charge within the meaning of the above section of the Convention, and, consequently, that, notwithstanding anything in the 59th section of the 6 ,Geo. 4, c. 125, Norwegian vessels could not be subject to compulsory pilotage where vessels were exempt. This view, however, seems to me untenable. The theory of the Legislature, whether right or wrong, must be taken to be that compulsory pilotage is not a charge upon vessels, but matter of legislation instituted for their benefit." With this opinion I entirely agree. I have considered the argument founded on the 59 Geo. 3, c. 54. It seems to me not to affect the question of compulsory pilotage, though it may, perhaps, refer to pilotage dues where the legal necessity to take a pilot does not exist. Upon the whole, I am of opinion that the plaintiffs have failed to establish their position that the Vesta was not under compulsion of law to employ a pilot, and I must, therefore, pronounce for the defendants on the question of law on which my decision has been sought.

In cases raising important points of law the court will give leave to appeal to the Court of Appeal where, on a proper construction of the Acts governing appeals, such leave is necessary.

THIS was an appeal from the City of London Court (Admiralty jurisdiction) in a case of damage to cargo.

The action was brought by Messrs. Cole and Kirkman, of Liverpool, the legal holders of two bills of lading of cargo, then lately laden on board the ship Rona, against the owners (unknown) of the said ship. The owners, who were domiciled in England, appeared, and at the hearing the objection was taken that the court had no jurisdiction.

The Commissioner decided that he had no jurisdiction.

The following is a copy of the judgment, which was given on the 28th April 1881, so far as it is material:

Whereas the plaintiffs Messrs. Cole and Kirkman, of Liverpool, in the county of Lancaster, the legal holders of two bills of lading of cargo lately laden on board the

ALLEN v. GARBUTT.

THIS was an action in rem, instituted in the City of London Court against the ship Merthyr, for necessaries supplied to that vessel. On Nov. 8th, 1880, the defendant moved the Queen's Bench Division (Manisty and Bowen, JJ.) for a prohibition to restrain the Judge of the City of London Court from proceeding with the action, on the ground that the Merthyr was a British ship, the owners of which were domiciled in England or Wales, and that the Court had therefore no jurisdiction. The facts of the case, and the arguments, sufficiently appear from the judgment.

Gainsford Bruce for the defendant.

Myburgh, for the plaintiff, showed cause.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 13. MANISTY, J. (delivering the judgment of the Court).—This is a proceeding in rem, by action in the City of London Court for necessaries supplied to the ship Merthyr. On the 8th of November Mr. Gainsford Bruce moved for a prohibition to restrain the judge of that court from proceeding further with the action, on the ground that the ship was a British ship, the owners of which were domiciled in Great Britain, and that, consequently, as he contended, the court had no jurisdiction to entertain the action. Mr. Myburgh showed cause. It has long been settled law that, independently of statute, the Court of Admiralty has no jurisdiction to entertain a suit for necessaries: (The Neptune, 3 Hagg. 120; 3 Knapp P. C. C. 94; 12 Moore P. C. C. 346; The Pacific, Br. & L. 243). By 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, sect. 6, jurisdiction was given to the Court of Admiralty to decide claims for necessaries supplied to any foreign ships or seagoing vessels, but that statute only applied to foreign vessels: (The Ocean Queen, 1 W. Rob. 457.) By sect. 5 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), it is enacted that the Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claims for necessaries supplied to any ship elsewhere than in the port to which the ship belongs, unless it is shown, to the satisfaction of the court, that at the time of the institution of the cause, any owner or part owner of the ship is domiciled in England or Wales. This section applies to British ships only: (The Ella A. Clark, Br. & L. 32.) By sect. 2 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), her Majesty in Council was empowered to give Admiralty jurisdiction to County Courts, and by sect. 3 it is enacted that any County Court having Admiralty jurisdiction shall have jurisdiction to try and determine, amongst other things, any cause as to a claim for necessaries in which the amount does not exceed 150*l.* By sect. 2 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869 (32 and 33 Vict. c. 51), any County Court having Admiralty jurisdiction is empowered to try and determine causes as to, among other things, any claim arising out of any agreement made in relation to the use or hire of any ship; and by sect. 3 of that Act, it is enacted that the jurisdiction conferred by that Act and by the Act of 1868, may be exercised either by proceedings in rem or by proceedings in personam. By sect. 88 of the Judicature Act 1873, her Majesty is empowered to confer on any inferior Court of civil jurisdiction, the same jurisdiction in Admiralty as any County Court then had or might hereafter have. By virtue of this provision and an order in Council, the City of London Court has the same Admiralty jurisdiction as a County Court. Mr. Bruce contended that the Act of 1868 did not confer upon a County Court a more extensive jurisdiction in the case of a claim for necessaries than that possessed by the Court of Admiralty, and that, inasmuch as the Court of Admiralty could not have entertained the present action, neither could the City of London Court entertain it. In support of that contention he cited the case of The Dowse (3 Mar. L. C. O. S. 424; L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 135; 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 627. decided in 1870, in which it was held that the County Court Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 does not confer on a County Court a more extensive jurisdiction as to a claim for necessaries than that exercised by the Court of Admiralty. The case followed and adopted the principle of the decision of the Court of Common Pleas in the case of Everard v. Kendall (3 Mar. L. C. O. S. 391; L. Rep. 5 C. P. 428; 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 408). Mr. Myburgh, on the part of the plaintiff, admitted that the Court of Admiralty could not have entertained the action in question, but he contended that, according to the true construction of the Acts of 1868 and 1869, a County Court, and consequently, the City of London Court, can entertain it. In support of that contention he cited the case of The Alina in the Court of Appeal (sup.) 257; L. Rep. 5 Ex. Div. (C.A.) 227; 42 L. T. Rep. N. S, 517), decided in February 1880. Upon referring to that case it will be found that it was a decision as to the effect of the Act of 1869, with reference to an action for a breach of a charter-party as to which jurisdiction was given to the County Court in express terms by sect. 2, sub-sect. 1, of the Act of 1869. The Court of Appeal followed and adopted the decision of the Privy Council in 1872, in the cases of Cargo ex Argos and The Hewsons (1 Asp. Mar. L. C. 360, 519; L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 568, 5 P. C. 134; 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 64, and 28, p. 77). These decisions have reference to the construction of the Act of 1869, and do not touch the present question, which depends upon the construction of the Act of 1868. The case of The Dowse (ubi sup.) is in point as to the construction of the Act of 1868, and we should probably have felt bound to follow it, even if we had doubted its correctness; but we do not entertain any such doubt. There will therefore be a rule absolute for a prohibition.

The said action coming on this day for trial, it is adjudged that the said action do stand dismissed out of this court for want of jurisdiction.

On the 14th June 1881 the judge gave leave to the plaintiffs to appeal, notwithstanding the time for appealing had expired.

On the 21st April 1882 the appeal came on for hearing.

The arguments turned on the proper construction of the following enactments:

The Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c 10.

Sect. 6. As to claims for damage to cargo imported.—The High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim by the owner or consignee or assignee of any bill of lading of any goods carried into any port in England or Wales in any ship for damage done to the goods or any part thereof by the negligence or misconduct of or for any breach of duty or breach of contract on the part of the owner, master, or crew of the ships, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that at the time of the institution of the cause any owner or part owner of the ship is domiciled in England or Wales: Provided always, that if in any such cause the plaintiff do not recover 20*l.*, he shall not be entitled to any costs, charges, or expenses incurred by him therein, unless the judge shall certify that the cause was a fit one to be tried in the said court.

An Act for conferring Admiralty Jurisdiction on the County Courts 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71.)

1. Short title.—This Act may be cited as "The County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868.

2. Appointment of County Courts for Admiralty purposes.—If at any time after the passing of this Act it appears to Her Majesty in Council, on the representation of the Lord Chancellor, expedient that any County Court should have Admiralty jurisdiction, it shall be lawful for Her Majesty, by Order in Council to appoint that court to have Admiralty jurisdiction. . . . .

3. Any County Court having Admiralty jurisdiction shall have jurisdiction and all powers and authorities thereto to try and determine, subject and according to the provisions of this Act, the following causes (in this Act referred to as Admiralty causes). . . . .

(2) As to any claim for towage, necessaries, or wages, —any cause in which the amount claimed does not exceed 150*l.*

(3) As to any claim for damage to cargo, or damage by collision—any cause in which the amount claimed does not exceed 300*l.*

An Act to amend the County Courts (Admiralty Jurisdiction) Act 1868, and to give Jurisdiction in certain Maritime Causes; 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51).

1. Short title. This Act may be cited as "The County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869," and shall be read and interpreted as one Act with the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868.

2. Extension of jurisdiction over ships and goods.—Any County Court appointed or to be appointed to have Admiralty jurisdiction shall have jurisdiction, and all powers and authorities relating thereto, to try and determine the following causes:

(1) As to any claim arising out of any agreement made in relation to the use or hire of any ship, or in relation to the carriage of goods in any ship, and also as to any claim in tort in respect of goods carried in any ship, provided the amount claimed does not exceed 300*l.*

3. Proceedings in rem or in personam.—The jurisdiction conferred by the Act and by the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 may be exercised either by proceedings in rem or by proceedings in personam.

Bucknill for appellants.—It is clear that the County Court has jurisdiction under the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869, even if it had not under the original County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868. This was held to be the case in The Cargo ex Argos and The Hewsons (1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 360, 519; L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 568; 5 P. C. 134; 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 64, and 28, p. 77). The cases at common law to the contrary effect (Simpson v. Blues, 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 326; L. Rep. 7 C. P. 290; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 697; Gunestead v. Price and Fullmore v. Wait, 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 543; L. Rep. 10 Ex. 65; 32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 499) are overruled by the Court of Appeal in the case of The Alina (sup. 257; 5 Ex. Div. (C. A.) 227; 42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 517). And the only case now to be considered is Allen v. Garbutt (L. Rep. 6, Q. B. D. 165), on which no doubt the respondents rely. If it is necessary to distinguish that case, it is sufficient to say that it was a suit for necessaries, the right to sue for which under the Admiralty jurisdiction of the County Court rests entirely on the Act of 1868; that was an Act to confer Admiralty jurisdiction pure and simple, and therefore the courts of common law had ground for holding that it conferred no more extensive jurisdiction than the Court of Admiralty had in respect of the same matters, and that therefore in a claim for necessaries the jurisdiction of the County Courts was limited to the case where the owner was domiciled in England or Wales, the fifth section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 relating to necessaries containing a provision to that effect similar to the sixth section in the case of damage to cargo. But the amending Act of 1869 in its title professes not only to amend the former Act, but to "give jurisdiction in certain maritime causes." Amongst those are cases of breach of contract to carry goods, and of tort in carrying goods (sect. 2, sub-sect. 1). That section is wholly inoperative if the jurisdiction remains limited as under the former Act. Moreover, by sect. 1 of the amending Act the two Acts are to be read together, and therefore, whilst the case of necessaries remains as it was, there being no extension of jurisdiction there, the case of "damage to cargo" is expressly extended. Even if the High Court had no original jurisdiction in those matters where an owner was domiciled in England, there is nothing unreasonable in its having an appellate jurisdiction; the same reasons which induced the Legislature to confer on the High Court in 1861 a special jurisdiction in rem in certain matters in the case of foreign ships to enable the plaintiff to recover summarily here instead of having to pursue his remedy in a foreign country, might well have induced it in 1868 and 1869 to confer a similar jurisdiction in small matters on the County Court, not only over foreign but also over British ships, to enable the injured party to pursue his remedy at once in the place where the ship discharged her cargo instead of having to pursue the remedy in some distant part of the United Kingdom where the owner might chance to reside. And then the High Court of Admiralty, having a similar jurisdiction, would be the natural and proper court to hear the appeals. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The case of the court having appellate jurisdiction where it had no original jurisdiction is not without precedent. Revenue appeals from the West Indies were formerly heard here, though the court had no original jurisdiction in such matters.]

Myburgh, Q.C. and Kennedy for the respondents.—Admitting that the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869 does give the County Courts jurisdiction in some matters which the High Court did not at the time possess, and that the cases of The Cargo ex Argos and The Alina are correct, and that Simpson v. Blues cannot now be considered good law, yet this case is not within that extended jurisdiction. This is simply a case of "damage to cargo," the jurisdiction in respect of which is given only by the Act of 1868; it is not like The Cargo ex Argos and The Alina, a question of breach of contract for the "hire of any ship" under the amending Act of 1869; it therefore stands precisely on the same footing as a claim for necessaries, and the necessity for the owner to be domiciled in this country exists exactly as much as in the case of Allen v. Garbutt. That case followed The Dowse (3 Mar. Law Cas. O.S. 424; L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 135; 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 627), which was a decision of this court to the same effect so far as necessaries are concerned, and is consistent with Everard v. Kendall (3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 391; L. Rep. 5 C. P. 428; 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 408) and the other cases on the interpretation of the "damage by collision" clause. The court is not asked merely to follow The Alina, and hold that in cases of charter-party, &c., when an action is brought under the Amending Act the County Court has jurisdiction where the High Court had none, but to hold that the amending Act is not only to be read with but to supersede and repeal the original Act.

Bucknill, in reply, referred to The Sussex Peerage case (11 Cl. & F. 143), as to the construction of Acts of Parliament.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 2.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is an appeal from a decision of the judge of the City of London Court in an action for damage to cargo. The action was an action in rem brought in that court by the holders of a bill of lading against the owners of the ship Rona for damage to goods on board the Rona alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the master during a voyage from New York to this country. At the trial it was contended by the defendants that the action was brought under the Admiralty Court Act 1861 and the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, and that therefore, as the owners of the Rona were domiciled in England, the City of London Court had no jurisdiction. The learned judge, who considered himself bound by the judgment in Allen v Garbutt, dismissed the action for want of jurisdiction, and the plaintiffs have appealed to this court. It was admitted, at least for the purposes of the appeal, that the owners of the Rona are domiciled in England, and that the jurisdiction of the City of London Court is the only question now to be decided. This question mainly depends upon the construction to be put upon the following sections in three several Acts of Parliament. It is enacted by the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), sect. 6, that [his Lordship here read the section set out above]. The 3rd section of the County Court Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 7) provides that [his Lordship here read the section and sub-section (3) set out above]. Lastly, the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51), the full title of which, it is important to observe, is "An Act to amend the County Courts (Admiralty Jurisdiction) Act 1868, and to give jurisdiction in certain maritime causes." The second section of this Act of 1869 provides that [his Lordship here read the section set out above]. The 3rd section provides that the jurisdiction conferred by the two Acts of 1868 and 1869 may be exercised "either by proceedings in rem or by proceedings in personam." The appellants, who were plaintiffs in the court below, contend that their action was brought under sub-sect. 1 of sect. 2 of the Act of 1869, and that therefore it came within the Admiralty jurisdiction of a County Court, notwithstanding that in consequence of the exception in sect. 6 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (which I have already read) it would not have come within the jurisdiction of the High Court of Admiralty unless brought thither by way of transfer or by way of appeal. I may say here that the City of London Court, by virtue of an Order in Council, possesses the Admiralty jurisdiction of a County Court, and all the law relating to the Admiralty jurisdiction of County Courts applies equally to that court. I have been referred to several cases which I have carefully examined, and which I think it expedient to mention in chronological order: April 1870, Everard v. Kendall; June 1870, The Dowse; May 1872, Simpson v. Blues, the decision in which case it was admitted could not be relied upon; July 1872, The Cargo ex Argos, and Dec. 1872 and Feb. 1873, the same cases on appeal; Feb. 1880, The Alina; Dec. 1880, Allen v. Garbutt. The appellants supported their contention by citing The Cargo ex Argos, a case which like the present arose on a bill of lading, and is so far directly in point, and The Alina, which was decided in 1880 by the Court of Appeal, and expressly approved The Cargo ex Argos. On the other hand, the respondents (defendants in the court below) contend that the action was brought, not under the Act of 1869, but under the 3rd section of the Act of 1868, which section expressly mentions claims for damage to cargo; and they argue that therefore, as the High Court of Admiralty could have had no jurisdiction in such a case (inasmuch as the owner's domicile was English), so neither can a County Court have jurisdiction. They rely upon the authority of Allen v. Garbutt, which, following the earlier cases of Everard v. Kendall and The Dowse, decided that an action for necessaries which had clearly been brought under the Act of 1868, where the owners of the ship were domiciled in England, did not come within the Admiralty jurisdiction of a County Court. It was alleged on both sides that these decisions (The Alina and Allen v. Garbutt) are distinguishable from each other, and do not necessarily conflict; the former dealing with an action under the Act of 1869, the latter with one under the Act of 1868. It is not necessary to determine whether these cases are reconcilable or not, because in fact the issue is narrowed to this point: Was the action against the Rona brought under the Act of 1868 alone, or under that of 1869, read and interpreted as one with the previous Act? It appears to me to follow, from the arguments of the respondents, that the action could not properly have been brought under the act of 1868, and I am of opinion that this is "a claim arising out of an agreement made in relation to the carriage of goods in a ship," and that the action clearly falls within the words of the 1st sub-section of sect. 2 of the Act of 1869. I hold, therefore, that the City of London Court has jurisdiction, and that the appeal must be allowed.

Kennedy, on behalf of the appellants, asked for leave to appeal to the Court of Appeal, there being some doubt on the construction of the County Courts Act 1875, s. 10, Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1873, s. 45, Appellate Jurisdiction Act 1876, s. 20, and Order LVIII., r. 19 whether it was necessary to obtain leave to appeal further where the judgment of the Admiralty Division varied the judgment of the County Court sitting in Admiralty.

Sir R. Phillimore.—If it is necessary that I should give leave to appeal further, I do so, as the question is one of importance.

Before Pollock, B., Manisty and Stephen, JJ.)

The Chartered Mercantile Bank of India, &c, v. The Netherland Steam Navigation Company Limited.

Shipping—Bill of lading—Exceptions—Collision—Negligence or default of master or servants—Negligence of servants on board another ship—Liability of shipowner—Damages.

The 9th sub-section of the 25th section of the Judicature Act 1873 does not affect the old common law rules as to damages in actions by owners of goods against the owners of the ship on board of which they have shipped their goods, because no variance previously existed in such actions between the Admiralty rule and the common law rule.

The 8th sub-section of the 25th section of the Judicature Act 1873 only applies to actions for damages arising out of collision brought by the owner of one ship against the owner of another ship, or by the owner of goods on board one ship against the owner of another ship.

Where a quantity of specie was shipped on board the Crown Prince under a bill of lading which contained the following exceptions: "The act of God, the king's enemies, restraint of princes and rulers. . . . accidents and damages from . . . . collision . . . . and all the perils, dangers, and accidents of the sea, rivers, land carriage, and steam navigation of whatsoever nature and kind soever, and accidents, loss or damage from any act, neglect, or default whatsoever of the pilots, masters, mariners, or other servants of the company, in navigating the ship, or from any deviation, excepted," and whilst on her voyage the Crown Prince came into collision with another steamship belonging to the same owners, and a quantity of the specie was lost, and the jury found that this latter vessel was principally in fault but that the Crown Prince was also in some degree to blame; the exception in the bill of lading as to collision did not protect the shipowners from liability for a collision caused by the negligence or default of their servants on board a vessel other than the Crown Prince, neither were they protected by the clause which excepted their liability for the negligence of their servants, as that applied only to the negligence of their servants who were navigating the Crown Prince.

Pollock, B.—This is an action brought by the plaintiffs, who are bankers carrying on business in London, against the defendants, who are a joint-stock company limited, constituted and duly registered pursuant to the Companies Act 1862, having their head offices in London, to recover the value of a quantity of specie which in the month of Nov. 1875 was shipped by the plaintiffs at Singapore on board the defendants' steamship called Wilhelm Kroon Prinz de Nederlanden (which I shall call the Crown Prince for the sake of brevity), to be carried by the defendants from Singapore to Sourabaga, and there delivered in good order and condition to the order of the plaintiffs, they paying freight for the same upon the terms of the bill of lading, which contained the following exceptions: "The act of God, the king's enemies, restraint of princes and rulers, pirates, or robbers by sea or land, accidents and damage from vermin, barratry, jettison, collision, fire, machinery, boilers, steam, and all the perils, dangers, and accidents of the sea, rivers, land carriage, and steam navigation of whatsoever nature and kind soever, and accidents, loss, or damage from any act, neglect, or default whatsoever of the pilots, master, or mariners, or other servants of the company in navigating the ship, or from any deviation, excepted." The Crown Prince sailed from Singapore on her voyage to Sourabaga, and in the course of it she came into collision with another steamship of the defendants called the Atjeh, and was sunk with the plaintiffs' specie on board. Some of the specie was recovered, and the action is brought to recover the value of the residue which was lost. The plaintiffs alleged, by paragraph 4 of their statement of claim, that the collision was caused by the negligence of the defendants' servants on board the Atjeh, and that the loss of the specie was not caused by any of the perils excepted in the bill of lading. The defendants, by their statement of defence, admitted that their steamship the Crown Prince in the course of her voyage came into collision with their steamship called the Atjeh, and was sunk with the plaintiffs' goods on board, but they denied that the collision was caused by negligence, and alleged that, if it was so caused, such negligence was wholly that of their servants on board their ship the Crown Prince, and that such negligence is one of the perils specially excepted in and by the bill of lading. The defendants also denied the allegation in the 4th paragraph of the plaintiffs' statement of claim, that the loss was not caused by any of the perils excepted by the bill of lading. In other words, they alleged that the loss was caused by a peril or by perils excepted by the bill of lading. The plaintiffs joined issue upon the defendants' statement of defence. The cause came on for trial at the Guildhall Sittings on the 15th Dec. last before Manisty, J., and a special jury. A great deal of evidence was given on both sides as to the cause of the collision, and in the result the jury found that the Atjeh was mainly in fault, but that the Crown Prince was also in some degree to blame. Upon these facts it was contended before us, on the part of the plaintiffs, that the defendants are liable for the loss of the specie, first, by reason of the contract into which they had entered by the bill of lading for carriage of it, and secondly, that they are liable in tort as owners of the Atjeh for the negligence of their servants, the master and crew of that vessel, whereby the collision was mainly occasioned. In the view which I have taken of this case, it becomes unnecessary to consider the questions which arise out of the second contention. As to the first question it was suggested for the defendants that the contract contained in the bill of lading was not governed by English law. I cannot, however, think that there is room for serious argument upon this point. The goods were shipped at an English port; the plaintiffs are an English company; the defendants are a limited company, whose registered office is in London, and by their memorandum of association they describe as one of the objects for which the company is established the hiring of vessels. The bill of lading is in the English language throughout, and the defendants are therein described as "The Netherlands India Steam Navigation Company Limited," which obviously has reference to the Companies Act 1862, whereby the liability of the members of limited companies is limited to the amount unpaid on the shares held by them, or to the amount which the members may undertake by the memorandum of association to contribute to the assets of the company in the event of its being wound-up. Under all these circumstances, adopting the well-known rule of law as acted upon in Lloyd v. Guibert (2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 26, 283; 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 570, and 13, p. 602; L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 115), the law of the place where the contract is made is primâ facie that which the parties intended or ought to be presumed to have adopted as the footing upon which they dealt, and there exist here none of those facts from which the court were in that case led to infer the contrary. Assuming, then, that the English law governs, two matters must be dealt with before the liability of the defendants can be determined, viz.: first, what is the true construction of the bill of lading? and, secondly, have the defendants succeeded in showing that the event whereby the loss of the plaintiffs' specie was occasioned was within the excepted perils? With regard to the perils excepted by the bill of lading they may be divided into two classes: first, those which are dealt with by the first clause and mentioned by name, one of these being "collision;" and, secondly, those which are covered by the second clause, which provides for "accidents, loss, or damage, from any act, neglect, or default whatsoever of the pilots, masters, or mariners, or other servants of the company in navigating the ship," which would include all acts so caused, and therefore, inter alia collision, if it was caused by the neglect or default of the defendants' servants in navigating the Crown Prince. Dealing first with the second of these clauses, it is obvious that, had the loss been occasioned wholly by those who were navigating the Crown Prince, the defendants would have been protected, but the jury having found that the crew of the Atjeh were mainly in fault, although the Crown Prince was also in some degree to blame, it appears to me that the defendants are not protected by this clause, inasmuch as they have not succeeded in showing that the loss was occasioned wholly by the neglect or default of those who were navigating the Crown Prince. With respect to the first clause there is no doubt that the loss in question was occasioned by collision, and the only question that arises is, whether the word "collision," as here used, applies to a collision which was mainly brought about by the negligence of those who were servants of the defendants engaged in the navigation of one of their vessels other than that in which the specie was shipped. It is necessary here to bear in mind that the clause in question is inserted in limitation of the common law liability which could otherwise attach to the defendants in the discharge of their duty as carriers, and should its intention and effect be open to doubt it must be construed most strongly against the carriers. This proposition is very clearly dealt with by Story, J., in sect. 512a. of his work on Bailments, in which speaking of the well-known and long-established exception contained in maritime contracts for the carriage of goods, of "perils of the sea," he says: "The phrase perils of the sea, whether understood in its most limited sense, as importing a loss by natural accident peculiar to that element, or whether understood in its more extended sense, as including inevitable accidents occurring upon that element, must still, in either case, be understood to include such losses only to the goods on board as are of an extraordinary nature, or arise from some irresistible force, or from inevitable accident, or from some overwhelming power, which cannot be guarded against by the ordinary exertions of human skill and prudence. Hence it is that, if the loss occurs by a peril of the sea which might have been avoided by the exercise of any reasonable skill or diligence at the time when it occurred, it is not deemed to be, in the sense of the phrase, such a loss by the perils of the sea as will exempt the carrier from liability, but rather a loss by the gross negligence of the party." The same principle of construction has been acted upon by the English courts and applied to the case of a loss occasioned by collision. Thus, in Lloyd v. The General Iron Screw Collier Company Limited (2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 32; 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 586; 3 H. & C. 284), it was held that the exception in the bill of lading of "accidents or damages of the seas, rivers, and steam navigation of whatever nature or kind soever," did not exempt the shipowner from responsibility for the loss of goods which arose from a collision caused by the negligence of the master or crew. This decision was discussed and followed in Grill v. The General Iron Screw Collier Company Limited (2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 362: 14 L. T. Rep. N.S. 711: L. Rep. 1 C. P. 600). A similar construction was given to a bill of lading which contained a clause that the shipowner "is not to be accountable for leakage or breakage," in the earlier case of Phillips v. Clarke (2 C. B. N. S. 256), and more recently in Czech v. The General Steam Navigation Company (3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 5; 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 246; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 14). These cases show that but for the general words excepting the neglect or default of the defendant's servants in navigating the Crown Prince, the defendants would not be protected in the event of a collision occasioned by such neglect or default, and as there are no words in the bill of lading which apply to a collision arising from the neglect or default of the defendants' servants in navigating another vessel, the word "collision" itself is of no avail, and it is hardly necessary to add that, where goods are damaged by reason of a collision occasioned by the fault of the master or crew of a vessel, other than that in which they are shipped, or by the default of those on board both vessels, the owner of the carrying vessel, in the absence of an express stipulation to the contrary, is liable for their loss. The law as to this will be found in 3 Kent's Commentaries, lecture 47, s. 5, and in Parson's Law of Shipping, vol. 1, p. 269. It was pressed upon us by the defendants' counsel in argument that it bore hardly upon the defendants to extend their liability beyond the negligence of those of their servants who were engaged in carrying out the contract of carriage, and that it ought not to be supposed that under any circumstances they could intend to make themselves liable for the acts of their servants who were navigating another vessel, whose duties had no connection with the performance of the contract for carriage upon which the plaintiffs are suing. There is much that is plausible in this, but it only raises in another form the question already answered, by saying that the defendants as carriers are liable for all events other than the act of God, which they have not excepted by their bill of lading, and although, if the collision had taken place between two ships which were the only vessels owned by the defendants, and these were engaged in wholly different voyages, and happened to meet by accident upon the high seas, the result might appear to be more unforseen and peculiar than in the present case, it must be remembered that the defendants are owners of ships which are engaged in a carrying trade between certain fixed ports, and make regular voyages over the same seas, and in saying that they are liable for a loss occasioned by the negligence of their crews on board a vessel other than that in which the plaintiffs' goods are shipped, is only applying a rule, the equity of which would not be contested if it were applied to a carrying company who own a large fleet of vessels trading in such a manner to and from a port that in the course of their voyage they would constantly pass or meet in a river or harbour, or would be brought up in close proximity to the same loading wharf. The liability of the defendants being established, a question still arises, what is the proper amount of damages? Until recently the defendants, who had contracted to carry the specie in question from Singapore to Sourabaga, and had failed to do so by reason of a peril against the occurrence of which they were not protected by the contract of carriage, must have been held to be liable for the full value of the specie. A doubt, however, has been raised by reason of the language contained in sect. 25, subsect. 9 of the Judicature Act 1873. The language of that sub-section is as follows: "In any cause or proceeding for damages arising out of a collision between two ships, if both ships shall be found to have been in fault, the rules hitherto in force in the Court of Admiralty, so far as they have been at variance with the rules in force in the courts of common law, shall prevail." If this provision is applicable to the present case, inasmuch as both the Crown Prince and the Atjeh were found by the jury to have been in fault, the Court of Admiralty rule must be held to apply; and that rule is that, where both parties to a collision are to blame, they must share the loss equally: (see The Milan, Lush. 388; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 185; 5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 590; and Hey v. Le Neve, 2 Shaw Sc. App. Cas. 395.) The language of this sub-section is no doubt very general, but, before effect is given to it, it would seem necessary to refer to what was the condition of the law before the passing of the Judicature Act. The only cause or proceeding for damages arising out of a collision between two ships, in which the rules in force in the Court of Admiralty were at variance with those in force in the courts of common law, were cases in which actions were brought by the owner of one ship against the owner of another ship, or by the owner of goods on board one ship against the owner of another ship in respect of a collision. In either of these cases the Admiralty rule and the common law rule with respect to damages differed, the Admiralty rule being as I have already expressed it, and the common law rule being that where both vessels were in fault in the sense that those navigating the plaintiff's ship were guilty of negligence which substantially contributed to the collision, the plaintiff could not recover. It was, I apprehend, to prevent this variance, and to make the practice in both courts uniform, that this sub-section was passed; but it seems to me equally clear that its effect must be confined to those cases in which such variance previously existed. Where the action is brought, not by one shipowner or goods owner against a ship which has run into the carrying vessel, but by the goods owner who seeks to enforce the contract for carriage against the owner of the ship to whom he has intrusted his goods, no such variance in practice could arise.

Manisty, J.—I concur with my brother Pollock in the conclusions at which he has arrived, and in the reasons which he has stated in support of them, but, as the case is somewhat novel, and as it will probably be submitted to a higher tribunal, I wish to add a few observations of my own as to the liability of the defendants upon their contract. The question which lies at the root of the case is, to what cause ought the loss of the plaintiffs' goods to be attributed? Doubtless the collision of the defendants' ship the Crown Prince, with the defendants' ship, Atjeh, was the causa proxima but according to the finding of the jury the negligence of the defendants' servants on board the two ships was the causa causans in other words, the efficient cause of the loss. Now it is a settled rule of law that, in the case of an action on a contract of marine insurance, regard is to be had to the causa proxima (see Thomas v. Hopper, E. B. & E. 1038); but in the case of an action for breach of a contract contained in a bill of lading, regard is to be had to the causa causans (Lloyd v. The General Iron Screw Company 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 32; 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 588; 3 H. & C. 284, and the other cases cited by my brother Pollock). It was conceded on the part of the defendants that, but for the express exception in the bill of lading of the negligence of their servants on board the Crown Prince, they would have been liable for the loss in question, notwithstanding collision is one of the excepted perils in the bill of lading; but they contend that, without any express exception of the negligence, of their servants on board the Atjeh, they are protected by the exception of collision. I am unable to see any sound ground for the distinction between the negligence of the defendants' servants on board the Crown Prince and similar negligence of their servants on board the Atjeh. No authority was cited in support of it, but it was contended that there was an implied contract in the bill of lading that the defendants' servants on board the carrying ship (the Crown Prince) would use all reasonable care to carry safely, and that consequently it was necessary expressly to except their negligence, whereas there was no such implied contract wfth respect to their servants in any other ship, and therefore there was no need of any express exception of their negligence. It seems to me that this argument admits of a ready answer, that there is no implied contract whatever in the case. The contract contained in the bill of lading is express, namely, to carry the goods safely, and deliver them in good order and condition subject to certain specified exceptions which do not include the negligence of their servants on board either of the two ships. Having regard to the finding of the jury that the Atjeh was mainly to blame, but that the Crown Prince was also in some degree to blame, I think that the defendants are liable by virtue of their contract for the whole of the loss.

Shipping—Charter-party—Exceptions — Detention by ice—Customary manner of loading — Demurrage.

Where it was agreed by charter-party that the plaintiff's ship should "proceed to Cardiff, E. Bute Dock, and there load in the customary manner from the agents of the freighters a full and complete cargo of rail iron; the cargo to be loaded as fast as the steamer can take on board, and stow within the customary working hours of the port, commencing when the steamer is in berth and ready to load. If longer detained, merchants to pay steamer 30*l. per day demurrage. Detention by frost, &c., not to be reckoned as lay days, &c.," and the ship was intended to be loaded with C. and Co.'s iron, though this fact was unknown to the plaintiff when the charter-party was made, C. and Co.'s wharf being some distance from the E. Bute Dock, situated upon a canal which leads into the W. Bute Dock, and their customary manner of loading being to bring rail iron from their wharf in lighters into the W. Bute Dock, and thence into the E. Bute Dock, and all other makers of rail iron, about six in number, having wharves upon one or other of the two docks, and loading vessels either directly from the quay, when they are alongside, or by lighters, and the ship arrived in the E. Bute Dock, and loading was commenced, but was interrupted for sixteen days by reason of a severe frost, which prevented the lighters coming down the canal from C. and Co.'s wharf to the W. Bute Docks, the docks themselves being free from ice, the defendants were held to be protected by the exception in the charter-party as to detention by frost.*

FURTHER CONSIDERATION.

The action was brought to recover sixteen day's demurrage for detention of the plaintiff's steamship Cid.

At the trial at Swansea Summer Assizes 1881, Pollock, B. referred all questions of fact in the cause to a special referee.

The facts, as found by the referee, are sufficiently set out in the judgment of the learned judge.

Cur. adv. vult.

POLLOCK, B.—This case was tried before me at Swansea, and reserved for further consideration. It was an action on a charter-party of the steamship Cid, and the material facts as set out in the statement of claim are that the plaintiff's steamer should, with all possible despatch, sail and proceed to Cardiff East Bute Dock, and there load in the customary manner from the agent of the freighters a full and complete cargo of rail iron. The cargo was to be loaded as fast as steamer can take on board and stow within the customary working hours of the port (Sundays and holidays excepted), commencing when the steamer is in berth, and to be discharged as fast as the custom of the port of delivery will admit, but not less than 200 tons per working day, and, if longer detained, merchants to pay steamer 30*l.* per day demurrage. Then follows this clause: "Detention by frost, floods, riots, and strikes of workmen, accidents to machinery or quarantine, not to be reckoned as lay days." Under this charter-party the Cid proceeded to Cardiff East Bute Dock, and was there ready to take cargo, and it is admitted that there was delay in fact, the only question being whether this delay is excused by the exception in the charter-party. One argument on the construction of the charter-party I may notice and deal with at once. It is said that as the charter-party is made between the "owner and the agents of the freighters," the provision as to loading in the customary manner must be con fined to the custom of loading adopted by Austen Brothers, but it is clear to me that in the ordinary acceptation of the words, they must mean all persons who would load such a cargo as the charter-party stipulates for, and therefore, amongst others would be, in the present case, Messrs. Crawshay, whose cargo it was, in fact, intended to ship. It is found as a fact, by the special referee, to whom this case was sent for a finding as to the facts, that the shipowner was ignorant of the existence of any custom prevailing at the port of loading; but Hudson v. Ede (ubi sup.) lays it down that ignorance on the part of the shipowner is immaterial if the custom is well known and acted on at the port of loading. I have already mentioned the objection that the name of Messrs. Crawshay, their iron, and their wharf, were not mentioned in the charter-party, and have said that they must be treated as agents of the freighters, and therefore, when we consider what the customary manner of loading is, we must take in all manners of loading so as to establish the usage. Another point made on the part of the plaintiff was that "customary manner" is equivalent to actual manner of loading the ship, and does not include the carriage of goods from a distance to the dock where the ship is lying, and Lawson v. Burness (ubi sup.) and Tapscott v. Balfour (ubi sup.) were quoted in support of this contention; but the point is not quite the same in the present case, for the argument is that the Cid, being in the dock where she is to load, there is a customary manner of loading which appertains to the port. The facts, as found by the special referee, are that there are two docks at Cardiff, the East Bute Dock and the West Bute Dock, connected by a canal with locks at both ends. The West Bute Dock is also connected by a junction canal with the Glamorganshire canal. Iron rails shipped at Cardiff are almost entirely manufactured by some five or six makers having their works at some distance from Cardiff, Messrs. Crawshay and Co. being one of such makers. With the exception of Messrs. Crawshay, the other manufacturers rent wharves or quays in the docks themselves for their own exclusive use, some of them in the East Bute Dock and some in the West Bute Dock. Messrs. Crawshay, who manufacture their rails about twenty-four miles from Cardiff, have no exclusive wharf in either dock, but they have a wharf on the Glamorganshire Canal nearly opposite the Junction Canal leading from the Glamorganshire Canal to the East Bute Dock. There are in the docks berths alongside the dock quays which are open to the public in turn on application to the dock authorities. Vessels are also moored in tiers in the dock basin for the purpose of being loaded with rails and other cargo from lighters brought alongside the vessels. A railway runs along the quays round both docks. Large steamers cannot go into the West Bute Dock, and shippers having wharves in the West Bute Dock send their iron by lighters into East Bute Dock to load vessels that may be in that dock. Crawshays forward their iron from their wharf in lighters propelled by lightermen to alongside vessels in the East Bute Dock, which vessels are moored at the top of that dock for the purpose of receiving their cargo from their canal wharf. On the 8th Jan., in anticipation of the Cid's arrival, the whole of the iron intended for her had been sent down from Messrs. Crawshay's works and deposited at their wharf. The Cid arrived on the 11th Jan., and was berthed at the top of the East Bute Dock, that being the place where Messrs. Crawshay always loaded vessels with their rail iron. On the 13th loading was commenced and continued, with some interruption from ice until the 16th. From the 16th Jan. all the usual approaches from Crawshay's wharf to the docks were impassable, and continued so until the 31st Jan., when iron was again sent through, and the shipping was completed on the 2nd Feb. Every exertion was made to forward the iron after the canal communication was practically open, and the irregular delivery after the 14th was occasioned by frost alone. During all this time the docks themselves were not frozen; steamers and lighters could move about, and vessels could go out to sea. No reasonable means could have been adopted to convey the iron from the wharf into the docks, neither could any marketable railway iron have been obtained from any other source. The result is that there are four methods of loading which may be said to be the usual modes of loading. First, loading from the wharf when the vessel is alongside; secondly, by lighters when the vessel is not alongside; thirdly, by lighters coming from the other dock through the canal joining the two docks; and fourthly, Messrs. Crawshay's iron brought in lighters from their wharf upon the other canal. Under the circumstances it seems to me to be substantially the same as if the iron had been in the West Bute Dock, and if so it would come within the finding in the ninth paragraph of the report. It seems to go one step further and say that, since the iron is taken from the Glamorganshire canal, and that was blocked with ice, the delay falls within the exceptions in the charter-party taken in conjunction with the "loading in the customary manner." I know of no case exactly similar to the present; that of Hudson v. Ede (ubi sup.) comes nearest to it. In that case "a charter-party provided that the ship should proceed to Sulina, or outside, in sufficient depth of water to load the ship, and there load from the agents of the merchants a complete cargo of grain. The cargo to be brought and taken from alongside the ship at the ports of loading and discharge at charterer's expense and risk. Thirty running days to be allowed (if the ship be not sooner despatched) for loading and unloading, and ten days on demurrage over and above the laying days at 6*l.* a day; detention by ice and quarantine not to be reckoned as laying days. There are no storehouses at the port of Sulina itself; but the grain shipped at Sulina is kept at places higher up the Danube, and is brought by steam lighters down the river and unloaded direct into ships waiting their lading at Sulina. The ship being ready to load notice was given to the charterer; but after six days before any cargo had been supplied, the river immediately above Sulina became frozen up, and so remained for two months, the port of Sulina itself remaining open. The ship having been thus delayed waiting for cargo, held, that this was a detention by ice within the meaning of the charter-party; and that, though the circumstances of the port were unknown to the shipowner, yet, being well known in the grain trade, they must be taken to have been the basis of the contract: and that whenever there was no access to the ship by reason of ice from any of the storing places from which merchandise was conveyed direct to the ship, the exception in the charter-party would apply." The ground of the judgment is put in this way, that the conveyance by the river is part of the act of loading, "and as there are no storehouses for grain at Sulina, the case seems to be the same as if the ice lay between the shore, from which of necessity the grain must be brought, and the vessel in which it must be loaded, so that the parties must have contemplated that portion of the river as a part of the waters through which the cargo was to be conveyed between the shore and the ship, and in which detention by ice was to be provided against. The whole of that reasoning would apply to the present case, and as it must be taken to have been in the contemplation of both parties that the agents of the freighters would load in any of the modes customary in the port of loading, the latter had the option of loading in any of the four ways that are found to be customary. Another argument was based upon the case of Kearon v. Pearson (ubi sup.). It is said that the words "load with usual despatch" implied that the cargo was ready to be loaded, and it was argued that Messrs. Crawshay's iron ought to have been brought down from their wharf to the dock in readiness to be placed on board the steamer. If the iron had been at their manufactory I agree that this would have been a good argument; but the iron lying at Crawshay's wharf is ready for loading, according to the ordinary usage of the port, so that this case really has no application. I therefore think that there should be verdict and judgment for the defendants with costs.

COVERDALE, TODD, AND CO. v. GRANT AND CO.

Shipping—Charter-party—Exception—Frost preventing loading—Demurrage.

Where it was agreed by charter-party that the plaintiffs' ship should proceed to Cardiff, and there load in the customary manner a cargo of iron, the charter-party containing the following clauses: "Cargo to be supplied as fast as steamer can receive. Time to commence from the vessel being ready to load, and ten days on demurrage at 40l. per day. Except in case of hands striking work, or frost, or floods, or any other unavoidable accidents preventing the loading and unloading, in which case owners to have the option of employing the steamer in some short voyage trade until receipt of written notice from charterers that they are ready to resume employment without delay to the ship," and the ship arrived at Cardiff, and the loading was commenced, but was afterwards interrupted by frost, it was held that the exception applied to delay occasioned by the excepted causes after the loading was commenced, and was not confined to the commencement of the loading being prevented.

FURTHER CONSIDERATION.

The action was brought to recover demurrage and damages for the detention of the plaintiffs' steamship Mennythorpe.

At the trial, at Swansea Summer Assize 1881, all issues of fact were referred by Pollock, B. to a special referee.

The following are the material facts found by the referee:—

It was agreed by charter-party of the 16th Dec. 1880 that the plaintiffs' ship should proceed to Cardiff East Bute Dock, and there load a full and complete cargo in the customary manner from the agents of the freighters. The cargo was to be supplied as fast as steamer can receive at all hatchways. The time to commence from the vessel being ready to load and unload, and ten days on demurrage at 40*l.* per day; except in case of hands striking work, or frosts or floods, or any other unavoidable accidents, preventing the loading, in which case owners to have the option of employing the steamer in some short voyage trade, until receipt of written notice from charterers that they are ready to resume employment without delay to the ship.

The steamer arrived in Cardiff on the 10th Jan. 1881, and commenced to load on the following day. On the 13th and the two following days loading was delayed by ice, and from Jan. 16th to the 21st it was entirely suspended, owing to the same cause. The delay in loading was caused by the frost alone, and the iron could not have been brought into the dock by any reasonable means, neither could the charterers have obtained or loaded the vessel with a like cargo from any other place or by any other means.

Cur. adv. vult.

POLLOCK, B. (after referring to the facts) said:—The same principle is involved in this case as in that of Kay v. Field (ante, p. 630), and I must give judgment for the defendants for the same reasons. There were, however, other considerations argued, which I will briefly notice. It was argued that the exception as to frost applies only to the clause in which it occurs; that is to say that it applies only to the "time to commence," and not to "cargo to be supplied." In my opinion, that is not the proper construction. The result of that argument is, that the exception would apply only to cases in which the loading had not been commenced, and that, as in the present case, the loading had been commenced and was afterwards interrupted by frost, it has no application. The argument may be supported by the strict grammatical sense of the word, but I think we are bound to give it the ordinary and popular sense, and the subsequent words "resume employment" tend to show that this is the proper construction. Again, it was urged that the stipulation as to the owners being at liberty to make use of the vessel for a short voyage shows that it was contemplated that the vessel would be empty; but the argument is based upon the ground of the inconvenience to the owner rather than on the construction of the agreement itself; and, unless the inconvenience were so great and so manifest that it was clear the parties could not have contemplated its occurrence, weight ought not to be attached to it. I therefore give judgment for the defendants.

THE STORNOWAY.

Lien—Freight—Hire of ship—Charter-party.

The goods of a shipper in a general ship are not affected by a clause in a charter-party between the person working the ship and the shipowner of which he has no notice or knowledge, giving the shipowner a lien on all cargo and freight for arrears of hire due under the charter-party.

Semble, the fact that no bills of lading were given for the goods makes no difference in this respect as to the rights and liabilities of the parties.

T. hired a ship from M., and by the charter-party gave M. a lien on all cargo and freight for arrears of hire.

T. advertised the ship as a general ship, and gave no notice of the charter-party.

B. shipped goods and obtained a receipt, but no bill of lading. The hire being in arrears, M. detained the goods of B. for the whole of the arrears.

Held, that M. was not entitled to detain the goods of B., and that B. was entitled to damages for their detention.

THIS was an action for non-delivery and wrongful detention of thirty-nine casks of linseed oil.

The plaintiff, a seed-crusher at Lowestoft, shipped the casks on board the Stornoway at that port on the 10th May 1881, to be carried to London. The Stornoway was a regular trader between Lowestoft and London as a general ship. No bills of lading were given in respect of the goods, but the agent of the steamer at Lowestoft gave a receipt for the goods. The Stornoway arrived at London on the following day, the 11th May.

The plaintiff was willing to pay the freight, 5*l.* 10*s.*, for the carriage of the goods, but the defendants claimed to detain them under the provisions of a certain charter-party, asserting that by that document they had a lien on the goods for the whole of the chartered freight then due.

The conditions in the charter-party on which the defendant relied, were stated in the statement of defence as follows:

5. . . . On or about the 10th Oct. 1880 the defendants, by a charter-party made between them and Julius H. Thompson and Co., let to the said J. T. and Co. the steamship Stornoway for the sole use and benefit of the said J. T. and Co. for the term of three or six calendar months from the 25th Oct. then next, at the charterers' option, they giving fourteen days notice of discontinuance. The hire of the said steamship was to be paid at and after the rate of 140*l.* sterling per calendar month, less a commission of 5 per cent. due to the charterers, and was to be payable fortnightly in advance in cash until the vessel was again returned by the said J. T. and Co. to the plaintiffs.

6. It was further agreed in the said charter-party, by and between the defendants and the said J. T. and Co., that the defendants were to have a lien upon the cargo and freight for arrear of hire of the said steamship, and that the charterers were to have a lien upon the said ship for the monthly freight, payable in advance, and also that, in default of payment of hire when due, the owners were to be at liberty immediately to resume possession of the said steamship, and to claim damages. . . . .

On the arrival of the said steamship at London the defendants had not received the last fortnightly instalment of hire due under the charter-party, and the charterers having suspended payment, the defendants landed the thirty-nine casks of oil at a wharf, and detained them to satisfy their claim for hire under the charter-party. Before the trial it had been arranged between the parties that the oil should be given up, the plaintiff paying the sum of 85*l.*, which was sufficient to cover the arrears of the hire of the steamer, to the defendants' solicitors, which sum was to be considered as representing the casks of oil.

The plaintiff in his reply averred that he had no notice of the alleged charter-party.

The case was heard on the 21st and 22nd March by Sir Robert Phillimore, assisted by assessors.

R. T. Reid for plaintiff.—The question is whether a shipowner can have a lien on goods shipped on board his vessel as a general ship by reason of a secret lien clause in a charter-party of which the shipper has no notice. The agent for the ship at Lowestoft signed receipts as agent for the ship and for J. T. and Co., thereby leading shippers to suppose that J. T. and Co. were owners of the ship, and J. T. and Co. could not detain these goods for freight due for the carriage of other goods; so long as the plaintiff paid, or was prepared to pay, the freight due for the carriage of his own goods, he was entitled to have them delivered to him. If the plaintiff had received bills of lading which incorporated the charter-party, he would be bound by the terms of the charter-party, but he would be entitled to refuse to have the goods carried on such terms and to have them returned to him, if he received no previous notice of the charter-party:

Peek v. Larsen, 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 163; L. Rep. 12 Eq. 378; 25 L. T. Rep. N.S. 580.

The ground of that decision is that the shipper had no notice of the charter-party, and that is the case here. If a shipper contracts by bill of lading with the master of a ship, he is entitled to claim performance from the owner, if he had no knowledge that the ship was chartered:

Sandemann v. Scurr, 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 446; L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 86; 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 608;

That is, that the rights and remedies and obligations of the owner in such a case are the same as those of the charterer with whom the shipper has contracted on the supposition that he is the owner. Even if there were was a lien on these goods, it was lost when they were landed without the notice required by the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), s. 28, being given. It was also vitiated by being asserted for more than the freight actually due at the time.

McLeod, Q.C. (with him Butt, Q.C.) for the defendants.—The lien for freight or hire of the ship binds all goods upon the ship; the remedy of the shipper is against the charterer if he has no notice of the terms of the charter-party:

Small v. Moates, 9 Bing. 579.

R. T. Reid in reply.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The question in dispute in the present case was clearly stated by the plaintiff's counsel in the course of his argument. The facts were proved or admitted; the point of law alone remains for decision. There are three sets of persons involved in the transaction out of which the action arises, but two only are parties to the action: (1) Barber, the plaintiff, is a seed crusher at Lowestoft, and owner of this oil; (2) Methuen and Co, the defendants and owners of the Stornoway; (3) Thompson and Co., who are not parties to the action; who have offices in London and Lowestoft, and who have, as I understand, suspended payment. In October 1870 Messrs. Thompson and Co. enter into a charter-party with Messrs. Methuen and Co., the owners of the s.s. Stornoway, and the defendants in the present action, for the hire of that vessel from 25th of that month for three or six months at charterers' option, on fourteen days' notice of discontinuance. It was agreed by the charter-party that the defendants should retain a lien on cargo and freight for the arrears of the hire due. Thompson and Co. then advertise the Stornoway as a general ship plying between London and Lowestoft, and in the advertisements the names of Thompson and Co. only appear, no notice being given of the charter party, or that any person other than Thompson and Co. were owners of the ship. The Stornoway begins to run on the 7th Jan. 1881, and the plaintiff says he frequently sent goods to London by her. Under these circumstances Messrs. Barber and Co., the plaintiffs, ship their goods on board the Stornoway in ignorance of the fact that the defendants were owners of the vessel, or that there was any charter-party from any person to Messrs. Thompson and Co. The goods are carried to London, and there seized and detained by the defendants, in virtue of the lien given by the charter-party. On the 16th May the plaintiff goes to Thompson and Co., in London, who by that time have suspended payment, and they inform him that the oil has been seized in consequence of a dispute between themselves and the defendants, Messrs. Methuen and Co. Correspondence ensues between plaintiff and defendants, the latter saying that they can only recognise Thompson and Co. as charterers, and that, as there are no bills of lading, they must be taken to be owners of the cargo as well. On the 24th May the plaintiff arrests the ship under the provisions of the Admiralty Court Act, the affidavit to lead the warrant affirming that there was no owner domiciled in England or Wales. She is, however, released at once—I believe the same day. On the 1st June the oil was given up on deposit of 85*l.* being made in place of it.

The issue really is whether the defendants, Methuen and Co., can claim a lien on goods the property of the plaintiff Barber, carried by the Stornoway, in respect of arrears of hire due from the charterers Thompson and Co., the plaintiff at the time of the shipment knowing nothing of the charter-party or its conditions. I have been referred to three cases upon the subject, only one of which, however, appears at all applicable to the present case, and I am sure that the industry of counsel would have furnished me with any others, did such exist. No direct precedent has, however, been produced, and the case must be decided on general principles. The marginal note of the one case (Peek v. Larsen, 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 163; L. Rep. 12 Eq. 378: 25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 580), to which I have referred, and which was decided by Lord Romilly, Master of the Rolls, in 1871, is as follows: "Where a vessel about to sail is advertised as a general ship," as was the case here, "an intending shipper is not bound to inquire as to the existence of any charter-party. A person who, without notice of any charter-party, has placed goods on board a vessel which has been advertised as a general ship, is entitled to have his goods returned to him if the captain refuses to sign bills of lading, except subject to a charter-party containing objectionable provisions. A Norwegian vessel was advertised as a general ship by Messrs. C. and Co., an English firm, described in the advertisement as brokers. The plaintiffs entered into an agreement with Messrs. C. and Co. for the carriage of certain goods at a stipulated rate of freight, and placed the goods on board before they had notice of any charter-party affecting the ship. It afterwards proved that Messrs. C. and Co. were charterers of the vessel, under a charter-party which provided that the owner should have a lien for freight, dead freight, and demurrage. The captain refused to sign the bills of lading, except subject to the charter-party, or to return the goods to the plaintiffs. Held, that the owners of the ship were not entitled to retain the goods in satisfaction of their claims under the charter-party, and that the plaintiffs were entitled to have the goods delivered to them free from any claim by the owners;" and in his judgment Lord Romilly says: "I am of opinion that this is a very clear case. I think that it depends upon this: Had the plaintiffs, the shippers, notice of this charter-party, or was it their bounden duty to inquire whether there was a charter party or not? I fully admit that every person is bound by the contents of a charter-party of which he has notice. If he does not choose to inquire what the contents of the charter-party are that is his own fault, and he must take the consequences of it. But I am of opinion that, until he is either set upon inquiry, or has notice of a charter-party, he is not bound to assume that there is a charter-party. All that the plaintiffs knew in this case was the advertisement. That advertisement was inserted in the paper in consequence of the charter-party entered into between the owner and Messrs. Claxton; but anyone reading it would suppose that Messrs. Claxton were the agents of the owner of the ship." It appears to me that this language of the learned Master of the Rolls is directly applicable to the present case. It seems to me that the defendants' contention is contrary to the general principles of equity and justice, and also to the decision which I have just quoted. I therefore pronounce in favour of the plaintiffs' claim, the question of damages for the detention of the oil to be referred to the registrar and merchants.

