BOND.

SUBJECTS OF CASES.

BOTTOMRY.

1. Governing law—Law of flag—Foreign ship—Communication with owners.—When cargo is shipped on board a foreign vessel it becomes subject to the law of the flag of the ship in which it is shipped, in incidents arising out of the contract of shipment, and with regard to which the contract is silent. A person shipping goods on board a foreign ship puts them on board to be dealt with by the law of the country of the ship, unless there is a stipulation to the contrary, and if that law does not render communication with owners necessary before a bottomry bond is made, the want of such communication is no defence to an action on the bond. (Ct. of App., reversing Adm.) The Gaetano and Maria ..... page 470, 535
2. Governing law—Law of the flag—Foreign ship—Bottomry on cargo.—A contract of bottomry, covering the cargo as well as the ship, is governed by the law of the flag, i.e., by the law of the country to which the ship carrying the cargo belongs. Ct. of App., reversing Adm.) Gaetano and Maria...470, 535
3. Interest after cessation of risk—Shipowner—Cargo owners—Master's authority—The rate of interest ordinarily payable upon a bottomry loan and the premium thereon after the safe arrival of the ship at the end of the risk is 4 per cent. per annum, and a provision in a bond entered into by the master of a ship providing for the payment of 10 per cent. per annum interest is not binding on the owners of ship or cargo, provided the provision was entered into without their knowledge. (Adm.) The D. H. Bills 20
4. Maritime risk—Payment due on arrival of ship—Bond—An instrument by which a captain binds his ship to pay a sum of money for goods supplied within "six days after my arrival," means after the ship's arrival, and is an instrument of bottomry. (Adm.) The Cecilie 78
5. Practice—Costs—Damages—Arrest.—Where the holder of a bottomry bond arrests the vessel and freight on which the bond is secured before the bond is due, and the bond is paid at or before maturity, the shipowner is entitled to the costs occasioned by the proceeding, but not, in the absence of malice or gross negligence on the part of the bondholder, to damages. (Adm.) The Endora..... 78

CARRIAGE OF GOODS.

1. Bill of lading—Collision—Negligence of crew or servants—Judicature Act 1873, s. 25, sub-sect. 9.—The right of shippers to recover for loss of goods shipped under bills of lading and lost in consequence of a collision through the negligence of the shipowners, or their servants, is not affected by the 9th sub-section of the 25th section of the Judicature Act 1873, because no variance previously existed in such actions between the Admiralty rule and the common law rule, and that section only applies to actions arising out of collision brought by the owner of one ship against the owner of another, or by the owner of goods on board one ship against the owner of another ship. (Q. B. Div.) Chartered Mercantile Bank of India, The, &c. v. The Netherland Steam Navigation Company Limited...page 523
2. Bill of lading—Collision—Exceptions—Negligence of crew—Negligence of servants on board another ship—Liability of shipowner.—Where a quantity of specie was shipped on board the Crown Prince under a bill of lading which contained the following exceptions: "The act of God, the king's enemies, restraint of princes and rulers . . . . accidents and damages from . . . . collision . . . . and all the perils, dangers, and accidents of the sea, rivers, land carriages, and steam navigation of whatsoever nature and kind soever, and accident, loss or damage from any act, neglect, or default whatsoever of the pilots, masters, mariners, or other servants of the company, in navigating the ship, or from any deviation, excepted," and whilst on her voyage the Crown Prince came into collision with another steamship belonging to the same owners, and a quantity of the specie was lost, and the jury found that this latter vessel was principally in fault, but that the Crown Prince was also in some degree to blame; the exception in the bill of lading as to collision did not protect the shipowners from liability for a collision caused by the negligence or default of their servants on board a vessel other than the Crown Prince, neither were they protected by the clause which excepted their liability for the negligence of their servants, as that applied only to the negligence of their servants who were navigating the Crown Prince, and the defendants were held liable for the loss of the specie. (Q. B. D.) Chartered Mercantile Bank of India, The, &c., v. The Netherland Steam Navigation Company Limited 523
3. Bill of lading in three parts—Indorsees—Delivery of goods—Prior indorsement—Notice.—If one of a set of bills of lading made in parts is produced to the master of a ship by the consignee or an indorsee, and the master has no notice or knowledge of any prior indorsement of one of the other parts, he is justified in delivering the goods upon the part presented to him; but, if he has notice or knowledge of two conflicting claims, he must deliver to the rightful holder at his peril, or interplead. (H. of L. affirming Ct. of App. reversing Q. P. Div.) Glyn, Mills, Currie, and Co. v. East and West India Dock Company 220, 345, 580
4. Charter-party—Bills of lading—Penalty for not signing—Non-delivery of Cargo—Damages—Conversion.—Where by charter-party a master agrees to sign bills of lading as presented within twenty-four hours after the cargo is on board, or pay 4d. per day per registered ton for each day's delay as damages, and afterwards refuses to sign bills of lading as presented, and sails without doing so, and the charterers indorse and send the unsigned bills to their consignees, who, acting under instructions from the charterers, when a small part of the cargo has been delivered, inform the master that they shall deduct from the freight the penalty for not signing the bills of lading, and the master then warehouses the rest of the cargo, the master's refusal to sign bills of lading is a breach of contract on the part of the shipowner, but there is no conversion of the cargo by the shipowner, and the owners of cargo are only entitled to nominal damages for the breach of contract, the non-delivery of the cargo being occasioned by their own act in instructing the consignees to make a deduction from the freight not authorised by the charter-party. (Ct. of App.) Jones v. Hough.....page 248

5. Charterers—Sale of cargo by master—Bills of lading signed by charterers—Agency—Liability.—Charterers of a ship are not liable for the improper act of the master of the vessel chartered by them in selling at an intermediate port a cargo put on board by shippers under an agreement with the charterers, by which the latter, "acting for the owners of the ship," agree to receive on board the ship the shippers' cargo, and the shippers, after shipment, take from the master bills of lading (which the charter-party provided are to be signed as the charterers required) to their own order; the master being the charterer's agent only to receive the cargo and sign the bills of lading, and for nothing subsequent. (Ct. of App., affirming C. P. Div.) Wagstaff v. Anderson and others 163, 290

6. Costs—Charter-party—Breach—Non-delivery of cargo.—Where, in an action for non-delivery of cargo, the plaintiffs were held to be entitled to nominal damages only for breach of charter-party, the non-delivery of the cargo being occasioned by their own act in instructing the consignees to make a deduction from the freight not authorised by the charter-party, each party was ordered to pay his own costs. (Ct. of App.) Jones v. Hough..... 248

7. Damage to cargo—Indorsee of bill of lading—Sale of cargo—Foreign vessel—Bills of Lading Act 1856—Admiralty Court Act 1861—Right to sue.—An indorsee of a bill of lading has a right to sue for damage to the cargo arising from a breach of the contract contained in the bills of lading under the Bills of Lading Act 1856 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 111), and in the case of a foreign vessel to take proceedings in rem. under the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), though at the time of the institution of the suit he has sold the cargo. (Adm.) The Marathon 75

8. Damage to cargo—Negligent stowage—Charter-party—Bills of lading—Liability of Shipowner—Exception of negligent navigation.—Where consignors of goods on board a steamship under charter receive, without notice of the charter-party, bills of lading signed by "agents," containing a clause exempting the shipowners from damage arising from neglect or default on the part of the master or crew, it being agreed that the latter should be deemed the servants of the shipper, owner, or consignee of the goods, but not exempting them from negligent stowage, and the goods are damaged by bad stowage, the shipowners are liable for the damage, although the agents signing are agents of the charterers only, the shipowners having either by the bill of lading entered into a contract with the consignor without any such exemption, or received the goods on board without special contract, in which case the negligence is a breach of duty. (Ct. of App., affirming Denman, J.) Hayn, Roman, and Co. v. Culliford and Clark 48, 128

9. Damage to cargo—Warranty—Seaworthiness—Bill of lading—Peculiar construction of ship.—The ordinary warranty as to seaworthiness in a bill of lading is a warranty that the ship is seaworthy at the time, and reasonably likely to continue seaworthy on the voyage specified. If from special circumstance in her construction she requires special appliances to preserve the cargo from sea damage, the owner is bound to prove those appliances, and will be liable for damage to cargo arising from the want of them. Steele v. State Line Steamship Company (3 Asp. Mar. Law. Cas. 516; 3 App. Cas. 72; 32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 333) followed. (Adm.) The Marathon.....page 75

10. Delivery of cargo—Charter-party—Safe port—"Always afloat."—Where by charter-party, a vessel is to call for orders for a safe port (or as near thereunto as she can safely get, and always lie and discharge afloat) she is entitled to be sent to a port which she can enter loaded, and in which she can always lie and discharge afloat at all times of the tide; and, if she be ordered to a port in which she cannot do so, she is entitled to proceed to the nearest port to the said port in which she can do so, and there discharge. (Ct. of App., reversing Adm.) The Alhambra..... 334, 410

11. Delivery of cargo—Charter-party—Bill of lading—Custom of port of discharge—Reasonable time.—Where a charter-party provides that a ship shall deliver her cargo as fast as the custom of the port of discharge will allow, and the bill of lading provides that the cargo shall be delivered to the consignee or assigns, he or they paying freight as per charter-party, and there is no custom of the port as to delivery, the contract in both charter-party and bill of lading is that the cargo shall be delivered within a reasonable time. (Ct. of App.) Fowler v. Knoop..... 68

12. Delivery of cargo—Custom of port—Charter-party—Construction.—A custom of a port, that the charterer is not bound to take delivery of cargo elsewhere than at port of destination, cannot be set up in answer to a claim by a shipowner on a charter-party, which provides that the ship shall proceed to a certain port, or so near thereto as she can safely get, and deliver. (Ct. of App.) Hayton v. Irwin 212

13. Demurrage—Bill of lading—Charter-party—Indorsee—Liability.—The words "paying freight and all other conditions as per charter-party" in a bill of lading incorporate all the terms of the charter-party as to demurrage, so as to render an indorsee of the bill of lading liable for such demurrage if incurred. (Ct. of App.) Porteous and others v. Watney and others; Straker v. Kidd and Co....34, 34n

14. Demurrage—Bill of lading—Charter-party—Liability of consignee.—When a bill of lading or charter-party (the terms whereof are incorporated in the bills of lading) contains a clause providing that the cargo of the ship shall be discharged in a certain number of days or demurrage paid, a consignee of part of the cargo whose goods are not discharged within the lay days provided, is liable for demurrage, although the delay has been caused by no default of his, but by the default of other consignees whose goods are stowed above his in the ship, provided there is no default on the part of the shipowner. (Ct. of App.) Porteous and others v. Watney and others..... 34

15. Detention of ship—Liability of consignee—Sale of cargo during voyage—Bills of Lading Act 1855, sect. 1.—Where a bill of lading provides for the delivery of goods to a named consignee or his assigns, and the consignee, during the ship's voyage sells the cargo, and several subsequent sales take place, and the cargo is delivered to the ultimate purchaser, upon orders of the consignee, who does not indorse but retains the bill of lading, such consignee may be sued in an action for damages for detention of the ship, being a consignee within the meaning of the Bills of Lading Act 1855, sect. 1. (Ct. of App.) Fowler v. Knoop 68

16. Deviation—Salvage—Life—Loss of cargo—Liability of the shipowner—Perils of the sea.—The owner of a ship who has contracted not to be liable to the freighters for loss of cargo, by perils of the sea, is, nevertheless, liable to them for such loss, during a deviation from her course for the purpose of saving a ship in distress and her cargo, if such deviation was not (or was prolonged until it ceased to be) reasonably necessary in order to save life. (Ct. of App., affirming Lindley, J.) Scaramanga and Co. v. Stamp and Gordon .....page 161, 295

17. Freight—Sale of cargo by shipowner while afloat —Part payment by purchaser—Implied contract.— Where the plaintiff, a shipowner, sells a cargo of wheat, while afloat on board his ship, to H., at the price of 65*s* per 500lb., including freight and insurance: "freight for United Kingdom to be reckoned at 60*s*. per ton," and while the cargo is still afloat, H. sells to L., and L. to the defendant, upon similar terms, and upon the arrival of the ship, the defendant pays 1000*l*. on account of freight, and invites the master to complete delivery of the cargo, which is done, the conduct of the defendant amounts to an implied contract on his part with the plaintiff to pay freight at the agreed rate for all the cargo delivered. (Ct. of App.) Swann v. Barber and Co. 264

18. Freight — Amount payable — Measurement— Timber—Loss of part—Charter-party.—Where, by a charter-party, freight is payable on the intake measure of quantity delivered, and the measurements of a cargo of timber at the place of shipment are entered by the shipper in his specification, and also chalked on each piece of timber, and part of the cargo is lost, and on the rest some of the marks remain, and some do not, and there is evidence that the timber lost was of average dimensions, the shipowners are entitled to deduct from the specification the proportion which the lost part of the cargo bears to the rest, and to recover freight on the residue, and are not bound to have the unmarked pieces measured de novo (Q. B. Div.) Spaight and others v. Farnworth and another..... 251

19. Lien for freight — General ship — Shipper— Charter-party—Notice.—The goods of a shipper in a general ship are not affected by a clause in a charter-party between the person working the ship and the shipowner, giving the shipowner a lien on all cargo and freight for arrears of hire due under the charter-party, where the shipper has no notice or knowledge of the charter-party or its terms. (Adm.) The Stornoway 529

20. Lien for freight — General ship — Shipper — Charter-party—Notice—No bills of lading.— Semble, the fact that no bills of lading were given, for the goods makes no difference in this respect as to the rights and liabilities of the parties.—(Adm.) The Stornoway 529

21. Practice — Interrogatories —Irrelevancy—Non-delivery—Action by owners of cargo—Insurance.— Where a shipowner is sued by the owners of the cargo and charterers for non-delivery of cargo, and the defendant alleges that the non-delivery was caused by perils of the sea excepted in the charter-party and bill of lading, interrogatories asking the plaintiffs whether the cargo was insured, and if so, with whom, by whom, and to what amount, are irrelevant and therefore inadmissible. (C. P. Div.) Bolckow, Vaughan, and Co. v. Young 301

22. Voyage—End of—Charter-party—"As near as she may safely get"—Demurrage — Delay.— Where by a charter-party it is provided that a ship shall carry a cargo of timber from the Baltic to the Surrey Commercial Docks, "or so near thereto as she may safely get and lie always afloat," and shall deliver the same on payment of freight, "the cargo to be received at port of discharge as fast as steamer can deliver," and when she arrives in the Thames the Surrey Commercial Docks are so crowded that she cannot be received in them, and it appears from the evidence that she cannot be admitted for many weeks the, delay is so great as to make it unreasonable for the ship to wait for admission into the docks, so that the alternative in the charter party comos into operation, and the voyage is at an end when the ship is moored in the river, ready to discharge her cargo, and the charterers' liability for demurrage begins from this date. (H. of L. from Ct. of App.) Dahl and Co. v. Nelson, Donkin, and Co.....page 172, 392

23. Voyage—End of—Charter-party—"As near as she may safely get—Construction—Physical obstruction—Unreasonable delay.— The primary obligation of a ship under charter is to proceed, if possible, to the place named in the charter-party; but it is not necessary, in order to free the ship from this obligation, and to substitute an alternative destination, that she should be prevented by a permanent physical obstruction, if the obstruction is such as to cause a delay so unreasonable as to make the prosecution of the voyage impossible from a mercantile point of view. (H. of L. from Ct. of App.) Dahl and Co. v. Nelson, Donkin, and Co 172, 392

24. Voyage—End of—Charter-party—"As near as she may safely get"—Lighterage.—Where a charter-party provides that the ship shall carry a cargo to a port in the United Kingdom or on the continent between Havre and Hamburgh, as ordered on signing bills of lading, or so near thereto as she might safely get, the cargo to be brought to and taken from alongside at merchant's risk and expense, and the ship is ordered to a place up a canal, and on arrival at the mouth of the canal, the master finds that the ship draws too much water to get up the canal without discharging more than a third of the cargo, and the consignee makes no arrangement to lighten the ship or to take delivery or give directions where the ship has arrived, the master is justified in considering the voyage at an end at the place of discharge or at the mouth of the canal, and if he discharge part of his cargo into lighters and then take the rest on in the ship to the port named, he will be entitled to recover the lighterage from the charterers. (Q. B. Div.) Capper and Co. v. Wallace Brothers 223

25. Warehouseman—Merchant Shipping Act 1862 ss, 66, 78—Goods landed.—A warehouseman with whom goods have been warehoused under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), ss. 66, 78, is in the same position as the shipowner or master, and is entitled to the same protection. Carriage of Goods, No. 5—Mortgage, No. 1.

CHARTER-PARTY.

1. Cancellation—"To be cancelled"—Construction.—Where a charter-party provides that in the event of "war, blockade, or prohibition of exporting preventing loading, this charter to be cancelled," the charter-party comes to an end ipso facto, on the happening of any of the contingencies mentioned, without any act of the shipowners or charterers being necessary to cancel it. (Q. B. Div.) Adamson and another v. The Newcastle Steamship Freight Assurance Association ... page 150

2. Demurrage—Arrival in dock—Commencement of running days—Liability of charterer.—Where a charter-party provides for the loading of a vessel in a named dock in a port, and that she shall be loaded and discharged in a given number of running days, or if longer detained be paid demurrage at so much a day; and she proceeds to and enters the dock, but by the dock regulations cannot obtain a berth for some days, the running days commence from the time of entering the dock, and the charterer is responsible for the delay, and must pay demurrage. (Ct. of App.) Davies v. Mc Veagh..... 149

3. Demurrage—Detention—Discharge—Custom of port.—A charter-party in which there are stipulations as to the loading or discharging cargo in a port is always to be construed as made with reference to the custom of that port; therefore words "cargo to be discharged with all despatch according to the custom of the port," do not affect the liability imposed on the charterer by the ordinary clause, "cargo to be taken from alongside at the merchant's risk and expense," as they mean no more than would be implied. "Custom" in such a case means a settled and established practice of the port. (H. of L. from Ct. of App.) Postlethwaite v. Freeland 302

4. Demurrage—Detention—Discharge—Lighters—Limited number—Custom of port—Charterer—Liability of.—Where in an action brought by a shipowner against the charterer for demurrage at the port of discharge, it is proved that from the natural conditions and rules of the port ships must necessarily be discharged into lighters, and that only a limited number of lighters are available, the insufficiency of the number of lighters available to discharge simultaneously all the ships lying off the port when the ship arrives there, cannot, in the absence of any express stipulation as to time of discharge, be considered as an impediment to the due discharge of the ship collateral to or separable from the custom of the port, and the charterer is not liable for demurrage. (H. of L. from Ct. of App.) Postlethwaite v. Freeland..... 302

5. Demurrage—Detention—Discharge—Charterer—Duty of—Reasonable time—Circumstances at port of discharge.—Where the time to be allowed for unloading is not named in a charter-party, the charterer is bound, on the arrival of the ship at the usual place of discharge within the port of discharge, to provide sufficient appliances of the kind ordinarily in use at the port for the purpose of unloading, and it is no answer to a claim for damage for delay in unloading to show that the delay was caused by the crowded state of the port. (Ct. of App. from Q. B. Div.) Wright v. The New Zealand Shipping Company..... 118

6. Demurrage—Detention—Custom of port—Dock—Frost—Loading.—Where it was agreed by charter-party that a ship should load in a certain dock in the customary manner, and the charterer undertook to load as fast as the ship could take on board, and if longer detained to pay demurrage, detention by frost not to be reckoned as lay days, this exception was held not to cover frost which was external to the dock, and which prevented the shipper from getting the goods to the dock, although it appeared that it was customary to bring the goods into the dock by means of lighters. (Ct. of App., reversing Q. B. Div.) Kay v. Field and Co. ..... page 526, 588

7. Demurrage—Detention—Loading—Exception of frost—Charter-party—Construction.—Where it was agreed by charter-party that the plaintiffs' ship should proceed to Cardiff, and there load in the customary manner a cargo of iron, the charter-party containing the following clauses: "Cargo to be supplied as fast as steamer can receive. Time to commence from the vessel being ready to load, and ten days on demurrage at 40*l.* per day. Except in case of hands striking work, or frost, or floods, or any other unavoidable accidents preventing the loading and unloading in which case owners to have the option of employing the steamer in some short voyage trade until receipt of written notice from charterers that they are ready to resume employment without delay to the ship" and the ship arrived at Cardiff, and the loading was commenced, but was afterwards interrupted by frost, it was held that the exception applied to delay occasioned by the excepted causes after the loading was commenced, and was not confined to the commencement of the loading being prevented. (Q. B. Div.) Coverdale, Todd, and Co. v. Grant and Co...... 528

COLLISION.

1. Appeal—Costs—Inevitable accident—Practice.—In future the costs in Admiralty appeals, where a vessel is held not to blame on the ground of inevitable accidents, will follow the event, notwithstanding the former practice of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in certain Admiralty appeals. (Ct. of App. from Adm.) The Condor..... 115

2. Appeal—Costs—Variation of decree—Both ships to blame—Practice.—Where the Court of Appeal varies the decision of the court below by finding both vessels to blame for a collision, there will be no order as to costs, but each party must bear his own costs of the whole litigation. (Ct. of App. from Adm.) The Milanese 318

3. Compulsory pilotage—Exemptions from Pilotage Act 1825 (6 Geo. 4, c. 125)—Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 154) s. 353.—The provisions of the Pilotage Act 1825 (6 Geo. 4, c. 125), as to compulsory pilotage and exemptions therefrom, are preserved by the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 353. (Adm.) The Hankow 97

4. Compulsory pilotage—Exemption—Foreign ships—British ships—Order in Council, Feb. 18th 1854.—The Order in Council of the 18th Feb., 1854, extending the exemptions from compulsory pilotage, applies only to British vessels. (Adm.) The Vesta 515

5. Compulsory pilotage—Differential dues—Harbours and Passing Tolls Act 1861—Foreign ship.—A charge for compulsory pilotage on a foreign ship is not a differential due within the meaning of the Harbours and Passing Tolls Act 1861, and is therefore not abolished by that Act. (Adm.) The Vesta ..... page 515

6. Compulsory pilotage — Foreign ship — River Thames—Passengers—Pilotage is compulsory in the Thames on a foreign ship carrying passengers and trading between London and ports between Boulogne and the Baltic. (Adm.) The Vesta... 515

7. Compulsory pilotage—Passengers—Port of London —Pilotage Act 1825, sect. 59.—A ship belonging to the port of London, and bound to London from Australia with passengers, is obliged to employ a pilot by compulsion of law, under the provisions of sect. 59 of the Pilotage Act 1825 (6 Geo. 4, c. 125), when within the limits of the port of London, by reason of there being at that time "particular provisions" for the appointment of pilots for the rivers Thames and Medway below bridge. The Stettin (Br. & Lush. 199; 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 613; 1 Mar. L. C. O. S. 229) not followed. The Killarney (Lush. 427; 6 L.T. Rep. N. S. 908; 1 Mar. L. C. O. S. 238) approved. (Adm.) The Hankow 97

8. Compulsory pilotage—Port to which ship belongs— Exemption—Pilotage Act 1825.—A vessel within the limits of her own port at a place where, previous to the passing of the Pilotage Act 1825, there were provisions in force for the appointment of pilots, is not exempt from compulsory pilotage. (Adm.) The Hankow 97

9. Compulsory pilotage—"Proceeding to Sea"— Mersey Docks Acts Consolidation Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. xcii.) ss. 138, 139.—When a vessel leaves a dock in the Mersey on her voyage to sea and receives slight injuries to a yard-arm, necessitating repairs, and in consequence is anchored under the directions of the pilot in the river, intending to go to sea on the next day, the pilot remaining in charge, but on the next morning before resuming her voyage, and whilst still at anchor, she gets into collision and does damage to another vessel, she is not "proceeding to sea" within the meaning of the 139th section of the Mersey Docks Act Consolidation Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. xcii.), and the pilot is not in charge by compulsion of law. (Adm.) The Cachapool 502

10. Compulsory pilotage—Rivers Thames and Medway—Trinity House charter—"Particular provisions"— Pilotage Act 1825, s. 59.—The provisions of the Trinity House Charter granted by James II., and of the Acts of Parliament relating to the pilotage of the rivers Thames and Medway, and the approaches thereto, are "particular provisions" relating to the port of London, within the meaning of sect. 59 of the Pilotage Act, so far as that port is contained in the pilotage district. (Adm.) The Hankow 97

11. Compulsory pilotage—Suez Canal—Negligence of pilot.—The employment of a pilot in the Suez Canal, though compulsory, is not of such a nature as to exempt the owners of a ship from liability for damage done to another ship by the negligence or want of skill of such pilot. (Adm and Ct. of App.) The Guy Mannering..... 485, 553

12. Compulsory pilotage—Suez Canal—Duties of pilot—Regulations.—By the regulations of the Suez Canal the pilot is to advise the master of the ship; but the master remains responsible for the navigation of the ship. Such regulations are not ultra vires. (Adm. and Ct. of App.) The Guy Mannering..... 485, 553

13. Contributory negligence—Damages recoverable— Admiralty rule—Practice.—Where a plaintiff by his negligence causes a collision which would not have caused damage except for the negligence of the defendant, he is not disentitled to recover damages altogether, but is by the practice of the Admiralty Division only allowed to recover half the loss he has sustained. (C. A. from Adm.) The Margaret..... page 276, 375

14. Launch—Reasonable notice—Necessary precautions.—Where a launch was about to take place in the river Mersey at high water, and the usual general notice had been given, and the launch was dressed with flags and all usual precautions taken, and in due time before the launch a tug proceeded to a vessel lying at anchor off the place where the launch was about to take place and warned her thereof, and subsequently in sufficient time offered to tow her out of the way; but, owing to the conduct of those on board the vessel at anchor, whose pilot was aware before she anchored that the launch was about to take place, that vessel was still in the way, when the launch, which was delayed as long as it was prudent to do so, took place, and the launch struck the vessel and sank her: it was held that the owners of the launch had taken every possible precaution and were not to blame for the collision, and that the vessel at anchor was alone to blame. (Adm.) The Cachapool 502

15. Launch—Reasonable notice.—Semble, a vessel at anchor in the track of a vessel about to be launched is bound to get out of the way of the launch if she has had warning of the launch in due time and facilities for moving out of the way in time (such as a tug offering and being ready to tow her) are afforded by those in charge of the launch. (Adm.) The Cachapool 502

16. Liability—Foreign ship—Damage on the high seas—General maritime law—Law of the flag.—Collisions between ships when one or both are foreign, on the high seas, are questions communis juris, and liabilities created by them are to be decided by the general maritime law of liability as administered in the court where the cause is tried. (Adm.) The Leon..... 404

17. Liability—Foreign ship—Damage on the high seas—General maritime law—Law of the flag.—A collision took place on the high seas between a British and a Spanish vessel; both vessels sank. The English owners commenced a suit against the Spanish shipowners, who had an office in England. The Spanish shipowners appeared, and pleaded that by Spanish law there was no personal liability. Held, a bad defence, as the liability was governed by general maritime law and not by Spanish law. (Adm.) The Leon ... 404

18. Liability—Ship and shipowner—General maritime law.—By general maritime law the liabilities of the ship and of the owners are identical for damages arising from collision. (Adm.) The Leon..... 404

19. Measure of damages—Loss of goods.—The measure of damages for goods lost in a collision (as held in the United States) is the value of the cargo at the port of shipment, together with the expense of lading it on board, and transporting it to the place of collision, and interest at 6 per cent. per ann.; all beyond is expected earnings or profits; and the loss of them is not a proper measure of damages. (U.S. Circ. Ct. East Dist. of N.Y.) Joseph W. Dyer and others v. The National Steamship Company 26

20. Measure of damages—Market value—Deductions. —Where the value at the port of shipment cannot be ascertained, the measure is the market value at the port of destination, less expenses which would have attended the sale, and less the estimated mercantile profit but plus interest.

(U.S. Circ. Ct. East Dist. of N.Y.) Joseph W. Dyer and others v. The National Steamship Company .....page 26

21. Mistake—Error of Judgment—Imminence of collision—Liability.—Where a ship has, by improper navigation rendered a collision imminent, and executes wrong manœuvres when close to another vessel, such other vessel will not be held guilty of contributory negligence, or in any way to blame for the collision, if the master, under the pressure of circumstances, executes or orders a manœuvre which is not the right one under the circumstances. Ordinary skill and care are all that are expected of persons in charge of vessels, and not ability to see at once the best possible course to pursue under the pressure of extreme peril brought about by the wrongful act of another. (Ct. of App.) The Bywell Castle 207

22. Practice—Actions by ship and cargo—Stay of proceedings—Limitation of liability.—Where owners of cargo have recovered judgment in a collision action brought by them, and the owners of the ship carrying the cargo subsequently bring an action against the same ship to recover damages in respect of the same collision, and the damages in both actions would exceed the value of the defendant's ship at 8*l.* per ton, and the damage in the cargo action alone would not exceed that amount, the court will not stay proceedings in the cargo's action until after judgment in the ship's action, on the ground that without such stay the defendants have to institute a limitation of liability action, which would be unnecessary if the defendants obtained judgment in the ship's action. (Adm.) The Alne Holme (first action) 593

23. Practice — Bail — Counter-claim—Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), s. 34.—Where, in a damage action, the ship proceeded against is not arrested, and the plaintiffs do not require bail to be given, the defendants cannot compel the plaintiffs to give security to answer a counter-claim in the action under the provisions in the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), s. 34, although they voluntarily give bail. (Adm.) The Alne Holme (second action) 591

24. Practice—Bail—Lien — Necessaries — Sale of ship—Proceeds — Payment out of—Priority.—Where, after judgment against a ship in a damage action, in which bail has been given and the ship released, judgment is given against the same ship in a necessaries action in which the ship is sold and the proceeds of the sale of the ship paid into court, the plaintiffs in the damage action cannot be paid out of the proceeds to the prejudice of other claimants still having maritime liens upon the proceeds. (Adm.) The Falk 592

25. Practice—Consequential damage—Registrar and merchants—Admiralty division.—It is not the invariable practice of the Admiralty Division in cases of damage to refer questions of consequential damages to the registrar and merchants. (Adm.) The Maid of Kent 476

26. Practice—Consequential damage—Reference to registrar and merchants—Propriety of.—The court will in each case consider whether the question of consequential damage is one which ought to be decided by the court itself, with the assistance of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House, or one which ought to be referred to the registrar and merchants. (Adm.) The Maid of Kent 476

27. Practice—Consequential damage—Reference—Question of cost and nautical skill—Admiralty Division.—The court will be influenced in coming to its decision by economical considerations, and by the presence of questions requiring for their decision the nautical knowledge of the Elder Brethren. (Adm.) The Maid of Kent .....page 476

28. Practice — Consolidation — Cross causes of damage—Service of writ.—Consolidation of cross causes of damage will not be ordered where service of the writ in the principal action has not been effected. (Adm.) The Helenslea; The Catalonia 594

29. Practice—Consolidation—Irish Admiralty Court—Interest of suitors.—In case of collisions occurring between several ships on the same occasion and at the same time, the court will, in the exercise of its discretion, make such order for consolidation as it considers will meet the justice of the case, and protect the interest of the suitors. (Adm. Ir.) The Vildosala; The Emerald; The Satellite; The Toiler 228

30. Practice— Costs—Cargo owners —Contributory negligence—Both ships to blame—Semble, if the defendant in an action brought by the owner of cargo laden on board another ship, for damages arising from a collision, admits his liability, but pleads contributory negligence on the part of the ship on board which the cargo was laden, and both ships are found to blame, the plaintiffs may be condemned in costs; and where cargo owners suing alone admit contributory negligence on the part of the ship in which their cargo was, and only claim half their damages, and recover them, they will get costs. (Ct. of App.) The City of Manchester 261

31. Practice—Costs—Cargo owners—Both ships to blame—Damages—Judicature Act 1873, sect. 25, sub-sect. 9.—Where an action is brought by owners of cargo laden on board one ship against another ship, for damages sustained by the cargo through collision between the ship in which it is laden and the other ship, and both ships are found to blame for the collision, the plaintiffs will recover half their damages in accordance with the practice of the Court of Admiralty and sect. 25, sub-sect. 9 of The Judicature Act 1873, but no order will, as a rule, be made as to the costs. (Ct. of App. from Adm., overruling The Milan, 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 185, as to costs.) The City of Manchester 106, 261

32. Practice—Costs—Compulsory pilotage.—When defendants rely solely on the defence of compulsory pilotage and are successful, they may not get costs if the court is of opinion that under the circumstances the plaintiffs were justified in bringing the action. (Adm.) The Hankow 97

33. Practice — Costs— Compulsory pilotage— Defence on merits.—Where a defendant in a collision action raises a defence on the merits, and also on the ground of legal exemption from liability by reason of the compulsory employment of a pilot and succeeds in the latter defence alone, he will not recover his costs. (Adm.) The Matthew Cay ... 224

34. Practice—Costs—Inevitable accident—Compulsory pilotage—Judicature Acts. Query, whether in cases of inevitable accident, where the practice of the Admiralty Court as to costs before the Judicature Acts was different from that of the courts of common law, the Admiralty Division will now follow the practice of the courts of common law. In cases of compulsory pilotage the Admiralty Division will adhere to the practice of the High Court of Admiralty prior to the Judicature Acts as to costs. (Adm.) The Matthew Cay 224

35. Practice—Costs—Reference—Both ships to blame Owners of Cargo—Owners of ship—Where an action is brought by owners of ship and owners of cargo laden on board it jointly against another ship for damages arising from collision, and both vessels are found to blame, and as a consequence

no order is made as to the costs of the action, and each ship pays a moiety of the damage of the other, those plaintiffs who are owners of the cargo are entitled to the costs against the defendants of proving their claim in a reference before the Registrar and Merchants. (Ct. of App. from Adm) The Consett ..... page 230

36. Practice—Evidence—Ship's log—Decease of persons making the log.—Entries made in the ship's log by the mate of a vessel relative to a collision, and signed by him and the captain nearly two days after the collision, cannot be used as evidence on behalf of the ship in which they were made after the decease of the persons making and signing them (Adm.) The Henry Coxon 18

37. Practice — Evidence — Depositions—Receiver of wreck—Decease of deponent.—Depositions made before the receiver of wreck by persons on board a ship relative to a collision cannot, even after the decease of the deponents, be used as evidence on behalf of that ship at the trial. (Adm.) The Henry Coxon 18

38. Practice— Indemnity— Third party—Issues—Decree—Judicature Act.—When in a collision cause the defendant claims indemnity from a third party, and such third party appears and defends, the court may find the original defendant solely to blame, notwithstanding he does not plead or appear at the trial, but unless issues are directed between the defendant and the third party the court cannot make a decree deciding questions of liability between them. (Ct. of App., reversing Adm.) The Cartsburn 202

39. Practice— Indemnity — Third party—Trial—Issues—Plaintiff and defendant—Semble: It is competent to the court to order such issue between the defendant and the third party to be tried either at the same time as those between plaintiff and defendant, or after they have been decided. (Ct. of App. The Cartsburn 202

40. Practice—Indemnity—Third Party—Defendant —Position of.—The position of the defendant in the original action is the same whether a third party is cited or not. (Ct. of App.) The Cartsburn... 202

41. Practice—Preliminary Act—Amendment prior to trial—Clerical error.—In a damage action the court will not allow a party to amend a mistake in his preliminary act, prior to trial, although he applies upon affidavit, alleging that the mistake was the result of a clerical error. (Adm.) The Miranda 595

42. Regulations for preventing Collisions 1863.—Infringement—Departure from—Master—Discretion of—To leave to masters of vessels a discretion as to obeying or departing from the sailing rules is dangerous to the public, and they ought not to be required to exercise such discretion, except in cases of extreme necessity. (Priv. C.) The Byfoged Christensen v. The William Frederick 201

43. Regulations for Preventing Collisions 1863—Infringement—Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85), s. 17.—If an infringement of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea may by possibility cause or contribute to a collision, the vessel infringing the regulations will be found to blame under the provisions of sect. 17 of Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85), unless the actual infringement was necessary although justifiable. (Adm.) The Tirzah..... 55

44. Regulations for Preventing Collisions 1863, Art. 10—Fog—Duty of vessel when near fog-bank.—It is the duty of a vessel when in the vicinity of a fog-bank to make the signals prescribed by Art. 10 of the regulations for Preventing Collisions at sea to warn vessels within it of her presence. (Adm., Ct. of App., and H. of L.) The Milanese...page 318, 438

45. Regulations for Preventing Collisions 1879, Art. 12—Fog—Foghorn—Sailing prior to rules coming into force.—The neglect to use a mechanical fog-horn is not excused by the fact that the sailing ship left port before the regulations came into force, if the master at the time of sailing knew that the rules would come into force during the voyage. (Adm.) The Love Bird..... 427

46. Regulations for Preventing Collisions 1879, Art. 12 — Fog— "Necessary departure" — "Possible" contribution to collision—Merchant Shipping Act 1873, s. 17.—The neglect of a steamship to stop and reverse in a fog on hearing a mouth fog-horn ahead of her will render her to blame for a collision with the sailing ship sounding the fog-horn; but the sailing ship is also to blame if she does not use the mechanical fog-horn provided for by the Sailing Rules, Art. 12, as such a fog-horn might possibly have given the steamship earlier warning and the neglect to use it cannot be excused unless circumstances rendered a departure from the rule necessary: Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85), s. 17. (Adm.) The Love Bird 427

47. Regulations for Preventing Collisions 1879, Art. 12—Mechanical fog-horn—Accident to—Necessary departure—Merchant Shipping Act 1873, s. 17,—Where the mechanical fog-horn of a sailing-ship breaks down without any default on the part of those in charge of the ship and a mouth-horn is made use of in its place, the departure from Art. 12 of the regulations is necessary, and the vessel is not to blame under the 17th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85). (Adm.) The Chilian..... 473

48. Regulations for preventing Collisions 1863—Lights—Alteration of place—Infringement.—A vessel moving her lights in bad weather from a place approved by the Board of Trade, and where they complied with the regulations as to visibility, to a place where they were obscured, to a certain extent, by sails, &c., on the ground that in the approved place they would be washed away, found to blame for a collision which might have been occasioned by their non-visibility, on the ground that, though it was justifiable to move them, they should have been moved to such a place, or such steps should have been taken, as to render them properly visible in the new place. (Adm.) The Tirzah 55

49. Regulations for Preventing Collisions 1863—Lights—Infringement—Vessel in tow—Merchant Shipping Act, 1873, sect. 17.—A sailing vessel, and semble, any other vessel, towing another vessel, is responsible for the lights carried by both vessels being in accordance with the regulations, and an infringement by the towed vessel brings the towing vessel within the scope of sect. 17 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873. (Adm.) The Mary Hounsell 101

50. Regulations for Preventing Collisions 1863—Lights— Masthead light— Side Lights—Fog.—When at night a masthead light is seen, but no side lights, it is an indication to an approaching vessel that the lights are those of a steamer, whose side lights are obscured by fog. (Adm. Ct. of App. and H. of L.) The Milanese.....318, 438

51. Regulations for Preventing Collisions 1863, Art. 7—Lights—Mersey Approaches Act—River Mersey —Merchant Shipping Act 1873.—Vessels at anchor in the sea approaches to the river Mersey are required by sect. 1 of 37 & 38 Vict. c. 52, to exhibit a white light at the main or mizen mast in addition to the white light prescribed by the Regulations for Preventing Collisions, Art. 7, and a vessel omitting to exhibit such additional light will, where the omission may have caused or contributed to a collision, be held to blame under sect. 17 of 36 & 37 Vict. c. 85. (Adm.) The Lady Downshire ..... page 25

52. Regulations for Preventing Collisions, 1863—Mersey Approaches Act (37 & 38 Vict. c. 52)—Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85), s. 17.—The Mersey Approaches Act (37 & 38 Vict. c. 52) prescribing regulations to be observed in the Mersey additional to those contained in the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at sea is, though passed subsequently, to be read as a part of those regulations, and a breach of it will be visited by the penalties prescribed by sect. 17 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85.) (Adm.) The Lady Downshire 25

53. Regulations for Preventing Collisions 1879, Art. 11—Light astern—Binnacle Light—Overtaking ship.—The provisions of Art. 11 of the Regulations for preventing Collisions at Sea, that a ship being overtaken by another shall show from her stern a light, are not complied with where the only light astern is the binnacle light in the binnacle. (Adm.) The Breadalbane 505

54. Regulations for Preventing Collisions 1879, Art. 11—Light astern—Overtaking vessel—Apprehension of danger.—A vessel is not bound by Art. 11 of the Regulations to show from her stern a white light or a flare-up light to a vessel overtaking her, unless there is ground for the apprehension of danger from the overtaking vessel. (Adm.) The Reiher 478

55. Regulations for Preventing Collisions 1863—Lights—Pilot vessel—Vessel in tow.—A sailing vessel of any description when in tow is bound to carry at night the two coloured side lights prescribed by Articles 3 and 5. The white masthead light prescribed by Article 8 for sailing pilot vessels is only to be carried by those boats when independent, and not in tow of any other vessel. (Adm.) The Mary Hounsell 101

56. Regulations for Preventing Collisions 1879—Art. 5—Lights—Ship adrift—Inevitable accident—Merchant Shipping Act 1873, s. 17—Necessary departure—Possible contribution.—Where a sailing vessel broke adrift from her anchors in very bad weather, and about one hour and a half afterwards, during a large part of which time she had been bumping over sands, thereby injuring herself so as to be unmanageable, drove into another vessel at anchor, having in the meantime neither put up her side lights nor three red lights: it was held that the collision was an inevitable accident, and that under the circumstances of the case she was not to blame for not carrying her side lights or the three red lights prescribed by Art. 5 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, the circumstances being such as to render a departure from the rule necessary and their absence not possibly contributory to the collision. The action was dismissed without costs. (Adm. Div.) The Buckhurst 484

57. Regulations for Preventing Collisions 1863—Arts. 12 & 18—Sailing Ships—Crossing Ships.—Where one vessel close hauled on the port tack is approaching another on the starboard tack with the wind free, so that the former cannot at any particular time come to a distinct conclusion that the latter is not about to obey Article 12 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions, the former is entitled to keep his course, under Article 18, till the last moment when, luffing is a proper manœuvre. The Commerce (3 W. Rob. 287) discussed. (Priv. Co.) The Byfoged Christensen v. The William Frederick ..... page 201

58. Regulations for Preventing Collisions 1863—Arts. 12, 19, 20—Sailing Ships crossing—Vessel hove to—Vessel close hauled on starboard tack.—Where a vessel hove to with her tiller lashed a-lee, and with the wind on the port side, fore-reaching one and a half knots an hour, is crossing another vessel close-hauled on the starboard tack and a collision occurs, the first vessel is to blame for not keeping out of the way under Art. 12 of the Regulations; but the second is also to blame if she sees, or ought to see, that the first vessel is not taking steps to keep out of the way, and fails to take any steps in her power to avoid the collision. (Adm.) The Rosalie 384

59. Regulations for Preventing Collisions 1879—Arts. 14, 20—Sailing ships—Crossing ship—Overtaking ship.—Semble, that where two ships are on converging courses, with the difference of a point and a half, the one having the other on her quarter four or five points abaft the beam, they are crossing ships, and not within the overtaking rules. (Adm.) The Breadalbane 505

60. Regulations for Preventing Collisions 1879 (Art. 13)—Speed—Fog—Sailing ship.—What is a "moderate speed" for a sailing ship in a fog, in accordance with Art 13 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1879, depends on the place where the ship happens to be, and (semble, per Cotton, L.J.) her handiness, and is not necessarily proportioned to or less than the maximum speed she can make under the circumstances. (Ct. of App.) The Elysia 540

61. Regulations for preventing Collisions 1879 (Art. 13)—Speed—Fog—Sailing ship—Atlantic Ocean.—A speed of about five knots, in the case of a sailing ship, in a fog out in the Atlantic Ocean, is a "moderate speed," and in compliance with this rule, the sailing ship being at the time under all plain sail, and going as fast as she can with the wind on her quarter. (Ct. of App.) The Elysia 540

62. Regulations for Preventing Collisions 1863—Art. 16—Speed—Steamship—Risk of Collision—Merchant Shipping Act 1873, sect. 17.—A steamship approaching another ship, so as to involve risk of collision, and failing to stop and reverse as provided by the Regulations for preventing Collisions at sea, Art. 16, must, if departure from the rule be not shown to be necessary, be held to blame under the Merchant Shipping Act 1875 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85), s. 17, although the neglect to stop and reverse would not have prevented the collision. (H. of L.) The Stoomvaart Maatschappy Nederlands v. The Peninsular and Oriental Company; The Voorwarts. The Khedive 360

63. Right of action—Mere contract—Injuria sine damno.—In cases of collision between ships a mere contact without damage gives no right of action; the cause of action is the damage sustained by one ship through the negligence of those on board another. (C. A. from Adm.) The Margaret...276, 375

64. River Tees—Rules for Navigation of, Art. 22—Speed—Through the water—Over the ground.—In rule 22 of the Rules for the Navigation of the River Tees, providing that "no steamship shall at any time be navigated in any part of the river at a higher rate of speed than a maximum speed of six miles an hour," the speed mentioned is speed through the water, and not over the ground, and a vessel exceeding that speed through the water is to blame if a collision ensues to which such speed contributes. (Adm.) The R. L. Aston..... 509

65. Thames Conservancy Rules, 1872, Arts. 19, 20, 72 —Anchor—Breach of—Negligence—Penalty.—A breach of the Thames Conservancy Rules, such as carrying an anchor in a manner thereby forbidden, which causes damage to others navigating the river, is evidence of negligence on the part of those guilty of the breach, and is not merely an act rendering the guilty party liable to the penalty provided by the rules. (Ct. of App. from Adm.) The Margaret.....page 276, 375

66. Thames Conservancy Rules 1875—Lights—Effect of breach—Onus of proof.—Where there has been a breach of the Thames Conservancy Rules as to lights by a vessel seeking to recover damages for collision with another vessel, the latter vessel cannot be held to blame for doing an act which she probably would not have done if the light had been carried, and it is upon the plaintiffs to show that the absence of the light did not contribute to the collision. (Ct. of App., reversing Adm.) The Condor..... 115

67. Thames Conservancy Rules 1875, Art. 3—Stern lights—Infringement of—Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85), s. 17.—Quære, whether an infringement of the Thames Conservancy Rules 1875 causes the vessel infringing them to be "deemed to be in fault," within the meaning of sect. 17 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85). (Ct. of App. from Adm.) The Condor..... 115

68. Thames Conservancy Rules, 1880, Art. 23—Steamships approaching points—Waiting—Tide.—A steamship navigating the Thames against the tide is always bound to obey Rule 23 of the Thames Conservancy Rules 1880, and on approaching one of the points there named to wait until vessels then approaching it with the tide have passed clear of her. (Ct. of App.) The Libra..... 439

69. Thames Conservancy Rules 1880, Art. 22—Vessels approaching points—Passing Rule—Tide, with and against. — Whether vessels approaching points in the Thames are also to observe Rule 22 and pass port side to port side, depends upon whether the vessel navigating against the tide is close to the shore when waiting for the one approaching with the tide to pass her, or so far out as to allow the latter to pass port side to port side. (Ct. of App,) The Libra..... 439

70. Thames Conservancy Rules 1880, Art. 23—"Passed clear"—Waiting ship.—The expression "passed clear" in Rule 23 of the Thames Conservancy Rules 1880 means "passed clear of the waiting ship." (Ct. of App.) The Libra..... 439

71. Thames Conservancy Rules 1880, Arts. 22 & 23—North side of river—Flood tide—Lights—Starboard side to starboard side.—Semble, where the point to be passed is on the north side of the river, with a flood tide, or on the south side with an ebb tide, if the vessel navigating with the tide has her green light open when ahead of the vessel waiting, the 23rd rule alone applies, and the vessels will pass clear starboard side to starboard side; otherwise both rules 22 and 23 apply. (Court of App.) The Libra..... 439

72. Thames Conservancy Rules 1880, Arts. 14, 23—Steamships rounding points—Stop and reverse—Curvilinear courses.—Steamships rounding a point in the river Thames are not bound to stop or reverse because at one moment they are approaching a vessel coming in the opposite direction where there is no risk of collision if both vessels continue the curvilinear courses they are then on. (Ct. of App.) The Libra..... 439

73. Thames Conservancy Rules 1880. Art. 22.—Steamships meeting—Risk of collision—Regulations for preventing collision.—Whether "two steam-vessels proceeding in opposite directions, the one up and the other down the river Thames, are approaching one another so as to involve risk of collision," within rule 22 of the Thames Conservancy Rules, is in all cases a question of fact for the court, and is not subject to the same interpretation as that given by Art. 15 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea for vessels meeting end on or nearly end on. (Ct. of App.) The Odessa.....page 493

74. Thames Conservancy Rules 1880, Art. 22—Risk of collision—Port side to port side.—When two steam-vessels are proceeding in the Thames in such directions that their respective courses, if continued, will bring them so near each other as to cause a risk of collision, rule 22 of the Thames Conservancy Rules is imperative, and both vessels must so manœuvre as to pass port side to port side. (Ct. of App.) The Odessa..... 493

75. Thames Conservancy Rules, 1880, Art. 22.—Vessels meeting—Lights—Port side to port side—Semble, when two steam-vessels are proceeding one up and the other down the river, and have their green lights only in sight each to each, and bearing one point on each other's starboard bows at a distance of a quarter of a mile they are approaching so as to involve risk of collision, and are both bound to port their helms to pass port side to port side. (Ct. of App.) The Odessa..... 493

76. Thames Conservancy Rules, 1880, Art. 22—Lights —Risk of Collision.—Semble, if each had the other's green light three points on the starboard bow they would not be approaching so as to involve risk of collision. (Ct. of App.) The Odessa 493

77. Tug and Tow—Compulsory pilotage—Liability of tug—Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, s. 338.—Where a tug is employed to tow a ship which is in charge of a pilot by compulsion of law, the exemption from liability given to the owners of the ship for damage arising in consequence of obedience to the pilot's orders by sect. 388 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 does not extend to the owners of the tug for damage done by the tug, whether from acting in obedience to the pilot's orders or in the absence of any orders. The Ticonderoga (Sw. 215) followed. (Adm.) The Mary... 183

78. Tug and tow—Person in charge of tow—Orders—Discretion to tug.—The person in charge of a ship in tow is not bound to direct every movement of the vessel towing, but may allow the towing vessel a discretion as to the way in which other vessels are to be passed. (Adm.) The Sinquasi..... 383

79. Tug and tow—Wrong Manœuvre on part of tug—Compulsory pilotage—Liability.—Where a collision is caused by a tug executing a wrong manœuvre, the fact that the person in charge of the ship was a pilot employed by compulsion of law, and gave no orders does not relieve the owners of the ship in tow from liability. (Adm.) The Sinquasi 383

80. Wreck—Navigable river—Obstruction—Possession and control—Liability of owner—Duty to give warning.—Where a vessel, through the negligence of those in charge of her becomes a wreck and a dangerous obstruction in a navigable river, it is the duty of those originally in charge of her, though not actually in possession at the time, to take steps to warn approaching vessels of her position, and semble, this duty attaches until the wreck is removed or taken possession of by competent authority. (Adm.) The Douglas..... 510

81. Wreck—Obstruction—Liability of owner—Notice to Conservators of Thames.—The D., in consequence of a collision caused by the negligence of those in charge of her, sank in the river Thames. Some hours afterwards the M. N. ran into the wreck, which was not marked in any way. The owners of the D. were held to blame, and not to be excused by reason of the impossibility of any person remaining on board the wreck, or by having given notice of the wreck to the proper authority. GENERAL AVERAGE.

1. Adjusters—Custom of trade—Port of refuge—Expenses—Evidence—Practice.—The defendants who were the owners of cargo in an action against them by the shipowner to recover a general average contribution in respect of expenses caused by the ship putting into a port of refuge, landing, storing, and reshipping the cargo, and leaving the port, alleged a custom of trade that in such a case the expenses incurred in and about warehousing the cargo were apportioned among the owners of the cargo alone, and the expenses of reshipping the cargo, port dues, &c., were borne by the owners of the ship and freight, and produced in support of such custom witnesses who proved that it had been the practice of average adjusters to adjust in accordance with the custom alleged by the defendants. Held, that this was not evidence of a custom of trade. (Q. B. Div.) Svendson v. Wallace and others.....page 550

2. Adjusters — Practice of — Custom of trade—Evidence of.—A long-continued practice of average adjusters who prepare their statements according to the law as laid down by the courts, is no evidence of such a custom or usage of trade as can be impliedly incorporated in a contract between a shipowner and an owner of cargo, and if their practice is to exclude expenses legally chargeable to general average, such practice is not binding as being contrary to law. Q. B. Div.) Svendson v. Wallace and others 550
Attwood v. Sellar 153, 283

3. Adjustment — Place for making—Intermediate port—Termination of voyage—Pro ratâ freight.—An average adjustment cannot be made at a port prior to the port of discharge, unless the original voyage was in fact terminated at such prior port through the occurrence of circumstances beyond the control of the shipowner, and such as rendered the completion of the voyage on the terms originally agreed upon physically impossible, or so clearly unreasonable as to be impossible in a business point of view. (C.P. Div.) Hill v. Wilson 198

4. Adjustment—Security for payment—Duty of shipowner—Lien.—A shipowner having a lien on cargo for general average, not only can require security for payment of the cargo share, but it is his duty to take the neccssary steps for the adjustment of the general average and for securing its payment, and if by his neglect to take such steps anyone of the cargo owners is damnified, such cargo owner can recover his loss against the shipowner. (Q. B. Div.) Crooks and Co. v. Allan and another 216

5. Deck cargo—Jettison—Custom—Charter-party—Liability.—Where a general ship is carrying cargo both above and below deck, and there is no custom to carry goods on deck and the voyage is not a coasting voyage, the owner of the deck cargo that has been necessarily jettisoned in the course of a voyage can have no claim for contribution against the shipowner or the other cargo owners, although the contract between him and the shipowner specifies that the goods are to be carried on deck. (Ct. of App.) Wright v. Marwood and others; Gordon v. Marwood and others 451

6. Fire—Damage to cargo by water—Liability of shipowner.—Shipowners are liable to a claim for general average contribution by the owner of cargo in respect of damage to cargo caused by water being poured down the ship's hold to extinguish fire on board the ship while discharging. (Ct. of App.) The Whitecross Wire and Iron Company Limited v. Savill and others

cargo of coals is shipped to be carried to S., and there delivered on payment of freight, and a fire breaks out spontaneously in the coals, and portions are thrown overboard, and the remainder so wetted and damaged by water poured upon them to extinguish the fire, that they have to be discharged, and sold at a port of refuge, and the freight upon them is wholly lost; the shipowner is entitled to a contribution in general average for the lost freight, and there is no claim on account of the cargo; first because there is no loss on account of it; secondly, because the vice in it is the cause of the sacrifice. (Watkin Williams, J.) Pirie and Co. v. Middle Dock Company ..... page 388

8. Fire—Damage by water—Exemptions in bill of lading—Insurance.—Bills of lading exempting a shipowner from damage by fire or the consequences thereof, or any damage to any goods which is capable of being covered by insurance, does not exempt the shipowner from contributing in general average to damage sustained by goods carried under the bill of lading through water poured on them to extinguish a fire. (Q. B. Div.) Crooks and Co. v. Allan and another; Schmidt v. Royal Mail Steamship Company 216

9. Limitation of liability—Salvage—Wrecks Removals Act 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 16)—Thames Conservancy Acts (20 & 21 Vict. c. cxlvii., s. 86, and 33 & 34 Vict. c. cxlix., s. 27)—Contribution by cargo owners—Lien.—Where a ship carrying cargo is sunk in the Thames in consequence of a collision caused by her own negligence, and her owner limits his liability under the Merchant Shipping Act 1862, s. 54, and the Thames Conservancy raise the ship and cargo under their special Acts and the Wrecks Removal Acts, and deliver them to the shipowner on payment of the expenses of raising, the shipowner has no lien on the cargo for general average or salvage, and no claim against the cargo owner for the cargo's proportion of the cost of raising. (Ct. of App. from Adm.) Prehn v. Baily and others 465

10. Port of refuge, expenses—General average act—Expenses of warehousing and reloading—Pilotage charges—Repairs.—Where a vessel has put into port to repair an injury occasioned by a general average sacrifice, the expenses of warehousing and reloading goods, necessarily unloaded for the purpose of repairing the injury, and expenses incurred for pilotage and other charges on the vessel leaving the port, are the subject of general average. (Ct. of App. from Q. B. Div.) Attwood v. Sellar 153, 283

11. Right to general average—Foundation.—The right to general average is not founded upon contract, or the relations created by contract, but upon a rule of the common law and upon the principle of the ancient maritime law. (Watkin Williams, J.) Pirie & Co. v. Middle Dock Company 388

12. Salvage—Pilot—Contribution of cargo owner.—Where a payment is rightly made to pilot by a shipowner as salvage reward for saving ship and cargo, the shipowner is entitled to recover from the cargo owner general average contribution in respect of such sum. (Ct. of App.) Akerblom v. Price 441

3. Bottomry bond — Freight — Insufficiency—Cargo owners—Perils of sea—Liability of insurers.—Where a bottomry bond has been given on ship, cargo, and freight to discharge the cost of repairs of a ship damaged in collision at sea, and the ship's freight proves insufficient to pay the amount of the bond, and the owner of cargo has to pay the deficiency, he cannot recover the amount so paid under the bond under his policy of insurance, as the loss upon the cargo is not proximately caused by perils of the sea. (H. of L.) Fisher v. Smith... 60

6. Concealment of material facts—Duty of assured——Facts to be disclosed.—In marine insurance it is not sufficient to disclose the facts material to the risks considered in their own nature, but all should be disclosed which would affect the judgment of a rational underwriter governing himself by the principles and calculations on which underwriters in practice act. 7. Concealment of material facts—Fraud—Open policies—Goods to arrive—Declaration at less than true value—Action to set aside policies—Premiums.—Where open policies are effected on goods to arrive, and the assured declare goods after arrival at less than their true value, and effect other policies upon such goods without disclosing the fact that the declaration was for less than the actual value, the underwriters are entitled to have the latter policies set aside on the ground of concealment of material facts, and the assured are not entitled to a return of the premiums paid. (Ct. of App. from Q.B. Div.) Rivaz v. Gerussi and others 377

8. Construction of policy—"Perils of the sea, fire, and all other perils, &c.—Explosion of boiler. Damage to a steamer occasioned by the bursting of a boiler, the plates of which had become too thin to resist the pressure of the steam, through the negligence of those in charge in not regularly inspecting and cleaning the boiler, is covered by a policy of marine insurance against "perils of the sea, fire, and all other perils, &c." (Ct. of App.) The West India and Panama Telegraph Company Limited v. The Home and Colonial Marine Insurance Company Limited.....page 341

9. Constructive total loss—Abandonment—Mutual Marine Insurance Association—Bye-law.—A bye-law of a Mutual Marine Insurance Association providing that, in the event of any ship being stranded or damaged, and not taken into a place of safety, it should be lawful for the directors of the company to use every possible means in their power to procure the safety of the said ship, the owner bearing his proportion of the expense incurred; and that no acts of the company or its agents, under or in pursuance of the power thereby reserved to the company, should be deemed or taken to be an acceptance or recognition of any abandonment of which the assured might have given notice to such company; and that the company, under any circumstances, should only pay for the absolute damage caused by the perils insured against, which in no case was to exceed the sum insured, is no answer to an action by a member for a constructive total loss proved or admitted, the right to recover for such a loss being a right which can only be taken away by express words. (Ct. of App., affirming Lush, J.) Forwood v. The North Wales Mutual Marine Insurance Company 219, 293

10. Constructive total loss—Notice of abandonment—Sale of ship.—Notice of abandonment is a condition precedent to a claim for a constructive total loss, except in the one case where by reason of a justifiable sale of the ship coming to the knowledge of the assured at the same time as the news of the damage, such notice could not possibly be of any benefit to the underwriters. (Ct. of App., reversing C. P. Div.) Kaltenbach v. Mackenzie 15, 39

11. Constructive total loss—Stranding—Sale of ship—Stringent necessity for—Question for jury.—Where a ship is stranded, with her cargo on board, and the master bona fide believing that he is unable to save her, sells her, the question to be tried in an action on a policy for a constructive total loss is (per Coleridge, C.J.) whether the ship was a constructive total loss at the time of sale, so as to render the sale a stringent necessity, and if there is no evidence of this the case should be withdrawn from the jury, but (per Grove, J.) the question is not whether the circumstances justified the sale, but whether the circumstances detailed in the evidence was sufficient to be laid before a jury that the sale was justifiable, and that such a case should not be withdrawn from the jury. (C. P. Div.) Hall v. Jupe 328

12. English policy—French ship—Lex loci.—Where an English policy is made on goods on board a French ship, the policy, in the absence of stipulation to the contrary must be construed by English law. (Q. B. Div.) Greer v. Poole and others ... 300

13. Freight — Loss of—Charter-party—Deductions for sea damage—Underwriter's liability.—Where a charter-party provides for specific freight, and that "if any portion of the cargo be delivered sea-damaged, the freight on such sea-damaged portion to be two-thirds of the above rate," the charterers, under a policy purporting "to cover only the one-third loss of freight in consequence of sea-damage, as per charter-party," can receive from the underwriters the one-third lost under the charter by sea-damage, or the amount insured in respect thereof, the policy sufficiently describing the subject-matter which is such one-third, and the whole freight. (Ct. of App.) Griffiths and others v. Bramley Moore and others..... 66

14. Freight—Loss of—Perils of the sea—Admiralty charter—Discharge by Admiralty.—Where a ship is chartered by the Admiralty Commissioners for three months certain, and thenceforward until notice given, the charter-party containing a clause entitling the charterers on the ship becoming incapable to perform efficiently the service contracted for, to put her out of pay, and before the expiration of three months the ship strikes on a rock, and is thereupon put out of pay and discharged from the service, and the ship is insured for three months on "freight outstanding," the underwriters knowing of the existence of the charter-party, but not knowing its terms, the loss of freight is not a loss by perils of the sea, and the shipowners are not entitled to recover it under the policy. (Ct. of App.) The Inman Steamship Company Limited v. Bischoff and others ..... page 419

15. Inception of risk—"From the loading thereof on board"—Loss of cargo in lighters.—Where shipowners by a policy insurance caused "themselves to be insured, lost or not lost, at and from Libau to Bordeaux, upon freight (valued at interest), of and in the vessel Hawthorn, beginning the adventure upon the said goods or freight from the loading thereof on board the said ship at Libau, and to continue and endure during the said vessel's abode there, and until the said vessel shall have arrived at Bordeaux, and the said goods shall be safely delivered from the said ship," and during the loading at Libau a portion of the cargo, which was in the lighters alongside and about to be transferred to the vessel, was by reason of the perils of the sea wholly lost and the shipowners prevented from earning the freight insured, it was held, upon demurrer, that the shipowners could not recover. (Q.B.Div.) Hopper and another v. Wear Marine Insurance Company 482

16. Insurable interest—Floating policy on goods—Specific appropriation to contract—Passing of property—Interest in profits.—Where A. contracted to sell goods to B. and C., and B. was buying to complete a contract made with C. for the sale of such goods, and this was unknown to A. and C., and all the goods were shipped together by A., without being specifically appropriated to either B. or C., and were lost, it was held that, although after the loss C. paid for the goods and obtained the necessary documents entitling him to their possession if they had existed, there was no such appropriation as gave him an insurable interest. (Q.B. Div.) Stock v. Inglis 596

17. Insurable interest—Floating policy on goods—Appropriation to contract—Passing of property—Interest in profits—There is no insurable interest in a purchaser of goods sold under an executory contract to answer a specific description. until the property in the goods has been transferred to the buyer by an appropriation of the goods to him; and if the goods are lost before such appropriation takes place, the buyer cannot recover for them under an open policy, although after the loss he pays for them and declares them under the policy. (Q.B. Div.) Stock v. Inglis..... 596

18. Measure of insurers' liability—Constructive total loss — Abandonment — Partial loss—Partial repairs—Sale of damaged ship.—Where a vessel insured under a time policy and valued is stranded and got off, and the owners, on the underwriters refusing to accept abandonment, finding that the cost of restoring her to her condition before stranding would exceed her value when repaired, do some slight necessary repairs and sell her for over her estimated value, the measure of the insurers liability is the difference between the value of the vessel when undamaged, and the balance which remains after deducting from the proceeds of the sale the cost of the repairs executed. (Ct of App., from Q. B. Div.) Pitman and another v. The Universal Marine Insurance Company ..... page 444, 544

19. Measure of insurers' liability—Abandonment—Rights of insured — Repairs — Total loss.—The assured is never bound to abandon; he can always repair if he chooses, and refrain from insisting on a total loss. (Q.B. Div. Pitman and another v. The Universal Marine Insurance Company..... 444

20. Measure of insurer's liability—Repairs.—If the assured does repair the ship, bonâ fide and with reasonable discretion, the cost of the repairs is the measure of the loss. (Q. B. Div.) Pitman and another v. The Universal Marine Insurance Company..... 444

21. Measure of underwriter's liability—Repairs—Constructive total loss—Right of assured to repair.—An assured whose ship is damaged, is not bound to claim for a total loss where repair is practicable, but may repair her; and even where her value when repaired is less than the cost of repair, may recover from the assurers their proportion of the reasonable cost of the repairs less one-third new for old, although such proportion exceed the amount the assurers would be liable for if they paid for a total loss. (Ct. of App. and H. of L.) Aitchison v. Lohre 11, 168

22. Open policy—Reinsurance against fire—Usage—Declaration of risks.—The usage that in case of any open marine policy in goods in ships to be declared, such policy attaches to the goods as soon as, and in the order in which they are shipped and in which order the assured is bound to declare them, and that in case of mistake the assured is bound to rectify the declaration, and that such rectification may take place after a loss, extends to a reinsurance effected by insurers with a fire reinsurance company against losses by fire only on coal-laden ships insured by the former, such risk being a contract of fire insurance in respect of a marine risk. (Lopes, J.) Maritime Marine Insurance Company Limited v. Fire Re-Insurance Corporation Limited..... 71

23. Policy—Construction of—Indemnity—Qualifications.—A policy of marine insurance is not a perfect contract of indemnity, but must be taken with certain well-established qualifications, which must be applied even if the assured thereby receives more than a perfect indemnity. (H. of L.) Aitchison and another v. Lohre 168

24. Reinsurance after ship's arrival—Lost or not lost—Concealment—No knowledge. — A voyage policy effected by way of re-insurance on the cargo of a vessel, lost or not lost, which has, unknown to both parties, arrived at the port of destination, and landed her cargo undamaged before the making of the policy, is a good contract of insurance, and the underwriter is entitled to the premium which the assured has agreed to pay. (Ct. of App.) Bradford v. Symondson..... 455

25. Sale of cargo—Authority of master to sell—Agency—Necessity—Duty to carry to destination.—The master of a general ship becomes agent for the sale of the cargo—that is, has an authority to sell, so as to bind the owners of the goods entrusted to him for carriage to their port of destination—only where there is a necessity for that course; and it lies on those who claim title to the cargo as purchasers from the master to prove that he, before selling, used all reasonable efforts to have the goods conveyed to their destination, and that he could not by any means available to him carry the goods, or procure the goods to be carried, to their destination, as merchantable articles, or could not do so without an expenditure clearly exceeding their value after their arrival. (Ct. of App. from M. R.) Atlantic Mutual Insurance Company v. Huth.....page 369

26. Salvage—Geneva award—Compensation under—War risks—Valued policy.—Under a valued policy covering war risks underwriters who have paid for losses sustained by the assured through the destruction of the subject matter insured by the Alabama, are not entitled to recover as salvage from the assured sums paid by the United States Government under the Geneva Award as compensation for loss over and above the amount recovered by the assured. (H. of L., affirming Ct. of App.) Burnand and others v. Rodocanachi, Son, and Co.....400, 576

27. Salvage—Peril insured against—Liability of underwriters.—A claim for salvage is recoverable directly as a loss by the peril insured against, and the underwriters are not liable, in respect thereof beyond the amount insured. (H. of L.) Aitchison and another v. Lohre..... 168

28. Salvage—Sue and labour clauses—Salvors not employed by assured or agents—Liability of underwriters.—Under the sue and labour clause in a policy of insurance, the assured may recover expenses incurred by themselves or their agents for the hire of persons expressly engaged by them to avert loss to the insurers, but cannot recover money paid to salvors giving assistance to the ship to save her from perils of the sea, such salvors not being agents of the assured, and having no contract with the assured, but acquiring a lien on the ship by the law maritime. (Ct. of App., and H. of L.) Aitchison and another v. Lohre..... 11, 168

29. Salvage—Sue and labour clause—Salvors not employed by assured or agents—Liability of underwriters.—A sum paid for salvage services rendered to a ship where there has been no employment of the salvors by the assured or his agents is not recoverable under the sue and labour clause in a policy of marine insurance. (Ct. of App. reversing Lindley J.) Dixon v. Whitworth; Dixon v. Sea Insurance Company 138, 327

30. Seaworthiness—Onus of proof—Presumption—Damage or loss immediately upon leaving port.—Under a plea of unseaworthiness in an action on a policy of insurance, the onus of proof lies upon the defendants throughout, and is never, as a matter of law, shifted to the plaintiffs; but where it is shown by the defendants that the vessel shortly after leaving port is compelled to return disabled, or is totally lost, the shortness of time between the leaving port and the damage or loss may raise a presumption that she was lost or damaged, not by reason of perils insured against, but by reason of unseaworthiness before sailing, which presumption requires to be rebutted by the plaintiff's evidence, and whether such presumption is to prevail or is rebutted, is a question for the jury only. (Ct. of App.) Pickup v. The Thames and Mersey Marine Insurance Company Limited..... 43

31. Valued Policy—Effect of valuation—Collateral purposes. The valuation in a valued policy of insurance, while conclusive as between the parties for all purposes of the contract is not conclusive for other purposes collateral to the contract. (H. of L.) Burnand v. Rodocanachi and others..... 576

MASTER'S WAGES AND DISBURSEMENTS.

1. Practice — Costs — Jurisdiction — Certificate — County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32, Vict. c. 71).—A County Court has no jurisdiction in Admiralty over a claim for a master's disbursements, and hence in an action for master's wages and disbursements in the High Court, a certificate under the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71) is not necessary to entitle a successful plaintiff to his costs, although he recover less than 150*l.*, the limit of the County Court jurisdiction over wages under sect. 3 of the said Act. (Adm.) The Dictator..... 19

2. Pleadings—Claim—Counter-claim — Negligence—Reply—Payment by indemnities—Demurrer.—Where in an action a master claims his wages, and the shipowners counter-claim for loss of the ship by his negligence, a reply that the ship was insured, and that the underwriters are liable to pay the shipowner, and that the defendants can not consequently claim in respect of the loss, is no answer to the counter-claim, and is bad on demurrer. Quære: Would such a reply be good if it alleged that the money had been paid by the underwriters, and that the counter-claim was made without their authority. (Adm. Ir.) The Acacia.....page 226

Possessory lien—Mortgagor—Mortgagee—Priority—Arrest.—A material man into whose hands a vessel has been put for repairs by a mortgagor, left in possession by the mortgagee, has, so long as he retains his possession, a possessory lien for the repairs done, giving him priority over the mortgagee, and such possessory lien is not determined by the arrest of the vessel by warrant of the High Court of Admiralty in a suit by him for equipment and repair. (Adm. Ir.) Hamilton v. Harland and Wolff; The Acacia..... 254

3. Practice—Lien—Irish Admiralty Court.—The powers of material men to enforce their lien differ under the English and Irish Admiralty Court Acts. (Adm. Ir.) Hamilton v. Harland and Wolff; The Acacia..... 254

MORTGAGE.

1. Charter-party—Mortgagor—Charterer's rights—Arrest—Release.—Where the owner of a ship, which is mortgaged, charters her before the mortgagee takes possession, the mortgagee cannot interfere to prevent the execution of the charter-party unless it will materially injure or impair the value of his security, and if the vessel be arrested in an action of mortgage by the mortgagee, the court will release on the application of the charterer, unless such injury is shown by the mortgagee. (Adm.) The Fanchon...page 272

2. Charter-party — Mortgagors—Co-owners—Arrest—Bail—Release.—Where shares in a ship are mortgaged, possession being retained by the mortgagors, and the managing owner, duly appointed by all the co-owners, including the mortgagors, charters the ship for a foreign voyage, and she loads and is about to proceed on the voyage, the mortgagee, even though he takes possession of his shares before the sailing of the ship but after the making of the charter-party, cannot arrest the ship or demand bail in an action brought by him to compel payment of his mortgage debt, provided the performance of the charter-party is not prejudicial to the security; and the court will, upon the application of the co-owners, release a ship so arrested, and will condemn the mortgagee arresting in costs. (Adm.) The Maxima..... 21

3. Interest on mortgage—Payable in advance—Notice—Sale by mortgagee.—Where interest on the mortgage of a ship is payable in advance, and the mortgage provides for six months interest in lieu of notice, and the mortgagee sells and receives the proceeds two days after the six months' interest falls due, he is not entitled to the six months' interest in lieu of notice. 4. Practice—Action by mortgagee—Account—Second mortgagee—Freight—Defendants out of jurisdiction—Service on—Order XI., r. 1.—In an action by a first mortgagee of a ship against a second mortgagee for an account, persons resident abroad and retaining the freight as against a debt due to them from the second mortgagee, may be added as defendants, and served with notice of the writ out of the jurisdiction under Order XI., r. 1, provided the contract under which the freight is due is an English contract. (V.C.B.) McStephen and Co. v. Carnegie..... 215

5. Statute of Limitations—Sale by first mortgagee—Trust, express or constructive—Acknowledgement.—Where a ship is mortgaged in the ordinary form provided under the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and the mortgagee sells under the powers of sale in sect. 71 of that Act, there is no express trust in favour of the mortgagor of the purchase moneys received by the mortgagee, but only a constructive trust of the surplus remaining after paying off the mortgage, and the court will not, after the expiration of six years, allow evidence to be gone into to show the existence of a surplus for the purpose of raising such trust except where there has been such an acknowledgment as will take the case out of the Statute of Limitations. (Ch. Div.) Banner v. Berridge ...page 420

PRACTICE.

1. Appeals—County Courts—Leave to appeal to Court of Appeal.—In cases from County Courts raising important points of law, the court will give leave to appeal to the Court of Appeal, where, on a proper construction of the Acts governing appeals, such leave is necessary. (Adm.) The Rona..............................page 520
2. Appeal—Costs—Both vessels to blame—Motion by way of cross-appeal—Order LVIII., r. 6.—The fact that respondents in an appeal from the Admiralty Division, where both have been held to blame, have given notice under Order LVIII., r. 6, of their intention to ask for a variation of the decree below makes no difference in the practice of dismissing the appeal with costs if the judgment below be confirmed, provided only that such costs as are occasioned by the respondent's notice will be deducted. (Ct. of App. from Adm.) The Lauretta 118
3. Appeal—Costs — Interlocutory order — Order LVIII., r. 15.—An addition made to a decree upon motion, giving directions as to costs as to which the decree itself was silent, is a portion of the decree, and therefore can be examined in an appeal from the decree, and is not an interlocutory order within the meaning of Order LVIII., r. 15. (Ct. of App.) The City of Manchester 261
4. Appeal—Costs—Judicature Act 1873, s. 49.—A question of the principle on which costs are awarded is subject to appeal, notwithstanding sect. 49 of the Judicature Act 1873. (Ct. of App.) The City of Manchester............................ 261
5. Appeal—Indemnity for costs—Salvage—Apportionment.—On appeal against apportionment of salvage reward the owners of the salved vessel were cited, and asked for an indemnity for their costs, which the appellants refused, and gave notice that no relief would be applied for against the owners. The owners were held to be entitled to their costs up to the time of such notice. (P.C.) The Castlewood.............................. 278
6. Appeal—Security for costs—Court of Passage—County Courts Admiralty Jnrisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 21) s. 26.—The appeal from the Court of Passage at Liverpool exercising Admiralty jurisdiction is under the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71, s. 26), and security for costs must be given before the instrument of appeal is lodged. (H. of L., reversing Ct. of App.) Bayley and others v. Chadwick.) 59

2. Commission—Broker—Introduction of purchaser.—Where a shipowner agrees with a broker that if the latter is the means of introducing a purchaser of a ship of the shipowner, the shipowner will pay the broker a commission on the purchase money, the commission is payable when the purchaser is introduced through an agent employed by the broker, and the person introduced purchases as agent for some one else. 4. Apportionment—Master's share—Skilful navigation.—Where 3500*l.* had been awarded for salvage services rendered by a steamship, 2000*l.* was awarded to the owners, and 700*l.* to the master for his skilful navigation in dangerous circumstances. 4. Co-ownership action—Accounts—Settlement of—Date of writ—Practice—Admiralty Court Act 1861, s. 8.—In an action by one co-owner of a ship against the other co-owners under the Admiralty Court Act 1861 for a settlement of accounts between the co-owners, the plaintiff is entitled to a settlement of such accounts only as are or ought to be rendered to the co-owners prior to the date of the writ in the action and cannot recover any sum due upon accounts, which in the due course of the ship's business could not be rendered to the co-owners until after such date. (Adm.) The Eider..... 104

5. Co-ownership action—Accounts—Agent.—When a co-owner acts as a ship's agent (not managing owner) for a coasting steamer at one of her ports of call, he cannot in a co-ownership action for the settlement of ship's account recover amounts due to him as agent. (Adm.) The Eider..... 104

6. Co-ownership action — Half-yearly accounts — Settlement.—Where a ship's accounts are rendered half-yearly, a co-owner is not entitled to recover upon accounts rendered for and at the end of the half-year in which the writ is issued. (Adm.) The Eider 104

7. Co-ownership action—Sale of ship on application of minority—Jurisdiction—Admiralty Court Act 1861, s. 8.—The High Court of Justice (Admiralty Division) has power, under the Admiralty Court Act 1861, s. 3, in a co-ownership action to order the sale of a ship on the application of a minority of owners, and will exercise such power where it appears that a sale is to the interest of the owners, but such power will always be exercised with great caution. (Adm.) The Nelly Schneider..... 54

8. Co-ownership action—Practice—Bail for safe return.—The minority in interest of co-owners are entitled to bail for safe return of the ship as far as the value of their shares extends, if they object to the proposed employment of the ship. (Adm.) The Talca 226

9. Co-ownership action—Practice—Bail for safe return—Managing owner.—It is not a bar to the claim for bail for safe return that the manager or ship's husband who arranged the employment of the ship was appointed with their acquiescence if they give reasonable notice of their objection to the employment of the ship. (Adm.) The Talca 226

SHIP'S HUSBAND.

1. Charter-party — Cancellation — Authority. — A ship's husband, who, with the authority of the ship-owners, has entered into a charter-party under which a commission on freight, primage, and demurrage is payable to the charterers on execution of the charter-party, cannot, by virtue of his office as ship's husband, enter into an agreement with the charterers to cancel the charter-party and pay them a sum of money in lieu of commission, that shall be binding on the ship-owners, without their express authority so to do, notwithstanding that such agreement may be for the benefit of the shipowners. (Ex. Div.) Thomas and another v. Lewis 51

2. Freight—Co-owners—Assignments—Advances—A ship's husband has no implied power as against his co-owners to assign or pledge the entire freight to become due on a charter, although money be owing to him from the co-owners or advances made on the ship's account. (Ct. of App.) Benyon and Co. v. Godden and Son; H. R. Evans, third party .....page 10

3. Freight—Lien—Advances—Assignments—Where a ship's husband has made advances on account of the ship, he has a right or lien or retainer, and not a charge, on the freight in respect of the repayment of those advances, so that, if his appointment of ship's husband ceases before the freight has been earned, an assignee of his interest in the freight is not entitled to it as against the owners. (Ct. of App.) Benyon and Co. v. Godden and Son; H. R. Evans, third party 10

4. Freight — Right to—Co-owners — Mortgagees. — Where a ship's husband, who is also part owner, has mortgaged his shares, he will be deprived of all right to receive his share of freight, either as ship's husband or owner, if the mortgagees before the end of the voyage unite with the co-owners in the appointment of another ship's husband to receive the freight; the action of the mortgagees being a sufficient taking possession or intervention to displace the title of the mortgagor to the freight. STOPPAGE IN TRANSITU.

1. Duration of transit—Actual Delivery—Destination.—Till the goods are actually delivered to the purchaser or his agent the transitus is not at an end, and it makes no difference that the ultimate destination of the goods has not been communicated by the purchaser to the vendor. (Ct. of App. from Bank.) Ex parte Rosevear China Clay Company; Re Cock..... 144

2. Duration of transit—Cargo held for freight—Notice to shipowner—Delivery orders—Sub-sale—Unpaid vendor.—Where the master of a ship has still the character of carrier and retains a lien for freight upon the cargo, the fact of a subsale and handing over of a delivery order for the cargo to the sub-purchaser, and actual receipt by him of part, does not put an end to the transitus, and the unpaid vendor has, upon giving the due notice, the right to stop the purchase money payable and still unpaid by the sub-purchaser, after discharging intermediate equities. (Ct. of App from Bank.) Ex parte Falk; Re Kiell..... 280

3. Duration of transit—Constructive delivery—Agreement between carrier and consignee—Warehouseman.—Where goods are placed in the possession of a carrier to be carried for the vendor to be delivered to the purchaser, the transitus is not at an end so long as the carrier continues to hold the goods as a carrier, and it is not at an end until the carrier, by agreement between himself and the consignee, agrees to hold for the consignee not as a carrier but as his agent. The same principle applies to goods placed in possession of a warehouseman or wharfinger. (Ct. of App.) Ex parte Cooper; Re M'Laren.....page 63

4. Duration of transit—Constructive delivery—Free on board—Ship chartered by purchaser.—Delivery of goods by a vendor on board a ship chartered by the purchaser is only constructive, and not actual, delivery to the purchaser, inasmuch as the contract with the master of the ship to carry the goods does not make him the agent of the purchaser, and so long as the goods remain in the hands of the master of the ship as carrier, the vendor's right of stoppage in transitu continues. TUG AND TOW.

1. Negligence of tug—Contributory negligence of tow—Orders of person in charge of tow.—Where a tug was engaged to tow a ship in charge of a compulsory pilot into harbour, and the tug attempted to tow the ship across a bank instead of round it, and the ship struck and was damaged, and it appeared that although the pilot signalled the tug to alter her course he did not, on seeing the signals disregarded, cast off the tow rope: Held, that as the casting off would have had to be done at the last moment there was no such contributory negligence on the part of the ship as prevented her from recovering from the tug owners, although the nautical assessors considered the pilot's conduct negligent. (H. L.) Spaight v. Tedcastle..... page 406

2. Negligence of tug—Orders as to navigation—Person in charge of tow—Course—Discretion of tug—Semble, the person in charge of the tow may give express orders as to the course, and the tug is bound to obey them, but in the absence of such orders the tug has the general direction of the course, and is bound to tow the vessel in a safe and prudent course. (Ct. of App.) The Robert Dixon..... page 246

3. Specific agreement—Delay—Extra remuneration.—Where a tug contracts to perform a specified towage for a specific sum, and from causes beyond the control of tug or tow, the completion of the contract is delayed, the tug is not entitled to extra remuneration for such delay, provided it was reasonable under the circumstances. (Adm.) The Hjemmett..... 274

4. Thames Conservancy Bye-laws—Construction of Barges.—The towing of eight barges above Albert Bridge by a steam-tug, the first four in a single line, and the last four two abreast, is a breach of the Thames Conservancy Bye-law, No. 4, of July 11, 1877. 5. Warranty—Power of tug—Delay—Master—Agreement.—Where a master mariner agreed with certain owners of barges to take charge thereof, for a voyage across the Atlantic, the owners to provide a specified tug for towing, and the tug, by reason of defects unknown at the time of contracting, prolonged the voyage longer than was anticipated: Held, that there was no implied warranty that the tug should be reasonably efficient for the purposes of the voyage, and the master mariner was not entitled to recover the loss incurred by the prolongation. THE FRANCONIA.

APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (ADMIRALTY.)

Limitation of liability—Steamships—Gross tonnage—Deductions—Crew space—Spar deck—Foreign ships—British measurements—17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, ss. 20, 21, 23, 26, 29, 504, 505; 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, ss. 2, 3, 54, 60, 61; 30 & 31 Vict. c. 124, ss. 1, 9; 35 & 36 Vict. c. 73, s. 3—Order in Council 26th June 1873.

The "gross tonnage without deduction on account of engine-room" on which the limited liability of owners of steamships is calculated is the total capacity of the ship obtained by the rules of measurement given in the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and including the space or spaces occupied by the crew, unless the provisions of sect. 9 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1867 with regard to such spaces are complied with.

Semble, it is immaterial, if the provisions of sect. 6 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1867 are complied with, whether the space in question is in "a break or poop, or any other permanent closed-in space on the upper deck solely appropriated to the berthing of the crew" (sect. 21 (4) Merchant Shipping Act 1854), or is a portion of the space beneath a "spar deck" (sect. 21 (5) Merchant Shipping Act 1854).

Sect. 9 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1867 applies to foreign ships seeking to limit the extent of their liability in an English court.

An order in Council purporting to be made in pursuance of sect. 60 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1862 is valid notwithstanding that it recites that the British rules as to measurement have been adopted. . . . "with the exception of a slight difference in the mode of estimating the allowance of engine-room."

Burrell v. Simpson (Cas. in Court of Ses. (Sc.) ser. 4 vol. p. 177) explained.

THIS was a suit for the limitation of liability by the owners of the German steamship Franconia, which had been found to blame for a collision in the English Channel, which took place between her and the Strathclyde, and in consequence of which the Strathclyde sunk, and several of the passengers and crew on board were drowned. The facts of the collision will be found reported The Franconia (ante, vol. 3, p. 285; L. Rep. 2 P. Div. 8; 35 L. T. Rep. N.S. 360). The collision gave rise to criminal proceedings against the captain of the Franconia which are reported Reg v. Keyn (L. Rep. 2 Ex. Div. 63; 13 Cox C. C. 403), and also to proceedings under Lord Campbell's Act by the representatives of the deceased passengers and crew against the owners of the Franconia, reported Mary Ann Harris, Administratrix of James Sullivan, deceased v. The Hamburg-Amerikanische Packetfahrt-Actien Giesellschaft (L. Rep. 2 C. P. Div. 173), and subsequently to proceedings in rem against the ship by some persons similarly interested, which are reported The Franconia (ante, vol. 3, pp. 415, 435; L. Rep. 2 P. Div. 163; 36 L. T. Rep. N.S. 445, 640).

The Franconia was a spar-decked ship—that is, a ship having a deck above the tonnage deck: and her crew were berthed between the spar deck and the tonnage deck, occupying a space of $154\frac{33}{100}$ tons. The total capacity of the ship according to her German certificate was $3098\frac{45}{100}$ tons, made up as follows: Space under the measurement (tonnage) deck, $228\frac{3}{100}$; space between decks (spar deck and tonnage deck), $848\frac{1}{100}$; round house (above spar deck), $15\frac{99}{100}$ tons; one other erection (above spar deck), $6\frac{12}{100}$—total, $3098\frac{45}{100}$. Then follow as deductions: Berths of crew, which are between decks (spar and tonnage), $154\frac{33}{100}$; engines, boilers, and fixed coal bunkers, $844\frac{8}{100}$. No question arose as to this last deduction; but, deducting $154\frac{33}{100}$ from $3098\frac{45}{100}$ the remainder is $2944\frac{12}{100}$; and of this "remaining tonnage" $154\frac{33}{100}$ is more than $\frac{1}{20}$th by $7\frac{13}{100}$ tons.

The writ in the suit for limitation of liability was issued on 20th Nov. 1877, and a statement of claim delivered by the owners of the Franconia on 23rd Nov. 1877, in which they alleged that all claims for loss of life or personal injury were settled with the various claimants or otherwise disposed of, and praying a decree limiting their liability to 8*l.* per ton on a gross tonnage of $3098\frac{45}{100}$ tons.

The cause was heard on 21st Dec. 1877, and a decree made limiting the liability of the owners of the Franconia to 24,788*l.*, being 8*l.* per ton on the gross tonnage of $3098\frac{45}{100}$. Subsequently the plaintiffs ascertained that a portion of the tonnage included in the $3099\frac{45}{100}$ was space occupied by the crew, below the upper or spar deck of the ship, and on the 26th Feb. 1878 an order was made allowing an amended statement of claim to be delivered to enable the court to decide at a rehearing whether a deduction could or could not be made for such "crew space" in estimating the liability of the vessel for damages. The amended claim stated the gross tonnage of the Franconia without deduction on account of engine room space to be $2944\frac{12}{100}$, and no more. The plaintiffs now moved the court to amend the former decree by inserting the figures 23,553*l.* for the figures 24,788*l.* wherever the same occurred in the former judgment.

The motion was heard on the 14th and 22nd May 1878. The sections of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and of the various Acts amending the same, on which the arguments turned and the judgment was based, are as follows:

The Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104):

Measurement of Tonnage.

Tonnage Deck; Feet, Decimals.

Sect. 20. Throughout the following rules the tonnage deck shall be taken to be the upper deck in ships which have less than three decks, and to be the second deck from below in all other ships; and in carrying such rules into effect all measurements shall be taken in feet and fractions of feet, and all fractions of feet shall be expressed in decimals.

Rule I.—For Ships to be registered and other Ships of which the Hold is clear.

Sect. 21. The tonnage of every ship to be registered, with the exceptions mentioned in the next section, shall previously to her being registered be ascertained by the following rule, hereinafter called Rule I.; and the tonnage of every ship to which such rule can be applied, whether she is about to be registered or not, shall be ascertained by the same rule.

Sub-sects. 1, 2, 3 give the measurements to be taken and calculations made for ascertaining the tonnage beneath the tonnage deck, and sub-sect. 3 concludes as follows:

And the quotient being the tonnage under the tonnage deck shall be deemed to be the register tonnage of the ship, subject to the additions and deductions hereinafter mentioned.

Poop and any other closed in space.

(4.) If there be a break, a poop, or any other permanent closed-in space on the upper deck, available for cargo or stores, or for the berthing or accomodation of passengers or crews, the tonnage of such space shall be ascertained as follows:

Then follow the measurements to be taken, and calculations made, to ascertain the tonnage of any such space or spaces, and the sub-section concludes as follows:

And the quotient shall be deemed to be the tonnage of such space, and shall be added to the tonnage under the tonnage deck, ascertained as aforesaid, subject to the following provisoes: First, that nothing shall be added for a closed-in space solely appropriated to the berthing of the crew, unless such space exceeds one twentieth of the remaining tonnage of the ship, and in case of such excess the excess only shall be added; and, secondly, that nothing shall be added in respect of any building erected for the shelter of deck passengers, and approved by the Board of Trade.

In cases of Two or more Decks.

(5.) If the ship has a third deck, commonly called a spar deck, the tonnage of the space between it and the tonnage deck shall be ascertained as follows:

Then follow the measurements to be taken, &c., as before, and the sub-section concludes:

And the quotient shall be deemed to be the tonnage of such space, and shall be added to the other tonnage of the ship ascertained as aforesaid; and if the ship has more than three decks, the tonnage of each space between decks above the tonnage deck shall be severally ascertained in the manner above described, and shall be added to the tonnage of the ship ascertained as aforesaid.

Rule III.—Allowance for engine room in steamers.

Sect. 23. In every ship propelled by steam or other power requiring engine room, an allowance shall be made for the space occupied by the propelling power, and the amount so allowed shall be deducted from the gross tonnage of the ship ascertained as aforesaid, and the remainder shall be deemed to be the register tonnage of such ship; and such deduction shall be estimated as follows—that is to say:

To be rateable in ordinary Steamers.

(a) As regards ships propelled by paddle wheels in which the tonnage of the space solely occupied by and necessary for the proper working of the boilers and machinery is above 20 per cent. and under 30 per cent. of the gross tonnage of the ship, such deductions shall be thirty-seven one-hundredths of such gross tonnage; and in ships propelled by screws in which the tonnage of such space is above 13 per cent. and under 20 per cent. of such gross tonnage, such deduction shall be thirty-two one-hundredths of such gross tonnage.

(b) Contains provisions for measuring and calculating the engine space in certain exceptional cases.

Tonnage when once ascertained to be ever after deemed the Tonnage.

Sect. 26. Whenever the tonnage of any ship has been ascertained and registered in accordance with the provisions of this act, the same shall thenceforth be deemed to be the tonnage of such ship, and be repeated in every subsequent registry thereof, unless any alteration is made in the form or capacity of such ship, or unless it is discovered that the tonnage of such ship has been erroneously computed; and in either of such cases such ship shall be remeasured, and her tonnage determined and registered according to the rules hereinbefore contained in that behalf.

Sect. 29. The Commissioners of Customs may, with the sanction of the Treasurer, appoint such persons to superintend the survey and admeasurements of ships as they think fit; and may, with the approval of the Board of Trade, make such regulations for that purpose as may be necessary; and also with the like approval make such modifications and alterations as from time to time become necessary in the tonnage rules hereby prescribed, in order to the more accurate and uniform application thereof, and the effectual carrying out of the principle of admeasurement therein adopted.

The Merchant Shipping Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63):

Sect. 2. This Act may be cited as "The Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862," and shall be construed with and as part of "The Merchant Shipping Act 1854," hereinafter termed the Principal Act.

Sect. 3 repeals certain enactments contained in schedule A.; inter alia, sects. 504, 505, Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), which were as follows:

Limitation of Liability.

Measure of Owner's Liability.

Sect. 504. No owner of any sea going ship or share therein shall, in cases where all or any of the following events occur without his actual fault or privity (that is to say),

(1) Where any loss of life or personal injury is caused to any person being carried in such ship;
(2) Where any damages or loss is caused to any goods, merchandise, or other things whatsoever on board any such ship;
(3) Where any loss of life or personal injury is by reason of the improper navigation of such sea-going ship as aforesaid caused to any person carried in any other ship or boat;
(4) Where any loss or damage is by reason of any such improper navigation of such sea-going ship as aforesaid caused to any other ship or boat, or to any goods, merchandise, or other things whatsoever, on board any other ship or boat,

Be answerable in damages to an extent beyond the value of his ship and the freight due or to grow due in respect of such ship during the voyage which at the time of the happening of any such events as aforesaid is in prosecution or contracted for, subject to the following proviso (that is to say), that in no case where any such liability as aforesaid is incurred in respect of loss of life or personal injury to any passenger, shall the value of any such ship and the freight thereof be taken to be less than 15*l.* per registered ton.

Value of Carriage of Goods and Passage Money to be considered as Freight.

Sect. 505. For the purpose of the ninth part of this Act the freight shall be deemed to include the value of the carriage of any goods or merchandise belonging to the owners of the ship, passage money, and also the hire due or to grow due under or by virtue of any contract, except only such hire, in the case of a ship hired for time, as may not begin to be earned until the expiration of six months after such loss or damage.

Sect. 54 (which supplied the place of sects. 504, 505, given above):

LIABILITY OF SHIPOWNERS.

The owners of any ships, whether British or oreign, shall not, in cases where all or any of the following events occur without their actual fault or privity, that is to say:

Then follow sub-sects. (1) to (4) verbatim, the same as those of sect. 504 of the Act of 1854, and the section continues:

Be answerable in damages in respect of loss of life or personal injury, either alone or together, or the loss or damage to ships, boats, goods, merchandise, or other things, to an aggregate amount exceeding 15*l.* for each ton of their ship's tonnage, nor in respect or loss or damage to ship's goods, merchandise, or other things, whether there be in addition loss of life or personal injury or not, to an aggegate amount exceeding 8*l.* for each ton of the ship's tonnage, such tonnage to be the registered tonnage in the case of sailing ships, and in the case of steamships the gross tonnage without deduction on account of the engine room.

In the case of any foreign ship which has been or can be measured according to British law, the tonnage as ascertained by such measurement shall for the purpose of this section be deemed to be the tonnage of such ship.

In the case of any foreign ship which has not been and cannot be measured under British law, the Surveyor-General of Tonnage in the United Kingdom, and the chief measuring officer in any British possession abroad, shall, on receiving from or by the direction of the court hearing the case such evidence concerning the dimensions of the ship as may be found practicable to furnish give a certificate under his hand stating what would in his opinion have been the tonnage of such ship, if she had been duly measured according to British law, and the tonnage so stated in such certificate shall for the purposes of this section be deemed to be the tonnage of such ship.

Sect. 60. Whenever it is made to appear to Her Majesty that the rules concerning the measurement of tonnage of merchant ships for the time being in force under the principal Act have been adopted by the Government of any foreign country, and are in force in that country, it shall be lawful for Her Majesty by an Order in Council to direct that the ships of such foreign country shall be deemed to be of the tonnage denoted in their certificates of registry, or other national papers, and thereupon it shall no longer be necessary for such ships to be re-measured in any port or place in Her Majesty's dominions, but such ship shall be deemed to be of the tonnage denoted in their certificates of registry or other papers, in the same manner, to the same extent, and for the same purposes, in, to, and for which the tonnage denoted in the certificates of registry of British ships is deemed to be the tonnage of such ships.

ORDER IN COUNCIL.

At the Court at Windsor, the 26th day of June 1873, present: The Queen's most excellent Majesty in Council, Whereas by the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, it is enacted:

And then, after reciting sect. 60 of that Act, (ubi sup.) proceeds:

And whereas it has been made to appear to Her Majesty that the rules concerning the measurement of tonnage of merchant ships now in force under the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, have been adopted by the Government of His Majesty the German Emperor, with the exception of a slight difference in the mode of estimating the allowance for engine room, and such rules are now in force in that country, having come into operation on the 1st day of January 1873, Her Majesty is hereby pleased, by and with the advice of her Privy Council, to direct as follows:

(1) As regards sailing ships: That merchant sailing ships of the said German Empire, the measurement whereof, after the first day of January 1873, has been ascertained and denoted in the registers and other national papers of such sailing ships, testified by the date thereof, shall be deemed to be of the tonnage denoted in such registers and other national papers in the same manner and to the same extent and for the same purpose in, to, and for which the tonnage denoted in the certificate of registry of British sailing ships is deemed to be the tonnage of such ships.
(2) As regards steamships: That merchant ships belonging to the said German Empire which are propelled by steam, or any other power requiring engine room, the measurement whereof shall, after the said 1st day of January 1873, have been ascertained and denoted in the registers and other national papers of such steamships, testified by the dates thereof, shall be deemed to be of the tonnage denoted in such registers or other national papers in the same manner and to the same extent and for the same purpose in, to, and for which the tonnage denoted in the certificate of registry of British ships is deemed to be the tonnage of such ships, provided nevertheless that if the owner or master of any such German steamships desires the deduction for engine room in his ships to be estimated under the rules for engine room measurement and deduction applicable to British ships instead of under the German rule, the engine room shall be measured and the deduction calculated according to the British rules.

Merchant Shipping Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 124):

Sect. 1. This Act may be cited as the Merchant Shipping Act 1867, and shall be construed with and as part of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, hereinafter termed the principal Act.

Place appropriated to Seamen to have a certain space for each man, and to be properly constructed and kept clean.

Sect. 9. The following rules shall be observed with respect to accommodation on board British ships. That is to say:

1. Every place in any ship occupied by seamen or apprentices, and appropriated to their use, shall have for every such seaman or apprentice a space of not less than seventy-two cubic feet and of not less than twelve superficial feet, measured on the deck or floor of such place.
2. Every such place shall be such as to make the space aforesaid available for the proper accommodation of the men who are to occupy it, shall be securely constructed, properly lighted and ventilated, properly protected from weather and sea, and as far as practicable properly shut off and protected from effluvium which may be caused by cargo or bilge water.

3. No such place as aforesaid shall be deemed to be such as to authorise a deduction from registered tonnage, under the provisions hereinafter contained unless there is or are in the ship one or more properly constructed privy or privies for the use of the crew, such privy or privies to be of such number and of such construction as may be approved by the surveyor hereinafter mentioned.
4. Every such place shall, whenever the ship is registered or re-registered, be inspected by one of the surveyors appointed by the Board of Trade under part iv. of the principal Act, who shall, if satisfied that the same is in all respects such as is required by this Act, give to the collector of customs a certificate to that effect, and thereupon such space shall be deducted from the registered tonnage.
5. No such deduction from tonnage as aforesaid shall be authorised unless there is permanently cut in a beam or cut in or painted on or over the doorway or hatchway of every such place the number of men which it is constructed to accommodate, with the words "certified to accommodate seamen."

Merchant Shipping Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 73):

Transfer to Board of Trade of duties of Commissioners of Customs with respect to measurement of ships.

Sect. 3. The twenty-third, twenty-seventh, twenty-eight, and twenty-ninth sections of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, the fourteenth section of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1855, and the fourth section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1871, shall be read and construed as if the Board of Trade were therein named instead of the Commissioners of Customs.

May 14, 22, and 28, 1878.—W. G. F. Phillimore and Stubbs for the plaintiffs, owners of the Franconia. — The question as to whether, in estimating the tonnage to which the limitation of liability applies, "crew space" is to be deducted or not in the case of steamers, is one of considerable importance. In this case the "crew space" represents more than 154 tons, or an amount of over 1232*l*. The final clause of sect. 54 of the Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63) shows that the tonnage of the vessel is to be arrived at on the same principles as those which regulate the tonnage of British vessels and therefore, by the principles laid down in sects. 20-23 of the Act of 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104). The Franconia has three decks, and therefore, by sect. 20, her tonnage deck is the second deck from below. Sect. 21 (sub-sects. 1-3) show how to obtain the cubical contents, i.e., the tonnage of the space below the tonnage deck, aad declares that that space shall be deemed to be the registered tonnage of the ship, subject to certain additions and deductions; what those additions and deductions are, in the case of all ships, are given by sect. 21, sub-sects. 4 and 5, and, in addition, for steamers, by sect. 23, Our contention is, first, that "gross tonnage, without deduction for engine room, is the tonnage ascertained by sect. 21 (1) with the proper deductions for crew space. This is shown by sect. 23 (3), which speaks of deductions to be made in the plural, and therefore cannot apply to engine room space alone, but to crew space and engine room space separately. A sailing ship in no case would pay on her crew space, because it is deducted in her register from the amount of her total tonnage, and the remainder is called her registered tonnage. Moreover, the Board of Trade, who now have the functions of the Commissioners of Customs vested in them by sect. 3 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 73), within certain limits can allow such deductions in the measurement (sect. 29 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, 17 & 18 Vict, c. 104), though such deductions must be, as to measurement, in accordance with the system of measurement prescribed by the Act itself: (The City of Dublin Steam Packet Company v. Thompson, 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 247, 412; L. Rep. 1 C. P. 355; 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 849; 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 112.) That it was the intention of the Legislature that crew space should in all cases be deducted is apparent from the provisions contained in sect. 9 of the Act of 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 124); and second, assuming that we are entitled to deduct the crew space at all, the fact that in this vessel the crew are not berthed in permanently closed-in spaces on the upper deck wholly appropriated to their use, but in a portion of the vessel above the tonnage deck but beneath the spar deck, we are still entitled to deduct from our total tonnage the space so occupied. Sect. 23 (4) speaks of a species of erections above the level of the tonnage deck, and says that those erections used for the crew are not to be added in estimating the tonnage of the ship. Sect. 23 (5) speaks of the particular case in which the erections, instead of being isolated, are continuous, but must be read subject to the general provisions of sect. 23 (4). It is true that sect. 9 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 124) applies only to British ships, and that therefore this vessel, the Franconia, is not bound by its provisions, but it is explanatory of the previous regulations so far as crew space is concerned, and shows that the intention of the Legislature was to encourage proper accommodation being given to the crew, by allowing for it whether under a spar deck or in a house on deck. What the tonnage of the vessel is appears from her certificate of register, which states what the crew space is. The court cannot go behind the certificate after it has been adopted by the Order in Council, as is here the case by the Order in Council of June 26, 1873 (ubi sup.) The only difference is as to engine rome space, and this, as no deduction is claimed for it, does not effect this case. The whole object of the system of measurement is to obtain the amount of tonnage on which light, harbour, and other dues are to be paid; the interest of the shipowner is to make this as small as possible, and at the same time to carry as much tonnage for freight as possible, therefore the interests of the crew would suffer by the space allotted to them being reduced so as to make as much as possible of the vessel available for cargo. The Legislature protects the seamen from this tendency by first of all saying in the Act of 1854, that crew space should not be included in the registered tonnage on which dues are payable, and then in the Act of 1862 that in British ships it shall only not be included provided the surveyors are satisfied with its sufficiency. The case has already been decided in accordance with our contention in the Court of Sessions in Scotland, which had to decide on these sections of the Act (Burrell v. Simpson, Cases in Court of Session, series 4, vol. 4, p. 177), and the parties concerned must have been satisfied that the judgment could not be impeached, as, although that case was carried on Appeal to the House of Lords (sub nom. Simpson and others v. Thomson and others, ante, vol. 3, p. 267; 3 App. Cas. 279; 38 L. T. Rep. N. S. 1), on another point there was no appeal from the decision so far as the measurement was concerned.

E. C. Clarkson (with him Butt, Q.C.) for defendants.—There are two questions in the case. First, can any steamer, in estimating the tonnage in which her liability is limited, deduct for the space occupied by the crew? Secondly, supposing that under certain circumstances of build and equipment steamers may make such a deduction, can this steamer do so? The language of sect. 54 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63) is clear and precise. It says that "such tonnage"—that is, the tonnage on which the liability, limited to 8*l.* per ton, is to be calculated—is "to be the registered tonnage in the case of sailing ships, and in the case of steamships the gross tonnage." So far as practice goes, it was, until the decision of the recent case in Scotland of Burrell v. Simpson (ubi sup.), universal that steamers paid on the whole of their gross tonnage in these suits for limitation of liability, both in this court and in the Court of Chancery. The Scotch case does not govern the decisions of this court; but, even if it did, it only goes so far as to say that spaces properly deducted, or rather in respect of which "nothing shall be added"—i.e., spaces mentioned in sect. 21 (4) of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104) and "solely appropriated to the berthing of the crew," &c.; but the crew space here can in no case be deducted—it is a portion of the space below the spar deck, the directions for the measurement of which are given in sect 21 (5) of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), and which that section expressly says "shall be added to the other tonnage of the ship." It is not contrary to natural justice that a steamship should have to pay on her crew space while a sailing vessel has not. The liability of a shipowner, which originally was unlimited, was by sect. 504 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 limited to the value of the ship and freight; that is, it was not a function of the tonnage at all but of the value. Now, in consequence of her valuable machinery, a steamship is far more valuable per ton than a sailing ship of the same size. Therefore, assuming that the average value of a sailing ship is fairly estimated at 8*l.* per ton, the average value of a steamship would fairly be estimated at more than 8*l.* per ton; and it would not have been inequitable if the Legislature, when they repealed that section (sect. 504) and substituted for it sect. 54 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), had said that, whilst sailing vessels should have their liability limited to 8*l.* per ton, steamers should have theirs limited at some higher rate per ton. Instead of adopting that course, the Legislature has arrived at approximately the same result by enacting that steamers shall pay on their gross tonnage and sailing vessels on their registered tonnage only. In sect. 23 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104) the amount of deduction for engine space is given, and this is to "be deducted from the gross tonnage ascertained as aforesaid," that is, by sect. 21, by not adding to the tonnage below the tonnage deck the spaces occupied solely by the crew if above that deck, sect. 21 (4), where such spaces are breaks, poops, or other permanent and separate closed-in spaces, but by adding the whole space under the spar deck if the vessel has a spar deck, s. 21 (5). But even if the crew space were to be deducted for the purposes of measurement on which tonnage dues are to be paid, it does not follow that they are to be deducted for the purpose of measuring the tonnage on which 8*l.* per ton has to be paid in part compensation of a tort; tonnage dues are naturally payable only on a vessel's actually available carrying capacity; liability for a tort should bear a relation to the value of the property, and so whereas sect. 23 of the Act of 1854 speaks of the "gross tonnage ascertained as aforesaid," sect. 54 of the Act of 1862 speaks simply of the "gross tonnage," that is, the whole contents of the ship without any deduction whatever. The forms at present in use by the Board of Trade show at a glance what this "gross tonnage" is, and the par contra the deductions for crew and engine space, leaving as a result the "register tonnage" on which dues are to be paid. As regards this particular ship, at all events, these deductions cannot be made. The Order in Council referred to as showing that the tonnage denoted by the German certificate of registry should be deemed to be the real tonnage of the vessel is altogether ultra vires; it purports to be made in pursuance of sect. 60 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), but the condition required by that section is that the rules of measurement contained in the principal Act should be adopted by the Government of the country to the ships of which the Order in Council is to apply. In this case the preamble of the Order in Council itself speaks of a "slight difference" in the method of measurement, showing, therefore, that the rules of measurement have not been adopted. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The Order in Council goes on to say, "in the mode of estimating the allowance for engine room," that does not mean necessarily that the measurement of the spaces themselves are different.] On the face of the Order in Council it appears that there is a difference, that difference must be in some way a difference in the mode of measurement; but even assuming for the moment that the Order in Council is valid, that cannot avail the plaintiffs here, if in point of fact the measurement is not the same as it would be in all respects if this were a British ship, that is, if considered by the rules of measurement given in the Act "it is discovered that the tonnage of such ships has been erroneously computed." By the very words of the Order in Council such appears to be the case with regard to all German ships, and therefore, by sect. 20 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), the register is not conclusive, but the ship must be "re-measured, according to the rules" contained in sect. 21. The regulations of sect. 9 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 124), certainly so far as British ships are concerned, effect a modification of sect. 21 (5) by allowing to British ships a deduction for crew space wherever situated, but only to such ships as comply with the conditions contained in subsects. 4 and 5. This ship being a foreign vessel, cannot take advantage of these relaxations of sect. 21 (5); or, if it is alleged that the Order in Council brings her within the scope of the section, she has forfeited her right to claim the deduction, for it has never been contended that she has complied with the conditions subject to which they are granted. In any event, the crew space occupying as it does more than one-twentieth of the vessel's capacity, there is a small excess to be added to the tonnage on which the plaintiffs seek to limit their liability. Sect. 21 (4).

Stubbs in reply.—The use of the words in sect. 54 Merchant Shipping Act 1862, "without deduction on account of engine room," shows that the Legislature must have contemplated some other deductions, as in the case of sailing ships, or else it would have been simpler and clearer to have said, "without any deduction whatever." The limitation of liability to 8*l.* per ton is not a question of abstract justice—that was perhaps better satisfied by the old law of satisfaction in solido—but an enactment passed to encourage trade, and it naturally is the tendency of that policy to foster especially the more valuable class of vessels, and therefore it is not surprising that the liability of all alike should be limited to 8*l.* per ton.

Sir R. Phillimore announced that he would take time to consider his judgment.

Clarkson applied that a decree might be made in general terms for the amount due under the Merchant Shipping Acts, so as to enable the necessary advertisements to issue, and the claims to be brought in.

The plaintiffs did not oppose the application.

Sir R. Phillimore.—I shall make a decree in he terms prayed, and give six weeks for the claims to be brought in.

May 28.—Sir R. Phillimore.—In this case the owners of the Franconia having admitted their liability for damage done to the defendants, bring a suit for the limitation of that liability under the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63) sect. 54. They have stated, erroneously as they contend, the tonnage of the Franconia to be 3098 tons; and they now claim to have this error rectified by reducing the tonnage to 2944 tons, the effect of which is to lessen their liability by 154 tons, and a question of some difficulty and novelty is raised, whether for the purpose of estimating the tonnage for which the plaintiffs in this suit are liable, the space solely appropriated to the berthing of the crews is or is not wholly or in part to be deducted. The statute just referred to, after limiting the liability for personal injury to an aggregate amount of 15*l.*, and in the case of damage to goods to an aggregate amount of 8*l.* for each ton of the ship's tonnage, proceeds as follows: "Such tonnage to be registered tonnage in the case of sailing ships, and in the case of steamships the gross tonnage, without deduction on account of engine room. In the case of any foreign ship which has been or can be measured according to British law, the tonnage as ascertained by such measurement shall for the purposes of this section be deemed to be the tonnage of such ship." The Franconia is a steamship. The question is, what is the meaning of the term "gross" applied to the tonnage? In order to ascertain the meaning of this term regard must be had to various sections of the Merchant Shipping Acts. The 20th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104) enacts that, "Throughout the following rules the tonnage deck shall be taken to be the upper deck in ships which have less than three decks, and to be the second deck from below in all other ships."

Now, the Franconia has three decks, and therefore her tonnage deck will be the second deck from below. By the 21st section the tonnage is to be ascertained in a particular way by rule 1, sub-sect. 2; by sub-sect. 3 of this rule the register tonnage is to be ascertained by a computation of areas therein stated. But the tonnage so ascertained is to be subject to the additions and deductions thereinafter mentioned; to these I will presently refer. In sub-sect. 4 it is provided that, "If there be a break, a poop, or any other permanent closed-in space on the upper deck, available for cargo or stores, or for the berthing or accommodation of passengers or crew, the tonnage of such space shall be ascertained" in the manner there mentioned, "and shall be added to the tonnage under the tonnage deck ascertained as aforesaid, subject to the following provisoes: First, that nothing shall be added for a closed-in space solely appropriated to the berthing of the crew, unless such space exceeds one-twentieth of the remaining tonnage of the ship; and, in case of such excess, the excess only shall be added;" and another provision in regard to deck passengers, which does not concern this case. These clauses apply to the register tonnage of all ships. The 23rd section introduces a new provision for steamships, and enacts that, "An allowance shall be made for the space occupied by the propelling power, and the amount so allowed shall be deducted from the gross tonnage of the ship, ascertained as aforesaid," and the remainder shall be deemed to be the register tonnage of such ship;" and then follow rules for estimating the deduction. Gross tonnage is, I think, to be ascertained under the provisions of sect. 21, and one of these provisions, under sub-sect. 4, is to deduct the space solely appropriated to the berthing of the crew, so far as it does not exceed one-twentieth of the remaining tonnage of the ship. Returning, then, to the 54th section of the Act of 1862, which enacts the "tonnage to be the registered tonnage in the case of sailing ships, and in the case of steamships, the gross tonnage without deduction on account of engine room," it is to be observed that the Act of 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), provides, sect. 1, "That it shall be construed with, and as part of, the Act of 1854." The contention that according to this language the tonnage of the steamer is to be taken without deduction either for engine room or for berthage is, I think, erroneous, because the words "gross tonnage," as there stated, ought to have the same construction put upon them as clearly must be put upon them when used in sect. 23 of the Act of 1854.

I agree with the opinion expressed by the Lords of Session in the recent case (1876) of Burrell Simpson and Co. (Cases in Court of Session, Series 4, vol. 4, p. 177). The Lord President says (p. 184): "What is meant here, I apprehend, by gross tonnage, without deduction of engine room, means just the actual tonnage without deduction of engine room, or, in other words, the contrast between a sailing ship in this clause and a steamship is this, that in the case of a sailing ship the registered tonnage is to be taken — in the case of a steamship it is not to be the registered tonnage, but what is called the gross tonnage, without the deduction of engine room, which, if deducted, should make it the registered tonnage; in short, it is the want of the deduction of engine room that makes this gross tonnage instead of being registered tonnage."

It has been contended that, admitting the law to be as I have stated it in this case, inasmuch as the Franconia is a spar-decked ship, there is no closed-in place solely appropriated to the berthing of the crew according to the true meaning of the words in sub-sect. 4, sect. 21 of the Act of 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104); but I am unable to adopt this opinion, having regard to all the provisions in the 20th, 21st, and 23rd sections. I think that the deduction from the tonnage in cases of closed-in spaces are applicable to the berthing space provided in a spar-decked ship.

Lastly, with regard to the argument respecting the certificate of registry of this German vessel, the 60th section of the Act of 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63) provides that the Queen may by Order in Council direct that when the English rules for the measurement of tonnage of merchant ships have been adopted by a foreign government, "the ships of such foreign country shall be deemed to be of the tonnage denoted in their certificates of registry" to all intents and purposes as if they were British ships. These measurement rules were extended to Germany by an Order in Council dated the 26th June 1873. It has been contended that the Order in Council referred to is on the face of it invalid, inasmuch as it contains the words "with the exception of a slight difference in the mode of estimating the allowance for engine room," thereby exceeding the authority conferred upon it by the statute. I am not inclined to put so rigid a construction upon the Order in Council, which in all substantial respects complies with the directions of the statute. Upon the whole I am of opinion that the plaintiffs are entititled to the reduction of the tonnage measurement for which they pray.

It only remains to observe that it was admitted that there would be a balance of about seven tons in favour of the defendants under the provisions of sub-sect. 4 of rule 1.

From this decision the owners of the Strathclyde appealed.

In addition to the sections above set out the following was referred to on the hearing of the appeal:

25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, sect. 61 (Merchant Shipping Act 1862):

Whenever an Order in Council has been issued under this Act, applying any provision of this Act, or any regulation made by or in pursuance of the Act to the ships of any foreign country, such ships shall in all cases arising in any British court be deemed to be subject to such provision or regulation, and shall for the purpose of such provision or regulation be treated as if they were British ships.

July 19, 1878.—Butt, Q.C. and F. W. Raikes (with them E. C. Clarkson), for the appellants, the owners of the Strathclyde.

Benjamin, Q.C., Dr. W. G. F. Phillimore, and Stubbs for respondents, owners of the Franconia.

The arguments used were substantially the same as those reported in the court below.

James, L.J.—I am of opinion that the judgment of the learned judge of the court below cannot be sustained.

First of all, with regard to the case Burrell v. Simpson (Cas. in Court of Ses., ser. 4, vol. 4, p. 177), which has been cited to us as decided by the Scotch Court—a court of co-ordinate jurisdiction—on the Act of Parliament in question, which Act applies to all parts of the United Kingdom, that case was also cited to the court below, and upon it, apparently, the learned judge proceeded. When that case, however, is considered it is really no authority because the point which has been raised in this case, as to the difference between a crew space between decks and one above the upper deck was never before the court at all. It was no matter of argument before them and was not referred to in any way in their judgment; and I should rather gather myself, from the absence of all reference to it, and from the nature of the ship, that in point of fact the crew space there was a crew space which was within, clearly within, the section of the original Act (sect. 21 (4), 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, the Merchant Shipping Act 1854), and that the only point really in dispute as to the tonnage was, whether in a steamship the gross tonnage was to be taken, with or without the deduction for crew space in any event; that is, was it to be the total capacity of the ship, or the register tonnage with the addition of the amount of the deduction on account of engine-room. That seemed to me to be the only point there—that the gross tonnage on a steamer, whatever it is, would have been the same thing as the entire tonnage for registration had she been a sailing ship; that there was in reality no question before the court as to the construction of the Act of Parliament.

I have not heard anything in answer to the argument of Mr. Butt, who pointed out that there was a very distinct provision in the Act of Parliament providing for the deduction of crew space only under circumstances where the crew were lodged on the upper deck; the closed-in spaces in that case would be measured, but those of them which were solely appropriated to the convenience of the crew would not be included for the purposes of tonnage. The terms of the Act apply to that case first, and the whole measurement between docks below, it is quite clear, is to be taken without any deduction whatever, and therefore I myself have no doubt that upon the construction of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 no deduction ought to be made for the berths of the crew when below the upper or spar deck.

There is a subsequent Act (30 & 31 Vict. c. 124, the Merchant Shipping Act 1867), which makes provision (sect. 9) for the better security and health of English seamen, and it contains very detailed provisions for requiring certain things to be done—certain measurements are to be made, certain inscriptions are to be put on the doors, a certain quantity of air is to be secured to each seaman, and so on; and it further requires that when the ship is measured the spaces should be certified, and when that was done, and all the provisions complied with, the allowance should be made for such spaces, but the allowance is to be made expressly subject to all those conditions. It is not pretended that those conditions have been or could have been complied with by the respondents' ship in this case. It does not appear that the ship ever was examined by a surveyor. It is proved that she had not got the announcement required to be cut or painted on the beam or doorway that the space was certified to accommodate so many seamen. The provisions of the Act, in short, were not complied with, and the ship is therefore not brought within the Act. That being so, the court below allowed the deduction given by the Act.

Mr. Benjamin contends that, if an English certificate had shown that no deduction had been made, if the English register had shown so much gross tonnage, and so much to be deducted for the berths of the crews, that such a register would be conclusive evidence that all the provisions of the Act of Parliament had been complied with, and that it would not be competent to the court to rectify or go behind the register on the most conclusive evidence, that there had been a mistake somewhere, or some error committed by some of the parties, and that by the effect of the Order in Council the German register is put on the same footing as an English one. I cannot agree with that argument at all. There is a direction given which no doubt primâ facie makes provision for foreign ships similar to those for British ships, but all it authorises the Queen in Council to do, and all the Queen in Council has done—as was well put by Mr. Benjamin in the early part of his argument—is to authorise all her officers to accept the actual measurements, things ascertained by manual measurement made by the Germans, exactly the same as if they had been made in England. All we have got before us then is, that the gross tonnage is so much, that the space actually occupied by the crew is so much, that the actual measurement of the space occupied by the engines, boilers, and coal bunkers is so much—that is to say, that the actual measurements of the above-mentioned spaces as given in the German register are to be taken as the true measurements. But the legal results to be drawn from those measurements, that is the legal deduction from them, is a matter not within the function of the Queen in Council to declare. We have before us the statement that these are the actual measurements. We take it to be true. We take the German certificate to be perfectly accurate. On that finding the Queen in Council has directed us to consider that the actual crew space is $154\frac{33}{100}$ tons. That fact being so ascertained, is the space to be deducted, or is it not? And is the question of English law to be determined by the interpretation put by an English court of justice on an Act of Parliament, or to be determined for us by an Order in Council recognising, or giving a sort of recognition, to a German certificate? I think the contention that we are governed by the latter fails, and that we are bound by the Act of Parliament to hold that the berths between decks are not to be deducted for the purposes of this suit.

Brett, L.J.—I cannot agree with the judgment of the learned judge of the Admiralty Court.

I agree with him on one point, which is that the Order in Council here is not ultra vires. I cannot adopt the argument of Mr. Butt upon that, and I think that it is not ultra vires, for the same reason as that given by the learned judge of the Admiralty Court, namely, that the Order in Council is substantially in accordance with the statute.

That Order in Council is to have a certain effect. It is to have the effect which is stated in sects. 60 and 61 of the Act of 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63). From sect. 60 it results that the certificates of registry of a German ship are to be accepted in our courts, and the German ship shall thereupon "be deemed to be of the tonnage denoted in their certificates of registry or other papers, in the same manner, to the same extent, and for the same purposes, in, to, and for which the tonnage denoted in the certificates of registry of British ships is deemed to be the tonnage of such ships." Mr. Benjamin argued that, if this were a British register, it would be conclusive. I cannot agree to that. I know of no law which says the register is to be conclusive for all purposes. I apprehend that you are entitled to look behind the register and see whether the provisions of the Act of Parliament on which and in virtue of which the register was made, were complied with. Therefore I think that a German certificate is no more conclusive than a German register would be. We are only to consider and determine the tonnage in the same manner and to the same extent as if the register was a British one. That entitles us to see whether the register was made in accordance with the Act of Parliament authorising it to be made. The question then is whether the register is made according to the provisions of the Act of Parliament, or in other words whether, if this had been a British ship, the register complied with the Act of Parliament.

Now, it is said, first that the berths of the crew ought to be deducted, that is what is called the crew space, by virtue of the statute of 1854 (Merchant Shipping Act 1854, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104). It seems to me that the crew space in the case cannot be deducted under that Act. I agree that the sect. 21 applies to the measurement both of steam-vessels and sailing ships, and that therefore, where there is a crew space brought within sect. 21, that it is to be deducted before you show what the gross tonnage of the ship is. I take it that sect. 23 gives to a steam-vessel the deduction for engine-room space in addition to the deductions of sect. 21, and that therefore to arrive at the register tonnage of a steam-vessel both these deductions should be made. The question then is whether, to arrive at the gross tonnage, the crew space should be deducted. I think that cannot be done under sect. 21 of the Act of 1854, for the simple reason that the crew space is not on the upper deck.

It is argued that the Scotch case (Burrell v. Simpson, Cases in Court of Session, ser. 4, vol. 4, p. 177) decides that it does not signify under the Act of 1854 whether it is on the upper deck or between decks. As I understand the treatment of a Scotch decision by a court of this country, it should be treated with the greatest respect, but it is not a binding authority; and even supposing it to have decided the point in question, if we differed from it we should be entitled to decide differently from a Scotch court. But I cannot think that the Scotch court did decide the point; at all events it is not shown that it did. If in the case before the Scotch court the space was on the upper deck, it does not touch this case at all; certainly the point was never discussed. As it seems to me the point there was, whether, in the case of a steam-vessel, you should or should not deduct crew space, even on the upper deck; and on that question I should entirely agree with the Scotch court, and say you might.

But since the crew space here is not on the upper deck, it cannot, in my opinion, be deducted from the total tonnage of this vessel to arrive at the gross tonnage under the provisions of the Act of 1854. Can it then be deducted under the provisions of the Act of 1867? It is argued that it is inequitable that the space could under the circumstances be deducted if this were a British ship, and that it cannot be deducted because this is a German vessel. The answer appears to be, that under the circumstances you could not have deducted it even if this had been a British ship, because it is allowed upon the facts of the case that it is not brought within the Act of 1867. There was no survey of the space. I care not about the cutting on the beam. But there is a more material matter behind, viz, that it is not shown to have been surveyed by the officer to whom the Legislature has intrusted this duty; that is to say, a surveyor of the Board of Trade. The British Legislature has not thought fit to intrust any surveyor with the power of giving these certificates, but only an authorised surveyor of the Board of Trade; and therefore, failing that certificate, the space is not brought within the Act of 1867.

It is argued that we may apply to this ship the rule in the Act of 1867, without her compliance with the provisions of that Act, because she is a foreign vessel. It seems to me that if we did so we should be legislating. If the Legislature, in passing the Act of 1867, overlooked the case of foreign ships we cannot help it. Those who think it has been overlooked by inadvertence and not intentionally, must go to the Legislature and get the Act of Parliament altered. We have only to construe the Act as it stands. This case is not brought within it, therefore this space cannot be deducted under it; and therefore we are driven to conclude that the tonnage on which the ship's limited liability is to be calculated—the gross tonnage without deduction on account of engine room—is the gross tonnage arrived at without deduction of engine room, and also without deduction on account of crew's space.

COTTON, L.J.—The question which we have to decide is this: Under the Merchant Shipping Act 1862, s. 54, what is to be considered the gross tonnage without any deduction on account of engine room? There is no difficulty with regard to the engine-room space. For that we are thrown back on the Act of 1854, of which sect. 23 for the first time mentions steamships, and provides for deduction being made in the tonnage, which of course is inapplicable to sailing vessels without propelling power. That does not decide whether the crew space is or is not to be deducted in steam-vessels, and I think the question may fairly be put, Does the previous section (sect. 21) allow for any ship a deduction for crew space except where the crew space is in some erection on the upper deck? In my opinion it does not. There are two sub-divisions of sect. 21 dealing with the point; sub-sect. 4 deals with the case of there being a poop or other closed-in space on the upper deck without reference to the question whether that deck is or is not a spar deck. It does not refer to the case of a closed-in space above the tonnage deck, but only to the case of a closed-in space above the upper deck, whatever that may be; and, after providing for the measurement of it, further provides that no addition is to be made for any such space solely appropriated to the berthing of the crew; that is, any house or erection on the upper deck separated and set apart for the crew; but the whole sub-section, in my opinion, only applies to cases where such a provision is made for the berthing of the crew. Then when you come to sub-sect. 5, which deals with the case we have now before us—that of spar-decked ships—there is no exception as to space set apart below it for the crew any more than when the crew are berthed below the tonnage deck.

A case was referred to as decided by the Court of Session; and of course we should regard the opinion expressed by a judge of that court with the highest respect; but the point is whether the crew space there was under the spar deck or on the upper deck, and until that is shown we cannot in any way consider the judges as expressing any opinion on the point which arises here. They were expressing their opinions on the words "gross tonnage" in sect. 23 of the Act of 1854, and sect. 54 of the Act of 1862.

We then come to the question whether or no, under the Order in Council referring to German ships and the Act of 1862 as to the certificates of foreign ships, these certificates are to be conclusive. I say they come in now, because the other question turned upon the Act of 1854. Without the Act of 1867 the Franconia could rely upon the certificate as being conclusive that if crew space should be deducted when under the spar deck in British ships, then that her crew space should be deducted, as it appeared on the face of the register certificate that the crew space was between decks. And of course that depends on the construction of an Act of Parliament, not upon the registered certificate of a German ship, assuming it to be put in the same position as a British ship, as to whether or no the crew space can properly be deducted. But, in my opinion, the true effect of the Act of 1862 and the Order in Council is this, that the measurement to be taken is sufficient when Her Majesty is satisfied that the principles of measurement in this country are adopted, and that the principles of measurement shall be defined when any question arises as to them in this country, but not that, when according to the true construction of the Act of Parliament, a certain deduction ought not to be made, and a foreign certificate treats it as a deduction which ought to be made. That certificate is to be binding upon the courts in this country when they have to decide the question.

It must not be supposed that I leave out of consideration whether or not the Franconia was entitled to the deduction allowed under certain circumstances by the Act of 1867. I need not go through that Act. It is perfectly true that the deductions to be allowed under that Act are subject to several stipulations and conditions. It may or may not be an oversight, that having regard to those conditions a foreigner cannot, except under very special circumstances, get the benefit of the Act of 1867; but a foreign ship coming here to get the benefit of the limitation of liability afforded by a British Act of Parliament, if it gets that benefit must of course take it with all its burdens, and one of these burdens is, that the crew space is to be reckoned if it is between decks, unless certain things are done as required by the Act of 1867. Those things have not been done in the present case, and we are unable to see that the Franconia is entitled, under the Act of 1867, to deduct crew space when she has not complied with the requirements of the Act, has not got the necessary certificates of survey and the proper words put up to show that proper accommodation has been provided for the crew.

James, L.J.—The appeal will be allowed with costs. I should add, that we are unanimously of opinion that there is no foundation for the proposition that the Order in Council is ultra vires.

Shipping — Mortgage — Assignment of freight — Charter-party — Ship's husband.

A ship's husband has no implied power as against his co-owners to assign or pledge the entire freight to become due on a charter, although money be owing to him from the co-owners for advances made on the ship's account.

Where a ship's husband has made advances on account of the ship, he has a right of lien or retainer, and not a charge, on the freight in respect of the repayment of those advances, so that, if his appointment of ship's husband ceases before the freight has been earned, an assignee of his interest in the freight is not entitled to it as against the owners.

Where a ship's husband, who is also part owner, has mortgaged his shares, he will be deprived of all right to receive his share of freight, either as ship's husband or owner, if the mortgagees before the end of the voyage unite with the co-owners in the appointment of another ship's husband to receive the freight; the action of the mortgagees being a sufficient taking possession or intervention to displace the title of the mortgagor to the freight.

R., being part owner of a ship, mortgaged his shares in her. Subsequently, in Aug. 1876, he was acting as ship's husband and obtained a loan of 200*l. from plaintiffs. The ship had been chartered by defendants, and by a letter of the* 30*th Aug. B. requested them to pay to plaintiffs the freight due on the charter. On the* 20*th Sept. R.'s co-owners and the mortgagees of his shares appointed E. ship's husband in R.'s place. Upon the* 11*th Oct. the ship completed her voyage, and upon the* 14*th began to discharge her cargo. Upon the* 16*th defendants sent plaintiffs a cheque for* 200*l., of which, having received notice that E. claimed the amount of the freight, they afterwards stopped payment.*

Held (affirming the decision of Huddleston, B.), that plaintiffs were not entitled to recover the amount of the cheque from defendants, as the mortgagees of R.'s shares in the ship, by appointing with the co-owners a ship's husband in place of R., had effectually interfered so as to entitle themselves to R.'s share of the freight as against him and the plaintiffs, his assignees.

Appeal from a decision of Huddleston, B., giving judgment for the defendants, at the trial before him without a jury.

The action was to recover the amount of a cheque for 200*l.* given by the defendants to the plaintiffs.

The proceedings at the trial, the facts and the arguments in the Court of Appeal, sufficiently appear in the judgment of the court (post).

Cur. adv. vult.

May 18.—Bramwell, L.J. delivered the following judgment of the Court:—This is an action to recover the amount of a cheque given by the defendants Godden and Son to the plaintiffs. The judgment has been for the defendants, and against this the plaintiffs have appealed. The following are the transactions which gave rise to the plaintiffs' claim.

In Aug. 1876 T. R. Rees was part owner of a vessel, the Eliza, and he was also acting as a ship's husband. In August he was in want of money, but even assuming, as alleged by the plaintiffs, that he required it for the purposes of ships of which the ownership was the same as that of the Eliza, he did not require it for the purpose of earning the freight to be earned by the voyage on which the Eliza was then engaged. He applied to the plaintiffs for a loan, and it appears on the evidence of the plaintiff Thomas Beynon, that before he made any advance Rees stated to him that the ship was in debt to him, Rees, to the extent of 280*l.* The defendants had chartered the ship for the voyage in which she was at the time employed; and on the 30th Aug. 1876 the plaintiffs advanced to Rees 200*l.*, and he thereupon signed and gave to the plaintiffs a letter addressed to the defendants, which was dated the 30th Aug. 1876, and was as follows:

"Newport, Mon., Aug. 30, 1876.

"Messrs. William Godden and Son, London.

"Gentlemen, — I hereby give authority, and request that you will pay to Messrs. S. Beynon and Co., of Newport, Mon., the freight on charter of my vessel the Eliza, dated Aug. 2, 1876, bound from Little Curacoa (W.I.) to U. K. or continent, in consideration of value received from them."

On the 6th Sept. this letter was communicated to the defendants Godden and Son, and this letter constitutes a good equitable assignment to the plaintiffs of the freight payable by the defendants, if and so far as Rees was able to assign this freight. The Eliza on the 11th Oct. arrived at Hamburgh, and completed the voyage for which she was chartered by the defendants, and on the 14th began to unload her cargo. At the time when Rees gave the equitable assignment of the 30th Aug. his share of the Eliza was in mortgage, and on the 20th Sept. the mortgagees of his share and the owners of the other shares, appointed Henry Russell Evans ship's husband in the place of Rees. There was some question whether this appointment was proved at the trial of the action, but, on the whole, we think that, if not proved, it was assumed to be the fact that Russell Evans had been so appointed. The Eliza began to discharge her cargo on the 14th Oct., and on the 16th of that month the defendants, who had previously had some communication with Moyle, their agent at Harburgh, where the vessel was unloading, on the subject of making a payment to the plaintiffs, gave to them a cheque for 200*l*. On the same 16th Oct. Evans sent a telegram to Harburgh, by which he claimed, as registered managing owner of the Eliza, to be entitled to the freight, and thereupon Moyle telegraphed to the defendants, who stopped payment of the cheque given to the plaintiffs, and the action is brought to recover the amount with interest. The defendants after the commencement of the action insisted that Russell Evans should be made a party to the action, on the ground that they, if liable to the plaintiffs, were entitled to relief over as against him.

The action was tried at Gloucester, before Baron Huddleston, without a jury. He decided in favour of the defendants, but he ordered them to pay the costs of Evans, and also gave the plaintiffs against the defendants any costs which they had incurred in consequence of Evans having been summoned as a third party. The plaintiffs have appealed, and ask that judgment may be given for them, or that a new trial may be directed; and the defendants have also appealed against the direction that they should pay the costs incurred by summoning Evans as a third party.

The right of the plaintiffs must depend on the question whether, at the time when the cheque was given, they were entitled to receive the freight of the Eliza, either absolutely or to the extent of 200*l*.

Under the charter-party one-third of the freight was payable on arrival at the port of discharge, and it was argued on behalf of the plaintiffs, that Messrs. Matthieson and Co., of Harburgh, had, by their directions, and on their account, paid sums of money exceeding 200*l*. for the expenses of the ship there, and that consequently the plaintiffs were entitled, to the extent of these payments, to receive a portion of the freight payable at Harburgh. But it appears that these payments were made on account of the defendants as charterers, and were repaid by them to Messrs. Matthieson.

Had, then, Rees power to assign the freight of the Eliza? At the time of obtaining the advance from the plaintiffs he was ship's husband; but as such, in our opinion he had no power as against his co-owners to assign or pledge the entire freight. Apparently the plaintiff made the advance to him on his representation that the money was owing to him as ship's husband by his co-owners; and if this was the fact, and he as ship's husband had received the freight, the co-owners must have allowed him in account the sums due to him before they could have claimed their shares of the freight, and he could have assigned to the plaintiffs this his interest therein. But this interest is a right of lien or retainer, and not in the nature of a charge on the freight; and as he was removed from being ship's husband by the act of the mortgagees and of the co-owners before he was in a position to receive any part of the freight, the plaintiffs cannot, even if there were a balance due to Rees, claim by virtue of his assignment to receive the freight. An attempt was made to show that the co-owners of the Eliza had given Rees at least implied authority to borrow money on security of the freight; but, in our opinion, the evidence does not support this contention.

The result, in our opinion, is that Rees had no power to assign the entire freight. But the question still remains whether Rees could assign his own share of the net freight, that is, of the freight remaining after paying all expenses connected with the voyage. At the trial there was no evidence that there was such a balance; but we might receive evidence now or direct an inquiry for the purpose of ascertaining whether there was any such balance of freight; but, in our opinion, the plaintiffs cannot under the circumstances sustain any claim even to Rees' share of the net freight. For Rees' share was in mortgage, and in our opinion the mortgagees effectually interfered, so as to entitle themselves to Rees' share of the freight, as against him and the plaintiffs as his assignees. If the entire ship had been in mortgage, to defeat the right of the mortgagor to receive the freight, it would have been necessary to establish that the mortgagee had taken possession of the ship before she completed her voyage. But the mortgage was of certain shares only in the ship, so that the mortgagees were not in a position to take possession of the ship, and in our opinion the mortgagees, by joining with the owners of the other shares in the ship in the appointment of the ship's husband in the place of Rees, which they did before the ship reached harbour, effectually intervened so as to entitle themselves to the freight to be earned, and to displace the title thereto of Rees and of his assigns. The plaintiffs' appeal entirely fails, and must be dismissed with costs.