The Whitecross Wire and Iron Company Limited v. Savill and others.

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Ship—General average—Damage to cargo by water used to extinguish fire.

Where a ship cauyht fire in harbour while discharging her cargo, and in order to extinguish the fire, water was poured down the hold on the part of the cargo that remained on board:

Held (affirming the judgment of Pollock, B.), that the shipowners were liable to a claim for general average contribution by the owner of the cargo in respect of damage to the cargo caused by the water.

This was an appeal from the judgment of Pollock, B. at the trial, which took place in London.

The action was brought by owners of cargo against shipowners to recover a general average contribution.

The jury were discharged at the trial, and the following facts were proved or admitted:

The plaintiffs were consignees of certain fencing wire, which was shipped on board the Himalaya, an iron vessel belonging to the defendants, to be carried from London to Wellington in New Zealand. The Himalaya sailed from London on the 7th Oct. 1876, and arrived at Wellington towards the end of Jan. 1877. She went alongside a wharf to discharge her cargo, which consisted of about 1400 tons.

On the 16th Feb., early in the morning, a fire broke out in the hold. All the cargo had then been discharged except between 50 and 100 tons. The plaintiffs' wire was still on board. The ship being in danger, the captain ordered water to be poured down the hold, and by these means the fire was extinguished. The plaintiffs' wire was injured by the water which was poured upon it.

At the time of the fire the Himalaya drew about eleven feet of water, and the depth at the wharf where she was lying was about twenty-two feet at high water. It would, therefore, have been possible to extinguish the fire by scuttling her, and afterwards to raise her again.

Pollock, B. held that the defendants were liable to a claim for general average contribution in respect of the loss sustained by the plaintiffs through pouring water on the wire, and gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

The defendants appealed.

Sir H. S. Gifford, Q.C. and Pollard, for the defendants.—What was done by the captain of the Himalaya was not a general average act, and cannot give rise to a general average contribution. Judgment was given in favour of the plaintiffs on the authority of the two cases of Stewart v. The West India and Pacific Steamship Company (1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 528; 2 Id. 32; 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 820; 28 L. T. Rep. N. S 742; L. Rep. 8 Q. B. 88, 362), and Achard v. Ring (2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 34; 31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 647), but the point now in question was not directly decided in either of those cases, and what was said on the subject is not binding on the Court of Appeal. The practice in England has been not to treat such a loss as this as a general average loss (2 Arnould on Marine Insurance, part 3, cap. 4, page 817, 5th edit.), and American decisions to the contrary are not binding here. The case of Schmidt v. The Royal Mail Steamship Company (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 217; 45 L. J. 646, Q. B.) is distinguishable, because there, if the ship had been scuttled, she would have been totally lost, whereas here the ship could have been scuttled, and sunk in comparatively shallow water, which would have extinguished the fire, and could afterwards have been raised. In order to give rise to a claim for general average contribution there must be an intentional sacrifice of part in order to save the whole adventure, and here there has not been such a sacrifice as is required to bring the case within that rule;

Shepherd v. Kottgen, 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 544; 37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 618; 2 C. P. Div. 585.

There was not such imminent peril of destruction to the whole adventure as is necessary in order to support this claim:

Harrison v. The Bank of Australasia, 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 198; 25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 944; L. Rep. 7 Ex. 39.

Danger of damage is not sufficient. The captain only did his ordinary duty, and adopted the usual means of extinguishing fire; this cannot occasion a general average loss. The vessel had arrived at her port of destination before the fire broke out; the common adventure was at an end, and the law as to general average had ceased to be applicable. At all events the claim cannot extend to any part of the wire which had become unmerchantable through damage by fire before the water was poured on it.

Cohen, Q.C. (Hollams with him) for the plaintiffs.—The practice of average adjusters professes, and is intended, to follow the law, and if the practice is wrong it cannot control the law:

Atwood v. Sellar, 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 233; 42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 644; 5 Q. B. Div. 286.

The cases which have been already cited show that the practice of average adjusters not to allow damage done to cargo by water is contrary to law, and it is mentioned with disapproval in 2 Arnould on Marine Insurance, page 914, 2nd edit., and in Bailey on General Average, pages 81, 82, 2nd edit. The law in America is clearly contrary to this practice:

Nimick v. Holmes, 25 Pennsylv. Rep. 366.

[He was stopped by the Court.]

Pollard replied.

Lord Coleridge, C.J.—I am of opinion that our judgment ought to be for the respondents. The question for decision is one which comes, as it is said, before a Court of Appeal for the first time; in one sense that is true, for certain well-known principles have now to be applied to this particular set of circumstances for the first time, but the facts bring the case within the well-understood principles of general average. The master, for the interest of the owners of the ship and cargo, deliberately sacrifices part of the cargo in order to preserve the rest and the ship. To give rise to a claim for general average this must be done where there is a peril, and it must be done for the preservation of the adventure. Here the ship had reached the port, and so in a certain sense the voyage was over; she was in port, and was moored alongside the quay; part of the cargo was unloaded, but a considerable part,—from 50 to 100 tons out of a cargo of about 1400 tons,—was left in the ship. A fire broke out in the hold; the fire was burning in that part of the hold where the remainder of the cargo which had not yet been unloaded was stowed. In order to save the ship and the rest of the cargo the captain caused water to be poured down the hold, by which the fire in the cargo was put out; by that the fire was extinguished, and the ship, and what was left on board of the cargo, were saved. A part of the cargo was damaged by the water which was poured down the hold, and the question is whether this gives rise to a claim for general average contribution by the owners of the cargo against the shipowners. Except in the case of there being authority to the contrary, I could not see why this should not be general average, or indeed, how could it be disputed that it is so, for in my opinion it comes clearly within any definition of a general average loss that is to be found in any of the books on the subject, either English or American. But it is said that up to the year 1873 the practice of average adjusters would exclude this loss from general average, and that Baily has laid down the principle that the definition of general average contribution does not apply to a case of this kind. But Bailey lays down this as the rule, giving his opinion at the same time that it is difficult to reconcile it with common sense; he says, "The damage done to cargo by pouring water upon it to extinguish a fire, or by water admitted into a vessel's hold when she is scuttled to extinguish a fire, is by rule 10 excluded from general average. In defence of this practice no valid reason can be urged. It is based on an erroneous idea that a general average cannot arise when the degree of danger is so great that it amounts to a moral certainty of total loss, and on a fanciful distinction between the degree of danger existing in cases of fire, and the degree existing when a vessel is on her beam-ends, or on the point of foundering, a distinction which the ingenuity of argument may draw, but which will not bear the test of common sense": (Baily on General Average, 2nd edit. pp. 81, 82.) The author could not help laying down the practice as it existed, but at the same time he gives his own opinion that it cannot be justified. Although this was the English practice it was not the American. I cannot say for certain what the American practice may have been in former times, but whether this practice ever existed there or not, it certainly has not been the American practice for a long time past. Parsons lays down that this is general average (2 Parsons on Marine Insurance, 288), and there is nothing opposed to this view, but the practice of average adjusters, and against that there is the protest of an eminent writer, which I have read.

Then how does authority stand on this question? There is none in conflict with us if we adopt the view which I have expressed. On the contrary, the case of Stewart v. The West India and Pacific Steamship Company (1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 528; L. Rep. 8 Q. B. 88, 362) as far as it goes, is very like this case. The circumstances of that case were like the circumstances of this, but the case was decided for the defendants because these words occurred in the bills of lading under which the plaintiffs' goods were shipped: "Average, if any, to be adjusted according to British custom." Both in the course of the argument and in the judgment the judges who decided that case in the Court of Queen's Bench point out that in ordinary cases this practice is not correct, but they held that they were bound by the contract, whatever the law was. In the judgment of the court, delivered by Quain, J., he says: "On these facts we are clearly of opinion that the loss was, according to the general law, properly the subject of a general average contribution. It was a voluntary and intentional sacrifice of the barque made under the pressure of imminent danger, and for the benefit and with a view to secure the safety of the whole adventure then at risk. No case has been cited in which the exact point to be decided has arisen in our courts, but we have been referred to an American case in which the question was considered and decided." He then cites the case of Nimick v. Holmes (25 Pennsylv. Rep. 366), which has been referred to in the argument of the present case, and assents to the conclusion arrived at by the American court, which he conceives to be in accordance with the law of England. The case of Stewart v. The West India and Pacific Steamship Company went to appeal, and was affirmed in the Exchequer Chamber (2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 32; L. Rep. 8 Q. B. 362). It is true that, in delivering the judgment of the court, Brett, J. there uses words which, I agree with Mr. Pollard, are guarded and leave the point open; but he decides the case on the clear ground that the contract was made subject to the custom by the express words of the bill of lading. He does not intimate any opinion as to how the other point ought to be decided, for it was not necessary to do so. Then there is another decision in the Queen's Bench; the same kind of case came before the court in the year 1876: Schmidt v. The Royal Mail Steamship Company (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 217; 44 L. J. 646, Q B.). The question there was not exactly the same as what has to be decided here; the question was whether the bill of lading could override the general law and whether, in spite of the bill of lading, the damage done entitled the owners of the goods to claim a general average contribution, and the shipowners were liable, and Blackburn and Lush, JJ. expressly held that they were so liable in spite of the terms of the bill of lading. In that case Blackburn, J. refers to a case that is not reported, Aspinwall v. The Merchant Shipping Company, as having decided this point. Therefore, there is further authority in favour of the view which I adopt. It is true that all the cases are in the Queen's Bench, but Schmidt v. The Royal Mail Steamship Company was decided by other judges than those who had constituted the court in Stewart v. The West India and Pacific Steamship Company. In the earlier case the judges were Cockburn, C.J. and Mellor and Quain, JJ., and in the later case Blackburn and Lush, JJ. Therefore, there are five judges of the Queen's Bench, who, without hesitation, hold this view to be correct, and there are three cases all like the present case in their circumstances, and all laying down the law as the respondents here contend it should be laid down. That is the state of the law on the first point; there is no authority to the contrary, but only the practice of average adjusters. The case of Atwood v Sellar (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 283; 5 Q. B. Div. 286) was cited for the expression that average adjusters profess to follow the law. In that case, in delivering the judgment of the Court of Appeal, Thesiger, L.J. said: "It was not, however, and could not reasonably be, contended for the defendants that the practice could not be put so high as a custom impliedly incorporated in the contract between the parties, and during the course of the argument we intimated our opinion . . . . that the question between the parties must be decided in accordance with legal principles and authority which the practice of the average adjusters professes to follow." This shows that it was clearly his opinion that the average adjusters might differ from the authorities, and if so the authorities ought to be preferred, and so the court held. The principle is stated in the same terms in all the books, and the question, the moment it arises in an English court, is decided in favour of the respondents' contention here, the courts saying that the custom could not be maintained, and an eminent average adjuster says so as well. This case, therefore, in my opinion, ought to be decided in accordance with the general law, which is contrary to the practice of average adjusters in England.

A second subordinate question was raised, and at first I thought there might be something in it. The contention was that these principles of mercantile law do not apply to a land adventure, and that here the voyage was at an end when the loss took place, and therefore a different rule was applicable. I should think Mr. Pollard is probably right in his contention that the voyage was at an end. I should suppose that if there was a voyage policy the liability of the underwriters would have ceased. But the mercantile adventure had not ceased; the bills of lading were in operation, and the parties to the adventure were still subject to their rights and liabilities under them. This I think is very plain, but if authority is wanted there is the case of Achard v. Ring (2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 34; 31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 647). There the circumstances were the same as here; the voyage was at an end and the ship was in port; but, because the loss occurred during the currency of the bill of lading, it was held that the liability attached. Therefore both on principle and on authority we must decide the second point for the respondents. There is one other point to be dealt with. According to my own judgment this rule which we have laid down ought to be applied only to so much of the cargo as was damaged by water. I agree that in law a distinction ought to be made between the different parts of the cargo, and the rule ought only to apply to so much of the cargo as was not damaged by fire, but was sacrificed by pouring water on it. But it is not open here to raise the question whether all the cargo in respect of which the claim is made is subject to the principle which I have laid down, for the point was not taken at the trial. For these reasons I am of opinion that our judgment ought to be for the respondents.

Brett, L.J.—In this case an action is brought by the owners or consignees of cargo against the shipowners to recover a general average contribution. The action was tried before Pollock, B. without a jury, and the appeal is from his judgment. There is, therefore, an appeal both on questions of fact and on questions of law. It seems that the ship was used in the ordinary way to carry goods from port to port. On this occasion she had arrived and had been in port some days before the damage in question occurred, and she was partly unloaded, but a portion of the cargo remained on board. A fire broke out in the hold. We do not know how it was caused. The fire got so far that, in my judgment, if nothing had been done, there would have been a practical destruction of the ship and cargo. It is true that the ship was in such a position that if she had been scuttled she probably would not have been totally destroyed, but there would have been great damage done to the ship, and the cargo would have been injured in the same way as it was in fact injured. The captain poured water down into the hold, and by so doing damaged that portion of the cargo which remained on board. I think the facts existing did cause such danger as to make it reasonable for him to do what he did. The result was that the fire was subdued, but injury was done to the plaintiffs' goods by the water, and the question is whether the plaintiffs can recover a general average contribution. I do not think the general rule as to what causes a general average contribution is much disputed. The question raised here is subject to all the ordinary rules of general average. There must be danger; if there is danger by fire, I think it follows that the use of water to extinguish the fire is not unreasonable. There must also be an intent to sacrifice the goods; which intent must either be inferred or proved. If there is an intent to sacrifice goods (which may or may not perish if not so sacrificed) in order to save the adventure, this would give rise to a claim for general average contribution. It was argued by Sir Hardinge Giffard and Mr. Pollard that there must be danger of an immediate total loss, and that if there was not such danger there was no claim to a general average contribution. I know there are some phrases in Arnould on Marine Insurance which are favourable to that view, but I cannot find that in the authorities there cited the law is so stated. Mere bonâ fides on the part of the captain is not sufficient, for it must be shown that there was danger in fact, not only that there was danger in the captain's mind. The rule is this: if it is shown that circumstances exist in fact which make it reasonable to sacrifice part of the whole, and if part is intentionally sacrificed, then that is a general average sacrifice and a general average loss. You cannot do away with the liability for general average by showing that perhaps there would not have been an immediate total loss. But it is said that such circumstances did not exist here as to make it a general average loss, because the ship was not in danger; first, because she was an iron ship, and, secondly, because she could have been scuttled in comparatively shallow water, and afterwards raised again. It is true that the iron of the vessel could not have been destroyed by fire, but where the fire had got well hold of the ship there would have been such a loss as a reasonable captain ought to prevent if possible; the ship would not be all iron, and the fire would burn any wood there was in her, so that, if there would not have been an absolute annihilation of her as a ship, still there would have been such a loss as to make it reasonable for the captain to pour water in as he did. It is said there was the choice of scuttling the ship, but if so, I cannot conceive how, if the ship had been scuttled, she would not have been entitled to a general average contribution; while as regards the cargo there would have been the same question as arises here. Because there was the alternative of scuttling the ship I cannot say that the captain acted unreasonably in what he did. It seems, therefore, that there was sufficient danger to justify what was done. There must be an intent to sacrifice the goods, and it is argued that pouring water in shows no intent to sacrifice. This argument is contrary to the judgment in the American case which has been referred to (Nimick v. Holmes, 25 Pennsylv. Rep. 369). It is said that what was done here cannot give rise to a claim for general average contribution, because it was the captain's duty. There is a fallacy in that argument, for if there are extraordinary circumstances the captain is bound to do his best for all concerned. If he sacrificed part of the cargo, and there were no reason for doing it, there would be no general average claim against the shipowner, but a claim for the value of the goods improperly sacrificed. Then can it be said that the captain sacrificed a part for the sake of the adventure? We may take it that some of the goods were on fire, but there was danger to the whole adventure; then what is the consequence? The captain intentionally damages the whole of the cargo that remains on board, and not only that part of it which has been already damaged by the fire. It is no answer to the plaintiff's claim to say that it was the captain's duty to act as he did. It is like the case of jettison; if a captain were to jettison goods without any reason for so doing, there would not be a claim for general average, but an action for the whole value of the goods. I think, therefore, that in the present case the goods were sacrificed by the shipowners, by the hand of the captain acting as the shipowners' agent, for the benefit of all concerned in the adventure. Therefore, all the circumstances exist here which make a general average sacrifice, a general average loss, and a general average contribution.

Then it is said the voyage was at an end. It is true the sailing voyage was at an end, but the maritime adventure was not at an end; the carriage was not finished, and therefore the maritime adventure was not concluded. It would not be ended until the goods were delivered, and therefore the maritime law applies. I agree with the Lord Chief Justice that Achard v. Ring (2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 34; 31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 647) is an authority on this point, and the ruling in that case was right. There is only one other point to which I need refer. It is argued that the wire was damaged by the fire and made unmerchantable, and therefore cannot be said to have been sacrificed by pouring water on it; but that point was not raised at the trial, where there was an opportunity for giving evidence, and it might have been met, and therefore it is not now open. Therefore, agreeing with the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench in Stewart v. The West India and Pacific Steamship Company (1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 528, 2 Id. 32; L. Rep. 8 Q. B. 88), and with the decisions in Aspinwall v. The Merchant Shipping Company, and Schmidt v. The Royal Mail Steamship Company (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 217; 45 L. J. 646, Q. B.). I think that in the Court of Appeal we ought to declare that these facts give rise to a general average contribution. As to the decision of the Court of Exchequer Chamber in Stewart v. The West India and Pacific Steamship Company (2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 32; L. Rep. 8 Q. B. 362), I may say that it is only limited by caution, because probably the judges knew of this practice of average adjusters, and would not decide the question. I have a clear opinion that the views of average adjusters, whether expressed separately or together in consultation, cannot and do not make the law of England.

Holker, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (ADMIRALTY).

Practice — Pleadings — Particulars — Damage to cargo—Defective condition—Reasonable fitness—Negligence.

In an action for damage to cargo in the Admiralty Division the defendants are entitled to particulars from the plaintiffs of an alleged "defective condition" of the ship by reason of which she is asserted to have been not "reasonably fit" to carry the cargo in question and also of an alleged act of negligence or breach of duty or contract on the part of the defendants causing the said damage.

The rule as to giving particulars of general allegations in pleadings is the same in the Admiralty as in the other divisions of the High Court of Justice.

This was an appeal from a decision of Sir Robert Phillimore, by which on Feb. 28th he had, in an action of damage to cargo, rejected an application of the defendants for particulars of certain defects in the Rory, the vessel in which the cargo was laden.

The statement of claim in the action contained, inter alia, the following averments:

1. The plaintiffs are merchants carrying on business in the city of London, the defendant is the owner of the steamship Rory.

And after alleging a shipment of a cargo of peas at Montreal to be carried to London on the terms contained in certain bills of lading, and the transfer of the bills of lading to the plaintiffs, and that the cargo arrived in a damaged condition such damage not being occasioned by any of the perils excepted in the bills of lading, continued:

8. The said damage and deterioration were, amongst other causes, occasioned by the defective condition of the said vessel by reason that the said vessel was not reasonably fit to carry the said cargo on the said voyage or by other the negligence or breach of duty or contract on the part of the defendant, his servants, or agents.

The defendant took out a summons before the registrar for particulars of the defective condition of the Rory alleged in the 8th paragraph, on which summons the registrar made an order on the 25th Feb. for the particulars to be given; from this order the plaintiff appealed to the judge, who on the 28th Feb. allowed the appeal and rejected the defendant's application for particulars, giving leave to appeal to the Court of Appeal.

On April 4th the appeal came on for hearing.

Cohen, Q.C. and G. Bruce for the appellants (defendants).

Butt, Q.C. and Gray for the respondents (plaintiffs) referred to The Freedom (3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 219; L. Rep. 2 Ad. & Ecc. 346; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 229).

Lord Coleridge, C.J.—I am of opinion that this appeal should be allowed. The action is in the Admiralty Division, and is brought by the indorsees of bills of lading of cargo shipped on board a steamship against the ship owners, for the delivery of such cargo in a damaged condition, such damage being alleged in the statement of claim not to have been occasioned by any of the excepted perils in the bills of lading, but by reason of the vessel not being reasonably fit to carry the said cargo, or by the negligence of the defendants or their servants. I think that such a mode of pleading as this general allegation in the plaintiffs' statement of claim may be allowed in order to avoid prolixity; but then, to prevent the defendants from being taken by surprise, this should be supplemented by particulars; and if defendants ask for it, the plaintiffs should be required to say on what defects in the vessel they rely as making it unfit for the carriage of the cargo. If it be only an inference they draw from the state in which the cargo was when it arrived, let them say so, but they are bound to communicate what they know; and if at any other time before the trial they should obtain any other knowledge of any matter occasioning the damage on which they should wish to rely, they should give it to the defendants by amending the particulars, which they might do from time to time as they should obtain fresh information on the subject. I do not think that the general principles laid down by Sir R. Phillimore in The Freedom (L. Rep. 2 Ad. & Ecc. 346; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 229) conflict with this. The object of the rules of pleading is, he says, to prevent either party being taken by surprise at the hearing; and if during the trial it should appear that one of them relied on any act of which he had knowledge which took the other by surprise, Sir R. Phillimore would, it appears, adjourn the trial in order to enable such other to produce evidence in contradiction. That may have been very proper in the Admiralty, but it would not do to pursue that course in the Queen's Bench Division. In this case I think that the particulars asked for should be given.

Brett L.J.—It would be strange if a different rule as to giving particulars to the opposite party should prevail in the Admiralty Division from that which exists in the Queen's Bench Division, for this is really a common law action, which might have been brought in the Queen's Bench Division, but which has been given to the Admiralty Division by enabling the plaintiffs to enforce their claim against the ship. The rule, however, as to the delivery of particulars is founded on a consideration of matters which are applicable to all courts. In order to prevent the necessity of a minute statement of all the facts in pleading, a general allegation is often allowed, as for instance, in the case of fraud; but then, in order to have a fair trial, the party who makes such general allegation is always bound to give particulars of it to the opposite party, so that he should not be taken by surprise, and should also be able to defend himself against that with which he is charged. Now, how are the defendants to meet the case contained in the 8th paragraph of the statement of claim? Do the plaintiffs mean by what is there stated that there was a defect in the construction of the ship, or that there was not a proper crew, or that the master was drunk, or that he did not put the hatches on when there was bad weather. If the plaintiffs were to state in these particulars that they rely on one only of these matters, then there would be no necessity for the defendants to search all over the world to meet a case founded on the others, as they might otherwise have to do. I can see no reason why the procedure in this respect should be different in the Admiralty Division from what it is in the Queen's Bench Division. In The Freedom (3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 219; L. Rep. 2 Ad. & Ecc. 346; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 229) the reason given by Sir Robert Phillimore for not allowing particulars in the Admiralty Division is that, if the parties are taken by surprise, the Court of Admiralty can postpone the inquiry. That is not a reason to be adopted; in such a case as the present, the trial might have to be postponed on that account until a commission had been sent to the other side of the globe, and I cannot agree to there being a different process in such a matter between different divisions of the High Court.

APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (ADMIRALTY.)

Bottomry—General maritime law—Law of flag—Lex fori—Lex loci contractûs—Lex loci solutionis.

A contract of bottomry, covering the cargo as well as the ship, is governed by the law of the flag, i.e., by the law of the country to which the ship on which the bond is given belongs.

When cargo is shipped on board a foreign vessel it becomes subject to the law of the flag of the ship in which it is shipped in incidents arising out of the contract of shipment and with regard to which the contract is silent. "He who ships goods on board a foreign ship puts them on board to be dealt with by the law of the country of the ship, unless there is a stipulation to the contrary."

The Hamburg (Br. & Lush. 253) explained.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs from a decision of Sir Robert Phillimore, by which, on the 11th Nov., he had allowed a demurrer to the plaintiffs' reply, and held that communication with the owners of cargo, where possible, was necessary for the validity of a respondentia bond on cargo, when sued upon in England, as part of the general maritime law, notwithstanding that such communication was not necessary by the law of the state to which the ship belonged whose master had given the bond.

The case is fully reported in the court below, where the pleading demurred to is set out (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 470; 7 P. Div. 1; 45 L. T. Rep. N. S. 511).

The case was argued on the 11th and 12th May.

C. Hall, Q.C. and Phillimore for the appellants. —Where the law of the flag is clear, and the question of fact clearly raised by the pleadings, that law must govern a contract of bottomry. The Hamburg (Br & Lush. 253; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 1), when properly considered, is no authority to the contrary, as any statement of the sort in the head-note is not borne out by the report itself; the question there was whether, in the absence of proof of any particular law governing the bond, communication with the owners of the cargo was necessary by the general maritime law. Dr. Lushington says, at p. 259, and the judgment is affirmed by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, "I think it expedient to state that I shall govern my judgment by reference to the ordinary maritime law;" and then, after stating that questions of bottomry had in former cases, citing The Gratitudine (3 C. Rob. 240) and The Bonaparte (8 Moore P.C. 459), been decided by that law, he proceeds to say: "The state of the pleading is so vague, and the evidence so loose and unsatisfactory, that I can take no other course. Whenever any specific law is averred to be the governing law, with sufficient distinctness and proper evidence produced, I shall be ready to consider the question." In this case the law is distinctly averred, and therefore the time has arrived for considering the question, and the question is, so far as The Hamburg (ubi sup.) and previous cases are concerned, perfectly open. [Brett, L.J.—The question is not one of the construction of a contract, but of the nature and degree of the authority which a foreign master possesses to bind the English owner of cargo laden on board his ship.] I shall show that that authority is governed by the law of the flag. Lloyd v. Guibert (10 L. T. Rep. N. S 570; 35 L. J. 241, O. B.; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 26; and on appeal, L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 115; 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 602; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 283) turned upon the extent of the master's authority, and decided that its extent was governed by the law of the flag, The judgment in both courts was unanimous. In the court below Lord Blackburn, then Blackburn, J., says: "We think the power of the master to bind his owners personally is but a branch of the general law of agency;" and the Exchequer Chamber did not consider themselves bound by The Hamburg, as Willes, J., in delivering the judgment of the court, says: "The present question does not appear to have ever been decided in this country, and in America it has received opposite decisions equally entitled to respect. We must therefore deal with it as a new question." The supposed difference between Lloyd v. Guibert and this case on the ground that that was a question of the contract of affreightment cannot be sustained; both were really questions on the law of agency. That the law of the flag governs questions of hypothecation, whether of ship or cargo, is shown by The Karnak (L. Rep. 2 P. C. 505; 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 159; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 103, 276); and the more recent case of Kleinwort, Cohen, and Co. v. The Cassa Maritima of Genoa (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 358; 2 App Cas. 156; 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 118) is no authority to the contrary; it merely followed The Bonaparte and The Hamburg on the question of fact, without reference to the applicability of foreign law. The law of the flag is applicable to cases when the agency of the master in case of necessity to sell the ship is in question (The Segredo or The Eliza Cornish, 1 Spinks, 36), and that was a question arising out of the act of the master at this port of Fayal. [Cotton, L.J.—But that was a case of the authority of the master as agent of the owner of the ship; his authority as agent of the owner of the cargo may be different.] In Lloyd v. Guibert (ubi sup.) the action was not on the original contract of affreightment, but on the relations of the owner of ship and owner of cargo; that is, on an implied contract by the owner of ship to pay the owner of cargo money which he had paid on a bottomry bond given, as in this case, on ship and cargo at Fayal. There, the ship being French, the incidents arising out of the contract of hypothecation were held to be governed by French law; and here we say, in like manner, the ship being Italian they should be governed by Italian law. [Brett, L.J.—The question at the root of the whole matter is, out of what arises the power of the master to hypothecate the cargo.] The power of the master to borrow on the cargo arises out of the fact of the cargo being on board the ship, and it being necessary to obtain money to carry it on, but it is an incident of the shipment on board the particular ship, and must therefore be governed by the law of the ship which the shipper is taken to have adopted when he put the goods on board. By Italian law the consul is established as the judge of the necessity, and therefore his decision is, in the case of an Italian ship, substituted for the communication, when possible, with the owner that is required in an English ship. It is, besides, exceedingly desirable that the power of borrowing money on bottomry should be preserved, and if doubts are cast on the validity of the bonds, lenders will not advance money on so precarious a security, or will do so at a ruinous rate of interest; therefore, on grounds of public policy, the law of the flag, which the people who lend can ascertain, should prevail, otherwise the validity of a bond may depend on the port where the vessel ultimately discharges the cargo. This bond, for instance, is no doubt valid by the law of France and Belgium, they having in this matter the same regulations as Italy; and if a ship is bound to Falmouth or Cork for orders, and thence to a port of discharge in Great Britain or on the continent of Europe, between, say, Havre and Hamburg, the consignee of cargo may defeat the bondholders' claim by ordering the vessel to Great Britain. This suggested anomaly shows that the lex fori cannot govern the question the bond must be either valid or invalid from the moment of its execution. It was executed in accordance with the law of the ship, and was therefore valid then, and so remains valid, and the demurrer must be dismissed.

Butt, Q.C. and Myburgh, Q.C. in support of the demurrer.—It is a perfectly new and unheard-of thing, and contrary to the well-established practice, to apply foreign law of any sort to a bottomry bond the subject of a suit in this country: (Maude and Pollock, Mer. Ship. 4th ed. p. 570.) Here the parties to the suit are both English, and the action is in England. One party, it is true, is the assignee of a foreigner, not of an Italian, but of a resident at Fayal, which is Portuguese territory. How can it be possible that the formalities of Italian law can govern such a contract? The real question is, was the master of the ship the agent of the owners of the cargo for making this bond; had he their authority? We say no, and his authority must be proved by evidence. Now, the master's authority only exists in consequence of necessity, and the law of England says that necessity is only proved by the fact of communication of the circumstances to the owners having been made where possible. That communication has not been made, and therefore there is no evidence of the necessity, nor consequently of the authority. Evidence is always a matter of the lex fori, and the court cannot be satisfied here of that necessity, and hence the bond is invalid ab initio. In fact, it is not proved that the bond is the cargo owners' bond at all. This is different altogether from a question on the contract of affreightment, as in Lloyd v. Guibert (ubi sup.); it is an incident of the fate of bailment; the master being in charge of goods cannot use his own judgment as to borrowing money on them without the consent of the owner of the goods where such consent can be obtained. [Lord Coleridge, C.J.—The agency does not arise from the necessity, but from the shipment; the exercise of the agency from the necessity to deliver in some way what forms the shipment.] That is consistent with the proposition of English law that the agency to do this particular thing, hypothecate the cargo, is only constituted when the necessity arises, and proof of necessity is therefore requisite. [Lord Coleridge, C.J.—In the case of The Gratitudine (3 C. Rob. at pp. 262, 263), Lord Stowell recognises the difficulty of the master communicating in all cases with the owners of cargo, instancing the case of a general ship with a cargo owned by or consigned to perhaps one hundred different persons, who when applied to might give conflicting directions as to what was to be done with the cargo, and seems to think that in such a case it might be necessary to hypothecate without communication.] Even supposing that to be so, it is altogether different from this case where the whole cargo belongs to one person who has chartered the vessel. Questions of general average, another special maritime contract arising from necessity, are always interpreted by the law of the port of discharge, which is, as a rule, that of the country in which the suit is brought, and never by that of the flag. The Hamburg (ubi sup.) is approved and specially distinguished in Lloyd v. Guibert (ubi sup.). In cases where a conflict of law exists in such a matter, the lex fori is to prevail (The Halley (L. Rep. 2 P. C. 193; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 879; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 556). There is also a reason for applying the lex fori, when, as here, it is also the lex loci solutionis, from the analogy to the case of a bill of exchange. [Cotton, L.J.—The lex loci solutionis is only applicable to a bill of exchange when accepted, and the acceptance is a necessary admission of the authority to draw; that is, there is no question of agency in that case.] That is so, but this branch of the argument assumes against ourselves that the master has authority to bind the owner of cargo in certain cases. Apart altogether from the question of agency, the assignee of a bottomry bond can only exercise his lien on the thing hypothecated by the assistance of the Admiralty Court, and that court would be wrong to lend its process for a purpose of enforcing a lien, unless the requisites of English law are satisfied. Moreover, the contract of affreightment here was an English one. [The Court.—That fact does not appear in the pleadings. Phillimore.—I do not object to an amendment of the pleadings which will allow it to appear. The Court.—The pleadings may be amended, by inserting the words "was chartered in London" in the defence.] The goods were on board in pursuance of an English contract, and the giving of this bond is a consequence of that contract, and its validity must therefore be determined by the same laws: (Story's Conflict of Laws, s. 242.) Besides, the Admiralty Court has not jurisdiction to enforce the bond, because it is not properly considered a bottomry bond at all. A bond purporting to be a bottomry bond, but payable in any event, i.e., not dependant on "maritime risk," is no bottomry bond, and gives no lien (Williams & Bruce, Ad. Pr. 46), because by English law "maritime risk" is an essential of the contract of bottomry; another essential is communication where possible, and in its absence the bond is by parity of reasoning no bottomry bond.

Phillimore in reply.—It is admitted that, where there is a contract to carry in a ship, certain consequences of that contract are to be governed by the law of the flag of that ship (Lloyd v. Guibert, ubi sup. and Nugent v. Smith 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 87, 198; 1 C. P. Div. 19, 423), the decision of the court below in the latter case not being overruled on this point; why then should one series of consequences of that contract be governed by one law, and another series by another law? The question in The Gratitudine (ubi sup.) was not what law was to govern a contract of bottomry, but whether a master had power to hypothecate cargoes at all under any circumstances, and it was held by the analogy of ransom bonds and jettison that he had such a power in cases of necessity. In The Bonaparte (ubi sup.) the question was whether it was in all cases necessary to communicate, and the decision shows that it was not. The addition of the words in the amended pleading makes no difference, for it merely asserts that the contract of affreightment was made in England, that England was for that contract the locus contractus as well as the locus solutionis, but the non-applicability of either of these laws to the contract of affreightment and its incidents is directly decided in Lloyd v. Guibert (ubi sup.).

Cur. adv. vult.

May 26.—The following judgments were delivered, in which Lord Coleridge, C.J. formally announced his concurrence.

Brett, L.J.—This case arises on demurrer to the reply. I think we must take the facts to be that the goods were shipped abroad by the defendants, who, whether British subjects or not, are domiciled in England, for the purpose of being brought to England, and that they were shipped on board an Italian ship in fulfilment of a charter-party made in London. The ship met with misfortunes and was taken into Fayal, a Portuguese port, and whilst there the master entered into a contract of bottomry by which he hypothecated the ship and cargo, but without previously communicating with the cargo owner. The ship, with the cargo on board, afterwards arrived in England, when both ship and cargo were arrested in the English Admiralty Court. It was asserted in the statement of defence that the master might have communicated with the cargo owner before hypothecating the cargo. That is not denied in the reply, but it is stated that by the Italian law, even though he might have so communicated, yet he was entitled under the circumstances to hypothecate the cargo or cover it by a bottomry bond, if he did so before his consul, without any such communication with the cargo owners, and that he executed this bond before his consul. In another paragraph it is stated that by the Italian law the master of a vessel may execute a bottomry bond without any previous communication with the owners of the cargo under certain conditions, which in the present case were fulfilled. The point of demurrer, therefore, is whether, although there were the means of communication before the bottomry bond was executed, yet, nevertheless, the defendants' goods are bound in the English Court of Admiralty by the bottomry bond so entered into.

The first point raised before us was the question as to the law which is administered in the English Admiralty Court, whether it is the English municipal law or that which was called the general maritime law, which is not the law of England in particular, but the law of all maritime countries. On that point I have no doubt. The English Admiralty Court is an English court authorised to act by English law, and acting for the English Sovereign, and every Admiralty Court is the court of the country in which it sits and to which it belongs. The law administered in the English Court of Admiralty is the English maritime law, and the law administered in any other Admiralty Court is the maritime law of the country to which the court belongs. To my mind there is no law which is not the law of any country in particular, but is the law of all countries. But with regard to the meaning of the proposition that maritime law is the same law in all countries, and in that sense that there is a common maritime law, the law administered in the English Admiralty Court is not the ordinary internal municipal law of the country, but is the maritime law of England, and is the law which either by Act of Parliament or by reiterated decisions, and traditions, and principles, has been adopted by the English Admiralty Court as the English maritime law. About that I have no doubt, and it seems to me that is what has been promulgated by every judge in the Court of Admiralty in England—by Dr. Lushington and Lord Stowell, and by the judges before them. Nor do I understand that the present learned judge of the Admiralty Court differs in this, for he says the case must be determined by the general maritime law as administered in England, that is, by the English maritime law.

Now, if this ship had been an English ship, if her captain and her cargo owners had been English subjects, there would be no doubt as to the law to be applied. In that case the master would have no authority to bind the cargo owners unless certain necessities had arisen. He is only empowered generally to act on the part of the shipowner, where the ship is in distress and the owner has no means of finding money, and has no credit, and to entitle him at all to hypothecate the cargo the value of the ship must be insufficient. But even when all these circumstances exist, yet the master is not authorised to charge the cargo if he has the means of communicating with the owner of it within a reasonable time, so that upon receiving notice the cargo owner may determine whether he will bottomry the cargo, or take other means, either to sell the cargo where it stands or to forward it. If therefore this had been an English ship no doubt upon the facts here pleaded the defendants would not have been liable, for it is admitted that the captain might have communicated with the cargo owners. But it was alleged that this rule must bind the plaintiffs, although the ship is an Italian ship, because the matter to be proved was whether there was such necessity as to give the captain a right to hypothecate the cargo in this way, and that inasmuch as such necessity was matter of evidence, therefore, it was matter of procedure, and that procedure must be governed by the lex fori. The question thus arises whether this is a matter of procedure. Now, the manner of proving facts is matter of evidence and to my mind matter of procedure; but the facts to be proved are not matters of procedure, but they are the matter with which procedure has to deal. The facts to be proved in order to give the captain authority are a different thing from the evidence by which the facts are to be proved. The thing to be proved cannot be evidence of the thing to be proved. Therefore it is not a question of procedure to be governed by the lex fori. Then arises this consideration, what is the nature of that which is to be proved? It is the authority of the master. This is not a contract. There is no contract between the master and the owner of a cargo which enables the master to deal with the cargo, although there is a contract between the owner of a ship and the owner of a cargo with which I will presently deal. I doubt, but it is not necessary to decide it here, whether the master is ever the agent of the cargo owner. He is the agent of the owner of the ship, and it may be that, as such agent, he has some right to act for him as regards the cargo. But, supposing he could be, in circumstances of necessity, the agent of the cargo, out of what does that authority arise? This authority of the master to hypothecate the ship or cargo is peculiar. It does not arise merely out of the contract of bailment; that contract gives no such right. It does not arise out of the contract of carriage on land, and I doubt whether it arises out of a contract for sea carriage to be wholly performed within the realm, though it is not necessary to decide that; but it does arise where goods are shipped on board a ship to be carried from one country to another. That is a proposition which is acknowledged by the maritime law of England and also of every maritime country. It arises out of the necessity of the thing that, from the obligation of the shipowner and master to carry goods from one country to another, and it being inevitable that the ship and cargo will at some time be in a strange country, where the captain is without means and the owner can have no credit, that, therefore, in certain circumstances, for the safety of all concerned, and for the carrying out of the object of the whole transaction, there should be a power on the part of the master to hypothecate not the ship alone, but also the cargo. That power does not arise out of the bill of lading nor out of the charter-party, because it may exist where there is neither one nor the other, but arises out of the contract of maritime carriage necessitated by the shipment of goods on board a ship to be carried from one country to another, and it exists from the moment the goods are put on board for such a purpose. That bare contract, standing on the shipment alone, is regulated and often limited by the terms of the charter-party or bill of lading. But, unless those terms specifically do away with the authority of the master, that authority exists by virtue of or under the contract which arises out of the shipment of the goods, and that contract between the shipowner and shipper gives the master authority to act in certain circumstances in respect of the cargo. It is not necessary to decide whether it gives that authority by way of contract, or by the law in respect of the contract between the shipowner and the owner of the cargo. It is an authority which is an incident of contract, but which is not the subject-matter of contract. It is not a term of a contract, but arises in consequence of a contract having been entered into. What, then, is the principle which ought to govern this case? The goods were put on board an Italian ship, and the person to exercise the authority is an Italian master; what authority ought to be inferred in these circumstances? Is the authority of an Italian master to be determined by the law of the country of each person who ships goods on board his ship? Why, if one law is to bind both parties, should it be the law of the shipper of the goods? Must the master be taken to know the law of the country of each shipper of goods put on board his ship? That would be very hard. If a man puts his goods into the power of an Italian master on board of his own ship, what is the meaning of the parties? Surely it is that the master shall deal with the goods as an Italian master. That is what must be in the mind of the parties, and therefore is what is binding on them. The principle is, that he who ships goods on board a foreign ship puts them on board to be dealt with by the master of that ship according to the law of the country of the ship, unless there is a stipulation to the contrary. Therefore, when the goods in question were put on board an Italian ship, it seems to me, by the contract of the parties arising out of the shipment, that it must be taken that the owner of this cargo intended them to be dealt with in circumstances which might arise, and which are considered as likely to arise by all the maritime countries, in the way in which that master would, in the circumstances, deal with the goods according to the law of Italy unless there was some stipulation to the contrary. That is on principle. How stands authority?

The case of Lloyd v. Guibert (L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 115; 13 L T. Rep. N. S. 602; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O, S. 26, 283) does not seem to me to govern this case absolutely. The question there was whether or not a certain stipulation was implied in a contract. The contract was a contract of affreightment, and the question was whether there was to be implied a stipulation that in the event of certain circumstances happening, and of the master in consequence giving up the ship and freight, he should not be liable beyond that amount. The master and the owner could only be relieved from further liability if there was such a stipulation in the contract of affreightment. There would have been no such stipulation if the case was to be decided according to the English law—the law of the forum—but there would be if the law of the ship was applicable. There it was held that, inasmuch as the contract was made abroad with the owner or master of a foreign ship, that contract was a contract of the country of the ship, and it was governed by the law of the flag: and inasmuch as in the country of that flag the contract of affreightment would have contained such a stipulation, the English municipal court would hold that it did contain it. It was a foreign contract because it was a foreign ship, and the court construed it according to the foreign law. Here the question is not the construction of a contract, but what authority arises out of the fact of the contract having been entered into; yet the principle of that case is applicable to this, inasmuch as the contract there was held to be a foreign contract, because it was for shipment of goods on board a foreign ship, and therefore a contract of the country of the ship, and not of the country where the contract was made. That principle governs this case, and leads me to say that the authority here arising out of the contract of shipment is an authority which the law of the country of the ship would give the master; and in accordance with that principle I think this case should be decided. The judge in the court below considered this case was governed by The Hamburg (Br. & Lush. 253; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 1); but with great deference I think he need not have considered himself bound by that case. There Dr. Lushington, and on appeal the Privy Council, treated the ship as if she were English, and said he was administering the maritime law of England in the absence of evidence of the applicability of any other law, but he said that, "Whenever any specific law is averred to be the governing law, with sufficient distinctness and proper evidence produced, he would be ready to consider it." I cannot, therefore, consider that The Hamburg is in conflict with the case of Lloyd v. Guibert.

Therefore I am of opinion that, both in accordance with the principle of Lloyd v. Guibert and that which arises from the transaction itself and the necessity of the case, the proper view is that which I have already stated, that whoever puts his goods on board of a foreign ship puts them on board to be dealt with by the master according to the law of the country to which the ship belongs, unless his authority is limited by express stipulation between the parties at the time of the shipment. There was a minor point taken, that even if English law as the law of the forum did not govern the case, yet that English law should as lex loci solutionis and also as the lex loci contractus, on the ground that the contract of affreightment—the charter-party—was made in England, and the cargo to be delivered there; but that cannot, in my opinion, affect the case, as the matter for our consideration is an incident of the shipment on board a foreign vessel, and is not the subject of any stipulation in the charter party or bill of lading. I therefore think that the demurrer must be allowed, and the rights of the parties decided in accordance with the law of the flag.

Cotton, L.J.,—The question in this case is as to the validity of a bottomry bond against the owners of the cargo on board the ship. Undoubtedly by the law of England, on the facts stated in the pleadings, notice ought to have been given to the cargo owner before giving the bond on his cargo; but it is stated in the reply that by the law of Italy no such notice was necessary for the validity of the bond, and that the vessel was an Italian ship, and the question comes before us on demurrer to this statement. And the question we have to consider is, whether the validity of the bond is determined by English or by Italian law. The answer depends, not on the express terms of any contract, but on an implied authority arising out of the contract between the shipowner and the owner of the cargo when the goods were put on board for the purpose of being carried. And, like all other implied terms, it must be governed by the law applicable in the country where the contract is made, and this implied term introduced into the contract, where the contract is silent, by the law applicable as to the duty or authority of the parties who have entered into the contract. It was argued that the authority to hypothecate arose from necessity. In my opinion, that is not correct. Necessity is a condition precedent to the exercise of the authority, but the authority itself arises out of the contract and is implied in the contract, and cannot properly be said to be given by necessity. If this view of the case is correct, what law must govern the exercise of the authority? It was argued that it must be governed by the lex fori, and that on two grounds. First that the remedy depended on the lex fori. That is no doubt true; but we are not here considering what is the proper remedy on a bottomry bond, but whether the bottomry is valid or not. Secondly, it was argued that the necessity which was a condition precedent to the exercise of the authority was a matter of evidence and hence of procedure, and on this account must be governed by the lex fori. But as pointed out by Brett, L.J., though no doubt the abstract proposition of law is correct, yet the facts necessary to establish the right of the party are not the same thing as the evidence by which those facts are proved, and the facts necessary to prove the right as distinguished from the way in which those facts are to be proved is no part of the lex fori. Then it was argued that the validity of the bond must depend on the place where the original contract was made; that the law of the place where the contract is made is to be implied wherever the contract is silent, subject to this, that where a contract is made in one place to be performed in another, the law of the place of performance is to be implied. It was then said that the place of performance of this contract was England, because the goods were to be landed there. But this view is fallacious; the original contract is not merely to land the goods in England. The goods are taken on board, no doubt, for the purpose of being ultimately landed in England, but it may be to be taken to many different countries en route.

What law, then, is to govern the contract in those various stages of its performance? In my opinion, and in the absence of authority on the point, the rule is that stated by Brett, L.J., that whoever puts his goods on board a vessel must be taken to authorise the owner of the vessel and his agent—the master—to deal with those goods according to the authority given him by the law of the country of the ship on board which they are placed, that is, if as in this case the ship is an Italian vessel, by the law of Italy. That this rule is applicable is shown by the fact that whilst no shipper can be ignorant of the flag, that is of the country, to which the ship belongs, the master of the ship would be in a very difficult position if he had to ascertain the laws of the country of each shipper or consignee, because in case of necessity arising to deal with the cargo the laws of those various countries required different courses to be pursued before dealing with it, and also that different measures would have to be pursued with the cargo of one shipper from those adopted in the case of another. The rule then appears to be sensible and just if there is no authority on the point; but I think that the express decision of Lloyd v. Guibert (ubi sup.) leads to the same conclusion. That case, it is true, was a question of the relationship existing between the master and the owner of a ship, and of the extent to which the former could bind the latter, but it decides that that, when affecting the right of other parties, is governed by the law of the flag, and hence leads to the result at which I, agreeing with Brett, L.J., have arrived in the present case. The court below considered itself bound by a decision of Dr. Lushington, The Hamburg (ubi sup.), but I do not think that Dr. Lushington intended to decide the question at all. He says (p. 260): "The state of the pleading is so vague, and the evidence so loose and unsatisfactory, that I can take no other course. Whenever any specific law is averred to be governing law, with sufficient distinction and proper evidence produced, I shall be ready to consider the question." That shows that he was not even considering the question we have now to decide; certainly that he was not deciding it in a way inconsistent with the decision at which we have arrived.

Appeal from Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division (Admiralty).

Collision—Fog—Moderate speed—Sailing ship—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea—Art. 13—36 & 37 Vict. c. 85, s. 17.

What is a "moderate speed" for a sailing ship in a fog, in accordance with Art. 13 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1879, depends on the place where the ship happens to be, and semble, per Cotton, L.J, her handiness, and is not necessarily proportioned to or less than the maximum speed she can make under the circumstances.

A speed of about five knots, in the case of a sailing ship out in the Atlantic Ocean, is a "moderate speed," and in compliance with this rule, the sailing ship being at the time under all plain sail, and going as fast as she can with the wind on her quarter.

Per Brett, L.J.: What is a moderate speed for a sailing ship is not necessarily the same as a moderate speed for a steamer in the same position.

This was an appeal from a decision of Sir R. Phillimore, by which, on the 20th Dec. 1881, he had found the s.s. Elysia alone to blame for a collision which took place a little after 4 a.m. on the 12th Aug. 1881 between that vessel and the sailing brig Emily.

The appellants limited the appeal to the question of the speed at which the Emily was proceeding being a sufficient compliance with Art. 13 of "The Regulations for Preventing Collisions at sea.

The Emily, a brig of 278 tons register, and manned by a crew of nine hands, was bound on a voyage from St. John's, Newfoundland, to Queenstown with a cargo of seal oil.

The Elysia, a screw steamer of 1778 tons net register, and engines of 600 horse power, manned by a crew of seventy hands, and having on board 101 passengers and a general cargo, was bound from London to New York.

The Emily stated the wind to be south-westerly, a nice breeze, the weather foggy, her course S.E. by E., speed about five knots an hour, and that the collision took place about 49° N. and 30° W. by dead reckoning.

The Elysia stated that just before the collision she had run into a fog, and that when the Emily was sighted the officer in charge of the Elysia was in the act of signalling to his engines to reduce speed, but that the Elysia's speed was in fact eight and a half knots, and her course W. by N ¼ N.

Each vessel saw the other about 200 or 300 yards off, and nearly ahead, and at once ported their helms, and each alleged that they had been making the proper fog signals on board their own ship, and had not heard those of the other ship.

There was a great conflict of testimony as to the condition of the fog horn on board the Emily, the owners of the Elysia calling as a witness one of the crew of the Emily to prove that it was not used.

After hearing the evidence, and Dr. Phillimore (with him Dr. Raikes) for the plaintiffs, and Myburgh, Q.C. (with him Aspinall) for the defendants, and conferring with the Trinity Masters,

Sir R. Phillimore said:—This is a case of collision which happened after four o'clock in the morning on the 12th Aug., in this year, between a screw steamship called the Elysia, of Glasgow, and a brig called the Emily, of Swansea. The bluff of the Elysia's bow and the port side of the Emily, about her foretopmast backstays, were the parts of the vessels which came into contact. The Emily ultimately sank. There are two questions which arise in this case, viz.; Whether one vessel was to blame, or whether both were to blame. Now this is a collision in the open sea, and it was most clearly the steamer's duty to keep out of the way of the sailing vessel, and it was also the duty of the sailing vessel to keep her course. The first inquiry is, At what speed was the steamer going? The defendants admit her to have been going eight and a half knots an hour. That probably is less than her actual speed, but it may be taken (to give her all the advantage that may be derived from the statement of defence) that she was going eight and a half knots an hour at a time when the atmosphere was dense, and there were continual patches of fog, and sometimes what are called banks of fog. We have no hesitation in saying that eight and a half knots was an undue speed on the part of the steamer. We think also she must have had an inefficient look-out, because (again giving the defendants the benefit of their preliminary act) those on board the Elysia saw the sailing ship only 200 or 300 yards right ahead. The sailing ship ported a little, and if the steamer had ported at the same time, and if she had been sufficiently prompt in putting her helm hard-a-port, the collision would have been avoided. The brig seems to have done all that it was in her power to do to avoid the collision, which, in our judgment, ought to have been averted. The next question I have had to ask the Elder Brethren is, whether, in the circumstances of this case, the sailing vessel was going at too great a speed; that is to say, whether her speed constituted an offence against the 13th Article of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at sea, which provides that "every ship, whether a sailing ship or steamship, shall in a fog, mist, or falling snow, go at a moderate speed." The speed at which we think the sailing vessel was going was somewhere about five knots an hour, probably less, certainly not more, taking the whole of the evidence together. The Elder Brethren are of opinion that this was not an undue speed, and that the brig was not to blame on this account. I may observe, before I leave this part of the case, that as it is in evidence that a rowing boat communicated from one vessel to another with only one man sculling, the wind and sea could not have been excessive. It remains to consider a question which has been much discussed, and which I may say has been treated almost as if it was the main question in the case, namely, whether this brig had an efficient fog horn on board when the collision occurred, because it has been rightly contended if she had not had a proper fog horn on board her she cannot, under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873, recover any damages, though she may otherwise not be to blame. This is a question of evidence, but I am very glad to have the assistance of the Elder Brethren upon this point, as well as upon the other parts of the case; and we have no hesitation in arriving at the conclusion that the story told by the brig's crew, with the exception of one man, is a true story, viz., that the fog horn on board the Emily was a proper fog horn, and was duly sounded before the collision. It has been, I think, observed with truth that this conclusion does not necessarily—when the matter is carefully considered—imply that the crew of the steamer are perjured in the evidence which they have given. What they say is that they did not hear any fog horn, and that may have been consistent, according to the state of the atmosphere, with the fact to which the crew of the brig have sworn, viz., that there was a fog horn blown some time before the collision. As we believe that story to be true, it becomes unnecessary to consider what I may term the future history of this fog horn. Certainly it was a very strange one to rely upon. According to the defendant's witnesses, it was picked up on deck, taken away from the people to whom it belonged, carried on a voyage across the Atlantic, and was tossing about in a locker; and I should consider a long while, if it was necessary, before I found upon such evidence, that the brig did not carry a proper fog horn on the occasion of this collision. But, as I am satisfied, and as the Elder Brethren are satisfied, that the fog horn was blown on board this sailing vessel before the collision, it becomes unnecessary to consider what consequences would attach to what I have called the future history of this horn. I pronounce that the steamer is alone to blame for this collision.

From this judgment the owners of the Elysia appealed, limiting their appeal, however, to the question of the speed of the Emily, as shown by the following extract from a letter from their solicitor to the solicitor of the defendants:

> We beg to give you notice that on the appeal our clients will admit that the Elysia is to blame for the collision, and will not take exception to the sufficiency of the fog horn of the Emily, but will contend that the Emily is also to blame for the collision by reason of the rate of speed at which she was proceeding at the time.
> Please inform us whether you will accept this as a sufficient notice of the course the appellants will take in this appeal, to save the necessity of more formal notice and proof thereof . . .

To this letter the respondents replied, accepting the letter of the appellant's solicitors as notice.

The log of the Emily had been left on board that vessel after the collision, her crew having been taken off by the Elysia, and had subsequently been found on board by the crew of a vessel which had fallen in with the Emily derelict, and attempted unsuccessfully to salve her, and had by them been handed to the receiver of wreck. The log was produced at the trial, and appeared to have been written up to twelve o'clock on the 11th Aug., the day preceding the collision, but whether twelve noon or twelve midnight—that is, to within four or sixteen hours of the collision—appeared doubtful, but on the advice of the nautical assessors it was held to be till twelve noon.

The entries in it, to which reference was made, were that during the last eight hours the speed was seven knots, and for the previous sixteen hours eight knots, the wind being S.W., and the course E.S.E., and the weather was described as "strong breeze, and thick weather throughout." Lat. by acc. 50° 35′ N., Long. by acc. 33° 01′ W.

The argument on the law turned on the proper construction of Art. 13 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, made under the provisions of Order in Council, 14th Aug. 1879. That article is:

> Art. 13. Speed to be moderate in fog, &c.—Every ship whether a sailing ship or a steamship, shall in a fog, mist, or falling snow, go at a moderate speed.

The corresponding rule under the regulations previously in force is contained in the latter part of Art. 16 of the regulations of 1862, and being as follows—"Every steamship shall, when in a fog, go at a moderate speed"—does not expressly apply to a sailing ship.

June 19.—The appeal came on for hearing.

Webster, Q.C. and Aspinall (with them Myburgh, Q.C.) for the appellants.—The only matter for the court is the speed of the Emily. That involves (1) a question of fact whether the speed was not really much more than the learned judge has found it to be; whether the court will not be satisfied on the evidence that it was nearer eight knots than five; and (2) a question of law whether, even assuming it to be only five knots, such a speed is, on a proper construction of Art. 13, a compliance with that article. As to the actual speed of the Emily, there is no reason why she could not be going as fast at the time of the collision as she was during the twenty-four hours to which the last entries in the log refer. She had the same sail set, all plain sail, all sail possible to be set, and was going as fast as ever she could. The force of the wind was a fresh breeze, and it was free on her quarter. Moreover, the distance from the position given in the log at the previous noon to that at which, according to the plaintiff's preliminary act, the collision happened, will give, if measured, 120 miles, or close on eight knots an hour. The only witness who speaks to five knots an hour is the officer in charge of the watch, who, being responsible, has an interest in making it appear small. On the evidence the court will be satisfied that the judgment of the court below is wrong in finding five knots as the maximum speed of the brig. But on the law, how can it be said that a speed is moderate which is admittedly the greatest possible? There is no direct precedent as to the speed of sailing ships in fogs, the new rule having not yet been discussed, but under the corresponding rule of the former regulations applicable to steamers, four knots was held as too high a speed for a steamer in foggy weather in the open sea; that is, it was held not to be a "moderate speed" in compliance with the rule then in force for steamers, (The Magna Charta, 25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 512; 1 Asp. Mar. L. C. 154) If four knots is not moderate for a steamer which probably goes at full speed ten, how can five be moderate for a sailing ship which cannot, under any circumstances, go more than eight or nine, and under the actual circumstances could go no faster than she was going? The case is à fortiori against the sailing ship, because a steamer can in an emergency stop and reverse and manœuvre in a manner not open to a sailing ship, dependent on a constant external force for her means of propulsion. Had the speed of the brig been a knot less, or bearing, the same proportion to her full speed that our actual speed did to our full speed, the collision would probably have been saved altogether, as the vessels only grazed as it was, and were by operation of the port helm parting from each other; but if the speed was not moderate it is sufficient to show, under sect. 17 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873, and the cases decided on that section, that it might by possibility have caused or contributed to the collision, and not that it in fact did so.

Dr. W. G. F. Phillimore and Dr. Raikes, for the respondents, were not called on.

Lord Coleridge, C.J.—We need not trouble you, Dr. Phillimore. I am of opinion that in this case the judgment must be affirmed. It is a clear and simple point that is now before us. In the court below there were divers points raised on which the learned judge, Sir Robert Phillimore, had to express his opinion, but there is now no dispute on most of those points. The only point raised here is whether the Elysia alone, a steamship, or the Emily as well, a sailing ship, is to blame for the collision which took place, and liable for the damages that resulted from the collision. The question first, then, is, did the Emily comply with Article 13 of the Order in Council of the 14th Aug. 1879? By the 13th Article of that Order it was laid down that "every ship, whether a sailing ship or a steamship, shall, when in a fog, mist, or snow, go at a moderate speed." The Emily, the sailing ship, was, it has been admitted, in a fog when the accident occurred, and I see no reason to differ from the court below, which found that she was going at a speed of "somewhere about five knots an hour, probably less, certainly not more, taking the whole of the evidence together." So far as I can see, everything leads me to think that she was going steadily at not more than five knots an hour. Now, a sailing vessel in a fog, in the middle of the Atlantic, is going somewhere about five knots, and the question is whether, according to the 13th Article of the Order in Council, she was going at a moderate speed? I am of opinion that she was going at a moderate speed; and the court below, as well as the Elder Brethren who assisted them, and the gentlemen who give us such great assistance here, believe that the Emily was not going at an undue rate of speed when the collision took place. There are constructions of this 13th Rule which have been suggested for our consideration, but I think the rule means what it says. It says that a ship, whether a sailing vessel or a steamship, must go at a speed which is perfectly moderate. It says nothing whatever about the capacity of a vessel for speed. If a ship be a slow ship, it does not follow that, because she is going at her greatest speed, which is a slow speed, she is to reduce her speed in proportion to a faster vessel. It is not, if her best speed is moderate, that she must reduce it; but if her speed is more than moderate, she must bring it down to what is moderate. It would, indeed, be very dangerous to lay down any rule as to what is moderate and what is immoderate speed. A moderate speed in the Atlantic Ocean may be immoderate elsewhere. Under the circumstances of this case, then, I am of the same opinion as the court below and the Elder Brethren; and I am corroborated in that opinion by the gentlemen who assist us, that the sailing vessel Emily, going at the rate of five knots an hour, was not going at an immoderate speed when the collision with the Elysia took place. That being the only point which was to be raised before us—and it is not made out before us that there was immoderate speed on the part of the Emily—I am of opinion that the court below was right in its decision.

Brett, L.J.—Questions were raised in the court below in respect of some defects in the navigation of the Emily, but it is not for us to go into those matters. The point to which we have to confine our attention is the speed of the Emily at the time of the collision, and that is the only question we have to determine. With regard to the two questions which have arisen in connection with this case, one is a question of fact and the other is a question of law, viz., the construction of the 13th rule. Now, with regard to the question of fact, we are put into this position, whether we can undertake to say that the question of fact was wrongly decided, the question being whether the sailing vessel, the Emily, was going at a speed of five to five and a half knots an hour or considerably more. The only thing which seems to me to solve that question is the evidence of the witnesses, and whether they can be believed or not. The argument of Mr. Aspinall, deduced from the distance traversed from the previous noon, as shown by the log, was very ingenious with regard to the accuracy, and the strict accuracy, of the speed of these two vessels on the ocean. But we are not affected by the accuracy of that part of the case. What we have to decide is, what was imposed on the vessels by the 13th Rule of the Order in Council. The learned judge and the Trinity Brethren had first mainly to depend upon the evidence of the witnesses, but they had also the entries in the log of what had happened previously, and their decision would no doubt be affected by the evidence contained in the log. I think that if the log of the Emily had shown the state of the weather for, say, within four hours of the collision, I should have doubted the evidence; but when you take the entries which were made sixteen hours before, and the fact that the wind was gradually diminishing, it is not improbable that the Emily was going at the slow speed stated by the witnesses. As to whether they were credible witnesses or not was for the court below to determine; but I can see nothing in their testimony which enables this court to doubt, from the evidence given, that the Emily was only going at the rate of five knots an hour. It has been argued that the Emily was to go at a moderate speed in proportion to her own capacity for speed. The rules for guidance of vessels at sea are divided into two classes. One states what ships are to do when they are approaching each other, and what each is to do when there is danger of a collision. The other the precautions to be observed independently of the neighbourhood of any other ship. The rule under discussion is of the latter class, and it lays down an absolute rule without regard to any other ship. It does not say that when a vessel is approaching another vessel in a fog a certain thing shall be done; but it says that when a vessel is in a fog she must go at a moderate speed, whether there is a vessel approaching or not, and there is a statute (Merchant Shipping Act 1873, 36 & 37 Vict. c. 85, s. 17), which say, that if she infringes the regulations, that is, in the present case, if she does not go at a moderate speed in a fog, and she comes into collision with another vessel, she is deemed to be in the wrong. There is no question about that; and the rule may be regarded as an absolute Act of Parliament rule.

The question then is, what is the meaning of that rule? It is that she shall go at a speed such that, if she approaches another vessel, she may have time to perform the proper evolutions to avoid a collision.

This question of speed has reference to the time it would take a vessel to go from one point to another point in the water, and that must depend upon the locality and upon a variety of circumstances. It cannot be that moderate speed can be the same with regard to a steamer absolutely as to a sailing vessel. If you were to say that three knots were a moderate speed for a steamer in which to turn from one point to another when out in the ocean, that does not presume that that would be a moderate speed for a sailing vessel, because a steamer can reduce her speed to a knot and a half. It would, however, be very dangerous for a sailing vessel under all circumstances to reduce her speed to anything like three knots, because such a speed would in certain circumstances place her entirely out of command. In a narrow channel again crowded with vessels in a fog it would be necessary that there should be modifications of any rule laid down. In the Thames at Gravesend, for instance, the moderate speed could not safely be the same as in mid-ocean. Then, if the construction of law and nautical science depend upon circumstances, we have to deal with each case separately. Then, supposing a vessel to be in mid-Atlantic in a fog, and going at a speed of five knots an hour, is that a moderate pace, not for the Emily, but for any other sailing vessel to be going? We are advised that the speed the Emily was going in mid-Atlantic was a moderate speed, and, that being so, it seems to me that the decision in the court below was right.

Cotton, L.J.—It appears to me that there are two questions involved in this case, the principal one being the construction of rule 13 of the Order in Council. The Court below held that the speed of the Emily at the time of the collision was but five knots an hour. On the question of fact there could be no better judge of that than the court below, where the witnesses were seen and heard; and I cannot say that the court below has been wrong in the consideration of the question of fact. The judge below had before him the log, which has been referred to, and the witnesses as to what the speed was at the time of the collision. I think that the witnesses of the Emily stated accurately that the speed of their vessel was less than when it was recorded in their log some sixteen hours before; and according to the log there was certainly some evidence tending to show that the wind was less at the time of the collision than before it. The latest entry in the log I see is sixteen hours before the collision, and, therefore, it is important as showing what the state of the weather had been when the entry was made. The witnesses, however, on the other side would think that the wind they were meeting was stronger than those thought who were going before it, and that would account for their estimating the speed of the Emily before the collision at nine knots instead of five knots an hour. In my opinion this court cannot go against the evidence of the defendants' witnesses called in the case.

Now, as to the consideration of the 13th rule, I have little to add to what has already been said by my learned brothers. In my opinion the rule does not require that the speed is to be slackened by a naturally slow vessel. If the vessel was going at a moderate speed, it is not bound to go at a less speed. But what is a moderate speed? One cannot exactly define what is a moderate speed. That must depend, not upon the speed of the vessel herself, but upon the position in which she is, whether in a crowded channel or on the open seas, where vessels are not very frequently met; and in my opinion it is not necessary to decide that point in the present case. It might depend upon whether a vessel is rapid in answering her helm or not; but the moderation of the speed must depend upon the circumstances, not upon what is the speed of a vessel naturally, but where she is sailing when there is a fog on. Both position and other matters have to be taken into consideration, and the assessors tell us that the speed at which the Emily was going was moderate, and that being so the appeal must be dismissed.

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Marine insurance—Partial loss—Sale of damaged ship—Loss on sale—Cost of repairs not executed—Measure of insurer's liability.

Plaintiffs' vessel was insured by a time policy, valued. During the continuance of the risk she went ashore and was damaged, but was got off and towed into port. Her value immediately before she went ashore was the same as at the commencement of the risk. The cost of the repairs necessary to restore her to the same condition as she was in before she was damaged would have greatly exceeded her value when repaired. Plaintiffs did not do these repairs, but only did some slight repairs that were immediately necessary, sold the ship before the expiration of the policy for a sum exceeding her estimated value, and claimed for an average loss.

Held, by Jessel, M.R. and Cotton, L.J. (Brett, L.J. dissentiente), that the measure of the insurers' liability was the difference between the value of the vessel when undamaged and the balance which remained after deducting from the proceeds of the sale the cost of the repairs executed.

Per Jessel, M.R.: The value to be regarded was the value of the vessel at the commencement of the risk.

Per Brett, L.J.: The measure of the insurers' liability was the estimated cost of the repairs which would have been necessary to restore the vessel to the same condition as she was in before she was damaged, deducting one-third new for old.

Judgment of Lindley, J. (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 444; 45 L. T. Rep. N. S. 46) affirmed.

Appeal by the plaintiffs from the judgment of Lindley, J., on further consideration, which is reported ante, p. 444, and 45 L. T. Rep. N. S. 46, where the facts are fully stated.

The appeal was first argued on the 9th and 10th Dec. 1881, when the court took time to consider and was re-argued by order of the court on the 24th and 25th April 1882.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 6. — The following judgments were delivered.

Cotton, L.J.—This is an action by the owners of a vessel insured by the defendants, and the only question on the appeal is the amount which the plaintiffs are entitled to recover on their policy. The vessel during the subsistence of the insurance was materially injured by perils of the sea. The repairs necessary to make good the injuries were estimated at a large sum, and the owners at first claimed to treat the case as one of constructive total loss, but this was objected to by the insurers, and the owners abandoned this contention. They then began to repair the vessel at Moulmein, but instead of executing the repairs necessary to restore the vessel to as good a condition as before the injury was sustained, they had some of the most necessary repairs done at a comparatively trifling expense, and then during the continuance of the risk covered by the policy sold the vessel at that port. It realised a large sum, and the judgment of the court below has given the plaintiffs only the difference between the value of the ship in its uninjured state, and the sum realised by its sale after deducting from this latter sum the cost of the repairs which were in fact done. The plaintiffs claim to be entitled to recover the estimated cost of the repairs necessary entirely to make good the injury sustained by the vessel, less the usual allowance of one-third of the cost, which would give the plaintiffs a very much larger sum than they can recover under the judgment appealed from. As a general rule, where there is a partial loss in consequence of injury to a vessel by reason of perils insured against, the insured is entitled to recover the sum properly expended in executing the necessary repairs, or, if the work has not been done, the estimated expense of the necessary repairs, less, in each case where the vessel was not at the time of the injury a new one, the usual allowance of one-third new for old. But in the present case the insured, before the determination of the risk, by their voluntary act showed that they did not desire to restore the ship to the same condition as before the injury, and rendered it impossible that the repairs of which they seek to recover the expense should ever be executed by them. No doubt both judges and text-writers have spoken of the insured in a case of partial loss being entitled to recover the amount above mentioned. But they do so without special reference to cases like the present, on which there is no express authority. It therefore becomes necessary to consider the principle on which an insured shipowner is entitled to recover the above-mentioned proportion of the costs, actual or estimated, of repairs. A policy of marine insurance is a contract of indemnity. In case of partial loss, when repairs are in fact executed, the sums expended in repairing the ship in a reasonable and proper way are damages sustained by the insured by reason of the perils insured against, and a natural consequence of such perils; and the insured is entitled by way of indemnity to the cost so incurred, after deducting in the case of a vessel not new at the time of the injury one third of the expenditure, this deduction being made to prevent the insured getting a benefit by reason of his ship being repaired with new materials in place of old. Mr. Cohen argued that, where the cost of repairing an injured vessel would exceed the value of the vessel when repaired, the expenditure could not be recovered from the underwriters. But it must not be supposed that, by using the term "properly expended in repairs," I in any way accede to this argument. By "properly expended in repairs" I mean expended in executing the necessary repairs in a reasonable and proper manner. Where in the case of a partial loss the owner has not repaired the vessel he is entitled to have made good to him the depreciation at the end of the risk in the value of his vessel, so far as this is caused by the peril insured against. This is the present case, and we have to determine on what principle this deterioration is to be ascertained. As a general rule, the estimated cost of the repairs is the measure of deterioration, but, to use the language of Maule, J. in Stewart v. Steele (5 Scott N. R. 948): "The assured must recover the repairs not eo nomine as expenses, but as the measure of the loss." But it is urged by the appellants that the estimated cost of repair, with the deduction of one-third new for old in the case of ships not new, is the established and settled measure of damages to be recovered by an insured shipowner where there is a partial loss and the ship has not been repaired. The judgment of Lord Campbell, in Knight v. Faith (15 Q. B. 649), and the decision in Lidgett v. Secretan (1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 95; 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 942; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 616) have been relied on in support of this contention. In the former case the policy was a time policy for a year, and the ship sustained injury during the year by perils insured against, and after the expiration of the year was found to be in such a state as to be a constructive total loss, and was sold for a very small sum. The court held the defendants not liable for the total loss, and undoubtedly Lord Campbell speaks of the sum to be recovered by the plaintiffs for the partial loss as that which they could prove it would have cost to repair the injury sustained during the time covered by the policy. But there the plaintiffs had not before the expiration of the risk elected not to repair, but to sell the ship, and the sum which the repairs would have cost was the only available measure of the deterioration at the expiration of the risk.

In Lidgett v. Secretan (ubi sup.) the vessel was insured by two policies. A partial loss was incurred during the period covered by one of the policies, and, after that had expired and while the ship was being repaired, a total loss occurred by the ship being burnt during the period covered by the second policy. The Court decided that under the first policy the estimated cost of the repairs, which had not been done when the total loss occurred, was to be taken into account in ascertaining the amount recoverable under the first policy. Here again, this was the only measure of the depreciation of the vessel by the injury sustained during the first policy. But the judges who decided that case do not say that the estimated cost of repairs not executed is necessarily in all cases to be taken as the measure; what they say is in principle against the appellants. Smith, J. said: "The cost of the repairs would be a mode" (not the mode) "of estimating the amount by which the vessel was depreciated by striking on the reef;" and Willes, J. said: "The only question we are asked to decide is, what are the true principles upon which the loss is to be assessed? The true principle I apprehend to be this: "The owners are not to get anything which they did not lose by the vessel striking on the reef. They are to get the amount of the diminution in value of the vessel at the end of the first risk, the difference between the then value and what she would have been worth but for the damage she had sustained. In arriving at that result, I do not see how the arbitrator can avoid taking into consideration the expenses which would have to be incurred in order to put the vessel into a proper state of repair; but he must do this only for the purpose of arriving at the diminution of value at the expiration of the risk." These cases, in my opinion, do not help the appellant's contention; and the decision in Stewart v. Steele (5 Scott N. R. 927) is against them. There the ship had been injured, and had, in consequence of defects not caused by the perils insured against, been sold for breaking up. The wales had been removed to ascertain the injury which the vessel had sustained, and were not replaced before the sale. The jury had given the shipowner the sum which it would have cost to replace the wales. But the Court held that on the evidence, as the ship was sold for breaking up, the plaintiffs were not damnified by the wales not having been replaced, and were not entitled to recover the sum which it would have cost to replace them. The authorities, therefore, in my opinion, do not support the contention of the plaintiffs, that the estimated cost of repairs, less one-third new for old, is necessarily the measure of the sum to be recovered by the insured, and the reasoning and expressions used by the judges in the cases tend strongly to show that the estimated cost of repairs which have not been executed is a method, but not under all circumstances the only method, of estimating the deterioration of the vessel. To hold that in the present case the insured is entitled to recover two-thirds of the estimated cost of repairs would be contrary to what is one of the principles applicable to all insurance cases, that the policy is a contract of indemnity, or, to adopt the words of Willes, J. in Lidgett v. Secretan (ubi sup.), the insured is not entitled to recover more than he lost by the injury sustained by the vessel through the perils covered by the policy.

In this state of the authorities, I am of opinion that the estimated cost of repairs, less the usual allowance of one-third new for old, is not, under all circumstances, the sum which the insured is to recover. Where, as in the present case, there is not a constructive total loss, he is not, as against the insurers, entitled to sell so as to bind them by the loss resulting therefrom; but, when he elects to take this course, as in the present case, he, as against himself, fixes his loss; that is, he cannot, as against the underwriters, say that the depreciation of the vessel exceeds that which is ascertained by the result of the sale. Probably the most accurate way of stating the measure of what, under such circumstances, he is to recover is, that it will be the estimated cost of repairs, less the usual deduction, not exceeding the depreciation in value of the vessel as ascertained by the sale. It was urged that the judge in the court below had no sufficient evidence of what was the value of the vessel at Moulmein in its undamaged state. But this objection cannot, I think, be sustained; and, as he found that this value was the same as that of the vessel at the commencement of the risk, the question as to the proper mode of estimating from the sale the depreciation of the vessel does not, I think, arise. It must be observed that in the present case some repairs had been done to the vessel before it was sold, and these have been allowed to the plaintiffs; for notwithstanding criticisms on the wording of the judgment, I think that it directs the cost of these repairs to be subtracted from the proceeds of the sale before these proceeds are deducted from the value of the ship when uninjured, so as to fix the amount of deterioration. In my opinion, the judgment appealed from is right, and the appeal must be dismissed.

Cotton, L.J. then read the judgment of Jessel, M.R.—The question in this case is, Upon what principle ought the liability of underwriters to be determined, when the ship has been damaged by the perils of the sea, and has been sold during the continuance of the risk, without being repaired, in a case where the amount, required to restore her to the same condition she was in before the injury, would have largely exceeded the value of the ship when repaired, so that no reasonable man would have repaired her? In this instance the value of the ship in her damaged state was large, and to have repaired her would, according to the surveyor's report, have caused a loss of 41,000 rupees, viz., 25,000 rupees, the estimated amount of her value unrepaired, and the sum of 16,000 rupees, being the difference between 45,000 rupees, her estimated value when repaired, and 61,000 rupees, the estimated cost of the repairs. It is plain that, there being no special circumstances in this case, no reasonable uninsured owner would have repaired the ship so as to restore her to her former condition. The owners took this view, and therefore determined to sell her, and, having made some slight repairs with a view to a sale, they sold the ship for much more than the estimated value in her damaged state, viz., for 38,000 rupees, or thereabouts. The underwriters are willing to pay the whole of the loss actually incurred by the owners, viz., the difference between the value of the ship at the port of departure for the voyage—i.e., 4000*l.*—and the amount of the net proceeds of the sale, after deducting therefrom the amount actually expended for repairs; and this, as I read the judgment, is what they are to pay. If there is any doubt as to the meaning of the words on this point, I am willing that it should be removed by altering the wording of the judgment. On the other hand the owners claim two-thirds of the estimated cost of the repairs required to put the ship in the same condition as she was in before the injury; this proportion of the amount expended for repairs being the sum ordinarily payable by underwriters on the occurrence of a partial loss where the ship is an old one, as this is, and is not repaired. The precise question we have to determine does not appear to have been decided, nor can I find any case in which it has been even discussed. It remains, therefore, to be decided upon principle.

The contract of insurance is, as I understand, a contract of indemnity to the insured against the loss incurred by him through the ship being injured by the perils of the sea. It follows from this that, as a general rule, in no case can the insured become richer by reason of these perils, or, in other words, that the insured ought not to be entitled to receive from the insurer a larger sum for a single partial loss than if the ship was wholly lost. Treating this as in effect a constructive total loss, or rather, taking the amount recoverable to be an amount not exceeding, and therefore in a case like this equal to, what would be recovered as on a total loss, I think the value to be regarded is the value of the ship at the port of departure; but in this case it is not material, because I think the value at Moulmein before the injury was about the same. The estimated value was 45,000 rupees when the vessel was restored to its class, which at the exchange of 1*s.* 9⅝*d.* would be a little over 4000*l.*; but the vessel would after repair have been in all probability rather better than she was before the injury. This being so, it appears to me that the decision of the learned judge in the court below, which was in favour of the underwriters, was substantially right; but I do not wish to be understood as concurring in all the reasons given by him for that decision. It seems to me, both on principle and authority, that the rights of a shipowner, who actually repairs his vessel when damaged by the perils of the sea, to recover the amount, or a portion of the amount, expended in repairs from the underwriters, are not in all cases the same as those of a shipowner who declines to repair because the ship is not worth repairing, and who therefore sells the ship during the risk; and I wish to confine my judgment to the latter case, which is the case before us. I am therefore of opinion that the decision appealed from should be affirmed.

Brett, L J.—The facts of the case are not in dispute. The case was at my request argued a second time before us. Neither before Lindley, J., nor before us, was it argued that there was a total loss of this ship. Both parties have advisedly admitted that the case must be decided upon the assumption that there was only a partial or average loss of the ship. If they had not done so, I am not at all prepared to say that the finding of Lindley, J., in which he says, "I find as a fact that a prudent uninsured owner would have done what the plaintiffs did, and that they did what was best for all interested in selling the ship in her damaged state," would not, if the insured had elected so to treat it, have justified the sale as against the underwriters, and have made a total loss of this ship. But I think that the court cannot decide this case upon such a view of it after the plaintiffs have elected to treat the loss as an average loss, and after the advised persistent argument on both sides. It appears to me absolutely necessary throughout the consideration of this case to remember that it is to be decided on the assumption that there was only an average loss on ship. The decision of this case upon the facts of it might have been easy and of little importance, if it had been treated as a total loss; but the doctrines suggested in argument, and, as I think, countenanced by the judgment of Lindley, J., upon the assumption that this was a partial loss, have made the case to my mind one of the highest mercantile and legal importance.

On the first hearing before us it was contended on behalf of the defendants, first, that if a ship damaged by sea-peril is repaired by her owner, so as to be as good as she was before, but a jury find that it was unreasonable so to repair her, the liability of the underwriters must not be ascertained by a comparison with the cost of such repairs, but by ascertaining the difference between what the ship would have sold for damaged and unrepaired, and what she would sell for repaired, and by comparing that difference with the value of the ship in the policy. The same argument was put in the following form: secondly, if it is unreasonable to repair the ship so as to make her as good as she was before, the assured, though he may of course in fact repair her, cannot so repair her as against the underwriters so as to charge them, and it is unreasonable so to repair her, if the cost of such repairs exceed the value of the ship when repaired. And again in this form: thirdly, where it would be so extravagant as to be unreasonable to repair an injured ship so as to make her as good as she was before, the shipowner ought not to repair her, and if he does you must in such case ascertain the depreciation in value of the ship caused by the accident by ascertaining the difference between what the ship would sell for damaged and undamaged at the same place. And it was urged in each and every of these forms that it was a question for the jury whether a prudent uninsured owner would have undertaken the repairs. It seems to me that the judgment of Lindley, J., countenances if it does not adopt these arguments. It must be admitted that they are absolutely new. In a case where the repairs were actually done, they were the arguments brought forward and overruled—the case of Aitchison v. Lohre (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 168; 41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 323; 4 App. Cas. 755)—in all the courts, and in the House of Lords. It need hardly be observed that, if the counsel for the defendants could have maintained any of these propositions as true in the case of repairs effected, they would have enforced them easily in a case where no such repairs had been done. It was further argued fourthly, on the first hearing before us, that whenever the damaged ship is sold, and without being repaired, the loss is to be ascertained by the same process as a loss on damaged marketable goods is ascertained. This formula would be so damaging to underwriters, if the estimate of repairs were low, that, stated in these terms, I think it was at once abandoned. On the second hearing before us none of these arguments were again brought forward. The arguments for the defendants on the second occasion were, that the object of marine insurance is that the assured is to be put in the same position with regard to the subject insured as if he had not embarked on the adventure, and if a ship has been injured and not repaired, and a comparison with the estimated cost of repairs would produce a sum greater than the sum which would be due on a constructive total loss, the object is not attained except by paying the same sum as would be payable on a constructive total loss. It was pointed out that, if this principal were correct as a principle, it would be equally applicable to a case in which the repairs had been done, and that it would in such case break the rule that there is no salvage on an average loss; to which it was answered that there is a custom where repairs have been done, but that there is no custom where repairs have not been done. It was further argued that repairs must be bonâ fide done, and that they cannot be done bonâ fide if the cost of them when done would exceed the value of the ship when repaired, and therefore that no such possible or contemplated repairs could be considered in estimating an average loss on a ship. But it was pointed out and admitted that such repairs might be bonâ fide incurred in order to earn a valuable amount of freight. The main argument in the end was, that the law which affirms that a contract of insurance is a contract of indemnity obliges us to say that the assured cannot recover for a partial or average loss more than for a total loss, and that, if the comparison with the estimated cost of repairs produces a sum equal to 100 per cent. of the sum insured, and the ship be allowed to be sold without the amount of the proceeds of sale being brought into the account, the assured will in such case, by recovering a full 100 per cent. without deduction of salvage, recover more than he would recover for a constructive total loss. This is the argument on behalf of the defendants which has given me so much trouble. As to all the others I confess that I feel no doubt that they are all untenable. The following propositions are all, I think, recognised as true in insurance law: The assured is not under any circumstances bound to sell his ship. He is entitled under any circumstances to repair his ship. The assured may under any circumstances sell his ship. He is not bound under any circumstances to repair his ship. In none of these respects does any question arise as to whether a prudent owner uninsured would act in the like manner. All this is so because there is nothing in the contract of insurance which takes away from the assured the absolute power and right to do with his own property what he will. The assured, therefore, can always, whatever be the amount of damage done to his ship, repair her. If he does repair and keep the ship, there cannot be a total loss; the loss then must be a partial or average loss, leaving open the question of how much loss is to be adjusted. But in the case of a partial or average loss there is no salvage. Therefore in such case, if the cost of repairs, actually done in a reasonable way at a reasonable cost, so as to make the ship equal to what she was before the accident, equals or exceeds 100 per cent. of the sum insured, the assured in respect of such average loss on ship recovers 100 per cent. of the sum insured without any deduction. That was the decision in Aitchison v. Lohre (ubi sup.). The assured need not repair the ship. If he does not, but leaves her unrepaired till the end of the risk, no subsequent total loss intervening, then he is to be compensated as if he had repaired, except that the cost of the repairs he might have made must be determined by estimate instead of by actual expenditure. This proposition is undoubtedly supported in terms by high authorities. If the damage done to the ship has not been repaired, the only mode of ascertaining its amount is by the estimate of surveyors. Where, however, the damage has been repaired, the established mode of estimating its amount is to deduct one-third from the whole expense, both of labour and material, which the repairs have cost, and to assess the damage at the remaining two-thirds: (Arnould on Marine Insurance, c. 5, s. 3, article 2.) Arnould points out the mode of arriving at the amount of damage in either case, namely, where the ship has and has not been repaired. Then he applies one common mode of adjusting the loss: "The rule for adjusting a particular average loss on the ship is very simple, viz., that in open policies the underwriter pays the same aliquot part of the sum he has agreed to insure as the damage or the expense of repairing it is to the ship's value at the commencement of the risk; in valued policies he pays the same proportion of the valuation in the policy:" (Arnould on Marine Insurance, c. 5, s. 10, article 2.) "The partial loss," says Lord Campbell in Knight v. Faith (15 Q. B. 669, 670, in which case the ship had not been repaired), "must be calculated on the same principles as if she had actually been repaired and proceeded on her voyage, or had foundered at sea without having been repaired soon after the policy expired." He admits the difficulty of proof in such cases of the amount of the damage, but says that it can be overcome. Willes, J., in Lidgett v. Secretan (ubi sup.), seems to me to say elaborately the same thing. In none of the authorities, such as Stevens, Benecke, Park, Phillipps, or Parsons, is any different rule suggested for fixing the amount of damage, and adjusting the loss, in the cases of the ship having been repaired or left unrepaired. If this proposition as to there being no different rule for ascertaining the amount of damage in the cases of actual repairs done and an estimate of repairs not done, is true, it seems to me to follow that, if the assured does not repair, and does not sell, and the accepted estimate for repairs equals or exceeds 100 per cent. of the sum insured, the principle adopted and approved in Aitchison v. Lohre (ubi sup.) is equally applicable in such a case as to the case in which repairs have actually been done. The only difference between the two cases is the mode of proving the amount of damage. But mode of proof does not alter liability. In such a case then the assured would recover 100 per cent. of the sum insured, and the value of the unrepaired ship would not be taken into the account. It seems to me to follow that, if the assured keeps the ship unrepaired until the expiration of the time fixed in the policy, or at all events until the day of trial, he may sell the ship the day after, and the proceeds of such sale cannot be brought into the account.

The question in this case is whether, if the sale takes place on the day before the one or the other event, the proceeds of the sale are to be taken into account. All the other propositions advanced in argument are answered by the preceding considerations. And as to this, the first observation which strikes me is, that a distinction between a day before and a day after is too minute to have been treated as a distinction by business men; and the second, which seems to me, following the other, to be of immense force, is that none of the great masters who have dealt with the subject of the adjustment of an average loss on ship have in any way glanced at a different mode of adjusting such a loss if the ship should be sold before the adjustment or after it. Not one of them has ever alluded to such a rule as has been acted upon by Lindley, J. in the present case. It is said that the circumstances of this case were never present to their minds. But it is inconceivable to me that Stevens, Benecke, Park, Arnould, Phillipps, Parsons, writing exhaustive treatises on maritime insurance, should all have overlooked the possibility of such a case arising. The more natural, the more just conclusion seems to me to be, that they knew but of one rule of adjusting a partial or average loss on ship. It is said further, that the case has never been present to the minds of the great judges who have enunciated the rule of adjusting an average loss on ship. Is that possible? The circumstance has actually been before them in every case in which the shipowner or master has considered that the damage done to the ship amounted to a constructive total loss, and has thereupon sold her unrepaired, but where the owner has failed at the trial to prove that there was a constructive total loss. In every such case the owner has recovered as for a partial loss, and no different mode of calculating the loss from the ordinary mode has been suggested. The point was surely distinctly before Lord Campbell in Knight v. Faith (15 Q. B. 649), where the ship had been sold. And he thus in such a case lays down the rule (at page 669): "However, if there has not been a total loss of the ship, actual or constructive, with notice of abandonment, it lies upon the assured to show the extent of the injury which the ship sustained from the accident, together with the sum which would be required for repairing it; and from this there would be the usual deduction of one-third new for old." It is not possible to my mind that so great a judge should not have added this caution if the supposed rule existed: "Provided that the proceeds of the sale of the ship must be deducted, as she has been, in fact, sold by the master." But I will endeavour further to consider this matter. It seems to me that it can be solved by considering what it is against which the underwriter insures. It is true that the contract of insurance is a contract of indemnity, and that the insured must not be paid more than is sufficient to indemnify him against the loss which the underwriter by the contract of insurance has agreed to indemnify. But the question is what is the loss against which the contract indemnifies? Whatever the assured may gain or lose by the accident by reason of matter outside the contract of indemnity, is not matter to be considered between the assured and the underwriter in settling the loss which is within the contract. As, for instance, if the matter insured is marketable goods—suppose them bought for 100*l.* and insured for 100*l.*, and suppose the market to which they were to be carried is so gone down that if the goods arrived there they would sell for 50*l.*—and if the goods are totally lost in the voyage, the underwriter must pay 100*l.*, although the assured, by reason of the accident, is 50*l.* the better than he would have been if the accident had not happened. The fall of the market being a matter outside the contract of insurance is not a matter to be considered in adjusting the loss, and therefore the assured recovers the 100*l.* So, if such goods upon such markets were in the voyage damaged to the extent of 75 per cent., the assured would be entitled to receive 75*l.*, and so would be the better by 25*l.* than if the accident had not happened. The question then is, what is the loss against which the underwriter agrees to indemnify? It is the loss which the assured intends to cover, and which the underwriter knows that the assured intends to cover. In the case of an insurance on marketable goods, it is known to both that the object of the assured in conveying such goods from one place to another is that they may be sold at a profit. In order that such a result may ensue, they should arrive and arrive undamaged. If they do not arrive at all, the assured is put in the same position as he was at the beginning of the adventure if he is paid the price at which he originally bought the goods. If the goods are damaged, he is put into that position by being paid a percentage of such price. The identity of the goods is immaterial to him. Goods for purchase and sale are exactly represented by money. But a ship is not in commerce treated by its owner as a subject of purchase and sale in either one market or another. It is used in commerce, as Arnould notices, by its owner as a machine for carrying cargo backwards and forwards for prices determined by successive contracts of affreightment. If the ship be totally lost, the only method of indemnifying the shipowner, that is, of placing him in the position he was in at the commencement of the risk, is to pay him the then value of the ship. But, if the ship is damaged, the immediate business inconvenience and loss to the owner is, not that a sale of the ship is thereby prevented or injured, but that he is prevented, by reason of the damage, from using the ship as a carrying machine to earn freight. That inconvenience is not to be cured by buying another ship or by selling the damaged ship. A ship damaged in some distant port, though she can there be repaired, cannot be replaced by the purchase of another ship at home; the business inconvenience to the shipowner, i.e., the loss in his business, can only be met by repairing the ship so as to make her as good a carrying machine as she was before. That is the object he desires to attain by the insurance. The loss he desires to cover, and which the underwriter knows he desires to cover, is therefore the cost of repairs, not the diminution in value of the ship to sell. The cost of repairs is therefore the matter to be indemnified. The loss in value to sell is not the loss against which the shipowner insured. The injury to or loss by a sale is no more within the purview of the contract of insurance on ship than is the loss of market in the case of an insurance on goods. Loss or gain by a sale of the ship is therefore not a matter to be considered between the assured and the underwriter in adjusting either a total or a partial loss on ship. This seems to me the reasoning by which all writers on insurance, and all judges who have dealt with insurance, have laid down the one and sole rule which they have laid down for the adjustment for a partial or average loss on ship. And as was said in Aitchison v. Lohre (ubi sup), if this has been accepted as a sole and only rule by merchants and underwriters for many years, it is now a rule which is part of the contract of insurance on ship. According to that rule, no evidence that the ship had been sold, or of what were the proceeds of the sale of the ship, is properly admissible in evidence in an action brought simply to recover a partial or average loss on ship. As to the case of Stewart v. Steele it seems to me, I confess, to be the most unsatisfactory case, as reported, with which I have ever had to deal; every observation made by the judges during the argument seems to show that their minds were bent on the consideration of a case in which, after a partial damage, the ship is totally lost. In such case it is settled that partial damage actually repaired is to be paid for, but that repairs not done are not to be taken into account. Different reasons are given in the final judgments why the cost which would have been incurred if the wales had been replaced was not to be allowed. In simple truth, I do not gather the reason why such cost was disallowed. No writer has ever deduced any rule from that case. The case was cited before Lindley, J., and before us, from 5 Scott N. R., for the purpose of relying on a supposed dictum of Maule, J., at page 950, that "as to the supposed duty of the underwriters to pay for the repairs, that is a mere fallacy, and the frequent statement of the proposition will not make it the less fallacious; the law casts no such duty on them." The proposition so stated startled me exceedingly. Underwriters have for years paid for repairs. I felt certain it was not correct. And it is not true that Maule, J. stated such a proposition. What he did state is shown in the report in the Law Journal (11 L. J. 155, C. P.). He, in answer to an argument to the contrary, stated that the underwriters had no duty to do the repairs to the ship. That proposition has no effect on the solution of the present case, though it is most undoubtedly true. I would add that none of the terms on the face of the policy can help us to a solution of the present question, because, as is stated by Arnould, a policy of insurance in its present form is mainly construed according to long settled and admitted usage of merchants and underwriters. The defect in the judgment under review seems to me, with deference, to be, that it has misapplied the doctrine that a contract of insurance is only a contract of indemnity. It is true that it must not more than indemnify against the loss which it covers; but it is also true that it has nothing to do with gains or losses which are outside the contract by which it undertakes to indemnify against the losses which it does cover. One is naturally startled at the facts of the present case; but they are wholly abnormal, and it is in my opinion, most dangerous to mercantile business to tamper with a settled rule of adjustment of liability and claim in order to meet a case which will in all probability never happen again. I therefore am of opinion that this appeal and the plaintiffs' claim ought to be allowed.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Reported by H. D. Bonsey, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Wednesday, June 7, 1882.

Before Grove and Mathew, JJ.)

Svendson v. Wallace and others.

Marine insurance—General average—Practice of average adjusters—Not evidence of custom of trade.

A long-continued practice of average adjusters who prepare their statements according to the law as laid down by the courts is no evidence of such a custom or usage of trade as can be impliedly incorporated in a contract between a shipowner and owner of cargo.

The defendants who were the owners of cargo in an action against them by the shipowner to recover a general average contribution in respect of expenses caused by the ship putting into a port of refuge, landing, storing, and reshipping the cargo, and leaving the port, alleged a custom of trade that in such a case the expenses incurred in and about warehousing the cargo were apportioned among the owners of the cargo alone, and the expenses of reshipping the cargo, port dues, &c., were borne by the owners of the ship and freight.

Several witnesses were called who gave evidence to the effect that for sixty or seventy years the practice of average adjusters had been as stated by the defendants, but that, in consequence of the decision in Atwood v. Sellar (4 Asp. Mar. L. C. 153; L. Rep. 5 Q.B. Div. 286; 42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 644) some average adjusters had altered their mode of adjustment in such a case.

Held (affirming the decision of the learned judge at the trial), that this was not evidence of a custom of trade which could be left to the jury.

This was an action brought by the owners of a ship against the owners of the cargo to recover a general average contribution amounting to 770*l.* 2*s.* 4*d.*

During the voyage from Rangoon to Liverpool the ship met with heavy weather and sprang a dangerous leak, in consequence of which the master took refuge in the port of St. Louis, Mauritius. At St. Louis the vessel was repaired, in order to enable her to prosecute her voyage to Liverpool, and certain expenses were incurred which the plaintiffs alleged were a proper subject of general average.

The expenses consisted among other things of charges for pumping the ship, for landing, storing, and re-shipping the cargo, and for port dues in respect of entering and leaving the port.

The defendants denied that the expenses were the subject of general average, and alleged that at Rangoon and at Liverpool, and elsewhere in England and in the British empire, there had been and was a well-known and approved usage and custom of trade amongst shippers, shipowners, merchants, underwriters, and average staters, that expenses incurred in and about the warehousing, storing, and reshipping of cargoes rendered necessary for the purpose of repairing damage occasioned to the ships on board of which they were laden by perils of the seas, and also expenses incurred for and in and about defraying port charges, pilotages, and other outward bound dues to enable the ships to proceed on their voyages with their cargoes, were not contributed for by any general average or payment in the nature of general average among all the owners of the ship, freight, and cargo on board any ship, but that the expenses of warehousing and storing the cargo were apportioned among the owners of the cargo alone, and the expenses of reloading the cargo, the port charges, pilotage, and other outward dues, are apportioned amongst and borne by the owners of the ship and freight.

The defendants paid into court the sum of 681*l.* 13*s.* 1*d.* for storing and warehousing the cargo, but denied that they were liable in respect of any expense incurred in reshipping the cargo, port dues, or any expenses subsequent to reloading.

When the case came on to be tried several witnesses were called on behalf of the defendant in support of the custom, and they gave evidence to the effect that for sixty or seventy years it had been the uniform practice of average adjusters, to charge expenses of this kind in the manner contended by the defendant, but that, in consequence of the decision in Atwood v. Sellar (4 Asp. Mar. L. C. 153), some average adjusters had changed their mode of adjustment in such cases; and that it was the duty of average adjusters to prepare their statement in accordance with the law, and to adapt their practice to the law as laid down by the courts from time to time. The learned judge refused to leave this evidence to the jury, on the ground that it was merely evidence of the practice of average adjusters, and no evidence of a usage or custom of trade. The defendants obtained a rule nisi for a new trial on the ground that the learned judge was wrong in holding that there was no evidence of a usage or custom of trade to go to the jury.

Cohen, Q.C. and H. D. Warr (C. Russell, Q.C. with them) for the plaintiff showed cause against the rule.—The learned judge at the trial held that it was for the defendants to prove the custom alleged in the statement of defence. Several witnesses were called, and the judge held that the evidence did not amount to any evidence of a custom of trade, but that it was merely evidence of the practice of average adjusters, who regulated their mode of adjustment by the law. There are two questions: First, whether there was any evidence of a custom, and secondly, whether it has any of the legal incidents of a custom. It is important to see what the custom is at Liverpool, the port of destination; and since the case of Atwood v. Sellar (4 Asp. Mar. L. C. 153; 42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 644; 5 Q. B. Div. 342) the practice there has not been uniform, where the putting into port was not in consequence of a general average sacrifice. At any rate, after the decision in Atwood v. Sellar there has not been a uniform custom at Liverpool. Secondly, we say that this so-called custom or usage of trade has not the legal incidents of a custom. The characteristic of a custom is that it differs from the law or what the law would imply; but the evidence here is that the average adjusters altered their practice when any alteration was made in the law, and, in fact, merely adjusted according to the law. A custom could not be incorporated into the contract unless it was a legal custom generally existing at Liverpool. The evidence was properly rejected by the learned judge at the trial.

Butt, Q.C. (Webster, Q.C. and Myburgh, Q.C. with him) for the defendant in support of the rule.—There has never been a different mode of adjusting. Our witnesses do not go so far as to say that a different practice prevails in Liverpool. All that the evidence amounts to is that since the decision in Atwood v. Sellar some average adjusters have taken a different view in one or two cases, but that will not prevent the custom existing, and we say that the evidence called for the defendant showed that for a great many years it had been the practice of average adjusters to treat these expenses as particular average. A similar sort of question arose in the case of The Copenhagen (1 C. Rob. 159). [GROVE, J.—What do you say is the difference between this case and Atwood v. Sellar?] We say that the custom in the case of Atwood v. Sellar is not properly stated. The evidence in the present case goes further. The learned judge at the trial ought to have left the evidence to the jury.

GROVE, J.—This was an action brought by the shipowner against the owner of goods claiming for a general average contribution in respect of certain charges for loading, storing, and re-shipping the cargo and for port dues in respect of entering and leaving the port. The case was tried before Lopes, J., and the rule for a new trial was granted on one point only, viz., on the ground that the learned judge ought to have left to the jury certain evidence that was given on behalf of the defendant of a usage of trade. Certain witnesses, who were average adjusters, were called for the defendant, and they stated that, for sixty or seventy years, it had been the practice of average adjusters to charge some of these charges as particular average, and it was said that this was evidence to be laid before the jury of a custom by which the parties were bound, and of the mode of average adjustment in mercantile law. The learned judge held that this evidence did not prove a custom or usage of trade, and withheld it from the jury, and on that point, only the rule was granted by the court.

Now, I am of opinion, having heard the case argued, and having looked into the case, that the learned judge was right in refusing to leave the evidence to the jury. The practice stated by the witnesses was alleged to have been uniform up to a certain time, but in consequence of the decision in Atwood v. Sellar (ubi sup.) several average adjusters changed their practice, and several of the witnesses said that they adopted the practice because it was the law, and when the law changed they altered their mode of adjustment. The question, therefore, is, whether this could be said to be such a mercantile custom as must be read into the contract and bind the parties. It has not the general characteristics of a custom, and appears only to be the practice of skilled men who adopted the practice because it was the law. That, to my mind, is not a custom. If there was no authority on the point, it is possible that I should have taken more time to consider the matter, but to my mind the case of Atwood v. Sellar (ubi sup.) is an authority directly in point. Two distinctions between that case and the present one were put forward by Mr Butt. The first was that, in the case of Atwood v. Sellar the injury to the vessel was a subject of general average, and that being the cause of putting into port, the subsequent loss might follow the general character of the injury to the vessel. No doubt that is a distinction, but upon the one point on which it is necessary to decide this case it does not apply. Another distinction pointed out by Mr. Butt was that in Atwood v. Sellar all that was found was that this had been the practice of average adjusters for seventy or eighty years, but it was not found as a matter of fact that persons paid upon the computation so found, whereas in the present case it is proved that merchants paid upon these computations. This is merely a distinction in words. If it was found in Atwood v. Sellar that this was a mere theory, the court would not have arrived at the decision they did. Now Atwood v. Sellar was this: A ship on her voyage to Liverpool encountering severe weather, the fore topmast had to be cut away, and in its fall caused other damage to the ship, which was thereby compelled to put into port. In order to effect the repairs and to enable the ship to proceed on her voyage, it was necessary to discharge a portion of the cargo, and expense was incurred in landing and warehousing it. The repairs having been effected, expense was incurred in reshipping such portion of the cargo. It was found that for seventy or eighty years it had been the practice of English average adjusters in adjusting losses where ships have put into port to refit, whether such putting into port has been occasioned by a general average sacrifice or a particular average loss, to treat the expense of discharging the cargo as general average, but the expense of warehousing it as particular average on the cargo, and the expense of re-shipment of the cargo and pilotage, port charges, and other expenses incurred to enable the ship to proceed on her voyage, as particular average upon the freight. The owners of the ship claimed to have the expenses of warehousing and re-shipment of cargo, and the pilotage and other expenses of leaving port, as matter of general average, and sued the owners of the cargo for contribution in respect thereof. It was held by Cockburn, C.J. and Mellor, J. that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover on the ground that the expenses were all incurred in furtherance of the common purpose of prosecuting the adventure and for the benefit of the cargo as well as the ship; and by Manisty, J. that the practice of average adjusters having existed for so long a period must be deemed to be the general mercantile usage of the country, and as such to have the force of law. The Court of Appeal upheld the decision of the majority of the court. Now, I say nothing upon this decision on the general question whether certain charges should be treated as general or particular average. The only point in that decision which is directly in point here is that the majority of the court below and the Court of Appeal discarded the practice of average adjusters. All we have to say is whether the evidence given of the practice of average adjusters is evidence of a custom or usage of trade, and I am of opinion that it is not, and that this rule should be discharged.