There remains the appeal of the defendants. In our opinion this appeal fails. As far as appears, Russell Evans did not receive the freight or any part of it. All that he did, was as agent of other parties to give the defendants directions not to pay the freight to the plaintiffs. It was for them to decide whether they would act on their direction or not, and there was no sufficient reason for summoning Russell Evans as a third party.

Judgment affirmed.

LOHRE v. ATCHINSON AND ANOTHER.

Marine insurance—Policy on ship—Partial loss—Repairs—Amount recoverable.

Plaintiff, a shipowner, effected a voyage policy with defendants, underwriters, for 1200*l. on a ship valued at* 2600*l. The policy was in ordinary form, and contained a suing and labouring clause. During the voyage the ship encountered severe weather, sustained sea damage, and was in danger of becoming a total loss. The ship was repaired, and was metalled, which she had not been before; and the cost of the repairs, exclusive of the metalling, came to* 4414*l. The repairs*

(except the metalling) were such as were reasonably necessary for making the ship staunch and seaworthy, and the effect of them was to make her of much greater value than she was before the damage occurred. Salvage expenses had been recovered in the Admiralty Court against the ship and cargo, amounting to 515l.

Held, first (affirming the decision of the Queen's Bench Division), that plaintiff was entitled to be paid by defendants, in respect of the repairs, 1200l., the full sum insured.

And secondly (reversing the decision of the Queen's Bench Division), that defendants were also liable to pay 12-26ths of the 515l., being their proportion of the amount of average charges incurred by the ship.

Appeal from a judgment of the Queen's Bench Division on a special case.

The case in the court below is fully reported 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 445; 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 794. The facts stated in the special case and the arguments sufficiently appear from the judgment of the Court of Appeal (post).

Cur. adv. vult.

May 18.—The judgment of the court was delivered by Brett, L.J.—This was a special case. The material facts were that the action was brought by the plaintiff, the owner of the ship Alf, on a voyage policy, effected with the defendants for 1200l., on ship valued at 2600l., the policy being in ordinary form, containing a suing and labouring clause. The ship, during the voyage insured, encountered severe weather. According to paragraph 5 of the case: "On the 30th Jan., the ship then being in great danger of being completely lost, and in a helpless condition, and not capable of being navigated, those on board of her sighted the steamship Texas, which ultimately took her in tow without any agreement being come to as to remuneration for the service, and took her into Queenstown." For these services the ship, freight, and cargo were sued in the Admiralty Court, where salvage was awarded. The ship's proportion of salvage and general average charges was 515l. The ship was surveyed, estimates were made, a contract was entered into, and the ship was repaired, and she was metalled, which she had not been before. The amount expended on the ship, exclusive of metalling, was 4414l. Deducting one-third new for old in all matters to which such deduction is properly applicable, this was reduced to 3178l. The case then contained the following paragraph (14), from the full force of which we have no power to derogate. We are bound to accept it in its ordinary sense in full as correct. It is as follows: "All the works, except the metalling, &c., were undertaken for the purpose of making the ship staunch and strong and seaworthy, which she had ceased to be by reason of the sea damage she had sustained, and they were reasonably necessary for that purpose." The effect of these works was to make the ship a very much stronger and better ship, and of very much greater value than she had been before she sustained damage." The value of the ship after the repairs was 7000l. The case then stated the contentions of the parties, but it is unnecessary to refer to them, as they were not pressed in argument as correct. Before us, the substantial contention on behalf of the plaintiff was, that he was entitled to be paid, in respect of the loss arising from the expenses of repairs, 1200l., the full sum insured; and besides and beyond that sum a proportion of the salvage and general average charges of 515l., to be recovered by virtue of the suing and labouring clause. It was contended on behalf of the defendants, on several grounds, that they were only liable to pay, in respect of the loss, a proportionate part of 1200l.; and that they were not liable to pay any part of the 515l. under the suing and labouring clause.

The dispute thus raised is one with regard to the mode of ascertaining the amount of a loss under a policy in ordinary form, and of adjusting that amount when ascertained. Such disputes have for a long period been determined according to recognised rules. As many of the arguments presented to us seemed to trench violently on several of those rules, it appears to us advisable to state our view of the binding force of these rules, and the reason why they have a binding and exclusive force. They are rules which originated either in decisions of the courts upon the construction or on the mode of applying the policy, or in customs proved before the courts so clearly or so often as to have been long recognised by the courts without further proof. Since those decisions and the recognition of those customs, merchants and underwriters have for many years continued to enter into policies in the same form. According to ordinary principle, then, the later policies must be held to have been entered into upon the basis of those decisions and customs. If so, the rules determined by those decisions and customs are parts of the contract. And although a court now might differ from the correctness of the rules as originally laid down, it must yet now act upon those rules as parts of the contract, or as agreed modes of carrying it out.

It was urged on behalf of the defendants that there was in this case an actual total loss with benefit of salvage. The rules for determining whether or not there has been an actual total loss within the meaning of an ordinary policy are well established, and are of the nature of those above described. All the novel rules, therefore, proposed by Mr. Benjamin are inadmissible. According to the recognised rules, there cannot be a total loss of ship when it is safe in the hands of the owners, still bearing the character of a ship however greatly damaged. There is an actual total loss if by perils insured against the ship has wholly disappeared, or is so damaged as to have lost the character of a ship, or, although still a ship, has by capture or a justifiable sale or otherwise become wholly lost to her owners. But in the present case the ship was saved, and restored to her owners as a ship, although greatly damaged; salvage, indeed, has been awarded to salvors for saving her as a ship; and there has been no sale. Moreover, if there had been a sale, it could not have been justified, or this loss made by it a total loss; because the rule as to that is, that a sale by the master cannot be justified as against his owners or as against the underwriters, nor a sale even by the owners constitute a total loss as against the underwriters, if the ship, being disabled, can be repaired, so as to be a seagoing ship, at an expense less than her value when repaired. The contrary is found in this case. It was further argued that the ship was, if not an actual, at least a constructive total loss. The rule for determining this question is also a settled rule. It would, in the circumstances of this case, be the same as that just enunciated with regard to a justifiable sale. In this case, therefore, no abandonment could have been supported, even if notice of abandonment had been given. But no such notice was given, and it is impossible to maintain that there was a constructive total loss. There was, therefore, no total, but only an average or partial loss in this case. And that being so, there can be no benefit of salvage. Upon a partial loss no such claim arises.

The questions, therefore, on the first part of this case are reduced to these: What is the proper mode of ascertaining the amount of a partial loss arising in respect of the expense of repairing a damaged wooden ship; and what is the proper mode of adjusting such a loss under a valued policy? Now, as to the first, there is an established mode of estimating the amount. The ship must be repaired, or estimates may be procured for repairing her, so as to make her as nearly as possible equal to what she was before the damage caused to her by the perils insured against, and in either case at such reasonable cost as the shipowner can by reasonable effort procure. "The underwriter is responsible for the repair or restoration of the damaged or destroyed part of the ship, or article belonging to it, with materials, workmanship, style, and finish, corresponding to its original character:" (Phillips on Insurance, s. 1428.) It has been found by experience that no carpentering can be so skilful as to replace exactly the damage which has occurred. If a ship be from age or construction a weak ship, it may, although she was seaworthy at the commencement of the risk, be impossible so to repair her as to make her equal to what she was before, or even a sea-borne ship, without, either by the superior strength of the materials used in the same manner as the old materials or by a necessary change of construction, making her a stronger, and therefore a more valuable ship than she was before. It has further been found by experience that it is almost impossible to ascertain with any exactness the difference between the value of the ship before the damage and the value added to her by repairs. "A general usage, which the law follows as founded in public convenience, has therefore applied a certain rule in all cases:" (Phillips on Insurance, s. 1431.) This rule is also one of those before described, and therefore is the only rule. The rule is that "where timbers or other materials are replaced by new (or are treated upon estimate as so replaced), the vessel when repaired (or when treated as repaired) is considered to be better than before; and accordingly the assured must himself bear one-third of the expense of the labour and materials for the repairs, and this deduction is said to be on account of new for old:" (Phillips on Insurance, s. 1431.) "Where the damage has been repaired, the established mode of estimating its amount is, in case of wooden ships, to deduct one-third from the whole expense both of labour and materials which the repairs have cost, and to assess the damage at the remaining two-thirds. This is termed deducting one-third new for old, &c. To avoid discussion in each particular case, the amount of deduction is fixed at one-third." (Arnould on Insurance, last edit. p. 901.) The amount, therefore, of the partial loss arising in respect of the expense of repairing a damaged wooden ship is the reasonable cost of so repairing her as to make her as nearly as possible equal to what she was before the damage caused to her by the perils insured against, less one-third new for old, that is to say, less one-third of the expense of the labour and materials used in making the repairs. And this mode is equally applicable, whether the ship is, by the repairs which are necessary to make her equal to what she was before the damage, made only a little or very largely of greater value than she was before the damage. The amount of the partial loss caused by the repairs in this case was therefore 4414*l.*, less one-third new for old; or, as found in paragraph 16 of the case, 3178*l.*

The next question is, how is this amount or loss to be adjusted? Here, again, it must be repeated that there is a recognised long-adopted rule, and that is therefore the only one. The relation between the amount of so much of the ascertained loss caused by expenses of repairing as is to be borne by the underwriters and the value of the ship at the commencement of the risk must first be established. In a valued policy that value of the ship is the valuation in the policy and no other. In an open policy that value must be ascertained by evidence. Then, in order to adjust the loss, the underwriters as a whole are, and each individual is, to pay an amount bearing the same relation to the sum insured by them or him as the amount of the ascertained loss bears to the value of the ship at the commencement of the risk. When the amount of the ascertained loss by repairs is less than the value of the ship at the commencement of the risk, or, which is equivalent, to the value of the ship stated in the policy, the relation is expressed in business by percentage expression, as that the loss is 20 per cent. or 50 per cent. or 90 per cent. Then the underwriter is said to be liable to pay the same percentage of the sum insured. According to the rule, therefore, if the percentage of the loss to the original value of the ship is 99 per cent, the underwriters must pay 99 per cent. of the sum insured. This by the argument addressed to us was admitted; but it was urged that the rule cannot be applied, because it is wholly unjust to apply it, if the relation of the amount of loss to the original value of the ship is 100 per cent., or greater than 100 per cent.; and in order to replace the rejected rule, many new ones were suggested. But if the rule were the only rule, the only logical conclusion would be, that if the first relation is 100 per cent., or more than 100 per cent., so must the second relation be, and the underwriters must pay accordingly 100 per cent., or more than 100 per cent. of the sum insured. There is, however, another, and, to a certain extent, a controlling rule. "The liability of insurers on a single loss is, without question, limited to the amount insured (and the expense of suing &c.), and the payment of the whole amount for a single loss discharges them from further liability:" (Phillips on Insurance, s. 1742.) Where the relation of the ascertained loss to the value of the ship at the commencement of the risk or to the value stated in the policy is greater than 100 per cent., the underwriter, who by the rule for adjustment would have to pay more than 100 per cent., is by the rule of limitation of liability absolved from paying more than 100 per cent. But there is nothing to prevent his liability to the extent of 100 per cent. The defendants therefore were bound to pay, in respect of the loss arising from the ascertained expense of repairs, 1200*l*., the whole sum insured; although the loss was, according to the phraseology of insurance law, only a partial as distinguished from a total loss under the policy.

The next question is, whether the defendants are not bound also to pay further, an additional sum in respect of an alleged obligation to do so by reason of the suing and labouring clause. That depends, considering the subject generally, upon the construction of the suing and labouring clause, and, in the application of the clause to a particular case, upon whether the occasion upon which the alleged expenses were incurred was such as is within the clause, and whether the expenses were of such a character as are within the clause. Now the general construction of the clause has been held to be, and we think it is, that if by perils insured against the subject-matter of insurance is brought into such danger that without unusual or extraordinary labour or expense a loss will very probably fall on the underwriters, and if the assured or his agent or servants exert unusual or extraordinary labour, or if the assured is made liable to unusual or extraordinary expense for efforts to avert a loss, which, if it occurs, will fall on the underwriters, then each underwriter will, whether in the result there is a total or a partial loss, or no loss at all, not as part of the sum insured, but as a contribution independent of and even in addition to the whole sum insured, pay a sum bearing the same proportion to the cost or expense incurred as the sum they would have had to pay if the probable loss had incurred, or to the loss which, because the efforts have failed, has occurred bears to the sum insured. "There is a question," says Willes, J., in Kidstone v. The Empire Marine Insurance Association (ubi sup.), "whether the clause ought to be limited in construction to a case where the assured abandons, or perchance may abandon, so that the expense incurred is not only in respect of a subject-matter in which the underwriters are interested, but upon property which, by the abandonment, actually becomes or may become theirs, or whether it extends to every case in which the subject of insurance is exposed to loss or damage, for the consequences of which the underwriters would be liable, and in warding off which labour is expended. The question manifestly depends upon the construction of the clause, and quite apart from the proved usage we think the latter is the construction." The proof given in that case by underwriters and others was that "there has been in the business of marine insurance a well-known and definite meaning affixed by long usage between the assured and the underwriters to the term "particular average" as distinguished from the term "particular charges"; "particular average" denotes actual damage done to or loss of part of the subject-matter of insurance, but it does not include any expenses or charges incurred in recovering or preserving the subject matter of insurance." The decision in Kidstone v. The Empire Marine Insurance Association, was that a loss within the clause was not excluded by a clause exempting from average loss; the reason given being that a loss within the clause is different from and is in no case to be considered as part of the loss by reason of actual damage to the subject insured. "By this clause," says Arnould, summing up the authorities, "the insurers undertake an additional liability over and above the insurance properly so called, and quite of a different nature:" (Arnould, vol. 2, p. 780, last edit.) "The assured may recover, under a marine policy, the value at which the subject is insured; and also for the amount of expenditure in addition to a total loss. This liability is stipulated for by the provision that the assured may labour, travel, and sue for the safeguard and recovery of the insured property, to the expenses of which the insurers agree to contribute:" (Phillips on Insurance, s. 1742.) These authorities, and the decision in Kidstone v. The Empire Marine Insurance Society, seems to us to show that the clause in question is a wholly independent contract in the policy from the contract to pay a certain sum in respect of damage done to the subject-matter of insurance, and consequently that it applies whatever be the amount of such damage, and whether indeed any such damage occur or not. Nothing is said in any of the authorities, and there is nothing in the wording or nature of the clause, to show that an intention must be present in the mind of those who make the effort to benefit thereby the underwriters. The absence or presence of such an intention cannot diminish or add to the value or effect of the services. Such intention therefore is, upon reason and authority, an immaterial circumstance. The only conditions to give a valid claim under it are danger of damage to the subject insured by reason of perils insured against, unusual or extraordinary efforts made, or expenditure incurred in consequence of such efforts made to attempt to prevent such damage. Whether the present occasion was one to give rise to a valid claim under the suing and labouring clause depends upon whether there was probable danger of loss to the underwriters. Looking at paragraph 5 of the case, that cannot be doubted. Whether the expense in respect of which the claim is made is such as is within the suing and labouring clause depends upon whether the liability or obligation to pay for such salvage services as were here rendered is within the clause. Now services which can be rewarded as salvage services can only be such are rendered when danger exists, and when they are rendered in order to avert danger. They cannot, whilst the master or others in due charge are on board, be properly rendered without the consent of the captain or those in charge. The only difference between them and similar services rendered without a claim for salvage is, that they are rendered without an agreement, express or implied, as to the price at which they are to be paid. They are rendered upon the terms that they are to be performed without payment if without success, and to be rewarded by a judgment of the Admiralty Court if successful. But the nature and object of them are precisely within the proposition above enunciated; they are unusual and extraordinary efforts made in a time of danger and made in an attempt to avert damage which, if the subject to which they are rendered is insured, would, if it ensued, cause loss to the underwriters. It is not necessary, as has been observed, that there should be a specific intention to benefit underwriters; therefore, although salvage services may be rendered without knowledge that the subject saved is insured and yet are of the same value to the underwriters, they fulfil the conditions just as much as similar services given on other terms of remuneration. "Salvage," says Arnould (p. 778, last edit.), "in so far as it is a claim to which the insurer is liable, designates an expenditure necessarily laid out in preserving the subject of an insurance from a loss for which the insurer would be liable under the policy, and is recoverable from him in virtue of an express clause in the policy inserted for such a case, and known as the sue and labour clause." With this we agree. Nothing is said about intention. It follows that in this case the defendants were bound to pay, in addition to the 1200*l*, the amount for which they were liable in respect of repairs done to the ship, their proportion of the 515*l*, the amount of "average charges" incurred on behalf of the ship. That seems to be, as urged on behalf of the plaintiff, the same proportion of 515*l*. as 1200*l*. bears to 2600*l*., or 12·26ths of 515*l*.

It follows that the appeal on behalf of the defendants must be dismissed, and the appeal on behalf of the plaintiff must be allowed.

Appeal dismissed.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

COMMON PLEAS DIVISION.

Reported by A. H. BITTLESTON Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(Before GROVE, DENMAN, and LOPES, JJ.)

KALTENBACH v. MACKENZIE. (a)

Marine insurance—Constructive total loss—No notice of abandonment—Question for jury.

A constructive total loss may, if the circumstances justify it, entitle the owners to recover as for an actual total loss, although no notice of abandonment has been given; and whether the circumstances justify the absence of such notice is a question for the jury in each particular case.

THIS was an action on a policy of marine insurance claiming as for a total loss. The defendant paid into court for a partial loss, and the question was whether the plaintiff could recover as for a total loss without notice of abandonment. At the trial before Lord Coleridge, C.J., judgment of nonsuit was given in favour of the defendant, on the ground that notice of abandonment was in the circumstances of the case essential, and that there was no evidence of any such notice having been given. The plaintiff is a partner in the mercantile firm of Kaltenbach, Engler, and Co., who carry on business at Paris, Singapore, and Saigon. In 1867 they became the owners of the Admiral Protet, the plaintiff being the only registered owner owing to the other parties being foreigners.

On Oct. 4, 1870, the Admiral Protet was insured for 4000*l*. for a voyage from Saigon to Hong Kong with rice, the policy being made in England in consequence of the French war.

On Jan. 14, 1871, she sailed from Saigon, and on the 22nd struck on a bank and was much damaged.

On the 24th she was towed to Saigon and discharged her cargo. She was then surveyed, and the surveyors recommended that she should be sold.

On Feb. 7, the owners (one of whom was at Singapore) made up their minds to sell, and communicated to the captain to that effect.

On Feb. 11 the ship was condemned, and on the 23rd was sold.

The owners on the 11th of March gave notice that they claimed for a total loss. The underwriters resisted the claim on the ground that notice of abandonment had not been given to them by the owner.

A rule nisi for a new trial having been obtained by the plaintiff.

Butt, Q. C., Cohen, Q.C., and Hollams showed cause.—In answer to interrogatories, the plaintiff says, "I was the sole registered owner of the ship, but it is in fact the property of my firm." One member of the firm was at Singapore at the time of abandonment. The captain, in a letter to the partner at Singapore, says, "It is more than probable that the ship will be condemned in dock." Then the ship is condemned and they do not telegraph to the underwriters. The sale of the ship was determined on by the plaintiffs themselves, not by the captain. The question is, whether, when the assured is on the spot, he can recover for a constructive total loss, without notice of abandonment. In The Oriental (7 Moore's P. C. C., O. S., 398, 411) it was held that the master has only authority to pledge the ship for necessaries, where there is no means of communication with the owner. In his judgment, Jervis, C.J. says: "We must, however, look at the circumstances of this case. There was not only the power of communication, but an absolute communication made. It was made, and properly made, at the moment of the accident, communicated and received within a few hours, and by a means of communication in existence which must be taken to be the proper mode or channel of communication, not to send money as suggested, because the electric telegraph will not carry money, but to send a communication on the one hand, and receive an answer on the other. There, there being the means of communication, and the authority of the master being founded on the impossibility of a communication, their Lordships are of opinion that there was no authority in the master to raise money on bottomry." In Rankin v. Potter (2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 65; L. Rep. 6 E. & Ir. App. 83, 121; 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 142) Blackburn, J., after referring to Lord Abinger's judgment in Roux v. Salvador (3 Bing. N. C. 286), says: "But I think this is from the nature of things confined to cases where there are some steps which the underwriters could take if they had notice. When they can do so, I think that the neglect to give a notice of abandonment may determine the owner's election. This is a matter that is now of much greater practical importance than it was when Lord Abinger delivered that judgment. For then the assured could not learn that his ship had got into difficulties at a distant place till long after the disaster, and the underwriters could only send out orders which would arrive later still. Under such circumstances a notice of abandonment was often a very idle ceremony, and in my opinion unnecessary, if the facts did amount to a total loss, inoperative if they did not. Now, when by means of the electric telegraph the underwriters' orders might promptly reach the spot where the ship was in peril, a notice of abandonment may be of great practical importance. What would be a reasonable time, and whether the neglect to give notice of abandonment does determine the election, must, I think, depend in each case on the circumstances, and principally on what steps the underwriters might take if they had notice. If there was nothing they could do, no notice I think is required." And Lord Chelmsford in the same case, says: "It was argued at the bar, on the authority of the case of Knight v. Faith (15 Q.B. 649), that in every case where the subject-matter insured exists in specie, though in a damaged state, a notice of abandonment is necessary to entitle the assured to make a claim as if it had been actually destroyed." This was the opinion expressed by Lord Campbell, in delivering the judgment of the court in that case. . . . Lord Campbell had before, in the case of Fleming v. Smith (1 H. of L. Cas. 535), stated the rule as to notice of abandonment in the same unqualified terms, saying, 'According to all the old authorities, a constructive total loss can only entitle the owners to recover as for an actual total loss, by a notice of abandonment.' . . . No prejudice can possibly arise to the underwriters from withholding a notice where it is wholly out of their power to take any steps to improve or alter their position. Upon this ground, therefore, I am of opinion that there was no necessity for the assured in this case to give notice of abandonment of the chartered freight to the underwriters." In Roux v. Salvador (ubi sup.), Lord Abinger says: "In all these or any similar cases, if a prudent man, not insured, would decline any further expense in prosecuting an adventure, the termination of which will probably never be successfully accomplished, a party insured may, for his own benefit, as well as that of the underwriter, treat the case as one of a total loss, and demand the full sum insured. But if he elects to do this, as the thing insured, or a portion of it, still exists, and is vested in him, the very principle of indemnity requires that he should make a cession of all his right to the recovery of it, and that, too, within a reasonable time after he receives the intelligence of the accident, that the underwriter may be entitled to all the benefit of what may still be of any value, and that he may, if he pleases, take measures, at his own cost, for releasing and increasing that value. In all these cases, not only the thing insured, or part of it, is supposed to exist in specie, but there is a possibility, however remote, of its arriving at its port of destination, or, at least, of its value being in some way affected by the measures that may be adopted for the recovery or preservation of it. If the assured prefers the chance of any advantage that may result to him beyond the value of the thing insured, he is at liberty to do so, but he must also abide the risk of the arrival of the thing in such a state as to entitle him to no more than a partial loss. If, in the event, the loss should become absolute, the underwriter is not less liable upon his contract because the assured has used his own exertions to preserve the thing insured, or has postponed his claim till that event of a total loss has become certain, which was uncertain before." And in Arnould's Marine Insurance, vol. ii. p. 919 (5th edit.), the author says: "It is obviously just that the assured, if he means to abandon and throw upon the underwriters the ownership of the thing insured, should give them notice of this intention within a reasonable time after receiving intelligence of the loss, in order that they may take immediate steps for turning the property thus cast upon their hands to the best account." The effect of the cases is that whenever there is a reasonable opportunity of communicating with the assured and the underwriters, the assured must give notice of abandonment to the underwriters, unless there is nothing to abandon. And the communication must now be by telegraph. See The Oriental (ubi sup.); Proudfoot v. Montefiore (L. Rep. 2 Q, B. 511; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 512); The Onward (L. Rep. 4 Adm. 38; 28 L.T. Rep. N.S. 204; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 540). If it should be held that the use of the telegraph is not necessary, still the notice of abandonment must be given within a reasonable time. "What is a reasonable time in a case of this description must depend upon the particular circumstances of each case. On the one hand, the assured is not to delay his notice when a total loss occurs, in order to keep his chance of doing better for himself by keeping the subject insured, and then, when he finds it will be more to his advantage to do so, throwing the burden upon the underwriters; while, on the other, the underwriter cannot complain of a suspense of judgment fairly exercised on the part of the assured, to enable him to determine whether the circumstances are such as to entitle him to abandon." Per Lord Chelmsford, in Currie and Co. v. The Bombay Native Insurance Company (L. Rep. 3 P. C. 72, 79; 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 317; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O.S. 369). Further there is in this case no evidence whatever of the necessity of the sale on the 23rd Feb. The following cases were also cited:

(a) This case was originally argued June 19, 20, 1877, but was ordered to be re-argued before three judges.

Knight v. Faith, 15 Q. B. 649;

Sir Henry James, Q.C., Watkin Williams, Q.C., and J. C. Mathew, for the defendant, in support of the rule.—The question is whether the state of the ship was such as to put on the assured the duty of giving notice of abandonment before claiming as for a total loss. It is conceded that there was a partial loss, and money was paid into court in respect of that. It is also admitted that there was here no actual total loss. Here it must be taken that there was a constructive total loss. Primâ facie a constructive total loss is the same as an actual total loss. But though that is admitted it is said that for a constructive total loss notice of abandonment is necessary. At one time it seems to have been thought by some persons that notice of abandonment was necessary in all cases. But in Roux v. Salvador (3 Bing. N. C. 281) Lord Abinger laid down the rule that no notice of abandonment was necessary where "neither the assured nor the underwriters could, at the time when the intelligence arrived, exercise any control over the goods, or by any interference alter the consequences." This was dissented from by Lord Campbell in Knight v. Faith (15 Q. B. 649); but Knight v. Faith was disposed of in Rankin v. Potter (ubi sup.), in which case Roux v. Salvador was referred to with approval. What is the duty cast upon a person to give notice of abandonment? That is, I submit, a question of fact for the jury, depending on the circumstances of each case. The reasonableness as to time, expense, and probability of insurer receiving the notice must be considered in each case. In Arnould's Marine Insurance, ii.. 918 (4th edit.), it is laid down that "the notice of abandonment ought to contain, or be accompanied with, a short statement of the ground of abandonment, in order that the underwriters may determine whether to accept it or not." Then, as to the fact in this case, the ship was surveyed on Feb. 2nd and 3rd, by Waterson and Bailey, and they recommended that it should be sold. [GROVE, J.—All that you have to show is that there was evidence to go to the jury of a constructive total loss.] The log-book shows that on Feb. 7 the leakage was at the rate of two and a half inches per hour. The evidence of Lloyd's agent, who was on the spot, shows that there was no skilled labour to be had at Saigon, and no dock there. He says that he would not have sailed her; that she was broken all to pieces like a biscuit: and that there would have been risk to the lives of those on board to have towed her to Singapore with her back broken. The captain communicated the condemnation and sale of the ship at once to Kaltenbach at Singapore, and Kaltenbach immediately wrote to Im Thurn to let the insurers know. As soon as Im Thurn heard from Kaltenbach, he communicated with the underwriters. All that the court is asked to say is that each case is for the jury to decide, and that it was misdirection to rule that there was no evidence to go to the jury. In Read v. Bonham (3 Brod. & Bingh. 147) the court refused to grant a new trial, which was moved for, on the ground that the ship ought not to have been sold, and that notice of abandonment had not been given in due time; and Dallas, C.J. commences his judgment by saying: "The jury have found in this case that the captain had a justifiable cause for selling the ship." The following case was also cited:

King v. Walker, 33 L. J. Ex. 167, 325; 2 H. of L. Cas. 384.

GROVE, J.—We are all of opinion that there should be a new trial. I do not think it necessary or desirable to say more now than that the facts show more than a scintilla of evidence upon which the jury might have found for the plaintiff.

DENMAN, J.—I agree in the result. The single observation I will make is that on the new trial a question founded on Rankin v. Potter (ubi sup.) should be left to the jury.

LOPES, J.—I think that after the case of Rankin v. Potter (ubi sup.), it is impossible to hold that there was no evidence upon which the jury could have found for the plaintiff.

Practice—Inspection of documents—Reports of survey—Privilege.

Reports of survey of a ship made before the commencement of an action are privileged for inspection if made solely for the purpose of proceeding in the action.

Southwark and Vauxhall Water Company v. Quick (3 Q. B. Div. 315; 38 L. T. Rep. N.S. 28, followed).

THIS was a motion on behalf of the defendants, owners of the The dor Korner, in the cause of damage to cargo, for (1) the issue of a commission for the examination of the defendant's witnesses at New York; (2) inspection of two reports of survey dated respectively the 26th and 27th March, and mentioned in the first schedule of the affidavit of Andrew Gibson Gibson, sworn on the 13th June. The third paragraph of the affidavit in question was as follows:

I object to the production of such documents as are set out in the first schedule hereto; on the ground that they are documents written and prepared solely for the purpose of proceeding in this action.

The first schedule contained only the names of the two documents following:—26th March 1878, reports of survey of Capt. T. H. Trapp; 27th March 1878, report of survey of Capt. H. Edwards. The writ in the action was issued on 4th April 1878.

E. C. Clarkson for defendants.—These documents are not privileged. There can be no privilege for bonâ fide reports of survey. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The rule as to what documents are privileged has been laid down by the Court of Appeal: Bustros v. White, 1 Q. B. Div. 423; 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 835.] That is so, and reports of survey are not such documents. Besides, it has been expressly held that reports of survey of a ship are liable to inspection:

Martin v. Butchard, 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 732.

There both reports were made for the purposes of the action; one before and one after the action was actually brought, and both alike were held liable to inspection by the defendants. In this case both were before action brought, and therefore certainly liable. Besides, it has been the regular practice of this division for years to allow inspection of such documents.

Myburgh for the plaintiffs.—These documents are privileged; they are information procured by the advice of solicitors for the purpose of being laid before them:

The Southwark and Vauxhall Water Company v. Quick, 3 Q. B. Div. 315; 38 L. T. Rep. N. S. 28.

The true test of privilege is, where they or were they not bonâ fide obtained for the purpose of being laid before the plaintiff's legal advisers, and for the purpose of seeing whether the action should be carried on or not. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE:—You say that The Southwark and Vauxhall Water Company v. Quick decides that any document is safe from inspection if actually prepared by the advice of the legal adviser of the party.] Yes, when in contemplation of legal proceedings.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Taking paragraph 3 of the affidavit of Mr. Gibson and The Southwark and Vauxhall Water Company v. Quick (ubi sup.) together, I do not see how it is possible to say that these reports of survey are not privileged from inspection by the other side. I grant the first part of the motion, and a commission to examine witnesses at New York will issue: but I cannot grant the second part. I feel myself bound by the case cited.

THE HENRY COXON.

Evidence—Admissibility—Ship's log—Deposition before receiver of wreck—Deponent deceased.

Entries made in the ship's log by the mate of a vessel relative to a collision and signed by him and the captain nearly two days after the collision, cannot be used as evidence on behalf of the ship in which they were made, after the decease of the persons making and signing them.

Depositions made before a receiver of wreck by persons on board a ship relative to a collision cannot, even after the decease of the deponents, be used as evidence on behalf of that ship at the trial.

THIS was a cause of damage instituted by the Compagnie des Messageries Maritimes de France, owners of the steamship Gange, against the British steamship Henry Coxon. There was also a counter-claim by the owners of the Henry Coxon against the Gange in respect of the same collision. The collision took place in Sea Reach of the River Thames about 2.30 p.m., on the 12th Jan. 1878. Both vessels were bound down the Thames—the Gange on a voyage to Marseilles, the Henry Coxon to the Tyne. In consequence of the collision the Gange had to run on shore, whilst the Henry Coxon proceeded on her voyage. At the hearing, after the evidence for the Gange was closed, the defendants called evidence to show that subsequent to the voyage in which the collision occurred the Henry Coxon had made a voyage to Riga, and had left that port on June 12, bound for Grimsby, with a cargo of sleepers; that she passed Copenhagen on June 15, and was due at Grimsby about June 19; that since leaving Copenhagen she had not been heard of, that on the 15th June there was very bad weather, that a lifeboat belonging to her had been picked up by another vessel and taken to Dantzic, and that some sleepers had been noticed floating near Copenhagen twenty-four hours after she passed. From this evidence the court was asked to conclude that she had foundered with all hands, and, under the circumstances, to admit as evidence for the defendants the log book kept on board by the mate on the voyage during which the collision happened, and who was on board also when she sailed from Riga. It was admitted that the log was in his handwriting; and the second engineer who was below in the engine room at the time of the collision on Saturday, 12th Jan., but was not in the vessel on the subsequent voyage, proved that he signed the entry in the log about 9 a.m. on Monday, and that the captain and mate had already signed it, and that when he went below, ten minutes before the collision, the captain and mate were both on deck, and that it was the practice for them both to be on deck whilst going down the river.

Butt, Q.C., with him E. C. Clarkson.—Under these circumstances the log is evidence. The entry in it is an entry by the mate in the course of his business:

Price v. Earl of Torrington, 1 Salk. 283, 2 Salk. 690, 6 Mod. Cas. 264, 2 Lord Raym. 873.

The entries are made on consecutive dates, and recenti facto. The collision only occurred on Saturday, and on Monday the entry had already been made before the second engineer was called on to sign it; it therefore falls within the rule of the cases cited in the notes to Price v. Earl of Torrington in Smith's Leading Cases, 7th edit. vol. I. p. 328, et seq.

Dr. Deane, Q.C. and Webster, Q.C. (with them Dr. Phillimore) in objection.—The rule is that where the handwriting is admitted or proved, an entry cannot be used as evidence after the decease of the writer unless some use could have been made of the entry in his lifetime, but no use can be made of a log. This is not the case of an admission against interest; and therefore it could only be evidence, if admitted, of a fact, i.e., of the collision having happened, and also perhaps of the time and place at which it happened; but before it could be evidence even of that it must be "corroborated by other circumstances" (per Taunton, J., Doe v. Turford, 3 B. & Ald. 898. Here there is no evidence that the mate was on deck at the time, and therefore that he was making entries of matters within his personal knowledge. Besides, his duty as to entries in the log is only to enter facts, i.e., in this case the fact of the collision, not that the other vessel was to blame for it. Therefore such entries are not entries within the scope of his ordinary duty, and cannot become evidence after his decease (Smith and others v. Blakey, L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 326); and, so far as the entries concern his own ship, he has an interest in making them favourable to her, and therefore are excluded by all rules of evidence:

Smith's Leading Cases, 7th edit. vol. ii., p. 333, et passim;

Taylor on Evidence, sect. 708. 7th edit. p. 599.

Butt, Q.C., in reply.—These entries are all in the course of the mate's duty. (Doe v. Turford) (ubi sup.). This duty is not confined to merely entering facts, but the surrounding circumstances. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Even assuming that what the writer himself did when recorded by himself is evidence, can you say that what he says he saw done by the other ship is so?] That is an objection to the weight of the evidence, but not to the fact of its being evidence. I don't put it as an entry against interest, but on the other ground of its being a practically contemporaneous entry in the course of business. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Does it not create a fresh difficulty in that respect that it is a joint instrument signed by three different people?] Not if it is made contemporaneously. If not contemporaneous, I admit it is not to be relied upon.

Sir ROBERT PHILLIMORE.—I have fully considered the important question which has been raised in this case. The facts mentioned are these: The vessel which has been proceeded against has made a subsequent voyage and perished with all hands who were on board at the time of the collision, excepting one who has been called to-day, but who was not on deck at the time of the collision; and in these circumstances the log of the vessel which has perished is pressed upon the court as being evidence on the ground of a variety of cases beginning with that of Price v. The Earl of Torrington (ubi sup.), down to much later cases. In this case it is contended that the entry in the log was made in the course of his duty by the mate and contemporaneously; not against his interest but in the execution of his duty. Now I think upon the whole, though the question is not without difficulty, that the principle of the authorities is adverse to the admission of this document. I am not satisfied that it is a sufficiently contemporaneous instrument; the collision having taken place on the Saturday and the entry referred to having been made on the following Monday morning. There is another objection to it. I think that it was clearly to the interest of the parties to represent that the collision took place in consequence of the bad navigation of the other ship, and not of their own. There is another matter to consider. It seems to me that the authorities point to this, that when such evidence as this, where the party who furnished it is dead, is admitted, it must be evidence which relates to an act done by himself and not by others. We all know, as a matter of common knowledge in these proceedings, that it is the duty of the mate to enter not only what manœuvres are executed on board his ship and the navigation of his vessel, but to state what the cause of the collision was, and whether it was in consequence of the manœuvres and navigation of the other ship. Therefore it would be extremely difficult to disentangle the two portions of the evidence, that which relates to what was done by himself and that which was done by the other vessel. I think that this case does not come within the principle of those cases which have allowed evidence of this kind to be admitted. It is one of extreme difficulty, but I think that under all the circumstances I must reject the evidence.

Butt, Q.C. then tendered the deposition of the captain of the Henry Coxon, made before the receiver of wreck. The deposition is now the best evidence which can be produced of the facts; if the captain were still alive it could not be used, but as he is dead the case is otherwise. It was sworn at the Custom House in London, the 15th Jan., and therefore when the facts were fresh in his memory.

Dr. Deane, Q.C., in objection to the admission of the deposition, cited

Taylor on Evidence;
The Little Lizzie, L. Rep. 3 Ad. 56; 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 84; Northard v. Pepper, 17 C.B. N. S. 39; 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 782.

Butt, Q.C. in reply.—The cases cited are not in point. The oral testimony of the deponents there could have been obtained; here, the deponent being dead, his deposition is the best evidence procurable. In this court matters could always be proved by affidavit.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—If the evidence is to be admissible, it must be because the common law has made it so or the words of a statute. There is no authority to show me that it is admissible by the common law; indeed, I hold it to be clearly inadmissible by common law. It is true that in the case of Northard v. Pepper (ubi sup.) (a) the deponent was still alive, but that does not seem to affect the case. I think it my duty to follow the decision in that case, and on the ground of that decision I must reject the evidence.

Some other evidence of independent witnesses was then heard for the defendants; and, after hearing counsel and consultation with the Trinity Masters, Sir Robert Phillimore found that the Henry Coxon was alone to blame, observing in the course of his judgment, "It is a misfortune that the Henry Coxon has lost the evidence of those on board her; but I must not on that account depart from the rules which govern the court in examining the testimony of the witnesses who are before it."

THE DICTATOR.

Wages and disbursements—County Court Admiralty jurisdiction—Costs.

A County Court has no jurisdiction in Admiralty over a claim for a master's disbursements, and hence, in an action for master's wages and disbursements in the High Court, a certificate under the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71) is not necessary to entitle a successful plaintiff to his costs, although he recover less than 150*l.*, the limit of the County Court jurisdiction over wages under sect. 3 of the said Act.

THIS was an action for master's wages and disbursements, and came before the court upon an application on behalf of the plaintiff for an order to the Liverpool District Registrar to tax the plaintiff's costs.

The claim had been referred to the district registrar, who had found and reported that the sum of 137*l.* was due to the master for wages and disbursements, but had, upon the plaintiff's costs being brought in for taxation, refused to tax upon the ground that the amount recovered being below 150*l.*, the plaintiff was not entitled to his costs without a certificate under sect. 9 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, as the action might have been brought in a County Court.

(a) The cases of Northard v. Pepper and The Little Lizzie, cited in argument and in the judgment, were themselves argued on the supposition that these depositions were made evidence by sect. 449 Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104). That section is, however, repealed by sect. 45 and Sched. Pt. 1 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 80).

Before action there had been considerable correspondence between the plaintiff and the owner of the ship as to the amount due to the plaintiff; but the plaintiff had not actually furnished his final accounts until Oct. 3, the action being begun on Oct. 6, 1877.

Clarkson in support of the application.—The district registrar was wrong in refusing to tax. This is a claim for wages and disbursements. The County Court Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 gives jurisdiction to County Courts over wages only, and not over disbursements. Hence no certificate is necessary. The action could not have been brought in a County Court.

Sutton for the defendants.—The word "wages" in the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, sect. 3, sub-sect. 2, should be widely construed, and includes more than mere wages:

The Blessing, 38 L. T. Rep. N. S. 259; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 561.

and should include disbursements. Besides, the plaintiff is not entitled to his costs upon the ground that he did not deliver his accounts until too late for investigation before action:

The Fleur de Lis, L. Rep. 1 Adm. & Ecc. 49.

Clarkson in reply.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 cannot be construed so as to give jurisdiction over disbursements to the County Courts. There is no such jurisdiction in the County Courts either by statute or by the general law. Hence I am clearly of opinion that the matter must be referred back to the registrar for taxation. On the other point, I am of opinion that the master had done all that was necessary to entitle him to bring his action. I grant the application.

THE D. H. BILLS.

Bottomry — Interest after cessation of risk — Practice.

The rate of interest ordinarily payable upon a bottomry loan and the premium thereon after the safe arrival of the ship at the end of the risk is 4 per cent. per annum, and a provision in a bond entered into by the master of a ship providing for the payment of 10 per cent. per annum interest is not binding on the owners of ship or cargo, provided the provision was entered into without their knowledge. (a)

THIS was an action brought against the U. S. ship D. H. Bills, her cargo and freight, to recover the amount of a bottomry bond on ship, cargo, and freight, given by her master at Farsunden, Norway.

The court made a decree against ship and freight by default. The owners of cargo admitted liability.

The plaintiff, the holder of the bond, now applied for judgment pronouncing for the validity of the bond. The bond provided for the payment of the amount lent (1295*l.*), together with 161*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* for bottomry premium three days after the arrival of the ship at Newport, Monmouth, and in default of such payment at the time aforesaid, it provided for the payment to the bondholders of "interest for the same sum at the rate of 10*l.* per cent. per annum, from the time aforesaid until payment of the said sum." The bond was entered into and signed by the master of the ship, and there appeared to have been no knowledge on the part of the shipowner or the owner of the cargo that there was any such stipulation as to interest in the bond.

Clarkson, for the plaintiffs, asked for judgment pronouncing for the validity of the bond against ship, cargo, and freight, for a sale of the ship, and payment of the bond, &c., out of the proceeds and freight, and for the condemnation of the cargo, or of the cargo owners, and their bail, in so much of the amount secured by the bond as the proceeds and freight should fail to satisfy.

J. P. Aspinall, for the owners of the cargo, admitted the validity of the bond, save in so far as the same provided for the payment of 10 per cent. interest, made payable by the bond in the event of the principal sum and premium not being paid within three days after arrival of the ship. The master had no authority in making the bond to bind the owners of cargo to pay anything for interest beyond the ordinary amount of interest allowed by the court. The court often reduces the amount of such interest stipulated for.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The plaintiffs are not entitled to interest after arrival in this country in a greater amount than the usual amount allowed, viz., 4 per cent. In this respect the bond is not binding, as the owners had no knowledge of this stipulation; but in all other respects I pronounce for the validity of the bond as against ship, cargo, and freight.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Clarkson, Son, and Greenwell.

Solicitors for owners of cargo, Waddilove and Nutt.

(a) This same question arose in two cases: Cargo ex Vineland, an action on a respondentia bond, and The Christiane, in both of which the respective masters had signed bonds giving 6 per cent. interest on the advances in the event of nonpayment at the port of discharge. Both were undefended actions, but upon the cases coming before the court (July 23, 1878) the judge mentioned the above case and asked how the plaintiffs were entitled to more than the usual rate of interest. Clarkson, for the plaintiffs in both actions, pointed out that even if the defendants had not expressly sanctioned the rate of interest named in the bond, still, by their default of appearance, they had ratified it, and submitted that where the persons who had to pay did not object, the court would allow the interest. The Court allowed the rate of interest named in the bond upon the grounds submitted, expressly stating that if it were shown that a ship or cargo owner appeared and opposed the payment of more than the ordinary rate of interest, and showed that the master had no authority to allow more, no more than usual rate would be allowed.—ED.

THE MAXIMA.

Mortgagee—Charter—Arrest—Possession—Release.

Where shares in a ship are mortgaged, possession being retained by the mortgagors, and the managing owner, duly appointed by all the co-owners, including the mortgagors, charters the ship for a foreign voyage, and she loads and is about to proceed on the voyage, the mortgagee, even though he takes possession of his shares before the sailing of the ship but after the making of the charter-party, cannot arrest the ship or demand bail in an action brought by him to compel payment of his mortgage debt, provided the performance of the charter-party is not prejudicial to the security; and the court will, upon the application of the co-owners, release a ship so arrested, and will condemn the mortgagee arresting in costs.

THIS was an action brought by the mortgagee of 16-64th shares in the British barque Maxima, to recover the sum of 1000*l.* due to him on the security of the mortgage from the mortgagors, partners in the barque to the extent of those 16-64th shares. The action was commenced on the 7th June 1878, and the vessel was immediately afterwards arrested. An appearance was entered on behalf of the owners of the barque, and a motion was now made on their behalf for the immediate release without bail of the barque and the condemnation of the plaintiff in the damages and costs occasioned by the arrest of the barque and the costs of the motion.

The circumstances of the case were as follows: On June 14, 1877, J. H. Burgess and G. Shaddich, of Swansea, owners of the 16-64ths above mentioned, being indebted to G. C. Stewart, of Liverpool, in 1000*l.* on an account current, mortgaged their shares to Mr. Stewart to secure payment of the debt, which was by the mortgage made payable six months after the date thereof. In Nov. 1877, J. B. Meagher, of Swansea, was by the co-owners (including the mortgagors) of the barque appointed managing owner and continued to act in that capacity up to and after the arrest. The barque was employed under the managing owner's directions, and the plaintiff, in March 1878, applied to him as managing owner for information as to the barque's then and future employment, and was informed that she was at that time at New York, and was under charter to load grain from that port to the United Kingdom. The barque was, on the 11th May 1878, chartered by the managing owner to take a cargo of coals from Swansea to Coquimbo. On May 21, 1878, the plaintiff wrote to the managing owner asking where the barque then was, and whether he or the co-owners would purchase the 16-64th shares, of which the plaintiff was mortgagee, and also asking the date of her arrival in England, and what was going to be done with her then. To this the managing owner replied on the 23rd May 1878, that he had not been able to see the owners as to the purchase of the shares, but asking the plaintiff's price, and telling him that the vessel was then on her way from Newry to Swansea, to load a cargo of coals to Coquimbo. On the 28th May the plaintiff replied that he gave the managing owner notice that he held the mortgage above mentioned, and claimed to have paid to him at once the proportionate shares of her last freight, and offered in the alternative to transfer his mortgage to the managing owner for 1050*l.*; and saying that unless he heard satisfactorily by return he should be compelled to adopt legal proceedings against the vessel, as he would not permit her to go another voyage until he was settled with. On May 29, 1878, the managing owner replied that he would consider the plaintiff in future as mortgagee in possession, and wished to know how he was to deal with the unsettled accounts against the 16-64th shares, but refusing to give the price asked for the shares as being too high. The plaintiff thereupon wrote, saying he should commence proceedings at once. On the 4th June the plaintiff by means of an agent at Swansea took possession of the 16-64th shares in the ship, and on the 8th June the ship was arrested in the action. Thereupon, the barque being fully loaded, the charterers began to threaten to hold the owners liable for any damage resulting from delay. The plaintiff objected particularly to the proposed voyage, because he had not then insured the ship, and was informed that high rates of premium were charged for such a voyage.

W. G. F. Phillimore for the defendant in support of the motion.—The plaintiff has allowed the ship to remain in the hands of the managing owner, and the mortgagors to retain possession of their shares; he had full knowledge of the fact that the ship was being employed by the managing owner acting by the authority of his co-owners. So long as he is not in possession he must be taken to sanction the acts of the managing owner in the employment of the ship and he cannot in this respect be in a better position than the mortgagors. The mortgagors could not repudiate the acts of their authorised agent, the managing owner, nor do anything to prevent his contracts from being carried out, so long as they were within the scope of his authority; they could not derogate from their own grant of authority; and as the plaintiff has only their rights, neither can he. This charter-party was made before the mortgagee took possession, and he cannot now prevent its execution. If he had been in possession before it was made he might have taken steps to prevent the vessel leaving England, but now it is too late, and the court will not allow him to detain the ship, seeing that the charter-party is not in any way prejudicial to the sufficiency of the security:

Collins v. Lamport, 34 L. J. 196, Ch.;
The Highlander, 2 W. Rob. 109;
The Innisfallen, L. Rep. 1 Adm. & Ecc. 72; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 71; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 470.

Clarkson for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff is in possession of his shares, and is consequently in the position of co-owner, and entitled to bail for safe return. The plaintiff cannot enforce his security at all if he cannot arrest the ship and hold her to bail. As mortgagee in possession the plaintiff could institute an action of restraint at once, and would, I submit, be entitled to demand bail for safe return; the court should make the release in this action conditional on the defendant giving bail for safe return. The voyage upon which the vessel is bound will last at least a year, and the plaintiff will have his security at risk all that time, and hence the charter-party, if allowed to be performed without bail being given, will in fact be prejudicial to the sufficiency of the security. The distinction between this case and The Innisfallen (ubi sup.) is that there the mortgagee was never in possession; here he has taken possession.

Phillimore in reply.—If the plaintiff is to be treated as a co-owner he cannot have bail because he has allowed his authorised agent, the managing owner, to enter into a contract and cannot now do anything to repudiate that contract. If he is to be treated as mortgagee he cannot be in a better position than his mortgagor, and can only take possession of the ship subject to any engagements made on her behalf by the mortgagor or his authorised agent.

Sir ROBERT PHILLIMORE.—In this case the plaintiff is mortgagee of 16-64 shares in the ship of which the managing owner seems to have been unanimously appointed by his co-owners in Nov. 1877. The plaintiff did not do any act which would create him mortgagee in possession until May 28, 1878, when he wrote to the managing owner, informing him of his claim, and demanding the freight. On the 8th June the ship was arrested, and this is an application to order her release, and condemn the plaintiff in damages and costs. There is no application for bail for safe return indorsed on the plaintiff's writ, the indorsement on which is confined to the claim of the plaintiff for payment of his mortgage debt. However, I must exercise an equitable jurisdiction in such a matter, and if I thought that the voyage for which the vessel is chartered would be likely to be prejudicial to the plaintiff's interests as mortgagee, or likely to lessen the sufficiency of his security, I should probably order the release on terms satisfactory to the plaintiff. But I see in this action and in the arrest of the ship nothing but an attempt on the part of the mortgagee to compel the other owners to purchase the shares which he holds. It would be very injurious to the shipowning interest if, after a charter-party has been made, a mortgagee could step in and set aside what the managing owner has done, merely because he seeks payment of his debt at that moment. In this case there is nothing to show that the voyage will create any danger to the mortgagee's interests beyond what will arise from the usual perils of the sea, which every ship must encounter, and which can be covered by insurance. In the absence of precedent to the contrary, and on principle, I must order the ship to be released, and I condemn the plaintiff in the costs incidental to obtaining the release, and in the costs of this motion.

THE ANDALUSIAN.

Limitation of liability—Launch—Ship—Recognised British ship—Registration—Shipbuilder—17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, ss. 2, 18, 19, 106, 516—25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, s. 54.

A vessel at the time of her launch, and before registration, is not a "recognised British Ship," and cannot avail herself of the limitation of liability granted by sect. 54 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1862, for damage done by her to another vessel.

Quære, whether the limitation of liability clauses apply to the case of a shipbuilder under contract to build and launch safely before delivery.

THIS was a suit for "limitation of liability" brought by F. R. Leyland, the builder and sole owner of the Andalusian, a vessel built as a screw steamship and subsequently registered as of 1722 tons, against the owners of the Angerona. The collision, in consequence of which this action was instituted, occured on the 14th July 1877, when the Andalusian was still in motion after being launched. Cross-actions for damage were tried in the Admiralty Court, that against the Angerona being in rem, and that against she Andalusian in personam, and on the 7th Aug. 1878 judgment in that action was delivered, by which the Andalusian was held alone to blame, and the amount of damage referred to the registrar and merchants.

The Andalusian had originally been built under contract for Mr. Leyland, a term of the contract being that delivery was to be made after the safe launching of the vessel, but, previous to the launch, the contract under which she was built had been set aside, and Mr. Leyland had come into possession of the unfinished vessel and the materials, and had completed her himself. It was the intention of the owner to sail the Andalusian under the British flag, and, before the launch, she had been partially measured by a surveyor of the Board of Trade for the purpose of registration; but at that time the houses on deck were not finished, nor were the engines on board.

The Andalusian was launched with her screw, and the aftermost piece of shafting and sea-cocks and valves in their places, but without masts or engines or boilers, and unregistered.

The plaintiff, in the limitation of liability suit, contended that he was only liable to pay compensation at the rate of 8*l.* per ton on the gross tonnage of the Andalusian, as found on the certificate of registration subsequently issued by the Board of Trade. The owners of the Angerona, on the other hand, maintained that under the circumstances the statutes for limitation of liability did not apply, and that they were entitled to restitutio in integrum.

On the 24th July 1878 the cause came on for hearing before Sir R. Phillimore.

Sir J. Holker, A.G., Butt, Q.C., and E. C. Clarkson, for the plaintiff, builder and owner of the Andalusian.

Benjamin, Q.C., Myburgh, and W. G. F. Phillimore, for the defendants, owners of the Angerona.

The sections of the Acts of Parliament on which the arguments turned, and the judgment was based, are as follows:

Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict., c. 104):

Sect. 2. In the construction and for the purposes of this Act (if not inconsistent with the context or subject-matter) the following terms shall have the respective meanings hereinafter assigned to them; that is to say,

"Ship" shall include every description of vessel used in navigation not propelled by oars.

Description and ownership of British ships.

Sect. 18. No ship shall be deemed to be a British ship unless she belongs wholly to owners of the following description; that is to say,

(1.) Natural born British subjects.

Sect. 19. Every British ship must be registered in manner hereinafter mentioned. . . . And no ship hereby required to be registered shall, unless registered be recognised as a British ship.

Sect. 106. Whenever it is declared by this Act that a ship belonging to any person or body corporate qualified according to this Act to be owners of British ships, shall not be recognised as a British ship, such ship shall not be entitled to any benefits, privileges, advantages, or protection usually enjoyed by British ships, and shall not be entitled to use the British flag, or assume the British national character: but so far as regards the payment of dues, the liability to pains and penalties, and the punishment of offences committed on board such ship, or by any person belonging to her, such ship shall be dealt with in the same manner in all respects as if she were a recognised British ship.

Sect. 516. Nothing in the ninth part of this Act contained shall be construed.

To lessen or take away any liability to which any master or seaman, being also owner or part owner of the ship to which he belongs, is subject in his capacity of master or seaman; or

To extend to any British ship not being a recognised British ship within the meaning of this Act.

Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63):

Liability of shipowners (part ix. of Merchant Shipping Act 1854).

Sect. 54. The owners of any ship, whether British or foreign, shall not in cases where all or any of the following events occur without their actual fault or privity; that is to say,

(4) Where any loss or damage is by reason of the improper navigation of such ship as aforesaid caused to any other ship or boat, or to any goods, merchandise, or other things whatsoever on board any other ship or boat, be answerable in damages in respect of loss of life or personal injury, either alone or together, with loss or damage to ships, boats, goods, merchandise, or other things, to an aggregate amount exceeding fifteen pounds for each ton of their ship's tonnage; nor in respect of loss or damage to ships, goods, merchandise or other things, whether there be in addition loss of life or personal injury or not to an aggregate amount exceeding eight pounds for each ton of the ship's tonnage, such tonnage to be the registered tonnage in the case of sailing ships, and in the case of steam ships the gross tonnage without deduction on account of engine room.

In the case of any foreign ship which has been or can be measured according to British law, the tonnage as ascertained by such measurement shall, for the purposes of this section, be deemed to be the tonnage of such ship.

In the case of any foreign ship which has not been and cannot be measured under British law, the surveyor of general tonnage in the United Kingdom, and the chief measuring officer in any British possession abroad, shall, on receiving from or by direction of the court hearing the case such evidence concerning the dimensions of the ship as it may be found practicable to furnish, give a certificate under his hand, stating what would in his opinion have been the tonnage of such ship if she had been duly measured according to British law, and the tonnage so stated in such certificate shall, for the purpose of this section, be deemed to be the tonnage of such ship.

Sir John Holker, A.G.—In this case the court will have to decide three questions: (1) Was the Andalusian a ship? (2) Was she a British ship? (3) Was she, at the time of the collision, in the course of navigation? She was a vessel protentially used in navigation, and certainly not propelled by oars, and therefore she comes within the definition of a "ship" given in the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 2. The fact that she was not registered does not prevent her being a ship; a vessel on the stocks, unfinished, and which never has been afloat, is a ship:

It was unavoidable that the ship was not yet registered, and therefore advantage cannot be taken of that fact to deprive the plaintiff of the limitation of his liability given by sect. 54 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), for if the court is satisfied that this vessel is a ship, it will also be satisfied that she is a British ship, and entitled to all the privileges and immunities of such. Sect. 516, which declares that an owner of a ship shall not be entitled to the privileges of limitation unless such ship is recognised as a British ship, applies only when the time at which registration was possible has arrived. In this case it had not arrived, for the engine and boilers were not yet in. Sect. 19, which is the first of the sections relating to measurement, confines its operation to vessels "hereby required to be registered," therefore there must be some British ships not required to be registered. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—You contend that the Act is penal only for default of registration, and that you have been guilty of no default; the defendants, that it confers a privilege on registration, and that you are not in a position to avail yourself of that privilege.] That no doubt will be their contention, but it will also be contended, I presume, that the ship was not in the course of navigation when the accident happened. There is no definition of navigation in the Act of Parliament, but this court has frequently held that a vessel dropping down the river with the tide is navigating, also a vessel warping out of dock negligently has been held to be guilty of improper navigation (Wood v. The London Steam Owners Association, L. Rep. 6 C. P. 563); as also one negligently moored in dock (Laurie v. Douglas, 15 M. & W. 746). Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—When, in my previous judgment in this case, I found the Andalusian to blame, it must have been on account of bad navigation.] That this ship is entitled to limit her liability as a ship, is also shown by the case of The Glengarry (L. Rep. 2 P. Div. 235; 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 341; 2 Asp. Mar. L. C. 230), which was similar to this in all respects except that the action there against the launched vessel was in rem, which therefore shows that the launch was subject to the ordinary maritime law.

Benjamin, Q.C., for the defendants.—Sect. 54 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1862 was enacted in the place of sects. 502, 503, 504 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854. It is therefore incorporated in part ix. of that Act, and therefore applies only to those British owned vessels which are recognised as British ships (sect. 516 Merchant Shipping Act 1854). To come within that enactment a vessel must comply with the provisions of sects. 18 and 19 of the same Act. Sect. 18 declares indeed the requirement that unless a vessel is British owned she cannot be a British ship, but does not say that the fact of being British owned alone constitutes a British ship. That is declared by sect. 19, with the provisions of which this vessel has not complied. The only question is whether the Andalusian was registered or not. If she had been, she could have availed herself of the statutory privilege given to registered British ships, but failing registration she cannot. Moreover this vessel, in her then condition, was not a ship at all, any more than a building without a roof would be a house; nor does she come within the definition given in sect. 2 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854. To satisfy that definition she must have been "used in navigation," and there is no authority for reading in the words "or to be" into that definition. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—You contend, then, that in no case could a launch claim any limitation of liability?] Certainly, that is our contention; and the fact that it has never before been raised is immaterial. Navigation is the movement of a ship from a port or place in the water to another port or place in the water, not from a place in shore; a lifeboat carried in a truck on shore could not be said in any sense to be navigated. Another point is, that the Act only limits the liability of a shipowner, and leaves the liability of a shipbuilder for injuries resulting from his negligence to the common law. Here the plaintiff, though he happened to be owner, must for the purposes of this suit be considered only in his capacity of builder, as having undertaken to complete the contract of building entered into by the builder, had the original contract been carried out. The builder was responsible for the safe launching of the Andalusian, and had this accident occurred whilst the original contract was in force the owners of the Angerona would have had an action against the builder for the full amount of the damage done, and they cannot be put in a worse position by means of a subsequent arrangement between the builder and the plaintiff, to which they were not parties: (Union Bank v. Lenanton, 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas., 600; L. Rep. 3 C. P. Div. 243, per Cockburn, C. J., p. 246; 38 L. T. Rep. N.S. 698.)

Sir J. Holker in reply.—A vessel, so soon as she assumes the condition of a ship, is a ship; and if further she is then owned by a British subject, she becomes a British ship. Suppose a crime to be committed on board a vessel so situated, but which for some reason had not been registered, could it be contended that our courts had not jurisdiction because it was not a British ship; or again, suppose a child to be born on board such a vessel, would it not be a British subject? (sect. 156 Merchant Shipping Act 1854). The fact of the plaintiff being builder does not prevent him taking advantage of his other position as owner; it may be that, in any ordinary collision, caused by the negligence of the master, there is a remedy in full against him independent of the remedy against the owner should it be worth while to pursue it.

July 30.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—On the 14th July 1877 the Andalusian, a vessel in the imperfect and unfinished state of equipment which is termed a launch, having been built in a building-yard on the Cheshire side of the river Mersey, was launched into that river and brought into collision with a ship called the Angerona, which ship brought an action against the Andalusian in this court, and I pronounced that the Andalusian was alone to blame for the collision. The Andalusian now brings an action for limitation of her liability under the Merchant Shipping Acts, and this action is opposed on behalf of the Angerona, upon the grounds—first, that the Andalusian is not a ship; secondly, that she was not used in navigation at the time of the collision; and thirdly, that she was not a British registered ship. The court is much indebted to the able and ingenious arguments of the Attorney-General and Mr. Benjamin upon all these points.

By the 2nd section of the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, it is enacted that "ship" shall include every description of vessel used in navigation not propelled by oars. I am disposed to consider that a ship of this character in this imperfect state of a launch might be included under this provision. The 18th section of the same Act provides that "no ship shall be deemed to be a British ship unless she belongs wholly to owners of the following description:" it is only necessary to mention one category, namely, "natural born British subjects." The Andalusian is proved to have been the property of a natural born British subject, and therefore is in one sense a British ship. The most important question remains to be considered. At the time of the collision this launch-ship had not her engines and boilers and other portions of her machinery on board, and was not in a condition to be registered, and as a matter of fact was not registered. By the 19th section of the same Act it is enacted, "That every British ship must be registered in manner hereinafter mentioned" (with certain exceptions which it is not necessary to mention); and it is further enacted that "no ship required to be registered shall unless registered be recognised as a British ship." The 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, s. 54, limits the liability of shipowners with reference to the registered tonnage of sailing ships, and the gross tonnage of steamships without deduction on account of engine-room, and the 516th section of the first statute provides that nothing in that part of the Act (Pt. IX.) which relates to the limitation of liability shall be construed to extend to any British ship not being a recognised British ship within the meaning of the Act. It has been contended by the Attorney-General that these clauses should not be construed to deprive a vessel such as this launch not yet ripe for registration, but intended to be registered when the proper time has arrived, of the benefit of this limitation of liability; that it would be very harsh to put this construction upon the sections; that this launch is not a ship required to be registered, because at the time of being launched she was not ready for registration, inasmuch as a launch cannot, and in this instance did not, take place with all the machinery and fittings on board which it is necessary she should have at the time of registration; that she is not an offender against the law by reason of not having been fully registered, and that being owned by a British subject, and intended to be registered, she might be recognised as a British ship. After much consideration I am unable to arrive at the conclusion. It is, in the first place, to be remembered that the limitation of liability is a creature of statute law; that upon general principles of jurisprudence and natural equity I think Dr. Lushington more than once said the sufferer is entitled to restitutio in integrum at the hands of a wrongdoer; that it is not a question of the launch being liable to a penalty for necessary non-registration, but a question whether she is entitled to a privilege—which operates severely upon the sufferer—unless she brings herself strictly within the plain meaning of the provisions of the statute. Now it appears to me that, however unfortunate it may be that the collision should have happened before the privilege of limitation of liability accrued, it has so happened, and that with respect to this privilege I, at least, understand the Merchant Shipping Acts from beginning to end to treat a registered British ship as the only recognised British ship entitled to this privilege.

I must therefore reject the claim of the Andalusian, the plaintiff in this suit, and there must be judgment for the defendant with costs.

THE LADY DOWNSHIRE.

Collision—Regulations for preventing—Local Act —25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, ss. 25, 31, Sc. Table C. Art. 7—36 & 37 Vict. c. 85, s. 17—37 & 38 Vict. c. 52, s. 1.

An Act (37 & 38 Vict. c. 52) prescribing additional regulations to be observed in a particular place or channel to those contained in the "Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea" is, though passed subsequently, to be read as a part of those regulations, and a breach of it will be visited by the penalties prescribed by sect. 17 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85).

Vessels at anchor in the sea approaches to the river Mersey are required by sect. 1 of 37 & 38 Vict. c. 52 to exhibit a white light at the main or mizen mast in addition to the white light prescribed by 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, Sc. Table C., Art. 7, and a vessel omitting to exhibit such additional light will, where the omission may have caused or contributed to a collision, be held to blame under sect. 17 of 36 & 37 Vict. c. 85.

THIS was a cause of damage arising out of a collision between the Edward John, a three-masted British schooner, and the Lady Downshire, a screw steamer of 131 tons burthen and 50-horse power nominal. The collision took place about 11.30 p.m. on the 12th May 1876, in the Crosby Channel of the river Mersey, at a place in that channel between the first and second red buoys; the wind was S.E., the weather moderately fine, and the tide flood.

The Edward John was at anchor in the channel, and had one light exhibited on her forestay. The Lady Downshire was bound up the Mersey; those on board her observed the white light of the Edward John, and close to it first a green and then a red light, from which they concluded that the lights were all shown from a steamer until close to her and too late to avoid the collision. The argument turned upon the effect of the following statutes:

Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 63):

Sect. 25. On and after the first day of June 1863, or such later day as may be fixed for the purpose by Order in Council, the regulations contained in the table marked (C) in the schedule hereto shall come into operation and be of the same force as if they were enacted in the body of this Act; but Her Majesty may from time to time, on the joint recommendation of the Admiralty and the Board of Trade, by Order in Council, annul or modify any of the said regulations, or make new regulations in addition thereto or in substitution therefor, and any alterations in or additions to such regulations made in manner aforesaid shall be of the same force as the regulations in the said schedule.

Sect. 31. Any rules concerning the lights and signals to be carried by vessels navigating the waters of any harbour, river, or other inland navigation, or concerning the steps for avoiding collision to be taken by such vessel, which have been or are hereafter made by or under the authority of any local Act, shall continue and be of full force and effect, notwithstanding anything in this Act or in the schedule thereto contained.

Art. 7. Ships, whether steamships or sailing ships, when at anchor in roadsteads or fairways, shall, between sunrise and sunset, exhibit, where it can best be seen, but at a height not exceeding twenty feet above the hull, a white light in a globular lantern of eight inches in diameter, and so constructed as to show a clear, uniform, and unbroken light, visible all round the horizon, and at a distance of at least one mile.

The regulations contained in this Table C were repealed by Order in Council of January 1863, but Art. 7 was re-enacted by the same order in precisely the same words.

The Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85):

Sect. 17. If in any case of collision it is proved to the court before which the case is tried that any of the regulations contained in or made under the Merchant Shipping Acts 1854 to 1873 has been infringed, the ship by which such regulation has been infringed shall be deemed to be in fault, unless it be shown to the satisfaction of the court that the circumstances of the case made departure from the regulation necessary.

An Act to make regulations for preventing collisions in the sea channels leading to the river Mersey (37 & 38 Vict. c. 52):

Sect. 1. Any general regulations for preventing collisions at sea for the time being in force under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Acts shall be construed as if the following regulations were added thereto, that is to say—

(1.) Every steamship, and every vessel in tow of any steamship, when navigating in the sea channels or approaches to the river Mersey, between the Rock Lighthouse and the farthest point seawards to which such sea channels or approaches respectively are for the time being buoyed on both sides, shall, whenever it is safe and practicable, keep to that side of the fairway or midchannel which lies on the starboard side of such steamship or vessel in tow.

(2.) Every ship at anchor in the said sea channels or approaches, within the limits aforesaid, shall carry the single white light prescribed by Art. 7 of the General Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, made under the authority of the Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment Act 1862, at a height not exceeding twenty feet above the hull, suspended from the forestay, or otherwise near the bow of the ship where it can be best seen; and, in addition to the said light, all ships having two or more masts shall exhibit another similar white light, at double the height of the bow light, at the main or mizen peak, or the boom topping lift, or other position near the stern where it can be best seen.

Milward, Q.C. and W. G. F. Phillimore, for the owners of the Edward John.—The Mersey Approaches Act only orders the second light to be shown in addition to that required by the general regulations. The not carrying the second light could not be subject to the same penalties as that incurred by an infringement of the regulations, and the Act cannot be included in a regulation made before the Act was passed, unless the Act itself contains a clause to that effect, and there is no such clause in this Act. It is not a place such as is contemplated by sect. 31 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1862, as it is neither a "harbour, river, or inland navigation." The proper method for making a new regulation which shall be incorporated with those contained in Table C is given by sect. 25 of the Act of 1862, and that method has not been adopted. Besides, as there is no general law requiring vessels to have on board more than one lantern of the sort used for showing an anchor light, we are not to blame for not being provided with a second one; and, not being provided with a second one, it was not possible to conform to the regulations, and therefore we are not liable to any penalty. The fact of our not having two lights had nothing to do with the collision at all. If we were visible at all—and it is admitted that our light was seen—it was the duty of the Lady Downshire to avoid running into us. We did not move, being at anchor; and therefore the whole fault of the collision rests with the Lady Downshire.

Butt, Q.C., and E. C. Clarkson for the Lady Downshire.—The Mersey Approaches Act must be read in with the Merchant Shipping Acts and Order in Council as to lights. Sect. 31 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1862 expressly provides for future regulations being made by a local Act, and says they are to be of full force and effect, that is, of the same force and effect as those contained in the schedule to the Act, or made subsequently by a competent authority (sect. 25 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1862); and therefore disobedience to this regulation as to the second light is to be treated as disobedience to any of the other rules. The penalty of that disobedience is given by sect. 17 Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85), as interpreted by this court and the Privy Council (The Magnet, The Duke of Sutherland, The Fanny M. Carvill, 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 478; L. Rep. 4 Ad. 417; 32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 129, 646, and subsequent cases); and it cannot be contended that the total absence of a light is not a material infringement of a regulation requiring it to be exhibited, nor that it might not by possibility cause or contribute to the collision by misleading those who saw it. The very object of the Act was doubtless to make greater distinction between steamers and vessels at anchor; and had we known in time, as we ought to have been informed, that this was a vessel at anchor, we should have taken steps to avoid her; as it was, we steering a course which would have taken us clear of a steamer coming down, at the last moment discover that this was not a vessel so situated, but, in consequence of the neglect of those on board the Edward John, we do not make the discovery till at a time when embarrassed by having to clear two ships instead of one, we are unable to avoid her.

Milward, Q.C. in reply.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The first question to be determined in this case is whether the "Act to make regulations for preventing collisions in the sea channels leading to the river Mersey 1874" (37 & 38 Vict. c. 52) is or is not brought within the provisions of sect. 17 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85). Now, the Mersey Approaches Act 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 52) enacts: [His Lordship then read sect. 1, sub-sect. 2, of the Act (37 & 38 Vict. c. 52, sup.), and proceeded:] It is an admitted fact that the Edward John, the plaintiff, was a three-masted brigantine, and ought according to this direction to have carried two lights, whereas she only carried one, which was on her forestay, and a light of considerable power. It is argued that this provision of the Mersey Approaches Act as to a second light is not incorporated in the Merchant Shipping Act, because the Liverpool Act speaks of the light prescribed by those Acts, and says that that light is to be carried "in addition." Now, sect. 17 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85) is as follows. [His Lordship then read the section (ubi sup.) and proceeded:] After giving the best attention in my power to the arguments on both sides with respect to the question whether this section includes the Liverpool regulation, I am of opinion that it does include it. That regulation, it is admitted, was infringed on this occasion, and with respect to the other part of the case I am of opinion that no circumstances have been shown to make a "departure from the regulation necessary." The pilot was perfectly aware of the law, and told the man to put up two lights. The master said he had no second light and could not exhibit it. I am therefore of opinion that the Edward John must be held to blame under that statute, no sufficient reason being given for the non-compliance with the Mersey Approaches Act. But the question remains whether the Lady Downshire, the defendant, is not also to blame. The Trinity Masters think that the Lady Downshire, if she saw a red light, could not have thought that it was on board the same ship on which she saw the white light. It has been said, indeed, that the single white light was a misleading light; but it is to be observed that the side light would have been proper to have been avoided, yet she ran straight into it. I must hold both vessels to blame.

JOSEPH W. DYER AND OTHERS v. THE NATIONAL STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

Collision—Steamer and ship—Crossing courses—Steamer porting and failing to stop—Damages—Limitation of liability.

An American ship loaded with guano, which she was bringing from the Chincha Islands to New York under a charter from the Peruvian Government, came into collision when about fifty miles from New York with a British steamship, bound from New York to Liverpool. The night was clear, and both vessels had the regulation lights set and burning. The wind was about northwest, and the ship was close hauled on the wind, heading a little south of west. The lights of the steamer were seen on her starboard bow at a distance of several miles, and she kept her course till just as the vessels were coming together, when her helm was changed, but not so as to affect her course. The steamer was heading east by south half south. The green light of the ship was seen from her deck two or three miles distant, a little on the port bow, her helm was ported, but the bearing of the light was not changed. Her speed was not checked till the collision was inevitable, when her helm was also put hard-a-port. She struck the ship on the starboard bow, and the latter soon sank. The steamer also received injury, and was put about for New York; but in the entrance of the harbour she took the ground and became a wreck. Her owners took off from her and sold a quantity of wreckage.

Held, that the steamer was in fault in continuing her port wheel, although the bearing of the ship's light was not changed, and in not stopping till the collision was inevitable, and was solely responsible for the collision.

That, as the owners of the steamer had taken no proceedings in accordance with the Act of Congress of 1851, limiting the liability of shipowners, to obtain a limitation of their liability, and inasmuch as they had not made a surrender of the steamer to the owners of the ship and cargo, as required by the general maritime law, there was no limitation of the personal responsibility of the owners of the steamer for the damages caused by the collision, by reason of the wreck of the steamer. (a).

(a) The effect of this decision, and of the decisions cited in the argument, appears to be that no shipowner is entitled to the benefit of the Act limiting their liability unless he takes the steps or proceedings provided by that Act for obtaining such limitation. Prior to the passing of the Judicature Act it was always supposed that no judgment could go against a shipowner for loss or damage within the meaning of the 54th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63) for a larger amount than the sum limited by that section, although the defendant made no claim in his pleadings for such limitation; in fact, at common law, such claim could not have been made as it would have been a plea to damages. The question, however, was never formally raised, probably because in almost every case the limitation was claimed by other proceedings in Chancery or Admiralty in order to avoid a multiplicity of actions. Since the Judicature Act, however, it appears that under the new system of pleading a party must insert in his pleading all the claims to relief which he seeks; and therefore in an action for damage by collision or other negligence, the defendant shipowner must claim in his defence to have his liability limited in accordance with the statute, otherwise he is not entitled to limitation. It is true that this would not make much practical difference in a case where there were many separate claims depending against the same defendant, as he would in such case be sure to take the necessary means to limit his liability by instituting a separate action for that purpose; but in the case of there being only one plaintiff all the persons injured joining in one action, the rule of pleading as now in force is important to remember. The case by which this rule is applied to actions of this nature is as follows:

WAHLBERG AND ANOTHER v. YOUNG AND OTHERS.

THE statement of claim alleged that the plaintiffs were the owners of the Russian barque Ystavat, and the defendants were the owners of the steam tug Tuskar, that the plaintiffs engaged the Tuskar to tow the Ystavat from Swansea to Cardiff for reward to the defendants in that behalf, and upon the terms, amongst others, that the defendants should use due and reasonable care in and about towing the said barque, and managing the said tug; that the Tuskar, in pursuance of the said engagement, started from Swansea with the Ystavat in tow; the Ystavat being in charge of a duly licensed pilot; that whilst the Ystavat was being towed those in charge of the Tuskar neglected to use due and reasonable care in and about the management of the tug, and neglected to obey the orders of the pilot, and, by reason of the said neglect and misconduct of those on board the Tuskar, the Ystavat was run aground, and sustained severe injury.

That the damage for the loss of the cargo of guano was to be arrived at by taking the maket value in the port of New York, and deducting there-

The statement of defence after stating certain facts, and traversing the negligence and misconduct alleged in the statement of claim, contained the following paragraph:

7. "The defendants say that the matter complained of, if any such occurred, and the defendants are liable for them, which they deny on the grounds hereinbefore stated, constituted a loss or damage by reason of the improper navigation of the said steam tug Tuskar, then being a British registered ship, caused to another ship, that is to say, the said barque Ystavat, and the defendants say that the same occurred without the actual fault or privity of the defendants, and that the gross tonnage of the said steam tug, without any deduction on account of engine room, amounted to ninety-seven tons, and no more, and the defendants claim that they are not liable in any event in respect of the premises to an aggregate amount exceeding 8*l.* per ton of the said ninety-seven tons."

To this 7th paragraph the plaintiffs demurred on the ground that the matter therein stated afforded no defence in law to the plaintiff's claim as alleged in the statement thereof, either in whole or in part; and upon this the defendants joined the demurrer.

Milward, Q.C. (R. E. Webster with him) for the plaintiffs in support of the demurrer.—The 7th paragraph is in effect a plea to damages, and therefore bad on general demurrer. The action is for breach of contract in not towing with due care, and in not obeying the orders of the pilot; the Merchant Shipping Act 1862, sect. 54, sub-sect. 4, is applicable only to cases of tort, as shown by the use of the words "improper navigation."

E. C. Clarkson for the defendants.— Whatever may have been the rules before the Judicature Acts 1873—1875, a defendant seeking relief of whatever nature must claim it by his pleadings. By the Judicature Act 1873, sect. 24, sub-sect. 3, the court has power to grant to any defendant "all such relief against plaintiff or petitioner as such defendant shall have properly claimed by his pleading, and as the said courts respectively, or any judge thereof, might have granted in any suit instituted for that purpose by the same defendant against the same plaintiff or petitioner." By Order XIX., rule 4, of the Supreme Court Rules, every pleading must contain as concisely as may be a statement of the material facts on which the party pleading relies. Before the Judicature Acts it may be that the defendants could at the trial of an action have given evidence which would have entitled him to have the judge direct the jury that the damages were not to exceed the amount limited by the Merchant Shipping Act 1862; but he could not have so pleaded, as a plea to that effect would have been a plea to damages. But since the Judicature Acts a defendant must plead all the relief he claims. The injury here complained of did arise from improper navigation of the tug; there is nothing to prevent limitation of liability from being claimed in respect of a loss arising from a breach of contract: (The London and South-Western Railway Company v. James 1 Asp. Mar. L. Cas. 526; L. Rep. 8 Ch. App. 241.) The action here is for breach of duty.

Webster in reply.

LORD COLERIDGE, C.J.—In this case the plaintiffs have sued the defendants as the owners of a steam tug called the Tuskar, for damages resulting from an injury which was produced by the mismanagement of the said steam tug. It is alleged in the statement of the plaintiff's claim that they had contracted with the defendants for the Tuskar to tow the plaintiff's barque on the terms, amongst others, that the defendants should use due and reasonable care in and about the towing of the said barque, and in and about the management of the said tug. That probably is merely stating, as my brother Archibald has remarked during the argument, as part of the contract, what the law would imply. Then the breach alleged is that whilst the barque was being towed those in charge of the Tuskar neglected to use due and reasonable care in its management and neglected to obey the orders of the pilot, and by and through the said neglect the barque was run aground and injured. The defendants have pleaded a plea which it may be assumed for the present purpose admits the statement of the plaintiff's claim, and that damage resulted from the neglect to use due and reasonfrom all the expenses which would have attended its sale there, and a reasonable mercantile profit. That the owners of the steamer must be decreed to pay the damages occasioned by the collision, with 6 per cent. interest from the time of the collision.

able care in and about the management of the tug, and states that this constituted a loss or damage by reason of the improper navigation of the said steam tug, and that therefore in effect the 54th section of the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act 1862 applies, and the damages ought to be limited to 8*l.* per ton of the gross tonnage of the steam tug. That plea has been demurred to and a preliminary discussion arose as to whether the objection to the plea properly formed a ground of demurrer. Mr. Clarkson has satisfied me that I was wrong in the view I first took in the case, and that the plea is one which may properly be pleaded, and therefore he demurred to. He referred us to sect. 24, sub-sect. 3 of the Judicature Act 1873, and to Order XIX., and pointed out that sub-sect. 3 of the 24th section in effect requires a person who has any claim in equity against any plaintiff in respect of which he seeks relief, to properly claim it by stating it in his defence, and that by Order XIX., rule 4, he must state in his pleading the material facts on which he relies. Now it is clear under the old practice the defendants might have obtained a decree in equity limiting their liability under the Merchant Shipping Act 1862 if that Act applied; and therefore it follows that under the Judicature Acts this is a relief which if they desire to have it against the plaintiffs, they must now claim by pleading it. That shows that the pleading has been properly framed in the present case, to raise the question, whether in law the case comes within sub-sect. 4 of sect. 54 of the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act 1862. The case has been extremely well argued, and the court has received therefore considerable assistance from counsel, and the question is whether in these pleadings and the facts which are admitted by them, the sub-sect. 4 of the 54th section applies, Now I wish to adopt the language of Mellish, L.J., in The London and South-Western Railway Company v. James, and to say as he says: "The case being directly within the words, it ought to be held within the Act, unless it is clearly not within what was the scope and intention of the Legislature in passing the Act;" and I think the case here is both within the words and meaning of the Act. The contract between the plaintiffs and the defendants is a contract about the management of the defendants' tug, and the injury which the vessel of the plaintiffs received is from the breach of such contract in not using due and reasonable care, and in not obeying the orders of the pilot. That appears to me to be an injury to the towed vessel, caused by the improper navigation of the tug. It was argued unsuccessfully in The London and South-Western Railway Company v. James though only faintly, that the case of a breach of contract was not within the 54th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1862, but if that case had never existed, I should have considered that there was nothing to exclude the case from the limitation of liability given by the statute, merely because the injury arose from a breach of contract. The limitation is to be construed in favour of shipowners, and applies equally whether the damage done be from a breach of contract, or from a simple tort. The navigation of the tug is to be considered in the relation in which it stands to the other vessel, and it may be, and here it must be, admitted that the neglect to obey the order of the pilot was such an improper navigation of the tug, as to produce the disastrous result which ensued. It is true that there may be a breach of the contract to tow which may not be from any improper navigation of the tug; if, whilst it is towing another vessel damage be done to such other vessel, it appears to me to be within sub-sect. 4 of the 54th section. Here it stands admitted on the pleadings that the loss occurred by the improper navigation of the steam tug, for by demurring the plaintiffs must take the statements of fact in the defence demurred to as being true, and therefore if the matter was bare of authority I should consider it right to hold that the plea is properly pleaded, and that our judgment should be for the defendants; but the case does not stand there, because, though the facts are distinctly different from those in The London and South-Western Railway Company v. James, the contention of counsel there went to the extent to which it has been put forward here, and the judgment of the Lord Chancellor was there that the Merchant Shipping Act 1862 applied and limited the liability of shipowners as well when the damage occurred from a breach of contract as when it occurred from tort. For these reasons I therefore think our judgment on this demurrer should be for the defendants.

BRETT, J.—The demurrer is to the 7th paragraph of the statement of defence, and the first point which arose was assuming the 7th paragraph was wrongly pleaded; yet, as it was only a statement limiting the amount of damages, and therefore merely a plea to the damages, and no good ground of defence to the claim, or to any part of it, whether it was not within Order XXVII. of the Judicature Act 1875, and the demurrer an improper mode of getting rid of it. But when the 7th paragraph is properly looked at, it will appear that it contains a statement of facts which will have to be proved, and which, if proved, would have entitled the defendants before the Judicature Acts to an injunction; and, as that is the case, the defendants are by virtue of sect. 24 of the Judicature Act 1873 entitled it by pleading it in their defence, and therefore if such statement amounts to a defence, it is here properly pleaded, and also properly demurred to; and consequently the question is whether the facts stated in the plaintiff's claim, and in this 7th paragraph of the defendants' statement of defence, shows that the 54th section of the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act 1862 is applicable. On the part of plaintiffs it was said that this paragraph merely disclosed a breach of contract, and did not show a loss from improper navigation within the 54th section of the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act 1862. On the part of the defendants it was contended that it showed not only a breach of the towing contract, but that the loss or damage had been under circumstances which were admitted to amount to an improper navigation of the tug. I think it right to say that a mere breach of the towing contract would not bring the case within the 54th section of the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act 1862; but I am of opinion that if there has been such an improper navigation as would bring it within that section, the case is not ousted out of that section because there has also been a breach of the towing contract. It seems to me that the real question raised is this, viz., whether the tug so put herself in relation to the ship she was towing that there might be an improper navigation of the tug as regards such ship, which would be an improper navigation within the enactment, although it would not be an improper navigation of the tug as regards herself. The words of the 54th section are large enough to admit a loss or damage to the ship by such improper navigation of the tug in the relation it stood to the ship; and I think such loss or damage is within the section. But for a mere breach of contract such as refusing to take the ship in tow, I doubt if it be within the 54th section, and I should say that if there had been only a breach of contract, the owner of the tug would not be protected by the section. That, however, is not the present case, and I think the defendants are entitled to the protection of the Act.

ARCHIBALD, J.—I think we must deal with the facts of this case as they appear on the record. Now, here the statement in the plaintiffs' statement of claim is that the plaintiffs engaged the defendants to tow the plaintiffs' vessel for reward, and upon the terms that the defendants should use due and reasonable care in and about the management of the tug. These terms are stated as a matter of contract, but they might have been stated as a matter of law, for they are nothing more or less than what the law would imply. Then disobedience of the orders of the pilot whilst towing the plaintiffs' vessel is alleged as a neglect to use due care in the management of the tug; so that the cause of action might have been put as a tort. Now, the 7th paragraph of the defendants' statement of defence is in substance that what is complained of constituted a loss by the improper navigation of the tug within the 4th sub-sect. of the 54th section of the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act. 1862. I confess when the case was first opened I doubted whether this was a matter which ought to be pleaded at all, and, consequently, whether it was properly subject to demurrer, because before the Judicature

ON the night of Dec. 1, 1866, a collision occurred between the ship Kate Dyer and the steamship Scotland, about fifty miles from the port of New York, which the steamship had left some hours before, bound to Liverpool. The ship was struck on her starboard bow by the stem of the steamship, and sank in a short time. Of her crew of twenty-seven souls only fourteen were saved. The steamship was also injured and caused to leak by the collision, and was in consequence put about and headed for New York, but the water gained on her so that when she reached the Outer Middle at the entrance of the port, she took the ground. A storm came up not long after, and she became a wreck. The owners of the ship being American citizens, filed a libel in Admiralty against the National Steamship Company, a British corporation, owners of the Scotland, in the Eastern District of New York, to recover the value of the vessel and her cargo of guano, of which they were common carriers, and by a foreign attachment upon property of the defendants compelled its appearance. The cause was tried before the district judge as to the merits of the collision, and he, in March 1869, held that the steamship was solely in fault for the collision, and that the defendants were liable for the damages, and ordered a reference to a commissioner to ascertain the amount of such damages.

A passenger on the ship named Rollins had joined himself as co-libellant to recover the value of his property lost in the collision; and the Republic of Peru also became a co-libellant to recover for itself the value of the cargo of guano, which question of value was much contested in the case. The facts out of which that question arose were that the ship had taken on board the cargo at the Chincha Islands in the Pacific Ocean to bring to New York, under a charter to the Peruvian Government. Peru had a monopoly of that guano, and it was not allowed to be sold at the Chincha Islands, but was shipped by the Government to various parts of the world. The defendants insisted that the owners of the cargo could only recover the value of the cargo at the port of shipment, while the owners insisted that they were entitled to recover the value of the cargo at the time of the collision in the port of New York. The district judge held that they were entitled to recover its value in the port of New York, less the estimated expense of performing the small remaining portion of the voyage.

An appeal was taken from the decree of the District Court to the Circuit Court, and the cause was heard anew on all the questions passed on by the district judge, and also on the question whether the defendants were not freed from all responsibility for the collision by the subsequent wreck of the Scotland. In their answer in the District Court they had averred the destruction of the Scotland, and that there was no liability in personam against them for the loss of the Kate Dyer, but the question was not presented to or passed upon by that court.

An Act to limit the liability of shipowners was passed by the Congress of the United States in 1851. Its main provisions are as follows:

Sect. 3. And be it further enacted, that the liability of the owner or owners of any ship or vessel, for any embezzlement, loss, or destruction, by the master, officers, mariners, passengers, or any other person or persons, of any property, goods, or merchandise, shipped or put on board of such ship or vessel, or for any loss, damage, or injury by collision, or for any act, matter, or thing, loss, damage, or forfeiture done, occasioned, or incurred, without the privity or knowledge of such owner or owners, shall in no case exceed the amount or value of the interest of such owner or owners respectively, in such ship or vessel, and her freight then pending.

Sect. 4. And be it further enacted, that if any such embezzlement, loss, or destruction, shall be suffered by several freighters or owners of goods, wares, or merchandise, or any property whatsoever, on the same voyage, and the whole value of the ship or vessel, and her freight for the voyage, shall not be sufficient to make compensation to each of them, they shall receive compensation from the owner or owners of the ship or vessel, in proportion to their respective losses; and for that purpose the said freighters and owners of the property, and the owner or owners of the ship or vessel, or any of them, may take the appropriate proceedings in any court, for the purpose of apportioning the sum for which the owner or owners of the ship or vessel may be liable amongst the parties entitled thereto. And it shall be deemed a sufficient compliance with the requirements of this Act, on the part of such owner or owners, if he or they shall transfer his or their interest in such vessel and freight, for the benefit of such claimants, to a trustee, to be appointed by any court of competent jurisdiction, to act as such trustee for the person or persons who may prove to be legally entitled thereto, from and after which transfer all claims and proceedings against the owner or owners shall cease.

In 1872, after the interlocutory decree in this cause had been made, but before the question of damages was determined, and two years before the final decree of the District Court was made in this cause, that Act was for the first time brought before the Supreme Court of the United States for construction in the case of The Norwich Company v. Wright (13 Wallace's Rep. p. 104), and that court held that Congress intended by that Act to give to shipowners the exemption from liability given by the general maritime law, which extended to damage by collision. At the same time that court made a set of rules as to the practice to be followed and the proceedings to be taken by a shipowner who desired to avail himself of the benefit of the Act, which rules are also published in the same volume of Wallace's Reports.

Acts it was a matter only to be taken at the trial, and not by way of pleading; but Mr. Clarkson has satisfied me that it is now necessary to state this in the statement of defence, in order to entitle the defendants to claim relief. That being so, and it being demurred to, the question is whether this is a case within sect. 54, sub-sect. 4, of the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act 1862. The plaintiffs contend that the cause of action is a mere breach of the contract to tow, and therefore that the case is not within the enactment, but, as I have already observed, what is stated in the plaintiffs' statement as to using due and reasonable care is only what the law would imply, and consequently the action might have been in tort. Though it is unnecessary to determine the point, yet I agree with my brother Brett in thinking that a damage from the breach of a mere towing contract would not be a damage from improper navigation within the meaning of sect. 54, sub-sect. 4. Here, however, the parties have admitted on the pleadings that the damage was such as fell within the words of that enactment; and the allegation that it happened from the want of due care in the management of the tug is consistent with its arising from the improper navigation of such tug as alleged in the defence, and which must be taken by the demurrer to be admitted. Then if, as alleged, and also as admitted, that this occurred without the actual fault or privity of the defendants, it falls within sect. 54, sub-sect. 4, and on that ground, and that ground only, I decide this demurrer in favour of the defendants.

Solicitors: For the plaintiffs, T. Cooper; for the defendants, Ingledew, Ince, and Greening.

[The above case was by error omitted from the earlier numbers of these reports.—ED.]

The defendants in this case took no proceeding in accordance with those rules. But on the hearing in the Circuit Court they insisted that by virtue of that Act, and also of the general maritime law, they had been by the destruction of the Scotland free from all personal responsibility. The libellants gave evidence that a large quantity of wreckage, of many thousand dollars value, had been saved from the Scotland and sold by the defendants; and they insisted that the defendants being a foreign corporation, could not claim the benefit of the statute of the United States, and that, as they had neither taken the proceedings allowed by that statute, if applicable, nor made a surrender of the vessel to the libellants as required by the maritime law to be done by shipowners if they would free themselves from personal liability for the acts of their agents, there was no limitation of their liability.

BLATCHFORD, J.—The evidence is entirely satisfactory, that the steamer was wholly in fault for the collision, and that the ship was free from fault. The wind was from north-west to north-north-west. The ship was close hauled on the wind, and heading a little south of west. The steamer was heading in such a manner that her course crossed the course of the ship at an angle of about two points. The ship showed her green light to the steamer, and the steamer saw that light, and no other light on the ship, and saw that light a little over the port bow of the steamer. The steamer showed her masthead light and her red light to the ship, and the ship saw those lights, and no other lights on the steamer, and saw those lights a little over the starboard bow of the ship. The steamer saw the ship's light at a sufficient distance off to have avoided her, and yet the steamer ported and persistently ported, although the ship's light continued to draw towards the bow of the steamer, and was not shaken off as the result of the steamer's porting; and in spite of the danger which this condition of things indicated, the steamer did not slow or stop and reverse, until just before the collision. Her speed was so great when she struck the ship, that she cut off entirely the forward part of the ship, and passed some distance beyond her. The ship did not change her course before a collision was inevitable; and it is doubtful whether she changed it even then. She made no change which contributed to the collision or embarrassed the steamer's freedom of action. The answer charges as faults on the part of the ship, that she had no look-out, and was not properly manned and navigated, and changed her course. No one of these points is established by the respondents. The foregoing conclusions were those arrived at by the District Court.

But there is one question which has been presented to this court, that was not discussed or considered in the court below. The answer of the respondents alleges as follows: "Respondents further answering say that said steamer Scotland was by said collision sunk and destroyed, and that there is no liability in personam against these respondents for said loss of the Kate Dyer." Under this allegation the respondents insist that their liability, as owners of the steamer, did not extend beyond the value of their interest in the steamer, and in her freight, pending at the time of the collision; that, as the steamer was lost by he collision, and no freight money or passage money was earned by her, the respondents are thereby discharged from liability; and that the District Court had no right to exercise jurisdiction by issuing a writ of foreign attachment against the respondents, and no right to seize any property belonging to the respondents, under such writ. The answer does not state whether the alleged non-existence of liability is claimed under the Act of Congress of March 3, 1851 (9 U.S. Stat. at Large, 635), or under the general maritime laws. The question may first be considered on the view that the Act of 1851 applies to this case. Under the 3rd section of that Act, the liability of the respondents, as owners of the steamer, for the damages sustained by the libellants by this collision, cannot exceed the amount or value of the interest of the respondents in the steamer and her freight, pending at the time of the collision. Sect. 4 of that Act provided that the respondents might take appropriate proceedings in any court for the purpose of apportioning the sum for which, as owners of the steamer, they might be liable, amongst the parties entitled thereto. The claims sued for and represented by the libellants in this case are the claims for the loss of the ship and of her freight and cargo, and of the personal effects of her master and crew, and of property owned by a passenger on the ship. They comprise all the claims which could exist for any loss or damage growing out of such collision, so far as appears. This being so, and those claims being all before the District Court in this suit, it was easy for the respondents to institute appropriate proceedings in that court to have the limitation of their ability adjudged, and to have the sum for which they were liable apportioned among the parties making such claims. No such proceedings were instituted, although the rules of proceeding were made by the Supreme Court, in May 1872, and some of the testimony as to damages was put in after that time, and the commissioner's report was made after that time, and the question of damages was heard by the District Court after that time, and the final decree of that court was not made until July 17, 1874. Moreover, the 4th section of the Act provided that it should be a sufficient compliance with its requirements, on the part of the respondents, if they should transfer their interest in the vessel and freight, for the benefit of the persons making claims, to a trustee to be appointed by any court of competent jurisdiction, to act as such trustee for the persons who might prove to be legally entitled thereto, and that from and after such transfer, all claims and proceedings against the respondents should cease. The District Court was a court of competent jurisdiction to appoint a trustee in this case, but no such proceeding was had. But it is insisted by the respondents that there was nothing in the shape of vessel or freight, or interest therein, or value of interest therein, which existed after the libel herein was filed on the 17th Dec. 1866, to which the Act of 1851 could apply. In Norwich Company v. Wright (13 Wallace, 104), it was held by the Supreme Court that by the maritime law, the liability of the owner of the vessel doing damage by collision was limited to his interest in the vessel and freight, and he was discharged by giving up that interest or by loss of the vessel on the voyage; that, by the English law, as constituted by statute, such liability was limited to the amount and value of the vessel and freight at the time of the injury; and that the Act of 1851 intended, so far as collisions are concerned, to adopt the rule of maritime law; therefore, under the Act of 1851, it is sufficient to surrender the vessel and any freight that may have accrued, without paying into court anything further, and it is not necessary to pay or give security for the value of the vessel at the time of the collision, and of the freight for the voyage. But, to enjoy the benefits of the Act of 1851, so long as there is anything left of the vessel to be surrendered or transferred, or in or of which to have an interest capable of being surrendered or transferred, what is so left, or the interest in it, or the value of it, or of such interest, must be surrendered or transferred. In the present case, it is shown that there was a large amount of anchors, chains, rigging and cabin furniture saved from the steamer and delivered to the agent of the respondents, and what was so saved was of the value of several thousand dollars. That was a part of the vessel, and should have been surrendered or transferred, if the Act of 1851 was to be availed of. Nor is there yet time for the respondents to institute proceedings under the Act of 1851. No sufficient excuse is shown, as in Norwich Co. v. Wright, for not having taken such proceedings. There was more than two years' time after the rules of practice were prescribed in May 1872, and before the final decree of the District Court was made, during which the proceedings might have been taken in that court. The respondents, especially in view of the allegation in their answer as to their non-liability, because of the alleged destruction of the steamer, must, after allowing a final decree to go against them in the District Court, without instituting any proceedings under the Act of 1851, be held to have waived all right to institute such proceedings now.

I have not found it necessary to determine the question, whether the Act of 1851 applies to the owners of a foreign vessel, who seek the benefit of that Act. Undoubtedly, under the general maritime law, the liability of the owner of the vessel doing damage by collision, for the wrongful act or negligence of the master or crew of the vessel, if such owner was personally free from blame, was limited to his interest in the vessel and its freight, and ceased by his abandoning and surrendering those to the parties sustaining loss. But he could not discharge himself without abandoning vessel and freight; nor, if vessel and freight were lost, could he discharge himself without surrendering all claims in respect of vessel and freight, such as insurance, &c. If, in consequence of the loss of the vessel on the voyage, no interest in vessel or freight remained, the shipowner was discharged, but if any interest in vessel or freight remained, he could not be discharged without surrendering such interest. Therefore, if non-liability be claimed in this case under the general maritime law, the respondents have not put themselves in a position to claim it, because they have not surrendered, or offered to surrender, what remained of the vessel. On the contrary, the respondents retained what was saved from the steamer, and permitted the decree below to pass against them without surrendering it. If the answer be considered as averring that the steamer was in such wise, and to such extent, sunk and destroyed by the collision, that, under the rule of the maritime law, the respondents were discharged from liability, then the answer is not supported by the evidence, for there was something left of the vessel, and what was left was capable of being surrendered. As the personal liability of the respondents was not discharged, a cause of action in the Admiralty existed against them, and the jurisdiction of this court to administer the relief asked by the libel was properly enforced by the process of attachment issued.

The owners of the ship have appealed because the decree below awards them less than the value of the ship, and because it awards them interest at the rate of 6 per cent. instead of 7 per cent. upon the amount of their damage for the loss of the ship and for her freight, and for the personal effects of the master and crew of the ship. I examined the question of the rate of interest in the case of The Aleppo (7 Benedict, 120), and for the reasons there stated, and in the cases there cited, the rate of interest allowed was correct. The point that the value of the ship was fixed too low is not insisted on, on such appeal.

The proper rate of interest on the value of the cargo is 6 per cent, and the appeal of the Republic of Peru on that point is not sustained. The final decree of the District Court, besides awarding specified sums for the loss of the ship and of the freight on the cargo and of the personal effects of the officers and crew of the ship and of the property of the passenger, awarded to the Republic of Peru, as owners of the cargo of guano, which the ship was carrying, and which was totally lost by the collision, the sum of 64,731.27 dols. in gold coin of the United States, with interest thereon in like gold coin at six per cent. This amount was arrived at in the District Court, by taking the market price of the guano at the port of New York, and deducting therefrom the costs and charges which would have been incurred from the time of the loss, until it could have been placed in New York, ready for sale. It is contended by the respondents, that this rule of damages was erroneous, and that the proper rule in this case, is the cost of the cargo at the place of shipment, with the expenses and charges actually incurred and interest thereon. I had occasion in the case of The Aleppo (before cited) to examine this general subject, and to consider the decision in regard to it. In that case a cargo of wool was lost by a collision on the high seas, a few miles from the harbour of Boston, and it was urged, that the proper measure of damages was the market value of the wool in Boston on the day of its loss, less duties, freight, charges for landing, and cost of insurance from the place of loss to Boston; and that the result arrived at by such method of computation would be the value of the cargo at the time and place of its destruction. But the result of the principles laid down in the cases cited and considered was held to be that the proper rule of damages was the value of the cargo at the port of shipment, including the expense of lading it on board and transporting it to the place of collision, with interest at 6 per cent. from the time of collision; that all beyond that was expected earnings or profits; and that the loss of them was not a proper measure of damages. The cases in the Federal Courts to which I refer are those of Murray v. The Charming Betsey (2 Cranch. 64), The Lively (1 Gallison, 315), The Anna Maria (2 Wheaton, 327), The Amiable Nancy (3 Wheaton, 546), Smith v. Condry (1

Howard, 28), Williamson v. Barrett (13 Howard, 101), The Ocean Queen (5 Blatchf. C. C. R. 493), and The Vaughan and The Telegraph (2 Benedict 47: 14 Wallace, 258, 267). It is urged that the owner of the cargo must be indemnified to the extent of the loss sustained; that complete indemnity for such loss cannot be given in this case by taking as the rule the market value of the guano at the place of shipment; that there never was a market price, as the evidence shows, for the guano at the Chincha Island, where it was shipped, it having there neither market value nor ascertainable cost; that nevertheless it was an article of value, and could at the time and place of its loss have been easily exchanged for gold at a large price; and that, on any other rule, the recovery for the cargo would be only 1,424.25dols., being the cost of preparing it for shipment, and the charges incident to shipment. Indemnity for loss, in the sense of the law of damages, is indemnity to a party for his having lost what he once had. In common speech, a party may lose a market, or may lose an expected profit. But that is not correct language to use in considering the law of damages. The value of this cargo of guano at the time and place of loss did not embrace any part of the profits which would have been realised on the cargo if it had safely reached New York. It is impossible to take the market price at New York as the standard without taking in the probable and prospective profits. To say that this cargo could have been sold to arrive, or could have been easily exchanged for gold at a large price at the time and place of the loss, does not meet the difficulty. Selling the cargo to arrive, is only selling it to be paid for if and when it arrives, and leaves it subject to the contingencies of the voyage; and if it never arrives, the price, which is a New York price, and includes profits, is not paid. The transaction of delivering the cargo at the time and place of loss, on a sale then and there just before the loss, and receiving pay for it on the spot, based on a New York price for it, as if it were at New York, and deducting only the expense of carrying it to and landing it at New York, is not a real or probable transaction. It would be a transaction in which the seller would receive all the profit and take none of the risk of the voyage, and one which might as well be supposed to take place at the Chincha Islands, in respect to the cargo on board of the vessel, as at any point of the voyage short of the port of destination. The fact that the cargo was lost within but a short distance of New York, compared with the length of the entire voyage, makes no difference in principle, because, the fact of its loss at the place where it was lost by collision, shows that there was greater danger of its loss by collision at that place than at any previous point in the voyage. If the Scotland had not run into the ship, she might have been run into by some other ship nearer to New York, or the cargo might have been lost in some other way nearer to New York. If the collision had occurred one mile farther from New York, and the cargo had thereby been lost, the rule contended for by its owners might have been urged with equal weight; and so in respect to any collision farther and farther from New York, embracing even a collision close to the port of shipment. The contingency of a safe arrival of the cargo at New York, so as to enable its owners to realise their probable or prospective profits, was, during the whole voyage, a matter of conjecture, and the result shows that there was not any less peril so near to New York than during the prior part of the voyage. To allow such profits in this case would make it necessary to allow them, if the cargo had been lost by a collision close to the Chincha Islands, and would establish a rule which the Supreme Court rejected in Smith v. Condry. In opposition to this view two cases are relied on. In Bourne v. Ashley (1 Lowell, 27), the question was as to the value of a whale converted in the Okhotsk Sea. The court held that the market price was the rule in the case of articles which had a market price; that the wrong-doer could not escape paying damages by showing the absence of a market for the article; that there was no market price for whales anywhere, and no market for oil and bone, in the Okhotsk Sea; that, nevertheless, the fair value of the whale must be paid for, that that could not be arrived at by conjectural testimony of experts, as to what they would be willing to give for whales in the Okhotsk Sea; that the court was obliged to discover, as well as it might, the value of a whale, to a person who happened to want it at the time and place in question: that that value must be the price of the oil and bone in some market, less the expense of making the oil and bone out of the whale and getting it to market; and that as the market of New Bedford was the controlling market of the country, as well as the home port of both vessels, the proper standard was the value at New Bedford of the oil and bone made, or which might have been made from the whale, less the average necessary expenses of converting the whale into oil and bone, and freight, insurance, and other usual charges, with interest on the sum thus arrived at. In Swift v. Brownell (1 Holmes 467) the question was as to the value of a cargo of oil and bone lost in the Arctic Ocean by a collision between two whaling vessels. The court adopted the rule laid down in Bourne v. Ashley, and took the price of the oil and bone at New Bedford at the time when it would probably have arrived there, and not the New Bedford price at the time of the collision. Both of those cases proceed upon the principle that, if there is an ascertainable market value for the cargo at the time and place of the loss, that ascertainable market value is to govern; and that if there is no such ascertainable market value, and yet the cargo is of value to its owner, the wrong-doer cannot escape by showing that there is no such ascertainable market value. But to show that there is no such ascertainable market value, it is not sufficient to show that the place of loss was on the high seas, where traffic does not take place, and buyer and seller do not meet in market. That is the case in every case of loss by collision on the high seas; yet in such cases, if the cargo came from a port of shipment where traffic in it did or could take place, the value there and not the value at the port of destination is the rule laid down. The cases of the whale and of the cargo of oil and bone are exceptional cases. The articles in question in those cases were not shipped at any port of shipment where traffic in them did or could take place, and no value at the time and place of loss, predicated upon any value at any port of shipment, could be affixed to them. Whales and their products commence their existence as property on the high seas, and their value, if to be dealt with as a value of the property in some market, could, in those cases, be dealt with only as a value in the port of New Bedford. The property had never been in a port or at a place where any definite or ascertainable value had been or could be given to it, as a market value. Not so with this cargo of guano. This guano, with all the guano at the Chincha Islands, was the property of the Peruvian Government, which exported it to foreign countries on its own account, and prohibited its exportation by any other parties. It was not bought and sold in Peru as a general article of commerce. Any citizen of Peru was at liberty to take it from the Chincha Islands for use in Peru, without paying anything for it, but he could not export it from Peru. Guano so taken was sold in Peru, subject to such restriction as to its use in Peru, at 12dols. a ton, gold. But such guano did not form more than one-twentieth part of the guano taken from the islands. The guano in the Kate Dyer belonged to the Peruvian Government, and cost it nothing but the labour of digging it only, and loading it on the ship, and was being exported by it to be sold on its own account and for its own profit. One sale by the Peruvian Government of 25,000 tons of guano, for 30dols., gold, per ton, net, in 1864, to be exported, is shown. The price of guano at New York, at the time the Kate Dyer would probably have arrived there, was 60dols. a ton, gold. The owners of this guano ought to receive, as compensation, a fair indemnity for its actual loss of guano, but not for its failure to realise probable profits. The value of this guano, at the time and place of loss, based on its value in Peru, can, I think, be ascertained from the evidence in such manner as to give to its owners such fair indemnity, and yet not limit it to the recovery of only 1,424.25dols. as the expense of shipment, with no value in the guano itself. This can be done without conflicting with the general rule. Because the Peruvian paid nothing for the guano, it does not follow that no value, as substantially a market value of it in Peru, can be ascertained. Nor, on the other hand, does the 12dols. a ton gold, or the 30dols. a ton gold, on the exceptional sales referred to, furnish a fair standard of market value. Mr. Hobson, a merchant residing in the city of New York, who has been for thirty years in the business of importing goods from the west coast of South America and other South American ports, testifies as follows: "Q. Suppose an article of merchandise is produced or obtained in Peru, the same not being there sold as an article of commerce for exportation, and for which there is a market in the United States, what would you, as a merchant, consider its value in Peru, in reference to the net proceeds of its sale in the United States, if it could be bought in Peru for exportation? A. With reference to net proceeds, and looking to a fair average profit, I should think it would be worth from 10 to 12 per cent. off from the net proceeds. To get at the net proceeds, I would take out shipping expenses, freight, duties (if any), marine insurance, and all port charges here, also commission for selling. If it could be bought at such rates in Peru for exportation, that would create a demand for it there for exportation." "By this fair average profit," the witness states that he means the usual mercantile result after paying for the article in a foreign country and all charges on it. There is no testimony in contradiction to this, or naming any other percentage as a deduction for a "fair average profit." The Government of Peru, in respect of its guano, was a merchant, exporting it and selling it in the market of New York, and making a mercantile profit on it. To be sure, the Government made a larger profit on it than the mere mercantile profit, and which larger profit included the mercantile profit; but the value in Peru which is to be ascertained is the value of the guano as an article to be dealt with there by a merchant seeking to export it and realise only a fair mercantile profit on it. That value is the proper value in this case, and can be readily ascertained in the method testified to by Mr. Hobson. The rate of profit is a matter of expert knowledge, as to which Mr. Hobson, as an expert, can speak. No expert contradicts him, or gives any other rate than that which he gives. Under the customs laws, where actual market value in the foreign port is required to be stated in invoices, it has been held that, in the absence of sales of offers to sell in the foreign port, the cost of manufactured goods, with a manufacturer's profit added, may be resorted to as a means of ascertaining the market value of such goods in the foreign port: (Six Cases of Silk Ribbons, 3 Benedict, 536.) In every case where market value abroad is sought to be ascertained, and there is no standard by sales abroad, that method of ascertaining such market value or its equivalent must be resorted to, which, under all the circumstances of the particular case, furnishes the nearest approach to such value abroad, as that a fair mercantile profit, and no more and no less, will be allowed to the merchant, in view of the net proceeds at the place of importation. That was the view in the case of the silk ribbons, and that is the view of this case. The decree in respect to the guano will be drawn up on the basis indicated.

On the appeal by the owners of the ship the respondents must have costs of appeal. On the appeal by the respondents, the appellees, other than the Republic of Peru, must have costs of appeal: and on such appeal, as between the appellants and the Republic of Peru, the appellants must have costs of appeal. On the appeal by the Republic of Peru, the respondents must have costs of appeal. The decree below is affirmed as to damages, except as to the amount awarded to the Republic of Peru, and it is affirmed as to the costs it awards, except as it awards costs to the Republic of Peru.

SITTINGS AT WESTMINSTER.

Reported by P. B. Hutchins and W. Appleton, Esqs., Barristers-at-Law.

May 4, 16, 17, and July 2, 1878.

(Before Brett, Cotton, and Thesiger, L.JJ.)

Porteous and others v. Watney and others.

Shipping— Charter-party — Demurrage — Bill of lading—"All other conditions as per charter-party."

In a charter-party entered into between plaintiffs and B. and Co., it was stipulated that fourteen days should be allowed for loading and unloading, and ten days on demurrage. Defendants were indorsees of a bill of lading, which contained the terms "paying freight for said goods and all other conditions as per charter-party." Defendants' goods were stowed at the bottom of the hold, and, owing to the delay of the consignees of the goods stowed above the defendants', the defendants were unable to obtain delivery of their goods within the lay days, and three days' demurrage were incurred:

Held (affirming the judgment of Lush, J.), that the defendants were liable for the demurrage, as the charter-party was incorporated in the bill of lading. (a)

The words "paying freight and all other conditions as per charter-party" in a bill of lading include all the terms of the charter-party as to demurrage, so as to render an indorsee of the bill of lading liable for such demurrage if incurred.

When a bill of lading or charter-party (the terms whereof are incorporated in the bills of lading) contains a clause providing that the cargo of the ship shall be discharged in a certain number of days or demurrage paid, a consignee of part of the cargo whose goods are not discharged within the lay days provided, is liable for demurrage, although the delay has been caused by no default of his, but by the default of other consignees whose goods are stowed above his in the ship, provided there is no default on the part of the ship owner.

This action was tried at the Hilary sittings in London before Lush J. without a jury. Judgment was given for the plaintiffs for 150*l.*, the whole amount claimed.

The facts were as follows: The plaintiffs, the owners of the ship Stamford, entered into a charter-party with Brand and Co. for the conveyance of a cargo from Cronstadt by which it was stipulated that fourteen days were to be allowed for loading and unloading at the port of discharge and ten days on demurrage at 35*l.* per day; the master to sign bills of lading without prejudice to the charter-party, but at not less than chartered rate, and to have an absolute lien on cargo for freight, dead freight, and demurrage; the cargo to be brought and taken from alongside at merchant's risk and expense.

The defendants were consignees of a portion of the cargo, which portion was stowed at the bottom of the main hold, and under that of the other consignees. The bills of lading, one of which was endorsed to the defendants, stipulated for the delivery of the goods to order or assigns, "on paying freight for the said goods, and all other conditions as per charter-party." Owing to no neglect of the defendants, but owing to the delay of other consignees in unloading the cargo above the defendants' goods, the defendants were unable to obtain delivery of their goods, and three days' demurrage were incurred, for which this action was brought.

The case was reserved for further consideration, and on March 8th, 1878, the following judgment was delivered by

Lush, J.—The circumstances under which the defendants are sought to be made liable to demurrage are precisely the same as those in Straker v. Kidd and Co. (a) The only distinction between the

(a) The effect of this decision is to make each of the consignees liable to demurrage, whether his goods remain on board or not, after the expiration of the lay days, provided there is no default on the part of the former.—Ed.

This was also an action tried during Hilary Sittings in London, before Lush, J., without a jury, and reserved for further consideration. The facts are fully set out in the judgment.

Watkin Williams, Q.C. and J. C. Mathew for the defendants.

March 8.—Lush, J.—This is an action for two days' demurrage of the steamer Charles Mitchell, which had been chartered by Messrs. Gibsone and Co., for the conveyance of a cargo of wheat from Dantzic to London. Eight bills of lading were given by the master for various portions of the wheat shipped by the charterers, one of which had been indorsed to the defendants. Each of them contained the following clause: "Three working days to discharge the whole cargo, or 30*l.* sterling per day demurrage." The vessel arrived on the morning of the 23rd of May, was reported at the Custom House at eleven o'clock, and was ready to discharge at noon of the same day. None of the consignees, however, were ready to receive delivery on that day, and the discharge did not commence till the morning of the 24th. One question raised at the trial was whether the lay days commenced at noon of the 23rd or on the following day. In the view which I take of the contract it becomes immaterial to decide this question. It happened that the defendants' portion of the cargo, except a comparatively small quantity which lay in the bunker and upon which no question arises, was part of a larger bulk stowed at the bottom of the hold, which belonged to the defendants and to another consignee in given proportions. This bulk was not reached till between two and three o'clock on Saturday the 26th. The barges of the other consignee being alongside first, his portion of the bulk was first delivered; and the defendants, though their barges had been in readiness the whole day, were unable to get any part of their cargo till after five o'clock. The discharge was, therefore, only commenced that afternoon, and was not completed till the Monday, whereby the vessel lost two days' sail. The defendants contended that, as they could not get their goods in time to clear the ship on that day, they were entitled to a reasonable time on the Monday to complete; that the default, if any, was that of the master, who was unable, and therefore was not ready, to deliver in time to enable them to discharge the ship within the lay days. On the other hand it was argued that the plaintiffs were always ready and willing to discharge the cargo, and that the risk of being prevented from getting their goods by the delay of other consignees is a risk which falls on the consignees and not on the shipowner. The first question is, what is the contract which is implied by the acceptance of a bill of lading containing the stipulation in question? It cannot be said that the words have no meaning, or that they were not intended to be binding to some extent; for the obvious purpose of the shipowner in inserting them was to secure the payment of a stipulated sum per day for demurrage, in case his ship should be detained in the process of unloading beyond three two cases is in the form of the bill of lading. In the present case the ship was chartered to convey a cargo of grain from Cronstadt to this country, and to be delivered here as directed by bills of lading. The charter stipulates that fourteen working days were to be allowed for loading and unloading at the port of discharge, and ten days on demurrage at 35*l.* day by day. The bills of lading, one of which for part of the cargo contained the words "paying freight for the same goods and all other conditions as per charter-party." Seven days had been consumed at the port of loading, so that seven working days remained for unloading at the port of discharge. It was argued that the words of reference in the bill of lading import into it only so much of the stipulation in the charter-party as applies to those particular goods—that is, that it gives the consignee such a proportion of the seven days for discharging them as his part of the cargo bears to the whole. But this is not the natural meaning of the words, nor can it have been the intention of either party. The object of the shipowner obviously was to place the consignees under the same obligation as to payment of demurrage as the charter imposed on the charterer; and any consignee knows before he reads the charter that if lay days are provided they are given for discharging the whole cargo. The bill of lading must be read as if instead of the words referring to the charter-party it had contained the entire stipulation, expanded so as to be adapted to the facts. "Seven working days are to be allowed for unloading the ship at the port of discharge, and ten days on demurrage at 35*l.* day by day." This puts the present case exactly on a parallel with that of Straker v. Kidd and Co., and I therefore, for the reasons given in the judgment in that case, hold that the defendants are liable for the three days demurrage claimed by the writ, making 105*l.*, and give judgment accordingly with costs.

From this judgment the defendants appealed.

May 4, 16, and 17.—Butt, Q.C. and Mathew for the defendants.—The terms "all other conditions as per charter-party" must be held to mean such conditions as are applicable to these goods. If the meaning is not restricted in this sense the contract becomes unreasonable; the holder of the bill of lading becomes liable for the delay of a third party. But the default of this third party is as between the shipowner and the other consignees the default of the shipowner. The ship cannot be said to be ready to unload as regards the defendants until she is in such a state that they can reach their goods, and the lay days do not begin to run against the defendants until the ship is ready for them to remove their goods.

A. L. Smith and R. T. Reid for the plaintiffs.—The bill of lading incorporates the charter-party so far as the same is applicable to the subject of the contract in the bill of lading, that is, such clauses as refer to the carriage and delivery of these goods. Therefore the condition that all goods are to be cleared in fourteen days refers to these goods, and therefore the holder of the bill of lading is liable when there is no default of the shipowner. The consignees are in the position of co-sureties; they contract that the ship shall be days, demurrage at the rate of 30*l.* per day shall be paid. This is the alternative which the bill of lading presents, and which the consignee implied agrees to by taking the benefit of it. The objection raised against this rendering of the clause is undoubtedly striking. It virtually makes each holder of such a bill of lading answerable for the others as well as for himself, though he has no control over their acts. But no other construction can be put upon the clause without doing violence to the words or introducing a qualification which destroys their force. If the words had been, as the defendants contend they should be read, "Three days to discharge the goods in this bill of lading or demurrage," the defendants would have been in no better position; for the words must have been construed as an absolute contract to clear the goods within that time. The argument on the part of the defendants requires the insertion of a proviso, making the liability to demurrage conditional on their not being delayed by the acts or defaults of the other consignees. That would make it an entirely different contract, and defeat the obvious intention of the shipowner, which was to put pressure upon all the consignees, and make it the interest of all of them to clear the ship within the stipulated period, under the penalty of their having to pay 30*l.* per day, leaving it to them to settle between themselves how, by whom, and in what proportions the demurrage account should be paid. It seems to me, therefore, impossible to construe this clause otherwise than as a contract to pay stipulated demurrage if the ship is not cleared within three days. There is, of course, an implied condition that the shipowner shall be ready and willing to deliver. If he wrongfully refuses to give over the goods, or if by reason of any default of his or of any obstacle for which he is responsible, the consignee is unable to get his goods, this would afford a good answer to the claim, and this is the substance of the defence which is pleaded. Now, the only thing which prevented the delivery in the present case was the inability of the master to get at the goods, because they were stored at the bottom of the hold, and because the owners of the superincumbent goods had neglected to take those goods away in proper time. Can this neglect of the other consignees be said to be the default of the master? If not, it is immaterial whose fault it was; for the defendants undertook that, whether they were able to get away their goods or not, they would pay demurrage if the ship was not cleared within the stipulated period, the contract being, as I have said, an absolute and not a conditional contract. The defendants are therefore liable, unless they can show that some act or default of the owner, or of someone for whom he is responsible, prevented them from performing their contract. Now, it is clear that the master was not in default, he was ready and anxious to deliver. The leaving those goods in the ship which overlaid the defendants' was not his act but was the act of third persons, not with his consent, but against his will. The case, therefore, falls within the principle laid down in Thiis v. Byers (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 147) and the cases there cited, that when the vessel has arrived at the place of discharge, and the master is ready to commence and complete the delivery, the lay days begin to run, and the consignee must bear the risk of any ordinary casualty or obstruction which might occur to interrupt the process of discharge. The cases on this particular point are but few, and they are conflicting. In Leer v. Yates (3 Taunt. 387) the Court of Common Pleas held, after taking time to consider, under a similar bill of lading, that the consignee was liable for demurrage, though he was prevented from getting his goods by the delay of other consignees whose goods lay above his. But Lord Tenterden, in two subsequent cases—Rogers v. Hunter (M. & M. 63) and Dobson v. Droop (M. & M. 441)—dissented from this doctrine; and directed the jury in a similar case that if a consignee cannot get his goods because some other person's goods prevented him, he is not liable for the detention of the vessel. I do not find that this ruling was questioned by motion to the court, nor do I find any subsequent decision on the point. Leer v. Yates (3 Taunt. 387) has however, been repeatedly quoted as an authority and is I think, upon principle, a sound decision. Lord Tenterden's dictum describes the position of a consignee whose bill of lading mentions no specific time for unloading, but it overlooks the nature and effect of such a stipulation as was contained in the bill of lading in those cases, and as is contained in the bill of lading now in question. My judgment is, therefore, for the plaintiff for two days' demurrage at 30*l.* per day, and costs.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 2.—The following judgments were delivered:—

Thesiger, L.J.—I am of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed.

By the terms of the bill of lading the consignee is only to receive his goods on the payment of freight for them, and on the fulfilment of all other conditions as per charter-party. Among these conditions is that by which the shipowner stipulates for payment of demurrage at a fixed rate in the event of the vessel carrying the goods being detained beyond the working days allowed by the charter-party. The language used, if construed according to its natural meaning, imports a liability on the part of the consignee for demurrage co-extensive with the liability of the charterer, and the court ought not to depart from what is the natural meaning of words selected by the parties to the contract, unless compelled by strong reasons or distinct authority. In Wegener v. Smith (15 C. B. 285; 24 L. J. 25, C. P.) the words of the bill of lading were substantially the same as here, viz., "against payment of the agreed freight and other conditions as per charter-party," and the construction put upon them was that to which I have referred. It is true, as was pointed out in the later case of Smith v. Sieveking (4 E. & B. 945; 24 L. J. 257, Q.B.), that there the demurrage sued for had arisen from the default of the defendant, but this fact was not even alluded to in the judgments of the learned judges who decided the case, and was not the ground of the decision. In Gray v. Carr (1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 115; L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 522) the words were "he or they paying freight and all other conditions or demurrage (if any should be incurred) for the said goods as per the aforesaid charter-party," and although the Court of Exchequer Chamber decided against the shipowner on the ground that the claim set up by him for damages for short loading was not provided for under the term "dead freight" used in the charter-party, so that the case is not a direct authority upon the point under consideration, yet, inasmuch as the majority of the court, consisting of four out of six judges, were of opinion that under the words "all other conditions as per the aforesaid charter-party" the holder of the bill of lading would have been liable for dead freight if any had been payable, the case at least indirectly confirms the authority of Wegener v. Smith (supra.) The cases of Chappel v. Comfort (10 C.B. N.S. 802), Fry v. The Chartered Mercantile Bank of India (L. Rep. 1 C. P. 689; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O.S. 346), and Smith v. Sieveking (4 E. & B. 945) which have been cited on behalf of the defendants in the present case, so far from weakening the authority of Wegener v. Smith, appear to me to tend still further to strengthen it. In each of them the reference to the charter-party contained in the bill of lading was either expressly by the use of the words "freight as per charter-party," as in the two first cases, or impliedly by the use of the words "paying for the said goods as per charter-party," as in the last case, limited to the condition in the charter-party relating to freight, and was held to be made simply for the purpose of ascertaining the rate of freight, and not for the purpose of imposing an obligation upon the holders of the bill of lading to perform the conditions of the charter-party generally. In none of these cases was any doubt thrown upon the correctness of the decision in Wegener v. Smith, while in Smith v. Sieveking it is expressly approved of, and the court in referring to the language of the bill of lading says: "This plainly indicated to the consignee that before he was entitled to the delivery of the goods he was bound to make a payment beyond the freight; and there was a reference to the charter-party for some condition to be performed beyond the payment of freight. That condition was payment of demurrage, and the bill of lading was construed as if it had expressly made the payment of demurrage a condition on the performance of which the goods were deliverable. The consignee accepting the goods under such a bill of lading could not escape the payment of demurrage by denying his liability to pay it." The true result of the authorities, therefore, is that a bill of lading, in which the words "and all other conditions as per charter-party" follow the expression "on paying freight" or "paying for the said goods," or similar expressions, imports a liability on the part of the consignee of goods under the bill of lading to pay the demurrage stipulated for by the terms of charter-party to which it refers.

It is said, however, on the part of the defendants, that the present case is distinguishable from those of Wegener v. Smith and Gray v. Carr, by the fact that in them the bill of lading comprised the whole cargo, while here it comprises only a portion of the cargo; but, with the exception of an observation of Maule, J. (made in the course of the argument in the former case), I can find nothing which would justify me in supposing that such a distinction exercised any material effect upon the decisions in those cases, and the absence of any reference in the judgments to it is an argument against its existence. For myself, I feel a difficulty in seeing how the construction of a bill of lading, which on its face may not, and in many cases will not, prove the fact whether the goods to which it refers do or do not constitute the whole cargo of a chartered ship, can, upon a point like that under consideration, alter according to whether the parol evidence establishes that fact in the affirmative or negative. One view by which it is suggested that this difficulty is met is that the construction is not altered, but that the conditions of the charter-party are to be read into the bill of lading not absolutely, but with reference to the goods which are the subject of it; and that, just as the freight, if regulated by the charter-party, is proportionate to the goods carried under the bill of lading, so the demurrage is to be divided among the consignees in proportion to the value of their goods. But this view, by attempting to remove one difficulty, raises another; for it would, if adopted, be incapable of being worked out as a matter of convenient practice. It is impossible to suppose that a shipowner whose ship has been detained beyond the lay days could in practice assert liens or bring actions against all the bill of lading holders for proportionate amounts of demurrage, ascertained by a sort of average statement; and the result would therefore be that a clause in the bill of lading, which would appear to have been inserted for the very purpose of securing the liens to which the shipowner is entitled by the charter-party, would become practically inoperative. Another view presented is, that the working day under the charter-party must be allotted among the consignees of the cargo in proportion to the amount of cargo to be respectively received by them, so that, if in the present case there had been seven consignees of the cargo in equal portions, then there being seven working days left for unloading at the port of discharge, each consignee would be entitled to one day for unloading, and would only be liable for demurrage if he exceeded, and to the extent that he exceeded that one day. But this view is as unpractical as the other to which I have just referred, and would, if adopted, lead to the same consequences. There is in reality no practicable middle course between the right of the shipowner to treat each consignee as liable in solido for the demurrage secured by the charter-party, and the right of the bill of lading holder to have his goods entirely freed from the conditions contained in the charter-party as to demurrage; and, even if a middle course were practicable, the parties to the bill of lading contract could only be held to have adopted it by giving a strained interpretation to the words used by them. But then it has been urged upon us that the inconvenience and hardship which would arise if the consignee of a small parcel of goods were held liable for the whole demurrage under the charter-party afford a strong practical argument against the construction of the bill of lading contended for by the plaintiffs. This might be so if it were possible to construe the bill of lading so as to exclude altogether the condition as to demurrage; but, if that condition must be included, as for the reasons I have already given, I think it must, and the words by which it is included in their natural meaning import, as I also think they do, that the condition is to be read as if it had been introduced into the bill of lading, while any other construction of the bill of lading would lead to an utterly impracticable result, the argument founded upon the alleged inconvenience and hardship to the consignee becomes of little force. It is no doubt a startling consequence if the construction which this court puts upon the bill of lading is the true one—if, as it has been suggested, and as I understand Brett, L.J. holds—the shipowner can recover the demurrage against all as well as against any one or more of the consignees, so that he may be paid over and over again. If the words of the charter-party are to be read into the bill of lading in such a manner as that reference to the charter-party, and to what is done under the charter-party, except for the purpose of reading the words in, cannot be made, such a consequence would follow; but in that case Leer v. Yates (3 Taunt. 387) becomes an authority that, notwithstanding that consequence, the consignee is liable for the entire demurrage; and Leer v. Yates, notwithstanding the dissent from the doctrine laid down in it expressed by Lord Tenterden in the cases of Rogers v. Hunter (M. & M. 63) and Dobson v. Droop (M. & M. 441), still stands as an authority.

But on the other hand, without taking upon myself to express an opinion upon a point which is not directly before us, especially in the face of the opinion of Brett, L.J., I must at least say that I do not think it altogether clear that, when a bill of lading stipulates that a consignee under it is to have his goods on payment of freight, and on the performance of all other conditions of the charter-party, and in point of fact all demurrage due under the charter-party has been paid to the shipowner by some other consignee under a similar bill of lading, so that the condition in the charter-party as to demurrage has been performed, although not by the particular consignee, that fact would not constitute in equity, if not at law, a defence to an action for demurrage brought against the first consignee. Be this how it may, I feel bound, by the language of the contract between the parties in this case, to hold that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover against the defendants the demurrage claimed, and consequently that the decision in their favour by the learned judge in the court below was right, and should be affirmed.

COTTON, L.J.—I entirely agree in the decision and also in the reasons which have been given by Thesiger, L. J. for the conclusion which he has arrived at. The real question we have to decide is this, What is the contract and the consequences of the contract entered into between the defendant and the shipowner by means of this bill of lading? Now, I have considered for some time whether or not a distinction might be drawn in this case in consequence of its being a bill of lading of part only of the cargo, and whether we should introduce with all its consequences those conditions of the charter-party which are relied upon into the bill of lading; but I find it impossible, according to the ordinary and usual rule of construction, to come to any other conclusion. This is simply a question of construction, subject to any decisions which have laid down rules for our guidance, and subject to which we must always consider the meaning where parties have expressed themselves in an ambiguous way which is capable of two meanings, and carry into effect the intention of the parties with regard to the contract they have entered into; but the words, to my mind, of the bill of lading, combined with the charter-party, are sufficiently clear to establish that the plaintiffs in this case are right. The bill of lading is this: "paying freight for the same goods, and all other conditions as per charter-party." That, of course, must be performing all other conditions as per charter-party. Now, here we have an express provision in the charter-party that the shipowner shall have an absolute lien on the cargo for all freight, dead freight, and demurrage. It is impossible not to import that into the contract entered into by the bill of lading without rejecting those words, "all other conditions." We are not entitled to reject them unless there is something manifestly inconsistent. The lien generally is on the cargo, and on every part of it; and although the bill of lading refers to one part of the cargo, yet my opinion, as a matter of construction of the contract between the parties, is that the condition shall be introduced, and being introduced there is a lien on every part of the cargo for demurrage, and therefore on the construction of the contract the plaintiff is right. If parties choose to make these contracts they must take the consequences, and not come to the court to enforce an unnatural construction of words simply for the purpose of avoiding an inconvenience which possibly they may not have conceived, but which is the result of a fair construction of the contract into which they have entered. As regards the questions whether the plaintiffs could recover from each holder of a bill of lading the full amount of the demurrage, the question does not arise before us; therefore I think it better not to express any opinion upon it, though I do not in any way express dissent or any opinion either way on that point. We have simply to consider this, whether or no the plaintiffs have or have not, under their contract with the defendants, a right to recover the sums sued for, and in my opinion they have.

BRETT, L.J.—I must confess I have struggled long and hard to be able conscientiously to differ from the judgment, but I have not being able to do so, and notwithstanding the somewhat astounding results to which the decision brings one, in consequence of what I cannot help thinking (I suppose for some good business reason) the obstinate persistence of merchants to accept bills of lading in this form, I cannot differ from the decision, and the reason why is this, that I think one would be obliged to break too many settled rules of law. The bill of lading is taken "on paying freight for the same goods, and all other conditions as per charter-party." I tried in Gray v. Carr (1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 115, 120; L. Rep. 6 Q. B. at p. 533) to give what I thought was a reasonable interpretation to those words "and all other conditions as per charter-party." but my interpretation was not accepted by the majority of the court; and I take the decision in Gray v. Carr to have been that those words in a bill of lading are to be treated as words of reference to the charter-party, and that they therefore introduce into the bill of lading every condition that is in the charter-party by way of reference; so that they bring into the bill of lading every condition of the charter-party in its terms, and make every one of those conditions part of the bill of lading, as if they had been originally written into it. But then there is another rule which applies, which is, that if, taking all the conditions to be in the bill of lading, some of them are entirely and absolutely insensible and inapplicable, they must be struck out as insensible, not because they are not introduced, but because being introduced they are impossible of application. The bill of lading must therefore be considered as if all the conditions of the charter-party had been absolutely written into it originally, and then we have a bill of lading in this form: Fourteen working days for loading and unloading, and ten days on demurrage. Now, it is impossible to say that that condition is not applicable to a bill of lading, although the bill of lading represents only part of the cargo. It is applicable, although it seems strange that a person should enter into such a contract. Now, what is the next rule? The bill of lading claims to be a contract between the shipowner and the person taking the bill of lading. There is no relation at all between the holders or takers of other bills of lading and any one holder of a bill of lading. There is no relation between them at all. They are not co-sureties. It therefore seems to me that, when it is said we can look at all the bills of lading and then divide the days of demurrage or the lay days between them we are looking at other bills of lading which cannot be put in evidence. They cannot be received in evidence in an action between the shipowner and the holder of a bill of lading; and therefore, when it is said that the bill of lading represents a part of the cargo, and that the other bills of lading are in the same form. we break the rule which forbids us to look at them; for we do not know whether the other bills of lading are in the same form at all. Then what is the contract represented by the bill of lading with the stipulation in it? It seems to me that the cases of Randall v. Lynch (2 Camp. 352), Leer v. Yates (3 Tannt. 387), and particularly the late case of Thiis v. Byers (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 147), show what the contract is when that contract is in this form. It is not that the holder of the bill of lading will discharge his cargo within a reasonable time after he is able to do so; it is that, if the ship is not able to discharge the whole of her cargo within the given number of days after she is at the usual place of discharge, the holder of that bill of lading will pay a certain sum for each day beyond, however the delay may be caused, unless it is by default of the shipowner; he has made himself liable to pay the demurrage. That is stated to be so in Thiis v. Byers (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 147). Therefore the holder of a particular bill of lading is bound to pay according to that contract for every day beyond the days during which the ship remains with the cargo in her, unless that is caused by the fault of the shipowner.

Now, in the case before us there is no fault on the part of the shipowners. The delay might be caused by accidents over which none of the holders of the bills of lading had any control, or it may have been caused—although it is not so found—by delay of the holders of cargo above that of the defendants. But even supposing it is by their neglect, in the contract between the shipowners and the defendants, there is no stipulation about the negligence of other people. The defendants are to pay unless it is the fault of the shipowners. The negligence of the holder of the upper cargo is not the fault of the shipowners; therefore the negligence of owners of the upper cargo would be one of those negligences the consequence of which the defendants have undertaken to pay for. Therefore, whether the owners of the upper cargo were negligent or not, it seems to me that on their contract the defendants must pay. If I could arrive at an opposite conclusion I would, for I do not share the doubt of Thesiger, L.J. I think that, if the holder of a similar bill of lading had been called upon to pay the whole demurrage to the shipowners. the holder of another bill of lading, if sued, could not set that up as a defence. That defence would arise in respect of a contract with which he has nothing to do, and he would have no right to prove that other and wholly independent contract; and therefore I accept the proposition that it would be no defence to the defendant, the owner of the bill of lading, to say that the shipowner had been paid the same sum by all other holders of bills of lading for cargo in the ship. This must follow if people will make such contracts. Therefore I think that we are bound to follow the decision of the court in Leer v. Yates (3 Taunt 387). I cannot do so without considerable hesitation, when I know what judges of the authority of Lord Tenterden and Sir James Mansfield thought upon the matter. We have to decide upon a conflict of authority, and I prefer the decision in Leer v. Yates (3 Taunt. 387) to that in Rogers v. Hunter (Mood. & M. 63) and Dobson v. Droop (Mood. & M. 441).

There is another solution of the problem which has been ingeniously suggested by Mr. Maclachlan in the last edition of his book, at page 496, where he suggests that there are two elements which enter into this question, namely, time and amount; and he proposes a solution somewhat between Sir James Mansfield and Lord Tenterden; but it seems to me that his solution would break the rule and cannot be admitted, and therefore, although I accept the result that the shipowner, where there are this number of contracts, may sue each and every one of the holders of the bill of lading, and recover against each and every one of them, I also accept the result that no one of the holders of bills of lading can defend himself by saying that others have paid before him or may be made liable to pay behind him. He has nothing to do with those independent contracts, he is bound by his own contract—a written contract in terms—and he must pay if the circumstances have arisen. Nothing can relieve him but the fault of the shipowner. It has suggested itself to me that, if the holder of the bill of lading of the upper cargo were to delay the ship by unreasonable delay, it is possible that the holder of the cargo under his might have an action against him for injury to himself by reason of that delay. It may be they owe that duty to each other that no one of them shall negligently delay; but there may be difficulties in bringing such an action. He may not have notice of the contract, or there may be other difficulties; still I think it is possible he may have that remedy—it is reasonable, but to my mind he certainly can have no other; he cannot maintain an action against the others for contribution. So that I accept the whole consequence that was seen by Sir James Mansfield in Leer v. Yates (3 Taunt. 387); but at the same time I think the rules of law oblige us to say that the holder of each bill of lading is liable if the ship is delayed beyond the number of days allowed in his bill of lading. Therefore I think that the judgment of Lush, J. is correct, and must be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

KALTENBACH v. MACKENZIE.

Marine insurance—Constructive total loss—Notice of abandonment.

Notice of abandonment is a condition precedent to a claim for a constructive total loss, except in the one case where such notice could not possibly be of any benefit to the underwriters.

Plaintiff's vessel was insured with the defendants on a voyage from Saigon to Hong Kong. The ship sailed from Saigon on 14th Jan. 1871, and on the 22nd she struck upon a bank, and was damaged. On the 24th she was towed to Saigon, and discharged her cargo. She was then surveyed, and the surveyors recommended she should be sold. On 7th Feb. the owners' house at Singapore made up their minds to sell, and wrote to the captain to that effect. On 11th Feb. the ship was condemned, and on the 23rd was sold. On 27th Feb. the Singapore house wrote to their agents in London, stating the survey and that the ship had been sold, and directing them to inform the underwriters in London. On 11th March the plaintiff's firm claimed for a total loss against the underwriters.

Held (reversing the decision of the C. P. Div., Grove, Denman, and Lopes, JJ.), that notice of abandonment was necessary, that no such notice was given, and that plaintiff was consequently not entitled to recover.

APPEAL from a decision of the Common Pleas Division.

The action was on a policy of marine insurance, claiming as for a total loss.

The defendant paid money into court for a partial loss.

The facts proved at the trial were as follows:

The plaintiff is a partner in the firm of Kaltenbach, Engler, and Co., who carry on business at Paris, Singapore, and Saigon. In 1867 they became the owners of the ship Admiral Protet, of which the plaintiff was the only registered owner, the other members of the firm being foreigners.

On the 4th Oct. 1870 the Admiral Protet was insured under Lloyds' policy, for 4000*l.* for a voyage from Saigon to Hong Kong, the policy being made in England in consequence of the Franco-Prussian war.

On the 14th Jan. 1871 the ship sailed from Saigon with a cargo of rice; and on the 22nd Jan. she went ashore on Britt's Shoal, and sustained great injury. She was floated off the same day, and on the 24th she was towed into Saigon, and discharged her cargo. She was then surveyed, and the surveyors, on the 3rd Feb., made their report, recommending that she should be sold.

On the 30th Jan. 1871 the plaintiff's house at Saigon wrote to the house at Singapore, giving particulars of the disaster, and stating that the condemnation of the ship was highly probable.

On the 3rd Feb. the surveyors' report having been made, the master of the vessel wrote to the Singapore firm stating the survey and that it was recommended that the vessel should be sold. On the 7th Feb. the firm at Singapore wrote to the master of the vessel, stating that they thought it best that he should follow the advice of the surveyor and let the vessel be sold.

On the 20th Feb. the Singapore firm received a letter from Saigon as follows:

You may depend that Admiral Protet average documents will be made with the utmost care. We will do all in our power to avoid trouble on behalf of the underwriters. The Admiral Protet will be sold on the 23rd.

The ship was sold on the 23rd for 1600 dollars.

On the 27th Feb. the Singapore firm wrote to Messrs. Im Thurn and Co., the plaintiff's agents in London, as follows:

We are sorry to inform you that, at a survey held on the Admiral Protet in the Government dock at Saigon, it has been found that the damages are so serious that it would cost from 18,000 to 20,000 dollars to repair the same, and that the repairs would take four months' time, as Government cannot place the dock at the ship's disposal for such a length of time, the same being more specially reserved for repairing ships of war. Considering, also, that in her present state she could not sail for some other port for repairs, and as the costs of repairs would have exceeded the amount insured on her, the surveyor recommended that the Admiral Protet should be sold on account of the underwriters, and the sale was to take place on the 23rd Feb. We do not know as yet how the sale has turned out. Kindly inform the underwriters.

On the 11th March the owners gave notice that they claimed for a total loss. This claim was resisted by the underwriters on the ground that notice of abandonment was necessary, and had not been given to them by the owners.

At the trial Lord Coleridge, C.J. nonsuited the plaintiff, on the ground that notice of abandonment was, under the circumstances of the case essential, and that there was no evidence of any such notice having been given.

A rule nisi for a new trial was afterwards obtained by the plaintiff on the ground of misdirection.

The Common Pleas Division made this rule absolute.

The defendant appealed.

The case in the court below is reported ante, p. 15; 38 L. T. Rep. N. S. 942.

Butt, Q.C., Cohen, Q.C., and Hollams, for the defendant.—There was plenty of time between the 7th and 23rd Feb. for the Singapore firm to communicate with the underwriters, and there was no necessity for an immediate sale. The Singapore house had all the materials before them for the purpose of making their election whether they would abandon the vessel or not, and they ought as a matter of law to have given notice of the abandonment within a reasonable time. They cited.

BRETT, L J.—Two questions are raised in this case: first, whether notice of abandonment was necessary; and, secondly, whether it was given in time. It seems to me that, before going into the particulars of the case, I ought to state what my view of the law is.

I agree that there is a great difference between abandonment and notice of abandonment, and I agree with what has been said by Lord Blackburn, that the doctrine of notice is not peculiar to a policy of marine insurance. It is part of the doctrine of indemnity, and wherever persons have entered into a contract of indemnity, and claim an absolute indemnity, there must be an abandonment and a notice of abandonment. The doctrine of abandonment can only arise where the assured claims for a total loss. There are two kinds of total loss: 1, actual; 2, constructive; but in both the assured claims for a total loss, and abandonment must take place in both. For instance, if there is a total loss, and, as was said by Lord Abinger, the ship has become a wreck or mere congeries of planks, or something remains of the cargo which is not the goods themselves but the remains of goods, there must be abandonment; but if there is an actual total loss there is, of course, no abandonment, because there is nothing to abandon. But in cases of constructive total loss notice of abandonment is necessary. How came that doctrine to arise? Some judges have said that it is a necessary equity. I doubt whether that is the origin of notice of abandonment. I think it was introduced by the unanimous consent of shipowners and underwriters, and has therefore become part of their contract. I think, therefore, that being part of the contract, the notice of abandonment is a condition precedent to a claim for a constructive total loss. Now, a loss may occur in any part of the world, and losses frequently occur in places where the underwriter has no power to get notice of the loss except from the assured, and there might be great danger that the owner of the ship or goods might take his own time to consider what to do, and to wait and find out whether the markets were likely to rise or fall before he arrived at any decision, and this is the reason why in all cases it is made a part of the contract that, when there is a claim for constructive total loss, notice of abandonment must be given. That being so, and this being made part of the contract, then came the office of the judges, as disputes arose as to when notice of abandonment must be given. It was questioned whether or not the notice must be given when the assured first heard of the loss, and the judges decided that the assured must have reasonable time to ascertain the nature of the loss. For instance, if the owner hears that his vessel is damaged, that is not sufficient information; he must know the nature of the damage. If he hears that his ship is captured in the time of war, then it is obviously a total loss. If he hears that his ship is stranded with her bottom out and her back broken, yet still is in existence, but is in such a state that any reasonable man must know that she is in imminent danger of being utterly lost, then he must at once give notice of abandonment. When he hears that the damage is such as to cause imminent danger of total loss, then he must give notice of abandonment: but if his information be otherwise, then he can have a reasonable time to wait. Notice of abandonment is a condition precedent, and must be given directly after the assured knows that his ship is in so dangerous a condition as to be likely to prove a total loss; but in cases of uncertainty a reasonable time is allowed. But then there is this state of things to be considered, when the ship and goods are put in danger, and neither the assured nor the underwriters is at hand. Then the captain of the vessel alone must act; indeed, under such circumstances, captains have sold ship and cargo where they were not insured. As a general rule, as to the propriety of sale and the title a captain can give, I say that he has in himself no right without the consent of the owners; but, if it be a case of urgent necessity, then he becomes an agent so as to bind the owner of the ship and goods. The rule is then that, if the circumstances are such that any reasonable person having authority would sell, then the captain can sell, and what he does is binding on the owners. When, therefore, there is a constructive total loss of the ship or cargo, circumstances may or may not have arisen to justify the captain in selling, and he may or may not have sold. If the first information which the assured has of the damage to his ship or goods, although it be not of an actual total loss by the perils of the sea, is accompanied also by the information that the captain has sold them, and he has done so justifiably, that is the time when the assured should give his notice of abandonment. In the case of Potter v. Rankin (ubi sup.) it was held that, where no possible advantage could accrue to the assurer from notice of abandonment, then such notice was a mere idle ceremony, and need not be given: but the decision in that case went no further. I will not say that, if it could be shown that the subject-matter was in such a condition that it would disappear before notice of abandonment could be given, the assured might not be excused from giving notice; but I say that nothing short of that would excuse him. I think to go further would let in all the dangers against which the doctrine of notice of abandonment was made part of the contract.

Now for the present case. The ship was undoubtedly badly injured, and, in order to consider the ruling of the learned judge at the trial, we must take it that she was so badly injured that there was imminent danger of her becoming a total loss—that she was, in fact, a constructive total loss; that is to say, in such a condition that if the owners had fulfilled their duties they might have claimed as for a constructive total loss, which must be the existing state of things before a sale takes place or notice of abandonment is given, and that the assured was entitled to abandon. The questions are (1) was the assured excused by the circumstances from giving notice of abandonment? (2) Did he give such notice? (3) If such notice was given, was it given in legal time? It was argued before us that the ship was an actual total loss, but I am of opinion that there is not the least doubt that she was not. I think we must say that she was a constructive total loss, and that the circumstances were such that the owner had a right to consider that the costs of repairing the vessel would be greater than the value of the vessel, and that therefore there was imminent danger of a total loss, and that at the time of the inspection of the vessel he would make such an election as any reasonable man would make, and that then he was bound to give notice of abandonment unless he was excused by the circumstances of the case. The owners were a firm, some at Singapore, and some at Saigon, and I think that the firm at Singapore were the owners who were bound to act. They received information on the 7th Feb. as to the condition of this ship, and I think that they did not receive material information after that time. I think the information they received was such that, unless they were otherwise excused, they were bound to act upon it, as upon information of the imminent danger of the vessel. That being so on the 7th Feb., the ship was not sold, and therefore this case is not within Potter v. Rankin (ubi sup.). Then arose a dispute as to whether or not the firm at Singapore ought to have made a communication by telegram to the underwriters in London. If the telegraph was in use, and was known to be so by the firm at Singapore, then I think that they ought to have made use of this means of communication; but, if it were not so, then they would be justified in sending a letter. There was no evidence which could warrant a jury in saying that the ship would have perished before an answer could be received; and therefore that question did not arise. They ought to have sent a notice of abandonment to the underwriters as soon as was possible. If they were only bound to send this notice by post, then they had no right to let an unreasonable time elapse before sending it. I do not think that they intended to consider the rise or fall of the markets; but, instead of sending the notice to the underwriters or their agent, they only communicated with the owner at Zurich, and therefore failed to give notice of abandonment. None of them made up their minds in time to give notice of abandonment, nor did they send it in due time. The only mode of abandonment under a policy of marine assurance is to give notice, and here I think that the evidence was that the assured did not give notice of abandonment in proper time; and that therefore Lord Coleridge was right in his decision, and the divisional court wrong. I think that they carried the words of Lord Blackburn in Potter v. Rankin (ubi sup.) further than the decision required, and further than Lord Blackburn intended.

COTTON, L.J.—The question raised in this case is whether or not Lord Coleridge was right in his decision. Although the claim was for a total loss, the ship still existed as a ship, and we must consider that the damages were such as to constitute her a constructive total loss. Where the damages to a ship are such that the owner can treat her as a total loss or else repair her, he has a right to elect which course he shall pursue; and if he has elected to treat her as a total loss, he must transfer to the underwriter the ship or thing insured which has not quite perished. As a general rule he must give notice of abandonment as soon as he has received information of the condition in which his ship is; and I think there are two reasons for this rule; the first is, that when he has once made his election to treat the vessel as a total loss, the underwriters can insist upon his doing so, and he cannot go back from his decision; and the second reason for his notice of election is, that the underwriters may do the best they can and make the most they can. I think in this case that there was no evidence of great danger. I think that before the ship was placed in dock she was damaged considerably, but that the leaking was afterwards of a minor character, and such as to justify a jury in finding that she was not in imminent danger. I think that notice of abandonment was not given in due time, and that Lord Coleridge was right and the Court of Common Pleas was wrong, and that their decision must be reversed.

THESIGER, L.J.—I am also of opinion that the judgment of Lord Coleridge was right.

In this case the plaintiff seeks to recover for constructive total loss. It is impossible for him on the facts of the case to put his claim higher, and the underwriters do not contend that the facts proved were otherwise than sufficient to establish such a claim. That being so, the assured had to prove either that he gave notice of abandonment as soon as he received full information as to the state of the vessel; that is to say, as soon as he had all the materials to enable him to elect what course he would pursue, or to prove that the state of circumstances was such as to make a notice of abandonment unnecessary. Before Lord Coleridge the plaintiff adopted the latter alternative; and it was there urged on his behalf that the sale was reasonable and prudent, that the communication of the fact of the sale could not have reached the underwriters in time for them to have given their orders, that the case was within the decision in Potter v. Rankin (ubi sup.), and that no notice of abandonment was necessary. Lord Coleridge assumed, as he was bound to do, that the sale was reasonable and prudent; but he held notwithstanding that the assured must give notice of abandonment, and I agree with him. In the first place, it was a question of fact, whether or not it was impossible to communicate with the underwriters in time. I think even there the assured has failed to establish the impossibility. On the 7th Feb. he was in possession of full materials to enable him to decide whether to abandon or not. There was a telegraph in existence between Singapore and Europe; but I think there is no need for us to decide on that question of fact. I will assume that the question of the telegraph was one for the jury.

But then the question arises as to whether these facts bring this case within the decision in Potter v. Rankin (ubi sup.) in the House of Lords. And now to distinguish between that case and the present case. When, at the time of the assured electing to consider the vessel as a constructive total loss, there is no possibility of the insurer getting any advantage from a notice, then there is no necessity for the mere idle ceremony of giving notice of abandonment. Lord Chelmsford says in Potter v. Rankin (2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 65; L. Rep. 6 E. & I. App.): 'In Farnworth v. Hyde (ubi sup.), under similar circumstances of the loss of the ship insured, and of her sale having reached the assured at the same time, it was held that the underwriters were liable for a total loss without notice of abandonment. This seems to place the rule as to notice of abandonment on a reasonable foundation. No prejudice can possibly arise to the underwriters from withholding a notice when it is wholly out of their power to take any steps to improve or alter their position." Again, Lord Colonsay says. "I think that the reason of the thing tells us that where there is nothing substantially to abandon to the party to whom the notice of abandonment is given, and he could gain nothing by it, then it is not necessary to give that notice." And Lord Hatherley, remarks: "I apprehend, my Lords, that certainly no authority has been cited to show that this notice of abandonment is to be considered necessary in a case where no such advantage could possibly accrue to the underwriters. If the vessel be not really wholly lost, if it be only a constructive total loss, as it is termed (though that is perhaps not a very happy phrase), occasioned by the impossibility of effecting repairs, the cost of which will not exceed the value of the ship when repaired, then there being something in esse to be handed over to the underwriters, it is necessary that they should be informed of this in order that they may have an opportunity of making the best use of what remains. . . . . But in this case there is nothing suggested, and nothing can be suggested (except one single point which I will notice in a moment), as to any advantage that could have been derived by the underwriters from any such notice of a constructive total loss being given to them on the part of those who had insured." It is said that there is something in Lord Blackburn's judgment to extend the principle further; but I say that when the whole of Lord Blackburn's judgment is read it does not help the plaintiff, and goes no further than the decision of the House of Lords, that when no part of the subject-matter is in existence, so that notice of abandonment could be of no advantage to the underwriters, then the assured may be discharged from giving such notice. When we think how far the principle set up on the part of the plaintiff might be carried, we cannot hold in favour of such a construction.

Now, with regard to the facts of this case, there was no evidence to the effect that there was an absolute necessity of selling the ship, although she was a constructive total loss in this sense, that the cost of repairing her would be more than she was worth, but there was no evidence to show that if the sale had been postponed for two or three or four months she was in danger of becoming an actual total loss. I do not think that the plaintiff can say that the immediate necessity for sale excuses him from giving notice of abandonment. Then arises the question, Did the plaintiff in fact elect to abandon in reasonable time, and give notice of abandonment in reasonable time? The letters from the firm at Singapore to Kaltenbach at Zurich were only letters of information, and not notice of abandonment. If the letter of the 27th Feb. can be called a notice of abandonment, it is at all events the first one. On the 7th Feb. the firm at Singapore had full information and materials to elect whether to abandon the vessel or treat her as a partial loss. Then the firm elected to abandon on the 7th Feb. or on the 23rd (the day of sale), or later. If on the 7th, then there are no facts by which the assured can account for the delay between the 7th and the 27th. If the election to abandon was made at a later date, then there is an assumption that the plaintiff was called upon to elect before that date, and that his election was too late.

For these reasons the onus of proof was on the plaintiff, and he failed to give evidence of election of abandonment or notice of abandonment in due time; and I am of opinion that Lord Coleridge was right, and the court below wrong.

Judgment reversed.

Pickup v. The Thames and Mersey Marine Insurance Company (Limited).

Shipping — Marine insurance — Seaworthiness — Onus probandi—Presumption—Misdirection.

Under a plea of unseaworthiness in an action on a policy of insurance, the onus of proof lies upon the defendants throughout, and is never, as a matter of law, shifted to the plaintiffs; but where it is shown by the defendants that the vessel shortly after leaving port is compelled to return disabled, or is totally lost, the shortness of time between the leaving port and the damage or loss may raise a presumption that she was lost or damaged, not by reason of perils insured against, but by reason of unseworthiness before sailing, which presumption requires to be rebutted by the plaintiffs' evidence, and whether such presumption is to prevail or is rebutted, is a question for the jury only.

In an action on a policy of marine insurance the evidence was that eleven days after leaving port the vessel encountered bad weather, and put back in a disabled condition. The judge directed the jury, as a matter of law, that the burden of proof of seaworthiness was shifted from defendants to plaintiff, and that it was for plaintiff to prove that the ship was rendered unseaworthy by perils of the sea encountered after sailing, and insured against.

Held that this was a misdirection.

Watson v. Clark (1 Dow. 336) distinguished and explained.

Action against underwriters on a policy of insurance on freight on a cargo of rice shipped on board the ship Diadem, for a voyage from Rangoon to a port in the United Kingdom.

The case was tried at the Guildhall before Field, J. and a special jury.

The facts proved at the trial showed that the ship sailed from Rangoon, and that after encountering severe weather within eleven days, she had to put back and return to Rangoon. That on a survey which took place several days after her return to Rangoon, her bottom was found to be very much worm-eaten, and that the river at Rangoon was much infested with a species of worm that injured ships.

Field, J., upon these facts, directed the jury as a matter of law that the space of eleven days was sufficient to shift the burden of proof on the issue of seaworthiness from the defendants to the plaintiff, and the jury thereupon found for the defendants.

A rule nisi for a new trial on the ground of misdirection was obtained in the Court of Queen's Bench Division.

The rule was argued in the Q. B. Div. in Feb., when Watkin Williams, Q.C. (with him W. G. Harrison, Q.C.) and Lodge appeared for the defendants, and Butt, Q.C. (with him Cohen, Q.C. and J. C. Mathew), for the plaintiff.

The facts of the case and the arguments sufficiently appear from the judgment of the Q. B. Div., post. Cur. adv. vult.

March 5.—The judgment of the court (Cockburn, C.J., Mellor and Field, JJ.) was delivered by Cockburn, C.J.—This was an action on a policy of insurance on freight on a cargo of rice shipped on board the ship Diadem, on a voyage from Rangoon to a port in the United Kingdom. Amongst other defences was one of unseaworthiness. The cause came on for trial before my Brother Field and a special jury at Guildhall, when, under the direction of the learned judge as to the law applicable to the case, the jury found a verdict for the defendants on the ground that the vessel was unseaworthy on commencing the voyage. The facts, as far as they are necessary for the present purpose, may be expressed in a few words.

The ship having conveyed a cargo of coals to Point-de-Galle, proceeded in ballast to Rangoon, where she loaded a cargo of rice, the freight on which was the subject-matter of the insurance in question. She arrived at Rangoon on the 25th April 1874. Amongst other issues in the cause was one of unseaworthiness at the commencement of her voyage from Galle to Rangoon; but that issue the jury decided in favour of the plaintiff, and no question upon that arises here. For the present purpose the ship must be taken to have been seaworthy on her arrival at Rangoon. She remained there till the 4th June following, when, having loaded her cargo, she set sail on the homeward voyage. Between the 9th and 15th June she encountered severe squalls and a heavy sea, and laboured heavily, and made so much water that the master and crew, becoming alarmed for the safety of the ship, and, satisfied with her inability to perform the voyage home, determined on putting back to Rangoon. On the 19th June, when in the Rangoon river, she grounded on the Silver Sand, but was got off again, and proceeded to Rangoon, where she arrived on the 20th June. In the course of the month of July surveys were held on the ship. She was found to be very much strained, and, in several places where her copper was off, to be very much worm-eaten; and on the 15th July she was pronounced to be unseaworthy, and there was no contest as to her having been so at that time. The question was whether the rough weather she had encountered between the 9th and 15th June, and the straining thereby occasioned had caused her leaky condition; in which case that condition would have been consistent with her having been seaworthy on starting on the voyage; or whether her leaky state had been brought about by the action of the worms, which, from the defective condition of some parts of the copper, had been able to eat their way into her planks, so as to render many of them in an unsound condition.

Arguing on the latter hypothesis, the defendants contended that the worm-eaten condition must have arisen during the period the ship was loading in the Rangoon river, namely, from the 25th of April to the 4th of June; the plaintiff on the other hand contending that the leaky state of the vessel was due to the weather she had encountered, and that the worm-eaten condition, as apparent in the survey, had been produced during her stay at Rangoon, between the time of her return thither and the time of her survey, that is to say, between the 20th of June and the 15th of July, the water there being greatly infested with the species of worms by which wooden vessels are liable to be attacked, and which, owing to portions of her copper having been rubbed off on the occasion of her stranding, had been thus enabled to get at the vessel.

After the close of the evidence, and during the addresses to the jury, the question was raised as to the party upon whom, in this particular case, the onus of proof lay; and the counsel for the underwriters submitted to the learned judge to tell the jury as a matter of law that the onus of proof was in this instance shifted to the plaintiff. This course, however, the learned judge, at that time, declined to adopt, but left the whole issue to the jury, putting the question of burden of proof also to them in the language of Lord Eldon in Watson v. Clark (1 Dow. 344), and laying before them the evidence on one side and the other necessary to enable them to arrive at a conclusion. At the close of the summing up the jury retired to consider their verdict, and after a protracted absence, returned into court, saying that they were unable to agree on their verdict. In answer to a question put by the learned judge, whether there was any point upon which he could give them any assistance, the foreman asked "whether the judge could give them any more precise and positive directions as to which of the parties had the onus of proof cast upon him," upon which my brother Field again used the language of Lord Eldon, but dealt with it this time as a direction in point of law, and directed the jury as matter of law that, while the presumption of law was primâ facie in favour of seaworthiness, and the burden of proving unseaworthiness was, in consequence, in the first instance, on the insurers; yet that, if the inability of a ship to proceed on the voyage becomes evident in a short time after her sailing, the presumption of law is that the inability arose from causes existing before she set sail, and that in such event the burden of proof becomes shifted, and that it then rests with the assured to show that the inability arose from causes occurring subsequently to the commencement of the voyage; and, in reference to the particular case, the learned judge directed the jury, as matter of law, that the time which elapsed between the departure of the ship from Rangoon on the 4th June and her putting back on the 15th, was a sufficiently short time to shift the onus of proof and to make it incumbent on the assured to satisfy the jury that the unseaworthiness of the vessel arose from causes occurring subsequently to her setting out on the voyage.

We are of opinion that this direction cannot be upheld, and that there must be a new trial; and in this view the learned judge on consideration himself concurs. We do not say that time may not be an element in the consideration of a question of unseaworthiness. If a vessel very shortly after leaving port founders or becomes unable to prosecute her voyage, in the absence of any external circumstances to account for such disaster or inability, the irresistible inference arises that her misfortune has been due to inherent defects existing at the time at which the risk attached. But this is not by reason of any legal presumption or shifting of the burden of proof, but simply as matter of reason and common sense brought to bear upon the question as one of fact, inasmuch as, in the absence of every other possible cause, the only conclusion which can be arrived at is that inherent unseaworthiness must have occasioned the result. Indeed, on clear consideration, it becomes apparent that time enters to a very limited extent in arriving at this conclusion. If the vessel strikes on a rock or a sandbank immediately after leaving port, or, while still in sight of it, is overpowered by a storm, the shortness of time which has elapsed since she started becomes at once immaterial. On the other hand, though the vessel may have been at sea days, or even weeks, if during the whole of the time she has had favourable weather, fair winds, and calm seas, and yet goes down, or proves unable to continue on her course, the same inference as to inherent unseaworthiness presents itself as in the former case, though perhaps with diminished cogency in proportion as the interval has been longer. But in the latter case, as in the former, the inference arises from the impossibility of ascribing the result to any other cause than the condition of the vessel on starting on the voyage, the interval of time being matter of very secondary consideration if of any. It is from the entire absence of any other cause than inherent unseaworthiness that the probative value of such a combination of circumstances is derived. Time can enter to a very limited extent only, if it enters at all, into the question as a factor in leading to the result. It certainly cannot be said of itself and without more, to give rise to any new presumption of law, or, as matter of law, to shift the onus of proof from the party on whom the law has cast it.

This reasoning applies with peculiar force to the case before us. The ship had been at sea eleven days before she put back. Assuming for the moment that shortness of time, intervening between the departure of a vessel and her inability to keep the sea, could shift the burden of proof, we think it cannot be said that an interval of eleven days would be sufficiently short to warrant the application of such a principle or to raise any presumption independently of other circumstances. In that time—it was the stormy season in the eastern seas—the vessel might possibly have encountered a cyclone. As it was, she was exposed during several days, from the 9th to the 15th June, to severe squalls and a boisterous sea, and laboured heavily. The question was whether her inability to pursue her voyage and the unseaworthiness as afterwards ascertained were due to the action of the winds and waves; in other words, to the perils insured against, or to the antecedent causes of unseaworthiness, to which the defendant ascribed them. Under these circumstances, the time the vessel had been at sea became a matter of secondary consideration, and, if to be taken into account at all, could only be so as an element in the inquiry, and as one of the facts of the case. It could not properly be held to be of itself, and independently of the other facts, sufficient to take the case out of the ordinary rule, and, by giving rise to a new presumption, to shift the burden of proof from the insurer to the shipowner. As we are of opinion that the direction cannot be upheld, and as it is clear from what took place on the trial that the verdict of the jury was determined by the direction so given, it follows that judgment cannot be given for the defendants on the finding, and that the rule must be made absolute for a new trial.

May 15 and 16.—On appeal, the same counsel appeared, and the following authorities were referred to:

Watson v. Clark, 1 Dow. 336;
Paddock v. The Franklin Insurance Company, 11 Pick. 226;
Douglas v. Scougall, 4 Dow. 269;
Parker v. Potts, 3 Dow. 23;
Foster v. Steele, 3 Bing. N. C. 892;
Sutton v. Saddler, 3 C. B. N. S. 87.

The arguments sufficiently appear from the judgments.

Brett, L.J.—I agree with the judges of the Queen's Bench Division that the direction given by my brother Field to the jury cannot be upheld, because it amounts to what in law is called a "misdirection."

Now, a good deal has been said before us about the "burden of proof" and "presumption," and I cannot help thinking that although in many cases these two expressions are identical, yet that, if they are considered as invariably identical, it may cause confusion. The burden of proof upon a plea of unseaworthiness raised upon a policy of marine insurance lies upon the defendant who alleges the unseaworthiness; and, as far as the burden of proof goes, i.e., the burden of proof on the pleadings, it never shifts at all, but remains the same from the beginning to the end. But, when evidence of facts is given, it is often said that certain presumptions, which are really inferences of fact, arise and shift the burden of proof, and so they do as a matter of reasoning and as a matter of fact; and it is true to say, as a matter of reasoning and as a matter of fact, that where a ship sails from a port and sinks to the bottom of the sea, or becomes exceedingly leaky very soon after she has sailed, and there is nothing in the weather to account for such a disaster, she was unseaworthy when she started, and a jury may be properly told that, upon such a state of uncontradicted evidence, any reasonable man may presume that unseaworthiness; that is, that as a matter of reasoning, in drawing an inference of one fact from other facts almost all reasoning men would find that, under such circumstances, the ship must have been in an unseaworthy condition when she started, it being recollected that the definition of unseaworthiness is that when she started she was not in a fit state to encounter the ordinary vicissitudes of the voyage; and if a jury with no other evidence than that were to find the contrary, it would be such a finding against the reasonable inference of facts that anybody would say that it was a verdict against evidence. But it is a question of fact, not a question of law. It is a very proper guide to a jury upon a question of fact, and the mode in which they are to draw inferences, to tell them what is so often laid down, and I think well laid down, in Arnould (vol. 2, p. 618, 5th edit.), namely, that where a ship became so leaky or disabled as to be unable to proceed on her voyage soon after sailing on it, and this cannot be ascribed to any violent storm or extraordinary peril of the sea, the fair and natural presumption is that it arose from causes existing before her setting out on her voyage, and, consequently, that she was not seaworthy when she sailed. I think that is a very good guide to a jury, and they should be told to adopt that view. But what is the result? The only result of that is to tell them that "if nothing else is shown from the beginning to the end of the case, I should advise you to find, and I think as reasonable men you ought to find, that the ship when she started was not seaworthy." But it does not settle the matter, because, if so far the matter is proved, still, as Arnould says, in such cases it is incumbent upon the assured to show that at the time of her departure she was in fact seaworthy, and that her inability has arisen from causes subsequent to the commencement of the voyage. The assured must, therefore, show facts to prove that she was seaworthy before starting, and I think that all a judge can do is to lay before the jury a proposition that must be supported by certain evidence, and that it is for them to say whether or not the evidence supports it, and whether or not there is anything else to account for the injury the ship has received, than the fact that she was unseaworthy before starting. But the question of what is a short time after sailing must surely depend on the circumstances; for instance, if a ship sails from Greenwich and goes down to Gravesend in the Thames, I should say a short time after starting from Greenwich is a very different "short time" to what it would be in a case where a ship sails out of Bombay, and the moment she is out of harbour she is in the Atlantic. I say the circumstances would be very different. Therefore what is or is not "soon after sailing" depends on the circumstances of each case, and it is for the jury to say whether, under the circumstances of the particular voyage, they think that the time of the loss was so soon after the sailing that it raises the presumption of unseaworthiness. It is a question for a jury as much as any other question, and I know of no case myself where the question of time—of what is a short time, or what is a long time—or any similar question, could be for a judge.

Now, if that be true, let us see whether there is any authority to the contrary. The case of Watson v. Clark (1 Dow. 336) is cited to us. No doubt it is a case often cited, but I think it is more often cited for the question of law which Lord Eldon enunciated than for his treatment of the facts. It is cited as an authority for saying that it is a clear and established principle that if a ship was seaworthy at the commencement of the voyage, although she became otherwise only an hour after sailing, the warranty is complied with, and the underwriter is liable. There then was a proposition of law for which the case is cited in every book. I do not deny that it was cited as a case for that proposition, and the proposition of presumption arising from the facts, and the inference to be drawn; I do not deny that it is often cited also as an authority for the form of enunciating that proposition. But Lord Eldon and Lord Redesdale were sitting as a Court of Appeal from a decision in Scotland in an Admiralty Court, a court which decided both law and fact, and they were called upon therefore, as upon a rehearing, not only to determine what the law was, but also to determine whether they agreed with the other court upon the facts; and thus it was that they gave their reasons for agreeing with the other court's decision as to the facts, and that Lord Eldon stated the mode of reasoning by which he arrived at the inference which he had to draw. And I say, therefore, it is a very good guide to us when we find Lord Eldon and Lord Redesdale pointing out in the clearest terms a process of reasoning which is almost irresistible, in pointing out to a jury in clear language the process of reasoning which they ought to follow. But I have never heard that this case was an authority for showing that the inference of fact is really a proposition of law, and, if it ever has been said, I can only say that I do not agree with it.

Now I think that it cannot be denied that my brother Field so expressed himself that the jury would consider themselves bound to take it as a matter that was decided, and one which they were not bound to consider, that eleven days after sailing was, as a matter of law, a short time, and a short time which shifted the presumption; and my brother Field, who was a party to the judgment of the Divisional Court, himself admitted that his decision was wrong. He said that he intended to lay it down as a matter of law, and that he saw himself that his direction was erroneous. Therefore, upon the question of seaworthiness, and upon the policy on the freight, there cannot be a doubt that this was fatal to the case.

There is a somewhat greater difficulty about the other case, and a difficulty that has been raised with regard to both policies, about the finding that the loss was by perils of the sea. Now, I am not prepared to say, if that had appeared on the record alone, that one could have said that this was a misdirection on the point of law. But when in this particular case one sees that the question of whether the ship was lost by perils of the sea really had as its only antithesis the question whether or not she was worm-eaten at the time she started, and that the proposition came to be this: If she was not worm-eaten at the time she started from Rangoon, there is nothing to account for this loss; but if she was worm-eaten at Rangoon, the evidence of sea peril is not sufficient to show that she was lost by perils of the sea—then it seems to me upon the facts of this case that, when the jury were practically told that as a matter of law they were to take it that she was worm-eaten at Rangoon, unless the shipowners could show that she was not, that must have had a vital effect upon the finding of the jury upon the loss by perils of the sea, and that, therefore, even though it might be said as a matter of abstract proposition that this would not be a misdirection upon that plea, it was such a direction in this case as to be a wrong direction as to an inference of fact, turning an inference of fact into an inference of law, and such that it would almost inevitably lead to a wrong consideration of the issue by the jury; and that, therefore, the trial, and the finding of the jury upon that other issue cannot upon either proposition or consideration be satisfactory. Therefore, I think, there must be a new trial as regards both policies.

Cotton, L.J.—I agree that there must be a new trial in this case on the ground of the misdirection by Field, J. Now one must consider how he was induced to give that direction, on which reliance was placed for showing that he misdirected the jury. The jury had retired for some time, and they came into court and made some communication to him. From what he says, it is evident that they doubted in whose favour they could find the issues left to them, amongst others, that of seaworthiness. Now, that being so, the learned judge says that he came to the conclusion that, for the purpose of enabling the jury to arrive at a decision, he would give them such a ruling as he could on the question of where the onus of proof lay. In the previous part of his summing up, he lays down (which was apparently not objected to), amongst other things, that the onus of proof as regards seaworthiness was on those who alleged unseaworthiness, that is to say on the insurers. Now, that being so, on the question of seaworthiness, that issue was doubtless on those who alleged unseaworthiness. The proof of certain facts might to a certain extent satisfy the doubts of the jury, that is to say, if there is nothing proved to explain or answer those facts, it would stand in this position, that it would enable the jury to say, and justify them in saying, that unseaworthiness was made out. And so, if it was true that a very short time after leaving port there was nothing else to explain how it came that the ship was unable to perform her voyage, it might be that it would move the jury to find that she was unseaworthy when she left the port. But, of course, there might be evidence on the other side, or facts might come out in the evidence, as to the shortness of the time when the ship became unable to complete its voyage, which might afford some sort of answer; and then the jury would have to consider on which side the balance lay; and, in considering that, one must remember that the onus and the burden of the particular issue of unseaworthiness was throughout on those who alleged unseaworthiness, though facts had been proved, such as that a very short time after the ship's leaving port she was found to be unable to complete her voyage. Had there been nothing else, they might find that the burden had been discharged, and might consider that that fact being proved was sufficient to call for an answer, and in that sense to shift the burden of proof, or onus of proof, on the insurers who alleged unseaworthiness.

Now, what is the direction of the learned judge that is complained of? It practically comes within the very last few words which Field, J. used on the return of the jury into court, and made a communication to him; and those are the very few words which the jury had to take as a clear statement of the law from the learned judge, and which are complained of as a misdirection. They are as follows: "I say, as a matter of law, the time is such that I direct you that the onus of proof was shifted."

Now, on two grounds I consider that there was a misdirection. First of all, the question of whether or not the time is sufficiently short to satisfy the burden of proof, thrown upon those who had to prove unseaworthiness, must not, under the circumstances, be a question of law, but must be a question of fact, as to which the judge is to direct the jury. When he directs them as a matter of law as to the time, they of necessity, taking the direction from him, thought they could not find the contrary; then on that I think he is wrong. The question for them to consider is whether, under the circumstances, the time is so short that it satisfies them that the ship was so unseaworthy that that would account for it. Then there is another point on which I think that they were misled, namely, by the learned judge directing them that the onus of proof was shifted. If he had stated that the time was so short that, primâ facie, the insured had satisfied the burden thrown upon them of showing that the ship was unseaworthy by reason of her becoming in so short a time unfit to perform her voyage, that would have been right. But I think the way in which Field, J. directed them, in saying that, as a matter of law, the time was such that the onus of proof was shifted, probably induced them to think that the onus was not upon the person who properly had to make out the case, but that the onus of proof was on the other person who had not that burden upon him. That is probably what they thought.

Thesiger, L.J.—I agree that this case must go back for a new trial.

There are two questions which the court have to decide. First, was there a misdirection; and, secondly, did that misdirection, within the meaning of Order XXX., r. 3, occasion substantial wrong or miscarriage. not only on the question raised by the issue of seaworthiness or unseaworthiness, but also upon the issue that was raised as to the cause of loss? Now it is convenient, I think, to take these two questions separately; and, first, to consider whether or not there was a misdirection upon the issue of seaworthiness or unseaworthiness.

What is the position of the facts in the case at the time when the learned judge gave his direction? On the one hand there had been evidence, I do not give any opinion as to the strength or weakness of that evidence, but there had been evidence that the ship had met with some severe weather during the course of the eleven days which elapsed between her leaving Rangoon and the time when she set sail to return to Rangoon. On the other hand there was evidence that, upon her return to Rangoon, upon the first survey some traces of worming were discovered, and, upon a latter survey taking place, at a considerable period after her return to Rangoon, her bottom was found to be very seriously worm-eaten—so much so as to be quite sufficient to account for the return to Rangoon. Under these circumstances what direction, either in fact or in law, could the learned judge give to the jury? It seems to me that he could not direct the jury that the burden of proof was shifted either in fact or in law. All that he could say was this: the burden of proof remains as it originally remained, namely, that if there had been no evidence on the one side or on the other, the plaintiff would have been entitled to a verdict on the question as to whether the ship was or was not seaworthy at the commencement of the voyage. There being evidence on both sides, it is for you, the jury, to consider whether the evidence as to the weather was such as to induce you to think that the loss was due to the weather, and therefore to a peril insured against, or whether the evidence which has been given as to the worming, coupled with the evidence as to the weather, satisfies you that the weather was insufficient to account for the loss, while the worming was amply sufficient. That seems to me to be the whole extent to which the learned judge could, under the circumstances of the case, fairly direct the jury. That being so, what is the direction he gives them. He tells them perfectly correctly that upon the issue of seaworthiness the burden of proof rested upon the underwriters originally. But then he proceeds to tell them that, only eleven days have elapsed since the vessel left Rangoon, and between that time and the time of her return to Rangoon, the burden of proof which originally lay upon the underwriters had shifted, and the burden was thrown upon the plaintiff of showing that the loss of the vessel was due to the causes which had arisen subsequent to her sailing; the meaning of that being obviously this, that the jury must, from the short time that elapsed after her voyage commenced, presume primâ facie that, instead of the vessel being seaworthy, as they would have presumed without any evidence, they must presume that she was unseaworthy at the commencement, unless such evidence was given on the part of the plaintiff as to satisfy them that the loss was not due to unseaworthiness, but due to the perils insured against. Therefore it appears to me that, even presuming that the argument of Mr. Williams and Mr. Harrison were correct, and that although the words "as a matter of law" are used, what the learned judge really intended to say was that the burden in point of fact had been shifted. Then again it seems to me even then that the learned judge misdirected the jury, because there is nothing to show or to justify him in saying that the burden of proof as a matter of fact had shifted; because at the very same time that it was proved that there was a short time that had elapsed since the vessel had started, it was also proved that there was weather which might possibly account for the loss which took place. Therefore, upon the question of seaworthiness, it seems to me that there was a clear misdirection.

Now arises the question, was the misdirection such, upon the question of seaworthiness, that it must necessarily have affected the minds of the jury upon the other issues? It appears to me that the question should be answered in the affirmative. In the first place I think there was a misdirection as regards the issue raised upon the question of the cause of loss, and for this reason: it is perfectly true that upon that issue the burden of proof lies upon the plaintiffs, and it may be true that the presumption of unseaworthiness, or the question of the onus of proof upon the issue of unseaworthiness is one that relates, as has been argued, solely to that issue, and does not in any way touch the issue of cause of loss; but, on the other hand, this much is clear, that there is no presumption against seaworthiness, and that the plaintiff, undertaking, as he is bound to undertake, upon the issue to prove that the loss was occasioned by a peril insured against, would have fulfilled the burden thrown upon him if he proved that the policy had been effected on his vessel, that the vessel had started upon her voyage, and that after the voyage the vessel met with such weather as would fully and fairly account for the loss which was sustained by him under the policy. But the position in which the learned judge left the matter to the jury under this subsequent direction placed a very much heavier burden upon the plaintiff, because he had directed the jury that the mere fact of this short lapse of time was such as to raise a presumption counter to the original presumption of seaworthiness. And, logically followed out, that must mean a presumption of unseaworthiness, and consequently the plaintiff, instead of undertaking the burden of proving a loss by perils insured against upon a ship which at all events is not presumed to be unseaworthy, although it may not be proved to be seaworthy, was undertaking a burden of proving that loss in respect of a ship, which, according to the learned judge's direction, was presumably unseaworthy when she started.

For these reasons it appears to me that there was a misdirection upon both points, and the observations which I have just made are sufficient to show that that misdirection must have been the cause of substantial wrong or miscarriage. Nothing could show that more plainly than this, that the very point on which the jury seemed to have been in disagreement when they returned and discussed the matter with the judge, was the point as to on which side the onus of proof lay, and in the argument before us it was stated that the minds of the jury were equally balanced upon this point, so that it was necessary to give some direction upon it. If their minds were in that state of equal balance, it follows from that, that that is just the occasion when the learned judge must necessarily be most accurate in the language which he uses to the jury on the point which they discuss with him.

There is only one other matter to which I wish to refer, and that is the question of authority. The learned judge, in giving his direction to the jury, appears to have relied upon the passage in Watson v. Cooke (1 Dow. 336), taken from the opinion given by Lord Eldon. But in that case Lord Eldon was judge both of fact and of law; and when the passage, upon which the learned judge relies, is looked at, I think it is clear to every mind that Lord Eldon was not speaking of a presumption of law, but was speaking of a presumption of fact, or an inference which his mind would be led to form from the facts of that particular case. And I think in the use of that expression "burden of proof" in the cases there has been a little confusion. Burden of proof always remains the same as a matter of law. No doubt the burden of proof in fact may shift, and must shift during the course of evidence in any particular trial. But while the learned judge has to direct a jury upon the burden of proof as a matter of law, I take it it is not the duty of a learned judge under any circumstances to direct the jury as to the question of the burden of proof in fact; that is a question for the jury, and beyond deciding the question which a judge must always decide, namely, whether there is any evidence at all to go to the jury, it seems to me, as a matter of fact, on questions of fact the province of the learned judge does not entitle him to go. But in Lord Eldon's opinion he says this (1 Dow. 344): "Primâ facie the onus of proof that she is not seaworthy lies on the defendants, but when the inability of the ship to perform the voyage becomes evident within a short time after the sailing, the presumption is that it arises from causes existing before she set sail on the voyage, and that the ship was not then seaworthy; and the onus probandi, in such a case, rests with the assured to show that the inability arose from causes subsequent to the commencement of the voyage." Now two points arise upon the observations that were made. In the first place it is clear that, when Lord Eldon speaks of the "inability of the ship to perform the voyage becoming evident a short time after the sailing, and the presumption being shifted," he must mean (and it is obvious from the context that he did mean) where there is only that proof and no proof beyond. But where at the very same time that the lapse of the voyage is proved, and is relied upon to raise a presumption, there is also a cause proved which might fairly account for the loss, he cannot have meant in that case, even as a matter of fact, that the presumption shifts back and is thrown upon the other party. And, again, the second point for observation is this: that, when he speaks of the presumption shifting back, he is not speaking of a presumption of law, but he is speaking of a presumption of fact. Therefore, it appears to me that there is nothing in the law, as laid down in the cases, which alters the position which would be taken up, and which I should take up certainly apart from the cases. Consequently, I think that there has been in this case a misdirection, and such a misdirection as necessitates a new trial.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

COMMON PLEAS DIVISION.

Reported by J. A. Foote, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Wednesday, July 3, 1878.

(Before Denman, J.)

Hayn, Roman, and Co. v. Culliford and Clark.

Bill of lading — Ship — Liability of owners — Broker's signature—Stowage, loss caused by negligence in—Excepted perils.

The plaintiffs were the consignors of sugar to be carried from Hamburgh to London at an agreed freight in the defendants' steamship, and received bills of lading signed by "P. and K., agents." The steamship was at the time under charter to P. and K., who were merchants at Hamburg, but the plaintiffs had no knowledge of such charter. Evidence was given that, in the case of steamships, it is the custom for the broker of the ship, and not the master, to sign the bills of lading. The court were empowered to draw inferences of fact, and found that P. and K. signed the bills of lading as agents for the defendants, and with their authority. The sugar having been damaged by negligent stowage:

Held, that the defendants were liable on the bill of lading; and, semble, they would have been so even if P. and K. had had no actual authority to sign for them, there being nothing to call the attention of the plaintiffs to look to any one save the master or owners to stow the goods safely.

The bill of lading excepted liability in respect of "all accidents, loss, and damage of whatsoever nature . . . . occasioned by any act, neglect, or default whatsoever of the pilot, master, or mariners, in navigating the ship . . . . it being agreed that the captain, officers, and crew of the vessel in the transmission of the goods . . . . be considered the servants of the shipper, owner, or consignee," of the goods.

Held, that the owners were liable for negligent stowage.

CASE heard on further consideration before Denman, J. The damages were assessed by the jury, all other questions being left to the decision of the learned judge.

The facts are fully set out in the judgment.

Butt, Q.C. and J. C. Mathew, for the plaintiffs.—First, we say as a matter of fact that Pott and Korner, who signed the bill of lading, did so as agents for the defendants, and with their authority. Secondly, even if there was no authority in fact, the defendants are nevertheless bound. The bill of lading was signed by the brokers of the ship, purporting to bind the owners; the persons signing it had the control and management of the ship, and the consignors had no notice of any charter. The defendants, therefore, cannot protect themselves by such a charter:

Peek v. Larsen, 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 163; L. Rep. 12 Eq. 378;
Sandeman v. Scurr, L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 86; 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 608; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 446;
Sack v. Ford, 32 L. J. 12, C. P.;
The St. Cloud, Br. & Lush. 4; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 309.

Thirdly, it is the duty, primâ facie, of the master and owners so to stow the cargo that dangerous goods do no damage (Brass v. Maitland, 26 L. J. 49, Q. B.); and the clause in the bill of lading, excepting the owners from liability for the consequences of negligence in "navigation" does not relieve them of that duty. Such a liability is not imposed by the bill of lading, but exists apart from it:

Schuster v. McKellar, 26 L. J. 281, Q. B.;
Czech v. General Navigation Company, 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 246; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 14; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 5.

Watkin Williams, Q.C. and C. Bowen, for the defendants.—The defendants cannot be made liable simply because Pott and Korner represented that they had authority to sign bills of lading for them. They had no authority in fact, and were not held out as having any. And even if the defendants are to be bound by the bill of lading, this loss comes within the exceptive clause. They cited

July 3.—DENMAN, J. delivered judgment.—The plaintiffs in their statement of claim alleged that they delivered to the defendants 280 bags of sugar in good condition, to be carried by the defendants' steamship Cleanthes from Hamburg to London for agreed freight, upon the terms of a bill of lading by which the goods were to be delivered in good condition, certain perils only excepted (by which perils it was alleged that delivery in good condition was not prevented); that the defendants did not deliver the goods in good condition, but damaged and unmerchantable, and that such damage was caused by the sugar becoming tainted with oxide of zinc, owing to the improper and negligent stowing of their goods and cargo.

The defence, so far as it is material to the questions remaining for my decision, is as follows: That the ship was before the time mentioned in the statement of claim chartered for a voyage from Hamburg to London under a charter-party, by which it was agreed that the ship should be under the control of the charterers, and that the master of the ship should act as the servant and agent of the charterers for the purpose of signing bills of lading, and not as servant or agent of the defendants; that, in pursuance of the charter-party, a cargo shipped by different shippers, including the 280 bags shipped under the bill of lading mentioned in the statement of claim, was taken on board; that the goods were not delivered to the defendants but to the charterers, or the master as their agent or servant, and not otherwise; that the shippers of the sugar and the plaintiffs had notice of the charter-party, and that the master was servant and agent of the charterers to sign bills of lading, and not servant or agent of the defendants; that the bill of lading contained a clause by which the defendants would not be liable for the damage complained of, even if bound by the bill of lading; and that the damage, if any, and the delivery in bad condition, were acts and defaults for which the charterers and not the defendants were responsible.

The charter-party, which was put in at the trial, was dated the 15th Nov. 1877, and was made between the defendants, "owners of the steamship Cleanthes," and Messrs. Pott and Korner, merchants, by the intercession of the shipbroker, W. Zoder;" and it bound the ship, after discharging her inward cargo, to load from the said merchants a full and complete cargo of general lawful merchandise, and to proceed to one wharf only in London, as ordered by charterers' correspondents, and deliver the cargo on payment of freight (for sugar) at the rate of 7*s.* 6*d.* sterling, in full, per ton, gross weight delivered; "it being agreed that for the payment of all freight, dead freight, and demurrage, the said master or owner shall have an absolute lien . . . on the said cargo, which lien they shall be bound to exercise; the charterers' liability to cease when cargo is shipped and bills of lading signed; the captain shall sign bill of lading at rates as presented, without prejudice to this charter-party." The charter-party was signed by "H. W. Pott and Korner," and "by telegraphic authority of the owners, W. Zoder, as agent." Alphonse Roman, one of the plaintiffs, who was examined at the trial, swore that his firm had no knowledge of the existence of a charter until 10th Dec., after a claim had been made upon the defendants for the damage for which this action was brought. The plaintiffs bought the sugar in November, and received the bill of lading after paying for it, and gave the bill of lading to Messrs. Middleton, wharfingers, who took the bill of lading and got delivery from the ship. The freight at the bill of lading rate was paid to one Watkins, who, according to an answer to one of the interrogatories administered by the plaintiffs to the defendants, "acted as broker for the ship in London." Watkins received the freight, and gave a receipt to the plaintiffs headed "Freight per Cleanthes," and signed, "Received for the owners." It was admitted at the trial that the sugar was damaged by improper stowage, but there was no evidence as to the employment or otherwise of a stevedore, except that in their answers to interrogatories the defendants said they believed the cargo was stowed by a stevedore employed by Zoder, who was the agent of the ship at Hamburg, at the expense of the ship. A letter was read at the trial, of the 4th Dec. 1877, in which the defendants' firm in London wrote to the same firm in Sunderland, stating that a serious claim was pending, "apparently through the fault of the captain," expressing a hope that the amount of damage might turn out to be exaggerated, and containing this passage: "Watkins will, no doubt, make best of case for steamer; but why the captain stowed poison in casks on top of sugar in bags it is difficult to understand, and may prove serious to him." On the 5th Dec. the plaintiffs wrote to Watkins and to the defendants, informing them of the damage, and inclosing their claim for the full value of the sugar as being rendered totally worthless. On the 6th, Watkins wrote denying that there was any proof of the sugar being damaged or totally spoilt, and adding that "if damaged, it was no doubt by perils of the sea." On the 10th Dec., Watkins, by desire of the defendants, referred the plaintiffs to the charterers.

Evidence was given at the trial, and admitted, subject to objection, that in the case of steamships it is uniformly the custom for the broker of the ship, and not the master, to sign the bills of lading. The witnesses who proved this usage said, on cross-examination, that the brokers frequently charter the ship, and when they sign bills of lading for chartered ships, they sign them for the owner or for the charterer, according to the authority they may have; and, on re-examination, they said that, if they were themselves the charterers, they would sign it in their own name.

The bill of lading relied on by the plaintiffs was objected to by the defendants' counsel as evidence in the cause, on the ground that it was signed by Pott and Korner, agents, and that there was no evidence of any authority to them to sign it on behalf of the shipowners. I admitted it subject to objection; and it was, I think, admissible in evidence, if on no other ground, because it was referred to in the pleadings, and not denied to exist; on the contrary, it was in part set out by the defendants in order to raise one of their defences. The question, of course, was still open to the defendants whether it was binding upon them, and whether, if binding, it exempted them from liability.

The question then arises, was there, under the circumstances of the case, any contract between the plaintiffs and the defendants for the carriage of the goods in question, or was this a contract with the charterers, Pott and Korner? It was submitted, on behalf of the defendants, that the very form of the bill of lading, coupled with the fact that Pott and Korner had, in fact, a charter of the ship, was conclusive against any liability on the shipowners. The bill of lading, omitting the exceptive clause (on which the second contention of the defendants depends) was as follows: "Shipped in good order, and well conditioned, in and upon the good steamship Cleanthes, whereof is master P. Andrews, now lying at Hamburg, and bound for London, 280 bags, &c., which are to be delivered in like good order to Hayn, Roman, and Co. (the plaintiffs), or their assigns, freight, &c., to be paid by consignee. In witness whereof the master or agent of the said ship has signed four bills of lading of this tenor and date. Dated in Hamburg, this 19th day of Nov. 1877, Pott and Korner, agents." It was contended that, inasmuch as Pott and Korner were in fact the charterers, whether on their own behalf or on behalf of some other persons unknown, it ought to be presumed, in the absence of any express evidence of authority to sign the particular bill of lading on behalf of the shipowners, that it was signed by them on their own behalf, and not on behalf of the defendants; and that, so far as this was a question of fact, I ought so to find.

It was agreed at the trial that, except so far as the question of damages was concerned, all questions of fact and inferences of fact arising upon or to be drawn from the evidence were to be disposed of by me or by any court before whom the case may come.

Looking at all the facts of the case, I am of opinion that the bill of lading was in fact signed by Pott and Korner, not on their own behalf, but as agents for the owners, and with their authority; and that it is on that ground a document binding upon the defendants. I think it impossible to doubt that the defendants knew that bills of lading were to be signed and had been signed on their behalf by Pott and Korner, and only repudiated the bill of lading after they knew that a heavy claim had arisen upon it. The letters and telegrams put in at the trial and upon the argument seem to me to establish beyond all doubt that the bill of lading was their contract with the plaintiffs as shippers or consignees of the goods.

This renders it unnecessary to consider minutely the other grounds upon which the plaintiffs contended that the defendants would be liable, even if the bill of lading was not binding upon them as a document signed with their actual authority. I think that even in that case there would have been strong reason for holding the defendants liable. But the result of the able and elaborate argument before me was to convince me that, under circumstances such as those of the present case, the defendants would be liable, upon the principles explained in Sack v. Ford (32 L. J. 12, C. P.), The St. Cloud (B. & L. 4; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 309), Gilkison v. Middleton (2 C. B. N. S. 134; 26 L. J. 209, C. P.), and Sandeman v. Scurr (2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 446). The plaintiffs in the present case had no notice whatever of any charter-party until after the damage. The bill of lading, though not signed by the master, was signed by persons purporting to act for the defendants: there was nothing calling the attention of the plaintiffs to look to anyone, save the master or shipowners, to perform that which is the primâ facie duty of the master and shipowner, viz., to stow the goods safely. Under the circumstances I think that, that duty having been negligently discharged, especially where it was discharged in so palpably negligent a manner as that described in the defendants' letter of the 4th Dec., it is clear that an action would lie against the shipowners, and that the shipowners would be estopped from relying on a charter-party of which the plaintiffs had no notice for any purpose. (See Peek v. Larsen 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 163: L. Rep. 12 Eq. 378; 25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 580, per M. R.) The authorities and text-books are all uniformly to the effect that, subject to any stipulations to the contrary in the bills of lading, and in the absence of any notice of a charter, one of the primary duties of the master is to stow the goods carefully. This appears to me to be a duty arising upon the mere receipt of the goods for the purpose of carriage, and to be one which it would require an express contract to supersede or excuse.

Holding, however, as I do, that the bill of lading is binding between the parties as having been actually signed with the authority of the defendant, it becomes necessary to consider another point made by the defendants, viz., that by the terms of the bill of lading itself they are exempt from liability for the damage in question. This turns upon the true construction of the exceptive clause in the bill of lading, the material parts of which are as follows: "The act of God, the Queen's enemies, pirates, robbers, restraints of princes, vermin, jettison, barratry, and collision, fire on board or on shore, and all accidents, loss, and damage of whatsoever nature or kind, and howsoever occasioned, from machinery, boilers, steam and steam navigation, or from perils of the seas or rivers, or from any act, neglect, or default whatsoever of the pilot, master, or mariners in navigating the ship: the owners of the ship being in no way liable for the consequence of the causes above excepted; and it being agreed that the captain, officers, and crew of the vessel, in the transmission of the goods, as between the shipper, owner, or consignee thereof, and the ship and shipowner, be considered the servants of such shipper, owner, or consignee." The defendants in their statement of defence set out the above clause, and alleged that, if the goods were not delivered in good condition, it was owing to the "acts, neglects, or defaults of the pilot, master, or mariners in navigating the ship." It was contended for the defendants that the word "transmission" in the above clause was never more extensive than the word "navigating," and that it included everything to be done with the goods, from the receipt of them from the hands of the consignor to their arrival at their destination, and Good v. London Steamship Owners' Association (L. R. 6 C. P. 563) was relied on, in which it was held that an injury which happened to a ship moored at a quay where she was lying, having put back to coal, which injury was owing to the negligent leaving open of a sea-cock, was "damage caused by reason of improper navigation," within the meaning of a deed by which an association of shipowners agreed to indemnify each other against "loss or damage, which by reason of the improper navigation of any such ship may be caused to any goods on board." In that case Willes, J. said, "Improper navigation, within the meaning of this deed is something improperly done . . . . in the course of the voyage." I do not think that the case assists the decision of that before me, beyond being an authority that the ship need not be in a state of motion in order to be in a state of navigation, within the meaning of that word as used in the deed there in question. Other cases have decided that the word "navigation" for some purposes includes a period when the ship is not in motion; as, for instance, when she is at anchor. But I do not think that these cases have any strong bearing upon the question how the words "navigating the ship" and "transmission of the goods" ought to be construed in such a clause as the present. The contention for the plaintiffs was, that the words "in transmission of the goods," if operative at all, had a limiting effect upon the alleged generality of the previous words, and confined their application to a period subsequent to the period at which locomotion in the ship should commence, and they cited Czech v. General Navigation Company (ubi sup.) as showing that the tendency of the courts was strong to require clear affirmative proof on the part of the shipowner to enable him to claim exception under exceptive clauses such as the present; and also Taylor v. Liverpool and Great Western Steamship Company (2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 275; 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 714; L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 546), in which Lush, J. uses this expression, "The word . . . . is ambiguous, and being of doubtful meaning, it must receive such a construction as is most in favour of the shipper, and not such as is most in favour of the shipowner, for whose benefit the exceptions are framed." I am of opinion that the contention of the plaintiffs on this point ought to prevail. Though it may be quite correct to say, that for many purposes negligent stowage is a portion of negligent navigation, and, though in the case of Good v. London Steamship Owners' Association (ubi sup.), in answer to an observation of counsel, "Would damage arising from negligent stowage be within this deed?" Willes, J. answers, "Certainly, unless in a port where stevedores are employed," I do not think it follows that, in the case of an exceptive clause such as that now in question, the words "in navigating the ship" or "in transmission of the goods" include stowage On the contrary, I think that, applying the principle laid down by Lush, J., in Taylor v. Liverpool and Great Western Steamship Company (ubi sup.), which I think ought to be applied in such cases, and, considering how easy it would have been to use apt words to exempt the shipowners from liability for improper stowage, it is more reasonable to hold that the case of negligent stowage is not included under the words relied upon than that it is included.

I therefore think that the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment for the sum assessed by the jury—501*l.* 6*s.*—and I give judgment accordingly for that amount and costs.

APPEAL FROM INFERIOR COURT.

Ship and Shipping—Ship's husband—Authority of—Cancellation of charter-party by—Validity of cancellation.

A ship's husband, who, with the authority of the shipowners, has entered into a charter-party, under which a commission on freight, primage and demurrage is payable to the charterers on execution of the charter-party, cannot, by virtue of his office as ship's husband, enter into an agreement with the charterers to cancel the charter-party and pay them a sum of money in lieu of commission, that shall be binding on the shipowners without their express authority so to do, notwithstanding that such agreement may be for the benefit of the shipowners.

THIS was an action by the plaintiffs to recover 24*l.* 0*s.* 6*d.*, a sum agreed to be paid to them in lieu of commission under the circumstances stated by the judge of the County Court of Monmouth for the opinion of the court in the following

SPECIAL CASE.

3 and 4. During all the time herein mentioned the defendant was part owner of the vessel Myvanwy, of 162 tons register or thereabout, and one Thomas Robbins Rees was ship's husband of the said vessel, appointed by the defendant and others, part owners of the said vessel, by an appointment in writing dated the 31st Dec. 1873.

5. That the said T. R. Rees, as such ship's husband, entered into a charter-party with the plaintiffs, dated the 9th Feb. 1876, the vessel then being at Amsterdam, whereby it was stipulated that the vessel should, with all convenient speed, proceed in ballast to Scarborough, Tobago, for orders, or as near thereunto as she might safely get, and there, at the customary place, load from factors of the said merchants a full and complete cargo of sugar $\frac{\text{and}}{\text{or}}$ other lawful produce, timber and cotton excepted, the vessel to proceed to Queenstown, or any convenient port of call, for orders to be given in reply to captain's telegram, to discharge at one safe port in the United Kingdom and discharge in such dock as charterers appoint, and deliver the same on being paid freight at the rate of 47*s.* 6*d.* per ton of 20cwt. net delivered at the Queen's Beam; and it was stipulated by the said charter-party that should the vessel not arrive in Tobago by the 1st of April the charterer's agent was to have the option of cancelling or confirming the charter-party, and that 5 per cent. commission on the amount of freight, primage, and demurrage was due on the execution and signment of the charter-party, and to be paid to the plaintiffs, ship lost or not lost.

6. The ship being at Amsterdam Rees informed the plaintiff's agent that the ship could not get to Tobago in time, and that if she was not there in time she might not get a cargo, and in the month of March, at the request of Rees, the plaintiffs agreed to and did cancel the charter-party upon the aforesaid agreement of Rees to pay the sum of 24*l.* 0*s.* 6*d.*, being the amount of commission at 5 per cent. on the amount of the cargo, which was estimated at 200 tons of sugar at 47*s.* 6*d.*, if the charter-party had been carried out, with the addition of 5*s.* 6*d.* for stamps on the charter-party, and that sum was to be paid forthwith by Rees, but he neglected to do so, and on the 29th July 1876 he gave to the plaintiffs' agent his promissory note at one month's date for the amount, 24*l.* 0*s.* 6*d.*, which note was not paid by Rees, and is still unpaid.

7. Evidence was given at the trial of the above facts, and also that the vessel did not go to Tobago, and that the cancellation of the charter-party was for the benefit of the owners.

8. It was contended for the plaintiffs that the committee was due on the execution and signing of the charter-party as therein expressly stipulated. That the plaintiffs had done all on their part to be done to entitle them to be paid the said commission, and that their right to recover the said commission accrued immediately upon the execution and signing of the said charter-party and existed at the time of cancellation, and did not depend upon the said cancellation, and that the charter-party was only cancelled upon the express agreement of Rees to pay the commission; that it was within the scope of his authority as ship's husband to cancel the charter-party, and to agree upon the terms of such cancellation, more particularly as it was for the benefit of the vessel.

9. Each of the points referred to in the last paragraph was contested by or on behalf of the defendants, who also contended that Rees, as such ship's husband, had no power to enter into agreement with the plaintiffs for payment of a sum in lieu of commission upon cancellation of the charter-party, which would bind the owners of the vessel, except with their express authority; that this was an act beyond the scope of the general authority given to him upon his appointment as ship's husband; that it amounted to a compromise of a claim which could not be effected without the special sanction of the owners; that the plaintiffs, in subsequently accepting Rees's promissory note for the 24*l.* 0*s.* 6*d.*, adopted him as the person liable to them, and therefore discharged the owners of the vessel, and that the transaction was a personal one between the plaintiffs and Rees; that Rees absconded in Nov. 1876, and, although the promissory note became due prior to that date, no claim was made against the owners of the ship until after Rees had absconded.

10. The County Court judge found as a fact that the defendant was part owner of the vessel at the date of the charter-party, and its cancellation; that Rees was appointed ship's husband, and was so at the date of the cancellation; that he entered into the charter-party; that the vessel did not go to Tobago; that the charter-party was cancelled by the plaintiffs at the request of Rees upon his agreeing to pay 24*l.* 0*s.* 6*d.* in lieu of commission in cash, which he failed to do, and afterwards gave the said promissory note, and the same was signed by him and not paid, and is still unpaid. But the judge held that, although Rees had, as ship's husband, authority to charter the said vessel, he was not empowered to pledge his owner's credit for the payment of a sum of money for the cancelling of the charter-party without their express sanction, that being a matter quite unusual and out of ordinary course, however advantageous the compromise effected might have been to the interest of all the owners, and as no special authority was proved to have been given, the plaintiffs were nonsuited.

The question for the opinion of the court is, whether, under the circumstances hereinbefore set forth, the plaintiffs are entitled to recover from the defendant part of the said sum of 24*l.* 0*s.* 6*d.*, so agreed to be paid for cancellation of the charter-party.

Anstie for the plaintiffs.—That a ship's husband has authority to bind the owners by effecting a charter-party is not doubted or denied, but the question here is, whether he has also authority to bind the owners by cancelling the charter-party, and paying money in lieu of commission, such arrangement being a benefit to the owners. There is very little authority on the subject, and none directly in point on this particular question; but the principles for which the plaintiffs contend are borne out in the cases that are to be found on the point. The case of Barber v. Highley (1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 383; 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 228; 15 C. B. N. S. 27; 32 L. J. 270, C. P.) is the nearest point to the present; it was held there that a ship's husband was an agent of the owner to do what was necessary for the benefit of the ship, and therefore that he had authority to bind his co-owners by giving a bail-bond to free the vessel from arrest in a suit for collision; yet that was quite an unusual matter. [CLEASBY, B.—In that case the ship's husband was also managing owner.] No doubt he was, but the judgment does not rest on that. A part owner is not a copartner with his co-owners. What that case decided was, that, if it be necessary to enable the ship to continue her voyage and earn freight, that enables the ship's husband to give the bond and bind the owners. It is found in the case that the cancellation was accepted and acted on by the owners, and was for their benefit, and, having reaped the benefit of the cancellation, they ought not to be allowed to escape from bearing the burden of it. [KELLY, C.B.—Where and when was the bargain made?] It was at Amsterdam, and the probability is that there was no means of obtaining the consent of the owners in time, and if the ship's husband could not, under such circumstances, act for their benefit and so as to bind them, the result might be a considerable loss before the owners could be communicated with. The authority delegated to the ship's husband is for the advantage of the owners, his principals, and whether it is to make a contract or to cancel one, the principle, it is submitted, is identical. According to the contention of the defendants the charter-party is still subsisting, and has not been cancelled, as, if Rees had no authority to promise the compensation for its cancellation, then no cancellation has taken place. Rees had no possible reason, being no part owner, for making himself personally liable on the promissory note, and his giving it is no bar to an action by the plaintiffs against the principals: Robinson v. Read (9 B. & C. 449.) He cited also Thompson v. Finden (4 C. & P. 158), and Whitwell v. Perrin (4 C. B. N. S. 412), as authorities showing the power and authority of a ship's husband to bind his owners in matters connected with the ship and the interests of the owner.

A. T. Lawrence, for the defendant (respondent), contrâ.—The question is purely a legal one, viz., whether a ship's husband has by law power and authority, in that capacity merely, to bind the shipowners by his cancellation of the charter-party. I submit that he has not, and the non-production of any authority in favour of the plaintiffs' contention on the point is a strong confirmation of the contrary view, and in favour of the defendant's contention that such a proceeding is beyond the scope of his authority and employment. In Campbell v. Stein (6 Dow. App. Cas. 134) Lord Eldon held that a ship's husband had no authority to bind the shipowner to the costs of a lawsuit. That case, which is the nearest authority at all in point, will be found cited, with others, in Abbott on Shipping, 10th edit., pp. 79, 80. In Story on Agency, sects. 34 and 35, that learned author gives a summary of the authorities on the duty and power of a ship's husband, from which it appears that he has authority to direct all proper repairs and equipments and outfits for the ship, to make contracts for freighting or chartering, if that is her usual employment, and to do other acts necessary to dispatch her on her intended voyage. Now the making of charter-parties is usual, but the cancelling of them is, it is submitted, not usual; and indeed the case finds that it is unusual. 1 Bell's Commentaries on the Laws of Scotland, 7th edit., pp. 552, 553, a leading authority on the subject, is to the same effect. The principle of construction of a written appointment is to construe it strictly, and to allow an implied authority very reluctantly, and only to allow such authority as is necessary to the ordinary discharge of the duty. Here it was said to be unusual, and out of the ordinary course of business. The case of Barker v. Highley (ubi sup.) does not, it is submitted, apply. It is the exact converse of the present case. The judgment there given was put on the ground only of what had been done being absolutely necessary, &c. It is not found by the case that Rees professed or assumed to bind the defendant by the promissory note.

KELLY, C.B.—The question which comes before us for our decision in this case involves a point which is not only of considerable interest and importance to the shipping and maritime trade of this country, but is also an entirely new one. Text books of very high authority, and amongst them the learned work of Lord Tenterden on Shipping, have been brought to our notice, but in none of them has any decision or dictum of any judge or any authority whatever, been found for the proposition that a ship's husband has any authority beyond that of putting the ship into a proper condition for proceeding to sea and enabling it to prosecute its voyage; and in the absence of any authority in support of the power of the ship's husband which the learned counsel for the plaintiffs has consented for here, I should feel grave doubt and hesitation in laying down the rule for the first time, that any such power in fact exists. There is no doubt that the ship's husband, as laid down in the books on the subject, has authority and power to procure a charter-party and to make certain contracts for the benefit of the shipowners, but there it seems his authority ceases; and although it might be highly convenient and desirable, and especially in cases where the ship's husband is on the spot, and the shipowners are far away in another country, and so cannot promptly or easily be communicated with, that the ship's husband should have the power of cancelling a charter on the terms most advantageous and for the benefit of the shipowners that he may be able to procure, yet I cannot, in the present state of the law and absence of all authority, venture to take upon myself to say for the first time that such a power does exist. It is, I think, a matter for regret that there is no law or usage clearly defining the power and authority of persons in the capacity of ship's husbands; but, as that is the case, I am unable to hold the defendant liable in the present instance, and therefore the judgment of the County Court judge in favour of the defendant must be affirmed.

Cleasby, B.—I am of the same opinion. It cannot, I think, be contended that, if the shipowners themselves had effected the charter-party, the ship's husband would have had authority to make such an agreement on their behalf as that which Rees made with the plaintiffs in this case for the cancellation of it; and, indeed, I very much doubt whether he had authority to cancel the charter-party at all. It may be taken for granted inasmuch as he was appointed ship's husband before the making of the charter-party, that he had authority to make it. The learned counsel for the defendant, in the course of his argument before us, referred us to sects. 34 and 35 of Story's treatise on Agency, in which are laid down the extent and nature of the several duties and authority of a ship's husband, in which certainly, as there stated, is not included an authority to cancel the contract between the charterer and the shipowner. Mr. Lawrence also read us a passage from Bell's Commentaries on the Laws of Scotland (ubi sup.) on the same subject, in which that well-known writer says: "His" (the ship's husband's) "powers, where not expressly limited, may be described generally as those requisite to the performance of the duties now enumerated. It may be observed however: (1) that without special powers he cannot borrow money generally for the use of the ship; though he may settle the accounts of the creditors for furnishing, or grant bills for them, which will form debts against the concern, whether he has funds in his hands or not with which he might have paid them. (2) That although he may, in the general case, levy the freight which is by the bill of lading payable on the delivery of the goods, it would seem that he will not have, and is not to be relied on as possessing, power to take bills for the freight and give up the possession and lien over the cargo, unless it had been so settled by charter-party, or unless he has special authority to give such indulgence. (3) That under general authority as ship's husband he has no power to insure or to bind the owners for premiums, this requiring a special authority." Thus it seems, according to the authority of Bell, the ship's husband has power to act under the usual conditions, and to do whatever is necessary or usual for working the ship: but all such usual acts are of an entirely different character from an act which puts an end to the contract.

It would have been very satisfactory to me if I could have seen the contract in this case, for it is not quite clear, from the statement in the case, whether the agreement to cancel was made between the plaintiffs and Rees in his own name and in his individual capacity, or between them and him as the agent of the shipowners. The arrangement was so exceptional in its character that I am rather inclined to think that the cancellation was accepted and the whole affair arranged on the authority and personal credit of Rees alone; and I am of opinion that he was not authorised to bind the shipowners by what he did in making that arrangement with the plaintiffs.

The Nelly Schneider.

Co-ownership — Sale of ship — Application of minority—Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), s. 8.

The High Court of Justice (Admiralty Division) has power under the Admiralty Court Act 1861, s. 8, in a co-ownership action to order the sale of a ship on the application of a minority of owners, and will exercise such power where it appears that a sale is to the interest of the owners, but such power will always be exercised with great caution.

This was an action brought by John Williams, John Swainson, and William Swainson, against the British vessel Nelly Schneider, as co-owners of that vessel, to have an account taken of the earnings and profits of the vessel, and to procure a sale thereof.

The plaintiff, John Williams, was owner of 9-64th shares in the said vessel, and each of the other plaintiffs was the owner of 1-64th share therein.

An appearance was entered in the action on behalf of the other owners of the vessel, of whom Joseph Fisher owned 48-64th shares.

In 1876 the Nelly Schneider was being built, and the plaintiff John Williams, a master mariner, applied to the defendant Joseph Fisher, who was acting and continued to act as managing owner of the vessel, to appoint him, Williams, master of the vessel. This the defendant Fisher promised to do, provided the plaintiff John Williams would purchase and become owner of 9-64th shares in the vessel, and would find purchasers for three other 64th shares therein. The plaintiff Williams agreed to the proposed terms, and he accordingly paid for and became the purchaser of 9-64th shares, which he continued to hold at the commencement of the action. The plaintiffs J. and W. Swainson, and one Isaac Rawlinson, became the owners of one share each, at the instigation of the plaintiff Williams, and Williams was duly appointed master of the Nelly Schneider. The plaintiffs J. and W. Swainson and J. Rawlinson became owners of the shares on the faith and understanding that Williams was to be master. The Nelly Schneider made several voyages under the command of Williams; but in Aug. 1877, on the return of the vessel from a foreign voyage, the defendant Fisher, having had some quarrel with the plaintiff Williams, suddenly dismissed Williams from his employment as master; the dismissal took place without the knowledge of the other owners, and under circumstances which would not justify a discharge without proper notice.

Williams thereupon commenced an action against the vessel to recover his wages, and disbursements and damages for wrongful dismissal; and at the same time Williams and the other two plaintiffs commenced this co-ownership action. The vessel was arrested, but, bail being given in the action and for safe return, she was released and departed on a voyage with another master in command. The statement of claim alleged that accounts were outstanding between the plaintiffs and Fisher as managing owner. It was proved that the plaintiffs did not approve of the employment of the vessel otherwise than under the command of Williams, and that they objected to his dismissal. Their claims as appearing in the statement of claim were as follow:

1. That in the event of the Nelly Schneider not being brought back to this country, pursuant to the bond given in this action that such bond shall be forfeited, and that all necessary relief thereon may be given to the plaintiffs.
2. That the defendant Joseph Fisher, the managing owner of the said vessel, and the other defendants may be ordered to bring her back to this country on completion of her present voyage, and that she may be sold by the marshal, and the proceeds of her sale be divided amongst her owners in the proportions in which they may be entitled thereto.
3. That all accounts outstanding and unsettled between the plaintiffs respectively and the defendant Joseph Fisher, as such managing owner, may be referred to the registrar to report thereon.
4. That the defendants and their respective shares in the proceeds of the sale of the Nelly Schneider may be condemned in any sum or sums of money which shall be reported to be due to the plaintiffs respectively.

At the hearing it appeared that the parties could not agree as to the management of the ship, the plaintiffs insisting upon, and the defendants (other than Rawlinson) objecting to, the appointment of the plaintiff Williams as master, and that the defendants declined to purchase the plaintiffs' shares at a valuation.

Butt, Q.C. and Clarkson, for the plaintiffs, submitted that some rule ought to be laid down in these co-ownership cases where a minority of owners are in hopeless disagreement with the majority. The court has power to direct a sale under the 8th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, and this is a case where that power should be exercised to dissolve the association, which cannot prosper in its present condition. The shares of the minority might be valued by the court, and the owners of the majority of the shares should have the option of taking them at the valued price within a fixed time, and in default the ship should be sold.

Milward, Q.C. and Bucknill (W. G. F. Phillimore with them) for the defendants, refused to consent to such an order.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The court has under the 8th section of the Admiralty Act 1861 full power to direct a sale of the ship; but this is a power which must always be exercised with great caution at the instance of a minority of owners. But in this case I think that, considering the difficulty the parties must find under the circumstances in coming to terms, it will be greatly to their interest that some arrangement should be made which will sever their connection. The course suggested by counsel for the plaintiff does not seem to be an unreasonable course to adopt, and I shall make the following order: I order that a valuation of the shares now held by the plaintiffs in the vessel be made; that a copy of such valuation be filed in the registry, and that thereupon the defendants have the option of purchasing such shares at the amount fixed by the valuation. If the plaintiffs do not exercise this option within a fortnight, the ship must be apprised and sold by the marshal.

April 5.—Bucknill, for the defendants, stated that the defendants declined to avail themselves of the option of purchasing the plaintiffs' shares.

E. C. Clarkson, for the plaintiffs, asked that the vessel might be at once brought back to this country and sold.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I cannot compel the defendants to bring the vessel home, but I grant the plaintiff's application as far as I can. The order for the appraisement and sale of the vessel will be put in force when the vessel comes back to England from her present voyage.

THE TIRZAH.

Damage—Collision—Regulations for Preventing, Arts. 2, 3, 5—Infringement—Light—36 & 37 Vict. c. 85, s. 17.

If an infringement of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea may by possibility cause or contribute to a collision, the vessel infringing the regulations will be found to blame under the provisions of sect. 17 of Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85), notwithstanding that an infringement was justifiable, unless the actual infringement was necessary.

A vessel moving her lights in bad weather from a place approved by the Board of Trade, and where, semble, they complied with the regulations as to visibility, to a place where they were obscured, to a certain extent, by sails, &c., on the ground that in the approved place they would be washed away, found to blame for a collision which might have been occasioned by their non-visibility, on the ground that, though it was justifiable to move them, they should have been moved to such a place, or such steps should have been taken, as to render them properly visible in the new place.

THIS was an action for damages sustained by the barque Duke of Wellington in a collision between that vessel and the brig Tirzah, about ten or twelve miles S.E. by E. of Orfordness, about midnight on the night of the 27th-28th Aug. 1878.

The Duke of Wellington was a barque of 794 tons register, and was on a voyage from South Shields to Carthagena, laden with a cargo of coal and coke, and manned by a crew of sixteen hands.

The Tirzah was a brig of 239 tons register, and was on a voyage from Archangel to London, laden with a cargo of oats, and manned by a crew of eight hands.

The night was clear, but dark, the wind about W.S.W., a strong breeze, and, according to those on board the Tirzah, there was a heavy sea running. The Duke of Wellington was close-hauled on the port tack, heading about N.W., and going about three and a half knots through the water, under all plain sail except foretopgallant and mainsails. The Tirzah was close-hauled on the starboard tack, under topsails, courses, jib, and trysail, and making about one and a half knots an hour.

Those on board the Duke of Wellington observed the Tirzah three points on the starboard bow, about one-third of a mile off, but could see no lights till the Tirzah was quite close, when a red light was seen. The Duke of Wellington ported her helm, and let go the spanker sheet and lee main braces; but nevertheless before she had paid off sufficiently she with her port bow struck the port bow of the Tirzah. Those on board the Tirzah observed the green light of the Duke of Wellington three points on the Tirzah's port bow about a mile off. They kept their luff until close to the Duke of Wellington, and a collision was imminent, when, after hailing that vessel, their helm was put hard down to ease the blow. There was a good look-out on board both ships. The Duke of Wellington's lights were fixed forward of the greatest beam of the vessel. The Tirzah had two sets of stanchions for her lights, one set right aft and the other forward. It was proved that the surveying officer of the Board of Trade at Dublin had directed the lights to be removed from aft, where they had been carried before the inspection, and that they were usually carried forward, but in bad weather were moved aft to their original position, and that on the night of the collision they had been moved aft at 10 p.m. From that position they were not visible right ahead, nor on either bow from an angle variously estimated by the witnesses at from half a point to one and a half points on each bow.

The question was whether the fact of the lights being in such a position was, under the circumstances, sufficient to render the Tirzah liable for the damage arising from the collision within the meaning of sect. 17 of the Merchant Shipping Act.

The following enactments were those referred to:

Merchant Shipping Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), Table (C.)

Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea—Rules concerning lights.

Art. 2.—The lights mentioned in the following articles, and no others, shall be carried in all weathers between sunset and sunrise.

Art. 3.—Seagoing steamships when under weigh shall carry

(a) At the foremast head, &c.

(b) On the starboard side, &c.

(c) On the port side a red light so constructed as to show an uniform unbroken light over an arc of the horizon of ten points of the compass, so fixed as to throw the light from right ahead to two points abaft the beam on the port side, and of such a character as to be visible on a dark night with a clear atmosphere at a distance of at least two miles

(d) The said green and red lights shall be fitted with the board screens projecting at least 3ft, forward from the light, so as to prevent these lights from being seen across the bow.

Art. 5.—Sailing vessels under weigh or being towed shall carry the same lights as steamships under weigh, with the exception of the white masthead lights, which they shall never carry.

The Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85), s. 17.

If in any case of collision it is proved to the court before which the case is tried that any of the regulations contained in or made under the Merchant Shipping Acts 1854 to 1873 has been infringed, the ship by which such regulation has been infringed shall be deemed to be in fault, unless it be shown to the satisfaction of the court that the circumstances of the case made departure from the regulation necessary.

The case was heard on Nov. 21 and 22, by Sir R. Phillimore, assisted by two of the elder brethren of the Trinity House as assessors.

Butt, Q.C. and Dr. W. G. F. Phillimore for plaintiffs, owners of the Duke of Wellington.—The position of these lights was such that we, approaching on her bow, could not see them, therefore the position misled us, and caused the collision. Two circumstances must combine to prevent the Tirzah being liable for this collision: (1) a necessity for carrying the lights aft; and (2) a necessity for carrying them aft in such a way as not to comply with the regulations. The object of the statute was to prevent the court having to decide on conflicting evidence whether in any particular case the infringement of the regulations did or did not cause or contribute to a collision. To bring the Tirzah under the edge of the statute it is only necessary to show that the infringement was not absolutely necessary, and that it may have caused or contributed to the collision. We have the strongest evidence on that point. The defendants themselves are obliged to admit that, with the ship leaning over as she was, the lee light, which is the one here in question, would be obscured by the mainsail for one and a half points on the bow; within that angle we could not see the light, and, not seeing it, we were justified in supposing either that the object we did see was a vessel going the same way as ourselves, and therefore no cause of immediate danger, or a vessel running free, and therefore, in the then existing state of the wind, a passed vessel, and not a source of danger at all; we were therefore justified, as a close-hauled vessel, in keeping our luff till we, at the last moment, discovered a state of things in which, though we did all that seamanship could suggest, the collision could not be avoided. What right or excuse had the Tirzah for carrying her lights in such a place? The Board of Trade at Dublin had pointed out that it was an improper place; and even if the weather was such as to prevent them being carried forward, yet the weather was not exceptionally bad weather, but such as vessels expect to meet, and therefore she ought to have adopted precautions either by having the staunchions aft turned out, or the mainsail hauled up, so as to show the lights ahead.

E. C. Clarkson (with him Myburgh) for defendants, owners of the Tirzah.—The court will first determine the facts, and then see if the statute applies. We with our lights burning see the Duke of Wellington's light three points on our bow; it is not contended that our light was obscured to that extent, and therefore, if the Duke of Wellington had had a proper look-out, our light would have been seen, and it was her duty as a port-tacked ship to get out of our way. The collision was caused by her want of look-out, and if she had no proper look-out, the visibility or invisibility of our light could not by any possibility cause or contribute to the collision:

The Englishman, 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 506; L. Rep. 3 P. Div. 18; 37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 412.

Our lights only became obscured at about five-eighths of a point, that is, only very shortly before the collision, and when a collision was already inevitable for the want of look-out on board the Duke of Wellington. Besides, if we had kept our lights forward in the place which the Board of Trade desired, we could not, under the existing circumstances of wind and sea, keep them alight at all, and therefore we were justified in moving them to a place where, at all events, they would burn safely. The old stanchions left in the place where the lights were originally placed were at once the best and only makeshift we could avail ourselves of.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE, after consultation with the Trinity Masters, said:—"This is a case of collision which happened between twelve and one o'clock in the morning of the 28th Aug., about ten miles from Orfordness. The direction of the wind was stated to be W. S. W., or W. by S., and the weather was clear but dark. It appears that there was a strong and heavy sea, and at the time the tide was ebb. The vessels that came into collision were the barque Duke of Wellington and the brig Tirzah. The Duke of Wellington was by far the larger ship, being 794 tons register, and the Tirzah only 239 tons register. The Duke of Wellington was bound from South Shields to Carthagena, with a crew of sixteen hands, and a cargo of coal and coke. Between twelve and one she says that she had all her plain sail except mainsail and foretopgallant sail, and was heading N.W., making three to four knots an hour. No question arises as to her lights, which were admitted to be proper. She says she saw a vessel without lights from a quarter to half a mile off, and about three points on her starboard bow, and that the vessel was watched; there is no doubt it was the Tirzah, but no lights could be seen. Suddenly they appeared close to the Duke of Wellington, who could not pay off enough in the time, and the Tirzah came into collision with her; the two vessels struck together on their port bows. Now the Tirzah's case is, that she was close-hauled on the starboard tack, and was under her topsails, courses, jib and trysail, proceeding, as she says, at the rate of about one and a half knots an hour, and that she saw the green light of the Duke of Wellington at a distance of about a mile, and about three points on her port bow. She was kept close-hauled by the wind, expecting the Duke of Wellington would keep out of the way, but the Duke of Wellington approached, and a collision took place.

There is no dispute on this part of the case that the Duke of Wellington was a port-tacked vessel, and the Tirzah, a starboard-tacked vessel; therefore it was the duty of the former to get out of the way. She was unable to discharge it, she says, on account of the insufficient state of the Tirzah's red light: and the 17th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85) has been invoked in her favour: that section is as follows: [His Lordship here read the section given above.] Now this section has undergone much discussion both in this court and before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and the result of the case is to establish the law that, in any case where an infringement of the regulations could by any possibility have caused or affected the collision, the ship so infringing them is brought under the section to which I have referred.

Now in this case the Tirzah up to ten p.m. did carry her lights forward, and at ten o'clock at night they were removed aft, and, as I understand, close to the traffrail. One of the questions that I have put to the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House is, whether, having regard to the state of the weather, it was a justifiable act: and they are of opinion that it was, and in that I agree. They were, unfortunately, placed aft in such a position as unquestionably to infringe the regulations, to what extent is perhaps doubtful, but we think it must have been to the extent of a point or a point and a half.

The second question then arises whether, in this state of things, such an infringement of the rule could by possibility have affected this collision. That is evidently a question for the Elder Brethren, who have assisted me with their nautical skill; and, in their opinion, it must be answered in the affirmative that it could by possibility have affected the collision.

The main question then arises with regard to the other branch of the clause of the statute, namely, were there any circumstances which made a departure from the regulation necessary? It appears, on the evidence, that the officials of the Board of Trade at Dublin passed the lights, and that they were in the same condition previous to 1873 as they were on the occasion of the collision. Soon after the passing of the Merchant Shipping Act in that year (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85) the Board of Trade ordered the stanchions to be put forward, and the lights were carried forward, it appears, at that time. Now, it has been argued with considerable plausibility and acuteness that this vessel was constrained by the state of the weather to remove her lights from the position in which they had been, and in which they were placed by the direction of the Board of Trade, and that it was the best makeshift that could be adopted, and that if they were placed in their original position aft, it was as much as could be expected from the master of the ship. On the whole, I have arrived at the conclusion that it is not a sufficient excuse that this vessel was in such rough weather as to render it necessary that her lights should be removed from forward to aft. It seems that a fair and proper arrangement should be provided to make them comply with the regulations as to visibility, and such was not provided. I must, therefore, under the provisions of the statute, hold that the Tirzah is deemed to be in fault for this collision.

Practice—Institution of suit—Default cause—Time—Writ of summons—Warrant of arrest—Adm. Court Rules 1871, r. 4—Rules of the Supreme Court; Order I., r. 1: Order V., r. 11; Order IX., r. 10.

In ordinary default causes in rem, the time at which the steps in the action may be taken date from the service of the writ of summons, and not, as before the Judicature Acts came into operation, from the service of the warrant of arrest.

THIS was a motion in a cause of towage and necessaries instituted against the vessel Maria.

The cause was instituted on the 25th Oct. 1878, and the writ of summons had been served on the ship by being nailed to the mast, in accordance with Order IX., r. 10. No appearance was entered on behalf of the owners or others interested, but no warrant of arrest (Order V., r. 11 a) was issued till the 14th Nov. 1878.

G. Bruce now moved the court ex parte to allow the plaintiff to file proofs and enter action for trial, notwithstanding that the time had not elapsed since the issue of the warrant, required by Admiralty Court Rules 1871, r. 4. (a) He argued that since the Judicature Acts the writ of summons was notice to all the world of the suit, and that therefore Admiralty Court Rules 1871, rule 4, must be read as if the expression "writ of summons" were used instead of "warrant of arrest;" the warrant of arrest is now only necessary to enable the vessel to be sold under the order of the court, and the writ of summons is now the commencement of Admiralty actions in rem as well as of all other actions (Order I., r. 1), and is in actions in rem served in the same way that the warrant of arrest formerly was (Order XI., r. 10).

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I shall grant the application in the present case, as I am of opinion that in a case like the present the service of the writ of summons by nailing it on the mast is sufficient intimation to all whom it may concern of the existence of the suit. But it must be borne in mind that the present application is in a cause by default, and therefore made ex parte, and I do not say that I should grant the application under other circumstances, as there are peculiarities in some cases where the proceedings are in pœnam, and the warrant of arrest may be a necessary preliminary to found jurisdiction. *Practice—Trial by jury—Admiralty Division—Transfer—*38 & 39 Vict. c. 77, s. 11 (2) (3), Order XXXVI., rr. 3, 27.

An action assigned to the Admiralty Division, but which would not have been within the cognizance of the High Court of Admiralty before the Judicature Acts, transferred to another division on that ground.

Quœre, can an action be tried, and the issues of fact therein decided, by a jury, in the Admiralty Division of the High Court as well as in the Common Law Divisions?

THIS was a motion to transfer an action for "damage to cargo" from this division to the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court.

The Seaham was a British ship, and her owners were resident in Great Britain.

E. C. Clarkson, for the defendants, owners of the Seaham.—This is not a case within the Admiralty Court Act 1861, s. 6 (24 Vict. c. 10), and therefore not one over which the High Court of Admiralty would have had jurisdiction; therefore it has been wrongly assigned to this division: (Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1875, s. 11 (3), 38 & 39 Vict. c. 77). No doubt the court has power to retain it (Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1875, s. 11 (2), 38 & 39 Vict. c. 77), but it would be inconvenient, and besides we desire to try the case by jury; we have a right to demand trial by jury (Order XXXVI., rr. 3, 27.) [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Is there anything to prevent you trying the case with a jury in this division?] There is at all events no precedent for so doing, and the cases in the Chancery Division in which a jury is required are set down for trial in London or Westminster in the general list, and tried before one of the judges of the Common Law Divisions. I should therefore, later on, have to ask for directions how the trial was to take place, and the cause being improperly assigned here, I take the more direct and simple course of asking to transfer it bodily.

W. G. Phillimore.—Allowing that this case comes within the provisions of Order XXXVI., rr. 3, 27, and that the defendants have a right to try by jury, there is nothing to prevent the exercise of the right in this division, even if it should ultimately be necessary to try issues of fact with a jury, and to follow the Chancery precedent in such a case; there may well be issues of law which we prefer to have decided in this court.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I shall grant the present application, as the cause has been wrongly assigned to this division, but not on the ground that I have no power to summon a jury. Costs to be costs in the cause.

THE JACOB LANDSTROM.

Practice—Salvage—Rival salvors—Consolidation—Tender.

The court has power to order the consolidation of salvage suits in all cases, but it will not usually exercise the power contrary to the wish of the various plaintiffs; but if the plaintiffs institute and prosecute several suits without necessity, they will be condemned in costs.

When there are separate suits instituted in respect of services rendered to a vessel and her crew by rival salvors, and the defendant is unable to estimate the respective values of two several services, he will be allowed to make a single tender in respect of the whole services rendered.

THIS was a motion in a cause of salvage by the defendants, owners of the Jacob Landstrom, to consolidate two salvage suits which had been brought against that vessel, or in the alternative to be allowed to make a single tender in respect

(a) See The Polymede (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 124; 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 367; L. Rep. 1 P. Div. 121) as to the effect of the Judicature Acts and Orders under it on the Act and rules previously in force.

(b) The time for taking proceedings in Admiralty actions may always be abridged by order of court or a judge under Order LVII., r. 7; but in default causes there is a difficulty as to the time of the service of the notice of motion to abridge the time, though, looking to Order XIX., r. 6, Order LIII. rr. 3, 7, and Morton v. Miller (L. Rep. Ch. Div. 516), Digmond v. Croft (34 L.T. Rep. N.S. 786; L. Rep. 3 Ch. Div. 512), and Gardiner v. Hardy (W. N. 1876, p. 185), it would probably be considered sufficient if they were filed in the Admiralty Registry.

of both suits. The notice served on the plaintiffs in Action 1878, K. No. 5, was as follows:

We, Stokes, Saunders, and Stokes, solicitors for the defendants in this cause, give notice that we shall by counsel, on the 5th March 1878, move the judge in court to order that this action be consolidated with action 1877, O. No. 379, or that in the event of either of the plaintiffs objecting thereto the defendants may make a tender in court in this action of a sum that they may deem sufficient to satisfy the claims for salvage in both actions, notwithstanding the actions may not be consolidated.

A notice was served on the plaintiffs in action 1877, O. No. 379, in the same terms excepting that "Action 1878, K. No. 5" was substituted for "Action 1877, O. No. 379."

March 5.—Stubbs for the defendants.—The court has power to order the consolidation of the suits; but if it should be of opinion that the interests of the salvors are so diverse as not to be conveniently disposed of in the same suit, it will not on that account subject us to the inconvenience of making separate tenders in each suit. We admit that we are liable to pay some salvage, and desire to tender; but if the plaintiffs' claims are so difficult to adjust inter se, that they are compelled to keep their actions separate, how can we, before the trial of the question, say in what proportions their services or alleged services should be rewarded?

W. G. Phillimore, for plaintiffs in Action 1877, O. No. 379.—The consolidation of suits is a matter in the discretion of the court, and it has been already decided in the registry not to allow it, and this court will not interfere on appeal with a matter of discretion. There is no precedent for a tender being made common to two separate actions, and such a proceeding would occasion greater inconvenience than it is alleged that it would prevent. Suppose one set of salvors consider the amount sufficient and accept it, they will be compelled to fight the question of amount at their own risk against the other set which consider it insufficient, apart altogether from the question of apportionment. The defendants' servants did not abandon the ship, and their mate has been examined; therefore, all the circumstances of the salvage and the relative value of the services rendered by each set of salvors are in their knowledge, and they cannot be within the personal knowledge of both sets of salvors. They have had the benefit and should bear the burden, not we who rendered the service. The questions to be tried are separate, and we are entitled to a separate judgment in each, and therefore to a separate tender for each.

Nelson, for the plaintiffs in Action 1878, K No. 5, also objected both to the consolidation and to a joint tender, but claimed if the consolidation was ordered that he should have the conduct of the cause, as he was the first salvor in the field.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The first question that comes before the court is as to the power of consolidation. It is hardly necessary to say that it has always been considered a special power of this court to order actions to be consolidated both in cases of wages and other suits. The practice is laid down by Dr. Lushington as follows (The William Hutt, 1 Lush. 27; 1 L. T. Rep. N.S. 448): "According to my knowledge the universal practice of the court has been to consolidate actions where the decision of each action depends on precisely the same facts; and in salvage suits the court has gone further, consolidating actions where there are several sets of salvors not rendering precisely the same services. The power of consolidating actions is most beneficial. But for this power the owners of a ship would often be vexed by a host of different actions arising out of one matter, as in a case of collisions by all the several owners of cargo in the vessel run down, and the court could afford no relief, having no power to order the evidence in one action to be taken as evidence in "another." I perceive also, that in one case (The Melpomene, 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 515; L. Rep. 4 A. & E. 129), decided in July 1873, I ordered two causes to be consolidated where the application was made by the plaintiffs and resisted by the defendants. Nevertheless, the practice of the court for many years has been not to compel a consideration where the different plaintiffs object to it and maintain that their interests are diverse. In such cases the court has not ordered consolidation, but has always held it to be in its power to condemn the party refusing to consolidate in costs. I do not therefore order a consolidation of these actions. There remains the further question whether it is not competent to the owner of the salved property to make one single joint tender in both separate actions. On the whole I am of opinion that it is competent for him to do so. It is quite clear that there are some cases in which it would be impossible for him to make separate tenders. For example, take the case of a vessel absolutely derelict and two salvors setting up separate claims, it would be impossible for the owner to know what the several services rendered were, but he would know the value of the vessel and her cargo and freight, and therefore might estimate what the value of the services in the aggregate was. In such a case it would be unjust to call upon the owners of property to make separate tenders, and I am of opinion that the present case falls within the same category. There is a salvage of the crew and a separate salvage of the vessel. The owner may estimate the whole value of the service rendered to his property at a certain sum and tender it in court, and if the salvors refuse it they do so at the risk of costs. I order a single tender for the whole services rendered to the ship, the defendants to elect if they choose in which action it is to be paid in.

BAYLEY AND OTHERS v. CHADWICK.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Commission—Sale of ship—Evidence for jury.

The appellants were auctioneers. The respondent put a ship into their hands for sale, and it was agreed that if it was not sold by auction, but if a subsequent sale were effected to any person led to make an offer "in consequence of the appellant's mention or publication for auction purposes," they were to be entitled to a commission.

The ship was not sold by auction, but afterwards P., having been present at a conversation which led him to believe that S. would purchase the ship, wrote to the appellants, "noting that they had the ship in their hands," to enquire the price, etc., P. then communicated with S., who ultimately became the purchaser, but not through the agency of P.

Held (reversing the judgment of the court below), that there was evidence to go to the jury that the sale was effected in consequence of the appellants' mention or publication, within the meaning of the agreement, and that they were entitled to their commission.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Bramwell, Brett, and Cotton, L.JJ.) reported in 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 543; 37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 593, reversing a judgment of the Common Pleas Division (Lord Coleridge, C.J. and Denman, J.) reported in 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 453; 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 740.

The action was brought for commission upon the sale of a ship. The right to the commission depended upon a letter written by the respondent, the vendor, to the appellants, who were auctioneers, in these words:

In case the ship is not sold by auction, she is forthwith to revert to the custody of the owners for private sale, but in case a subsequent sale be effected to any person, or firm, introduced by you, or led to make such offer in consequence of your mention or publication for auction purposes, you to be entitled to the same one per cent. commission on such sale.

The ship was not sold by auction, but was afterwards purchased by a person of the name of Sugden, who was first introduced to the appellants by a man of the name of Pearson, who acted for some time as his agent in the matter, and the sole question was whether there was evidence that he had first heard that the ship was for sale, "in consequence of" the appellants "mention or publication for auction purposes," within the meaning of the contract. The case was tried before Lord Coleridge, C.J., when the jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs. A rule was obtained in the Common Pleas Division for a new trial on the ground of misdirection and also on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence. The rule was discharged, whereupon the defendant appealed to the Court of Appeal, who held that there was no evidence to go to the jury in support of the plaintiffs' claim. The plaintiffs then appealed to the House of Lords.

Benjamin, Q.C, Murphy, Q.C, and Edwyn Jones appeared for the appellants.

Herschell, Q.C. and R. T. Reid for the respondent.

Their LORDSHIPS were unanimously of opinion that there was no question of law in the case, and that upon the facts set out above there was ample evidence to go to the jury in support of the plaintiffs' claim.

Judgment of the Court of Appeal reversed with costs; judgment of the Common Pleas Division restored.

FISHER v. SMITH.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Insurance broker — Sub-agent — Policy — Lien — Monthly payments.

Where a shipowner employs a broker to effect insurances, and, there being no underwriters at the place of employment, the broker engages another broker elsewhere to effect the insurances, and such latter broker pays the premiums, he has a lien on the policies for such premiums as against the shipowner.

Settlement of accounts between the two brokers once a month, the sub-agent meanwhile retaining the policies, is not inconsistent with such a lien, even though the first broker has been paid by the shipowner.

Crawshay v. Homfray (4 Barn. & Ald. 50) distinguished).

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Cockburn, C.J., James, Bramwell, and Brett, L.JJ.), reported in 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 492: 37 L. T. Rep. N.S. 18, reversing a judgment of the Exchequer Division (Kelly, C.B., and Cleasby, B.), reported in 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 211; 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 912, in favour of the plaintiff upon a special case.

The action was an action of detinue, brought to recover a policy of insurance effected by the defendant, an insurance broker at Liverpool, as sub-agent for a broker of the name of Skinner, who had been employed by the plaintiff to effect the policy for him. The defendant claimed to have a lien on the policy for the amount of premiums paid by him, but the plaintiff, who had paid Skinner the amount of the premiums, claimed to have the policy given up to him. It was admitted that the plaintiff knew that Skinner had employed the defendant as his sub-agent; but it was said that the course of business between the parties, by which the amounts due were settled monthly, being a giving of credit, discharged the lien.

A special case was stated, which is set out at length in the reports in the Courts below.

Watkin Williams, Q.C., and T. S. Pritchard appeared for the appellant.

The arguments urged by them appear sufficiently from the judgments of their Lordships.

H. Matthews, Q.C., and Maclachan, who appeared for the respondent, were not called upon to address the House.

At the conclusion of the arguments for the appellant their Lordships gave judgment as follows:

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Cairns).—My Lords, I do not think your Lordships entertain any doubt as to the propriety of the decision of the Court of Appeal in this case.

There are substantially three questions in the case, which have been argued by the learned counsel for the appellant. In the first place, was there in the respondent, from the nature of the transaction, a lien? Secondly, was that lien superseded by any contract or course of business inconsistent with it? Thirdly, was it discharged by any payment which was a payment to the respondent?

As to the question whether this is a case in which a lien originally would arise in the respondent, I think there can be no doubt he is the person who effected the policies of insurance; he either paid the premiums or became liable for them, and his was the labour and the care through which the insurances were effected. According to the well-known rule of law he would be entitled, for his labour and care, and his money expended, to a lien in the nature of holding possession of the policies, and he would be entitled to that lien against every person, against the owner of the goods for whose benefit the policies were effected, and against any intermediaries who might have intervened between the owner and himself. That appears to me to be the ordinary and well-known rule of law, and I do not think it was seriously disputed at your Lordships' bar. But was there any contract or course of dealing in the case which superseded that lien, which, ordinarily speaking, would have arisen? As to that, the argument has been that the lien was superseded, whether it was a lien of the respondent or of the intermediary, Skinner; but I will take it as a lien of the respondent. Now, the course of dealing is a question of fact, and is to be ascertained from the statements in the case, with the power which your Lordships have, and which the court below had, to draw whatever may be the inferences of fact that you think a jury would, or ought to have, drawn. The course of dealing was this: the respondent, Smith, effected in the course of the month a number of insurances for Skinner. At the end of the month, or within the first ten days of the succeeding month, he furnished him with an account of all that he had expended, and his commission; and he expected to receive payment in cash on the 10th of the following month for what he had so expended. It is said that that was a giving of credit, and that it was inconsistent with maintaining a lien, and that it superseded any right of lien which might otherwise have existed. I could quite understand a course of business of that kind, with a slight addition, superseding the lien. In the case of Crawshay v. Homfray (4 Barn. & Ald. 50) there was an additional element in the course of business. There a wharfinger was in the habit of receiving goods, upon which he might have had a lien, but the course of business was that he parted with the goods from time to time, receiving payment at the end of every six months, or every year, for all his dues; and it was held that that course of business prevented him from maintaining his right of lien. If it had been the course of business here for the respondent not merely to effect these policies, but from time to time to give them up as they were effected, and simply to stand upon his right to be paid at the end of the month, then I can understand that the case would be like that I have cited. But instead of that being so here, your Lordships have exactly the opposite state of facts found in this case; because not only is there no statement that it was the habit for the policies to be delivered up at the end of the month, and not only is the case one in which you are dealing with a kind of article, namely policies of insurance, as to which there is no immediate necessity for delivering them up as soon as they are effected, but in addition to that you have a precise statement, inserted apparently for this very purpose, that it was not the usual practice for the respondent to part with the original stamped policies to Skinner until the premiums were received from him. What does that mean but this, that the habit of business between the parties was that the respondent insisted upon, and held firmly, his lien? And no instance can be given of the opposite. The conclusion, of course, as a matter of fact, upon that is that the course of business was not any superseding of the lien, but was a course of business by which the premiums were settled month by month, the lien notwithstanding being maintained until payment. That answers the second question.

Then is there anything which has discharged the lien by payment? The moment your Lordships find that the lien was a lien of the respondent there is no pretence for saying that there was any payment to him, because such payment as has been made was payment to Skinner the intermediary; and the learned counsel for the appellants very properly said that he could not contend that Skinner was the agent of the respondent to receive payment.

That exhausts the whole of the case, and, under these circumstances, I submit to your Lordships that the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Lord PENZANCE.—My Lords, I have been quite unable throughout to appreciate any considerable difficulty in this case. The appellant Fisher lived at Barrow-in-Furness, and he was minded to open a policy of insurance upon some goods belonging to him. He employed a local agent named Skinner to effect that policy. Skinner employed the respondent, as a sub-agent of Fisher, to effect the policy. Thereupon he effected a policy, and kept it in his hands, as I believe is the universal practice of brokers effecting insurances. The result of that transaction, as it seems to me, would be to make Smith, the respondent, the sub-agent of Fisher. Fisher knew that he had been employed for the purpose of effecting the policy, and Smith knew that he was effecting the policy not for Skinner but for Fisher. It was therefore a perfectly well-understood transaction. Under these circumstances it appears to me that the ordinary rule of law that a lien would arise in favour of the broker who held in his hands the policy could not but be applicable to this case. It is precisely the same as if there had been no intermediate agent at all, and as if Fisher had written direct to Smith to ask him to open a policy for him. Having opened that policy, and having got possession of it, he was not liable to give it up to his principal until he had received the premium which he had either paid or become liable to pay in respect of it. It appears to me that up to this point, and looked at in this way, the case does not admit of argument.

But then it is said, conceding that there would have been originally, from the nature of the transaction, a lien in Smith as against Fisher, and as against everybody, yet, if you look at the case, you will find that a bargain was made by Smith which was inconsistent with his having any such lien. Paragraph 12 of the case says: "The course of business was for the defendant to effect the policy with the underwriters, and procure and deliver to Skinner copies of the policies." Therefore the course of business as there stated was not to effect a policy and hand it over to Skinner, but to hand over to Skinner a copy of it—"and also to send to Skinner a debit note of the premiums paid, and at the commencement of each month to make out and deliver to Skinner an account debiting him with the money due in respect of the premiums paid on the several insurances effected for him during the month then preceding, and on the 10th of each month the account of premiums paid in the preceding month was paid." That is to say, the course of business was that when he had effected a policy he kept it in his own hands, he forwarded a copy of it to Skinner, and he debited Skinner for it in the general account of all the moneys that were due between them, which general account was paid at the end of the month, or at latest on the 10th day of the following month. Then the case goes on: "It was not the usual practice of the defendant to part with the original stamped policies to Skinner until the premiums were received from him." Now reading that as a statement of the way in which the defendant and Skinner carried on business, I am wholly at a loss to understand how that was inconsistent with the idea of the defendant retaining the policy, and retaining a lien. It is true that it shows that the payment was, according to the common understanding between them, ordinarily postponed for a month, or until the 10th of the following month, but that postponement of the payment was not coupled with the giving up of the thing in the meantime. Undoubtedly a lien may be lost in cases where the party agrees to give up the thing, making a bargain at the same time for payment on a future day. If the agreement is that the thing is to be surrendered, and that the payment is to be postponed, that is inconsistent with a lien. But there is nothing inconsistent with a lien in saying, "I will take payment for convenience sake at the end of the month, and I will keep the policy in my hands in the meantime; if a loss should occur in the meantime, and you want the policy, then you must pay the premium; but, subject to that event occurring, the premium need not be paid till the end of the month." It seems to me that this is the natural consequence and effect of the sort of agreement, as it is called, or rather the course of business which is here set up, and if the matter be viewed in that aspect, of course the ground taken by the appellant entirely fails.

As regards the remaining proposition which was argued, namely, that though there was once a lien, yet that lien has been discharged, I have nothing to add to what has fallen from my noble and learned friend on the woolsack.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the judgment of the court below should be affirmed.

Lord O'HAGAN.—My Lords, I am quite of the same opinion.

There were two points argued in this case. On the first point, as to the existence of a lien, the matter stands in this way: It is found that the appellant Fisher, employed an intermediary to do his work, but the person who effected the insurance, who paid the money for the making of it, and got the policy into his hands, was the defendant. And that was with the full knowledge and assent of the plaintiff himself, because, in paragraph 5 of the case, it is found that, although Skinner was the person directly employed, "the plaintiff had been informed before receiving the covering note that the policies which Skinner was authorised to effect, as above stated, had been effected through the defendant at Liverpool." I do not say that that makes any great difference in the case, or that it would have been necessary for the case of the plaintiff that that should have been found; but it is a fact that what was done by the defendant here was done with the full knowledge and authority of Fisher, and in that way he became the authorised maker of this particular insurance.

Then it is said that the lien does not exist because there is an antagonism between the contract made by the parties and the existence of a lien. I do not think I can say any more on that subject than has been said. It seems to me plain that the principle of antagonism between a contract and the existence of a lien does not apply to this case. The principle would have applied if in this case there had been a contract that, on the making of the insurance, the policy should be given up immediately and absolutely; then the lien could not have existed without interfering with the contract between the parties. But that is not the ordinary bargain, and it is not found to be the bargain which existed in this case, because the bargain, on the contrary, was that the policy should remain with the person who had made it and paid for it, and that he should hold it until his debt should be discharged. Therefore, I think, upon the first branch of the argument there is nothing further to be considered; as to the second branch, I shall only say one word.

If there was a lien, the question is, how was that lien discharged? If Smith, having done this work, was entitled to be paid for it, how has he been paid? He has not been paid at all; ex concessis, he never was paid. It was attempted to show that the payment which Fisher undoubtedly made to Skinner was a payment to Smith, the defendant; but how is that made out in any sort of way? It is said that, according to the course of business, he recognised a payment to Skinner as a payment to himself. He recognised nothing of the kind in the course of business. The course of business found to have existed in the face of this case was a course of business which led to the payment to Skinner by a monthly bill, and then a payment by Skinner to his sub-agent Smith; and why Smith should be bound to stop in the middle of that course of business so far as it harmed him, and never to regard the same course of business so far as it helped him, I cannot at all understand. I put the question myself to the learned counsel, whether or no there was anything in the case that would entitle him to contend that the intermediary had been constituted an agent to receive payment for the sub-agent, and the answer was that there was nothing of the kind. There is not a particle of evidence in the case, or finding upon the case, that any such acceptance was ever authorised by Smith to the intermediary; and if not I cannot at all comprehend how the payment to the intermediary can be held to have been a payment to the sub-agent. If that was no payment to him, and if he had a lien, the lien is there still undischarged in justice and in law. I observe that in the court below a statement of the law was referred to which I think I may very fairly and properly submit to your Lordships, as covering as the learned judge (Brett, L.J., at 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 496; 37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 22) says who cites it, the whole of this case. It is from 2 Phillips on Insurance, sect. 1909. Your Lordships will observe how very fully it touches all parts of this case: "The agent who effects a policy for his principal, and advances the premium, or becomes responsible for it, and retains the policy in his hands, has a lien upon it for his commission and the premium, until the same are paid to him or he is supplied with funds for the payment, whether his immediate employer is the assured himself, or an intermediate agent; and in the latter case whether the intermediate agency was known or not to the sub-agent claiming the lien." Here there was an intermediate agent, here there was a sub-agent, and here the knowledge of the whole transaction was in the minds of all the parties. It appears to me quite impossible to contend that under those circumstances this lien does not exist as fully now as it ever existed at any period of the transaction.

On the whole, I have no doubt that the judgment of the court below was right, and that the appeal should be dismissed.

Lord SELBORNE.—My Lords, I have but a few words to add to what has been already said. As to the cases of Crawshay v. Homfray (ubi sup.) and Kirchner v. Venus (12 Moo. P. C. 361), I understand their principle to be this, that a lien cannot be claimed so as to intercept the performance of the actual contract between the parties, whether that contract is express or is to be inferred from a certain course of dealing. If the contract is to deliver goods at a certain time, or to deliver them whenever demanded, it would be inconsistent with that contract to refuse to deliver them, the proper time having arrived, upon the ground of any lien for a price, which by agreement was not then payable. Here no such contract has been found by the special case; for if, on the one hand, there was a course of dealing according to which payment of the premiums was usually made to the broker by monthly settlements with his principal, it is also found, on the other hand, that it was not the course of dealing between the parties (for which purpose I identify Fisher with Skinner) that the policies should be delivered to the principal until the premiums were actually paid to the broker. The true result is, in my opinion, that payment of the premiums was postponed till the monthly settlement only, when possession of the policies was not in the meantime demanded; but that if the policies were sooner demanded, they were then to be delivered up to the principal upon payment of the premiums, and not otherwise.

Judgment of the court below affirmed, and appeal dismissed, with costs.

COURT OF APPEAL.

SITTINGS AT LINCOLN'S INN.

Reported by H. PEAT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Thursday, Feb. 20, 1879.

Ex parte COOPER; Re MCLAREN.

Stoppage in transitu—End of transitus—Constructive delivery — Delivery of part of cargo — Master's lien for unpaid freight.

Where goods are placed in the possession of a carrier to be carried for the vendor to be delivered to the purchaser, the transitus is not at an end so long as the carrier continues to hold the goods as a carrier, and it is not at an end until the carrier, by agreement between himself and the consignee, agrees to hold for the consignee not as carrier but as his agent.

The same principle applies to goods placed in the possession of a warehouseman or wharfinger.

A cargo of miscellaneous iron castings was shipped at Glasgow on the 30th July, by a Scotch firm of manufacturers on board a vessel chartered by them, and consigned to M., a merchant in London, the bill of lading being made out in favour of M. or his assignees, he or they paying freight. M. was managing partner of the Scotch firm, and carried on business in London on his own account.

On the 7th Aug. the ship arrived in the port of London, and on the same day a portion of the cargo was delivered on board a barge belonging to M. On the 8th Aug. the Scotch firm gave notice to the master to stop the unloading of the ship. At that time part only of the freight had been paid. M. had not paid for the goods. On the 19th Aug. M. filed a liquidation petition, and on the 21st Sept. a sequestration was issued against the Scotch firm in the Scotch court:

Held, that the delivery of a part did not amount to a constructive delivery of the whole of the cargo, as, the whole of the freight not having been paid when the part was delivered, it could not be supposed that the master of the ship intended to give up his lien on the cargo for unpaid freight; that the stoppage in transitu was therefore in time, and the trustee in the Scotch sequestration was entitled to the part of the cargo not actually delivered before the stoppage.

Slubey v. Heyward (2 H. Bl. 504) and Hammond v. Anderson (1 B. & P. N. R. 69) distinguished.

THIS was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Registrar Hazlitt, sitting as Chief Judge in Bankruptcy.

The facts of the case were briefly as follows:

Andrew McLaren carried on business as an iron merchant in London on his own account. He also traded at Alloa, in Scotland, in partnership with Richard Andrews, under the firm of the Albion Iron Company. Andrews was only a sleeping partner, McLaren having the management of the business.

On the 30th July 1878 a cargo of 114 tons of miscellaneous iron castings, such as ovens, wheels, troughs, grates, &c., were shipped by the Albion Iron Company on board a vessel called the Shamrock, at Glasgow, and consigned to McLaren in London, the bill of lading being made out in favour of McLaren or his assignees, "he or they paying freight."

On the 7th Aug. 1878 the ship arrived in the port of London, and on the same day about thirty tons of the goods were placed on board a barge belonging to McLaren.

On the 8th Aug. McLaren, who was then in Scotland, and who was aware that both he himself and his Scotch firm were on the verge of insolvency, sent a telegram to his manager in London: "If commenced to unload ship, stop proceedings; if not, do not begin until I return." Upon receipt of this telegram the unloading was suspended.

On the 12th Aug. McLaren returned to London and saw the captain of the ship, and arranged with him to stop the delivery.

Part of the freight was paid on the 7th Aug., and another part was paid on the 15th Aug.

The goods had not been paid for by McLaren.

On the 19th Aug. McLaren filed a liquidation petition in London, and on the 21st Sept. his Scotch firm presented a sequestration petition in the Scotch court, and a sequestration was issued on the same day.

The balance of the freight was paid on the 23rd Aug. by the receiver in the liquidation, and the remainder of the cargo was then landed and placed in medio.

The cargo was claimed by the trustee in the English liquidation, and also by the trustee in the Scotch sequestration, the question being whether McLaren's separate creditors or the creditors of his Scotch firm were to get the benefit of it.

The registrar having decided in favour of the trustee in the Scotch sequestration, the trustee in the English liquidation appealed.

Before the appeal came on for hearing the Scotch trustee abandoned his claim to the thirty tons which had been unloaded before the 8th Aug.

Joseph Brown, Q.C. and Stern for the appellant.—The delivery of a part of the cargo on the 7th Aug. amounted to a constructive delivery of the whole; and thus the transitus was at an end before the notice to stop was given:

Slubey v. Heyward, 2 H. Bl. 504;
Hammond v. Anderson, 1 B. & P. N. R. 69;
Lickbarrow v. Mason, 1 Sm. Lead. Cas. 7th edit. 756;
Hanson v. Meyer, 6 East, 614;
Tanner v. Scovell, 14 M. & W. 28.

If it is a question of intention, as stated in Benjamin on Sales, 2nd edit., p. 663. The intention at the time of the partial delivery must be regarded, and there can be no doubt that at that time the intention was to deliver the whole cargo. [COTTON, L.J.—The only case altogether in your favour is Jones v. Jones, 8 M. & W. 431.] This is not like Dixon v. Yates (5 B. & Ad. 313-341), where Parke, J., said, "If part be delivered with intent to separate that part from the rest, it is not an inchoate delivery of the whole." Here there was no such intention, and the partial delivery was an inchoate delivery of the whole, which would have been completed but for the telegram. The onus of proving an intention to separate a part from the whole lies on the person seeking to stop in transitu. In Betts v. Gibbons (2 Ad. & E. 73). Taunton, J., in answer to counsel who maintained that a delivery of part amounts to a delivery of the whole only when circumstances show that it is meant as such, said, "No; on the contrary, a partial delivery is a delivery of the whole, unless circumstances show that it is not so meant." McLaren in stopping the delivery was giving a fraudulent preference to the creditors of his Scotch firm. They also cited

Simmonds v. Swift, 5 B. & C. 857;
Miles v. Gorton, 2 Cr. & M. 504;
Allan v. Gripper, 2 Cr. & J. 218.

Benjamin, Q.C. and R. T. Reid, for the respondent, were not called upon.

JAMES, L.J.—I think that the decision of the learned registrar in this case ought to be affirmed.

I do not know that it is necessary to lay down absolutely a general principle as regards those cases of Slubey v. Heyward (2 H. Bl. 504) and Hammond v. Anderson (1 B. & P. N. R. 69), namely, as to the circumstances under which a delivery of part is to be considered a delivery of the whole, so as to put an end to the vendor's right of stoppage in transitu. The simple question here is whether, if the vendor receives notice of the vendee's insolvency, and at once takes steps, going to the port as fast as he can, and finds that the captain has delivered part of the goods, he has a right to stop the delivery of the rest. No such case, as far as I have heard, has ever occurred. The cases which have occurred have been cases in which there has been a change of the relationship between the carriers of the warehousemen and the vendee, and such a change of relationship as to make the carrier or the warehouseman the actual holder of the goods for the vendee. In the case of Bolton v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company (13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 764, 767; L. Rep. 1 C. P. 431, 440), Willes, J. says this: "Then, as to the alleged delivery of part of the goods, and the effect of that upon the vendor's right to stop the rest: there have been different expressions of opinion at various times as to whether the delivery of a portion of the goods, the subject of an entire contract, operates as a constructive delivery of the whole, so as to put an end to the right of stopping in transitu. It was supposed to have been thrown out by Taunton, J., that a delivery of part operated as a constructive delivery of the whole; but that doctrine has since been called in question and dissented from; and it is now held that the delivery of part operates as a constructive delivery of the whole only where the delivery of part takes place in the course of the delivery of the whole, and the taking possession by the buyer of that part is the acceptance of constructive possession of the whole." Now, in this case, the fact seems to be really quite clear. There could be nothing like a constructive delivery by the captain of the whole or a constructive acceptance of the whole by the vendee. What the effect might have been if the whole freight had been paid so that the captain had no lien whatever that he could have exercised on behalf of the owners, and the delivery had begun—what difference that would make it is not necessary now to say. It appears to me quite clear that, as there was not actual payment of the whole of the freight, there could not be a constructive delivery of the whole of the goods, because the captain must be assumed not to have delivered the whole until he had received the whole of the freight, and therefore, if the captain had not constructively delivered the whole, it would be impossible to say that the vendee had constructively accepted a delivery which was never constructively made.

I am of opinion, therefore, that in this case there was not such a constructive delivery by the captain, and such a constructive acceptance of that delivery by the vendee as would amount to an acceptance of the whole; that is to say, such an acceptance as to prevent the vendee from refusing to take, or to prevent the vendor from exercising his right of stoppage in transitu, the vendee having become insolvent. I do not think it makes any difference that McLaren was partner in the Scotch firm.

BRETT, L.J.—I am of opinion that there was in this case a valid stoppage in transitu of the goods by the vendor as against the insolvent vendee at the time when McLaren directed the captain to stop the delivery. In my opinion the goods were then in the hands of the shipowner as carrier, and the transitus was not at an end.

The only ground upon which it is urged that the transitus was at an end is, that there had at that time been a part delivery of the cargo. It seems to me that a part delivery of the cargo or of the bulk of the goods is not primâ facie a delivery of the whole, and that those who rely on the part delivery as a constructive delivery of the whole are bound to show that the part delivery was made under such circumstances as to make it a constructive delivery of the whole. Now here it is first objected that McLaren, as a member both of the London house and of the Scotch firm, was doing wrong in stopping the delivery, so as to give the Scotch firm an opportunity of stopping in transitu, that he was thereby making a fraudulent preference; but it was admitted by Mr. Brown that that depended upon whether the transitus was at an end, whether the delivery in law was complete. Therefore, unless the delivery was complete, there was nothing wrong in McLaren (knowing that his London house was insolvent) stopping the delivery so as to give the Scotch firm the opportunity of exercising their rights as unpaid vendors. The Scotch firm had the right to stop in transitu under the circumstances of this case, unless the transitus was over. We therefore come down, or are driven down, to the only point in this case, that is, whether the transitus was over.

Now, the goods were shipped by the Scotch firm. They were placed on board ship to be carried to London, and there delivered. At the time therefore of the delivery on board the goods were held by the captain as the carrier on behalf of the Scotch firm. They were brought to London. There is a part delivery. There had been freight paid, and, to my mind, the captain was bound to deliver, unless ordered to the contrary, up to the extent of the prepaid freight; but the moment he had delivered sufficient to satisfy the prepaid freight, he had his lien upon the rest of the cargo for the unpaid freight. Then the captain, holding the goods as carrier, delivers a part; but is it to be said, or can it be properly said that, when he delivered a part, he intended to deliver the whole? If he did intend to deliver the whole, he intended to give up his lien for his freight. The inference is directly the contrary. As a matter of fact he could not have intended to deliver the whole, and therefore when he delivered part he did not intend to deliver the whole, but on the contrary, he intended to keep back the remainder, or part of the remainder, in order to secure his lien for the freight. In the same way it does not seem to me that from the mere fact of the consignee, McLaren's servant, having received a part, he knowing that he could not receive the rest without paying the freight, and there being no evidence that he offered freight for the rest, it can be said that the proper inference is that he intended to take the delivery of part as the delivery of the whole. It is a mere ordinary case of taking the delivery of a cargo in successive deliveries. If that be so, the captain will hold the undelivered part of the cargo as the carrier, and in that case the transitus is not over. If so, the Scotch firm was entitled to stop in transitu.

With regard to the cases of Slubey v. Heyward and Hammond v. Anderson (ubi sup.), it seems to me that the ground of decision was that in one case the captain of the ship had altered his position from that of a mere carrier, and had undertaken, with the consent of the assignees of the bill of lading, to hold the whole of the cargo for them, and, in the other case, in the same way, the wharfinger, who for a time had held for the persons who put the goods into his hands, altered his position, and he, with the consent of the person to whom the goods were transferred, had agreed to hold them, no longer for the person who had put them into his hands, but for the other side. In both cases there was an attornment, and unless something equivalent to an attornment is shown on the part of the carrier, so that he has altered his position from that of a carrier, and holds the goods in another capacity, it seems to me that the transitus could not be at an end, and, so long as the carrier holds the goods as carrier, the mere fact of delivery of part does not prevent the unpaid vendor from stopping the remainder in transitu. It seems to me that any other doctrine would be of the greatest possible danger in mercantile transactions.

I may say that this case goes even further than a mere stoppage in transitu, because, in my mind, the agreement of the vendor and the vendee, both of whom were sui juris, intended a cessation of the delivery of the goods.

COTTON, L.J.—Whether this case is one of stoppage in transitu or delivery of the whole of the goods, the only question is whether or no there had been a delivery to McLaren in London; that is to say, whether he had actual or constructive possession of that portion of the cargo which remained in the ship, because, as to the rest, I understand it is not disputed.

Now, in my opinion, there is no ground for the contention that from the very first the captain was the agent for McLaren in London; that is to say, that when these goods were put on board the ship they came into the possession of McLaren of London. That being so, these goods, which were actually on board the ship, remained in the possession of the person who occupied the position of having to carry the goods and to deliver them to McLaren in London. Was there such a delivery? Actually there was none; but it was said that there was a constructive delivery, and therefore constructive possession by McLaren. Why? Because it is said, and truly, that there was actual delivery to him in London of portions of the cargo. Now the case might be different possibly if the whole of the cargo had been one entire machine, because, if a person is allowed to take possession of one piece of a machine, it is possession of the whole. It may possibly be—but I do not decide it, for it stands in a very different position from the present case—that he has got possession of the entirety of which he has taken away an essential part. But here we have a cargo of a number of different things capable of being estimated separately as to their value, and in fact estimated in the bills of lading as to the particular value of each. Does a delivery of a portion of these articles, which are in their nature entirely separate one from the other, constitute constructive delivery of the whole? In my opinion, on principle it does not. It is only a delivery of that which is put over the ship's side and into the hands of the consignee. The captain has a lien for his freight on the remainder, without in any way having given them up. But it is said that the decisions and authorities are against that conclusion, and certainly no decision has been quoted which decides this case in favour of the appellant. Tanner v. Scovell (14 M. & W. 28) was said to be a case most in his favour; but it really was no such thing. It was only a decision that, where a consignee took part intending to deal with it separate from the rest of the cargo, under those circumstances taking part was not taking the whole. But Mr. Brown, I think, put his argument, not in words, but in substance, thus: that where there was no evidence it must be presumed that taking the part was taking the whole. In my opinion that proposition is wrong in principle; but has it been so decided? In Tanner v. Scovell the learned judge who delivered the judgment of the court (Pollock, C.B.) (14 M. & W. at page 37) says this: "It will be found that the only two cases, as far as I have looked, which bear the semblance of an authority that a mere part delivery is sufficient to put an end to the right to stoppage in transitu are Slubey v. Heywood and Hammond v. Anderson. In the case of Binney v. Poyntz (4 B. & Ad. 571), part delivery of a portion of a haystack, with intent to separate that from the remainder, was held not to be sufficient. In Jones v. Jones (8 M. & W. 431), on the other hand, this court held, that the vendee (who was assignee under a trust deed) took possession of part of the cargo with the intention of obtaining possession of the whole for the purposes of the trust, and therefore that such taking possession of part did put an end to the transit; but it was fully admitted in that case, that the mere delivery of part to the vendee, when he meant to separate that part from the remainder, did not put an end to the right to stop in transitu . . . . . If the vendee takes possession of part, not meaning thereby to take possession of the whole, but to separate that part and to take possession of that part only, it puts an end to the transitus only with respect to that part, and no more; the right of lien and the right of stoppage in transitu on the remainder still continue." Now the judgment in Slubey v. Heyward does not say on what special ground the case was decided, but only the circumstances of the case so decided. In Hammond v. Anderson there had in point of fact been an actual weighing by the purchaser of the entirety of the cargo. How can a man weigh a thing that is not in his possession? That entirely puts an end to any general proposition in favour of the appellant being deduced from these two cases. Then the case of Jones v. Jones, which has been referred to, looks a little more like a case which would have maintained the general proposition. But, it was decided upon the documents in that case, and the court came to the conclusion as a matter of fact that there was an intention to take the whole when part only was actually taken out; and, that being so, that case is an authority that where a man taking part shows an intention, acquiesced in by the carrier, to receive and take possession of the whole, that is a constructive possession of the whole by the acquiescence of both parties. It does not in any way support the proposition that a mere delivery of a part of the cargo, such as in the present case, can be looked upon as a constructive delivery of the whole, or to putting the consignee in constructive possession so as to defeat the lien, and also defeat the right to stop in transitu, or the right of the consignor if he desires under the circumstances to put an end to the contract.

James, L.J.—I think that having had the advantage of hearing the judgments of my learned brothers, I may say that our decision, upon which we are unanimous, will be expressed thus: That where goods are placed in the possession of a carrier to be carried for the vendor to be delivered to the purchaser, the transitus is not at an end so long as the carrier continues to hold the goods as carrier, and is not at an end until the carrier, by agreement between himself and the consignee, agrees to hold the goods for the consignee, not as carrier, but as his agent. And of course the same principle will apply to a warehouseman or wharfinger.

Appeal accordingly dismissed with costs.

SITTINGS AT WESTMINSTER.

Reported by W. Appleton, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Friday, Nov. 29, 1878.

(Before Bramwell, Brett, and Cotton, L.JJ.)

Griffiths and others v. Bramley-Moore and others.

Marine insurance—Charter-party—Freight—Deductions for sea-damage—Insurance against loss of freight—Underwriters' liability.

A charter-party provided for payment of freight at a specified rate, and contained a clause that, "If any portion of the cargo be delivered sea-damaged, the freight on such sea-damaged portion to be two-thirds of the above rate." Plaintiffs, the charterers, effected an insurance "To cover only the one-third loss of freight in consequence of sea-damage as per charter-party." A portion of the cargo became sea-damaged, and one-third of the freight payable in respect of that portion was deducted by plaintiffs from the whole freight.

Held (affirming the judgment of Denman, J.), that the policy sufficiently described the subject-matter insured, which was the one-third loss in consequence of sea-damage, and not the whole freight; and that plaintiffs were entitled to recover from each underwriter such proportion of the loss of freight as the amount of his subscription bore to the whole sum subscribed.

Appeal of defendants from a judgment of Denman J. on a trial with a special jury at Guildhall.

The action was to recover from the several defendants, who were underwriters, sums alleged to be due from each under a policy of insurance upon freight.

The statement of claim alleged that the plaintiffs, who were shipowners, agreed by charter-party that one of their ships should carry and deliver a cargo of rice, and "that the charterers should pay freight on true delivery of cargo, after the rate of 3*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* per ton," subject to certain deductions. The charter-party also contained a provision as follows;

If any portion of the cargo be delivered sea-damaged, the freight on such sea-damaged portion to be two-thirds of the above rate, except only in case the vessel shall have been stranded.

The plaintiffs also entered into a policy of insurance, at the foot of which was the following clause:

To cover only one-third loss of freight in consequence of sea-damage, as per charter-party, unless the ship be stranded, sunk, or burnt.

The defendants' names and the amount of their respective subscriptions were written under this clause, and the consideration was expressed in the policy to be 10*s.* per cent.

The cargo was carried to London, and there discharged, but during the continuance of the risk a portion of the cargo was sea-damaged, and the plaintiffs thereby lost one-third of the freight on that portion. The total freight on the cargo was 3817*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.*, and one-third of the total freight was 1290*l.* 12*s.* 1*d.*, of which 1200*l.* formed the subject of insurance under the policy.

The one-third of the freight lost by the plaintiffs on the sea-damaged portion of the cargo amounted to 293*l.* 15*s.* 7*d.* The amount therefore due or payable under the policy was 273*l.* 13*s.* 8*d.*

By reason of the premises the plaintiffs alleged that they had become entitled under the policy to recover from the defendants so much of 273*l* 13*s.* 8*d.* as was proportionate to the sums for which the defendants respectively subscribed the policy.

The plaintiffs claimed the specific amounts so calculated to be due from each defendant and interest thereon.

The defence, so far as material, was that, assuming the total freight to have been 3817*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.* and the amount lost to have been 293*l.* 15*s.* 7*d.*, the plaintiffs were entitled under the policy to the proportion of the loss which the amount insured bore to the whole freight and no more, and that the defendants before action tendered the same, and, on the plaintiffs' refusal to accept it, paid it into court.

By paragraph 5 it was alleged in the alternative that, at the time of effecting the policy, it was represented by the plaintiffs to the defendants, and expressly agreed between them, that the policy should apply to cover the whole of the freight, and that any claim should be calculated on the whole amount of freight, and not on one-third thereof, and that the defendants executed the policy on the faith of such representation, and that the plaintiffs were endeavouring, contrary to their representations and to good faith, to avail themselves of a mistake in the form of the policy.

Issue was taken on this defence.

At the trial the only question left to the jury was the issue raised by paragraph 5, and the jury found for the plaintiffs on this issue, and negatived the defendants' allegations in paragraph 5.

Denman, J. thereupon ordered judgment to be entered for plaintiffs for the full amount of their claim.

The defendants appealed.