MATHEW, J.—The sole question for our determination in this case is whether or not the evidence ought to have been left to the jury. The action was brought by the owners of ship against the owners of goods to recover a general average contribution, and the defendants set up as a defence "that the said cargo of rice was laden on board the said ship or vessel Olaf Feygrason at Rangoon, a port in the East Indian possessions of Her Majesty the Queen of England and Empress of India, to be carried to Liverpool in pursuance of the terms of a certain contract, and before and at the time of the making of the said contract there had been and was at Rangoon, and at Liverpool, and elsewhere in England, and in the British Empire, a well-known and approved usage and custom of trade amongst shippers, shipowners, merchants, underwriters, and average staters that expenses incurred in and about the warehousing, storing, and re-shipping of cargoes rendered necessary for the purpose of repairing damage occasioned to the ships on board which they were laden by perils of the seas, and also expenses incurred for and in and about defraying port charges, pilotage, and other outward dues to enable the said ships to proceed on their voyages with the said cargoes are not contributed for by any general average or payment in the nature of general average among all the owners of the ship, freight, and cargo on board any such ship; but that the expenses of warehousing and storing such cargo are apportioned amongst the owners of the said cargo alone, and the expenses of reloading such cargo, the port charges, pilotage, and other outward dues are apportioned amongst and borne by the owners of the ship and freight, of which said usage and custom the plaintiffs and defendants at the time of the making of the said contract for the carriage of the said cargo of rice had notice, and the plaintiffs and the defendants made the said contract with reference thereto, and that by reason of the said usage and custom the defendants were not liable to pay the said sum of 770*l.* 2*s.* 11*d.*, or any part thereof, save the sum of 68*l.* 13*s.* 1*d.* so paid as aforesaid." A similar question had been raised in Atwood v. Sellar, and the Court of Appeal in that case had pronounced against the alleged usage. The evidence in that case had been taken before an arbitrator, and he stated the conclusions at which he arrived in the form of a special case. The evidence for the defendants in that case, as in the present, was of this nature. It was shown that for a long period of time mercantile men had made payments upon the footing of the supposed usage, and it was said that each payment was a recognition of the usage, and that its existence as a usage of trade was therefore demonstrated. On the other hand, it was sought to be shown for the plaintiffs that the uniformity of practice relied upon by the defendants was not due to a common understanding among mercantile men that the law should not be followed, but was referable to mere mistake as to what the law really was. It was said that the alleged custom was unreasonable, because it had the effect of transferring the liability of one person to another, and that there was no sensible explanation of its origin or use. The true reason, it was said, why payment on the footing of the supposed usage was made was this, viz., that average adjusters had been in the habit of distributing the expenses in question in a particular way in ignorance of their real legal character, and that merchants had paid upon the supposition that the adjustments were correct in point of law. In support of this view, evidence was laid before the arbitrator to show what the business of English adjusters really was, and the extent of the authority conferred upon them by mercantile men when employed to make a statement of average. Upon the evidence before him, the arbitrator found that "It is, and for from seventy to eighty years past has been, the practice of British average adjusters in adjusting losses in cases where ships have put into port to refit, whether such putting into port has been occasioned by a general average sacrifice or a particular average loss, to treat the expense of discharging the cargo as general average, the expense of warehousing it as particular average on the cargo, and the expense of the re-shipment of the cargo, pilotage, port charges, and other expenses incurred to enable the ship to proceed on her voyage, as particular average upon the freight. Cases of putting into port in consequence of general average sacrifice only, and where there is no particular average loss at all, are not of frequent occurrence; but such cases, and cases where the substantial cause of the putting into port is a general average sacrifice, are sufficiently common to establish a regular practice of treating the expenses in case of a general average sacrifice in the way above described. Average adjusters regulate their rules of practice in accordance with what they consider are the legal principles applicable to the subject. There is an association of average adjusters, which holds meetings from time to time, at which the rules of practice are discussed and altered or modified with reference to legal decisions," and upon this the court pronounced the following opinion: "The special case states a long-continued practice of British average adjusters in adjusting losses in cases where ships have put into port to refit, whether such putting into port has been occasioned by a general average sacrifice or a particular average loss, to treat the expenses of discharging the cargo as general average; and the expenses of warehousing it as particular average on the cargo, and the expense of the re-shipment of the cargo, pilotage, port charges, and other expenses incurred to enable the ship to proceed on her voyage, as particular average upon the freight. It was not, however, and could not reasonably be contented for the defendants that the practice could be put so high as a custom impliedly incorporated in the contract between the parties and during the course of the argument we intimated our opinion, founded on the language of the special case with regard to this practice, and especially the language of the fifth paragraph, that the question between the parties must be decided in accordance with legal principles and authority, which the practice of the average adjusters professes to follow." With the conclusion of the arbitrator in Atwood v. Sellar, and the opinion expressed upon it by the Court of Appeal, as we were informed in the course of the argument, there has been some dissatisfaction, principally, as it would seem, among average adjusters, and it was determined that evidence as to an analogous practice of average adjusters should be given in another case for the purpose of showing that the arbitrator had been mistaken in the inference drawn by him, and that the practice ought to be treated as part of the law merchant. Accordingly this action has been brought, and several witnesses, average adjusters, and mercantile men were called by the defendant at the trial, and we have to say whether their testimony ought to have been submitted to the jury as evidence of the alleged mercantile usage.

I am of opinion that the evidence justifies a clearer and more conclusive inference against the existence of any usage of trade, founded on the practice of average adjusters, than that embodied in the findings of the arbitrator in Atwood v. Sellar. All the witnesses agree, as it seems to me, in this case that it is the duty of English average adjusters to prepare their statements in accordance with the law, and that they are employed by mercantile men for this purpose, and that it is their custom to adapt their practice to the law as laid down by the courts, and to correct their practice from time to time when it is shown not to be in conformity to legal principles. I think the learned judge was right in his decision. I will add that I think it would be matter for regret if English average adjusters were embarressed in their efforts to emancipate themselves from the mistakes of their predecessors by a suggestion that their mistakes were now embodied in the mercantile law, and could be set right by no easier method than by an act of the Legislature. I desire further to guard myself from being supposed to pronounce an opinion on the law.

SITTINGS AT WESTMINSTER.

(Before Lord COLERIDGE, C.J., BRETT and COTTON, L.JJ.)

THE GUY MANNERING.

APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (ADMIRALTY).

Damage — Collision — Suez Canal — Compulsory pilotage—Duties of pilot—Regulations—Concession.

The employment of a pilot in the Suez Canal, though compulsory, is not of such a nature as to exempt the owners of a ship from liability for damage done to another ship by the negligence or want of skill of such pilot.

By the Regulations of the Suez Canal a pilot is to advise the master of the ship; but the master remains responsible for the navigation of the ship.

Such regulations are not ultra vires.

Per Brett, L.J.: Observations on the general duties of a pilot as understood in England.

THIS was an appeal from a decision of Sir Robert Phillimore, by which, on the 21st Feb., he had decided, in a judgment on a special case, that the owners of a British ship were not exempted from liability for damage done to another British ship in a collision which took place in the Suez Canal by reason of the employment of a pilot by compulsion of law.

The case is fully reported ante, p. 485, where the facts of the case, the special case, and enactments referred to are set out.

July 4.—The appeal came on for hearing.

Butt, Q.C. and Nelson for the appellants.

Cohen, Q.C. and Dr W. G. F. Phillimore for the respondents.

The arguments used were the same as in the court below, and, in addition to the cases therein cited, reference was made by the respondents to the case of The Maria (1 W. Rob. 95).

Lord Coleridge, C.J.—This case has been very ably argued by Mr Butt, for the defendants; but, except that it had been so well argued by him, I should have said it was not arguable. However, I am of opinion that the judgment of the court below was correct.

Brett, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and for the same reasons. I agree with the reasons given by the judge of the Admiralty Court. The case is certainly a new one. Two objections have been taken, as I understand them (1) That assuming the law to be within the power of those who made it, inasmuch as the pilot and the captain are the agents of the owners, the defendants, the owners of this ship, are liable. (2) That the persons who made these articles had not authority to make them, as if they compel shipowners to pay for a pilot, and so far impose a pilot upon the ship, any limit of such pilot's usual authority was ultra vires. As to the facts on which a question as to whether it was ultra vires can be raised: Upon the regulations made for the management of the Suez Canal, we are all of opinion that, if it is a regulation of the canal in that country, there seem to be no facts stated on which it can be properly averred that the authorities of the canal had not power to make the regulation. Then it is said that the regulation does impose upon the captain of a vessel the necessity of taking a pilot, and it is said that, the moment you have a pilot compulsory on board, the meaning is you are to give up the navigation of the ship, and if you do give up the navigation from the fact of its being compulsory, then you know the consequences. There are statutes applicable to different parts of the United Kingdom which put upon a shipowner whilst in those parts a compulsory pilot. As to the English statutes, none of them state what is the duty of the pilot when he is so on board. The duty of a pilot in England is too well known and too universally applied to require any enactment with regard to it at all. It is to regulate the navigation of the ship, and to conduct it so far as the course of the ship is concerned. He has no other power on board the ship; he has no power over the discipline of the ship; he has no power over the cargo on board; and he has no power with regard to the various matters which are necessary to enable him to perform his duty; he cannot place a man on the look-out, or regulate the place at which the look-out man shall be on board the ship. He has nothing to do but to control the navigation. If a ship be a sailing ship, it is known that she cannot steer in a particular way without her sails being regulated as to quantity and as to position; and, therefore, for the purpose of steering the ship the pilot is the person on board an English sailing ship who gives the orders with regard to the sailing. It is obvious, therefore, that, in order to steer a ship on her course, he gives the orders as to the time of tacking and as to the mode of progressing. All the orders which an English pilot has to give are the orders for regulating the course of the ship upon the waters. He knows the course she has to take, and must take.

Well, upon the English law, applying the principles of law to such an employment, I should say, if you are compelled to put a man in that position where he is to exercise those powers, then he is not a person who, in the exercise of those powers, is to act according to your directions. With regard to them he is to exercise the power himself—at all events, you are not bound to give him orders. He is put there for a special purpose; therefore, so far as the exercise of those known powers are concerned, if, in the course of the ship upon the waters, damage arises by reason of his regulating the course of the ship, the owners are not liable. But if the ship, in consequence of the want of a look-out man, goes wrong, then, although the pilot has given the orders as to the course, yet, inasmuch as the course goes wrong, because he has not the proper information given him by the master and the crew, it is not the fault of the pilot, it is the fault of the master and crew, and therefore the owner is liable. So, if the pilot gives an order to the man at the wheel to steer a course which would be the right course, and he does not obey it, or obeys it too late, then, though the course of the ship is wrong, it is not solely the fault of the pilot, and therefore the owner is liable. There have been some cases referred to with regard to the English law, where it has been enacted that you must take a pilot, and if you do not take him you must nevertheless pay for his services. That is the case of The General Steam Navigation Company v. The British and Colonial Steam Navigation Company (3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 168; Id. 237; L. Rep. 3 Ex. 330; L. Rep. 4 Ex. 238; 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 357; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 581). There the master was bound to take a pilot at Dungeness, and to pay for services to be rendered all the way to Gravesend. It is true that, for the purpose of the decision, it was assumed that the pilot might cease to exercise authority—at all events the captain was not bound to employ him—after passing Yantlet Creek; but if he was coming into the Thames from Dungeness he was bound to take him and pay him all the way to Gravesend; and it was held that, though from Yantlet Creek to Gravesend might be within the port of London, where pilotage was not compulsory for the ship in question, London being her port of registry, yet the obligation to pay a pilot all the way to Gravesend was a compulsion on the captain, in a sense. With regard to the case of Lucy v. Ingram (6 M. & W. 302), that does not apply, because it was decided on an interpretation of a section of an Act of Parliament (6 Geo. 4, c. 125) which relieved the shipowner though the pilot was not compulsory, if the pilot was acting under the provisions of the statute; and it was held that he was acting under the provisions of the statute. Now, the foundation of the English law is, that where a person has another put on him compulsorily, on certain conditions, and he cannot enforce the performance of that which that other has to do, then he is not in the same situation as he would otherwise have been, because the relation of master and servant implies that the master may have directions at any time. The Dutch law and the Belgian law make the employment of a pilot in certain places compulsory. But by the law of those countries the taking of a compulsory pilot on board does not relieve the owners of responsibility. But it was held in this country, nevertheless, that by taking a pilot compulsorily in the waters of those states, the English owners were relieved from responsibility for an accident happening to the ship on the theory of the English law: (The Halley, 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 131; L. Rep. 2 P. C. 193; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 879.)

But all the theory on which the English law is founded seems to fail in this particular case; because, here, the duty of the pilot is not the same as the duty of an English pilot, and by this somewhat curious enactment it seems to me that the pilot does not take, in this canal, the control or management of the course of the ship. He is on board of her. The captain is bound to take him and bound to pay him; and he is bound to pay him, though the man is not bound to perform the duties of an English pilot. Part of the obligation which is assumed by a pilot in British waters is by this regulation thrown upon the captain of the ship. The Suez Canal pilot is placed at the disposal of the captain of the vessel because of his practical knowledge of the navigation of the canal. But the captain is supposed to acquire the knowledge and to steer the ship so as to avoid danger in the navigation of the canal. But as to the peculiarities of the steamers and the machinery for stopping and going on, &c., the control and management in these respects devolve solely upon the captain. The only phrase in which I can accurately describe the position of the pilot is, that he is a live chart; therefore, the whole duty of steering the ship remaining with the captain, he must consequently do it so as to avoid injury; and, therefore, any defect in the steerage is his fault. With regard to the captain, in this case, though the owners are liable if he has been in fault, he was in fault in this way, that he misconstrued the powers that devolved upon him. He thought he was in the same relation in regard to the pilot as he would be in regard to an English pilot. Whether the regulation was in English or not, he did not understand it, and though bound by it in law is not morally to blame.

Cotton, L J. concurred.—The principle of English law is, that where a pilot is compulsorily taken on board and put in charge of the vessel, he is not to be deemed the owner's servant. Here, however, the rules under which the pilot was taken expressly stated that the master was to remain responsible for the steering of the vessel, and that the services rendered by the pilot were to be only by way of advice, and were not to extend to orders as to the steering and manœuvring or the speed of the ship—an error which actually caused the collision. It follows that the owners, the defendants, are liable for the default of their servant, the master.

The Mac.

APPEAL FROM PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (ADMIRALTY).

Salvage—Jurisdiction of justices — Mudhopper—Ship or boat—Definition of ship—Navigation—Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), ss. 2, 458, 460.

A mudhopper barge used for carrying mud out from a river, and having no internal means of propulsion, is a "description of vessel used in navigation," and not being "propelled by oars," is a ship within the meaning of the word as defined by the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 s. 2, and as such the justices have jurisdiction to award salvage for services rendered to her when "stranded or otherwise in distress on the shore of any sea or tidal water situated within the limits of the United Kingdom."

A vessel may be in "distress on the shore" without being actually aground or in contact with the shore.

The Leda (Swabey, 40), approved.

Semble, a vessel such as a mudhopper used to transport men and mud, and capable of being guided, though not of motion, by internal means, is a vessel actually used in navigation.

This was an appeal from a decision of Sir Robert Phillimore, by which, on the 1st Feb. 1882, he had held that a mudhopper barge used for dredging a river and not propelled by oars was not used in navigation, and was therefore not a ship within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, ss. 2, 458, unless she habitually went to sea, and that on that account the magistrates had no jurisdiction in salvage proceedings against such a vessel under sect. 460 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854.

The case is fully reported in the court below ante, p. 507, where the facts sufficiently appear and the sections on which the arguments were based are set out.

The appeal came on for hearing on the 30th June, and was heard on that day and the 3rd July.

Bucknill for the appellants.—The learned judge gave too narrow a signification to the expression "used in navigation;" there was evidence that the vessel had been brought over from Holland in tow. Her habitual employment was to carry mud from the harbour works at Boston out to sea. She had a rudder, and was directed as to her course by men in charge of her, and she was found actually at sea:

Ex parte Ferguson, 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 8; 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 96; L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 280;
The Andalusian, 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 22; 39 L. T. Rep. N. S. 204; L. Rep. 9 P. Div. 182.

But it is not necessary for the purpose of giving the magistrates jurisdiction that she should be "used in navigation," for they have by the terms of the section jurisdiction in cases of salvage not only of ships, but of boats; and this vessel, even if not a "ship" within the definition of the Merchant Shipping Act, s. 2, is clearly a "boat," of which there is no definition in the Act.

Dr. W. G. F. Phillimore for respondents.—The Andalusian (ubi sup.), only decides that a vessel before registration is not a "duly recognised British ship," and is not, therefore, capable of limiting her liability; it does not decide that a vessel which is not used or to be used in navigating the sea is a ship. That the distinction between a vessel navigating the sea and one only used in the river is recognised by the courts, is shown by the case of The C. S. Butler (L. Rep. 4 Ad. & Ecc. 238), where it is laid down "that the criterion as to whether a vessel falls under the category of 'ship' mentioned in the Act, is whether the vessel be one whose real habit and business is to go to sea; if so, though propelled by oars as well as sails, it is a ship within the meaning of the Act;" as in that case it appeared that the barge in question did not go to sea, it was held not to be a "ship." [Brett, L.J.—In that case the decision was on the use of the word "sea" in the Regulations for Preventing Collisions; the barge was not a "sea"-going vessel. The question in the case at present before us when before the court below was, what was the meaning of "navigation?" May it not be that anything which carries men and materials on the water is a vessel used in navigation?] A "ship" requires something more than capacity for motion; lighters on the Thames and elsewhere are not ships, they are not registered. It has been decided that the Admiralty Court have no original jurisdiction to award salvage in the case of a raft of timber adrift in tidal waters: (A Raft of Timber. 2 W. Rob. 251.) Prior to 1840, the only jurisdiction in salvage existing was that of the High Court of Admiralty and that jurisdiction was confined to services rendered on the high seas; in that year it was enacted by 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6: "That the High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction to decide all claims and demands whatsoever in the nature of salvage for services rendered to . . . . any ship or seagoing vessel . . . . and to enforce the payment thereof, whether such ship or vessel may have been within the body of a county or upon the high seas at the time the services were rendered . . . . in respect of which such claim is made;" and it was under that section that A Raft of Timber (ubi sup.) was decided, and in 1844 the magistrates first obtained jurisdiction in salvage claimed under 200*l.* by 9 & 10 Vict. c. 99 (the Wreck and Salvage Act). By sect. 21 of that Act it is enacted that: "Where any person shall have rendered any service except ordinary pilotage in the saving or preserving of any ship or vessel in distress, or of the cargo thereof, or of the life of any person on board the same" the justices should, if the amount claimed did not exceed 200*l.* have jurisdiction. Sect. 40 of the same Act extended the jurisdiction of the High Court of Admiralty, which under the Act already cited was confined to services rendered to ships and seagoing vessels, to "any goods or articles found either at sea or cast upon shore," and therefore under the Wreck and Salvage Act the distinction is clearly drawn between the jurisdiction of the magistrates and that of the High Court, that of the former excluding and that of the latter including such a case as the present. This Act (the Wreck and Salvage Act 1844) was repealed by the Merchant Shipping Repeal Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 120), sched. But the jurisdiction of the High Court had already been re-enacted by the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 476, and extended over "wreck," which within the definition clause (sect. 2) would include "derelict," and therefore would give jurisdiction over this mudhopper if it were in contemplation of law derelict, which it was not, and possibly in any case under the more general provisions of sect. 476. It is also probable that a like jurisdiction is given to the County Courts by the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), s. 3, but the jurisdiction of the magistrates is given by sects. 458 and 460, and is practically a re-enactment of that which they had under the Wreck and Salvage Act, and does not include this article, which is neither "ship" nor "boat" nor "wreck," and certainly is not "cargo" or "apparel." The Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), s. 49, extends the jurisdiction as to amount, but does not affect it in any other way. That it is not "wreck" within the meaning of the Act is shown by the case of Palmer v. Rouse and others (3 Hurl. & Nor. 505), which decides that property not intended to be at sea at all, as a raft of timber washed away from its moorings in a river, is not "wreck" within the meaning of the Act, and that the justices have no jurisdiction in such a case. I have, therefore, only to satisfy the court that this mudhopper is not a ship or boat. Ex parte Ferguson (ubi sup.) is no authority that it is a ship, even if it be taken to decide that a fishing coble habitually taken to sea was a ship, as this mudhopper was not so taken to sea; she was only, in any event, taken just out of the harbour of Boston and back again, her employment being essentially in the harbour. But the main question in Ex parte Ferguson was, whether "by reason of a casualty happening to or on board of any ship on or near" the coast, a loss of life had ensued; and Lord Blackburn, in the course of the argument expressed a strong opinion that a casualty might be said to happen to a ship if it ran down a boat although no injury was caused to the ship itself, or anyone on board; and therefore it was not necessary for the decision that the coble should be a ship at all, though she was the craft run down, and on board which the loss of life occurred. [Cotton, L.J.—The judgment finds, however, that what goes to sea is a ship, and it does not confine a ship to what goes to sea.] The definition given of a "ship" in Dr. Johnson's Dictionary is a "large hollow building made to pass over the sea with sails." Of course, to adopt that definition to the present time, steam would have to be included as a means of propulsion; but it does not include a vessel like this, which is not made to pass over the sea at all, and has no means of propulsion. [Cotton, L.J.—Sect, 19 of Merchant Shipping Act 1854, dealing with the question of registration, speaks of "ships . . . . employed solely in navigation on the rivers or coasts of the United Kingdom," &c.] That section refers to steamers or sailing vessels which might be used at sea, but which in fact are not so used, not to a barge or craft like this that could not be so used. [Lord Coleridge.—The word most frequently used in the New Testament for the fishing vessels in the Lake of Gennesareth is "ship."] In the New Version the word is more correctly rendered as "boat." But this vessel is not a boat in ordinary parlance. Dr. Johnson defines a "boat" as a "ship of a small size." Therefore, if this vessel is not a ship, neither is she a boat, and though there is no definition in the Merchant Shipping Acts of 'boat," the word is universally used there as a thing appurtenant to a ship, in fact as a ship's boat. But, apart altogether from this mudhopper being a ship or boat, the justices have no jurisdiction, because it was not "stranded or otherwise in distress on the shore": (Merchant Shipping Act 1854, s. 458.)

Bucknill.—This point cannot be raised. The defendants have not joined in the appeal, and, that being so, are bound to accept the judgment for the reason assigned therein.

Phillimore.—I am entitled to support a judgment which is in my favour on any grounds. The Act of Parliament only gives jurisdiction to the local justices in cases where a vessel is actually in contact with the shore. Stranded has a well-known meaning in mercantile instruments, such as policies of insurance, and a vessel may well be in distress on the shore from other causes than stranding: e.g., if the getting on shore was voluntary, as for the purpose of discharging a cargo on the beach, or to stay a tide, and whilst so on shore bad weather comes on, or the vessel caught fire or fell over. The Leda (Swabey, 40) was wrongly decided, and does not bind this court, though the judge below was justified in considering himself bound by it, as he states during the argument, but was not bound to mention it in his judgment. If The Leda is correct, then "on the shore" means "off the shore," or at least "within three miles of the shore." [Brett, L.J.—Dr. Lushington, in referring to the three-miles limit, is only bringing home the well-known proposition that if beyond three miles it could not be "situate within the limits of the United Kingdom."] Even if that be so, according to the ordinary rule of interpretation of statutes, there is no authority for interpreting a clear, definite, and well-known word "on" to mean "on or near."

Lord Coleridge, C.J.—Two points have been made in this case, one against the judgment, and another against the reasons for the judgment on which it is suggested that the judgment cannot be supported. The judgment proceeded on a wrong ground, and I think it cannot be supported. I think that which was salved, the Mac, undoubtedly was a ship. I think the definition in the Merchant Shipping Act is not exclusive but inclusive, and that it may include a good deal more than a vessel used in navigation. The definition is, "ship shall include every description of vessel used in navigation not propelled by oars." It may be that this is a ship within the definition, and, in my judgment, it is a ship. As to a dumb barge getting out to sea, I agree that it is a strong thing, at first sight, to say that it is a ship. The definition might not, on a fair construction, include all vessels of that description. In this case the thing is steered by a rudder and towed out, and the mud is loaded and discharged by men who remain on board. There are various cases which have been cited, but it seems to me unnecessary to adduce any other authority than the definition that is given in Dr. Johnson's Dictionary. It is plain that this vessel was treated as a ship, as explained by the interpretation clause of the Act of Parliament, and I should have great difficulty in arriving at the conclusion that this large barge was not a ship. That would, in the first instance, decide the question, because the learned judge in the court below seems to have gone upon a view of the definition that it was exclusive and not inclusive, and bases his decision on the ground that it was not used in navigation. He fails to deal with the question whether it was a ship. I decide this case on the ground that it undoubtedly was a ship.

Then Dr. Phillimore does that which he is entitled to do. He says that the judgment may be supported by decided cases on other grounds which the learned judge of the court below did not take advantage of. The point is that, upon the facts of this case, this vessel, which is now assumed to be a ship, was not "stranded or otherwise in distress upon the shore" in a tidal water within the limits of the United Kingdom. It is unnecessary to be so in order to give the magistrates jurisdiction to decide, as they did decide in this case. Sir Robert Phillimore was of opinion that he was bound by the decision of Dr. Lushington in the case of The Leda (Swabey, 40), in which he held that "stranded or otherwise in distress on the shore of any sea or tidal water" meant to include otherwise in distress than by stranding. I should have thought, if he was put to decide the section without those words, it might be said "actually physically stranded on the shore, and otherwise in distress," distinguishing it from stranding ships or some other danger which contemplated the taking the ground. That is the strict physical meaning. He would not extend it further than three miles. But in the case before him it was within the three miles of the shore, and within the meaning of the section. I am of opinion that the judgment of Dr. Lushington was properly decided, and that Sir Robert Phillimore was bound by the authority of that case, and that his judgment cannot be supported on the ground that The Leda was wrongly decided, and that the jurisdiction of the magistrates only includes cases where a vessel is physically in contact with the ground.

Brett, L.J.—I am of opinion that this case comes within the words of sect. 458 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, without the assistance of the interpretation clause, and I think it is also within the interpretation clause. The 458th section is: "Whenever any ship or boat is stranded or otherwise in distress on the shore of any sea or tidal water situate within the limits of the United Kingdom," and she is rescued, there shall be salvage reward. The first question is, whether this vessel or this thing, or whatever it may be called, came within the words of the section as "any ship or boat?" I cannot help thinking that the word "ship" there cannot be confined to its most technical meaning. It is not confined to a ship of a peculiar rig, which, in strictly nautical language, is styled a ship. We must go further. There are many vessels, such as ship, barque, brig, cutter, and barge. Barges are vessels in a sea language. But you do not confine these words to the strict interpretation. I can see no reason why they might not include all those vessels known amongst sailors. The term includes, therefore, all things which are built in a particular form for the purpose of being used on the water This thing is being used for that purpose. How is it built? It is built like any other barge, with iron plates instead of wood, but on precisely the same frame. What is she built for? For the purpose of doing something on the water. She happens to be built for carrying mud, but is built in the form of a barge. She has means of guidance—that is, she has a rudder. It is said she has no means within herself of motive power. Well, that is true. She is towed; but towing alone would not conduct her. She would be a most unwieldy thing on the water without a rudder. Therefore she is used for the purpose of carrying something on the water; and she must carry men on board to guide and conduct her. She is called a barge. One may often see barges going out in a string behind a tug for the purpose of the work they have to do outside docks; and you speak of a string of barges. They are like any other barges, and they are vessels in the ordinary sense—in the sea sense; and, unless you can confine "ship" to the strict definition, it must include all things built in the ordinary way; and if vessels are to bear the nomenclature of known vessels, I should say the word "ship" in this section includes barges as well as any other kind of vessel. It may be a barge is propelled by oars, in which case she is not within the definition; but in this case she is found not to be so; therefore she seems to be within the section. But, supposing she were not? Let us see what is the interpretation clause. It is not a limited clause. It is for the purpose of enlarging the term "ship" in the section, and that is shown by Lord Blackburn in a case that is decided. Therefore, it is something more than that which would be ordinarily known as a ship. I think the intention of the clause is that, as things are invented which were never before known, if such a thing be invented and is used for navigation it shall be within the section. Then it is certainly a vessel. And what is it used for? It is used for carrying men, and mud or gravel got out from the bottom of the river, and carrying them to a certain distance on the water. There is nothing in the interpretation clause which says how it is to be used for navigation, and it comes within the ordinary meaning of the term. I should say it is for the purpose of navigation, and would be within the term "a vessel used for the purpose of navigation." Would anybody say, where there are large steamers lying off the mouth of the Mersey, that, supposing you were to build a large saloon barge to carry 200 people, but which should be towed out to a steamer at the mouth of the Mersey by a tug—would anyone say that that would not be a thing used for the purpose of navigation? Therefore the principle applies, and this barge is within the section and within the interpretation clause.

Then the other point is, assuming it is within the interpretation clause, she was not in distress "on the shore." I think that these words have the nautical meaning. They are terms used in the Merchant Shipping Act. I take it that they do not mean hard and fast on the shore, but in the vicinity of the shore. I doubt whether Dr. Lushington intended to lay down the limit of three miles. What he said was, "in the vicinity of the shore," and that would come within the three miles. It was only for the purpose of deciding that it was within the limit of the United Kingdom that he referred to the distance of three miles. Therefore, whatever limit you put on these words, it is obvious to me that, looking at the place where this thing was, it was close to the shore. Therefore on both points the argument of Dr. Phillimore fails. Notwithstanding that argument, I cannot agree with the learned judge in the construction he put on the word "ship."

Cotton, L.J.—This is an appeal from a decision of Sir Robert Phillimore, holding that the justices of the peace had no jurisdiction to make an award of salvage in this case on the ground that the Mac, a hopper barge, was not a vessel used in navigation. I am of opinion that the judgment cannot be supported. The interpretation clause of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (sect. 2) does not confine the ordinary meaning of the word "ship" to a certain class of vessel or a certain method of use, but extends it so as "to include" not only every vessel, but "every description of vessel used in navigation not propelled by oars." I think that this vessel would come within the stricter definition as being actually used in navigation were it necessary so to hold; but she certainly is included in the broader one as being a description of vessel used in navigation. "Ship" in its ordinary acceptance is a generic term for anything formed for the purpose of going on the water. According to the definition quoted in Johnson's Dictionary, a "boat" is also a "ship of a small size," and a ship is formatum aliquid for the purpose of conveying merchandise, &c. by water, in contradistinction to a raft, which is not in this sense formatum. Now the only precedent which has been cited against the jurisdiction is a case of A Raft of Timber (ubi sup), and therefore a case not applicable to what is a ship in the ordinary acceptation of the term, or as defined in the Merchant Shipping Act. It was indeed attempted to show that this vessel did not come within the definition of a ship, and was not therefore a proper subject for the magistrates to award salvage in respect of, by reference to the case of Ex parte Ferguson and Hutchinson (ubi sup.), but that case only shows that a fishing vessel which goes to sea and is used in navigation does not cease to be a ship within the meaning of the Act of Parliament by reason of its being sometimes propelled by oars. That a "ship" cannot under the Act be confined to vessels going to sea or used in sea navigation is shown by sect. 19 of the same Act (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), which in giving the exceptions allowed in the law of registration, speaks (inter alia) of "ships not exceeding 15 tons burden employed solely in navigation on the rivers and coasts of the United Kingdom, or on the rivers or coasts of some British possession." But apart altogether from these considerations this vessel was, in my opinion, herself used in navigation; her use was to carry mud, and to carry it by water, and it is not necessary that she should have any means of propulsion within herself.

As to the second point raised by the respondents, I am of opinion that it is clearly competent to them to support the judgment of the court below on grounds other than those given for the judgment in the court below, without themselves appealing from a judgment which was in their favour; but I do not think the judgment can be supported on the grounds urged. The learned judge, though he did not refer to it in his judgment, had the case of The Leda (ubi sup.) before him, and considered himself bound by it. We think that that case was correctly decided, and that "stranded or otherwise in distress on the shore of any sea or tidal water situated within the limits of the United Kingdom" includes the case of a vessel not actually stranded, but otherwise in distress, near the shore within the limits prescribed.

Appeal allowed.

Bucknill.—This being an appeal from an inferior court, I had to get leave to appeal to the court, and as a condition of getting leave I had to give security for costs; I have therefore to apply for my costs, and the discharge of the security.

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Marine insurance — Barratry — Smuggling — Seizure by Revenue officers — Warranty free from seizure.

A time policy of marine insurance enumerated, amongst the perils insured against, "men of war, enemies, pirates, rovers, thieves, surprisals, takings at sea, arrests, restraints and detainments of all kings, princes, and people, of what nation, condition, or quality soever, barratry of the master and mariners," but there was a warranty "free from capture and seizure and the consequences of any attempts thereat."

The officers of the plaintiffs' ship, which was insured by this policy were arrested by Spanish revenue officers for smuggling, and proceedings were taken to procure sentence of condemnation and confiscation of the ship at a Spanish port, and the plaintiffs incurred expenses in resisting these proceedings, and were obliged to pay money to procure the restoration of the ship.

In an action on the policy to recover these expenses and payments:

Held (affirming the judgment of Field and Cave, JJ.), that the underwriters were exempted from liability by the warranty, and the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover as for a loss by barratry.

The plaintiffs' steamship Rosslyn was insured by a policy which was underwritten by the defendant.

One of the perils insured against was "barratry of the master and mariners."

The policy contained this clause, "warranted free from capture and seizure and the consequences of any attempts thereat."

The master took on board a cargo of tobacco for the purpose of assisting in smuggling it into Spain, and while the tobacco was on board, the vessel was seized by Spanish revenue officers, and taken into Cadiz.

The plaintiffs incurred expenses in resisting proceedings taken to procure sentence of condemnation and confiscation of the ship, and were compelled to pay a large sum of money to procure the restoration of the ship.

The question raised on this appeal was whether the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the amount of these payments and expenses as a loss caused by the barratrous act of the master in smuggling, or whether the underwriters were exempted from liability by the warranty against capture and seizure.

The special case stated for the opinion of the court is set out in the report in the court below (ante, p. 480; 45 L. T. Rep. N. S. 713).

Field and Cave, JJ. gave judgment for the defendant, and the plaintiffs appealed.

June 8 and 9.—Webster Q.C. and Myburgh, Q.C., for the plaintiffs in support of the appeal.—The judgment of the court below cannot be supported, and the plaintiffs are entitled to recover. The question is whether money paid to avoid sentence of condemnation amounts to a loss by seizure and capture, so as to exempt the underwriters from liability, or whether the loss is properly described as a loss by barratry, in which case the underriters are liable. The true view is that it is a loss by barratry. But for the barratry there would have been no loss. Barratry was the causa proxima of the loss; more than that, it was the causa sola. In order to bring the case within the warranty the defendants must show that there was a capture and seizure independent of the barratry. In 2 Arnould on Marine Insurance, part 3, chap. 2, pp. 773, 774, in the 5th edition the law is stated thus: "Loss by barratry seems to form an exception to the general rule of Causa proxima non remota spectatur. It is not necessary (it hardly ever is the case, in fact) that the barratrous act should be the proximate cause of the loss. If there has been barratrous conduct on the part of master and mariners, and a loss subsequently happens as a remote, though not a direct, consequence of the barratry, or if the barratrous acts have only been a co-operative cause of loss, in conjunction with some other peril, this is enough to entitle the assured to recover under a count for barratry. . . . . If, indeed the loss be merely barratrous it is not recoverable under an allegation of another description of peril." In 1 Parsons on Marine Insurance chap. 17, p. 570, the following statement occurs: "A deviation may not be barratrous, and generally is not; but if the deviation be barratrous, and the insurers insure against barratry, then the act operates, not as a deviation but as barratry. That is, the insurers would be liable for a loss caused by it, and would also be liable for a subsequent and independent loss; because this deviation, being an act of barratry and so insured against would not discharge them. A stipulation that the underwriters shall not be liable for seizure or detention on account of illicit or prohibited trade does not render them less responsible for a seizure occasioned by barratry." The law laid down by both authors is supported by the authorities. It is not admitted that barratry is a remote cause of the loss in such a case as the present:

Vallejo v. Wheeler, 1 Cowp. 143;
Goldschmidt v. Whitmore, 3 Taunton, 508.

If the capture and seizure is a mere incident of the peril insured against (i.e. barratry), the loss is a loss by barratry. The American decisions bearing on this point are strongly in the plaintiffs' favour:

American Insurance Company v. Dunham and Wadsworth, 12 Wendell, 463; affirmed, 15 Wendell, 9;
Suckley v. Delafeld, 2 Caines, 222;
Wilcocks v. The Union Insurance Company, 2 Binney, 574.

The decision of the Court of King's Bench in Havelock v. Hancill (3 T. R. 277) is also a strong authority in the plaintiffs' favour. A barratrous act has always been held to cover all the consequences which come from the barratrous act, whereas capture and seizure do not extend beyond the act of seizing the ship. They also referred to

Kleinwort v. Shepard, 1 E. & E. 447; 28 L. J. 147, Q. B.; Lozano v. Janson, 2 E. & E. 160;
Livie v. Janson, 12 East, 648;
Hahn v. Corbett, 2 Bing. 205.

Cohen, Q.C. and Barnes for the defendant.—Although the loss might be described as a loss by barratry, for which the underwriters would have been liable had it not been for the warranty, nevertheless there was a capture and seizure within the meaning of the warranty, and the defendant is therefore exempted from liability. The object of the warranty is to exclude a liability which would otherwise be incurred, that is, a liability for losses which might be described as occasioned by the enumerated perils, but at the same time are included in the words of the warranty:

Kleinwort v. Shepard (ubi sup.);
Arcangelo v. Thompson, 2 Camp. 620.

The loss here was entirely occasioned by the seizure. [Brett, L.J. referred to Ionides v. The Universal Marine Insurance Company, 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 353; 14 C. B. N. S. 259; 32 L. J. 170, C. P.] There is no case either in England or America which goes far enough to show that underwriters can be held liable for a loss such as this, which is clearly covered by the express words of the warranty. They also referred to and commented on the authorities cited on behalf of the plaintiffs, and cited in addition:

Heyman v. Parish, 2 Camp. 149;
Blyth v. Shepherd, 9 M. & W. 763;
Green v. Elmslie, 1 Peake, 278;
Powell v. Hyde, 5 E. & B. 607; 25 L. J. 15, Q. B.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 1.—The following judgments were delivered:

Brett, L. J.—In this case an action was brought upon a policy of insurance to recover a sum of money paid by the owners of a ship in order to release the ship which had been seized by the Spanish authorities on the ground that the master had been guilty of smuggling. It was admitted that the smuggling on the part of the master was an act of barratry. The policy contained a warranty "free from capture or seizure or the consequences of any attempt thereat;" and it was urged on behalf of the defendant (an underwriter) that although that seizure would otherwise have come within the perils insured against, yet by the warranty they were freed from liability. On the part of the plaintiffs it was contended that, inasmuch as the seizure of the vessel was the result of the barratrous act of the master, and barratry was one of the perils insured against, the warranty did not relieve the defendant from the consequences of a loss by barratry. Reliance was placed on behalf of the plaintiffs upon the peculiar doctrine which in insurance law is applicable to losses resulting from barratry. With regard to other losses in insurance law it is the proximate cause which alone can be looked at, but in cases of barratry that rule does not apply. If barratry be the effecting cause, what is commonly called the causa causans, although it is not the last or ultimate cause, yet that effecting cause may be relied upon. It was therefore urged on behalf of the plaintiffs that they could, without infringing upon the warranty, prove a loss by barratry which was a peril insured against by the policy, and that they would have to prove seizure as the means by which the loss by barratry affected the shipowner, that is to say the seizure would be the means of measuring the damage caused by the barratry. On the part of the defendants it was contended that the barratry alone would not have caused any damage to the shipowners except by seizure, and the terms of the warranty cannot be confined, but it is applicable to every seizure, whatever may be the provoking cause of the seizure. No doubt it is true that in cases of barratry the causa causans may be looked at. Here the causa causans was undoubtedly barratry. It seems to me that under these circumstances, if there had been no warranty the assured would have been entitled to bring an action stating the loss either as a loss by seizure or as a loss by barratry. They might have stated the whole cause as barratry and proved the barratrous act and the subsequent seizure, although the seizure was the proximate cause of the loss. But they might also have sued for the loss by seizure, leaving out the barratry. That is clear from the case of Arcangelo v. Thompson (2 Camp. 620) where the loss was by barratry. The loss claimed in the declaration in that case was a loss by capture, and it was contended on behalf of the defendants that, as the capture was the result of barratry, therefore the loss was a loss by barratry and not a loss by capture, and the declaration was not true. But it was held by Lord Ellenborough that, although the plaintiff might have sued upon the loss by barratry, yet, inasmuch as there was a capture he might in effect disregard the loss by barratry. That is an authority that in this case the shipowners might have claimed for a loss by seizure disregarding the barratry (supposing there had been no warranty), but that equally they might have sued for the barratry, disregarding the seizure. It would be strange if the result of the question of liability were to depend upon the form in which the loss was stated in the statement of claim—that if it were stated to be barratry there should be one result, but if it were stated to be seizure, another result. In these days forms of pleading do not affect rights. The right must be in existence before the pleading begins. It seems to me that the case resolves itself into this, whether this warranty against seizure is to be confined to some seizures or whether it includes all seizures. If the case had been one of first impression it would have been argued that this warranty against capture and seizure, or the consequence of any attempts at either, was only a warranty against war risks. I confess I should have been inclined to think this warranty was originally intended to be only against war risks. But it was otherwise decided in the case of Kleinwort v. Shepard (1 E. & E. 447) where there was the same kind of warranty as in the present case. The loss there occurred by the rising of certain Chinese coolies on board the ship who took possession of her, and she was consequently lost. It was held that that was a loss by seizure. It was certainly a piratical act on the part of the coolies, and was therefore a loss by piracy, and was a loss by seizure. It was argued that the warranty was only against war risks, and the rising of the coolies was not a war risk. It was contended that the only seizure intended by the warranty was a seizure in course of war, but Lord Campbell held that the terms of the warranty could not be so confined, but must be read in their natural meaning, and that the warranty included such a seizure as had taken place. It is to be remarked therefore that the seizure within the terms of the warranty included a seizure which was a piratical act, that although piracy was one of the perils insured against, yet this warranty excepted from the policy a piratical act if that act was a seizure. Therefore in that case, although the action might have been brought as for a loss by piracy and also as for a loss by seizure, yet the underwriters could not be made liable as for a loss by piracy because the warranty could not be confined but must be read in its ordinary meaning, and Lord Campbell said it extended to all seizures. In Powell v. Hyde (5 E. & B. 607) there was a policy against all ordinary losses, but there was also a warranty free from capture or seizure or the consequences thereof. The ship was struck by a Russian battery, though there was no war between England and Russia. It was held first that the firing was an attempt to capture the ship, not with the intention of sinking her, but in order that she might be stopped and seized. It was not the act of any enemy, because there was no war, but it was an attempt to capture the ship. It was urged that the warranty extended only to war risks and the losses thereupon; but it was held that the terms of the warranty could not be confined, that it was an attempt to seize the vessel, that the seizing was not to be confined to seizure as a war seizure, but must be read according to ordinary interpretation as applying to all seizures. It seems to me, after some reflection and hesitation, that these cases are authorities to show that such a warranty as that in the case now before us, according to its ordinary signification in the English language, must not be confined to certain seizures, but includes all seizures; i.e., it is a warranty against seizure which may be by an enemy, by the act of foreign governments, or the result of piracy, and, as it includes all seizures, there is nothing to prevent it applying to seizure resulting from barratry, and the peculiar doctrine of barratry does not interfere with the proper interpretation of the warranty. I am of opinion, therefore, that the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover.

It was argued that certain American cases would lead to a contrary conclusion. If I had thought that the American authorities were clear on this point, there being no specific authority to the contrary in England, I should have done everything to bring my mind to follow them, for I agree that it is most advisable that decisions on insurance law should be in conformity in all countries, if possible. It is a law which is applicable in all countries and to maritime business carried on between different countries; and, even if I were disinclined to agree with American decisions, yet if there were no authority to the contrary I should follow them. Although the American decisions are not binding upon us, yet I have always found on insurance law they are supported by careful reasoning. But I think the American cases do not govern the point now before us. The warranty in American Insurance Company v. Dunham (12 Wendell, 463; 15 Ib. 9) was free from the effects of illicit trading, and the court went rather more into a consideration of the history of that warranty than we should do in an English court in order to determine its construction. They concluded that the meaning of such warranty was that it was against illicit trading on the part of the owner. Of course barratrous trading was not within the terms of the warranty. They did not decide upon any particular views of the doctrine of barratry, but only upon the construction of the warranty itself—that it was a warranty against illicit trading which only applied to trading by the owner. It is true those decisions are very much like that of Havelock v Hancill (3 T. R. 277), where the policy was, although not in the form of a warranty, on a ship not in lawful trade. There also barratry was a peril named in the policy, but a policy in that form amounts really to a warranty against illicit trading by the owner, and therefore did not apply to illicit trading by the master. That was no doubt in conformity with the American decisions, but, for the same reason as I have mentioned in reference to the American decisions, I think it does not apply here. This case must be decided in accordance with the case of Kleinwort v. Shepard (1 E. & E. 477), which of course is not binding upon this court, but I think it would be wrong that we should as to the interpretation of a warranty in the policy, differ from the Court of Queen's Bench. I think, therefore, that the principle of that decision shows this to be a warranty against every seizure. Acts of the enemy and acts of barratry which would injure the shipowner, although they would not lead to the seizure of the ship, would be included among the risks insured against, and the warranty only takes away that barratry which results in seizure. Both parts can be construed together, and therefore they must be so construed. I am therefore of opinion that the judgment of the Divisional Court was right, and ought to be affirmed.

Cotton, L.J.—The question in this case depends on the true construction and effect of a policy of marine insurance on the ship Rosslyn, which amongst the perils insured against includes barratry. The policy also contains a warranty by the insured against capture and seizure. In consequence of the master having at Gibraltar taken a cargo for smuggling into Spain, the vessel was seized by the Spanish authorities. The action was to recover expenses incurred by the owners for the release of the vessel. The act of the master in taking the cargo was barratrous, and, as in cases of barratry, there is an exception to the general rule that the loss must be referred to its proximate cause, but for the warranty the insured might have recovered his loss as occasioned by barratry. But the immediate cause of the loss was the seizure, and the question is whether the warranty deprives the insured of his right to recover. In my opinion it does. It has been decided that in such a policy capture and seizure is not confined to capture and seizure by an enemy; and as this is the case, I think that these words must be construed to include capture and seizure for breach of the revenue laws of a foreign state. I think that the warranty must be construed as a limitation of the liability, which would otherwise have been undertaken by the underwriters. Several of the perils insured against besides barratry, such as king's enemies and pirates, might have resulted in capture or seizure, and I think that the warranty protects the underwriters from loss in respect of the perils insured against where such loss is the immediate result of capture or seizure. It was attempted to limit the effect of the warranty by applying it to those perils only which would probably result in capture or seizure. But I can see no sufficient reason for thus limiting the operation of the warranty, and if several perils insured against may produce capture or seizure as well as other losses, the warranty must modify the liabillty of the underwriters in respect of all the perils which can produce the result mentioned in the warranty, which in terms applies to capture or seizure for whatever causes. But it was said that the case was decided by authority. Vallejo v. Wheeler (1 Cowper, 143) was referred to. There the insured owners recovered a loss the consequence of a barratrous deviation of the master, and it was argued that the implied condition only regulates what is not expressly provided for, and the implied condition against deviation would not modify the express provision as to barratry. Havelock v. Hancill (3 T. R. 277) was also relied on. There the vessel was insured in any lawful trade against (amongst other things) barratry. Loss was incurred by the master barratrously engaging in a prohibited trade. The owner recovered against the underwriters. But there "in lawful trade" was construed "during employment by the owner in lawful trade;" that is, by limiting the condition to acts of the owner. This was also the principle of the decisions in the cases in the United States to which we were referred, where warranty against seizure on account of prohibited trade was construed as a covenant against employment by the owner in unlawful trade. In my opinion none of these cases are authorities in favour of the plaintiffs, and in my opinion the decision appealed from is right, and must be affirmed. With regard to the American cases I cannot regard them as authorities, although the judgments are worthy of all respect as expressing the opinions of learned persons.

Brett, L.J.—We are requested by Lord Coleridge, C.J. to state that he agrees with the judgment of the court.

Ship and shipping—Merchant Shipping Act, 1876, ss. 6, 10—Detaining unsafe ship—Reasonable and probable cause.

By sect. 6 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1876 it is enacted: "Where a British ship, being in any port of the United Kingdom, is by reason of the defective condition of her hull, equipments, or machinery, or by reason of overloading or improper loading, unfit to proceed to sea without serious danger to life, having regard to the nature of the service for which she is intended, any such ship (hereinafter referred to as 'unsafe') may be provisionally detained for the purpose of being surveyed, and either finally detained or released." By sub-sect. 1: "The Board of Trade, if they have reason to believe, on complaint or otherwise, that a British ship is unsafe, may provisionally order the detention of the ship for the purpose of being surveyed." By sect. 10: "If it appears that there was not reasonable and probable cause, by reason of the condition of the ship or the act or default of the owner, for the provisional detention of the ship, the Board of Trade shall be liable to pay to the owner of the ship his costs of and incidental to the detention and survey of the ship, and also compensation for any loss or damage sustained by him by reason of the detention or survey."

In an action against the secretary of the Board of Trade to recover compensation under the above section, the verdict of the jury was taken upon the question whether it was reasonable in the Board of Trade to detain the ship for survey without a direct affirmation by the surveyors that in their opinion the ship was unsafe.

Held, that the proper question for the jury was whether a reasonable man with a competent knowledge of ships would have believed from the actual condition of the ship that she was unsafe, the question of reasonable and probable cause under this Act depending, not on what representations are made to the Board of Trade, but on what the actual condition of the vessel is:

Held, also, that the question of reasonable and probable cause was one for the jury:

Held, also, that evidence as to the history of the vessel is admissible upon that question:

Held, also, that where the contemplated employment of a vessel is for a purpose which involves more than the outward voyage, the employment after the end of the outward voyage is part of "the service for which she is intended," and must be taken into consideration in deciding whether there was reasonable and probable cause for believing the ship to be unsafe.

Judgment of Field and North JJ. reversed.

This was an action against the secretary of the Board of Trade to recover compensation, under sect. 10 of 39 & 40 Vict. c. 80, for the provisional detention of the plaintiff's ship, the City of Limerick.

The facts and arguments are sufficiently stated in the judgment.

Charles Russell, Q.C. and Gainsford Bruce for the plaintiff.

The Attorney-General (Sir Henry James) and

Gully, Q.C. (R. S. Wright with them) for the defendant.

July 1.—BRETT, L.J.—In this case the plaintiff was the owner of an iron steamship, the City of Limerick. In the autumn of 1880, the ship was at Sunderland, preparing to proceed with an ordinary cargo to America, and to return with a cargo partly consisting of cattle. Whilst the ship was thus preparing to carry out such purposes, the officials at Sunderland of the Board of Trade communicated with the Board in London. In the result the ship was provisionally detained under the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1876, by an order of the Board of Trade. Afterwards, under the same statute, a court of survey was held before Mr Rothery and others, who held and reported as follows: "The conclusion, then, to which we have come is, that whether we look to the outward or to the homeward voyage, this vessel is not unfit to proceed to sea without serious damage to human life, having regard to the nature of the service for which she is intended, and that consequently the Board of Trade officers had no right to detain her. Under these circumstances, we have no option but to order the vessel to be released forthwith." The vessel was accordingly released. The present action was then brought by the plaintiff in order to recover compensation for the loss to him by reason of the provisional detention. The case was tried before the Lord Chief Justice and a special jury at Liverpool. The jury found for the plaintiff. A motion was made in a divisional court for a new trial for misdirection, and as for a verdict against the weight of the evidence. Field and North, JJ. refused to grant a rule. A rule nisi was afterwards granted in this court; upon showing cause the case was exhaustively argued before my brother Cotton and myself. At the trial before Lord Coleridge, C.J., it was admitted, for the purpose of that trial, that the ship was in fact a safe ship for the proposed voyages both out and home. The following facts, amongst others, were given in evidence: First, as to the construction and former use of the ship, evidence in accordance with the statement of fact contained in the judgment or report of Mr. Rothery; then certain letters from officers of the Board of Trade at Sunderland to officers of the Board in London to the following effect: On the 21 April 1881 Mr. Mills, a surveyor of the board stationed at Sunderland, wrote to the assistant secretary in London, "City of Limerick. An application has been made for a passenger certificate. She has been until recently a vessel with two decks and a spar deck. Her present owners have now fitted her with an additional awning deck about four-fifths of her length. The ship presents a curious and abnormal appearance, and a question arises in the minds of the surveyors and with myself how far such a superstructure on a vessel of already great depth and small breadth detracts from her seaworthiness. I therefore beg to submit that it is a case wherein the opinion of the consultative staff should be taken. The case is urgent, as the vessel is soon to leave Sunderland for America." A minute was made on this report by Captain Sir Digby Murray, an official of the Board. "I should advise that we absolutely decline to grant this vessel a passenger certificate. There still remains the question whether we are to permit her to proceed to sea or whether we ought not to detain her as unsafe. We should send Mr. Wilmshurst, &c., to survey." On the 28th April, Messrs. Mills and Wilmshurst made a joint report: "We have now inspected this vessel, &c. Above the spar deck is now being added the frames, beams, planks, &c., for a further deck covering or platform, extending about four-fifths of the vessel's length, for the conveyance of cattle, &c. The following considerations arise, &c., as to whether from the great depth to breadth and the danger of the top structure getting partly filled with water, the ship is in such condition as that she may be allowed to sail on a sea voyage. We think it is possible with special loading and provisions that she may be made safe to leave the United Kingdom; but she will, without doubt, be dangerous when loaded in a usual method, or with cattle upon the upper deck. We therefore suggest the desirability of the board leaving the responsibility of such an altogether exceptional case upon a court of survey." Upon this the following minutes were made in London: "Our duty is clear. I instruct Mr. Mills that we have received his joint report, and we understand that he will detain this ship if she attempts to proceed to sea. That being so, he should take care that the steps he takes are effectual." And by the President of the Board: "I approve of what has been done. The owner may be told that the Board of Trade will not take the responsibility of allowing a ship of such unusual dimensions to go to sea without further inquiry. On the 2nd May Mr. Mills wrote: "May I respectfully suggest that others of the board's staff who have experience of the trade this vessel is intended for should be sent to see her at once? The case is a heavy one for me to be left with alone; besides the opinions of Mr. Wilmshurst and myself, as given in our report, might not be in accord with that of others." Evidence was given that the ship had formerly brought cattle on deck from America covered or protected by a movable wooden awning or shed, and that shortly before May 1881, the plaintiff had replaced this by a permanent structure said to be lighter, made partly of iron and partly of wood, to act as a shed or an awning for cattle, and that the ship was intended to bring cattle on deck in such shed from America to England on a homeward voyage. The ship was provisionally detained on the 14th May. By a report dated the 16th May, signed by Mr. Wilmshurst, principal surveyor of iron vessels, by Laslett, Brown, and Paxton, shipwright surveyors, and by Vyvyan, nautical surveyor, the grounds of the provisional detention were stated to be "improper construction, viz., unusual proportions," and after giving the length, breadth, and depth of the ship, there was a statement that these formed "a proportion unknown in the merchant service in any other vessel." The Lord Chief Justice left the following questions to the jury:—1. Had the Board of Trade, when the detention order was issued, reason to believe that the City of Limerick was unsafe for the outward voyage or for the homeward voyage?—A. No, to both branches of the question. 2. Was she unsafe in point of fact on the voyage to New York?—A. No. 3. Was the City of Limerick unsafe for the voyage from New York to England if loaded with an ordinary cargo of American produce, including, as part of the cargo, 500 head of cattle on the main or upper deck?—A. No. 4. Was there an absence of reasonable and probable cause, by reason of the condition of the ship or the act or default of the owners, for the provisional detention of the ship by the Board of Trade?—A. Yes. 5. From what date was the ship in point of fact detained?—A. From the 14th May to the 11th June. The Lord Chief Justice, in summing up the case to the jury, thus explained the fourth question: "You would expect to find, as in my judgment you do find, that where there is a bonâ fide and honest action on the part of that great department of the State, if that action is wrong, and in a particular case inflicts hardship upon an individual, that individual, if the action of the Board of Trade is bonâ fide, and has been upon reasonable grounds, for the general benefit must suffer." And again: "The true question for you to consider is, had the Board of Trade at the time when the vessel was detained, reason to believe when they so acted, that the vessel was unsafe for her outward or her homeward voyage? The true question is what was present to their minds when they did detain." And still more clearly: "As I understand it, and I think rightly understand, therefore, Mr. Mills was wrongly informed, and Mr. Mills wrongly informed the Board of Trade, but, remember, in my view, the question is not whether he wrongly informed the Board of Trade, but whether he did inform the Board of Trade, and whether it was reasonable for the Board of Trade to believe what he informed them." "The Board can only go by the reports of their people, and so long as they have reason to trust those people, and those people do not give them reasons to doubt the trustworthiness of their report, or give them reason to doubt that they can be relied on, I do not see why they should be held blameworthy or responsible under this particular Act of Parliament." The learned judge then left it to the jury to say whether the letters and reports of Mr. Mills and Mr. Wilmshurst did give the board reasonable ground to detain the ship. And he further said that if the question of the absence of reasonable cause was for him, he was of opinion that there was an absence of reasonable cause. The ground of this view of the learned judge, and a ground which he left to the jury to consider in order to determine their verdict, was that the report and letters did not express a determined opinion of Mr. Mills and Mr. Wilmshurst that the ship was unsafe; but rather seemed to avoid, and in his view did avoid, giving such an opinion; and that it was not reasonable for the board to detain the ship without having at least a definite opinion that the ship was unsafe.