Cohen, Q.C. and J. C. Mathew for defendants.—The whole freight is insured, as is shown by the low rate of premium; the premium being calculated on the view that each underwriter's liability is determined, not by the proportion which his subscription bears to the amount of the loss, but by the proportion which his subscription bears to the total amount insured. It is an insurance of the whole freight, and the plaintiffs are entitled only to recover under the policy such a proportion of the loss as the amount insured bears to the whole freight. An underwriter, when he subscribes a policy, never agrees to pay on a proportion of loss, but always on a proportion of the assured's liability. The insurance here is against the contingency that the whole freight may be reduced under the charter-party by one third. The underwriter compares the amount of his subscription with the assured's interest:

Hendricks v. Australasian Insurance Company, 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 44; L. Rep 9 C. P. 460.

Secondly, if the subject-matter of the insurance was not the total freight, the parties were never ad idem as to the subject-matter. There is a patent ambiguity, the subject-matter not being sufficiently described, and therefore no contract:

Raffles v. Whichelhaus, 2 H. & C. 906; 33 L. J. 160, Ex.

Holl, Q.C. and Witt, for plaintiffs, were not required to argue.

Bramwell, L.J.—I think this is as plain a case as could well be. It is possible, however, that there may be some understanding among underwriters which would cause them to put a construction upon this policy different to that which I am about to put. I think it is plain that the plaintiffs had freight coming to them which might come at one or other of two rates, If the cargo arrived safely, they would get one sum on the whole freight; if it arrived sea-damaged, they would suffer a deduction of one-third in respect of so much of the cargo as was sea-damaged. The plaintiffs being desirous of guarding against that loss, they insure for the one-third value of the freight. It is the same thing as if they said, "We will insure to the amount of 6*s.* 8*d.* out of every pound coming to us as freight." [The words of the policy are plain enough, "to cover only the one-third loss of freight, as per charter-party;" and the charter-party explains what those words mean. Mr. Mathew argues that this is an insurance to cover the whole freight, and although the utmost loss can only be one third, yet he says that the plaintiffs must insure the whole in order to cover it. He says, also, that this proposition is not an unreasonable one, because the underwriter, in consideration of the shipowner insuring the whole freight, takes one-third only of the premium. That seems a roundabout way of doing it. However, no such contract has been made out. This appeal must be dismissed.

Brett, L.J.—The first point taken is, that there is no description of the subject-matter insured, because the description is not in the usual place in the policy. Is it a true proposition to say that, because the sentence is not in its usual place in the policy, therefore this is not a true description of the subject-matter? I cannot think it is so. In truth, this is the only description of the subject-matter insured, and if so, what is that subject-matter? It is not freight other than freight under the charter-party, because no other freight was under risk. It is shown to be freight under the charter-party by the reference to the charter-party in the description of the subject-matter insured. It is said there is no insurance of loss, but the words are, "to cover one-third loss of freight in consequence of sea-damage." That refers one to the charter-party to find out what was the subject-matter of insurance, and one finds that freight under the charter-party is to be payable on true delivery of cargo, at so much per ton. But then there is a further particular clause in the charter-party, that if a portion of the cargo is delivered sea-damaged one-third of the freight on such portion is to be deducted. If, then, there is sea-damage, there is a loss upon the sea-damaged portion to the amount of one-third freight. Looking at the policy, the subject-matter of insurance is described to be the one-third loss which accrues on the charter-party under, and by virtue of, the above clause. The policy refers only to particular loss caused by sea-damage, and that is the subject-matter of insurance. Then what is the true construction of the whole policy? When once the subject-matter is made out, every part of the policy is to be applied that has reference to that subject-matter. It is said that some parts of the policy could not be applied to such a subject-matter, and therefore that it is not the subject-matter. That suggestion is answered by applying the rule of construction I have just mentioned. This and similar policies are of a peculiar nature, and though the subject-matter of insurance is accurately defined, the quantity of it is not ascertained until the loss has occurred. It seems to me that the only loss that could be recovered under the policy is a total loss. If there is a total loss, then the insurer is liable to the full amount of his subscription. I think that he is so liable in the present case. The ordinary manner of calculating such a loss ought to be applied, and I am of opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover the amount of it.

Cotton, L.J.—The questions are, whether there is a sufficient description of this subject-matter insured, whether that subject-matter is the total loss sustained, or whether the underwriters have a limited liability in respect of another subject-matter. Now I have no doubt on the construction of the charter-party. It is clear that, if the cargo arrives safely, the whole freight would be payable, but if any part arrives sea-damaged, then there is to be a deduction, in respect of that part, of one-third freight. I find that there is in the policy a reference to the subject-matter insured, which is to be the difference between the full freight and the freight payable if the cargo arrives sea-damaged. The words "to cover only the one-third loss of freight in consequence of sea-damage, as per charter-party," are not an inapt description of the subject-matter insured. I am of opinion that our judgment should be for the plaintiffs.

Fowler v. Knoop.

Shipping—Charter-party—Bill of lading—Consignee of goods—Implied contract to take delivery within a reasonable time—Bills of Lading Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 111) s. 1.

G. and Co. chartered plaintiff's ship to load a cargo at Iquique, and proceed to a port for orders to discharge in a safe port in the United Kingdom. The charter-party stipulated that the vessel should deliver the whole of her cargo as fast as the custom of the port of discharge would allow. G. and Co. (the charterers) shipped the cargo at Iquique, and consigned it to defendant, to secure an advance and for sale. The bill of lading stated that the cargo was to be delivered to defendant or his assigns, "he or they paying freight for the said goods as per charter-party." Whilst the ship was on her voyage defendant sold the cargo, and after intermediate sales, upon the ship's arrival at the port of discharge, the cargo was delivered to the ultimate purchasers upon orders signed by the defendant, who retained without indorsing it to any of the purchasers the bill of lading in his own hands. In an action for damages for detention of the ship at the port of discharge, the jury negatived the existence of any custom in that port as to unloading.

Held (affirming the judgment of Field, J.), that the contract, both in the charter-party and the bill of lading, was that the cargo should be discharged within a reasonable time; that defendant was a consignee of the goods within the meaning of the Bill of Lading Act 1855, sect. 1, and therefore that plaintiff was entitled to maintain this action.

Appeal from a judgment of Field, J., after a trial with a special jury at Guildhall, during the Trinity Sittings 1877.

The action was to recover damages against the defendant, as consignee named in the bill of lading of a cargo of nitrate of soda, shipped on board the ship Claudine, for the detention of the vessel at the port of discharge.

The plaintiff was the owner of the vessel Claudine. By charter-party entered into at Valparaiso on the 11th Sept. 1875, J. Gildmeister and Co. chartered the Claudine to load a cargo of nitrate of soda at the port of Iquique, and proceed to a port for orders to discharge in a safe port in the United Kingdom. The charter-party contained the following stipulations:

Bills of lading to be signed by the master, weight and quality unknown, all on board to be delivered, and that the vessel should, in such discharge port as ordered, deliver the whole of her cargo as fast as the custom of the port will allow.

The cargo was shipped on the 19th Nov. and consigned to defendant, who was then carrying on business in London under the firm of William Berkefield and Co. The bill of lading was as follows:

Shipped in good order and condition by J. Gildmeister and Co., on board the British barque Claudine, whereof E. Jamieson is master, now lying at the port of Iquique, and bound for Queenstown or Falmouth for orders—5290 bags nitrate of soda, weighing, &c., and are to be delivered in the like good order and condition at the port of her final destination (the act of God, fire, and all other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation excepted), unto Messrs. Wm. Berkefield and Co., London, or to their assigns, he or they paying freight for the said goods, as per charter-party and average accustomed. In witness, &c. Dated at Iquique Nov. 19, 1875.

Messrs. Gildmeister and Co. drew a bill of exchange for 5000*l.* upon the defendant on account of the cargo, and forwarded to him the bill of lading and a copy of the charter-party. The defendant accepted and paid the bill of exchange, and agreed to sell the cargo to the London Banking Association at a price per ton delivered ex ship. The London Banking Association contracted to sell it to Bath and Sons upon the same terms, and the latter firm also upon the same terms agreed to sell it to Jas. Gibbs and Co. The defendant kept the bill of lading in his own hands, and did not indorse it to any of the purchasers of the cargo. The vessel was ordered to Plymouth to discharge, and she was there and ready to discharge her cargo on April 8, 1876. The cargo was delivered to Jas. Gibbs and Co. upon orders signed by the defendant, and the discharge (which the plaintiff contended was not performed within a reasonable time) was completed on April 27.

At the trial, the defendant's counsel at the close of the plaintiff's case, submitted that there was no liability on the part of the defendant to the plaintiff to take delivery of the cargo within a reasonable or any other time. Field, J. reserved this point for further consideration, and left certain questions to the jury upon which they found: First, that there was no such custom of the port of Plymouth as to take delivery of cargoes of nitrate of soda at the rate of forty tons per day as alleged by the defendant; secondly, that the delivery of the cargo was not taken within a reasonable time, and that seventy tons per day was reasonable.

It was agreed that, if the defendant was liable, the plaintiff was entitled to recover for seven days, detention at 7*l.* 10*s*, per day.

The question of liability was argued on Dec. 1, 1877. Judgment being reversed, was subsequently delivered as follows:—

May 6, 1878.—Field, J.—The question in this case is, whether the defendant is liable for not taking delivery at Plymouth, within a reasonable time, of a cargo of nitrate of soda, which was shipped on board the Claudine, at Iquique, by J. Gildmeister and Co., under a charter-party, whereby it was stipulated that the vessel should deliver the whole of her cargo as fast as the custom of the port would allow, and in respect of which a bill of lading, stating that the cargo was shipped by J. Gildmeister and Co., who were the same persons as the charterers, and was to be delivered unto the defendant or his assigns, he or they paying freight for the said goods as per charter-party, was signed by the master. The defendant advanced to Gildmeister and Co. 5000*l.* on account of the cargo, which was consigned to him to secure the advance and for sale, and it was admitted on the argument that he was a consignee named in the bill of lading to whom the property in the cargo passed. Whilst the cargo was afloat the defendant sold it, and after several intermediate sales the ultimate purchasers were James Gibbs and Co. The defendant did not, however, indorse or part with the bill of lading, and the cargo was delivered to Messrs. James Gibbs and Co. by his orders. He therefore remained subject to any liability which attached to him as the consignee named in the bill of lading, and it becomes unnecessary to consider the point adverted to by the Lord Chief Baron in Lewis v. M'Kee (L. Rep. 4 Exch. 58; 38 L. J. 62, Ex.; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 427), whether the doctrine of Smurthwaite v. Wilkins (1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 198, 244; 11 C. B. N. S. 842), that the right of the consignor to sue under the Bills of Lading Act passes to the indorsee with the indorsement, applies to the liability of the consignee, so as to divest his liability in the event of a transfer by him.

Upon the argument it was contended on the part of the plaintiff that it is an implied term of the contract, contained in the bill of lading, that the consignee shall take delivery of the goods within a reasonable time; and that by virtue of the Bills of Lading Act 1855 the defendant, to whom the property in the goods passed by reason of the consignment, became liable to do so.

On the part of the defendant it was contended, first, that the bill of lading did not contain any contract to take delivery within a reasonable time, or at any time; and secondly, that, as there was an express contract in the charter-party with reference to the discharge of the cargo, no other contract on the part of the shippers who were the charterers, could be implied in the bill of lading, as between the shippers and the shipowner; and that therefore no liability passed from the shippers to the consignee, under the Bills of Lading Act; or, in other words, that the only liability to take delivery was under the charter-party, to which the defendant was not a party.

Upon the first question, which I answer without reference to the charter-party, I am of opinion that there is a contract in the bill of lading by the consignee to take delivery. It is true that in one sense there is no express contract to that effect in words, the only express stipulation being that the cargo is to be delivered to the defendant or his assigns, he or they paying freight as per charter-party—the only term of the charter-party which is incorporated in the bill. But delivery by one person to another is not an act which can be performed by one of them only. In order to effect a delivery, one party must give, and the other must take delivery; it is a composite act requiring a readiness and willingness in both parties to the delivery. It is as much the act of the person who takes as of the one who gives delivery—of the merchant as the shipowner. See the judgment delivered by Blackburn, J. in Ford v. Cotesworth (19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 634; L. Rep. 4 Q. B. at p. 132; 38 L. J. 216, Q. B., at p. 55: 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 190, 468.) I think that the obligation of the shipowner to deliver, which is expressed in the bill of lading, imports an obligation to take delivery, and that a contract to take delivery is to be implied in the bill of lading. It is clear that the consignee on tendering freight is entitled to delivery; it would be, I think, unreasonable to hold that the ship-owner has not a relative right to have the cargo taken and to sue the consignee for not taking it. To hold otherwise would compel the owner to resort to the charterer, who may be, and often as in this case is, a stranger living in a distant part of the world, and to deprive him of what, in comparison, is the simple and natural resort of the person who has taken delivery of his cargo.

Then within what time is delivery to be taken? I think that in this, as in all other contracts where anything is to be done, and there is no express stipulation as to the time within which it is to be done, a reasonable time is to be implied, which, in the present case, is found by the jury against the defendant.

I also think that the liability to take delivery became vested in the defendant by virtue of the 1st Section of the Bills of Lading Act 1855, whereby it is enacted that: "Every consignee of goods named in a bill of lading, to whom the property in the goods therein mentioned shall pass upon or by reason of such consignment, shall have transferred to and vested in him all rights of suit, and be subject to the same liabilities in respect of such goods, as if the contract contained in the bill of lading had been made with himself." It was argued by Mr. Butt that, as there was an express contract in the charter-party as to the delivery of the cargo, and as the charterers were the shippers of the cargo mentioned in the bill of lading, there was no contract between the shipper and the shipowner contained in the bill of lading as to taking delivery, and no new contract was to be implied. This appears to me to misread the statute. The statute does not say that the contract between the shipper and the shipowner is to be transferred, but that the liability of the consignee in respect of the goods is to be the same as if the contract contained in the bill of lading had been made with the consignee himself. What is the object of taking a bill of lading when there is a charter-party? The object of a bill of lading is to enable the holder to sell, or otherwise deal with the cargo, and to transfer the right to the cargo upon the terms contained in the bill of lading, free from all rights and liabilities under the charter-party, except so far as any term in it is incorporated in the bill of lading. It is to be observed that, whilst on the one hand it is clear that as between the parties to the charter-party and the bill of lading, so long as they are the parties whose rights and liabilities have to be determined, the terms of the charter-party dominate; on the other it is equally clear that when the bill of lading is in the hands of an indorsee, only those terms of the charter-party which are expressly incorporated bind the latter; and if there be a different rate of freight provided for, nothing can be clearer than that the indorsee is liable to the bill of lading, and not to the charter freight. In the present case, freight is the only term of the charter-party which is expressly incorporated in the bill of lading; and I have to say what is the term of the contract contained in the bill of lading which is to govern the rate and time of discharge. If the effect of the reference in the bill of lading to the charter-party had incorporated the terms in the charter-party in reference to the mode of discharging, the consequences would be the same; for the jury have found that there was no special custom to take the contract out of the ordinary one of reasonable time, and that the delivery was not taken within that time; but if, as I hold, the contract upon which the defendant is liable is that contained in the bill of lading, then the same result follows.

My judgment is, that the contract contained in the bill of lading was to take delivery of the cargo in a reasonable time, according to the custom of the port of discharge; and that the defendant is subject to this liability, not because it was the contract entered into between the plaintiff and the shipper, but because it is the contract contained in the bill of lading. I therefore give judgment for the plaintiff for 52*l.* 10*s.* and costs, and I think that he should also have the costs of the introduction of the different purchasers as third parties.

The defendant appealed from this judgment.

The arguments fully appear from the judgments of Field, J. and the Court of Appeal.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 10.—The following judgment of the Court was delivered by Bramwell L.J.—In this case the defendant contended that, as there was a charter-party besides the bill of lading, and as the terms of the charter-party provided that the unloading should be according to the custom of the port, the bill of lading and the contract contained in or evidenced by it is not the governing contract, but that it must be read in connection with the charter-party. It was said that the contract between the defendant as consignee of the goods, if he was so, and the shipowner, must be collected from the two documents and the other circumstances of the case. This the plaintiff denied. We think it is not necessary for us to give an opinion as to this, because the plaintiff contended that, even if the charter-party and the bill of lading were to be read together, the same contract would be collected from them as shown by the bill of lading alone, without the charter-party. Field, J., in the court below, took this view, and said that, in his opinion, the charter-party did not alter the contract, which was to be collected from the bill of lading alone. We agree with the view of Field J. If there had been no charter-party, the contract would be in the bill of lading, and the law would imply a contract to unload within a reasonable time, or, which is the same thing, with due diligence. The charter-party makes no difference whatever; it provides that the unloading shall be according to the custom of the port. There was no custom of the port, unless it was to unload within a reasonable time. So that, assuming that the defendant's objection is well founded, and that you must look at the two documents together, the obligation is to unload within a reasonable time. We agree with Field, J., that that obligation is the same as under the charter-party, and therefore that the plaintiff is entitled to our judgment. There is another point which we also decide in plaintiff's favour. It was said that the defendant was not the consignee of the goods, and a holder of them for value within the meaning of the Bills of Lading Act, because, before the bill of lading was made, he had secured to him an interest in the property within the Act. I doubt whether that is true in fact, because the bill of lading was made at a time when he was the beneficial owner of the goods. But, if the argument was well founded on fact, I am of opinion that the case is within the statute. The defendant retained the bill of lading in the sense of being the owner of it. He did not indorse it over to any of the purchasers, but retained it in his own hands with all the rights and obligations appertaining to the owner of a bill of lading, and he gave delivery orders to the vendee for the goods. Under these circumstances, I am of opinion that the defendant is liable, for the reason, that there must be some one to satisfy the description in Bills of Lading Act; either the original consignee or his assignee of the bill of lading. In the present case, James Gibbs and Co. were not the one or the other, and it seems to follow that the defendant was.

Dec. 13, 1878, and March 14, 1879.

(Before Lopes, J.)

Maritime Marine Insurance Company (Limited) v. Fire Re-Insurance Corporation (Limited).

Marine insurance—Re-insurance against fire—Usage—Declaration of risks.

The plaintiffs, a marine insurance company entered into an agreement with the defendants, a fire re-insurance company, that the defendants should upon certain agreed terms re-insure the plaintiffs against loss by fire only by all coal-laden ships which should be insured by the plaintiffs under their policies between certain ports, so long as the agreement remained in force; and successive policies to cover the risks insured against by ships as might be declared were accordingly subscribed and issued by the defendants to the plaintiffs. It was admitted that in the case of open policies, on ships to be declared, there was a usage of merchants and underwriters that such policy attached to the goods as soon as and in the order in which they were shipped, in which order the assured were bound to declare them; and, in case of mistake, that the assured should be bound to rectify the declaration, which was something done after loss.

Held, that the admitted usage with regard to marine insurances applied, although the re-insurance with the defendants was a re-insurance against fire only; it being a contract of fire insurance in respect of a marine risk.

Further consideration.

The action was tried at the Liverpool Summer Assizes 1878, and the jury being discharged without a verdict, all questions in the action were left to the decision of the learned judge.

The plaintiffs were a marine insurance company, who had agreed to re-insure themselves with the defendants against all loss or damage by fire only, in respect of such coal-laden ships as should be insured by the plaintiffs under their policies while the agreement was in force; and the action was brought to recover in respect of such an alleged loss. The facts are fully set out in the judgment.

C. Russell, Q.C. and Myburgh for the plaintiffs.—It is admitted that the usage stated in Stephens v. Australian Insurance Company (1 Asp. Mar. Law, Cas. 458; 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 585; L. Rep. 8. C. P. 18) exists as to marine insurance generally. The risk which the plaintiffs undertake is a marine risk, it being simply an insurance of ships at and between certain specified ports. Part of this risk—i.e., so much as relates to fire—they have re-insured with the defendants. The risk undertaken by the defendants is consequently also a marine risk, it being an insurance against fire in the case of ships at sea, and the admitted usage therefore applies to the present case. It follows that the policy attached to the ships insured by the plaintiffs as soon as the risk of the plaintiffs began; and their laches in not declaring the Hampden does not disentitle them to recover, since the declaration can be amended or supplied after the loss. It is admitted that there was no bad faith.

Herschell, Q.C. and Wheeler for the defendants.—The insurance with the defendants was a fire insurance; and the usage does not apply to such cases. The policy did not attach until the declaration in each case was made; and that was not done here until after the loss. It is not contended that the plaintiffs acted in bad faith, but their negligence in not declaring must disentitle them to recover To hold otherwise would be to open the door to fraud:

1 Parson on Insurance, 519, 520.

March 14.—Lopes, J. delivered the following judgment:—This case came before me for trial last Liverpool Summer Assizes. The jury were discharged by consent without a verdict, and all questions were left to my decision.

The plaintiffs are a marine insurance company, carrying on business at Liverpool, and defendants are a fire re-insurance corporation. In Nov. 1876 it was agreed between the plaintiffs and defendants that the defendants should, upon certain agreed terms, re-insure the plaintiffs against loss by fire, to the extent of not more than 1000*l.* by any one vessel, upon all coal-laden ships which should be insured by the plaintiffs under their policies, at and from certain agreed ports to certain other agreed ports. In accordance with such agreement the defendants subscribed and issued to the plaintiffs a policy dated 28th Feb. 1877, whereby the defendants, in consideration of 250*l.*, undertook to guarantee or re-insure the plaintiffs against loss or damage by fire and the consequences thereof, to the extent of 50,000*l.*, by the ships and vessels, as might be declared, at and from certain ports therein mentioned to destination, the said policy to be subject to the same clauses and conditions (as far as they relate to the fire risks only) as the original policy or policies, and would pay as might be paid thereon. In the said policy it was provided that the arrangement was to be in force for one year, from the 1st Oct. 1876, and was to include only such vessels as were coal-laden. It was also provided that the said policy was to be supplemented by further policies on like terms, should the amount thereof not prove sufficient for the year's transactions. Declarations were made on the 19th Feb. and on the 29th June, but such declarations were far in excess of the said policy. On the 9th July defendants subscribed and issued a second policy for 50,000*l.*, similar in its terms in every respect to the former policy. On the 7th June the plaintiffs insured a coal-laden ship called the Hampden on a voyage between the prescribed ports. The Hampden was lost on the 18th Sept., and the loss was posted at Lloyd's on the 24th Oct. Further declarations were made on the 10th Aug., and were in excess of the second policy. The Hampden was not declared either on the 29th June nor on the 10th Aug. On the 24th Oct. the plaintiffs applied to the defendants for a covering slip, which was sent to them by the defendants; and on the 25th Oct. a third policy was subscribed and issued by defendants in the same terms in all respects as the two former policies. On the 2nd Nov. the plaintiffs declared the Hampden, and claimed for a loss. At this time, and when the third policy was effected, the plaintiffs knew of the loss of the Hampden.

It was admitted at the trial, and on the argument, that the plaintiffs had taken a risk of a coal cargo in respect of the Hampden, and that there was a loss which would be covered by the policy of re-insurance, if the plaintiffs were not debarred from attributing it to one of the said policies by reason of delay in declaring the risk. It was also undisputed that, taking the risks in chronological order, the Hampden did not come under either of the first two policies, which were by previous risks exhausted when the plaintiffs took the risk on the Hampden, but must rank under the third policy (if under any), which was effected on the 25th Oct. It was also undisputed that the plaintiffs' manager had been most negligent in not declaring the Hampden, but the defendants admitted that there was no want of good faith on his part nor on the part of the plaintiff company.

It was also admitted that a usage in fact existed such as that in the case of Stephens v. Australian Insurance Company (1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 458; 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 585; L. Rep. 8 C. P. 18), to the effect that in the case of open policies, on ships to be declared, there is a usage of merchants and underwriters that this policy attaches to the goods as soon as, and in the order in which, they are shipped, in which order the assured is bound to declare them; and in case of mistake as to the order of shipment, the assured is bound to rectify the declaration, which is sometimes done after loss. The defendants, however, contended that they not being a marine insurance company, the usage did not attach. As this case depends mainly upon whether this custom applies or not, it is necessary to decide that question. I think it does.

The argument is, that the usage does not attach, because the plaintiffs are insured against marine risks, and the defendants are re-insurers against fire. It is conceded, however, that it is within the powers of the defendant company to re-insure against loss by fire in case of ships at sea. The plaintiffs here insure against perils by sea generally, and in order to ease their liability they re-insure their risks in respect of coal-laden vessels, for a limited amount in each case, and in respect of fire only, and between specified ports, with the defendants. The contract with the defendants is a contract of fire insurance, no doubt; but it is a contract of fire insurance in respect of a marine risk. The defendants when they entered into that contract, were doing the trade or business of marine insurance. The plaintiffs, in the course of their business, undertook certain marine risks; the defendants, for their own benefit, take upon themselves to indemnify the plaintiffs against one of those marine risks, being a risk against fire. It was a marine risk in the hands of the plaintiffs, and did not become less so when undertaken by the defendants. When the defendants contracted with the plaintiffs, they contracted with them according to the usage of the particular trade or business to which the contract related. It related to the trade or business of marine insurance. I think, therefore, the usage in Stephens v. The Australian Insurance Company applies.

This being my view, it is not neccessary for me to determine how the case would stand if this usage did not attach. I will only say that it appears to me that, if the usage did not attach, this contract could not be regarded as an ordinary open policy on ship or ships to be hereafter declared. Having regard to the terms of the contract between the parties, I should be inclined to think that there is no necessity, except as a matter of convenience (as showing when one policy was exhausted and another had become necessary), that there should be any declaration, but that the policy attached when the risk was incurred.

It was urged by Mr. Wheeler on the part of the defendants that the negligence of the plaintiffs' manager was such that it afforded facilities for fraud, and consequently disentitled the plaintiffs from recovering, and a passage from Parsons on Insurance was relied on. I am not prepared to hold that there was such negligence, nor can I find an authority for Mr. Wheeler's contention. I am of opinion that the plaintiffs, having acted in good faith, are not debarred from recovering by the delay in making a declaration on the Hampden.

Thames navigation—Construction of conservators' bye-laws—Vessels towed by steam—"Six vessels and no more. . . in a single line"—Bye-laws of July 1877, Nos. 2, 3, 4.

No. 4 of the Bye-laws of the Thames Conservators July 1877, is as follows: "Above and to the westward of Albert Bridge at Chelsea, six vessels and no more may be towed together in a single line at one time, and the distance between any two of the vessels shall not exceed fifty feet.

Held, that the towing of eight barges by a steam-tug, the first four being in a single line, and the last four two abreast, but lashed closely together, was an infringement of the bye-law.

SPECIAL CASE.

This is a case stated for the opinion of this honourable court, by John Paget, Esq., sitting magistrate at the Hammersmith police court, under and by virtue of the statute made and passed in the twenty-first year of the reign of Her Majesty Queen Victoria (cap. 43), being an Act to improve the administration of the law so far as respects summary proceedings before justices of the peace.

1. The appellant in this case is the master of the steam-tug Vixen, belonging to the Thames Steam-tug and Lighterage Company (Limited), and he resides at Ealing-lane, and the respondent is a river-keeper of the Conservators of the River Thames, duly appointed under and by virtue of the Thames Conservancy Acts (1857 and 1864).

2. The appellant was summoned by the respondent for an alleged breach of the 4th bye-law, duly made in pursuance of the Thames Conservancy Acts, and the Thames Navigation Acts, and allowed by Order in Council dated the 11th July 1877.

The following is a copy of the summons:

Metropolitan Police District, to wit.—Hammersmith police court. To George Gadney, master of the steam-tug Vixen.

Whereas complaint this day has been made before the undersigned, one of the magistrates of the police courts of the metropolis, sitting at the police court, Hammersmith, in the county of Middlesex, and within the metropolitan police court, by George John Rough, for that you, on the 28th June, A.D. 1878, on the river Thames, in the parish of Fulham, in the county of Middlesex, and within the said district, did, being the master of a steam-tug called the Vixen, tow by steam more than six vessels at one time, contrary to the 4th bye-law of the Conservators of the River Thames, dated 11th July 1877.

These are therefore to command you, in Her Majesty's name, to be and appear on Monday next, at eleven o'clock in the forenoon, at the police court aforesaid, before me, or before such other magistrate of the said police courts as may then be there, to answer to the said complaint, and to be further dealt with according to law.

Given under my hand and seal this 15th day of July, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight, at the police court aforesaid.

JOHN PAGET. (L.S.)

3. The summons was heard before me on the 22nd July 1878, and on the hearing it was admitted that on the 28th June 1878 the steam-tug Vixen, belonging to the said Steam-tug and Lighterage Company (Limited), and in charge of the appellant, a duly licensed waterman, as master, was towing eight barges astern of the said tug down the river, in the manner as shown in the sketch annexed hereto and marked A., but above and to the westward of the Albert Bridge at Chelsea, the barges at the time being all lashed firmly together.

4. On the 5th Feb. 1872 an Order in Council allowed certain bye-laws, one of which, No. 14, was as follows:

All vessels navigating the river between London Bridge and Bugsby's Hole shall singly and separately pass along the same except vessels in tow of steam-tugs, skiffs, wherries, or ships' boats fastened together or towed at the stern of any vessel and vessels not exceeding six in number, two only abreast and towed by steam.

5. The following are the bye-laws allowed by Order in Council on the 11th July 1877.

(1.) Bye-law No. 14 of the bye-laws for 1872, for the regulation of the navigation of the river Thames, allowed by order of Her Majesty in Council on the 5th Feb. 1872, shall after these present bye-laws shall have been allowed by order of Her Majesty in Council be, and the same is hereby repealed, and in lieu thereof,

(2.) All vessels navigating the river between the Albert Bridge at Chelsea and Charlton Pier, shall be navigated singly and separately, except small boats fastened together, or towed alongside or astern of other vessels except vessels towed by steam.

(3.) Vessels towed by steam shall be placed two abreast if more than four in number, and not more than six shall be towed together at one time.

(4.) Above and to the westward of Albert Bridge at Chelsea, six vessels and no more may be towed together in a single line at one time, and the distance between any two of the vessels so towed shall not exceed fifty feet.

(7.) Any person committing any breach of, or in any way infringing any of these bye-laws shall be liable to a penalty of and shall forfeit a sum not exceeding five pounds, which said penalty shall be recovered, enforced, and applied according to the provisions of the Thames Conservancy Acts 1857 and 1864.

6. It was admitted that Bugsby's Hole is to the east of Albert Bridge, and that before and except the bye-laws in question there was no bye-law or provision preventing vessels being towed as the masters pleased to the westward of Albert Bridge. It was also admitted that from the Albert Bridge at Chelsea westward to Putney Bridge there is no tow path or other means of towing save by steam.

7. It was contended on behalf of the appellant that the 2nd and 3rd bye-laws were to be read together, and that the 3rd did not apply in any way to the 4th; that, therefore, there was no breach of the 4th bye law so long as not more than six vessels were towed in one line, and that there was no restriction as to there being a double line nor as to the number to be towed, and that it was an open question whether the 4th bye-law had affected vessels towed by steam, inasmuch as steam was not mentioned; and further that, as prior to the 11th July 1877 there had been no bye-laws affecting the navigation of vessels to the westward of London Bridge, the bye-law should state specially that it was intended to apply to steam, otherwise there could be no conviction, as it was void from uncertainty, and in support of this contention the appellant relied upon the decision of the Court of Appeal on the 4th May 1878 in a case stated by Mr. Bridge between the same parties as in the present case.

8. It was contended on behalf of the respondent that, even if the 3rd bye-law does not apply in any way to the 4th, there would nevertheless be a breach of the 4th bye-law if more than six vessels were towed together at one time in a single line or otherwise, and as there is no tow path between the Albert Bridge at Chelsea westward to Putney Bridge, or means of towing save by steam, there is no uncertainty in the said bye-law so as to render it void.

9. I was of opinion that, under the facts hereinbefore stated and admitted, the appellant had been guilty of an offence under the said 4th bye-law, and I convicted him accordingly, and sentenced him to pay a fine of 5*s.*, and 2*s.* for costs in that behalf.

The appellant having applied to me to state a case for the opinion of the Court of Appeal, I state this case in compliance with such application.

10. The question for the opinion of the court is whether I was right in convicting under the above circumstances.

11. If the court should be of opinion in the affirmative, the said conviction is to be affirmed, and the appellant is to pay to the respondent the costs of the said appeal; but if the court should be of a contrary opinion, the said conviction is to be quashed, and the summons dismissed, and the respondent is to pay to the appellant the costs of the said appeal. JOHN PAGET.

In a sketch annexed to the case, and marked "A." a steam-tug was represented as towing eight barges, the first four being in a single line, and the last four two abreast, but lashed closely together.

Webster, Q.C. for the appellant.—We have been already summoned under the 3rd bye-law for the same offence, and the Queen's Bench Division quashed the conviction, The judgments in that case are not reported, but they are conclusive of this case. The 2nd and 3rd bye-laws apply only to the river between Albert Bridge and Charlton Pier; the 4th bye-law applies only to the river above Charlton Pier. The Queen's Bench Division pointed out that that must be so, because otherwise there would be inconsistent laws for the same part of the river. It must be borne in mind that at the time they are legislating for the river westward of Albert Bridge, they have before them the legislation for the river eastward of Albert Bridge. It is submitted that the 4th bye-law applies only to the length of the tail. The vice that the bye-law was aimed at was not the towing of more than six barges—if it had been, the bye-law might easily have said so—but the towing of more than six barges in a line. The 3rd bye-law, which deals with the river eastward of Albert Bridge, does expressly limit the number that may be towed together at one time.

Grantham, Q.C. for the respondent.—The 2nd bye-law provides for all vessels navigating the river between the Albert Bridge at Chelsea and Charlton Pier. The 4th bye-law provides for vessels above and to the westward of Albert Bridge at Chelsea. The 3rd bye-law is only an exception as to vessels towed by steam, applicable to both the 2nd and 4th. That is the construction of these bye-laws that it is submitted is the correct one, although the Queen's Bench Division construed them differently. But, assuming the decision of the Queen's Bench Division to be right, and reading the 3rd bye-law as not applying to the west of Albert Bridge, the 4th bye-law, rightly construed, prevents more than six vessels being towed at one time. If not so construed, then, provided they are not in a single line, any number may be towed at the same time, which cannot have been intended.

Webster, Q.C. in reply.—As to the argument ab inconvenienti, there is a practical limit to the number of vessels that can be towed abreast.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—I think this decision should be affirmed. There is a good deal to be said for the view Mr. Webster has presented as to the construction of these rules. What this 4th bye-law was intended to do I have, of course, no means of knowing; but I think, according to its true construction, it was intended to apply to all vessels being towed above Albert Bridge, whether by steam or otherwise. I was struck by Mr. Grantham's argument that the 2nd and 4th bye-laws should be first read together, excluding the 3rd. The 2nd says, "All vessels navigating the river between the Albert Bridge at Chelsea and Charlton Pier shall be navigated singly and separately, except small boats fastened together, or towed alongside or astern of other vessels, except vessels towed by steam." The 4th says, "Above and to the westward of Albert Bridge at Chelsea six vessels and no more may be towed together in a single line at one time, and the distance between any two of the vessels so towed shall not exceed fifty feet." Then he says the 3rd should be read as an exception engrafted on both of them, viz., that when vessels are towed by steam, they shall be placed two abreast, if more than four in number, and not more than six shall be towed together at one time. Now it is not material to decide in the present case whether the 3rd and 4th bye-laws are to be read together. If they are, then no more than six barges can be towed together at one time by steam, and if more than four then they must be two abreast, both above and below Albert Bridge. If they are not, then that applies only below Albert Bridge, and, above Albert Bridge six vessels and no more may be towed together in a single line at one time, by steam or otherwise. According to either view, in my opinion, it is equally prohibited to tow eight barges by steam above Albert Bridge. According to the last-mentioned construction of the rules, which is that contended for by the appellant, the provision is that "six vessels and no more may be towed together," and in this case more than six vessels were being towed. It is said that the words that follow "in a single line" are the governing words, and that more than six may be towed provided they are not in a single line. But I think that to adopt that view would be to defeat the intention of the clause. If that was what was meant, the clause should have run: "If vessels are towed in a single line, not more than six shall be towed together at one time." If that is what was meant, it is not what has been said. The 4th bye-law further says that the distance between any two of the vessels "so towed" shall not exceed fifty feet. Now, if the fifty feet here mentioned applies only longitudinally, as it clearly does, the bye-law obviously contemplates as the only possible distance between any two of the vessels towed in accordance with its provisions a longitudinal distance; that is, that there shall only be a single line of such vessels. I am therefore of opinion that this conviction was right, and should be affirmed.

DENMAN, J.—I am of the same opinion. I am inclined to think that the 3rd bye-law does not apply to the westward of Chelsea Bridge, if it were necessary to come to any decision on that point in this case. I think so for this reason, that the 2nd bye-law concludes with the words "except vessels towed by steam," and then the 3rd bye-law takes up the words, and begins "vessels towed by steam shall," &c., as if the 3rd bye-law was intended merely as supplementary of the 2nd. That appears to have been the decision of the Queen's Bench Division when the matter was before them. But it is not necessary for us to consider that question now. The 4th bye-law is applicable to vessels above Albert Bridge. There is an unfortunate looseness in the language in which part of the clause is expressed. I think, however, that "six vessels and no more in a single line" must mean six vessels in a string. It is, perhaps, open to argument that this was a casus omissus, there being no express provision as to vessels towed by steam, and that the bye-law does not apply to such a case. It is contended that it was not proved here that there were more than six vessels in a single line. I think the bye-law is intended to apply to all cases where there are more than six vessels, whether towed by steam or not. The construction suggested by my Lord seems to me to be the reasonable one, viz., that "six vessels and no more may be towed together." If we construed the bye-law otherwise it would be productive of great inconvenience. Then come the words "in a single line;" but I think those words do not alter the restriction conveyed in the former ones, but impose an additional obligation. That is a way in which this bye-law may be read, and I think, therefore, ought to be read. The magistrate has so read it, and I am consequently of opinion that the conviction should be affirmed.

Webster, Q.C. asked for leave to appeal, which was refused.

Damage to cargo—Parties—Indorsee of bill of lading—Seaworthiness—Peculiar construction of ship — Stowage — Dunnage—Trinity Masters—Evidence of, as to report—18 & 19 Vict. c. 111, s. 2—24 Vict. c. 10, s. 6.

The ordinary warranty as to seaworthiness in a bill of lading is a warranty that the ship is seaworthy at the time, and reasonably likely to continue seaworthy on the voyage specified. If from special circumstances in her construction she requires special appliances to preserve the cargo from sea damage, the owner is bound to provide those appliances, and will be liable for damage to cargo arising from the want of them.

Steele v. State Line Steamship Company (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 516; 3 App. Cas. 72; 37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 333) followed.

Where Trinity Masters are desired to inspect and report to the court, their report is not necessarily confined to those matters on which evidence has been given, but may include any circumstance in their opinion affecting the merits of the case.

An indorsee of a bill of lading has a right to sue for damage to the cargo arising from a breach of the contract contained in the bill of lading under the Bills of Lading Act 1856 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 111), and in the case of a foreign vessel to take proceedings in rem under the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. 10), though at the time of the institution of the suit he has sold the cargo.

THIS was an action for damage to cargo. The original plaintiffs in the cause were D. and W. Murray, who were indorsees of the bills of lading of the cargo. At the trial, on the application of the plaintiffs, Holmes, who had purchased the cargo from the original plaintiffs as a damaged cargo before action brought, was added as a plaintiff.

The cargo, consisting of chopped and ground bark, was shipped at Adelaide on board the American ship Marathon by H. Wilkie and Co., the vessel being chartered by her master on behalf of the owners to H. Wilkie and Co. The charter-party guaranteed "that the vessel was classed A 1½," and contained the following stipulations, that Being tight, staunch, and strong, with masts and rigging in good order, and every way well fitted and equipped for the voyage, and so to be maintained by the owners or their agents while under this charter, should load a full and complete cargo of ground bark in bags, with sufficient loose chopped bark for broken stowage amongst ground bark only . . . . and being so laden and dunnaged in accordance with Lloyd's rules, shall proceed to Falmouth or Cork for orders to proceed to any one safe port in the United Kingdom, and there discharge . . . . as ordered by the charterers or their agents . . . . The cargo to be stowed at ship's expense; dunnage to be provided by the ship, and laid to the satisfaction of the charterers . . . . The captain to sign bills of lading for cargo as presented at any rate of freight required by charterers or their agents . . . . The ship guarantees to pass survey to the Adelaide Underwriters' Association, and to produce their surveyor's certificate of survey to the charterers or their agents before giving notice of being ready to load.

The captain signed two sets of bills of lading, of which the material parts of the first are as follows:

Shipped in good order and condition by H. Wilkie and Co., on board the good ship Marathon . . . . bound for a port in the United Kingdom, calling at Cork or Falmouth for orders as per charter-party, 2774 bags ground bark, and 384 bags chopped bark (used as broken stowage), being marked and numbered as in the margin, and to be delivered (subject to the exceptions and stipulations hereinafter mentioned) in the like good order and condition . . . . to order or to his or their assigns . . . . The following are the exceptions and stipulations referred to . . . . neglect or default of the pilots, masters, or crew in the navigation of the ship and all and every the dangers and accidents of the seas or rivers and navigation of whatever nature or kind are excepted. The ship is not liable for . . . . loss or damage arising from vermin, heat, sweat, leakage, breakage, rust or decay of contents or packages unless occasioned by improper stowage . . . . weight, quantity, and contents unknown. . . . . Several bags stained.

The second set were in precisely the same words, only differing as to the quantities and marks of the bark shipped, and the concluding clause was "Weight, quality and contents unknown." It appeared that there were peculiarities in the construction of the ship, she having a main deck which had been caulked some years previously, and that the upper deck had been in part laid some time after the ship was built, and at a different level from the original deck, there being a vertical bulkhead at the point of junction; the extremities of the vessel having originally been occupied by deck houses, and that there were no scuppers in the main deck. Bark was stowed between decks without any dunnage, a certain amount of loose chopped bark being used to fill up between the bags. The lower hold was dunnaged in the bottom and wings, but the dunnage was not brought up to the main deck, so that the upper tiers of bags rested against the lodging knees in the lower hold. The level of the lower deck was only between one and two feet from the water when the ship was laden and lying on an even keel.

The ship left Adelaide on the 7th May, met with heavy weather in the early part of the voyage, arrived at Cork on 3rd Oct., left that place on the 11th Oct., and arrived at Hull on 23rd Oct. The cargo, on discharge, was found much damaged by sea water.

On the arrival of the ship at Cork, Messrs. Murray, who were the holders of the bills of lading, sold the cargo to Messrs. Holmes. Messrs. Holmes, on ascertaining the condition of the cargo, refused to take the delivery of it. The contract of sale was thereupon cancelled, and a new contract entered into on 14th Nov., by which Messrs. Holmes agreed to take it at 6*l.* per ton for sound, and 3*l.* per ton for damaged bark.

The writ was issued by Messrs. Murray on 20th Nov. 1878.

The case was heard on 31st Jan. and 1st, 3rd, and 5th Feb. A great deal of evidence was produced, both as to the construction of the ship and the stowage of the cargo, and it was proved that Messrs. Murray were agents and consignees of Messrs. Wilkie, and that Messrs. Wilkie had drawn on them against this cargo.

After the close of the evidence it was desired by the court that the Trinity Masters should inspect the construction of the ship, and accordingly the argument was deferred. The Trinity Masters made a report to the court as follows:

Trinity House, 8th Feb. 1879.

We have carefully compared the evidence in the case of the American barque Marathon, and we have come to the conclusion that the lower hold appears to have been fairly dunnaged; but altogether wanting in the 'tween decks, in which there should have been scuppers. She is a badly fastened ship, leaking much in her topsides, waterway seams, deck, and generally, which, when she strained in bad weather, admitted large quantities of water, which, falling on the upper part of the lodging knees, poured over them into the hold beyond the inner surface of the dunnage, damaging the cargo.

In bad weather the pumps appear to have been properly attended to; but nothing could remedy the want of proper and adequate fastening.

Much water must also have found its way between decks from the bulkhead in the break, when she pitched heavily, and, as the master stated, shipped large quantities of water forward. As a proof how much she strained, the oakum about the stem, bows, and also under the counter, had worked out as stated by the seaman of the Marathon, who thrust his knife right into one of the seams.

This could not have happened had she been properly fastened.

Feb. 11.—Butt, Q.C. and E. C. Clarkson for the plaintiffs.—The ship was improperly constructed to carry this particular cargo stowed in the way it was stowed:

Kopitoff v. Wilson, 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 163; 1 Q.B. Div. 377; 34 L. T. Rep. N..S 677;

Steel v. State Line Steamship Company, 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 516; 3 App. Cas. 72; 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 333.

The exception of "negligent navigation" in the bill of lading does not include "bad stowage." The effect of inserting the exception may be to shift the onus of proof as to how the damage arose:

The Helene, Br. & Lush. 429; L. Rep. 1 P. C. 231; 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 873; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 390;

Czeck v. General Steam Navigation Company, L.Rep. 3 C. P. 14; 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 246; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 5

We have satisfied that onus of proof independently of the report of the Trinity Masters, and have shown that the ship was herself defective when she was warranted seaworthy, and also that the cargo was improperly stowed. What the amount of damage is which we have sustained by reason of these defects and negligence, is for the registrar and merchants.

Webster, Q.C., and Dr. W. G. F. Phillimore.—The only issue in the case is, whether the damage was sustained in consequence of the ship not being properly dunnaged, or by the construction of the ship, so far as the plaintiffs can avail themselves of any peculiarity in it. As to the report of the Trinity Masters, the plaintiffs cannot help their case by that. It was not the case they have attempted to prove, that the fastenings of the ship were weak, they had themselves examined the ship and made no complaint of the fastenings. The report of the Trinity Masters should have been confined to the matters pleaded and in issue, and the court will only decide the case on the evidence which has been given, and the report of the Trinity Masters, so far as it affects that evidence. But apart altogether from this question, the plaintiffs here have no right of action. Murray is merely an intermediate indorsee of the bills of lading, and, having parted with the cargo by sale to Holmes on the 14th Nov., had divested himself of any such property in the bills of lading or goods as might give him a right to sue under the Bills of Lading Act or Admiralty Court Act, before the action was commenced on the 20th Nov. The other plaintiff, Holmes, bought the cargo as a damaged cargo, and therefore, having knowledge and notice of the damage, is not in any way damnified by the fact of the cargo being damaged. Wilkie, the shipper, is the only person who can really recover from the shipowner. Before the passing of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10) Wilkie was the only person who could have sued at all. Murray's right is only under the statute, and therefore only as owner or agent of the owner of the cargo:

The St. Cloud, Br. & L. 4; 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 54; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 309.

A bare assignee cannot sue; but here the plaintiffs are neither assignees, consignees, nor owners within the meaning of the Act. Wilkie, the shipper, cannot be joined as a plaintiff without his consent (Sup. Court of Jud. Act 1875, Order XVI., rule 13). The property had passed to Holmes before the action was brought, by the transfer to him of the documents of title:

The North of England Pure Oil Cake Company v. The Archangel Marine Insurance Company, 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 571; L. Rep. 10 Q. B. 249; 32 L. T. Rep. N.S. 561.

Holmes cannot sue as trustee for Murray; the case does not come under the exception to the genera rules in Powles v. Innes (11 M. & W. 10).

Butt, Q.C. and E. C. Clarkson in reply.—A right of action having once vested in Murray, it cannot be vested except by a release under seal or something in accord and satisfaction. Murray had a cause of action under the Bills of Lading Act and Admiralty Court Act vested in him on the 4th Nov., and the fact that he sold the cargo for what he could get for it before the 20th Nov. does not divest him of it. Indeed, if the goods were perishable, it would be his bounden duty to sell, so as not to increase the damage to the cargo. One accepting a bill of exchange against goods has sufficient property in the goods to allow him to sue under the Bill of Lading Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 111), and the Admiralty Court Act (24 Vict. c. 10):

The Figlia Maggiori, L. Rep. 2 A. & E. 1086; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 532; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 97.

The property in the goods had not passed from Murray at the time the action was brought. It is clear that, if the contract had been for the sale of a "cargo" simply, the property in a particular cargo would not have passed, and the fact that the sale was of the "cargo ex Marathon," is not of itself sufficient to pass the property in this particular cargo. "Where anything remains to be done to the goods for the purpose of ascertaining the price, as by . . . testing the goods, where the price is to depend on the . . . quality of the goods, the performance of these things also shall be a condition precedent to the transfer of the property, although the individual goods be ascertained, and they are in the state in which they ought to be accepted:" (Blackburn on Sales, pp. 151, 152; Benjamin on Sales, pp. 235, 236.) The plaintiff Murray has two distinct causes of action; one for the breach of contract to deliver in good order and condition, and the other for negligence in the stowage by which he has suffered damage.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I consider the objections to this action being brought by the present plaintiffs invalid, on both the grounds which have been argued.

After further consultation with the Trinity Masters, his Lordship delivered the following judgment on the merits of the case:—

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This case has occupied the attention of the court for some days, and I have had an ample opportunity of consulting from time to time the Elder Brethren and ascertaining their opinions upon the subjects discussed before them, and also their reasons for the conclusion at which they have arrived.

Now, in all cases of this kind, the question is whether the damage to the cargo was caused by one of the excepted perils in the charter-party and bills of lading, or by the want of proper appliances on board the carrying ship. The law which is applicable to this subject is perspicuously stated by the Lord Chancellor in the case of Steele v. The State Line Steamship Company (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 516; 3 App. Cas. 72; 37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 333), and I think I cannot do better than read it: "It is an engagement to carry and to deliver at a certain port in this kingdom the wheat so shipped. What is the meaning of the contract created by those words, supposing they stood alone? I think there cannot be any reasonable doubt entertained that this is a contract which not merely engages the shipowner to deliver the goods in the condition mentioned, but that it also contains in it a representation, and an engagement—a contract—by the shipowner that the ship on which the wheat is placed is at the time of its departure reasonably fit for accomplishing the service which the shipowner engages to perform. Reasonably fit to accomplish that service the ship cannot be unless it is seaworthy. By 'seaworthy,' my Lords, I do not desire to point to any technical meaning of the term, but to express that the ship should be in a condition to encounter whatever perils of the sea a ship of that kind, and laden in that way, may be fairly expected to encounter in crossing the Atlantic. My Lords, if there were no authority upon the question, it appears to me that it would be scarcely possible to arrive at any other conclusion than that this is the meaning of the contract."

The decks of the vessel in this case appear to have been of a peculiar formation, and in this respect the vessel seems to have undergone an alteration from her original structure. The cargo consisted of ground bark and chopped bark; a portion of the latter was used as dunnage. As to this I shall say a word presently. Part of this cargo was of a porous kind, and, when saturated with water, caused the ship to float so much deeper. The sweat and the steam would have been the natural consequences of the heating of the cargo, and I must take it to have been put on board in good order. It arrived in an extremely bad condition. The voyage, beginning on May 7 at Adelaide, ended on Oct. 3, at Cork, occupying, therefore 149 days. The weather was extremely tempestuous, almost a succession of gales, until she came under the influence of the trade winds. The upper works leaked continuously, admitting large quantities of water. In the 'tween decks there was no dunnage. In the lower hold the dunnage was in quantity sufficient, but being composed of chopped bark, was bad for the purpose, acting as a sponge, conveying the water to the cargo. The Elder Brethren are decidedly of opinion that there should have been scuppers in the 'tween decks, and that the want of them was one of the causes of the damage to the cargo in the lower hold. I must here express my entire agreement with that, and also with the observation of the learned counsel who spoke last, that it was not competent to the carriers of this cargo to use any portion of it as dunnage. The Trinity Masters further drew my attention to what they consider a great defect in the ship, the want of proper fastenings in the deck—that is, as I understand, a sufficient number of bolts to hold the planking to the timbers. The vessel, leaking much in her topsides, admitted large quantities of water, which, falling on the upper part of the lodging knees, poured over them into the hold beyond the inner surface of the dunnage, and greatly damaged the cargo. In bad weather the pumps appear to have been properly attended to, but the Trinity Masters point out to me that this could not have remedied the want of proper and adequate fastenings. They further observe that much water must have also found its way between decks from the bulkhead in the break when she pitched heavily, and, as the master stated, shipped large quantities of water forward. They allege, as a proof how much she strained, that the oakum about the stem and bows, and also under the counter, had worked out, as stated by the seaman of the Marathon, who thrust his knife into one of the seams.

On the whole, I am of opinion that it is proved that the damage was occasioned by the want of proper appliances on board the carrying vessel, especially the want of proper scuppers, and the imperfect and improper dunnage, as well as the inadequate fastenings.

I must, therefore, refer to the registrar, assisted by merchants, to inquire into the report as to the amount of damage caused by the matters I have referred to, and I give judgment for the plaintiffs.

THE ENDORA.

Bottomry—Practice—Costs—Damages—Arrest.

Where the holder of a bottomry bond arrests the vessel and freight on which the bond is secured before the bond is due, and the bond is paid at or before maturity, the shipowner is entitled to the costs occasioned by the proceeding, but not, in the absence of malice or gross negligence on the part of the bondholder to damages.

THIS was a motion in an action of bottomry. The bottomry bond on ship and freight was payable seven days after the arrival of the ship in the port of London. The plaintiffs instituted the action, and arrested the ship on Feb. 25, 1879 the ship having arrived on Feb. 22. The bond was paid within seven days from Feb. 22.

March 1.—Clarkson moved the court to release the vessel without bail, and to condemn the plaintiffs in costs and damages.

Myburgh, for the plaintiffs consented to the release of the vessel on the amount of the bond and interest being paid, and the rest of the motion was ordered to stand over.

Clarkson, for the defendants, now moved the court for costs and damages, for the unlawful arrest of the ship. There was no excuse for the arrest; the bond was not due, and till it became due there was no cause of action. In fact, there never was a cause of action, as the money was tendered before it had arisen; the arrest was not merely premature, but altogether illegal.

Myburgh for the plaintiffs.—Under the circumstances we were justified in taking the steps we did. Before the arrival of the ship we had written to ask if the bond would be paid, and received no reply. Our bond was on ship and freight only; if therefore the vessel was not arrested the cargo would be discharged and the freight received by the ship, and our security diminished by that amount. The bond was for a large sum, and the ship by itself might not have realised enough to pay it:

The Jane, 1 Dodson 461, 464;
The San José Primeiro, Prit. Dig. 513.

There was no malice or gross negligence in the arrest such as to entitle the defendant to damages:

The Evangelismos, Swa. 376; 12 Moo. P. C. 352.

Sir ROBERT PHILLIMORE.—I do not think the circumstances are such as to entitle the defendants to damages, but they are clearly entitled to the costs of the suit.

THE CECILIE.

Bottomry—Maritime risk—Payment due on arrival of ship.

An instrument by which a captain binds his ship to pay a sum of money for goods supplied within "six days after my arrival," means after the ship's arrival, and is an instrument of bottomry.

THIS was an action of bottomry brought against the Danish vessel Cecilie to recover sums of 134*l.* 5*s.* 8*d.* and 131*l.* 11*s.* 10*d.*, to pay for yellow metal and provisions supplied at Hamburg, the payment whereof was secured by two instruments in the following form:

I the undersigned, captain of the Danish vessel named the Cecilie, hereby acknowledge for myself and my heirs, the duplicate being valid as a single acknowledgment, that I am indebted to Mr. Rith Rodewalt for yellow metal delivered to (provisions and equipment of) the said vessel for the prosecution of her voyage from Hamburg and Africa and back to London, in the sum of 2684 marks and 50pf. (2739 marks and 35 pf.) wherefore I pledge my ship and appurtenances, and bind myself to pay the above sum within six days after my arrival in London, or wheresoever I may put in, said payment to be prompt and uncontested, according to the law of exchange in all parts.—Hamburgh, July 13, 1878. (Signed) N. S. THOGERSEN, Master of the schooner Cecilie.

These documents were indorsed by Mr. Rodewalt to Elliott's Metal Company (Limited), who now sued as indorsees. Certain persons who had supplied necessaries to the ship, other than the above, disputed the payment on the ground that the said instruments were not bottomry bonds, as they showed no maritime risk, and therefore gave no priority to the plaintiff.

Butt, Q.C. and Hodgson for the plaintiff.—In Simonds v. Hodgson (3 B. & A. 50), which was an action on a policy of insurance on bottomry, the words on the instrument of bottomry were, "I bind myself, my ship, her apparel, tackle, &c., as well as her present freight and cargo, consisting, &c., to pay to B. the above-mentioned sum, with 12 per cent. bottomry, premium, &c., and I do hereby bind myself, the said schooner, brig, &c., to full and complete payment of the said sum, with all charges thereon, in eight days after my arrival at the afore-mentioned port of London; and I do hereby make liable the said vessel, her freight, and cargo whether she do or do not arrive at the above-mentioned port of London;" and Lord Tenterden, delivering the said judgment of the Exchequer Chamber, held that the words "eight days after my arrival" means after the ship's arrival, and that such words show that the lender takes on himself the risk of the voyage. The only difference between that case and this is that here there is no bottomry premium mentioned; but that is not essential; the assumption of the risk is all that is necessary:

The Elpis, 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 664; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 472.

Clarkson for the interveners.—The bond was given at the commencement of the voyage and not during the voyage for its necessities; this, and the fact of there being no maritime premium are strong evidence of the instrument not being intended to be a bottomry bond.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I am satisfied that these are bottomry bonds, and I pronounce for their validity. They will bear 4 per cent. interest from the date of their becoming due.

THE CONFIDENCE; THE SUSAN ELIZABETH.

County Court Admiralty appeal—Mode of hearing—No notes of evidence—Witnesses on appeal.

In an Admiralty appeal from a County Court, under the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, where there are no shorthand writer's notes of evidence, and no notes taken by the judge of the County Court available for the purpose of appeal, the High Court (Admiralty Division) will order the appeal to be heard on vivâ voce evidence.

THIS was an appeal from the County Court at Portsmouth in cross actions of collision brought respectively by the owners of the Susan Elizabeth against the Confidence, and by the owners of the Confidence against the Susan Elizabeth. The actions were tried together at Portsmouth on 12th Dec. 1878, and judgment given for the owners of the Susan Elizabeth in both actions; and the owners of the Confidence appealed under the County Court Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, sect. 26. At the hearing there was no shorthand writer, and in order to bring the evidence before the High Court on appeal the appellants applied to the County Court judge for a copy of his notes of the evidence. The County Court judge refused to supply such copy upon the grounds that he was not aware that he was bound to do so, that he had not been asked by counsel at the hearing to take any note of any points, and that the notes he had taken were only short notes, and not of any use for the purposes of appeal. At the hearing the County Court judge was asked by counsel for the appellants to state his reasons for his judgment, but he declined to do so.

The case now came before the High Court on motion to direct the mode of hearing the appeal.

J. P. Aspinall, for the appellants, having stated the above facts, asked that the case should be reheard on appeal by means of vivâ voce evidence. By the General Orders made in 1869, under the County Court Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, there is provision made (rule 32) for the evidence of witnesses being taken down by a shorthand writer, and the transcript has always hitherto been used on appeal. This rule, however, has been omitted in the Consolidated County Court Orders and Rules 1875, and consequently there is now no provision by means of which the parties can bring the evidence before the Appeal Court except the judge's notes, which, according to the judge's statement, would be useless. The only mode of hearing the appeal is therefore to rehear the evidence.

E. C. Clarkson, for the respondents, contended that the judge's notes ought to be procured before any order as to hearing witnesses was made.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I shall order the appeal to be heard on vivâ voce evidence, but the parties are at liberty to procure the judge's notes if they can; and, if on their being procured it appears they are of any use for the purposes of appeal, the respondents can apply again to the court to make such use of the notes as they can, or to set aside this order.

THE CONSTITUTION.

Jurisdiction—Foreign vessel of war—Maritime lien—Ex-territoriality—Salvage.

The High Court of Justice, Admiralty Division, will not allow a warrant to issue for the arrest of a foreign vessel of war, or of private property on board of her and of which the Government to which she belongs have the care, at the suit of salvors.

THIS was a motion on behalf of the owner, master, and crew of the steam-tug Admiral for two warrants of arrest to issue against the U.S. vessel Constitution, and against the cargo laden on board of her.

The Constitution, whilst on a voyage from Havre to New York, and having on board a large quantity of empty cases, and also of goods returned from the Exhibition at Paris, got ashore on Bollard Point, near Swanage, and whilst in that position salvage services were rendered to her by the steam-tug Admiral and other vessels.

Jan. 27.—Dr. Phillimore applied to the court that warrants of arrest should be issued against the ship and cargo, as the plaintiffs were unable to obtain proper remuneration for their services, and the vessel was about to leave the country.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—As a question of jurisdiction is raised, I shall certainly not grant the application till the question has been argued; but I will give leave to serve short notice of motion, so that the question may be argued on Wednesday next, the notice to be served on the vessel and American Consul, but not personally on the captain, and I think a letter should be also sent to the American Ambassador stating that the application will be made.

Jan. 29.—The question of jurisdiction came on for argument on the following motion:

Between the Owners, Master, and Crew of the steam-tug Admiral (plaintiffs), and the ship or vessel Constitution, her cargo and freight (defendant).

Constitution.

We, Clarkson, Son, and Greenwell, solicitors for the plaintiffs in this cause, give notice that we shall by counsel at 10.30 o'clock in the forenoon of the 29th Jan. 1879, move the judge in court to order a warrant to issue for the arrest of the vessel and for a further warrant to arrest her cargo and if necessary to unliver the same, to answer the claim of the plaintiffs for salvage services rendered to the Constitution her cargo and freight; and further take notice that leave has been given by the court to serve short notice of this motion.

Dated the 27th Jan. 1879.

CLARKSON, SON, AND GREENWELL.

On behalf of the plaintiffs the following affidavit of the owner of the Admiral was read:

1. I am the owner of the steam tug Admiral and one of the plaintiffs in this action.

2. On the 17th Jan. inst. I received a telegram from Lieut. Viry, Swanage station, to the following effect: "American frigate Constitution ashore on Bollard Point. Send strongest tug immediately, two if possible." I thereupon despatched my tug Admiral to the assistance of the vessel Constitution, and she rendered important and efficient salvage services to the ship Constitution and her cargo, and was instrumental in getting her off the ground.

3. After the several services were completed, I, on the 21st Jan. inst. received the following letter from the consular agent at Portsmouth:

"United States of America Consular Agency,
Portsmouth, 20th Jan. 1879.

"Mr. George Drover,

"Sir,—If you have any claim to present against the U.S. frigate Constitution please put it in writing and bring it to my office as early as possible to-morrow forenoon. If you cannot come, forward it to me by return of post. The ship sails soon.—Yours respectfully,

"C. E. M'CHEANE, United States Consular Agent."

In reply to this letter I, on the 21st inst., sent the following telegram: "Impossible my coming to Portsmouth. I claim one thousand five hundred pounds services rendered by my tug Admiral. You, no doubt, are aware my tug was the means of towing Constitution off. Malta and the three other tugs could not move the ship, but when we commenced towing ship immediately came off. Please wire reply immediately as I leave shortly for London."

4. Afterwards, on the 23rd inst., I received a sum of 200*l*. in recognition of the services rendered by the said tug, accompanied by the following letter:

"United States of America Consular Agency,
Portsmouth.

"Mr. George Drover,

"Sir,—I am instructed by the captain of the U.S. frigate Constitution, on behalf of the United States Government, to forward to you a cheque for 200*l*., in recognition of the services rendered to that vessel upon the occasion of her stranding on Bollard Point by your tug Admiral, and by the master and crew of that tug. I shall be obliged to you to settle with the master and crew accordingly.

"It may prevent some misconception on your part if I inform you the value of the Constitution and cargo, principally empty cases and machinery, on board her does not exceed 12,000*l*. My government are happy that the services, with the important co-operation of H.B.M. tug Malta, were rapidly and easily successful.—I am, sir, your obedient servant,

"C. E. M'CHEANE, U.S. Consular Agent.

"Please acknowledge this in course."

5. Such sum of 200*l*. is entirely inadequate and insufficient compensation for the services rendered, and on the 25th inst. I returned the said sum to the consular agent, accompanied by the following letter:

"M'Cheane, Esq. "25th Jan. 1879.
"Constitution.

"Sir,—Herewith please find cheque received to-day for 200*l*. I cannot think of accepting so small a sum. I am willing to refer the matter to the Admiralty Court. If you wish to communicate with me, please address letter to care of Clarkson, Son, and Greenwell, 24, Carter-lane, Doctors' Commons, London. I shall be there Monday morning ten o'clock.—Yours truly, GEORGE DROVER."

6. The frigate Constitution had on board her at the time of the services a valuable cargo, consisting principally of machinery belonging to private individuals, exhibitors at the Paris Exhibition, and was on a voyage from Havre to New York. I am informed and believe that the value of the vessel Constitution and her cargo amount to considerably over 12,000.

7. On the 28th Jan. inst. I received a further letter from the American Consulate to the following effect: "Your favour of the 25th inst., returning the cheque for 200*l*., has been received. This award for the services of your tug Admiral to the Constitution was made advisedly, and is considered by competent and disinterested experts as ample and liberal, and my information is that it is final. Cheque will remain at my office till noon of the 15th Feb. next, when, you having failed to call for it, its amount will be forwarded by me to the United States Navy Department."

8. The said vessel Constitution and the cargo on board her are now lying off Portsmouth, and will leave immediately for New York. That applications have been made by my solicitors to the American Legation, and I am unable to obtain sufficient compensation for the services of the said tug without the aid and process of this honourable court.

The notice of motion was served, as directed by the judge, on the ship and the American Consul, and a copy of it sent to the American Embassy, accompanied by the following letter:

24, Carter-lane, Doctors' Commons, E.C.
The American frigate Constitution 27th Jan. 1779.

Your Excellency,—Our clients, the owners, master and crew of the steam-tug Admiral, of Cowes, Isle of Wight, lately rendered very valuable salvage services to the American frigate Constitution, which was ashore at Bollard Point.

Application for remuneration for such services was made to the American Consul at Portsmouth, and he forwarded a sum of 200*l*. to the owners of the tug. This sum is quite insufficient to compensate for the services rendered, and was returned to the consul. The Constitution had on board a valuable cargo, consisting of machinery, the property of the exhibitors at the Paris Exhibition. We this morning moved the judge of the Admiralty Division for leave to arrest the Constitution and her cargo, and an order was made that the motion should be adjourned till Wednesday, in the meantime notice of the motion to be served on the vessel and American Consul. In accordance with the judge's request, we beg to give your Excellency notice of the application to be made, and inclose a copy of the notice of motion.—We are your Excellency's obedient servants,

CLARKSON, SON, and GREENWELL.

The Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary for the United States of America.

The defendants' solicitors produced the following letter:

Legation of the United States,
London, 28th Jan. 1879.

Messrs. Thomas Cooper and Co.,
Solicitors, &c.

Gentlemen,—The accompanying notice marked A., having been left at this Legation with the janitor after the office was closed last evening, I shall be obliged to you to instruct counsel to be present in court to-morrow morning to inform the Right Honourable the Judge of the Admiralty Court that the ship against which the warrant has been applied for by the owners, master, and crew of the steam-tug Admiral is the United States national ship of war Constitution, regularly commissioned by the Government of the United States, and that the Constitution at the time of the alleged salvage services was engaged in the national service of the United States for public purposes, and in pursuance of a special Act of Congress passed in that behalf. You will please also instruct counsel to inform the judge that the so-called cargo consists of property of which the United States Government has for public purposes charged itself with the care and protection. Under these circumstances I, as the representative of the United States, cannot recognise that the High Court of Justice has any jurisdiction whatever in the case.—I am respectfully yours,

JOHN WALSH.

Counsel will be good enough to inform the learned judge that application should have been made to the Marquis of Salisbury, Secretary for Foreign Affairs, had time permitted it.

Milward, Q.C. and Dr. Phillimore, for the plaintiffs, owners, master, and crew of the Admiral.

E. C. Clarkson for the American Minister.

The Admiralty Advocate (Dr. Deane, Q.C.), with him the Attorney-General, for the Crown.

Milward, Q.C.—This application is of a twofold nature: (1) to arrest the ship herself; (2) to arrest the cargo laden on board of her, and, if necessary, to unliver it. In ordinary cases, the warrant to arrest a ship and cargo for salvage services rendered to her would issue as a matter of course. We have come to the court to ask its leave; but there is nothing to induce it to withhold that leave. There is a precedent for the arrest of a vessel under similar circumstances in the time of Lord Stowell: (The Prins Frederik, 2 Dods, 451). There is no dispute as to the fact that, as sworn in the affidavit, there was a distinct request to the salvors in this case to come and render assistance to a vessel ashore on the coast of England. What is there, then, to shut the doors of this court to the salvors when they take the ordinary legal means of securing a due compensation for their services? The vessel, it is true, belongs to a foreign Government, but she was not at the time the services were rendered engaged in the public service of that Government, but in carrying a cargo the property of various private individuals. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—It is, I understand, admitted that the vessel herself is a vessel in the war service of the United States Government, and that the cargo sought to be arrested is now on board her.] Yes: but that is precisely the case of The Prins Frederik (ubi sup.), except that there the cargo seems to have been laden on Government account.

E. C. Clarkson, on behalf of the American Government, asked permission to read the letter of instructions from the American Ambassador to Messrs. Thomas Cooper and Co., given above, and was permitted to do so.

The Admiralty Advocate, on behalf of the Crown, informed the court that a communication had been received by the Foreign-office as to the application now before the court, and that he was instructed to inform the court that the Government recognised the public character of the Constitution, and, whilst submitting to any course which the court might consider it its duty to pursue, to protest against any exercise of its jurisdiction against this ship. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Under these circumstances, the onus lies on the salvors to show that they are entitled to arrest the ship.]

Milward, Q.C.—The exemption of vessels of war of foreign states from civil process is only granted to them by the comity of nations in consequence of the public service they are engaged in. This is no more a public service than that of any other vessel hired to bring goods from France to America for private citizens. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—It will be convenient to keep distinct the question of arrest of the ship from that of the cargo.] As far as possible; but the cargo being on board the ship in question cannot be absolutely dissevered. The American Embassy does not deny that the property in the cargo is in private owners; it only alleges that it has the care of it. In The Prins Frederik (ubi sup.) it actually belonged to the Government (2 Dod. 465), and yet the warrant of arrest was actually issued and executed (p. 451). If access to this court is refused to the salvors, they have no means of obtaining justice. The exemption of foreign vessels of war is only an exemption from ordinary civil process. It does not apply to causes in rem; there the maritime lien attaches jure gentium at once, either ex quasi contractu or ex quasi delicto, whatever be the character of the vessel:

The Charkich, 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 581; L. Rep. 4 Adm. & Ecc. 59, 93, 96 28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 513; The Exchange, 7 Cranchf U.S. Sup. Court Rep. 116.

It is true that the last case was one where the question arose as to prize property; but that is à fortiori in favour of the salvors here, as prize property is the property of the Crown or Government; here the property in the goods is private.

Dr. Phillimore, on the same side, adopted as a portion of his argument the following extract from the opinions of Attorney-Generals of United States, vol. I., p. 54, as quoted in the Report of the Royal Commission on Fugitive Slaves, p. 84: "The question again arose . . . . whether judicial process could be lawfully served on board a public ship of war belonging to his Britannic Majesty lying alongside a wharf in the city of New York and within the territorial jurisdiction of the state of New York; and the opinion of the Attorney-General, Charles Lee, was taken on the subject. After quoting passages from Vattel and Martens, he then proceeds: 'According to the general rule established by these citations, every ship, even a public ship of war of a foreign nation, at anchor within the harbour of New York, is within the territory of the state of New York and subject to a service of judicial process; if an exemption from this rule is claimed by a foreign ship of war, it is incumbent on such ship to set forth and maintain clearly and satisfactorily its right to the exemption, or it must be deemed within the general rule. The officers and crew of a public ship of war being admitted into the United States are entitled to be treated with hospitality and kindness; but that does not in reason require that the ship should be exempt from judicial process; and more especially when they are bound by every kind of obligation to act in conformity to the laws of the country which affords them and their ships its sovereign protection whilst within its jurisdiction. It is expressly provided by article 23 of the Treaty of London that the ships of war of each of the contending parties shall at all times be hospitably received in the ports of the other, their officers and crews paying respect to the laws and government of the country. This is conceived to be declaratory of the usage of nations; and here it may be observed that hospitality which includes protection is to be enjoyed upon condition that the laws and government of the country are respected. To disobey judicial process authorised by law, or to resist it on board the ship, is inconsistent with a due respect to the laws and government of the country. The article further stipulates that the officers shall be treated with that respect which is due to the commission which they bear; and if any insult shall be offered to them by any of the inhabitants, all offenders in that respect shall be punished as disturbers of the peace and amity of the two countries." [Sir R. PHILLIMORE. — That is an opinion written, I think, in the year 1799. It is questionable how far the same would have been written in 1879; besides it relates rather to the liberty of the subject than to civil actions against the property.] Yes, but it shows at all events that the ex-territoriality enjoyed by a foreign vessel of war is not absolute: (Report of Royal Commission on Fugitive Slaves, p. 33.) It was the opinion of Chancellor Kent that civil and criminal process might be served on board the ship, though not on the ship itself (Kent's Comm. on Amer. Law, ed 1851, p. 157, note e); but if it may be served on any private property on board and therefore on the cargo, the court has certainly jurisdiction to inquire into the property in goods on board:

The Santissima, Trinidad, 7 Wheaton (Amer.) Rep. 273.

If this motion is refused, foreign vessels of war will themselves be the chief sufferers, as, if a claimant has no right to enforce his claim against them by law, he will be loathe to render assistance when they stand in need of it. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE,—It is not proper to suppose that any Government will act otherwise than equitably towards those who render services to its ships.] In this very case we contend that what they propose to give us is altogether inadequate, and we are anxious to have the opinion of the court on the merits.

E. C. Clarkson for the American Minister.—The Government is desirous of showing all courtesy to the court, and has therefore instructed me to appear and argue the case. It cannot admit that the court has any right to entertain a suit, or to issue a warrant against this ship. Had the ship in any way been divested of its character as a public ship of war, and had it been engaged in ordinary trading operations, it would have been liable to arrest for one of the reasons for which the vessel belonging to the Khedive as appears in The Charkieh (ubi sup.) was held liable to process; but it has not done so. It is not possible to distinguish the case of the vessel itself, and of the cargo on board of her. The ex-territoriality of the ship must be violated to enable the officer of the court to get at the cargo. (The Exchange, ubi sup.) Supposing the captain of that American man of war ordered the removal of the officer of the court as a trespasser molliter manu; what power would any court have to interfere? The goods are in the possession of the Government, and cannot be arrested without dispossessing the Government. If the salvors consider that the liberal award they have received is not sufficient, they can invoke the services of the Foreign-office.

The Admiralty Advocate (Dr. Deane, Q.C.), for the Crown. In a case of this description it may almost be doubtful if the Government have not a right of prohibition, as so unusual a proceeding as the arrest of a foreign vessel of war might occasion serious danger to the relations of amity existing between the countries. Whilst countries are at peace it is an implied condition of the peace that their ships of war should be free from civil process in one another's countries. The Charkieh (ubi sup.) is not in point, she was not a public ship of war, but a trader, and not the property of a sovereign prince.

Milward, Q.C. in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 29.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—On Monday last an application was made to this court to allow a warrant of a peculiar character to issue and to be served upon a ship of war belonging to an independent state in amity with Her Majesty. The court directed the case to stand over, and suggested that it would be proper that notice should be given to his Excellency the Minister of the United States in this country, and also to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. The court has had reason to congratulate itself that it took that step, because the result has been that I have had the advantage of having the opinion of counsel on behalf of the United States Government, and also the opinions of the law officers of the Crown.

Now, it is admitted—and indeed it could not be denied—that, if I were to exercise the jurisdiction prayed in this case, I should be doing that for which there is no legal ground or precedent. It is clear upon all the authorities, which are to be found in the case of The Charkieh (L. Rep. 4 A. & E. 59; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 581; 28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 513), that there is no doubt as to the general proposition that ships of war belonging to another nation with whom this country is at peace are exempt from the civil jurisdiction of the country. I have listened in vain for any peculiar circumstances to take this case out of the general proposition.

It has happened to me more than once since I have had the honour of sitting in this chair to have been requested by foreign states to sit as arbitrator, and to make an award in certain cases—one of collision and two of salvage, I think. If such an application had been made to the court in this case, I would gladly have undertaken the duty sought to be imposed upon me; but such is not the case.

I have now to consider whether there is any authority for the proposition that, when a foreign state refuses to waive the privilege which it has, it is competent to this court nevertheless to treat it as an individual, and serve civil process on its property. I am clearly of opinion that it would be very wrong and improper in me to assent to the request on the part of the owner of the steam-tug. I see no distinction in this case between refusing the warrant prayed for against the ship and that against the cargo, and I refuse it equally in both cases. I think it unnecessary to go into the cases cited, because they are distinguishable from the present, inasmuch as the important point decided in The Charkieh (ubi sup.) was that the Khedive of Egypt was not an independent sovereign, and also that the ship had been treated as a vessel of commerce and not of war. There was another point to which notice has been drawn, but it was not necessary for the decision of that case, and the points decided in that case are those which I have mentioned. I state these facts to show that that case is materially different from the case now before the court.

It has been alleged that great hardship will ensue from the decision of the court, inasmuch as it would expose ships to great difficulty in future, if necessity should arise for salvage services to be rendered to them. To that I must answer that it would be improper to suppose that any foreign Government would not remunerate the services of salvors, taking proper means to ascertain what those services were. I have no reason to suppose that such would not be the case. Be that as it may, I have to discharge my duty, which is to say, in the absence of precedent and principle I cannot feel warranted in allowing the process to issue.

I cannot consent that any warrant shall issue from this court, and I must dismiss the motion with costs.

THE PARLEMENT BELGE.

Jurisdiction — Collision — Arrest — International law — Constitutional law — Ex-territoriality — Mail packet — Government vessel — Foreign sovereign State — Crown and subject — Treaty-making power.

A vessel belonging to or chartered by a foreign Government, and regularly employed for the purposes of carrying mails and passengers and some cargo, is not entitled to the privileges of a man-of-war as to ex-territoriality; but is liable to an action for damage done by her to the vessel of a British subject, and to arrest if the suit is in rem.

The Crown of this country has not power, by treaty with a foreign Government, to give to vessels of, or employed by, that Government other than vessels of war the privilege of freedom from civil process extended by international law to vessel of war. (a)

Where the Crown appears to protest against the jurisdiction of the court being exercised against a vessel belonging to a foreign power, it has the same right of reply as in cases where it appears on its own behalf.

THIS was a motion in a cause of damage by collision. The action was brought in rem against the Parlement Belge to recover damages for a collision under circumstances set out below. No warrant of arrest was issued, and no appearance was entered by any person on behalf of the Parlement Belge, and the time required for proceeding by default having elapsed, the case came before the court on the following motion:

IN THE HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE, ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

Between owners of steam tug Daring (plaintiffs) and the owners of the steamship or vessel Parlement Belge and her freight (defendants).

Ship Parlement Belge.

We, L. and Company, solicitors for the plaintiffs in this cause, give notice that we shall by counsel on the 4th Feb. 1879 move the judge in court to direct that judgment with costs may be entered for the plaintiffs in respect of damages sustained by their tug Daring, through collision with the steamship Parlement Belge; that the accounts and vouchers relating to such damage may be referred to the registrar and merchants to report thereon, and that a warrant may issue for the arrest of the said steamship Parlement Belge. LOWLESS AND CO.

Dated 25th Jan. 1879.

The facts of the case, as set out in the statement of claim, and verified by affidavit, and for the purposes of the argument undisputed, were that

At about 4.30 p.m. on 14th Feb. 1878, the steam tug Daring, of 109 tons gross register . . . brought up to an anchor in Dover Bay, within the port and harbour of Dover, in a safe and proper berth, about half a mile east of Dover pier.

2. In the course of the evening a fog began to rise from off the shore, about 10.30 p.m. the wind was to the S. and W., and the weather nearly a calm, the fog still continuing. The tide was ebb; the Daring was riding in the same place, having her anchor regulation light clearly exhibited, and burning brightly; her fog bell rung at proper intervals, and a good look-out kept on board her.

3. In these circumstances, the paddle steamship, Parlement Belge, was seen and heard by those on board the Daring, when a short distance off, approaching rapidly towards her from the direction of the harbour, and although the fog bell of the Daring was loudly rung, and her captain hailed the Parlement Belge to stop, she came on and ran her stern right into the starboard side of the Daring, cutting into her about 14 feet, and doing her a great deal of damage.

4. The collision was caused by the bad navigation and negligence of those on board the Parlement Belge. The collision was not caused or contributed to by the plaintiffs, or by any of those on board the Daring.

5. A writ in rem in this action was duly served on the Parlement Belge on the 26th Feb. 1878, and no appearance has been entered in this action.

6. The Parlement Belge is a Belgian vessel, and was and is now employed in the service of carrying the mails between Dover and Ostend and Belgium.

7. Before and since the time of the collision in question she was engaged in carrying, besides the mails, passengers and merchandise, and in earning passage money and freight. The plaintiffs are unable to discover whether the Parlement Belge was at the time of the collision, or is now, the property of His Majesty the King of the Belgians, or whether she was only chartered for the purpose by His Majesty, or by some officer or officers of His Majesty's Government. They have caused application to be made to the Government of His Majesty to give them compensation for the damage done to them, but have been unable to obtain such compensation.

The plaintiffs claim as follows:

(1.) Judgment against the Parlement Belge, her tackle, apparel, and furniture, for the damage occasioned to the plaintiffs by the collision, and for the costs of this action.

(2.) A warrant to arrest the Parlement Belge, her tackle, apparel and furniture, and if necessary, a sale thereof.

(3.) Such further and other relief in the premises as the nature of the case may require.

Filed 4th Jan. 1879.

Feb. 4, 1879.—Dr. W. G. F. Phillimore.—A writ in rem was served in the ordinary way (Rules of Sup. Ct., Order IX., r. 10), but no warrant of arrest was issued (Order IX., r. 9). No appearance being entered in the time limited, a statement of claim was filed, and the ordinary steps in a cause by default taken (Adm. Rules 1871, r. 4; L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 514; and The Polymede, 3 Asp. Mar. Law. Cas. 124; 1 P. Div. 121; 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 367). I have an affidavit by the master of the Daring verifying the statement of claim; therefore, in an ordinary case, I should be entitled to judgment (Adm. Rules 1871, r. 5; L. R. 3 A. & E. 614). But there are peculiar circumstances in this case. It will be seen by the statement of claim that the Parlement Belge, the vessel which ran down the Daring whilst at anchor in Dover

(a) The proposition of law here laid down may have serious consequences. Applied to other circumstances it might put it in the power of a subject to involve this country in war with a foreign state without the Crown having any means of restraining him in spite of its treaty obligations. Again, the decision involves the proposition that our courts of law have power to decide whether a treaty is or is not binding upon British subjects, or, in other words, whether the Crown was acting within its rights in making any particular treaty. If our courts have such a revising power, it is extraordinary that no traces of the exercise of any such power should exist in our records. The only case which at all resembles the present, and which was not cited on the argument, is Weymberg v. Touch (Hil. Term, 20 & 21 Car. 2, 1 Cases in Chan. 123). In this case, an action having been brought by a British subject against a Dane to recover the price of goods sold in Denmark, the Dane applied to Chancery to restrain the action on the ground that, by a treaty between the Kings of England and Denmark, it was stipulated that any sums paid by subjects to either sovereign should be taken as paid to the creditor, and the debtor should be discharged, and that the Dane had paid the King of Denmark under compulsion; the British subject demurred to the bill in Chancery, but was ordered to answer the bill.—ED.

Bay, is a vessel employed by the Belgians in the mail service between Ostend and Dover, and by the correspondence which has passed, it appears that an exemption from the ordinary process of the court is claimed for her under the provisions of a convention. The most important articles of that Convention are Articles 6 and 10 (ubi sup.). The affidavit of Eugene Carden (ubi sup.) shows clearly that the Parlement Belge was carrying cargo at the time, and by so doing, in violation of Art. 10, she has waived the privileges, if she ever was in a position to claim them, of Art. 6. A vessel of war, by carrying cargo for purposes of trade, would waive her privilege of ex-territoriality (The Charkieh, 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 121; L. Rep. 4 A. & E. pp. 99, 100; 28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 513); à fortiori, a vessel which only claims the privilege conditionally on not carrying cargo: (The Exchange 7 Cranch, U. S. Sup. Ct. 116.) This right of action and of process is a common law right, of which the plaintiffs cannot be ousted by anything except the common law or a statute; this special Convention, even if valid at all, cannot affect the rights of a subject, because the Crown puts a construction upon it which the Convention will not bear. In the recent case of The Stadt Flushing (not reported) it was proved that the vessel was a mail packet, and under contract with the Government to proceed at a certain rate of speed, but that did not prevent the plaintiffs from recovering from her for damage resulting from a collision occasioned by the Stadt Flushing proceeding at a high rate of speed in a fog.

The Admiralty Advocate (Dr. Deane, Q.C.), for the Crown, was stopped.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The question is one of such great importance, that I think it would be more convenient to have it raised and solemnly argued on some form of pleading, which will enable it the more easily to be taken to a Court of Appeal. I shall direct the motion to stand over for a fortnight to give time to the Crown to consider if it will appear and intervene in any way.

Feb. 18.—The Admiralty Advocate (Dr. Deane, Q.C.) informed the court that the Crown proposed to appear, but that, through inadvertence or misunderstanding, no pleadings had as yet been put in. The motion was thereupon directed to stand over further for a week, and on the 24th Feb. the following "Information and Protest" of the Attorney-General was filed:

The Attorney-General, under protest on behalf of Her Majesty the Queen, gives the court to understand and be informed as follows:

1. Before, and at the time of the alleged collision, and thenceforward till the present time, the Parlement Belge was one of the mail packets running between Ostend and Dover, and one of the packets mentioned in Article VI. of the Convention of Feb. 17, 1876, hereinafter referred to.

2. During the period hereinbefore mentioned, and at all material times, the said packets were and are the property of His Majesty the King of the Belgians, and in his possession, control, and employ, as reigning sovereign of the State of Belgium, and have been and still are public vessels of the Government and Sovereign State of Belgium, carrying his said Majesty's royal pennon, and were and are being navigated and employed by and in possession of such Government and not otherwise.

3. The said packets were and are officered by officers of the royal Belgian navy holding commissions from His Majesty the King of the Belgians, and in the pay and service of his Government. The said officers are appointed by and are under the control and orders of the Belgian Minister of Public Works.

4. During the period hereinbefore mentioned, and at all material times, a Convention, dated Feb. 17, 1876, has been and is in force between Her Majesty the Queen and His Majesty the King of the Belgians, to a copy of which in the French and English languages the defendants crave leave to refer as if the said convention were duly set forth at length herein.

5. During the period hereinbefore mentioned, and at all material times, the Parlement Belge was carrying the public mails, under the said Convention, between and from the royal post offices of Great Britain and Belgium.

6. The Attorney-General, under protest, says that this honourable court has no jurisdiction to entertain this suit, and that the plaintiffs cannot prosecute the same therein.

7. The Attorney-General, under protest as aforesaid, gives the court to understand and be informed herein, that he does not admit the matters alleged in any of the paragraphs of the statement of claim to be true.

Wherefore the Attorney-General, on behalf of Her Majesty the Queen, prays the court to stay all proceedings in this action, and to dismiss the motion of the plaintiffs with costs to the Attorney-General, on behalf of Her Majesty, of and incident to this application and action.

(Signed) JOHN HOLKER.

The Convention (a) referred to is as follows:

Convention between Her Majesty and the King of the Belgians, regulating the Communications by Post between the British and Belgian Dominions.

Signed at London, February 17, 1876.

[Ratifications exchanged at London, March 24, 1876].

Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britian and Ireland, and His Majesty the King of the Belgians, being desirous of strengthening the friendly relations which unite the two countries, and wishing to regulate by special arrangement (forming a sequel to the General Postal Treaty concluded at Berne on the 9th of October 1874) the postal relations between their respective offices, have named as their Plenipotentiaries for this purpose, that is to say: Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britian and Ireland, the Right Honourable Edward Henry Stanley, Earl of Derby, Baron Stanley of Bickerstaff, a Peer and a Baronet of England, a Member of Her Britannic Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council, Her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, &c., &c., and the Right Honourable John James Robert Manners (commonly called Lord John Manners), a Member of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council, a Member of Parliament, Her Majesty's Postmaster-General; and His Majesty the King of the Belgians, Baron Henry Solvyné, Grand Officer of the Order of Leopold, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of His Majesty the King of the Belgians to Her Britannic Majesty, &c., &c. Who, after having reciprocally communicated to each other their respective full powers, found in good and due form, have agreed upon the following Articles:

ARTICLE I.—There shall be between the Post-offices of Great Britian and Belgium a periodical and regular exchange of correspondence of every kind in international service as in transit.

ARTICLE II.—The exchange of correspondence between the two offices shall be carried out through the following Post-offices:—On the part of Great Britian: 1. Dover, 2. London. On the part of Belgium: 1. Ostend (local office). 2. The offices travelling between Brussels and Ostend. 3. The office travelling between Brussels and Tournai. 4. The office travelling between Ghent and Mouseron. The two offices may, if they think proper, agree to name other offices for the exchange of correspondence.

ARTICLE III.—The mails between Great Britain and Belgium shall be conveyed by means of special packets running between Ostend and Dover. Each office shall have the right to employ subsidiarily, and so far as it shall be of any advantage on the score of speed, the route viâ France, and the French packets from Calais to Dover for the conveyance of its correspondence in closed bags to the other office. With regard to the mails conveyed on account of other offices, it will be the duty of the despatching office to indicate the route to be followed.

ARTICLE IV.—The Post-offices of Great Britain and of Belgium shall fix by a mutual agreement, the time for the departure of the packets from Ostend and Dover and they shall regulate this service in connection with the railway trains, so as to insure with the greatest possible speed the transmission of mails for international as well as for transit service.

ARTICLE V.—The Belgian Government shall continue to perform, at its own expense, the double daily service for the conveyance of the mails from Ostend to Dover and vice versâ (a service which must be performed at least six days in the week, the service on Sunday being optional).

ARTICLE VI.—The packets employed for the conveyance of the correspondence between Ostend and Dover shall be steamboats of sufficient power and size for the service in which they are to be employed. They shall be vessels belonging to Government, or freighted by order of Government. (Ce seront des bâtiments appartenant à l'Etat ou frétés pour le compte de l'Etat.) These vessels shall be considered, and treated in the port of Dover and in all other British ports at which they may accidentally touch, as vessels of war, and be there entitled to all the honours and privileges which the interests and importance of the service in which they are employed, demand. They shall be exempted in those ports, as well on their entrance as on their departure, from all tonnage, navigation, and port dues, excepting however the vessels freighted by order of Government (pour le compte de l'Etat), which must pay such dues in those ports where they are levied on behalf of corporations, private companies, or private individuals. They shall not be diverted from their especial duty—that is to say, the conveyance of the mails—by any authority whatever, or be liable to seizure, detention, embargo, or arrêt de Prince. (Ils ne pourront être détournés de leur destination spéciale, c'est à dire du transport des dépêches, par quelque autorité que ce soit, ni être sujets à saisie arrêt, embargo, ou arrêt de Prince.)

ARTICLE VII.—The captains of the Belgian packets shall receive from the agents appointed for the service of exchange, the mails at Ostend and at Dover, the bags being closed and sealed. The number of these bags and the time of their delivery shall be entered on a way bill, which the captains or the officers intrusted under their orders with the care of the mails, shall deliver on their arrival to the office for which they are destined. They shall bring back to the despatching office a certificate of the punctual delivery of the mails, delivered to them by the agent who shall have received them.

ARTICLE VIII.—Unless prevented by causes over which they have no control, the captains of the packets engaged in carrying the mails between Ostend and Dover shall proceed directly to their destination. If in consequence of stress of weather or damage, they should be compelled to alter their course, and to put into any other port than Ostend or Dover, they must justify such deviation in the manner that their respective offices shall deem advisable. Whenever a packet conveying mails shall be compelled to put into any other than its destined port, the captain shall immediately deliver the mails to the local post-office, or forward them towards their destination, under the charge of an officer of the vessel.

ARTICLE IX.—The boats which shall be necessary for taking on board or landing the mails, or for assisting the steam packets upon their arrival or departure, shall be provided, both at Dover and Ostend, by the Belgian Government, and at its expense.

ARTICLE X.—The mail packets shall be at liberty to take on board or land at Dover, as well as at other British ports where they may be obliged to put in, any passengers of whatever nation they may be, with their wearing-apparel and luggage, and also with their horses and carriages, on condition that the captains of the said packets shall conform to the regulations of the United Kingdom concerning the arrival and departure of travellers. They shall be prohibited from conveying goods or merchandise on freight, with the exception, however, of postal packets and small parcels, the weight of which shall be limited by mutual agreement between the two offices. (Ils ne pourront transporter aucune marchandise à titre de fret, à l'exception toutefois des colis postaux et des articles de messagerie dont le poids sera limité de commun accord entre les deux Administrations.)

ARTICLE XI.—The expenses which may be incurred for signals of every kind, and for the burning of Bengal lights upon the pier for the use of the steam packets, shall be borne both at Dover and at Ostend by the Belgian Government.

ARTICLE XII.—The captains of the packets specially engaged in the conveyance of the respective mails of the two offices are forbidden to take charge of any letter not included in their mail bags, with the exception, however, of Government despatches. They must take care that no letters are conveyed illegally by their crews or passengers, and must give information in the proper quarter of any breach of the laws which may be committed in that respect.

ARTICLE XIII.—In case of war between the two nations, the mail packets shall continue their navigation without impediment or molestation, until a notification is made on the part of either of the two Governments that the service is to be discontinued, in which case they shall be permitted to return freely, and under special protection, to the port in Belgium where they were fitted out.

ARTICLE XIV.—The British Government engages to pay annually to the Belgian Government, in consideration of the advantages which it derives from the double daily packet service between Ostend and Dover, viz.: 1. For the night service, the sum of four thousand pounds sterling; and 2. For the day service the sum of five hundred pounds sterling. These sums shall be paid quarterly to the Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of His Majesty the King of the Belgians at the Court of Her Britannic Majesty. It is understood that the British Government shall be at liberty to terminate such payment on giving to the Belgian Government a notice of at least six months; and that even without such notice, the payment of either or both of the above-mentioned sums shall be lawfully discontinued at any time that the Belgian Government should cease to perform either a portion or the whole of the service.

ARTICLE XV.—The two Governments engage to cause to be conveyed, by the means which the respective post-offices employ for their own business, the closed mails which one of the offices may wish to exchange, through the medium of the other office, with countries which are not parties to the General Postal Union. The one of the two offices on whose account this conveyance shall take place, shall pay to the office performing this service, in consideration of the distance traversed beyond the limits of the union, rates which shall be determined by mutual agreement between them, and which shall not exceed the rates to be determined for the despatch of correspondence in open mails, in conformity with Article XI. of the Treaty of Berne, of the 9th Oct. 1874.

ARTICLE XVI.—In order to secure the whole of the receipts upon the correspondence passing between the two countries, the British and Belgian Governments engage to prevent by every possible means the said correspondence being sent by any other way than by their respective posts.

ARTICLE XVII.—The post-offices of Great Britain and Belgium shall determine by mutual agreement, in accordance with the conditions laid down in the Treaty of Berne of the 9th Oct. 1874, the matters of detail connected with the execution of the present Convention, as well as all other arrangements deemed necessary for regulating the postal regulations between the two countries.

ARTICLE XVIII.—The present Convention which abrogates and takes the place of all previous postal arrangements concluded between Great Britain and Belgium, with the exception of those relating to post-office money-orders, shall come into force immediately after the exchange of the ratifications. It is concluded for an indefinite period, each party reserving to itself the right to terminate it at any time upon giving at least twelve months' notice to the other party of its intention in this respect.

ARTICLE XIX.—The present Convention shall be ratified, and the ratifications shall be exchanged at London as soon as possible. In witness whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the present Convention, and have affixed thereto the seal of their arms. Done in duplicate, at London, the seventeenth day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-six.

(L.S.) SOLVYNS.

The plaintiffs produced, as evidence in the case, the following documents.

1. An affidavit of John Simonds, owner of the Daring, verifying the allegations in the statement of claim.

2. An affidavit of George Henry Gregory, as follows:

1. That I did, on the 8th day of February 1879, attend at the office of the Continental Daily Parcels Express, to make inquiries as to the conveyance of goods and merchandise from London to Belgium, viâ Dover and Ostend by the mail boats, and in reply to my inquiries, I was handed the exhibit, marked with the letter "A," hereunto annexed. The exhibit referred to is a sort of time and charge table relative to the conveyance by the Government mail packets viâ Dover, Ostend and Calais of samples of every description, papers, plans, books, articles for private use, luggage, and packages of all kinds up to 200lbs. weight between England and the Continent, viz., France, Belgium, &c.

2. By a reference to paragraph 5 thereof, it appears that the said Continental Daily Parcels Express has been in existence for the last thirty years, and further, that they ship their goods to Belgium by the mail boat, viâ Ostend. I asked the gentlemen in the office of the said Continental Daily Parcels Express, whether there was any other means by which they sent to Belgium, and the reply was "No, we can only ship by the mail boats, viâ Dover and Ostend."

3. By reference to page 9 of the exhibit "A," it appears there is no limit as to size or weight of the parcels that are so shipped, the printed tariffs on the said page going up to 200lbs., but stating as to the rate generally, as well as to the special rates to Ostend alone, an additional charge is made for every 10lbs., according to the tariff.

The exhibit "A" was a small paper book of charges to be made by the company for the conveyance of parcels to various places on the continent of Europe, viâ Dover and Ostend.

3. An affidavit of Eugene Carder, solicitor, of Dover, of which the material part was as follows:

2. That I did, on the 10th and 11th days of January 1879, search in the records at the offices of H. M. Customs in Dover, for the dates and particulars of the voyages of the said vessel Parlement Belge made between the ports of Ostend and Dover, between the 1st day of January and the 31st day of March 1878.

7. The exhibit, marked "A," hereto annexed, is a certified extract from the books of H. M. Customs, in Dover, and is signed by the local collector of Customs.

On 14th Feb. vessel returned to harbour again, in consequence of a collision, left Dover 16th Feb. for Ostend in ballast.

Custom House, Dover, 11th Jan. 1879. J. M. Clarke, Col., Deputy of the Bill of Entr .

Feb. 25.—Webster, Q.C., Dr. W. G. F. Phillimore, and Johnstone for the plaintiffs in support of the motion.

Webster, Q.C.—The mode in which the Crown has appeared is irregular; an appearance by the Attorney-General by information and protest is not the practice of this court. A petition on protest should have been filed according to the ancient practice of the Court of Admiralty, which is not altered by the Judicature Acts in this respect:

The Vivar, 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 308; 2 P. Div. 29; 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 782.

But we don't wish to press a technical objection, and shall consider it as a petition on protest. We are in order to move for judgment; all the steps necessary to entitle us to judgment by default have been taken, and it is for the Crown to show any reason why the vessel should not be treated in the ordinary way. She had cleared from the Custom-house at Dover with cargo in the ordinary way. It is shown by the affidavits that the Continental Daily Parcels Express was in the habit of forwarding goods by her and her consorts, and by the tariff issued by that company it appears that they forward parcels up, at least, to 200lbs. weight, and without any limit to value. It cannot be said that a vessel employed in such a traffic as this, for profit and freight, is not carrying merchandise. Assuming, for the purpose of argument, that the statements in the information and protest are correct, there is nothing to show that the Convention set up is valid to bind British subjects, and to preclude them from having recourse to legal means to establish their rights. A convention or treaty which in any way interferes with the common law rights of a subject must be confirmed by Parliament. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Supposing there were no convention at all, but the vessel carried the flag and crew of a man-of-war, do you contend that she would be liable to civil process?] This vessel is by necessary implication not a vessel of war, she claims to be exempt as a vessel of war under the treaty; to enable her to do so, something more is necessary than the mere fiat of the executive. An Act of the Legislature is necessary:

Wheaton's International Law by Lawrence, 2nd ed. (1863), p. 455;
Mahon's Hist. of Eng., p. 49;
Halleck's International Law, ed. 1878, vol. 1, s. 229.

[Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Do the authorities show more than that a treaty, whilst unconfirmed by Parliament, cannot contravene an Act of Parliament?] The statute law cannot stand on a higher footing in this respect than the common law, and therefore a treaty unconfirmed by Parliament cannot deprive a subject of his common law or statutable rights:

Blackstone, bk. 4, pt. 1, ch. 6 passim;
Vattel, bk 2, ch. 12, sect. 154;
D. D. Field, International Code, tit. 4, ch. 15, sect. 192, p. 80.

[Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Does not the ratification of the Legislature referred to by the last-mentioned authority, the work being that of an American author, mean the ratification by the home authority, whatever that may be, of the act of their ambassador?] That does not seem to be the case. Speech by Mr. Gladstone, Aug. 10, 1870. He says (Hansard's Parl. Debates, ser. 3, vol. 100, c. 111, p. 1790) that the Legislature can give power to the Crown to make such treaties, therefore without the Act of the Legislature, either previous or subsequent to the treaty, the Crown has no such power. The Treaty of Berne, which is referred to in the preamble to this Convention, was confirmed by Act of Legislature (38 Vict. c. 22), and that is a treaty on precisely the same subject, i.e., the International Postal Regulations. Extradition treaties, too, have always to be confirmed by Parliament. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Does it not make a great difference that those treaties of necessity affect the liberty of the subject?] The treaty as to the Newfoundland Fisheries was confirmed by Act of Parliament (35 & 36 Vict. c. 45), and so also were the treaties as to International Copyright (1 & 2 Vict. c. 59; 7 Vict. c. 12). The fact that all these various international rights required the confirmation of Parliament before the treaties affecting them became valid throws the onus of proof on the Crown to show why this particular convention should be valid without it. But the present jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty is regulated by statute, and includes "all claims and demands whatsoever . . . . for . . . . damage received by any ship or sea-going vessel" (3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6), and also "any claim for damage done by any ship" (24 Vict. c. 10,, s. 7). These being statutable provisions, unless this vessel can show an exemption by statute, she is claiming an exemption under a treaty in contravention of a statute. There is no allegation in the information and protest, which, if proved, can oust the jurisdiction of this court to arrest the ship. The treaty or convention referred to in it only confers the privilege (Art. 6) conditionally on the vessel not carrying cargo (Art. 10). This vessel has broken the condition, and cannot therefore claim the privilege, Even a vessel of war carrying cargo would be liable to civil process:

The Charkieh, 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 121; L. Rep. 4 Ad. 59, p. 89 et seq.; 28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 513.

In the recent case of The Constitution (ante, p. 79) it was stated that the carriage of goods was not for freight, but under a special Act of the Legislature, empowering a vessel of war to be so employed in the service of the nation, but there is no such allegation here. This case is even stronger than that of The Charkieh (ubi sup.), because it is not the waiver of a right, but the contravention of the condition on which a privilege was granted. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Art. 10. apparently contemplates the employment of the vessel as a merchant vessel to some extent, as it expressly permits the carriage of passengers' luggage, carriages, and horses.] Yes, but the enumeration of those particular articles make the case all the stronger against her when she carries other articles.

Dr. W. G. F. Phillimore on the same side.—The plaintiffs claim the ordinary common law and statute rights of subjects against the property and persons of those who injure them within the realm; to exempt the ship from this ordinary process, she must prove that she is within some special or general legal exemption. We are not now asking for process out of the Admiralty court; this court prior to the Judicature Acts was a Prerogative Court, and had special relations to the Crown, which might have affected the question; but we come to this court as a branch of the High Court of Justice, and claim by the process peculiar to this division an arrest of the res, our statutory remedy for a wrong committed against us in the body of a county. The statutes giving this remedy (3 & 4 Vict. c. 68, s. 6, and 24 Vict, c. 10, s. 7) do not apply to vessels of war, because by international law, well recognised at the time the statutes were passed, they were exempt from civil process, and if exempt by international law, they were so by common law (Stephen's Blackstone, 4th ed. vol. 4. p. 282); but a vessel circumstanced as the Parlement Belge is is not so exempt by international law, and the sovereign of a constitutional country cannot ipso motu so construct international law as to violate or infringe upon the rights of his subjects at common law. The decision in The Schooner Exchange v. McFadden (7 Cranch, U. S. Supreme Court Rep. 116) is based on the distinction that that vessel was an "armed" vessel. The doctrine laid down in The Charkieh (2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 121; L. Rep. 4 A. & E. 59; 28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 513), that the goods of a sovereign engaged in trade are not exempt from proceedings in rem is exactly in point. There is a difference recognised by the law of this country between vessels of war and other vessels in the public service:

The Cybele, 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 533; 37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 774, note;
The Helen, 3 C. Rob. 224;
The Bellona, Edw. 63.

If this vessel is not within the exemption allowed to vessels of war, is she exempt on the ground that the property of a sovereign quâ sovereign is free from process? In Morgan v. Larivière (L. Rep. 7 H. L. 423; 32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 41) the Lord Chancellor (Lord Cairns) says: "The court having a trust fund under its control might well proceed to administer that fund, even although a foreign Government might be interested in it, and might not be before the court or subject to the jurisdiction of the court. The constitutional power of the Crown to make treaties is limited to those at the termination of war, and is an incident of the right to declare war and make peace. Any other treaty interfering with private rights is ultra vires so far as it infringes upon them. There is no doubt that some treaties, i.e., those of extradition, require confirmation of Parliament before they became operative; and if those affecting the liberty of a subject, why not those affecting what is next in value to him, his property? The Convention, should it be decided that its words deprive a subject of his right of action, deprives him of a valuable right and a valuable property. Her Majesty has authority by Order in Council to allow to foreign ships certain privileges granted to British ships as to measurement for dues; but, inasmuch as the granting of such privileges indirectly affected the rights and privileges of subjects, it was necessary to grant that authority to the Crown by statute, as also in cases of life salvage for foreign ships out of the jurisdiction of this country (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, ss. 59, 60). Before a treaty could be made with the United States of America, it was necessary to get an Act of Parliament (22 Geo. 3, c. 46) [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—In that case authority was required to allow the Crown to part with a portion of British territory,] Yes; but as a treaty at the end of war it would appear to come within the general prerogative of the Crown, and therefore that general prerogative is limited to initiating a treaty, but the treaty itself is only valid when confirmed. The fact that the Conventions as to international copyright have been authorised by Parliament shows that those conventions, unless authorised by the Legislature, would not have been recognised by the courts of law in this country. So in the case of the fishing convention with France (31 & 32 Vict. c. 45, title, ss. 6, 66), the latter section is on a matter almost exactly similar to this Convention in one respect, viz., that under certain circumstances the fishing boats should be exempted from dues, an exemption purporting to be granted by Art. 6 of this convention to these packets. This grant of an exemption is not within the prerogative of the Crown at all. "The King cannot grant an exemption from the jurisdiction of any court if he does not erect another jurisdiction of the like nature, for that would be a failure of justice:"

2 Rol. 281 c. 45;
Comyn's Dig. tit. Prerogative p. 443, D. 33.

A power to grant exemption by treaty cannot be put on a higher footing than a direct grant by the Crown, but the rule of law on that point is that "the King cannot grant to any that he shall not be impleaded, and if he makes such grant it will be void" (Viner's Abridgment, tit. "Prerogative of the King," T. 6): and "if a man is indebted to me, and the King grants to him that I shall not have action against him, it is void:" (Ib. T. 7.) But even assuming the treaty itself not to be ultra vires, can the vessel claim an exemption from civil process under it? The meaning of Art. 6 is only that the vessel shall be free from public process, not from private suit; "seizure" is the ordinary word used in policies of insurance, and does not mean seizure by the officer of a court at the suit of an individual, but "seizure" by the Government in case of hostilities, actual or imminent. "Detention" and "embargo" are also well understood expressions relating to the same state of affairs, and "arrêt de prince," an expression which, for want of an exact English equivalent, remains untranslated in the English version of the treaty, is defined by Cussy to be nearly the same thing as "embargo." "L'arret de prince ou par ordre de Puissance, autrement dit l'embargo, est l'obstacle qu'un souverain apporte au depart de tous ou de quelquesuns de navires qui se trouvent dans les ports de sa domination, sans distinguer s'ils appartiennent à ses sujets ou à des étrangers:" (Cussy, "Phases et Causes Célebres du Droit Maritime des Nations," vol. 1 L. 1, titre 2, s. 49, p. 120.) And again: "L'arret de prince peutêtre exécuté en pleine mer par les vaisseauz de guerre du souverain qui l'a prononcé; l'arrestation, en pareil cas, d'un navire étranger n'est point une capture semblable à celle qui est faite par des bâtiments armés en course, en temps de guerre; elle n'et pas hostile, elle est uniquement comminatoire; mais elle peut, il faut le reconnaitre, de même que l'embargo lui même pratiqué dans les ports conduire à des hostilities:" (Ib. p. 121.) [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The special expressions no doubt relate to a state of war, or a state bordering on it, but does that condition limit the general expression "by any authority whatever?"] The general expression can only be taken to mean generally all the causes individually mentioned afterwards, and others of a like nature. Treaties are not drawn with the precision of deeds; they must be interpreted with this consideration in mind, and therefore this treaty, if valid at all, must be considered only as granting such privileges, ceremonial and others, as the Crown can grant, and not as interfering with the private rights of subjects. The grant of the privilege is at all events a conditional grant, and the grantee cannot claim under an instrument at the same time that he has broken the condition of the instrument.

The Solicitor-General (Sir H. Giffard), the Admiralty Advocate (Dr. Deane, Q.C.), and Bowen, for the Crown.

The Solicitor-General.—It would probably be sufficient for the Crown to rest entirely in this case on general public grounds, but I will not rely on what is in some respects an artificial hypothesis. These vessels are not ordinary traders; they carry certain continental parcels, but not general merchandise. There is nothing to show that the provisions of Art. 10 have been infringed; the vessels are to be allowed to carry "small parcels, the weight of which shall be limited by mutual agreement between the two offices;" no such mutual agreement has yet been come to, and therefore, pending any regulation being made, the vessels are entitled to carry such parcels as are forwarded by the Continental Daily Parcels Express. Art. 6 grants in the most general way possible all the privileges of vessels of war. The article must be taken in its entirety, and the special provision must not be held to control the general ones. But even supposing there has been a breach of the provisions of Art. 10, the analogy that the plaintiffs would draw between such an infringement of an article of a treaty and of a condition in a contract is incorrect. Even between individuals, it is not every breach of a contract that will vitiate a bargain. Supposing there has been a breach of the treaty of which the Government may complain, how can that affect the rights and liabilities of private individuals? The treaty itself is not void by reason of a breach; it might be voidable by proper notice on the part of the contracting powers; but it cannot, in default of a special provision which does not exist here, become ipso facto void. There can be no doubt, as a matter of constitutional law; that the treaty-making power is in the Crown, how far ipso motu depends on other considerations. How far a treaty made by the Crown, and without any further confirmation, binds a subject, may be a matter for discussion, but not as to the validity of the treaty itself. The remedy of the subject whose rights are invaded by a treaty may be against the Crown. The Extradition Treaties are not in point; it is necessary to get the sanction of Parliament for them, or else every person sought to be surrendered could take advantage of the Habeas Corpus Act. The position of the court is not altered by the Judicature Acts. The exemption of sovereigns and their property is not the creature of statute law, but is a principle of the common law. The statute of Anne (7 Anne, c. 12) is declaratory of the common law:

Triquet and others v. Bath, 1 Taunton 107.

The case of The Charkieh (ubi sup.) is not in point; the decision there was based on the ground that the Khedive of Egypt was not a sovereign prince, and that therefore his property was not privileged from process. In The Exchange (ubi sup.), p. 144, the distinction is clearly marked: "But in all respects different is the situation of a public armed ship. . . . . The implied licence, therefore, under which such a vessel enters a friendly port may reasonably be construed, and it seems to the court ought to be construed, as containing an exemption from the jurisdiction of the sovereign in whose territory she claims the rites of hospitality." There is no right of suit given ab initio against the public ships of a foreign country.

The Admiralty Advocate (Dr. Deane, Q.C.) on the same side.—The distinction which it is endeavoured to make between armed and unarmed public ships is illusory:

The Prins Frederic, 2 Dods, 451.

A yacht of the sovereign would be unarmed, but it could not be contended that on that account she was not entitled to be treated as a public vessel of war. Art. 6 expressly says that those ships "shall be vessels belonging to Government or freighted by order of Government." They must therefore be public vessels. The Constitution (ubi sup.) was not armed, but she was held to be a public vessel, and entitled to the immunities of such vessels. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE:—If the Government had power to make this Convention, I have no doubt on the matter. The question appears to me to be whether they had the power.] That is determined by the fundamental laws of the country, which in this country, as in most other monarchies, vest the treaty-making power in the sovereign (Halleck International Law, by Baker, vol. 1, p. 229). On grounds of public convenience the court will not allow the warrant to issue.

C. Bowen on the same side.—There is no precedent in the history of this or any other country for subjecting a vessel specially invited by the Crown into our ports to civil process. A treaty is not a contract, the conditions of which can be subjected to courts of law; the parties to it are beyond the reach of the law. The treaty-making power of the Crown is absolute. The provisions of a treaty, however, may or may not bind the subject; some do so proprio vigore, others require the sanction of Parliament; which treaties fall into which category can only be ascertained by examining each class of treaty. The language which is appropriate enough in discussions on municipal law is out of place in questions of international law. A treaty is not void, but at most voidable by reason of a breach:

1 Halleck International Law, 268;
1 Kent's Comm. 175.

Even in municipal law, where the condition of a patent is broken, a third party cannot take advantage of the breach until the patent itself is revoked by the Crown. It is, however, no doubt competent to the court to consider the stipulations of a treaty. But, as a principle of law, applying to the interpretation of Art. 6, acts of state determining the diplomatic status of foreign persons and things are binding on the courts of the country of that state; unless the central authority in the state can authoritatively say what that status is, it must remain wholly undetermined. The Judicature Acts have made no difference in this respect; they, like every other statute, must be read Salvo jure regis, and therefore, if it was competent to the crown, before the statute, to make such regulations as this, exempting these vessels from process out of this court, it is still competent to it to do so. The limitation of the prerogative of the Crown, referred to in Viner's Abridgement (ubi sup.), relate only to rights of suit already existing; i.e., rights between subjects. The same principle of common law which says that those who commit wrongs, within the jurisdiction, against others shall be subject to punishment says also, that ambassadors and public ships shall not be subject to punishment, and therefore the right of suit is not a common law right against all ships. It is evident that treaties conferring any diplomatic status upon aliens do not require to be confirmed by the Legislature, because the treaties themselves are of record: "All leagues and safe conducts are, or ought to be, of record; that is, they ought to be enrolled in the Chancery, to the end the subject may know who be in amity with the King, and who be not; who be enemies, and can have no action here; and who in league and may have action personal here" (4 Coke Inst. 126, ed. 1809, p. 152); and also that the Crown alone is the competent authority to make such treaties, for, "with regard to foreign concerns, the sovereign is the delegate or representative of his people," for otherwise "foreign potentates . . . . might scruple to enter into any engagement that must afterwards be revised and ratified by a popular assembly. What is done by the royal authority, with regard to foreign powers, is the act of the whole nation:" (Stephen's Blackstone, 7 ed. vol. 2, bk. 4, p. 1, ch. 6, p. 490.) No doubt in any country the municipal law may limit this sovereign or supreme executive power, but that has never been done in this country. There is no doubt that the Sovereign of Belgium is recognised as an independent sovereign prince. There can be no doubt as to the status of Belgium and its sovereign, and this recognition is an act of state (Wheaton Inter. Law by Lawrence, 2nd ed. part 1, ch. 2, p. 45), and therefore the court must take judicial notice of this status:

The City of Berne in Switzerland v. The Bank of England 9 Ves. 347, and note thereto as to the soi disant Columbian Government.
The Columbian Government v. Rothschild, 1 Sim. 94;
The United States of America v. Wagner, L. Rep. 2 Ch. App. 582; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 86; Cherokee Nation v. State of Georgia, 5 Peters (Amer.) Rep. p. 1.

Again, the recognition of the status of belligerents is an act of state:

Wheaton's International Law, by Lawrence, 2 edit. pt. 1, ch. 2, p. 40.

The decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in prize causes in the late civil war show that a declaration of the President is conclusive on the courts of law there, and also that the Queen's proclamation was an estoppel on British subjects. So also it has been always considered an act of state to decide what articles—ancipitis usus — are in time of war contraband. The Declaration of Paris was never submitted to Parliament, it is an act of state. So again a declaration of a blockade and licences to trade with an enemy are acts of state; the status of an ambassador which the Crown allows after receiving his letters of credit addressed to itself is another instance. So the treating of Belgian Government vessels as vessels of war are treated, is an act of state. But apart altogether from the treaty, as the immunity of an ambassador extends to those of his goods which pertain to his functions, so the immunity of a foreign sovereign extends to his goods, and, with regard to his ships, cannot depend on the accident of their being armed or unarmed. The not carrying of cargo is not a condition precedent to the grant of the privilege, and in these matters there can be no waiver of a right. The privilege is the privilege of Government vessels:

Briggs v. The Light Boats, 11 Allen, Mass. Amer. Rep.

Webster, Q.C. in reply.—I do not know if the Crown in this case claims any right of reply over.

The Solicitor-General intimated to the court his intention of claiming the privilege of the Crown to reply over.

Webster, Q.C.—The Crown have no right to reply over in this case. The action is not against the Crown; the writ was served on the ship, and the action is against her and her owners. The Crown only intervenes, and should have done so by petition on protest. The Crown, not being a party to the suit, has no special right of reply. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—In cases such as these it has always been the practice of this court to allow the Crown to appear and be heard, and to give them all the rights exercised by the Crown in cases where they are parties.] It is the first time that a treaty unconfirmed by Parliament has infringed the liberty of a British subject. As between English subjects and foreign vessels the character of the ship depends on its being armed or not armed. It may be that no right of action exists against an unarmed ship of our own Government on account of different considerations, but the whole reading of the cases shows that the exterritoriality is only accorded to foreign armed ships: (The Exchange, ubi sup.) The case of Briggs v. The Light Boats (ubi sup.) was one of an American citizen suing the Government vessel of his own nationality, and is therefore not in point. In The Exchange (p. 141) it is pointed out by the court that by treaty the ports of all civilized countries are open to the private ships of other countries when driven in by distress; but could it be contended that it was competent to the Government to deprive its subjects of right of action against ships so driven in? And again, the distinction between the private ships or property of a foreign sovereign and the public armed vessels of the nation of which he is the sovereign is drawn (p. 145), in referring to the case of the Spanish war ships arrested by a subject of the States General, for a debt alleged to be due from the King of Spain, and which ships were released either by judicial sentence or authority of the State. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Might not there be a case of a vessel used for purposes of war and yet not armed?] Certainly; but, if she was regularly commissioned as a vessel of war, she would be to all intents and purposes a portion of the military marine of her country, and therefore, by the reasoning of all the cases on that point, as exempt from jurisdiction as if she were armed. But the vessel is not used for war purposes, and is not commissioned as a vessel of war. The mere carrying of a pennon, even by licence of its own Government, is not sufficient to clothe a vessel with the character of a man-of-war. The Charkieh (ubi sup.) carried the flag and pennant, but was not exempt. It is contended that the Crown has power to make treaties, and it depends on their provisions whether they require confirmation or not; even if that is so, it is plain that the treaty or convention is one of those which do require confirmation. On the face of it it is declared to be a "sequel" to the General Postal Treaty concluded at Berne, and that treaty had to be confirmed by Parliament (38 Vict. c. 22). That statute declares that the Treaty of Berne could not "be carried into effect except by the authority of Parliament," and this Convention contains provisions similar to those of the Treaty of Berne.

The Solicitor-General (Sir H. Giffard) replied over on behalf of the Crown.—It is no doubt competent to the courts of law in this country to consider whether the acts of the Crown are ultra vires or not. But there is nothing done here beyond the rights of the Crown. The fact of a vessel being armed is only one of several indicia of her public character:

Wheaton Internat. Law, by Lawrence, 2nd edit. p. 198.

In commenting on that case of The Exchange (ubi sup.) in the subsequent case of The Santissima Trinidad (7 Wheaton Amer. Rep. 283), Story, J. all along draws the distinction between public and private vessels, not using the word "armed" as a necessary condition for the public vessel claiming exterritoriality. The trading by the Parlement Belge is not a private trading by the King of the Belgians for his own benefit, but part of the public national employment of the vessel for the benefit of the state. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—It is noticeable that the immunity purporting to be granted by the Convention is only an immunity in port, and not on the high seas.] On the high seas it would not be necessary; for a vessel carrying the flag and pennant of a public vessel would be notice to everyone that she was such a public vessel. The crown has a right to remit port dues because they are originally a portion of the royal revenue, and can be granted to whom it will:

Chitty, Prerogative of the Crown. p. 174.

In none of the treaties to which reference has been made has there been any question of the common law rights of the subject. They conferred rights on certain persons, and therefore required to be incorporated formally in the statute law. Admitting that the Crown cannot grant to a person not to be sued, yet, if the Crown accepts a debtor to a subject as ambassador, the right to sue him for the debt is suspended so long as he remains ambassador. By parity of reasoning the same thing applies to ships. It is a part of the law, independent of any act of state, that an ambassador cannot be sued, and it is part of the law that a public ship cannot be subjected to process. It is for the Crown to say who is or who is not an ambassador, and what is or is not a public ship. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The Convention stipulates for the payment of a certain subsidy; how is the money for that payment obtained?] The money would be voted in the estimates like all other supplies, and so confirmed by Parliament. Moreover, the trading does not preclude the claim of a public character in this vessel, inasmuch as the licence to trade under the treaty is a portion of the pecuniary consideration granted to the Belgian Government for the employment of the ship.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 15.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—In this case questions of international and public law of the gravest importance have been raised. The court has to acknowledge the great assistance which it has derived from the learned and able arguments of counsel, especially valuable in a case which is, I believe, primæ impressionis, and which must be decided upon general principles and analogies of law rather than upon any direct precedent.

On the 16th Feb. 1878 the owners of the steam-tug Daring served a writ on board the steamship Parlement Belge against the owners of that vessel and her freight, in which they claimed the sum of 3,500*l.* for damage arising out of a collision which occurred between that vessel and the steam tug Daring on the 14th Feb. 1878 off Dover. The defendants put in no appearance, and took no steps whatever; the plaintiffs have proceeded by default, and taken the usual and proper course, and the case being ripe for judgment, the plaintiffs, on the 25th Jan. in this year, gave notice that, on the 4th Feb., the court would be moved to direct judgment with costs to be entered for them in respect of the damages so claimed, and that the usual order might be made of reference to the registrar and merchants, and that a warrant should issue—the action being in rem—against the steamship Parlement Belge. Having looked at the papers and pleadings, I perceived that the arrest of the ship and the judgment which were prayed might affect the prerogative of the Crown and its relations with a foreign State; I therefore directed that notice should be given to the law officers in order that they might have an opportunity, if they thought fit, of showing cause against the prayer of the plaintiffs. The Attorney-General has appeared and filed what is called an information and protest, which I will now read. [His Lordship here read the information and protest set out above and proceeded:] I have had the advantage of an argument from the Solicitor-General on the whole case. The protest of the Attorney-General raises a question of constitutional law, and a question of international law, both of great moment, and which I will endeavour to consider separately.

By the protest it is in substance contended that the steamship Parlement Belge is not answerable to the process of this court, (1) On the ground that she is the property of the King of the Belgians, and at the time of the collision was controlled and employed by him; (2) That Her Majesty the Queen, by a convention with the King of the Belgians, has placed this packet boat in the category of a public ship of war. I will endeavour to deal with these questions in the order in which I have stated them, though perhaps they cannot be kept quite distinct.

It is expedient to make a preliminary observation which is important in its bearing upon one, if not both, of the questions. The collision in this case took place in Dover Harbour; that is, within the body of a county, and therefore previously to the year 1840 the court would have had no jurisdiction in the matter; but by the joint operation of the statutes 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, and 24 Vict. c. 10, the court was given a jurisdiction both in rem and in personam in cases where the collision happened in a harbour, as well as when upon the high seas. It follows, therefore, that the plaintiffs in this suit have a statutable right of action against the Parlement Belge, unless that vessel be of that privileged class which are not amenable to a court of law. The burden of proving that she does belong to this class lies upon the defendants, more especially as it appears from the papers before me that she was engaged in carrying on commerce, howsoever limited in its nature, at the time of the collision.

I turn now to the consideration of the first question raised in the protest. I had occasion to consider most, if not all, of the authorities upon the point in the case of The Charkieh (2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 121; L. Rep. 4 Ad. & Ecc. 59; 28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 513). I desire to state at once that, in my opinion, every public ship of war belonging to a state at amity with Her Majesty is exempt from the jurisdiction of the court. This proposition I maintained in the recent case of The Constitution (ante, p. 79) and it has been laid down in a variety of cases adjudicated both in our courts and in those of the United States of North America. They will be found collected in The Charkieh (ubi sup.), and in the case decided in the Supreme Court of Massachusetts (Briggs and another v. Light Boats, 11 Allen (Mass.) Rep. 180), and it may be considered, notwithstanding certain dicta in the case of The Prins Frederic (2 Dod. 464), to be firmly rooted in the jurisprudence of both countries. It has been contended on the part of the Crown, not that the Parlement Belge is a ship of war in the general international sense of that word, but that she is a privileged mail packet the property of the crown of Belgium, carrying the Royal pennon and officered by the commissioned officers of the Royal Belgian navy. On the other hand it must be taken that she is not a public armed ship constituting a part of the military force of her nation, nor is she a vessel, so to speak, of pleasure belonging to the Crown, and on that ground perhaps by the comity of nations in the class of privileged ships. In the case of the Charkieh (ubi sup.) I said: "I am not prepared to deny that the private vessel—for instance, the yacht of the Sultan—though equipped for pleasure, and not for war, would be entitled by international comity operating, at least so long as it is not withdrawn by the State conceding it, as international law, to the same immunity as a ship of war; though dicta to the contrary may be found in the writings of some jurists." Since that time I have not found reason to alter the opinion I then expressed. The especial duty—to borrow the terms of the treaty to which I will presently advert—is the conveyance of the mails. But, though such be the especial duty of the packet, it is by no means its sole occupation. Mr. Gregory has made an affidavit in the following words. [His Lordship here read the affidavit set out above and continued:] The Parlement Belge, it would appear, is neither a public ship of war nor a private vessel of pleasure belonging to the Crown of Belgium. Nor is she a public ship sent by the Government on an exploring expedition, like those employed in the Arctic expeditions, all of which ships—belonging to England—were, it should be observed, regularly commissioned as ships of war. She is a packet, conveying certain mails, and carrying on a considerable commerce, officered, as I have said, by Belgian officers, and flying the Belgian pennon. Can such a vessel so employed be entitled to the privileges of a public ship of war?

The analogy between the immunity of the ambassador and the ship of war is obvious. It has been holden by high authorities, both in this and other countries, that an ambassador may lose his privileges by engaging in commerce. Indeed, Lord Campbell was of opinion that in such a case "all his goods unconnected with his diplomatic functions may be arrested to force him to appear, and may afterwards, while he continues ambassador, be taken in execution on the judgment:" (The Magdalena Steam Navigation Company v. Martin, 2 E. & E. 94, 114, cited in The Charkieh, ubi sup.) "A distinction," says Story, J., "has been often taken by writers on public law as to the exemption of certain things from all private claims; as, for example, things devoted to sacred, religious, and public purposes, things extra commercium et quorum non est commercium. That distinction might well apply to property like public ships of war, held by the sovereign jure coronæ, and not be applicable to the common property of the sovereign of a commercial character, or engaged in the common business of commerce:" (United States v. Wilder, 3 Sumner (U.S.) Rep. 308, also cited in The Charkieh, ubi sup.) In The Santissima Trinidad (7 Wheaton (Amer.) Reps. 283), Story, J. said: "The Commission, therefore, of a public ship, when duly authenticated, so far at least as foreign courts are concerned, imports absolute verity, and the title is not examinable. The property"—it was a prize case—"must be taken to be duly acquired, and cannot be controverted. This has been the settled practice between nations, and it is a rule founded in public convenience and policy, and cannot be broken in upon, without endangering the peace and repose, as well of neutral as of belligerent sovereigns. The commission in the present case is not expressed in the most unequivocal terms; but its fair purport and interpretation must be deemed to apply to a public ship of the Government." Looking to the character of the suit, and the other passages in the judgment, it seems to me clear that by the expression "public ship of the Government," he meant a ship of war, and not any vessel employed by the Government. But even if the term could be treated as more comprehensive, and as including public ships such as I have referred to, sent by the Government on exploring expeditions, it would not include vessels engaged in commerce, and whose owner is, to use the expression of Bynkershoek (De Leg. Mercatore, ed. 1730 vol. 6 p. 500) "strenue mercatorem agens."

Upon the whole, I am of opinion that neither upon principle, precedent, nor analogy of general international law, should I be warranted in considering the Parlement Belge as belonging to the category of public vessels which are exempt from process of law and all private claims.

I now approach the consideration of the second question, namely, whether the Convention between Her Majesty and the King of the Belgians, ratified 24th March 1876, does so far as this country is concerned, place the Parlement Belge while in British ports in the category of a public ship of war and exempt from the process of an English court. I may observe in passing, that the very fact that this packet is in terms given by the Convention the privileges of a ship of war in British ports, and there only, tends to show that she had not such privileges by general international law, and that a convention was deemed necessary to confer them.

It is admitted that this Convention has not been confirmed by any statute, but it has been contended on the part of the Crown, both that it was competent to Her Majesty to make the Convention, and also to put its provisions into operation without the confirmation of them by Parliament. The plaintiffs admit the former, but deny the latter of these propositions. The power of the Crown to make treaties with foreign states is indisputable. Passing by other authorities, I will cite the language of Blackstone, who was not disinclined to maintain the prerogative of the Crown: "It is," he says, "also the King's prerogative to make treaties, leagues, and alliances, with foreign states and princes, for it is by the laws of nations essential to the goodness of a league that it is made by the sovereign power, and that it is binding upon the whole community; and in England the sovereign power, quod hoc, is vested in the person of the King. Whatever contracts therefore he engages in, no other power in the kingdom can legally delay, resist, or annul; and yet lest this plenitude of authority should be abused to the detriment of the public, the constitution (as was treated before) hath here interposed a check by the means of parliamentary impeachment for the punishment of such ministers as from criminal motives advise or conclude any treaty which shall afterwards be judged to derogate from the honour and interest of the nation:" (Blackstone's Comm., ed. 1844, vol. 1, ch. 8, s. 2, p. 256.) The learned writer, however, was certainly aware that this general proposition must receive some modification and restraint besides that which he has mentioned. Blackstone must have known very well that there was a class of treaties, the provisions of which were inoperative without the confirmation of the Legislature; while there were others which operated without such confirmation. The strongest instance of the latter, perhaps, which could be cited, is the Declaration of Paris in 1856, by which the Crown, in the exercise of its prerogative, deprived this country of belligerent rights which very high authorities in the state and in the law had considered to be of vital importance to it. But this Declaration did not affect the private rights of the subject, and the question before me is whether this treaty does affect private rights, and therefore require the sanction of the Legislature? The authority of Chancellor Kent was relied on. That learned writer observes that, "Treaties of peace, when made by the competent power, are obligatory upon the whole nation. If the treaty requires the payment of money to carry it into effect and the money cannot be raised but by an Act of the Legislature, the treaty is morally obligatory upon the Legislature to pass the law, and to refuse it would be a breach of public faith:" (Kent's Comm. ed. 12, 1872, vol. 1, p. 166.) And he further observes, "There can be no doubt that the power competent to bind the nation by treaty may alienate the public domain and property by treaty:" (1b. 167.) He refers to the case of The United States v. The Schooner Peggy (1 Cranch. Amer. 103), decided by the Supreme American Court. That was a case of prize capture, in which the vessel had been condemned, but subsequently a treaty had been made between France and the United States, by the terms of which the prize among others was restored to its original owners. The Court of Appeal in that case held the treaty to be binding upon it, and indeed said: "That where a treaty is the law of the land and as such affects the rights of parties litigating in court, that treaty as much binds those rights and is as much to be regarded by the court as an Act of Congress;" (Ib. 110.) But the sentence in the case was founded upon the power of the President with the consent of the Senate to make a treaty affecting the rights of a captor in time of war, and the judgment was given upon that point. The Court said: "It is true that in mere private causes between individuals a court will and ought to struggle hard against a construction which will by a retrospective operation affect the rights of parties; but in great national concerns, where individual rights acquired by war are sacrificed for national purposes, the contract making the sacrifice ought always to receive a construction conforming to its manifest import; and if the nation has given up the vested rights of its citizens it is not for the court, but for the Government, to consider whether it be a case proper for compensation:" (Ib.) The whole sentence is founded upon the right of the American executive with respect to "prize of war." The like question arose in England in the famous case of The Elsebe. In that case Lord Stowell said: "Prize is altogether a creature of the Crown, and no man has or can have any interest but what he takes as the mere gift of the Crown. Beyond the extent of that gift he has nothing. This is the principle of law on the subject, and founded on the wisest reasons. The right of making war and peace is exclusively in the Crown. The acquisitions of war belong to the Crown; and the disposal of those acquisitions may be of the utmost importance for the purposes of both war and peace:" (The Elsebe, 5 C. Rob. 181). Brougham, L.C., in the case of the booty captured by the army of the Deccan, referred to The Elsebe as undoubted law, observing that it was therein determined, "that when the Crown saw fit to restore the capture, the captors who had run the risk and suffered the loss, who had moreover borne the charge of bringing the prize into port, and the further costs of proceedings in the Admiralty to adjudication, and had even undergone additional expenses in contesting their claim upon appeal, were altogether without a remedy." Lord Brougham goes on to say: "The title of a party claiming prize must needs in all cases be the act of the Crown by which the royal pleasure to grant the prize shall have been signified to the subject. Whether, where that act has once been completed, and it distinctly appears that the Crown was minded to part with the property finally and irrevocably; whether, even in that case, the same paramount and transcendent power of the Crown might not enure to the effect of preserving to His Majesty the right of modifying or altogether revoking the grant, is a question which has never yet arisen, and which, when it does arise, will be found never to have been determined in the negative. But this, at all events, is clear, that when the Crown, by an act of grace and bounty, parts, for certain purposes and subject to certain modifications, with the property in prize, it by that act plainly signifies its intention that the prize shall continue subject to the power of the Crown as it was before the act being done:" (Alexander v. Duke of Wellington, 2 Russ. & Myl. 54.)

The judgment in the case of The Schooner Peggy (ubi sup.) does not establish the proposition that the Crown can dispose of the rights of a subject without the sanction of Parliament. A treaty may contain provisions which are ultra vires of the prerogative, in part valid and operative, and in part invalid and inoperative. A treaty is, indeed, not necessarily void by reason of the infraction of some of its conditions, though it may be voidable; and the validity of it cannot be challenged, speaking generally, by any private person. But a court of justice, when called upon to execute the provisions of a treaty, may, at the instance of the subject who is affected by them, examine whether those provisions are such as to be capable of legal enforcement, just as it may inquire into the validity of letters patent granted by the Crown (Long v. Bishop of Capetown, 1 Moore P. C. N. S., 411), and also into the validity of an Order in Council duly passed and gazetted: (Attorney-General v. Bishop of Manchester, L. Rep. 3 Eq. 346.)

There have been, not to go further back than during the reign of her present Majesty, various treaties confirmed by Parliament; and by statute, power has been given to the Crown by Order in Council to do certain things which it must be presumed without such order it could not have done; for instance, 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63 (A.D. 1862), empowers the Crown by Order in Council to make rules and regulations respecting collisions and salvage services relating to the ships of foreign states; 31 and 32 Vict. c. 45 (A.D. 1868), relating to a convention between France and England as to sea fisheries, and reciting that doubts had arisen whether part of the convention relating to exemption from dues had been confirmed by Parliament, proceeded to give such confirmation; 35 & 36 Vict. c. 45 (A.D. 1872), confirms the Treaty of Washington between the United States and England; and, as will presently be seen, the very treaty of which this Belgian treaty is a sequel was confirmed by statute. Some of these treaties confirmed relate to the payment of, and exemption from, dues in harbours. One more, and not an insignificant one, will presently be added; I mention this merely as illustrative of the position that certain treaties do require parliamentary confirmation. I now turn to the provisions of the treaty which have been relied upon in this case. In the preamble it is said that, "Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and His Majesty the King of the Belgians, being desirous of strengthening the friendly relations which unite the two countries, and wishing to regulate by special arrangements (forming a sequel to the general Postal Treaty concluded at Berne on the 9th Oct. 1874) the postal regulations between their respective offices, have named as their plenipotentiaries for this purpose" certain distinguished persons whose names are then mentioned. The Treaty of Berne referred to, and to which this Belgian Treaty of 1876 is "to form a sequel," being concluded in the year 1874, was specially confirmed by a statute passed in 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 22), the preamble of which is as follows: "Whereas under the Post Office Duties Act, 1840 to 1871, divers powers are given to the Treasury of fixing by warrant the rates of British, foreign, and colonial postage: and whereas by a treaty made at Berne on the 9th Oct. 1874, and detailed regulations made under it, various stipulations and regulations have been made with respect to the duties on postage and other matters connected with the exchange by post with foreign countries of letters, post cards, books, newspapers, and other printed papers, patterns of merchandise, and legal and commercial documents, and it goes on as follows: and whereas such treaty and regulations cannot be carried into effect except by the authority of Parliament, and it is expedient to give such authority, and to comprise in one Act the powers of the Treasury in relation to fixing the rates of postage, be it therefore enacted," &c. The statute then proceeds to enact a variety of provisions relating to the duties on postage and the post-office, and provides (sect. 2) for future arrangements with foreign countries with respect to the conveyance of postal packets and payments by the Treasury. This clause may perhaps suffice to render legally operative the clauses in the subsequent Belgian treaty relating to these particular matters. I find in that treaty a variety of enactments relating to the conveyance of mails between Great Britain and Belgium. By Article 10, it is provided that [His Lordship read Article 10 of the treaty (ubi sup.) and proceeded:] It is the 6th Article however, which has the most important bearing on this case, and which has been chiefly discussed at the bar; it is as follows [His Lordship read the article (ubi sup.), and proceeded:] With respect to the interpretation of the last clause of this article, it was agreed by counsel—and I am of the same opinion—that the words "seizure," "detention," "embargo," or arrêt de prince, related to the belligerent rights of the Crown, including the droit d'angarie. With respect to the other clauses of the article, I think it cannot be denied that they purport and intend to place this Belgian packet in the category of a ship of war while in a British port. It is remarkable that this privilege—by the words of the article "Privilege"—is not extended to these packets in territorial waters, nor—so far as even British ships are concerned—to the high seas, and does not give them when on the high seas immunity from actions for salvage and collision happening out of a port (a), and of course the treaty cannot constitute these packets ships of war in their relation to foreign states.

If the Crown had power without the authority of Parliament by this treaty to order that the Parlement Belge should be entitled to all the privileges of a ship of war, then the warrant which is prayed for against her as a wrong-doer on account of the collision cannot issue, and the right of the subject, but for this order unquestionable, to recover damages for the injuries done to him by her is extinguished. This is a use of the treaty-making prerogative of the Crown which I believe to be without precedent, and in principle contrary to the laws of the constitution. Let me consider to what consequences it leads. If the Crown, without the authority of Parliament, may, by process of diplomacy, shelter a foreigner from the action of one of Her Majesty's subjects who had suffered injury at his hands, I do not see why it might not also give a like privilege of immunity to a number of foreign merchant vessels. The law of this country has indeed incorporated those portions of international law which give immunity and privileges to foreign ships of war and foreign ambassadors, but I do not think that it has therefore given the Crown authority to clothe with this immunity foreign vessels which are really not vessels of war, or foreign persons who are not really ambassadors.

Let me say one word more in conclusion. Mr. Brown in his very able speech dwelt forcibly upon the wrong which would be done to this packet if, being invited to enter the ports of this country with the privileges of a ship of war, she should find them denied to her. I acknowledge the hardship, but the remedy, in my opinion, is not to be found in depriving the British subject without his consent direct or implied of his right of action against a wrong-doer, but by the agency of diplomacy and proper measures of compensation and arrangement between the Government of Great Britain and Belgium.

I must allow the warrant of arrest to issue.

On the application of Gorst, Q.C., for the Crown, a stay of proceedings was granted for a fortnight, in case the Crown decided to appeal, and the question of costs was directed to stand over.

(a) But as the only practical means of enforcing a claim in rem for salvage or collision on the high seas is by arrest when the vessel is in port, the treaty gives all the protection which is necessary. The marshal may possibly have power to arrest in territorial waters, but he could not practically keep a ship in such waters, and if he brought her into port she would at once come under the terms of the treaty.—Ed.

Practice—Discovery—Salvage—Tender and admission of statement of claim—Reply—Amendment.

A plaintiff in a salvage action in the Admiralty Division, in which the defendants admit the allegations in the statement of claim, and tender a sum in satisfaction, is nevertheless entitled to discovery and inspection of documents, but at his own risk and cost if such discovery and inspection should be held at the hearing to have been unnecessary.

Quœre, is a reply necessary in a salvage action where the only defence is admission of the plaintiffs' facts and tender of a sum in satisfaction which is rejected by the plaintiff?

Leave given to reply, and claim amended before reply.

This was an action brought by William Brown and thirty-six others, beachmen of Palling, Norfolk, against the Russian barque Maria, to recover salvage reward for services rendered to the Maria off the coast of Norfolk.

The action was commenced on the 18th Jan. 1879, and the plaintiffs delivered their statement of claim on the 6th Feb. 1879, and thereupon obtained an order for discovery of defendants' documents. The defendants on the 15th Feb. 1879 filed an affidavit of discovery, disclosing the log of the Maria, and the protest of her master and crew, and nothing else. The plaintiffs thereupon on the 19th Feb. 1879 gave notice, under Order XXXI., r. 14, to inspect the said documents. On the 28th Feb. 1879 the defendants delivered their statement of defence, in which they alleged as follows:

The defendants on the 28th Feb. 1879 paid into court and tendered to the plaintiffs for their services the sum of 250*l.*, and offered to pay the costs; and they submit that such sum was sufficient, and they admit that the statements on the statement of claim are substantially true, and do not put the plaintiffs to proof thereof.

The tender was rejected by the plaintiffs.

On the 8th March the plaintiffs inspected the said log and protest, and then also saw certain surveys which had been held on the Maria after the services; these surveys had not been mentioned in any affidavit of discovery; but the defendants refused to allow the plaintiffs to have copies of any of the documents upon the ground that all the facts stated by the plaintiffs in their statement of claim being admitted such copies were unnecessary. The plaintiffs thereupon took out a summons calling upon the defendants to show cause why they should not be allowed to make copies of the log and protest, and why the defendants should not make a further and better affidavit of document.

March 18.—The summons came on for hearing before the Judge in Court.

J. P. Aspinall, for the plaintiffs, contended that the defendants were bound to disclose all documents, and to allow copies thereof to be taken: Order XXI., rr. 12 and 14. The fact of the defendants having admitted the plaintiffs' facts as alleged makes no difference, as upon the documents when disclosed, new facts might be ascertained, which would enable the plaintiffs to amend their statement of claim without leave before reply: (Order XXVI., r. 2.)

E. C. Clarkson for the defendants.—The facts being admitted, there can be no necessity for copies of documents, or for further discovery. The plaintiffs knew their own case, and ought not to be allowed to better it by means of defendants' documents.

J. P. Aspinall in reply.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I must make the order as asked for by the plaintiffs, but it seems to me to be an oppressive proceeding, and I shall direct the defendants to file a further and better affidavit of discovery, and to allow the plaintiffs to take copies and translations of the documents, but at plaintiffs own risk as to costs should such translations and copies be decided at the trial to be unnecessary.

The plaintiffs did not get inspection and copies of any of the said documents under this order until the 19th March, and then not of all mentioned, and were unable to do so until after the time for replying (21st March 1879) had expired. The plaintiffs took out a summons, returnable on the 29th March 1879, before the registrar, for leave to deliver reply, notwithstanding the time had expired. This summons the defendants opposed upon the ground that there was no defence, and hence no reply was necessary, and upon their application, the registrar referred the matter to the judge, and it came on before him in chambers on the 1st April 1879; the judge then gave the plaintiffs leave to join issue, but expressed an opinion that as there had been a rejection of the tender, such joinder of issue was unnecessary.

The plaintiffs thereupon on the 1st April, under Order XXVII., r. 2, delivered an amended statement of claim (before the time limited for reply and before replying), and on the following day delivered their reply, merely joining issue upon the defence.

April 7.—The action came on for hearing, and the judge awarded 400*l.* to the salvors, and costs.

Clarkson, for the defendants, applied for the costs of the discovery after the defendants had admitted their liability and paid into court, pointing out that the amendments on the statement of claim, founded upon such discovery, did not materially strengthen the plaintiffs' case.

J. P. Aspinall, for the plaintiffs, opposed the application upon the ground that as a matter of principle the plaintiffs were entitled to inspection, and it was impossible for them to determine whether an amendment was necessary or not until they had had discovery.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Without laying down any general rule as to the costs of discovery in such cases, I rule that here the discovery was unnecessary, and I give the defendants the costs incidental to all discovery after defence.

(Before Sir ROBERT PHILLIMORE and TRINITY MASTERS.)

THE ROBERT DIXON.

Towage — Salvage — Negligence — Damage — Tug and tow.

Where in the performance of towage services the tow gets into a position of danger, to extricate her from which would entitle a stranger to salvage reward, the tug is not entitled to any reward if the situation in which the tow was placed was the result of negligence in the tug, and the tow is entitled to be reimbursed by the tug's owners for loss occasioned to the tow in being extricated from the position of danger.

Where the tug is familiar with the navigation and the tow a foreigner, it is the duty of the tug to tow in a safe direction, without waiting for directions from the vessel in tow.

THIS was an action for salvage, by the owners, master, and crew of the steam tug Commodore, of 120 tons burthen and of about 700 horse-power (actual), against the Robert Dixon, an American sailing ship of 1368 tons registered, and of the value of about 11,000*l.* The owners of the Robert Dixon, by counter-claim, claimed against the Commodore for the value of her anchors and cables.

The circumstances of the case as proved by the evidence were, that the Robert Dixon, when bound in to Liverpool, had been towed by the Commodore, and that it was agreed that the Commodore should tow her out again when she left Liverpool.

On the 18th March 1878 the Robert Dixon was ready for sea, and some conversation took place between the captain and the master of the Commodore as to the advisibility of going to sea on that day on account of the weather; but it was finally arranged that she should go, the master of the Commodore supplying the hawser to tow with, and undertaking to tow the vessel to the Skerries. The vessels crossed the bar about 5.30 p.m., when the Liverpool pilot left; he gave a course before leaving of W.N.W.; there was on board, besides the captain and regular officers and crew of the ship, an unlicensed Channel pilot to assist in the navigation of the vessel. The Commodore towed the Robert Dixon, it was alleged, too close to the shore for safety, the Robert Dixon being in ballast, and sagging to leeward, and it was proved that she passed well inside of a pilot boat (No. 6) off Point Lynas, whilst other vessels in tow passed outside. Some time before midnight, the exact time being in dispute, the wind having then increased to a gale, the tug began to tow further off shore, but the wind being on shore with a heavy sea, at 1 a.m. the hawser parted and the Robert Dixon began rapidly to drift towards the shore; the tug was unable to get hold of her again, and it was alleged suffered damage by coming into collision with the Robert Dixon during the attempts. The Robert Dixon let go her anchor, but, as she still dragged, she let go her second anchor also and paid out a whole cable on each. There was some dispute as to whether she still dragged or not, but at daylight she was within half a mile of the shore at Bull Bay, in Anglesea. During the forenoon the weather moderated, and the Robert Dixon, after having refused the services of another tug, the Rescue, was taken in tow again by the Commodore and proceeded to sea; she had been unable to weigh her anchors, and had therefore slipped both cables. In the statement of defence the defendants denied that any salvage service had been rendered, and paid into court 49*l.* in respect of the towage, that amount having been agreed upon before the services were commenced, and by counter-claim alleged that the loss of the anchors and cables was occasioned by the misconduct and negligence of the plaintiffs in supplying an insufficient hawser and towing an improper course, and claimed the value of them from the plaintiffs.

Butt, Q.C., and Potter for the plaintiffs.—The defendants knew what the hawser was before they went to sea; besides it was sufficient for the purpose under ordinary circumstances. The course towed was a proper one—it was, in fact, the course which the Liverpool pilot, on leaving, directed to be steered; when the state of the weather rendered it imprudent to continue on that course, the tug towed her further out to sea. The violence of the weather could not be foreseen. There has been no negligence on the part of the tug; but, from unavoidable circumstances, the towage service became a salvage service, and we are entitled to salvage remuneration for it.

Milward, Q.C., G. Bruce, and F. W. Raikes, for defendants.—It was imprudent to tow a light ship on such a course with the wind on shore. The plaintiffs knew, or ought to have known, that under such circumstances the vessel would sagg to leeward, and not make good the course steered. The course steered was actually one which, if continued, would not clear the land. The plaintiffs undertook the business of towing with full knowledge of the difficulties, and undertook, in any event, to tow clear of the Skerries. Had they taken proper precautions the hawser would not have carried away; the hawser itself was not fit for the work, and the plaintiffs, knowing what that work was, had undertaken to supply a proper hawser. They ultimately completed the service, and we therefore pay into court the contracted price for the service, but we were put into peril by the misconduct or negligence of the tug, and to get out of it had to slip two anchors and cables. That is the direct result of the plaintiffs' negligence, and therefore we are entitled to receive their value:

The Minnehaha, Lush. 335; 4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 810.

Potter in reply.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE, after consulting the Trinity Masters, said:—There are certain propositions which are agreed upon, or cannot be denied, relative to this case, which it may be convenient to state before I proceed to pronounce upon the merits of the case itself.

This vessel, the Robert Dixon, a ship of 1368 tons register, was off Bull Bay, within a quarter of a mile of the shore. There is no doubt, first, that she was in a position of considerable danger, the wind blowing directly upon the shore; and, secondly, that she could only be rescued from that danger by the help of steam power; nor can it be doubted, as matter of law, that had the vessel that came up to her, and whose services were refused, or any other vessel except the Commodore, towed her out of her position, that vessel would have been entitled to salvage; and it is not because the Commodore did not perform what would have been in its general character salvage service that the objection is taken. It is with reference to the engagement under which she was at the time when this, which otherwise would have been a salvage service, was rendered. The Commodore was engaged as a tug to tow this large sailing vessel clear of the Skerries, and she tacitly contracted, of course, to find adequate knowledge and skill for the performance of this service. The vessel, however came into the position of danger which I have mentioned, and the tug now makes a claim in this court in the character of a salvor, because she says that danger was the consequence of supervening circumstances over which she had no control.

There are then two points: first, the parting of the hawser; and, secondly, the coming on of a gale. With regard to the breaking of the hawser, looking to all the circumstances of the case, namely, that it was patent to the captain of the sailing vessel that the hawser was chafed to the extent of three or four fathoms from the end, and that that was the only part of the hawser that was damaged; that his attention having been drawn to it, he refused to allow his own hawser to be used; and that the river pilot saw it, and was of opinion that it was not inadequate; and that it had been used from five p.m. to one a.m.; I do not think, and the Elder Brethren agree with me, that the tug is to blame for having attempted to tow the vessel with an improper hawser. But the more serious question remains, namely, whether the tug, if she was pursuing a proper course, would have been compelled to place the sailing ship in a position of danger. It is important to remember that the weather had been bad for some time; and that at the time when the towing was begun it was seen to be very doubtful. Now, the course that the tug ought to have pursued was a north-west course; the course she said she pursued, in the statement of claim, is this: "The wind was from the northward, a strong breeze, the sea moderate, and the vessel was being towed three-quarter speed, or five to six knots an hour, on a W. by N.½N. course. It appears from the evidence of the master of the tug himself that he received orders from the pilot to steer a W.N.W. course. The contention is, that, whereas he did steer half a point more to the west according to the statement, and according to the evidence, he steered a course which brought him inside the pilot boat No. 6, he steered this course when to have gone outside the pilot boat would have been a course of, comparatively speaking, perfect safety, and a course that two other vessels of the same kind, and under the same circumstances as the tug, at the same time pursued. Now the master of the tug denies that after the pilot left he received any orders at all, but he says that at eleven o'clock he put the vessel N.W. by W. of his own accord. Unfortunately, it was then too late to regain the ground he had lost, and this necessitated the vessel being placed in a position of considerable danger.

Now, it is a matter very much for the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House to advise the court on a point of this description, as to whether there was a want of commom prudence and skill in going to leeward, the consequence of which was that the ship was taken within a mile and a quarter of the shore; whether it was consistent with common prudence to have taken that course in that state of the weather; and they are clearly of opinion that it was not, that it was an imprudent course to pursue, and the consequence is that the sailing vessel was placed in a position of jeopardy resulting from the imprudence of this navigation. That being their opinion, it is impossible to come to any other conclusion than that the Commodore did not act as a salvor, but, on the contrary, is to blame. We are clearly of opinion that, though the master of the tug acted imprudently, he acted in good faith, and we have no reason to believe, nor is it suggested, that he endeavoured to induce the crew to leave the vessel, or that he placed her in a position of danger or in any way intentionally misconducted himself. But he did not give that skill and prudence which he tacitly contracted to give when he engaged to tow the vessel.

It may be as well to refer to the very careful language used by the Privy Council in the case of The Minnehaha (4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 810; Lush. 355), which is: "Whether the circumstances in each particular case are sufficient to turn towage into salvage must often be a subject of great doubt, as it is in the present case; but there is one point upon which their Lordships can entertain no doubt, and upon which they are surprised that any doubt should have been thrown at the bar. If the danger from which the ship has been rescued is attributable to the fault of the tug; if the tug, whether by wilful misconduct or by negligence, or by the want of that reasonable skill or equipments which are implied in the towage contract, has occasioned or materially contributed to the danger, we can have no hesitation in stating our opinion that she can have no claim to salvage. She never can be permitted to profit by her own wrong or default. When it is remembered how much in all cases—how entirely in many cases—the ship in tow is at the mercy of the tug; how easily, with the knowledge which the crews of such boats usually have of the waters on which they ply, they may place a ship in their charge in great real or apparent peril; how difficult of detection such a crime must be, and how strong the temptation to commit it, their Lordships are of opinion that such cases require to be watched with the closest attention, and not without some jealousy."

I am of opinion, after receiving the advice of the Elder Brethren, that this case is brought within the scope of these observations of their Lordships of the Privy Council in the case of The Minnehaha, and that the tug did "materially contribute to the danger" and the position in which this vessel was placed.

It remains only to consider the other part—the counter-claim—in this case, namely, certain damage to the vessel by reason of being obliged to slip both her anchors. She claims to be reimbursed for the loss occasioned to her, as she says by the tug; and, inasmuch as I am of opinion that the loss of the anchors and chains was a consequence of the imprudent navigation of the tug, I must refer the matter to the registrar and merchants to ascertain their value, and the amount of the loss which was so caused.

THE HANKOW.

Collision—Damage—Compulsory pilotage—Exemptions—Exceptions from—Port or place to which ship belongs — Particular provisions — Costs— 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, preamble, s. 59 — 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, ss 353, 370, 376, 379, 388.

The provisions of the Pilotage Act 1825 (6 Geo. 4, c. 125), as to compulsory pilotage and exemptions therefrom, are preserved by the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 353.

A vessel within the limits of her own port at a place where, previous to the passing of the Pilotage Act 1825, there were provisions in force for the appointment of pilots, is not exempt from compulsory pilotage.

The provisions of the Trinity House Charter, granted by James II., and of the Acts of Parliament relating to the pilotage of the river Thames and Medway, and the approaches thereto, are "particular provisions" relating to the port of London, within the meaning of sect. 59 of the Pilotage Act, so far as that port is contained in the pilotage district. (a)

(a) There may be some doubt as to whether the charter of James II. has really any bearing on the question. The Hankow was an inward-bound vessel from Australia, and would therefore in all probability have come by Dover. In that case she would under the original pilotage law (3 Geo. 1, c. 13, s. 1: 7 Geo. 1 stat. 1, c. 21, s. 14; 5 Geo. 2, c. 20, s. 12; 43 Geo, 3, c. 52), have had to employ a Cinque Port pilot, and none other. The reciprocal right of piloting vessels inward by the South Channel was only conferred on the Trinity House of Deptford pilots by 48 Geo. 3, c. 104, s. 2, and was confirmed by 52 Geo. 3, c. 39, s. 2. Therefore the charter of James II., though giving power to the Trinity House of Deptford to appoint pilots for the Thames, could not have affected the case of a ship inward bound having passed Dover. The Cinque Port pilots do not appear to have obtained their right of piloting inwards by charter, as the preambles of the Acts referring to it speak of them as having existed "time out of mind," and having enjoyed the exclusive right. But however long their rights may have existed, those rights seem to

A ship belonging to the port of London, and bound to London from Australia with passengers, is obliged to employ a pilot by compulsion of law, under the provisions of sect. 59 of the Pilotage Act 1825 (6 Geo. 4, c. 125), when within the limits of the port of London, by reason of there being at that time "particular provisions" for the appointment of pilots for the rivers Thames and Medway below bridge.

The Stettin (Br. & Lush. 199; 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 613; 1 Mar. L. C. O. S. 229) not followed

The Killarney (Lush. 427; 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 908; 1 Mar. L. C. O. S. 238) approved.

When defendants rely solely on the defence of compulsory pilotage and are successful, they may not get costs if the court is of opinion that under the circumstances the plaintiffs were justified in bringing the action.

THIS was an action for damage by collision brought by the owners of the Nelson steam tug against the Hankow. The collision happened in the river Thames, above Gravesend, about three p.m. The Nelson was engaged in towing a ship called the Beltana up to London, and was lashed alongside of her. The Hankow (a screw steamer of 2322 tons register) was bound to London from Sydney in New South Wales with a cargo of wool and seventy or eighty passengers. At the time of the collision she had a duly licensed pilot on board and in charge of her.

The action was originally brought in the City of London Court against the owners of the Hankow and also against the pilot, and was transferred by the judge of that court on the ground that he could not entertain a suit of that nature against a pilot. At the trial in the Admiralty Division the defendants did not dispute that the ship was to blame but alleged that the pilot was employed by compulsion of law, and that all his orders were obeyed, and that therefore the owners of the Hankow were not liable for the damage. At the hearing it appeared that the statement of defence only alleged that the Hankow (par. 2) "was in charge of a duly licensed pilot," and (par. 7) that "before and at the time of the collision the Hankow was being navigated by the defendant Robert John Oates, a duly licensed pilot, and if and so far as the collision was caused by any negligence of any on board the Hankow it was caused by the negligence of the said pilot."

March 7.—Milward, Q.C. and Dr. W. G. F. Phillimore, for the defendants.—The plea of compulsory pilotage being the only question to be decided, the defendants have the right to begin.

Clarkson.—There is no plea that the pilotage is compulsory; the pleadings only assert that you had a pilot on board, and that he was in charge; they do not say that his employment was compulsory.

Milward, Q.C. asked leave to amend the pleadings so as to raise the issue distinctly.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE,—I shall allow the amendment.

The pleadings were therefore amended by interpolating in paragraph 7 of the defence a statement that the employment of the said pilot was compulsory.

Milward, Q.C.—I have to show, first, that I had a pilot on board; secondly, that I was compelled to employ him; and, thirdly, that his orders were obeyed.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—There are two questions to be decided: one of law, whether the pilotage was compulsory; one of fact, whether the pilot's orders were obeyed.

The pilot himself was thereupon called. He stated that he went on board at Gravesend, took charge of the ship, that she was from Australia with passengers, that he was a properly licensed pilot, and that all his orders were obeyed.

Clarkson claimed the right to cross-examine the pilot as to what his orders were. Thereupon other witnesses were called for the plaintiff to show that all the material orders were obeyed. After hearing the evidence and counsel,

March 8.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—On the question of fact, I am of opinion that the pilot gave the order to slow the engines; and on the question of nautical science, the Elder Brethren advise me, that whether given or not, or obeyed or not, it could not have contributed to the collision.

Milward, Q.C. then called an official from the Trinity House, who produced a box containing, as he alleged, the original charter granted to the Trinity House by James II.

The argument as to whether the pilotage was compulsory was then postponed, and was argued on March 14th and 18th. The argument turned upon the following enactment:

6 Geo. 4, c. 125 (An Act for the Amendment of the Law respecting Pilots and Pilotage; and also for the better Preservation of Floating Lights, Buoys, and Beacons).

Preamble:

Whereas, ships and vessels have frequently been wrecked, and many lives and much property have been lost from the ignorance and misconduct of persons taking charge of such ships and vessels as pilots; and whereas the master, wardens, and assistants of the guild fraternity, and brotherhood of the Most Glorious and Undivided Trinity, and of St. Clement, in the parish of Deptford Stroud, in the county of Kent, commonly called the "Corporation of Trinity House of Deptford Stroud," have as well by usage for more than three centuries, as by grants from the Crown, been empowered to appoint pilots, loadsmen, or guides, to conduct ships and vessels into and out of and upon the river Thames, through the

have been definitely settled by 3 Geo. 1, c. 13, s. 1, which provided that no person save a duly qualified Cinque Port pilot should pilot a ship "by or from Dover, Deal, or the Isle of Thanet, to any place or places in or upon the rivers Thames or Medway"; and this Act contained no exemption in favour of ships within their own ports. This was apparently the exclusive right of the Cinque Ports pilots. As to all other pilotage in the Thames, provision was made by the charter and Acts applying to the Trinity House. Hence, prior to the 48 Geo. 3, c. 104, there was particular provision made for all the pilotage both up and down the Thames by all channels. The last mentioned Act (sect. 35), and 52 Geo. 3, c. 39 (sect. 59) both contain provisions exempting masters of vessels from employing a pilot "within the limits of the port or place to which his ship belongs;" but they also contain a similar proviso to that in the later Acts by which the exemption does not extend to a "port or place in relation to which provision hath heretofore been made by an Act or Acts of Parliament, or by any charter or charters, for the appointment of pilots." Hence it would seem that either by the Trinity House charter, or by 3 Geo. 1, c. 13, there was, at the time of the passing of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, particular provision in force for the appointment of pilots to pilot vessels entering the Thames by whatsoever channel, and that there was no exemption even for vessels belonging to the port of London.

The charters of the Trinity House — granted by Henry VIII. and James II.—have been printed and published in a small volume (in the year 1730); but this volume seems difficult to procure. There is a copy of it in Lincoln's-inn Library.—ED.

North Channel, to or by Orfordness, and round the Long Sand Head, or through the Queen's Channel, the South Channel, or other channels, into the Downs, and from or by Orfordness, and up the North Channel, and up the rivers Thames and Medway, and the several creeks and channels belonging to or running into the same, and to make such orders and constitutions as should be needful for the wholesome government of seafaring men, and maintenance and increase of navigation, and of all seafaring men within the said river of Thames; in pursuance of which powers the said corporation have from time to time appointed a sufficient number of pilots for the purposes before mentioned, and made orders for the better regulation and government of the same: And whereas there has been, time out of mind, and now is, a society or fellowship of pilots of the Trinity House of Dover, Deal, and the Isle of Thanet, who have had the pilotage and loadmanage of all ships for the said places up the rivers Thames and Medway, which said society or fellowship have been confirmed by various Acts of Parliament for regulating the pilots of the society or fellowship of pilots of Dover, Deal, and the Isle of Thanet, commonly called Cinque Ports pilots; and whereas, by certain Acts of Parliament, and more particularly by an Act passed in the fifty-second year of the reign of his late Majesty King George III., intituled "An Act for the more effectual regulation of pilots, and of the pilotage of ships and vessels on the coast of England," certain additional powers and authorities were vested as well in the said corporation of Trinity House of Deptford Stroud and the said society or fellowship of pilots of Dover, Deal, and the Isle of Thanet, commonly called Cinque Port pilots, as also in the corporation of the Trinity House of the ports of Hull and Newcastle respectively; and whereas a certain other Act of Parliament was passed in the fifty-fifth year of the reign of his late Majesty King George III., intituled "An Act to relieve certain foreign vessels resorting to the Port of London in respect of pilotage, and to regulate the mode of payment of pilotage on foreign vessels in the said port;" and whereas the provision of the several Acts have been found inadequate and insufficient, and it is therefore expedient that the same should be repealed (except as hereinafter provided), and that the several provisions therein contained respecting pilots and pilotage should be improved and amended and consolidated in one law: May it therefore please your Majesty that it may be enacted, and be it enacted, &c. . . . . that the said Act passed, &c., and also the said Act passed, &c. . . . . and all and every the clauses, provisions, powers, penalties, forfeitures, matters, and things relating as well to pilots appointed by the said corporation of Deptford Stroud as to pilots of the fellowship of Dover, Deal, and the Isle of Thanet, and to the pilotage by and regulation of all such pilots as aforesaid, and also as to the conduct of all persons in matters of pilotage within the jurisdiction of the said corporation of Trinity House of Deptford Stroud, and the liberty of the Cinque Ports, which are contained in any Act or Acts of Parliament heretofore made, shall be and the same are hereby repealed; Provided always, that nothing in this Act contained shall extend or be construed to extend to repeal so much of the said Acts passed in the fifty-second and fifth-fifth years of the reign of his late Majesty, or either of them, as relates to any rates of pilotage due or to become due, or to any penalty or forfeiture incurred or to be incurred, or any other act, matter, or thing done or to be done before the commencement of the operation of the provisions of this Act, in relation to any such matter and things as last aforesaid.

Sect. 59:

Masters of certain ships may pilot same as long as not assisted by unlicensed persons.

Provided always, and be it further enacted, that for and notwithstanding anything in the Act contained, the master of any collier, or of any ship or vessel trading to Norway, or the Cattegat or Baltic, or round the North Cape, or into the White Sea, on their inward or outward voyages, or of any constant trader inwards for the ports between Boulogne inclusive and the Baltic (all such ships and vessels being British register, and coming up either by the North Channel, but not otherwise), or if any Irish trader, using the navigation of the rivers Thames and Medway, or of any ship or vessel employed in the regular coasting trade of the kingdom, or of any ship or vessel wholly laden with stone for Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, Sark, or Man, and being the production thereof, or of any ship or vessel not exceeding the burthen of sixty tons, and having a British register, except as hereinafter provided, or of any other ship or vessel whatever whilst the same is within the limits of the port or place to which she belongs, the same not being a port or place in relation to which particular provision hath heretofore been made by any Act or Acts of Parliament, or by any charter or charters for the appointment of pilots, shall and may lawfully, and without being subject to any of the penalties by this Act imposed, conduct or pilot his own ship or vessel, when and so long as he shall conduct or pilot the same without the aid or assistance of any unlicensed pilot or other person or persons then the ordinary crew of the said ship or vessel.

The Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104).

Compulsory Pilotage (General).

Compulsory pilotage, in what mode to be enforced.

353. Subject to any alteration to be made by any pilotage authority in pursuance of the power hereinbefore in that behalf given, the employment of pilots shall continue to be compulsory in all districts in which the same was by law compulsory immediately before the time when this Act comes into operation; and all exemptions from compulsory pilotage then existing within such districts shall also continue in force; and every master of any unexempted ship navigating within any such district who, after a qualified pilot has offered to take charge of such ship or has made a signal for that purpose, either himself pilots such ship without possessing a pilotage certificate enabling him so to do, or employs or continues to employ an unqualified person to pilot her, and every master of any exempted ship navigating within any such district who after a qualified pilot has offered to take charge of such ship or has made a signal for that purpose employs or continues to employ an unqualified pilot to pilot her, shall for every such offence incur a penalty of double the amount of pilotage demandable for the conduct of such ship.

Trinity House to license pilots to act within certain limits.

370. The Trinity House shall continue, after due examination by themselves or their sub-commissioners, to appoint and license under their common seal pilots for the purpose of conducting ships within the limits following or any portion of such limits; (that is to say,)

(1.) "The London District," comprising the waters of the Thames and Medway as high as London Bridge and Rochester Bridge respectively, and also the seas or channels leading thereto or therefrom as far as Orfordness to the north and Dungeness to the south: so nevertheless that no pilot shall be hereafter licensed to conduct ships both above and below Gravesend.

Compulsory Pilotage (Trinity House).

Penalty on masters of ships employing unlicensed pilots, or acting as pilot.

376. Subject to any alteration to be made by the Trinity House, and to the exemptions hereinafter contained, the pilotage districts of the Trinity House within which the employment of pilots is compulsory are the London districts, and the Trinity House outport district, as hereinbefore defined; and the master of every ship navigating within any part of such district or districts, who, after a qualified pilot has offered to take charge of such ship, or has made a signal for that purpose, either himself pilots such ship without possessing a certificate enabling him so to do, or employs or continues to employ an unqualified person to pilot her, shall for every such offence, in addition to the penalty hereinbefore specified, if the Trinity House certify in writing under their common seal that the prosecutor is to be at liberty to proceed for the recovery of such additional penalty, incur an additional penalty not exceeding five pounds for every fifty tons burden of such ship.

Exemptions from compulsory pilotage.

379. The following ships, when not carrying passengers shall be exempted from compulsory pilotage in the London district, and in the Trinity House outport districts; (that is to say,)

(1.) Ships employed in the coasting trade of the United Kingdom:

(2.) Ships of not more than sixty tons burden:

(3.) Ships trading to Boulogne or to any place in Europe north of Boulogne:

(4.) Ships from Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, Sark, or Man, which are wholly laden with stone being the produce of those islands:

(5.) Ships navigating within the limits of the port to which they belong:

(6.) Ships passing through the limits of any pilotage district on their voyages between two places both situate out of such limits, and not being bound to any place within such limits nor anchoring therein.

Saving of Owner's and Master's Rights.

Limitation of liability of owner where pilotage is compulsory.

388. No owner or master of any ship shall be answerable to any person whatever for any loss or damage occasioned by the fault or incapacity of any qualified pilot acting in charge of such ship, within any district where the employment of such pilot is compulsory by law.

Milward, Q.C. (with him Dr. W. G. F. Phillimore) and Verney.—The pilotage of this vessel at the place in the London district (Merchant Shipping Act 1854, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 370) is compulsory (Merchant Shipping Act 1854, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 376); she had passengers on board, and therefore cannot claim exemption under sect. 379 of that Act, though she is navigating within the limits of her own port, being above Gravesend, and therefore above Yantlett Creek also:

General Steam Navigation Company v. British and Colonial Steam Navigation Company, L. Rep. 4 Ex. 230; L. Rep. 4 Ex. 238; 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 357; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 581.

She is not exempt under sect. 353 of the same Act, for that section preserves only the exceptions existing at the time it was passed; that is, those existing under 6 Geo. 4, c. 125. Sect. 59 of that Act, only excepts ships "whilst within the limits of the port or place to which she belongs" when that port or place is not "a port or place in relation to which particular provision hath heretofore been made by any Act or Acts of Parliament, or by any charter or charters for the appointment of pilots." Therefore, if London is a port or place for which previous to that Act particular provision had been made for the appointment of pilots, whether their employment was compulsory or not, this vessel cannot be exempt under that section. I have proved the existence of a charter for the appointment of pilots in that place, and it is recited in the preamble of the Act (ubi sup.), together with previous statutes having reference to it. The decision in The Stettin (Br. & Lush. 199; 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 613; 1 Mar. L. C. O. S. 229) was given because this charter and the Act relating to it were not brought to the notice of the learned judge. He is reported in the report of the case in the LAW TIMES Reports to have said: "I am aware of no such Act of Parliament, and no such Act has been mentioned, so I must conclude there is none." I have shown that there was such an Act (59 Geo, 3, c. 39) recited in the preamble to the very Act (6 Geo. 4, c. 125), in which that provision is made, and which was therefore in operation at the time the latter statute was made. When any such particular provision as is required by the statute was brought to the notice of the learned judge, he decided that it was a bar to the exception:

The Killarney, Lush. 427; 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 908 1 Mar. L. C. O. S. 238.

That case is precisely similar to this, with the exception that the port or place is there Goole, and here London. The other leading cases on the subject of pilotage are not in point, as the exemptions claimed in The Earl of Auckland (1 Lush. 164; 3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 786; 1 Mar. L. C. 27, 177); Reg. v. Stainton (8 E. & B. 445), and The Moselle (32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 572), were on the ground that the carriage of passengers (sect. 379 Merchant Shipping Act 1854) did not necessitate the employment of a pilot by a vessel exempted under sect. 59 of 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, by reason of being engaged in a particular trade.

E. C. Clarkson.—The decision in The Stettin (ubi sup.) was based on sect. 59 of 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, and therefore the statute was before the learned judge; that being so, it was not necessary to give evidence of the charter, as it is recited in the Act. The real ground of the decision in The Stettin (ubi sup.) was, that though special provisions are made for the appointment of pilots by the Trinity House by the charter, and the employment of such pilots is rendered compulsory by the Act with certain exemptions, the charter and Act only relate to certain districts of which the London district is one, and not to the port of London; therefore this ship is exempt from compulsory pilotage because she is within the port (London) to which she belongs, such not being a port for which any particular provision is made. It is true that there were special provisions at the place where she happened to be, but this place was for pilotage purposes on the river Thames, and the ship cannot be said to belong to the river Thames. The Killarney (ubi sup.) is decided on the express grounds that the port in which she was, and to which she belonged, was a port for which particular provisions were made. The Stettin (ubi sup.) was followed by the Lord Chief Baron in the General Steam Navigation Company v. British and Colonial Steam Navigation Company L. Rep. 3 Ex. 330; 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 357), and there the charter of James II. and the Acts making pilotage compulsory were specially referred to. There was a general provision for pilotage in the river Thames and waters adjacent thereto, but no "particular provision" has been made for the "port" of London to which this vessel belongs; she therefore is exempt from the necessity of carrying a pilot, as being "within the limits of the port or place to which she belongs" sect. 59, 6, Geo. 4, c. 125).

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is a case in which the court, if it had the option, would not choose to decide where the statutes are so very conflicting upon the question; but I have no option of my own.

By sect. 376 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), it is enacted that "subject to any alteration to be made by the Trinity House, and to the exceptions hereinafter contained, the pilotage districts of the Trinity House, within which the employment of pilots is compulsory, are the London district" . . . . Then sect. 370 of the same Act defines the London district as follows: [His Lordship here read sect. 370 (1) ubi sup.] Now it is admitted that the collision took place in the river Thames above Gravesend. If, therefore, that statute (the Merchant Shipping Act 1854) stood alone, the law would be tolerably clear that as that vessel had passengers on board, and could not therefore take advantage of the exemptions given by sect. 379, a pilot would be compulsorily employed on board her when within these waters. But the question really turns on the construction of the Pilotage Act 1825 (6 Geo. 4, c. 125).

It has been shown to me that there is a charter of the Trinity House, which was in existence prior to the passing of that Act, making provisions for the appointment of pilots at the place where the collision happened. The question is whether that is a "particular provision" to satisfy the requirements of sect. 59 of the statute, qualifying the exemption given to vessels when within the limits of their own port, as this vessel was. I am of opinion that it is.

The point was before my learned predecessor twice, once in the case of The Killarney (Lush. 427; 6 L. T. Rep. N. L. 908; I Mar. L. C. O. S. 238), and once in the case of The Stettin (Br. & Lush. 199; 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 613; 1 Mar. L. C. O. S. 229); and what surprises me is, that when the whole of the subject-matter was discussed, no reference to the former case was made in the latter. In The Killarney (ubi sup.) Dr. Lushington says, speaking of the exemption from compulsory pilotage: "One of these exemptions (the only one at all applicable to this case) is that a master may pilot his own ship whilst the same is within the limits of the port or place to which she belongs. Here the Killarney was in Goole, the port to which she belonged, and accordingly this case would appear to be within the exemption, and the pilotage would be voluntary only. But there is an exception to this exemption, for the section goes on to say, 'the same,' that is 'the port or place, not being a port or place in relation to which particular provision has heretofore been made by any Act or Acts of Parliament, or by any charter or charters for the appointment of pilots.' The whole case, therefore, comes to this: Had any particular provision been made in relation to Goole before the year 1826 by any Act of Parliament or by any charters for the appointment of pilots? If there had been, the exemption just mentioned did not attach, and the pilotage was compulsory." Then he went on to say that there was an Act of Parliament which brought Goole within the operation of the exception in the statute. So in the case of The Stettin (ubi sup.) he is reported as saying, in the report of the case in the Mar. Law Cases and LAW TIMES REPORTS: "I am well aware that to put one construction upon the 59th section of the Pilot Act, and another upon the 379th section of the Merchant Shipping Act, tends to create some confusion; but I cannot help myself, for the Legislature has used different expressions, as I think conveying different meanings. Then follow the words, 'the same not being a port or place in relation to which particular provision has heretofore been made by Act of Parliament. . . .' Now, I am aware of no such Act of Parliament, and no such Act has been mentioned, so I must conclude by this there is none. The result is that I must hold that the steamer was exempt from compulsory pilotage." But there is no reference to the charter in that case, and it is more than probable that it never was brought to the judge's attention on that occasion, and it does not appear to have been present to his mind. I feel some difficulty in discovering why the decision in The Killarney (ubi sup.) is not referred to in the case of The Stettin (ubi sup.). There is one more case referred to which I ought not to pass by, that is the case of The General Steam Navigation Company v. The British and Colonial Steam Navigation Company (ubi sup.). I am unable to extract any assistance from that case, and I find myself rather perplexed in reading the judgments, which are conflicting on almost all points, therefore I must put that case on one side.

Upon the whole, I am of opinion that it is proved in this case that the pilotage was compulsory, the locus in quo being a "place" which is excepted from the more general exemption given by the statute. The case is one in which it is very difficult to find one's way with satisfaction; but I shall hold that in this case there was a pilot by compulsion of law.

Milward, Q.C. asked for costs.—We only relied on the pilotage being compulsory, having admitted that the collision was caused by the negligence of the pilot in charge of our ship. We therefore have succeeded on the only issue before the court, and are entitled to our costs:

The Royal Charter, L. Rep. 2 Ad. & E. 362; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 262.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The question has been one of such complexity, and the opinion which I have formed being contrary to that expressed by my learned predecessor in The Stettin (ubi sup.), I think the plaintiffs were justified in coming here, and I shall make no order as to costs.

Damage—Collision—Lights—Infringement—Pilot vessel—Vessel in tow—Regulations for preventing collision at sea—Article 5 and 8—36 & 37 Vict. c. 85, s. 17.

A sailing vessel of any description when in tow is bound to carry at night the two coloured side lights prescribed by Articles 3 and 5. The white masthead light prescribed by Article 8 for sailing pilot vessels is only to be carried by those boats when independent, and not in tow of any other vessel.

A sailing vessel, and, semble, any other vessel, towing another vessel, is responsible for the lights carried by both vessels being in accordance with the regulations, and an infringement by the towed vessel brings the towing vessel within the scope of sect. 17 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873.

THIS was an action for damages by collision brought by the owners of the British brigantine Bessie against the British brigantine Mary Hounsell. The owner of the Mary Hounsell counter-claimed against the Bessie for the damages sustained by their vessel in the same collision.

The Bessie was bound from Cardiff to Cadiz with a cargo of coals. The Mary Hounsell from Youghal to Llanelly in ballast. The collision occurred on the 23rd Feb. 1879, off Barry Island, in the Bristol Channel, about 6.45 p.m.

The case for the Bessie was that, the wind being N.N.W., and the weather cloudy, but clear, she was sailing close hauled on the starboard tack, heading W. by N., and making four or five knots, and that she had a pilot on board, whose boat was in tow astern of the Bessie, and had her own sails set as well; that she observed a red light on her port bow; that as the vessel exhibiting it approached the red light was obscured, and a green light became visible; that the helm of the Bessie was ported, and the other vessel hailed to port, but the collision took place, the other vessel, which proved to be the Mary Hounsell, with her stem striking the Bessie on her port bow with such violence that the Bessie soon after sunk.

The lights exhibited by the Bessie were the ordinary regulation sailing lights for a vessel under sail (Art. 5), and the pilot boat in tow astern of her had the white light prescribed (Art. 8) for sailing pilot vessels.

The case for the Mary Hounsell was that, the wind being N.E. by N., and the weather clear and dark, she was sailing by the wind on the port tack, heading E. by S. half S., making about four knots; that she observed the red and green lights of the Bessie, and the white light of the pilot boat about half a point on the starboard bow; that she supposed the lights to be those of a steamer (Art. 3), and held her course, until the Bessie, whose red light had been obscured for some time, rendered a collision imminent by porting; that the Mary Hounsell then put her helm hard down, but the collision nevertheless happened.

It was proved that the pilot on board the Bessie had no certificate as a pilot, and that there was no one on board of or belonging to the pilot boat who had a certificate, that the persons using her were in the habit of piloting vessels in the absence of certificated pilots, and were in the habit of exhibiting the light prescribed for pilot boats (Art. 8). They had not on the occasion of the collision exhibited the flare-up light spoken of in the latter part of Article 8, within fifteen minutes, or at all.

The argument principally turned upon the true direction of the wind, as affecting the question of the credibility of the witnesses on either side as to their vessel being close-hauled, and on the question of lights, as to whether those carried by the Bessie and the pilot boat in tow were proper under the circumstances; and if not, whether by the exhibition of them the Bessie was to be held to blame for the collision.

The articles and sections of the Act referred to are as follows:

Merchant Shipping Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63). Table (C).

Regulations for preventing collisions at sea—Rules concerning lights.

Art. 2. The lights mentioned in the following articles, numbered 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, and 9, and no others, shall be carried in all weathers, from sunset to sunrise.

Lights with steam ships.

Art. 3. Sea-going steam ships when underweigh shall carry:

(a) At the foremost head, a bright white light, so fixed as to show an uniform and unbroken light over an arc of the horizon of twenty points of the compass, so fixed as to throw the light ten points on each side of the ship, viz., from right ahead to two points abaft the beam on either side, and of such a character as to be visible on a dark night, with a clear atmosphere, at a distance of at least five miles.

(b) On the starboard side, a green light, so constructed as to show an uniform and unbroken light over an arc of the horizon of ten points of the compass, so fixed as to throw the light from right ahead to two points abaft the beam on the starboard side, and of such a character as to be visible on a dark night, with a clear atmosphere, at a distance of at least two miles.

(c) On the port side, a red light, so constructed as to show an uniform and unbroken light over an arc of the horizon of ten points of the compass, so fixed as to throw the light from right ahead to two points abaft the beam on the port side, and of such a character as to be visible on a dark night, with a clear atmosphere, at a distance of at least two miles.

(d) The said green and red side lights shall be fitted with inboard screens, projecting at least three feet forward from the light so as to prevent these lights from being seen across the bow.

Light for steam tugs.

Art. 4. Steam ships, when towing other ships, shall carry two bright white mast-head lights vertically, in addition to their side lights, so as to distinguish them from other steam ships. Each of these mast-head lights shall be of the same construction and character as the mast-head lights which other steam ships are required to carry.

Lights for sailing ships.

Art. 5. Sailing ships under weigh, or being towed, shall carry the same lights as steam ships under weigh with the exception of the white mast-head lights, which they shall never carry.

Lights for pilot vessels.

Art. 8. Sailing pilot vessels shall not carry the lights required for other sailing vessels, but shall carry a white light at the mast-head, visible all round the horizon, and shall also exhibit a flare-up light every fifteen minutes.

The Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85, s. 17):

If in any case of collision it is proved to the court before which the case is tried that any of the regulations contained in or made under the Merchant Shipping Acts 1854 to 1873 has been infringed, the ships by which such regulation has been infringed shall be deemed to be in fault, unless it be shown, to the satisfaction of the court, that the circumstances of the case made departure from the regulation necessary.

Dr. W. G. F. Phillimore (with him Butt, Q.C.) for the plaintiffs, owners of the Bessie.—We were justified in what we did; being on the starboard tack close-hauled we were bound to keep our course, and we did so until by the action of the Mary Hounsell a collision became inevitable, when we threw ourselves into the wind, which was the proper course to pursue:

The Mamion, 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 255; 1 Asp. Mar. L. C. 412.

If the pilot boat exhibited a wrong light we cannot be held to blame under the Merchant Shipping Act 1873, s. 17, for that is a penal enactment and confined to the ship guilty of an infringement of the regulations; it cannot be said that the Bessie infringed the regulations. There is no special provision for sailing vessels towing, as there is for steamers under Art. 4; we therefore had only to obey Art. 5, and we have done so. But the pilot boat exhibited her proper light. To make a vessel a pilot boat, it is not necessary to carry licensed pilots: it is enough if those on board of her are and act as pilots (The Columbus, 2 Hagg. 178, note), and the fact that at the time of the collision there was no one on board who could act as pilot, does not alter the case, for the rule as to lights attaches to the character of the vessel, not to the condition in which she may happen to be. This is shown by the article relating to fishing boats lights (Art. 9), where, when the nature of the light to be exhibited depends on the condition of the vessel, it is so stated. "Sailing" in Art. 8 refers only to the character of the vessel as opposed to a steam vessel or a rowing boat, not to the way in which she is progressing, or the fact of her progressing at all; this is shown by the interpretation which has been put on Art. 5 universally, where it has been held that a vessel tripping her anchor, but not yet under weigh, has to carry the lights for a "sailing" ship or a "steamship" as the case may be.

Milward, Q.C. for defendants, owners of the Mary Hounsell.—The boat is not a pilot boat at all. If she ever was a pilot boat she was at this time functus officio, as she had no professing pilots to give to ships in want of them. But, even assuming that under any circumstances she would be entitled to show the lights of a pilot boat under Article 8, she could not do so when in tow. Article 5 is the article which governs the case; there can be no question but that, whether pilot boat or not, she was a sailing vessel, and as such, and in tow, she is bound by Article 2 to exhibit the side lights prescribed by Articles 3 and 5, and no others; by showing a white mast head light, she has infringed the provisions of all three of those articles, and there can be no question but that that infringement might, as in fact it did, cause or contribute to the collision; the lights shown by these two vessels would resemble those of a steamer, and so induce us to continue our course (Article 18) in the expectation that she would alter hers (Article 15).

Dr. Phillimore in reply.

Sir ROBERT PHILLIMORE, after consultation with the Trinity Masters.—I am of opinion that the Bessie, with the pilot cutter attached to her by a rope, must be considered in the application of the navigation rules as one vessel; and I am of opinion, and the Elder Brethren agree with me, that the white light which the pilot vessel carried might have been a misleading light. Whether the 5th article or the 8th article applies, it appears to me that either is hostile to the case set up on the part of the Bessie. If the 5th article applies—i.e., if the pilot cutter was a ship "under weigh or being towed"—she falls under the express provision of the article, which goes on to say that she "shall never carry" a white mast-head light. But if she falls under the 8th article, that article says, "Sailing pilot vessels shall not carry the lights required for other sailing vessels, but shall carry a white light at the mast head, visible all round the horizon," and in my opinion contemplates the case of a pilot vessel, not being towed by another vessel, but in an independent condition, and in that case the light would not be misleading. It appears, therefore, that the cutter was to blame for showing this white light, and the other vessel, the Bessie, was to blame for allowing herself to proceed with three lights on or connected with herself, and if so, there was an infringement of the regulations under the Merchant Shipping Act 1862. The 17th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85) enacts that "the ship by which such regulation has been infringed shall be deemed to be in fault, unless it be shown to the satisfaction of the court that the circumstances of the case made departure from the regulation necessary." There are no circumstances in this case that "made a departure from the regulation necessary," and a construction has been put upon these words by the Privy Council, namely, "If by possibility the infringement of the regulation could be contributory to the collision" (The Fanny M. Carvill, 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 565; 32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 646), the ship shall be deemed to be in default; I therefore pronounce the Bessie in fault for towing the other vessel exhibiting a white light. The next question is this, whether the Mary Hounsell is not also to blame? and after conference with the Elder Brethren on this point we are all of opinion that the story told by the Bessie is the true story, and that she was heading W. by N., and was close-hauled on the starboard tack, and that the Mary Hounsell had the wind free, and ought to have got out of the way, which she did not do. The evidence preponderates greatly in favour of the story of the Bessie. I ought to observe that the man at the helm of the Mary Hounsell, greatly prevaricated. On the whole the evidence preponderates in favour of the fact that the Bessie was close-hauled on the starboard tack, while the Mary Hounsell had the wind free; I therefore pronounce the Mary Hounsell also to blame. The result will therefore be that the damages will be divided, and no order will be made as to costs.

MUD HOPPER, No. 4.

Salvage—Damage to salvor—Demurrage.

Where a vessel in rendering salvage service sustains damage without negligence on her part, she is entitled to be repaid for such damage, and for demurrage during repairs by the owners of the vessel salved.

THESE were consolidated actions of salvage brought by the owners of steam tug Lord Lyon and the steam tug Toiler, to recover salvage reward for services rendered to Mud Hopper No. 4, a steam barge, the property of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board. The Hopper was coming out of the Sandon Dock Basin into the Mersey, when she came into collision with a large steamship, the Neera, which cut the Hopper nearly in two, and the two vessels remained fast together. The two tugs towed the Hopper clear, and she, being kept afloat by her water-tight compartments, was, by the tugs, put ashore at Seacombe, on the Mersey, and afterwards taken into the docks and repaired. In rendering the service the Lord Lyon, without any negligence on her part, sustained damage; in her statement of claim she claimed 78*l.* for the damage and four days demurrage at the rate of 25*l.* a day. At the hearing the plaintiffs tendered evidence to shew the amount of the damage and the rate of demurrage; the evidence as to the latter being a letter from the defendants' solicitor admitting that 60*l.* would be a fair amount of demurrage; this latter sum the plaintiffs were willing to accept.

There also was, in another action heard at the same time, a claim by the same tugs against the Neera for salvage reward.

Butt, Q.C. (Gully, Q.C. and J. P. Aspinall with him) objected to the admission of the evidence as to the demurrage on the ground that such evidence was never allowed by the court which gave its award in a lump sum to cover all such claims. The service was rendered without much risk or danger.

Phillimore (Goldney with him), for the Lord Lyon, contended that demurrage was part of the damages sustained in rendering the service, and was always allowed in such cases.

Milward, Q.C. and Clarkson for the Toiler.

Myburgh and Stewart for the Neera.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—There is no doubt a salvage service was rendered to both vessels. The contention that the demurrage is not to be allowed to the Lord Lyon, I cannot accede to, and I may say at once that the sum—which is not to be included in the amount given as reward for salvage, but is to be considered as paid for repairs and demurrage—amounts to 138*l.* (78*l.* for damage and 60*l.* for demurrage). The vessels whilst fast together were in a position of danger to themselves and to the navigation of the river, but there was no danger to the salvors. I award 560*l.* beyond the 138*l.* above-mentioned, 372*l.* to be paid by the Neera, 188*l.* to be paid by the Hopper.

THE EIDER.

Co-ownership accounts—Settlement of—Not after date of writ—Agent—Right of action—Admiralty Court Act 1861, s. 8.

In an action brought by one co-owner of a ship against the other co-owners under the Admiralty Court Act 1861, sect. 8, for a settlement of accounts between the co-owners, the plaintiff is entitled to a settlement of such accounts only as are or ought to be rendered to the co-owners prior to the date of the writ in the action, and cannot recover any sum due upon accounts, which in the due course of the ship's business could not be rendered to the co-owners until after such date.

Where a ship's accounts are rendered half-yearly, a co-owner is not entitled to recover upon accounts rendered for and at the end of the half-year in which the writ is issued.

When a co-owner acts as ship's agent (not managing owner) for a coasting steamer at one of her ports of call, he cannot in a co-ownership action for the settlement of ship's accounts recover amounts due to him as agent.

THIS was an action brought in rem, under the Admiralty Court Act 1861, s. 8, by William Holden, owner of sixteen 64th shares in the steamship Eider against that vessel and her other owners to obtain, as appeared by the indorsement on the writ (dated 24th Jan. 1878):—1. An inquiry into the conduct of the managing owner, Henry Ward; 2. An account of the earnings of the ship from the month of May 1871 to the date of writ, and a decree for payment of the amount that should appear due to him; 3. A sale, if necessary, of the shares of certain of the defendants.

In his statement of claim (delivered April 2, 1878) the plaintiff alleged that he had become owner of the said shares in the ship with the knowledge and consent of the defendant Ward upon the terms that he (the plaintiff) was to act as agent for the ship at Hull, between which place and Ipswich she was engaged in trading; and that he was to be paid for his agency at the rate of 5 per cent. on the gross freight inward and outward manifests and of the said vessel, that the plaintiff acted as such agent from Nov. 1875 until Jan. 1877, when he was wrongfully and improperly dismissed by the defendant Henry Ward, and thereby lost his commission; and that the defendant Henry Ward managed the business of the vessel at Ipswich from May 1876 until the commencement of the action, and acted as managing owner thereof, and that it was his duty to render to the plaintiff from time to time true and correct accounts of the earnings and disbursements of the vessel, and of all charges and matters relating to the business of the vessel at Ipswich, and to pay over a proportion of the profits which became due to the plaintiff, but that the defendant Ward did not render true accounts but rendered incorrect accounts, and did not pay over to the plaintiff his share of the profits, and neglected to manage the business of the vessel with due skill, and managed her to his own advantage, and to the plaintiff's disadvantage, and caused her to be employed in a less profitable way than she might have been; and the plaintiff claimed—first, an inquiry into the accounts of the earnings and disbursements of the said vessel from the 19th May to the then present time, and concerning the commission payable to the plaintiff as such agent at Hull as aforesaid; 2nd, an inquiry into the conduct of the defendant, H. Ward, the managing owner, touching the matters alleged as to the employment of the vessel; third, a decree for the payment to the plaintiff of such sums as might be found due to him on a true statement of accounts; fourthly, a decree for such damages as the court might think fit to award in respect of the wrongful acts complained.

Upon this statement of claim being delivered, the defendants took out a summons, to strike out so much of it as related to the claim for wrongful dismissal of the plaintiff from his agency as being embarrassing, and the Registrar on the hearing of the summons struck out all such portions of the statement of claim as related to such agency and the dismissal, on the ground that the court having no jurisdiction in rem over a claim for the wrongful dismissal of an agent, the statement of claim was in this respect embarrassing.

The statement of defence thereupon delivered alleged that the accounts of the ship were made up half yearly by the defendant Ward, and that he had duly rendered them to the plaintiff and the other owners within a reasonable time, and that if there had been any delay it had been occasioned by the plaintiff not sending to the defendant the accounts of the Hull agency for a long and unreasonable time; that nothing was due to the plaintiff as his share of profits of the vessel, but on the accounts the plaintiff owed money to defendant Ward; that the ship's business and employment had been properly managed, and by way of counter-claim the defendant Ward alleged that the plaintiff, as owner of the said shares, was indebted to the said defendant Ward on a balance of co-ownership accounts between them; and the defendant Ward claimed a reference to the registrar and merchants, and judgment for the amount found due with costs. Upon this issue was joined.

On the 26th Oct. 1878 the parties agreed that all questions raised by the pleadings should be referred to the registrar, assisted by merchants, to report thereon, and that as to any question raised by the pleadings which either party was entitled to have tried by the court the action should, after the filing of the said report, proceed in the ordinary manner. An order of reference was made in the terms of this agreement, and the reference was heard on Dec. 16, 1878, Jan. 4 and 11, 1879.

The defendant, Ward, filed no accounts at the reference, alleging that he had rendered to the plaintiff sufficient accounts. The plaintiff filed such co-ownership accounts as had been delivered to him by Ward, including all the half yearly accounts from May 1876 to Dec. 1877, and the account for the half year ending June 30, 1878, and also filed the agency accounts rendered to him by Ward showing the amounts due to him as agent at Hull. At the reference it was contended, on behalf of the plaintiff, that he was entitled to have all accounts investigated up to the date of the hearing of the reference, and, hence, that he was entitled to go into the accounts for the half year ending June 30th, 1878; for the defendants it was objected that no accounts could be investigated to the delivery of which the plaintiff was not entitled prior to the date of the writ, and that the plaintiff could only recover in this action such sums as appeared due upon accounts deliverable before action brought, i.e., before Jan. 24, 1878. The registrar upheld the defendant's objection and declined to investigate the accounts for the half year ending June 30th, 1878.

The plaintiff also claimed at the conference to be entitled to have his Hull agency accounts settled by the registrar and to recover in this action the amount found due to him upon these accounts; the defendants admitted the necessity for the investigation of the agency accounts, the amount due to the plaintiff upon them being a necessary figure for the settlement of the co-ownership accounts, but the defendants disputed the plaintiff's right to recover in this action as agent or in any other way than as a co-owner.

On the 22nd March 1879 the Registrar made his report, and after setting out the facts, said:—"The result of this prolonged investigation, which I think by a little moderation and sound judgment on the part of the plaintiff might easily have been avoided, is as appears by the schedule that there is due from the plaintiff to the defendant on the co-ownership account the sum of 11*l.* 2*s.* 3*d.* The amount due to him as agent, including his commission, is 52*l.* 5*s.*; if, therefore, his share of the loss on the profit and loss account be deducted, the balance due to him as agent will be further reduced to 41*l.* 2*s.* 9*d.* Under the circumstances thereby stated above, as the plaintiff has failed to establish any of the grounds of complaint urged on his behalf against the defendants, I am of opinion that there was no adequate cause for the lengthened inquiry which has taken place before me and the merchant by whom I have been assisted, and that the costs of such inquiry ought to be paid by Mr. Holden, the plaintiff."

On the 26th March 1879 the plaintiff gave notice that he should move the court for an order directing the defendants to pay the costs of the action and reference, and directing the registrar to add to the amount found to be due to the plaintiff the sum of 62*l.* 3*s.* 8*d.* admitted to be due to the plaintiff in the co-ownership account rendered on the 30th June 1878.

On the following day the defendants gave notice that they should move the court to confirm the registrar's report, pronounce judgment in the defendants' favour for the sum of 11*l.* 2*s.* 3*d.*, and condemn the plaintiff therein, and in the costs of the action, reference, and that application.

April 8.—Gainsford Bruce for the plaintiff.—Upon the account rendered to June 1878 there is a balance due to the plaintiff on the co-ownership account, which he is entitled to recover. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—It became due after the date of writ, and how can you recover it in this action?] By the practice of the Court of Chancery, accounts are always settled up to the date of the chief clerk's certificate (Daniell's Chancery practice, 5th edit p. 1120 et seq.) It would be a great hardship to drive the plaintiff to bring another action for this balance. Moreover, the registrar has reported that there is a balance due to the plaintiff on the accounts prior to the date of writ, and on these grounds alone the plaintiff is entitled to his costs of the action and reference.

J. P. Aspinall for the defendants.—The plaintiff can recover in this action only what is due to him on the co-ownership accounts up to the date of writ, and as on these accounts the registrar has reported a balance against him, he cannot recover at all. The agency accounts were only incidentally gone into, and the balance found due upon them cannot be recovered in this action. I ask for judgment on the claim and counter-claim with costs.

Bruce in reply.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—In this case the writ appears to have been issued on Jan. 24, 1878, and the registrar by his report appears to have investigated all the co-ownership accounts due and rendered up to that date. Now the registrar has followed the invariable practice by so taking the accounts up to the date of writ and by refusing to take any subsequent accounts. In fact, in all co-ownership actions in this court it has been the practice without exception, as I am informed by the registrar, to lodge accounts up to the date of writ, and the registrar in dealing with them limits the taking of such accounts to the date of writ, so that the plaintiff cannot in any event recover anything which has become due after that date. This being the settled practice of the court, it is not likely to be altered, and I should only depart from it if it was made clear to me that the practice was founded on a wrong principle; but I am of opinion that the practice is not founded on a wrong principle. Counsel for the plaintiff has referred to the practice of the Court of Chancery, but the Court of Admiralty has always had an independent practice of its own. If I were to hold otherwise it might very well be that in the case of a vessel making weekly or monthly voyages, the accounts would never be finally settled and the registrar might be kept sitting de die in diem, and the reference would never come to an end. I shall not alter the practice of the court. The registrar has reported that there is a balance of 11*l.* 2*s.* 3*d.* due to the defendant on the co-ownership accounts, and as these were the only accounts referred to the registrar I shall not disturb his report. The report therefore is confirmed, and I give judgment for the defendants; and with regard to the costs the plaintiff must pay the costs of the action as well as the costs of the reference.

Where an action is brought by owners of cargo laden on board one ship against another ship for damages sustained by the cargo through collision between the ship in which it is laden and that other vessel, and both vessels are found to blame for the collision; the plaintiffs will recover their costs as well as half their damages from the ship against which they have brought their action.

On the subject of costs, The Milan (Lush. 388; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 185) confirmed; and The Hibernia (2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 454; 31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 805) dissented from.

THIS WAS a motion in a cause of damage by collision, brought by the owners of cargo laden on board the Moselle, against the owners of the City of Manchester. The cause was heard on the 24th and 25th April, when, by the judgment, both vessels were found to blame for the collision.

Benjamin, Q.C., Phillimore and Stubbs, for the plaintiffs, argued that, the action being by owners of cargo only, the Admiralty rule of dividing the damages between the two ships did not apply, and therefore, though admitting that this court would follow the decisions in The Milan (3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 185; Lush 388) and other cases, yet formally asked for judgment against the City of Manchester for the whole amount, so as to give an opportunity for taking the case to the House of Lords.

Butt, Q.C. and Clarkson for the defendants.—The court will follow the decision of Dr. Lushington and the Privy Council.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I shall make the decree in accordance with the precedents in this court and the Privy Council both as to damages and costs.

May 20.—Dr. W. G. F. Phillimore moved that the court would condemn the City of Manchester in the costs. He argued that, however the appeal as to the amount of the damages was decided, whether The Milan (3 Mar. Law. Cas. O. S. 185; Lush. 388) and other cases following it was overruled or not, the plaintiffs were, at all events, entitled to costs. It does not appear that there is any settled practice where the action is by owners of cargoes and not of ships, and the judgment declares that both ships are to blame. But the owners of cargo ought to get their costs; the cargo is at all events innocent, and they substantially succeed in their action, and are therefore entitled to their costs: (Order LV.) The question has in reality never been argued. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I am informed by the registrar that he has examined the records of the court, and finds that in The Milan (Lush. 388) costs were given, but not in the subsequent cases of The Hibernia (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 454; 31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 805) and The Malta (not reported).] That is to say, that there is no uniform practice; but for the future one uniform rule as to costs is to apply to all divisions of the High Court: (The Condor, see post; 40 L. T. Rep. N.S. 442.) If the defendants had admitted their partial liability, but claimed a contribution as to half the damages from the owners of the Moselle, they might claim to have won in the issue, which would then have had to be tried between them and the owners of the Moselle; but we claim for damages occasioned to us by their negligence, and we have got damages, though not all we claimed. The case is different from that of an action by the owners of one ship against the owners of another, when both are found to blame, for then, after the damages of each are assessed in the registry, it may be found that the half of the defendant's damages, which the plaintiff has to pay, exceed in amount the half of the plaintiff's to be paid by the defendant, and that, therefore, in the result the defendant recovers on the balance, and therefore, whilst it is still uncertain which side in the result will have to pay, it is not inequitable that each should pay their own costs. Besides, both are wrong doers, and therefore disentitled to costs. But the case is not so with plaintiffs, who are owners of cargo; they are not to blame, and must, however the damages are assessed, pay nothing to, but recover half their total amount of damages from, the wrong-doing ship, against which they have brought their action.

E. C. Clarkson.—The Condor (see post; 40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 442) is not meant to govern the discretion of the courts below, it only applies to the costs of appeals. The Milan (Lush. 388) was never argued as to the question of costs, therefore a decision given sub silentio cannot guide the practice of the court. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I decided The Malta (not reported) as following The Hibermia (31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 805), but it appears from the report, when my attention is directed to it, that the question was not argued in that case either.] It cannot be said that the cargo is in the technical sense not to blame; it is identified with the ship on board which it is carried, at least as much as a passenger on an omnibus with the omnibus. Yet in such a case at common law the passenger was held to be so far identified as to be unable to recover from another omnibus for damage sustained in a collision between them, and for which both drivers were to blame (Thorogood v. Bryan, 8 C. B. 115; 18 L.J. 836, C.P.), and therefore he certainly would not get his costs, and there is no reason why, because the peculiar practice of the Admiralty Court gives him half his damages, to which he would not before the Judicature Act (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66, s. 25, sub-sect. 9) have been entitled in any other court, that practice should still further ameliorate his condition by giving him his costs. The principle of Thorogood v. Bryan has been lately approved in Armstrong v. The Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company (L. Rep. 10 Ex. 47; 33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 228.) [Sir R. Phillimore.—In those cases it is decided that the plaintiff recovers nothing, therefore he gets no costs; here he recovers half from the defendants in this action, and the other half from the owners of the ship in which his cargo was carried.] That would depend on the terms of the contract of carriage in the charter-party and bill of lading. It is not possible to distinguish the case of the cargo from that of the ship in which it is laden, and if the ship were plaintiff in this action she could not recover costs; it is inequitable that she should be enabled to do so by setting up the owners of cargoes to fight the battle for her. The plaintiffs have sought to prove defendants wholly to blame for this collision, and they have failed; that was the issue they set up, and they have only proved half of it, and therefore are not entitled to costs.

Sir R. Phillimore. — There is considerable obscurity in the question, owing to the diverse decisions both in this court and in the Privy Council; but, on consideration, I think the decision in The Milan (Lush. 388) the most consistent with justice to the parties, and I shall follow it, and the plaintiff will be entitled to his costs of action.

SITTINGS AT LINCOLN'S INN.

Chapman v. Royal Netherlands Steam Navigation Company.

Steamship — Collision — Limitation of liability— Both vessels to blame—Merchant Shipping Act 1854, s. 514—Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, s. 54.

Plaintiff was owner of the steamship S., the defendants were owners of the steamship V. and of her cargo. A collision had occurred between the two vessels, whereby the V. had been lost with her cargo. The S. was also damaged. In an action in the Admiralty Division, both vessels had been found to blame, and the ordinary Admiralty rule where both vessels were to blame was ordered to apply, namely, that each was to pay half the damage to the other. The owner of the S. then took proceedings in the Chancery Division to obtain the benefit of the provision of the Merchant Shipping Act, which enables shipowners to limit their liability to a sum equal to 8*l. per ton of the tonnage of their ship. The loss on the V. and her cargo was about* 28,000*l., and the limit of liability at* 8*l. per ton of the S. would be only* 5200*l. The loss on the S. was about* 4000*l. The owner of the S., while claiming to limit his own liability to* 8*l. per ton, claimed nevertheless to recover half the damage sustained by his own vessel against the owners of the V., which would make him liable for a balance of about* 3200*l. The owners of the V. on the other hand claimed to have the two sets of damages first assessed, and the S.'s half damage deducted from the V.'s half damage, and then contended that the owners of the V. should prove against the S. for the balance to the extent of* 8*l. per ton, which would make the plaintiff liable to the full limit of his liability, namely* 5200*l.*

Held, by Baggallay and Cotton, L.JJ. (reversing the decision of Jessel, M.R.), Brett, L.J. dissenting, that on the true construction of the 54*th section of the Merchant Shipping (Amendment) Act* 1862, there could be no set-off under the circumstances, that the principle advocated by the plaintiff was the correct one, and that the proof must be for the whole moiety of the damage ascertained to have been sustained by each ship.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff from a decision of the Master of the Rolls in a suit for the limitation of the liability of shipowners in a case of collision, the crews of both vessels having been to blame.

The plaintiff was the owner of the steamship Savernake; the defendants, the Royal Netherlands Steam Navigation Company, were the owners of the steamship Vesuvius, and the owners of her cargo.

On the 7th April 1876 a collision had occurred between the two vessels, whereby the Vesuvius had been sunk, and was lost, with her cargo. The Savernake was also damaged.

On the 22nd April an action for damages was commenced in the Admiralty Division by the owners of the Vesuvius against the owners of the Savernake, who defended the action, and put in a counter-claim against the Vesuvius.

The action was tried on the 24th July 1876, before the judge of the Admiralty Division, who held both vessels to blame, and the ordinary Admiralty rule where both vessels were to blame was ordered to apply, namely, that each was to pay half the damage to the other.

The owner of the Savernake thereupon commenced the present action in the Chancery Division to obtain the benefit of the provision of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, s. 54, which enables shipowners (where there is no loss of life) to limit their liability to a sum equal to 8*l.* per ton of the tonnage of their ship. He claimed a declaration that he was only answerable in damages in respect of loss and damage to the owners of the Vesuvius and her freight, the goods, effects, and merchandise, and other things, on board the said ship, to an aggregate amount not exceeding 5064*l.*, being the amount of 8*l.* per ton on the gross registered tonnage of the Savernake, and for relief consequent on such declaration. The loss on the Vesuvius and her cargo was about 28,000*l.* and the limit of liability at 8*l.* per ton of the Savernake would be only 5200*l.* The loss on the Savernake was about 4000*l.* The present plaintiff, the owner of the Savernake, while claiming to limit his own liability to 8*l.* per ton, claimed, nevertheless, to recover half the damage sustained by his own ship against the owners of the Vesuvius, which would make him liable for a balance of about 3200*l.*

The owners of the Vesuvius, on the other hand, claimed to have the two sets of damages first assessed, and the Savernake's half damage deducted from the Vesuvius's half damage, and then contended that the owners of the Vesuvius should prove against the Savernake for the balance to the extent of 8*l.* per ton, which would make the plaintiff liable to the full limit of his liability, namely, 5200*l.*

On the 7th Aug. 1878 the case came before the Master of the Rolls, when he gave the following judgment, deciding in favour of the defendants, the owners of the Vesuvius.

Jessel, M.R.—I will first of all give my view of what the meaning of the thing is, and then I will see how far that view is consistent with the well-known forms of precedents.

When two ships come into collision and both are in fault, one or the other can recover damages, and only one of the two, because the result of the action is that either the plaintiff or the defendant is to win something. That is the meaning of it. The consequence of the collision is, that damage being done to one or both vessels, the owner of one vessel can recover something from the other. The Admiralty rule in such a case is to take the amount of the damage done to each vessel, to add the amounts together, and to halve them, so that each owner is inter se to bear half, and then to ascertain who is to pay to the other, and the monition finally issues for the balance.

That is all that is ever recovered in the action. Now let us look at what the statute provides: "Where any loss or damage is, by reason of the improper navigation of such ship as aforesaid, caused to any other ship or boat, or to any goods," &c., the owners are not "answerable in damages" beyond a certain amount. What were they then answerable for before the Judicature Act passed? They were answerable for the balance. The other side could not have got from the Admiralty judge a monition for more than the balance. Since the passing of the Judicature Act is there any distinction? If there is, it is entirely in favour of the same view, because since then these things are no longer raised by cross-causes but by counter-claims. It is a mere question of procedure. What is to be done on that judgment? What is the duty of the judge? I think it is plain that that which was formerly called "set-off" is now a matter of right and duty, a right in the first party to pay and a duty in the judge to grant. That is perfectly clear when you look at the Act of Parliament, which is for the purpose of enabling the court to do complete justice. Is it complete justice to make one side pay and leave the other side without paying? The 24th section of the Judicature Act 1873, sub-sect. 3, says: "The said courts respectively and every judge thereof shall also have power to grant to any defendant in respect of any equitable estate or right or other matter of equity, and also in respect of any legal estate, right, or title claimed or asserted by him, all such relief against any plaintiff or petitioner as such defendant shall have properly claimed by his pleading, and as the said courts respectively, or any judge thereof, might have granted in any suit instituted for that purpose by the same defendant against the same plaintiff or petitioner." Nothing can be wider. "All such relief" shows it may be in diminution of the plaintiff's claim, or it may be in excess of the plaintiff's claim, but although it is no longer to be a cross-action, the judge is to do complete justice between the parties. The 3rd rule of Order XIX. says: "A defendant in an action may set off or set up, by way of counter-claim against the claim of the plaintiff, any right or claim, whether such set-off or counter-claim sound in damages or not; and such set-off or counter-claim shall have the same effect as a statement of claim in a cross-action, so as to enable the court to pronounce a final judgment in the same action, both on the original and on the cross-claim." And Order XXII., r. 10, says: "Where in any action a set-off or counter-claim is established as a defence against the plaintiff's claim, the court may, if the balance is in favour of the defendant, give judgment for the defendant for such balance, or may otherwise adjudge to the defendant such relief as he may be entitled to upon the merits of the case." Now, I am asked to make that word "relief" mean "where he wins altogether," but I decline to accept such interpretation. It may be in diminution of the plaintiff's claim, as it is in the 3rd sub-section of the 24th section of the Act of 1873. The result therefore is this, that where it says, "the court may adjudge," it means "the court shall," and consequently where the question in the action is, who is to pay damages on account of the collision, the court is bound to see who is to pay on the balance, and to order for it. Therefore the result under the Judicature Act is the same as the practical result was before the Judicature Act, by reason of the judge only issuing the monition for the balance. The total result therefore, is this, that the mode of calculating the damages is what I have stated, but the damages are calculated as the damages arising from the collision, payable by one party to the other, which is the balance in case both vessels are damaged.

Of course, in the case of only one vessel being damaged, there is only one payment in respect of that one vessel. That, I think, is the fair view of the Act of Parliament—not two losses, not two independent actions, and two separate independent rights, but the loss arising from the collision; and if you look at the Act you will find that there is nothing said about the person entitled to recover. It is only a limitation of the amount that the owner of the vessel is liable to pay. It appears to me a fallacy to say that the owner of that vessel is entitled to recover from the owner of the other; on the contrary, he is liable to pay the balance and not entitled to recover. Although, by reason of some defective procedure, you may have a difficulty in making your demand effectual, it appears to me that is the substance of the matter, and all the rest is mere form. That being so, it seems to me, as between the owners of the two vessels, the amount payable as damages to the owners of the Savernake is the difference or balance of the two moieties ascertained in the way I have indicated. So far as they are concerned they have a right to prove, and, as I have already said, it does not make the owner of the Savernake liable to pay beyond the 8*l.* per ton, nor was it intended that he should pay more. Now, as regards the intention of the Legislature, I think it is plain. Originally it was the value of the vessel, but there was inconvenience about that, and instead, this tonnage value was substituted; the theory being that, when the owner of the vessel gave up all he was entitled to, he should not pay more. That was the theory of the Legislature, and when you look at it in that light, it is quite clear he is not to be in a position to receive compensation for damage to his vessel, and at the same time not to pay compensation for damage done to the vessel of the other people. Clearly he is to get no profit, and he is to give up his vessel and freight, and that will be the result, according to the decision at which I have arrived.

The plaintiff appealed, on the ground that, according to the true construction of sect. 54 of the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act 1862, the defendants should prove for a moiety, when ascertained, of the amount of damage sustained by the Vesuvius, without deducting a moiety of the amount of damage sustained by the Savernake.

The material facts and the nature and effect of the arguments are fully set out in the written judgments of their Lordships.

Baggallay, L.J.—The question involved in this appeal has arisen under the following circumstances:—On the 7th April, 1876, a collision took place between the steamship Savernake belonging to the plaintiffs, and the steamship Vesuvius belonging to the defendants. On the 22nd of the same month an action for damages was commenced in the Admiralty Division by the owners of the Vesuvius against the Savernake and her owners: the owners of the Savernake defended the action, and put in a counter-claim against the owners of the Vesuvius. The action was tried on the 24th July 1876, before the judge of the Admiralty Division, who held both vessels to blame, and condemned the owners of each in a moiety of the losses and damages sustained by the other; and it was referred to the registrar of the Admiralty Division, assisted by merchants, to assess the amount of such damages respectively. The owners of the Savernake thereupon availed themselves of the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Acts, and commenced the present action in the Chancery Division, claiming a declaration that they were not answerable in damages in respect of loss and damage to the Vesuvius and her freight, the goods, effects and merchandise, and other things on board the said ship, to an aggregate amount exceeding the sum of 5064*l*., being the amount of 8*l*. per ton on the gross registered tonnage of the Savernake, and for relief consequent on such declaration. The defendants to the limitation action were the Steam Navigation Company and the owners of a portion of the cargo which was on board the Vesuvius at the time of the collision. By an order of the Master of the Rolls leave was given to the plaintiffs to pay into court to the credit of the action the sum of 5212*l*. 3*s*. 5*d*., being the amount of the aforesaid sum of 5064*l*. together with interest thereon at 4 per cent. per annum from the time of the collision; and on 20th Dec. 1876, 5212*l*. 3*s*. 5*d*. was paid into court pursuant to such order. By the same order the defendants, the owners of the Vesuvius, and the defendants, owners of the cargo, were restrained from further prosecuting the proceedings commenced by them in the Admiralty Division against the owners of the Savernake, in respect of the collision, until judgment in the present action or further order, without prejudice to the continuance of the proceedings in the said division in respect of the counter-claim of the Savernake. On the 25th June 1877 judgment was given by the Master of the Rolls in the limitation action, and a declaration of limitation of the liability of the owners of the Savernake as claimed by them was made, and inquiries were directed for the purpose of ascertaining who were the persons entitled to the fund so paid into court and its accumulations, and in what proportions it ought to be distributed among the persons who should be found entitled; and the injunction awarded by the order of the 9th Dec. 1876 was continued until further order against the defendants, the Steam Navigation Company. It appears that the effect of the proceedings in the present action is to leave the damages in which the owners of the two ships have been respectively condemned to be assessed by the registrar and merchants under the order of the Admiralty Division of the 24th July 1876. In the course of the prosecution of the inquiries so directed by the Master of the Rolls, the defendants, the Steam Navigation Company, as owners of the Vesuvius, claimed to prove for the full amount of the losses and damage sustained by them by reason of the collision, or, in the alternative, to prove for one moiety of such losses and damage, less the moiety of such damage as should be found to be payable by them to the plaintiff in respect of the losses and damage sustained by the plaintiff, and to be paid pro ratâ with the other claimants out of the fund in court in respect of the amount for which they should be held entitled to prove. On the 7th Aug. 1878, the claims so asserted by the defendants, together with certain other questions which had arisen in the course of the proceedings, were brought under the consideration of the Master of the Rolls, upon an agreed statement of facts: the first of the alternative claims of the company does not appear to have been pressed, at any rate it has not been supported in argument before us, and it is clearly untenable; the second was opposed by the plaintiff, who insisted that the company ought to prove for a moiety, when ascertained, of the amount of damage sustained by the Vesuvius,, without deducting a moiety of the amount of damage sustained by the Savernake. If this contention of the plaintiff were to prevail it would leave him in a position to assert his claim against the owners of the Vesuvius for the amount, when ascertained, in which such owners have been condemned in respect of the damage occasioned by the Savernake by the improper navigation of the Vesuvius. The Master of the Rolls decided in favour of the second of the alternative claims of the company, and from that decision the present appeal is brought. The owners of the Vesuvius have not asserted any claim to a limitation of their liability.

The question involved in the appeal is one of considerable importance, not only to the parties interested in the present action, but also as affecting the principle upon which the liabilities of shipowners are to be measured in cases where both ships are held to blame in respect of a collision, and the owners of one or both claim a limitation of liability under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Acts. If the contention of the respondents is well founded, the plaintiff, as owner of the Savernake, instead of having his liability limited to 8*l.* per ton upon the registered tonnage of his ship, will also lose the amount in which the owners of the Vesuvius have been condemned, and will be in exactly the same position, as regards the amount of loss he will have to bear, as he would have been in had he been held alone to blame, that is to say, he will have to pay the 8*l.* per ton, and bear the loss of all the damage done to his own ship. The owners of the Vesuvius, on the other hand, by reason of their escaping the payment of the amount in which they have been condemned by deducting it from the amount in which the owner of the Savernake has been condemned, and proving for the balance only, will obtain payment in full of so much of the amount in which the owner of the Savernake has been condemned as is equal to the amount in which they have themselves been condemned. The claimants in respect of cargo, &c., are also benefited by the decision of the Master of the Rolls, inasmuch as the proportionate parts of the fund paid into court, to which they are entitled, will be increased in amount by the reduction of the proof of the owners of the Vesuvius, and we consequently find them siding with the company in opposing the appeal.

Now it certainly strikes one as improbable that such an apparently inequitable result should be in accordance with the true construction of the Merchant Shipping Acts; but, if such be their true construction, we are bound to adopt and act upon it, however inequitable, in our opinion, the result may be. The question, therefore, for present consideration is, whether the true construction of the Acts is that which the Master of the Rolls has adopted. With all respect for that learned judge, and for Lord Justice Brett, who is of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed, I think that the view contended for by the plaintiff is more in accordance with the true construction of the Merchant Shipping Act 1862, upon which, as it seems to me, the whole question turns.

The 54th section of that Act, so far as it is applicable to the case we are now considering, may be stated in the following terms: "Where by reason of the improper navigation of any ship, but without the actual fault or privity of its owners, loss or damage is caused to any other ship, or to any goods on board such other ship, the owners of such first-mentioned ship shall not be answerable in damages, in respect of such loss or damage, to an aggregate amount exceeding 8*l.* per ton of their own ship tonnage." The aggregate, which is limited to 8*l.* per ton, is made up of (1) damages in respect of the loss or damage to the other ship, and (2) damages in respect of the loss or damage to the goods on board such other ship; but, as regards both classes of damages, they are to be in respect of loss or damage occasioned by the improper navigation of the ship, whose owners claim the benefit of limited liability. What then are the damages to which the owners of the Vesuvius would be entitled in respect of the loss or damage occasioned to that ship by the improper navigation of the Savernake, if no claim to limited liability had been made by the owner of the Savernake? It appears to me that the damages to which, upon this hypothesis, the owners of the Vesuvius would be entitled would be a moiety of their claim in the Admiralty action, as assessed under the order of the 24th July 1876, or under any substituted jurisdiction. It may be, and probably is, quite true, that after the assessment of the amounts in which the owners of the two ships were respectfully condemned, the Admiralty Division would order the owner of the Savernake, which had admittedly sustained less damage than the Vesuvius, to pay to the owners of the Vesuvius the difference between the amounts of the two assessments, but that would be mere procedure, adopted for convenience only, and to avoid the circuitous course of reciprocal payments; the amount of damage occasioned to each ship by the improper navigation of the other could not be altered by the order for payment of the balance by the one condemned in the larger amount. And it is in respect of the damage occasioned to one ship by the improper navigation of the other, as such damage could be ascertained independently of the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Acts, that limited liability is given by those Acts, and not in respect of the ultimate balance which, under the procedure of any court having jurisdiction, may be payable in the final winding-up of all matters of account arising out of the collision. But our attention has been directed, in the course of the argument, to the practice of the Court of Admiralty as constituted previously to the passing of the Judicature Acts, of setting off, as it were, in cases of collision in which both ships were held to blame, the amounts in which owners of the ships were respectively condemned, and of issuing a monition for payment of the balance by the owners of the ship condemned in the larger amount; and it has been contended on behalf of the respondents that such balance, being the amount which would have been so ultimately recovered by the owners of the ship that had sustained the greater amount of damage, should be treated as the amount of damages provable by them in a limitation suit. It is immaterial, in my opinion, to consider the various steps in the proceedings in the Admiralty Court which would have preceded the issuing of a monition for the payment of a balance under such circumstances as have been referred to in argument, though cases have been cited on the subject by the one side and the other. I will assume, for the purpose of the few remaining observations which I have to make, that the practice was as it has been represented by the counsel for the respondents. But in what respect did the practice of the Admiralty Court, of issuing a monition for the payment of the balance after the sums which each party was liable to pay to the other had been ascertained, differ in principle from that which might, and probably would, be adopted by the Admiralty Division under similar circumstances, and to which attention has been directed? Then, as now, convenience dictated the form in which the ultimate order should be made, but such ultimate order was for the purpose of giving effect to rights previously declared after the pecuniary results of such declaration had been assessed. It appears to me that, under the provisions of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 and the recent Judicature Acts, the Court of Admiralty, previously to the last-mentioned Acts coming into operation, and the Admiralty Division from that time, acquired the power of doing directly what the Court of Admiralty, previously to the Act of 1861, had done or endeavoured to do indirectly, that is to say, the power, after the amounts in which the owners of each ship were liable to the owners of the other had been ascertained, of securing that the owners of one ship should not receive the amount coming to them without ample provision being made that they should in return pay on account for the amount of their own liability, and in no better way can such provision be made than by setting off the one amount against the other, and ordering payment of the balance, and for that purpose, and for no other, as it appears to me, have monitions or orders for payment of the balance been from time to time made.

I am of opinion that the order of the Master of the Rolls should be reversed, and that an order should be made declaring that the owners of the Vesuvius ought to prove for the amount of one moiety of the loss or damage sustained by their ship by reason of the improper navigation of the Savernake, when such amount shall have been assessed in manner directed by the order made in the Admiralty Division on the 24th July 1876, and that the costs should follow the result.

Brett, L.J., after referring to the facts, said:—The Master of the Rolls decided in favour of the view presented by the owners of the Vesuvius, and his order carries out that view. The appeal is against that order. Our decision must depend upon what is the true application to such a case of sect. 54 of the statute of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63 (the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862), by which, omitting inapplicable matter, it is enacted that the owners of any ship "shall not where any loss or damage is, by reason of the improper navigation of such ship, caused to any other ship, be answerable in damages in respect of loss or damage to ships, goods, or merchandise, &c., to an aggregate amount exceeding 8*l.* for each ton, &c." The case to which we have to apply this enactment is that of a collision between two ships, a claim and a counter-claim in the Admiralty Division, a judgment thereon that both vessels were to blame, a limitation action in the Chancery Division by the owners of the vessel which was the less injured of the two. The same question might have been raised by a petition in the Admiralty Division for a declaration of limitation. No difficulty in the application of the statute in question can arise except where both vessels are pronounced to be in fault. At the time of the passing of the Act of 1862 the difficulty therefore could only have arisen in respect of a decision given, or to be given, in a suit in the Admiralty Court. Since the passing of the Judicature Act of 1873 (sect. 25, sub-sect. 9), it may arise in respect of a decision in the other divisions of the High Court. But the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act 1862 must be interpreted, I think, as it would have been on the day after it came into operation. I, therefore, with deference, think it better not to discuss the effect of the procedure under the Judicature Acts. Whatever was the effect of the Limitation Act upon the rights of the parties before the Judicature Act must, in my opinion, be its effect now. The Judicature Acts did not alter rights but only procedure.

In order to interpret the Limitation Act, or to apply it, it seems to me necessary to consider what, at the time of the passing of the Act, was the course of procedure in the Admiralty Court in a cause of damage. In case of a collision a cause was instituted by the owners of one of the ships, a warrant was issued, either the ship proceeded against was seized, or her owners, without waiting for such seizure, entered an appearance upon giving bail to, or paying into court, the amount in which the case was instituted; if the ship was seized bail might be given to the ascertained value of the ship, if that was less than the sum for which the cause was instituted, or to the amount in which the cause was instituted, if the value of the ship was greater than that sum—the cause then proceeded. The owners of the ship proceeded against might or might not institute a cross action. If they did not the single cause proceeded to a hearing. If the question of joint blame was raised by proper pleading in that cause the court would in that suit give judgment, either that the defendants' ship was solely to blame, or that both ships were to blame, and the court, in and by such judgment, unless the amount was admitted, would refer to the registrar and merchants the amount of damage done to the plaintiff's ship. In the former case the plaintiff would eventually be entitled to recover the whole amount of damage done to his ship; in the latter case the half of such amount. After the report of the registrar to the court, the plaintiff applied to the court for an order for the payment of the money due to him. If the defendant had paid money into court, the order was to pay to the plaintiff the amount due out of the fund in court, and upon such "order of payment" the plaintiff obtained a cheque from the registrar. If the defendant and sureties had given bail, the "order for payment" was an order on the defendant and his bail to pay the amount on a particular day. If the amount was not paid on that day, the "order for payment" was enforced by "monition" to pay it on a particular day, and on neglect by "attachment." But in general, before the Judicature Acts, the defendants in a suit instituted in respect of a collision did at some time, sooner or later, institute a cross-cause. To the cross-cause thus instituted the original plaintiffs sometimes appeared, and sometimes did not appear. If they appeared, they in their turn gave bail. If they did not appear, and their ship could not be seized, the cross-cause could not for the time proceed. Yet the court, before 1862, had no power to stay proceedings in the first cause. This was decided in several cases, as in The Seringapatam (3 W. Rob. 38); The Heart of Oak (29 L. J. 78, Adm.); The Carlyle (6 W. Rep. 197); and The North American (1 Lush. 81). The first case proceeded to judgment, that is to say, to the judgment which declared the liability, and it further proceeded to the inquiry thereupon by the registrar and merchants. And the court could not direct an inquiry as to the amount of damage done to the defendant's ship, so as to allow the defendant to deduct the half of such amount from the amount due to the plaintiff. That was decided in The Seringapatam. The court therefore allowed the inquiry to proceed as to the amount of damage suffered by the plaintiff's ship, and issued "an order for payment" against the defendants and their bail. But the court by anticipation refused to issue a "monition" to the defendants and their bail to pay the plaintiffs the loss or damage suffered by the plaintiffs' ship; for instead of making the "order for payment" an order to pay the plaintiffs, it ordered "the amount to be paid into court under the decree, not to be paid out till the plaintiffs should consent to a deduction in respect of the damage done to the defendants' ship." Thus in The North American and The Tecla Carmen (1 Lush. 79), where there was no appearance to the cross-action, the court refused to stop the proceedings in the first action, or to refer the damage done to both vessels; but after the report of the registrar on the amount of damage done to the plaintiffs' vessel, refused to make an "order for money" to the plaintiffs until decree should be given in the cross-action, and ordered the amount reported due by the registrar to be paid into the registry. It is obvious that the Court of Admiralty was struggling to effect, in these cases, as the result of the litigation, that only one payment should, in fact, be made, and that such payment should be a payment of the balance between the amounts of the two damages. But the court could not interfere until the moment when it was asked to enforce the decree it had been obliged to make; that is to say, until it was called upon to issue a "monition to pay." That it refused to do. The difficulty in proceeding in a manner in which the court so evidently considered to be just, namely, so as to make the suit end in one payment only, and that a payment of the balance was met by the enactments contained in sect. 34 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861: "The High Court of Admiralty may, on the application to the defendant in any cause of damage, and on his instituting a cross-cause for the damage sustained by him in respect of the same collision, direct that the principal cause and the cross-cause be heard at the same time and upon the same evidence; and if in the principal cause the ship of the defendant has been arrested, or security given by him to answer judgment, and in the cross-cause the ship of the plaintiff cannot be arrested, and the security has not been given to answer judgment therein, the court may, if it think fit, suspend the proceedings in the principal cause until security has been given to answer judgment in the cross-cause." The court, after that statute, could, if the defendant instituted a cross-cause, force the plaintiff to appear to it, and insist that both causes should be heard together. This could be for no other purpose than to arrive directly at the result which had been sought, and which was properly arrived at indirectly in the case of The Seringapatam and The North American. The same result was now procured whether there was at the commencement of the litigation only one cause or a cause and a cross-cause. Before the litigation was ended there was a cause and a cross-cause. But, in such circumstances the two causes, though tried together, and upon the same evidence, were distinct and separate causes just as they had been before: (The Calypso, Swab. 28,) Each therefore proceeded by separate pleading and resulted in form in separate judgments as to liability. In each there was, if the proceedings were formally drawn out, a judgment or decree which declared that both ships were to blame and ordered a reference to the registrar and merchants to ascertain the amount of damage suffered in each cause by the plaintiff's ship. Whether the registrar would thereupon in form hold two separate references I know not. I doubt much whether he ever did. He would, in strictness, I presume make a report in each case though I should think he never did. It may even be that an order for payment would be made in each suit though I much doubt it. But it seems to me impossible to suppose that more than one monition ever issued. It cannot be that the Court of Admiralty ever issued two monitions so as uselessly and ridiculously to force both the parties to pay money, one of them thereby both paying and receiving an identical sum. There must have been one monition and that must have been to pay the balance only, upon which monition, if disobeyed, one attachment alone could issue. One party only was, or may well be said to have been, "made liable in damages."

The question then is how to apply the 54th section of the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act 1862 to such a procedure? The limitation of liability is applicable as well to cases in which the defendant's ship is solely to blame as to cases in which both ships are to blame. It was therefore when the statute was passed, applicable to claims enforced by common law actions as well as to claims enforced in the Admiralty only that the complication arising from action and cross-action in which both ships should be held to blame could only arise in the Admiralty, for upon such a finding in the common law actions neither party could be liable to pay any damages. Again, the limitation might be required either where the only claim against the defendant was by the owner of the other ship or where there were several persons claiming against him. In the former case, if the action were at common law, the amount of the verdict was, I have no doubt upon evidence given, confined to the limitation amount; the verdict being practically the last step in the cause other than mere administrative steps taken as a matter of course, by the party. If the suit were in the Admiralty Court, and the defendants' ship was declared solely to blame, there must have been an inquiry by the court, i e., the registrar and merchants, as to the amount of damage suffered by the plaintiff's ship, and if that amount was greater than the limitation amount, the "order for payment" must have been confined to the limitation amount. But if, in either court, there were several claims in different actions against the defendant, or if several claims were apprehended, the defendant as against all those actual or apprehended claimants, might proceed in Chancery by a bill, or after the Admiralty Court Act 1861, in the Admiralty by a petition for a declaration of the amount of his liability, and for an injunction to stay actions, and for an order as to the distribution of such amount rateably amongst the several claimants. This power was given to the Court of Chancery formerly by the statute 53 Geo. 3, c. 159, s. 7, and afterwards by the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, in part 9, s. 514. It was given to the Court of Admiralty by the Admiralty Court Amendment Act 1861, s. 13. This application by a shipowner was, it must be observed, made in a different action or suit from the collision action or suit, and was made as between the shipowner and parties, who were not parties to any one collision action, or suit. The limitation suit, or petition, might be commenced before or after the judgment as to liability in an Admiralty suit, and, so far as I can see, if before execution, before or after judgment in a common law action. The claim for a limitation of liability as against several or aggregate claims, could not be made by any means in any of the suits brought in the Admiralty for compensation by reason of collision, or in any action at law brought to recover such compensation. And that being so, it seems to me to follow that every such suit or action must, if not stopped by injunction at an earlier stage, have proceeded to judgment as if no statute limiting the liability existed. How then could the statute affect such suit or action if allowed to proceed? Only after judgment, and before execution. Suppose then a cause in the Admiralty by the one shipowner against the other, and a cross cause and judgment in each declaring that both ships were to blame, and ordering inquiry as to the amount of damage suffered by the ship proceeded against; and suppose such inquiry or inquiries held, and report or reports made as to the amount of damage suffered by each ship: if there were no Limitation Act, the one party would obtain an "order for payment" of the balance, and the other party would obtain no order for payment; or at the most one party alone would obtain a monition, and that would be a monition to pay the balance. But then suppose other claims are made or apprehended against him who would have to pay such balance, and he thereupon, in a suit instituted by him, or in a petition presented by him, claims a declaration of limitation of liability. He must claim a declaration to be answerable in damages to all claimants only to the extent of 8*l.* per ton in the aggregate. How would that affect the order for payment already obtained against him? It cannot alter it. The Court of Chancery could not direct the Court of Admiralty to alter its order already properly made in a cause properly before it. The Court of Admiralty could not, on the petition, alter its order given in the cause. There is no such power mentioned in the statutes giving power to declare the limitation. Upon such a petition or in such a suit, the court is directed to declare the amount of limitation, and to distribute such amount among the claimants. There is no other direction. The amount of one claim is in the case supposed already settled. There is no power to unsettle that amount. In such a state of circumstances, therefore, the amount of the shipowner's claim would be the amount already ascertained by the inquiry before the registrar as to the amount to be paid and recovered, which would be the balance ascertained without reference to limitation. If this would be the result where the application by bill in Chancery or by petition in Admiralty was made after judgment declaring liability was given in the collision causes, could the result be different, ought it to be held different, where the application for limitation is made before such judgment is given? Upon such application for limitation the court may or may not, "as it thinks fit," the statute says, restrain further proceeding in the collision causes. The present case is an instance. The Master of the Rolls has not stayed all further proceedings in the collision causes, but on the contrary has directed further proceedings in the limitation cause to stand over until the loss and damages which the plaintiffs and defendants, the Royal Netherlands Steam Navigation Company, have sustained, have been assessed in the Admiralty Division. But the court in the limitation cause does not restrain further proceedings in the collision causes, it cannot give any direction as to the form of proceeding in those causes. Then the proceedings in those causes must follow the ordinary form. In such case, therefore, of cause and cross-cause, and decrees or judgments therein declaring both ships to blame, the inquiry or inquiries before the registrar must proceed in the ordinary form, and then the amount of loss or damage suffered by both vessels must be ascertained, and the balance be ascertained, and so the right to payment in favour of the party to be paid be ascertained, and the amount which he is entitled to be paid ascertained, all in ordinary form. Then, the court acting in the limitation suit interposes and distributes the limitation amount. It seems to me impossible that the court could in such a case distribute upon a different amount than that thus ascertained. Where, therefore, the limitation action or application by petition is instituted after the judgment in a damage cause or causes, or where either of them is instituted before such judgment but no order is made to stay any proceedings in the damage causes, the 54th section of the Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment Act 1862, to be invoked as against several claimants, cannot prevent the more successful party from ascertaining in the usual way and according to the usual rules the amount of loss or damage primarily due to him. In such cases the phrase, "answerable in damages," is applicable to the last proceeding only of the whole litigation; that is to say, to the distribution of the limitation amount among the parties. And if, in such cases, it would and could be applicable only to the last proceeding, it seems to me to follow that it ought only to be applied to the same last proceeding in all cases. If so, where the Court of Chancery in a limitation suit, or the Court of Admiralty on petition, thinks right to stop the proceedings in the Admiralty collision causes before the balance of the two losses is ascertained, and to ascertain itself the balance, it is bound, as it seems to me, to ascertain such balance according to the ordinary rules, and not to apply the 54th section until after such balance is ascertained, and it is about to perform the last act, namely, to distribute the limitation amount.

It is suggested that by such a contruction the plaintiff in the limitation cause, i.e., the defendant in one of the collision causes, is deprived of his right to obtain a deduction in respect of the damage done to his ship, but it does not seem to me that such objection is well founded. He does obtain such deduction. Such deduction is made in order to arrive at the rateable amount in respect of which the other shipowner's share of the distribution is to be paid to him, The amount for which such other shipowner is to prove is the balance between his loss and the loss of the plaintiff in the limitation cause. It is not this, but the other construction which would work relative, if not direct injustice. The owner of the cargo in the one ship suing the other ship in the Admiralty where both ships are pronounced to be in fault, can recover only half the loss or damage done to his cargo: (The Milan, 1 Lush. 388.) But no deduction can be made from the half. Suppose then, by way of example, cross-causes by the two ships, and also a cause by owner of cargo against the ship claiming limitation. Let the limitation amount of the ship B. be 2000*l.*; let the damage to ship A. be 6000*l.*; half the damage to A. is 3000*l.*; half damage to ship B. is 1000*l.*; damage to cargo in ship A. is 6000*l.*; half damage is 3000*l.* Upon the construction of the Limitation Act adopted by the Master of the Rolls ship A. would prove for 2000*l.*, cargo in ship A. would prove for 3000*l.* But by force of the Limitation Statute neither could recover payment of the whole of his loss. The fund to distribute being 2000*l.*, ship A. would recover 800*l.*, cargo in ship A. 1200*l.* But upon the opposite construction ship A., though damaged to the extent of 6000*l.*, the half damage being 3000*l.*, would only be entitled to say that ship B. was liable to pay her 2000*l.* Ship B., damaged to the extent of 2000*l.* would claim 1000*l.* Ship A. would prove only for 1000*l.*; cargo in ship A. would still prove for 3000*l.* The fund to be distributed being still 2000*l.*, ship A. would recover only 500*l.*; cargo in ship A. would recover 1500*l.* The Limitation Act was passed solely in favour of ship B. Why, without any advantage whatever to ship B., should it be construed so as thus to alter the relative rights of ship A. and the cargo of ship A.?

A statute for the purposes of public policy derogating, to the extent of injustice, from the legal rights of individual parties, should be so construed as to do the least possible injustice. This statute, whenever applied, must derogate from the direct right of the shipowner against the other shipowner. Upon the construction suggested by the appeal, it would derogate also from his relative rights as regarding the parties. It should be so construed as to derogate as little as is possible, consistently with its phraseology, from the otherwise legal rights of the party. It seems to me that the phrase "answerable in damages" may be, and therefore on this last rule of construction ought to be, applicable to the last step in litigation; that is to say to the damages, which but for this section would be ultimately payable by the person seeking its protection. It need not, and therefore ought not to be applied until the last stage is reached. If so, it leaves untouched all the preceding steps necessary to ascertain the amount of that last payment which, but for it, would have to be made. In the present case therefore, it is not to be applied until the balance, which would otherwise be payable to the owners of the Vesuvius, is ascertained by the same rules as it would be ascertained irrespective of the Limitation Act. That result is effected by the order of the Master of the Rolls. In my opinion that order is right, and ought to be affirmed.

In consequence of the arguments used before us I have given reasons for my judgment more technical than those given by the Master of the Rolls for his. I, however, entirely agree with him in the larger reasons given by him for his judgment.

Cotton, L.J.—This appeal is against so much of an order of the Master of the Rolls as declares that the defendants are entitled to prove for one moiety of the loss and damage sustained by them less a moiety of the loss and damage sustained by the steamship Savernake, which belonged to the plaintiff, and against the directions consequential on that declaration.

The plaintiff, the owner of the Savernake, commenced an action to obtain the protection given by the Merchant Shipping Acts. Under an order of the Master of the Rolls the plaintiff paid into court the sum fixed by sect. 54 of the Act of 1862 as the amount of his liability, and is entitled to the benefit of that section, which enacts that "the owners of any ship, whether British or foreign, shall not, in cases where all or any of the following events occur without their actual fault or privity—that is to say, first, where any loss of life or personal injury is caused to any person being carried in such ship; secondly, where any damage or loss is caused to any goods, merchandise, or other things whatsoever on board any such ship; thirdly, where any loss of life or personal injury is by reason of the improper navigation of such ship as aforesaid caused to any person carried in any other ship or boat; fourthly, where any loss or damage is, by reason of the improper navigation of such ship as aforesaid, caused to any other ship or boat, or to any goods, merchandise, or other things whatsoever on board any other ship or boat—be answerable in damages in respect of loss of life or personal injury, either alone or together with loss or damage to ships, boats, goods, merchandise, or other things, to any aggregate amount exceeding 15*l.* for each ton of their ship's tonnage; nor in respect of loss or damage to ships, goods, merchandise, or other things, whether there be in addition loss of life or personal injury, or not, to an aggregate amount exceeding 8*l.* for each ton of the ship's tonnage."

Where an action is commenced and money paid into court under sect. 54 of the Act of 1862, the liability is provided for under that Act by proof against the fund paid into court. It is provided that the sum paid into court shall be the limit of the statutory liability for the loss or damage caused by reason of the improper navigation of the ship. The effect of the order of the Master of the Rolls is to deprive the owners of the Savernake of the amount of one-half the damage occasioned to their vessel, for which the owners of the Vesuvius were, by the order of the 24th July 1876, in the Admiralty Court, condemned or declared to be liable, and it does so for the purpose of satisfying a portion of the amount of the damages sustained by the Vesuvius by reason of the improper navigation of the Savernake which, under the Acts referred to, is to be provided for solely out of the fund in court. This is apparently against the words and meaning of the Merchant Shipping Acts and the provisions therein contained limiting the liability of the owners of the Savernake, and certainly is so, if the amount assessed as half the damage to the Vesuvius is the damage for which the owners of the Savernake would, independently of the Act be liable. But it is attempted to support the order appealed from by urging that in the Admiralty Court a monition to enforce payment in such cases is issued only for the balance of the moiety of the loss sustained by the greater sufferer after deducting the moiety of the loss sustained by the other vessel. This, in fact, is the case, and on this it is contended, and I understand this was the view of the Master of the Rolls, that the action and cross action in the Admiralty Court, and all the proceedings therein up to and including the monition, are means taken to ascertain one set only of damages, viz., that to which the greater sufferer is entitled, being the balance mentioned in the monition. I am unable to agree with this view. The monition was preceded by the decree of the 24th July 1876, in which both vessels were declared to be in fault, and each was condemned in a moiety of the claim of the owners of the other vessel. A monition is, according to the practice of the Admiralty Court, the first step in the process to enforce payment, not the declaration of liability, and though it issues only for the balance of the sums for which the parties have been declared liable, each to each, yet this, in my opinion, is done only as a matter of convenience to work out the result of the cross claims and to avoid process being issued by each party against the other. It is said that the monition is the judgment. This depends on the meaning in which the word is used. It is so in the sense of being the order in which process to enforce payment is issued, but, in my opinion, it is not so in the sense of being the order of the court, which declares and establishes the liability. What takes place is, in my opinion, like what frequently occurs in proceedings in the Court of Chancery where parties have cross claims against each other, the amount of which depends upon accounts or enquiries to be taken or made in chambers. In such cases the decree declares the liability of each; the necessary accounts or inquiries to ascertain the amount are directed, and the decree on further consideration directs payment of the balance. Looking to the form of the order of the Master of the Rolls, it can hardly be supposed that he intended the proceedings in the Court of Admiralty to be carried on till a monition for payment was obtained. But even if a monition were obtained in this case, it would not be right (if the view which I take is otherwise correct) that it should be for the balance of half the damage sustained by the Vesuvius after deducting half the damage sustained by the Savernake, for, under the circumstances, there can be no set-off, as the owner of the Savernake has claimed the benefit of the limited liability given by the Act, which leaves to the owners of the Vesuvius a right to be paid a dividend only on the damage sustained by that ship while they, the owners of the Vesuvius, remain liable in full.

For these reasons I agree with Baggallay, L.J., that the order appealed from must be reversed, and that the defendants, the owners of the Vesuvius, must rank against the fund in court for the entire amount of the moiety of the damage to which they have been declared entitled.

APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (ADMIRALTY).

Damages—Collision—Thames Conservancy Rules—Lights—Practice—Costs—36 & 37 Vict. c. 85, s. 17.

The owners of a vessel which has infringed a regulation as to lights, made by a competent authority, must, when plaintiffs, show that that infringement could not have caused or contributed to the collision. It is not necessary for the defendants, who are not counter-claiming for damages, to prove that in point of fact it did cause or contribute to it.

Quære, whether an infringement of the Thames Conservancy Rules 1875 causes the vessel infringing them to be "deemed to be in fault," within the meaning of sect. 17 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85.)

In future the costs in Admiralty appeals, as in all other appeals, will follow the event, notwithstanding the former practice of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in certain Admiralty appeals.

This was an appeal in an action for damage by collision. The action was brought in the Admiralty Division by the owners of the dumb bargee Swansea against the steamship Condor and her owners, the General Steam Navigation Company (Limited). The collision took place in the Lower Pool, river Thames, opposite the Aberdeen Steam Wharf, about midnight on the 24th Oct. 1877. The night was dark but fine and calm, and the tide flood running about three knots. The Swansea was proceeding up the river, in company with two other dumb barges, in tow of the steam launch Jane, at full speed. The two other barges were astern of the launch, and abreast of each other, the Swansea being astern of them, the steam launch had the proper lights for a tug, i.e., two bright white masthead lights vertically in addition to the ordinary side lights. The barges had no lights of any sort.

The Condor was proceeding down the river under steam. There was evidence that the river was very crowded. There was a great conflict of testimony as to what took place on board both vessels before the collision happened, but the Condor's stem struck the Swansea on the port-side abaft the beam. There was no counter-claim on the part of the Condor, and the defence was that, so far as the Condor was concerned, the collision was the result of inevitable accident, and was occasioned by negligence on board the Swansea and the steam launch Jane.

The argument principally turned upon the construction and effect of rule 3 of the Bye-laws for the Navigation of the River Thames, made by the conservators of the river, under the provisions of the Thames Conservancy Acts 1857, 1864, and 1867, and the Thames Navigation Acts 1866 and 1870, and approved by Order in Council of the 17th March 1875, and of Sect. 17 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873. Rule 3, is as follows:

3. The person in charge of the sternmost or last of a line of barges, when being towed, shall exhibit between sunset and sunrise a white light from the stern of his barge.

And the Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85.) sect. 17:

If in case of any collision it is proved to the court before which the case is tried that any of the regulations for preventing collisions contained in or made under the Merchant Shipping Acts 1854 to 1873, has been infringed, the ship by which such regulation has been infringed shall be deemed to be in fault, unless it be shown to the satisfaction of the court that the circumstances of the case made departure from the regulation necessary.

June 20, 1878.—The cause came on for hearing before Sir R. Phillimore and Trinity Masters.

Milward, Q.C. and Phillimore, for plaintiffs, owners of the Swansea.—The bye-law in question has never been properly published; those on board the Swansea, in common with the generality of people using the Thames, had never heard of it; its absence did not cause or contribute to this collision; the Condor could see the barge in plenty of time to have avoided it; the two masthead lights on board the steam tug were notice to her that there were barges in tow. The object of the stern light is to show vessels coming up astern the position of the barges: this is shown by rule 2 of the same bye-laws, which requires all independent dumb barges to have a light ready to show. She knew that vessels in tow coming up with the tide could not be stopped and reversed with the ease of an independent steamer. We did no wrongful act, we were in a proper place and properly navigated; it was the duty of the Condor to keep out of the way, and she did not do so, therefore she is to blame for the collision. A bye-law for the navigation of the river Thames, made by the Conservators of the Thames in 1875, is not a "regulation for preventing collision contained in or made under the Merchant Shipping Acts 1854 to 1873," and therefore the breach of it does not carry with it the consequences that have been held to result from sect. 17 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873.

Butt, Q.C. and Clarkson, for defendants, the General Steam Navigation Company, owners of the Condor.—The barge ought to have carried a light, she did not do so, and therefore has infringed the regulations, and is to blame under sect. 17 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873. The object of the regulation as to lights is not merely to show vessels coming up astern their position, but—since where there is a string of barges in tow, that string may, following the curves of the river or alterations in the course of the tug, be far from a straight line—to show to vessels approaching from any direction where the end of that line is, to allow time to get past in safety. This, in fact, was shown by the fact that the regulations as to exhibiting a light by barges in tow only applies where there is a string of barges. If only a single barge, or two abreast are in tow, the towing lights of the tugs are sufficient notice; but where there is a train, the termination of that train of uncertain length is required to be marked. If there had been a light on the last barge, which was the one we came into collision with, we could have seen her sooner, and should have known she was in tow, and might have avoided the collision. We were hardly moving at all, and the barge swept across our bow. We could do nothing more than we did to avoid the collision. The speed at which the barges were coming up the river was improper, seeing the crowded condition of the navigation, and the admitted difficulty of stopping them when going with the tide.

Milward, Q.C. in reply.

Sir R. Phillimore, after consultation with the Trinity Masters.—This is a case of collision which happened about midnight, or later, on the 24th Oct. 1877, in the river Thames, opposite the Aberdeen Steam Wharf. The vessels which came into collision were the Swansea, a dumb barge in tow of a tug called the Jane, and the steamship Condor. The stem of the Condor went into the port midships of the Swansea, abaft her beam, and did her considerable damage. The state of the weather may be taken, both on the admissions of the Condor and on the general result of the evidence, to have been what is well known and often described in this court as "clear but dark," and the pilot of the Condor, in his evidence, states distinctly that it was a night in which lights could be seen at a reasonable distance. The main defence, as it appears, and I think was hardly denied by the counsel for the Condor in this case, was, that, looking at the crowded state of the river and other circumstances, the collision was the result of unavoidable accident. In the first place, I have consulted the Elder Brethren on the nautical points of the case—there are several points of this nature that present themselves more for their opinion than for mine—and we have no doubt whatever that the Jane, with her three barges, two immediately astern of her and one immediately astern of the two, were properly navigated on the north side of the mid-channel. with this one exception, that she disobeyed the rule of the Thames Conservancy, which was binding on her, and which is in these words [His Lordship read rule 3, and proceeded:] There was a clear infringement of this rule here, for no such light was exhibited from the stern of the last barge. The defence—that the parties were ignorant of the existence of the rule, and that it was generally not observed—is not valid, in my judgment, and I should be very sorry that anything I should say should by any possibility lead to the conclusion that the court would listen to such a defence as this. Therefore there has been in this case what amounts to a direct infringement of the 17th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85), and the court is at liberty to consider whether the disobedience to the rule I have referred to did or did not contribute to the collision in this case. (a) The elder Brethren are very clearly of opinion, and I agree with them, that it did not contribute to the collision. What is necessary for the decision of this case may be stated in a few words. The Condor's engines had been stopped previous to clearing the single barge that was lying about mid-river. Those on board the Condor, it appears from the evidence, had seen the lights of the tug Jane with barges in tow, crossing her bows, as the pilot and captain of the Condor say. Now, if the pilot of the Condor had not set her engines on, as he did do, until the tug and the barges that

(a) This sentence is a correct transcript of the judgment of the court below as printed for the appeal; but there would appear to be some typographical error in it, having regard to the decided cases in sect. 17 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873, and the fact that it has never been decided that the Thames Conservancy Rules are such "regulations" as are contemplated by that section.

the tug was towing had passed clear of her, there would have been, in the judgment of the Elder Brethren, in which I agree, no collision. The collision was caused by the Condor going ahead before the tug got clear. The Elder Brethren are also of opinion that the tug Jane was quite right in going full speed, as by so doing the chance of a collision was lessened. I must therefore pronounce the Condor alone to blame for the collision.

From this judgment the defendants appealed.

The appeal was heard on 29th and 31st March 1879, before James, Baggallay, and Bramwell, L.JJ. (assisted by two nautical assessors).

Butt, Q.C. and Clarkson, for appellants.

Milward, Q.C. and Phillimore for respondents.

The arguments used were the same as those reported in the court below.

James, L.J.—We have had the opportunity of considering this case with our nautical assessors, who, as well as ourselves, have very carefully read the evidence, and heard the arguments based upon it, and we find ourselves unable to concur with the judgment given in the court below. Bearing in mind the crowded state of the river, and the fact that the Condor was compelled to do something to get out of the way of another barge drifting up in mid-river, she did nothing, in our opinion, except give herself the very smallest headway possible to enable her to clear that barge. There was nothing in what the Condor did to render her liable to a charge of bad seamanship, or neglect, or other improper conduct in clearing that barge, but it brought her into the place where the collision occurred with the barge Swansea, which was going up the river, together with other barges, in tow of a steam tug, and which (it is not immaterial to consider) were going up the river at full speed, as great a speed as the tug could go, and with a strong flood-tide giving an additional speed of two or three knots an hour. The Condor, moreover, was placed in a position of additional difficulty by another matter, in the view of which, taken by the court below, we cannot agree—the absence of a light. It is quite clear that the steam tug, with its train of barges, in coming up the river under the circumstances I have mentioned, did violate the express rule of navigation of the Thames, by not having a light on the stern of the barge which should have carried it; the object of which must be to give everybody, having anything to do with the navigation of the river, notice of what it is they are likely to come into collision with. If the steam tug and its barges had shown that light, it is impossible to know what would have been the conduct of the master and pilot of the Condor on seeing it, and knowing that the tug and barges were coming full speed up the river incapable of stopping themselves. If the steam tug had been, like the Condor, without the burthen of barges behind it, it seems to me it would have been as much the duty of the steam tug to stop as of the Condor. Their duty would have been the same each to the other. But the steam tug could not stop her barges, and there was no notice given to the Condor that that state of things existed. There was nothing to inform the Condor of the fact that there was a train of barges behind the tug, and she had to deal with the lights in the river as they appeared to her. In the absence of that intimation, the circumstances being so likely to throw the Condor into a difficulty, I cannot consider that we ought to hold the master of the Condor to blame for not having done that which he might have done, or rather for having done that which he probably would not have done if he had known what the true state of affairs was, and if he had had that full intimation which he ought to have received from the tug and barges by the exhibition of that light which plainly, by the rules, ought to have been exhibited.

Baggallay, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It appears to me that the Condor was in a position of very considerable difficulty. The navigable portion of the river is very narrow where the collision happened, and there were a number of barges about. There was a strong adverse tide, and she was therefore obliged to keep her engines going ahead to a certain extent to stem the tide and keep steerage way. I am unable to take the same view that was taken in the court below as to the absence of a proper light in the stern of the last barge in tow, and it appears to me that, having regard to all the circumstances, the Condor adopted a reasonable course, and the accident was the result of circumstances which could not have been avoided by her. In point of fact she might have a right to assume, seeing the mast-head lights in the steam tug, and no other light indicating where the tow ended, that there were only one barge or two barges abreast astern of the steam tug, and had there been no more than that, the accident would not have occurred, for in the result the first two passed by safely, and it was only the last barge, which had no light on it, which was struck. I agree therefore with James, L.J., that the judgment of the court below should be reversed.

Bramwell, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The learned judge in the court below, after stating a few of the facts, says that "the main defence . . . was, that . . . the collision was the result of unavoidable accident;" but it seems to me that we should consider what was the conduct on the part of the plaintiffs. I asked the counsel for the plaintiffs why it was wrong for the Condor to get way on her as she did; but he did not, to my mind, give a satisfactory answer to that question. I could not think that that act was wrong in itself, unless there was some reason to suppose that there was something for her to run against, and I cannot see that there was such reason.

Clarkson applied for costs below and of appeal. There is now one uniform practice in the Court of Appeal as to costs:

The City of Berlin, 2 P. Div. 187; 37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 307.

The practice of the Court of Admiralty was not uniform to the contrary:

The Innisfail; The Secret, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 819.

Milward, contra.—When a collision is the result of inevitable accident it has always been the rule in the Court of Admiralty and the Privy Council that there should be no order as to costs; and this court, sitting as a Court of Appeal in Admiralty causes, will follow the practice of the Privy Council in such cases:

The City of Cambridge, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 781;
The Corinna, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 781;
The Daoiz, 37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 137.

James, L.J.—With regard to the question of costs in this case, it is quite clear, from what has been said on both sides, that there has been a general impression in the profession that the old rule of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council should be followed, and there is colour for that opinion in the decisions which have been shown to us by the registrar, and it appears that this court, in a particular case, decided the same thing. We think that requires great consideration, and we should consider whether it can be right that there should be one rule as to costs in one branch of the High Court of Justice, and another rule in another branch of that court. I think in future that the rule will in every case follow the result, as it does in other branches of the High Court; but we are not prepared to apply that rule for the first time in this case. I am not satisfied with the evidence given on behalf of the Condor, and on the general facts of the case, and all the circumstances, and with regard to the former decision of this court, I think we should dismiss the action without costs. I think it may be considered as settled that for the future there will be no difference as to the costs between Admiralty and other appeals.

Baggallay and Bramwell, L.JJ. concurred.

Appeal allowed and action dismissed, but without costs either below or on appeal.

The Lauretta.

APPEAL FROM ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

Admiralty appeal—Costs—Both vessels to blame—Motion by way of cross appeal—Rules of Supreme Court, Order LVIII., r. 6.

The fact that respondents in an appeal from the Admiralty Division, where both have been held to blame, have given notice under Order LVIII., r. 6, of their intention to ask for a variation of the decree below makes no difference in the practice of dismissing the appeal with costs if the judgment below be confirmed, provided such costs as are occasioned by the respondent's notice will be deducted.

An action in rem was brought by the owners of the City of New York (Inman Line) against the brigantine Lauretta to recover damages for a collision between the two vessels, and the owners of the Lauretta counter-claimed for the damages sustained by their vessel in the same collision.

The action was tried in the Admiralty Division on the 16th April 1878, and the judge (Sir R. Phillimore) pronounced both vessels to blame and made the usual decree.

From this decree the owners of the City of New York appealed, giving notice of appeal in accordance with Order LVIII., rr. 2 and 4. The owners of the Lauretta thereupon gave notice under Order LVIII., r. 6, that they intended on the hearing of the appeal to contend that the decision of the court below should be varied by pronouncing the City of New York alone to blame.

The Court of Appeal, after hearing counsel for the appellants and respondents, confirmed the finding of the court below, and dismissed the appeal.

Myburgh and Phillimore (with them Aspinall, Q.C. and Goldney), for the respondents, applied for costs of the appeal.—The notice given by the respondents does not affect their right to costs, as they could, under Order LVIII., r. 6, have raised any question as to the decree without notice. The notice has occasioned no extra costs. All the costs have been occasioned by the appellants appealing. They brought the respondents here. The notice is not a cross appeal, such as was necessary in the Privy Counsel, and the respondents could never have been before this court at all if the appellants had not appealed.

Butt, Q.C. (with him Milward, Q.C. and Clarkson), for the respondent, submitted that the notice was in fact a cross appeal, and that it had always been the practice of the Privy Council to leave each party to pay his own costs; here there were cross appeals, and both vessels were held to blame.

James, L.J.—There appears to me to be no necessity under the Rules of the Supreme Court, Order LVIII., r. 6, to give this notice at all. All questions could be raised without the notice. Hence the respondents have done more than they need. The appeal will be dismissed with costs, but if any costs have been occasioned by the respondents' notice these costs will be deducted.

Bramwell and Baggallay, L.JJ. concurred.

Wright v. The New Zealand Shipping Company.

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Ship—Charter-party—Action for delay in discharging—Duty of charterer—Reasonable time—Circumstances at port of discharge.

Where the time to be allowed for unloading is not named in a charter-party, the charterer is bound, on the arrival of the ship at the usual place of discharge within the port of discharge, to provide sufficient appliances of the kind ordinarily in use at the port for the purpose of unloading, and it is no answer to a claim for damages for delay in unloading to show that the delay was caused by the crowded state of the port.

The action was brought by the plaintiff, owner of the ship China, against the defendants, charterers, for not unloading the ship at the port of discharge within a reasonable time. The ship was chartered by the defendants to carry a general cargo from London to Port Lyttleton, in New Zealand, and there deliver, "as per bills of lading, into lighters alongside or at the wharf, as charterers' agents might direct, ship being always afloat; cargo to be brought to and taken from alongside, free of expense and risk to the ship." The ship loaded in London, and sailed for New Zealand on the 14th Nov. 1873, and arrived at Port Lyttleton on the 17th March 1874. On the 18th March 1874 she was placed in a discharging berth, over a mile from the town, as she drew too much water to go alongside the wharf. The usual mode of discharge for vessels not able to go alongside the wharf at Port Lyttleton was at that time by means of lighters. The ship was ready to commence discharging on the 19th March 1874, but no lighters were sent to her by the charterers' agents till the 30th March, when she commenced discharging. The discharging went on at intervals till the 29th May 1874, when it was completed. The ship was at Port Lyttleton seventy-three days before her discharge was complete; of these days there were twelve days before the discharge was commenced, eleven Sundays and fifteen days when there was no discharging. The usual time taken in discharging vessels of the class of the China was from thirty to forty days, all included. The trial took place at the spring Northumberland assizes 1878, before Pollock, B., and the plaintiff gave evidence to show that the time of a vessel's arrival from England could be calculated within ten days; that at the time of the arrival of the China there was a greater number or rush of vessels in the port than usual, of which the greater part were chartered to the defendants; that many of these vessels were chartered for the passage out and home, and contained provisions fixing the time for loading and discharging, and providing for the payment of demurrage in case of delay, and that consequently it was the defendants' interest to discharge and load these vessels before unloading the China, and that they did so. The defendants relied upon the fact that, at the time when the ship arrived at the port of discharge, Port Lyttleton, in New Zealand, the port was crowded with vessels, and there were only a limited number of lighters in the port, the consequence of which was that it became impossible to unload the ship as soon as she could have been unloaded if there had been a sufficient number of lighters in the port to meet the requirements of all the vessels which were there at the time, or if the port had not been so crowded with shipping. The time when the ship arrived was the time of year when the port was generally most crowded. There were a considerable number of other vessels in the port besides the China, either belonging to or chartered by the defendants, and it was alleged on behalf of the defendants that they distributed all the lighters which they could obtain between the ships which they were discharging, including the China.

The learned judge, without giving any specific direction as to what was to be considered a reasonable time, asked the jury whether the vessel had been loaded in a reasonable time under the circumstances.

A verdict was found for the defendants, and the Divisional Court (Cockburn, C. J. and Mellor, J.) set the verdict aside as being against the weight of evidence, and directed a new trial, but refused to grant the rule on the ground of misdirection.

The defendants appealed.

Cave, Q.C. and Hugh Shield, for the defendants, contended that the crowded state of the port, being usual at the time of year at which the ship arrived, must be taken to be an ordinary circumstance of the port, that the impossibility of obtaining sufficient lighters discharged the defendants from their liability to unload within what would otherwise have been a reasonable time, and that the verdict was justified by the evidence given at the trial.

Herschell, Q.C. and J. P. Aspinall, for the plaintiff, contended that the difficulties which the defendants relied upon as having relieved them from their obligation under the charter-party were such as they were themselves bound to provide against, and they could not throw the consequences upon the plaintiff; and further that, in any case, the verdict was against the weight of evidence:

Adams v. The Royal Mail Steam Packet Company, 5 C. B. N. S. 492; 28 L. J. 33, C. P.; and Ford v. Cotesworth, 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 190, 468; 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 634; L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 127; 38 L. J. 52, Q. B., affirmed in Exchequer Chamber, 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 165; L. Rep. 5 Q.B. 282; 39 L. J. 188, Q. B., were cited.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 28.—Bramwell, L.J.—I am of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed. I think the order of the court below was right. I think the verdict was against the evidence, so that it ought to be set aside. In order to show that I think so, it is necessary for me to consider what I hold to be the law upon this matter.

Now, the charter-party contains no statement as to the number of days in which the charterers should be entitled to discharge the vessel; they were therefore bound to do it within a reasonable time. Now, in my judgment, a reasonable time for doing a thing is the time within which it can be done, working reasonably. What I mean to say is this: you are to look at the time necessary for doing the act without taking into account the time that may have been, or might under the particular circumstances be, necessary for the man who has to do it to make his preparations. Applying that rule to this particular case, it seems to me that the defendants, upon the arrival of the ship, were bound to have—I do not mean, as I said before, lighters on the shore ready manned to start off, but were bound to have lighters presently, or immediately, or forthwith, or within a reasonable time, ready to discharge the ship, and were not entitled to say, "We had not got them, not through any fault of ours, but because there were only a certain number of lighters there, and there were other ships which required those lighters, belonging to other people, and we could not get them, and we behaved reasonably and fairly to you in getting lighters for you as soon as we could." To my mind, that is no answer; they must do the thing, and they must be ready to do it, and being ready, they must do it within a reasonable time.

Now, if that is the law, it is manifest that this verdict is against the evidence, because the case of the defendants is, not that they did it within a reasonable time in such a way as I have mentioned, but that they did it in a reasonable time, taking into account the embarrassment they were under on account of there being only a certain number of lighters, and a large collection of ships. Of course, in considering a case of this sort, you would have to take into account what one may call the physical conditions of the port. If the vessel cannot get within two miles the charterer must have a longer time for unloading her than if she came within a few yards. Things of that sort may be taken into account, but not such as are relied upon by the defendants in this case. A difficulty was suggested as to a ship being bound to go to a certain place, and that place not being accessible. It seems to me that if the condition or the obligation of the defendant was to have that place ready, why then it was his place, or, if he was in any way bound to have it ready, he is responsible, although it may be occupied by anything else; but if he is not bound to have it ready, as in the case of a dock which I put, where the dock is not his dock, where both parties have agreed that the ship shall be discharged there, and the ship cannot get into the dock on account of some defect at the entrance of the dock, which is not the fault of the shipowner or the charterer, then the charterer is not liable, nor is the shipowner; neither of them has made any default in doing the thing within a reasonable time, and it would be as unreasonable to say in such a case that the charterer had not discharged the ship within a reasonable time as it would be to say the shipowner had not got his ship into dock within a reasonable time; neither statement would be well founded. I cannot help thinking the illustration I gave was a good one. I order a coat of a tailor, and he must make it in a reasonable time. What is that? Why it is the reasonable time required by a man who has got workmen and needles and cloth, and other things for making a coat. In considering what is a reasonable time, he must not say that he ought to have some time for buying the cloth and to go and get workmen and the materials necessary.

Lord Justice Cotton has been good enough to read to me what he is going to say upon this. He has put down his view of what the law is on the matter, with which I entirely agree.

Cotton, L.J.—I agree in thinking there must be a new trial; that is to say, that even according to the ruling of the learned judge at the trial, the court from which the appeal comes was right in saying the case must go back, and that really disposes of the appeal; but I think it would not be right, as it is to go back for a new trial, not to say what, after argument, in our opinion is the law applicable to the case, in order that there may be no necessity for the case coming again to this court, after a further trial, on a question of law.

Now the contract is one imposing an obligation on the charterer to unload within a reasonable time, nothing being said about the time to be taken; that is, in law, that he must do it within a reasonable time. When that is the contract there always arises a difficulty as to what is meant by "reasonable time," and I think the difficulty always arises in this way, from not considering what the obligations of the parties are, and not considering what facts are to be taken into account as between the parties to the contract in estimating what is reasonable. Therefore, I propose to state what I consider is the obligation of the charterer under those circumstances, what he is entitled to take into account in his favour in fixing what is a reasonable time, and what he is not—not of course exhaustively, but as applicable to this particular case, and to some extent to all cases.

Now, I apprehend, in saying anything determining whether an obligation of this sort has been performed within a reasonable time, we must take it that this is an obligation of the charterer, namely, that he must provide at the port of discharge sufficient appliances of the kind ordinarily in use at the port, and that he must have them ready either when the ship arrives or within a short time (one might say a reasonable time, but that would be ambiguous) within, we may say, a day, or a couple of days, after the arrival of the ship. Possibly, cases may arise where a ship arriving unexpectedly, much more shortly than could reasonably have been expected, a longer delay might be claimed and allowed than in ordinary cases where the ship arrives at the time when she is expected, and when there was no difficulty in knowing when she would come. I say appliances of the kind ordinarily used in the port for which the ship is destined, because of course it is not reasonable that the charterer should be supposed to provide at the port appliances which are in use in some ports, such as the port of London, which would never be expected to be provided, and never be deemed to be in the contemplation of the parties as being provided, at such a port as that we are dealing with—a port in New Zealand; then, I take it, he must provide a sufficient number of them, and have them ready in order to make use of the appliances provided for unloading the ship, and although he is not bound to work during the whole of the twenty-four hours, he must work during the ordinary time of working at that port where the ship is to unload.

That being so, for what is allowance to be made? I apprehend the first allowance applicable to the present case is this, that allowance must be made if any difficulty or delay arises from the natural or physical peculiarities of the port; such, for instance, as this, that the ship is obliged to lie at some considerable distance from the land, or that in particular winds, or those which in ordinary ports would not be of such strength as to prevent a ship being unloaded into lighters, yet, in that particular port, owing to its exposure to a particular quarter, or the particular character of the port in other respects, it is not safe, speaking reasonably, to unload during that time; and then if a ship could be more conveniently unloaded by bringing it, after a portion of its cargo is taken out, nearer to the shore, then for any interruption of the work really caused by bringing it there, allowance is also to be made. Whether or no the work of unloading can be going on during the removing or changing of the berth, would be a question upon which the jury must give their opinion. Of course, allowance must be made for that, and I should say allowance must also be made for any holidays usually observed at the port, during which working men will not work, such as in the present case, Easter Monday.

Now, I do not mean to say that there may not be other allowances, but those allowances affecting the present case appear to me to be allowances to which the charterer is entitled. But is he entitled to that on which his counsel relied in the present case? As I understood his argument, it was this: "I had a number of ships in this port, and besides my own ships there were a number of others, the number of lighters at the port being limited, and what I did was this, without favour to anybody I used such lighters as I had got, and the number of other ships belonging to other persons allowed me, and distributed them fairly between the ships." Now upon that point I think the verdict was unsatisfactory, having regard to the evidence. But is that law? Now, in my opinion, it is not. In my opinion, for the purpose of determining what was a reasonable time on the contract between the plaintiff and the defendant, the defendant is not entitled to excuse delay that would otherwise be inexcusable by saying, "I sent so many ships to that port that the lighters which I engaged did not enable me to unload your ship within what would otherwise (and if I had not taken those other ships to that port) have been a reasonable time." In my opinion he cannot excuse his delay by claiming an allowance for the time during which he used his lighters, which could have been used for that ship, for the purpose of unloading other ships sent by him to the port. In my opinion it was his duty as between himself and the owner of the ship to provide sufficient appliances for unloading the ship. In like manner, in my opinion, he cannot excuse his delay by saying, "there were at the port other vessels not belonging to me, so many in number as to prevent me from applying the appliances which otherwise might be applied to the purpose of unloading the ship."

That, in my opinion, must be the principle on which to decide what, upon the contract between these parties, is or is not a reasonable time for unloading according to the charter.

Thesiger, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

The contract between the parties to this action was that which the law implies, namely, that the ship should be unloaded at the port of her discharge within a reasonable time. A reasonable time means a reasonable time under ordinary circumstances, and in the absence of some stipulation altering the implied contract between the parties the charterers would not be relieved from the fortuitous and unforeseen impediments affecting only the due performance by them of their part of the contract. This seems to be the result of the case of Adams v. The Royal Mail Steampacket Company (5 C. B. N. S. 492; 28 L. J. 33. C. P.), and the case of Ford v. Cotesworth (3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 190, 468).

In the present case it is proved that at Port Lyttleton about thirty-five working days would in general be occupied in discharging a vessel of the burden of the China, loaded as she was loaded under the charter-party in question; but it is said on the part of the defendants that at the particular time of the year at which she arrived at the port the concourse of vessels was, as a yearly occurrence, such that lighters could not be obtained regularly enough to discharge the vessel within the time mentioned. Now, although that circumstance might be one which did as a matter of fact occur at the same time in each year, that was not, in my opinion, an ordinary circumstance of the port the consequence of which the shipowner was called upon to bear. He has a right to assume, when he contracts to discharge the cargo into lighters, that the charterers will provide a proper supply of lighters to unload the cargo within such time as would be reasonable, having regard to the character of the vessel and the quantity and description of the cargo; and the effect of there not being sufficient lighters for the purpose is one of those fortuitous and unforeseen (unforeseen at least as regards the shipowner) impediments affecting only the due performance by the charterers of their part of the contract, and from the consequences of which they are not relieved. And, as a matter of common fairness, they ought not to be relieved from them unless some express stipulation on the point is made in the contract of charter, and for this reason, namely, that the shipowner cannot in any way control the arrangements as to lighters, and cannot be supposed to know the times at which, owing to the circumstances of the particular port, there may be a difficulty in obtaining them. He therefore makes his arrangements for the employment of his vessel with reference to the time within which, under ordinary circumstances, and amongst them the circumstance of a due supply of lighters, his vessel will be discharged. On the other hand, the charterers have a control as well as knowledge in the matter, and can, if they choose, make special arrangements to meet special emergencies, and if they do not choose to make those special arrangements in order that the charterer's vessel may be unloaded within a time which would be a reasonable time, under what the shipowner would naturally and properly assume to be the ordinary circumstances of the port, it is but reasonable that they should indemnify the shipowner for the loss thereby sustained.

If this be the law it is clear—and indeed it was admitted by counsel for the defendants—that the jury had not the law presented to them as it should have been, and for that reason, therefore, there should be a new trial; but even assuming that the difficulties in obtaining lighters, caused by the rush of vessels to the port of discharge at the particular time in question, were to be taken into account in favour of the defendants, I am further of opinion, upon the grounds which have already been stated, that the verdict was against the evidence, and should be set aside.