The same view is expressed by Field, J.: "I think there can be no doubt that if the statements of the surveyors had been direct and pointed statements of fact, even although mistaken, and although they had erroneously supposed that that was a deck which was not a deck, and that that which was merely a supplementary alteration was a new construction, or that that which they thought added seven feet to the depth of the ship was, with reference to the question whether she was stable or not, erroneous, still, if all that had been positively stated to the Board of Trade by their respective officers, whose competency was not at all doubted, and they had taken it all into consideration, however unfounded or erroneous the views or statements of facts might have been, we should have thought that there would have been very strong evidence indeed to show that there was no absence of reasonable and probable cause." But relying on the same point as the Lord Chief Justice, namely, that the surveyors declined to pledge their opinion that the ship was unsafe, he states that he cannot disagree from the finding that, even subject to the manner of leaving the question to the jury, there was an absence of reasonable and probable cause. Upon the argument before us many points were raised. In order the better to express my views on them, I think it well to state in the first place my opinion on the construction of the statute. The first section with which in this case we have to deal is sect. 6. That section gives power to the Board of Trade, a high executive State department, to interfere with the rights of private subjects over their private property. It would be anticipated that the exercise of such a power so as to be absolutely justified in the end would be expressly confined to certain limited cases: in other words, that such a power so to be justified would only be given on the existence of certain conditions. And so we find that it is not given in respect of every British ship, but only where certain conditions exist with regard to a British ship: "Where a British ship, being in any port of the United Kingdom, is by reason of the defective condition of her hull, equipments, or machinery, or by reason of overloading or improper loading, unfit to proceed to sea without serious danger to human life, having regard to the nature of the service for which she is intended, any such ship (hereinafter referred to as 'unsafe') may be provisionally detained for the purpose of being surveyed and either finally detained or released." This is the part of the enactment which gives the power; the remainder of the section deals with the manner in which the power thus given is to be exercised. The power, then, is not given with regard to every British ship. The enactment is not that an absolutely justified power is given to provisionally detain every ship which the Board of Trade has reason to believe is unsafe. If that be the construction, then all this first part of the section has no effect, and therefore no practical meaning. The only ships which can justifiably in the end be provisionally detained, according to this preliminary part of the section are those which satisfy the condition that for one or other of the reasons mentioned they are unsafe. But by subsect. 1: "The Board of Trade, if they have reason to believe, on complaint or otherwise, that a British ship is unsafe, may provisionally order the detention of the ship for the purpose of being surveyed." Here a power is given to the board to order the provisional detention, if they have reason to believe, &c. This must, if possible, be read so as not to destroy the immediately preceding enactment. The only way to read the two enactments together, so as to give effect to both, is to say that the Board may detain a ship if they have reason to believe she is unsafe (they would, in my opinion, be bound by their duty to the State to detain a ship if they had reason to believe she was unsafe), but that the Board will be proved by the result to have detained the ship unjustifiably as against the owner, even provisionally, if in fact the ship was not by reason of one of the mentioned causes unsafe within the meaning of the section. I would remark here that it is perhaps possible that a ship may be unsafe within the meaning of the section for some cause other than one of the causes mentioned in the section, and if so, such a ship, though unsafe, could not be provisionally detained.

A question was raised as to whether the consideration of safety, or want of it, must be confined to safety or want of it, on an outward voyage. It was urged that it must be, by reason of the words, "unfit to proceed to sea," and from "a port in the United Kingdom." But it seems to me that the words, "having regard to the nature of the service for which she is intended," enlarge the area of consideration. If for any part of the service for which the ship is intended when she is about to leave a port in the United Kingdom, such service to be fulfilled before her return to the United Kingdom, she would be unsafe, it seems to me she ought to be provisionally and finally detained. If a British ship were about to sail in ballast to the Chincha Islands to there load and bring back a cargo of guano, and she would be unsafe to human life to bring back such a cargo, it seems to me that she would be proceeding to sea for a service for which she was destined at the time of proceeding to sea, and for the performance of which service she would be an unsafe ship. Or if a British ship were under charter to leave a British port in ballast to proceed to Spain to load ore, and thence to proceed to some other country, it seems to me that it would be far too narrow a construction of the protection to human life intended by this statute, if such a ship might not be detained, if with a cargo of ore she would be unsafe to human life: she would be about to proceed to sea destined to perform a service for which she would be unsafe. Sub-sect. 3 gives power to the Board of Trade to order "the ship" to be finally detained, either absolutely or until the performance of certain conditions. But "the ship" which may be so detained is a ship satisfying the conditions mentioned in the first part of the section. The conditions in the first part of the section are therefore conditions precedent to a perfect right to detain a ship either provisionally or finally. But they are not conditions precedent to a duty on the part of the Board of Trade to provisionally detain. The Board is bound to perform a duty to the State which is hazardous to this extent, that the performance of it may be shown by a result which at the time the Board could not foresee to have been an unjustifiable act as against an individual, All the difficulty pressing upon the Board by reason of its duty to act on information which it cannot sift in time, and on its grave responsibility to the State if it allow an unsafe ship to go to sea, must be admitted. Nevertheless, in my opinion, the duty to act under such difficulties is imposed. Now although the action of the Board, unless justified by the result of inquiry, is an unjustifiable act as against the shipowner, yet if no particular remedy were given to him by this or some other statute, he would have no remedy. The wrongful act would be a wrongful act done by the members of a public department acting gratuitously, and in the performance of a public duty. Yet the injury done to a shipowner by the detention of his ship at the moment of her proceeding to sea is usually so enormous, that if it were allowed to be done with impunity against one whose ship was not in fact unsafe, and more than that, was not in truth liable, if the true facts were known, to a just suspicion of being unsafe, such legislation would seem to be legislation of the highest injustice. A perfectly innocent individual would by legislation be grievously injured without redress. The Legislature was placed in a position of great delicacy; it was anxious to protect certain subjects, it was bound not too arbitrarily to injure others. The result was sect. 10. By it "if it appears that there was not reasonable and probable cause, by reason of the condition of the ship, or the act or default of the owner, for the provisional detention of the ship, the Board of Trade shall be liable to pay to the owner of the ship his costs of and incidental to the detention and survey of the ship, and also compensation for any loss or damage sustained by him by reason of the detention or survey." Several questions arise as to the meaning of this enactment. It clearly does not go so far as to say that the shipowner shall be compensated if in fact his ship was not unsafe; to so hold would strike out the words, "that there was not reasonable and probable cause." Does it say that he shall not be compensated, if there was reasonable and probable cause present to the minds of the Board from information before them, though there was not reasonable and probable cause if the true state of facts had been before them? It seems to me that so to hold would strike out the words, "by reason of the condition of the ship or the act or default of the owner." In order to justify the suggested interpretation the section should have been, "if it appears that there was not reasonable and probable cause for the provisional detention of the ship," &c. Then, although neither the apparent condition of the ship nor any apparent act or default of the owner would have given to any person of ordinary skill any reason to doubt the safety of the ship, yet if incorrect facts had been stated to the Board of Trade, either through want of skill to appreciate them, or through negligence, or even fraudulently—such facts if they had been true being sufficient to raise a reasonable doubt—the shipowner would be without remedy. A shipowner, so absolutely innocent that not even by misfortune could his ship be an object of suspicion to a person of ordinary skill, would have been deeply injured without remedy. Such legislation would have inflicted frightful injustice. It may be hard but it is not unjust to say that if by misfortune or otherwise a ship does fairly present a suspicious aspect, the shipowner must bear the consequences. It seems to me that the words of the enactment, if effect be given to all of them, carry out the intermediate view, the hard view but not the unjust one. The true interpretation seems to me to be that if upon the evidence given at the trial of what by all means of examination possible under the circumstances in which the ship then was, and all reasonable inquiries, might have been made known, though it was not, to the Board of Trade, a person of ordinary skill would have had reasonable and probable cause so far to suspect the safety of the ship, as to make it reasonable to detain her for the purpose of inquiry, the shipowner has no remedy given to him, though his ship was in fact a safe ship; but if upon such evidence a person of ordinary skill would have had no reasonable and probable cause to suspect the ship, then compensation is given to the shipowner, although the facts erroneously stated to the Board of Trade would, if correct, have given to a person of ordinary skill reasonable and probable cause to suspect, and consequently detain the ship. This reading is, in my opinion, fortified by considering the next part of the section, which seems to be an enactment of reciprocal liability imposed on the shipowner, and which liability clearly depends upon the result in fact, and not upon any statements or appearances of facts. It seems to me to be also fortified by sect. 11. That section assumes that the Board of Trade may be liable to the shipowner, and may yet have a remedy over against a complainant; that would hardly have been enacted if upon the facts asserted to the board there would be an absence of reasonable and probable cause to detain the ship, and yet the board should detain her. It is clear that if the ship was in fact unsafe, no question can arise as to whether the information laid before the board was or was not sufficient to give reasonable and probable cause to detain the ship. In such case the shipowner can have no right to compensation. A question was raised as to whether the Board of Trade could rely upon any other deficiency than the one stated in their notice of detention, and of the reasons for it. As, for instance, if the reason given for the provisional detention were a leak in the bows of the ship, could evidence be given at the trial that, although there was no such leak, there would have been apparent to any ordinary skilful observer a defect in the engines, or in the rudder, or in the masts? Putting upon sect. 10 the interpretation stated above, which seems to me to be the right one, I think that the suggested evidence could be given, subject, no doubt, to fair notice being given of it to the shipowner before the hearing.

Another question raised was whether the question of reasonable and probable cause ought to be left to a jury, or be decided by the judge. In my opinion, the question of reasonable and probable cause, if material, is never a question for the judge, except in the cases of a charge of malicious prosecution or false imprisonment. It is not unnatural that in those cases it should be left to him, because the question in those cases is whether there was reasonable and probable cause to set the law in motion or to act personally on it. But however that may be, it seems clear to me that from the very nature of the case the meaning of this statute must be that it is a question for the jury, to the solution of which they may be assisted by expert evidence. To ask a judge whether upon certain measurements of length, depth, and breadth a ship would have sufficient stability, or whether with a cargo loaded in a given form she would be safe, is on the face of the proposition, to my mind, absurd. Another point raised was whether among the facts which might be proved in order to raise the question above stated as the question to be tried by the jury, the previous history of the ship as to antecedent behaviour might be proved. In my opinion, it might. No reasonably skilled and careful inquirer would, if anything struck him as amiss in a ship, fail, in my opinion, to ask whether what he had observed had existed in previous voyages, and whether it had affected the behaviour of the ship. The previous behaviour of the ship under the same conditions as would affect her on her proposed going to sea, would, in my mind, be an obvious and necessary fact to be considered in determining whether she would be safe or unsafe. An objection was taken to the view of the statute which I think is the right one, on the ground that the Legislature would be imposing a duty on the Board of Trade, and obliging them to pay damages in respect of the performance of that duty; but this objection seems to me to be more formal than accurate. If the members of the Board of Trade were made by the decision personally liable, this objection would be formidable indeed; but in fact the duty is imposed on the Board, the damages are paid by the State. Upon the view thus expressed of the true interpretation of this statute, it follows that, in my opinion, the right question was not left to the jury. The verdict of the jury was taken upon the question whether it was reasonable in the Board of Trade to detain the ship for survey without a direct affirmation by the surveyors that in their opinion the ship was unsafe. The attention of the jury was not drawn to this question, namely, whether the facts with regard to this ship as she lay at Sunderland, which would have been apparent to a person of ordinary skill, if he had had all means of examining her possible under the circumstances in which she lay at Sunderland, and of inquiring about her, and had used those means, would have in the opinion of the jury given to such person reasonable and probable cause so far to suspect the safety of the ship for her outward or homeward voyage as to give him reasonable and probable cause to detain the ship for survey and inquiry. I am sorry to say, under these circumstances, that in my opinion there must be a new trial, if the Board of Trade think it advisable. The appeal must, in my opinion, be allowed.

COTTON, L.J.—The construction of the 6th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1876 is open to some difficulty. It has been contended that the vessel being in fact unsafe is a condition precedent to the exercise of all the powers given by the section. But this cannot, in my opinion, be the true meaning of the earlier part of the section which gives rise to this argument. For, if this is the true construction, a vessel could not lawfully be detained, even for the purpose of being surveyed, unless she is in fact unsafe. This is inconsistent with the first sub-section, which expressly gives power to detain provisionally if the Board of Trade have reason to believe the ship is unsafe, and the contention is inconsistent with the first part of the section itself, which assumes that a ship coming under the provisions of this part of the section may be released, which in the case of a ship in fact unsafe would not be right. The section is not very correctly framed, but I think its meaning is that a ship which the Board of Trade have reason to believe to be unsafe may be detained, and after such investigation or inquiry as by the section is binding on the owner, either released or finally detained. The first part of the section, in my opinion, sums up, though not very accurately, the subsequent detailed provisions of the section. But though as a matter of public policy it was thought right that a power should be given to the Board of Trade to detain provisionally ships reasonably believed by the Board to be unsafe, it was obvious that this might produce great hardships to owners of some vessels, and the 10th section gives in certain cases to owners of vessels which have been detained, and which in fact are not unsafe, compensation by way of damages for their detention, this compensation being payable not by the officers of the Board, but by the State, out of the public purse. In this section the language used differs from that of the first sub-division of the 6th section. It is not "if the Board had not reasonable cause," but "if there was not reasonable and probable cause," that is, if in fact there was not such cause, and it must exist by reason of the condition of the ship, or the act or default of the owner. This, in my opinion, means that the existence of the cause is not to be decided on the representations made to the Board of Trade, on which they acted, but is to be decided on the actual condition of the vessel—on what, in fact, has been done by the owner—so as to prevent the owner being injured by reason of inaccurate representations made to the Board of Trade either by its officers or by strangers, even in cases where the Board has properly discharged the public duty which the Act enables and requires the Board to discharge, and this is supported by section 11.

Then comes the question by whom is the existence of reasonable cause to be decided, by the judge, or by the jury? This does not depend on matters of which a judge has any special knowledge, as is the case where the question is whether there was probable cause for a criminal prosecution. In my opinion, therefore, it must be decided by the jury, and I think the question for the jury (when a vessel is said to be unsafe by reason of her condition) is, whether a reasonable man with a competent knowledge of ships would have believed from the actual condition of the ship that she was unsafe. In some cases the construction of the vessel, without any reference to her previous history, may be sufficient to enable the jury to decide this question, and in my opinion it cannot be said that in all cases evidence ought to be given as to the history of the vessel, but I think that evidence as to the actual history of the vessel is admissible to show that she is or is not unsafe, or that there was or was not reasonable and probable cause for believing her to be unsafe. The only other question is, whether in deciding whether there was reasonable and probable cause for believing the ship to be unsafe, regard is to be had to the outward voyage only. In my opinion where the contemplated employment of the vessel is for a purpose which involves more than the outward voyage, as, in the present case, the bringing cattle home from the United States, or, in other words, employment in the foreign cattle trade, this employment after the end of the outward voyage is part of "the service for which she is intended" and must be taken into consideration. Full protection would not otherwise be secured to seamen employed in British ships, and having regard to the words quoted from sect. 6 it is within the fair interpretation of the Act. The result of my opinion is that in the present case the proper question was not left to the jury, and that the verdict cannot stand. The defendant desires to contend before a jury that the ship was not in fact safe, that is, to question the finding of the court of inquiry. This he did not on the previous trial do in consequence of an expression of opinion by the Lord Chief Justice that the question was whether the Board of Trade had reasonable ground on the statement submitted to them for believing that the vessel was unsafe, and the defendant ought, if he claims it, to have an opportunity of raising the question. There must therefore be a new trial.

The Stoomvaart Maatschappy v. The Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Ship—Collision—Limitation of liability of owner—Mode of ascertaining the amount when both ships to blame—Merchant Shipping Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), s. 54.

Where two ships have been injured by a collision for which both have been found to be in fault, and each has been condemned to pay the moiety of the other's damage, if either party applies to have his liability limited under the Merchant Shipping Act 1862, s. 54, a set-off is allowed between the two amounts, and the other party is entitled to prove against the fund paid into court for a moiety of the loss sustained by him less a moiety of the loss sustained by the party making such application.

Judgment of the court below reversed, Lord Bramwell dissenting.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal.

The action was brought by the respondent company, the owners of the steamship Khedive, to limit their liability in respect of the damage arising out of a collision between that vessel and the steamship Voorwarts, belonging to the appellant company, which took place in May 1878.

The House of Lords had decided that both vessels were to blame for the collision (Stoomvaart Maatschappy Nederland v. Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company (ante, p. 360; 5 App. Cas. 876; 43 L. T. Rep. N. S. 610), and in accordance with the Admiralty rule each was condemned to pay the moiety of the other's damage. This action was brought by the owners of the Khedive to limit their liability under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), s. 54.

The owners of the Voorwarts, which had sustained the greater amount of damage, contended that they were entitled to set off the moiety of the damage sustained by the Khedive, and to prove against the fund in court for the balance; but the contention on the other side was that they should prove for the whole moiety of the loss sustained by them, and be paid in respect of such moiety pari passu with the other claimants on the fund.

The same question arose in the case of Chapman v. The Royal Netherlands Steam Navigation Company (ante, p. 107; 4 P. Div. 147; 40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 433), in which Jessel, M.R. had decided in favour of the contention of the present appellants, but his decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal (Baggallay and Cotton, L.JJ.), Brett, L.J. dissenting. The courts below held themselves bound by that case, and this appeal was accordingly brought to the House of Lords.

The Solicitor-General (Sir F. Herschell, Q.C.), Webster, Q.C., and Phillimore appeared for the appellants. and argued that the view taken by Jessel, M.R. and Brett, L.J. was the right one, and that it was not intended that the provisions for the limitation of liability should be construed in the manner contended for by the respondents. They referred to

The Seringapatam, 3 W. Rob. 38;
Prehn v. Bailey and others; The Ettrick, ante, pp. 428, 465; L. T. Rep. N. S. 817; 45 Ib. 399; 6 P. Div. 127;
De Vaux v. Salvador, 4 Ad. & Ell. 420.

Butt, Q.C., Benjamin, Q.C., and Myburgh, Q.C., for the respondents, contended that the payment of 8*l.* per ton provided for by the Act was intended to be a payment in full of all demands, reserving all rights. The practice of the Admiralty Court was not to strike a balance, as alleged by the appellants, but to give two distinct judgments one against each ship, as may be seen from an inspection of the proceedings in suits both before and since the Judicature Acts, for example in The R. L. Alston (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 509; 7 P. Div. 49; 46 L. T. Rep. N. S. 208), separate reports are made; in fact, proceedings might be taken in two different courts, as in the case of The Velocity (3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 308; 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 686; L. Rep. 3 P. C. 44). This claim could not be set off or proved in bankruptcy, and the argument on the other side is that the words in Order XXII., r. 10, "the court may, if the balance is in the defendant's favour," &c., mean "the court must," &c. If the Khedive alone had been found to blame, the respondents would have had to pay no more than the appellants now contend for, and the fact that anomalies may arise is no ground for interfering with an established rule:

Lohre v. Aitchison, 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 12; 4 App. Cas. 755; 41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 323.

The intention of the Legislature was to limit the owners' liability, and to give an equal dividend to all claimants, which the rule we contend for does, and the appellants' construction does not. They also referred to

The Milan, 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 185; 5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 590; Lush. 388;

The Solicitor-General was heard in reply.

At the conclusion of the arguments, their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

July 26.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Selborne).—My Lords: This case has been to me one of unusual difficulty. In the courts below judicial opinion has been equally divided, and I fear that, even in your Lordships' House, there is not unanimity. In most cases the argument from abstract justice and equity is (in re dubiâ) of great importance; but here it seems to me that there is little, if any, room for that argument. Whatever in this case was the liability to damages within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act of 1862, to that liability the statutory limitation must be applied. That liability depends upon a rule of the Admiralty jurisdiction, which to myself has always seemed arbitrary; and in examining the practice and procedure of the Court of Admiralty, in order to ascertain the true results of that rule, we not only enter upon a branch of forensic jurisprudence, the forms of which are different from those of the common law courts (in which other questions of liability to damage usually arise), but we find important variations in those forms themselves. The rule was thus stated by Sir William Scott, in the case of The Lord Melville (in 1816, not reported): "When it (i.e., loss by collision at sea) happened by the common fault of both parties, the ancient rule of the Admiralty was, that it should be considered a common loss, to which both parties were liable." In the case of The Woodrop (2 Dod. 83) the same very learned judge said: "The rule is that the loss must be apportioned (meaning, equally apportioned) between them, as having been occasioned by the fault of both of them." The Merchant Shipping Amendment Act of 1862 provides that in all cases of collision, where there is no loss of life or personal injury (no special reference being made in the Act to the particular case of both ships being in fault), the owners of any ship "shall not be answerable in damages in respect of loss or damage to ships, goods, merchandise, or other things" to an aggregate amount exceeding 8*l.* for each ton of the ship's tonnage. This is a limitation of the amount for which the owner shall be "answerable in damages;" it does not make him, in any case, "answerable in damages" upon any principle or to any extent upon or to which he would not have been so "answerable" if the Act had not passed. Nor does it relieve him, wholly or partially, from any loss to which he might have been subject, otherwise than by liability in damages. If, for instance, his whole ship were wholly lost in a collision, for which it was alone to blame, he must bear that whole loss, in addition to his liability in damages, as limited by the statute, to the owners of the other ship, and also to the owners of any cargo. And, if the true result of the Admiralty rule is, as the Master of the Rolls and Brett, L.J. considered it to be, that in a case in which both ships are to blame only one of them is really liable in damages to the other, such damages representing a moiety of the difference of the aggregate loss, beyond the point at which the one loss balances the other, the fact that the rest of the loss must be borne by each shipowner who has suffered it is quite consistent with the limitation of liability by the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act. The question is, whether there are in these cases two cross liabilities in damages of each shipowner to the other for half the loss which that other has sustained, or only one liability for a moiety of the difference of the aggregate loss beyond the point of equality. If both parties were solvent, and if there were no statutory limit of liability, the result either way would practically be the same; because up to the point of equality the loss would be borne, in the one view, by the owner who suffered it, and, in the other view, the one liability would be compensated by, or set off against, the other, according to an equity which would certainly have been enforced in the Court of Admiralty. If, however, by the effect of a supervening bankruptcy before judgment, or of the statutory limitation of liability, the position of the two parties were rendered unequal, so that a claim by the one would only be to receive a dividend out of a fund, while a claim by the other would be payable in full, the distinction may become important. But a consequence arising out of circumstances foreign to the rule itself ought not to be regarded in the determination of this question, whether it may tend practically to disturb or to maintain that equality of participation in the loss arising from a common fault, which is the principle of the Admiralty rule. The solution of this question appears to me to depend upon the true effect of the procedure, and the forms of decrees of the Admiralty Court in this class of cases: for the new method of procedure under the Judicature Acts, by claim and counter-claim, cannot, in my opinion, make any difference. If the course of the court had been to deal with the whole controversy between the owners of the two ships in a single proceeding, the natural result of the rule would, I think, certainly be that for which the appellants contend. If both ships had suffered an exactly equal amount of damage, ascertained in the same suit, it cannot be conceived that the court, acting on such a rule, would adjudge the owner of the one ship to pay any damages at all to the other, In general, this would not happen, but one ship would have suffered more damage than the other. The natural result of this inequality of loss would seem to be, not that either owner should pay anything to the other up to the point at which (if there had been no such difference) the loss would have been equal, but that the difference only should be equally divided between them, the one bearing and the other paying a moiety of that difference.

The whole difficulty, as it seems to me, arises out of the fact that the course of the Court of Admiralty was not, and, from the nature of the case, hardly could have been, to deal with the whole controversy between the owners of the two ships in a single suit. When a suit for collision was brought it was always by one party alleging the other party to be in fault; and there was also generally (when both were ultimately found to blame, and when both had sustained damage) a cross suit by the other party, with a like allegation of fault against his opponent. At the hearing, whether of one such suit only, or of two such suits, heard separately, or conjoined, the court, when it determined that both ships were to blame, usually pronounced in each suit a separate decree. It cannot be denied that the more common and recent form of such decrees seems (primâ facie, at all events) favourable to the contention of the respondents. In each suit there was, as I have said, a separate decree declaring that both ships were in fault, "and that the damage arising therefrom ought to be borne equally" by the owners of both ships; and afterwards proceeding to "condemn" the defendants and their bail "in a moiety of the damages proceeded for by the plaintiffs;" and referring it to the registrar, assisted by merchants, to assess the amount of such damages (with or without costs, as the court might think fit). Under every such decree the registrar made a report, finding that a moiety of the damages sustained by the plaintiffs amounted to so much, and (ordinarily) computing interest thereon from the date of the decree. A moiety of the damages sustained by the other party (if plaintiff in a cross suit) was in like manner found (also with interest) sometimes by the same, and sometimes by a separate report. It does not appear that, on the face of the reports made under this form of decree, any balance was ever struck; but, unless the parties, by a voluntary settlement, rendered further resort to the court unnecessary, the proper course would have been for that plaintiff to whom a balance was due to apply to the court for a monition requiring the other party to pay it. A monition was seldom issued in practice: indeed, Mr. Butt in his argument for the respondents stated that he had been unable to find one on the records of the court. But there cannot, I think, be any doubt that, if issued, it would have been in favour of one plaintiff only and that for the balance, representing one moiety of the excess of the aggregate loss beyond equality, and the interest thereon, and the costs (if any) to which that plaintiff might be entitled. The computation of interest by the registrars in cases of this class might, at first sight, seem to imply that there was, in that stage, an ascertained judgment debt carrying interest. But I think this cannot be a correct view, whatever (in other respects) may be the effect of the decrees under which the registrars acted. It does not appear to have been the general course of the court that those decrees should contain any direction as to interest; and I think it more probable that the principle on which interest was computed under them is that mentioned by Mr Sedgwick in his book on damages (chap. 15, pp. 373 and 385-7), where he treats of the power of a jury to allow interest, as in the nature of damages, for the detention of money or property improperly withheld, or to punish negligent, tortious, or fraudulent conduct; the destruction of or injury to property involving the loss of any profit which might have been made by its use or employment.

I understand the Master of the Rolls and Brett, L.J. to have been of opinion that everything in this course of procedure, prior to monition, was not in form only (according to the style of the Admiralty Courts), but substantially interlocutory; that the decree was not, either before or after the report of the registrar, equivalent to a final judgment constituting a liability in a certain amount of liquidated damages; that, for this purpose, a monition (which, both in form and in substance, would be an order to pay) was necessary; that such monition could only issue for a moiety of the excess of the aggregate loss beyond the point of equality, in conformity with the principle of the rule declared on the face of the decree itself; and that there was, therefore, no liability in damages except for that balance. Baggallay and Cotton, L.JJ., on the other hand, thought that the amount of the liability of each party to pay damages to the other was fixed by the decree in the suit of each plaintiff, and that the monition was merely a step towards execution. If no light could be obtained from any other source than the analogy of the forms of procedure in courts of common law and equity, I should have found great difficulty in dissenting from the conclusions of Baggally and Cotton, L.JJ. But, in determining the effect of Admiralty procedure, authorities in the Admiralty Courts ought to prevail over reasoning founded upon the procedure of other tribunals. I referred in the outset to the terms in which the "ancient rule of the Admiralty" was stated by Sir W. Scott in the case of The Lord Melville; and I recur to them for the purpose of observing that they would hardly seem to be quite accurate if the loss to be "apportioned" (according to the other form of expression used by him) were only that of one ship considered separately and without regard to the loss of the other. At all events, the phrase "a common loss" seems to me to point, more naturally, to what Lord Denman, C.J. understood to be the result of the Admiralty rule. "The positive rule" (he said in De Vaux v. Salvador, 4 Ad. & Ell. 420) "of the Court of Admiralty requires the damage done to both ships to be added together, and the combined amount to be equally divided between the owners of the two." The observation which I have ventured to make upon Sir W. Scott's words is, in itself, slight, and would be of no weight at all if there were no precedents of the Court of Admiralty in accordance with Lord Denman's statement of the rule. But there do appear to be such precedents, older than the forms recently in issue, and differing from them. Whatever else may be doubtful in this case, it is, at all events, certain that the ancient rule of the Admiralty and the present rule are the same. The earliest recorded precedent is that of The Petersfield and The Judith Randolph (not reported, cited in Hay v. Le Neve, post), decided by Sir James Marriott in 1789 (following, as it would seem, a case determined in Queen Anne's time). which was treated by Lord Gifford when delivering the opinion of this House in Hay v. Le Neve (2 Shaw. Sc. App. 395) as an authority for the application of the Admiralty rule, which the House of Lords ought to follow. In Hay v. Le Neve the question, which is now so important, did not arise, because there only one of the ships which came into collision had sustained any damage. But a decision, so recognised by this House, is entitled to great weight on all points relating either to the principle or to the application of the rule. The exact terms of the final judgment entered up in The Petersfield and The Judith Randolph were thus stated to the House of Lords by Lord Gifford: "The judge by his interlocutory decree pronounced, that both ships were in fault, and that the Judith Randolph was most in fault, and decreed that the whole damage sustained by the owners of the ship Petersfield and her cargo which was sunk and lost, as well as the 230*l.* damages and expenses given against the ship Petersfield, and the costs of suit here on both sides, be borne equally by the parties to this suit; and assigned for liquidation of damages and taxation of expenses the third session of next term; and referred the liquidation of the said damages and expenses to the registrar, taking to his assistance two merchants." This form of decree agrees with Lord Denman's statement of the rule. Its effect is, I think, clear; 230*l.* damages and expenses had been ascertained (I presume, in a suit brought by the owners of the Judith Randolph) as the amount of the loss and expenses suffered by the Judith Randolph, in a moiety of which (as I suppose) the Petersfield had been "condemned." But the amount of the loss and expenses suffered by the Petersfield was, as yet, unascertained. Let it be supposed, for illustration's sake, that, when ascertained, the loss and expenses suffered by the Petersfield and her cargo might amount to 1770*l.*, which, added to 230*l.*, would make 2000*l.* This decree certainly could not and did not mean that the owners of the Petersfield and her cargo, who had suffered in damages and expenses 1770*l.*, should be liable in 1000*l.* damages and costs to the owners of the Judith Randolph, whose total loss and expenses did not exceed 230*l.*, and should themselves be entitled to receive back from the owners of the Judith Randolph the exact amount which they so paid. The effect of that operation would simply be that the parties would be left in the same position as they would have been at common law, each bearing his own total loss. The effect of such a form of decree could, therefore, only be that the owners of the Petersfield and her cargo should bear their own greater loss to the extent of 1000*l.*, and that the owners of the Judith Randolph, after bearing the whole amount of their smaller loss, namely, 230*l.*, should pay the residue of 1000*l.*, being a moiety of the difference of the aggregate loss, to the owners of the Petersfield. This is, in substance, that mode of applying the Admiralty rule for which the appellants here contend. Dr. Lushington appears to have followed this precedent in 1841, referring expressly to Hay v. Le Neve, in the case of The Washington (5 Jur. 1067), when, two cross actions being tried by agreement at the same time, he "decreed the damages, costs, and expenses of both parties to be thrown together, and to be equally divided." It further appears to me that this view of the real meaning of the procedure in such cases goes far to reconcile with sound principle the course taken by Dr. Lushington in The Seringapatam (3 W. Rob. 38) and The Tecla Carmen (Lush 79), which (in the former case especially) would otherwise have seemed arbitrary, and hardly consistent with the respect due to those decrees of Her Majesty in Council in favour of the owners of the Harriett (1 Mar. Law. Cas. O.S. 152; 5 L. T. Rep. N.S. 210) and the Tecla Carmen, the fruits of which he thought himself entitled to withhold from the plaintiff, unless (in the one case) they would "submit to the deduction of a moiety of the damages which had been sustained by the owners of the Seringapatam" (without a decree in any cross suit), and (in the other) until a cross suit should be brought to hearing. These authorities are, I think, sufficient to prove that the course of the Court of Admiralty has been to use its powers over its own procedure, so as either at the hearing of a cross suit after decree and report in the original suit, or at the hearing of two conjoined suits, or in that later stage at which a monition might be applied for, to bring about the same result as if the whole controversy between the owners of the two ships had been, from the first, dealt with in one proceeding, and this, not by way of set-off, but in a manner which can only be explained as resulting from the view which that court took of the principle, and the just consequences, of its own rule.

One further observation I desire to make, as offering (what seems to me) a not improbable explanation of the ordinary form of decree. It is that, as every suit of this kind was originally brought by a plaintiff alleging his adversary to be in fault (and not admitting the existence of fault on both sides), and as each suit was or might be separately brought to a hearing, the form of the decree made separately in each suit, before "liquidation of damages," would naturally be such as might be applicable to the possible case (which actually occurred in Hay v. Le Neve) of that plaintiff's ship only having suffered any damage; in which case the moiety of that damage only which was mentioned in that decree would be taken into account. My conclusion, upon the whole, is that the opinion of the Master of the Rolls and Brett, L.J. ought to prevail, and that the judgment appealed from should be reversed. In arriving at this conclusion, I have not only the hesitation which I must always feel in differing from the opinion of my noble and learned friend Lord Bramwell, but I am also bound to acknowledge that my own impression, down to the conclusion of the arguments, had been different. A fuller consideration of the authorities to which I have referred has convinced me that they are not reconcilable with the judgment of the Court of Appeal.

Lord BLACKBURN.—My Lords: In this case two ships, the Voorwarts belonging to the appellants, and the Khedive belonging to the respondents, came into collision, and damage was thereby occasioned to each of the ships and to the cargo on board, so that the owners of each ship and the owners of the cargo each sustained loss arising from the same accident, and each had a claim for recompense from those who were responsible. No loss of life or personal injury was incurred. It was ultimately determined that the collision arose from the fault of both ships, and according to the rule in the Admiralty, that being so, the whole damage arising from the collision ought to be borne equally by the owners of the two ships, without inquiring in what degree each was to blame. There was no fault or privity on the part of the owners of the Khedive, and they were entitled to take steps for limiting their liability; and as the moiety of the damage in any view of the case exceeded the amount to which their liability was limited, they instituted an action for this purpose in the Admiralty Division, bringing that amount into court, and making the owners of the Voorwarts and all other persons claiming damages from the collision, defendants. The amount of the damage to the Voorwarts exceeded the damage to the Khedive, and the question which it is intended to raise is whether the owners of the Voorwarts were to prove for the whole moiety of the loss and damage sustained by them and to be paid in respect of such moiety pari passu with the other claimants on the fund, which is the contention of the respondents, or whether they were to prove for the moiety of the loss and damage sustained by them, less a moiety of the los and damage sustained by the Khedive. One practical difference is, that if the respondents are right the amount to be paid out of its fund in court to the owners of the cargo, who are not to blame, will be diminished, for the benefit of the Khedive which was to blame, and, as was said by Baggallay, L.J.. in Chapman v. Royal Netherlands Steam Navigation Company (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 107; 4 P. Div. 157; 40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 433), "it certainly strikes one as improbable that such an apparently inequitable result should be in accordance with a true construction of the Merchant Shipping Acts; but, if such be their true construction, we are bound to adopt and act upon it, however inequitable the result may be." Perhaps it is too strong to call the result inequitable, but I think it is certainly one which the Legislature were not likely to have wished to bring about, and that if they had had it brought to their notice they probably might have altered the language of the Acts, so as to make it clear that they did not intend to bring about such a result. Whether, on the true construction of the Acts as they are framed, the result follows is the question. Another result is that, as between the shipowners, the ship which seeks to limit its liability will always, whether its damage be greater or less than the other, obtain a benefit; whether that is to be wished depends upon which was most to blame.

This is in substance an appeal from the decision in Chapman v. The Royal Netherlands Steam Navigation Company (ubi sup.), in which the question was decided, and it was so argued. In that case the Savernake and the Vesuvius had come into collision, and both were to blame. The owner of the Savernake brought the amount of his statutable liability into court, and made the owners of the Vesuvius and all other claimants defendants. Jessel, M.R., in that suit, declared "that the defendants, the Royal Netherlands Steam Navigation Company, are entitled to prove for the moiety of the loss and damage sustained by them, less a moiety of the loss and damage sustained by the Savernake, and to be paid in respect of such balance pari passu with the other claimants out of the fund in court." That is the declaration which the appellants say ought to be made here, and if it were made the rest of the order would easily be framed. But this declaration was altered in the Court of Appeal by a majority consisting of Baggallay and Cotton, L.JJ., Brett, L.J. dissenting and thinking that the declaration of Jessel, M.R. was right; so that as far as mere weight of authority goes it was pretty equal. I need hardly say that the question is one of difficulty. On the best consideration I can give I think that Jessel, M.R. and Brett, L.J. were right. The solution of the question before the House depends upon two questions: First, what is the true construction of the statutes putting a limit on the liability of shipowners to make recompense in damages to those injured by a collision brought about in whole or in part by the negligence of their servants? Secondly, what is the nature of the recompense in damages awarded by the rule of the Admiralty between the owners of the two ships which came into collision, when both are to blame? I will first consider the statutes. The first Act which limited the liability of shipowners in cases of collision was the 53 Geo. 3, c. 159, and though that Act has been repealed by the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, I think its provisions are material in construing those provisions which have been by the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, as amended by the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, substituted for those contained in it. Stat. 53 Geo. 3, c. 159, begins by a recital that it was expedient to prevent any discouragement to merchants and others from being interested in shipping belonging to this realm, and it was confined to British ships. Sect. 1 enacts "that no person, owner or part owner of any ship, shall be subject or liable to answer for or make good any loss or damage arising or taking place by reason of any act, neglect, matter, or thing done, omitted or occasioned without the fault or privity of such owner, which may happen" to the cargo of the ship, "or to any other vessel," or to any goods being in or on board any other vessel, "further that the value of his or their ship or vessel, and the freight due, or to grow due for and during the voyage which may be in prosecution, or contracted for at the time of the happening of such loss or damage." There were three cases decided between the passing of this statute and its repeal which were not cited in the argument, but I think it right to bring them before your Lordships' notice. In 1818 in Wilson v. Dickson (2 B. & Ald. 2) the Court of King's Bench decided that the value of the ship was to be taken as "the existing value at the time when the loss takes place." In Brown v. Wilkinson (15 M. & W. 391), in 1846, Parke, B. intimates a strong opinion that the value, if it was res integra, ought to be taken as the value at the time of the commencement of the voyage, but adds "as however, the point has been decided by the case referred to, we should pause before we overruled that authority. It is not, however, necessary in this case to do so, for we think that according to the true meaning of that decision the value at the time of loss, to which the damages were then restrained, is the value at the moment the loss commences by the collision, whence the injury, and it is not to be reduced by the consideration that the defendant's vessel is about to founder, at which time it is really of no value, for that would be to exempt the defendant altogether, which the statute certainly does not contemplate under any circumstances." This was quite sufficient to suggest the expediency of substituting a fixed rule for ascertaining the amount of the limit of liability, as was afterwards done, though not till 1862, by the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 13, s. 64. In the interval between these two cases, that of The Dundee (1 Hagg. Adm. 109), was decided by Lord Stowell, in 1823. That was a case of collision in which the Dundee was solely to blame, and consequently her owners were liable for the whole loss. The question there raised was what was to be included in the word "appurtenances" in the 53 Geo. 3, c. 159, a question no longer of importance since the repeal of that statute.

On a prohibition in Gale v. Laurie (5 B. & C. 156), the King's Bench put the same construction on the words as Lord Stowell had done, so that the point, if still important, would probably be held concluded by authority. But the judgment of Lord Stowell contains a great deal material to the present inquiry. He begins by saying that the loss arose from "a want of that attention and vigilance due to the security of other vessels that are navigating on the same seas, which, if so far neglected as to become, however unintentionally, the cause of damage of any extent to such other vessels, the maritime law considers as a dereliction of bounden duty, entitling the sufferer to reparation in damages. The quantum of reparation due in such cases has been differently measured in the maritime laws of different commercial countries, and of the same countries, our own amongst others, at different periods. The ancient general law exacted a full compensation out of all the property of the owners of the guilty ship upon the common principle applying to persons undertaking the conveyance of goods" (I should rather say undertaking the management of anything likely to do mischief unless attention and vigilance is used by these who manage it) "that they are answerable for the conduct of the persons whom they employed, of whom the other parties who suffered damage knew nothing, and over whom they had no control. To this rule our own country conformed, and it is not to be denied that the term compensation is not very accurately applied to any restitution that falls short of a fair and full indemnification for the injury done. But Holland having introduced a law for the protection of its navigation, that persons interested in it should not be liable beyond the value of that property of their own which they exposed to hazard, their ship, freight, apparel, and furniture, England followed in successive statutes, by which it protected owners from responsibility beyond their interests. First, in the case of embezzlements committed by some of the crew of the ship herself, by 7 Geo. 2, c. 15, and in a succeeding statute (26 Geo. 3, c. 86), this protection was extended to the case of embezzlements committed by other persons. The Legislature proceeded in a later statute (53 Geo. 3, c. 159) to give the same protection in the case of all losses otherwise produced. The latter statute, which most immediately applies to the present question, in the first enacting clause subjects the ship, tackle, apparel, and furniture and its freight, but in the following clauses the word 'appurtenances' is introduced, and is repeated as subject to contribution." He then discusses the nature of the fishing stores on a Greenland voyage, and the case of Hoskins v. Pickersgill (Marsh. Ins. 765), in which it was held that fishing stores were not included in the word "furniture" in the construction of a policy of insurance, and proceeds: "I am not sufficiently aware whether this would govern the construction of the same word occurring in an Act of Parliament or in the phraseology of a court in which its meaning is, perhaps, more to be collected from its proper and genuine import than from a prevailing understanding controlling its proper meaning in a contract between two individuals whose words were not to be carried beyond their own intentions in the contract. But it is unnecessary for me to pursue that question further, because it is an admitted fact that this mode of initiating a suit, by the arrest of the ship, tackle, apparel, and furniture, is the ancient formula of the court, though leading to a full remedy affecting all the property of every kind belonging to the owners. The same formula has existed and operated its remedy under all the variations by which the remedy has been modified. It has been no further restricted than as the statute has restricted it; but the initiatory terms 'tackle, apparel, and furniture' founded the suit sufficiently to enable it to embrace all the objects which the statute left subject to its operation. These restrained them only by their own particular restrictions. The same words went as far as the general law went, notwithstanding the narrowness of those terms, and they must now go as far as the general law, limited only by that statute, extends." Before going further, I may observe, first, that neither in Wilson v. Dickson, The Dundee, nor Brown v. Wilkinson did any question arise as to how a court of equity was to work the jurisdiction given it in cases where there were several losses to several parties arising out of the same collision, and the fund brought into court was to be distributed among them rateably, which is the present case. In each of these cases there was one loss only. Next, that Lord Stowell treats it as quite clear that, though the mode in which the Court of Admiralty founded its jurisdiction was by a seizure of the ship, the recompense in damages decreed by that court could be enforced against the owners out of all their property of every kind, so that the result was that by the general law the owners might be made to pay to their uttermost farthing the recompense in damages decreed by the Court of Admiralty, however small the value of their ship when siezed was. Park, B., in Brown v. Wilkinson (ubi sup), says: "From the practice of the Court of Admiralty no light could be derived on this question, for that court proceeds in rem, and can only obtain jurisdiction by seizure, and the value when seized is the measure of liability." It is not, I think, necessary to decide between these very high authorities. If it were, I should wish to make further search among the cases on prohibition; but primâ facie one would say that Lord Stowell was more familiar with the subject, and, therefore, more likely to be accurate. And lastly, that Lord Stowell seems to me to think that the recompense in damages was to be regulated according to the established law in the Court of Admiralty, which is my own opinion. What that established law is, is a question which I will discuss hereafter.

Where there were several losses occasioned to several persons by one act of negligence of those for whom the owner was responsible, the 53 Geo. 3, c. 159, s. 7, permitted the owner to file a bill "in any court of equity having competent jurisdiction against all the persons who shall have brought any such actions, &c., and all other persons who shall claim to be entitled to any recompense for any loss or damage arising or happening by the same separate and distinct accident, act, neglect, or default, or on the same occasion to ascertain the amount of 'the value,' and for the payment and distribution thereof rateably amongst the several persons claiming recompense as aforesaid, in proportion to the amount of the several losses or damages sustained by such persons so claiming such recompense according to the rules of equity and as the case may require." There are carefully drawn provisions requiring the plaintiff in such a bill to make all persons whom he knows of as having any claim for recompense arising out of that one transaction, defendants, so that they may, if they please, claim; and by sect. 10 it is enacted that the court in which the bill is filed shall have full powers for ascertaining the value and the amount of the losses or damages claimed by the defendants respectively, and "generally to do what may appear to be just" in such suit. By the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104 this statute was repealed, and other enactments provided in the ninth part of that Act, sects. 504 and 505, were repealed by the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, and for these was substituted sect. 64 of that latter Act. It is in these words: "The owners of any ship, whether British or foreign, shall not in cases where any of the following events occur without their actual fault or privity, that is to say: 1. Where any loss of life or personal injury is caused to any person being carried in such ship; 2. Where any damage or loss is caused to any goods, merchandise, or other things whatsoever on board such ship; 3. Where any loss of life or personal injury is, by reason of the improper navigation of such ship as aforesaid, caused to any person carried in any other ship or boat; 4. Where any loss or damage is, by reason of improper navigation of such ship as aforesaid, caused to any other ship or boat, or to any goods, merchandise, or other things whatsoever on board any other ship or boat, be answerable in damages in respect of loss of life or personal injury, either alone or together, with loss or damage to ships, boats, goods, or merchandise, to an aggregate amount exceeding 15*l.* for each ton of their ship's tonnage, nor in respect of loss or damage to boats, goods, or merchandise, or other things, whether there is in addition loss of life or personal injury or not to an aggregate amount exceeding 8*l.* for each ton of the ship's tonnage." The case which we have to deal with falls within the fourth of these heads, and, as I think in respect of such losses the only difference intended to be made from the law as it was under 59 Geo. 3, c. 159 was to extend the protection to foreign ships as well as British, and to substitute as the limit of liability a fixed and easily ascertainable sum for the value of the ship, freight, and appurtenances. As regards the mode in which the limitation of liability was to be worked out where there were more persons than one who had sustained loss from the same separate neglect or on the same occasion, the elaborate provisions of 59 Geo. 3, c. 159, are repealed, and in lieu of them is substituted sect. 514, which I think was intended to give the jurisdiction to any court of equity in any part of the British dominions, and in Scotland to the Court of Session, but to make no other difference in the substance of the law. And I think, though the words are changed—principally I think with a view to brevity even at the risk of obscurity—they ought to be construed with reference to the former law and the extent to which it was intended to alter it. And, doing so, it seems to me that the phrase "be answerable in damages" is not to be confined to the damages to be recovered or enforced in an action directly brought against the owner, but it is to be construed as meaning that the aggregate of the recompenses which he has to distribute under sect. 7, "according to the rules of equity, and as the case may require," shall be so limited. This is an important link in my chain of reasoning. I think that the principle laid down in Rex v. Loxdale (1 Burr. 445), as to the construction of statutes in pari materiâ applies; if I am wrong in this, so much of what I rely on is debile fundamentam, and I agree that so far fallit opus. If I am right, I cannot but think that if Baggallay and Cotton, L.JJ. had had their attention called to the very wide words of sect. 7 and sect. 10 of the 53 Geo. 3, giving the Court of Equity, whose powers the Master of the Rolls was exercising, every power for distribution of the value amongst the several persons entitled to such recompenses, and "generally to do therein as shall appear to be just," and had agreed with me in thinking that though these words are not repeated in 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 514, the previous law is to be borne in mind when construing that section, their opinions might have been different; at least, Baggallay, L.J. would have more fully developed his reasons for thinking that the true construction of the Act compelled him to put a construction on it, which he, in the passage already cited, calls "apparently inequitable in its result." And Cotton, L.J. would have given his reasons for saying as he does that the result the Master of the

Rolls had come to was "apparently against the words and meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act." But the argument at your Lordships' bar was mainly rested on the effect of the rule in Admiralty in the Court of Admiralty, and the proceedings in the Court of Admiralty, before there was any limitation of liability at all. That court has jurisdiction over both the parties to a collision. Either of them may, if he pleases, abandon or not exercise his right to claim a recompense from the other. But when one does institute a suit the other cannot baffle him by refusing to appear, even though his ship is not within reach of the court; the institution of the suit gives a maritime lien against the ship forming the foundation of an inchoate right to seize the vessel whenever it comes within the reach of the court, even though in the meantime it had become the property of a bonâ fide purchaser without notice: (The Bold Buccleugh, 7 Moo. P.C. 267.) And according to Lord Stowell in The Dundee (ubi sup.), the Court of Admiralty, when it seized the ship, could enforce a full remedy affecting all the property of every kind belonging to the owners, however small the value of the ship seized might be. These cases were not cited by Brett, L.J., but they seem to me strong authorities in favour of the view he took of the Admiralty procedure. In this case, as in most others, both parties appeared and both made claims. And the great question was, whether both, or only one, and if so, which of the vessels was to blame. It was ultimately decided that both were to blame, and then the court pronounced the judgment which since the decision of this House in Hay v. Le Neve (ubi sup.) has always been pronounced in such cases, viz., that the collision in question in the cause was occasioned by the fault or default of the master and crew of the Khedive, and by the fault or default of the master and crew of the Voorwaarts, and that the damage arising therefrom ought to be borne equally by the owners of the Khedive and the owners of the Voorwaarts. I say that this has always been the form of the judgment since Hay v. Le Neve. I do not think that such could have been the form of the judgment before that case, for it would have had an important bearing on the question then in issue, and not only was Lord Gifford, who presided, a very accurate lawyer, but it appears from the report that he consulted Lord Stowell, who furnished him with authorities, and would certainly have quoted the form of the judgment if it had then existed. Before the decision in Hay v. Le Neve Lord Stowell had in the Woodrop (ubi sup.) laid down that when both ships were to blame "the rule of law is that the loss must be apportioned between them, as having been occasioned by the fault of both of them." As the Woodrop was solely to blame he had no occasion to say on what principle it was to be apportioned. In The Lord Melville, a case not reported anywhere, as far as I can find, but cited by Lord Gifford in Hay v. Le Neve from a shorthand note of the judgment furnished to him, he said: "The ancient rule of the Admiralty was that it should be considered a common loss to which they were justly liable." I do not doubt that "justly" is a misprint for "jointly." The Court of Session had in Hay v. Le Neve apportioned the damage by making the ship most to blame bear two-thirds of it, and the ship least to blame one-third. And the question before the House was, if this was right? In that case only one of the ships had put in a claim, and there was no cross-claim—why, I do not know—but the House had not to consider any question arising from the absence of a cross-claim. Lord Gifford consulted Lord Stowell, and was furnished by him with a note of a decision of Sir T. Marriott. That was in a case in which the Petersfield and the Judith had come in collision and both were to blame, but the Judith most, and in which—I do not quite understand how—the Judith had recovered 230*l.* damages against the Petersfield. The decision of Sir T. Marriott was, "that the whole damage sustained by the Petersfield and her cargo, as well as the 230*l.* damages and expenses given against the ship Petersfield, and the costs on both sides, be borne equally by the parties in this suit." I may observe that Lord Stowell introduced a rule that, though the damages were to be divided, each party should, in such cases, bear his own costs, and that it has been determined that the liability of the shipowner to make good costs is in no way affected by the statutes limiting his liability: (see Ex parte Rayne, 1 Q. B. 982.) In these authorities the decision of the House of Lords was that the damages arising from the collision ought to be borne equally by the owners of the two ships in fault. I do not think attention was called to the effect which this might have on the interest of the innocent owners of cargo. In the possible event of one set of owners proving insolvent whilst the others were solvent, the owner of the cargo would, if the rule was as laid down in the Lord Melville that the owners were liable jointly, receive full indemnification for his loss from the solvent owners; by the rule as laid down in Hay v. Le Neve he only gets one-half from them, and gets a dividend only from the insolvent owners. This rule has been stigmatised as judicum rusticorum, and is justified on the ground of general expediency avoiding interminable litigation at the cost of some inevitable injustice in particular cases. But if the recompense in damages which the one ship is to make to the other is to be considered as quite a distinct thing from that which the other is to make to it, this injustice is increased in a manner which is not only not inevitable, but which as it seems to me, it requires some subtle and technical reasoning to bring about, It was not disputed that in practice, when the damages were ascertained, and it was proved that the damage to one ship was greater than that to the other, the balance, and the balance only, was paid. The Master of the Rolls, in Chapman v. Royal Netherlands Steam Navigation Company (ubi sup.), said that balance "was all that is ever recovered in the action, that is the substance of it." He had just before said that "the monition finally issues for the balance." Inquiry has been made and it turns out that the parties to collision suits having always given substantial bail; there is no instance to be found in which a monition ever issued at all, the money being always paid without anything in the nature of an execution. But I think it can be hardly doubtful that if in any case it ever should be necessary to issue a monition it would not be issued for more than the balance. Had the statute of 53 Geo. 3. c. 159, been unrepealed, and had the Master of the Rolls been exercising the jurisdiction given in such wide terms by the 7th section to determine "according to the rules of equity, and as the case may require," and by the 10th section "generally to do therein as shall appear to be just," I do not think that there could be much doubt that he did right in making his order according to the substance of what was done. I have already expressed my opinion that the statute now in force, though couched in different words, is to be construed as giving the same power as was given by the repealed Act.