Bramwell, L.J.—I quite agree with every word spoken by Lord Justice Thesiger. The judgment will be affirmed. Appeal dismissed.

Sale of goods — Divisible contract — Shipment "per vessel or vessels" — Rescission.

Plaintiffs contracted to sell to defendants "about 25 tons (more or less) Penang black pepper, Oct. and Nov. shipment, from Penang to London, per sailing vessel or vessels . . . the name of the vessel or vessels, marks, &c., to be declared to the buyer in writing within sixty days from date of bill of lading." Plaintiffs within the contract time declared 25 tons of pepper shipped in one vessel, of which 20 tons were properly shipped and declared, but 5 tons were shipped in Dec., and defendants in consequence refused to accept the whole quantity. Subsequently plaintiffs declared 5 tons of Nov. shipment in substitution for the 5 tons shipped in Dec., but this declaration was made more than sixty days after date of bill of lading, and defendants refused to accept it. On the vessel arriving in England, plaintiffs as a performance of their contract, tendered the 20 tons properly shipped and declared, and the 5 tons properly shipped but declared after the contract time had elapsed. Defendants refused to accept any of the pepper so tendered, and plaintiffs claimed damages for such refusal.

Held, per Cotton and Thesiger, L.JJ. (Brett, L.J. dissenting), that the contract time for declaration was an essential condition; that the contract was not divisible; and that defendants therefore were entitled to reject the whole 25 tons.

Brandt v. Lawrence (L. Rep. 1 Q. B. Div. 344) discussed and distinguished.

Per Brett, L.J.: The defendants were bound to take delivery of the 20 tons, as the contract was divisible, and the incurable failure of plaintiffs to deliver the 5 tons according to the contract was a breach as to part only of the consideration, which could be compensated in damages.

Appeal from a decision of Lord Coleridge, C.J.

The action was to recover damages for loss alleged to have been sustained through the defendants' refusal to take delivery of 25 tons of pepper under a contract of sale made between the plaintiffs and defendants.

At the trial, before Lord Coleridge, C.J. and a special jury, the learned judge ordered judgment to be entered for defendants.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 9.—The following judgments were delivered:

Brett, L.J.—In this case the facts which I consider material are, that a contract of purchase and sale was entered into between the plaintiffs and defendants on the 29th Dec. 1876. By it the plaintiffs sold to the defendants about 25 tons, more or less, Penang black pepper, October and November shipment from Penang to London, per sailing vessel or vessels, at $4\frac{3}{16}d.$ per pound. The name of the vessel or vessels, marks, and full particulars to be declared to the buyer in writing within sixty days from date of bill of lading; but, should the vessel or vessels which may apply to this contract be lost before declaration, this contract to be cancelled as far as regards such lost vessel, &c. Should the vessel or vessels and the pepper, or any portion thereof, be lost, this contract to be cancelled for the whole or such portion, &c. Prompt three months from final day of landing; deposit 20*l.* per cent., and difference on presentation of weight notes; no discount. In fulfilment of this contract the plaintiffs, on the 22nd Jan., within sixty days of the dates of three respective bills of lading of pepper, shipped on board a vessel called the Borga, declared in one declaration three distinct parcels of pepper, all on board the Borga, thus: S.B.; B. 285 bags, bill of lading dated 29th Nov.; C. 110 bags, bill of lading, dated the 29th Nov.; F. 105, bill of lading, dated the 11th Dec. Two of the parcels, which amounted to 20 tons, were shipped and declared in accordance with the contract, but the third parcel, although declared within due time after date of bill of lading, did not fulfil the contract, because it was not a November shipment. The plaintiffs were asked whether this declaration, which both parties called a tender, was final, and answered that it was. On the 27th Jan. the plaintiffs asked whether the defendants would accept the December shipment named in the declaration of the 22nd Jan. No definite answer was given, but on the 2nd Feb. the defendants refused the whole, on the ground that a part was not a November shipment. It is somewhat difficult to appreciate the legal effect of this refusal. I know of no legal obligation to accept or reject a declaration which is an act to be done solely by the seller, nor of any legal effect to be given to an alleged refusal to accept a declaration. The highest effect which can be given to this refusal at this time is that it is a notice by the defendant that he does not accept the declaration as good for 25 tons. On the 5th Feb. the defendants wrote to substitute for the December shipment a November shipment, which was also on board the Borga. The date of the bill of lading of this lot was the 29th Nov.—that is to say, they offered a November shipment. But they made the offer or declaration more than sixty days after the date of the bill of lading. This was refused by the defendants. The Borga arrived in June. The plaintiffs tendered three parcels of Penang pepper, all of November shipment, and amounting in all to 25 tons, being the two parcels of November shipments declared on the 22nd Jan., and the one parcel offered or declared on the 2nd Feb., but which last was not declared within sixty days of the date of the bill of lading relating to it. The defendants refused to accept any part, on the ground, by reference to their former letter as to the declaration, that they would not receive a part if offered, because the whole had not been declared according to contract.

Upon this state of facts it is obvious that the declaration of 20 tons, per Borga, made on the 22nd Jan. was a different declaration of 20 tons, unless the declaration of so much was rendered nugatory by the wrong declaration of the other 5 tons, the December shipment; and it is equally obvious that after the 28th Jan. the plaintiffs could not make a valid declaration of any November shipment. So that on the arrival of the ship in June the plaintiffs could only tender as well shipped, and also well declared, 20 tons, and could not by any contrivance tender as well shipped, and also well declared, the other 5 tons. The plaintiffs did tender 25 tons. If the defendants had refused on the ground of having 25 tons offered to them, whereof they were only bound to take 20 tons, so that they had left it open to be said that if the 20 tons had been offered to them they might have accepted them, then the tender of the 25 tons must have been bad; but the defendants did not take that point. They refused in terms which amounted to saying that they would not take the 25 tons, nor the 20 tons if offered, because they could not have 25 tons shipped and also declared according to contract. This refusal seems to me to have absolved the plaintiffs from the necessity of tendering separately the 20 tons, and to oblige us to treat the case of liability as if the plaintiffs had tendered the 20 tons at the time when they tendered the 25 tons. The question is whether, if the plaintiffs had tendered the 20 tons only, not being able to tender according to contract any 5 tons to make up the 25 tons, the defendants could have refused to accept the 20 tons.

That raises, first, the question, What is the proper construction of the contract?

In Jonasshon v. Young (4 B. & S. 296) an action was brought for not accepting coals. The contract was that the plaintiffs would sell and deliver to the defendant as many coals, equal to a former sample cargo, as a steamer called the Great Northern could fetch in nine months, proceeding to and from Sunderland, from and to London, backwards and forwards, in successive voyages, the steamer to be sent by the defendants, and the plaintiffs to ship the coals at 5*s.* 9*d.* per ton, payments at the beginning of each month for the preceding month's shipments, less 2½ per cent discount. The defendants pleaded that on the first voyage the plaintiffs shipped a cargo not equal to sample. To this plea there was a demurrer. The failure of the first cargo was therefore admitted. It was impossible that the plaintiffs could by any subsequent deliveries satisfy the contract if it was one and indivisible; but the court held that the plea was bad, because the breach by the plaintiff went only to part of the consideration. Now, the consideration for the whole of the defendants' undertaking—which was of course the undertaking to accept and to pay for all which the plaintiffs were to deliver—was that the plaintiffs undertook to deliver all, and to deliver a cargo each time that the defendants should send the steamer. The judgment is that the failure to deliver the first cargo according to the contract, though an incurable failure, did not absolve the defendants from the duty of accepting the subsequent cargoes, because the failure as to the first cargo was only a breach of a part of the consideration moving from the plaintiffs. Apply that case to the question raised is this. Here the whole consideration for the defendants' promise to accept the pepper was the plaintiff's promise to deliver the whole 25 tons. The plaintiffs were ready and willing to deliver 20 tons, but failed by an incurable failure to be able to deliver the other 5 tons. The case cited answers that the failure of the plaintiffs is a breach only of part of the consideration, and the defendants are not absolved from the duty of accepting the 20 tons.

In Simpson v. Crippin (L. Rep. 8 Q. B. 14) the action was for non-delivery of coal. The defendants agreed to supply the plaintiffs with from 6000 to 8000 tons of coal, to be delivered into defendant's waggons, at plaintiff's collieries, in equal monthly quantities during the period of twelve months, from 1st July, at 5s. 6d. per ton; terms, cash monthly, 2½ per cent. discount. The plaintiffs failed to send waggons according to the contract in the first month. That was an incurable failure. Their part of the whole contract never could afterwards be fulfilled. The judge told the jury that, as the plaintiffs did not intend to break the contract month by month, and only broke it for the first month's delivery, that did not justify the defendants in point of law in cancelling the contract. "It cannot be denied," says Blackburn, J., "that the plaintiffs were bound in every month to send waggons capable of carrying at least 500 tons, and that by failing to perform this term they have committed a breach of the contract, and the question is whether by this breach the contract was determined. The defendants contend that the sending of a sufficient number of waggons by the plaintiffs to receive the coal was a condition precedent to the continuance of the contract. No sufficient reason has been urged why damages would not be a compensation for the breach by the plaintiffs, and why the defendants should be at liberty to annul the contract. Apply the case to the present. The point taken on the behalf of the defendants is that, by reason of the incurable breach as to the five tons, the plaintiffs are entitled to rescind the contract as to the twenty tons. The answer is, no sufficient reason has been shown why damages would not be a compensation for the breach by the plaintiffs as to the five tons.

In Brandt v. Lawrence (L. Rep. 1 Q. B. Div. 344) the action was for non-acceptance of oats. By the contract the defendant bought of the plaintiff 4500 quarters of Russian oats, at 28s. per quarter delivered 304lbs., including freight and insurance, to London; shipment by steamer or steamers during February; payment by cash on receipt of [and in exchange for shipping documents, less interest at one-fifth per cent. for the unexpired portion of three months from date of bill of lading. In fulfilment the plaintiff tendered 11,392 quarters, per Winsland. The defendant, for a given reason, refused to accept them. The plaintiff afterwards tendered the balance of quantity brought by a ship called the Oxford, but brought too late. At the time of action brought, therefore, the plaintiff had tendered in good time a part of the oats, but had never tendered, and never could tender, the balance within the terms of the contract, if treated as one and indivisible. It was argued for the defendant that the contract was an entire contract for the delivery of 4500 quarters of oats within a specified time. It could not be split into parts. If the whole was not shipped in time the defendant was entitled to reject the part which was in time. The Q. B. Div. thought that this was not so, because the contract says "Shipment by steamer or steamers." In the Court of Appeal Mellish, L.J., said, "I think the legal inference is that it was intended that the shipment should be made (which might mean might be made) in different parcels, and that the purchaser was bound to accept them as they came, if they were in time;" and, again, "was the purchaser bound to accept that part of the goods which was shipped in time? I am of opinion that he was, because the contract says that the shipment is to be made by steamer or steamers. That judgment was rested solely on the construction of the contract.

No reliance was placed on any power of election by the seller to send by two ships instead of one. As the case stood it was the same as if he had only shipped a portion by one ship and had never shipped the other portion by any ship. The late shipment was no shipment according to the contract. Apply that case to the present. The contention here is that the defendant was not bound to accept the twenty tons, because there was no shipment and declaration of five tons according to contract. The question is, was the defendant the purchaser bound to accept that part of the goods which was shipped and declared in time? The answer according to the judges in the Queen's Bench and in error in the case cited is that he was, because the contract says that the shipment is to be, i.e., may be, in sailing vessel or vessels. Mellish, L.J., cited in that case the case of Simpson v. Crippin (sup.). It is obvious to my mind that he considered the case before him to be governed by that case, and that case was in its turn in terms founded on Johnasson v. Young (sup.).

The chief use of authoritative cases is to enable us to deduce from them, if we can, a general principle applicable to succeeding similar though not identical cases. It seems to me that the general principle to be deduced from these cases is that, where in a mercantile contract of purchase and sale of goods to be delivered, the terms of the contract allow the delivery to be by successive deliveries, the failure of the seller or buyer to fulfil his part in any one or more of those deliveries does not absolve the other party from the duty of tendering or accepting, in the case of other subsequent deliveries, although the contract was for the purchase and sale of a specified quantity of goods, and although the failure of the party suing as to one or more deliveries was incurable in the sense that he never could fulfil his undertaking to accept or deliver the whole of the specified quantity. The reasons given are that such a breach by the party suing is a breach of only a part of the consideration moving from him; that such a breach can be compensated in damages, without any necessity for annulling the whole contract; that the true construction of such contracts is that it is not a condition precedent to the obligation to tender or accept a part that the other party should have been, or should be always ready and willing and able to accept or tender the whole. A consideration of the mercantile consequences of otherwise construing such contracts seems to me to fortify the one construction and to condemn the other. Suppose in the case of shipments, the seller to have by contracts made abroad provided for all the successive shipments, and to have taken up ships to proceed and call for the successive cargoes, and the first seller to him fails to fulfil his contract, and so that the first shipment fails, the purchaser under the main contract we are discussing may upon one construction suggested throw up the whole contract, although he would be amply recompensed for the partial failure, and throw the loss of all the other purchases and charters upon the seller without any compensation. So if the purchaser has made contracts and fails to take delivery of one parcel, the seller, although he might be amply compensated for the partial failure, would be entitled to ruin the buyer with regard to his forward contracts without any compensation. Again, suppose any one of the ships lost after a perfectly good shipment by several ships, either buyer or seller might at once cancel the whole contract, to the irreparable loss of the whole party, although he himself might be amply compensated by a payment in damages. Or suppose a seller to send all the stipulated quantity in one ship, and a jettison to have become inevitable on the voyage, he is to have the whole of the remainder of the cargo left on his hands without compensation, although the buyer might easily be compensated for the short delivery. These considerations show that the rule of construction adopted by the courts is as sound on mercantile as it is on legal considerations; and all the considerations, both mercantile and legal, apply as much and as fully to the present contract as to those cited. The question of the time or mode of payment has nothing to do with the reasoning for or against either view. Moreover, it is most important, in my opinion, that the construction of mercantile contracts should be broad and large, and should not depend on refined logical deductions, or on variations either in the terms or the conditions of each particular contract. The contract, for instance, now before us differs as to the period and conditions of payment from that in Brandt v. Lawrence, but it differs very little as to the terms of payment from the other cases cited. That difference as to the period of payment makes no difference in the reasons given for the decisions in those cases in which the stipulation as to the payment was not noticed, and in Brandt v. Lawrence it is not even reported.

I am of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to recover in respect of 20 tons, leaving the defendant to a cross action in respect of 5 tons.

Cotton, L.J.—This was an action on a contract dated the 29th Dec. 1876, whereby the defendant agreed to buy from the plaintiff 25 tons of pepper, more or less, of October or November shipment, from Penang to London, per sailing vessel or vessels, marks and other particulars to be declared within sixty days from the date of the bill of lading. On the 22nd Jan. 1877 the plaintiffs, by a letter addressed to the defendants, declared 25 tons of pepper, shipped in various parcels on board the Borga. Of these 25 tons, 5 had in fact been shipped in December, and were therefore not pepper which according to the contract the defendants were bound to take; and on the 30th Jan. the defendants declined to take the 25 tons. Afterwards, but after the expiration of the time within which the pepper was under the contract to be declared, the plaintiffs declared other 5 tons of pepper, shipped in November, on board the same vessel, in substitution for the 5 tons previously declared, but which were not shipped till December, and to which the defendants had a right to object. The vessel arrived in this country in June, and the defendants refused to take the pepper. Hence the present action, and Lord Coleridge, C.J. decided in favour of the defendants that they were not bound to take the 25 tons of pepper, or any part thereof. The plaintiffs have appealed to this court.

The first point urged by the appellants was that the defendants, before the expiration of the time within which under the contract the plaintiffs were to declare the 25 tons, had by their conduct either waived the condition as to time or induced the plaintiffs to believe that the condition would not be insisted on until it was too late for them to declare other 5 tons in substitution for that part of the 25 tons which were shipped in December, and therefore not in accordance with the contract. In my opinion this contention cannot be supported. It was for the plaintiffs to declare 25 tons of pepper of the quality, and shipped at the time, stipulated by the contract, and to do so within a limited time. The defendants were indeed asked whether they insisted on the objection that 5 tons were not of October or November shipment, and did not answer till the 30th Jan. But there is really nothing to support the contention that this delay, if any, was intended to mislead the plaintiffs, and in the absence of evidence from which such a conclusion could be arrived at we cannot release the plaintiffs from the stipulation as to time. It was urged that the rules of courts of equity are now to be regarded in all courts, and that equity enforced contracts though the time fixed therein for completion had passed. This was in cases of contracts such, exempli gratiâ, as purchases and sales of land, where, unless a contrary intention could be collected from the contract, the court presumed that time was not an essential condition. To apply this to mercantile contracts would be dangerous and unreasonable. We must, therefore, hold that the time within which the pepper was to be declared was an essential condition of the contract, and in such a case the decisions in equity on which reliance is placed do not apply.

But then it was urged that the contract was divisible, and that the defendants were bound to take the 20 tons—that is to say that, although 5 tons was a difference which could not be covered by the words "more or less," under this contract the defendants would be bound to take and pay for any substantial portion of the 25 tons which the plaintiff might be ready and willing to deliver to them; and in support of this contention reliance was placed on the words "per sailing vessel or vessels," and it was argued that this showed that the contract was divisible. In my opinion it has not this effect. These words do indeed show that the 25 tons might be delivered in several parcels, and possibly might arrive in England at different times. But this is very different from the contention that the defendants, having stipulated for 25 tons, would be bound to take a small portion—say, 5 tons—when the plaintiffs were unable or unwilling to supply the balance of the stipulated quantity. The contract in this case was in December, after the pepper must, in order to comply with the condition of the contract, have been shipped, and I think that the reference in the contract to "vessel or vessels" may well have been intended to obviate any difficulty arising from the circumstance of 25 tons of the required quality of pepper not having been shipped in one vessel. But that is to enable the plaintiffs to require the defendants to take and pay for the pepper; there must be the 25 tons, though in different vessels. But it is urged that the decision in Brandt v. Lawrence (sup.) has given a judicial interpretation to the words "per vessel or vessels" in a contract which would otherwise be entire and indivisible. I cannot consider that case of Brandt v. Lawrence as laying down a general rule of construction, but merely as deciding that the contract in that case having regard to these words "vessel or vessels," was divisible. The contract is not stated at length in the report, but we have been furnished with a copy of it. There the contract was entered into before the shipment was under the contract to be made, and payment was to be made in cash on receipt of or in exchange for shipping documents. In that case the seller shipped in a vessel a portion of the oats, and tendered it to the buyer with a view to the supply of the entire quantity, and the whole of the oats in that vessel were oats which complied with the conditions of the contract as to quality and time of shipment, and the seller had therefore under the contract a right to ask for the price in cash for this part of the entire quantity in exchange for the bill of lading. This is, I think, a substantial difference between the contracts in the two cases, and sufficient to prevent the construction put upon the contract in that case affording authority for a decision in favour of the plaintiffs on the present contract. But there is also a difference in the circumstances under which the plaintiffs in this action make their claim, for in the present case the plaintiffs have not severed or separated the 25 tons of pepper, which is the subject of the contract, in the only way contemplated by the contract, namely, by shipping it in different vessels, but shipped in one vessel 25 tons, of which they contend the defendants are bound to take the whole.

I am of opinion that the decision of Lord Coleridge was correct, and must be affirmed.

Thesiger, L.J.—This is an action brought by the plaintiffs as sellers against the defendants as buyers for the non-acceptance of about 25 tons of black pepper, shipped from Penang to London. The defendants refused to accept any portion of this pepper, while the plaintiffs have contended in this court that the defendants were either bound to accept and take delivery of the whole or at least were bound to take delivery of a portion amounting to about 20 out of 25 tons. The contract between the parties was made on the 29th Dec. 1876, and was as follows. [His Lordship here read the contract.] On the 19th Jan. 1877, the plaintiffs, purporting to act in pursuance of the contract, declared by a vessel called the Borga 500 tons of black Penang pepper, which would be equal in weight to about 25 tons in three parcels, the subject of separate bills of lading, viz., 285 and 110 bags under bills of lading dated the 29th Nov. 1876, and 105 bags under a bill of lading dated 11th Dec. 1876. In answer to the declaration, the defendants by letter requested information as to the date of shipment of the pepper. On the 22nd they repeated the request, and on the 24th Jan., having in the meanwhile received no information as to the date of shipment, the defendants asked whether the declaration, or, as they called it, tender of the 19th Jan. was final or not, and were answered on the same day that it was. On the 25th and 26th Jan. the defendants again inquired as to the date when the whole of the pepper was shipped, and on the 27th Jan. the following letters passed between Messrs. Moon, Bower, and Co., acting for the plaintiffs, and the defendants:—"From Moon, Bower, and Co. to Messrs. J. Sala and Co. Jan. 27. We have received the following in reply to your memo. of yesterday's date: 'We beg to acknowledge receipt of your memo. of yesterday's date, and are at a loss to know what you want. We have already furnished you with dates of bills of lading, and which in declaration is always considered sufficient." "London, 27th Jan. 1877.—From J. Sala and Co., 108, Fenchurch-street, to Messrs. Moon, Bower, and Co. Pepper cont. 29th Dec. 1876.—We have your memo. of this day. By furnishing us with dates of bills of lading you only fulfil one part of your contract, but the most important for us is the date of shipment, which, according to the contract, ought to have been made at the latest during November. We want, then, to know if you tender the said 500 bags as being all shipped during November." Upon the same day an interview took place between the parties, with the object, so far as the plaintiffs are concerned, of learning whether the defendants would accept the declaration, but nothing definite passed. In point of fact, the shipment of the 105 bags under the bill of lading of the 9th Dec. 1876 had not been made until the month of December, and on the 30th Jan. 1877 the defendants wrote to the effect that they did not accept the declaration, as it was not for the full quantity according to the contract terms. Upon the 31st Jan. the plaintiffs, through Messrs. Moon, Bower, and Co., proposed by letter an arbitration, to decide whether their tender or declaration constituted a fair delivery according to the contract, and in answer to that letter the defendants on the 2nd Feb. wrote as follows:—"We have your memo. of 31st ultimo. If the pepper you tender is all of November shipment at latest there is nothing to arbitrate upon, and the contract would be in order so far. If any portion of what you have tendered is not November shipment at latest, we reject said tender entirely, and refuse to arbitrate, as the contract has not been fulfilled by you." On the 5th Feb. the plaintiffs substituted for the declaration of 105 bags per Borga, under bill of lading of 11th Dec. 1876, a similar number of bags by the same vessel, under a bill of lading of 29th Nov. 1876; but, this declaration being made more than sixty days after the date of the bill of lading to which it referred, the defendants on the same day wrote as follows:—"We have your memo. of this day, and do not admit your tender. If even other reasons did not exist, as you will find by previous correspondence, your tender aforesaid, would be out of date." Some correspondence then passed between the parties, upon which, coupled with what passed before and at the interview of the 27th Jan., the plaintiffs found a contention that either the stipulation as to time of declaration was waived, or that the defendants by their conduct had misled the plaintiffs into a belief that the breach of the stipulation would not be relied upon, and were estopped from setting up such breach. It does not seem to me that this issue, which would be one peculiarly suitable for a jury, was really intended to be tried, or indeed was tried when the parties dispensed with a jury and took the case before Lord Coleridge alone, and it is not mentioned in his judgment. But, assuming it to be open to the plaintiffs at all, I am of opinion that the evidence wholly fails to support their contention. I gather from the evidence that, down to the time that the declaration was finally rejected, both the parties were standing upon their strict rights, and that the plaintiffs had due warning from the defendants that they at least were doing so, and I can see no ground for the imputation that the defendants wrongfully induced in the plaintiffs the belief that time was waived, or would be, or did anything which could be construed into a waiver or its equivalent. I revert again to the evidence. On the 2nd June the arrival of the Borga was advised by letter as follows:—"Memorandum. London, 2nd June 1877. From Moon, Bower, and Co. to Messrs. J. Sala and Co. We beg to advise the arrival of the Borga from Penang, in which vessel you are interested, as per contract dated 29th Dec." To that letter the defendants, on the 7th June, sent the following answer:—"London, 7th June 1877. Borga. We have your memo. of the 2nd inst., advising arrival of above vessel. By our previous memorandums, which we now confirm, you will find that we rejected your tender of pepper by this vessel." On the 26th June samples of the pepper which was included in the declaration of the 19th Jan. as altered by that of the 5th Feb., and all of which was a November shipment, were tendered. The defendants rejected the whole of these samples, and this action was then brought.

I have already stated my opinion that there was no waiver of the time within which the declaration was to be made, and no conduct of the defendants estopping them from setting up the breach of the stipulation in regard to time, and it follows that the declaration not being in time as regards 5 tons, the plaintiffs cannot maintain their action for the non-acceptance of the whole 25 tons.

The argument before us, however, was mainly directed to the question whether the plaintiffs can maintain their action in respect of the 20 tons. I am of opinion that they cannot do so.

The subject of the contract is the sale of a specific quantity of a given article, with a margin for a moderate excession or diminution of that quantity, under the words "about" and "more or less." The rule applicable to such a contract, if it were not qualified by other provisions, would be that, subject to the moderate margin, the sellers cannot call upon the buyers to accept any greater or less quantity of the article bargained for than the specified quantity. In the present case, if the 5 tons shipped or declared too late be excluded, the diminution in quantity is clearly beyond the margin. But the contract also provides that the shipment is to be "per sailing vessel or vessels," and that the name of the vessel or vessels, &c., is to be declared within sixty days of the bill of lading. Founding themselves upon these provisions, the plaintiffs contend that they were entitled to call upon the defendants to accept delivery of any substantial portion of the pepper, whatever might be their position or declared intention as regards the remainder, and they rely upon the decision in Brandt v. Lawrence (L. Rep. 1 Q. B. Div. 344) in support of that view. The defendants, on the other hand, contend that they were not bound to accept anything less than the whole of the pepper, subject to a moderate margin, except in the case of loss of vessel, or of vessel or pepper, especially provided for by the contract, or at least that under the circumstances of this case they were not so bound. I do not accede to the defendants' contention so far as it rests upon the provisions of the contract relating to the loss of vessel, or of vessel and pepper, for those provisions are, in my opinion, inserted alio intuitu. I think they were intended to protect the sellers from any action for non-delivery caused by the happening of the contingency provided for. But I am of opinion that the defendants' contention is otherwise well founded.

Brandt v. Lawrence (sup.) was a case where Russian oats were sold under a contract by which the shipment was to be by steamer or steamers, in a particular month, conditionally upon ice at loading port not preventing it, in which event shipment was to be made immediately after the opening of the navigation. Payment was to be made in respect of any shipment by cash, and on receipt of or in exchange for shipping documents. Under this contract a portion of the oats, together with other oats, the subject of another contract, was shipped, in consequence of ice, after the specified month, but immediately after the navigation was opened, and was refused by the defendants on the ground that the shipment had been made too late. At the time of this refusal the sellers were acting in strict accordance with their contract, and there was nothing to indicate that the contract would not be performed by them in its entirety. Afterwards and beyond the time allowed by the contract the remainder of the oats were shipped, and were also—but in this case rightly—refused. In an action brought by the sellers for non-acceptance of both parcels of oats, the facts were proved as above stated, and, a verdict having been found for the plaintiffs in respect of the first shipment, a motion for a new trial was refused both in the Queen's Bench Division and on appeal to this court.

But in the present case the facts are very different. In the first place the declaration of the pepper named but one ship, and the pepper tendered did in fact arrive by one ship. In the second place there has not been at any time either a declaration or a tender of the 20 tons of pepper which the plaintiffs contend that the defendants are bound to accept, apart from the 5 tons, which upon this branch of the case they admit that the defendants were not bound to accept. The matter seems to stand thus: If the declaration of the 19th Jan. be relied upon, then the plaintiffs indicated by that declaration their intention of calling upon the defendants to accept under the contract of the 29th Dec. 1876, 25 tons of pepper, 5 tons of which were not of October or November shipment. If the declaration of the 5th Feb. be relied upon as severing those 5 tons from the remainder and cancelling the previous declaration made of them, then it is clear that it at the same time added another 5 tons, which the defendants were equally not bound to accept, inasmuch as the sixty days within which the declaration was to be made had expired; and even if these 5 tons had not been added the declaration of the 20 tons as a separate parcel would seem only to date from that day, and would therefore also be too late. But the plaintiffs endeavour to displace these positions by the argument that as the pepper tendered was shipped under three separate bills of lading, and was so declared, the declaration and tender, although never one in fact may be treated as separable in law, and consequently that the defendants were bound to accept the 20 tons, which upon this hypothesis were properly declared and tendered. I cannot assent to this argument.

In mercantile contracts like the present the making within a given time of a declaration or declarations upon which the buyers may act is an essential feature. And, further, although the sellers have an option to ship the article contracted to be sold either by one or more vessels, and the provision in the contract to that effect may give, as according to Brandt v. Lawrence (sup.) it does give, the sellers a right to call upon the buyers to accept any portion of the quantity contracted to be sold which has been shipped and declared in accordance with the contract, and as a step towards its entire performance, it does not appear to me by any means to follow that the quantity named in the contract is not still of the essence of the contract, and, if it be so, the case is in this respect distinguishable from Simpson v. Crippin (L. Rep. 8 Q.B. 14), and cases of that class, where each delivery of coal was really like a delivery under a separate contract to be paid for separately, and in respect of the non-delivery of which the parties might well be assumed to have contemplated a payment in damages rather than as a rescission of the whole contract. But however this may be, the present contract ought and must, in my opinion, at least involve this consequence, viz., that when the sellers elect to ship by the vessel the whole quantity contracted to be sold and declare their election to the buyers—still more when they follow up their declaration and election by tendering the whole quantity pursuant to their declaration, they cannot, after it is discovered that as to a portion of the quantity shipped it was not shipped in accordance with the terms of the contract, and that the buyers are not bound to accept that portion, turn round and call upon them to accept the remaining portion of the quantity shipped, which, although physically separable and the subject of distinct bills of lading, yet has always been treated by the sellers as part of an entire whole, which the buyers, by the declaration, were told to treat, and, by the tender, were called upon to accept as one entire whole. The matter may be made more plain by reversing the position of the parties. Suppose a declaration, such as was made in this case, on the 19th Jan., and that the fact had been that all the three parcels had been shipped in accordance with the terms of the contract. Suppose also that, under such circumstances, the defendants, either at the time of declaration, or when the pepper was tendered, had expressed their willingness to take the 20 tons, but had absolutely refused to take the five; the plaintiffs might clearly have said: "We make this declaration or tender as a whole; and will only deliver the pepper comprised in it as a whole." If that be not so, where would the defendants' right of separation cease? They might, of course, take only one of the three parcels, and it is difficult to see on what logical or legal principle they might not demand to have some bags out of the one parcel and say, "We will pay for the non-acceptance of the remainder in damages." This would reduce the matter to a practical absurdity. But on the other hand, if the seller's rights would under the circumstances supposed, be such as I have suggested, viz., the right to have the pepper accepted as a whole, and the consequent right of treating the contract as at an end if the buyers refused to accept it as a whole, surely the converse proposition must hold, viz., that when the shipment comprised in one declaration is in part good and in part bad, and, although the good and bad parts are separable, yet the sellers adhere to the declaration as a whole and tender the shipment as a whole, the buyers must have a right to reject unconditionally both the declaration and the whole of the goods tendered under it; and further, that the defendants would not be bound to accept the part of the shipment which in itself complied with the terms of the contract if after the declaration and tender, and after it was apparent that the sellers' contract could not be performed in its entirety by delivery of the whole of the goods contracted to be sold, the sellers separated the good portion of the shipment from the bad, and made a fresh tender of the former for acceptance.

Looking at the case from this point of view it is really untouched by either the contract cases to which I have referred, or by the decisions in Brandt v. Lawrence (sup.), and upon the grounds mentioned I arrive at the conclusion that the plaintiffs cannot maintain their action against the defendants in respect of any portion of the pepper which was the subject of their contract, and that the judgment of Lord Coleridge should therefore be affirmed.

APPEAL FROM THE COMMON PLEAS DIVISION.

Ship—Damage to cargo by negligent stowage—Liability of shipowner—Bill of lading—Signature by agent.

Plaintiffs were consignors of sugar to be carried from Hamburg to London in defendants' steamship, and received bills of lading signed by "P. and K., agents." The ship was at the time under charter to P. and K., who were merchants at Hamburg, but plaintiffs had no knowledge of such charter.

The bill of lading accepted liability for "all accidents, loss, or damage . . . from any act, neglect, or default whatsoever of the pilot, master, or mariners in navigating the ship, the owners of the ship being in no way liable for any of the consequences of the causes above excepted, it being agreed that the captain, officers, and crew of the vessel in the transmission of the goods, as between the shipper, owner, or consignee thereof, and the ship and shipowner, be considered the servants of such shipper, owner, or consignee."

Plaintiffs' sugar was damaged owing to negligent stowage.

Held, that, if the bill of lading was a contract of carriage between plaintiffs and defendants, the exception did not apply, and that, if there was no contract of carriage between plaintiffs and defendants, the sugar being lawfully in the ship with the defendants' licence, the negligence was a breach of duty, and therefore in either case defendants were liable.

Judgment of Denman, J. affirmed.

The action was brought to recover damages for injury caused by negligent stowage to 280 bags of sugar belonging to the plaintiffs, which had been shipped on board the defendants' ship.

By a charter-party dated the 15th Nov. 1877, and made between the defendants, owners of the steamship Cleanthes, and Messrs. Pott and Korner, merchants, "by the intercession of the shipbroker W. Zoder," it was agreed that the ship, after discharging her inward cargo, should load from the said merchants a full and complete cargo of general lawful merchandise at Hamburg, and proceed to one wharf only in London as ordered by charterers' correspondents, and deliver the cargo on payment of freight (for sugar) at the rate of 7*s.* 6*d.* sterling in full, per ton, gross weight delivered—"it being agreed that for the payment of all freight, dead freight, and demurrage, the said master or owner shall have an absolute lien. . . on said cargo, which lien they shall be bound to exercise; the charterers' liability to cease when cargo is shipped and bills of lading signed; the captain shall sign bills of lading at rates as presented without prejudice to this charter-party." The charter-party was signed "H. W. Pott and Korner," and "By telegraphic authority of owners, W. Zoder as agent."

The plaintiffs, who were not aware of the existence of the charter-party, shipped the sugar under the following bill of lading.

Shipped in good order and well conditioned in and upon the steamship Cleanthes whereof is master P. Andrews, now lying at Hamburg, and bound for London, 280 bags of sugar, which are to be delivered in like good order and condition to Hayn, Roman, and Co. or their assigns, freight at the rate of 7*s.* 6*d.* sterling, plus 10 per cent. per ton gross weight, to be paid by consignees; the act of God, the Queen's enemies, pirates, robbers, restraints of princes, vermin, jettison, barratry, and collision, fire on board or on shore, and all accidents, loss or damage of whatsoever nature or kind, or howsoever occasioned from machinery, boilers, steam, and steam navigation, or from perils of the seas or rivers, or from any act, neglect, or default whatsoever of the pilot, master, or mariners in navigating the ship, the owners of the ship being in no way liable for any of the consequences of the causes above excepted, it being agreed that the captain, officers, and crew of the vessel in the transmission of the goods, as between the shipper, owner, or consignee thereof, and the ship and shipowner, be considered the servants of such shipper, owner, or consignee. In witness whereof the master or agent of the ship has signed four bills of lading of this tenor and date. Dated in Hamburg, 19th Nov. 1877.

Pott and Korner, Agents.

At the trial, before Denman, J., it was proved or admitted that the damage to the sugar was occasioned by negligence in stowing oxide of zinc in casks above the sugar, and the jury assessed the damages at 501*l.* 6*s.*

All other questions were left for the decision of Denman, J., who reserved the case for further consideration, and, after hearing arguments, gave judgment for the plaintiffs. The evidence on which the learned judge came to the conclusion that there was a contract between the plaintiffs and the defendants for the carriage of the sugar is fully set out in his judgment, which is reported 39 L. T. Rep. N. S. 288.

The defendants appealed.

Dec. 17 and 19, 1878.—Watkin Williams, Q.C. and C. Bowen for the defendants.—The real question is, whether there is any evidence of a contract of carriage between the plaintiffs as shippers and the defendants as shipowners, for otherwise on what ground can the plaintiffs put their case? The contract was made with Pott and Korner, the charterers, who signed the bill of lading. To make out a ratification so as to make the defendants liable on that ground, it must be shown that the contract purported to be made on their behalf, and there is nothing in this bill of lading to show that it was made on behalf of the ship. The cases which are cited in the court below do not establish any liability on the part of the defendants. Even if there was a contract, the defendants were discharged by the exception in the bill of lading.

Butt, Q.C. and J. C. Mathew for the plaintiffs.—The evidence is sufficient to show that the bill of lading was a contract between the plaintiffs and the defendants, on which the latter are liable, and the damage having been caused by negligent stowage, the defendants are not protected by the exceptive clause. The goods were lawfully on board with the defendants' consent, and in the defendants' custody, and therefore the defendants are liable for the injury caused by negligence.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 22. 1879.—The judgment of the court (Bramwell, Brett, and Cotton, L.JJ.) was delivered by Bramwell, L.J.—This case comes before us in a very unsatisfactory way, so far as relates to one of the questions principally argued before us. We are not told how the goods come to be shipped, and are left to guess with whom the plaintiffs made their contract of carriage. We are, however, satisfied that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover. The case is in a dilemma. Either there was a contract between the plaintiffs and the defendants, or there was not. If there was a contract between them, it is the one contained in or evidenced by the bill of lading. Now it is clear that, if that is the contract, the defendants are liable on the ordinary contract of a carrier, unless there is (and there is not) some clause in the contract to relieve them; whether the words in other respects would extend to this case we need not say, as there is one respect in which they do not; they extend to the acts of captain, officers, and crew; they do not extend to the acts of the defendants and their other agents and servants, therefore not to the acts and defaults of the stevedore. But it is by these acts and defaults that the goods were damaged. If then there is a contract between the plaintiffs and the defendants, the defendants are liable. So also if there is not. For if so, the case is this: the goods were lawfully with the defendants' licence in their ship, and they tortiously so dealt with them that the goods were injured. It was found, as a fact, that the loading of the oxide was negligent. It was therefore wrongful, not as a breach of contract, but as a wrongful act in itself. If the defendants had done what was done wilfully, that is to say, intentionally that it would injure the plaintiffs' goods, it is clear that they would be liable. But what difference does it make that they did it ignorantly? It may be asked where is the duty of care? I answer, that duty that exist in all men not to injure the property of others. This is not a mere nonfeasance which is complained of, it is a misfeasance—an act and wrongful. Suppose A. lets B. a horse, B. with C.'s licence puts up at C.'s stables for reward to C. from B., C. turns into the stable loose a vicious horse, known to be so, not to injure A.'s horse, but not thinking of the matter; there cannot be a doubt that C. would be liable to A. if the horse was injured. So if he gave the horse bad oats which injured the horse he would be liable, though he would not be to A. if he omitted to feed him; so here justice is done, though indirectly. It is certain that, if the charterers sued on the charter in respect of the complaint in this action, there would be no defence, and it is certain they ought to sue if necessary for the benefit of the plaintiffs. The judgment must therefore be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

Postlethwaite v. Freeland.

Shipping — Charter-party—Construction of—Demurrage—Charterer's liability—Due diligence.

A charter-party stipulated that the cargo should be brought to and taken from alongside at merchant's risk and expense, and should be "discharged with all dispatch, according to the custom of the port." In an action by the shipowner against the charterer for demurrage, it was proved that when the ship arrived at the port of discharge, owing to the unusual number of vessels then lying there, all the available lighters in the port were being used for discharging cargoes, so that the ship was compelled to wait her turn for lighters, and there was considerable delay in commencing to unload her. Cargoes were usually discharged in the port by lighters, and no others could be procured within 150 miles, and it was usual for ships entering the port to wait their turn for unloading. The judge asked the jury whether there was a settled custom in the port as to discharging vessels laden like the one in question; and, if there was, whether she was discharged with all dispatch according to the custom. The jury having answered both questions in the affirmative, judgment was entered for defendant.

Held (affirming the decision of the Exchequer Division, Cotton, L.J. dissenting), that, on the construction of the charter party, the charterer was not bound to begin discharging cargo at once without reference to the means for discharging existing in the port at that time; and the practice as to ships being unloaded in turn was part of the custom of the port; and therefore that there was no misdirection.

APPEAL from a decision of the Exchequer Division (Kelly, C.B. and Hawkins, J.).

The action was to recover damages for breach of an agreement contained in a charter-party to discharge cargo. At the trial the jury found for the defendant, and judgment was entered accordingly.

An order nisi having been obtained for a new trial, the Exchequer Division discharged the order, and the plaintiffs appealed.

The material facts of the case will be found to be fully set out in the judgment of the Court of Appeal (post).

Cohen, Q.C. and Bigham for plaintiff.—There was a misdirection. The obligation under the charter-party was not that the charterers should use reasonable diligence only in the discharge of the vessel with reference to the means of discharge existing at the port at the time. It is admitted that, if that were the only obligation there was no misdirection. "According to the custom of the port" means merely "in the manner usually employed in the port." There could be no evidence of custom as to the number of lighters available; it must necessarily vary. The fact that no lighters were immediately available does not relieve the charterers, who are bound under the charter-party to provide means of discharge. Suppose the vessel arrived while a strike of dock labourers was going on, or that all the lighters had been destroyed or injured by a hurricane, the charterers would still be liable under their contract for demurrage. In Ford v. Cotesworth (19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 634; L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 127; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 190, 468), the earlier cases are referred to, and the law summed up by Blackburn, J. The learned judge says: "The question depends upon what the contract implied by law is when there is a charter-party silent as to the time to be occupied in the discharge. We agree that, whenever a party to a contract undertakes to do some particular act, the performance of which depends entirely on himself, so that he may choose his own mode of fulfilling his undertaking, and the contract is silent as to time, the law implies a contract to do it within a reasonable time under the circumstances; and if some unforseen cause, over which he has no control, prevents him from performing what he has undertaken within that time he is responsible for the damage." Here the charterers or consignees were bound to provide lighters and discharge the cargo. The shipowner had nothing whatever to perform with respect to the discharge. In Tapscott v. Balfour (1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 501; 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 710; L. Rep. 8 C. P. 46; 42 L. J. 16, C. P.), where the vessel got in dock, but could not be loaded at once because of the number of vessels already in dock, it was held that the charterers were liable for the delay from the time of her getting into dock. See also Ashcroft v. The Crow Orchard Colliery Company Limited, 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 397; 31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 266; L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 540; 43 L. J. 194, Q. B.

In Wright v. The New Zealand Shipping Company (ante, p. 118; and 40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 413) this court held, where the time for unloading was not named in the charter-party, that the charterer was bound to provide at the port of discharge sufficient appliances of the kind ordinarily in use at the port, and that it was no answer to a claim for delay in unloading to show that the delay was caused by the crowded state of the port. Lord Coleridge should have directed the jury that under the charter-party the charterers were bound to provide means for discharging the cargo when it arrived, and also that it must be discharged with due diligence according to the custom of the port with respect to the manner of discharge. The attention of the jury should also have been directed to the fact that four of the lighters were out of repair.

Watkin Williams, Q.C. and Macleod for defendant.—Very little assistance can be gained from the authorities on this point; the principle of them is admitted. If the defendant was under the obligation contended for by the other side, it is admitted that the fact that there were a great number of ships at the port, or that this particular one had to wait her turn, would afford no excuse for the delay in unloading. But under the charter-party the defendant is not bound to give an absolute dischage with reference to the ship's capability to discharge. The words "according to the custom of the port" have no meaning if the contention of the other side is right. The evidence shows the very great difficulty there was in discharging cargo. Part of the custom was that ships should wait for their turn to discharge. "According to the custom" therefore means according to what occurs when there are a great number of ships in the harbour.

March 22.—THESIGER, L.J.—The plaintiff in this action was the owner of a vessel called the Cumberland Lassie, and on the 28th April 1875 he chartered her to the defendants to carry a cargo of about 370 tons of steel rails and fastenings from Barrow-in-Furness to East London in South Africa and there discharge. The charter-party provided that the cargo should be brought to and taken from alongside at merchants' risk, and contained the following stipulation: "The cargo is to be discharged with all dispatch according to the custom of the port." The action is brought to recover damages for the alleged breach of such stipulation.

The port of East London is situate upon a river having a bar at its mouth, and into which in consequence vessels of the burden of the Cumberland Lassie are unable to enter until the greater part of their cargo is discharged. The discharge is performed by lighters, which are worked to and from the ship in a somewhat unusual manner. There is one large warp or cable from the inside to the outside of the bar. From that warp there branch out minor warps, and to those minor warps vessels lading or unloading their cargoes attach their own cables. The lighters have neither sails nor oars, and are worked by being pulled along the warps and cables which I have described. In 1875 the business of lading and unloading was mainly conducted by a company called the East London Loading and Shipping Company, to which the warps belonged, and which owned nine or ten lighters for working in conjunction with the warps. Four only of these lighters were suitable to the discharge of the cargo of the Cumberland Lassie. The custom or practice of the port, as regards the discharge of vessels, was as follows:—vessels upon arrival reported themselves at the port office, and in the order in which they reported themselves their turn, as it was called, for unloading came in rotation. As soon as a vessel came in turn, one lighter was sent to her every working day until such time as she was finally discharged, with the exception that when the mail steamers came in a preference was given to them. The Cumberland Lassie arrived at East London on the 31st Aug. 1875, and was ready to commence discharging her cargo on the following day. It happened, however, that at the end of 1874, or the beginning of 1875, the supply of iron rails to the Government at East London had commenced, and in consequence the number of vessels arriving at the port in the autumn of 1875 was increased, and when the Cumberland Lassie arrived there were already lying in the roadstead seven vessels laden with cargoes similar to her own. The Government obtained from Algoa Bay, situate at least 150 miles south of East London, three or four surf boats, two of which appear to have been brought to East London after the Cumberland Lassie arrived there, and all of which, with the exception of one under repair, were employed in discharging the vessels which arrived before the Cumberland Lassie. In the result, the turn for the discharge of that vessel did not come until the 6th Oct., when a lighter of the East London Landing and Shipping Company commenced to discharge the cargo. From that time it is not contended on the part of the plaintiff that there was any undue delay; but, inasmuch as twenty-four working days intervened between the date of the ship's being ready to discharge and the 6th Oct., the plaintiff seeks to recover damages in respect of the non-discharge of cargo during those twenty-four days. The evidence establishes that the time occupied in discharging the vessel was not greater than the average time occupied in discharging vessels of like tonnage during the autumn of 1875. At the trial Lord Coleridge left to the jury to say, first, whether there was any settled practice or custom between the months of April and November 1875 as to the unloading of sailing vessels laden as the Cumberland Lassie was laden in the port of East London; secondly, if there was, whether the Cumberland Lassie was unloaded with all dispatch according to the custom. The jury answered both questions in the affirmative, and the learned judge directed the verdict and judgment to be entered for the defendants. The plaintiff moved the Exchequer Division for a new trial on the ground of misdirection, and that the verdict was against evidence, and the conditional order for a new trial having been discharged, he appealed to this court.

The argument before us has really resolved itself into a question as to the construction which the clause in the charter-party "the cargo is to be discharged with all dispatch according to the custom of the port" when read in conjunction with the facts ought to bear. The plaintiff contends in substance that Lord Coleridge ought to have told the jury that as soon as the Cumberland Lassie was ready to discharge the defendants ought to have provided her with one lighter for every working day, except perhaps the days on which the lighters were engaged in discharging mail steamers. If the plaintiff is right in his contention I think it clear that the learned judge did misdirect the jury, for he certainly indicated to them that there was no such obligation upon the defendants to provide lighters; but I am of opinion that the plaintiff is not right in his contention. In order to support it his counsel treat the clause of the charter-party in question as if the words "with all dispatch" were unconnected with the words "according to the custom of the port," and they endeavour by that means to read the clause as running in this way, "the cargo is to be discharged according to the custom of the port, and with all dispatch." Reading the clause in this way, they argue, not without force, that the custom of the port was to regulate the mode of discharge by a single lighter worked by the warps and cable, but was not to regulate the time of commencing the discharge or the rate of dispatch, which it was contended was to be as fast as one lighter, commencing as soon as the vessel was ready to discharge, could on working days discharge the cargo. In my opinion, however, the words "according to the custom of the port," placed as they are in immediate juxtaposition with the words "with all dispatch," were intended to be read, and must be read, so as to qualify these latter words and, if that be so, it appears to me to follow that the practice or custom as to vessels coming on turn was one which regulated the dispatch of the Cumberland Lassie just as much as the practice or custom of unloading vessels by lighters worked along the warps or cables. Indeed, lighters, warps, and cables may in this case be looked on as forming one apparatus for unloading, and the plaintiff had no right to complain of the defendants, because this apparatus was, until the 6th Oct., occupied by vessels which arrived before the Cumberland Lassie, and over which the defendants had no control.

The decision in this court of Wright v. The New Zealand Shipping Company (ante, p. 118), to which we have been referred, is in no way inconsistent with this view. There the charter-party did not contain any express provision in reference to the discharge of the cargo, and the obligation of the charterer was therefore that implied by law—that is, to discharge within a reasonable time. The ordinary time for discharge of vessels of similar burthen with and loaded as the chartered vessel in that case was loaded, was proved to be thirty-five days; but, owing to a concourse of vessels annually at the particular time of the year at which the plaintiff's vessel happened to arrive, and due in great measure to arrivals of the defendants' own vessels, the lighters were inadequate in point of number, and the plaintiff's vessel was delayed for a much longer period than thirty-five days. Upon that state of facts it was held that the shipowner ought not to be the sufferer from a delay, against which the defendants might themselves have provided, in respect to which the charter party contained no express stipulation, and the cause of which, although recurring at fixed intervals of time, was exceptional when compared with the general state of the port of discharge.

The cases of Tapscott v. Balfour (1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 501; 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 710); L. Rep. 8 C.P. 46) and Ashcroft v. The Crow Orchard Colliery Company (2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 397; 31 L. T. Rep. N.S. 266; L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 540) are also distinguishable from the present. In the former the loading of a cargo of coals was to be in the usual and customary manner, nothing being said as to time, and it was held that the words applied to the mode of loading only, and that the charterer was responsible for delay, which arose from his vessels' inability to get under the tips, that inability again being due to the number of vessels waiting in turn to go under the tips before her, of which number, moreover, several were loaded by the agent employed by the charterer. It is also to be observed that in that case it was proved that, although loading from the tips was the most usual method of loading in the particular dock, yet it could be, and not unfrequently was, done from lighters, and Denman, J. in his judgment relies upon the fact as giving additional support to the view that the charterer, who might have obtained lighters, was responsible for the delay. In Ashcroft v. The Crow Orchard Colliery (ubi sup.) a cargo of coal was to be loaded with the usual dispatch of the port, or if longer detained the ship was to be paid forty shillings demurrage. It was there held that the charterers were liable for a detention outside the docks for an unusual time, that detention being due to the fact that the charterers themselves had, when the charter party was entered into, three ships loading in the docks, and ten other charters in their books having priority over the plaintiffs.

None of the decisions to which I have referred in any way impugned the authority of cases of the class of Leideman v. Schultz (23 L. J. 17 C. P.; 14 C. B. 38) and Lawson v. Burness (1 H. & C. 396) which were decided in favour of the charterer upon words in the charter party importing that he has only to be bound to take cargo in regular turns of loading. They are merely illustrations of the principle enunciated in Ford v. Cotesworth (19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 634; L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 127; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 190, 468), to which my judgment in this case is in no way opposed. That principle is that, under a charter-party which provides for the delivery of the cargo in the usual and customary manner, but which is silent as to the time to be occupied in the discharge, the law implies a contract that each party will use reasonable diligence in performing that part of the delivery which by the custom of the port falls upon him. Here the use of the warp and lighters in regular turn was part of the custom of the port by which the discharge with all dispatch was to be qualified and limited, and by that custom the control of the lighters as well as of the warp was no more in the hands of the charterers than it was in the hands of the shipowner.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the ruling of the learned judge at the trial was correct, that the findings were warranted by the evidence, and that this appeal should fail.

COTTON, L.J. read the following judgment:—This was an action by the owner of a sailing vessel called the Cumberland Lassie against the charterers for the detention of his ship. The action was tried before Lord Coleridge, and resulted in a verdict and judgment for the defendants, and this was an application by way of appeal from the Exchequer Division for a new trial, on the ground of misdirection. By the charter-party, which was dated the 28th April 1875, it was agreed that the Cumberland Lassie should take a cargo of rails from Barrow-in-Furness to East London in South Africa, and it was stipulated that the cargo should be brought to and taken from alongside at merchants' risk and expense; and further (which is the provision on which the question turns), that the cargo was to be discharged with all dispatch according to the custom of the port. It was for delay in accepting delivery of the cargo at the port of discharge that the action was brought. The ship arrived at East London on the 31st Aug. 1875. The harbour there is a bar harbour, and vessels of the size of the Cumberland Lassie are obliged to unload a considerable portion of their cargo before they can cross the bar. The discharge of cargoes outside the bar is effected by means of lighters or other small vessels. The usual way by which in Sept. 1875 lighters were brought alongside the vessel to be unloaded was by means of a warp, consisting of a rope carried across the bar and fastened to buoys, and on the outside connected with the ropes branching from it; from the end of these branch warps the lighters were warped to the vessel to be unloaded by a rope provided by that vessel. The complaint of the plaintiff is, that for twenty-four working days after the Cumberland Lassie arrived at the port no lighter or other vessel was provided by the defendants, the charterers, to accept delivery of the cargo. The defendants admit the fact, but they say that, having regard to the terms of the charter-party and the facts proved, they are not liable for the delay. It was proved at the trial that, at the time when the Cumberland Lassie arrived at East London and was in course of unloading, the only lighters for unloading vessels outside the bar, with the exception of three boats belonging to the Government, belonged to a company which had purchased these lighters and the warp from the Government; that there was a practice or custom at the port that every sailing vessel should be taken in turn for unloading, according to the time of her arrival in port, and that when the turn of a vessel arrived it should have the services of one lighter only, and once only in the day; that the company had four lighters only capable of carrying iron rails; that mail steamers were, as against sailing vessels, entitled to preference in the use of the lighters, and that in regular turn the Cumberland Lassie was not entitled to the use of a lighter for discharge of her cargo before the twenty-four working days had expired. There was evidence that, having regard to the number of vessels in the port at the time when the Cumberland Lassie arrived and to the number of lighters then at the port available for unloading rails, the turn of the plaintiff's vessel to have a lighter for unloading the cargo did not arrive before the twenty-four days had expired. The defendants contend that the reference to the custom of the port contained in the provisions of the contract to which I have referred absolves the defendants from liability, and so Lord Coleridge directed the jury; for he in his summing up in effect directed that, if they found that at the date of the charter-party and from that time till the time of the unloading there was a practice at the port as to the unloading, and if so, that the defendants used the existing appliances with due despatch in accordance with the practice, that then they should find for the defendants. If the delay of which the plaintiff complains was not attributable to what can be called the custom or practice of the port, this was a misdirection; for, in the absence of any reference to the custom of the port, and if there was no express stipulation in the contract to regulate in this respect the rights and liabilities of the plaintiff and defendants, it would be the duty of the charterers to provide at or shortly after the vessel was ready to discharge its cargo appliances of the kind ordinarily in use in the port for the purpose of taking delivery—that is, in the present case, lighters or other small vessels capable of crossing the bar.

Did then the reference to the custom of the port vary the defendants' liability in this respect? It was argued that it does so, because the custom or practice of the port was that vessels should be entitled to lighters in turn according to the times of their respective arrivals, and by treating the warp and lighters as one entire instrument for unloading vessels outside the bar. But there was no evidence that a larger number of lighters than were in use at the time in question in the port could not have crossed the bar daily by means of the warp; and, on the contrary, there was evidence that shortly afterwards a larger number of lighters were employed in unloading vessels, and crossed the bar by means of the warp. The delay therefore was attributable to the number of lighters at the port being insufficient for the number of vessels. The number of lighters cannot, in my opinion, be considered as a matter regulated by or dependent on the custom or practice of the port. It would not, I should think, be contended that, however the business of the port might increase, it could be said to be the custom or practice of the port that the only lighters for hire there should be such as the company were for the time being possessed of. In my opinion the defendants are not, by the qualifying reference in the charter-party to the custom of the port, protected from liability for delay caused by the number of lighters at the port being insufficient for the vessels for the time being in the port. It is said that this will make the words "according to the custom of the port" inoperative and strike them out of the contract. But, in my opinion, this is not the case. These words will qualify the words "with all dispatch" by excusing any delay caused, for example, by the preference given by the practice of the port to mail steamers, or by no work being done on those days which it is the practice of the port to observe as holidays.

It was much pressed in the course of the argument that it was impossible for the charterers to provide other lighters. If, however, the construction which I have put upon the contract is correct, the defendants cannot protect themselves from liability to pay damages to the plaintiffs for the delay by alleging that this is attributable to their inability to discharge an obligation which the defendants, as between themselves and the plaintiffs, had undertaken.

It was said that the number of the lighters was insufficient, in consequence of there being at the time an unusually large number of vessels which were waiting to discharge their cargo. In my opinion, if such was the case, it cannot excuse the defendants from liability; for, if such was the case, the delay would be caused by an accident, of which, as between themselves and the plaintiff, the defendants must bear the loss.

Brett, L.J. — The question in this case is whether there ought to be a new trial on the ground of misdirection. The action is for demurrage, and the answer is that under the charter-party discharge of the cargo was to be according to the custom of the port, and that it was properly discharged in accordance with the charter-party. Lord Coleridge asked the jury whether there was an established custom of the port, and whether, if so, the cargo was discharged in accordance with that custom; and the jury answered both questions in the affirmative. So far there is no symptom of a misdirection. But it is said that the judge misdirected the jury as to what might and what might not be a part of the custom of the port. The objection in reality is that the learned judge admitted evidence to show that certain things were part of the custom of the port which in their nature could not be so. It was shown by evidence that part of the custom was that vessels should be unloaded by certain lighters, that is to say, by those belonging to a certain company and those belonging to the Government, and that such lighters were only supplied to the ships in turn, and in a particular way. It was shown that this was the practice of the port, not only at the time when the ship arrived, but had been so for so long a time that it had become a recognised custom. But it was urged on behalf of the plaintiffs that this evidence was immaterial, and that the learned judge was wrong to admit it—that this evidence was, in fact, shut out by the terms of the charter-party.

Now, the charter-party provides that "the cargo is to be brought to and taken from alongside at merchants' risk and expense, that twelve running days (Sundays and holidays excepted) are to be allowed, and that the cargo is to be discharged with all dispatch according to the custom of the port." In other words, the cargo is to be discharged with all dispatch consistent with its being discharged in the way in which every ship is invariably discharged at that port. What, then is the manner in which the vessel is to be discharged? The ship cannot cross the bar, and must lie outside. The discharge must therefore take place by lighters, which are warped along a fixed cable across the bar, and, when they have crossed the bar, they are warped along smaller ropes to the ship's side, and in the same manner are warped in again. The port is 150 miles at least from any place whence any additional lighters can be procured; and to say that anyone could get more lighters for the purpose of unloading a particular ship is to say that which, from a business point of view, is impossible. Therefore, à priori, one would suppose that the unloading must be done by lighters belonging to that port only. Evidence was given which accords with that which one would naturally expect—that the unloading had to be done by lighters only, and not by such lighters as the owners of the cargo could procure at their own will and pleasure, but by the lighters belonging to the company and the Government. Now, the company and Government would only supply those lighters in one particular way, viz., at the rate of one lighter per day to the ships in turn, according as each arrived and was reported. Therefore, the process by which a ship had to be discharged was by placing itself on the turn and waiting till it received from the Government permission to have one lighter per day to discharge the cargo. So far from thinking that this cannot be a custom, I am of opinion that it is the only substantial custom of the port. If there was no custom whatever, and the charterer could have supplied himself with a hundred lighters at once, he must still use them by going along the fixed warp. That is a matter of necessity, and therefore the use of the fixed warp cannot be called an essential part of the custom; but an essential part of the custom was to wait till the vessel could get a lighter in her turn. Therefore, unless we hold that the defendants were bound to go to any distance to fetch lighters they used all diligence and every dispatch. I hold that it was an essential part of the custom that the charterers were not bound to get lighters from any other place in any other way, or at any other time, but only from the company and Government, at such times as they would allow; I am of opinion that that was a valid custom, that the learned judge was right to admit the evidence, that the verdict was right, that upon that finding no other judgment could be entered, and that consequently this judgment ought to be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Reported by A. H. POYSER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Saturday, June 14, 1879.

(Before COCKBURN, C.J. and LUSH, J.)

OAKLEY v. SPEEDY.

*Compulsory pilotage—Master of vessel on board—Criminal proceedings against master—Onus of proof—*17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, ss. 354, 370, 376, and 388—Thames Conservancy Act (29 & 30 Vict. c. 89), bye-laws 28 and 72.

In criminal proceedings against a master of a vessel who has a compulsory pilot on board, such master is not bound to prove that at the time of the act or omission the subject of such proceedings he was not interfering with the navigation of his vessel.

The respondent, the master of a vessel carrying passengers and within a district in which he was compelled to take a pilot on board, was summoned and charged by the appellant, acting on behalf of the Thames Conservancy Board, before the police magistrate at W., with not having navigated his vessel in a careful and proper manner; but the magistrate dismissed the summons on the ground that as the master had on board a pilot compulsorily in charge, he was exempt from liability, unless it was proved that he was actually navigating the vessel himself.

Held, that the summons was properly dismissed, for as there was a pilot compulsorily on board, it must be assumed that he was in charge of the vessel, since in criminal proceedings against the master for a breach of the rules and laws of navigation, it is incumbent on the prosecution to prove that at the happening of the accident the master actually took part in the management and navigation of the vessel.

THIS was a case stated by a stipendiary police magistrate under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43. The following were the material parts:—

The defendant was charged at the police court of Woolwich, by a summons taken out at the instance of the complainant, acting on behalf of the conservators of the river Thames, that he the said Wm. Speedy, on Nov. 16, 1878, being master of the steam-vessel Britannia, did not navigate the said vessel while passing on the river Thames in a careful and proper manner as well with regard to the safety of such vessel as of other vessels on the river.

At the hearing of the said summons it was admitted on the part of the defendant that he was on the said 16th Nov. 1878, master of the said steam vessel Britannia; and it was proved on behalf of the complainant that on the afternoon of that day the said steamship was navigated on the river off Woolwich at a rate of speed by reason of which one of the mooring chains of the Warspite, moored at Charlton, was by the heavy wash carried away.

It was proved on behalf of the defendant that the Britannia, was on the said 16th Nov. 1878, on a voyage from Wapping, in the port of London, to Dundee, in Scotland, and that she had on board certain passengers, and that at the time of the said navigation a pilot duly licensed by the Trinity Corporation was compulsorily on board the Britannia to take charge of and navigate her to Gravesend. The navigation of the river Thames is regulated by the bye-laws made by the conservators of the said river in pursuance of the Thames Conservancy Acts, and the Thames Navigation Acts, and allowed by order in council, dated the 5th Feb. 1872.

The 28th of such bye-laws is as follows:

Every vessel shall at all times while passing on the river be navigated in a proper and careful manner, as well with regard to the safety of such vessel as of other vessels on the river.

The 72nd is:

Any person committing any breach of, or in any way infringing any of these bye-laws, shall be liable to a penalty of and shall forfeit a sum not exceeding 5*l.*, which said penalty shall be recovered, enforced, and applied according to the provisions of the Thames Conservancy Acts 1857 and 1864.

By 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 354, it is enacted that:

The master of every ship carrying passengers between any place in the United Kingdom, or the islands of Guernsey, Jersey, Sark, Alderney, and Man, and any other place so situate, when navigating upon any waters situate within the limits of any district for which pilots are licensed by any pilotage authority under the provisions of this or of any other Act, or upon any part thereof so situate, shall, unless he or his mate has a pilotage certificate enabling such master or mate to pilot the said ship within such district, granted under the provisions hereinbefore contained or such certificate as next hereinafter mentioned, being a certificate applicable to such district and to such ship, employ a qualified pilot to pilot his ship.

Sect. 370 defines the "London district" as "comprising the waters of the Thames and Medway as high as London Bridge and Rochester Bridge respectively, and also the seas and channels leading thereto or therefrom as far as Orfordness on the north and Dungeness on the south.

Sect. 376 enacts that "subject to any alteration to be made by the Trinity House, and to the exemptions hereinafter contained, the pilotage districts of the Trinity House, within which the employment of pilots is compulsory, are the London district and the Trinity House outpost districts as hereinbefore defined."

It was contended on the part of the defendant that, inasmuch as the Brittannia was being navigated at the time of the alleged offence by a pilot compulsorily acting in charge, and was under compulsory pilotage, he (the defendant) could not be convicted of committing the breach of the bye-law charged in the summons, and was exempt from liability thereof, in proof of which contention sect. 388 of the last-mentioned Act was quoted, which section is as follows:

No owner or master of any ship shall be answerable to any person whatever for any loss or damage occasioned by the fault or incapacity of any qualified pilot acting in charge of such ship, within any district where the employment of such pilot is compulsory by law.

Being of opinion that such contention was correct, the magistrate dismissed the summons.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the contention of the defendant was good in law.

Arbuthnot for the appellant.—The act complained of was running down the river at an undue rate of speed, and causing an accident. The master was rightly summoned, but the charge was incorrectly dismissed. I admit that there was a pilot compulsorily on board; but the onus of proving that the act complained of was caused by the pilot is cast on the master, who must relieve himself of the liability. The master shields himself under the 72nd bye-law and sect. 388 of the Merchant Shipping Act; but notwithstanding the exemption afforded by this section the Admiralty Court has always in cases in which it is the defence cast upon the master or owner of the ship the burden of proving that the loss or damage was due to the wrongful act of the pilot:

The Mobile, Sw. Ad. Rep. 127;
The Admiral Boxer, Sw. Ad. Rep. 193;
The Schwabbe, Lush. Ad. Rep. 239;
The Carrier Dove, Br. & Lush. Rep. 113.

The principle of these cases is applicable to the matter now before the court. [LUSH, J.—This is not an action, or within the exempting clause, but a penal matter; and is there not a presumption that, when a pilot is on board, he is in charge of the whole navigation of the ship? The cases you have cited are civil actions for loss or damage, and rest on the statutory exemption, and their decisions do not apply to criminal charges upon the bye-laws for improper navigation, as to which it is ordinarily to be presumed that the pilot in charge of the vessel at the time should be responsible.] This is a question of the onus of proof. We were not on board of the defendant's vessel, and cannot know whose fault it is that has caused the mishap, but the defendant does, and it is for this reason that the Admiralty Court casts upon the master the burden of showing that he was not to blame for the accident. LUSH, J.—By the terms of sect. 354 of the Merchant Shipping Act there ought to have been a pilot on board this vessel, and you admit there was. Now, can you presume that the master was interfering in the management and navigation of the ship without presuming that he was guilty of a wrongful act?] The master might actually have been in charge of the vessel at this moment, for the pilot might have gone below; yet the defendant says, "I was not navigating the vessel when the accident occurred; there was a pilot on board; the law took the navigation out of my hand." Now, if such statement is final, and the respondent's contention is good, those in whose charge is the proper ordering of the navigation of the Thames will find their hands fettered, and much mischief will ensue. [LUSH, J.—The last bye-law, number 72, of the conservancy bye-laws, lays it down that the person actually committing the wrongful act of careless navigation is liable. The owner clearly would not be liable in this case, yet he would have been liable primâ facie in a civil action for a collision, as in the cases cited to us. This clearly shows the distinction between the two classes of cases.]

Bucknill, for the respondent, was not called upon.

COCKBURN, C.J.—This appeal must be dismissed. The principle of the cases cited to us is not applicable to the case before us now, though I must confess the decisions go a very long way. The Act of Parliament in consideration of its being compulsory on owners and masters to take on board pilots in certain districts, affords them a certain exemption from liability for the default of such pilot, but it will not permit the owner or master to say, without contradiction, that the accident has been caused by the default of the pilot and not of the master. This, in my opinion, goes a very long way, and for this reason, that it seems to me that when the pilot takes up the navigation of the vessel, and gives his orders and the others are to obey him, the presumption is really the other way. Here, however, we are not dealing with the civil, but penal exemption of the master of a vessel, on board of which there is a pilot directed by the law to be taken. The 28th bye-law says, "every vessel on the river must be navigated with due care;" and its infraction is visited with a penalty. But now we must look to see how far, if the master is not navigating the vessel, he is responsible, and how far he has interfered with the navigation, when his authority is properly merged into that of the pilot. It is the duty of the master to repeat the orders of the pilot and to see them obeyed; now, if he did the reverse of what the pilot told him, and interfered in the working of the ship, he would be responsible. But this is not proved. Those who seek to impose a penal responsibility on the defendant must prove that he has committed the offence imputed to him, and that he wrongfully interfered with the management and navigation of this vessel.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. Primâ facie, in a civil action, the owner of a vessel in which is a pilot compulsorily taken on board, is bound by the acts of his servants, and he must prove that the accident happened not through the fault of his servants, but of the pilot. The 72nd bye-law inflicts the penalty on the guilty person, not on the owner. When you summon a master of a vessel under this bye-law you must prove, to obtain a conviction, that he is the guilty party. If it is shown that he had a pilot compulsorily on board, and as the law presumes that the pilot had the charge of the vessel, you must prove that the master took part in the navigation. To take a cognate example, the master of a servant who has driven furiously may not be personally liable to punishment for an accident resulting therefrom, though he might be sued in a civil action for damages; but under the police regulations, the driver is made personally liable, and can be punished for his misconduct. In this case, the master having a pilot compulsorily on board, and so not being in command of the vessel, it is to be presumed that he took no share in the navigation. If he is to be personally fixed for a breach of the laws and rules of navigation, it is incumbent on those who would so fix him, to prove that because of some act of interference on his part the matter complained of occurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Dec. 4, 1878, and March 18, 1879.

PELLAS AND COMPANY v. NEPTUNE MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY.

*Marine insurance—Money owing to underwriters by insured—Defence in action by assignee of the policy—*31 & 32 Vict. c. 86.

The 31 & 32 Vict. c. 86, which enables assignees of marine policies to sue thereon in their own names, provides that "the defendant in any action shall be entitled to make any defence, which he would have been entitled to make if the said action had been brought in the name of the person by whom, or on whose account, the policy had been effected."

Held, in an action by the assignees of a policy, that the underwriters were entitled, under this provision, to set up a counter-claim for money owing to them, at the time of the assignment, by the person by whom the policy has been effected.

THIS was an action upon a policy of marine insurance, tried before Lord Coleridge, C.J., at the Guildhall. The plaintiffs were merchants in London, and the defendants an insurance company, carrying on business at West Hartlepool. In April 1876 Harris and Co., of Newcastle, effected a policy of insurance for 300*l.* with the defendants on a cargo of coals shipped on board the ship Towator, bound from the Tyne to Genoa, and upon cash advances. This policy was assigned to various persons, and ultimately to the plaintiffs. The ship and coals were totally lost on the voyage to Genoa, and the defendants admitted a total loss; but they claimed to set off as against the plaintiffs' claim of 300*l.* the sum of 40*l.*, in respect of which Harris and Co. were at the date of the writ and at the time of the loss, and continued to be, indebted to the defendants for premiums on policies other than the policy claimed under. After deducting this 40*l.* the defendants paid the balance into court. Lord Coleridge decided against the plaintiffs on this question, and a rule for a new trial was subsequently obtained by them on the ground of misdirection of the learned judge in holding that the set-off could be maintained against the present plaintiffs.

Herschell, Q.C. and A. L. Smith now showed cause.—The substantial question in the case is whether the defendants can set up their claim against Harris, who is the person for whose benefit the policy was effected, in this action by the plaintiffs. That depends on the construction to be put upon 31 & 32 Vict. c. 86, s. 1. Supposing a man has insured his ship, and it is damaged, and the assurer lends 200*l.* to the assured, and then the assured assigns the policy to A. B., and A. B. sues the assurer; is the assurer entitled to deduct 200*l.* from the amount of the insurance? It is said on the other side that policies of insurance are, like bills of exchange, transferable from hand to hand, and that it would be very inconvenient if their negotiability was in any way interfered with. But there is no real hardship in requiring the assignee to give notice of assignment to the underwriter, or take the policy at his own risk; while, on the other hand, there would be a great hardship to the underwriter, if he were liable to lose the security for his debt, through the assignee not choosing to give notice of assignment to him. The balance of convenience, therefore, is in favour of the defendants; but they rely on the plain words of the statute.

Murphy, Q.C.—It is submitted, in the first place, that the intention of the Legislature was to enable assignees of marine policies to sue thereon as if they had been the original grantees. It cannot be thought that it was the intention of the Legislature to preserve a state of things that enabled the assignor to commit a fraud. Before the statute, it is admitted that the assignee of this or any other chose in action could only have sued in the name of the assignor, subject to all equities against the assignor. But the Act intended to give a complete relief. Surely the Act cannot have been passed only with the object of enabling "asignees of marine policies to sue thereon in their own names," taking those words literally. Is it an uncommon thing to find in an Act that greater relief is given than is mentioned in a short preamble? It is submitted that, to give a reasonable construction to the Act, the words "any defence" must be limited to mean a defence upon the policy itself. Then, secondly, a set-off could never have been pleaded in an action for unliquidated damages. The claim is here for a total loss, or, in the alternative, general average; that is an action for unliquidated damages: Luckie v. Bushby (13 C. B. 864), King v. Walker (2 H. & C. 885), which cases are referred to in Arnould's Marine Insurance, 5th edit., p. 219, where it is said: "In considering the law of set-off, it is as well to remember that the contract of marine insurance is still a contract sounding in unliquidated damages, even after an adjustment of a loss under the policy, and notwithstanding it be a valued policy." It is said that the Judicature

Acts have altered this. The Marine Policies Act can only refer to defences that could have been set up at the time that it was passed; the Judicature Acts, therefore, do not apply. Moreover, the Judicature Acts, dealing only with procedure, cannot be held to have effected a change in the law of Marine Insurance.

Herschell, Q.C. in reply.—In this case the damages are liquidated. Before action brought, it was agreed that there was a total loss, and that the amount of damages was 300*l*. The cases cited go upon the particular facts, and do not establish any general proposition. By the Judicature Act 1873, sect. 25, sub-sect. 6, "Any absolute assignment by writing under the hand of the assignor (not purporting to be by way of charge only) of any debt or other chose in action, of which express notice in writing shall have been given to the debtor, trustee, or other person from whom the assignor would have been entitled to receive or claim such debt or chose in action, shall be and be deemed to have been effectual in law (subject to all equities which would have been entitled to priority over the right of the assignee if this Act had not passed), to pass and transfer the legal right to such debt or chose in action from the date of such notice, and all legal or other remedies for the same, and the power to give a good discharge for the same, without the concurrence of the assignor: Provided always," &c. The debt to the defendant here is an equity which would have been entitled to priority over the right of the assignee if the Marine Policies Act had not passed. That Act says that the defendant shall be entitled to make any defence which he would have been entitled to make if the action had been brought in the name of the person by whom the policy had been effected; and by the Judicature Act 1875, Order XIX., r. 3, "A defendant in an action may set off, or set up by way of counter-claim, against the claims of the plaintiff, any right or claim, whether such set-off or counter-claim sound in damages or not, and such," &c. It follows that the defendants here may set off this debt even if the claim be one for unliquidated damages.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 18.—The judgment of the court was delivered by LOPES, J.—The plaintiffs are merchants: the defendants, underwriters. The action is brought on a policy of insurance for the sum of 300*l*., effected in Jan. 1876, by Harris and Co., a firm at Newcastle, on a cargo of coals, and cash advances; shipped on board the Toivatar for a voyage from the Tyne to Genoa. The defendants, in consideration of the premium, underwrote the said policy, and became insurers to Harris and Co.

On the 22nd May 1876 the policy was assigned by Harris and Co. to one Questa, of Genoa, and on the 30th May 1876 the said policy was further assigned by Questa, to Castorina and Co., of Genoa, who, on the 10th May 1877, assigned to the plaintiffs. The Toivatar, with the said coals and cash advances, was, by the perils insured against, lost.

The defendants admitted that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover, and paid the 300*l*. into court, except the sum of 40*l*. which the defendants contended they were entitled to set off (the said 40*l*. being a debt due to the defendants from Harris and Co., incurred in Jan. 1876). The case was tried before the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas in London, who directed a verdict for the defendants. A rule was subsequently obtained for a new trial for misdirection, the ground being that the learned judge ought to have told the jury that the defendants could not set off this 40*l*. against the present plaintiffs.

The question we have to consider on the argument of this rule is whether, having regard to the provisions of the Act 31 & 32 Vict. c. 86, this set-off can be pleaded as a defence against the plaintiffs' who are assignees of the policy. The Act is entitled, "An Act to enable assignees of marine policies to sue thereon in their own names." Sect. 1 is as follows: "Whenever a policy of insurance on any ship or on any goods in a ship, or on any freight, has been assigned so as to pass the beneficial interest in such policy to any person entitled to the property thereby insured, the assignee of such policy shall be entitled to sue thereon in his own name, and the defendant in any action shall be entitled to make any defence which he would have been entitled to make if the said action had been brought in the name of the person by whom, or on whose account, the policy had been effected."

It is contended on the part of the plaintiffs that "any defence" is confined to a defence arising on the policy itself, and cannot cover or include a defence like a set-off, or in fact any defence which does not arise upon the policy. We are unable to place this limited meaning on the word defence, used as it is in this Act of Parliament. It would be doing violence to the plain language used. Previously to the passing of the Act, an assignee of a marine policy could not sue in his own name, he must have sued in the name of his assignor. The Act was passed to remedy this evil, and according to our view the Legislature intended to leave the law in all other respects as it was. It was intended to enable the assignee to sue in his own name, but the defendant was to be entitled to make any defence to the action of the assignee, which he might have made to the action of the assignor. Before the Act, if the action had been brought, as it must have been, in the name of Harris and Co., the defendants could have set off this 40*l*. If the debt set off had accrued since the assignment, and the defendants had notice of the assignment, it might have been replied as an equitable replication; but the 40*l*. beyond all question could have been set off. We think the defendants here are entitled to set off the 40*l*.

A point was taken by the plaintiffs in the argument, which was not raised at the trial. It was, that the plaintiffs' claim was for unliquidated damages, and that the 40*l*. could not be set off against such a claim. We do not think it necessary to consider this point. The point ought to have been taken at the trial. If it had been, the learned judge would probably have amended the statement of defence, by permitting the defendants to add a counter-claim for this 40*l*. If it had been pleaded as a counter-claim, we think it would have come within the words "any defence" in the Act. Had the Act not been passed, plaintiffs could only have sued in Harris and Co.'s name. If Harris and Co. had been plaintiffs, defendants could under the Judicature Acts, have made this 40*l*. the subject of a counter-claim and defence, and we think would have been within the meaning of the Act of Parliament.

April 26 and May 12, 1879.

(Before Lindley, J.)

Dixon v. Whitworth; Dixon v. Sea Insurance Company.

Marine insurance—Insurable interest—Description in policy—Action to determine amount of salvage—Liability of assurers to repay salvage, but not costs of action—Sue and labour clause in policy, construction of.

D. entered into an agreement by which he was to receive 10,000*l. if he succeeded in transporting fron Egypt and erecting uninjured in London an obelisk belonging to the British nation. D. expended* 4000*l. in constructing a vessel or case for the obelisk, in properly stowing it therein, and in providing for its transport. He then insured the obelisk and the vessel it was in with one underwriter for* 2000*l., and with another for* 1000*l. The vessel and obelisk had to be cast off in a storm in the Bay of Biscay by the steamship that was towing them. Another steamer subsequently found them and towed them into Ferrol, where they were refitted, and were afterwards towed to London. The salvors brought an action in the Admiralty Division of the High Court, and were awarded* 2000*l. salvage, the value of the obelisk being estimated at* 25,000*l.*

D., having paid the sum awarded and the costs of the action, brought actions to recover these and other payments from the underwriters. The policies, which were against total loss only, contained a provision that the vessel and obelisk, "for so much as concerns the assured," should by agreement be valued at 4000*l., and a sue and labour clause in the ordinary form.*

Held, that D.'s insurable interest in the obelisk and vessel containing it was 4000*l., the amount of his expenditure at the time that he insured; that it was not necessary to describe the nature of that interest in the policies; that the underwriters were liable to repay D., in proportion to the sums they had insured, the* 2000*l. awarded as salvage, it being expenditure in respect of preservation from loss that would have fallen on them; that they were not liable to repay D. the costs of the Admiralty proceedings, the expense of refitting at Ferrol, and towage to London, as these were not charges incurred by D. to avoid a loss insured against; and that D. was entitled to receive from the underwriters with whom he had insured the whole of the* 2000*l. that he had paid to the salvors, in contributions proportionate to the amount that each had subscribed, notwithstanding that the estimated value of the obelisk that had been salved was far larger than the amount of his interest in it.*

These were consolidated actions tried before Lindley, J., and reserved by him for further consideration, The facts are fully stated in the judgment.

Butt, Q.C., Gainsford Bruce and Hollams, for the plaintiff.—The obelisk has been estimated by the Admiralty Division to be worth 25,000*l.*; the interest that the insured has in the cargo, not the cargo itself, is what is valued in the policy. In Arnold's Marine Insurance, 5th ed., I., 311, the principle is laid down as follows: "The presumption is that the valuation in the policy is, not the whole estimated value of the subject of insurance, but merely of the interest of the assured therein. Hence, where insurance was made on goods 'valued at 19,000*l.*,' of which the assured owned four-ninths, it was contended that the valuation was intended for the entire property, and accordingly that the interest of the assured was to be taken as four ninths of that sum; but the Court said, 'We must take it that the value insured is the value of the assured's interest' (Feise v. Aguilar, 3 Taunt. 506). So in respect of freight (Allison v. Bristol Marine Insurance Company, 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 178; 1 App. Cas. 209"). It is clear from the correspondence in this case that the exact nature of Mr. Dixon's interest was disclosed to the underwriters before the policy was effected. The 4000*l.* is to be read not as the value of the obelisk, but of the plaintiff's interest in it. It is submitted that the assured is entitled to recover everything that he has paid. It may be contended, on the other side, that he has paid salvage for the uninsured portion of the whole value, and that that was not paid in the interest of the assurers, and cannot be recovered. But that is not so. He was forced to pay the whole salvage in order to avoid a total loss on this policy. There was so much salvage money claimed, for which the claimants had a lien on the ship, and there was no one to pay it in this case but the plaintiff. Kidstone v. The Empire Insurance Company (L. Rep. 1 C. P. 535, 2 C. P. 357; 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 12; 16 Ib. 119; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 400 468) is an authority that the suing and labouring clause is an entirely separate contract, under which the assured may recover more than the whole amount for which he is insured. If by perils of the sea the thing insured has got out of the hands of the assured, and he has to pay a sum of money to get it back, he can recover the amount paid under the sue and labour clause:

Dent v. Smith, L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 414; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 868. 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 351.

The vessel and the obelisk are cast away in the Bay of Biscay, are picked up by a steamer, and are taken in tow. It is conceded that, there having been no notice of abandonment, there was no constructive total loss of the vessel. But there would have been a total loss of the obelisk but for the services of the steamer. We can recover the costs of the salvage suit under the sue and labour clause, because it was the only way to avert a total loss. There was a lien on the ship and obelisk for the salvage. It would not have been reasonable for the assured to pay any amount of salvage demanded. Therefore, the only way to free the ship was to bring the suit. The test of what can be recovered is what it is reasonable to do to free the vessel and to avert the loss:

Lee v. Southern Insurance Company, L. Rep. 5 C. P. 397; 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 443; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 393.

Would it have been more reasonable to pay an exorbitant demand than to dispute it? In The Legatus (Swab. 169) Dr. Lushington says: "With regard to the practice of this court, so far as I have any knowledge of it, it has been uniform. It has always been the custom, wherever an action for damage has been brought against another vessel, and where it has been necessary to have recourse to assistance in the nature of salvage, for the remuneration paid for that salvage service to form part of the claim for damage as well as the costs incurred on both sides in the salvage suit. It may be true that there never has been a case of this sort brought before the court, but I think that is so for a plain and obvious reason: the practice of the court has been such that it would have been considered a desperate attempt to disturb what had been so uniformly and so long done." [Lindley, J.—How is it that there is no authority to be found where underwriters have been held liable to indemnify the assured for the costs of a salvage action? Is it not that it is altogether outside the contract between them?] If we had paid the claim of the salvors without disputing it, they would have said that we had acted unreasonably. Then, the interest of the assured is sufficiently described in this policy:

Park on Insurance, 8th ed. I., 9;
Carruthers v. Shedden, 6 Taunt. 114;
Mackenzie v. Whitworth, L. Rep. 1 Ex. Div. 36.

We are entitled to recover the whole amount of salvage, as that is not a sum proportioned to the value of the vessel and cargo, but a payment for services rendered. The question of value is not of great importance in estimating salvage when the value is very great. In The Amérique (2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 460; L. Rep. 6 P. C. 468; 31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 854) Sir James Colville sums up the authorities on that point. He says: "It was argued on the authority of a case decided by Dr. Lushington 1866 (The Syrian, reported in 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. p. 387), that the value of the property salved is material only in so far as it supplies a fund adequate to the payment of a liberal remuneration for the services rendered; and that it ought not further to affect the measure of that remuneration. . . . . That the value of the property salved is, to some extent, to be treated as an ingredient in the calculation of the quantum of salvage remuneration, is a proposition which might be supported by a long series of decisions, beginning with those of Lord Stowell in The William Beckford (3 C. Rob. 355) and Sir John Nicholl in The Industry (3 Hagg. 208), and coming down to the present time. And their Lordships do not conceive that it was the intention of the learned judge who decided the case of The Syrian to run counter to, or even to qualify the decisions of his predecessors on this point. The rule seems to be that, though the value of the property salved is to be considered in the estimate of the remuneration, it must not be allowed to raise the quantum to an amount altogether out of proportion to the services actually rendered. And this is consistent with what is said by Lord Stowell in The Blenden Hall (1 Dodson, 421):—'In fixing a proportion of the value the court is in the habit of giving a smaller proportion where the property is large, and a higher proportion where the value is small, and for this obvious reason—that in property of small value a small proportion would not hold out a sufficient consideration; whereas in cases of considerable value a smaller proportion would afford no inadequate compensation.' Applying these principles, their Lordships, with the most anxious desire not to infringe the wholesome rule which allows great latitude to the discretion of the court of first instance in cases of this description, have been unable to resist the conclusion that the learned judge has given undue weight in this case to the value of the property salved, and has consequently awarded a sum which, having regard to the services rendered, their Lordships must pronounce to be excessive." The plaintiff was trustee of the needle, in possession of it, and the only person who would have lost anything if it had gone to the bottom; therefore he had the insurable interest in it:

Russell, Q.C. and J. C. Matthew for the defendants.—There are four questions in this case: (1) Whatever was the interest of the assured, was that interest properly described in the policy? (2) the policy being against total loss only, are the sums that are claimed recoverable under it? (3) what is the proportion of expenses incurred that the underwriters in question, if liable, ought to bear? (4) are the costs of the salvage action, refitting at Ferrol, &c., expenses properly to be taken into account in estimating that proportion? First, Mr. Dixon was not the owner of the obelisk; that is conceded. [Lindley, J.—Mr. Butt tried to persuade me that he was.] He could not deal with it in any way. He had entered into an agreement to bring it to London for 10,000*l*. He was to get that sum if it came to London, otherwise nothing. His interest was, therefore, that of the shipowner in the freight. The owner of the ship cannot describe his interest as in the freight; and the person interested in the freight cannot describe his interest as in the ship. [Lindley, J.—The mortgagee of a ship may describe his interest as in the ship.] Because he is really the owner. Whitworth's policy is for 1000*l*. "upon the goods and merchandizes in the good ship or vessel called The Cleopatra iron vessel containing the Cleopatra obelisk. . . . . The goods and merchandizes, &c., for so much as concerns the assured by agreement between the assured and assurers in this policy are and shall be valued at 4000*l*. . . . . Vessel and obelisk being insured against the risk of total loss only." The Sea Insurance Company's policy is for 2000*l*. "upon any kind of goods and merchandizes, and also upon the body, &c., of and in the good ship or vessel called The Cleopatra iron vessel containing the Cleopatra obelisk. . . . . The said ship, &c., goods and merchandizes, &c., for so much as concerns the assured by agreement between the assured and the company in this policy are and shall be vessel and obelisk, valued at 4000*l*." The description in these policies is not sufficient to cover Mr. Dixon's insurable interest. Secondly, these policies being against total loss only, are the sums claimed recoverable? On the authorities, before there can be any liability here, there must have been a rendering of services such as would avert liability from the underwriters; in other words, such as would avert a total loss;

Booth v. Gair, 15 C. B. N. S. 291; 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 386; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 393.

Thirdly, in what proportion, if liable, are the defendants bound to contribute? The interest insured is not an interest in the ship, as has been already said, but in the ship's arriving at London. The argument upon the other side is that he had salved all, and as salvor of all had a claim upon all, whosesoever might be the property. It is quite conceded that if notice of abandonment had been given when the vessel was derelict, there would have been a constructive total loss; but it was not given. For whom has the salvor rendered services? For all who have an interest in the ship. There may be any number of interests in a ship, and it is clear that each of those interests must bear its quota of the salvage money. The plaintiff's interest is described in the policy as an interest to the amount of 4000*l.* Why should a man who only has insured 2000*l.* on a declared value of 4000*l.* be called upon to contribute upon the whole value of 25,000*l.*? It does not matter for this purpose who was the owner of this obelisk—whether Mr. Erasmus Wilson, the Board of Trade, or anyone else. Suppose a ship and its cargo, owned by one man, but insured with entirely different underwriters; and the ship and cargo were salved, and a claim made against the owner for salvage. Where is there any authority to show that a claim upon the underwriter who had insured the cargo for the whole amount of the salvage money would be good, and that he would have to look for indemnity to the underwriter who had insured the ship? The plaintiff can only throw on the underwriter that proportion of his loss which he has insured with him:

Lowndes on General Average, 2nd edit. p. 298.

In this case the premium is a 4 per cent. premium; the monument is of very large value; can it be supposed that the defendants would have incurred the risk that it is argued they did on such terms? Fourthly, what expenses can be properly taken into account, if the defendants are liable at all? If the defendants are liable at all it is admitted that they must pay their proportion of the amount awarded for salvage. But as to the costs of the salvage action it is submitted that the defendants are in no case liable to pay them. If the principle was that the underwriters were liable for all that was reasonably done to free the vessel, the defendants would be liable for these costs. That is not the principle. These costs were not the natural consequence of the perils insured against, and were outside the contract altogether:

Mors le Blanche v. Wilson, 8 L. Rep. C. P. 227;
Fisher v. Val de Travers Asphalte Company, L. Rep. 1 C. P. Div. 511; 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 366; Baxendale v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company, L. Rep. 10 Exch. 35; 28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 849.

The expenses in connection with taking the vessel into Ferrol, refitting there, and towing her to London, are also not expenses for which the underwriters can be liable. They are not expenses to avert a total loss.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 12.—Lindley, J.—These are actions brought by an assured against the underwriters of two marine policies, in respect of losses occasioned by the accident which befel the celebrated Cleopatra obelisk on her voyage from Alexandria to this country.

The plaintiff is a civil engineer, and it appears from his evidence that he was desirous of seeing the obelisk brought over to England, and had a conversation with Mr. Erasmus Wilson on the subject. Ultimately, by an agreement dated the 31st Jan. 1877, and made between Mr. Wilson of the one part and the plaintiff, Mr. Dixon, of the other part, it was in effect agreed that Mr. Dixon should, at his own expense and risk, transport the obelisk to London and erect it there uninjured, and that, in the event of his succeeding, Mr. Wilson should pay him 10,000*l.* Mr. Dixon, however, was to incur no liability to Mr. Wilson in the event of failure in the enterprise. On the other hand, Mr. Dixon was to have no claim whatever against Mr. Wilson, except in the event of success. Further, it appears from Mr. Dixon's evidence that he did not anticipate any profit to himself from the transaction; in other words, it was not expected that the 10,000*l.* would more than cover the expenses. The only evidence before me respecting the ownership of the obelisk is the plaintiff's statement that there was a dispute about it, and the Khedive presented it to the British nation and handed it to him (the plaintiff) on their behalf. Having made the above agreement, Mr. Dixon commenced to prepare for the transport of the obelisk. He spent considerable sums of money and much labour in doing this, and he built the vessel called the Cleopatra. This was, in fact, little more than an iron case in which the obelisk was stowed, and in which it would float. The vessel had no other use, and was fit for no other purpose. The vessel was quite subordinate to its cargo, and the cost of its construction was for all practical purposes nothing more than part of the cost of transporting the obelisk. In Sept. 1877 the obelisk was in its case, or, in other words, was on board the Cleopatra, and was ready to be towed to England. On the 15th Sept. an agreement was entered into between the owners of the steamship Olga of the one part and Mr. Dixon of the other part for the towage of the Cleopatra, with the obelisk on board, from Alexandra to London for the sum of 900*l.* The expenses and liabilities which Mr. Dixon had incurred up to this time in constructing the vessel, in getting the obelisk on board, in properly stowing it there, and in providing for its transport, were estimated by him at 4000*l.*, and did in fact amount to about this sum. On the 20th and 21st Sept. 1877 the policies on which these actions were brought were effected by Messrs. Barr and Co. for Mr. Dixon. I will state their language and legal effect presently. The Cleopatra and the obelisk left Alexandria on the 21st Sept. 1877 in tow of the Olga. All went well until the 14th Oct., when a severe storm was encountered in the Bay of Biscay, and the Olga was compelled to cast the Cleopatra off. On the 15th the Olga took the crew of the Cleopatra on board, and afterwards lost sight of her, and, having vainly endeavoured to find her, gave up the search and came on to England without her. On the evening, however of the same day the steamer Fitzmaurice fell in with the Cleopatra, and, after great risk and labour, succeeded in saving her and in towing her into Ferrol. The Cleopatra and obelisk afterwards reached London in safety. The Court of Admiralty awarded salvage to the Fitzmaurice. For the purpose of determining the amount to be awarded, the obelisk was estimated to be worth 25,000*l*., and the sum awarded to the salvors was fixed at 2000*l*. This sum the plaintiff paid. He also paid the costs of the proceedings in the Admiralty, and certain expenses in refitting the Cleopatra at Ferrol, and in towing her with the obelisk from that port to London.

The present actions are brought to recover contribution from the underwriters in respect of these salvage and other expenses. The policies on which the actions are brought are worded as follows: Whitworth's policy is for 1000*l*. "upon the goods and merchandizes in the good ship or vessel called the Cleopatra iron vessel containing the Cleopatra obelisk. The goods and merchandizes, &c., for so much as concerns the assured by agreement between the assured and assurers in the policy are and shall be valued at 4000*l*. Vessel and obelisk being assured against the risk of total loss only." The risks insured against are the ordinary sea risks, and the suing and labouring clause is in the ordinary form. The Sea Insurance Company's policy is for 2000*l*, "upon any kind of goods and merchandizes, and also upon the body, &c., of and in the good ship or vessel called the Cleopatra iron vessel containing the Cleopatra obelisk. The said ship, &c., goods, and merchandizes, &c., for so much as concerns the assured by agreement between the assured and the company in this policy are and shall be, vessel and obelisk, valued at 4000*l*." This policy also is against total loss only. The clauses relating to the risks insured against and suing and labouring are in the ordinary form. The actual wording of the suing and labouring clause was in both policies as follows: "And in case of any loss or misfortune it shall be lawful for the assured, their factors, servants, and assigns to sue labour and travel for, in, and about the defence, safeguard, and recovery of the said goods and merchandizes, or any part thereof, without prejudice to this insurance, to the charges whereof we the assurers will contribute each one according to the rate and quantity of his sum herein assured." Although the language of the first policy is not quite clear as regards the subject-matter insured, I think the first policy is on both ship and cargo, and not on cargo only. The second policy is clearly on both.

The plaintiff's interest in the Cleopatra and obelisk were as follows: he was owner of the Cleopatra: he was not owner of the obelisk; but he had spent money upon it, had possession of it, and probably had a lien upon it for his expenditure. Taking the Cleopatra and obelisk together, the value of his interest in them at the date of the policy was 4000*l*. This was all he really had at risk, and all that was worth insuring. It is true that in certain events he might become entitled to 10,000*l*. under his agreement with Mr. Wilson; but this sum was only calculated to cover expenses, and Mr. Dixon, as a prudent man, would hardly incur further expense until the risks of the voyage were over. I regard the policies as being exactly what they purport to be, viz., policies on the obelisk and the vessel it was in: and I regard Mr. Dixon as having an insurable interest in them to the value of 4000*l*., and having insured that interest by the policies. The description in the policies is sufficient in my opinion, to cover that interest. M'Kenzie v. Whitworth (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 81; L. Rep. 10 Eq. 142, and 1 Ex. Div. 36) shows that it is sufficient to specify the subject matter of insurance; and that it is not necessary to describe the assured's interest in it, unless his interest is such as to affect the risk insured against, which was not the case here. It was suggested that these policies ought to be regarded as analogous to policies on freight to be earned on the safe arrival of cargo; but in my judgment this is not the correct view. The analogy is too fanciful and far fetched to be of any practical use. The true effect of the policies is, in my opinion, what I have above described.

The first question which arises is whether the underwriters are bound to pay anything in respect of any of the expenses to recover which the actions are brought. These expenses are: (1) the 2000*l*. paid for salvage; (2) the costs of the proceedings in the Admiralty; (3) the expenses of refitting at Ferrol and of towing from that port to England. It will be convenient to consider each of these in turn.

1. As to the 2000*l*. paid for salvage. The policies are against the risk of total loss only. Neither the Cleopatra nor the obelisk was totally lost; both were in fact saved, and the defendants therefore contend that they are under no liability whatever. But, although there was no total loss, it is clear beyond all doubt that the Cleopatra and her cargo were in imminent danger of destruction, and were saved from total loss by the services of the salvors. The underwriters therefore have had the benefit of these services, and are bound, in my opinion, to indemnify the plaintiff against his liability in respect of them. It is true that the language of the suing and labouring clause does not in terms extend to any services except those rendered by the assured, their factors, servants, and assigns; and it is also true that the salvage services in this case were not rendered by Mr. Dixon, nor by any factor, servant, or assign of his, unless the salvors are to be regarded as having been his agents by necessity or by ratification. But, without discussing how far the salvors can properly be regarded as agents, I take it to be settled that the suing and labouring clause ought to be construed to cover expenditure which the assured necessarily became liable to pay by way of salvage in respect of preservation from loss which, if it had occurred, would have fallen on the underwriters. See Lohre v. Aitcheson (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 445; 4 Ib. 10; 3 Q.B. Div. 566, &c.); Kidstone v. Empire Marine Insurance Company (L. Rep. 1 C. P. 535 and 2 Ib. 357; 15 L. T. Rep. N.S. 12; 16 Ib. 119; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 400, 468). In truth, Mr. Russell did not seriously contest this point, although he thought it his duty to submit it to the court for decision. The same case of Lohre v. Aitcheson (3 Mar Law Cas. 445; 4 Ib. 10; 2 Q.B. Div. 501 and 3 Ib. 558) shows that this clause is operative even although there is no total loss and nothing abandoned to the underwriters; and in my opinion they are bound by this clause to indemnify the plaintiff in proportion to the sums they respectively insured against his loss of the 2000*l*. awarded for salvage.

2. As regards the costs of the Admiralty proceedings, I am of opinion that the underwriters are not liable for these costs, or any part of them.

I quite accede to the view that they were necessarily and properly incurred in ascertaining the proper amount of salvage to be paid; and I agree in the observation that, in order to enable Mr. Dixon to get the obelisk out of the hands of the salvors, it was as necessary to pay or secure their costs as to pay or secure the salvage itself. But the costs which Mr. Dixon has had to pay are not, in my opinion, charges incurred by him to avoid a loss insured against, or at all events they are too remotely so to be covered by the words of the policies before me. The suing and labouring clause is silent about costs, and no authority has been produced in which costs have been recovered under it. I do not regard Xenos v. Fox (L. Rep. 3 C. P. 631 and 4 Ib. 665; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 146) as conclusive against the plaintiff on this point, but it certainly is rather against him than for him; and the fact that the suing and labouring clause did not cover such losses as are now usually provided for by the collision clause goes far to show that the costs which I am considering cannot be thrown on the underwriters. Their contract does not cover them.

3. As regards the expense of refitting at Ferrol and towage from that port to London, I am of opinion that these matters cannot be thrown on the underwriters. They were not incurred to avoid a total loss by perils of the sea of the obelisk or of his interest in it. They were not incurred until after the obelisk had been saved. It is true that Mr. Dixon would have lost the benefit of his agreement with Mr. Wilson if he had not got the obelisk home. But, as has been seen, he did not insure the benefit of that agreement; and as soon as the obelisk was saved the interest in it which he insured by the policy was saved also. These policies are against total loss only, and every loss sustained by the plaintiff in getting the obelisk home after it was safe at Ferrol must be borne by him. See Great Indian Peninsular Railway v. Saunders (1 Best & Sm. 41, and 2 Ib. 266).

I pass now to the next and last question, which arises, viz., whether the plaintiff is entitled to recover in respect of the whole 2000*l.*, or only in respect of some portion of that sum, viz., in respect of what as between himself and the other persons interested in the obelisk would be his proper proportion, supposing the obelisk to have been uninsured? This question depends on the true construction and effect of the suing and labouring clause, and curiously enough appears never yet to have been decided, at least in this country. The language of the clause is in favour of the plaintiff, and so, in my opinion, is its true effect. By it the underwriters agree to contribute in proportion to the amount subscribed to such charges as the assured shall be put to in preventing a loss which, if not prevented, would fall on the underwriters. There are no words to the effect that the assured shall only be repaid such proportion of those charges as in an equitable adjustment between himself and others would fall on him alone. The agreement is to contribute (in proportion to the amount subscribed) to the charges of his services. In other words, the underwriters agree to pay him for his services, each underwriter agreeing to pay in proportion to the amount for which he insures. Moreover, the early part of the clause authorises the assured to endeavour to save, not his interest in the thing insured, but the thing itself; and the language of the clause is adapted to cases in which other persons besides himself are interested in that thing. Further, it is now clearly established that this clause is a distinct and independent agreement, which, although occurring in and forming part of the policy, may entitle the assured to recover more than the amount underwritten. See Lohre v. Aitcheson (sup). Having regard to this principle, to the language and known object of the clause, I am of opinion that whatever services or charges of the assured fairly come within it must be paid for by the underwriters in proportion to their subscriptions. This view is in accordance with that adopted by Chancellor Kent in Watson v. Marine Insurance Company (7 Johns N. Y. 757); and although that decision is controverted by Mr. Phillips (s. 1742, note 5) and by Mr. Lowndes (Law of Average, p. 231, 4th ed.), I am of opinion that Chancellor Kent's view is more in accordance with the true intent and meaning of the suing and labouring clause than are the views of his critics. They do not, I think, attach sufficient importance to the clause being a distinct agreement to pay for services rendered to avoid a loss insured against. The underwriters will be at liberty, on paying Mr. Dixon, to enforce such rights, if any, as he may have against other persons in respect of their proper shares in the salvage expenses (see Dickinson v. Jardine, L. Rep. 3 C.P. 639; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 126); and, although in this particular case those rights will probably be of no avail, yet whatever they may be worth the underwriters will be entitled to force them.

In the result my judgment is for the plaintiff for 500*l.* against the defendant Whitworth, and for 1000*l.* against the defendants, the Sea Insurance Company, these sums being their respective shares of the 2000*l.* In each action the defendants must pay the costs.

The Anders Knape.

APPEAL FROM INFERIOR COURT.

Salvage—Pilotage.

A person, whether a pilot or not, who takes charge of a vessel in distress, with the consent of her master is entitled to salvage reward, in the absence of an express contract to the contrary.

Semble, it is immaterial whether, under such circumstances as would entitle a person to salvage reward in any case, the person claiming salvage does or does not hold himself out rightly or wrongly as being a pilot, so long as he performs the service.

The Frederick, (1 W. Rob. 16) approved.

THIS was an appeal in an action of salvage from the decision of the City of London Court.

The facts were, that the Anders Knape, a Swedish Screw steamer, whilst on a voyage from Sweden to Cadiz, got ashore on the night of the 13th Feb. 1879, on the Long Sand; she got off without assistance the next morning, but with her rudder damaged, and anchored in eleven fathoms water.

The plaintiffs were the master and others belonging to the fishing smack Faith, and on the morning of the 14th they heard guns fired, and proceeded in consequence to the Long Sand, and soon after noon they fell in with the Anders Knape.

The master of the Faith went on board and took charge of the ship to bring her into Harwich. The contention for the plaintiffs was, that the master of the smack was not a pilot, and did not engage as such, and that the Anders Knape being in distress both by reason of the damaged condition of the rudder, and also from the ignorance of the locality, that the services rendered her were salvage services. The defendants contended that, at the time the plaintiffs came on board, the Anders Knape had a signal for a pilot flying, and that the smack exhibited a flag which led those on board the Anders Knape to suppose that she was a pilot boat, and that the person who ultimately turned out to be master of the Faith was engaged, in consequence of his own proceedings, as a pilot and for the purpose of piloting the ship into Harwich, and that therefore there was nothing to convert the service into a salvage service.

The flag which was produced by the master of the smack was red and white in two horizontal stripes, the upper one being white, and with a narrow border of blue. The regulation as to the flags to be carried by pilot boats and pilots is contained in the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 as follows:

Characteristics of Pilot Boats.

346. Every pilot boat or ship shall be distinguished by the following characteristics; (that is to say,) (1) . . . . (2.) . . . . (3.) When afloat, a flag at the mast-head or on a sprit or staff, or in some other equally conspicuous situation; such flag to be of large dimensions compared with the size of the boat or ship carrying the same, and to be of two colours, the upper horizontal half white, and the lower horizontal half red:

And it shall be the duty of the master of such boat or ship to attend to the following particulars: First, that the boat or ship possesses all the above characteristics; secondly, that the aforesaid flag is kept clean and distinct so as to be easily discerned at a proper distance; and lastly, that the names and numbers before mentioned are not at any time concealed; and if default is made in any of the above particulars he shall incur a penalty not exceeding 20*l.* for each default.

Qualified Pilot to display Flag, though not in Pilot Boat.

347. Whenever any qualified pilot is carried off in a boat or ship not in the pilotage service he shall exhibit a flag of the above description, in order to show that such boat or ship has a qualified pilot on board; and if he fails to do so, without reasonable cause, he shall incur a penalty not exceeding 50*l.*

Penalty on ordinary boat displaying Pilot-flag.

348. If any boat or ship, not having a licensed pilot on board, displays a flag of the above-mentioned description, there shall be incurred for every such offence a penalty not exceeding 50*l.*, to be recovered from the owner or from the master of such boat or ship.

There was great conflict of evidence as to the conversation which took place between the master of the Faith, and the captain of the Anders Knape, and as to whether the damage to the rudder of the Anders Knape was of such a nature as to materially interfere with her steering, and, if so, whether the master of the Faith was aware of the fact when he took the charge.

Bucknill for the plaintiffs.
Myburgh for the defendants.

Mr. Commissioner KERR, in delivering judgment, said that, on the facts, he was quite satisfied that it was pilotage and nothing else. The two flags are conclusive—one flag flying for a pilot, and another flag which is practically a pilot flag; one showing that a ship wanted a pilot, and the other flying a flag which must be taken for a pilot flag. The services were offered and accepted solely as those of a pilot. I think there ought to be some mode of preventing the use of a flag like that: it is a pilot flag, with two blue borders above and below. That is enough. It is to all intents and purposes a pilot flag, and the captain of the Anders Knape treated it as such. The suit is dismissed with costs.

From this decision the plaintiffs appealed, and the appeal came on for hearing in the Admiralty Division on May 13, 1879.

Clarkson for the appellants.—This is a salvage service. It was rendered in a place out of any pilotage district, and therefore it is immaterial whether the flag was similar to a pilot flag or not. That the ship was in need of assistance is obvious from the fact that she did not proceed on her voyage direct, but was brought into a port of refuge.

Myburgh for respondents.—The plaintiff held himself out as a pilot, and contracted to pilot the Anders Knape from the place where he boarded her into Harwich for pilotage reward, and therefore he cannot recover salvage.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is a case about which I admit I was exceedingly doubtful in the course of the argument. I have been referred to the case of The Frederick (1 W. Rob. 16) cited in The Œolus (Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 516; L. Rep. 4, Ad. & Ec. 31; 28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 41), where Dr. Lushington says: "It has been urged in the argument for the owners that pilots are not to convert their duties into salvage services. This may be a correct position under ordinary circumstances; at the same time it is to be observed that it is a settled doctrine of this Court, that no pilot is bound to go on board a vessel in distress to render pilot service for mere pilotage reward. If a pilot, being told he would receive pilotage only, refused to take charge of a vessel in that condition. he would be subjected to no censure: and if he did take charge of her would be entitled to salvage remuneration." Now, the facts of this case are these: This foreign vessel had been on the sand, and had sustained some damage to her rudder. She was therefore in a condition in which salvage services might be rendered to her. The plaintiff in this case—the master of the Faith—says that he went on board this vessel, and was told by the captain that the rudder was broken, and that the ship had been aground. A considerable quantity of evidence is produced as to whether he contracted as a salvor, or whether he contracted as a pilot. It has been well put by Mr. Myburgh that in this case it might be contended that he contracted to act as a pilot. But his own evidence is distinctly the other way. He says he told the captain that he was a fisherman, and that he told him he could conduct his ship into Harwich, that is to say, if he wished it; that he could help him to go into a port of refuge, where he could get the damage done to his vessel repaired. Supposing nothing had been said, supposing the master of the Faith had gone on board the Anders Knape without saying anything at all, and the captain had said, "I want to go to Harwich," and the master of the Faith had proceeded to put the vessel in a right direction, could it be doubted that he had performed a salvage service, looking to the state of the ship, and the fact that he had been asked to take her to a place where she could be repaired? I am of opinion that the facts of the case are brought within the judgment of Dr. Lushington in the case to which I have referred (The Frederick. 1 W. Rob. 16). I think that that was a case in which he would be "subject to no censure if he refused to take charge of the vessel, and if he did take charge of her he would be entitled to salvage remuneration," unless he had expressly contracted. I think that there was a salvage service, although I admit that the distinction is a nice one. I think that the judge of the court below was misled by the word pilotage; but, upon the whole, I am of opinion that a salvage service was rendered, and that the salvage remuneration should be awarded, and I shall award 30*l*. with the usual costs. There will be leave to appeal.

(Before JAMES, BRETT, and COTTON, L.JJ.

Ex parte ROSEVEAR CHINA CLAY COMPANY; Re COCK.

Stoppage in transitu—Contract to deliver goods free on board—Ship chartered by purchaser—Ultimate destination not stated.

Delivery of goods by a vendor on board a ship chartered by the purchaser is only constructive, and not actual, delivery to the purchaser, inasmuch as the contract with the master of the ship to carry the goods does not make him the agent of the purchaser, and so long as the goods remain in the hands of the master of the ship as carrier, the vendor's right of stoppage in transitu continues.

Till the goods are actually delivered to the purchaser or his agent the transitus is not at an end and it makes no difference that the ultimate destination of the goods has not been communicated by the purchaser to the vendor.

A contract was made for the sale of a quantity of china clay to be delivered free on board at a specified port, payment to be by the purchaser's acceptance. The purchaser chartered a ship and gave notice to the vendor, who then delivered the clay on board the ship at the specified port. Before the ship left the port the vendor, hearing that the purchaser was insolvent, gave notice to the master of the ship to stop the clay in transitu. No bill of lading had been signed, nor had the purchaser given any acceptance in payment of the contract price:

Held, that the clay was in the possession of the master of the ship only as carrier, and not as agent of the purchaser, that the transitus was therefore not at an end, and that the vendor had duly exercised his right of stoppage in transitu.

Decision of Bacon, C.J. reversed.

THIS was an appeal from a decision of the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy.

The facts of the case were as follows:

On the 20th Nov. 1877, David Cock, a china clay merchant, carrying on business at Roche, near St. Austell, wrote to the Rosevear China Clay Company, a letter of which the material parts were as follows:

Your favour respecting china clay to hand. I have this morning been on the works and took several samples of what is now in stock. I regret very much to assert that in consequence of what appears to me to have been put in the clay by way of adulteration will prevent me from purchasing. It might, and probably would be ruinous to all my connection. There are about 100 tons of the old stock which has not been so treated, and which I would purchase at 15*s*. per ton f. o. b. Fowey, payment to be by four months' acceptance, from date of bill of lading. Same to be shipped during this month, or if not bill to date 1st Dec.

On the 27th Nov. the secretary of the company replied:

We now offer you the balance old Rosevear make, 80 to 100 tons f. o. b. Par or Fowey, four months draft dated from 1st Dec., whether shipped or not. Please say if you confirm this.

On the 30th Nov. Cock replied confirming.

On the 1st Dec. the secretary wrote to Cock as follows:

I am in receipt of yours of the 30th ult., which is two days over return of post. This delay of your confirmation of the purchase has left the matter open for others. But as we have not definitely closed, if you are prepared to have the clay offered you taken on board within fourteen days from the date of my offer, and accept our draft from the 1st Dec. at four months next, we will withdraw from confirming sale to another party, but you must reply here definitely 4th inst., or the matter falls through.

On the 12th Dec. Cock wrote to the Company:

I have a vessel of 215 tons which will load at Fowey on Friday next, so now I can take your 100 tons of Rosevear clay upon your terms as per your last letter. Let me know not later than Friday morning if I am to have the clay or not.

On the 13th Dec. a clerk of the company replied:

In reply to yours of the 12th inst, I beg to say, in the absence of Mr. Carr (the secretary), who is away from home, we will send you the 80 to 100 tons china clay (old Rosevear make) as per conditions mentioned in Mr. Carr's letter to you of Nov. 27 and Dec. 1. I have instructed Capt. Dyer of this port to send on same to Fowey at once.

On 27th Dec. the secretary of the company wrote to Cock:

Mr. Dyer has handed account to-day by letter which makes 108 tons 2 qrs. 2 cwt. clay as shipped for your account, value 81*l*. 1*s*. 10*d*. There is an old balance due to us of 11*l*. 7*s*. 8*d*. Do you wish this added to the draft 81*l*. 1*s*. 10*d*. If so, I have no objection, and will send draft for your acceptance in a day or two.

Cock had on the 5th Dec. entered into a verbal agreement to charter a ship called the Forester to call at Fowey and convey the clay for him, with other clay, to Glasgow, where he had consigned it to an agent for sale. No charter-party was signed.

On the 29th Dec. the company delivered 100 tons of the clay on board the Forester at Fowey.

No bill of lading was signed.

On the 31st Dec. the company having heard that Cock, who had committed an act of bankruptcy by absconding, was insolvent, gave notice to the master of the Forester, which was still at Fowey, to stop the clay in transitu.

The master afterwards signed a bill of lading in favour of the company, and by their directions the clay was taken to Runcorn instead of to Glasgow, and was there sold on their account.

Cock was afterwards adjudicated a bankrupt in the Truro County Court.

The trustee in the bankruptcy claimed the clay on the ground that the transitus was at an end when the clay was shipped on board the Forester and that therefore the notice to stop in transitu came too late.

The trustee applied to the County Court for an order that the company should pay over to him the invoice price of the clay. On the hearing of the application the bankrupt was examined and deposed that he was in the habit of buying and sending clay all over the country; that he did not inform the Rosevear Company of the destination of the clay; that he never used to reveal the ultimate destination of cargoes; and that he communicated the name of the vessel to the vendors on the 12th Dec.

The invoice of the clay and the bill of exchange for Cock's acceptance were posted by the secretary of the company on the 29th Dec.; but the bill was never accepted.

The County Court judge refused the trustee's application, being of opinion that it was the intention of both the parties that the property in the clay should not pass to the purchaser until the bill of exchange for the price had been accepted by him; and that, even if the property did pass, the clay never came into the possession of the purchaser, that the transitus was not at an end when the clay was placed on board the ship, and that consequently the company had a right of stoppage in transitu, which right they had effectually exercised.

From this decision the trustee appealed.

On the hearing before the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy, the following cases were cited:

Valpy v. Gibson, 4 C. B. 837;
Ex parte Gibbes, Re Whitworth, 33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 479; L. Rep. 1 Ch. Div. 101;
Berndtson v. Strang, 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 583; L. Rep. 4 Eq. 481; 3 Ch. 588;
Bloxaman v. Sanders, 4 B. & C. 941;
Mirabita v. The Imperial Ottoman Bank, 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 591; 38 L. T. Rep. N. S. 597; L. Rep. 3 Exch. Div. 164; Ogg v. Shuter, 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 77; 33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 492; L. Rep. 1 C. P. Div. 47.

Bacon, C.J. delivered judgment as follows:—I cannot see what the bill of lading has to do with this question. (His Lordship alludes to the argument that no bill of lading having been signed so as to make the goods deliverable to any one, the vendors retain a jus disponendi, in support of which proposition, Ogg v. Shuter had been cited.) No doubt the vendors might, if they had thought fit, have taken a bill of lading, which would have secured, not the possession of, but a right to the property mentioned in the bill of lading; but they did not. Their omission to do so cannot be used in their favour. The transaction is as plain a one as ever was stated. A man wants to buy china clay, a heavy commodity or thing which he cannot carry in his own waggons, and does not mean to do so, but he tells the company that he will get a ship to transport this clay which he buys of them. He afterwards gives them the name of the ship, and directs them to deliver the clay which he has bought on board that ship. If it had been a warehouse instead of a ship, could there have been any doubt that after the clay had been carried to the warehouse the transitus would have been at an end? I have no doubt that the transitus, such as it was, ended when the clay arrived upon the quay at Fowey and was put into the ship Forester, which the bankrupt had hired for the very purpose of carrying it. Valpy v. Gibson is directly in point on the part of the case I am now considering. In that case there was that which was a little more remarkable, and which probably gave rise to some argument. The vessel in which the goods were to be shipped was destined for Valparaiso, and the vendors of the goods wanted some patterns or cards of theirs to be sent along with the goods, and, knowing well enough that the ship was going to Valparaiso, they gave a direction to that effect when they delivered the goods. The court decided that, when the goods were delivered on board the ship, which had been hired for the purpose of transport by the purchaser, there was an end of the transit. Delivery "free on board" only means "the price shall be that which we stipulate for, and you shall not have to pay for the waggons or carts necessary to carry the clay from the place where it is dug; we will bear all those charges and put it free on board the ship, the name of which you are to furnish. I cannot think that any question arises. The fact that the bill of exchange had not been accepted does not alter the case in the slightest degree. On the 29th Dec. the china clay, which had been bought and sold, was by the vendors put on board the ship; they never thought of taking a bill of lading, or of retaining any right over it, but they delivered it to the man who had bought it of them. There is no doubt upon the facts of the case, and there can be no doubt whatever about the law. There was no transit, except from the quarry to the ship's side; the transit was ended so soon as the clay was on board the ship, and the right to stop it was therefore entirely gone. None of the cases which have been referred to give any kind of colour to the contention raised on the part of the vendors to have this clay treated as still belonging to them, although they had delivered it free on board in the manner, and at the price stipulated for in the contract between the parties. However, the learned judge of the County Court took a very different view of the subject. He seems to have bestowed a great deal of attention upon it, and to have considered many cases, the bearing of which on the question before me I have not been able to perceive; but as he gave a very deliberate and considered judgment, which is entitled to all respect, and as, moreover, he invited the parties to take the case up to the highest court, I am content that it should go there. But I should be sorry if it went with any expression of doubt on my part. I am clear that this is a case in which the vendor's right of stoppage in transitu ceased to exist the moment the clay was put on board the ship.

From this decision the Rosevear China Clay Company appealed.

Winslow, Q.C. and E. C. Willis, for the appellants.—In the ordinary course of business the vendors would have applied to the master of the ship for a bill of lading, and they would have taken it to their own order. They would then have sent it to the purchaser with the bill of exchange for its acceptance. He could not have retained the bill of lading without accepting the bill of exchange; if he had done so, no property in the goods would have passed to him:

Shepherd v. Harrison, 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 60; 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 857; L. Rep. 5 E. & I. 116.

The vendors cannot be in a worse position, because no bill of lading was signed. Therefore the property in the clay never passed to the purchaser. [Brett, L.J.—What right had the vendors to the bill of lading? They were to deliver free on board for the purchaser. James, L.J.—What privity was there between the vendors and the master of the ship? The bargain to charter the ship was made between the purchaser and the shipowner.] The shippers of the goods would nevertheless be entitled to have the bill of lading made out to them:

Craven v. Ryder, 6 Taunt. 433;
Abbott on Shipping, 11th edit. p. 279.

[Brett, L.J.—In Craven v. Ryder, the ship was either a general ship, or it was chartered by the vendor.] In Turner v. The Trustees of the Liverpool Dock (6 Ex. 543) it was held that the property in goods did not pass to the purchaser, though they were delivered on board his own ship, because by the terms of the bill of lading the vendors reserve to themselves a jus disponendi which the master of the ship acknowledged by signing the bill of lading making the goods deliverable to their order. [Brett, L.J.—It was held in that case that if the goods had been delivered on board the purchaser's own ship, without any restriction, that would have been a delivery to the purchaser; but the master had assented to the vendor's restrictions. In the present case the question is whether there was any intention when the clay was delivered on board the ship to take a bill of lading to the vendors.] You cannot assume that it was intended to deliver the clay to the purchaser's order, when he had not accepted the bill of exchange; the inference would be the other way. At all events, whether the property in the clay passed to the purchaser or not, the right of stoppage in transitu remained. The transitus was not at an end when the clay was put on board the ship at Fowey; it would not have been at an end till the clay was delivered to the purchaser's agent in Glasgow. The master of a ship, which has been chartered by a purchaser to carry goods for him is not his agent or servant, and the goods are in the master's possession only as carrier, and so long as the possession is of that nature the vendor's right to stop in transitu continues:

Berndtson v. Strang, 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 583; L. Rep. 4 Eq. 481; 3 Ch. 588, 590;
Gibson v. Carruthers, 8 M. & W. 321 328;
Benjamin on Sales, 2nd edit. p. 698.

Northmore Lawrence (with him De Gex, Q.C.) for the trustee.—The vendors did not reserve their right, as they might have done. The contract was to deliver free on board at Fowey, and when that was done the transitus was at an end. If the ship had been the purchaser's own ship the delivery on board would have been delivery to him, and Schotsmanus v. The Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company (16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 189; L. Rep. 2 Ch. 332), shows that the transitus would then have been at an end. What difference can it make that the ship was only chartered by the purchaser? On demand, the master would have been bound to give the clay to the purchaser, subject only to his lien for freight. Valpy v. Gibson (4 C. B. 837) shows that the fact that there is to be a subsequent transit prescribed by the purchaser does not prevent there being a complete delivery to the purchaser. Ex parte Gibbes. Re Whitworth (33 L. T. Rep. N, S. 479; L. Rep. 1 Ch. Div. 101), shows that the right of stoppage in transitu is gone when the transitus prescribed by the vendor is at an end. Here the vendors had nothing to do with the further destination of the clay after they had delivered it on board at Fowey. That distinguishes the present case from Berndtson v. Strang, and other cases in which the ultimate destination of the goods was communicated to the vendor when the contract for sale was entered into. In such cases the vendor has in contemplation the transit to the ultimate destination, and delivers to the carrier as carrier.

No reply.

James, L.J.—With all respect for the decision of the Chief Judge, I am of opinion that this case cannot be distinguished from the authorities which have been referred to, and in particular from that of Berndtson v. Strang (ubi sup.) The authorities show that the vendor has a right to stop in transitu until the goods have actually got into the hands of the purchaser, or of some one who receives them in the character of his servant or agent. That is the cardinal principle. In order that the vendor should have lost that right the goods must be in the hands of the purchaser, or of some one who can be treated as his servant or agent, and not in the hands of a mere intermediary. It is admitted that if it had been mentioned in the original contract for sale that the goods were to be carried to Glasgow the present case could not have been distinguished from Berndtson v. Strang, but it is said that the fact that no ultimate destination was mentioned makes a distinction. It seems to me, however, that the mere fact that the port of destination was left uncertain or was changed after the contract for sale, can make no difference. The principle is this, that when the vendor knows that he is delivering the goods to some one as carrier, who is receiving them in that character, he delivers them with the implied right, which has been established by the law, of stopping them so long as they remain in the possession of the carrier as carrier. I am of opinion that in the present case, although the vendors' liability was at an end when they had delivered the clay on board the ship, which indeed is the case in most instances of stoppage in transitu, that did not deprive them of the right to stop in transitu so long as the clay was in the possession of the master of the ship as a carrier. To use the language of Lord Cranworth (then Rolfe, B.) in the case of Gibson v. Carruthers (8 M. & W. 321, 328), "I consider it to be of the very essence of that doctrine that during the transitus the goods should be in the custody of some third person, intermediate between the seller who has parted with, and the buyer who has not yet acquired, actual possession;" and that language was adopted by Wood, V.C., and by Lord Cairns in Berndtson v. Strang (16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 583; L. Rep. 4 Eq. 481; L. Rep. 3 Ch. 588, 590.) In the present case the clay was delivered to a third person, intermediate between the vendors and the purchaser, and therefore the vendors still had a right of stoppage in transitu.

Brett, L.J.—It seems to me that there was a binding contract between the vendors and the vendee, though by it alone the property in the clay did not pass to the vendee. But as soon as the clay was appropriated by the vendors to this contract, and was placed on board the ship, the property in it passed to the vendee, and at the same time, as between the vendors and the vendee, there was a delivery of the clay to the latter. But it was a constructive, not an actual delivery. If by the contract the vendors had been bound to deliver to the vendee at Fowey, and the clay had been there delivered to him or to his agent, and he or his agent had there shipped it, I should have thought that after that there would have been no transit. But the contract was to deliver at Fowey on board a ship, and to deliver free on board, that is, the vendors undertook the delivery of the goods. The ship was to be chartered by the vendee, it is true, and he must charter the ship to carry the clay to some port. The distinction taken by Mr. Northmore Lawrence is an ingenious one, but it seems to me that it can make no difference whether the destination of the goods is communicated at the time of the contract for sale, or whether the destination is to be named after the contract, but before the shipment. Here the purchaser entered into an agreement with the owner of the ship that the ship should take the clay to Glasgow, and the vendors were bound to put the clay on board that ship to be carried to Glasgow. It was not the purchaser's own ship, but that of the shipowner, and the clay when delivered on board was to be carried to Glasgow. The question is whether the transit was at an end before the arrival of the ship at Glasgow. It seems to me that several decided cases show that it was not. In James v. Griffin (1 M. & W. 20; 2 M. & W. 623) Parke B. laid down the law thus (at page 632): "Of the law on this subject, to a certain extent, and sufficient for the decision of this case, there is no doubt. The delivery by the vendor of goods sold to a carrier of any description, either expressly or by implication named by the vendee, and who is to carry on his account, is a constructive delivery to the vendee; but the vendor has a right, if unpaid, and if the vendee be insolvent, to retake the goods before they are actually delivered to the vendee, or some one whom he means to be his agent, or take possession of and keep the goods for him, and therefore to replace the vendor in the same situation as if he had not parted with the actual possession." The distinction there taken is between a constructive and an actual delivery to the vendee, and Parke, B. says that if there is only a constructive delivery to the vendee the transit is not over; it is not at an end until the goods have been actually delivered to the vendee or his agent. Then in the case of Berndtson v. Strang (ubi sup.) the test put by Lord Cairns is whether the goods have been delivered only to a carrier, although he may have been named by the purchaser. There the ship had been chartered by the purchaser, and therefore when the goods were placed on board there was a constructive delivery to him. Yet, because the goods were in the hands of the shipowner as carrier, it was held that the transit was not over until that carriage was over. So too in Smith's Leading Cases, in the notes to Lickbarrow v. Mason (vol. 1, p. 818, 7th edit.) it is said: "The rule to be collected from all the cases is, that the goods are in transitu so long as they are in the hands of the carrier as such, whether he was or was not appointed by the consignee." In the present case the clay was placed on board the ship for the purpose of being carried to Glasgow; it was in the actual possession of the shipowner and only in the constructive possession of the purchaser. Therefore the right of stoppage in transitu existed. If the purchaser had been the owner of the ship, the vendors would have had no such right, unless they had reserved it by express stipulation. But in the actual state of things, I think that, both on principle and on the authorities, the transit was not over, and the right to stop in transitu remained.

Cotton, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Assuming that there was a binding contract for the sale of the clay, I thing that the right to stop in transitu existed when the notice was given. The right of an unpaid vendor continues until the goods have come into the actual possession of the purchaser, treating for this purpose the possession of his agent or servant as his possession. The rule was stated by Lord Cairns in Berndtson v. Strang, and I think it is clearly established that so long as goods are in the hands of a carrier as carrier, they are not in the actual possession of the purchaser, whoever may have nominated the carrier. The contract with a carrier to carry goods does not make the carrier the agent or servant of the person who contracts with him whether he be the vendor or the purchaser of the goods. Here the verbal agreement which the purchaser entered into to charter the ship did not make the captain the agent or servant of the purchaser; he was only a carrier. But Mr. Northmore Lawrence ingeniously raised the point that there can be no stoppage in transitu unless there is a transit, and he said that the contract being only to deliver the clay on board the ship, and no further destination having been communicated to the vendors the transit was at an end so soon as the clay was delivered on board the ship. The cases no doubt show that there is no right to stop in transitu if the goods have once come into the possession of the purchaser, even though the vendor has afterwards regained the possession of them. The argument must come to this: it must be shown that the goods have come into the hands of the purchaser, and that the shipment has been then made by him. Here the contract was that the goods were to be placed on board by the vendors, not by the purchaser. The purchaser was to indicate where the goods were to go, and only when they had reached that destination would they come into the actual possession of the purchaser. If the contract had been to deliver the clay to an agent of the purchaser at Fowey, it would have been a very different matter. The case would then have been like that of Valpy v. Gibson (4 C. B. 837), in which the shipment was made by the purchaser, not by the vendor.

The Cassiopeia.

APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (ADMIRALTY).

Practice—Amended writ—Default cause—In rem—Service.

After a vessel has been sold under an order of the Judge of the Admiralty Division, and the proceeds are in the registry, no owner having appeared, the writ in an action against those proceeds, whether original or amended subsequent to the sale, must be personally served on the registrar.

An amended writ must in all cases be served in the same way as an original writ would be under similar circumstances. Where a writ is served on the registrar, to render the service good, the provisions of Order IX., r. 13 must be strictly adhered to.

This was an appeal from an order made by the Judge of the Admiralty Division refusing to sign judgment in a cause in rem by default.

The facts were, that a cause in rem was instituted against the Cassiopeia, a British colonial vessel, for necessaries supplied to her, and the writ was served on the ship in the usual way (Order IX., r. 10), but no appearance was entered for the owners.

At the time the writ was served the Cassiopeia was already under arrest in another action in rem, in which there was no appearance; a decree was obtained by default in the earlier action subsequent to the service of the writ in the later one, and under the decree the ship was sold and the proceeds of the sale brought into court. The plaintiffs in the second action then amended the indorsement on their writ of summons by adding to their claim for necessaries a claim as mortgagees of the ship; the mortgage was a security for the payment due for necessaries.

May 15.—W. G. F. Phillimore, for the plaintiffs in the second action, moved for judgment by default, under the Admiralty Rules of 1871 (L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 3 ad fin. The Polymede. 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 124; L. Rep. 1 P. D. 121; 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 367), for his claim as mortgagee in the amended indorsement against the fund in court. [Sir R. Phillimore.—Has the amended writ been served on the owners?] No, there is no neeessity; the claim for mortgage is the same as that for necessaries stated in a different way; the owners, by not appearing in the necessaries suit, show that they have no defence against our claim. [Sir R. Phillimore.—The owners may have a defence to your claim on the mortgage, though they have not when you claim for necessaries.] Where there is default of appearance, it is sufficient service to file in the registry: (Order XIX., r. 1) If there had been an appearance in the action, I should have been obliged to serve the amended writ after getting leave to amend under Order XXVII., r. 11 (see also Order III., r. 2), and the amendment may be made without prejudice to a pending motion:

Caldwell v. Pagham Harbour Reclamation Company, 2 Ch. Div. 221.

[Sir R. Phillimore.—There may be other claimants against the fund in court, and they were entitled to notice of this claim.] If there were they would have objected to our claim for necessaries and have entered a caveat.

Sir R. Phillimore.—I am not satisfied that there should not be a fresh service of the writ in this case, and therefore I refuse to grant the prayer of the motion for judgment.

From this decision the plaintiffs appealed.

May 21.—The appeal came on for hearing before Jessel, M.R., James, and Brett, L.JJ.

W. G. F. Phillimore for plaintiffs.—At the time the amendment was made in the writ the ship had already been sold, and therefore it was impossible and useless to serve the amended writ on her; the proceeds were in the registry, and the amended writ was served by being filed there.

Jessel, M.R.—In this case the service on the registrar was sufficient, the ship having been sold under order of the court, though in general an amended writ should be served in the same way that an original writ is.

James and Brett, L.JJ. concurred.

May 26.—The case came before the court (James, Brett, and Cotton, L.JJ.) again, the registrar of the Admiralty Division having refused to draw up the order for judgment on the ground that it was made on the supposition that the amended writ had been served on him (the registrar), when in fact it had only been filed in the registry, and also because it was informal, having no date of service indorsed on it in accordance with Order IX., r. 13.

Phillimore for the plaintiffs.—Order IX., r. 13, does not apply to actions in rem; it is taken from sect. 15 of the Common Law Procedure Act 1852, and applies only where personal service is necessary:

Dymond v. Croft, 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 786; 3 Ch. Div. 512.

[Brett, L.J.—That case was a case of substituted service, this is one in which the practice has been to serve the registrar as holder of the proceeds.] The service on the registrar is mere matter of custom, it is not required by any rule. [By the Court.—The practice is well established.] Our service of the amended writ in the registry was practically service on the registrar. [Brett, L.J.—Delivering a writ to a clerk to file is not service on the registrar. James, L.J.—An amended writ is like a new writ issued at the date of amendment, and should be served in the same way.] Not in all respects if a writ is amended after subsequent steps in the action have been taken; it is not necessary to go through all these steps de novo, the order is to amend the writ and all subsequent proceedings. [James, L.J.—But this amendment is a change both of the nature of the action and of the character of the plaintiffs.]

E. C. Clarkson, for other parties, was not called on.

Brett, L.J.—I am of opinion that the registrar was right in refusing to draw up the judgment. The service was not sufficient. When a writ is so amended as to introduce a new claim against the proceeds of the sale of a ship, it must be served on the registrar in the same way as an original writ in the like case. This amended writ was not served on the registrar, it was only filed in the registry. No intimation of the service was made. Delivery for the purpose of filing cannot be construed to be service. Moreover, the provisions of Order IX., r. 13, were not complied with.

James and Cotton, L.JJ. concurred.

Davies v. M'Veagh.

APPEAL FROM THE EXCHEQUER DIVISION.

Ship—Charter-party—Arrival at place of landing—Commencement of running days—Demurrage—Liability of charterer.

A charter-party provided for the loading of a cargo, "the vessel to be loaded and discharged in nineteen running days, or, if longer detained, to be paid 4l. per day demurrage." On the 20th Nov. the vessel was admitted into dock at the port of loading, but owing to the dock regulations was unable to obtain a berth where she could load until the 5th Dec.; she finished loading on the 6th Dec. The captain refused to sign a bill of lading, unless containing the words "sixteen days consumed in loading, leaving three running days for discharging." The charterer at first refused to take this bill of lading, but ultimately took it, in order to obtain the cargo, and paid 80l., which was demanded by the captain for twenty days demurrage. This action was brought by the charterer against the shipowner to recover the 80l. and damages for detention of the cargo.

Held (affirming the judgment of Brett, L.J.), that the running days had commenced when the vessel first got into dock, that plaintiff and not defendant was responsible for the delay occasioned by the dock regulations, and therefore that plaintiff was not entitled to recover.

The plaintiff sued to recover the sum of 80*l.*, which he had paid to the defendant under protest, and also claimed damages for delay in delivery of a cargo of coal which had been shipped on board a schooner belonging to the defendant under the following circumstances:—The plaintiff, a coal merchant at Runcorn, and the defendant, the owner of the schooner Pleiades, entered into a charter-party in the terms following:

Liverpool, 19th Nov. 1877.

I hereby engage with Joseph Davies, Esq., to receive and load on board my vessel, the Pleiades, of Belfast, being tight, staunch, and strong, and every way fitted for the voyage, a full and complete cargo of coal, about 375 tons to 390 tons, and proceed to Dublin, Burgh Quay or so near thereunto as she may safely get and deliver the same, per bills of lading, on being paid freight at the rate of 6*s.* per ton of 20 cwt., and three guineas gratuity. The vessel to be loaded and discharged in nineteen running days, or if longer detained to be paid 4*l.* per day demurrage (the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation of whatever nature and kind soever during the said voyage, always excepted). Ship to have a lien on the cargo for all freight, dead freight, and demurrage.

Penalty for non-performance of this agreement, estimated amount of freight.

(Signed) Thomas M'Veagh.

I hereby engage to load said vessel on the above terms. Vessel to load in B. Moore or Wellington Docks, High Level. (Signed) Joseph Davies.