The very ingenious argument of the counsel for the respondent was I think this: there was from very early times a jurisdiction exercised by the courts of common law, and I presume by all Superior Courts, to prevent their process being abused or used for the purposes of oppression, and therefore when A. had obtained a judgment in one court against B., on which he was about to issue execution for the full amount, the court on its being brought to their notice by B. that he had obtained a judgment against A. either in the same court, or another on which he could issue execution against A., would restrain A. from issuing execution on the judgment in their court except on the terms that he consented to set the one against the other, and would issue execution only for the balance. There were differences of practice in the Queen's Bench, and in the Common Pleas at one time, as to the extent to which the interests of the attorneys were considered (see Hall v. Ody, 2 B. & P. 28), but those I need not notice, and it was argued with great ingenuity that the cross-claims of the two ships which had come into collision were as distinct as any two actions in different courts, and that the undenied practice merely arose from the Admiralty interfering to prevent the abuse of its process. Even if this were made out I should be unwilling to give effect to what I cannot but think very technical and artificial reasoning. But I do not think it made out. The two claims arose out of one and the same accident. They are determined in one and the same court, and they depend on one and the same question, namely, were both or only one of the parties to blame? And that question is determined once for all between the same parties, and the amount of the damage is also determined by the same court, and between the same parties. Even if the course of pleading had always been as it appears latterly to have been to condemn each separately, and order the damages to be assessed separately, I should still say that they were in substance at least, not distinct and separate actions. But as I have pointed out, I think there can have been no settled form before Hay v. Le Neve. I think the forms produced were all comparatively modern. No practical consequences resulted from these forms, and consequently nothing called upon the courts to consider to what consequences they led. In the case of The Seringapatam (ubi sup.) where the Seringapatam and the Harriet had come into collision, and the owners of the Harriet which had gone to the bottom, refused to give bail to the action against them by the Seringapatam, Dr. Lushington decided, I cannot but think erroneously, that he had no power to stay the action by the owners of the Harriet till they gave bail in the action against them. Whether he was right or not is not since the 24 Vict. c, 10, material, but he so thought, and that looks as if he thought them distinct actions. But when the Seringapatam dropped its action against the Harriet, and the Harriet proceeded against the Seringapatam, and finally judgment was given that both were to blame, and that judgment was affirmed on appeal, the question was raised in a very practical shape. The counsel for the owners of the Harriet argued that the Court of Appeal had in effect, though not in express terms, said that the owners of the Harriet shall receive a clear moiety of the damage." Dr. Lushington took a course which could not be justified on the ground that the court was preventing an abuse of its process on any other ground than that taken by the Master of the Rolls, in Chapman v. Royal Netherlands Company that they were not independent actions, and that the substance was that the balance only should be paid. I have only to add that, whilst I think that the Chancery Division in Chapman v. Royal Netherlands Company, and the Admiralty Division in the present case, are to conduct the limitation action brought under the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 514, according to the procedure as altered by the various subsequent Acts, that those Acts make no difference in the substance of what they are to do. They ought to make exactly the same declarations, and do the same things which the Court of Session following their own procedure ought to have done if the limitation action had been brought in that court. I began by saying what was the question intended to be decided in this House. I doubt if it is raised, I doubt if the appeal is not premature, but I do not think that your Lordships should on that account refrain from deciding it. If the House adopts the view which I take of the law, I think the proper order would be to adopt that of the Master of the Rolls in the former case, and declare "that the defendants, the owners of the Voorwaarts, are entitled to prove for the moiety of the loss and damage, sustained by them, less a moiety of the damage sustained by the steamship Khedive, and to be paid in respect of such balance pari passu with the other claimants out of the fund in court." and with the declaration to remit the action to the Admiralty Division to do what is just in the action. I have had the opportunity of perusing the opinion of Lord Bramwell, who takes the opposite view. I have read it very attentively but it has not changed my opinion.

Lord Watson.—My Lords: I have only to state my entire concurrence in the judgments which have just been delivered.

Lord Bramwell.—My Lords: I entirely agree that the question is, what was the practice or what is the practice or law of the Court of Admiralty in proceedings in that court where both ships are held to be to blame? If I had had to form my own opinion upon that matter unassisted and unbiassed by the opinions of my noble and learned friends who have addressed your Lordships, I confess that I should have come to a different conclusion from that to which they have come, because I should, upon an examination of the practice and what I may call the necessity of the case, have come to the conclusion that there were separate decrees in each case for the damages, or a moiety of the damages, sustained by each ship, and that the fact that the balance was afterwards ascertained, was a mere matter of arrangement and convenience for the avoidance of what I may call a sort of circuity of proceeding, that is to say, a payment by one ship and repayment by the other. And I must say that at the present moment it seems to me extremely difficult to say that that must not of necessity be the law; because what is to happen if proceedings are brought by the owners of one ship in one court and by the owners of the other ship in another court in another country? or, if the owners of the ship sued in this country do not think fit to bring their cross-action or to make their counter-claim, I cannot see what is to happen in such a case as that; and I can foresee great difficulties from the opinions which have just been expressed in your Lordships' House in the case of actions which may be brought in the common law courts in this country. I must acknowledge that I had written a long judgment in support of the views which I am now expressing, but it is not my intention to trouble your Lordships with that opinion, for I really have not confidence enough in my own opinion, in a matter of this description, to differ from the opinions which have been expressed by my noble and learned friends who have already addressed your Lordships. It is not a question of principle; it is not a question of reason; but it is a question of what was the law of the Court of Admiralty; because, undoubtedly, what was the law formerly is the law still, for the Judicature Act has not changed the law in that respect. I therefore will not trouble your Lordships with the opinion which I should have expressed, for I feel bound to give up my own judgment in a case of this description, yielding to the opinions of my noble and learned friends.

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Selborne).—My Lords: The order which I should propose to your Lordships, and move for the purpose of giving effect to the opinions which have been expressed by the majority of your Lordships upon this appeal, is to reverse the order appealed from, and to affirm the judgment of the Admiralty Division dated the 5th April 1881, with the following declaration: That the defendants the owners of the steam vessel Voorwaarts are entitled to prove against the fund paid into court under that judgment for a moiety of the loss and damage sustained by them, less a moiety of the loss and damage sustained by the steam vessel Khedive, and to be paid in respect of the balance due to them after such deduction pari passu with the other claimants out of such fund. It will be for your Lordships to consider what ought to be done with regard to the costs in the court below and here. With respect to that question I venture to point out to your Lordships that this case comes before the House not under the ordinary circumstances which make it fit to apply the rule that the costs should follow the event, but under these circumstances that in another case—namely, the case of Chapman v. The Royal Netherlands Steam Navigation Company between other parties, a decision had been pronounced by the Court of Appeal reversing the judgment of the Master of the Rolls, which it was inevitably necessary for the court below to follow unless it was reversed by this House. The point also was one which all your Lordships felt to be a point of difficulty involving an abstruse matter of law. Taking all these circumstances into account, and I may add quite consistently, as it seems to me, with the principle of the rule which we are applying, I would submit to your Lordships that no costs should be given either in the Court of Appeal or of this appeal.

Order appealed from reversed. Decree of the Admiralty Division, dated the 5th April 1881, affirmed, with a declaration. No costs in the Court of Appeal, or of the appeal to this House.

BURNAND v. RODOCANACHI AND OTHERS.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Marine insurance—Valued policy—Money paid as compensation—Salvage—Indemnity.

The valuation in a valued policy of insurance, while inclusive as between the parties for all purposes of the contract, is not conclusive for other purposes collateral to the contract.

The respondents were the owners of a cargo shipped on board a United States merchant ship which was destroyed by the Confederate States cruiser Alabama. The appellant was an underwriter of a valued policy of insurance on the cargo including war risks, and paid the respondents the valued amount as for an actual total loss.

An Act of Congress was afterwards passed in the United States for the distribution of a compensation fund among persons who had suffered damage from the Alabama. The Act provided that no claim should be allowed for which compensation had been received from any insurer, but that, if such compensation were not equal to the amount of the loss actually suffered, the difference might be awarded; and (sect. 12) that no claim should be allowed by or on behalf of any insurer.

The amount of the respondents' loss was greater than the valuation in the policy, and they received the difference from the fund under the Act.

Held (affirming the judgment of the court below), that the amount so paid was a free gift which the underwriters were not entitled to recover from the assured, though they had paid as for an actual total loss.

THIS was an appeal from the judgment of the Court of Appeal (Bramwell and Brett, L.JJ., Baggallay, L.J. dissenting), reversing a judgment of Lord Coleridge, C.J., in favour of the plaintiff (the present appellant), in an action tried by him without a jury.

The case is reported in 44 L. T. Rep. N. S. 538; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 400; and in 5 C. P. Div. 424, and 6 Q. B. Div. 633.

The facts, which were undisputed, appear from the head-note above, and are fully set out in the report in the court below.

Butt, Q.C., Cohen, Q.C., and Hollams appeared for the appellant, and argued that the underwriters having paid as for an actual total loss were entitled to all the rights of the assured, and an Act of the American Congress cannot affect the legal rights of British subjects in England. The United States received their sum as trustee for those whose claim they put forward, and there is a moral obligation so to apply it. If this cargo had been salved and had come in specie into the hands of the respondents, the appellant would have had a claim to it, and this sum is in the same position. The valuation in the policy is conclusive as between the parties. They referred to

The Attorney-General (Sir H. James, Q.C.) and the Hon. A. E. Gathorne Hardy, who appeared for the respondents, were not called upon to address the House.

At the conclusion of the arguments for the appellant their Lordships gave judgment as follows:

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Selborne.)—My Lords: This is a short, but interesting and important question, but I believe there is no doubt in the minds of your Lordships that the judgment under appeal is right. Now, if I may venture to do so, with that sincere respect which I always feel for everything which falls from judges so eminent as Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Baggallay, L.J., I will indicate what I think is the fallacy in the reasoning of those learned judges. It is this: they have taken the valuation of the policy as conclusive, and as operating by way of estoppel between these parties for a purpose for which, as it appears to me, it is not conclusive, and does not estop them. For the purpose of the contract of insurance, and for the purpose of all rights arising from that contract, it may well be that the valuation in a valued policy is conclusive, and the effect of it may be that for those purposes the assured is not entitled to say, "My loss has been greater than that which was covered by the policy." He cannot say that for the purpose of withholding from the insurer any indemnity or right by way of subrogation or substitution to which by the true legal result of the contract the insurer is entitled. Whenever it is sought to set up an estoppel founded upon the valuation for any purpose going beyond that which I have endeavoured to indicate, the law does not justify such a use of it. It is admitted that that is the English law when it is attempted to use the valuation for the purpose of determining what is, and what is not, a constructive total loss. Now it appears to me that for every other purpose collateral to the contract, for the purpose of every question as to whether a particular claim to something which has arisen aliunde is, or is not, within those rights which result in law from the contract, there is no more reason for holding the valuation to be conclusive between the parties, or to operate by way of estoppel, than there is in the case in which it is admitted that in England it does not so follow. The title to a particular indemnity granted in particular terms out of a particular fund at the disposal of the United States of America by an Act of the Supreme Legislature of the United States, is not a title which I think can possibly result in law from the contract itself. If such a right exists it must exist by the combined effect of the contract between the assurer and the assured and the Act of Congress. It cannot follow from the contract of insurance alone without the Act of Congress. If the Act of Congress is consistent with such a right, having regard to the contract of insurance, still more if the Act of Congress fairly and equitably interpreted confers such a right, there is no reason whatever why the right should not receive full effect. But how is it possible that such an effect could be produced as to a right which could have no existence apart from the Act of Congress, if the Act of Congress itself expressly excludes it? I cannot for a moment understand the doctrine of moral right and obligation, or implied trusts affecting supreme governments and independent states, as applied to a question of this kind. The rights resulting from the contract must be such as in point of law the contract makes; the rights resulting from the Act of Congress must be such as according to its true construction and legal effect the Act of Congress makes; and the rights resulting from both together must be such as are consistent with and flow from the legitimate operation of the whole. Here it is admitted that there is in the Act of Congress everything said and done which a supreme Legislature could possibly say or do for the purpose of excluding the present claim, and attributing that fund which has been appropriated in this case to the sufferers by the capture, not to the valued part, but to the unvalued part of the loss. That distinction, which in my opinion does exclude for this purpose the part covered by the valuation of the policy of insurance, is made by the Act of Congress. It was a true and bonâ fide valuation, but it did not cover the actual loss. The fund awarded by the Act of Congress of the United States is only for that part of the actual loss which the valuation did not cover, and the insurers have not paid.

Whatever views of moral obligation may be entertained with regard to the Act of Congress, I think it is correctly described by Brett, L.J. as an act of pure gift from the American Government. We cannot go behind it and inquire into the motives for an Act of a supreme legislature on a matter within their legislative powers; and that being so, I am entirely unable, for any practical purpose, to distinguish this case, in which the Supreme Government of the United States, having absolute power of disposition over this fund, have, by a solemn Act of their Congress, declared that it should be given, not in respect of the loss which had been indemnified as between the assurers and the assured, but in respect of the loss which the assured had suffered beyond that amount, from the case of a voluntary gift by an individual on the same terms. Mr. Butt admitted that, if a member of the family of the shipowner who had suffered the loss, or of the owner of the cargo, had, after the insurers had paid the loss, made a will in the precise terms of this Act of the Congress of the United States, and had given a fund, over which he had absolute control, for the purpose of indemnifying his relatives or his friends for that portion of the loss which the insurance had not covered, the insurers could not have claimed the gift. I am unable to see, for any legal purpose, a distinction between such a case and the present. It is a satisfaction to me to find that, in taking that view of the matter, I only differ from Baggallay, L.J. so far as this: he thought that the cases of Randel v. Cockran, (ubi sup.) and Blaauwpot v. Da Costa (ubi sup.), under the Order of Council of the 18th June 1741, were authorities in point, and covering the present case. With the greatest respect for that learned judge I am unable to agree in that conclusion. I should not have had any difficulty at all in this case in upholding the claim of the appellant if the Act of Congress of the United States had been in terms similar to that proclamation. The difference is, that when the King of Great Britian came to distribute the fund which arose from the seizures of goods which had been taken by way of reprisal from Spain, the Crown directed it to be divided into moieties; one moiety was to go to the officers and sailors of the ships that had made the captures, but the other moiety was to be paid to and amongst such of His Majesty's subjects as had suffered by the unjust seizures and depredations of the Spaniards. There was no such exclusion of insurers as there is in the present case; in point of law and equity, too, the true result of the contract of insurance was, that the insurers had taken the loss upon themselves, and were entitled to all indemnities received in respect of the loss; they were sufferers in equity at all events, if not in the strictest legal sense, from those depredations; they were to take the place of the original sufferers, and to have all their rights, and therefore, according to the true effect of that proclamation, it was a grant by the Crown in their favour. If anything of the same sort had been done by the Act of Congress in the present case it would be very probable that your Lordships would come to the same conclusion. I see that Brett, L.J. expresses some hesitation upon that subject. It is not necessary for me to say more about it, excepting that I do not myself share that hesitation. I put the matter entirely upon the ground that the terms of the grant in the cases which have been referred to not only impliedly, but actually, according to their fair and legitimate construction in law and equity, operated in favour of the insurers, who, having paid the loss, were entitled to be recouped. Those cases appear to me to be clearly and broadly distinguishable from the present case. I think that the view taken by the majority of the Court of Appeal is correct, and therefore I move your Lordships to dismiss this appeal with costs.

Lord BLACKBURN.—My Lords: I am of the same opinion. The point is a very short one, and one upon which I have no doubt whatever. The general rule of law is, that where there is a contract of indemnity, and a loss happens, anything which reduces or diminishes that loss reduces or diminishes the amount which the indemnifier is bound to pay; and if the indemnifier has already paid it, then, if anything which diminishes the loss comes into the hands of the person to whom he has paid it, it becomes an equity that the person who has already paid the full indemnity is entitled to be recouped by having that amount back. The first question is this: There has been a policy of insurance, and a total loss, by capture and destruction, of the property insured, and a payment of the full value insured, a payment of the total loss under that policy. Subsequently to that payment there came the Treaty of Washington; and afterwards, in consequence of an Act of Congress, a sum of money was paid to the persons who had received payment under the policy; and the question, I apprehend, comes to be, was that sum or was it not paid so as to be a reduction or diminution of their loss? The cases which have been cited Randal v. Cockran (ubi sup.) and Blaauwpot v. Da Costa (ubi sup.), bear this resemblance to the present case, that after the loss had occurred there was a sum of money coming into the hands of the English Government; and the King was pleased—for I think it clear that he was not bound—to say that half of that money should be applied to those who had suffered from the captures. It was certainly, I think, a voluntary gift on the part of the Crown, and was for the benefit of the sufferers. But then I think that that gift being made, as it was made, for the benefit of those who had suffered from the captures, and the money being paid for that purpose, it did diminish the loss; and consequently the benefit of it enured to the persons who were bound to indemnify; and it was so decided in those two cases. It was not because the King was bound to pay the money—he was not; it was not because there was a moral obligation to pay it; it was because, de facto, there was a payment which prevented, or diminished pro tanto, the loss against which the insurers were bound to indemnify the assured. There was a subsequent case, Godsall v. Boldero (9 East, 22) which has not been cited, which proceeded upon an error, and has since been reversed, where a person insured the life of Mr. Pitt, having no other interest in his life than as a creditor, which gave him an interest, and the House of Commons voted out of pure grace and favour a large sum of money to pay Mr. Pitt's debts, and the executors paid this debt. The insurance company set up a defence that this was a contract of indemnity, and that Mr. Pitt's debts having been paid there could not be a right to recover against them. Lord Ellenborough, C.J., falling into a blunder which has since been corrected, thought that the contract of life insurance was a contract of indemnity, and accordingly held that it was a good defence on the part of the insurance company. That decision stood until it was decided in the Exchequer Chamber, in the case of Dalby v. India and London Life Insurance Company (15 C. B. 365; 24 L. J. 2, C. P.) that it went altogether upon a mistaken idea that a contract of life insurance was a contract of indemnity, whereas it was nothing of the sort. But, if it had been a contract of indemnity, the grant of Parliament to pay Mr. Pitt's debts would have prevented the man from sustaining any loss by Mr. Pitt's death, and consequently the decision would have been right. I mention this merely to show that the question is not whether the money was voluntary paid or not, but whether de facto the money which was paid did reduce the loss.

In the present case the Government of the United States did not pay it with the intention of reducing the loss. Lord Coleridge, C.J. says in his judgment, and says very truly, that the Government of the United States cannot by any action of theirs, deprive a man suing in this country of any right which he has. I quite agree in that, but I think that Lord Coleridge, if he had taken the same view that I do of the matter, might have seen that an Act of Congress of the United States might effectually prevent any such right arising. If once the right had vested to recover any such sum, of course an Act of Congress could not take it away; but when Congress in express terms says, "We do not pay the money for the purpose of repaying or reducing the loss against which the insurance company have indemnified, but for another and a different purpose," it effectually prevents the right arising. Bramwell, L.J., in his judgment, has used the phrase, "It was not given as salvage." I should myself prefer to use my own phrase expressing the same idea, and to say that it was not paid in such a manner as to reduce the loss against which the plaintiff had to indemnify the defendants; it is the same thing, but rather differently expressed. That would, I think, dispose of the case, if it were not for a point which Mr. Butt has submitted, namely, that, because this was a valued policy of insurance, the value being put at 15,000*l.*, the defendants could never, under any circumstances as against the plaintiffs, set up the fact that the value of the property exceeded 15,000*l.* Upon the statement of that point it looks so artificial when applied to these facts that one might almost rest there, and say it cannot be. I think it is plain that the reasons for which the valuation has been held to be conclusive extend no further than this, that for the purposes of the contract between the parties the policy may be valued at so much. Whether that principle was rightly applied in the case of The North of England Insurance Association v. Armstrong (ubi sup.) it is not necessary now to say. I own that, if I had a similar case to decide, I should pause before I said that it was rightly decided; but it is not at all necessary to consider that here. It is plain to my mind that the valuation being only for the purpose of the policy of insurance, and for the purpose of binding the defendants to admit it in favour of the plaintiffs, this sum was not paid in such a way as to reduce the loss against which the plaintiffs had to indemnify them. The circumstances that by agreement between the parties the amount they had contracted to pay was not to exceed 15,000*l.* appears to me quite immaterial. For these reasons I agree that the judgment, as it stands, is right, and ought to be affirmed.

Lord WATSON.—My Lords: I have come to the same opinion upon this point, which is one of novelty, but not of great difficulty, and arises, I think, entirely upon the terms of the Act of Congress. If compensation had under that statute been awarded by the American Congress to the respondents in respect of their losses, then I take it that the same rule would be followed as was adopted by the courts in the two cases which have been referred to, Randal v. Cockran (ubi sup.) and Blaauwpot v. Da Costa (ubi sup.). In that case the money voted would have been received by the respondents towards indemnification for the loss against which they were insured; and, upon the principle that one who has been already indemnified against that loss must impart to those who have indemnified him any benefits which he subsequently obtains of that description, the appellant would have been entitled to judgment. But in this case the Act of Congress declares in very express terms, when you take the whole of sect. 12 together, in the first place, that no compensation is to be given by the commissioners on account of loss which has been insured against, or covered by insurance; and secondly, that underwriters are not to receive any benefit from the funds distributed under the Act, and that the compensation given to the claimant must be given to compensate him for any loss either for want of insurance or from being under-insured. In the present case it is perfectly obvious from the statements made by the parties, upon which they agreed, that compensation was awarded to the respondents upon the second of these grounds, namely, in respect that the insurance which they effected fell short of protection against the whole loss which they sustained. It is conceded that compensation might be given to the respondents in these very terms and upon this footing by any benevolent individual, who, being under no obligation to give it, chose to indemnify the respondents; and it is conceded that in the event of his doing so no claim would lie to that money at the instance of the underwriters. Why the American Congress were not in a position to do the same I have not been able to understand, and I do not think that any cause whatever has been shown why they should not do so. Legal obligation is out of the question, but we have heard something about moral obligation. I do not understand what that means. I think that this fund was entirely at the disposal of the Legislature of the United States, that it was an act of grace on their part to assign it, and give it to either one or other of the losers by the act of the Alabama, and that in giving it as they have done they were attaching a condition to the gift which was not only entirely within their power, but which they might attach without violating any legal responsibility or moral obligation. These being my views, I entirely concur in the disposal of this case in the manner which is suggested.

Lord FITZGERALD.—My Lords: I concur in the judgment of the Lord Chancellor, and in the reasons he has expressed for that judgment. I adopt also his criticisms on the authorities cited, and his limitation to the rules which was contended for, viz., that on a valued policy the value agreed on was as between the parties conclusive under all circumstances and for all purposes, whether incidental to the contract or collateral and subsequent. The case presented itself to my mind thus: it is really the old action for money had and received. The plaintiff alleges that the defendant had received a sum of money, which in equity and good conscience he ought not to retain, but should pay over to the plaintiff. The defendant admits that he received the sum in controversy, but denys the plaintiff's equity. I have been wholly unable to discover on what this supposed equity rests. The United States Government might have done as it pleased with the whole sum, and when it was devoted to the purposes specified in the Act of Congress it may be regarded as a free gift for those purposes. The 12th section prohibits its application to such a claim as the plaintiffs. The defendant received the money under the Act of Congress, and the judgment of the American court, to keep it for himself, not to pay it over to the plaintiff.

Order appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed with costs.

GLYN, MILLS, AND CO. v. EAST AND WEST INDIA DOCK COMPANY.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Bill of lading in parts—Tittle of indorsee—Liability of warehouseman to deliver—Merchant Shipping Act 1862, ss. 66-78.

A warehouseman with whom goods have been warehoused under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), ss. 66-78, is in the same position as the shipowner or master, and is entitled to the same protection.

If one of a set of bills of lading made in parts is produced to the master of a ship by the consignee or an indorsee, and the master has no notice or knowledge of any prior indorsement of one of the other parts, he is justified in delivering the goods upon the parts presented to him; but, if he has notice or knowledge of two conflicting claims, he must deliver to the rightful holder at his peril, or interplead.

Fearon v. Bowers (1 H. Bl. 364) disapproved.

C. and Co. were consignees of goods shipped under a bill of lading made out in three parts. They indorsed the first part to the appellants for valuable consideration, and upon the arrival of the ship the goods were warehoused with the respondents under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1862, ss. 66 et seq., and entered at the customs by C. and Co. as owners. The respondents had no notice or knowledge of the title of the appellants. C. and Co. afterwards produced to the respondents the second part of the bill of lading, and required delivery of the goods upon orders signed by them as consignees.

Held (affirming the judgment of the court below), that the appellants could not maintain an action against the respondents for a conversion of the goods.

Barber v. Meyerstein (L. Rep. 4 H. L. 317; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 449; 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 808) discussed and explained.

THIS was an appeal from a decision of a majority of the Court of Appeal (Bramwell and Baggallay, L.JJ., Brett, L.J. dissenting), reported in 6 Q. B. Div. 475, 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 345, and 53 L. T. Rep. N. S. 584, reversing a judgment of Field, J. in an action tried before him without a jury in Dec. 1879 (5 Q B. Div. 129; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 220; 42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 90).

The appellants, who were bankers in London, had advanced money to Messrs. Cottam, Morton, and Co. upon the security of a cargo of sugar, of which Cottam, Morton, and Co. were the consignees.

The bill of lading had been made in three parts, and Cottam, Morton, and Co. indorsed the first part to the appellants as agreed.

Upon the arrival of the ship the cargo was warehoused with the respondents under a stop-order for freight, in accordance with the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63). Cottam, Morton, and Co. were entered in the manifest as consignees of the cargo, and they handed to the respondents the second part of the bill of lading, and paid the freight. They afterwards gave a delivery order to a firm of Williams and Co., upon which the respondents delivered the sugar to them.

The respondents had no notice of the appellants' title.

The bank then commenced this action against the dock company to recover damages as for a conversion of the goods.

The facts, which were not disputed, appear more fully in the reports in the courts below.

The Solicitor-General (Sir F. Herschell, Q.C.), Benjamin, Q.C., and Barnes appeared for the appellants, and contended that the legal position of the appellants as the first indorsees was settled by the decision of the House of Lords in Barber v. Meyerstein (L. Rep. 4 H. L. 317; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 449; 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 808). Messrs. Glyn had a right to the goods, and Cottam and Co. had no right to indorse to anyone else. Messrs. Glyn were the true holders of the bill of lading, and the indorsement of the other part would not make the indorsee "holder" in the legal sense. Under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1862 the respondents held the goods for the ship till the freight was paid, and then for the "owner"—that is, for Messrs. Glyn and Co. The shipowner would not be discharged until he had delivered to the true owner in accordance with the bill of lading, and the warehouseman must be in the same position. The Bills of Lading Act (18 & 19 Vict. c, 111) shows that Glyn and Co. might have been sued for the freight. [Lord BLACKBURN referred to Watts v. Ognell, Cro. Jac. 192.] The question arose in the case of Fearon v. Bowers (1 H. Bl. 364); but that decision, which was approved in Lickbarrow v. Mason (1 H. Bl. 357; 1 Sm. L. C.) and in The Tigress (32 L. J. 97, P. M. & A.; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 117; 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 117; Brow. & Lush. 38), goes too far to be maintained at the present day, and the point is so far without any authority. The shipowner is bound to deliver according to his contract, under which all rights and liabilities had passed to the appellants. The word "accomplished" in the bill of lading must mean "rightly accomplished," and if the dock company deliver to the wrong person they must be liable. As soon as the freight was paid and the stop taken off the contract of affreightment was dead, and the dock company held subject to the orders of the "holders of the bill of lading;" and they have delivered to persons who were not holders in law. They did not receive the goods as bailees of Cottam and Co., but held for the owner subject to the shipowner's lien for freight. See Hollins v. Fowler (L. Rep. 7 H. L. 757; 33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 73) and the cases there cited. [The LORD CHANCELLOR referred to Gurney v. Behrends, 3 E. &. B. 363.] A bill of lading is a document of title, the transfer of which transfers the contract. They also cited

Re Westzinthus, 5 B. & Ad. 817;
Townsend v. Inglis, Holt. N. P. 278;
Knowles v. Horsfall, 5 B. & Ald. 134.

Sir H. Giffard, Q.C., Cohen, Q.C., and Pollard, for the respondents, maintained that the judgment of the court below was right. The goods were delivered to the respondents as bailees for Cottam, Morton, and Co., and were held for them with no notice of any other title whatever. Therefore, under the circumstances, the respondents were justified in delivering to the order of Messrs. Cottam, Morton, and Co., and such delivery was not a conversion. They referred to

Mills v. Ball, 2 B. & P. 461;
Jones v. Smith, 1 Hare, 43.

The Solicitor-General was heard in reply.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

Aug. 1.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Selborne).—My Lords: Having had the advantage of seeing in print the opinion of my noble and learned friend, Lord Blackburn, on this case, with which I agree, I shall content myself with making a very few observations. Every one claiming as assignee under a bill of lading must be bound by its terms, and by the contract between the shipper of the goods and the shipowner, therein expressed. The primary office and purpose of a bill of lading, although by mercantile law and usage it is a symbol of the right of property in the goods, is to express the terms of the contract between the shipper and the shipowner. It is for the benefit of the shipper that the right to take delivery of the goods is made assignable, and it is for the benefit and security of the shipowner that when several bills of lading, all of the same tenor and date, are given as to the same goods, it is provided that "the one of those bills being accomplished, the others are to stand void." It would be neither reasonable or equitable, nor in accordance with the terms of such a contract, that an assignment, of which the shipowner has no notice, should prevent a bonâ fide delivery under one of the bills of lading, produced to him by the person named on the face of it as entitled to delivery (in the absence of assignment), from being a discharge to the shipowner. Assignment, being a change of title since the contract, is not to be presumed by the shipowner in the absence of notice, any more than a change of title is to be presumed in any other case, when the original party to a contract comes forward and claims its performance, the other party having no notice of anything to displace his right. He has notice, indeed, that an assignment is possible, but he has no notice that it has taken place. There is no proof of any mercantile usage putting the shipowner, in such a case, under an obligation to inquire whether there has in fact been an assignment or not; and, in the absence of such usage, I am of opinion that it is for the assignee to give notice of his title to the shipowner, if he desires to make it secure, and not for the shipowner to make any such inquiry. This conclusion is in accordance with the authorities which will be referred to by my noble and learned friend, and also with the principle of such decisions as those of your Lordships' House in Shaw v. Foster (L. Rep. 5 H of L. 321; 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 281) and London and County Bank v. Ratcliffe (6 App. Cas. 722; 45 L. T. Rep. N. S. 322). It was admitted in the argument at the bar that the right of the shipowner to deliver to the first person who claimed it by virtue of an indorsed bill of lading (the shipowner having no notice of any better title) could not be denied, although such person might not, in fact (if there had been a prior indorsement of another part of the bill of lading to another person for valuable consideration), have the legal title to the goods. It is clear, therefore, that the shipowner may be discharged by a bonâ fide delivery, under the terms of his contract with the shipper, to a person who is not the true owner; and I think there is no sufficient reason for refusing him the benefit of that contract, when the part of the bill of lading on which he makes a like bonâ fide delivery is not indorsed. I have spoken of the "shipowner" throughout, because, in my opinion, the position of the dock company, for the purposes of the present question, is not in any respect different from that of the shipowner. The appeal, therefore, ought, in my opinion, to be dismissed, with costs.

Earl CAIRNS.—My Lords: I also am of opinion that this appeal must fail. There is no necessity for going at length into any of the facts of the case, for on the facts there has really been no dispute; but I think it is desirable to state at the outset that the opinion which I have formed is that the respondents are under no higher liability in this case than the shipowner himself would have been, and on the other hand that they are not under any lower or less liability, and that the case may be looked upon, in a general point of view, as if the delivery had here been, not by the dock company, but by the shipowner himself. I think that that is satisfactory, because the opinion which your Lordships will express will be an opinion applicable generally to the case of shipowners, and will not be founded upon any special circumstances connected with the present case. So also, it appears to me that neither the appellants nor the respondents in this case can be said to be guilty of any lâches whatever, much less of any want of good faith. There was no lâches in law on either side, nor was there any bad faith. It is quite clear that Cottam, Morton, and Co. produced to the dock company, whom I will suppose to be the shipowner, one part of the bill of lading, and on the production of that part of the bill of lading the delivery of the goods took place. Then, that leads me to consider what is the position, with regard to a bill of lading of this kind, of a shipowner at an out-port? A shipowner or his agent at a distant port undertakes to carry certain goods; he receives the goods upon a contract of affreightment; he, or the captain, his servant, the master of the ship, gives a bill of lading. I will suppose, in the first place, that he gives a bill of lading consisting of only one part. Now the contract in a bill of lading of that kind is, that the shipowner will deliver to the consignee, or to his order, or to his assigns, the goods which are undertaken to be carried. Of course, in a contract of that kind, it is obvious that questions of some difficulty and some embarrassment may arise. The assumption is that the person who ships the goods, or the consignee, will not necessarily be the person to whom the delivery is to be made. The delivery is to be made to him or, in the alternative, to his order or to his assigns. Questions, it is obvious, therefore, may arise: Has the consignee ordered the delivery to be made to any person else? Has he assigned the contract or the property in the goods? If he has, to whom has he assigned it? Are there more assigns than one, and, if so, in what order of assignment do they stand? Now, if there were only one part of the bill of lading, the process, as it appears to me, would be an extremely simple one. The bill of lading would be the title deed, and whoever came to the shipowner, or to the master of the ship, and demanded delivery of the goods, in whatever right he claimed, whether he claimed as the original consignee, or whether he claimed as a person coming by order of the consignee, or whether he claimed as the assign of the contract or of the property, in any of those cases all that the master of the ship (who is not a lawyer, and has not, perhaps, a lawyer at his side) would have to say is, "Where is your title deed? Produce your title deed." If he had not a title deed, the master would be entitled to say, "I will not deliver these goods to you." If, on the other hand, he had the bill of lading, and if there was no fraud, and no notice of any different title brought home to the master, all that the master would have to do would be to deliver to the person having that title deed, and then he would be free from any responsibility. But the confusion, the difficulty, and embarrassment have arisen from there not being what I have supposed, one title deed, but there being more than one, in this case three parts of the title deed, that is to say, of the bill of lading. Now, I ask the question, For whose benefit is it that there are those three parts? Certainly not for the benefit of the shipowner or for the benefit of the master. To them the presence of three parts of the bill of lading is simply an embarrassment. It is for the benefit of the shipper or of the consignee. I do not stop to enquire whether to them it is a benefit, or whether at this time of day (many of the reasons, if not all the reasons, for having bills of lading in parts being very much modified) it would not be better for every one that there should be only one part; that is a question for the mercantile world to consider. It is quite sufficient for me to say that it is certainly not for the benefit or for the convenience of the shipowner or of the master that there are three parts of the bill of lading. Then what has the shipowner to do? The shipowner has to protect himself from that which is liable to cause difficulty or embarrassment to him, and the way in which, as it appears to me, he does protect himself is by stating that, although "the master or purser" hath affirmed to three bills of lading," that is to say, has signed three bills of lading, "all of the same tenor and date," yet, notwithstanding that fact, "one of those bills of lading being accomplished, the others shall stand void," which I understand to mean, that if upon one of them the shipowner acts in good faith, he will have "accomplished" his contract, will have fulfilled it, and will not be liable or answerable upon any of the others. If one is produced to him in good faith, he is to act upon that and not to embarrass himself by considering what has become of the other bills of lading. That appears to me to be the plain and natural interpretation of these words, having regard to the purpose for which they are introduced.

I put it to the learned counsel who argued the case whether he could suggest any other explanation of these words which would give them a rational meaning, but I could not learn from the bar that there was any other explanation that could be suggested. Then that being the case, there has occurred here exactly one of those instances in which the shipowner requires protection. He has had one of these bills of lading produced to him. I use the term "shipowner" because for this purpose I assume that the dock company is in the position of the shipowner. He has had in good faith one of the parts of the bill of lading presented to him; he has had no notice of any title of variance with that; he has acted upon the bill of lading so produced, and it appears to me that if he, or those who stand in his place, is not to be protected, the final clause might as well be struck out of the bill of lading. Now, it is said that this will cause inconvenience to those who advance money upon bills of lading. I do not think that it need do so in the least. There are, at all events, three courses open to them, either of which they may take. The mercantile world may, if they think right, alter the practice of giving bills of lading in more parts than one. That would be one course which might be taken. But even supposing that the bill of lading is in more parts than one, all that any person who advances money upon a bill of lading will have to do, if he sees, as he will see, on the face of the bill of lading that it has been signed in more parts than one, will be to require that all the parts are brought in; that is to say, that all the title deeds are brought in. I know that that is the practice with regard to other title deeds; and it strikes me with some surprise that anyone would advance money upon a bill of lading without taking that course of requiring the delivery up of all the parts. If the person advancing the money does not choose to do that, another course which he may take is, to be vigilant and on the alert, and to take care that he is on the spot at the first arrival of the ship in the dock. If those who advance money on bills of lading do not adopt one or other of those courses, it appears to me that, if they suffer, they suffer in consequence of their own act. Whether that be so or not, it seems to me that in this case the dock company, standing in the position of the shipowner, require to be protected, that they have done that which it was their positive duty to do, and that the judgment of the court below ought to be affirmed.

Lord O'HAGAN.—My Lords: I also have had the advantage of reading the opinion of my noble and learned friend (Lord Blackburn), and its exposition of the law presents the view which, after serious consideration, I have adopted in common, I believe, with all your Lordships. I cannot say that I have not had some hesitation in the adoption of it. The conflict of decision between able judges of equal authority and equally divided, the diversities of reasoning even between those who in the result have agreed, the want of any recent evidence as to the usages of commercial men in these countries with reference to bills of lading, and especially such dealings with them as are the subject of our consideration, made me doubtful for a time; but I am satisfied upon the whole that the ruling of the Appellate Court was right, and ought to be upheld. The defendants got possession of the goods from the captain, not by virtue of any contract or bailment, as has been contended at the bar, but under the provisions of the statute and subject to the liabilities created and the duties imposed by it; and amongst them was the obligation to deliver them to such person or persons, and on such conditions, as the statute should be held to have indicated and required to warrant delivery by the shipowner or the master. On the payment of the freight, and the removal of the stop-order, it seems to me that they were bound as he would have been to deliver them to the person making presentment of the bill of lading. I think, in the absence of express decision, the weight of authority having relation to it sustains the judgment of the court below; I think that usage, as far as we have any means of ascertaining it, is inconsistent with the plaintiffs' claim, and I think, finally, that principle and policy and the necessities of mercantile affairs are quite in favour of the action of the defendants. As to authority, there is none which deals with the precise state of facts before us. The case of Fearon v. Bowers (ubi sup.) was different from this, as there the person yielding up the goods was the captain of the vessel, and not the warehouseman, and he had to choose between two claimants—the consignee and the indorsee—whereas there was only one claimant known to the defendants, and they had had no notice of any other. I concur in the view of Lord Tenterden, that the law should not commit a discretion to the captain of a ship so unreasonably large and so capable of being put to evil uses. But that case could scarcely have been entertained at all, if the lesser power to hand goods to the holder of a bill of lading, bonâ fide and without knowledge of any adverse title, had not been assumed to be warranted by usage and by law. I do not think the approval of that case in Lickbarrow v. Mason (ubi sup.) by Lord Loughborough and Buller, J. can be held to have established it in all its dangerous extent. The circumstances they were considering do not necessitate the minute examination or the complete rejection or adoption of its doctrine. But this, at least, may be said that, unless the holder of a bill of lading was then understood to be entitled to receive the goods of which it guaranteed the delivery, we can scarcely conceive that the larger proposition would not have been at once repudiated. And in the case of The Tigress (ubi sup) before Dr. Lushington, when he refers to the case of Fearon v. Bowers, he does not expressly adopt it, in its fulness, as he did not need to do for the purpose of his judgment, but confined himself to approval of it so far as may be applied in the conditions of that before us. He says of Fearon v. Bowers: "This case is a stronger one than the present, for here it appears that there had been no presentment at all by the vendee of his bill of lading. It is clear, therefore, that the master would at least have been justified in delivering to the plaintiffs, as holders of the first bill of lading presented, and it must be remembered that the bills of lading contain a proviso that, the first being accomplished, the others shall stand void."

Plainly, Dr. Lushington considered the first presentment sufficient to entitle the holder to the delivery of the goods, and held that the delivery on such presentment was the "accomplishment" within the proper meaning of the instrument on which the others should "stand void." And accordingly the case is simply headed, "A master is justified in delivering the goods to the holder of the first bill of lading presented," which is the case of the defendants, who stand in the master's place. It seems to me that, taking these cases together, they constitute a reasonable body of authority in support of the judgment of the court below. Then as to the practice in such matters, we have no parol testimony about it, nor any proof at the particular trial of this case; but we have the statement of Lee. C.J., a long time ago, that a usage existed then which would have fully warranted the course of the defendants; we have his direction of a verdict founded on the proof of it; we have Lord Tenterden suggesting the limitation of the rule so acted on by the Chief Justice, but not denying its existence or disapproving of it, save as to its excessive operation; and we have the uncontradicted assertion of a living judge of great experience in mercantile cases, that it is still the "undoubted practice" to deliver, "without inquiry," to the holder of a bill of lading. And lastly, that principle and policy are in favour of such a practice appears to me reasonably plain, when we consider how impossible it would be for a master in a multitude of cases to institute satisfactory inquiry as to the transactions, dehors the part produced to him, which might qualify or destroy the right to the possession of the goods. The fact that so very few complaints of misdelivery are recorded during a century and more, either on the score of error or of fraud, demonstrates how little practical evil has come of the usage; whilst, if it had not prevailed, the prompt and unfettered action required by the needs of commerce might have been much restrained in very many instances. It is always painful to decide, when the decision must necessarily injure one of two blameless parties; but in this case the plaintiffs, who had the property which secured the advance undoubtedly vested in them by the indorsement of the bill of lading, have never lost their title to that property or the right to recover it, if wrongfully taken from them. If they had acted as the bank did in Barker v. Meyerstein (ubi sup.), there could have been no risk of loss. They might have taken other precautions (such as getting all the three parts of the bill of lading) with a like result, and they are not now precluded from seeking redress from anyone who may have illegally obtained possession of their goods. But the defendants who have done nothing malâ fide who have acted, as I conceive, according to usage and within their right, should not be made answerable for an error, for the consequences of which they are not, in my opinion, legally or morally responsible. I think that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Lord BLACKBURN.—My Lords: This is one of the cases in which difficulty arises from the mercantile usage of making out a bill of lading in parts. There is, since the decision of Lickbarrow v. Mason (ubi sup.) now nearly 100 years ago, no doubt that, before there was any statute effecting the matter, the bill of lading was a transferable document of title, at least to the extent, as was said by Lord Hatherley, L.C. in Barber v. Meyerstein (ubi sup.) that, "when the vessel is at sea and the cargo has not arrived, the parting with the bill of lading is the parting with that which is the symbol of property, and for the purpose of conveying a right and interest in the property is the property itself." The very object of making the bill of lading in parts would be baffled unless the delivery of one part of the bill of lading, duly assigned, had the same effect as the delivery of all the parts would have had; and the consequence of making a document of title in parts is, that it is possible that one part may come into the hands of one person who bonâ fide gave value for it under the belief that he thereby acquired an interest in the goods, either as purchaser, mortgagee, or pawnee, and another part may come into the hands of another person who, with equal bonâ fides, gave value for it under the belief that he thereby acquired a similar interest. This cannot well happen unless there is a fraud on the part of those who pass the two parts to different persons, such as would bring them within the grasp of the criminal law, and, from the nature of the transaction, such a fraud must speedily be detected; the cases, therefore, in which it occurs are not very frequent. Nevertheless, it does at times occur, and there are cases in our courts where the rights of the two holders have had to be considered. The last of those was Barber v. Meyerstein (ubi sup.), in this House; and, so far as that decision extends, the law must be taken to be settled. I have never been able to learn why merchants and shipowners continue the practice of making out a bill of lading in parts. I should have thought that, at least since the introduction of quick and regular communication by steamers, and still more since the establishment of the electric telegraph, every purpose would be answered by making one bill of lading only, which should be the sole document of title, and taking as many copies, certified by the master to be true copies, as might be thought convenient; those copies would suffice for every legitimate purpose for which the other parts of the bill can now be applied, but could not be used for the purpose of pretending to be holder of a bill of lading already parted with. However, whether because there is some practical benefit of which I am not aware, or because, as I suspect, merchants dislike to depart from an old custom for fear that the novelty may produce some unforeseen effect, bills of lading are still made out in parts, and probably will continue to be so made out. So long as this practice continues it is of vast importance not to unsettle the principles which have been already settled, and when a new case has to be decided it is desirable to be very cautious as to what principles are applied.

The facts in the present case bear in many respects a close resemblance to those in Barber v. Meyerstein (ubi sup.), but they are not quite the same; and the question on the solution of which, in my opinion, the decision in the present case ought to depend, did not arise in Barber v. Meyerstein, though Lord Westbury did in that case mention it when he says: "There can be no doubt, therefore, that the first person who for value gets the transfer of a bill of lading, though it be only one of a set of three bills, acquires the property, and all subsequent dealings with the other two bills must in law be subordinate to that first one, and for this reason, because the property is in the person who first gets a transfer of the bill of lading. It might possibly happen that the shipowner having no notice of the first dealing with the bill of lading, may, on the second bill being presented by another party, be justified in delivering the goods to that party; but, although that may be a discharge to the shipowner, it will in no respect affect the legal ownership of the goods." That point did not arise, and Lord Westbury did not express any opinion on it. He only mentions it, so as to show that it was not decided either way. In the present case Cottam and Co., on the 15th May 1878, applied in writing to Glyn and Co., bankers in London, for an advance on the security of certain bills of lading. From the terms of the application, it is plain that the bankers were to have a property, with a power of sale, in the goods represented by the bills of lading so far as was necessary to secure their advance, and that, subject thereto, Cottam and Co. were to remain owners of all the rest of the interest in the goods, and might do, as owners, everything consistent with the property thus given to the bankers. I do not think it necessary to express any opinion on a question much discussed by Brett, L J.—I mean, whether the property which the bankers were to have was the whole legal property in the goods, Cottam's interest being equitable only, or whether the bankers were only to have a special property as pawnees, Cottam and Co. having the legal general property. Either way the bankers had a legal property, and at law the right to the possession, subject to the shipowners' lien, and were entitled to maintain an action against anyone who without justification or legal excuse deprived them of that right. Cottam and Co. delivered to the bankers, as part of their security, a bill of lading for twenty hogsheads of sugar by the Mary Jones, shipped by Elliot, in Jamaica, deliverable to Cottam and Co., or to their assigns, indorsed in blank by Cottam and Co. This bill of lading bore on the face of it, distinctly printed, the word "first," and at the end had the usual clause, "In witness whereof the master of the ship hath affirmed three bills of lading all of this tenor and date, the one of which bills being accomplished the others to stand void." There could be no doubt, therefore, that the bankers had distinct notice that there were two other parts of the bill of lading. It appears in Barber v. Meyerstein, that in a similar transaction the Chartered Mercantile Bank, before making a similar advance to Abraham, had insisted upon having all three parts of the bill of lading delivered to them, and so no doubt might Glyn and Co. have done here; but I infer that Abraham, who soon after was guilty of a very gross fraud, was not a person who could ask any reliance to be placed on his honesty, and that where the person depositing the bill of lading is of good repute, a banker would rather run the risk, in most such cases nominal, of the depositor having committed a fraud than the risk of offending a good customer by making inquiries which might be construed as implying that they thought him capable of committing a gross fraud. However this may be, it appears that Glyn and Co. made no inquiry, and were content to take the one part; and as, in fact, neither of the other parts had been transferred, the security which Glyn and Co. had was not impeached by such a prior transfer, and as the Mary Jones was then at sea, the question mainly discussed in Barber v. Meyerstein does not arise in this case. The Mary Jones arrived on the 27th May, and next day the master reported her at the Customs, and the goods were there, for Customs purposes, entered by Cottam and Co. as owners. All this was quite right and did not require the production of any bill of lading; it could and ought to have been done as well as if the other parts of the bill of lading had been delivered to Glyn and Co. or had remained locked up in the desk of the shipper, Elliott in Jamaica. The master appears to have been in a hurry to get his vessel empty, and to have resolved to avail himself of the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1862. secs. 66 to 78. He had not, in strictness, any right to do so till default had been made in making entry, which never was the case at all, or till default had been made in taking delivery within seventy-two hours after the report of the ship, which would not in this case be till the 31st May. But the master, apparently being in a hurry, on the 28th May prepared and signed a notice to the East and West India Docks to "detain all the undermentioned goods which shall be landed in your docks now on board the ship Mary Jones, from Jamaica, whereof I am master, until the freight due thereon shall be duly paid or satisfied, in proof of which you will be pleased to receive the directions of James Shepherd and Co. The whole cargo as per bills of lading. This stop was lodged with the dock company on the 29th May, The dock company, it appeared, were in the habit of requiring the master to sign an authority at the foot of a copy of the manifest, and in this case the copy manifest was signed and lodged on the 28th May. It is not necessary to inquire what would have happened if before the seventy-two hours had expired a duly authorised person had tendered the freight and demanded delivery, for no such thing occurred; and I think as soon as the seventy-two hours had elapsed the dock company held the goods under the provisions of the Act, just as much as if they had not been landed till then. The counsel for the respondents wished your Lordships to draw the inference of fact that all this must have been done, not under the provisions of the Act, but by virtue of some agreement to which Cottam and Co. were a party. I do not see any evidence of this; and, looking at the manner in which the admissions were made so as to apply not only to the Mary Jones, but to two other ships mentioned in the 6th and 11th paragraphs of the statement of defence, I should, if necessary, draw the inference that it was not the fact. Then, on the 31st May, on which day the seventy-two hours had expired, Cottam and Co. brought down and showed to the dock company a bill of lading, with the word "second" distinctly printed on the face of it, and in every other respect precisely similar to the bill at that time in the hands of Glyn and Co. It was not indorsed. The clerk of the dock company entered in the books of the company that Cottam and Co. were the proprietors of the goods, and marked the bill of lading with his initials and the date, so as to show that he had seen it and returned it to Cottam and Co. It was proved, what I think would have been inferred without proof, that after this the dock company would, according to their ordinary practice, have delivered the goods when the stop for freight was removed to the order of Cottam and Co., unless, in the meantime, they had got notice that another bill of lading was, as the witness says, out. It appeared in Barber v. Meyerstein that in the case of Abraham, whose honesty they seem to have distrusted, the Chartered Mercantile Bank had lodged a stop; and so might Glyn and Co. have done in the present case. They did not do so; and the stop for freight having been removed, the dock company, though not till the month of July, delivered the goods to the order of Cottam and Co., not having then either notice or knowledge of the fact that one part of the bill of lading had been indorsed to Glyn and Co., but having from the form of the bill itself noticed that there were two other bills of lading, either of which Cottam and Co. if dishonest enough, might have indorsed and delivered for value to some other party.

The real question, I think, is, whether the dock company were, under such circumstances, justified in or rather excused for delivering to Cottam and Co.'s order, though, if they had had notice or knowledge of the previous transfer of the bill of lading to Glyn and Co., it would have been a mis-delivery, for which they would have been responsible. I do not think the dock company held the goods by virtue of any contract. They held them under the statute subject to a duty imposed by the statute to deliver them to the person to whom the shipowner was bound to deliver them; and, as I think, they were justified or rather excused by anything which would have justified or excused the master in so delivering them. So that, I think, the very point which has to be decided is that raised by Lord Westbury—viz., what will excuse or justify the master in delivering. The case of Barber v. Meyerstein settles that the mere fact there were parts of the bills in the hands of the mortgagor or pledgor does not form a justification or excuse for an innocent purchaser from the mortgagor or pledgor, whichever he was, taking the goods. If it could be proved that the other parts of the bill of lading were left in the hands of the mortgagor or pledgor in order that he might seem to be the owner, though he was not, a purchaser from the person in whose hands they were thus left might either at common law or under the Factors Acts have a good title; but there is not in this case, any more than there was in Barber v. Meyerstein, any evidence to raise such a question. But the master is not in the position of a purchaser from the holder, or person supposed to be the holder, of a bill of lading. He is a person who has entered into a contract with the shipper to carry the goods, and to deliver them to the persons named in the bill of lading, in this case Cottam and Co., or their assigns; that is, assigns of the bill of lading, not assigns of the goods; and I quite assent to what was said in the argument that this means to Cottam and Co. if they have not assigned the bill of lading, or to the assign if they have. If there were only one part of the bill of lading, the obligation of the master under such a contract would be clear, he would fulfil the contract if he delivered to Cottam and Co. on their producing the bill of lading unindorsed, he would also fulfil his contract if he delivered the goods to any one producing the bill of lading with a genuine indorsement by Cottam and Co. He would not fulfil his contract if he delivered them to anyone else, though, if the person to whom he delivered was really entitled to the possession of the goods, no one might be entitled to recover damages from him for that breach of contract.

But at the request of the shipper, and in conformity with ancient mercantile usage, the master has affirmed to three bills of lading all of the same tenor and date, the one of which bills being accomplished, the others to stand void. In Fearon v. Bowers (ubi sup.), decided in 1753, Lee, C.J, is reported to have ruled "that it appeared by the evidence that according to the usage of trade the captain was not concerned to examine who had the best right on the different bills of lading. All he had to do was to deliver the goods upon one of the bills of lading which was done. The jury were therefore directed by the Chief Justice to find a verdict for the defendant." Lord Tenterden says (I quote from the fifth edition, the last published in his lifetime, part 3, chap. ix., sect. 24), "But perhaps this rule might, upon further consideration, be held to put too much power in the master's hands." It is singular enough that 129 years should have elapsed without its having been necessary for any court to say whether this rule was good law. It was suggested on the argument with great plausibility that, especially after the caution given immediately after the passage I have read in Abbott on Shipping, part 3, chap. ix., sect. 25, masters have declined to incur the responsibility of deciding between two persons claiming under different parts of the bill of lading, so that the case has not arisen. If this rule were the law, it would follow a fortiori that if the master was entitled to choose between two conflicting claims, of both of which he had notice, and deliver to either holder, he must be justified in delivering to the only one of which he had notice. So that I think it is necessary to consider whether it is law, and I do not think it can be law, for the reason given by Lord Tenterden; it puts too much power in the master's hands. Where he has notice or probably even knowledge of the other indorsement, I think he must deliver, at his peril, to the rightful holder, or interplead. But where the person who produces a bill of lading is one who—either as being the person named in the bill of lading which is not indorsed or as actually holding an indorsed bill—would be entitled to demand delivery under the contract, unless one of the other parts had been previously indorsed for value to someone else, and the master has no notice or knowledge of anything except that there are other parts of the bill of lading, and that therefore it is possible that one of them may have been previously indorsed, I think the master cannot be bound, at his peril, to ask for the other parts. It is not merely that as Bramwell, L.J. says: "It is the undoubted practice to deliver without inquiry to anyone who produces a bill of lading"—i.e., when no other is brought forward—and that the evidence given in Fearon v. Bowers must have proved that much, though it seems also to have proved more; but that, as it seems to me, unless this was the practice, the business of a shipowner could not be carried on, unless bills of lading were made in only one part. I cannot say on this anything in addition to what Baggallay, L.J. says, and I quite assent to his reasoning. I think also that the only reasonable construction to be put upon the clause at the end of the bill of lading is that the shipowner stipulates that he shall not be liable on this contract if he bond fide, and without notice or knowledge of anything to make it wrong, delivers to a person producing one part of the bill of lading designating him—either as being the person named in the bill if it has not been indorsed, or if there be a genuine indorsement as being the assign—as the person to whom the goods are to be delivered. In that case, as against the owner, the other bills are to stand void. Even without that clause I should say that the case falls within the principle laid down as long ago as the reign of James I. in Watts v. Ognell (Cro. Jac. 192). "That depends," says Willes, J. in De Nicholls v. Saunders (L. Rep. 5 C. P. 589; 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 661)), "upon a rule of general jurisprudence, not confined to choses in action, though it seems to have been lost sight of in some recent cases, viz., that if a person enters into a contract, and, without notice of any assignment, fulfils it to the person with whom he made the contract, he is discharged from the obligation." The equity of this is obvious. It was acted upon in Townsend v. Inglis (ubi sup.), where goods lodged in the docks by Reid and Co. were by them sold to Townsend, and a delivery order was given by Reid and Co. to Townsend. Townsend paid for the goods to Reid and Co.'s brokers, who misappropriated the money. Then Reid and Co. countermanded the order and finally removed the goods from the docks before the dock company had any notice either of the sale to Townsend or of the delivery order given to him. Townsend brought trover against Reid and Co. and the dock company. Gibbs, C.J., a very great commercial lawyer, left to the jury the question as to whether Townsend was, on the evidence as to previous dealings, justified in paying the broker, which the jury found he was, and the plaintiff had a verdict against Reid and Co.; but he directed a verdict for the dock company, saying: "Though the skins were the property of the plaintiffs from the completion of the bargain, the company had made no transfer, and had no notice of their possessory title when they delivered the skins to Reid and Co." In Knowles v. Horsfall (ubi sup.) Abbott, C.J. treats this as indisputable. Goods, parts of which were in a warehouse, had been sold by Dixon to the plaintiff. Abbott, C.J. says as to the parcel in the warehouse: "If the plaintiffs had given notice of the sale to the warehouse keeper, the latter would not have been justified in delivering them to any other order than that of the plaintiff, but not having received any such notice, the warehouse keeper would have been justified in delivering them to the order of Dixon, who placed them there." I know of no case in which this principle has been departed from intentionally and though it is very likely that it may have been sometimes lost sight of, I do not know to what cases Willes, J. alludes. The sum involved in this case is not large, but the amounts advanced by those who lend money on the security of bills of lading, and the value of the goods for which warehouse keepers and wharfingers become responsible, are enormous, Which is the more important trade of the two I do not know, but the decision of this case must have an effect on both, and it is therefore of great importance, and requires careful consideration; and that being so, I have felt some diffidence in differing from the two learned judges who had below come to a different result. Field, J. seems to have taken a view of the facts as to the way in which the goods came into the hands of the dock company different from that which I have taken, and consequently to have thought that the very important question suggested by Lord Westbury did not arise. Brett, L.J. thinks that the master cannot be excused as against the first assignee of one part of the bill, who has the legal right to the property, for delivering under any circumstances to one who produces another bill of lading bearing a genuine indorsement, unless he would be excused in all circumstances — in other words, unless Fearon v. Bowers is good law to its full extent. In this I cannot agree. I think, as I have already said, that where the master has notice that there has been an assignment of another part of the bill of lading the master must interplead or deliver to the one who he thinks has the better right, at his peril if he is wrong; and I think it probably would be the same if he had knowledge that there had been such an assignment, though no one had given notice of it or as yet claimed under it. At all events, he would not be safe in such a case in delivering without further inquiry. But I think that when the master has not notice or knowledge of anything but that there are other parts of the bill of lading one of which it is possible may have been assigned, he is justified or excused in delivering according to his contract to the person appearing to be the assign of the bill of lading which is produced to him. I further think that a warehouseman taking the custody of the goods under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1862, sects. 66-78, is under an obligation cast upon him by the statute to deliver the goods to the same person to whom the shipowner was by his contract bound to deliver them, and is justified or excused by the same things as would justify or excuse the master; and I find as a fact that this was the position of the respondents here. On this ratio decidendi I think that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Lord WATSON.—My Lords: I am of the same opinion. It appears to me that the goods in question were placed in the custody of the respondents under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1862; and I agree with your Lordships that, in the circumstances of this case, the duty of the dock company, in regard to their delivery, differed in no respect from that of the shipowner. The nature and extent of the obligation undertaken by the shipowner to deliver the goods at the end of the voyage must depend upon the terms of the bills of lading, which contain his contract with the shipper; and every assignee of a bill of lading has notice of, and must be bound by, those stipulations, which have been introduced into the contract, for his own protection, by the shipowner. In the present case the master, for the convenience of the shipper, subscribed to three bills of lading of the same tenor and date, by which he undertook to deliver the goods at the port of London, to Cottam and Co. and their assigns, and each bill of lading bore the usual affirmation by the master that he had signed three in all, "the one of which bills being accomplished, the others to stand void." That is a stipulation between the shipper and the shipowner, and is plainly intended to give some measure of protection to the latter, after he has delivered the goods upon one of the bills of lading, against subsequent demands for delivery, at the instance of the holders of the other bills of the set, It is, in my opinion, inconsistent with any reasonable construction of the stipulation, that the shipowner should be held liable in all cases to deliver to the true owner of the goods, because in that case it would give him no protection. The stipulation can have no intelligible meaning or effect, if it does not under some circumstances enable the shipowner to resist a claim for second delivery, preferred by the holder of a bill of lading, who has by virtue of it, the right of property in the goods. On the other hand, it is obvious that the stipulation is meant exclusively for the protection of the shipowner, and is not intended to confer upon him the right to select the person to whom he shall deliver, or to affect the rights inter se of the holders of the bills of lading. That being so, I think that the natural and reasonable construction of the language of the contract is that the shipowner is to be exonerated by delivery upon one of the bills of lading, although it does not represent the property of the goods, with this qualification, that bonâ fides being an implied term in every mercantile contract, the delivery must be made in good faith, and without knowledge or notice of any right or claim preferable to that of the person to whom he so delivers.

Lord FITZGERALD.—My Lords: I also have had the advantage of reading the judgment of the noble and learned Lord (Lord Blackburn). I had previously arrived at the same result, though not entirely on the same grounds, and I concur in the decision which has now been announced. I entirely concur in the condemnation of the law laid down in Fearon v. Bowers (ubi sup.) (if it was so laid down there), that in case of presentation to the captain of two or more parts of the bill of lading by parties claiming to be holders, and adversely to each other, the captain was not bound to look into the merits of the particular claims, but had a right to deliver to which of the claimants he thought proper. Such a rule would go far to enable the captain to violate his contract and his duty, and to "accomplish" his obligation by delivery to one whom he may have had reason to believe was not the real owner of the goods. Before the close of the argument, Earl Cairns suggested for your Lordships' consideration that the practice of having so many parts of the bill of lading all in the nature of originals was introduced for some purpose of convenience to the consignor or consignee, and that the concluding passage, "the one of which being accomplished, the others to stand void," was probably intended for the protection of the shipowner. He further suggested that, in carrying into effect that object, the true interpretation should be that if the master, acting in entire good faith, delivered the cargo on one part of the bill of lading either to the consignee named in it as such, or to an indorsee of one part, he would have "accomplished" the bill of lading so far as it is a contract for carriage and delivery, and be protected, even though another part of the bill of lading should prove to be outstanding in the hands of a prior indorsee for value, but of which the master had no notice. It is singular that on this point there seems to have been hitherto no direct decision, though the present form of bills of lading has been in use, and the practice of having several parts of the bill of lading has been followed, for considerably more than a century. In Fearon v. Bowers, tried in 1753, there were three parts and the same form, and in Wright v. Campbell (4 Burr. 2046), in 1767, there were two parts, and the form the same. Fearon v. Bowers may be considered to bear on the question of construction, for Lee, C.J. is there represented to have said' "All the captain had to do was to deliver on one of the bills of lading."

In the absence of any authority to the contrary, I have come to the conclusion that, so far as the bill of lading is a contract for carriage and delivery, the noble and learned Earl suggested the true interpretation of "one of which being accomplished, the others to stand void." I should have had some difficulty in assenting to the proposition, either generally or as applicable to this particular case, that a delivery which, if made by the master, would justify or excuse him, would equally justify or excuse the warehouseman. The position of the warehouseman when the stop-order had been removed seems to me to be different, and possibly his liability more extensive. If we had to determine that question, it would be necessary to consider carefully the position of the warehouseman, and to have regard to the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act (25 and 26 Vict. c. 63, sects. 67 to 75), and in this particular case to his obligation under the memorandum at the foot of the manifest. I refrain from pursuing this topic further, as I do not consider it to be a necessary part of your Lordships' decision, nor does it, in my opinion, affect the result. A loss has been sustained by the wrongful act of Cottam and Co., which must be ultimately borne by one of three parties. Williams and Co. are not before us, and I say nothing as to whether or not they may be ultimately subject to any liability; but as between the plaintiffs and the defendants in this suit, it seems to me that the plaintiffs, who, by their omissions and want of proper caution, and by their misplaced confidence in Cottam and Co., have enabled Cottam and Co. to commit that wrong, ought, in reason and justice, to bear the loss. The plaintiffs omitted to get up from Cottam and Co. the second and third parts of the bill of lading, or to make any inquiry about them. They were not bound to do so, nor did that omission affect their legal title, but it left them open to a risk from which they are now to suffer loss. The insecurity created by that omission might have been ratified by notice of their title to the master, or by notice to the defendants at any time before the actual delivery to William and Co. The plaintiffs used no proper caution, and took no action of any kind in relation to the goods until after the misdelivery to Williams and Co., and the discovery of the insolvency of Cottam and Co.; and if we could put the question to them, "Why did you pursue so incautious a course?" their reply probably would be, "We trusted to the integrity of Cottam and Co., and we left the entry and warehousing of the goods, the payment of freight, and all matters of detail to Cottam and Co."

It cannot be truly said that, as between the plaintiffs and defendants, the plaintiffs are innocent sufferers by the act of a third party. The result has been the misdelivery of the goods, which the plaintiffs charge as an act of wrong by the defendants, rendering them liable in this suit. Having regard to the plaintiffs' legal title, it was no doubt a misdelivery; but the defendants are excused by law from the consequences of an error into which they have been led by the plaintiffs. In Lickbarrow v. Mason, Buller, J., in delivering his opinion in this House, observes "that in all mercantile transactions one great point to be kept uniformly in view is to make the circulation and negotiation of property as quick, as easy, and as certain as possible," and I may amplify his language by interpolating after "property" the words "and the advance and security of capital." It will be observed that, in this present decision of your Lordships, nothing has been expressed adverse to that proposition. We give full effect of the bill of lading as a symbol of title to the property comprised in it, and to its indorsement as a transfer of that title as full and effectual as if accompanied by a delivery of actual possession. We do no more than lay down a rule of construction, and apply a well-established principle of law, to this particular case, and we hope it may serve as a landmark for the future.

COURT OF APPEAL.

SITTINGS AT WESTMINSTER.

Reported by A. A. HOPKINS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Nov. 21 and 24, 1882.

(Before BAGGALLAY, BRETT, and LINDLEY, L.JJ.)

KAY v. FIELD AND CO.

Charter-party—Exceptions—Detention by frost—Customary manner of loading—Demurrage.

It was agreed by charter-party that the plaintiffs' ship should "proceed to Cardiff East Bute Dock, and there load in the customary manner from the agents of the freighters a full and complete cargo of rail iron; the cargo to be loaded as fast as steamer can take on board, and stow within the customary working hours of the port, commencing when the steamer is in berth and ready to load. If longer detained, merchants to pay steamer 30l. per day demurrage. Detention by frost, &c., not to be reckoned as lay days."

The ship was intended to be loaded with C. and Co.'s iron, though this fact was unknown to the plaintiff when the charter-party was made. C. and Co.'s wharf is some distance from the East Bute Dock, situated upon a canal which leads into the West Bute Dock; and their customary manner of loading was to bring rail iron from their wharf in lighters into the West Bute Dock, and thence into the East Bute Dock. All other makers of rail iron, of whom there were about six at Cardiff, have wharves on one or other of the two docks, and load vessels either directly from the quay, when they are alongside, or by lighters within the dock. The ship arrived in the East Bute Dock, and loading was commenced, but was interrupted for sixteen days by reason of a severe frost, which prevented the lighters coming down the canal from C. and Co.'s wharf to the West Bute Dock, the docks themselves being free from ice.

Held, in an action to recover demurrage for the sixteen days' detention, that the defendants were not protected by the exception in the charter-party as to detention by frost.

The decision of Pollock, B. reversed.

THE action was brought to recover sixteen days'

demurrage for detention of the plaintiffs' steamship Cid.

At the trial at Swansea Summer Assizes 1881, Pollock, B. referred all questions of fact in the cause to a special referee. The material facts stated in the report were as follows:—

By a charter-party made the 18th Dec. 1880, it was agreed between the plaintiffs and the defendants that the plaintiff's steamer Cid should "proceed to Cardiff East Bute Dock, and there load in the customary manner from the agents of the freighters a full and complete cargo of rail iron. The cargo to be loaded as fast as steamer can take on board and stow within the customary working hours of the port, commencing when steamer is in berth and ready to load. Detention by frost, floods . . . . not to be reckoned as lay days."

There are two docks at Cardiff, the East Bute Dock and the West Bute Dock, connected by a canal with locks at both ends. The West Bute Dock is also connected by a junction canal with the Glamorganshire canal.

Iron rails shipped at Cardiff are almost entirely manufactured by some five or six makers having their works at some distance from Cardiff, Messrs. Crawshay and Co. being one of such makers. With the exception of Crawshay and Co. all the manufacturers rent wharves or quays in the docks themselves for their own exclusive use, some of them in the East Bute Dock and some in the West Bute Dock. Crawshay and Co., who manufactured their rails about twenty-four miles from Cardiff, have no exclusive wharf on either dock, but they have a wharf on the Glamorganshire canal nearly opposite the junction canal leading from the Glamorganshire canal to the West Bute Dock.

There are in the docks berths alongside the dock quays which are open to the public on application to the dock authorities. Vessels are also moored in tiers in the dock basins for the purpose of being loaded with rails and other cargo from lighters brought alongside. A railway runs along the quays round both docks. Large steamers cannot go into the West Bute Dock, and shippers having wharves in that dock send their iron by lighters into East Bute Docks to load vessels that may be in that dock. Crawshay and Co. forward their iron from their wharf in lighters to vessels in the East Bute Dock, and the vessels are moored at the top of that dock for the purpose of receiving Crawshay and Co.'s cargo from their canal wharf. The Cid was in fact to be loaded with rail iron supplied by Crawshay and Co., but there is no evidence that the shipowner was aware of this when he entered into the charter party, or that he knew of the custom of the port of Cardiff, or of the way in which Crawshay and Co. conducted their business.

On the 8th Jan. 1881, in anticipation of the Cid's arrival, the whole of the iron intended for her had been sent down from the works to the wharf. The Cid arrived at Cardiff on the 11th Jan., and was berthed at the top of the East Bute Dock, and the master that day gave notice to Crawshay and Co. of the steamers arrival, and that she was ready to receive her cargo. Lighters loaded with the Cid's iron arrived at the East Bute Dock on the evening of the 11th Jan. The loading commenced on the 12th Jan., and was continued till the 15th Jan.

From the 16th Jan. to the 31st Jan. all the usual approaches from Crawshay and Co.'s wharf to the docks were impassable, and the loading was wholly discontinued. Demurrage was claimed under the charter-party in respect of this period. During all the time the docks themselves were not frozen. Steamers and lighters could move about, and vessels could go out to sea, but no reasonable means could have been adopted to convey the iron from the wharf into the dock, neither could any marketable railway iron have been obtained from any other source. The referee found that every exertion was made to forward the iron, and had it not been for the frost the vessel would have been loaded, according to the custom of the port, within a reasonable time.

Upon these facts as found by the referee the learned judge gave judgment for the defendants. The plaintiffs appealed.

Butt, Q.C., and Channell (with them Dillwyn) for the defendants.

Baggallay, L.J.—In this case the plaintiffs' claim is for demurrage for delay in loading the plaintiffs' vessel. By the terms of the charter-party the steamer Cid is to proceed to Cardiff East Bute Dock, and there load in the customary manner from the agents of the freighters a full and complete cargo of iron rails, "the cargo to be loaded as fast as steamer can take on board and stow within the customary working hours of the port, (Sundays and holidays excepted), commencing when the steamer is in berth and ready to load." The charty-party contains also the following proviso, "Detention by frost, floods, riots, and strikes of workmen, accidents to machinery, or quarantine, not to be reckoned as lay days." Now the steamer was in fact ready to load on Jan. 11, 1881, and the loading was completed on Feb. 2, 1881; the interval between these two dates is twenty-two days, and inasmuch as six days would have sufficed to load the vessel if the work had proceeded regularly, the plaintiffs claim demurrage for sixteen days at the rate of 30*l.* a day, the rate agreed upon in the charter-party. The defence was that there had been a frost, that the delay in loading was caused thereby within the meaning of the exception in the charter-party, and the defendants claimed the benefit of that exception. The question then turns upon the construction of the charter-party. The Solicitor-General contends that the detention to which the charter party applies is a detention from some cause which happens after the vessel begins to load, and that, as she was ready to load on Jan. 11, the detention after that must arise from some delay, not in bringing the cargo from some other place, but in the actual loading in the East Bute Dock. The contention on the other side is, that we ought not to place so narrow a construction upon the words East Bute Dock, but that we ought to treat all the usual store places of iron, including Messrs.

Crawshay's wharf, as if they were within the limits of the dock. I do not think so. I do not think this latter construction would be within the fair meaning of the words of the charter-party. Loading does not, in my view, begin when the goods leave the wharf of the manufacturer, but when they begin to be put on board the vessel. No doubt, in a very exceptional case like that in Hudson v. Ede (ubi sup.), the meaning of loading may be extended, but that was in consequence of the very special circumstances of that case, and only in consequence of those special circumstances. I do not think the report of the referee is quite clear and satisfactory as to the facts, but, giving it a fair interpretation, I do not think that enough has been found in this case to bring it within the exceptional circumstances of Hudson v. Ede. I have purposely refrained from going very much into the details of the case, preferring to leave my learned brothers, who are more familiar than I am with this sort of case, to deal with them. Thinking as I do that loading can only fairly be said to begin when the goods begin to be put on board, I think that the decision of the learned judge below was wrong, and that this appeal must be allowed.

Brett, L.J.—In this case we have to apply certain facts to a charter-party. Let me say at the outset that a great difficulty arises in this case from the way in which it was tried. Instead of being tried at Swansea before the learned judge in the ordinary course, when he would have had the evidence and facts fully before him, it was sent, from the force of circumstances of which we know nothing, and which we have no right to criticise, to an official referee to report upon to the learned judge, and that report of the official referee is to be supposed to contain all the facts of which we can have any cognisance. Now, it appears that at Cardiff there are several docks; the East Bute Docks and the West Bute Docks are separate and distinct docks, and besides these two there are other docks at some distance from them; all these are large and magnificent docks. There is a water communication between the East and the West Bute Docks by means of a short canal, and there is a further water communication with the West Bute Dock by means of a junction canal, which joins that dock to the Glamorganshire canal, which is a canal running into the country. Further, a railway runs all round the East and West Bute Docks. Iron rails shipped at Cardiff are almost entirely manufactured by five or six makers whose works are at some distance from Cardiff; some of these makers have storing wharves on the East Bute Dock, and some on the West Bute Dock, but Crawshay and Co. have no storing wharf on either of those docks, but have it at some distance from the docks, namely at the junction of the Glamorganshire canal with the junction canal that I have referred to. Now, if iron rails are to be loaded from a wharf on the West Bute Dock into a large steamer, they have to be sent by lighters from the West to the East Bute Dock, because large steamers cannot go into the West Bute Dock. Again, if iron rails are to be loaded from a wharf on the East Bute Dock, they are loaded either from the quay if the ship has a quay berth, or by lighters if the ship is lying in the tiers. Again, Crawshay and Co., because their wharf is so far off the docks, have for more than thirty years put their iron on lighters at their wharf, and so sent it down the junction canal into the West Bute Dock, and so through the short canal into the East Bute Dock. So that with regard to shipments of iron rails in the East Bute Dock there may be said to be three customary modes of loading: one mode employed by shippers who have wharves on the East Bute Dock, another mode employed by shippers who have wharves on the West Bute Dock, and a third mode employed by Crawshay and Co. It cannot be truly said that there is any one customary mode of loading iron rails at Cardiff. Under these circumstances a charter-party is entered into, not by Crawshay and Co., but by an ordinary charterer or shipper, and the terms of that charter-party are as follows: [His Lordship here read the material parts of the charter-party, and continued:] The first remark I have to make about that charter-party is, that it is somewhat informal because it speaks of lay days when strictly speaking there are no lay days provided for by it; we only make out by calculation that a reasonable time for loading the vessel in question would have been six days: that is agreed.

Now, what is the state of affairs between the shipowner and the charterer? The shipowner has no means whatever of knowing from what manufacturer of rail iron at Cardiff the cargo will come. His duty is to take his ship to the East Bute Dock; when he has done so, and has berthed her, and made her ready to load, his duty, as far as the commencement of the loading is concerned, is completed. Then comes the duty of the charterer, which is to begin at once to load. Now first, ought this charter-party to be construed as between the shipowner and the charterer as if the East Bute Dock was the only dock at Cardiff, and was in fact the port? I think so. I think this is clear both from authority and from the words of the instrument. In my opinion you have no right to take into consideration anything that occurs outside the East Bute Dock, either in the port or town of Cardiff or elsewhere. The question resolves itself into this: When does the loading of the vessel begin within the terms of this charter-party? Now, unless there is something peculiar in the terms of the contract, I think that all stipulations as to loading apply to the place where the actual loading is to take place. I do not wish to be understood to hold that the loading does not begin until the goods are actually being lifted on to the vessel; but I do not think that it can fairly be said to begin until the goods get within the actual place where, according to the terms of the charter-party, the loading is to take place; it appears to me that the bringing of the goods to that place, and what happens to them on their way there, has nothing to do with the loading within the terms of the charter-party. It seems to me that this not only follows from the terms of the charter-party, but that it was so held in Hudson v. Ede (ubi sup.). Now, if that be so, if every stipulation as to loading applies to the place of loading, then the exception in the charter-party applies to the same place; therefore, here, where the exception is detention by frost, that exception must be read as limited in the same way as the obligation, and so a detention by frost must mean a detention by a frost which actually prevents loading within the East Bute

Dock. I think this principle was also held in Hudson v. Ede. Therefore the only detention by frost which could absolve the charterer from his duty to load was a detention by a frost which prevented loading within the limits of the East Bute Dock. There was no such detention in this case. It follows from what I have said that the words "customary manner of loading" apply to the place of loading, that is in this case, to the East Bute Dock; therefore they do not help us. But it is said that, under the circumstances of this case, we ought to say that in the case of Crawshay and Co. their loading begins before the time when the goods they are to load arrive within the East Bute Dock, that it begins indeed at the time when their iron leaves their wharf a quarter of a mile off. Now, under what circumstances can we go beyond the limits of the place named in the charter-party, and say that loading begins outside those limits; That there are circumstances which may require us to do so was decided in Hudson v. Ede, by which case we are bound and from which we do not dissent; but it is admitted that the facts of that case were exceptional, and the very reasoning of that case admits that strong reasons are necessary to make it right to hold that in any particular case loading is to be said to begin before the goods arrive at the place of loading. In Hudson v. Ede everybody who shipped grain at Sulina brought it down from Galatz straight to the ship; that was the only way in which vessels to be loaded with grain at Sulina could be loaded at all, namely, out of lighters which had come all the way down the river from Galatz, and the court in that case expressly relied on the fact that every shipper shipped his corn in this way; indeed, that case was decided only upon the ground that the custom was universal and must be taken to have been the basis of the contract. The Lord Chief Baron adds an expression at the end of his judgment, which shows that, if one shipper had not followed this custom, that might in his opinion have made the whole difference. If this be so, then this case comes within the general ruling of Hudson v. Ede, and not within the exception that was allowed in that case; and I think that the learned judge who decided this case, and decided it upon the authority, as I understand his judgment, of Hudson v. Ede, was wrong in supposing that the facts of this case were such as to bring it within the exceptional state of facts upon which that case was decided. I am of opinion that the facts of this case are clearly distinguishable from those in Hudson v. Ede, and that this appeal must be allowed.

Lindley, L.J.—I also am of opinion that the judgment of the court below was wrong, and that this appeal must be allowed. The case strikes me thus: According to what I take to be the true construction of the charter-party, it may be divided into two parts. The first part has relation to the duty of the shipowner; the ship is to go to a particular place. I may pause to point out that the charter-party does not profess to define the duty of the shipper as to getting the goods to that place, it presupposes them to be there. Next, the cargo is to be loaded as fast as the steamer can take on board and stow, &c., and a clause is introduced to give the shipper the benefit of certain unavoidable detention by certain specified causes. Now, delay having taken place in consequence of one of those specified causes, we have to say how far the shipper can claim the benefit of the exception. The question is, what is such detention as is contemplated by this charter-party? Can it be said that detention owing to a cause which prevents the shipper getting his goods to the place of loading is within the fair meaning of this charter-party? I think not, I think it has nothing to do with it. I think it is plain that this is the true construction of the document, and any authority that is said to militate against this view must be carefully examined before it is allowed to prevail. Now it is said that Hudson v. Ede is an authority against this view. All I wish to add to what has been said about that case by Brett, L.J. is, that the remark of the Lord Chief Baron, quoting a remark of Willes, J., at the end of his judgment in the Exchequer Chamber, shows plainly that for the purposes of that case the court regarded the various wharves at Galatz as the shore from which the goods were loaded, and that they based their judgment upon the invariable nature of the custom of thus loading. I do not think that the facts of this case bring it within Hudson v. Ede, and that therefore this appeal must be allowed.

The Alne Holme (Second Action.)

Collision—The Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), s. 34—Counter claim—Bail.

Where, in a damage action, the ship proceeded against is not arrested, and the plaintiffs do not require bail to be given, the defendants cannot compel the plaintiffs to give security to answer a counter-claim in the action under the provisions in the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), s. 34, although they voluntarily give bail.

This was a motion by the defendants in a damage action to order the plaintiffs to give bail to answer counter-claim in the action.

It appeared that a damage action was instituted in the High Court by the owners of the Medea against the owners of the Alne Holme in respect of a collision between the Medea and the Alne Holme; by reason of the damage to the Medea she had gone to the bottom.

The owners of the Medea asked, in the first instance, for the undertaking to give bail, but subsequently gave notice that they would not require bail, though as a matter of fact bail was given.

The defendants had counter-claimed, and were now asking that the plaintiffs should be forced to give security to answer the counter-claim.

Bucknill in support of the motion.—The Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), sect. 34 provides that: "The High Court of Admiralty may, on the application of the defendant in any cause of damage, and on his instituting a cross cause for the damage sustained by him in respect of the same collision, if in the principal cause the ship of the defendant has been arrested or security given by him to answer judgment, and in the cross cause the ship of the plaintiff cannot be arrested, and security has not been given to answer judgment therein, suspend the proceedings in the principal cause, until security has been given to answer judgment in the cross cause." Security has been given by the defendants. The Medea cannot be arrested, seeing she is at the bottom of the sea, and therefore the plaintiffs are entitled to have security given by the defendants. The fact of the plaintiffs not requiring bail to be given was a mere device to prevent the defendants availing themselves of the statute, but the defendants have actually given bail, and therefore the statute is complied with. Further, the owners of the Medea are a foreign company, and it would be a great hardship that the defendants should have no security.

Dr. W. Phillimore against the motion.—The section quoted was passed to remedy cases where the plaintiff was able to lay his hands on the res, while the defendant was unable to obtain any security, and was thus placed in a very much worse position than the plaintiff. In the present instance the plaintiffs required no security, and were consequently on the same footing as the defendants prior to the passing of the Act. If the defendants choose to give security it is immaterial to us.

Sir R PHILLIMORE—I dismiss the motion with costs, being of opinion that the statute was not intended to include cases like the present.

THE FALK.

Collision—Bail—Sale of ship in another action—Payment of proceeds into court.

Where after judgment against a ship in a damage action, where bail has been given and the ship released, judgment is given against the same ship in a necessaries action in which the ship is sold and the proceeds of the sale of the ship paid into court, the plaintiffs in the damage action cannot be paid out of the proceeds to the prejudice of other claimants still having maritime liens upon the proceeds.

THIS was a motion by the plaintiffs, in an action for damage by collision, for payment out of damages and costs.

The action was brought by the owners of the Vero F. against the owners of the Falk to recover damages in respect of a collision between the two vessels.

The Falk was arrested, whereupon bail was given by Messrs. Jones, Heard, and Co., of Cardiff, the ship's agent, in the sum of 300*l.*, being the amount claimed on the writ in the action.

The action was tried, and the Falk was held alone to blame for the collision and condemned in the damages thereby occasioned to the Vero F., and a reference was ordered to the registrar and merchants to assess the amount of the damage. The registrar assessed the damages at 125*l.*, and his report was not objected to.

The plaintiff's costs were taxed at 229*l.* The amount of damages and costs exceeding the amount of the bail given, the plaintiffs applied for and obtained leave to re-arrest the ship to obtain security for the amount exceeding 300*l.*; whereupon, to avoid the arrest of the ship, the solicitors for the defendants gave an undertaking to put in the required supplementary bail, and the ship was not re-arrested in that action.

Subsequently to these proceedings, several actions for wages and necessaries (the Falk being a foreign ship) were instituted against the Falk, and these actions proceeded to judgment; and in one of them the ship was, by order of the court, sold, and the proceeds of the sale were paid into court.

The plaintiffs in the collision action now applied for payment of their damages and costs out of such proceeds.

L. E. Pike, for the plaintiffs, in support of the motion.—When it was found that the amount of bail given in the collision action was insufficient to satisfy the damages and costs, the plaintiffs applied for and obtained an order to re arrest the Falk, which order placed that vessel under the control of the court. The proceeds of the sale of the Falk are now in court, and as the plaintiffs in the damage action have a prior lien to the plaintiffs in the necessaries action, the money should be paid out in priority to the other claims.

J. P. Aspinall, for Messrs. Jones, Heard, and Co., in support of the motion.—By the practice of the Court of Admiralty the mode of enforcing payment has always been by monition to the owners of the ship held to blame, and in default of payment recourse is had to the bail; and the money in court being the property of the owners of the Falk, that should be applied to the payment of damages and costs before coming upon the bail.

Dr. Phillimore, for the plaintiffs in the necessaries action, against the motion.—The plaintiffs in the collision action have no right to the proceeds of the sale in the necessaries action. By taking bail they had given up their maritime lien on the Falk, and that lien is to be considered as discharged. In all cases where the ship has been re-arrested as a security where the bail has ultimately been found insufficient, it has been either in respect of costs or where no other actions had been instituted against the ship. The plaintiffs in the damage action are now in the position of execution creditors, and their claim as such is postponed to the claim of those who have a lien still unsatisfied on the ship. The Wild Ranger (Br. & L. 84) is a direct authority in my favour.

L. E. Pyke in reply.—The Wild Ranger is distinguishable; in that case no order was made to re-arrest the ship after judgment had been given. This is virtually an application for payment out of money in respect of costs, the costs greatly exceeding the amount of damage. In both The Freedom (1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 136; 25 L. T. Rep. N.S. 392; L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 495) and the Hero (Br. & L. 447) the ships were re-arrested because the bail was insufficient.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I reject the motion; the plaintiffs in the damage action having taken bail cannot be paid out of the proceeds to the prejudice of other claimants still having liens upon the proceeds.

THE ALNE HOLME (First Action).

Collision—Damage to cargo—Stay of proceedings—Limitation of liability—Merchant Shipping Acts.

Where owners of cargo have recovered judgment in a collision action brought by them, and the owners of the ship carrying the cargo subsequently bring an action against the same ship to recover damages in respect of the same collision, and the damages in both actions would exceed the value of the defendants' ship at 8l per ton, and the damage in the cargo action alone would not exceed that amount, the court will not stay proceedings in the cargo's action until after judgment in the ship's action, on the ground that without such stay the defendants have to institute a limitation of liability action, which would be unnecessary if the defendants obtained judgment in the ship's action.

THIS was a motion by the defendants in a damage suit to stay proceedings in a prior suit brought against the same ship.

An action had been brought by the owners of cargo shipped on board the Medea against the owners of the Alne Holme in respect of the loss of cargo occasioned by a collision between the Medea and the Alne Holme, and the Alne Holme had been found solely to blame. A reference had been held, and the registrar's report was to issue in a few days. Subsequently to the above action another action was brought by the owners of the Medea against the owners of the Alne Holme in respect of the same collision, and it was now prayed that further proceedings in the first action might be stayed until judgment had been given in the second action.

Bucknill, for the defendants, in support of the notion.—The claim of the owners of cargo is for 3200*l.*; the claim of the owners of the Medea is for 7000*l.*, making a total, which is 2000l. in excess of the value of the Alne Holme, reckoning her value at 8*l.* per ton. This being so, the defendants propose to bring a limitation of liability suit, should the plaintiffs in the first action issue execution, but if proceedings in the first action are stayed and the defendants are successful in the second action, the plaintiffs in the first action will get 20*s.* in the pound, and the expense of a limitation of liability suit will be saved. The defendants are willing to pay the money into court, and pay interest on it.

Dr. W. Phillimore, for the plaintiffs in the first action, against the motion.—The action instituted by the owners of cargo has proceeded to judgment in due form, the registrar's report will shortly be out, and the plaintiffs are entitled to issue execution for the money. The second action has nothing whatever to do with the owners of cargo, and it is unfair that one action should be tied up until judgment in another action.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I am of opinion that to stay the proceeding in the first action would be unfairly prejudicial to the plaintiffs in that action, and therefore I must dismiss the motion with costs.

THE IMMACOLATA CONCEZZIONE.

Transfer—Sale of ship—Action for necessaries—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), s. 6.

Where a necessaries action against a ship in the City of London Court has proceeded to judgment, by which a sale of the ship is ordered, and subsequently another action is commenced in the High Court by material men having a possessory lien upon the ship, and an appearance has been entered to the action in the City of London Court by the plaintiffs in the High Court, the sale will be stayed, and the City of London Court action transferred to the High Court upon the application of the plaintiffs in the High Court.

THIS was a motion on behalf of certain shipbuilders, plaintiffs in an action in the High Court, for repairs done to the Immacolata Concezzione, for the transfer to the Admiralty Division of the High Court of Justice of an action for necessaries pending in the City of London Court.

A necessaries action was brought in the City of London Court against the above-named ship, and judgment was given for the plaintiffs, ordering the sale of the ship by the bailiff of the City of London Court.

The plaintiffs in the action in the High Court intervened, and entered an appearance in the action in the City of London Court. Subsequently to the institution of the action in the City of London Court, an action for repairs effected upon the ship was brought in the Admiralty Division of the High Court, against the ship, by the parties moving the court.

Dr. W. Phillimore, for the plaintiffs in the action in the High Court, in support of the motion,—The proceeds of a sale of the Immacolata Concezzione by the bailiff of the City of London Court would be ridiculously small, as no one would care to buy her in consequence of the institution of the second action for repairs. The plaintiffs in the action in the High Court have a possessory lien on the ship, by reason of their repairs to her, and are therefore moving the court that the City of London Court action may be transferred to the High Court, in order that they may be more adequately capable of enforcing their claim against the ship.

Gainsford Bruce, for the other plaintiffs, against the motion.—The plaintiffs in the action in the High Court are in nowise entitled to have the County Court action transferred to the High Court. Under sect. 6 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71) it is provided that "the High Court of Admiralty of England, on motion by any party to an admiralty cause pending in a County Court, may, if it shall think fit, with previous notice to the other party, transfer the cause to the High Court of Admiralty;" but the plaintiffs in the action in the High Court are not parties to the Action in the City of London Court, and therefore have no right to have that action transferred to the High Court. The proceedings in the City of London Court action were in every way regular, and the City of London Court, with respect to this action for necessaries, is of co-ordinate jurisdiction with the High Court, and therefore it is an unlawful act on the part of the marshal of the High Court to interfere with the sale of the ship by the bailiff.

Dr. Phillimore in reply.—The plaintiffs in the High Court entered an appearance in the City of London action, and by so doing made themselves parties to the action, and moreover under rule 10 of Order XXXIII. of the County Court Rules, they clearly are persons claiming to have an interest in the vessel, and so are entitled to intervene for the purpose of having the action transferred to the High Court.

Sir ROBERT PHILLIMORE.—I allow the motion without prejudice to the rights (if any) of the plaintiffs in the City of London Court action.

THE HELENSLEA.

THE CATALONIA.

Practice—Admiralty action in personam—Service of writ in personam — Address of defendant incorrect on writ—Defendant resident out of jurisdiction—Judicature Act, Order II., rr. 3, 4 —Consolidation.

The misdescription of the residence of a defendant, whereby he is alleged to be resident within the jurisdiction, whilst he is in fact resident out of the jurisdiction, is not a sufficient ground for setting aside a writ in personam intended for service as soon as the defendant shall come within the jurisdiction.

Consolidation of cross causes of damage will not be ordered where service of the writ in the principal action has not been effected.

THIS was a motion by the defendant, the owner of the barque Helenslea, to set aside the writ in a damage action, brought by the Cunard Steamship Company, the owners of the Catalonia. It appeared from the affidavits filed on both sides, that cross actions had been instituted by the respective owners of the Helenslea and Catalonia in respect of a collision between the two vessels in or near Cork Harbour in Dec. 1881.

The writ in the first or principal action, instituted by the Cunard Steamship Company on the 25th Dec. 1881, was in personam and directed to "William Stephen, of the city of London," defendant, and was indorsed: "The plaintiffs, as owners of the steamship Catalonia, claim the sum of 10,000*l*. against the defendant as owner of the barque Helenslea, for damage occasioned by a collision which took place in or near Cork Harbour in the month of December 1881, between the Helenslea and the Catalonia, including costs of suit." On the 26th Dec. 1881 a cross action in personam was instituted by the owner of the Helenslea in respect of the same collision, and an appearance was duly entered in answer to the writ in this action by the Cunard Steamship Company.

On the 26th Dec. 1881 the Cunard Steamship Company took out a summons in the cross action calling upon the plaintiff in the same to show cause why the cross action should not be consolidated with the principal action. This summons came on before the registrar, and was by him referred to the judge.

Before this summons came on for hearing, the solicitors for William Stephen gave notice of motion to direct the writ in the principal action to be set aside, and filed affidavits in support of such motion, from which it appeared that they, on behalf of the owner of the Helenslea, had refused to accept service of the writ in the principal action; that the questions in both actions were identical; that William Stephen was the sole owner of the Helenslea; that he resided and carried on business at Dundee in Scotland, and had no residence or place of business in England; that the writ in the principal action had never been served upon him; that he was advised that the writ could not have been issued without untrue representations as to his place of residence, and that he was entitled to have the writ set aside as improperly issued.

It was agreed that the affidavits should be evidence in both actions,

Dr. W. Phillimore for the owner of the Helenslea. —Inasmuch as the collision occurred without the territorial jurisdiction of the court and the Helenslea has not been arrested, the writ, if it is to be served without the jurisdiction, should be set aside, because prior to its issue the leave of the court should have been obtained. The ruling in The Vivar (35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 782; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 308; 2 P. Div. 29) is a direct authority in my favour. But if the writ is to be served within the jurisdiction, it is vitiated by the false description of the owner of the Helenslea. The form in the schedule appended to the Judicature Act of 1873 is an argument in favour of the view that a writ for service within the jurisdiction is only effectual where the defendant resides within the jurisdiction. With respect to the consolidation summons, if the writ fails, the summons fails also; but even if the writ be not set aside, no consolidation order ought to be made, because service of the writ has not been made nor accepted nor bail given.

Butt, Q.C. and Myburgh for the Cunard Steamship Company.—The writ does not describe the defendant as of London, and there was no intention of serving him without the jurisdiction. But it is intended to serve the defendant with the writ the first time he crosses the border, and if then the description in the writ be wrong it can be amended. Order II. r., 3, contemplates such variations under the words "with such variations as circumstances may require." Seeing that the owners of the Catalonia are the plaintiffs in the principal action, they are entitled to have the conduct of the proceedings, and therefore the consolidation order should be made.

Sir ROBERT PHILLIMORE.—I am of opinion that I cannot grant the motion to set aside the writ issued on behalf of the Cunard Steamship Company. The writ in question is not a writ for service out of the jurisdiction; it is simply a writ for service within the jurisdiction, and it is said that it has been taken out in order that the defendant may be served with it, if he comes within the jurisdiction, at any time whilst it remains in force. At present it seems to me that no sufficient reason has been shown why it should be set aside as irregular, and I must therefore reject the motion. It may be that hereafter some reason, which does not exist at present, may arise in favour of a similar motion being granted; but as to that I express no opinion. I do not think I can make any consolidation order in this case. Service of the writ taken out by the Cunard Steamship Company has not been made or accepted, and in these circumstances I am of opinion that I ought not to order the two actions to be consolidated. Two suits can only, I think, be consolidated after each of them has become a lis pendens; and it is clear that a suit in personam does not become a lis pendens until after service of the writ of summons. On this point the well-known case of Ray v. Sherwood (1 Curteis, 173, 193; 1 Moore P.C. 353) is an authority.

[On the 3rd March 1882 the matter was settled by the respective parties before the cross action instituted by the owner of the Helenslea was heard.]

THE MIRANDA.

Practice—Preliminary act—Amendment.

In a damage action the court will not allow a party to amend a mistake in his preliminary act, prior to trial, although he applies upon affidavit, alleging that the mistake was the result of a clerical error.

THIS was a motion by the plaintiffs (the owners of the Cleanthes) in a damage action to amend their preliminary act. An affidavit in support of the motion was made by the plaintiffs' solicitor, who stated that by mistake the words "the engines of the Cleanthes were put full speed about between two and three minutes before the collision" were inserted in the 12th article of the draft preliminary act, and were copied into the filed preliminary act, and that the words should have been "the engines of the Cleanthes were put full speed astern about two or three minutes before the collision," and that this was the result of a clerical error; that the proposed amendment was bonâ fide, and was not required by any information received by the plaintiffs subsequent to the filing of the preliminary act; and further that the error had been discovered prior to the opening of the defendants' preliminary act.

Dr. W. G. Phillimore in support of the motion.—In The Vortigern (Sw. 518) Dr. Lushington lays it down that an application to amend a mistake in a preliminary act must be made immediately upon discovery, and must be supported by affidavit. Both these conditions have been complied with.

Myburgh, Q.C., against the motion, was not called upon.

Sir ROBERT PHILLIMORE.—I shall adhere to the practice I have always followed with regard to applications for leave to amend preliminary acts, and refuse to allow any such amendments to be made. The parties in an action of damage are not bound in their pleadings to repeat any errors or omissions which may exist in their preliminary acts, and it is open to them in their statement of claim, or statement of defence, to state correctly any facts which may have been omitted or erroneously stated in their preliminary acts; but I am quite sure that it would be improper for the court to allow any alterations to be made in the preliminary act. I therefore cannot accede to the application in this case, and I must reject the motion with costs.

THE LOTUS.

Salvage—Tender—Costs.

In a salvage suit, where the tender was held sufficient, but was not liberal, the Court gave the salvors their costs up to the time of the payment of the tender into court.

THIS was a salvage action, brought by the owners, master, and crew of the screw steamship Dora, of 645 tons gross register, belonging to the port of Newcastle, against the screw steamship Lotus, her cargo and freight.

The Lotus, a screw steamship of 476 tons net register, belonging to the port of Liverpool, left Bordeaux on the 12th Jan. 1882, bound on a voyage to Liverpool, laden with a general cargo, and manned by a crew of eighteen hands all told.

On the 13th Jan. the screw shaft of the propeller of the Lotus broke; and on the 15th, when about sixteen miles off Point Baleines, on the coast of France, whilst at anchor, the Dora was signalled. The Dora then bore down upon the Lotus and towed her to a safe anchorage off Pauillac in the Garonne. The towage lasted from about 8 a.m. on the 15th till about 1.15 a.m. on the 16th, and extended over a space of from seventy-five to eighty miles.

The defendants, on the 27th March 1882, paid into court by way of tender for the salvage services, the sum of 300*l.*, alleging that the same was sufficient. The plaintiffs rejected this tender, and replied that it was not sufficient. The Lotus, her cargo and freight, were valued at 20,000*l.*; the Dora, her cargo and freight, at 25,000*l.*

Myburgh, Q.C. and Dr. W. G. F. Phillimore, for the plaintiffs, contended that the tender was inadequate, and that under any circumstances they ought to have their costs:

The William, 5 N. of Cas. 108.

Butt, Q.C. and Stewart, for the defendants, contra.

Sir ROBERT PHILLIMORE.—Looking to the circumstances of this case, I am of opinion that the tender is adequate, though not liberal. There is a question of some importance as to costs. I find that my predecessor, Dr. Lushington, in the case of The William (5 N. of Cas. 108), upon the subject of costs, said: "I have considerable difficulty upon the subject of costs. In ordinary cases, the rule of the Court of Admiralty has been this: if a tender is made and rejected, which is afterwards pronounced sufficient, it ought to be followed by condemnation of the salvors in the costs, and no doubt, if I look to the practice of the other courts—I allude particularly to the opinion expressed by Lord Cottenham and the Master of the Rolls—costs are not given with a view of punishment, but as a matter of justice to the other party. I have considered how far this doctrine is applicable to cases of salvage, and I confess I have great difficulty in applying it with all its rigidity to such cases, for this reason: in the very nature of salvage services, there is something so loose and indefinite, and so difficult to be determined by the best constituted minds, when looking at their own case, that I am not inclined to press the doctrine to its full extent. Where there has been an offer on the face of the proceedings so large that it ought to have been accepted, I must administer justice in conformity to the rule I have mentioned. In the present case, however, whilst I certainly think the tender ought to have been accepted, yet, at the same time, looking at the value of the property and all the circumstances, I do not think that I ought to deprive the salvors of all reward; nor do I think that it would be for the interest of the public if I were to do so; because it is desirable to hold out a degree of extra encouragement, if I may say so, for the preservation of property. Upon the whole, therefore, in this case, though it is with some doubt, I do not condemn the salvors in costs." Dr. Lushington therefore held, in that case, that in a cause of salvage, where the tender was sufficient but not liberal, he had a discretion in the matter of costs. The exercise of this discretion as to costs is not affected either by the Judicature Acts or the Rules of the Supreme Court, and I shall give the salvors in this case their costs up to the time when the money was paid into court, and I shall make no order as to costs after that time.

STOCK v. INGLIS.

Marine insurance — Insurable interest — Floating policy on goods—No specific appropriation of goods to contract—Property in goods not passed —Interest in profits.

There is no insurable interest in a purchaser of goods sold under an executory contract to answer a specific description, until the property in the goods has been transferred to the buyer by an appropriation of the goods to him; and if the goods are lost before such appropriation takes place, the buyer cannot recover for them under an open policy, although after the loss he pays for them and declares them under the policy.

Where A. contracted to sell goods to B. and C., and B. was buying to complete a contract made with C. for the sale of such goods, and this was unknown to A. and C., and all the goods were shipped together by A., without being specifically appropriated to either B. or C., and were lost, it was held that although after the loss C. paid for the goods and obtained the necessary documents entitling him to their possession if they had existed, there was no such appropriation as gave him an insurable interest.

D. and Co., sugar merchants of London, entered on 7th Jan. 1881 into a contract with B. and Co. (of Bristol) to sell them 200 tons of sugar, 21*s.* 9*d. per cwt. net f.o.b. Hamburg; the further terms of the contract were "for January delivery at Hamburg; payment by cash in London in exchange for bill of lading." D. and Co. entered on* 12*th Jan.* 1881 into a contract with the plaintiff to sell him also 200 tons of sugar upon similar terms to those of the contract with B. and Co. As a matter of fact B. and Co. had entered into the contract of the 7th Jan. with D. and Co. to enable them to execute a contract previously made by them on the same day with the plaintiff for 200 tons at an advanced price. At the time of the shipment D. and Co. only knew that they had engaged to sell 400 tons destined for Bristol, i.e., 200 tons to B. and Co. and a like number to the plaintiff, and while the plaintiff knew that 400 tons were coming from Hamburg, viz., 200 under his contract with D. and Co., and 200 under his contract with B. and Co., he did not know that D. and Co. were the shippers of the latter 200 tons. The provisions of the Statute of Frauds had been complied with by all parties in the case of the contract of the 7th Jan. between D. and Co. and B. and Co., of that of the 12*th Jan. between D. and Co. and the plaintiff, but not of that of the 7th Jan. between B. and Co. and the plaintiff, for the latter had not signed any note of the contract so as to become liable on it. About the end of January D. and Co. advised their Hamburg forwarding agents that they had sold* 400 tons for Bristol, giving them the necessary orders for their shipment. In consequence of there not being enough sugar of the specific description at Hamburg to meet these orders, D. and Co.'s forwarding agents could only ship to Bristol 3900 bags by a particular steamer, and proposed to send the 100 short by the next steamer. They took several bills of lading for the said 3900 bags, by which they were made deliverable to "order Bristol." This shipment of sugar was thus 100 bags too few to satisfy the two contracts of the 7th Jan. and the 12th Jan.; and between those two contracts D. and Co. did not make any appropriation of these 3900 bags, so as to distinguish one set from another. With this sugar thus on board the steamer which left Hamburg went down on the following day with her cargo. On the same day, but before hearing of the loss, D. and Co. duly took up the bills of lading, and proceeded to apportion the 3900 bags between B. and Co., and the plaintiff, and in so doing specifically appropriated 2000 of the bags to B. and Co., and 1900 to the plaintiff, and made out separate invoices to each. The invoices were made to comply with the terms of the contract. Before these invoices were posted by D. and Co. news arrived of the loss of the sugar, and on the same day the plaintiff in Bristol became advised of the loss. The plaintiff in the meanwhile had effected with the defendant (an underwriter at Lloyd's), together with others, a floating policy in respect of the goods shipped under his contract with D. and Co. and B. and Co. The plaintiff, on the news of the loss, anticipating that he might have the 200 tons on board coming to him under his contract of the 12*th, although without any specific advice of the shipment, declared on the steamer under the said policy in respect of the said* 200 tons. D. and Co. forwarded invoices of the two shipments to B. and Co., and the plaintiff who paid the amount and obtained the bills of lading of the sugar thus invoiced to them. B. and Co. also made out their invoice to the plaintiff for the 200 tons under their contract, and the plaintiff paid the amount of the contract and received the bills of lading of the sugar thus invoiced. The plaintiff also declared on the said policy for this further loss. It was the defendant's proportion of the total claim that the plaintiff sought to recover.

Held, that the plaintiff had not any insurable interest in any portion of the sugar shipped and lost, for there had been no specific appropriation of the sugar to the contract of the 7th and 12th Jan., and so no property in it had passed to the plaintiff.