Nov. 19, 1877.

The docks alluded to in the charter-party, Bramley Moore Dock and Wellington Dock, were two adjacent docks at Liverpool, which were approached through the Wellington half-tide basin. On the 19th Nov. 1877 the Pleiades completed the unloading of her inward cargo in the half-tide basin, and on the following day she was admitted into the Wellington Dock as a matter of favour, because, being empty, she would be in danger outside, but in consequence of the regulations of the dock authorities, who had control over the movements of vessels in the docks, she could not obtain a berth at the end of the dock, where there was a high level railway and platform, with tips for loading coal, until the 5th Dec. She then loaded a cargo of coal, and the loading was completed on the 6th Dec. The plaintiff refused to take a bill of lading containing the words, "sixteen days have been consumed in loading the said vessel in Liverpool, leaving three running days for discharging at Dublin," and the captain refused to sign any other. The Pleiades sailed, and arrived at Dublin on the 23rd Dec., but the captain refused delivery of the cargo unless a bill of lading containing the clause above set out were produced, and the vessel remained unloaded until the plaintiff signed a bill of lading in the form above mentioned, and paid 80*l.* demurrage, which the captain claimed for twenty days detention. This payment was made under protest, and the plaintiff claimed the sum of 80*l.* in addition to damages for delay in delivery of the cargo.

The trial took place at the Liverpool Spring Assizes, 1878, before Brett, L.J., who on proof of the above facts gave judgment for the defendant.

The plaintiff appealed.

Gully, Q.C. (J. C. Mathew with him) for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff was not bound to pay demurrage, and therefore is entitled to recover, for the nineteen running days named in the charter-party did not commence until the 5th Dec., when the Pleiades first obtained a berth where she could load a cargo of coals.

C. Russell, Q C. and French for the defendant.—The running days commenced upon the 20th Nov., the day on which the discharge of the inward cargo was completed. The defendant had then done all that he was bound to do by the terms of the charter-party, and any loss which may have been occasioned by the action of the dock authorities ought to fall upon the plaintiff.

Gully, Q.C., replied.

The following authorities were referred to in the course of the argument:

Tapscott v. Balfour, 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 501; L. Rep. 8 C. P. 46; 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 710; 42 L. J. 16, C. P.;

Thiis v. Byers, 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 197; L. Rep. 1 Q. B. Div. 244; 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 526; 45 L. J. 511, Q. B.;

Randall v. Lynch, 2 Camp. 352;
Kell v. Anderson, 10 M. & W. 498.

Bramwell, L.J.—I am of opinion that the appeal in this case ought to be dismissed, and the judgment of Brett, L.J. affirmed. Where cargo is to be taken on board a vessel at a place of loading which is specified in the charter-party, the responsibility must rest upon the charterer, not upon the shipowner, if the berth so specified is not in a fit state to receive the vessel on her arrival at the appointed time. In the present case the vessel arrived at her place of loading, as soon as she was admitted into the Wellington Dock. Definitions are always dangerous, and I am not anxious to state one which hereafter may be questioned; but it seems to me that it may be laid down that a vessel has reached her place of loading, as distinguished from the spot of loading, as soon as she has entered the port from which her outward voyage is to commence. I am not afraid of the consequences, even if this definition is pushed to a great extent. Suppose the vessel had got into the Mersey, and the captain had then given notice to the plaintiff that he was ready to enter the dock and take the cargo on board; I think that in such a case the plaintiff could not have contended that the vessel was not at the place of loading, and that the nineteen days had not begun to run. Or suppose the vessel had once got into the dock, and the dock authorities had sent her out again, as far as the defence to this action is concerned, I think it would be the same as if she had remained in dock. I do not think it necessary to discuss the matter further, or to go into the authorities at length, but it seems to me the decision in Tapscott v. Balfour (ubi sup.), which has been cited as an authority favourable to the plaintiff, is not intended to be opposed to what I say now; if it is, it is also opposed to the case of Ashcroft v. The Crow Orchard Colliery Company (ubi sup.). I wish further to add that I am supported in the view which I have taken by the cases of Brown v. Johnson and Randall v. Lynch (ubi sup.). In Kell v. Anderson (ubi sup.) the vessel at the time of the alleged detention had not in point of law completed her voyage.

Baggallay, L.J. concurred.

Thesiger, L.J.—I am of the same opinion; I do not think it is very material whether the time for loading and discharging is definite or indefinite, although the fact that the time was not strictly defined seems to have been partly the ground of the decision in Tapscott v. Balfour (ubi sup.). But in Ashcroft v. The Crow Orchard Colliery Company (ubi sup.) the language of the charter was indefinite, and yet the charterers were held liable for the delay. Here the vessel was ready to receive cargo at the latest on the 20th Nov. I think the plaintiff was responsible for the delay which occurred after that day, and that the verdict for the defendant was right, and the judgment ought to be affirmed. Judgment affirmed.

Shipping—Charter-party—Marginal clause that in "the event of war, blockade, or prohibition of export preventing loading, this charter to be cancelled"—Contract void or voidable.

In a charter-party made between the plaintiffs and J. A. C. there was a marginal memorandum that in the event of "war, blockade, or prohibition of export preventing loading, this charter to be cancelled." There was a prohibition of export by the Government of R. which did prevent loading of the chartered vessel, but the charter-party was not cancelled by the plaintiffs and the charterer.

Held (by Cockburn, C.J. and Manisty, J., dissentiente Lush, J.). that the charter-party was put an end to ipso facto by the happening of any or either of the contingencies mentioned in the memorandum to the charter-party.

This was a case stated for the opinion of the court in an action on a policy of insurance on the freight of the ship Edgar effected by the plaintiffs with the defendant.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 3.—Manisty, J.—This was an action on a policy of insurance on the freight of the ship Edgar, effected by the plaintiffs with the defendant on the 24th Feb. 1877, from noon of the 20th Feb. 1877 until noon of the 20th Feb. 1878, at all times and in all places. The perils insured against were, among others, perils of the seas and restraints and detainments of kings and princes, and the interest insured was "owner's freight at risk on board the ship or chartered when in ballast."

By a charter-party dated prior to the policy of insurance, viz., on the 17th Feb. 1877, the plaintiffs chartered the Edgar to one T. A. Cicognani, by which it was agreed that the ship after completing intermediate employment (which she was to be at liberty to take), should proceed to Galatz, for orders to load there or at Braila or Ismalia, and there load a full and complete cargo of grain or seed, and being so loaded should therewith proceed to Malta for orders, &c.: and by a memorandum in the margin of the charter-party it was agreed as follows; "In the event of war, blockade, or prohibition of export preventing loading this charter-party to be cancelled."

On the 24th April 1877 Russia declared war against Turkey, and on the 31st April Her Majesty issued a proclamation of neutrality. On the 1st May 1877 the Edgar sailed from the Tyne from Genoa with a cargo of coal under a charter-party. She arrived at Genoa on the 14th May 1877, and after discharging cargo she took in ballast for the purpose of proceeding to Galatz. Before the Edgar arrived at Genoa the plaintiffs ascertained that Russia had closed the ports of loading mentioned in the charter-party of the 17th Feb. 1877. Nevertheless the Edgar, by order of the plaintiffs, sailed from Genoa in ballast on the 21st May 1877 towards Constantinople to fulfil the charter-party of the 17th Feb. 1877. Before doing so the plaintiffs requested the charterer (Cicognani) to cancel the charter-party, but he refused to do so and insisted upon holding the plaintiffs to it. The Edgar arrived at Constantinople on the 28th May, when it was found that the loading ports were still closed, and that there was no reasonable probability of their being open in time for the Edgar to load the chartered cargo. She did not therefore proceed further towards Galatz, but obtained at Constantinople a homeward cargo for England, the freight of which was less than the freight she would have earned had she obtained the chartered cargo. This action is brought to recover the difference, and the questions submitted to us are (1) whether the charter-party became as a matter of law void (by which I understand the parties to mean whether, according to the true construction of the charter-party, it came to an end) on the closing of the ports of loading in the charter-party mentioned, without any election to cancel it having been made either by the shipowners or the charterers? (2) Whether the charter-party was as a matter of law void and rescinded before the Edgar sailed in ballast from Genoa.

I am of opinion that both questions should be answered in the affirmative. I think that the act of closing the ports by the Russian Government was a "prohibition of export preventing loading" within the meaning of the memorandum in the margin of the charter-party, and that upon the happening of that event (which was before the Edgar reached Genoa) the charter-party came to an end without any election by either party.

It is contended on the part of the plaintiffs that the charter-party was voidable only at the option of either party, that neither party having elected to avoid it the charter-party continued in force, and that consequently the Edgar having sailed from Genoa for Galatz in ballast, there was a loss in chartered freight when the ship was in ballast. This construction necessitates the introduction into the charter-party of the words "at the option of either party" after the words "to be cancelled," which would not only violate the rule of construction that words should never be added, unless it be absolutely necessary to add them in order to give effect to the plain and manifest intention of the parties; but would, as it seems to me, defeat the plainly expressed intention of the parties, and might give rise to questions of considerable difficulty. One such question would be when was the option to be exercised? I suppose each party would be allowed a reasonable time for making up his mind whether he would or would not abandon the adventure. The authorities seem to show that in the event of a restraint of princes, the obligation of a shipowner (in the absence of any special provision) is to wait a reasonable time for the purpose of ascertaining whether the restraint is likely to be of such a duration as to render it impossible commercially to carry out the contract, and what is a reasonable time must depend upon the circumstances of each particular case.

It was suggested in the course of the argument for the plaintiffs that under the circumstances of the present case the master was justified in sailing from Genoa and proceeding as far as Constantinople before abandoning the adventure, and that consequently the chartered voyage had continued, and the policy had attached; whereas on the part of the defendants it was contended that in the absence of the clause in question the duty of the master would have been to wait a reasonable time at Genoa for the purpose of ascertaining if the prohibition was likely to be removed, and that if he had done so the chartered voyage never would have been commenced. The plaintiffs construction of the charter-party would involve this question, the defendants construction excludes it. Other questions of more or less difficulty and nicety would be open as between the shipowner and charterer if the plaintiffs construction of the charter-party be adopted all of which are excluded by the defendants construction of it.

If the parties really intended that the charter-party should only be voidable at the option of either of them, it was very easy for them to say so, and it is worthy of note that when they did so mean they did so say. The charter-party included two ships; as to one of them it was stipulated that if it did not arrive at her loading port on or before the 15th June, the charterers were to have the power to cancel the charter. As to the other, it was stipulated that if it did not arrive at the port of loading by the 30th June "charter for that steamer to be cancelled." If the words "to be cancelled" in the memorandum as to the prohibition of export are to be read as meaning "to be cancelled at the option of either party," the same words in the stipulation to which I had just adverted would, I suppose, have to be read in like manner, and I cannot for a moment believe that such was the intention of the parties. Of course it was open to the parties to agree that the second ship should be loaded notwithstanding she did not arrive at her port of loading by the 30th of June, but that would have been matter of new agreement. So the parties might have agreed at Genoa that notwithstanding the prohibition of export from the ports of lading, the Edgar should proceed to Constantinople or to Galatz, or anywhere else, but that would have been a new agreement dehors the charter-party. I think it much safer to adhere to the words which the parties have used, and to give effect to them according to their plain and ordinary signification than to put a construction upon them which necessitates the introduction of additional words.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the questions put to us should be answered in the affirmative.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I concur in this judgment. On the first argument I was disposed to think that the effects of the memorandum was to make the charter, not void, but voidable at the option of either party; so that, if both parties were concerned in waiving the right to cancel, the charter would continue in force. But, on further consideration, I have arrived at the opposite conclusion, and am of opinion that the meaning and effect of the memorandum was, in order to prevent all further question or delay, to put an end, ipso facto to the charter-party, on the happening of the contingency.

LUSH, J.—I regret that I am unable to concur with the Lord Chief Justice and my brother Manisty as to the construction to be put upon the memorandum to the charter-party. If there had been but one contingency provided for, and that one was "prohibition of export preventing loading" there would have been no difficulty, and it would have been immaterial whether the words "to be cancelled" were read as importing "shall be cancelled," or only "may be cancelled," in other words, whether in the happening of the event the charter was to be treated as absolutely void, or only voidable. But two other circumstances are mentioned, viz., "the event of war," and "blockade." A declaration of war may long precede a blockade or a closing of the ports; the seat of hostilities may be far off, or hostilities may terminate before reaching such a stage. The meaning put upon the words in their application to one of the specified events, must be put upon them in their application to each event.

The charter must of course be construed without reference to the policy of insurance, and as if the contention arose between the charterer and the shipowner. Suppose the shipowner in this case, instead of stopping at Constantinople, had gone on to one of the loading ports with the intention of carrying out the charter, and had, when he arrived there, found that the prohibition had been or was shortly to be withdrawn, but that he could command higher freights on a homeward voyage, was to be at liberty then to change his mind and to fall back upon the declaration of war, which took place and which he knew of before he started from Genoa? If the memorandum means that upon that event the charter is to be treated as actually cancelled, he may, and it would be a good defence to an action by the charterer for refusing to receive the cargo, say that the charter had ceased to be in force. Or, supposing the charterer found when the ship arrived at the port that he could ship at a lower rate than the chartered freight, he might set up the same plea as an excuse for not shipping the cargo. I cannot think the parties intended to place themselves in this position. Nor do I think that a verbal agreement by the one not to treat it as cancelled would have any binding force. By the hypothesis, the charter is void, and nothing short of a written agreement would have the effect of reviving it, which would be to make a new charter. The word "charter" imports a writing. A verbal charter is a thing unknown to maritime commerce. There may be an agreement on the one hand to load, and another to carry, but the security and the special provisions and exceptions always found in a charter would be wanting.

The alternative construction would answer every purpose intended by the parties, and be free from inconvenience. If it is voidable only the charter would remain in force until one of the parties elected to avoid it, but it would be optional to either of them to put an end to it upon the happening of either of the specified events, provided he did so within a reasonable time, and before the other party altered his position upon the faith of his having waived it. If, for example, after the vessel had arrived at Constantinople, the master had found that the ports were open, it would have been too late after what occurred at Genoa for him to quote the declaration of war as a ground of declaring the charter at an end. It is objected that this construction requires the memorandum to be enlarged by reading the words "at the option of either of the parties." But this seems to me necessarily implied. The memorandum is the language of both parties, and amounts to an agreement that in certain events the charter may be cancelled. It cannot mean that if they both concur they may cancel it. That they can do at any time without any previous agreement, the words read in this sense would have no effect. They must, as it seems to give them any operation at all, mean that either may cancel. Express words are found in another part of the charter, but that is where an option is given to one party only. Nor do I think that writing or any other manual act is necessary in order to cancel. It is sufficient that the party elects to exercise his option and notifies his election to the other party.

A further objection is that this construction makes the memorandum useless. But its purpose will appear if we consider what the rights and obligations of the parties would have been without it. Supposing for example the master had reached the loading port, and had then received information that it was likely to be soon opened, he would have had to stay there a reasonable time to see if that event happened. If he went away and the prohibition were taken off a few days afterwards, the charterer might say he had not waited long enough. The charterer might be in the same dilemma if the shipowner wished to stay, and he wanted to dispose of his goods on shore. The object of the memorandum was to avoid these harrassing questions, and to enable each party as soon as the event happened which might defer the voyage to put an end to it, and to all possible litigation upon such a question.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the charter continued in force up to the time when the loading became impracticable, and consequently that the assured had an interest in the chartered freight which he lost by the "restraint of princes."

ATTWOOD AND OTHERS v. SELLAR AND CO.

General average—Expense of warehousing cargo, and leaving port of refuge—Usage of average adjusters—Usage to be binding must be in accordance with law.

The fundamental principle upon which the doctrine of general average rests is, that all loss which arises from extraordinary sacrifices made, or expenses incurred, for the preservation of the ship and cargo must be borne proportionably by all who are interested. The expenses therefore of entering and quitting a port of refuge, and of unshipping, warehousing, and reshipping cargo, which have been necessitated by a general average act, and incurred in the common interest of all concerned, and in the prosecution of the common adventure, are the subject of general average contribution. (a)

The plaintiffs' ship the S.S. sailed from S. to L. with a general cargo. Encountering a storm, a general average sacrifice was made by cutting away the fore-topmast, whereby the S. S. was compelled to put into C. to repair in order to enable it to prosecute the voyage. To do the repairs it became necessary to unship a portion of the cargo, and to warehouse it, and upon completion of the repairs to reship it. Expenses were also incurred on account of pilotage and other charges on the ship leaving the port in order to proceed on her voyage. The voyage was completed, and the cargo safely discharged at L.

The plaintiffs, as shipowners, claimed contribution by way of general average, from the defendants, the owners of the cargo, on account of the above expenses. The defendants, relying upon the practice of British average adjusters for from seventy to eighty years, declined to contribute to any expenses incurred after the discharge of the portion of the cargo, on the ground that the expense of warehousing was particular average on the cargo, and that of the reshipment, port charges, pilotage, &c. was particular average on the freight.

Held (dissentiente Manisty, J.), that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover for the whole of the expenses claimed, as they were extraordinary expenses incurred for the preservation of the ship and cargo.

Held, also, that the usage of the average adjusters could not override the law of the country as it had not been made a term in the contract between the parties.

Held, by Manisty, J., that the defendants' construction was correct, as the usage of average adjusters for so great a time must be taken to have existed from all time, and to have been acquiesced in so as to have become the practice and usage of shippers and shipowners.

(a) In the present case the ship was compelled to put into a port of refuge in consequence of a loss, itself a general average loss, but the reasoning of the majority of the court would seem to apply equally to a ship compelled to put into port by a loss caused directly by the perils of the seas, and not by any act of the master or crew, and to show that port of refuge expenses are general average even in the lattercase.—ED.

THIS was an action by the plaintiffs, as owners of the Sullivan Swain, to recover 13*l.* 14*s.* 9*d.* in respect of a general average contribution from the defendants as owners and consignees of certain goods on board the said vessel.

In pursuance of an order of Master Hodgson, dated the 29th Dec. 1877, the following case had been stated for the opinion of the court.

CASE.

1. The plaintiffs are the owners of the ship Sullivan Swain, and the defendants are owners and consignees of goods shipped on board the said vessel on the voyage hereinafter mentioned.

2. The said vessel sailed from Savannah for Liverpool on the 10th Feb. 1877, and encountered severe weather, in consequence of which a general average sacrifice became necessary and was made, the master being compelled to cut away the fore-topmast, the fall of which occasioned further damage to the vessel, which was thereby compelled to put into Charleston on the 21st Feb. 1877 to repair the said damage.

3. In order to effect the said repairs and to enable the vessel to proceed on her voyage it was necessary to discharge a portion of the cargo, and expenses were incurred in landing, warehousing, and reshipping the same, and further expenses were incurred at Charleston for pilotage and other charges paid in respect of the ship leaving port and proceeding upon her voyage. The said vessel afterwards completed her voyage and discharged her cargo at Liverpool.

4. It is, and for from seventy to eighty years past has been, the practice of British average adjusters, in adjusting losses in cases where ships have put into port to refit, whether such putting into port has been occasioned by a general average sacrifice or a particular average loss, to treat the expense of discharging the cargo as general average, the expense for warehousing it as particular average on the cargo, and the expense of the reshipment of the cargo, pilotage, port charges, and other expenses incurred to enable the ship to proceed on her voyage as particular average upon the freight. Cases of putting into port in consequence of general average sacrifice only, and where there is no particular average loss at all, are not of frequent occurrence, but such cases and cases where the substantial cause of the putting into port is a general average sacrifice are sufficiently common to establish a regular practice of treating the expenses in case of a general average sacrifice in the way above described.

5. Average adjusters regulate their rules of practice in accordance with what they consider are the legal principles applicable to the subject. There is an Association of Average Adjusters which holds meetings from time to time, at which the rules of practice are discussed and altered or modified with reference to legal decisions.

6. In March 1876 one eminent average adjuster formed the opinion that the practice as above described was wrong, and that all such expenses as hereinbefore described up to the time when the ship was again at sea and had resumed her voyage ought to be charged to general average, and since March 1876 the said average adjuster has made up his adjustments in two or three cases of the kind in accordance with his said opinion, but the practice of British average adjusters, as above described, has remained unaltered.

7. The case of the said ship Sullivan Swain was put into the hands of the said average adjuster to prepare the adjustment, which he did in accordance with his said opinion, charging the whole of the said expenses to general average, and the plaintiffs have brought this action against the defendants to recover the contribution appearing to be due from them in respect of their goods upon the footing of the said adjustment. The defendants have always been willing to pay a general average contribution upon the footing of an adjustment made up in accordance with the practice of British average adjusters as above described, but deny their liability to pay upon the footing of the said average adjustment which has been so prepared as aforesaid, and this action was brought for the purpose of determining whether or not they are so liable.

8. The plaintiffs contend that, notwithstanding the said practice of British average adjusters, they are entitled to have the whole of the said expenses brought into general average, and to receive a contribution from the defendants accordingly, and the defendants contend, firstly, that apart from the said practice general average expenditure ceases in such cases when the cargo has been discharged from the ship; and secondly, that the said practice of average adjusters is a valid and binding custom regulating the treatment of the said expenses, and the contribution to be paid by the defendants. Either party is to be at liberty to refer to the average adjustment.

The question for the opinion of the court is:

Whether the plaintiffs are entitled to recover against the defendants a contribution in excess of what would be payable according to the said practice of average adjusters as stated in this case.

If the court should be of opinion that the plaintiffs are so entitled in accordance with the plaintiffs' contention as in the 8th paragraph of this case stated, judgment is to be entered for the plaintiffs for the amount shown to be due by the said average adjustment with costs. If the court shall be of opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover a contribution in excess of what would be so payable as aforesaid upon any other principle and to any other extent than as claimed by the plaintiffs as aforesaid, then judgment is to be entered for the plaintiffs for an amount to be ascertained in accordance with the principle laid down by the court, and in such case the court is respectfully requested to deal with the costs in such manner as to the court shall seem right.

If the court shall be of opinion in the negative, judgment is to be entered for the defendants with costs.

Cohen, Q.C. (J. C. Mathew with him) for the plaintiffs.

R. E. Webster, Q.C. (Fullarton with him) for the defendants.

The points raised during the arguments are fully dealt with in the judgment of the court.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 16,—The following written judgments were delivered:

MANISTY, J.—This was an action brought by the plaintiffs as owners of the American ship Sullivan Swain, to recover from the defendants, as owners and shippers of goods on board the vessel at Savannah, a small sum of money (13*l.* 14*s.* 9*d.*), as a general average contribution under the following circumstances.

The ship sailed from Savannah for Liverpool on the 10th Feb. 1877, and encountered severe weather, in consequence of which a general average sacrifice became necessary and was made by cutting away the foretopmast, the fall of which occasioned further damage to the vessel, which was thereby compelled to put into Charleston to repair. In order to effect the repairs and to enable the vessel to proceed on her voyage, it was necessary to discharge a portion of the cargo, and expenses were incurred in landing, warehousing, and reshipping it. Further expenses were also incurred at Charleston for pilotage and other charges in respect of the ship leaving Charleston and proceeding on her voyage. The vessel completed her voyage and discharged her cargo at Liverpool. The facts are more fully stated in a special case, and the question to be decided is, whether the plaintiffs are entitled to have the expenses of warehousing that portion of the cargo which was discharged at Charleston, and the expense of reshipment of it and the pilotage, port charges, and other expenses, incurred at Charleston, in respect of the ship leaving that port and proceeding on her voyage to Liverpool, or any, and if so which, of such expenses brought into general average. The plaintiffs contend that they are entitled to have them all brought into general average. The defendants contend that by the law and usage in England, none of the expenses in question are the subject of general average, but are particular average, the expense of warehousing being particular average on cargo, and the expense of reshipment of the cargo and pilotage, port charges, and other expenses incurred to enable the ship to proceed upon her voyage being particular average on freight. It is found as a fact in the case that it is, and for from seventy to eighty years has been, the practice of British average adjusters, in adjusting losses in cases where ships have put into port to refit, whether such putting into port has been occasioned by a general average sacrifice or a particular average loss, to treat the expense of discharging the cargo as general average, but the expense of warehousing it as particular average on the cargo, and the expense of the reshipment of the cargo, and the pilotage, port charges, and other expenses incurred to enable the ship to proceed on her voyage as particular average upon the freight. Recently, according to the statement in the special case, one eminent average adjuster formed the opinion that this practice is wrong, and this action is brought to have the matter judicially decided. It is necessary, therefore, to consider what is the law of England with respect to the adjustment of the loss in question, it being admitted that the loss must be adjusted according to that law.

The principle of general average, or general contribution, is, as is well known, derived from the ancient laws of the Rhodian Republic. It was imported into the Roman law and forms a head (De lege Rhodia de jactu) in the Digest of Justinian, with an express recognition of its origin. It has since been adopted by all commercial nations, but with so many variations, in different nations, as to the application of the principle, that as has often been remarked both by judges and text writers, no principle of maritime law has been followed by more variations in practice. In one point it would seem that all nations agree, namely, that in the absence of any particular instrument or contract the place at which the average is (as between owner of ship and owner of goods) to be adjusted is the place of the ship's destination or delivery of her cargo. As regards the law of England, it was laid down in the year 1824 in the considered judgment of the Court of King's Bench, delivered by Abbot, C.J., in the case of Simonds v. White (2 B. & C. 805) that "the shipper of goods tacitly, if not expressly, assents to general average as a known maritime usage which may, according to the events of the voyage, be either beneficial or disadvantageous to him—and by assenting to general average he must be understood also to assent to its adjustment, and to its adjustment at the usual and proper place, and to all this it seems to us to be only an obvious consequence to add that he must be understood to consent also to its adjustment according to the usage and law of the place at which the adjustment is to be made." Assuming this to be, as I think it is, a correct exposition of the law of England, it seems to me to go far towards deciding this case in favour of the defendants.

But it is said on the part of the plaintiffs that the special case does not find what has been the usage and practice of shippers and shipowners in England, but only what has been the practice of British average adjusters. I am of opinion that, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, the usage and practice of average adjusters for so great a length of time must be deemed and taken to have existed from all time, and to have been acquiesced in, and so to have become the usage and practice of shippers and shipowners: (see Stewart v. West India Pacific Steam Ship Company, 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 32.) I am at a loss to comprehend how the law of any particular nation as to general average can be arrived at except by ascertaining what has been, as a matter of fact, the usage and practice in such particular nation with regard to it.

A great many cases were cited in the course of the argument, commencing with Plummer v. Wildman (3 M. & S. 482), which was decided in the year 1815, and ending with Stewart v. West India and Pacific Steam Ship Company (ubi sup.), decided in 1873. I do not propose to notice many of those cases. Some have been expressly or impliedly overruled; some were actions on policies of insurance or bills of lading containing special provisions, others contain dicta not altogether consistent with the usage found by the case. But it seems to me that Simonds v. White (2 B. & C. 805), Job v. Langton (6 E. & B. 779), and Walthew v. Mavrojani (3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 382), coupled with the finding in the present case as to what has hitherto been the usage and practice of British average adjusters, are very strong if not conclusive authorities in favour of the defendants. I have already adverted at some length to the judgment in Simonds v. White (2 B. & C. 805). In Job v. Langton (ubi sup.) it was held that expenses incurred, after the cargo was in safety, in getting off the ship and towing her to Liverpool for repair, were not chargeable to general average but to ship alone. I notice this case not only because it is an authority in favour of the present defendants, so far as general principles are concerned, but also because Lord Campbell, C.J., in delivering the considered judgment of the court (consisting of himself and Coleridge, Erle, and Crompton, JJ.), says: "There is no mercantile usage stated to guide us. We must therefore resort to the general principles on which this head of insurance law rests; from which I infer that if a mercantile usage had been stated the court would have been guided by it. In Walthew v. Mavrojani (ubi sup.) (which was decided in the Exchequer Chamber in the year 1870 by six eminent judges, affirming a judgment of the Court of Exchequer) the question was whether the expense of getting a ship off a bank on which she had been stranded by a storm was general average, seeing that before the expense was incurred the cargo had been discharged and warehoused. The court held that it was not general average, inasmuch as, although the expense was incurred with the view and for the purpose of prosecuting the voyage, it was incurred after the cargo was in a place of safety and when the ship only was in peril. Bovill, C.J. says: "The American courts have enlarged the limit of general average and have included within the description of extraordinary expenses incurred for the common benefit the expenses of repairs rendered necessary by extraordinary perils, and made at an intermediate port for the purpose of prosecuting the voyage, and have in some other respects deviated from what we consider the strict rule, but the English courts have held strictly that unless there be a common risk and a voluntary sacrifice or an extraordinary expenditure incurred for the joint benefit of ship and cargo, a claim to general average is not established." And a little further on the same learned judge says: "To ground a claim for general average there must be a danger, actual or impending, common to both ship and cargo; here the cargo was safe, and the ship only in peril; it was indifferent to the owners of the cargo whether the ship floated or not, and there was therefore no sacrifice made or extraordinary expense incurred to save both ship and cargo or for the common benefit of both." In the same case the same learned judge says: "The claim has been put on the ground that the adventure was not complete, and that until it was terminated there was a common interest that it should be carried out; but that argument is in direct contradiction to the principle laid down with respect to repairs which are equally necessary to enable the ship to complete the adventure, but which are not matters for general average." In these observations, which are very pertinent to the present case, I entirely agree.

Mr. Cohen, in his able argument, says these are cases in which the cause of the extraordinary expenditure was an ordinary peril of the sea unaccompanied by a general average cause, such as the cutting away of the mast, and he says that the existence of a general average cause distinguishes those cases from the present. Let us consider that proposition practically. One ship meets with a storm so severe that it is deemed necessary for the safety of ship and cargo to run for an intermediate port, and it succeeds in reaching it without any voluntary sacrifice of any part of the ship or cargo. Another ship meets with a similar storm, and finds it necessary to run for an intermediate port, but, in order to reach it, is obliged to make a voluntary sacrifice of part of the ship, say, a mainmast or part of the cargo. Why should there be any distinction in the two cases with respect to what it is to be deemed general and what is to be deemed particular average after the cargo is landed in a place of safety? The cases are identical, save and except as regards the loss caused by the voluntary sacrifice of part of the ship or cargo. I am unable to see any principle upon which to rest the distinction suggested by Mr. Cohen; and it is, so far as I know, unsupported by authority. Certainly none has been cited in support of it.

Mr. Cohen further contended that it ought not to be presumed that foreigners contract with reference to the custom and practice of England in regard to general and particular average, and that inasmuch as the Sullivan Sawin was an American ship, and the cargo was shipped at Savannah, the shippers were not bound by the usage in England. That contention is in direct contradiction to the law as laid down in Simonds v. White, which, so far as I know, has never been questioned.

There is only one other argument put forward on behalf of the plaintiffs which I think it necessary to advert to. It is said that the court should adopt the principle contended for by the plaintiffs, in order that the law of England may be comformable to foreign law. The answer to this argument is, that the adoption of the principle contended for would unsettle the usage and practice which has hitherto existed and been acted upon in England, while it would still leave the usage and practice of many other nations at variance with that of England and of each other. I think it is much safer to adhere to a usage which has been acted upon, for aught that appears to the contrary, ever since England adopted the law of general average, than to introduce a new usage for no other reason, that I can perceive, than that such new usage would be more consonant with strictly logical principles. Such an alteration ought, in my opinion, to be effected, if at all, by legislation, and not by a decision of a court of law. Moreover, it is very immaterial what usage any particular nation may have adopted with respect to particular or general average, so long as that usage has been uniformly acted upon, and so become well known to all concerned.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the defendants are entitled to judgment.

The judgment of Cockburn, C.J. and Mellor, J. was delivered by COCKBURN, C.J.—This was a case of general average, arising under the following circumstances.

The plaintiffs' ship, the Sullivan Sawin, sailed from Savannah for Liverpool with a general cargo. Encountering a storm, the master found it necessary to cut away the foretopmost, and the mast in falling caused such further damage as rendered it necessary to put into Charleston to repair the ship, in order to enable it to prosecute the voyage. To repair the vessel, it became necessary to unship a portion of the cargo, and to land and warehouse it, and the repairs of the ship having been completed, the goods had to be reshipped. Expenses were also incurred on account of pilotage and other charges on the ship leaving the port in order to proceed on her voyage. The voyage was completed, and the cargo safely discharged and delivered at Liverpool, its proper destination. The plaintiffs, the shipowners, claim contribution by way of general average from the defendants, the owners of the cargo, in respect not only of the expense of entering the port and of discharging the cargo, but also that of warehousing and reshipping the latter, as well as in respect of expenses incurred in the way of port charges and pilotage on the occasion of the vessel again putting to sea. The defendants, while they admit their liability to contribute up to the discharge of the cargo, deny any liability beyond that stage, taking their stand on the usage of average adjusters in this country, according to which the expense of entering the port of refuge and discharging the cargo has, under such circumstances, been treated as general average; but the expense of warehousing the cargo has been treated as particular average on the cargo, and that of the reshipment, pilotage, port charges, and other expenses incurred to enable the ship to proceed on her voyage, as particular average on the freight. That such has been the practice of average adjusters in this country for from seventy to eighty years is undoubted; but the plaintiffs deny the validity of this practice, as being inconsistent with the principles of law relating to average.

Two questions present themselves: first, what, independently of this practice of average adjusters, is the principle or rule of law applicable to the case? Second, whether, assuming the practice to be inconsistent with what otherwise should be the law, having subsisted for so long a time, it must be taken to give the rule properly applicable to such a case. No claim being made by the plaintiffs of general average in respect of anything expended on the ship itself—the claim as stated in the case being limited to the expense of discharging a portion of the cargo, and of warehousing and reshipping it, and to expenses incurred for pilotage and other charges on the ship leaving port—the question which presented itself in Power v. Whitmore (4 M. & S. 141), and in Hallet v. Wigram (9 C. B. 580), as to how far repairs done to a ship—even to the extent of such temporary repairs only as would be necessary to enable it to proceed on the voyage—may be the subject of general average, does not arise. Nor are we called upon to consider how far, when a vessel has been stranded, and the goods have been taken out of her and safely landed, the expenses of getting the vessel off can be made matter of general average; or to undertake the difficult task of attempting to reconcile the apparently conflicting decisions of this court in Job v. Langton (6 E. & B. 779), and Moran v. Jones (7 E. & B. 523); or to consider whether there are any exceptional circumstances, the possibility of which was suggested in Walthew v. Mavrojani (3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 382), sufficient to take the case out of the narrow rule of the English courts, laid down and acted upon in the last-mentioned case, as compared with the more liberal one of the courts of the United States and of the other leading maritime nations. That the expenses which, according to the practice of average adjusters, are thus treated as particular average, should, according to legal principles, be made the subject of general average, appears to me to flow necessarily from the fundamental principle on which the whole doctrine of general average rests, namely, that all loss which arises from extraordinary sacrifices made, or expenses incurred for the preservation of the ship and cargo must be borne proportionably by all who are interested.

The contract between the goods owner and the shipowner, on a charter-party or a bill of lading, being for the conveyance of the goods to a given port, there occurs in the course of the voyage a state of things which is not provided for by the contract. A storm arises; the vessel is in danger; but a port is within reach, to which, in the common interest of all concerned, it would be prudent to take refuge. Or it becomes necessary to cut away a mast, and, as a consequence of so doing, to seek an intermediate port in order to replace it. Or the ship sustains damage from the violence of winds or waves, which renders it necessary, for the common safety of ship and cargo, and for the further prosecution of the adventure, to seek a port at which repairs which have become necessary for the safe prosecution of the voyage may be effected. The result is that, in theory at least, a new arrangement not contemplated or provided for by the original contract takes place between the parties, who in theory, as formerly in fact, must be supposed to be present, each in the practice of modern times represented by the master, to whom the interests of both are committed. If we could suppose both parties to be actually present, and under a sense of imminent danger to concur in the necessity of seeking a port of refuge, but to be discussing the question as to how the expenses incidental to such a course shall be borne, what arrangement could be more reasonable or just than that these expenses being extraordinary expenses incurred for the common benefit, should be borne in common on the same principle as that which has been established from the earliest times in the case of actual jettison?

Applying this principle with reference, in the first place, to the expenses incurred by the ship, it is admitted on all hands that the expenses of entering the port of refuge should be carried to general average. Logically, it would seem to follow that, as the coming out of port is—at least where the common adventure is intended to be, and is afterwards further prosecuted—the necessary consequence of going in, the expenses incidental to the latter stage of the proceeding should stand on the same footing as the former. The further prosecution of the voyage was in the contemplation of the parties or of the master, as representing them, in going in: the coming out, therefore, as essential to the further prosecution of the voyage, must equally have been in view when the resolution to go in was formed. But it is said—and it is upon this ground that the difference between these two sets of expenses is alleged to be founded—first, that it is the shipowner's duty under his contract to keep the ship in a navigable state, and consequently to repair any damage she may have sustained; second, that when the ship has been repaired, it is the owner's duty under his contract to reship the goods, and to set forth again on the voyage, and to that end to incur the cost of quitting the port, and of employing a pilot or a tug if necessary. The whole of this reasoning appears to me to be based on an assumption altogether fallacious. The shipowner is not bound to repair for the purpose of carrying on the cargo; nor having repaired, does he become bound to reship the cargo and complete the voyage under the original contract, but if bound at all to do so, is bound only under that contract as modified by the altered circumstances of the case. The contract, it should be remembered, expressly exempts the shipowner from performance of his obligations under it when performance is prevented by perils of the seas. The ship having become incapacitated from prosecuting the voyage, and performance of the contract having been prevented by the excepted cause, the shipowner is under no obligation, so far as the goods owner is concerned, to repair. He cannot, it is true, expose the goods of the freighter to further peril by persisting in carrying them on, if, having the opportunity of putting into a port of refuge, he cannot, or will not, repair the ship, but, if he chooses to forego his right to freight, he may repair or not as may best suit his interest.

"Under a charter-party containing such an exception," says Parke, B., in delivering the judgment of the court in Worms v. Storey (11 Ex. 427), "if the vessel sails in a seaworthy state, and in the course of the voyage is damaged by perils of the sea, the owner is not bound to repair it; but if he does not choose to repair, he ought not to go to sea with the vessel in an unseaworthy state, and so cause a loss of the goods; he ought either to repair or stop." It is true the liability to repair was not the question immediately before the court, the cause of action stated in the declaration, and on which there was a demurrer, being that the shipowner, after having put into a port where the ship might have been repaired, had put to sea again with the vessel in an unseaworthy state, and had thus occasioned the loss of the plaintiff's goods. The question was, however, one which the court had incidentally to consider, inasmuch as, if the shipowner had been under an obligation to repair, the proceeding to sea when the ship was unseaworthy would have been à fortiori actionable. But the view of the Court of Exchequer is supported by other considerations. By the express condition of the contract performance by the shipowner is dispensed with if prevented by perils of the seas. If it were true that under such circumstances he was nevertheless bound to repair, it would follow that he would be bound to do so without regard to the amount of the cost involved, or to the degree to which the expenses might involve him in loss. Yet it is well settled that where the cost of the repairs will exceed the value of the vessel when repaired, together with the freight, the owner is not bound to repair in order to carry on the cargo; and that the master, as his agent, will be justified, as against the goods owner, in abandoning the voyage: (see De Cuadra v. Swann, 16 C. B. N. S. 772), where the law on this head was made the subject of learned and elaborate argument. Some confusion may have arisen from the vague language in which the duty of the master to repair, after having gone into a port of refuge, is spoken of. Thus, in Benson v. Chapman (2 H. of L. 696), it is said in general terms that "the duty of the master, in case of damage to the ship, is to do all that can be done towards bringing the adventure to a successful termination; to repair the ship, if there be a reasonable prospect of doing so at an expense not ruinous, and to bring home the cargo and earn the freight, if possible." But however general the language here used, it is plain, on reference to the facts of the case, that the proposition thus stated related only to the duty of the master towards his owner. In the case of Benson v. Duncan (3 Ex. 644) in the Exchequer Chamber, Patteson, J., in delivering the judgment of the court, says: "In ordering the repairs of the ship the master acts exclusively as agent of the owner of the ship. No other person but the owner of the ship or his agent can have any authority to order the repairs. The owner of the cargo cannot insist on such repairs being made, for the shipowner is absolved from his contract to carry if prevented by the perils of the seas, and he is bound by it if prevented by inherent defects in the ship; in either case, if he does repair, he does so for the sake of earning the freight, which the master is bound to enable him to do if he can." The true rule is correctly stated in Maude and Pollock on shipping, p. 438: "The owner of the cargo cannot insist on the repairs being done, for the shipowner is absolved from his contract to carry if prevented by the perils of the seas; but, on the other hand, it is the duty of the master, as the agent of the shipowner, to repair the ship if there be a reasonable prospect of doing so at an expense not ruinous, and to bring home the cargo and earn the freight if possible."

But does the converse of the proposition equally hold? Though the shipowner or his master is not bound to repair, is he released, having done so, from the obligation to carry on the goods, or does the obligation to fulfil the original contract thereupon revive? At first sight it would seem to follow, from the position, that the owner is absolved from his contract by the damage to the ship, and therefore is free from any obligation to repair, that he becomes released in toto, and therefore would be free, if he chose to sacrifice the freight, to decline to carry on the goods. But, though not arising directly out of the original contract to carry, the obligation presents itself under a different form. In the contract of affreightment there is an implied undertaking on the part of the shipowner, in consideration of his being intrusted with the custody of the goods, that if the further prosecution of the voyage should be interrupted by disaster to the ship, if he cannot, or does not choose to tranship the cargo and send it on in another vessel in order to earn the freight, he will do his best to protect the interest of the goods owner; and therefore, if the circumstances will admit of it, must find another vessel and forward the goods to their destination. Upon which assumption it may be contended that, as the ship, having been repaired and rendered fit to resume the voyage, is available for the purpose, the master will be bound, as the best course to promote the interest of the goods owner, to reship the goods on board his owner's ship. But the question is by no means free from difficulty. In the first place, it is not settled that the master, though he has the right to tranship, is bound to do so as the agent of his owner. The opinions of the foreign jurists, which will be found collected in Parsons on Shipping, Vol. I., in a note at p. 234, are altogether conflicting; and although we learn from the work just referred to that it is now well settled in the courts of the United States that the master is bound to tranship if there be a vessel or other means of transport to the place to which the cargo should go within reasonable reach, there has been no decision to that effect in a court of this country. The question presented itself in Shipton v. Thornton (9 A. & E. 314), but it became unnecessary to decide it. But even if we assume that it would be the duty of the master, as becoming ex necessitate the agent of the shipper, to tranship the cargo, it must not be forgotten that he continues the agent of his owner; and in the latter capacity, if he can find a more remunerative employment for the ship, or earn a higher rate of freight, he may be justified in declining to carry on the goods.

But even if this point were, like the foregoing, assumed in favour of the goods owner, the case of the latter in the present case would be no further advanced. For the whole argument in his favour rests on the fallacious assumption that the rights and obligations of the parties remain as they existed under the original contract. But this is to overlook the fact that, by the interruption of the voyage, the absolution of the shipowner from the further performance of it, and the new arrangement which must be taken to have been come to between the parties on deciding to enter the port of refuge, the original contract has been essentially modified; in fact, a new one has been engrafted on it. Let us see what is involved in the arrangement so made. In legal theory we must suppose the parties to be present. In contemplation of law, the master, as representing both, makes for them both the agreement which it is reasonable to suppose, that, if present, they would have made for themselves. The common purpose is twofold. The first and immediate purpose is that of saving ship and cargo, by bringing both into harbour. The second is that of repairing the ship with a view to the further prosecution of the voyage if such repairs should prove reasonably practicable, with certain reservations on the part both of the shipowner and the goods owner, which possibly may lead to the abandonment of the further prosecution of the voyage. The second of these purposes involves several subordinate operations and expenses incidental thereto. The state of the ship and the degree of damage she has sustained have first to be ascertained. To effect this, as well as to do the necessary repairs, it may be necessary to unship the cargo. To preserve the goods from harm they will have to be warehoused. The repairs to the ship having been completed, the cargo must be reshipped. Lastly, all things having been completed, the ship will have to leave the port to put to sea. In respect of each of these stages expenses will have to be incurred, for which, as being altogether dehors the original contract, that contract wholly fails to provide. They are extraordinary expenses incurred for the preservation of ship and cargo, and in furtherance of the common adventure, under circumstances in which the ship and cargo would otherwise have perished, or the common adventure would have been abruptly brought to a termination.

Upon whom should the expenses of these different operations fall? The practice of the average adjusters makes the unloading of the cargo matter of general average, and, as it seems to me, on principle rightly so. On what ground the distinction between the cost of unshipping the cargo, and of warehousing it, which is thrown on it as particular average, and that of reshipping which is treated as particular average, on the freight, is founded, I wholly fail to perceive. Looking to the common purpose for which all these operations are performed, it seems only reasonable and just that the expenses should be borne rateably by all parties concerned—in other words, be treated as general average—so far, at all events, as the common purpose has been effected.

It is true that it not unfrequently happens that, the primary purpose of putting into port having been accomplished, the ulterior purpose, that of further prosecuting the voyage, fails. There may be no means in the port of refuge for repairing the vessel. The cost of repairing may be so great as not to make it worth the owner's while to repair in order to earn the freight. As regards the alternative of transhipment, there may be no opportunity to tranship; or only at an increased rate of freight, on which account the shipowner may decline to tranship, except on account of the goods owner. On the other hand, the cargo may be of a perishable nature, or it may be so damaged that it cannot be carried on further without becoming worthless; or the repairs to be done to the ship will take so long a time that in the interest of the goods owner the master would not be justified in detaining the goods, but acting as the agent of the latter, becomes bound to forego the right of carrying on the goods and so earning the freight, and must deal with them in the interest of the owner alone. In such cases it may well be that only the expense of putting into the port of distress could properly be made matter of general average, and that expenses thus incurred, from which no benefit results to the common adventure, should be treated as particular average to ship or goods, as the case may be. But we are here dealing with a case in which every expense has been incurred with a view to, and has resulted in, the further prosecution of the common adventure. The ship and cargo have been saved from destruction by being brought into port; the ship has been repaired, the cargo, having in the meantime been preserved by being warehoused, has been reshipped; the voyage has been resumed, and brought to a safe conclusion, and the goods have been delivered: in a word, the common purpose, the fulfilment of the contract of affreightment, has been effected. But how has this result been brought about? By the series of operations which have taken place from the ship's going into port to her putting to sea again inclusively. But the whole of these operations were necessary to the resumption of the voyage; the expenses of carrying them out were each of them incurred in furtherance of the common purpose. Not being expenses within the scope of the original contract, but extraordinary expenses incurred for the common benefit of ship and cargo, the conclusion appears to me irresistible that, with the exception of the cost of repairs to the ship, all these expenses should be charged to general average. As regards the cost of unloading and reloading, Lord Campbell, in Hall v. Janson (4 E. & B. 500), says: "The expenses necessarily incurred in unloading and reloading the cargo for the purpose of repairing the ship, that she may be made capable of proceeding on the voyage, have been held to give a claim to general average contribution; for the acts which occasion these expenses become necessary from perils insured against; and they are deliberately done for the joint benefit of those who are interested in the ship, the cargo, and the freight." This reasoning, in which I entirely concur, applies equally to expenses incurred in leaving the port, which like the expense of unloading, warehousing, and reloading, are expenses incurred in furtherance of the common enterprise, and must be taken, like them, to have been contemplated from the moment the resolution was taken to enter the port, as the necessary consequence of doing so. All such expenses, being extraordinary expenses, that is to say expenses arising out of a state of things not provided for by the original contract, must be matter of general average.

The exclusion of the cost of repairs to the ship from general average will not conflict with this conclusion, as it rests on exceptional grounds, namely, that the benefit of the repair enures to the owner beyond the scope of the voyage, and that it would therefore be unjust to the goods owner, whose interest is limited to the voyage, to make him contribute to the cost. A distinction has, indeed, been taken between general repairs and such temporary repairs as are necessary to enable the ship to complete the voyage. By the American law, as well as by that of many other maritime nations, such temporary repairs have been made the subject of general average, and this — assuming always that such repairs are of a temporary character only, and add nothing to the permanent value of the vessel—would certainly appear to be consistent with principle. It is, however, unnecessary to pronounce any opinion on this point, since, as has been already observed, no claim is made in this action for repairs. Nor is it necessary to consider whether, as the unseaworthiness of the vessel was caused by the jettison of the mast, and by damage occasioned by its fall—it being an admitted principle that consequential damage immediately caused by jettison is to be treated as jettison — the damage so caused might not have been made the foundation of a claim for general average, as no such claim is here made.

We have next to consider whether the practice of average adjusters in this country, which is said to have existed for seventy or eighty years, if thus found to be at variance with legal principles, shall nevertheless prevail, and must be considered as having settled the law. I am not aware of any principle on which the affirmative of this proposition can be maintained, or of any authority by which it can be upheld. It is not a usage of trade by which the terms of a contract may be interpreted or modified. It is not a custom which can be presumed to have had a legal origin. It is not the inveterata praxis of a court or courts having judicial authority, and which must therefore be taken to be the law though inconsistent with general principles. The authority of average adjusters may be said to be of an anomalous character. By the consent of shipowners and merchants they act as a sort of arbitrators in the settlement of matters of average; but they are bound, in the adjustment of such claims, to follow the law, and in the practice they have adopted they have not acted or intended to act on or give effect to any mercantile usage, but have intended to give effect to what they believed to be the law; but they have mistaken it. What was said by Pollock, C.B., in Cox v. Mayor of London (ubi sup.), is here in point. In that case a plea had been pleaded to a declaration in prohibition, alleging an immemorial custom, on a plaint being entered in the Lord Mayor's Court, to attach a debt due to the defendant from a third person, upon his being found within the jurisdiction, though none of the parties are citizens or resident in the city, and neither the original debt nor that due from the garnishee had accrued within it. The plea having been demurred to, the Lord Chief Baron in giving judgment says: "In holding this plea bad we neither overrule nor dissent from any former decision, for in no previous instance has the custom here stated been brought before any court, by plea or certificate, and held to be good. The Superior Courts have at all times investigated the customs under which justice has been administered by local jurisdictions, and unless they are found consonant to reason and in harmony with the principles of law, they have always been rejected as illegal," The terms in which the Chief Baron thus stated the law were expressly approved of by Lord Cranworth in giving judgment in the House of Lords on appeal. The law so stated appears to me to be à fortiori applicable to the present case. If a custom prevailing in a court, which, though an inferior court, is still a court of law, if inconsistent with law cannot prevail, surely the same rule must apply to a practice of average adjusters. When a practice of this kind is brought to the test of legal decision and is found to be erroneous and inconsistent with law, it cannot be permitted to override the law and acquire the force of law.

Three cases are relied on in opposition to the view expounded in the foregoing reasoning, and on which it may be desirable to make one or two observations, namely, Simonds v. White (2 B. & C. 805), Stewart v. Pacific Steam Ship Company (2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 32), and Walthew v. Mavrojani (3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 382). Neither of these cases appear to me to be in point to the one before us. The point to be decided in the first of these cases was whether the average which had to be adjusted should be determined according to the law of Russia or that of this country. Lord Ellenborough, C.J., after stating that this was the question, says that the shipper must be taken to assent to the adjustment "according to the usage and law of the place at which the adjustment is to be made."

So far as relates to the place of adjustment we are of course bound by this decision, and are therefore not at liberty to give effect to Mr. Cohen's argument, even if otherwise disposed to do so. But, if any stress is sought to be laid on what Lord Ellenborough says as to "usage," it is to be observed that he is speaking (as is manifest from the language of the judgment throughout) of a usage consentaneous with the law. It would be to give a mistaken effect to his language to suppose he was referring to a usage at variance with the law.

The case of Stewart v. Pacific Steam Ship Company (2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 32), far from supporting the defendants' case, appears to me a strong authority the other way. There, by the terms of the bill of lading, average, if any, was "to be adjusted according to British usage." A fire having broken out in the ship, water was poured in to extinguish it, and bark shipped on board by the plaintiffs was seriously damaged thereby. The plaintiffs claimed as for general average, but it appeared that it was the practice of average adjusters in this country to treat such damage as particular average. The court expressly declared the practice to be at variance with the law applicable to such a case, and would assuredly have given judgment in favour of the plaintiffs, had not the latter by the terms of the bill of lading expressly agreed to make the custom a part of the contract. "If," says Quain, J., in delivering the judgment of the court, "the present case depended wholly on the common law applicable to general average, we think the plaintiffs would be entitled to recover." But, "as the parties have agreed to make the custom a part of their contract, the case must be decided according to the custom, and the result is that our judgment must be for the defendant." To which the learned judge added: "It is to be hoped, however, that in future there will be no difference between law and custom on this point, and that average adjusters will act on the law as now declared, and that bills of lading will also be framed in accordance with it." There being no such term in the present contract, I see no reason for treating the practice with more consideration than the practice then before the court received at its hands in that case. Walthew v. Mavrojani (3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 382) was a case altogether differing from the present. It was a case of stranding; and the question was whether expenses incurred for the purpose of getting the ship off, after the goods had been taken out of her and removed to a place of safety, could be made the subject of general average, and it was held that they could not. But of the six judges who so held in the Exchequer Chamber, Bovill, C.J., Mellor, Montague Smith, Lush, and Hannen, JJ., base their judgment on the ground that, while it was essential to the owner of the ship to get his ship off, so as to be able to resume the voyage and earn the freight, it was indifferent to the goods owner, the goods being in safety, whether they were carried on in the same ship or in another. "It is not shown," says the Chief Justice, "that any advantage resulted to the goods from their being carried on in that ship rather than any other." "It was indifferent to the owners of the cargo whether the ship floated or not, and there was therefore no sacrifice made, or extraordinary expense incurred to save both ship and cargo, or for the common benefit of both." "I draw the inference," says Montague Smith, J., "that it was indifferent to the owner whether the goods went forward to England in the Southern Belle —the ship in question—or any other." Hannen, J. says: "It is unjust that expenses incurred by the owner of the ship for the benefit of all should be borne by him alone. But the expenses in question were not such, for it is indifferent to the owner of goods whether his goods are taken on by the same ship, except where they would not otherwise be carried on at all, or only at a greater expense." Even Brett, J., who appears to have been disposed to lay down the rule more generally treats these expenses as incurred solely for the benefit of the shipowner. In like manner, in the earlier case of Hallet v. Wigram (9 C. B. 580), in which a claim for contribution had been made where part of the cargo had been sold to raise money for the repair of the ship, which had put back by reason of damage sustained by ordinary perils of the sea, Wilde, C.J. in giving judgment says: "It is in respect only of the incapacity of the particular ship to carry the goods forward to their destination that the pleas show that the cargo was in danger of being wholly lost. It is difficult to see how the repair of the ship could be for the benefit and advantage of the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs' goods were of a description not to be deteriorated to any great extent." These two decisions are no doubt sufficient authority for saying that, according to English law, expenses incurred for the benefit of the ship alone, without any concomitant benefit to the cargo—such as the expense of getting off a stranded vessel after the goods have been discharged, or of repairing a vessel in a port of refuge in the absence of special circumstances such as were referred to in Walthew v. Mavrojani,— will not give a claim to general average. But they are inapplicable to a case like the present. There is nothing here to show that the goods could have been sent on in another vessel. And, what is of more importance, the expenses were all incurred in furtherance of the common purpose, and for the benefit of the cargo as well as the ship: of the ship, as an opportunity was thus afforded of repairing it and enabling it to take on the cargo; of the cargo, as it was thus enabled to be carried on to its destination.

I am therefore of opinion that our judgment must be for the plaintiffs; and, as my brother Mellor concurs in this view and in the reasons on which it is founded, there will be judgment for the plaintiffs. Judgment for plaintiffs.

(Before LINDLEY, J.)

SCARAMANGA AND CO. v. STAMP AND GORDON.

Assisting ship in distress—Deviation from course —Not in order to save life—Loss of cargo— Liability of shipowner.

The owner of a ship is liable to the freightors for loss of cargo occasioned by perils of the sea on a deviation from her course for the purpose of saving a ship in distress and her cargo, notwithstanding that the perils occasioning the loss are among the perils excepted in the charter-party, if such deviation was not necessary in order to save life.

THIS was an action tried before Lindley, J., and reserved by him for further consideration. The facts are fully stated in the judgment.

Herschell, Q.C., Cohen, Q.C., and Crump for the defendants.

Butt, Q.C., Mathew, and Lodge, for the plaintiffs, were not called upon.

LINDLEY, J.—I have had an opportunity of looking into the few authorities which are to be found upon this subject, with the exception of the case that has been mentioned by Mr. Herschell, and which I cannot find; and I will now read the few remarks which I have to make with reference to the points which have been urged by Mr. Herschell. This was an action brought on a charter-party by the freightors of a cargo of wheat against the owners of the steamship Olmpias for the loss of the cargo. By the terms of the charter-party the Olmpias was to proceed with the wheat on board from Cronstadt to the Mediterranean. The excepted perils were the usual perils of the sea. The Olmpias left Crondstadt on the 21st Nov. 1877. She passed the Scagger Rae on the 28th; and on the 30th, whilst in her proper course, she sighted and went to the assistance of another ship, in distress, called the Arian, and on the same day the master of the Olmpias entered into an agreement to tow the Arian to the Texel for a sum of 1000*l*. In pursuance of this agreement the master of the Olmpias took the Arian in tow, and proceeded with her towards the Dutch coast. On the night of the 2nd Dec. 1877 the Olmpias got ashore near the Terschelling Light, and she and her cargo were ultimately lost. It is for this loss of the cargo that the plaintiff sues the defendants.

Inasmuch as the loss was caused proximately by perils of the seas, and by the terms of the charter-party the defendants are exempted from liability for loss occasioned by such perils, it is incumbent on the plaintiff to prove the existence of circumstances which deprive the defendants of the benefit of this exemption. The plaintiffs accordingly relied on two grounds as sufficient for this purpose. First, they contended that the loss of the ship and cargo was really attributable to the negligence of the master of the Olmpias. If this proposition had been established the plaintiff would have been entitled to succeed; for it is settled that, as between a freightor of cargo and the owner of a ship the latter is liable for loss really attributable to the negligence of the master, although immediately caused by perils of the seas: (see Grill v. The General Iron Screw Company, L. Rep. 1 C. P. 600; 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 711; and The Chasca, 4 L. Rep. A. & E. 446; 32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 838). The jury, however, have decided this point in favour of the defendants, and for the present, at all events, the verdict must be treated as conclusive. Secondly, the plaintiff contended that the Olmpias deviated from the course, and that, as the loss occurred after such deviation, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover, whether there was negligence on the part of the master or not, and whether the deviation was or was not the cause of the loss of the cargo.

The fact of deviation was hardly open to serious controversy in the face of the evidence adduced at the trial, and especially of the captains' agreement on the 30th Nov. and his own letter of the 4th Dec. 1877, in which he said in effect that he should not have been where he was had it not been for the agreement. It is true that there was great conflict of testimony as to the proper course of the Olmpias from the Hohlman Light, on the Danish coast, to the English coast; one set of witnesses saying that she ought not to have gone near the Texel, but should have made for Oxfordness Light, and the other set saying that she should have sighted the Texel Light and then made for the Channel between the Hinder and Galloper Lightships. But notwithstanding this difference of opinion none of the defendants' witnessess went the length of saying "that there was no deviation on the part of the Olmpias;" and it appeared that there was so little real controversy on this point, that I did not think it necessary to frame a distinct question as to the facts of deviation to be answered by the jury. The fact of deviation therefore being established, it follows that the plaintiffs are entitled to succeed, unless the deviation took place under such circumstances as rendered it justifiable: (see Davis v. Garrett, 6 Bing. 716, which shows that the plaintiff need not prove that the deviation caused the loss.)

The defendants, however, although scarcely denying the fact of deviation, contended that the Olmpias was justified in deviating, inasmuch as she deviated solely in order to assist a ship in distress. That the Arian was in distress, and in fact in immediate danger, was hardly, if at all, disputed. But in answer to questions put by me to the jury they found, first, that it was not reasonably necessary to take the Arian to the Texel in order to save the lives of those on board her; but, secondly that it was reasonably necessary so to do in order to save her and her cargo. Upon these findings the plaintiff claims to be entitled to the judgment of the court, and I am of opinion that he is so entitled.

On the grounds of humanity it may be taken as established that a master of a ship is at liberty to deviate from his course in order to save, and so far as may be necessary to save, persons found by him when prosecuting his voyage to be in danger of their lives. There is no temptation to abuse this liberty, for salvage is not payable for the mere preservation of life; and owners of ships, owners of cargoes, and insurers may well be treated as impliedly assenting to a departure, for such a purpose, from the contract not to deviate, which, although not expressed, is always implied in contracts of freightment and insurance. The reason for holding the master justified in deviating to save life are overwhelming. To deny him this liberty would be to shock the moral sense of every right-minded person, and to ignore the clear moral duty of assisting fellow-creatures in distress.

But the jury having negatived the necessity for deviating in order to save life, the defendants are driven to contend that the deviation of the Olmpias was justified, inasmuch as it was necessary to save the Arian and her cargo. No authority was cited, nor indeed is any to be found in support of this contention; but general principles of expediency were appealed to, and I therefore will shortly state why in my opinion the liberty to deviate ought not to be extended to cases such as I am now considering.

The reasons in favour of an extension of the liberty are as follows: First, it is for the benefit not only of insured owners of ships and cargoes in peril, but also of their insurers, if any, that such ships and cargoes shall be saved, and that no obstacles shall be thrown by judicial decision in the way of those who are ready and willing to save ships and cargoes in distress; secondly, the interest of owners of ships and cargoes and their insurers is in fact the interest of the public; and therefore it is for the interest of maritime commerce in general, and of the public in general, that the masters of ships should be at liberty to succour other ships in distress without fear of loss of freight or liability for loss of cargo or loss of claim on insurance. Up to a certain point the principles here suggested may be conceded; indeed, they are recognised by the laws of all civilised countries. The whole law of salvage is based upon them, for salvage is awarded to those who, being under no obligation to exert themselves to save ships and cargoes in peril, do so exert themselves successfully. The question I have to decide is, whether by the laws of this country the owner of a ship deviating to save property is exonerated from the ordinary consequences of deviation? In order to answer this question it will be convenient to consider the interests of the various parties immediately affected by such deviation. First, as regards the mariners, their right to salvage is a sufficient inducement to them to succour ships in distress. Secondly, the owner of the succouring ship shares the salvage, and the salvage awarded is always proportionate to the risk run, and one of the risks run by the owner of the succouring ship is possible loss of freight, loss of benefit of insurance, and possible liability for loss of cargo. This remuneration therefore in the shape of salvage, if any is earned, indemnifies him against all risks incurred by him by the deviation of his ship. Thirdly, the owner of cargo, if the cargo be lost after a deviation, has his remedy against the shipowner. The owner of cargo has therefore really no interest in the question under discussion, unless the shipowner be insolvent, which is too rare an event to influence a general ruling, and which, when it occurs, may be exceptionally dealt with. Fourthly, unless under very special circumstances, the owner of cargo on board the saving ship does not share salvage; and it will be most unjust to hold that the risk to his cargo might be increased by salvage services when he obtains no benefit whatever from the salvage awarded for them. Fifthly, the same observation applies to the underwriters of the saving ship and her cargo. Their risk is increased by the supposed deviation, but they do not share the salvage awarded for it. Sixthly, the interests of the owners of the saved ship and cargo, and of the respective underwriters thereof, are protected by the inducement afforded by salvage to those who hazard their lives and ships to save ships and cargoes in peril of destruction.

The above considerations show that the owner of the deviating ship is only exposed to risk without remuneration when no salvage is earned, but to protect him in these cases at the expense of owners of cargo and underwriters, namely, by increasing their risks without even the hope of remuneration, would be in the highest degree unjust to them. Moreover, it would be most dangerous to hold that masters of ships may for reward, or the hope of reward, deviate with impunity in order to save property. Such a doctrine would open wide the door for the entrance of fraud—would tempt masters to enter into secret agreements for their own benefit, and to conceal them if all went well, and, if not, then to set up as an excuse for their conduct a deviation to save the property of others. The reasons against an extension of the doctrine of permitted deviation to save property appear to me far to outweigh the reasons in its favour. To permit deviation to save life is an anomaly justified by reasons which have no application whatever to deviation to save property, and on principle therefore I decline to extend the doctrine as desired by the defendant. I do this the more readily, as the propriety of so extending it has been considered before now, and been uniformly negatived by those who have had to consider it. I have, in order to decide this case, availed myself of every assistance within my reach. Every text writer that I have consulted—including Arnold, Phillips, Kent, and Parsons—is in favour of the conclusion at which I have arrived; and the reasoning of Washington, J. in Bond v. The Brig Cora (Washington C. C. 80), in favour of the same view, appears to me unanswerable. Still, as this is the first case in this country in which the point I have to decide has arisen and requires a distinct decision, I have thought it desirable to give the reasons for my opinion at greater length than I should otherwise have done.

I was informed at the trial that this was in substance an action by underwriters against underwriters, and that the particular underwriters who bring this action are acting contrary to the views and wishes of other persons in the same interest as themselves. Be it so. It is nevertheless plain that all I have to deal with are the rights of the plaintiff as owner of the cargo against the defendants as owners of the ship Olmpias. Those rights depend on the charter-party, for the bills of lading do not vary from it, and are to the same effect; I have nothing to do with any policies, and know nothing of their language. By the charter-party the defendants became liable to the plaiutiff for the loss of his cargo unless such loss was within one of the excepted perils. The excepted perils, although covering perils of the sea, do not cover such perils if subsequent to an unauthorised deviation: (see Davis v. Garrett, 6 Bing. 716.) The deviation was in this case, in my opinion, unauthorised, and I therefore give judgment for the plaintiff for such a sum as may be found to be due by a referee, it having been arranged that the actual figures shall be referred to a gentleman to be agreed upon. The costs of the action must be borne by the defendants.

WAGSTAFF v. ANDERSON AND OTHERS.

Charter-party—Sale of cargo—Act of master—Agency.

The plaintiffs were the owners of a cargo shipped in a vessel of which the defendants were the charterers, and sued for damages for wrongful sale and conversion by the master. The defendants, on the 24th June 1872, had written to the plaintiff's brokers offering them "room" in the vessel in question for a certain cargo for Callao on certain terms; and on the 25th June the defendants chartered the vessel for a voyage from London to Callao. The charter-party provided that the ship should receive on board, at such berth as the charterers might appoint, all such lawful goods as might be required; that the whole ship should be at the disposal of the charterers for the conveyance of goods; that the master and owner should give the same attention to the cargo, and in every respect be responsible to all whom it might concern, as if the ship were loaded in her berth by and for the owners independently of the charter; that the master was to sign bills of lading as the charterers might require; that the ship should be addressed to the charterers' nominees at Callao, and should, when loaded, proceed to that port and deliver cargo; and that the charterers' responsibility, except for freight, should cease upon the vessel being loaded. On the 26th June it was agreed "between the defendants, acting for the owners of the ship, and the plaintiffs, that the former shall receive on board" a cargo in accordance with the offer of the 24th June at a specified freight from London to Callao.

The cargo was shipped, the master signed bills of lading to deliver to plaintiffs' order, and the ship sailed for Callao: but being driven by stress of weather into Monte Video, where she was condemned, the master improperly sold the cargo, which was the conversion complained of.

Held, that the defendants had not contracted with the plaintiffs for the carriage of the goods, nor had they agreed to occupy the position of shipowners so as to be responsible for the master's acts after the ship had sailed, and that, inasmuch as he was not their servant or agent, they were not liable.

FURTHER CONSIDERATION.

Action by the owners of a cargo of stone and cement shipped in the vessel F. K. Dumas, from London to Callao, against the charterers, to recover damages for a wrongful conversion of the cargo by an unauthorised sale at Monte Video.

The facts are fully stated in the judgment.

Watkin Williams, Q.C. and Hannen for the plaintiffs.—We admit that the charter-party did not amount to an actual demise of the ship; but the defendants had hired the exclusive use of it, and were therefore practically the "owners" for the voyage. The contract of the 26th June, together with the bills of lading, which the master must be taken to have signed as the agent of the defendants, amounts therefore to a contract for carriage, and the defendants are liable for the act of the master, who was their servant:

Newbery v. Colvin, 1 Cl. & F. 283;
Major v. White 7 C. & P. 41;
Marquand v. Banner, 6 E. & B. 282;
Schuster v. M'Kellar, 7 E. & B. 704.

And though the sale by the master at Monte Video has been found by the jury to be unjustifiable in this particular instance, being without authority (Acatos v. Burns, L. Rep. 3 Ex. Div. 282) (a); yet there are cases where such a sale would be justifiable. The act therefore falls within the general scope of the master's authority, and is one for which his principals are liable:

Ewbank v. Nutting, 7 C.B. 797;
Wilson v. Millar, 2 Stark. 1;
Mitcheson v. Oliver, 5 E. & B. 301;
Shipton v. Thornton, 9 A. & E. 314.

The damages must be the value of the goods sold with interest:

British Columbia, &c., Company v. Nettleship, 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 604; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 507; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 65.

Cohen, Q.C. (with him Butt, Q.C. and J. C. Mathew contra).—The contract between the plaintiffs and defendants was not a contract for carriage, but only an agreement by the defendants that "room" should be found for the goods on board the ship, and that they should be there received, so as to become the subject of bills of lading to be signed by the master on behalf of the owners. The plaintiffs were left to make their own arrangement with the master, as the agent of the owners, for carriage, the freight only being agreed upon. The defendants were not the owners, nor in the position of the owners; and the master was not their agent. Lastly, even if the master was the agent of the defendants for some purposes, he was not so for the purpose of selling the goods at Monte Video, and that act being without the scope of his authority, cannot be binding upon the defendants. Watkin Williams, Q.C. in reply.

May 23.—DENMAN, J. delivered judgment as follows:—The plaintiffs in this case were the well-known contractors, Messrs. Brassey and Co., and they sued for the value of a cargo of stone and cement which had been shipped on board the ship F. K. Dumas, in London, for Callao, and sold in Monte Video under the circumstances afterwards mentioned. The defendants were the charterers of the ship under a charter-party of the 25th June 1872, which, amongst other things, provided as follows. It was agreed between the master, on the part of the owners of the good ship F. K. Dumas, and the defendants, that the ship should perform a voyage from London to Callao; that she should be maintained in her class by the owners while under the charter; that she should receive on board, at such loading berth as the charterers might appoint, all such lawful goods as might be required; that the whole ship should be at the disposal of the charterers for the conveyance of goods, except the space necessary for the crew and stores; that the master and owners should give the same attention to the cargo, and in every respect be and remain responsible to all whom it might concern, as if the ship was loaded in her berth by and for the owners, independently of the charter; that the master was to sign bills of lading at any rate of freight the charterers might require, without prejudice to the charter-party; that the ship should be addressed to the charterers' nominee at the port of discharge; that the ship, being loaded, should proceed to Callao and deliver the cargo agreeably to bills of lading in the usual and customary manner, the act of God, &c., excepted. The total freight to be paid for the use and hire of the ship was agreed at the sum of 2500*l.*, to be paid as follows against captain's order, viz., by charterers' acceptance payable at ninety days from the ship's final sailing from Gravesend, or in cash at 5 per cent. discount at captain's option; but the owners were to accept in satisfaction of freight all bills of lading bearing freight payable abroad, not exceeding one-third of the amount of the charter; and the charterers' responsibility, except for freight, was to cease on the vessel being loaded.

On the 26th June the defendants Moss and Mitchell, whose acts, it was admitted, were binding upon the other defendants as well as themselves, entered into the agreement with the plaintiffs, set out in the statement of claim, as follows: "It is this day mutually agreed between Messrs. Moss and Mitchell, acting for the owners of the F. K. Dumas, and the plaintiffs, that the former shall receive on board in the London Docks 1000 tons of cement in casks and stone in blocks, at the rate of 30*s.* per ton freight from London to Callao; the ship to receive the cement, &c., about the 25th July, and sail about the 25th Aug. The barges as they come alongside shall be immediately discharged, or Moss and Mitchell undertake to pay demurrage on barges. The cargo to be received at Callao as customary; freight to be paid, one-half on signing bills of lading, less two months discount at 5 per cent. per annum, and the remainder on final discharge at Callao. Penalty for non-performance of this agreement, 1500*l.*"

Before entering into the charter-party of the (a) In this case the Court of Appeal decided that the master of a vessel cannot at an intermediate port sell goods which are damaged and cannot be carried forward, without communicating with the owners of the goods, and receiving their instructions if it is possible to do so, taking into consideration the state of the goods and the necessity existing for immediate action.—ED.

25th June, the defendants had written to Messrs. Smith, Sundius, and Co., the plaintiff's brokers, offering "room" in the ship F. K. Dumas to Callao for 750 tons of cement, and 250 tons of stone at the same rate as that mentioned in the agreement of the 26th.

About 1000 tons of stone and cement were shipped, and the vessel sailed in due course. Before sailing, viz., on the 29th Aug., 1872, the master signed bills of lading for the cement and stone, "to be delivered at Callao, the act of God excepted, unto order or to plaintiffs' assigns, on paying freight for the goods, 786*l.* 17*s.* 4*d.*"

The sum of 780*l.* 6*s.* 1*d.* (the half freight, minus the discount of five per cent. for two months) was paid by the plaintiffs to the defendants before the ship sailed, leaving the residue, which was the sum mentioned in the bill of lading, to be paid at Callao. The vessel having sailed, met with bad weather about the 30th Oct., and was obliged to put into Monte Video. A survey took place, and on the 4th Dec. the cargo was discharged by order of the surveyors, and the stone and cement were landed and warehoused. The ship was condemned on the 17th Jan. 1873; and it was admitted that she was properly condemned. A portion of the cargo was sent on to Callao in other vessels; but the master, having made inquiry as to the possibility of obtaining vessels to carry on the stone and cement, without communicating with the plaintiffs, sold the cement on the 7th Feb., and the stone on the 28th.

It was agreed at the trial that the only questions for the jury were: first, whether the sale was justified; and secondly, the amount of damages; and that, if any other question of fact remained, it should be disposed of by me after argument on further consideration. The jury found that the master was not justified in selling, and assessed the damages at 1445*l.*, and said that if they were entitled to give interest from the date of the sale until the time of the verdict, they should do so. The 1445*l.* was the value of the goods at the time of the sale; and I think that if the plaintiffs were entitled to recover, they were also entitled to the five per cent. (that is, to 450*l.*) as damages for the conversion, according to the principle explained in the case of British Columbia Sawmill Company v. Nettleship (ubi sup.)

The defendants proposed at the trial to give evidence of a custom that loading brokers are not liable after the goods are received on board; and it was agreed, that if I should be of opinion that evidence of such a custom would be admissible, I should, before giving judgment, either take further evidence as to the existence of such a custom myself, or appoint some one to report to me after taking evidence thereon. This contention was not seriously pressed in the argument on further consideration, and I remain of the opinion I expressed at the trial, that such evidence was not admissible, and that the case must be decided according to the view to be taken of the relation between the parties to be gathered from the documents in the case, and of the proper inferences to be drawn from the facts proved at the trial.

The defendants' counsel at the trial put in a great many documents to show that the plaintiffs were for many weeks in correspondence with Smith, Sundius, and Co. about their claim upon the underwriters in respect of the stone and cement in question; but I lay no stress upon this evidence, as it might well be that the plaintiffs, or Smith Sundius and Co., might be doubtful as to their rights in a case of this description; and the only real question in the case is whether, under the circumstances which have occurred, they were entitled to sue the defendants for the unjustifiable sale of their goods by the master, or whether the master alone or the shipowner, was the proper person to sue, which depends, not upon what the plaintiffs, or Smith, Sundius, and Co. thought, but upon what was the relation of the master to the defendants at the time of the sale.

The case was argued very fully, and very powerfully before me; and a great number of authorities were cited, many of which, however, it is unnecessary to consider, upon the view which I take of the real relation between the parties in this case. On the part of the plaintiffs it was contended that though the charter-party of the 25th June did not amount to an actual demise of the ship, yet, inasmuch as the defendants had hired the exclusive use of the ship, they were practically the owners of the ship for the voyage, and that the words in the contract of the 26th June, "acting for the owners of the ship" meant "acting for the defendants;" and that the contract of the 26th June, therefore, coupled with the bill of lading, amounted to a contract between the plaintiffs as shippers of the goods and the defendants as carriers from London to Callao; and that the master in selling the goods acted as the servant or agent of the defendants, and that they were therefore responsible for his acts. It was contended that, inasmuch as the master, though the sale itself was unjustifiable, was acting within the general scope of his authority as agent for the defendants; and inasmuch as there are certain cases in which a sale of the cargo is justifiable, therefore the sale, though unjustifiable in the particular case, was one for which the defendants were liable upon the principle acted upon in Ewbank v. Nutting (ubi sup.) and other cases. For the defendants it was contended that the contract between the parties was not a contract for carriage, but only an agreement on the part of the defendants that the goods should be received on board the ship, and that room for them should there be found, so that they might be the subject of a bill of lading, to be signed by the captain on behalf of the owners of the ship without any undertaking on the part of the defendants in relation to the actual conveyance of the goods, or the dealing with them on the voyage between London and Callao. It was also contended that even the shipowner would not be liable for the unjustifiable sale of the goods by the master, and that even if the master was the agent of the defendants for some purposes in dealing with the goods at Monte Video, he was not acting as their agent in selling them so as to make them liable for his act. To this it was answered that looking at the conduct of all parties, it ought to be held as a fact, or concluded from the facts, that the master was throughout acting for the defendants, both in carrying and in dealing with the goods at Monte Video; and stress was laid upon the fact that what he had done was done in the interests of the defendants, and had to some extent been recognised by them as an act done for their benefit.

It was agreed that I should draw any inferences of fact, or find any question of fact not found by the jury; and it was suggested that it might be a question of fact whether the master signed the bills of lading as agent for the defendants or for the shipowners. If this be a question of fact for me, I find it for the defendants; and I am of opinion that, notwithstanding the interest the defendants had in the due prosecution of the voyage and conveyance of the goods to their destination, the master in selling the goods was not acting as the servant or agent of the defendants either in fact or in law. Looking at the letter of the 24th June 1872, which is headed in print, "Messrs. Moss, Mitchell, and Co., ship and insurance brokers," and sent to Smith, Sundius, and Co., the plaintiff's brokers (in which they merely offer "room" in the ship F. K. Dumas at certain rates of freight), and at the terms of the letter of the 25th June, constituting the contract between the plaintiffs and the defendant, I do not think that the latter document binds the defendants to any of the terms of the bill of lading, so far as relates to the carriage of the goods, or to the duty of the master after the goods are once received on board. It appears to me that it merely amounts to a contract that the owner of the ship shall receive the goods on board and enter into a contract by bills of lading to carry them at certain rates of freight and that the ship shall sail on or about a certain day named, and that the defendants will pay certain demurrage if the barges are delayed: All the other stipulations are on the part of the plaintiffs, who are left to make their own contract with the shipowners through the master for the carriage of the goods, and who in fact did take bills of lading in the ordinary form from the master, not purporting to act in any other capacity than as master of the ship. If I am right in the above view of the case, it follows that, inasmuch as the master was not the agent or servant of the defendants at all, except to receive the goods on board, and to sign bills of lading which should be binding on his owners as to the carriage of the goods, the defendants cannot be held liable for the conversion of the goods at Monte Video.

It was argued for the plaintiffs, that by the very fact of having entered into a charter such as that of the 25th June, the defendants became the virtual owners of the ship for the voyage; and the cases of Newbery v. Colvin, Major v. White, Marquand v. Banner, and Schuster v. M'Kellar, (ubi sup.) were relied upon, and it was argued from thence that the master became the agent of the charterers for arranging all matters relating to the carrying or not carrying on the goods, even to the extent of selling them, if necessary. But it appears to me that the very terms of the charter-party in this case are against any such liability on the part of the charterers; for the responsibility of the master and owners "to all whom it may concern" for proper attention to the cargo is expressly reserved by the charter-party, and it is provided that the charterers' responsibility under it, except for freight, shall cease on the vessel being loaded.

Such being my opinion as to the relation created between the plaintiffs and the defendants in this case, it becomes unnecessary to consider the question whether the sale, being within the general scope of the master's authority, was binding on the shipowners. The defendants, in my opinion, never agreed to occupy the position of shipowners so as to be responsible for the master's acts after the ship had sailed and before the completion of the voyage, but left the plaintiff's rights to be wholly regulated by the bills of lading, except in the particulars above explained.

I therefore give judgment for the defendants.

The Merchant Shipping Act 1854 provides for the "rights, privileges, and remuneration of pilots." Under this heading is a provision (sect. 357), that every pilot without his consent taken out to sea beyond the pilotage limits "shall be entitled, over and above his pilotage, to the sum of 10*s.* 6*d. a day;" and another* (sect. 363), that a ship's broker at the port where the services of a qualified pilot are obtained, shall be liable to pay "pilotage dues" for her.

Held, that the sum of 10*s.* 6*d. a day due to a pilot who had been carried out to sea, under sect.* 357, was not a pilotage due under sect. 363, and could not, therefore, be recovered from the ship's broker.

SPECIAL CASE stated by justices for the borough of Cardiff under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

The appellants, Messrs. Morteo and Penco, are a firm of shipbrokers at Cardiff, and the respondent is David Julian, a Bristol Channel licensed pilot.

In the month of December last, the master of the Genoese vessel Voltre being about to proceed with the vessel from Cardiff to Genoa, employed the respondent to pilot the Voltre from Cardiff docks as far as Lundy Island.

The respondent piloted the vessel first from Cardiff to Penarth Roads, and thence as far as Lundy Island.

The respondent did not leave the Voltre when she arrived off Lundy Island, which is the extremity of the limits of the Bristol Channel pilotage district, but the master of the Voltre, against the will of the respondent, took him to sea beyond such limits, and eventually landed him at Genoa in Italy.

At Genoa the master of the Voltre paid the respondent the pilotage dues for piloting the Voltre from Cardiff outwards to Lundy Island, and also paid him a reasonable sum for his travelling expenses from Genoa back to Cardiff.

The respondent claimed from the master of the Voltre when at Genoa compensation for his detention on board the vessel from the time she passed Lundy Island until his arrival back at Cardiff but this he was not paid.

The appellants acted as brokers for the Voltre when the vessel was at Cardiff in December, and they paid the pilotage inwards and the vessel's dock dues incurred at Cardiff.

The time which elapsed from the time the vessel left Lundy Island as aforesaid, until the respondent returned to Cardiff from Genoa was fifty-two days.

The respondent instituted proceedings before the justices at Cardiff, and claimed an allowance for the fifty-two days under the provisions of sect. 357 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), 27*l.* 6*s.*, being at the rate of 10*s.* 6*d.* per day.

The respondent claimed the said sum against the appellant under sect. 363 of the said Act.

The respondent, before commencing proceedings against the appellants, gave them the notice required to be given by sect. 363 of the said Act.

It was submitted for the appellants that the allowance claimed by the respondent was in the nature of compensation due to the pilot for the fifty-two days during which he was detained outside the pilotage district not acting as pilot, and that this and his reasonable travelling expenses, though recoverable from the master and owners of the Voltre under sect. 357 of the said Act. were not recoverable from the apellants (under sect. 363 of the said Act), and that the appellants were only liable under the provisions of sect. 363 of the said Act for pilotage outwards from Cardiff to the extremity of the Bristol Channel pilotage district.

We, the said justices, looking at the words which occur in the said 357th section, that the pilot should be entitled over and above his pilotage to the allowance for enforced detention; looking also to the general scope of the 357th and 363rd and 364th sections, were of opinion that the said allowance was of the nature of pilotage dues, and that the same remedy was intended by the Act to be given to the pilot for the recovery of both.

An order was according made for the payment by the appellants of the amount claimed by the respondent.

The question for the opinion of the court is: Whether the said allowance for detention is recoverable in the same manner as pilotage dues under sect. 363, against the agents of the ship.

If the court should be of opinion that the same is recoverable, then the order made by the justices is to stand; if otherwise, the same is to be quashed.

17 & 18 Vict. c. 104 (Merchant Shipping Act 1854), Part V., s. 357, is as follows:

No pilot, except under circumstances of unavoidable necessity, shall, without his consent, be taken to sea, or beyond the limits for which he is licensed, in any ship whatever; and every pilot so taken under circumstances of unavoidable necessity or without his consent, shall be entitled, over and above his pilotage, to the sum of ten shillings and sixpence per day, to be computed from and inclusive of the day on which such ship passes the limit to which he was engaged to pilot her up to, and inclusive of the day of his being returned in the said ship to the place where he was taken on board, or up to and inclusive of such day as will allow him, if discharged from the ship, sufficient time to return thereto, and in such last-mentioned case he shall be entitled to his reasonable travelling expenses.

Sect. 363:

The following persons shall be liable to pay pilotage dues for any ship for which the services of a qualified pilot are obtained (that is to say), the owner or master, or such consignees or agents thereof as have paid or made themselves liable to pay any other charge on account of such ship in the port of her arrival or discharge, as to pilotage inwards, and in the port from which she clears out as to pilotage outwards; and in default of payment such pilotage dues may be recovered in the same manner as penalties of the like amount may be recovered by virtue of this Act; but such recovery shall not take place until a previous demand thereof has been made in writing, and the dues demanded have remained unpaid for seven days after the time of such demand being made.

By sect. 518, penalties not exceeding 100*l.* are recoverable by summary proceedings before two or more justices.

Clarkson for the appellants.—The question is whether this amount of 27*l.* 6*s.* is recoverable as a pilotage due. What is a pilotage due? Surely payment for pilotage. This is not a claim in respect of any services rendered. [He was stopped by the Court.

Milward, Q.C. for the respondent.—The Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, is divided into various heads. Part V. is wholly confined to "pilotage." "Rights, privileges, and remuneration of pilots" is the heading of the group of sections in question. Taking into consideration that his services are compulsory, they provide for the adequate payment of them. No doubt, the payment for outdoor pilotage may vary very considerably, according to the distance that the captain chooses to take the pilot. But the broker in Cardiff must know that he is liable for a very uncertain sum; he knows thoroughly well the risk that he is running, whereas the pilot has no choice. The term "pilotage dues" means something more than mere tolls for pilotage. This sum is part of what is due under the contract of pilotage and for the performance of the duty cast on the pilot by statute. If the pilot has not this remedy, he is without remedy in this country. The object of sect. 363 was to provide for the probability of outgoing ships breaking the law. Enacting, as it does, that the broker who is at home shall be liable to pay the pilot pilotage dues, why should not pilotage dues include all that the pilot is entitled to receive from the master of the ship on which he was engaged.

DENMAN, J.—I think that the magistrates in this case have put too large a construction on the words "pilotage dues." I thought at first that the case found that pilotage services had been performed in respect of the sum claimed; but that is not so. I do not think we are entitled to stretch these words "pilotage dues," so as to include the allowance for detention. We think that the words "pilotage dues" do not include the charge of 10*s.* 6*d.* a day for carrying the pilot beyond the pilotage district. The case lies within a very small compass. Take the clauses one by one. First, there is a certain rate to be paid, according to the scale of the particular port, to the pilot for pilotage in certain parts of the sea. Then, if he is carried on, sect. 357 comes into play. That is as follows: [reads it, vide sup.] It does not say there that the pilot shall be entitled to this payment as "pilotage dues;" it does not speak of it as a pilotage due, but says "over and above his pilotage," which is equivalent to over and above his "pilotage dues." Then sect. 358 provides that "Any qualified pilot demanding or receiving, and also any master, offering or paying to any pilot, any other rate in respect of pilotage services, whether greater or less, than the rate for the time being demandable by law, shall for each offence," &c. Mr. Milward admits that the amount sought to be recovered here is not in respect of pilotage services. Then there is sect. 363, which says: [reads it. vide sup.] Looking at the intention of that section, it does not appear to me probable that the legislature intended the broker to be liable to make this payment; it must be quite indefinite, it may be very large, and the broker might be very much out of pocket if he paid it. Then by sect. 380, and the following sections, the words "pilotage dues," are frequently used as equivalent to rates of pilotage. No doubt, those sections only apply to Trinity House pilots, but they show the sense in which the words are used. I am unable to agree with the magistrates that this claim is payable by the broker, not being able to bring it within the words "pilotage dues."

LINDLEY, J.—I am of the same opinion. This Act of Parliament throws upon those who call upon the broker to pay, the necessity of making out his liability: the onus is on them. Now, when we look at sect. 363, it says: [reads it vide sup.] Now, primâ facie, "pilotage dues" would mean payment for pilotage services; and in the Act the words "pilotage dues" are used as synonymous with pilotage rates and pilotage: [see sect. 333, sub-sect. 5; sect. 350; and the group of sections, beginning with sect. 380, and headed "Rates of Pilotage." It is perfectly true that by sect. 357 the pilot is entitled, if carried out to sea, to a certain sum for detention. But it is not said that that is to be pilotage due. And, although I feel the force of Mr. Milward's argument that it is very desirable that a pilot should be able to recover these expenses in this country, I cannot see my way to holding that the Legislature intended to make them recoverable from the broker.

AITCHISON AND ANOTHER v. LORNE.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Marine insurance—Partial loss—Cost of repairs—Allowance of one-third new for old—Suing and labouring clause—Salvage expenses.

A policy of marine insurance is not a perfect contract of indemnity, but must be taken with certain well-established qualifications, which must be applied, even if the assured thereby receives more than a perfect indemnity.

An assured, whose ship is damaged, is not bound to claim for a total loss where repair is practicable, but may repair her, and even where her value when repaired is less than the cost of repair, may recover from the assurers their proportion of the reasonable cost of repair less one-third new for old, although such proportion exceed the amount the assurers would be liable for if they paid for a total loss.

Under the sue and labour clause in a policy of insurance, the assured may recover expenses incurred by themselves or their agents for the hire of persons expressly engaged by them to avert loss to the insurers, but cannot recover money paid to salvors giving assistance to the ship to save her from perils of the seas, such salvors not being agents of the assured, and having no contract with the assured, but acquiring a lien on the ship by the law maritime.

A claim for salvage is recoverable directly as a loss by the peril insured against, and the underwriters are not liable in respect thereof beyond the amount insured.

The appellants insured the respondent for 1200*l. upon a ship valued at* 2600*l. The policy contained the usual suing and labouring clause. The ship suffered damage from perils of the sea, and was brought into port by salvors not hired by the assured but having and enforcing a claim against the ship by the law maritime. The owner elected to repair, and the result of the repairs was to make the ship, which was an old one, more valuable than she had been at the time of the insurance.*

Held (affirming the judgment of the court below), that the measure of the loss was the cost of the repairs, with the usual allowance of one-third new for old; and that consequently the assured was entitled to recover up to the full amount insured for, though it might be more than the amount payable on a total loss with benefit of salvage.

Held, further (reversing the judgment of the court below), that the assured could not recover, under the suing and labouring clause, a proportion of the salvage expenses in addition to the amount for which the policy was underwritten.

THIS was an action brought by the respondent against the appellants, on a policy of insurance, to recover the cost of the injuries sustained by his ship the Crimea from perils of the sea.

In Sept. 1872 the plaintiff effected a policy on his ship, which was valued at 2600*l.*, for 1200*l.*, for a voyage out and home from the Clyde to Quebec or St. John's, and thence to any port in the United Kingdom. The policy contained the usual suing and labouring clause. On the homeward voyage, in Jan. 1873, the ship met with heavy weather, and was towed into Queenstown by the steamship Texas in a water logged condition. The Admiralty Court of Ireland awarded the Texas 800*l.* for this service.

The value of the Crimea in her then condition was stated to be 998*l.*, and the cargo was worth between 3000*l.* and 4000*l.* The ship, which was fifteen or sixteen years old, was repaired under contract for 2982*l.*, and was thus made of greater value than she had been at the commencement of the voyage.

The plaintiff claimed 1707*l.* as the amount due from the defendants, but they contended that they were not liable for more than a total loss with benefit of salvage, deducting from that the ship's proportion of salvage and general average, and they paid 1080*l.* into court. A special case was stated, which was argued in the Queen's Bench Division before Mellor and Lush, JJ., who gave judgment for the plaintiff for the sum of 120*l.*

beyond the amount paid into court, as reported in 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 445, L. Rep. 2 Q. B. Div. 501, and 36 L. T. Rep. N.S. 794, where the special case is set out in full.

Both parties appealed, and the Court of Appeal (Bramwell, Brett, and Cotton, L.JJ.) affirmed the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division on the main question; but held also, reversing the Queen's Bench Division upon this point, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover a proportion of the salvage expenses under the suing and labouring clause in addition to the amount for which the policy was underwritten, as reported ante p. 11, and in L. Rep. 3 Q. B. Div. 553, and 38 L. T. Rep. N.S. 802.

This appeal was then brought.

Benjamin, Q.C. and J. C. Matthew appeared for the appellants, and contended that there could not be a loss on a single policy beyond the amount insured, else it ceases to be an indemnity, and becomes a source of profit, whereas an insurance can only be an indemnity. If the plaintiff is right, particular average may exceed a total loss. The rule of "one-third new for old" is perfectly sound if not stretched unduly. What was done to the ship in this case, though no doubt rightly done, was in fact not repairing, but rebuilding. The plaintiff cannot recover more than the proportion of 2600*l.*, which he would have lost if not insured. On the question of salvage the judgment of Lush, J. is in accordance with the authorities, but that of the Court of Appeal is not. The expenses of salvage do not come under the "suing and labouring clause," but are an independent part of the loss sustained. A salvor is a person who voluntarily comes in and assists. They cited

Cohen, Q.C. and Hollams, who appeared for the respondents, were requested by the House to confine themselves to the question of salvage, as to which they argued that the assured could recover under the "suing and labouring clause" or not, at his election. They cited Arnould on Insurance, p. 778, 5th ed.; Phillips on Insurance, sect. 1742; and the American case Barker v. The Phœnix Insurance Company (8 Johnson 307) there referred to, and also the judgment of Willes, J. in Kidston v. The Empire Marine Insurance Company (ubi sup.).

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

July 31.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

Lord BLACKBURN.—My Lords, in this case the respondent insured 1200*l.* on a ship, the Crimea, valued in the policy at 2600*l.*, with the appellants' company on a voyage out and home from the Clyde to St. John's. The policy was against all the usual perils, and contained the usual suing and labouring clause. The appellants paid into court 1080*l.*, being at the rate of 90 per cent. on 1200*l.*, and the question was whether, under the circumstances stated in a special case, this sum was sufficient, or, if not, how much more the plaintiff below (the respondent) was entitled to recover. The Queen's Bench Division was of opinion that the amount recoverable was 1200*l.*, or 100 per cent., and gave judgment for 120*l.* Both sides appealed, and the Court of Appeal was of opinion that the sum recoverable was 100 per cent. in respect of the direct damages to the ship, and a further percentage in respect of the salvage and general average charges. The record was so imperfectly drawn up that it does not appear on it what was this further percentage. The counsel at the Bar of this House agreed that if the judgment of the Court of Appeal was affirmed, that percentage should be some rate which they agreed on between themselves. Some anxiety was expressed lest it should be supposed that in sanctioning this agreement this House determined some question of principle which was given up by one side or the other as of no practical importance in this case, though it might be of importance in other cases. The House certainly determined no such point, and indeed was never informed what this point was.

It appears from the statements in the case that the Crimea on the voyage home during the month of Jan. 1873 encountered a succession of stormy weather, and in consequence of the perils of the seas great damage was done to her, and she was reduced to a leaky and water-logged condition. It appears, incidentally, that some general average had arisen, for a proportion of which the ship was liable. The case then states that "on the 30th Jan., the ship being then in great danger of being completely lost, and being without fresh water or provisions and in a helpless condition, and not capable of being navigated, those on board of her sighted the steamship Texas, which ultimately took her in tow, without any agreement being come to as to remuneration for the service, and took her into Queenstown, and on or before the 11th March she was placed in safety near the wharf of the Victoria Dry Dock Company."

It may be as well here to point out that the liability of the articles saved to contribute proportionately with the rest to general average and salvage in no way depends on the policy of insurance. It is a consequence of the perils of the sea first imposed as regards general average by the Rhodian law many centuries before insurance was known at all, and, as regards salvage, by the maritime law, not so early, but, at least, long before any policies of insurance in the present form were thought of. No claim for remuneration from the owner is given by the common law to those who preserve goods on shore, unless they interfered at the request of the owner: (Nicholson v. Chapman, 2 H. B. 254) There Eyre, C.J., in delivering the considered judgment of the court, says that in respect of salvage "the laws of all civilised nations, the laws of Oleron, and our own laws in particular, have provided that a recompense is due for the saving, and our law has also provided that this recompense should be a lien on the goods which have been saved. Goods carried by sea are necessarily and unavoidably exposed to the perils which storms, tempests, and accidents (far beyond the reach of human foresight to prevent) are hourly creating, and against which it too often happens that the greatest diligence and the most strenuous exertions of the mariner cannot protect them. When goods are thus in imminent danger of being lost, it is most frequently at the hazard of the lives of those who save them that they are saved. Principles of public policy dictate to civilised and commercial countries, not only the propriety, but even the absolute necessity, of establishing a liberal recompense for the encouragement of those who engage in so dangerous a service. Such are the grounds upon which salvage stands; they are recognised by Holt, C.J. in Hartfort v. Jones (1 Lord Ray, 393)."

The Crimea had been before these disasters worth 3000*l.*; as she then lay in a damaged condition she was of the value of 998*l.* The damaged ship was liable to make good her proportion of the general average and of the salvage incurred for the preservation of the ship, freight, and cargo, and that proportion of the two taken together amounted to 519*l.* 0*s.* 1*d.* I think it convenient to pause here and inquire what would have been the loss to an uninsured owner from the perils of the seas under such circumstances. If such an uninsured owner chose to sell the hull as she lay, his position would be this: He would lose the value of the ship—3000*l.* He would receive 998*l.*, the value of the hull, less 519*l.*, the amount of general average and salvage which was a charge on the hull, or 479*l.*, and his loss would be 2521*l.* And if the hull had been so damaged that to repair her would have cost more than she would, when repaired, have been worth, the prudent shipowner would have taken this course. But, in fact, he not only could, but did repair her, and by an outlay of about 5600*l.* (part of which, about 1200*l.*, was for new work) he made the ship worth about 7000*l.*; and then (still assuming him to be uninsured) his position would have been this: original value of ship, 3000*l.*; salvage and average, 519*l.*; expenditure, 5600*l.*; total, 9119*l.*; value of repaired ship, 7000*l.*; loss, 2119*l.*; to which are to be added some particular charges amounting to apparently 235*l.*, bringing the loss up to 2354*l.*

The contract of insurance is a contract of indemnity, and, if it could be worked out as a perfect indemnity it would follow that 90 per cent., the sum paid into court, which on 3000*l.* amounts to 2700*l.*, was more than sufficient. But, as was said in the opinion of the judges in Irving v. Manning (1 H. of L. Cas. 287), a policy of insurance is not a perfect contract of indemnity. It must be taken with some qualifications. One of those is commonly expressed as the allowance of one-third new for old, and it is on the application of that to the present case that the first question arises. The owner of an insured ship which is so damaged that, though it is capable of repair, the expense of repairing her will exceed her value, may treat the ship as totally lost, and recover a total loss, the underwriters who pay that total loss being entitled to all that is saved. The assured is not even then bound to do so; but if the ship can be practically repaired within the meaning of the phrase as explained by Maule, J. in Moss v. Smith (9 C. B. 94), the assured has the option not t treat it as a total loss; and on the figures stated in the special case the respondent here had that option. He may repair the damage done by the peril insured against, and if he does so the damage would in general be what would be the reasonable cost of making her as good as she was before. The actual outlay on the repairs, if bonâ fide made, would be strong evidence what the reasonable cost was, and if the ship was by that outlay made more valuable than she was before the accident, which would generally be the case with an old ship, there should be an allowance for this increased value. It is obvious that, applying this, there would be great room for disputes and litigation on the adjustment in every case where repairs were executed, whether the repairs were extensive or not. In the present case, where the ship was fifteen or sixteen years old and the damage was extensive, it is probable, as is said in the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division, that the extent to which she was benefited by having new materials instead of old was much more than one-third of the expenditure. Probably two-thirds might be nearer the fact. But I think it is clearly established by long course of practice and many decisions that, for the purpose of avoiding the expense of litigation, a custom of trade has arisen which, though not written in the policy, is implied in it.

The parties to a policy of insurance on a ship tacitly agree that, in case of repairs, fairly executed to replace damage occasioned by one of the underwriters' perils to a ship of the age and character to which the custom applies, the loss shall be estimated at two-thirds of the cost of the repairs, neither more nor less. It is self-evident that this can very seldom be the accurate measure of the loss. In most cases the rule operates favourably for the underwriter, as the shipowner in spending money on repairs seldom benefits his ship to the extent of one-third, and in such cases the payment of the sum so fixed by custom falls short of a perfect indemnity. In some cases, and this is one, the benefit to the ship exceeds one-third, and there the assured receives more than a perfect indemnity. But if it were lawful to open the question and depart from the rule in any case, the whole object of it, which is to avoid litigation and expense, would be frustrated. No authority has been cited, and, as far as my knowledge goes, no authority exists, for any qualification of the general rule which would take this case out of it. If the rule applies, two-thirds of the expense of repairing the sea damage are to be charged to the ship. The expenses of making additions to the ship are not, of course, to be charged; they are not in any way a consequence of the perils of the sea. The arbitrator has found that the expense to which the rule is applicable were 4414*l.* 18*s.* 11*d.* This finding is binding. Now, two-thirds of this sum is, in round numbers, 2943*l.*, or very nearly 100 per cent. on 3000*l.* According to the finding in paragraph 16, there are other particular charges on the ship, the nature of which is not stated, which bring the loss up to 3178*l.* 11*s.* 7*d.*, which is more than 100 per cent.; and if the salvage and general expenses are added, the loss will be very considerably more than 10 per cent. In Phillips on Insurance, sect. 1743, that very experienced author finds great fault with the decision of the Court of Common Pleas in Le Cheminant v. Pearson (4 Taunt. 367) (so long ago as 1812), that more than the subscribed amount may be recovered where there are successive losses, which he seems to think can only be supported on the ground of inveterate practice. No question, however, of that kind arises here, for this is a case of one single loss; and he says, "The liability of insurers in a single loss is, without question, limited to the amount insured, and the expense of suing," &c. No authority in contradiction to this was cited, and I am not aware of any; and the position thus laid down in Phillips was adopted by both the courts below, who consequently limited the amount recoverable under the policy, as far as it related to the indemnity for the underwriters' perils, to 100 per cent, or in this case 1200*l*., or 120*l*. beyond the amount paid into court. I think it clear that they were right both in going so far, and also (which I think was scarcely contested at the bar) in not going further.

On this, the first question, on which both the courts were agreed, the judgment below should be affirmed. But there is a second point on which the courts below differed.

The policy contains the usual clause as to suing and labouring. The Queen's Bench Division were of opinion that the salvage or general average expenses described in the case did not come within that clause. The Court of Appeal were of a different opinion. In the judgment delivered by Brett, L.J., it is said that the general construction of the clause is "that if by perils insured against the subject-matter of insurance is brought into such danger that without unusual or extraordinary labour and expense, a loss will very probably fall on the underwriters, and if the assured or his agents or servants exert unusual or extraordinary labour, or if the assured is made liable to unusual or extraordinary expense in or for efforts to avert a loss, which, if it occurs, will fall on the underwriters, then each [underwriter," &c. Now if the part of this which is above emphasised is correct, there can be no question that both salvage and general average are unusual expenses, to which the assured have become liable in consequence of efforts to avert a loss. And such seems to be the opinion of the editor of the last edition of Arnould on Insurance, who (2 Arnould, p. 778, 5th edit.) says that salvage "is recoverable from him in virtue of an express clause in the policy inserted for such a case, and known as the sue-and-labour clause;" but for that position he cites no authority, and though the Court of Appeal in this case say that they agree with him, I am unable to do so. With great deference to the judges of the Court of Appeal, I think that general average and salvage do not come within either the words or the object of the suing and labouring clause, and that there is no authority for saying that they do. The words of the clause are that in case of any misfortune it "shall be lawful for the assured, their factors, servants, and assigns, to sue, labour, and travel, for, in, and about the defence, safeguard, and recovery of "the subject of insurance," without prejudice to this insurance, to the charges whereof we, the insurers, will contribute." The object of this is to encourage and induce the assured to exert themselves, and therefore the insurers bind themselves to pay in proportion any expense reasonably incurred. It is all one whether the labour is by the assured or their agents themselves, or by persons whom they have hired for the purpose; but the object is to encourage exertion on the part of the assured, not to provide an additional remedy for the recovery from the insurers of indemnity for a loss which is, by the maritime law, a consequence of the peril.

In some cases the agents of the insured hire persons to render services on the terms that they shall be paid for their work and labour, and thus obviate the necessity of incurring the much heavier charge which would be incurred if the same services were rendered by salvors, who are to be paid nothing in case of failure, and a large remuneration, proportionate to the value of what is saved, in the event of success. I do not say that such hire may not come within the suing and labouring clause; but that is not this case.

The owners of the Texas did the labour here, not as agents of the assured, and to be paid by them wages for their labour, but as salvors acting on the maritime law, which, as explained by Eyre, C.J., in Nicholson v. Chapman (ubi sup.), gives them a claim against the property saved by their exertions, and a lien on it, and that quite irrespective of whether there is an insurance or not, or whether, if there be a policy of insurance, it contains the suing and labouring clause or not. The amount of such salvage occasioned by a peril has always been recovered without dispute under an averment that there was a loss by that peril (see Cary v. King, Cas. temp. Hardwicke, 304); and I have not been able to find any case in which it was recovered under a count for suing and labouring. I do not much rely on this, for it is very likely that such counts often were in the declaration, and that therefore no inquiry was made whether the loss was recoverable under one count or another; but at least there is no authority for the proposition that salvage properly so-called was recoverable under that count.

There have been very few cases in our courts in which it has been necessary to discuss the nature of the suing and labouring clause; Kidston v. The Empire Marine Insurance Company (ubi sup.) is, I think, the only one in which there has been a recovery under it. There, however, all the extra labour was directly and voluntarily employed by the agents of the assured, and the charges were paid by them in consequence of this employment. In the very able and elaborate judgment of Willes, J. not a word can be found to countenance the extension of the construction of the clause beyond what seems to me both its language and its object, and except the passage introduced for the first time into Arnould by the present editor, I can find nothing in any text book tending to support it. (a)

I therefore think that the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be reversed, and that (a) It is assumed in this case that the salvors made no agreement with the master of the Crimea, and Lord Blackburn almost seems to assume that agreements are not made under similar circumstances. It is a fact, however, that it frequently happens that vessels in distress are towed in under agreements between their masters and the salvors for the payment of specific sums of money. If such an agreement amount to a hiring by the assured or their agents of persons to render services, it would seem that by the above decision the sums paid under the agreements should be recoverable under the sue and labour clause in a policy, notwithstanding the fact that the service rendered gives the salvors a maritime lien upon the ship salved. There are also cases where a master of a vessel in distress employs another vessel to tow his vessel into port, it being agreed that the amount of the remuneration shall be settled ashore. The view the court would take of such a contract—whether they would treat it as a hiring within the sue and labour clause or as pure salvage—can hardly be predicted in the face of the present decision.—ED.

of the Queen's Bench Division restored. As there are cross appeals, and neither party is completely successful, I should say that there should be no costs of either party, either in the Court of Appeal or in this House, and the respondents should have only the costs in the Queen's Bench Division, as given by that judgment.

The Lord Chancellor (Cairns), Lords Hatherley, O'Hagan, and Gordon concurred.

Judgment of the Court of Appeal, in so far as it reversed the judgment of the Court of the Queen's Bench Division, reversed; and in so far as it dismissed the appeal against the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division, affirmed.

COURT OF APPEAL.

SITTINGS AT LINCOLN'S INN.

Reported by E. S. Roche, J. P. Aspinall and F. W. Raikes, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

July 7, 8, 10, 11, and Aug. 8, 1879.

Nelson v. Dahl

Charter-party—Construction—Place of discharge—Liability of charterer for delay in unloading—Damages—Custom of the port of London.

By a charter-party it was provided that a steamer belonging to the plaintiffs should carry a cargo of timber from the Baltic "to London Surrey Commercial Docks, or so near thereto as she may safely get, and lie always afloat, and deliver the same on being paid freight" at the rate specified, "the cargo to be received at port of discharge as fast as steamers can deliver," Sundays and legal holidays excepted. The Surrey Commercial Docks are private docks. Before the arrival of the steamer the consignees of the cargo and charterers of the vessel endeavoured to secure a place of discharge in the docks, but owing to their crowded state were unable to do so, and the steamer was obliged to lie out for some time in the river at the Deptford buoys, and ultimately discharged her cargo into lighters. From the evidence it appeared that she would not have been admitted into the docks for several months.

An action was brought by the shipowners against the charterers for demurrage for the detention of the vessel, alleging that by the custom of the Baltic trade and by the terms of the charter-party, it was the duty of the defendants to make arrangements with the dock company for the reception of the ship and discharge of the cargo.

Held (affirming the decision of Jessel, M.R.), that the alleged custom of the port of London was not proved, but,

Held (reversing the decision of the M.R.), that on the true construction of the charter-party, the second alternative came into operation, that, as the crowded state of the docks was an obstruction so permanent as to make it commercially impossible for either plaintiff or defendant to wait for its removal, the vessel might deliver "so near thereto as she may safely get," and that the voyage was at an end when the vessel took up her position at the Deptford buoys and was ready to discharge her cargo, and the liability of the charterers commenced from that date.

An inquiry was directed as to the amount of damages.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs from a decision of the Master of the Rolls.

On the 21st June 1877 a charter-party was entered into between Messrs. Nelson, Donkin, and Co., shipowners, the plaintiffs, and Messrs. R. H. Dahl and Co., merchants, of London, the defendants, by which it was agreed that a steamer, called the Euxine, belonging to the plaintiffs, should go to Sodeshamm, in Sweden, and there take on board a cargo of "deals" for the defendants, and "proceed to London Surrey Commercial Docks, or so near thereunto as she may safely get, and lie always afloat, and deliver the same on being paid freight" at a specified rate, "the cargo to be supplied to steamer at port of loading as fast as she can take the same on board, Sundays and legal holidays excepted, and to be received at port of discharge as fast as steamer can deliver, as above.' Before the ship arrived in the Thames, the defendants endeavoured to procure a berth for her to discharge in the Surrey Commercial Docks, but owing to the crowded state of the docks they were unable to do so, and when she arrived she was unable to get into the docks, and had to lie out for some time in the river at the Deptford buoys. The defendants had obtained the promise of a berth in the Millwall Dock, but on the refusal of the plaintiffs to compensate them for the difference, as they alleged, in the value of the timber at the two docks, that arrangement came to nothing, and eventually the cargo was discharged by lighters, employed by the plaintiffs, into the Surrey Commercial Docks. The plaintiffs brought their action against the charterers claiming demurrage for the detention of the ship. The question was whether by the terms of the charter-party or otherwise an obligation was imposed on the defendants to have a berth ready for the reception and discharge of the ship when she arrived. The plaintiffs' case was that this obligation existed by reason of the charter-party itself, or, if not, that it was imposed by a custom in the Baltic timber trade in the port of London, for the consignee or receiver of a cargo of timber, and more particularly of "deals," where a particular dock is named in the charter-party, to make necessary arrangements with the dock owner for the reception and discharge of the ship. On failure of the consignee to make such arrangements according to the alleged custom, he would be liable to the shipowner for any delay. Some of the leading shipowners, and brokers, and timber merchants in the city of London were called on both sides to prove and disprove respectively the alleged custom. In the court below,

Jessel, M.R., in giving judgment, said:—

I must read this charter-party as any other mercantile document, and must assume that the shipowner when he entered into it knew perfectly well the meaning of the words to deliver at the Surrey Commercial Docks. That dock company, just as all other private dock companies, is ready enough to receive vessels for the purpose of discharge if they have room. It may, however, happen that owing to a press of business a ship may not be able to get in for some time, and therefore a shipowner entering into a contract of this sort does so, in my opinion, on the chance of being able to get into the dock. That is the construction put on the contract independent of the usage, and the shipowner must not only take his ship outside, but must take her inside, and even (though it is not necessary for the decision here) to a berth in the dock. That is an obligation quite independent of the question whether the dock happened to be full, or even when, from stress of weather, and too great draught of water, or, it might be, from some accident to the dock gates, the ship is unable to get inside the dock. The shipowner took that risk, but then so did the charterer or consignee, who was for the time deprived of his cargo. Both parties, therefore, took their chance of arriving at the place of discharge, unless the contract is controlled by the custom.

Now, is there such a custom as alleged? In my opinion no such custom has been proved by the plaintiffs. It is a question of fact, and must be strictly proved. The custom must, moreover be notorious, so that every person in the trade must know of it and regard it as a term of any contract entered into. The custom must, moreover, be uniform, certain, and reasonable, and such an absence of these conditions I have rarely seen. The practice of a named dock is only of recent introduction, and steamers have only since 1876 been generally used in the trade. It is therefore very unlikely that such a custom can have been established in such a short time. As to sailing vessels, which were in use prior to 1876, scarcely an instance has been proved in which such a custom has been really established, and where demurrage has been actually paid for the delay. No doubt the plaintiffs had called witnesses who had honestly testified to the existence of such a custom; but, on the other hand, the defendants had called merchants and shipowners, none of whom had ever heard of it, and some of whom were engaged in the largest transactions. In these circumstances I cannot say the usage was so well known, or so well established, as to exist as a recognised mercantile custom, and therefore the plaintiffs have failed to establish their case, and the action must be dismissed with costs. The defendants will, of course, as they have offered to do, pay the freight and all usual landing charges.

From this decision the plaintiffs appealed.

Benjamin, Q.C., Chitty, Q.C., Cohen, Q.C., and J. Rigby, for the appellants, contended that the defendants had actively interfered and prevented the steamer from obtaining admission to the docks; that such obstacle to the delivery of the cargo at the place primarily named was to be considered of a permanent nature, it being one which could not be removed within a reasonable time, and that under the circumstances the vessel having arrived within the terms of the charter-party at the alternative place of discharge, the shipowners were entitled to call upon the defendants to take delivery of the cargo at that place, a place so near to the docks as the vessel could safely get. On this point they referred to Schilizzi v. Derry, 4 E. & B. 873; 25 L. T. Rep. 66.

They further contended that by the custom of the port of London with regard to timber ships from the Baltic, the charterers undertook absolutely to obtain admission of the vessel into the docks, and that, if they did not, they were liable to pay damages in the nature of demurrage. The following cases were also referred to:

Randall v. Lynch, 2 Camp. 352;
Brown v. Johnson, 10 M. & W. 331;
Thiis v. Byers, 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 347; 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 526; L. Rep. 1 Q. B. Div. 244; Ashcroft v. The Crow Orchard Colliery Company, 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 397; 31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 296; L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 540.

C. Russell, Q.C., A. L. Smith, and R. T. Reid, for the defendants, submitted that the vessel was not entitled to rely upon being so near to the named place of destination as she could safely get, unless she was prevented by some physical cause existing in the named place, and unless such cause was permanent. Here no physical cause existed in the docks which made them unsafe for the ship, and the obstruction was not of a permanent character, for the vessel might have waited her turn to go in. Danger to the ship was the only event for which the alternative clause provided, and, with regard to the alleged special custom of trade, its existence had not been proved in evidence. They cited

At the conclusion of the arguments, their Lordships reserved judgment; and on the 8th Aug. James, L.J. shortly stated the decision to which they had come, though their written judgments were not then completed.

Subsequently the following written judgments were delivered out to the parties:

Brett, L.J.—Charter-parties, though all are as to the majority of the stipulations in them identical and in a common form, vary in some particulars. The descriptions of the voyages are necessarily various. But they are always described or ascertained by describing in terms the place where each is to begin and the place where it is to end. And it is this invariable mode of ascertaining what the agreed voyage is, which gives the key to the interpretation of the charter-party as to the time of the accruing of the liabilities as to loading and unloading. It is not invariable that the voyage or voyages which the shipowner undertakes is or are the voyage or voyages on which he is to carry cargo; as, for instance, when he undertakes to sail to a named place and there load and thence proceed and carry a cargo to another named place. In such case there is a voyage to the place of loading which the shipowner undertakes to make, and with regard to which he undertakes liabilities, but on which he carries no cargo. But if the charter is made at a time when the ship is already at the place of lading, the only voyage described is the voyage on which the ship is to carry cargo. The chartered voyage is therefore not necessarily identical with the carrying voyage. Charter-parties also differ in this, that in some of them lay days and demurrage days are specified, in others no mention is made of such days. Questions arising as to the commencement of the liability in respect of loading and unloading—and such is the question in this case—refer to (1) the rights of the shipowner with regard thereto; (2) his liabilities; (3) the rights of the charterer; and (4) his liabilities. I will consider first the rights and liabilities of both parties as to loading. The first right of the shipowner is the right of placing his ship at the disposition of the charterer so as to initiate the liability of the latter whatever it may be, to take his part as to loading. In every case it seems to me that it is a condition precedent to such right of the shipowner to place his ship at the disposition of the charterer for such purpose that the ship should be at the place named in the charter-party as the place whence the carrying voyage is to begin, and that the ship should be ready to load so far as the ship's part of the operation of loading is concerned. The place so named may give a description of a larger space in several parts of which a ship may load, as a port or dock; or it may be the description of a limited space in which the ship must be in order to load, as a particular quay, or a particular quay berth, or a particular part of a port or dock. If, when the charter is made, the ship is already in the place named, the shipowner may place the ship at the disposition of the charterer as soon as the ship is ready so far as she is concerned, to load, by giving notice thereof to the charterer. If the place named be of the larger description, as a port or dock, the notice may be given, though the ship is not then in the particular part of the port or dock in which the particular cargo is to be loaded; but if the place named is of the more limited description, the notice cannot be given until the ship is at the named place, though the ship is in the port or dock in which the named place is situated. If the ship is not, when the charter-party is made, at the port or place where she is to load, the form of the charter-party is, "That the said ship being at (the place where she then is), shall proceed, &c., to (the place named as the beginning of the carrying voyage), or so near thereto as she can safely get, and shall there load, &c., and proceed thence, &c." In this case also the named place whence the carrying voyage is to begin, though the carrying voyage is not the whole chartered voyage, may, as before, describe a larger or a more limited space. If it describes a larger place as a port or quay, the shipowner may place his ship at the disposition of the charterer when the ship arrives at that named place, and so far as she is concerned is ready to load, though she is not then in the particular part of the port or dock in which the particular cargo is to be loaded; but, in the absence of his right to place his ship only as near to the named place as she can safely get, which is a stipulation to be discussed hereafter, he cannot place his ship at the disposition of the charterer, so as to initiate the liability of the latter as to the loading, until the ship is at the named place, or the place which by custom is considered to be intended by the name; as, if a larger port be named, the usual place in it at which loading ships lie. If it describes a more limited place, as a quay or quay berth, or a particular part of a port or dock, the shipowner may place his ship at the disposition of the charterer when the ship is arrived at that place ready, so far as she is concerned, to load, but not until the ship is at that place. The further right of the shipowner as to the loading is, of course, his right to insist on the liability of the charterer, whatever that may be, which attaches when and after the ship is duly placed at his disposition. The liability of the shipowner as to the commencement of the loading depends on the particular form by which he has bound himself to place his ship at the disposition of the charterer for that purpose. He must do so "with all convenient speed," or "with all possible despatch," or "immediately unless prevented by enumerated accidents," or "within a reasonable time," according to his agreement in each case. If he fails to satisfy this liability an action may be maintained against him, as for instance, an action for a deviation in the preliminary voyage.

The primary right of the charterer as to the loading under a charter-party in ordinary terms seems to me to be that he cannot be under any liability as to loading until the ship is at the place named in the charter-party as the place whence the carrying voyage is to begin, and the ship is ready to load, and he, the charterer, has notice of both these facts; when these conditions are fulfilled, the liability of the charterer begins. The extent of that liability depends on the form, as to it, of the charter-party. If there be no undertaking that he will load the ship, at all events within a specified time, he will be bound to use reasonable diligence to do his part towards the loading according to the terms or meaning of the charter-party; that is to say, "with all possible despatch," or "with usual despatch," or "with the customary despatch of the port," or "within a reasonable time." But whenever in the charter-party it is agreed that a specified number of days shall be allowed for loading, and that it shall be lawful for the freighter to detain the vessel for that purpose a further specified time on payment of a daily sum this constitutes a stipulation on the part of the freighter that he will not detain the ship for the purpose of loading beyond those two specified periods. This is the principle laid down in Ford v. Cotesworth (3 Mar. Law Cas. O.S. 190, 468). If the ship in such case is detained beyond the specified lay days, the charterer must pay demurrage or damages in the nature of demurrage, though the delay in loading has occurred from causes wholly beyond the charterer's control.

The rights and liabilities of the shipowner and charterer as to unloading under a charter-party, in ordinary terms, are very much the same as, though they are not identical with, these respective rights and liabilities as to loading. The right of the shipowner is that the liability of the charterer as to his part of the joint act of unloading should accrue as soon as the ship is in the place named as that at which the carrying voyage is to end, and the ship is ready, so far as she is concerned, to unload. The shipowner, however, is not bound to give notice that his ship is so arrived and is so ready. If the named place describes, as before, a large space in several parts of which a ship can unload, as a port or dock, the shipowner's right to have the charterer's liability initiate commences as soon as the ship is arrived at the named place, or the place which by custom is considered to be intended by the name, and is ready, so far as the ship is concerned, to discharge, though she is not in the particular part of the port or dock in which the particular cargo is to be discharged. But, in the absence of his right to place the ship only as near to the named place as she can safely get, the shipowner's right to have the charterer's liability to unload initiate does not commence until the ship is in the named place. The liability of the shipowner as to the commencement of the unloading is to use all reasonable despatch to bring the ship to the named place where the carrying voyage is to end unless prevented by excepted perils, and when the ship is there arrived to have her ready with all reasonable despatch to discharge in the usual or stipulated manner. If the named place describes a more limited space, as a quay, &c., then the right of the shipowner to have the liability of the charterer initiate does not commence until the ship is at the named place, although the ship is in the port or dock or larger space in which the named place is situated. The primary right of the charterer as to unloading is similar to his primary right as to loading, namely, that he cannot be under any liability as to unloading until the ship is at the place named in the charter-party as the place where the carrying voyage is to end, and the ship is ready, so far as she is concerned, to discharge; or, if the necessary conditions are fulfilled, he may, as a substituted liability, be liable when the ship is as near to the named place as she can safely get. But when the ship is at the named place, or the substituted place, and is ready to discharge, the liability of the charterer as to the unloading commences. And here again the extent of his liability depends on the form as to it of the charter-party. If there be no undertaking that he will discharge the ship at all events within a specified, that is to say, a described time, he will be bound to use reasonable diligence to do his part towards the unloading, according to the terms or meaning of the charter-party. That may be "with all possible despatch," or "with usual despatch," or "with the customary despatch of the port," or "within a reasonable time." But if there be a stipulation express or implied on the part of the charterer that he will not detain the ship for the purpose of unloading beyond a specified time (and there is such a stipulation when lay days are allowed for unloading and demurrage days on payment of a daily sum), and if the ship be in fact detained beyond the lay days after she has arrived at the place named for the end of the carrying voyage, and is there ready, so far as she is concerned, to unload, the charterer must pay demurrage or damages in the nature of demurrage, though the delay in unloading has occurred from causes wholly beyond the charterer's control. In either form of naming the place at which the voyage is to begin and end, it follows from the very form of the agreement, which fixes what the voyage is by naming the places at which it is to begin and end, that the carrying voyage does not begin until the ship is at the place named as the place where it is to begin, and the carrying voyage does not end until the ship is at the place named as that where the voyage is to end. It would be a contradiction of the whole substance of the contract to carry on a voyage to say that the charterer is bound to load before the ship is at the place whence the goods are to be carried, or that the charterer is bound to receive the cargo before the shipowner has carried it to the end of the voyage for which he is paid to carry it.

These statements of the law seem to me to be also consistent with and to be the result of all the cases. In Randall v. Lynch (2 Camp. 352) the description of the carrying voyage was, as to the ending of it, to proceed direct to the said port of London, and when there, that is to say, at "the London Docks," to make discharge and faithful delivery of the said homeward cargo, &c,, and there end and complete both out and homeward voyages." The ship arrived in "the London Docks," but on account of the crowded state of the docks was delayed in discharging. The first part of the judgment of Lord Ellenborough is: "I am of opinion that the person who hires a vessel detains her, if at the end of the stipulated time he does not restore her to her owner. He is responsible for all the varied vicissitudes which may prevent him from doing so." This part of the judgment obviously gives no intimation as to when the end of the stipulated time arrives. It only states what is the liability when the end arrives. But when lay days are allowed the end of the stipulated time depends on the time when the liability to unload commences. That time is expressed later in the judgment. "When she was brought into the docks," says Lord Ellenborough, "all had been done which depended on the plaintiff, the shipowner," That is to say, the lay days began when she was brought into the docks. So the case has always been construed. Brereton v. Chapman (7 Bing. 559) only decides that where a large port, as Wells, is named, the vessel must have arrived not merely at the entrance or in the port, but at the usual place for discharging vessels which arrive in the port to be discharged. Kell v. Anderson (10 M. & W. 498) is to the same point, the named port being London. In Brown v. Johnson (10 M. & W. 331) the charter is to proceed to a port in the United Kingdom, fifteen days for discharging and thirty days, &c., demurrage. The ship was afterwards ordered to Hull. The ship arrived in port on the 1st Feb., in dock on the 2nd, but did not get into a place of unloading in the dock until the 4th, in consequence of the full state of the docks. Alderson, B. ruled that the period from which the lay days was to commence was the day of her coming into dock, and not the coming to her berth in the dock. And that ruling was upheld by Lord Abinger on the authority, he said of Randall v. Lynch (sup.) and Brereton v. Chapman (sup.). It must have been assumed or proved that the usual place of unloading all ships in the port of Hull was in a dock.

In Ford v. Cotesworth (3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 190, 468) the charter was that the ship "shall proceed to Lima, and there, or so near thereto as she may safely get, deliver the cargo in the usual and customary manner, and so end the voyage." No lay days or days on demurrage were named. The ship arrived at Callao, the port of Lima, and was ready to discharge. The authorities refused to allow the cargo to be unloaded for seven days: judgment for defendants. Blackburn, J. said: "Whenever a party to a contract undertakes to do some particular act, the performance of which depends entirely on himself, so that he may devise his own mode of fulfilling his undertaking, and the contract is silent as to time, the law implies a contract to do it within a reasonable time under the circumstances. And if some unforeseen cause over which he has no control prevents him from performing what he has undertaken within that time, he is responsible for the damage. But where the act to be done is one in which both parties to the contract are to concur, and both bind themselves to the performance of it, there is no principle on which, in the absence of a stipulation to that effect either expressed by the parties or to be collected from what they have expressed, the damage arising from an unforeseen impediment is to be cast by the law on the one party more than on the other; and consequently we think that what is implied by law in such a case is not that either party contracts that it shall be done within either a fixed or a reasonable time, but that each contracts that he shall use reasonable diligence in performing his part." But he adds: "Wherever in the charter it is agreed that a specified number of days should be allowed for unloading, and that it should be lawful for the freighter to detain the vessel for that purpose a further specified time, on payment of a daily sum, this constitutes a stipulation on the part of the freighter that he will not detain her beyond those two specified periods."

The case throws no light upon the question as to when lay days are to commence. Whatever the extent of the charterer's liability was, the question as to its extent arose with regard to delays which happened after the ship was at Lima. The only question decided was that, where no lay days are mentioned, and there is no other stipulation binding the shipowner or charterer to load or discharge the ship, at all events within a given time, their reciprocal liabilities are only to use their best endeavours to load or discharge within a reasonable time. This appears clearly from what was said in Thiis v. Byers (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 34). The charter was "to a safe port in the United Kingdom, to be discharged in fourteen days, ten days on demurrage." The ship was ordered to and arrived at Middlesborough. In the course of unloading bad weather intervened, and without any fault of the charterer the ship was detained beyond the lay days. It was argued that the charterer was not liable, because he had used his best endeavours, and Ford v. Cotesworth (3 Mar. Law Cas. 190, 468) was cited. "In that case," said Blackburn, J., "no lay days for unloading were stipulated." In Tapscott v. Balfour (1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 501) the charter was "to proceed direct to any Liverpool or Birkenhead dock, as ordered by charterer, and there load in the usual and customary manner a full and complete cargo of coals. The cargo to be loaded as customary at the average rate of 40 tons per working day, and freighters to pay demurrage at the rate of 4*d.* per ton register per diem." The vessel was ordered to the Wellington Dock, Liverpool. The vessel arrived at Liverpool. An order was obtained on the 29th June to admit the vessel into dock. She was not permitted by the authorities to go into the Wellington Dock until the 11th July, but on that day she went into the dock. She was not permitted to go under the spout until the 29th July. Bovill, C.J. and Denman, J. held that the lay days commenced on the day the ship entered the dock, and that the charterer was liable for subsequent delay beyond the lay days. The rule, it was said, is that where a port is named in the charter-party as the port to which the vessel is to proceed, the lay days do not commence upon the arrival of the vessel in the port, but upon her arrival at the usual place of loading in the port; not the actual berth at which she unloads, but the dock or roadstead where loading usually takes place. And Bovill, C.J. took notice that the stipulation relied on in argument to vary this general rule was in that case not a stipulation to load "with the customary or usual despatch," but to load "in the usual or customary manner," and that, he said, referred to the mode of delivery and not to the time of delivery. And surely he was right. In Ashcroft v. The Crow Orchard Colliery Company (2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 397) the charter seems to have been made whilst the ship was in the port of Liverpool, though not in dock. The whole charter is not given. As described in the judgment no mention is made of Liverpool at all. There it is said that "by the charter-party dated Liverpool the master engaged to receive and load a full and complete cargo of coal, and proceed to Belfast, &c. To be loaded with the usual despatch of the port." By the memorandum at the foot the vessel was to load in Bramley Moore or Wellington Docks. But in the headnote it is said that "by charter-party the master engaged to receive on board and load a cargo of coals, at the port of Liverpool." If those words were in the charter-party they described the place from which the carrying voyage was to begin, and the stipulations as to the dock were only as to the particular part of the named place, i.e., the port of Liverpool, in which the loading was to take place. If this view of the terms of that charter be correct, the decision is strictly in accordance with all former cases. I cannot but think it is correct, or was so assumed, for the judgment states that the contention of the defendant's counsel was, that the words "to be loaded with the usual despatch of the port" applied only to a delay in the process of loading when the vessel had arrived at the berth. "But we are of opinion," says the judge, "that the obligation goes further, and covers the whole period; from the time when the vessel at the port is placed at the disposal of the charterer there is a condition to receive her cargo." If the place named was the port, that is consistent with all the previous cases. It should be observed also that the court held that there was an absolute contract by the charterers that the vessel should be loaded with the usual despatch of the port. But in the charter-party, as reported, there are no lay days or days on demurrage given for loading, so that, if the charter-party is correctly set out, and if the decision be supposed to be other than one as to the extent of the liability, and not as to the time when it was to begin, or as a decision on the particular covenants in that charter-party, and on the particular facts of that case, it is in direct conflict with Ford v. Cotesworth. It is sufficient surely to say, without in the least questioning the correctness of the decision, that it is not a decision as to the time when the liability of a charterer as to loading or unloading is to begin to attach. In Tapscott v. Balfour the stipulation was to load "in the usual and customary manner." In Ashcroft v. The Crow Orchard Colliery Company the stipulation was that the vessel was to be loaded "with the usual despatch of the port." Both decisions were independent of the question as to what was the time at which the liability was to accrue. I cannot see that the two cases are in conflict. I cannot believe that Ashcroft v. The Crow Orchard Colliery Company was intended to overrule any previous case as to the period from which lay days are to commence to run at a place of discharge. Neither of the cases tried before me, which were cited, differ from the rule I have enunciated as to this point. In Strahan v. Gabriel (26th June 1879, not reported), tried at Newcastle, the named place was a quay. The ship arrived, and found the only quay berth occupied by another ship. The shipowner offered to discharge across the ship which occupied the quay berth, if the charterer would pay for the stage and labour. The charterer refused. The shipowner claimed demurrage. I held that the lay days did not commence to run until the plaintiff's ship was alongside the quay, the quay being the place named whereat the voyage was to end. In Davis v. M'Veagh (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 149), tried at Liverpool, the place named was the Wellington Dock. The ship was on a certain day admitted into the Wellington half-tide basin, but was refused admission for a considerable time into the Wellington Dock, because the loading berths therein were full. The evidence given—and I have referred to my notes for the purpose—was in terms that there were gates to the half-tide basin from the river, and that at Liverpool the half-tide basin was always treated as part of the Wellington and Bramley Moore Docks. It was not argued that it was not, but only that the liability of the charterer did not initiate until the ship was at the high level in Wellington Dock, which was the place of loading. I held that the lay days began to run when the ship was admitted into the dock, i.e., the half-tide basin. I held that it was the dock in consequence of the evidence. The dispute was only whether the liability commenced when the ship was in the dock, or when she was at a loading berth. I ruled upon that dispute. Nobody suggested the ship was not in dock.

Upon this review then of the cases, it seems to me that since Randall v. Lynch (2 Camp. 352) all the cases recognise the doctrine that when lay days are allowed they begin to run when the ship is in the place named in the charter-party as that whence the carrying voyage is to begin, or where that voyage is to end, and they do not begin until then. And that proposition, put into more general words, is, that upon a charter-party in ordinary form the shipowner's right to place his ship at the disposition of the charterer, so as to initiate the liability of the charterer either as to loading or discharging the ship, and the reciprocal commencement of the liability of the charterer either as to loading or discharging the ship, do not commence until the ship is in the place named as that whence the carrying voyage is to begin, or where the carrying voyage is to end.

Unless therefore the shipowner in the present case can maintain that he had a right to call upon the charterer to take delivery not in the Surrey Commercial Docks, but at a place so near thereunto as the ship could safely get, I am of opinion that he cannot maintain the action for any part of the demurrage, or any part of the damages which he has claimed. At the hearing before the Master of the Rolls it was contended that the shipowner was in this case prevented from obtaining admittance into the Surrey Commercial Docks by the act of the charterer. If that had been proved I should have thought the charterer was liable to damages on that ground, as for a wrongful act preventing the shipowner from carrying out his contract with the charterer. But the assertion was not supported by the evidence. A long and persistent endeavour was made to prove that, by a binding custom of the port of London with regard to timber ships importing timber from the Baltic, the charterer, who was an importer, undertook absolutely to obtain the admission of the ship into the dock. The meaning being that by the custom if he did not, he was, according to the understanding of all shipowners and importing charterers in that trade, liable to pay damages in the nature of demurrage. I entirely agree with the Master of the Rolls that no such custom was proved.

Another ground of liability was urged before us upon a suggestion of James, L.J., which was, that under the circumstances of this case the shipowner was entitled to call upon the charterer to take delivery at a place as near to the docks as the ship could safely get. That ground for liability does not seem to me to have been urged by anyone before the Master of the Rolls. It was there suggested that, if the place named in the charter-party was a private dock or quay, there arose an implied obligation from that fact alone binding the charterer to obtain admittance for the ship into that dock or to that quay. With the greatest deference I cannot accede to that view. In the first place, it contravenes what I apprehend to be the received interpretation of a well-known mercantile document, namely, a charter-party, which is, as I have stated, that the reciprocal rights and liability do not accrue until the ship is at the named place. In the second place, the hypothesis seems to me to violate the principle laid down in Ford v. Cotesworth, that where the act to be accomplished is to be brought about by the joint efforts of both parties, the only implication, in the absence of an express contract to the contrary, is that each will use his best endeavours to forward the accomplishment of the common object. It may be in such case that both shipowner and charterer would be bound to use their best endeavours to obtain access to the dock or quay, but no more; and, if so, the defendant in this case did use his best endeavours. But liability on that ground seems to be sufficiently asserted in the 15th paragraph of the statement of claim, and to be raised by the evidence. It seems to me to be proved by the evidence that the ship was prevented from entering the Surrey Commercial Docks solely by the action of the proprietors of those docks, and without any default of the defendant the charterer, and notwithstanding every effort of the plaintiff, the shipowner, to obtain admission. And it appears to me to be proved that the causes of the refusal would have inevitably lasted for many months, for more than six months. Upon the one side it is said that this refusal, which would have inevitably existed for so long a time, made it impossible within the meaning of the charter-party that the ship could enter the dock, and therefore she was only bound to go "as near thereto as she could safely get," and being so near was entitled to say that the ship had arrived within the terms of the charter-party, at the end of the carrying voyage, and was therefore entitled to call upon the charterer to take delivery at that place; and on the other side it was said that a ship is not entitled to rely upon being as near to the named place of destination as she can safely get, unless she is prevented by some physical cause existing in the named place, and unless such cause be permanent; and that in the present case there was no physical cause existing in the docks which made them unsafe for the ship, and if a disability to enter the docks arising from other than a physical cause might suffice if it were permanent, the cause in this case was not sufficiently permanent. I am not aware of any case having been decided under this head except where the cause was physical. But where the cause has been physical it has been often decided that if the obstacle was only temporary it was not, however complete for the time, sufficient to enable the shipowner to insist on the substituted or alternative place of delivery. This has been decided in Schilizzi v. Derry (4 E. & B. 873), and in Bastifell v. Lloyd (1 H. & Coll. 388). The term used has been that the obstacle must be "permanent." I think it is dangerous to depart from a recognised judicial phraseology. But the phrase must have a practical interpretation, just as the term "impossible" was interpreted by Maule, J. By analogy I should say that "permanent" as used in the cases on this subject, means that it is an obstacle which cannot be overcome by the shipowner by any reasonable means within such a time as, having regard to the objects of the adventure of both charterer and shipowner, is, as a matter of business, wholly unreasonable. I think notice must be taken of what the particular adventure in each case is; as, for instance, whether the voyage be to seas periodically frozen, or to such ports as London or New York. In the one case a much longer possible delay must be anticipated by both parties to the adventure than in the other. As to the question whether the obstacle must be physical, it depends upon what is the expressed or unexpressed condition to be implied from the stipulation "or so near thereto as she can safely get." Is it if the ship cannot get with safety to the place primarily named? or is it if the ship cannot get to the place primarily named? It seems to me on consideration that the sensible implication is, if the ship cannot get to the place primarily named. There is as much reason why the delivery and acceptance of the cargo should take place at the substituted place if the ship cannot arrive at the place primarily named for any other reason, as if she cannot arrive there with safety to herself.