Held, also, that though the plaintiff had an insurable interest in "profits" to be derived from the sugar, yet the loss of "profits" could not be recovered on a policy merely on "goods."

FURTHER CONSIDERATION.

C. Russell, Q.C., Myburgh, Q.C., and Danckwerts for the plaintiff.

Butt, Q.C., Cohen, Q.C., and Barnes for the defendant.

The facts and arguments appear sufficiently in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 31.—FIELD, J. delivered the following judgment:—The plaintiff in this action (a Bristol merchant) seeks to recover from the defendant (an underwriter at Lloyd's) under a "floating" marine policy on "goods," a proportionate part of the value (with 10 per cent. profit) of 3900 bags of sugar, lost with the City of Dublin, on the 4th Feb. 1881, on a voyage from Hamburg to Bristol. The sugar had been shipped at Hamburg by or on behalf of Messrs J. V. Drake and Co. (London merchants), and had been bought by them of German manufacturers. In the process of manufacture of sugar, although the parcels manufactured at each "make" are in general respects similar, the parcels turned out at any one make will differ slightly from any other in the number of degrees of saccharine matter which it contains, and the bags of each particular make bear a distinctive mark and number (say D. 200, D. 201, &c.), and the whole lot contains the same number of degrees of saccharine matter, and is otherwise identical in quality and description. The sugar contained in each lot is separately analysed in Germany, and a certificate of the analysis referring to the mark and number of the bags in which it is packed is forwarded to Drake and Co. in London, so that the quantity of net saccharine matter in the lot is communicated to them. The sugar is then invoiced to Drake and Co. in bags, the invoice referring in like manner to the marks and numbers; by comparison, therefore, of the marks invoiced with the certificates of analysis, Messrs. Drake and Co. know the quantity of saccharine matter contained in each parcel invoiced. The sugar is then forwarded by the manufacturers to an agent of Drake and Co. at Magdeburg (Paul Peckstein), and the amount of the invoice is paid in cash on behalf of Drake and Co. by their German bankers (the Credit Anstalt, of Leipsic) to the manufacturer upon delivery by them to the railway company. In order to secure the repayment to the Credit Anstalt of this advance there is an arrangement between them and Drake and Co. by which certain forwarding agents at Hamburg (in the present instance Herrman and Theilnehmer) ship and consign the sugars on their arrival at Hamburg, according to Drake and Co.'s orders. The forwarding agent, however, does not ship them in Drake's but in his own name, and he takes the bills of lading deliverable to "order," in London or Bristol, as the case may be, and then forwards the bills indorsed in blank to the London correspondent of the Credit Anstalt, who is instructed by the latter to deliver them to Drake and Co. against cash payment by them of the amount of the invoice. The forwarding agent of course keeps Drake and Co. advised of the marks and numbers in course of delivery and arrival at Hamburg, and asks for and obtains shipping orders from them, and as the certificates of analysis already in the possession of Drake and Co. enable them to know the precise net saccharine contents of each lot of 500 or 600 bags so advised, they can allot each bag or lot of bags to such one of their buyers with whom they are under contract, so as to correspond in respect of the specific qualities of net sugar with the degree contracted for. The contracts for delivery in England made to Drake and Co. are uniform, or nearly so in terms. They are for delivery f.o.b. Hamburg, and the quantities are expressed in "tons" weight. But the price is not calculated according to the weight per ton of the gross, but at so much per degree of net saccharine matter contained in the sugar as represented by the analysis. A standard degree is specified in the contract (say 88) with a payment or allowance of 6*d.* for every degree above or below the average analysis of the whole contract, but anything above a given percentage (say 92) is not paid for, and if the average analysis of the whole contract exceed (say 90), such excess is not paid for. When, therefore, Messrs. Drake and Co. are desirous of appropriating at Hamburg the number of bags required for the execution of one or more contracts for sugar destined for any one port (say, Bristol), it is obvious that the assortment must be so made before shipment that there shall be delivered such a gross number of bags as the port requires, and the bags so shipped must be made up of such particular bags as shall contain enough sugar of certain degrees, so that, on arrival of the bills of lading in London, Messrs. Drake and Co. can make up each particular contract in such manner that no part of the sugar to be supplied under that contract shall exceed 92, and that the average of the whole shall not be more than 90; for all net above, although paid for by Drakes in Germany, would, under the terms of the contract, go for nothing in England, and so be a loss to them. Messrs Drake and Co. having thus ascertained which of the bags advised can be best averaged to any particular port, the gross quantity destined to that port is shipped without any subdivision, leaving the operation of apportioning the gross shipped to the port amongst the different contracts at the port till after the receipt by Messrs. Drake and Co. in London of the bills of lading. Indeed, in some cases it is impossible for them to make this further apportionment before, and it is their usual course of business not to make it until after they have obtained the bills of lading by payment to the agent of the Credit Anstalt of the amount of the invoice. After having thus obtained the bills of lading, Drake and Co., on comparison of the bills of lading with the certificates of analysis, apportion the bags and the bills of lading representing them between their different buyers at the port for which they are shipped, and invoice the sugar to them accordingly. Messrs. Drake and Co's transactions of this character are very extensive, and have been so as well with the plaintiff as others, and the general course of business between them and their buyers has been for the buyer to bear the cost of the insurance against sea risks from the time of delivery. The buyers have usually themselves effected the insurance or declared the risk under floating policies, but in some cases Messrs. Drake and Co. have effected the insurance as agents of the buyer.

The sugars which were lost had been shipped on the City of Dublin in intended performance of two contracts made for sale and purchase entered into by Drake and Co. with two Bristol buyers, and at the time of the loss on the 4th Feb., the position of things with regard to these contracts was as follows: By the earliest of these two contracts (the 7th Jan.) Drakes agreed to sell to a Bristol firm (W. Beloe and Co.) 200 tons of sugar, price 21*s.* 9*d*, per cwt. net, f.o.b. Hamburg, for 88 deg. net saccharine contents, sugar to analyse between 85 and 92 net, 6*d*. per cwt. to be paid or allowed for each degree above or below 88, but anything above 92 not to be paid for, and should the average analysis of whole contract exceed 90 such excess not to be paid for. For January delivery at Hamburg. Payment by cash in London in exchange for bill of lading. By the second contract of the 12th Jan. Drakes agreed to sell to the plaintiff a similar quantity at a like price upon indentical terms. After the loss it became for the first time known to Drake and Co., and to the plaintiff, that Beloe and Co. had entered into the contract of the 7th Jan. with Drakes, for the purpose of enabling him to execute a contract previously made by him on the same day with the plaintiff for 200 tons at an advance price. Although not, I think, material, it is as well to observe that in this contract the condition contained in Drake's contract with Beloe as to the excess over 92 not being paid for, was omitted, and it contained an additional term, also in my view immaterial, that the price f.o.b. was on "a steamship to Bristol." At the time of shipment and loss, therefore, all that Drakes knew was that they had engaged to sell 400 tons destined for Bristol, i.e., 200 to Beloe, and 200 to plaintiff, and although plaintiff knew that he had 400 tons coming from Hamburg, i.e., to be shipped by Drakes, and 200 to be shipped by some unknown shipper under Beloe, he did not know that Drakes were the shippers of the latter 200, nor did Drakes know that Beloe was under any contract to deliver, or plaintiff under any contract to take, 200 tons contracted for by Beloe. It is also of importance to note that although in the case of the contract between Drakes and Beloe of the 7th Jan., and of that between Drakes and the plaintiff of the 12th, the provisions of the Statute of Frauds were complied with by all the parties to them, such was not the case with the contract of the 7th Jan. between Beloe and the plaintiff, for that contract, although signed by Beloe as if he had been acting as broker, was not, nor was any note of it, signed by the plaintiff (Beloe being a principal, and so not his agent for that purpose). The consequence of course was that, although Beloe, if he had been the party sought to be charged in any action upon this contract, could not have availed himself of the provisions of the Statute of Frauds, the plaintiff was never until after the loss in a position to be charged in any action with any liability under it. The ultimate destination of the whole 400 tons thus being Bristol, and the whole being delivered by Drakes f.o.b. at Hamburg during the month of January, it became necessary that provision should be made for shipment. The ordinary course of business, which course was known to the plaintiff, was for Drakes' forwarding agents at Hamburg to ship by that boat of the Hamburg and Bristol line of steamers next due to sail after the time fixed for delivery, and the City of Dublin was the one in turn for the departure at the end of the last half of January. The agents for this line are at Hamburg Niessle and Günther, and at Bristol Edward Stock and Son, and the latter make it their bnsiness to keep themselves informed of all contracts for sugar made for shipment from Hamburg to Bristol, and to keep Niessle and Günther advised of all such sales. The plaintiff had, immediately after making each contract of the 7th Jan. with Beloe and the 12th with Drake and Co., entered into binding contracts for sale to the Bristol Sugar Refinery Company of identical quantities upon identical terms except that the sale was at an advanced price of 22*s.* 7½*d.*, leaving him therefore the difference between that and 21*s.* 9*d.* as profit. The plaintiff was therefore anxious for the regular delivery by Messrs. Drake and Co. of the sugar he had thus contracted for, and he immediately informed Edward Stock and Son of the purchase he had made of Beloe, and requested them to reserve space by the last departure for the month, but, as he did not know from what shippers Beloe would supply his contract, all the advice he could give was the fact of the sale. In like manner on the 12th Jan. the plaintiff asked Edward Stock and Son to reserve space for that parcel. It also appears that Beloe had requested Edward Stock and Son to reserve space for the same 200 tons, the identity, however, at that time not being known to the agents. The plaintiff also on the 31st Jan. in writing to Drakes, expressed his hope that the 200 tons of the 12th were on the steamer then due to leave Hamburg, and in reply he received a letter from Drakes, that this sugar was not only at Hamburg, but that there would probably be extra expense chargeable to him owing to delay in steamer's arrival out, and consequent delay in departure. About the same time Drake and Co. also advised Herrman and Theilnehmer, their Hamburg forwarding agents, that they had sold 400 tons for Bristol, and gave them the necessary orders as to which bags were to be shipped for that port, begging them to engage room by the City of Dublin, and send the bills of lading to London as soon as possible. Although, however, sugar in sufficient quantity, and with suitable analysis, had arrived at Hamburg, so that Drake and Co. could have shipped either the 200 tons contracted for by the contract of the 12th Jan. with the plaintiff, or alternatively the 200 tons of the contract of the 7th Jan. with Beloe, the whole of the sugar which Drakes had appropriated to satisfy the two contracts together had not arrived at Hamburg at the time of the departure of the steamer, and in consequence Herrman and Theilnehmer were not able to ship by the City of Dublin more than 3900 bags, and they advised Drake and Co. of this short shipment, proposing to send the 100 short shipped by the next steamer due to sail on the 15th Feb. They did, however, ship 3900 bags, and took several bills of lading by which they were made deliverable to "order, Bristol," but, as Drake and Co. had made no apportionment of the 3900 bags as between the two contracts (7th Beloe's, and 12th plaintiff's) no appropriation was or could be made by them of any specific bags; that is to say, as to which of the bags were to be Beloe's and which of them the plaintiff's, but the whole 3900 were shipped in one undistinguished mass, and all were consigned simply "order, Bristol."

With this sugar thus on board the City of Dublin left Hamburg on the 3rd Feb., and on the morning of the 4th went down in the Elbe with her cargo. By the post of the 2nd Feb. Herrman and Theilnehmer had in usual course forwarded the bills of lading, indorsed in blank, to the London correspondent of the Credit Anstalt of Leipsic, and by the post of the 3rd they advised Drakes of their having so done, in order that the latter might take them up together with those of other bags (2900) shipped to London by another steamer in the same manner. On the 4th Feb., and before any intelligence of the loss had reached Drake and Co., they in due course took up the bills of lading by payment of the amount of the invoices to the agents of the Credit Anstalt, and then proceeded to apportion the 3900 bags between Beloe and the plaintiff, appropriating such of them as would make up the proper average for the plaintiff's contract to him, and such as would make up Beloe's contract to him according to the averages contracted for in each contract. At this time they had no knowledge that the sugar invoiced by them to Beloe would in fact be appropriated by him to the plaintiff under the sub-contract of the 7th Jan., and they therefore made out two separate invoices in ordinary course to them as two separate purchasers, as in fact they were. In doing this they had of course, as before explained, so to allot the bags to each particular contract as would best suit their own commercial convenience and advantage; and having made the selection of, and appropriated 2000 of the bags out of the mass to Beloe, and 1900 others to the plaintiff, they made out the invoices accordingly; and of course the result was a short supply of the plaintiff's contract by 100 bags. Each invoice, however, was so made up as to comply with the terms of contract, that to Beloe showing an average percentage on the whole of 89·5875, and that of the plaintiff of 89·35, both averages, therefore, being kept under 90. Certainly, however, before these invoices were posted by Drake and Co. (whether before or after the appropriation does not appear), news arrived by telegram to them of the loss of the sugar. News of the loss also arrived the same day in Bristol, and the plaintiff, anticipating that she might have the 200 tons on board coming to him under his contract of the 12th, although without any specific advice of the shipment, declared on the City of Dublin under the policy now under suit for any loss in respect of those 200 tons. In the letter to the plaintiff of the 4th Feb., in which Drakes inclosed the invoice to the plaintiff for the 1900 bags, they proposed that the contract should be cancelled as to the 100 short shipment and to this the plaintiff assented; but this was done after both parties knew of the loss. The invoice to the plaintiff was headed "Contract 12th January." It set out the marks and numbers of the bags, and statement of the degrees of net saccharine matter. With the invoice Drakes also forwarded a cash order for payment of the amount (4162*l.* 16*s.*) in Bristol to the order of Williams, Deacon, and Co. in London, in exchange for the bills of lading; and on the morning of the 5th the plaintiff paid the amount in exchange accordingly, and obtained the bills of lading of the sugar thus invoiced to him under his contract of the 12th. A like course of forwarding invoice and bill of lading was undergone in Beloe's case, between Drakes and him, the invoice being headed "Contract 7th January." The next step in the transaction was, that Beloe being, as before stated, under contract to sell 200 tons to the plaintiff, but at an increased price, made out his invoice to the plaintiff making him debtor to himself, and forwarded it to him with an intimation that the bills of lading were at the bankers, and requesting him to forward to him (Beloe) a cheque for the amount, and this being done the plaintiff received the bills of lading for the 2000 bags thus invoiced, and then also declared upon the present policy for this further loss, making his total claim against the underwriters, including the usual 10 per cent. added for profit, 9530*l.* 19*s.* 8*d.*, and it was the defendant's portion of this sum that the plaintiff sought to recover. In consequence of the loss of the sugar the plaintiff was of course unable to perform his two sub-contracts with the Bristol Sugar Refining Company, and therefore failed to realise the profit he had contracted for.

Upon these facts the plaintiff's right to recover was denied by the defendant on the ground that no property in the sugar had passed to him before the loss; and secondly, that at the time of the loss he had no insurable interest in the sugar itself, and that even if he had an insurable interest in "profits" he was not entitled to declare the loss in respect of that interest upon a policy on "goods." The first question therefore is, whether at the time of the loss, the property in the 3900 bags, or any of them, had passed to and was vested in the plaintiff. Now none of the three contracts which we have to take into consideration in the present case are for the sale of any specific goods—they are all executory; and no general rule can be more clearly established than that in the case of a contract like that to deliver goods to answer a specific description, and when it is for the seller to ascertain which of his goods he will deliver in execution of his contract, the property which he has in those goods does not pass out of him or vest in the buyer until he has made an appropriation of those specific goods to the latter. The question at what period of the transaction in such cases the property passes is often one not free from difficulty. The rule is, that it is a question of the intention of the parties to be collected from the language of the contract coupled with the ordinary and usual course of business; and so collected in the present case, it seems to me that the intention of the parties was that the seller should in each case select and ship at Hamburg the specific number of bags contracted for on board a ship selected by the buyer, the seller taking for them a clean bill of lading to be afterwards handed to the buyer against payment in London of the amount of the invoice. That this was the mode of delivery agreed appears from the terms as well of the two contracts of the 7th as of that of the 12th January. By them the goods which the seller should designate as the goods to answer the contract are to be delivered at Hamburg at a price f.o.b., and of course before any such delivery could have been made the seller must have appropriated to each of his buyers the specific goods which he intended to deliver to him. Messrs. Drake and Co. had no knowledge of Beloe's sub-contract with the plaintiff, nor had they any intention to make any appropriation or delivery at Hamburg to the plaintiff in respect of that contract, nor had the plaintiff any intention of taking delivery from Drake and Co. of that quantity, nor did he know that the 2000 bags which he had thus contracted to buy of Beloe were on board, although as the contract was to deliver on board a Bristol steamer by the end of January, he would probably expect that some Hamburg shipper would ship them by the last steamer of the month. But, if Messrs. Drake had, as they had contracted with the plaintiff to do shipped f.o.b. at Hamburg, and appropriated to him under his contract of the 12th Jan. 2000 specific bags of sugar, there would have been a delivery to him of those bags in the agreed mode of delivery; and they would, I think, have become his property and insurable by him as his goods—they would have become so by the appropriation to the plaintiff and the delivery with the plaintiff's assent on board a ship designated by him, and of course would have been at his risk. So, if the like course had been adopted in reference to the 2000 bags of sugar contracted for by Messrs. Beloe, the property in that sugar would, I think, have passed to Messrs. Beloe, and the sugar would have been at their risk on delivery. I do not however, see even in that event the plaintiff would have acquired any property in those 2000 bags, there being no appropriation or delivery to or taking of delivery by him either by or from Drake or Beloe. But it is unnecessary to consider that question, because I have come to the conclusion that there never was before the loss any sufficient appropriation and delivery by Drake and Co., either to the plaintiff or to Messrs. Beloe.

All that had been done by Messrs. Drake was to select from the large quantity of sugar which they had in Germany 4000 bags, with the general intention of sending them to Bristol, with the further intention of subsequently selecting from them bags such as from their analysis would suit Messrs. Drake's commercial convenience and profit to appropriate to the plaintiff and others, as would in like manner suit their contract with Beloe. That selection and appropriation they purposely deferred until after the arrival of the bills of lading in London, and at the time they actually made it the loss had occurred, and at the time that they communicated that appropriation to the plaintiff, and he assented to it, he and they knew of the loss. At the time of the loss, therefore, the power of selecting which bags should go to the plaintiff and which to Beloe still rested with Drake and Co., and no property in any specific bag passed to or vested in either Beloe or the plaintiff; nor could either of them have claimed to have any one bag rather than another. It is unnecessary in this case to consider whether Messrs. Drake and Co. could have withdrawn any of the bags and substituted others, nor is it necessary to say what might have been the result if all the parties had known of the actual state of facts in reference to the three contracts, and had agreed and been willing that the whole 3900 bags should without any further selection have passed to the plaintiff, for this was not the case. Shipping as they did, Messrs. Drake had only the general intention of putting on board goods in quantity and quality fit to answer both contracts, and leaving the specific appropriation of the particular bags to each until they should have recived the bills of lading. The plaintiff, as I have before observed, knew nothing about Drakes being the shippers of any goods which Beloe intended to appropriate to him, and had no intention of taking delivery of anything more than 2000 bags which he had requested Drakes to ship per the City of Dublin, Indeed, as Beloe's contract with the plaintiff was at an advanced price, it was absolutely necessary (nothing else having been agreed to by way of substitution) that Messrs. Drake should first appropriate and deliver to Beloe his 2000 bags before the latter could appropriate and deliver to the plaintiff, and none of the parties contemplated that either the plaintiff or Beloe would each take delivery from Drakes of more than his 2000 bags. Neither the plaintiff nor Beloe ever assented to any such general appropriation and shipment as was made by Messrs. Drake, and it did not appear that any such mode of carrying out any contracts in similar terms, under similar circumstances, had ever occurred before, so as to supply the want of actual assent by any assent to be implied from the course of business. I am, of course, speaking of what happened before the loss; after that event there was an assent by the plaintiff to what had been done, which, if given with a knowledge of all the circumstances, might have operated to pass the property in the whole to him from that time, and for some purposes by relation to the time of shipment. It was also, of course, competent to him to waive the default in delivery at the place agreed on, and, if he pleased, pay for the goods; but then as this assent and waiver did not take place until after the loss, the case of Anderson v. Morice (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 31, 290; 33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 355; L. Rep. 10 C. P. 58, 609; 1 App. Cas. 713) is an authority to show that it was not competent to him by any assent or election at that stage to enable himself to throw any liability upon the defendant which did not exist at the time of the loss. This proposition was also asserted in Stockdale v. Dunlop (6 M. & W. 224). In that case there was no contract binding the seller within the Statute of Frauds; and the court held that, although, as between him and the buyer the contract ultimately became capable of being enforced by a subsequent part delivery and acceptance, that circumstance would not operate retrospectively, so as to dispense with a memorandum within the statute, and thus by relation charge the insurer. In the view, therefore, which I have taken of the case upon this point, it is unnecessary to consider the questions which were raised on the argument whether either the Credit Anstalt or Messrs. Drake had (by taking the bills of lading making the goods deliverable to their order) so reserved the jus disponendi as to prevent the passing of the property to the plaintiff until after payment, or whether the short shipment of the 100 bags affected the case; and I express no opinion therefore upon either of those points.

But, upon the assumption that this decision might be against the plaintiff upon the question whether the goods were his, it was next argued for the plaintiff that, although the property had not passed, he yet had an insurable interest in the sugar. But the same default which seems to me to have prevented the passing of the property seems to me also to have prevented his having had any insurable interest. It was no doubt truly said for him that by the terms of the contract, and the known course of business, any goods duly shipped in accordance with the contract would have been at his risk after shipment. But in that event he would, according to my view, have had not only an insurable interest, but also property; and the present case is not like that of Castle v. Playford (26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 315; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 255; L. Rep. 5 Ex. 165; 7 Ex. 98), in which, although the property had not passed, there was a specific agreement that the goods were to be at the buyer's risk. Neither does the case of Sparks v. Marshall (2 Bing. N. C. 761), which was strongly pressed upon me in the course of Mr. Myburgh's very able argument, assist the plaintiff, because in that case, although the seller had made default in delivering at Portsmouth according to the contract, the plaintiff had before the loss assented to what was an undoubted appropriation to him, and so the property had passed. But, although the plaintiff had not in my judgment either property or insurable interest in "goods," he had, I think, an insurable interest in "profits," for he had contracts binding both Drakes and Beloe, by which he was entitled to the delivery of 4000 bags of sugar at Hamburg, and had sold at a profit which he was clearly unable to realise for want of the goods. Whether this profit was lost by any of the perils insured against it is unnecessary for me to consider, for it is now well settled that such a loss cannot be recovered under a policy framed like the present merely on "goods:" (M'Swiney v. The Royal Exchange Assurance Company, 14 Q. B. 634; and Anderson v. Morice, ubi sup.) I am unable, therefore, to give the plaintiff judgment. At first sight this seems to operate harshly on the plaintiff, for he had made a contract to insure and had paid premiums, and may have reasonably believed that he was insured under his floating policy, and so have omitted to effect a fresh insurance. But it is impossible to blame the defendant for this; he has insured at the ordinary market premium such risk coming within his policy as the plaintiff may choose to declare upon it. If the loss is not covered by it, the plaintiff will probably have the opportunity of declaring upon another which is; and suffering, as he no doubt has, the loss of this expected profit, he must consider it as due to Drake's breach of covenant in not delivering to him at Hamburg as he had promised to do; and for this the defendant is in no wise answerable. I give judgment for the defendant with costs.

COURT OF APPEAL.

SITTINGS AT LINCOLN'S INN.

Reported by FRANK EVANS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Friday, June 16, 1882.

(Before JESSEL, M.R., LINDLEY and BOWEN, L.JJ.)

DAVISON v. DONALDSON.

Co-owners—Agency—Partnership—Ship's husband—Purchase of stores—Liability of owner—Delay in suing.

A shipowner, by settling accounts with his managing owner, does not relieve himself from liability in respect of goods supplied on the order of the managing owner for the use of the ship, even though his share of the cost of such goods is debited to him in such accounts, and thereby paid for by him.

T., who was ship's husband and managing owner, purchased beef on credit from the plaintiff in Sept. 1877 for the use of the ship. The defendant was part owner of the ship, and was also interested jointly with T. in the voyages for which the ship was being fitted out. The plaintiff applied to T. for payment, but did not obtain it. In Dec. 1877 and Dec. 1879 the defendant settled accounts with T. and gave him credit for the price of the goods, supposing he had paid for them. T. having become bankrupt in 1881, the plaintiff applied for payment to the defendant, and brought his action for the price of the beef.

Held (reversing the decision of Mathew, J.), that the defendant was liable.

THIS action was brought by the plaintiff, in his own right, and as executor of W. Davison, against J. J. Donaldson, one of the co-owners of the ships Eliza Mary and Lucy Jane, for beef and other goods supplied for the use of the ships between April and Sept. 1877. The principal defence was, that the goods were supplied to C. Tate, the managing owner and ship's husband, and on his order and credit; that W. Davison and the plaintiff knew Tate was the managing owner, and elected to treat him as principal; that no application was made to the defendant or the other co-owners for payment of the charges claimed till Feb. 1881, nor had any of them notice that the charges had not been paid; that W. Davison and the plaintiff knew that the defendant and the other co-owners would from time to time, in the ordinary course of business, settle the accounts of the ships with Tate, and would include therein the sums claimed; that the defendant and the other co-owners, before they had notice that the charges had not been paid, settled with Tate, as such managing owner, accounts in which they paid or allowed him the moneys sued for as moneys paid by him; and that they were induced to pay or allow him such sums by the conduct of W. Davison and the plaintiff, and in the belief (induced by such conduct) that Tate had paid the money sued for, and that W. Davison and the plaintiff had supplied the goods on the sole credit of Tate, and had elected to treat him as the principal.

It appeared that the goods were supplied to Tate's order, while acting as ship's husband, the invoices being made out to "C. Tate and the ship Eliza Mary," or to "C. Tate and the ship Lucy Jane."

The defendant was co-owner of the ships with Tate, and was jointly interested with him in the voyages for which the provisions were supplied.

The plaintiff and W. Davison were unable to obtain payment from Tate, or his son and partner. Tate died in Oct. 1878, and his son filed a petition for liquidation in Jan. 1881.

Credit was allowed to Tate for the charges in a settled account between him and the other co-owners in Dec. 1877. A further account was settled between his estate and the other co-owners in Dec. 1879, in which the balance of the former account was brought forward.

In neither of these settlements were vouchers produced for the payment of these charges.

The action was tried at the Newcastle assizes, before Mathew, J. in Jan. 1882. The learned judge gave judgment for the defendant.

The plaintiff appealed.

Hopwood, Q.C. and McClymont for the appellant. The plaintiff and the defendant were both co-owners and co-partners, and as a partner the defendant is liable for debts incurred in the joint adventure. Credit is not given to the ship's husband, but to the owners of the ships whom he is known to represent. There has not been such delay on the plaintiff's part to alter the position of the defendant, or deceive him. If the defendant paid Tate for beef which the latter had not himself paid for, it was the defendant's own fault. He could have called for vouchers of the accounts.

Cohen, Q.C. and Edge for the defendant.—Tate was not dealt with as a partner, but as ship's husband. It is not the course of business for a ship's husband to buy on credit; he ought to pay debts as they become due. The owners were entitled to presume he had done so in the present case. The long credit given by the plaintiff deceived the defendant into supposing all accounts had been paid, and in that belief he settled accounts with Tate. Tate was then solvent, and the defendant could have recovered from him the amount erroneously allowed him in the account. It is well-established law that when a person deals with an agent, either by giving him unreasonable credit or otherwise, so as to deceive the principal and alter the relative position of the parties, the principal is discharged:

Heald v. Kenworthy, 10 Ex. 739;
Smyth v. Anderson, 7 C. B. 21;
Kymer v. Suwercropp, 1 Camp. 109;
Smethurst v. Mitchell, 1 E. & E. 623; 28 L. J. 241, Q.B.;
Armstrong v. Stokes, 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 872; L. Rep. 7 Q.B. 598;
Irvine v. Watson, 5 Q.B. Div. 102;
Leake on Contracts, 2nd edit. 503.

The creditor chose to make Tate his debtor, and cannot, on his failure to pay, turn round and charge the principal:

Thomson v. Davenport, 9 B. & C. 78, 86.

JESSEL, M.R.—The action was brought for the price of beef supplied to Tate, the ship's husband, who was a co-owner with the defendant of two ships. The invoices were in what we are told is the usual form in small transactions of this nature, namely, to "C. Tate and the ship." The beef was supplied for the use of the ships between April and Sept. 1877. Tate did not pay for the beef, but in Dec. 1877 he charged the owners with the beef supplied, in an account rendered to them. It is not suggested that at this time an unreasonable credit had been given to Tate; therefore the allowance of the payment to him in account was not made through any misrepresentation by the creditor, but solely on Tate's representation that he had paid for the beef. On the face of this the co-owner settled the account without calling for the vouchers. No doubt principles may, in many cases, reasonably rely on the honour of their agents and dispense with the production of vouchers; but when they come into court and seek to excuse themselves from liability, if it turns out that they have not required vouchers, they must expect to be dealt with strictly. Here, the defendant and Tate were not only co-owners, but co-adventurers, therefore they were strictly partners. The beef was supplied for partnership purposes, and the defendant was liable to the butcher, and is still liable to his executor. The defence is that the defendant was injured by the long credit given to Tate, which led him to believe Tate had paid for the beef, and prevented him obtaining repayment from Tate while he was solvent. "Therefore," says the defendant, "though I may be liable at law, I have the equitable defence that the plaintiff gave unreasonable credit without telling me, and the plaintiff has elected to treat him as his sole debtor, and cannot sue me." Is this the law, and, if so, on what principle does it proceed? There is no doubt a well-known principle, long acted on, both by courts of equity and courts of common law—for the equity is the same in both courts—that, if the defendant has been misled, by the words or conduct of the plaintiff, to believe that which is not true, and his position is thereby altered, the plaintiff cannot be heard to deny the truth of what he has thus led the defendant to believe. This is well expressed in Irvine v. Watson. There the defendants had paid the broker, and the question was whether that discharged their liability to the plaintiffs. Bramwell, L.J. said: "I think it impossible to say that it discharged them, unless they were misled by some conduct of the plaintiffs into the belief that the broker had already settled with the plaintiffs, and made such payment in consequence of such belief." Assuming that there is no distinction in this respect between a partnership and a case of principal and agent, that observation applies exactly to this case. The payment made by the defendant was not made in consequence of his being misled by the plaintiff. The mere fact that by the conduct of the plaintiff he lost the opportunity of getting the money back is not sufficient. In the same case, Baggallay, L.J., speaking of the observations of Parke, B. in Heald v. Kenworthy, says: "He sought to limit the qualification of the general rule to cases in which the seller by some conduct has misled the buyer into believing that a settlement has been made with the agent. And, if that limitation is correct, I am of opinion that there is no such payment here as would discharge the defendants." Brett, L.J. says: "Parke, B., after citing the dictum of Bayley, J., to the effect that the seller cannot sue the principal if the state of accounts between the principal and the agent would make it inequitable that he should do so, proceeds to ask what equity there can be, unless it is something arising out of the conduct of the seller, something to induce the defendant to believe that a settlement has already been made with the agent." Then, referring to the observations of the judges in Armstrong v. Stokes, Brett, L.J. continues: "Probably their decision means this, that, when the seller deals with the agent as sole principal, and the nature of the agent's business is such that the buyer ought to believe that the seller has so dealt, in such a case it would be unjust to allow the seller to recover from the principal after he paid the agent." All the judges agreed that when the seller knows there is a principal behind the person dealt with, the seller must be shown to have himself done something to raise an equity against him, or the principal is not discharged; but I am far from saying that there may not be special cases in which mere delay on the plaintiff's part would be held to be sufficiently misleading conduct. It may amount to a representation that he has been paid. Smethurst v. Mitchell is an authority that, when the goods are not to be delivered till the account is paid, and yet the goods are delivered, whether the seller takes a bill of exchange or not, the seller cannot afterwards claim against the principal. The conduct of the seller would be treated as evidence of payment; it would be conduct naturally leading men of business to believe that the money had been paid. Hill, J. says, in that case, "A question may arise in such a case whether a vendor selling to a person whom he knows to be acting as the agent of an undisclosed principal is not bound to make inquiries, and may not be debarred from proceeding against the principal, if there has been any alteration in the account between the principal and agent, to the prejudice of the former, at any time after the day of payment has arrived." It is said, both in Smethurst v. Mitchell, and Heald v. Kenworthy, that there must be a change of position between the principal and agent caused by the seller's conduct. Here it is clear that paying Tate an account in 1877 was not caused by any dealing of the plaintiff with Tate. What occurred afterwards did not affect the plaintiff. A principal cannot be heard to say that the seller's subsequent conduct induced the principal not to sue the agent for repayment of the money. Independently of the settlement of accounts there is no evidence that merely abstaining from pressing the agent is an injury to the principal. A debtor must find out his creditor and go and pay him; when a man is supplied with goods it is his duty to see that the seller is paid. There is no proof of the defendant's allegation that, by reason of the course of trade, in the case of a ship's husband, giving credit to him affords sufficient evidence of an election by the creditor to discharge the principal. There is no authority for such a proposition; and it is not within the equitable principle. A partner ought not to settle with his co-partner without satisfying himself that the payments have been actually made. In my opinion the plaintiff is entitled to judgment.

Lindley, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Tate and the other owners of the two ships were not only co-owners but co-partners, and, as such, the other owners are jointly responsible with Tate. The plaintiff was in a better position than he would have been if he had had only the option to sue either the agent or the undisclosed principal. Agent and principal were here partners and jointly liable to the creditor. Has the defendant got rid of his liability? The defence is that in 1877 he settled with Tate in this account for the payment to the plaintiff. But he was not induced to do so by the plaintiff's delay—and that is the vice of the defence. The defendant puts it thus: "We should, in Tate's lifetime, have re-adjusted our accounts with him, instead of which we have had other transactions with him on the faith of his having paid the plaintiff, and in 1879 we settled another account with him on that basis. But that is disproved by the whole of the facts. There is nothing to show that the defendant has been so misled as to disentitle the plaintiff to recover from him. There is no evidence that the plaintiff knew anything of the settlement of the accounts, or that he induced it by his conduct. It would be going too far to say that there was any such personal equity as precluded the plaintiff from suing the defendant. I do not say that, under some circumstances, mere delay may not be sufficient to create such a personal equity; but there are no such circumstances in the present case.

Bowen, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The goods were supplied to Tate as ship's husband; primâ facie, therefore, the defendant, who was a partner in the adventure, is liable jointly with the other partners. To get rid of this liability he endeavours to prove a settlement of account between Tate and his co-owners, and that such co-owners were induced thereto by conduct of the plaintiff leading them to believe that he had been paid by Tate. That was the sole ground on which the defendant relied at the trial. But the creditor had in 1877 been guilty of no delay which could make the co-owners believe that Tate had paid the plaintiff. It was Tate's representation that he had done so, and not the plaintiff's delay, which led to the settlement. At the trial Mathew, J. decided the case on the ground that the plaintiff elected to give credit to Tate, and that the defendant believed that credit had been given to Tate, and that Tate had paid the plaintiff. On appeal the defendant contends that the judgment below may be supported on the ground that the plaintiff's delay after settlement of the accounts changed the relative position of Tate and the defendant, to the injury of the defendant. However, taking this new ground, there is a joint liability from which the defendant has to discharge himself. In very special circumstances delay may amount to misrepresentation; it may be conduct misleading the defendant. But that can only be when there is something in the original contract, or in the conduct of the parties, which renders the delay misleading. That a creditor is not obliged to apply to all his debtors if he can obtain payment from one of them, is a doctrine which is laid down in Heald v. Kenworthy, is sanctioned by Irvine v. Watson, and is consistent with Lord Ellenborough's judgment in Kymer v. Suwercropp. I think the plaintiff is entitled to judgment on the ground that there was no misleading conduct on his part. The question whether, if there had been, and the defendant had been thereby induced to alter his position, the plaintiff would have been entitled, I prefer to express no opinion.

CROWN CASES RESERVED.

Reported by John Thompson, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Saturday, Nov. 25, 1882.

(Before Lord Coleridge, C.J., Pollock, B., Lopes, Stephen, and Williams, JJ.)

Reg. v. Carr and Wilson.

Felonious receiving—Bonds stolen from a British ship in a foreign river—Admiralty jurisdiction.

Egyptian and other bonds were put on board a British ship lying in the river, and moored to the shore, at Rotterdam, for conveyance to England. The bonds were stolen, and the prisoners, British subjects, were found dealing with them in England, and were tried at the Central Criminal Court, and found guilty of feloniously receiving the same, well knowing them to have been stolen.

Held, assuming the bonds to have been stolen by a foreigner, or other person not being one of the crew, from the ship at Rotterdam, whilst so moored in the river, that the admiral had jurisdiction over the offence, and that the prisoners were properly tried at the Central Criminal Court.

Case reserved for the opinion of this court by North, J.

The prisoners were tried before me at the Old Bailey, at the session of the Central Criminal Court, on 13th Sept. last, for felony in respect of twenty-five bonds (20*l.* each) of Egyptian Preference Stock, two bonds of 1000 dollars (ten shares), and 500 dollars (five shares) respectively of the Illinois Railway, and thirty other bonds of Egyptian Unified Stock.

The first count charged the prisoners with stealing these securities upon the high seas within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England; the second count charged that they being British subjects within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England, upon the British ship Avalon, then being in a certain foreign port, to wit, the port of Rotterdam, stole the same securities; the third count charged them with larceny of those securities within the jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court; the fourth count charged them with receiving the same securities within the jurisdiction of that court, well-knowing them to have been stolen; and the fifth and sixth counts respectively charged them with having been accessories after the fact to the theft and the receiving respectively of the same securities by persons unknown.

A copy of the extract of the indictment will be found in the schedule to this case, and the indictment may be referred to as a part thereof.

I was asked by the counsel for the prisoner Wilson to quash the second count of the indictment; but it was suggested by Sir H. Giffard, who appeared for the prisoner Carr, that the better course would be that the prisoners should refuse to plead, and I should direct pleas of not guilty to be entered, and this was accordingly done.

The material facts proved were as follows:—

1. On the 12th July last the above-mentioned Egyptian Preference Stock and Illinois Bonds were made up by Messrs Kelker and Co., bankers at Amsterdam, into a parcel which was marked outside "value 50*l.*," and was addressed to Messrs Mercia, Backhouse, and Co., in London. The Unified Stock was made up into another parcel similar to the first, except that it was marked outside as "value 100*l.*" These parcels were of a class known as "valued parcels." They were traced clearly from Amsterdam to Rotterdam, to the office of Messrs Pieters and Co., the agents there of the Great Eastern Railway Company, on whose behalf they were received.

2. There was evidence that these two parcels were (with two others) taken from Pieters and Co's office by a man employed by them for that purpose, and placed by him on board the steamship Avalon about half past five p.m. on the same 12th July.

3. The Avalon is a British vessel, registered at Harwich, and sailing under the British flag. She is about 240 feet in length, with a gross tonnage of 1,670 tons; and draws about ten feet six inches of water when loaded. She is the property of the Great Eastern Railway Company, and is regularly employed by them in their trade between Harwich and Rotterdam. On the evening in question she was lying in the river Maas, at Rotterdam, about twenty or thirty feet (the captain also described it as "about the breadth of the court") from the quay, and against a "dolphin," a structure of piles for the use of the company's ships only, projecting from the quay for the purpose of keeping vessels off the quay. She was moored to the quay in the usual manner.

4. The place where the Avalon was lying was in the open river, sixteen or eighteen miles from the sea. There is not any bridge across the river between that point and the sea. The tide ebbs and flows there, and for many miles further up the river. The place where the Avalon was lying at the dolphin is never dry, and that vessel would not touch the ground there at low water. The Admiralty chart, showing the river Maas from Rotterdam to the sea, was put in evidence at the suggestion of the counsel for the prisoners, and was proved by the captain of the Avalon to be correct. It is marked J.T.H. 1.

5. While the Avalon was lying at the dolphin, as above described, persons were allowed to pass backwards and forwards between her and the shore without hindrance.

6. The Avalon sailed for England the same evening, about six o'clock, and arrived at Harwich the following morning. Upon her arrival the two valued parcels above mentioned (and one of the other parcels) were at once missed, and upon inquiry it was found that they had been stolen. The parcel containing the Unified Stock and the third parcel have never since been traced; but the parcel containing the Egyptian Preference Stock and the Illinois bonds was found in the prisoners' possession on the 1st Aug.

7. The prisoners are British subjects.

8. It was contended for the prisoners that there was no evidence upon which the jury could find them guilty upon the counts charging them with stealing the securities. I was of that opinion, and so directed the jury, and the prisoners were accordingly acquitted upon those counts.

9. It was also contended for the prisoners that unless the jury found that the securities had been stolen from on board the Avalon the prisoners must be acquitted, as, if they had been stolen after leaving Pieters and Co.'s office, and before reaching the ship, the offence of stealing them was one which this court had not jurisdiction to try, and therefore the prisoners could not be tried here for receiving, according to the case of Reg. v. John Carr (one of these prisoners), reported in vol. lxxxvii., p. 46, of the Sessions Papers at the Central Criminal Court, and the cases there cited. I took this view and directed the jury, that unless they were satisfied that the securities had been taken from the Avalon, they must acquit the prisoners. They found both the prisoners guilty.

10. I was not asked to leave, and did not leave, any question to the jury whether the securities were stolen before or after the Avalon commenced her voyage from Rotterdam. There was no evidence upon which the jury could have found that the theft occurred after the voyage began; the evidence rather pointed to its having occurred before she sailed.

11. It was further argued on the prisoners' behalf that even if the securities had been stolen from the Avalon, there was nothing to show that they had been taken from a British subject, and, therefore, the case did not come within the Acts 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 267, 18 & 19 Vict. c. 91, s. 21, or 30 & 31 Vic. c. 124, s. 11, and the thief was amenable to the law in Holland only; and, further, that the case of Reg. v. Anderson (19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 400; L. Rep. 1 Cr. Cas. Res. 161; 11 Cox C. C. 198) was no authority to the contrary, inasmuch as the prisoner in that case, though a foreigner, was one of the crew of a British vessel, and therefore owed allegiance to the law of England, and upon that ground could be tried here. The counsel of the Crown did not dispute that the offender might be tried in Holland, but insisted that he might be tried here also.

12. I expressed my opinion that if the Avalon had, at the time when the securities were stolen, been sailing up or down the river Maas, the person who took them, whether an Englishman or a foreigner, could clearly have been tried here, upon the authority of Reg. v. Anderson; that the law is the same, whether the ship be anchored or sailing, as appears from the cases of Reg. v. Jemot and Reg. v. Allen (7 Car. & P. 664; 1 Moody's Cr. Cas. 494) where the vessels were lying in port, and which cases are referred to by Lord Blackburn with approval in Reg. v. Anderson; and that it could not make any legal difference whether the vessel was made fast to the bottom of the river by anchor and cable, or to the side of the river by ropes from the quay. I also expressed my opinion that, although the fact that the prisoner in Reg. v. Anderson was one of the crew was referred to more than once in the judgment of Bovill, C.J., it was not mentioned by any of the other judges, and was not the ground of the decision; and that it made no difference in the present case whether the securities stolen from the Avalon were taken by one of the crew or passengers, or by a stranger from the shore.

13. I directed the jury accordingly, telling them that if they came to the conclusion that the securities were taken from the ship, the taking them was an offence which could be tried here; and that, if so, the prisoners could now be tried here for receiving, and could be found guilty of that offence, if the jury thought the facts proved warranted such a finding. I stated at the same time that I should, if necessary, reserve the point for the consideration of this court.

14. With respect to the receiving, no difficulty of law arose, and no point was reserved.

15. The jury found both prisoners guilty upon the fourth count. I postponed passing sentence until the opinion of the court is given; and the prisoners remain in custody.

The question upon which I desire the opinion of the court is, whether, under these circumstances, there was any jurisdiction to try the prisoners at the Old Bailey for the offence of which they have been found guilty. If answered in the affirmative the conviction is to stand. If otherwise, the conviction is to be quashed; but the prisoners are to remain in custody to be tried upon another indictment, on which a true bill against them has been found by the grand jury.

FORD NORTH.

Sir H. Giffard, Q.C. (Tickell with him) for the prisoner Carr, and E. Clarke Q.C. (Grain with him) for the prisoner Wilson.—The Central Criminal Court had not jurisdiction to try the prisoners, the offence not having been committed within the Admiralty jurisdiction. It is immaterial that the prisoners were British subjects, as jurisdiction over the offence is not given by the nationality of the prisoners, but must exist independently thereof. The prisoners were convicted of receiving stolen bonds, and without the court had jurisdiction over the thief it has none over the receiver. There is no evidence as to the person who stole the bonds, and it is consistent with the facts that the thief may have been a Dutchman. On the case as stated it must be taken that the bonds were stolen from the vessel while it was moored to the wharf at Rotterdam. The question is whether the Dutch courts had not exclusive jurisdiction to try the prisoners? It is submitted that they alone had jurisdiction. The ship was attached to the shore by ropes, and became, as it were, part of the shore of the country to which it was attached. When the ship was moored to the quay the English flag was lowered, and the law then governing the ship was the law of Holland. There is no authority that decides that a foreigner on board a vessel at such a place and not being one of the crew and not claiming the protection of the flag of the vessel subjects himself to the jurisdiction of the country to which the vessel belongs. In Reg. v. Anderson (19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 400; L. Rep. 1 Cr. Cas. Res. 161; 11 Cox C. C. 198), Bovill, C.J., Channell, B., and Blackburn, J. seem to place reliance on the fact that the prisoner was one of the crew of the vessel. This is a new point not hitherto decided. What is the condition of a vessel in a river in a foreign country moored to the shore? It is submitted that the local and municipal authorities have exclusive jurisdiction over offences committed upon it whilst so moored.

Poland (Goodrich with him) for the prosecution. —It is submitted that the prisoners were properly tried and convicted. The question depends not on the character of the person committing the offence, but on the character of the ship. At the time the bonds were stolen the ship was within the Admiralty jurisdiction. It was a vessel trading from Harwich to Rotterdam, and when the theft was committed was lying in a tidal river where great ships go, and was in every sense floating within a place where the admiral had jurisdiction:

The United States v. Hamilton, 1 Mason (Amer. Rep.) 152.

Even if the theft was committed by a Dutchman, the Admiral had jurisdiction over it. There can be no distinction between a seaman, one of the crew, and a stranger who goes on board to do a criminal act; being on board an English vessel he puts himself within the jurisdiction of the English law, the ship being considered, as it were, part of the English territory. The test of the admiral's jurisdiction has always been whether the ship was upon the high seas or lying in a river where the tide ebbs and flows and where great ships go. The American reports of Thomas v. Lane (2 Sumner 1), and The United States v. Coombes (12 Peters 71) were then referred to. In Reg, v. Allen (1 Moo, C. C. 494) it was held that the Admiralty had jurisdiction over a larceny in a vessel lying in a Chinese river, although there was no evidence as to the tide flowing where the vessel lay. In Reg. v. Jemot (MSS. 1812) as appears from the report in the Times newspaper (29th Feb. 1812), it was held that the Admiral had jurisdiction over a larceny of 40,000 dollars from a British ship while lying in the harbour of St. Jago, in Cuba. The prisoner was convicted and sentenced to death. The case of Reg. v. Keane (2 Ex. Div. 92) was then cited. The principle on which Reg. v. Anderson (ubi sup.) was decided is applicable to this case, and supports the conviction. The theft in this case was committed on board a vessel sailing under the British flag, and being at the time floating in a tidal river where ships used for commerce go, and therefore it is submitted the admiral had jurisdiction over the offence.

Sir H. Giffard and E. Clarke were heard in reply.—The case of Reg. v. Leslie (Bell C. C. 220; 8 Cox C. C. 269) was referred to.

COLERIDGE, C.J.—This case has been argued at some length, and the question raised by it is no doubt of considerable importance. The facts are these. The bonds which the prisoners have been convicted of feloniously receiving were on board an English ship, in the river Maas, off Rotterdam, in front of a "dolphin," and was moored by ropes to the land of Holland. The tide ebbs and flows in the river, and at the place where she was lying in front of the "dolphin" there is always enough water to float ships of her class. There was no actual proof when, or by whom the bonds were stolen. The case states, "There was no evidence upon which the jury could have found that the theft occurred after the voyage began; the evidence rather pointed to its having occurred before she sailed." Whether the bonds were carried off the ship on to the shore, and sent by some conveyance to the prisoners in England, or whether they were brought by the prisoners to England, does not appear. The prisoners were acquitted of stealing the bonds and found guilty of receiving them with guilty knowledge that they had been stolen. It is obvious that the prisoners could not be convicted of feloniously receiving the bonds unless they were stolen within the same jurisdiction where the receiving took place, and therefore it becomes material to inquire whether the jurisdiction of the Admiralty attached, so that the prisoners could be tried at the Old Bailey. It is admitted that the exact point raised in this case has never arisen for decision in our courts before.

There appear but two points for us to decide. 1. Was the ship within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty so as to make offences committed upon it triable according to the English law? 2. If that point is answered in the affirmative, were the prisoners, according to the decisions, liable to be tried in the English courts? First, as to the place. The place appears to me to come within the old definition of the Admiralty jurisdiction. The ship was at a part of the river which is never dry, and where it would not touch the ground at low water, and the tide ebbs and flows in the river, and great ships do lie and hover there. That is sufficient to bring this ship within the Admiralty jurisdiction. Without saying that the reports of the cases of Rex v. Jemot and Rex v. Allen (ubi sup.) are as full as could be desired, it seems very difficult to draw any tangible distinction between them and the present case. This case also falls within the decision of Reg. v. Anderson (ubi sup.) where the ship was half-way up the river Garonne in France, and at the time of the offence about 300 yards from the nearest shore, and this court held, the prisoner having been convicted of manslaughter, that the offence had been committed within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty and that the Central Criminal Court had jurisdiction to try the prisoner. I am unable to distinguish this case from that, but if anything Reg. v. Anderson seems an a fortiori case. Then, as to the second point, whether there is anything in the personality of the prisoners which would make them not liable by the law of England. It is true that some of the Judges in Reg. v. Anderson (ubi sup.) place reliance upon the fact that the prisoners formed part of the crew of the vessel, but Bovill, C.J. in his judgment points out that England has always insisted on her right to legislate for persons on board her vessels in foreign ports. None of the judges suggested that their judgments would have been in any way altered if the prisoners had not in those cases formed part of the crew. I think it makes no difference whether a person is a British subject or not who comes on board a British ship where the British law reigns, and places himself under the protection which that flag confers; if he is entitled to the privileges and protection of the British ship he is liable to the disabilities which it creates for him. I am unable, therefore, to make a distinction between a passenger or stranger on board a ship and one of the crew, and it makes no difference in my mind whether the person is on board voluntarily or involuntarily; if while on board he is entitled to the protection of its flag, he is also bound by the obligations imposed by the law governing that ship. The utmost that can be said as regards the theft in this case is that the bonds may have been stolen by some one who came on board casually; it may be a foreigner who took them off the vessel at Rotterdam. Suppose the thief had not been able to get off the ship, and had been captured and brought here, could he have been tried here? In my opinion he could, for if while he was on board the ship he was entitled to the protection of the British flag, he was at the same time equally liable to the disabilities of the criminal law of this country. It appears to me that the evidence shows that the bonds were stolen within the jurisdiction of the English law, and I am of opinion that the prisoners therefore were triable at the Central Criminal Court for receiving them well knowing them to have been stolen. I think that the conviction should be affirmed.

POLLOCK, B.—I am of opinion that the conviction should be affirmed. The prisoners were convicted of the offence of feloniously receiving stolen goods, and the question is, were the prisoners within the jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court for all purposes? The general rule of law is that a person on board an English ship is to be treated as within the dominion of the English Crown; and it is admitted that if the ship had been on the high seas, or had been moored in the middle of the river, this rule would have applied to the case. Then what distinction can there be because the ship was tethered by ropes to the shore? I think there is no distinction. She was a large ship carrying passengers and goods from Harwich to Rotterdam, and was in a tidal river at Rotterdam at a spot where great ships go. She was there for the purpose of unloading, and when unloaded would return to Harwich. I think, therefore, the conviction was right.

LOPES, J.—I think, also, that the conviction should be affirmed, As to the question of the thief not being one of the crew of the vessel, I do not think that that matters. The thief was on board an English ship at the time the bonds were stolen, and therefore came within the English law.

STEPHEN, J.—Since the time of Richard II. the jurisdiction of the Admiralty has been extended to waters where great ships go. There are many statutes which gave jurisdiction to particular courts in particular cases. But the jurisdiction of the Admiralty itself has never been defined in any other way than as laid down in the reported cases. The case of Rex v. Jemot bears on the question of local jurisdiction, and decided that the Admiralty had jurisdiction over a theft on board an English vessel in a Spanish port, and shows that the jurisdiction of the admiral was not confined to the waters outside creeks, ports, harbours, &c. Rex v. Allen (ubi sup.) is to the same effect. Reg v. Anderson (ubi sup.) goes further, and affects both the questions of place and person, the place being in a foreign river, and the person being an American subject, who had committed manslaughter on board an English ship. No doubt the prisoner was one of the crew of that ship, but it seems to me that we cannot lay down the rule in narrower terms than that the jurisdiction of the admiral extends to all tidal waters where great ships go, and to all persons on board of them whether foreigners or not. There is no reason which should induce us to lay down restrictions to the extent which has been contended by the prisoners' counsel, that the Admiralty jurisdiction extends only when the British flag is flying, and not when it is lowered. It seems to me that the protection of the British flag and the English jurisdiction are co-extensive, and that protection and obedience must co-exist. I think, therefore, that the thief in this case, if he had been captured, might have been tried at the Old Bailey.

WILLIAMS, J.—I concur.