The proposition then in such a case is, that lay days do not begin to run either for the purpose of loading or unloading until the shipowner has brought his ship to the primary destination named in the charter-party, so as to be ready, so far as the ship is concerned, to receive or deliver there unless he is prevented from getting his ship to that destination by some obstruction or disability of such a character that it cannot be overcome by the shipowner by any reasonable means within such a time as, having regard to the object of the adventure of both the shipowner and charterer, is, as a matter of business, wholly unreasonable. If there be such an obstruction or disability the lay days begin when the shipowner has brought his ship to a place so near to the primary place of destination as the ship can be brought with safety to the ship and cargo, and so as to be ready, so far as the ship is concerned, to deliver there. In the present case there was such a disability as is described in the above proposition, and it was permanent in the sense expressed. Consequently, in this case the charterer was bound to assist in the discharge of the cargo at the place where the ship lay near the Surrey Commercial Docks, and, upon his neglect and refusal so to do, was liable for the damages thereby caused to the plaintiffs.

Cotton, L.J.—This is an appeal from an order of the Master of the Rolls dismissing the action. The action was by the owners of the steamship Euxine, to recover from the defendants as charterers of that vessel, freight and demurrage. There is no dispute about freight, for, although the Master of the Rolls dismissed the action, he did so on the undertaking of the defendants to pay the freight.

Although in terms the statement of claim asks for demurrage, in substance the claim is for damages for the neglect or refusal of the defendant to accept delivery of the cargo, and thereby detaining the plaintiffs' vessel, and subjecting the plaintiffs to divers charges and expenses in respect of the ship and cargo.

Under the charter-party, which was dated the 21st June 1877, the ship was to go to Sodeshamm, and there load a cargo of deals. [After referring to the terms of the charter-party, his Lordship continued:]

The ship arrived at Sodeshamm, and between the 21st and 28th July shipped the cargo of deals, and arrived in the river on the 4th of the following August. It appears that the Surrey Commercial Docks are in the habit of sending to merchants and others printed forms. These purported to be addressed to the captain of a ship to be named and contained a direction to him to take the ship into the docks, which is to be signed by the consignees. Then there follows a statement of the place where the consignee wishes the cargo to be stowed, and there is subjoined a notice relating to the different entrances to the docks, and a note that the vessel will not be docked at any other lock than that stamped thereon. The lock was the entrance from the river into the docks. It appeared that, when a consignee or charterer desired that the cargo of a steamer should be unloaded in the Surrey Commercial Docks, he made arrangements with the dock company for an unloading berth for the ship, sent to them one of the papers filled up so as to suit the particular case, and further, that if the dock company were able to provide accommodation for the vessel they were accustomed to stamp the document so filled up with the name of the lock by which it was to be admitted into the docks, and sent it to Gravesend, to be delivered by their agent there to the captain on his arrival. The document thus filled up and stamped became a direction to the captain, if no dock had been mentioned in the charter-party, to go to the Surrey Commercial Docks, and, whether the dock had been named in the charter-party or not, a direction to enter the docks by a particular lock, and it was a direction to the dock master to admit the vessel. The defendants on the 16th July endeavoured to obtain for the Euxine an unloading berth in the Surrey Commercial Docks, and with that view sent to the dock company one of the documents above mentioned. But the dock company had made arrangements for unloading so many steamers laden with deals that they were unable to provide an unloading berth for the Euxine, and declined to stamp the document, or to send it to the ship at Gravesend. On the 4th Aug. the ship went to one of the entrances of the Surrey Commercial Docks in order to enter the dock, but when at the point of entering the dock gates it was turned back by the dock master, and was moored near the entrance to the docks. A subsequent attempt was made by the captain and agents of the vessel to obtain admission into the docks, but the officers of the dock company refused admittance, and did so because they were unable to provide an unloading berth for the steamer. On each occasion there was room for the vessel to enter and be moored in the dock if the officers of the company would have allowed it to enter the dock gates. The plaintiffs contended that the defendants had actively interfered, and prevented the dock company from admitting the Euxine into their dock, but in my opinion this was not established. The first refusal of the dock company to admit the Euxine into the docks was at the time when the defendants were doing their best to induce the dock company to provide an unloading berth for the ship; and although the secretary of the dock company did, at the instance of one of the defendants, telegraph to the dock master not to admit the ship into the docks, this telegram was a mere repetition of orders previously given. Subsequently the captain and agent of the ship requested the defendants to make arrangements for unloading the ship in some other dock, which the defendants then had an opportunity of doing. They, however, refused to do so, and required the captain to discharge his cargo in the Surrey Commercial Docks, and as he was unable to obtain admission into that dock, he, after some delay, unloaded the cargo into lighters, which ultimately landed the cargo in the Surrey Commercial Docks.

Under the circumstances the ship was detained for a considerable time longer than would have been occupied in discharging its cargo if it had been received into the Commercial Docks and there unloaded with the usual steam despatch of that dock, or than would have been occupied in discharging the cargo if the defendants had been ready and willing to accept delivery of the cargo as soon as the vessel, after having failed to obtain admission into the docks, was moored in the river, and ready to deliver its cargo there.

It has been arranged between the parties that, if we shall be of opinion that the defendants are liable to the plaintiffs for detention of their vessel, the amount of damages shall be ascertained out of court.

As a general rule, the time within which the charterer or consignee is bound to accept delivery of a cargo does not begin to run until the ship has arrived at the stipulated place of discharge, and is ready there to begin to discharge her cargo; and the first point to be considered in the present case is whether the Euxine ever did arrive at a place of discharge stipulated for by the charter-party. The words are "shall therewith proceed to London Surrey Commercial Docks, or so near thereto as she may safely get and lie always afloat, and deliver the same, &c." I am of opinion that the ship never did arrive at the Surrey Commercial Docks within the meaning of this stipulation. For, although she arrived at one of the entrances to that dock, she never entered the dock, and in my opinion the contention of the defendants was correct that the meaning of the charter is that the ship should go into and not merely to the entrance of the docks. The question remains, did she go to the alternative place of discharge? It was argued on behalf of the defendants that the alternative was intended to provide for the accident of the vessel being unable to get to the primary place of discharge, in consequence of some permanent obstruction endangering the safety of the ship. Undoubtedly the alternative applies to and includes such a case, but the reference to the safety of the ship in the alternative clause is, in my opinion, introduced to show what the alternative place of discharge is to be, not to show when the alternative is to arise. In my opinion there is neither authority nor principle for holding that danger to the ship is the only event for which the alternative provides, and although expressions of judges may be found to the effect that the alternative was intended to provide for such a case, they must, in my opinion, be taken with reference to the cases in which they were used, and not as restricting the operation of the clause to that one case. In the present case we must construe the charter-party according to the facts known to both parties. On the evidence, and for the purpose, it is sufficient to refer to that of the defendants' witness, Sir Thomas Gabriel, it appears that it is the practice for the charterer or consignee to go to the docks to make arrangements first for admission of the vessel into the dock. It also appears that the dock was a private one; that is to say, that the dock company claimed the right to exclude any vessel which it was not for their interest to admit into their dock. The ship failed to obtain admission into the dock in consequence of the defendants having been unable to obtain a discharging berth for her. I think this charter-party may be construed as if the alternative place of discharge were allowed in case the dock company, from inability of the charterer to obtain a discharging berth, declines to admit the ship into the dock, and that consequently, subject to an objection which I shall mention, the ship, when she, after having been refused admission to the dock, anchored in the river, and was ready there to discharge her cargo, had arrived at the alternative place of discharge allowed by the charter-party, and that at least from that time the defendants are liable for any delay in accepting delivery of the cargo. But it is said that the ship might have waited for its turn to go into the dock, and therefore that, even if the provision for an alternative place of discharge would under any circumstances apply to the case of such an obstruction as existed in the present case, it cannot under the circumstances of this case do so, because the obstruction was temporary only, and not of a permanent character. In support of this argument cases were referred to where the owner of the ship was held not to be excused for not going to the primary place of discharge in consequence of its having been impossible so to do for a considerable time, as in Parker v. Winlow (7 E. & B. 942) and Bastifell v. Lloyd (1 H. & C. 388), in each of which cases the delay was for about a fortnight. But in each of these cases the access to the place of discharge was prevented by the state of the tide in the port, which must be considered as one of the usual accidents of navigation, which is a risk to be undertaken by the ship. In the present case the vessel had practically arrived at the end of the highway which formed the access to the place of discharge and her liability to enter the dock was not owing to any difficulty of navigation. It was attributable solely to the refusal of the officers of the dock company to admit her, and, in my opinion, on this contract the only question is whether the obstruction to her entering the dock is to be considered of a temporary or of a permanent nature. I think that an obstruction must be considered a permanent one which cannot be removed in a time which is reasonable, having regard to the interests of the shipowner and of the consignee; and such, in my opinion, was the obstruction in the present case, for the evidence was that the dock company would not admit the steamship unless an unloading berth could be provided for her, and that they would have been unable to provide an unloading berth for the Euxine for at least a month, probably for some months. This, in my opinion, must be considered a permanent and not a merely temporary obstruction to the admission of the ship into the docks.

In my opinion, therefore, the ship, when moored in the river ready to discharge her cargo, was entitled to say that she had arrived at the alternative place of discharge, and could require the defendants to accept delivery of the cargo. But independently of the question whether the ship had arrived at a place of discharge mentioned in the charter-party, I am of opinion that under the circumstances of this case the plaintiffs are entitled to recover. For it is proved that it is in fact the practice of the charterer or consignee to make arrangements for an unloading berth. The contract was made with reference to this state of things, and in it there is the stipulation that the cargo was to be received at port of discharge "as fast as steamer can deliver." It was urged that this provision only applied when and if the ship was in the Surrey Commercial Docks. I think it may fairly be construed as a stipulation by the charterer that the vessel shall, as far as he is concerned, be unloaded with the despatch of a steamer having the usual means of unloading in use in the Surrey Commercial Docks. It was solely in consequence of the inability of the consignee to obtain an unloading berth in the Surrey Commercial Docks that the ship was refused admittance into the dock. The ship was at the very entrance of the dock, ready to enter and to be put under the orders of the consignee for discharge. That it did not enter the dock was not attributable to any difficulty of navigation, or to any default on the part of the ship. In this case, as from the time when the ship was ready to enter the dock, the case as between the shipowner and consignee must be dealt with as if the ship had been in the dock, and the delay, if any, must in my opinion be considered as that of the charterer, for which the owner is entitled to claim compensation in damages.

This view is strongly supported by the judgment of Bramwell, L.J. in Davis v. M'Veagh (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 149). It was pressed upon us that a decision in favour of the plaintiffs in this case would be at variance with the decision in Tapscott v. Balfour (sup.). That case may be distinguished from the present by the stipulation in the present charter-party that the cargo was to be received at port of discharge as fast as steamer could deliver. Apparently there was not any similar provision in that case, and in the subsequent case of Ashcroft v. The Crow Orchard Colliery Company (sup.), a case the circumstances of which were very similar to that of Tapscott v. Balfour, the court, in deciding in favour of the shipowner, relied on a stipulation in the charter-party that the vessel was to be loaded with the usual dispatch of the port, which is very similar to the stipulation in the present case to which I have referred. Certainly the present case is more like that in the Queen's Bench than the previous decision in the Court of Common Pleas. In my opinion the court in Tapscott v. Balfour did not intend to lay down a general rule that, where the place of discharge is a private wharf or dock, and the inability of the ship to get to such a place of discharge is attributable to an omission or inability of the charterer to provide the means of discharge for the ship there, which it is usual for him to provide, in such a case the ship and not the charterer is to bear the loss.

James, L.J.—I concur generally in the judgment of Lord Justice Cotton.

It appears to me that, for the determination of the present question between the parties, the contract between them may be read as if expressed in ordinary Queen's English, and not in the peculiar dialect of charter-parties, and may be construed according to general legal principles, and not according to any peculiar usage, either maritime or commercial.

Now, in this case the charterers (the defendants) hired the plaintiffs' ship to proceed to a Baltic port, and there load from the factory of the merchant a full and complete cargo of deals, &c., and being so loaded, to proceed "to London Surrey Commercial Docks, or so near thereto as she may safely get, and lie always afloat, and deliver the same," at a certain freight, with 5*l.* gratuity in full of all port dues and pilotages. There was the usual exception of the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and steam navigation.

It was proved by the defendants' witnesses that the Surrey Commercial Docks was a private speculation and undertaking, the proprietors of which had and exercised the right to grant or refuse admission to any vessel, at their sole will and pleasure. As a matter of fact, therefore, the Surrey Commercial Docks was a private close to which there was access through their private gates from the port of London, but was outside of and no part of such port; that is to say, the water surface of the dock was no part of the water highway of the port. I hold it to be a matter of general law that where one man hires another to do something in a private close, his own or another's, there is, in the absence of express or implied stipulation or exception, a grant or a warranty of the requisite right of ingress, egress, and regress, to and from such close to enable the hired man to do the work. But where the close is not strictly a private close, but one which both parties know to be the close of another, whose ordinary business it is to allow access for his own profit, and whom it ordinarily suits to give such access to anyone willing to pay for it, what is the reasonable implication as to such access? Is it reasonable to imply that the hired man binds himself that the owner of the close will permit such access, and to hold that through the act of such owner in refusing such access, the contract is broken by the hired man? Is it, on the other hand, reasonable to imply that the hirer binds himself absolutely to procure such access, and breaks his contract if without any fault of his own, he fails? Supposing that the close being a dock, as in the present case, the dock walls had given away, and the dock company had been insolvent and wound-up, and unable to repair them, would that be a failure of the ship to complete its voyage? Would that be a default of the merchant preventing such completion? I cannot myself think that either alternative would be the true answer, and I think that there would be, in gremio contractûs, implied some such alternative as that which is actually expressed in the ordinary printed forms of charter-parties, and I approach the construction of that clause in the charter-party with this conviction, that no sensible shipowner, and no sensible merchant, would be contracting for the continued existence or physical fitness of the dock, or for the continual existence of the joint stock company, its owners, or for the readiness and willingness of the latter to open its gates.

I read the clause thus: "Shall proceed to the port of London, and discharge in the Surrey Commercial Docks, or if she cannot, from any physical or legal obstruction or other cause, not being an accident of sea or river (which the ship takes to herself), get into such dock, then she is to go so near thereunto as she can get, and as she can so get and lie, with safety and always afloat."

That this is the true construction (so far, at least, as it is favourable to the shipowner) appears to me to be strengthened by this, that the printed common forms, one of which was used on the present occasion, are adapted for the case of a port not named but to be named, and contain the following clause applicable thereto, and which still remains in the print: "If ordered to London the steamer to discharge in one of the docks in the river Thames." That means a dock to be named by the charterer. Now, could it be reasonably held that, under such a charter-party as that, the charterer could select and name a dock which he knew would not admit the ship for months, and so compel the ship to remain as a floating warehouse for him during three months? But what is the difference, in point of legal construction and effect, between such a charter-party completed by subsequently naming the port and dock, and a charter-party originally containing the names of both?

Adopting the construction which I think the grammatical and reasonable one of the alternative clause, I next inquire what is the practical effect of it? A ship is not, in my view of it, prevented from getting in if there be only a temporary delay or casual obstruction, such an accident as may be expected in the ordinary course of affairs. Supposing, for example, she had to wait her turn while some other ships were going through the dock, or to wait for a few hours, or a few tides, while some ships were being removed from their berths. Supposing, for another example, that a ship had foundered in the dock, or at the entrance, and that obstruction was being removed, and would be removed in a few hours, or a day or two—I should think that a mercantile jury would not hold that she was prevented from getting in. But supposing that the dock had fallen in, and that it would take at least several weeks or months to repair it—I think such a jury would say she was so prevented.

The present case, except that it is a case of a legal and not a physical obstruction, appears to me to fall exactly within the same category as the last example. The dock company, having plenty of room in the dock, refused to allow the ship to enter, not for a tide, nor for a day, or a week, but until they and the charterer could arrange as to giving a discharging berth to the latter, and when they would be able and willing to do so they could not and would not say. They would bind themselves to nothing, and all they would say was, that it would be a month, or might be months, before they would, in their good pleasure, think fit to permit the ship to enter. It is not easy to see why they should not allow the ship to enter and lie afloat in their water space, waiting safely there to get up to a berth. Peradventure it was that the dock managers had a notion that the law was as is contended for by the defendants, viz., that so long as the ship remained outside there could be no demurrage, and that they were minded to favour the charterer at the expense of the shipowner, by keeping the ship out. It was contended, in the course of the argument, that, if the ship had been allowed or contrived to enter into any part of the dock, the voyage would have been at an end, although the ship had not got, and could not for a long time get, to the discharging berth, or had been actually turned out. I find a difficulty in apprehending the distinction between failing to get into the dock and failing to get up to the berth; between the ship being turned back at the dock gates and being turned out after she had gone in without permission. It does not seem to me reasonable that the rights and liabilities of the parties should depend on the caprice of a third party, and who, if that be so, might, apparently, without violating any law, put a price on his exercise of such caprice. In my opinion, it is more reasonable to hold that the voyage, quâ voyage, ends where the public highways ends, and that everything afterwards is part of the mutual and correlative obligations of the shipowner and merchant to do everything that is respectively incumbent on them in order to effectuate the discharge of the cargo according to the true intent and meaning of the contract. The shipowner must of course be willing and ready to go into the dock specified, just as he must be willing and ready to proceed, when in the dock, to a proper berth assigned to him for unloading. There is, in my mind, a marked and broad distinction between the port of discharge, the usual public place of discharge in that port, which it is the shipowner's business at all events, at his own risk, to reach, and the private quay, wharf, or warehouse, or private dock adjoining or near the port, on which or in which he is to cooperate with the merchant in the delivery of the cargo.

We expressed our opinion that the evidence did not establish that there was any special or peculiar custom of trade applicable to the case. But I cannot help thinking that that evidence shows that everybody really acted according to the law as I understand it. The printed forms prepared by the dock company are all based on the assumption that it is the merchant who will apply for the necessary pass for the ship, and it was the merchant who always did apply for and obtain such pass to be forwarded to the ship at Gravesend, the ship learning, from such pass, and such pass only, by what lock it was to enter.

The Khedive.

APPEAL FROM PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (ADMIRALTY).

Practice—Admiralty appeal to House of Lords—Stay of execution.

Where an appeal is carried to the House of Lords for the decision of the Court of Appeal in an admiralty action, an application for a stay of proceedings pending such appeal must be made to the Court of Appeal, and not to the court below.

This was an application for a stay of execution pending an appeal to the House of Lords. This being the first Admiralty action carried from the Court of Appeal to the House of Lords, the practice was not settled.

The action was brought in the Admiralty Division by the Stomvart Maatschappy Nederland, owners of screw steamer Voorwarts, against the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company, owners of the screw steamer Khedive, for damages sustained by the Voorwarts in a collision between those vessels which occurred on the 23rd May 1878, in the straits of Malacca. The owners of the Khedive counter-claimed for their damages in the said collision. The case was heard on the 5th, 6th, and 7th Feb., when judgment was reserved, and on the 20th Feb. Sir R. Phillimore delivered judgment by which he found both vessels to blame for the collision, and decreed that, in accordance with the practice each vessel should pay the other the half of the damage she had sustained.

From this decree the defendants appealed, and the appeal was heard by the Court of Appeal at Lincoln's-inn on the 21st and 22nd July 1879, when the Court (James, Brett, and Cotton, L.JJ.) reserved judgment, and on the 28th delivered a judgment, varying the decree of the court below by finding that the Voorwarts was alone to blame. No application was made at the time for a stay of execution, but on the 4th Nov.,

W. G. F. Phillimore, for the owners of the Voorwarts, applied to the judge of the Admiralty Division for a stay of execution. This being the first appeal from the Admiralty Court to the House of Lords there is no settled practice, but it appears that the application ought to be made here, and not in the Court of Appeal:

Justice v. Mersey Steel and Iron Company, L. Rep. 1 C. P. Div. 575.

Clarkson for the owners of Khedive. — The application should be made in the Court of Appeal; that court has full possession of the case, and any application should have been made at the hearing. I am entitled to my costs of appearance.

Sir R. Phillimore made an order as follows: "The judge having heard counsel on both sides directed plaintiffs' motion to stay execution of the decree of the Court of Appeal on the 28th July last to stand over to give opportunity to the plaintiff to make the said motion to the aforesaid Court of Appeal."

Nov. 8.—W. G. F. Phillimore moved the Court of Appeal.—The parties being agreed as to the terms on which execution should be stayed, there is still a doubt as to whether the order should be made in this court or in the court below; Justice v. Mersey Steel and Iron Company (1 C. P. Div. 575) being apparently in conflict with Morgan v. Elford (4 Ch. Div. 388) and Grant v. Banque Franco-Egyptinne (3 C. P. 202; 38 L. T. Rep. N. S. 622). In the former practice in Admiralty appeals to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council it was not necessary to make any order, as, on the appeal being lodged, an inhibition issued as a matter of course:

Rules of Privy Council, Dec. 1865, r. 4.

The powers given to the court by Judicature Act 1875, Sch. 1, Order LVIII., r. 5, appear to be large enough to enable it to make such an order.

Clarkson was not called on.

James, L.J.—Justice v. Mersey Steel and Iron Company (1 C. P. Div. 575), refers to the practice in the courts of common law of giving bail in error, and does not apply to other appeals. This is the proper court to apply to for a stay of execution under the circumstances, and an order will be drawn up in accordance with the terms agreed to by counsel.

Baggallay and Thesiger, L.JJ. concurred, and the decree was drawn up as follows:—The Court of Appeal, having heard counsel on both sides, on plaintiffs (appellants) undertaking to prosecute their appeal to the House of Lords within a month, stayed the execution of the decree of the court of the 28th July last, so far as regards the assessment of damages, and in the event of defendants (respondents) proceeding to tax and enforce payment of their bill of costs, directed that an undertaking be given by their solicitors to refund the amount of such costs should the decree be reversed. The court also condemned the plaintiffs in the costs incurred by this motion.

THE MARY.

Damage—Liability—Tug and tow—Compulsory pilotage—17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 388.

Where a tug is employed to tow a ship which is in charge of a pilot by compulsion of law, the exemption from liability given to the owners of the ship for damage arising in consequence of obedience to the pilot's orders by sect. 388 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (a) does not extend to the owners of the tug for damage done by the tug, whether from acting in obedience to the pilot's orders, or in the absence of any orders.

The Ticonderoga (Sw. 215) followed.

THIS was a case in which separate actions had been brought against the Mary by the Sussex and the Desdemona for damages sustained by the two latter vessels in a collision which took place between them and the Mary, whilst the Desdemona was in tow of the Sussex. The collision took place in Sea Reach in the river Thames about 8.30 a.m. on the 30th April 1879, the wind was about N.E., with fine weather, and the tide ebb running about 2½ knots. The Sussex was a paddle tug, and in company with another tug, the Rambler, was towing the Desdemona, a ship of 1490 tons burthen, up the river, the Sussex being made fast on the starboard and the Rambler on the port bow of the Desdemona. The Desdemona had on board a pilot whose employment was compulsory by law. The Mary, a Norwegian barque of 518 tons register, was proceeding down the river under all plain sail.

The Mary was close hauled on the starboard tack, standing across the river to the northward. and the Desdemona and her tugs were steering about W.N.W. up the reach, and, for the Desdemona, it was alleged that she and her tugs would have gone clear under the stern of the Mary had the latter not gone in stays. For the Mary it was alleged that she did not go in stays till the approach of the Desdemona and tugs had rendered a collision imminent, and that the Desdemona and her tugs only starboarded when it was too late. The stern of the Sussex struck the starboard bow of the Mary, and afterwards the Desdemona's starboard bow struck the stern of the Sussex, driving the latter vessel again against the Mary. All three vessels sustained damage, the Mary counter-claiming against the owners of the Sussex.

The Sussex, in reply to the counter-claim, alleged that, if the collision was occasioned by the neglect or default on the part of the Desdemona or tugs, it was occasioned solely by the fault or incapacity of a pilot in charge of the Desdemona and the tugs, and whose employment was compulsory by law, and also that the tugs were under the orders of those on board the Desdemona.

The cases were heard together, the evidence in one being accepted as evidence in the other, on the 11th and 12th June 1879, before Sir R. Phillimore and Trinity Masters.

Myburgh and Nelson for the Sussex, E. C. Clarkson for the Desdemona, Butt, Q.C. and Dr. W. G. F. Phillimore for the Mary.

After hearing evidence on the merits, his Lordship decided that the Sussex was to blame for the collision for not starboarding sooner, and that the Mary was not to blame, and that therefore both suits against her should be dismissed, reserving the point of law as to the liability of the Sussex on the counter-claim of the Mary.

On the 8th July the point was argued.

Butt, Q.C. and Dr. W. G. F. Phillimore for the Mary.—Even if the tugs acted solely in obedience to the orders of the pilot on board the Desdemona that would not free her from liability. The sole ground of exemption is the compulsion of law, which does not create the relation of master and servant, between shipowner and pilot so employed, but there is no such compulsion on the tug. It is a purely voluntary agreement on her part to tow on what conditions may be mutually agreed upon, as she is not bound by law to obey the orders of the pilot, and therefore cannot claim the exemption from liability given by sect. 388 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854:

The Ticonderoga, Swabey Ad. Rep. 215.

Here the speed, which was one cause of the collision, was left in the hands of the tug. The tugs and tow are only considered as one vessel, in so far as their duties in obeying the rules of navigation are identical. If a vessel in tow, by mistake of her helmsman, executes a wrong manœuvre, it could not be said that the tug which had done nothing wrong was to blame for a collision ensuing. The case of The Duke of Sussex (1 W. Rob. 270, 1 Notes of Cases 61) is no authority now; it was decided under the law in force before the Merchant Shipping Act, which exempted all vessels acting under the orders of a duly licensed pilot, whether his employment were compulsory or not, from liability for damage done in consequence of his orders.

Clarkson and Nelson for the Sussex.—The fault was the fault of the pilot. The fact that he gave no order does not alter the case; he tacitly permitted the tug to go at a speed and in a direction which led to the collision, and he being in charge of the ship and tug, that is equivalent to an order to go at that speed and in that direction:

The Energy, L. Rep. 3 Ad. & Ecc. 48; 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 601; 3 Mar. Law Cas. 503.

The 388th section of the Merchant Shipping Act does not require that the employment of the pilot by the tug should be compulsory, but that the place should be within the district where his employment was compulsory—that is, by the tow, and the tug is only the motive power of the ship, and so long as it does not disobey the orders of

(a) MERCHANT SHIPPING ACT 1854 (17 & 18 VICT. c. 104).
Saving of Owners and Masters Rights.
Limitation of Liability of Owner where Pilotage is Compulsory.

Sect. 388. No owner or master of any ship shall be answerable to any person whatever for any loss or damage occasioned by the fault or incapacity of any qualified pilot acting in charge of such ship, within any district where the employment of such pilot is compulsory by law.

the pilot must be taken to be acting in obedience to them, and when damage ensues in consequence of obedience to the orders of a pilot in a district where his employment is compulsory, as in this case, the owners are exempt from liability for it.

Butt, Q.C. in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 15.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—In this case the steam tug Sussex has been found alone to blame for the collision with the barque Mary. It is now contended that the Sussex, the wrongdoer, is exempt from responsibility to the injured ship upon the ground that the Desdemona, the ship which, in conjunction with another tug, she was towing, had a pilot on board by compulsion of law. To this defence two answers have been made: First, that the immunity of the ship towed does not extend to the tug; secondly, that it is not proved by trustworthy evidence that this collision was solely occasioned by "the fault or incapacity" of the pilot "acting in charge" of the ship, and therefore that sect. 388 of the Merchant Shipping 1854 Act (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104) does not apply to this case.

First, as to the question of law, to use the language of Dr. Lushington in The Protector (1 William Rob. p. 57): "The great principle that a wrongdoer is responsible to the injured party, saving in the excepted cases, continues unaltered." The burden of proof, lies upon the party claiming the exemption. It is necessary to bear in mind the distinct relations subsisting between the ship and her tug and the ship and her pilot; perhaps a close attention to this distinction will remove the difficulty which the language of some of the earlier reported cases on this subject is supposed to have created. The root of the exemption in the case of compulsory pilotage is that the pilot is not the servant of the owner, but a servant forced upon him by the statute, whom he must employ, whether he likes it or not, but his relation to the tug is very different; the tug is his servant, voluntarily taken and employed by him for the occasion. The law, indeed, implies, when a tug is employed, a contract between the owner of the tug and the owner of the ship to the effect that the tug will obey directions from the ship and act as the servant of the shipowner; but this contract does not affect third parties, and the principle which exonerates the ship in the case of the pilot does not apply to the tug. It has been said, indeed, in various cases, that the tug and her tow constitute one vessel, but this has been said, and even then without exceptions, in the sense that the tug is bound by the rules of navigation applicable to steamers; in that sense it may be metaphysically, but not physically, that they are one vessel; the tug has a separate contract and a separate responsibility from the pilot. In short, it is by the exercise of free will that the ship takes the tug; by compulsion of law that she takes the pilot. It has been contended, however, that my predecessor, Dr. Lushington, ruled in the case of The Duke of Sussex (1 W. Rob. 270; 1 Notes of Cases, 161) that the exemption of compulsory pilotage extended to the tug. I think that a careful examination of this case does not lead to that conclusion. The case was decided in 1841, when 1 Geo. 4, c. 125, sect. 55, was in force, in which the words "compulsory by law" were not inserted; and it appears from the more full and accurate report in the Notes of Cases that Dr. Lushington, following a decision of the Court of Exchequer, decided that if the pilot was taken on board, whether by compulsion or not, the owner of the ship was exonerated from responsibility. Dr. Lushington seems to have been much impressed by the mischievous consequences which would follow from holding that the tug was not as much under the control of the pilot as the tow, and the chief object of his judgment seems to have been to refute the contrary opinion. He appears to have had the same object in the subsequent decision in The Christina (3 W. Rob. 27, 6 Notes of Cases 4) delivered in 1848. Looking at all the circumstances of these decisions, I am of opinion that they do not furnish a precedent for the case now before me, and I am fortified in this opinion by a subsequent decision of the same learned judge in The Ticonderoga, A.D. 1857 (Swabey Ad. Rep. 215), the marginal note in the report of which case appears to me to be accurate: "The Ticonderoga, under a charter-party to the French Government, was towed by a steamer athwart the hawse of the Melampus. The Ticonderoga alleged that she was not liable for the damage done, as her charter-party obliged her to obey orders, and put herself in tow of the steamer. Held, that such obligation was no compulsion, so as to lay the ground for exemption from liability for the damage done; as it arose from a voluntary stipulation entered into by the owners themselves." Dr. Lushington said (p. 216): "I take the true meaning of the plea to be, that the Ticonderoga was in the service of the French Government; that the steamer was attached to her, and she was compelled, by the order of the Government, to employ her in all the proper duties which could attach to a steamer." He goes on to say, "The blame having been imputed to the steamer, let us consider whether the Ticonderoga can or cannot be made responsible for the damage which has been done. Now, that the steamer was engaged in the service of the Ticonderoga, and that the steamer took the Ticonderoga into mischief, there can be no doubt whatsoever. We must recollect that this is a proceeding in rem. Let us see what cases there are in which the court does not hold a vessel responsible for the damage done. There is one case, and one only, that I am aware of, and that is where a pilot is taken on board by compulsion. On what principle is the owner, in that case, relieved from paying the damage done? On the principle of compulsion — the principle that the man is not the servant of the owner, but is forced upon him by Act of Parliament. Was this steamer taken by compulsion, or was it not? What species of compulsion is it which is averred on behalf of this American vessel that is to relieve her from the responsibility which the maritime law of the world attaches to the wrongdoer?—entering into a stipulation with the French Government. It is impossible to contend that, because a person has entered into a voluntary contract by which he is finally led into mischief, that that can relieve him from making good the damage which he has done." Upon the whole I am of opinion that the Sussex cannot be exonerated from the consequences of her wrongful act by reason of the Desdemona having on board a pilot by compulsion of law.

Having expressed my opinion on the question of law, it is perhaps unnecessary to deal with the question of fact, but I think it right to state that my recollection of the opinion of the Trinity Masters, as well as a re-perusal of the evidence, lead me to the conclusion that the damage was as a matter of fact occasioned, not solely by the fault or incapacity of the pilot, but that the master and the tugs were, as Sir John Nicholl said in The Girolamo (3 Hagg. Ad. 176) in pari delicto, and that I do not think there is any trustworthy evidence that the pilot's orders were obeyed; therefore, upon both the grounds of law and fact, I pronounce judgment in favour of the Mary.

THE EMPUSA.

Limitation of liability—Collision—Freight pledged for a loan—Right of assignee of freight to claim against fund in court—Costs.

Where freight is pledged by an instrument in the nature of a bottomry bond and the ship is totally lost, whilst the freight is at risk, by a collision with another ship which admits and limits her liability under the Merchant Shipping Acts, paying the amount of her liability into court, the holders of the instrument are entitled to rank against the fund paid into court for the freight pledged to them.

Semble, that the bondholders are entitled to recover out of the fund in court applicable to the payment of damages for loss of freight the same proportion of the sum secured by the bond as the total sum apportioned in respect of loss of freight bears to the whole freight of the ship lost.

In a limitation suit the costs of deciding a point of law arising on the claims of two rival claimants to the same fund not allowed as against the plaintiff; each claimant ordered to pay his own costs. (a)

THE owners of the ship Empusa, by action in the Admiralty Division, limited their liability in respect of damages occasioned by a collision between that vessel and the Commerce, resulting in the total loss of the latter, and paid into court a sum to cover the loss of ship, cargo, and freight. A dispute having arisen as to the right to the damages for the loss of freight between the Cassa Marittima, as holders of an instrument pledging the Commerce and her freight for an advance made, and the owner of the Commerce, the said disputants stated the following

SPECIAL CASE.

On the 24th Aug. 1878 Elijah Nickerson, master of the British ship Commerce, owned by the defendant, Lindley, M. M. Willet, and then lying in the port of Philadelphia, requested from the agent of the Cassa Marittima of Genoa a loan of 598*l.* 1*s.* 4*d.* upon the security of the freight of the said ship to be earned on a voyage from Philadelphia to Antwerp.

The said loan was granted, and the said Elijah Nickerson signed the following instrument:

Fifteen days after arrival at the port of Antwerp, Belgium, or other intermediate port at which shall end the voyage of my vessel, denominated the ship Commerce, I promise to pay to the order of the Cassa Marittima of Genoa the sum of 598*l.* 1*s.* 4*d.*, sterling value, received as loan on freight for the last expenses necessary to the undertaking of the voyage from Philadelphia to Antwerp, Belgium, on the conditions of the regulations of the Cassa Marittima, of which I have received a copy, ship and freight being in accordance with such regulations liable for repayment, with priority over every other credit.

On the back of this instrument were printed the regulations of the said Cassa Marittima. A copy of the same is annexed hereto, and is to form part of this case.

The sum of 598*l.* 1*s.* 4*d.* secured by the said bill was not actually advanced in full by the Cassa Marittima to the said master, but such sum was and is the aggregate amount of the actual advance made by the Cassa Marittima to the said master, and the premium and interest on such actual advance, which premium was retained by the Cassa Marittima, pursuant to regulation 13 of the said regulations.

The said loan was duly made, and the Commerce sailed in due course on her destined voyage from Philadelphia to Antwerp, but on the 26th Sept., while off Hastings, in the English Channel, the Commerce was run into and sunk by the steamship Empusa, and with her cargo and freight was totally lost.

The plaintiffs, who are owners of the steamship Empusa, admitted their liability for the damages occasioned by the said collision, and brought this suit to limit such liability in the manner provided by the statute in that behalf, and obtained a decree therein on payment into court of the amount of their statutory liability and all claims in respect of the loss or damage occasioned by the said collision were referred to the registrar and merchants to report thereon.

Amongst other claims the defendants, the owners of the Commerce, claimed the sum of 2148*l.* 13*s.* 6*d.* as damages for the loss of the freight, to be earned by the said ship on the said voyage from Philadelphia to Antwerp, and were allowed the sum of 2088*l.* in respect of such freight, being the amount of such freight less the expenses of completing the voyage.

(a) Since the decision on this point, the case of the s.s. Ponce, decided by the judge at chambers, has laid down the practice even more clearly. The owners of the Ponce, having been condemned in the damages caused by a collision with another steamer, limited their liability to 8*l.* per ton, and took the usual proceedings for the settlement of claims in the Admiralty District Registry at Liverpool. The claims on part of the owners of the plaintiffs' ship and her cargo greatly exceeded the amount for which the defendants were liable, and the latter took no steps to dispute the items claimed, leaving the registrar and merchants to deal with them. The owners of cargo, however, appeared by solicitor before the registrar and merchants and disputed several items in the claim of the shipowners, who also appeared by solicitor in support of their claim; in the result the claim of the shipowner was considerably reduced. The costs of this attendance were considerable, including costs of copies of documents, attendances, &c.; and the respective solicitors for the plaintiffs the shipowners and for the plaintiffs the owners of cargo contended that they were entitled to recover these costs from the owners of the s.s. Ponce as part of the necessary costs of establishing their respective claims, relying upon The Expert (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 381). The district registrar taxed the costs de bene esse, but referred the question of the liability of the defendants for the costs of settling the disputed items of the claims to the judge. On Dec. 2, 1879, the judge in chambers decided that the defendants were not liable for such costs.—ED.

The Cassa Marittima of Genoa also claimed the sum of 598*l.* 1*s.* 4*d.* as the damages they had sustained by reason of the loss of the freight, which was pledged to them as security for the said advance, and their claim was disallowed by the registrar on the ground, among others, that the owner of the ship was the only person who could recover in respect of the freight, and that the Cassa Marittima were not entitled to claim in competition with the owners of the Commerce, that vessel having been lost.

The Cassa Marittima of Genoa contend that they are entitled to prove for the loss of the freight so far as it was pledged to them, and that the defendants are not entitled to recover as part of their damages the freight, which would have to be paid to the Cassa Marittima if the Commerce had arrived at Antwerp, and that the said freight, having been allowed by the registrar as part of the claim of defendants, the owners of the Commerce, such owners ought to hold and receive the same as trustees for the Cassa Marittima, and are under an obligation to pay a proportion thereof to the said Cassa Marittima, or to allow the Cassa Marittima to receive the same out of court.

The questions for the opinion of the court are:

1. Whether the Cassa Marittima as against the owners of the Commerce is entitled to prove against the fund paid into court by the plaintiff for the said sum of 598*l.* 1*s.* 4*d.*, as damages occasioned in respect of the said collision.

2. Whether if the Cassa Marittima are not entitled to prove for the said sum as damages against the fund paid into court by the plaintiffs, they are entitled as against the defendants, the owners of the Commerce, to receive payment of the said sum out of court, or to an order that the said defendants, out of the moneys recovered by them as damages in respect of the loss of the said freight, should pay to the said Cassa Marittima the said sum for which the freight was pledged.

3. Or, in the alternative, that the Cassa Marittima are entitled to receive out of the fund in court applicable to the payment of damages for loss of freight, or from the defendants, the owners of the Commerce, the same proportions of the sum of 598*l.* 1*s.* 4*d.* as the total sum apportioned in respect of the loss of freight bears to the whole freight of the said ship.

The rules above referred to as being indorsed on the back of the instrument were as follows:

CASSA MARITTIMA.

GENOA.

Rules for Loans on Freight.

The loans which the Cassa Marittima agree to make on freight must be subject to the following rules:

1. Any owner desirous to obtain a loan on freight from the Cassa Marittima must make his request in accordance with the printed form which will be given him for the purpose

The form will indicate

a. The build, name, and tonnage of the vessel.
b. The port in which she is lying, and where and how insured.
c. The voyage she is about to make.
d. The amount of the freight upon which the loan is asked.
e. The amount of loan asked for.
f. The signature of owner or captain.

2. The board of direction authorised by two delegated administrators, according to Article 28 in the statute, accept or decline the demand.

3. The loan can never exceed a third of the whole freight the vessel may make.

4. The owner or the captain, before he can obtain a loan, must produce the bills of lading, signed by the shipper, in proof of not having received any previous advances on the freight.

5. The loan must be repaid within fifteen days after the arrival of the ship in the port to which she is bound, or wherever the voyage may terminate, and the freight and vessel will be liable to the repayment of the loan, with priority over every other credit.

6. In the event of the vessel on arrival at the port of destination being ordered by the shipper of the cargo to any other port, the amount of the loan must be repaid to the agents of the Cassa Marittima, and a further loan may be asked, which the agents have power to grant or decline.

7. Any captain leaving a port in which he has to repay a loan without having done so will be subject to a fine of 30 per cent. upon the sum due, besides being liable for all trouble and expenses caused to the Cassa thereby.

8. If the loan be not repaid when it falls due, as fixed according to Article 7, the Cassa will proceed to enforce payment, and will have the right to exact interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum until the payment is made.

9. A receipt will be given by the captain or owner when the loan is made, signed in accordance with the above rules, or with any others that may be established.

10. In the case of ships abroad, when the owner has not time to obtain the sanction of the directors of the Cassa Marittima to a loan on freight, agents are authorised to grant the loan at the request of the captain, always subject to these regulations.

11. Loans shall always be made in gold, and shall be repaid in gold at the current rate of Exchange on London at the port where the vessel discharges, or to the Cassa Marittima in Genoa.

12. Loans shall always be exempt from any contribution to either general or particular average.

13. The premium and interest on the sums granted in loan on freight according to the list must be always retained on the loan itself, and in case of a total loss, if there be no payment of freight, either total or partial, the sums received as loan shall not be paid back except that which has been taken beyond the third part of the freight.

14. Ships discharging in Italian and Adriatic ports shall repay the loan at the official rate current for sight bills.

15. The owner or captain shall not take any other advances upon the same freight at the port of loading, or in such case hold themselves bound to return the present loan, though the vessel be lost.

16. The captain shall give immediate notice on arrival at port of discharge to the Cassa Marittima in Genoa, or to their agents at the nearest port, incurring otherwise the penalty of 10 per cent. on the amount of the loan.

May 21.—Myburgh, for the Cassa Marittima.—This is in effect a bottomry bond, and the holders thereof are entitled to have paid to them out of the damages for loss of freight a proportion of the amount. A bottomry bond is primâ facie not payable in case of the loss of the ship on which it is given if the ship is lost; but if the loss is occasioned by any wrongful act of the shipowner as deviation the bond is payable in spite of loss, and this shows that loss does not in all cases terminate the liability under a bond. Here the bond, if terminated at all, is at an end because of the wrongful act of a third party who has made compensation to the owners for the loss sustained. The bond is terminated through no fault of the bondholder, and a fund representing the freight is in existence; hence he ought to be paid:

The Dante, 2 W. Rob. 427.

The holders of the bond might even have proceeded for the damage done in the name of the owners of the Commerce and have recovered the loss sustained by them. The owners of the Com- merce have a legal interest in the freight, but they can only claim as trustees for the bondholders, so far as the freight is pledged by the bond. The liability of the shipowners on the bond may have ceased, but the force of the bond as an assignment of freight remains. The shipowners have recovered their freight, and must hence pay the bond, or such proportion of the amount secured as the total sum recovered for loss of freight bears to the whole freight of ship.

E. C. Clarkson for the owners of the Commerce.—The question turns on the nature of bottomry bonds. The bondholders receive a premium (and in this case they have already retained it out of the sum advanced) in the express condition of taking the risk of loss. The ship and freight have been lost, the bond never became payable, and the conditions under which the bondholders are entitled to claim have never been fulfilled. The owners of the Commerce have in fact recovered no freight, only damages for the loss thereof. The bondholders cannot be heard as against the owners of the Commerce to say that they can recover on this bond, which by the very terms of it is at an end.

Myburgh in reply. The owners of the Commerce, having recovered damages for loss of freight, are precluded from saying that no sum has become payable in respect of freight; if it is once admitted that such a sum is due, we are entitled to enforce our lien on it. If the owners of the Commerce are right in their contention, underwriters would be precluded from recouping themselves against wrongdoers for payments made in respect of losses sustained: but they are entitled to proceed in the name of the assured; so ought a bondholder to be able to recover.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is a case for which there is no legal precedent, but it is one which is to be decided on general principles of equity and the circumstances of the case. Taking into consideration the 13th article of the regulations of the Cassa Marittima, providing for the event of a total loss, I decide that the Cassa Marittima is entitled to receive out of the fund in court applicable to the payment of damages for loss of freight, the same proportion of the sum of 598*l.* 1*s.* 4*d.* as the total sum apportioned in respect of the loss of freight bears to the whole freight of the said ship. This amount will be ascertained by the registrar. I direct the costs to be costs in the cause.

July 1.—W. G. F. Phillimore moved, on behalf of the owners of the Empusa, the plaintiffs in the limitation action, to rescind or vary the order as to the payment of costs. The effect of the order as it stands will be to make the plaintiffs pay all the costs of this special case, which is a dispute between two claimants outside the purposes of the action. There is in this case adverse litigation, and in such cases the costs have never been borne by the plaintiff in the limitation action:

The City of Buenos Ayres, 25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 672; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 169, 182;
The African Steamship Company v. Swanzy, 25 L. J. Ch. 870.

E. C. Clarkson, for the owners of the Commerce.—I cannot contend that where claimants against a fund enter into an improper or excessive contest they are entitled to their costs. But this is a question primæ impressionis, and it arises directly out of the act of the wrongdoer, who by his act has occasioned the necessity for having the question decided; and the costs of so deciding should be borne by the plaintiffs. The cases cited only go to the effect that if there were an improper litigation it might make a difference.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I think my former order was wrong as to the costs. It would be very difficult to draw a line of demarcation, and to say in which cases proper and in which improper litigation has arisen between rival claimants. The circumstances of each case would have to be considered. This case, however, is not a case in which the costs ought to be allowed as against the plaintiffs. The costs here incurred were costs arising out of a peculiar point of law decided as between the claimants, and this is not a case in which the plaintiffs ought to be called upon to pay costs. I shall vary the order by directing each of the claimants to pay his own costs. The plaintiff is entitled to his costs of this application against the Commerce.

THE CITY OF MECCA.

Jurisdiction — Practice — Foreign Judgment — Comity of nations—Maritime lien—Suit in rem—Arrest of ship.

The Admiralty Division of the High Court of Justice has jurisdiction to entertain a suit in rem to enforce a judgment of a foreign court exercising Admiralty jurisdiction in a case where the original suit was to enforce a maritime lien.

The jurisdiction of the Admiralty Division of the High Court of Justice is the same as that formerly exercised by the High Court of Admiralty in matters in which it had jurisdiction by the comity of nations as a court administering civil law.

THIS was a motion by the defendants to set aside the writ of summons and subsequent proceedings by the plaintiffs, and the bail-bond executed by the defendants, and to discharge the bail and condemn the plaintiff in the costs.

The action arose out of a collision which occurred between the British Steamer City of Mecca, whose owners resided in Scotland, and the Portuguese steamer Empreza Insulana de Navegacano, off the coast of Portugal, in which the Portuguese steamer was sunk, and the City of Mecca so much damaged that she had to put into Lisbon. Whilst at Lisbon, an action for the damages sustained from the loss of the Portuguese steamer was instituted before the Tribunal of Commerce, in which the City of Mecca was found alone to blame for the collision. This judgment was affirmed by the Courts o Appeal in Portugal. Subsequently, on the City of Mecca arriving in this country, the plaintiffs served a writ in rem on her in the ordinary way (S. C. J. Act 1875. sc. 1, Order IX., r. 10; R. S. C. Dec. 1875, r. 6 and App. A.), bearing the following indorsement of claim:

The plaintiffs' claim is upon a judgment of the Tribunal of Commerce of Lisbon, by which the court determined that the City of Mecca was alone to blame for a collision, and ordered the defendants to pay to the plaintiffs the loss sustained by them by reason of the said collision, and the plaintiffs claim 25,000*l.*

The defendants appeared under protest and gave bail, but before delivery of any petition on protest they served the plaintiffs with notice of motion to set aside all proceedings "on the ground of the writ having been improperly issued."

Nov. 11.—The motion now came on in court.

Butt, Q.C. and Clarkson for defendants.—The writ in this case and all subsequent proceedings must be set aside. The ship proceeded against here in rem was in collision with a Portuguese vessel, and judgment in a Portuguese court was given against the owners of the City of Mecca; that is, it was a suit in personam and not in rem. That judgment ordered the owners of the City of Mecca to pay a certain sum of money, and now the plaintiffs endeavour to recover that sum of money by a suit in rem against the ship in this country, the owners not being resident here. The indorsement on the writ states that the "claim" for 25,000*l.* "is upon a judgment of the Tribunal of Commerce of Lisbon, by which the court determined that the City of Mecca was alone to blame for a collision, and ordered the defendants to pay to the plaintiffs the loss sustained by them by reason of the said collision." There can be no dispute as to the right which a person successful in a suit in a foreign court acquires. He is entitled to recover the amount of the judgment as a debt; in the technical language of the courts, it was recovered in this country by an action of assumpsit. And at present the only question to be decided by this court is as to the means of procedure proper to enforce a foreign judgment. Before the passing of the Judicature Acts this court would have had no jurisdiction at all in such an action—an action of assumpsit. But admitting, for the present at all events, that now as a branch of the High Court of Justice it has acquired a right co-ordinate with that of the other divisions to entertain such an action—subject to the power of transfer—yet it has not acquired any right to entertain such an action by the institution of a suit in rem. An action of assumpsit is a purely personal action, and the basis of a suit in rem is maritime lien, extended by recent statutes to certain other matters, not giving a strictly maritime lien; but an action on a foreign judgment is not one of the matters to which it is extended:

Russell v. Smyth, 9 M. & W. 810;
Williams v. Jones, 13 M. & W. 633;
Goddard v. Gray, L. Rep. 6 Q.B. 139; 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 89;
Schibsby v. Westenholz, L. Rep. 6 Q.B. 155; 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 93.

In the last of those cases, Blackburn, J. sums up the substance of those proceedings as follows: "It is unnecessary to repeat again what we have already said in Goddard v. Gray (ubi sup.). We think that, for the reasons there given the true principle on which the judgments of foreign Tribunals are enforced in England is that stated by Parke, B. in Russell v. Smyth (ubi sup.), and again repeated by him in Williams v. Jones (ubi sup.), that the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction over the defendant imposes a duty or obligation on the defendant to pay the sum for which judgment is given, which the courts of this country are bound to enforce." This all speaks of a personal duty by the defendant, not of a lien which travels with the ship; and that view is taken also in the following paragraph: "In the event of a foreign judgment being in favour of the plaintiff, and made the foundation of his suit in England, as he cannot issue, as has been seen, execution upon it here, he must enforce it by bringing a fresh action, technically called an action of assumpsit, for the recovery of what is due to him under the judgment:" (Phil. Inter. Law, 2nd edit., vol. 4, p. 739, s. 955.) I do not dispute their right to institute a suit in rem against the ship, but that suit must be for the original cause of action, which would be then reheard on the merits, for "It is important to observe that the foreign judgment does not operate as a merger of the original ground of action:" (Phil. Inter. Law, 2nd edit., vol. 4, p. 739, s. 955.) There is no more right in principle in instituting a suit in rem against this ship on that foreign judgment than there would be against any other property—any other ship—of the defendants which might chance to be in England, and there is no precedent for such a proceeding.

Webster, Q.C. (with him Sir Edmund Hornby and Gainsford Bruce) for the plaintiffs.—It must, for the present at all events, be inferred that the judgment of the foreign court was a judgment in a suit in rem. It is not the defendants who are found to blame for the collision, but their ship, and the judgment condemned the defendants and the City of Mecca in the damages. It is therefore a judgment to enforce a maritime lien—the lien for damage by collision—and it cannot be said that a Court of Admiralty cannot enforce such a judgment by a suit in rem. Such a judgment is binding on every court in this kingdom. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—May it not be that it is binding, as conclusive evidence, on all courts, but that nevertheless the courts are not bound to enforce it as a judgment?] In any division of the High Court of Justice an action might be sustained on such a judgment. But the Court of Admiralty had a wider jurisdiction over certain causes of action arising on the high seas. Before the Judicature Acts were passed, if a collision occurred, and one of the ships, of which no owner resided in England, came to this country, a common law court would not allow a writ to issue; but the plaintiffs coming to this court would get a warrant and citation in rem against the ship. Now this division, being a branch of the High Court, has all the jurisdiction of that court, and therefore can entertain a suit on a foreign judgment, and none the less when that foreign judgment is to enforce a maritime lien. The res has come within the jurisdiction, and the res is subject to a maritime lien, and there is a judgment deciding the fact. If it has not previously been done, it is because before the Judicature Acts the Court of Admiralty did not exercise a jurisdiction over foreign judgments; but now that it has an undoubted jurisdiction in the matter of foreign judgments, what reasons can there be that, finding a foreign judgment binding against the res, it should not enforce it against the res? In Castrique v. Imrie (L. Rep. 4 H. L. 414; 23 L. T. Rep. N.S. 48) it is laid down by Lord Chelmsford that a judgment in rem of a foreign tribunal cannot be impeached save "on the ground of fraud, or as being contrary to natural justice;" and the same principle is clearly stated in the notes to The Duchess of Kingston's case (Smith's Leading Cases, vol. 2, 7th edit., p. 828): "The sentence of a foreign Court of Admiralty of competent jurisdiction pronounced in rem, is conclusive against all the world, as to the existence of the ground on which the court professes to decide." If then this court can entertain proceedings to enforce a maritime lien, it must be by its own process in cases of maritime lien; i.e., by proceedings in rem. If we had instituted a cause of damage in rem, in the ordinary way, no objection could have been made to our subsequently in our statement of claim pleading the foreign judgment. The fact that we state it in the writ and do not wait for the statement of claim, cannot alter the rights of the parties. The final judgment of a foreign court is conclusive between the parties on the merits, and no matter can be pleaded to it which might have been a defence on the merits in the original action:

Bullen & Leake, 3rd edit. p. 623, notes.

The suit is the same, whether the process is in rem or in personam, and if the owners of the City of Mecca pass through the kingdom, they can be sued there; why then cannot the res, which is here, and liable to the process of the court, be sued?

Sir Edmund Hornby.—The court will enforce a foreign judgment in rem by its ordinary machinery, but here it has direct authority to entertain a suit in rem:

The Bold Buccleugh, 3 W. Rob.; 7 Moo. P. C. C. 267; 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 235;
The Young Mechanic, 2 Curtis (Amr.) 404;
Taylor v. Carryl, 20 Howard (Amer.) 583;
2 Parsons on Shipping, edit. of 1859, p. 544, note 3.

In the case of Ewer v. Jones (2 Raym. 934), Holt, C. J. says: "The sentence of a civil law court in a foreign realm shall be executed in a court of the same nature here, and proceeding after the same law, and no prohibition, because the temporal courts proceed by a due law, and we must give credit to the sentence." The raison d'être of the jurisdiction in rem is that the res comes within the jurisdiction of the court, whilst the person does not: (Brown on Adm. Law, p. 120.)

Butt, Q.C. in reply.—No precedent has been cited for this process, and therefore I may say there is no authority for it. Castrique v. Imrie (ubi sup.) is not in point; that was not an action on a foreign judgment at all, but an action in trover, to which a foreign judgment was incidental. It may be that, if the plaintiffs bring an ordinary suit in rem, they may give this judgment in evidence; but that is not the question, they have brought the action in rem on the judgment, and that they are not entitled to do. The only jurisdiction this court has over an action on a foreign judgment is that which it has acquired as a branch of the High Court of Justice, and that must be exercised in the same way as any other division of the High Court would exercise it—by an action of assumpsit—in which the writ must be served on the defendant in the ordinary way; to institute such a suit in rem by service of the writ on the ship is without precedent, and contrary to principle.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 25.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is a case in which the representatives of the steamship Empreza Insulana de Navegacao have brought an action in rem against the steamship City of Mecca. In the writ of summons it is stated that the plaintiffs' claim is upon a judgment of the Tribunal of Commerce of Lisbon, by which the court determined that the City of Mecca was alone to blame for a collision, and ordered the defendants to pay to the plaintiffs the loss sustained by them by reason of the said collision, and that the plaintiffs claim 25,000*l*. In the affidavit to institute this suit it is stated by the solicitor for the plaintiffs, that he is informed that after the said collision the City of Mecca put into Lisbon, and that proceedings were there instituted against the said steamship, which subsequently left Lisbon without giving security in the said proceedings; also that the owners of the City of Mecca appeared and contested the said proceedings, and that the decree of the Tribunal of Commerce was confirmed by the final Court of Appeal in Portugal. A warrant of arrest was taken out in this court by the plaintiffs, and the vessel has been released on bail. A motion has been made by the owners of the City of Mecca to set aside the writ of summons issued in this action, and all subsequent proceedings on the part of the plaintiffs; also the bail bond executed on behalf of the defendants in this action, and that the bail may be discharged, and that the plaintiffs be condemned in the costs of the action on the ground of the writ having been improperly issued.

The question to be decided is whether this court can and ought to enforce the sentence of a foreign Admiralty Court by a proceeding in rem? It appears to me expedient to make two preliminary observations. First, I express my opinion that, whatever authority upon this subject was incident to this court before the Judicature Act belongs to it now; secondly, that this court has always exercised a jurisdiction founded on international comity with respect to the execution of the sentences of foreign Admiralty Courts.

I proceed to consider the authorities on this subject in their chronological order, as it is important to show that the duty of the Admiralty Court in England to enforce the decree of a foreign Admiralty Court has been steadily recognised for a great number of years. Weir's case (King's Bench, 5th James 1st A.D. 1608; Rolle's Abridgment, 530 and Viner's Abridgment, vol. 6, 513): "If a Friesslander sues an Englishman before the governor in Friesland, and recovers a certain sum, and the Englishman, not having enough to pay for it, comes to England, whereupon the governor sent his lettres missives to England, asking all magistrates of that kingdom to cause execution of the said judgment: Le judge del Admiraltie poet executer c'es judgment per imprisonment del partie, et il ne serra deliver per le common ley; car ceoest per la ley de nations que le justice d'un nation serra aidant al justice d'auter nation, et l'un d'executer le judgement de l'auter, et la ley d'Engletare prist notice de c'est ley et le judge del Admiraltie est le proper magistrate pur c'est purpose car il solment a l'execution del ley civill deins c'est relme." This case is referred to in Molloy "De Jure Marit." (book., 3 c. 9, s. 9). The next authority is that of Sir Leoline Jenkins, judge of the High Court of Admiralty in the reign of Charles II. This authority is one to which very great weight has always been ascribed by Lord Stowell and other eminent civilians, as both witnessing to the practice of the courts administering the civil law and setting forth the principle upon which that practice was founded. Sir Leoline Jenkins (Wynne's Life, vol. 2, p. 762), writing in 1666 A.D., says of the practice of civil courts that "they ordinarily intermeddle not with or inspect the merits of those sentences that are given without the limits of their jurisdiction. 'Tis a ruled case," he says, "that one judge must not refuse upon letters of request to execute the sentence of another foreign judge when the persons or goods sentenced against are within his jurisdiction; and if he do his superior must compel him to it; else it is a sufficient ground for reprisals against the territory." The next authority is only four years later. It is the case of Jurado v. Gregory (1 Vent. 32, King's Bench, 21 Charles II., A.D. 1670). In this case the plaintiff had sued in the English Admiralty for enforcement of a sentence given in a Spanish admiralty court. A prohibition was granted by the King's Bench, but only on the grounds that the sentence of the Spanish court was not complete, but was only an award, and could not therefore be sued upon, and the original contract being one made on land ought not to be sued upon in the Admiralty. The following proposition was advanced in argument by Finch, the Solicitor-General, and agreed to by the court: "Where sentence is obtained in a foreign Admiralty, one may libel for execution thereof here, because all the Courts of Admiralty in Europe are governed by the civil law, and are to be assistant one to another, though the matter were not originally determinable in our Court of Admiralty;" and Wier's case, before referred to, was cited. The next authority occurred in the year 1704. It is the case of Ewer v. Jones (2 Lord Raymond, p. 935). Holt, C.J., in giving judgment, says: "The sentence of a civil law court in a foreign realm shall be executed in a court of the same nature here, and proceeding after the same law, and no prohibition, because the temporal courts proceed by a due law, and we must give credit to the sentence, as it was adjudged in the time of Charles II. in Hughes v. Cornelius." To these authorities may now be added a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States of America. In Penhallon v. Doane's Administrators, decided A.D. 1795 (3 Dallas 54) it was said by Iredell, J.: "It was clearly shown at the bar," referring to page 74, I presume, "that a Court of Admiralty in one nation can carry into effect the determination of the Court of Admiralty in another;" and again by Cushing, J. at page 118, "That Courts of Admiralty can carry into execution decrees of foreign admiralties as seems to be settled law and usage. Dr. Browne, in his "Compendious View of Civil and Admiralty Law," a work dedicated to Lord Stowell, says (edition of 1802, vol. 2, p. 120): "The last branch of Admiralty jurisdiction I shall mention is the enforcing the judgments of foreign courts;" and proceeds to cite the opinion of Sir Leoline Jenkins, which I have before referred to. I find in the American work by Mr. Dunlop, entitled "Admiralty Practice," p. 68, A.D. 1850: "A Court of Admiralty of one country can carry into effect the determination of a Court of Admiralty in another, as well as its own judgments." In Parsons' Maritime Law, vol. 2, p. 541, also the work of an American writer of eminence, it is laid down that Admiralty Courts in different countries "sometimes enforce each other's decrees, or complete in one country what is done in another."

A consideration of these authorities, and of the principles upon which they rest, leads me to the conclusion that it is the duty of one Admiralty Court—a duty arising from international comity—to enforce the decree of another upon a subject over which the latter had jurisdiction.

I do not think it necessary to enter into a consideration of all the cases decided by the common law courts as to the effect of foreign judgments in this country. The general principle of recognising and giving effect to such judgments is now admitted by these courts. I do not indeed understand it to be denied by Mr. Butt that the Admiralty Court has power to execute the sentence of a foreign Admiralty Court. His objection is as to the mode by which it is sought to enforce it. He contends that a proceeding in rem can only be instituted where there is a maritime lien, and that the foreign judgment does not confer such a lien. I am of opinion that it is the duty of this court to act as auxiliary to the Portuguese Admiralty Court, and to complete the execution of justice which, owing to the departure of the ship, was necessarily left unfinished by that court; in other words, it is my duty to place this English court in the position of the Portuguese court after its sentence had been given against the defendants.

With respect to the motion now before me, I must take the facts from the indorsement on the writ of summons and the affidavit in support of it. From these I gather that there was substantially a judgment in rem in the Portuguese court. There is no doubt that a collision, such as there was in this case, creates a maritime lien. In support of this it is unnecessary to cite authorities. With regard to the further proposition that a proceeding for the enforcement of a maritime lien is a proceeding in rem, the remarks of Lord Chelmsford in Castrique v. Imrie (L. Rep. 4 E. & Ir. App. 447; 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 38) appear applicable: "This order," he says, "for the sale of the ship, whatever may be thought of the original proceeding, appears to be a judgment in rem. Without, however, looking to this ultimate order, I think that the original proceeding being for the purpose of enforcing a maritime lien, which by the law of all foreign codes founded on the civil law exists for money advanced for repairs and necessaries on a voyage, was a proceeding in rem." This court is now called upon to be aidant to the enforcement of a judgment in rem given by the Portuguese court.

With respect to the objection that no direct precedents have been cited in support of the course taken by the plaintiffs, it must be observed that, until a recent period, there were no reports of the courts exercising jurisdiction in accordance with the civil law, that is, of the Ecclesiastical and Admiralty Courts; moreover it is to be remembered that, speaking generally, any court which exercises a jurisdiction in rem has the res, or some substitute for it in the shape of a security, within its reach, and the wrongdoer is seldom able to evade compliance with the order of the court. This court, on failure of the owners to pay for the damage adjudged to be done by their ship, would arrest that ship, and enforce the judgment against the res by sale. The occasion for the exercise of such a power of arrest seldom arises, though in a recent case, that of The Troubadour, in 1878 (not reported), the court directed the issue of a warrant after judgment for the purpose of enforcing payment of the award of salvage, and there have been several instances in which a ship has been arrested or re-arrested in consequence of the bail becoming insolvent. In fact, what the common law courts do indirectly by implying a contract the Admiralty Court does directly and without any such implication on the grounds of international comity. It is clearly for the interests of justice that this court should exercise the jurisdiction as prayed, and having its hand upon the res should not take it off until the sentence be executed. Otherwise the wrongdoer might remove his ship out of this jurisdiction, and by keeping out of Portuguese waters defeat the just rights of the party who has suffered the wrong. It is to be borne in mind that this ship, the City of Mecca, is liable for the damage done by her to the plaintiff's property in a sense and in a manner that no other ship of the same owner would be liable.

Upon the whole I do not see why if the Admiralty Court might ever have enforced a foreign judgment—and the authorities are ample on this point—it may not enforce that judgment against the ship, and give that remedy in rem which is one of the especial advantages incident to the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty. I reject this motion without costs.

COURT OF APPEAL.

SITTINGS AT WESTMINSTER.

Reported by W. Appleton, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Tuesday, June 24, 1879.

(Before Bramwell, Brett, and Cotton, L.JJ.)

Wilkinson v. Alston.

Sale of ship—Introduction of purchaser—Commission—Introduction to agent of purchaser.

Defendant agreed that if plaintiff should be the means of introducing a person who should become purchaser of a ship of defendant's he should receive a commission on the purchase money.

In Feb. 1876 plaintiff introduced one Turpin, who had been recommended by one White, to buy, and it was agreed between plaintiff and defendant that, if a sale was effected with Turpin, White should share plaintiff's commission. No sale was effected.

In March White mentioned the ship to one Wise. Plaintiff informed defendant, and proposed he should see Wise, but no steps were taken, and Wise did not entertain White's proposal. Subsequently, on the 13*th March, defendant wrote to plaintiff that it was no use doing any more until the ship returned home. Plaintiff thereupon took no further steps. In May Wise wrote, as broker, direct to defendant and introduced a principal, who became purchaser. Plaintiff thereupon claimed his commission.*

The jury having found (1) that plaintiff was authorised to find a purchaser; (2) that Wise was induced to enter upon the negotiations by information received from White:

Held on appeal (reversing the decision of Lush, J.), that Wise, being the agent of the purchaser, and having acted upon information received from White, plaintiff was entitled to receive his commission, and that even if the letter of 13*th March amounted to a revocation of plaintiff's authority it was then too late.*

This was an action for commission on the sale of a ship, tried before Lush, J. and a jury at the Guildhall during the Trinity Sittings 1878.

The facts of the case and the arguments are sufficiently stated in the judgment of the learned judge in the court below, which was delivered, after consideration, on 30th Nov., and was as follows:

Lush, J.—This action is in its circumstances peculiar. It was set down for trial in February last before the Lord Chief Justice, when the jury were unable to agree upon the questions submitted to them. It was again tried before me at Guildhall in June last, when the jury answered the two questions which I put to them, and I then reserved for further consideration the question what judgment ought to be given upon these findings. The case was argued on the 5th day of this month, and I am now to deliver my judgment upon the whole case. Most of the material facts appear upon the correspondence. The action is brought for commission upon the sale of the defendant's interest in a vessel called the Madras, that interest being 37-64ths. The defendant was the owner or part owner of several vessels, and amongst them the Stamford and the Madras. The plaintiff was a shipbroker. He was on terms of intimacy with the defendant, and for a portion of the time, when the transaction in question took place, namely, from March to June 1876, both parties occupied the same office. The plaintiff having become aware in August 1875 of the defendant's intention to retire from business, began to look out for purchasers, with a view of earning a commission, and the defendant, though he did not put the ships in his hands or give him any authority to sell, agreed to pay a stipulated commission if he should be the means of introducing a person who should actually become the purchaser. The Stamford was sold by his instrumentality, and the stipulated commission was paid him. The plaintiff named several persons as likely to become purchasers of the Madras, but none of them came to terms. The following letters, amongst others, passed between him and the defendant:—"24th Feb. 1876, plaintiff to defendant.—Mr. James Turpin, of North Shields, has gone over to Stockton to see Mr. Blair with reference to the engine of the Madras, and as he knows the price you want it rather looks as though he meant business. He is a friend of Mr. White, who has recommended him strongly to buy. In case business should result, please to reserve the nominal 2½ per cent. for me and White." "25th Feb., defendant to plaintiff.—There is no chance of business herein if White is to finger one cent of it. I would keep the boat for years before I would allow one farthing to go into his pocket out of the sale of her. If you can bring Turpin to business I will arrange for a commission for you out of it, 1 per cent. say." "2nd March, plaintiff to defendant. — I fear Master White won't be licked off so easily. If I get 1 per cent. and he ditto, I don't think either of us will take any harm, You need not care who you do your business through so long as you get your price. Practical money-making people like you should not allow theoretical trifles to stand in your way." "4th March, 1876, defendant to plaintiff.—I agree with you, and think if you can bring this to business I will be able to swallow my annoyance with White, and pay the 2 per cent." The negotiation with Turpin also went off; no other person was afterwards mentioned by the plaintiff. On the 9th March, a Mr. Wise, jun., a member of the firm of Wise and Son, shipowners, of Hartlepool, called upon White in reference to another vessel called the Northumberland, belonging to another owner, which Wise, jun., contemplated buying in conjunction with one Learoyd, when White mentioned to Wise that if that purchase went off he had another vessel, the Madras, which he could equally recommend. Wise took no notice of this conversation, and on the 10th March, White, in a letter to the firm relating to the Northumberland, referred to his mention of the Madras to the son, and inclosed particulars of her, advising, "Please keep this matter private. On the 11th, Wise and Son answered the letter as far as it treated of the Northumberland, but took no notice of the Madras. On the same day the plaintiff wrote to defendant: "Young Wise was up here on business with White; the latter named the Madras to him. Wise thought 25,000*l.*, but White told him that there was not a shadow of a chance under 28,000*l.*, and that it was useless approaching you at less. He promised to crack the matter over with his father when he returned. They have 5000*l.* or 6000*l.* cash ready for any investment they may go into. Adams, of Adams and Co., Aberdeen, entertain the Madras." "If you are at Aberdeen or West Hartlepool, you know whether it would be advisable to see them. If you do, keep us a commission. In case of need I will get White to let you down easy, as I want to see business result, and would not myself be hard." It does not appear that Wise ever entertained the proposal to purchase the Madras, nor did the defendant go to Aberdeen or Hartlepool, or have any communication on the subject with either Wise or Adams. But on the 13th March he wrote to the plaintiff as follows: "Madras.—There is no use doing anything herein until the return home. No one will buy a ship at sea unless they know her thoroughly, such as Portens and Senior." Portens and Senior were the persons who had bought the Stamford, and whom the plaintiff had named as probable buyers of the Madras, but whose treaty for that vessel had gone off. From the date of the last-mentioned letter no correspondence took place between the plaintiff and the defendant respecting the Madras until after the sale of the vessel, as hereinafter mentioned, and although the parties then occupied the same office, neither of them mentioned the subject of the Madras to the other, nor did the plaintiff after that letter take any further steps to find a purchaser. On the 18th March White wrote to Wise and Son that, as they had missed the Northumberland, he should be glad to hear whether they entertained the purchase of the Madras, &c., and on the 22nd April he wrote again: "The Madras, the management portion of which I proposed to you for sale, left Bombay some days since for the continent, and may be expected home about the middle of next month. I shall be glad to hear whether you are disposed to arrange any purchase subject to confirmation on inspection as already advised you. The management is exceptional, and the terms of payment very easy." No notice was taken of these letters by Wise and Son, nor was either the defendant or the plaintiff aware that White was in correspondence with them, or was taking any steps to sell the Madras. On the 25th April Wise, junior, wrote to the defendant: "I can introduce a buyer for 33-64ths Madras (s.s.). What will you accept?" 26th April; defendant to Wise: "I am favoured with your memorandum of to-day, and in reply my lowest price for 37-64ths of the Madras (my present interest) is at the rate of 28,000*l.* for the vessel, equal to 16,187*l.*½10*s.* for 37-64ths, payment on the basis of half cash and half at six months. The credit portion I would not object to extend over a longer period to an approved buyer. I would require security on the shares sold for any portion of the price on credit. Interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum would be charged on any credit beyond six months. Mr. Blair will tell you the condition of the vessel, and what she got in the Tyne in January last. I may mention for your guidance that I will not take one farthing less than the price named, so you need not bother with her if you cannot offer the price, as I refused in December last the same price, less 2½ per cent., and I can show you the offer if you like. Madras is at present on the way from Bombay to Marseilles, and I expect her in this country (all being well) in June. She is not yet chartered for Marseilles, and I might arrange to give delivery there, otherwise she would be sold on her arrival in this country, subject to her bottom and engines being found sound and in good order to the approval of Mr. Blair." This was accompanied with another letter marked "private," dated the same day, in which the defendant said: "I hand you offer of my interest in Madras, so that you may have a chance of working it. I have not put one farthing in to take off again, so you must be good enough to understand this. I cannot afford any commission off the figure named, so to give you some encouragement to work it I will, in the event of a sale, pay you the odd money as commission, say, 187*l.* 10*s.* With kind regards to Mr. Wise, sen., and his home circle, I am," &c." "7th May, Wise, jun., to defendant: I have your esteemed favour re Madras, and hope to give you a definite answer in a day or two." "30th May; Wise, jun., to defendant: You last wrote me on the 8th asking a bid against 16,000*l.* for 37-64ths of Madras, and now with terms I can get 15,000*l.*, or at the rate of 26,000*l.*, having made great exertions to get up this figure. There is 5000*l.* ready; the remainder will be wanted to stay on for two years at five per cent. He is a younger son of a wealthy parent, and it would be right. I have said nothing about half six months or this 200*l.* you would send me as commission. I have instructions from him to go to another boat where similar terms are offered failing your acceptance, so beg your decision by 'wire.'" "1st of June; defendant to Wise, jun.: I was going from home the day when I sent my telegram to you, and on my return to-day I find yours in reply waiting me. I am very reluctant to concede the matter as to modification of cash payment, but if your client is such a good man I will accept 5000*l.* cash, and remainder spread over two years, bearing interest at 5 per cent. per annum. The instalments would be quarterly, so that there must be eight equal payments of the credit portion. Of course I would require to be secured, and I propose that I be registered owner of the shares and transfer them pro rata as the instalments are paid, granting a mutual trust deed, to be left in the hands, say, of E. Turnbull, embodying the conditions of sale, &c. This seems to me a suitable arrangement, and I have found it answer well in the case of the Stamford, on which vessel I had 52-64ths and sold them last January on similar condition. Madras is now on her way from Sulina to Antwerp. 37-64ths at 2760*l.* will be 15,609*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* If you carry this through I will allow 159*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* commission, not more. This will leave me only 15,450*l*, which will mean a heavy loss to me." "10th June; Wise, jun., to defendant: A very slight concession on your part will bring business. It is, first, this—that buyer does not wish to be bound to particular dates for payment, but to pay over the two years as may be convenient. You would be well enough off with the security and interest. If you will let me know that you agree to this, and that my commission is to be 200*l.*, I will disclose the principal, and business will be almost certain." Telegram, 13th June. Wise to defendant. "Learoyd, Huddersfield, give your price. Five down; remainder over two years; interest five. Wise acceptance. Can build, less money." Telegram, same day; defendant to Wise, jun., "I confirm sale of 37-64ths Madras, per my offer. Write you fully." And on the same day the defendant wrote, after referring to the telegram: "Your letter of the 10th came duly to hand, but it not being accepted I did not reply to it. But as your client and yourself have come to my terms the case is altered. As I understand the bargain, the price of 37-64ths at 27,000*l.* for the steamer Madras is 15,609*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.*, less your commission, 159*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.*, 15,450*l.*, payable as follows: 5000*l.* down, and balance in equal instalments of 3, 6, 9, 12, 15, 18, 21, and 24 months, bearing interest at 5 per cent. per annum, 37-64ths to be registered in my name as at present; transferred as the credit portion is paid off pro rata. A Lloyd's policy in my name for amount of purchase price to be taken out, and a protecting ditto. A trust deed to be executed and deposited in the hands of a trustworthy party, to our mutual satisfaction, setting forth the nature and condition of the sale. Mr. Learoyd's references to be satisfactory to me. Delivery in Tyne or Cardiff, or at Antwerp on completion of present voyage." 15th June: Wise to defendant: "The offer was made to you on the terms I wrote you, and I have authority to close them, but on no other, and Mr. Learoyd has gone away. Of course, it is subject to his stability being satisfactory, but if you have inquired you will find it right. He will not bind himself to dates, but will pay over two years as convenient, and I know if he wants 5000*l.* or 6000*l.* he can get it if he should not have it. As it is a fancy price, I cannot get any other terms. You can either transfer the shares paid for, or take a mortgage of the whole. The insurance would be date policies, and would be in your name. I am now in a position to lay before him a boat built in 1872, carries 2300 tons, 150 horse power, 21,500*l.*, so that your prompt wire will be required to make business." "We have two boats of the same dimensions, and are about contracting for another, and I think myself 27,000*l.* is a price you will not get offered again from anyone who knows enough." On the 16th June Wise, jun., writes that he would be in London, at Wood's Hotel, on a Saturday, wishing defendant to meet him there. The defendant did so, and terms were ultimately agreed, and the defendant's shares in the Madras sold to Learoyd. It appeared that White had received information from Hull that Wise was coming to town, and he also called upon him and pressed the purchase of the Madras. Wise led him to believe that he had declined the purchase, and was looking out for another vessel. It also appeared that after the treaty for the Northumberland had gone off, Wise left the firm of Wise and Son to carry on business on his own behalf as a shipbroker, and opened negotiations with Learoyd for a partnership. Learoyd was the person whom he referred to as the "buyer." The arrangement between them was that Learoyd was to bring in 5000*l.* as his share of the partnership capital, and that this was to be invested in the purchase of shares in a vessel, an ordinary means of securing a source of income to a firm of shipbrokers. I have recited the foregoing correspondence between Wise and the defendant at length, because of the imputation which was made and pressed on the jury at the trial that the defendant colluded with Wise to bring about a sale behind the back of the plaintiff, and to disguise it as a sale to a third party, in order to cheat the plaintiff of his commission. I am unable to discover any evidence whatever to support this suggestion; and, although the imputation was freely made, Mr. Day did not ask or suggest that this point should be put to the jury. It appears to me that the defendant acted in the matter with perfect good faith. But to proceed. On the 2nd Aug. the plaintiff wrote to defendant: "As I find the sale of the Madras has been completed, I beg herewith to inclose you account for commission, and will thank you for a cheque." The claim inclosed was 390*l.* 4*s.* 8*d.*, being commission at 2½ per cent. on 15,609*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* The following correspondence then passed:—3rd Aug., defendant to plaintiff, inquiring his grounds for making such a claim, as he had nothing to do with the sale so far as the defendant was concerned. 5th Aug., plaintiff to defendant. In the correspondence between Wise, jun., and White, the former said that if a boat had been bought it would be for the account of himself and Mr. Percy Learoyd, of Huddersfield, and that they were prepared to pay 5000*l.* or 6000*l.* cash, and the value to be spread over a couple of years at 5 per cent. or 6 per cent. interest. "Although Mr. Learoyd is the registered owner, it is well known and can be proved that Mr. Wise, jun., is the manager, and that he has done certain acts and deeds beyond the usual province of a ship's husband. With these few words, and referring you to my letter of 11th March, and your reply on the 13th, I return you the account, and beg for cheque in course." These being the grounds of the claim the defendant denied his liability, but as proceedings were threatened he required from Wise a guarantee, and the latter gave an undertaking that he had negotiated the sale and made the introduction between buyer and seller without the assistance of any third party, and that his undertaking to substantiate that was the basis of receiving payment of the 200*l.* commission. I declined at the end of the plaintiff's case to direct a nonsuit, thinking it safer to hear all the evidence on both sides. Mr. Day proposed two questions to the jury: 1. Was Wilkinson authorised to find a buyer? and 2. Was a buyer found through Wilkinson? The latter question involving, according to the contention of the defendant's counsel, and as I thought, matter of law as well as of fact, I put the question in the following forms: 1. Was the plaintiff employed by the defendant to find a purchaser for the Madras? 2. Was Wise induced to enter upon the negotiations by any information given him by White, or did he act upon his own knowledge previously or subsequently acquired from other sources? The latter question had reference to the evidence which Wise and other witnesses had given, but the finding of the jury makes it unnecessary to go into that evidence. The jury found, in answer to the first question, that the plaintiff was fully authorised to find a buyer for the defendant's interest in the Madras, if not employed according to my definition of that word. And in answer to the second question, that Wise was induced to enter upon the negotiation for the purchase of the Madras by the information he received from White. It occurred to me at the time with reference to the letter of the 13th March that there might be a distinction between the case of an agent who had been employed to look out for a buyer, and one who had merely at his own request obtained authority to do so. For the purpose of this case I do not think it needful to consider whether there is any such distinction or not. It must, of course, be taken upon the finding of the jury that Wise acted upon the information White gave him, what the vessel was, and that it was for sale. And the question is, assuming that to be so, did Wilkinson procure the buyer? Now it is clear that the buyer was Learoyd, and not Wise. The articles of partnership fully confirm what Wise stated that Learoyd's contribution to the partnership capital was 5000*l.*, which he was to provide in cash. How the partners invested the money was a matter which concerned themselves only. They did agree to invest it in the Madras, and to the extent of 5000*l.* the shares in the vessel became by Learoyd's act the property of the firm. But all beyond that was and remains the separate property of Learoyd. The instalments which he subsequently paid were paid with his money. Did Wilkinson then procure Learoyd to become the purchaser? He never had any communication with Learoyd, and never heard his name until after the purchase. Nor did White introduce Learoyd. He knew nothing of such a person, until after he wrote the letter of the 10th March. He mentioned the vessel to Wise as to a purchaser, not as to an agent, to look out for a purchaser for him, and Wise never thought of acting in any such capacity; and as far as appears, and as I believe, Wise at the time had no thought of treating for the purchase of the Madras, either as buyer or broker. Moreover, White was no agent of the defendant. The latter at first expressly refused to sanction White's sharing the commission, which he had agreed to pay Wilkinson, and he never went beyond merely withdrawing that prohibition. But White's authority, whatever it was, was derived solely from Wilkinson, and if ever it was within his competence to propose the vessel as one which he had, at all events that authority ceased when Wilkinson's authority ceased, and the letter of the 13th March was, I think, a revocation of that authority, or suspension of it till the vessel should arrive home. Such was the view taken of that letter by both parties, for Wilkinson made no endeavour afterwards to dispose of the vessel. The case, therefore, stands thus: White mentions the vessel to Wise with the view of his buying it, and let it be assumed that he does so as Wilkinson's agent. Wise declined to buy, Wilkinson's authority to look out for another purchase is revoked, and the whole transaction as between Wilkinson and the defendant is at an end. Afterwards Wise, having to find a vessel as broker for Learoyd, makes use in that capacity of the information he had before received from White, and treats with the defendant as an independent broker, stipulating for commission for himself. The defendant, in perfect good faith, treats with Wise as such broker acting on his own behalf, and undoubtedly he became liable to him for commission. It cannot be said, I think, under these circumstances, that Wilkinson by his agent procured Learoyd to become the buyer. The chain of continuity was broken. Even supposing White's act was Wilkinson's act, when he proposed the vessel to Wise, Wise's act in proposing it afterwards to Learoyd was not Wilkinson's act. It was his own act. In no sense was he agent to Wilkinson. Wilkinson's information to Wise must be taken to have been only the causa causans, and that is not enough. If a year had elapsed, and Wise having then become broker, and calling to mind the information he had received a twelvemonth before that this ship was for sale, had written to the defendant to inquire if it was still for sale, and upon hearing that it was negotiated as broker or purchaser for a customer, could it then be said that Wilkinson would be entitled to commission? Or supposing he had not undertaken brokerage business, but had casually mentioned to a broker who was looking out for a ship for his customer that this one was for sale a twelvemonth before, and this had led up to a bargain between the broker and the defendant, could Wilkinson be heard to say that he had found that purchaser? I apprehend not; and if not, I do not know where else the line is to be drawn than at the point where the action of the broker ceases and the buyer comes in under another who stands in no relation of privity to that broker. The conclusion that I come to is, that Learoyd was not in fact introduced either by Wilkinson or by any agent of his, and I am therefore of opinion that, notwithstanding the finding of the jury, judgment must be entered for the defendant, which will of course be with costs.

From this judgment plaintiff now appealed.

Day, Q.C. and A. L. Smith for plaintiff.

Willis, Q.C., Webster, Q.C., and Hindmarsh for defendant.

The Court gave the following judgments, reversing the decision of Lush, J.

Bramwell, L.J.—With the greatest respect for the opinion of my brother Lush, I do not think this judgment can be sustained.

We have two distinct facts: first, that there was an agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant that if the plaintiff should find a buyer for the ship the defendant would pay him a certain commission, that is to say, if the plaintiff should introduce the ship to the notice of some person, or should introduce some person to the defendant, and as the result of such introduction such person should become the purchaser of the ship, that then the defendant would pay to the plaintiff the commission agreed on. This I take to be the bargain as found by the jury in the finding that Wilkinson was authorised to find a buyer. In the next place we have it found that either the plaintiff, or White acting for him, did find a purchaser, who, in consequence of their introduction, did purchase the ship either for himself or for some one else. That this purchaser Wise had some interest in the purchase I do not for a moment doubt, but I will for the present assume that he was the agent of Learoyd to purchase, and that he was introduced to make this purchase by information which came to him from the plaintiff. Then it is said that at the time that this introduction was effected the plaintiff's authority to find a purchaser for the ship had ceased, having been revoked by the letter written by the defendant to him on the 13th March to the effect, "There is no use doing anything herein until the return home. No one will buy a ship at sea," &c. I do not consider this a revocation of authority, or anything at all like it. It simply means "it is no use doing anything in the matter at present." And moreover, even had this letter been, as contended, a revocation of the authority, it would have been too late, for the authority had been acted upon, and the introduction had already taken place before the date of that letter. It was said in the judgment of my brother Lush, and was also put forward by Mr. Willis, with his usual ability, that the claim of continuity was broken; that although the defendant employed the plaintiff, and the plaintiff employed White, who introduced the ship to Wise, that there it stopped, and that even supposing White's act was the plaintiff's act when he proposed the ship to Wise, Wise's act in proposing it to Learoyd was not the plaintiff's act but his own act. It may have been that Wise was intending to act on his own account, and intended if he could, to win the commission on the sale, and to supplant Wilkinson. But any acts done between the defendant and Wise are immaterial as between the plaintiff and the defendant, and cannot disentitle the plaintiff to his commission if he was already entitled, as I say he was. It is my opinion that Wise was purchasing on his own account, and not as agent for Learoyd, but as there is no finding of the jury to this effect, I do not found my judgment upon this assumption; the result is the same if he was acting only as agent for the purchaser. There is no fresh departure; the case stands exactly as if the communication had been made direct to Learoyd, and the purchase had been made by him. I wish now to refer to the judgment of my brother Lush, not for the purposes, by any means of criticising, but in order to show in what manner I am led to come to a different conclusion. After stating the facts he says: "The case therefore stands thus: White mentions the vessel to Wise with the view of his buying it, and let it be assumed that he does so as Wilkinson's agent." So far we are all agreed. "Wise declined to buy. Wilkinson's authority to look out for another purchaser is revoked, and the whole transaction between Wilkinson and the defendant is at an end." Here I am unable to agree with him. He then proceeds: "Afterwards Wise, having to find a vessel, as broker for Learoyd, makes use, in that capacity, of the information he had before received from White and treats with the defendant as an independent broker stipulating for commission for himself." Now, Wise was not in this position after the 13th March any more than he was before. He was just as much then broker for Learoyd as before. If he did treat with the defendant as an independent broker and stipulated for commission for himself, he was none the less already agent for Learoyd, and nothing else. The judgment proceeds: "The defendant, in perfect good faith, treats with Wise as such broker acting on his own behalf, and undoubtedly he became liable to him for commission." It may well be that the defendant thought that Wise was an independent broker and did act bonâ fide, but that does not affect the position of Wilkinson. "It cannot be said, I think under these circumstances, that Wilkinson, by his agent, procured Learoyd to become the buyer. The chain of continuity was broken. Even supposing White's act was Wilkinson's act when he proposed the vessel to Wise. Wise's act in proposing it afterwards to Learoyd was not Wilkinson's act, but was his own act." No doubt it was his own act, but only as agent of the buyer, and the subsequent purchase by Learoyd was as much the consequence of what White had done as if the introduction had been made to Learoyd in person, and he had himself come and bought in consequence. The judgment concludes: "The conclusion that I come to is that Learoyd was not in fact introduced either by Wilkinson or by any agent of his, and I am therefore of opinion that notwithstanding the finding of the jury judgment must be entered for the defendant." Now it seems to me, with great respect that the fallacy or mistake of the judgment is here in saying that Learoyd and Wise are not identified as the persons who were introduced by Wilkinson or his agent. Wise being Learoyd's agent was introduced by Wilkinson and White, and the introduction of Learoyd's agent was the introduction of Learoyd. It is hard to lay down any definite rule for these commission cases, but here we have the simple state of facts that Wilkinson was employed by the defendant upon the terms that if he introduced a purchaser and the sale was thereby effected he should receive a commission on the purchase money. He did introduce a purchaser, a sale was thereby effected, and therefore he is entitled to receive his commission.

Brett, L.J.—I am also of opinion that this appeal must be allowed.

The plaintiff was employed by the defendant to find a buyer for the defendant's vessel upon the terms that if he did so he should receive a certain commission. The plaintiff fulfilled the conditions to entitle him to the commission if he did introduce the ship to a person who became the purchaser, although all the subsequent negotiations were carried on between that person and the defendant without any further act or intervention on the part of the plaintiff. Now the plaintiff was not bound to effect this introduction or to give the necessary information by word of mouth; he was entitled to employ White, and if White found a purchaser it would be the same as if the plaintiff had done so himself. We are to take it as a fact that White did propose the ship to Wise, and that Wise acted upon the information he received from White. It is beyond a doubt that Wise was at least the agent of Learoyd, if no more, and therefore the case is the same as it would be if the information had been given to Learoyd. It is true that all the subsequent negotiations were carried on between Wise and the defendant alone, but that does not affect the plaintiff, for the plaintiff had fulfilled his part of the contract when the introduction was effected and if this resulted in a sale he had earned his commission. The learned judge in the court below held that the continuity was broken because Wise was not the agent of Wilkinson or of White to find the actual purchaser, who was Learoyd. But he, Wise, was the agent of Learoyd, and therefore information given to him was given to Learoyd. As all these questions of commission are difficult, and must be decided on the facts of each case as they arise, I give no opinion on any facts which do not here arise, and therefore I will say nothing as to what would be the result if Wise had not been agent of Learoyd. With regard to the contention that the authority of Wilkinson was revoked by the letter of the 13th March, I do not think that that letter can be said to have had that effect, but even if it had it would have been too late, for the person who became the buyer had been already introduced.

Cotton, L.J.—I also am of the same opinion, and am unable to agree with the conclusion of Lush, J.

The facts of the case on the findings are, first, that the plaintiff was duly authorised to find a buyer, and upon the terms that if he succeeded in doing so he should receive a commission on the purchase money. Upon this it was argued by the defendant that, according to the true meaning of the contract with Wilkinson, he could not be considered entitled to his commission unless he gave the name of the person who should become purchaser; but this argument cannot be maintained, for the real meaning of the contract is that Wilkinson should receive his commission if by his means the ship was introduced to a person who should afterwards become the buyer. The second fact is that Wise was induced to enter upon negotiation for the purchase of the ship by the information he received from White. Now it is conceded that White was the agent of Wilkinson, and that any act done in the matter by White was, as between Wilkinson and the defendant, the act of Wilkinson. Further, it may be stated as a rule of law that if a person in the position of Wilkinson under such a contract introduces the ship to the agent of the buyer, that is equivalent to an introduction direct to the buyer himself, because as between the agent of the buyer and the seller the agent is the buyer, and any communication made by the agent of the vendor to him is a communication made to the buyer for the purposes of the commission. The communication was made at a time when Wise was the agent of Learoyd. Wise was not the agent of Wilkinson, and Wilkinson is entitled to recover his commission, not because Wise in making the communication to Learoyd was acting as the servant or agent of Wilkinson, but because the communication made to Wise was a communication made by Wilkinson. But then it is said that when this communication was made to Wise the plaintiff was no longer in the position of agent to the defendant, but that his authority had been revoked by the letter of March 13. But even if this letter could be treated as a revocation of the authority, which in my opinion it cannot be, yet it could not defeat the plaintiff's right to commission, because at that date the plaintiff had done all that he had to do to introduce a buyer. There was at that time a contract that if what the plaintiff did resulted in a sale he would be entitled to his commission. That letter could not be treated as equivalent to a revocation of the authority, but was only an expression of opinion that nothing could then be done in the matter. As the word fraud has been mentioned in the course of the argument before us, I wish to add that I am not influenced by any feeling that the defendant was guilty of any fraud. The only question is on the contract, and on the contract alone have I decided.

Appeal allowed with costs. Judgment entered for plaintiff for amount claimed.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Reported by A. H. Poyser, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Saturday, June 28, 1879.

(Before Cockburn, C.J. and Lush, J.)

The Secretary of the Board of Trade (app.) v. Sundholm (resp.).

Ship and shipping—"Hurt or injury" to seaman—Illness of seaman owing to bad provisions—"Service of the ship"—Liability of master or owner—Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104) ss. 228 and 236.

A seaman who, from the effects of bad food supplied on board ship, becomes seriously ill and is landed at a port abroad, and is there tended in hospital, the expenses for such attendance and for his passage home being paid by the Board of Trade, or on their behalf, has received an injury in the service of the ship, within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, sect. 228, sub-sect. 1, and the Board of Trade are not entitled, on receiving his wages to deduct therefrom such expenses.

The respondent was a seaman on board the British ship Crown Prince, and was shipped in London in 1875. In Nov. 1876, while the Crown Prince was at sea, the respondent was taken ill, owing to the bad provisions which were supplied to the crew. The Crown Prince put into Port Stanley in Jan. 1877, and all the crew being sick were taken to the hospital there. The respondent remained there wholly incapacitated until Aug. 1877, when he was sent to England as a distressed seaman. The appellant declined to pay the expenses incurred by the respondent at Port Stanley, and for his passage home, and deducted them from a sum of 81*l.* 12*s.* 6*d. due to the respondent as wages. Upon a summons taken out by the respondent to recover that amount, the appellant, as Secretary to the Board of Trade, was convicted and fined one penny, and ordered to pay forthwith to the respondent the sum of* 81*l.* 12*s.* 6*d. Against this conviction the present appeal was brought.*

Held, that the conviction was good, as the words "hurt or injury in the service of the ship," in the 228*th section of the Merchant Shipping Act* 1854, were wide enough to apply not only to any hurt sustained by a casualty, but to any illness brought on a seaman while doing his duty in the service of the ship.

THIS was a case stated by a police magistrate, under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

The following are the material parts :—

1. The summons was issued against the appellant under sect. 236 of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, for that the appellant having received 81*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.*, the moneys of the respondent, a British seaman, did not return the same, nor pay the value thereof, when required so to do by the respondent after deducting what was legally due from the respondent for board or lodging, or otherwise.

2—3. In Jan. 1875 the Crown Prince, a British ship, left London for Melbourne and other ports, with a crew of fifteen men, including the respondent, who was shipped in the United Kingdom.

4. The respondent signed the ship's articles, by which he was to receive from the owners of the Crown Prince 5*l.* per month as wages, and to be supplied by them with provisions during the voyage.

5. In Nov. 1876, whilst the Crown Prince was at sea, the respondent and thirteen others of the crew were taken ill, first with vomiting and then with partial paralysis. The provisions supplied to the crew had been bad for several months before that time—the pork was green and black, and the sugar tasted of kerosine. The fourteen (including the respondent) who were taken ill with the same symptoms had all eaten of the pork, the one seaman who did not eat of the pork was not taken ill in the same way.

6. On the Crown Prince putting into Port Stanley in the Falkland Islands in Jan. 1877, all the crew being sick were taken to hospital, six died from the illness that attacked them on board, and the respondent being seriously ill from the same cause was left by the master at Port Stanley, and remained in the hospital there wholly incapacitated until Aug. 1877, when he was sent to England as a distressed seaman.

7. When the respondent left the Crown Prince in 1877, there was due to him for wages the sum of 81*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* The amount was paid over to the appellant as Secretary to the Board of Trade by the owners, as the ascertained wages due and payable to the respondent at the time when he was left on shore, subject to such expenses incurred on his behalf as the respondent was legally liable to pay.

8. The expenses, incurred in respect of the subsistence and passage home of the respondent from the date of his being left at Port Stanley until he was brought to a port in the United Kingdom, have been paid by the appellant, and amount to 10*l.*

9. At the hearing, the appellant contended that he was not liable in law to pay the amount claimed in the summons, as the respondent was bound to pay and allow the said expenses on account with the Board of Trade, inasmuch as they were not expenses incurred from respondent having received a hurt or injury whilst in the service of the Crown Prince for which the owners were liable under sect. 228 of the Merchant Shipping Act.

10. I found as facts, that the sickness of the respondent arose directly and immediately from the bad provisions supplied to him while at sea by the owners of the Crown Prince, and that such sickness was a lasting injury to his health. I considered that the respondent, while serving at sea on board the Crown Prince under his agreement, was necessarily bound to maintain himself for the purposes of such service upon the provisions which the owners supplied to them. I held, therefore, that the injury received by respondent was an injury received by him in the service of the ship within the meaning of the 228th section, sub-sect. 1 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and I held that, under the 210th section of that Act, the appellant was bound to deal with the 81*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* as wages to which the respondent was entitled without any deduction.

I convicted the appellant under the 236th section of the Act, and I adjudged the appellant to pay the penalty of one penny, and ordered him to pay forthwith the said sum 81*l.* 12*s.* 1*d.* to the respondent.

The question for the opinion of the court is, whether the sickness of the respondent being such and arising as hereinbefore mentioned, is a hurt or injury received by him in the service of the Crown Prince, within the meaning of 228th section, sub-sect. 1 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854.

The conviction to be affirmed or quashed in accordance with such opinion.

By 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, sect. 228, sub-sect. 1 :

If the master, or any seaman or apprentice, receives any hurt or injury in the service of the ship to which he belongs, the expense of providing the necessary surgical and medical advice with attendance and medicines, and of his subsistence until he is cured or dies, or is brought back to some port in the United Kingdom, if shipped in the United Kingdom . . . . and of his conveyance to such port . . . . shall be defrayed by the owner of such ship without any deduction on that account from the wages of such master, seaman or apprentice.

Sub-sect. 2 :

If the master, or any seaman or apprentice, is, on account of any illness, temporarily removed from his ship for the purpose of preventing infection, or otherwise for the convenience of the ship, and subsequently returns to his duty, the expense . . . . shall be defrayed in like manner.

Ravenhill (Mackenzie with him) for the appellant.—The facts here are agreed upon, but what the appellant contends is that this case, being one of illness, should be dealt with under the second sub-section of sect. 228 of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, and not under the first sub-section. The hurt or injury in that clause must be some hurt or injury in the ordinary sense of the words incurred, whilst doing some duty in connection with the service of the ship—illness is dealt with differently in the second sub-section; in the 229th section we find, "if any such expense in respect of the illness, injury, or hurt are to be borne, &c.," showing that illness is regarded as one thing, injury or hurt as an entirely different thing. [LUSH, J.—We must assume that the word injury and the word hurt are used with a different meaning.] The expression may be tautological, but it is distinguished from illness. I submit the words refer to any accident—such as the fall of a piece of timber upon a man while engaged in his work. [LUSH, J.—The man might fall from the mast. That would clearly come within the words—moreover, a "hurt" may cause illness. It appears to me that the 4th sub-section applies to the case where a man becomes ill from natural causes; but if a sailor is taken ill, and it is necessary to remove him for the convenience of the ship, then the 2nd sub-section applies; but neither case contemplates a sailor having to pay the expenses of the attendance of a medical man to cure him from having taken poisoned food which they have given him on board.] The injuries must have been received in the course of the discharge of his duty by the seaman, that would scarcely apply to eating. This appeal was brought in consequence of the construction I contend for having been put upon the Act by the law officers of the Crown. (a)

The respondent was not called upon.

COCKBURN, C.J.—This appeal must be dismissed. I must say I am struck by the use of the word "medical," as contradistinguished from "surgical" in the sub-section we are asked to construe. The words are "the expense of providing the necessary surgical and medical advice," which would seem not merely to apply to a hurt as from something falling upon a man, or his falling over something; but they seem to contemplate illness. The illness here is an illness brought upon the respondent while in the service of the ship. The illness might be certainly the result of physical injury or hurt, or it might be an illness to which the term "medical" attendance would be more applicable than "surgical." On that account, probably, the Legislature has inserted medical attendance in the sub-section, as well as surgical. The word "injury" may include illness, and therefore we must interpret it as distinguished from "hurt;" and such clearly ought to be the interpretation where a man receives a gross injury of this kind while in the service of the ship. With regard to the latter phrase, I am of opinion that the words "in the service of the ship" are intended to distinguish such a case as this from a hurt or injury which a man may receive while on shore. If the Legislature had intended otherwise the words while discharging his duty in the service of the ship, or other words to the same effect might have been used: but they have not been so used. As the section stands, the owners would clearly not be liable where a sailor met with an accident while on shore for his own pleasure, though they might be liable if the man were on shore in the service of the ship. I think the opinion of the magistrate is right, and should be affirmed.

LUSH, J. concurred. Appeal dismissed.

(a) In the book of "Instructions" issued by the Board of Trade for the guidance of consuls and custom's officers abroad, p. 27, the section in question is thus interpreted: "We are of opinion that the liability of the shipowners . . . . is confined to expenses incurred in respect of 'hurts or injuries' occasioned by wounds, bruises, fractures, or other casualties to body or limb of a like character, such injuries being received 'in the service of the ship,' that is in the course of discharge, by master, seaman, or apprentice, of the duty assigned or belonging to him on board of the ship on which he is serving.

General average—Adjustment—Place for making—Breaking up of voyage at intermediate port—Pro ratâ freight.

An average adjustment cannot be made at a port prior to the port of discharge, unless the original voyage was in fact terminated at such prior port through the occurrence of circumstances beyond the control of the shipowner, and such as rendered the completion of the voyage on the terms originally agreed upon physically impossible, or so clearly unreasonable as to be impossible in a business point of view.

FURTHER CONSIDERATION.

LINDLEY, J.—The plaintiffs in this action are the indorsees of certain bills of lading of goods shipped in Nov. 1876, at Riga, on board the Virago, for carriage to and delivery at Hull. The defendants are the owners of that ship. The Virago sailed from Riga with a general cargo, and was stranded and injured. Part of her cargo was saved, part was washed out and lost, and part was jettisoned, in respect of this part a claim for general average arose. The ship was got off, and was towed into Copenhagen on the 9th Dec. 1876. Her cargo was there discharged on the 3rd Jan. 1877. She was repaired at a large expense between the 13th and 31st Jan., and on the 7th Feb. was sent on to Hull, where she arrived on the 10th. The plaintiffs' goods arrived at Copenhagen, but, being much damaged, were there sold; and it is admitted that they were properly sold. The present action is brought for the amount realised by the sale, after deducting such charges and general average expenses as the defendants would be entitled to deduct by English as distinguished from Danish law.

As a matter of fact, the general average expenses had been ascertained at Copenhagen. The average had been thus adjusted according to Danish law; and the adjuster had charged the plaintiffs with pro ratâ freight from Riga to Copenhagen. The result was more favourable to the defendants than would have been the case if the adjustment had been made according to English law, and the defendants claimed to deduct from the proceeds of the sale of the goods a larger sum than the plaintiffs considered them to be entitled to. The defendants paid 146*l.* 4*s* 9*d.* into court; and it was admitted that that sum was sufficient if the defendants were correct in their contention. It was also agreed that, if they were in the wrong, the accounts should be referred to some third person for re-adjustment.

The Virago's cargo, when she left Riga, consisted of 1893 tons of goods: of these, 30 tons were jettisoned, and 1643 were sold at Copenhagen. There then remained 220 tons. of these, part was forwarded by the Mito on the 13th Dec. 1876, part by the Otto on the 31st Jan. 1877, and part by the Mito on the 31st Jan. 1877. the rest amounting to 127 tons) came to Hull in the Virago herself. The Mito and the Otto both belonged to the defendants; and full freight (by which was understood the full original freight from Riga) was paid for that part of the cargo which came home in them. Full freight was also paid for so much of the 127 tons brought home in the Virago as did not belong to the defendants themselves. But about 50 out of these 127 tons consisted of lathwood which had been abandoned to the defendants as underwriters thereof; and in respect of these fifty tons no freight was payable. It thus appears that the ship with part of her original cargo on board arrived in Hull, the original port of discharge, and that the defendants received the original full bill of lading freight for such cargo, except for that part of it which belonged to themselves and paid no freight. A long correspondence was put in evidence, and was referred to, and I have read the whole of it. That correspondence and the defendants' answers to the plaintiffs' interrogatories show: first, that the cargo forwarded from Copenhagen was forwarded by the instructions of the consignees or the underwriters; secondly, that the whole of the undamaged cargo might have been brought on to Hull in the Virago herself after she had been repaired; thirdly, that the plaintiffs never assented to, but always protested against, an adjustment of the average at Copenhagen.

Under these circumstances, I am of opinion that it is incumbent upon the defendants to show that the Danish adjustment is binding upon the plaintiffs; it is incumbent on the defendants to show that the voyage was terminated at Copenhagen by the occurrence of circumstances which necessitated or justified such termination, and, as a consequence, necessitated or justified a general average adjustment at that port.

Very little information is to be obtained upon the question what circumstances terminate a voyage at an intermediate port, when the ship with part of her cargo on board arrives at her original port of discharge. The only cases reported in our own books on this point are Fletcher v. Alexander (L. Rep, 3 C. P. 375; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 432; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 69), and Mavro v. Ocean Marine Insurance Company (2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 361, 590; L. Rep. 10 C. P. 414; 32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 743). In Fletcher v. Alexander a ship laden with salt sailed from Liverpool to Calcutta. She got ashore, and returned to Liverpool. The whole cargo, except 100 tons, was lost or so damaged as to be worthless; and the 100 tons were not forwarded. The ship herself after being repaired went on to Calcutta, her original port of destination, but with an entirely new cargo, and in fact on a totally different voyage. It was decided, amongst other things, that, the voyage having been broken up at Liverpool, Calcutta was not the place for adjustment. The arrival of the ship at Calcutta, and the possibility of forwarding the undamaged salt to the same place, did not prevent the court from holding the voyage to have been broken up at Liverpool, and from holding Liverpool to be the proper place for adjustment. In Mavro v. Ocean Marine Insurance Company (ubi sup.), a ship laden with wheat sailed from Varna for Marseilles. She became disabled, and put into Constantinople. Part of the cargo, which was damaged, was sold there; the rest was transhipped and sent on to Marseilles. The ship was repaired at Constantinople after a lapse of two months; but whether she ultimately proceeded to Marseilles does not appear. The above steps were taken by direction of the Consular Court of Constantinople; and under its direction an adjustment of average was made there. This adjustment was made according to the law of France, which under any circumstances was the law applicable to the case. The court held that the voyage had been properly broken up at Constantinople, and that the adjustment there was binding, although some cargo arrived at Marseilles, and the ship was herself repaired and sent to sea. The real question in this case was the true construction of an English policy of insurance containing the words "general average as per foreign statement;" and the case does not throw much light on any other question. In this state of the authorities, it is necessary to consider the matter on principle.

The duty of the shipowner is, to complete the voyage if he can. If owing to perils of the sea he is compelled to put into an intermediate port for repair, his duty is, to refit, and carry on such part of the original cargo as is fit to be carried on. If this is done, a policy on the ship for the original voyage will cover a loss sustained after she has been repaired and is sailing from the port of repair to her original port of destination, and a policy on her original cargo will still cover so much of such cargo as is being carried in her between the same ports. In a case of this description, the original voyage is not regarded as broken up into two, viz., first into one voyage from the port of sailing to the port of refuge, and, secondly, into another voyage from such port to the port of destination. Again, if the shipowner, being unable to repair his ship transhipps the cargo and sends it home in some other ship, which he may do, still, as between him and the original consignees of the cargo, the original voyage is treated as continuing, in the absence of some agreement to the contrary. This appears from Shipton v. Thornton (9 Ad. & E. 314), where the freight payable in such cases is discussed. Further, in a case of this description, a policy on the cargo for the original voyage will cover such cargo when transhipped in order to complete such voyage: (1 Arnould on Insurance, 2nd ed., 491.)

These considerations appear to me to show that, in order to uphold the Danish adjustment in this case as against the plaintiffs who have never assented to it, the defendant must prove two things, viz., first, that the original voyage was in fact terminated at Copenhagen, and, secondly, that it was so terminated either by agreement or by necessity, i.e. the occurrence of circumstances beyond the control of the defendants, and such as rendered the completion of the voyage on the terms originally agreed upon physically impossible, or so clearly unreasonable as to be impossible in a business point of view.

As a mere question of fact, my opinion is that the voyage did terminate at Copenhagen. With respect to 90 tons of the original cargo, there was no termination whatever of the voyage at that port, but only a suspension of it whilst the ship was under repair. The plaintiffs' goods were no doubt sold at Copenhagen, and as to them the voyage obviously terminated there; but this of itself cannot make an average adjustment there binding on the plaintiffs, as will be seen at once by supposing all the rest of the cargo to have been brought home in the Virago after a short detention for repairs.

But assuming the original voyage to have in fact terminated at Copenhagen, neither the necessity for its termination there, nor its termination by any agreement binding on the plaintiffs, is proved. The desirability of having the average adjusted at Copenhagen, in order to obtain an allowance of distance freight, and the desirability of bringing about a separation of ship and cargo in order to obtain an adjustment at Copenhagen, were clearly seen by Hansen, and were pointed out by him to the defendants; and the correspondence satisfies me that the adjustment at Copenhagen was not the consequence of an inevitable breaking up of the voyage there, but was the cause of the voyage being broken up there, so far as it can be said to have been broken up with respect to the ship and the undamaged goods.

The letters which show this to have been the case are as follows: [His Lordship gave the references to certain of the letters set out in the correspondence in the case.]

In coming to this conclusion, I do not accuse the defendants of bad faith. Their letter of the 13th Jan. 1877, and a letter from Mr. Bott to them of the 4th July 1827 show that the defendants were under the impression that the proper place for adjusting the average was where the damaged goods were sold, or that the defendants as shipowners had some option in the matter. This was in my opinion an erroneous view; and, for the reasons already stated, I decide that the plaintiffs are not bound by the Copenhagen adjustment.

The defendants, however, contend that, irrespective of this adjustment, they are entitled to charge the plaintiffs pro ratâ freight on the goods which were carried from Riga to Copenhagen and there sold. This contention can only be supported by establishing some contract, express or implied, binding the plaintiffs to pay pro ratâ freight. Express contract there is none; and the only grounds relied upon for implying a contract are that the plaintiffs' goods were sold at Copenhagen with their consent given expressly or impliedly to Hansen, who acted for the best for all parties. But, assuming this to be so, the goods were in fact sold because they were so damaged as not to be worth forwarding; and a sale under such circumstances, whether approved by the plaintiffs beforehand, or ratified afterwards by claiming the proceeds of sale, is not enough by English law to render distance freight payable: see Hopper v. Burness (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 149; L. Rep. 1 C. P. Div. 137; 34 L. T. Rep., N. S. 528), and the cases there cited. To have that effect, the circumstances must be such as to give the cargo owner an option of having his goods sent on to their destination, or of accepting them at the intermediate port. If, having that option, he accepts the goods at the intermediate port, he is bound to pay pro ratâ freight: (see McLachlan on Shipping, 2nd ed. p. 446.) But here the plaintiffs had no such option; there was nothing equivalent to a voluntary acceptance by them of the goods at Copenhagen.

Upon both points, therefore, my judgment is for the plaintiffs, with costs, the amount to be referred to an English average-adjuster.

THE BYFOGED CHRISTENSEN v. THE WILLIAM FREDERICK.

Collision—Sailing vessels—Crossing ships—Regulations for preventing collisions—Articles 12 and 15.

To leave to masters of vessels a discretion as to obeying or departing from the sailing rules is dangerous to the public, and they ought not to be required to exercise such discretion except in cases of extreme necessity.

Where one vessel close-hauled on the port tack is approaching another on the starboard tack with the wind free, so that the former cannot at any particular time come to a distinct conclusion that the latter is not about to obey article 12 of the regulations for preventing collisions, the former is entitled to keep his course, under article 18, till the last moment, when luffing is a proper manœuvre.

The Commerce (3 W. Rob. 287) discussed.

THIS was an appeal from the Vice-Admiralty Court of Admiralty.

The appellants were owners of a barque called the Byfoged Christensen, and the respondents were the owners of a three-masted schooner called the William Frederick. The appellants sued the respondents in the Vice-Admiralty Court for the recovery of damages in respect of a collision which took place between the Byfoged Christensen and the William Frederick, and the respondents instituted a cross action in respect of the same collision; and the two actions were by consent heard at the same time, and on the same evidence, and one judgment was pronounced, and one decree given in the two causes.

The collision occurred on the 26th Aug. 1878, in the Straits of Gibraltar, under the circumstances detailed in the judgment of their Lordships.

Butt, Q.C. and Stubbs (W. G. F. Phillimore with them) for the appellants.

Milward, Q.C. and Clarkson for the respondents.

The judgment of their Lordships was delivered by Sir J. W. COLVILE.—The collision out of which these appeals have arisen took place a few miles from Cape Spartel, on the 26th Aug. 1878, about five o'clock in the afternoon. The colliding vessels were the Byfoged Christensen, a Norwegian barque, and the William Frederick, an American three-masted schooner. The former vessel was bound on a voyage from Majorca to New York, and was therefore coming out of the Mediterranean. The other vessel was bound on a voyage from New York to Venice, and was therefore entering the Mediterranean. They were sailing and crossing vessels, and the sailing rules applicable to the case are the 12th and the 18th.

Both parties are agreed that the American vessel was on the port tack, and had the wind on the port side, whatever was the precise direction from which the wind was coming. Hence the appellants have correctly contended that it was only in case the Christensen, which had the wind on the starboard side, was free, that it would be her duty to keep out of the way; and that, if she were not free, it would be the duty of the American ship to keep out of her way.

The case is peculiar, because each vessel seems, up to the moment of collision, or at least up to the time when the collision became inevitable, to have kept its course, and to have acted as if it were the duty of the other vessel to keep out of its way. The question which of the vessels was right in throwing that obligation on the other depends upon the question what was the real direction of the wind. The Christensen contends that the wind varied from north and by west to north; the other vessel says that it was from north north-east to north, and by east. The difference between them is not less than one, or more than three, points of the compass. Their Lordships have no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that, if the direction of the wind was north and by east, or north-north-east, or anywhere between those two points, the Christensen would have been free within the meaning of the 12th rule. The learned judge of the court below has, upon very conflicting evidence—each crew swearing pretty consistently to the direction for which each contended—found that the wind was to the east of north, and their Lordships would not, without having strong grounds for coming to a contrary conclusion, be disposed to interfere with that finding of fact. An argument on the part of the appellants was founded on the following passage in the judgment under appeal. The learned judge there says: "I feel therefore compelled, but after much hesitation to decide that the Byfoged Christensen had the wind, if not altogether free, at all events some points more in her favour than the William Frederick, and that, according to the 12th rule of the road, she ought to have given way to the William Frederick." Upon this passage it was argued by Mr. Stubbs that it is inconsistent with the hypothesis that both vessels were close-hauled vessels, in which case it would be the duty of the vessel which had the wind on the port side to give way. There may be some ambiguity in the first part of the sentence; but, taking the whole sentence together, their Lordships cannot but think that it amounts to a finding that the Christensen was a free vessel within the meaning of the 12th rule of the road; and even if there had been greater ambiguity in the expression of the learned judge's judgment than their Lordships think there is, they would still think that, if the direction of the wind was properly found to be what he found it to be, the Christensen would have been a free vessel, and in that opinion they are confirmed by their nautical assessors.

The next question is, whether the finding as to the direction of the wind was justified by the evidence. It seems to their Lordships that it was so. The most plausible point made against that finding was the argument of Mr. Butt as to the position of the vessels at the time of the collision. He contended that, had the wind not been as it was stated by those on board the Christensen to be, that is, varying from north to north and by west, the vessel would not, according to the ordinary course of navigation, have been so near Cape Spartel as she was when the collision took place. But, on consultation with the sailing-masters, their Lordships find that she was upon the course which a vessel bound to New York and getting out of the Mediterranean would naturally have taken, and that her position at the time of the collision was by no means inconsistent with the fact that the wind was in the quarter in which the American vessel and its crew say that it was.

That being so, their Lordships have no difficulty in affirming the decision that it was the duty of the Christensen, according to the rule of the road, to keep out of the way of the other vessel, and that she failed to do so.

The question raised by the cross appeal arises upon the finding of the learned judge that both vessels were to blame, on the ground that, although the duty of keeping out of the way lay upon the Christensen, those on board the William Frederick, when they found that the other vessel was not going to perform its duty, ought not to have pertinaciously adhered to the 18th rule of the road by keeping on their course, but should have adopted some manœuvre in order to avoid the collision which afterwards took place. The learned judge in so deciding relied on the case of The Commerce (3 W. Rob. 287) before Dr. Lushington. Their Lordships desire to remark that, though the principle involved in that case may be in itself a sound one, it is one which should be applied very cautiously, and only where the circumstances are clearly exceptional. They conceive that to leave to masters of vessels a discretion as to obeying or departing from the sailing rules is dangerous to the public; and that to require them to exercise such discretion, except in a very clear case of necessity, is hard upon the masters themselves, inasmuch as the slightest departure from these rules is almost invariably relied upon as constituting a case of at least contributory negligence. In the present case their Lordships think that the principle of the decision in the case of The Commerce is not applicable. There is no constat at what particular time the master of the William Frederick ought to have come to so distinct a conclusion that the other vessel was not about to obey the rule as to justify his departure from what was his primâ facie duty. Their Lordships cannot infer from the facts proved in the case that he was bound to come to such a conclusion before the moment at which it appears he luffed up in the wind; and, after consulting with the sailing-masters, they have come to the conclusion that that was the best thing which, under the circumstances, he could have done; that if he had tried by any other manœuvre actively to get out of the way of the other vessel, there would still have been a collision, and that the consequences of that collision might have been aggravated owing to the greater way which his vessel would have had upon it. Their Lordships therefore think that no case of contributory negligence has been made out against the William Frederick, and they must humbly advise Her Majesty to allow the cross appeal, to reverse the decision of the court below, to pronounce that the Byfoged Christensen was alone to blame for the collision, to dismiss the suit of the owners of that vessel, and to condemn them to bear and pay the whole amount of the damages sustained by the William Frederick, and further to pay the costs of both suits in the court below, and also the costs of these appeals.

APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (ADMIRALTY.)

*Practice—Third party—Trial—Issues—Plaintiff and defendant—Plaintiff and third party—Defendant and third party—*36 & 37 Vict. c. 66, s. 24 (3); 38 & 39 Vict. c. 77, Order XVI., rr. 17, 18, 20, and 21.

When in a collision cause the defendant claims indemnity from a third party, and such third party appears and defends, the court may find the original defendant solely to blame, notwithstanding he does not plead or appear at the trial, but unless issues are directed between the defendant and the third party the court cannot make a decree deciding questions of liability between them.

Semble: It is competent to the court to order such issues between the defendant and a third party to be tried either at the same time as those between plaintiff and defendant, or after they have been decided.

The position of the defendant in the original action is the same whether a third party is cited or not.

THIS was a motion in the Admiralty Division in an action of damage to amend the decree by striking out certain portions thereof.

The collision out of which the action for damage arose took place soon after midnight on the night of the 3rd May 1879, in Penarth Roads, between the ship Cartsburn, which was being towed in from sea by the steam-tug Leader, and the Austrian barque Slavia, which was lying at anchor. In consequence of the collision the Slavia lost all her masts, and suffered other damage.

On the 5th May the owners of the Slavia instituted a suit in rem against the Cartsburn, and filed their preliminary act on the 13th June 1879. The owners of the Cartsburn appeared, and a preliminary act was filed on behalf of the Cartsburn, and on the 14th June the plaintiffs delivered their statement of claim, paragraph 4 of which was as follows:

4. The said collision and damage were occasioned by the neglect, default, or mismanagement of the Cartsburn and her tug, or of one of them, and were not occasioned or contributed to by any neglect, default, or mismanagement of the Slavia or of any of those on board her.

On the 10th June, the defendants, owners of the Cartsburn, obtained leave to serve a notice on Andrew Bain, the owner of the steam-tug Leader, in accordance with Order XVI., r. 18, App. B., Form I. Notice was served on him on June 18th, of which the material parts were as follows:

Take notice, that this action has been brought in rem by the plaintiffs against the defendants' ship or vessel the Cartsburn, claiming 3000*l*. for damage alleged to have been sustained by the said plaintiffs by a collision which occurred in Penarth Roads. . . . between the plaintiffs' barque or vessel Slavia and the Cartsburn. The defendants, the owners of the said ship or vessel Cartsburn, claim to be indemnified by you against liability in respect of the said alleged damage on the ground that the liability of the ship or vessel Cartsburn in respect of the said alleged damage (if any) arises from the negligence and improper navigation of the master and crew of the steam-tug Leader in tow of which steam-tug the Cartsburn was, and that the Leader was owned and possessed by you, and was being navigated by your servants. And take notice, that if you wish to dispute the plaintiffs' claim in this action as against the said ship or vessel Cartsburn, or the said defendants, you must cause an appearance to be entered for you within eight days of the service of this notice. In default of your so appearing you will not be entitled in any future proceeding between the defendants and yourself to dispute the validity of the judgment in the action, whether obtained by consent or otherwise.

On the 25th June an appearance was entered for Andrew Bain in pursuance of the above notice, and leave was obtained to examine the plaintiffs' witnesses, the registrar drawing up an order in the following terms:

The registrar having heard solicitors on all sides, allowed defendants a week's further time to deliver the statement of defence, and directed plaintiffs to give security for the defendants' and the intervener's costs jointly in the sum of 300*l*., and he gave leave to the plaintiffs to open the preliminary acts forthwith, and to examine their witnesses orally in court on Saturday the 28th inst.

On the 24th June the defendants gave notice to the plaintiffs and Andrew Bain of an application for directions as to the mode of having the questions in the action determined (Order XVI., r. 21). The application was made on the 27th June, W. G. F. Phillimore for the defendants, and E. C. Clarkson for the plaintiffs, Andrew Bain not being represented, when the Judge made the following order:

The judge having heard counsel for plaintiffs and defendants, owners of Cartsburn, ordered that Andrew Bain, of Newport, Monmouth, owner of the steam-tug Leader, the party served with notice under Order XVI., r. 17, be at liberty to appear and defend, being bound as between him and the said defendants by any decision the court may come to in this action.

On the 28th June, on the application of Myburgh for Andrew Bain, and with the consent of counsel for the defendants, the order was amended by adding to it the words "as to the cause of the collision."

On the 29th June certain of the plaintiffs' witnesses were examined in court by counsel for the plaintiffs, and cross-examined by counsel for Andrew Bain, the defendants not being represented.

On the 10th July the defendants solicitors served the solicitors of Andrew Bain with a copy of a summons served on them by the plaintiffs to show cause why the defendants should not forthwith deliver their defence, and why an early day should not be fixed for the trial. At the hearing of the summons the defendant did not appear, and the registrar made an order that Andrew Bain should deliver a statement of defence within a week, and fixing the 6th Aug for the trial.

On the 19th July a statement of defence on behalf of Andrew Bain was, in pursuance of the registrar's order, filed, which, after stating that the Leader was towing the Cartsburn under a contract, alleged,

3. Under these circumstances those on board the Leader observed two barques lying at anchor in the Middle Pool, riding to the flood tide, one of which (the Slavia) was lying farther away on the port-quarter of the other without having any riding light exhibited. The Leader and the Cartsburn in tow of her passed the nearer of the said barques on her starboard side, and under reduced speed proceeded to round under the said barque's stern, under a port helm, the Leader having previously directed the Cartsburn to follow her round. When those on board the Leader saw that the Cartsburn was not following her, they sung out to those on board the Cartsburn to port their helm, and afterwards to hard a-port. The Cartsburn neglected to port her helm, or follow the Leader, and was proceeding so as to involve risk of collision with the Slavia, and although she was loudly hailed by those on board the Leader to let go her anchor, and although the Leader went full speed ahead, and those on board her did all they could to bring the Cartsburn round, the Cartsburn with her stem struck the Slavia on her starboard side.

6. The said collision was not caused by any neglect or default on the part of those on board the Leader.

7. The said collision was caused by the neglect or default of those on board the Slavia.

On this defence the plaintiffs joined issue, and the case was heard by the judge assisted by Trinity Masters on the 6th Aug.

Clarkson and Lush for plaintiffs.

Butt, Q.C. and F. W. Raikes for Andrew Bain.

The defendants were not represented.

After hearing evidence and after consultation with the Trinity Masters, the Judge gave judgment as follows: I pronounce in this cause that the Cartsburn is to blame for the collision between her and the Slavia, and that the Leader is not to blame. The usual consequences will follow. The Leader will be entitled to her costs, and the Cartsburn will not be entitled to indemnity or damages against the Leader.

And the following form of decree was drawn up:

The Judge, being assisted by Capt. Thomas Narramore Were and Capt. G. C. Burne, two of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity Corporation, and having heard counsel for the plaintiffs and for C. and Co.'s parties (solicitors for Andrew Bain), pronounced the collision in question in this action to have been occasioned solely by the fault or default of the master and crew of the vessel Cartsburn, and for the damage proceeded for, and comdemned the owners of the said vessel Cartsburn and their bail in the said damages and in costs, and he referred the said damages to the registrar assisted by merchants to report the amount thereof. The judge further pronounced that the defendants, the owners of the Cartsburn, were not entitled to any contribution or indemnity against the co-defendants, the owners of the steam-tug Leader, in respect of the said damage or costs, and he condemned the said defendants and their bail in the costs incurred by the co-defendants.

On the 6th Sept. the defendants' solicitors gave notice to the third party that they should, on the first motion day of the then next sittings,

Move the judge in court that so much of the judgment rendered on the 6th Aug. 1879 in this action as declares that the defendants, the owners of the Cartsburn, are not entitled to any contribution or indemnity against the third party, Andrew Bain, or decides anything as between the said defendants and the said Andrew Bain, or gives direction consequential upon such declaration or decision, be struck out, and that the said Andrew Bain pay the costs of and incidental to this application.

The notice was not served on the plaintiff.

The motion came on for argument on Nov. 4.

Dr. W. G. F. Phillimore, for the defendants, owners of the Cartsburn, read an affidavit of the clerk to the defendants' solicitors which set out the various steps in the action as given above, and contained the following allegations:

7. The said order of the 27th June was duly served upon the solicitors for the said Andrew Bain, the owner of the said steam-tug Leader, but no other pleading whatever was delivered to the solicitors for the said defendants, owners of the said vessel Cartsburn, by or on behalf of the said Andrew Bain, or on behalf of the said plaintiff in the said action, in addition to the said statement of claim delivered by the said plaintiff as aforesaid.

8. On the 30th July 1879 the said Messrs. F. and S. (solicitors for the defendants) received from the solicitors for the said plaintiffs notice of trial in this action. (The notice was in the usual form, S. C. J. Act 1865, Sch. I., App. B., Form 14.)

9. The said third party, Andrew Bain, the owner of the said tug Leader, did not serve the solicitors of the said defendants, owners of the Cartsburn with any notice of trial in the said action.

13. The parts of the said judgment which the said defendants, owners of the Cartsburn, are advised should be struck out were obtained on the application of counsel acting on behalf of the said third party, Andrew Bain, the owner of the said steam-tug Leader, as aforesaid.

The effect of a third party appearing pursuant to our notice (Jud. Act 1875, Sch. I., App. B., Form 1) is that he steps into the shoes of the original defendant; he may defend the action or not as he likes, but if he chooses to defend he does so on behalf of the real defendants, not on any issue that may arise between the defendant and himself. The rules under the Judicature Act on this matter (Order XVI., rr. 20, 21) make no provision for the trial of questions between the defendant and a third party, but only of questions in the action that is the action brought by the plaintiff against the defendant.

Myburgh for third party, Andrew Bain.—The decree is perfectly correct. The Slavia brings an action against the Cartsburn, and the Cartsburn endeavours, after the statement of claim is delivered, to shift the blame of the collision on to the Leader. The Leader thereupon defends herself, and also raises a defence available for the Cartsburn. Order XVI., rr. 17-21, are only the regulations for carrying out the provisions of the Judicature Act 1873, s. 24 (3), by which "every person served with any such notice (App. B., Form I.) shall henceforth be deemed a party to such cause or matter, with the same rights in respect of his defence or petition as if he had been duly sued in the ordinary way by such defendant." And that section clearly gives us a right to defend against the claim of the defendant, and to get a decree on the issue raised by his notice to us. It is not necessary that the question between plaintiff and defendant, and that between defendant and third party, should be identical:

Swansea Shipping Company v. Duncan and others, 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 166, 345; L. Rep. 1 Q. B. Div. 644; 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 879.

Besides, in this case the process was invoked by the defendant, and the order under which this trial was had and decree made was made at his request, and he cannot therefore now take exception to its regularity.

W. G. F. Phillimore in reply.—The position of a third party is defined by the rules, and they only relate to the decision of questions between plaintiff and defendant. Order XVI., r. 18, is the rule really applicable to this case, and the position of a third party brought in under that rule is clear: "If a person, not a party to the action, is proceeded against under rule 18, he may enter an appearance in the action if he chooses. What if he does not? . . . . 'He shall be deemed to admit the validity of the judgment obtained against such defendant, whether obtained by consent or otherwise.' . . . . if he does not come in. . . . he is to be bound by the judgment, and cannot afterwards dispute it, if liable to the action for contribution or indemnity or other relief which the first defendant would have against him:" (per Cockburn, C.J., Horwell v. London Omnibus Company, L. Rep. 2 Ex. Div. pp. 365, 382; 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 637.) An action is brought against us for negligence, and we assert that if there was any negligence it was that of the tug; she can only defend in the action to show that there was no negligence at all, and therefore nothing out of which a claim could arise against her, and if she does not do so, she would not be able on a future occasion to dispute the negligence altogether, but would be bound by any judgment obtained against us:

Benecke v. Frost, L. Rep. 1 Q. B. Div. 419; 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 728.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 11.—Myburgh applied for leave to file an affidavit on behalf of Andrew Bain, having reference to what occurred at the various applications in the cause.

Sir R. Phillimore refused to allow such affidavit to be filed.

Nov. 18.—Sir R. Phillimore.—The question now to be decided arises under the rules relating to third parties to an action comprised in Order XVI. of the Rules of the Supreme Court.

A collision took place between two vessels, the Slavia and the Cartsburn, on the 4th May last, in Penarth Roads, Cardiff. At the time of the collision the Slavia, which is owned by the plaintiffs, was lying at anchor, and the Cartsburn, which is owned by the defendants, was in tow of a steam-tug named the Leader, owned by Andrew Bain.

The plaintiffs commenced an action in rem against the Cartsburn in the district registry at Cardiff, but the action was shortly afterwards transferred to the principal registry of this court, and appearances were entered for both parties. On the 10th June there came before me in chambers a summons issued by the defendants, on which the following order was made: "The judge having heard both solicitors gave leave to defendants to issue a notice to the owners of the vessel Leader that they claim to be indemnified by the owners of the said vessel in respect of all damages and costs proceeded for in this action, or incident thereto, and he directed the said defendants to file their preliminary act within three days."

On the 13th June the defendants' preliminary act was filed, on the 14th the plaintiffs' statement of claim was delivered, and on the 18th what is known as a third party notice was, together with a copy of the statement of claim, served by the defendants on Andrew Bain, the owner of the tug Leader. This notice, and the service of it, appear in all respects to have been in conformity with Order XVI., r. 18. On the 25th June an appearance in the action was entered on behalf of Andrew Bain, and on the 27th, on the application of the defendants, the following order was made by me: "The judge, having heard counsel for plaintiffs and defendants, owners of the Cartsburn, ordered that Andrew Bain, of Newport, Monmouth, owner of the steam-tug Leader, the party served with notice under Order XVI., r. 17, be at liberty to appear and defend, being bound as between him and the said defendants by any decision the court may come to in this action." The next day, on the application of counsel for Andrew Bain, the words "as to the cause of the collision" were added to that which I have just read. Such order as amended was duly served upon Andrew Bain.

Two of the plaintiffs' witnesses were examined in court on the 29th June. On the 12th July the registrar, having heard the solicitors for the plaintiffs, and Andrew Bain, directed the latter to deliver his statement of defence within a week, and appointed the 6th Aug. for the trial. On the 19th July the statement of defence of Andrew Bain, the owner of the steam-tug, was delivered to the plaintiffs' solicitors' who filed printed copies of it on the 2nd Aug., four days before the trial. In this statement of defence the Slavia was charged with neglect which led to the collision, but blame was also imputed to the Cartsburn, who it was alleged disobeyed the orders given her from the steam-tug.

Andrew Bain did not deliver to the solicitors for the defendants, owners of the Cartsburn, any pleadings, or serve them with notice of trial, but they received, on the 30th July, a notice of trial fixed for the 6th Aug., purporting to be addressed to them and to the solicitors for Andrew Bain. The trial took place as appointed on the 6th Aug. The plaintiffs and Andrew Bain appeared and produced evidence, but the defendants, the owners of the Cartsburn, did not appear. The minute of the judgment given is as follows: [His Lordship here read the decree set out above.]

The present application on the part of the owners of the Cartsburn is to strike out so much of this judgment as declares that such owners are not entitled to any contribution or indemnity against the third party Andrew Bain, or decides anything as between the said owners and the said Andrew Bain, or gives directions consequent upon such declaration or decision, and to direct that the costs of this application be paid by Andrew Bain.

The owners of the Cartsburn appear to have no substantial ground for their application. They introduced the owner of the steam-tug as a party to the action, and they were or ought to have been aware that the whole question as between the three parties would be disposed of at the trial. The objects of these rules relating to the introduction into a suit of third parties as prescribed by the Judicature Act of 1875 was, to adopt the words of the Master of the Rolls in The Swansea Shipping Company v. Duncan (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 166, 345; 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 879; L. Rep. 1 Q. B. Div. 644), "To prevent the same question being tried twice over, where there is any substantial question common as between the plaintiff and defendant in the action, and as between the defendant and a third person, and in such a case the third person is to be cited to take part in the original litigation, and so to be bound by the decision on that question once for all." If the Cartsburn were to be allowed now to raise an issue between herself and the steam-tug as to the facts of the collision, the result would be precisely what it was the intention of the Legislature to obviate; the case would, substantially, be heard twice over.

With regard to the technical point of procedure that has been raised, I cannot see that there has been any material departure from the course prescribed by Order XVI., rr. 17, 18, 20, and 21. The order of the 27th June giving to Andrew Bain, the owner of the tug, liberty to defend. The notice of trial of the 30th July, addressed to Andrew Bain as well as to the other defendants, and his statement of defence imputing blame to the Cartsburn which was filed on the 2nd Aug., were sufficient notice to the owners of the Cartsburn that they would have to meet, at the trial on the 6th, the cases set up both by the Slavia and by the steam-tug. They did not choose to appear. It would seem as if they meant, in the event of the Slavia being found to blame, to have the advantage of this finding, and on the other hand, if the Cartsburn was found to blame, to deny that she was affected by the sentence.

I dismiss this application with costs.

From this decision the defendant appealed, giving notice at the same time "that if necessary the defendants will ask to treat this notice of motion as also a notice of motion by way of appeal from such parts of the said judgment."

No notice of the appeal was given to the plaintiffs, owners of the Slavia.

The appeal came on for hearing as an appeal from an interlocutory order on the 13th Jan. 1880, and was heard on that and the following day, before James, Baggallay, and Cotton, L.JJ.

At the commencement of the argument, a question was suggested by the court as to whether the mode of procedure was regular, and whether the case ought not to have gone into the list of appeals from final orders; but, on counsel for the respondent's stating that they had considered the point and were willing to waive any irregularity of form for the sake of having the question at issue finally settled, the case was allowed to proceed.

Cohen, Q.C. and Dr. W. G. F. Phillimore for appellants, owners of the Cartsburn.—The object of Order XVI., r. 18, is to bind the third party by the decision of questions in the action between the plaintiff and defendant to prevent the questions in that action being fought twice over. The rule does not say that, in the event of the third party not appearing, he will be held liable to indemnify the defendant, but that he shall be bound by the decision of questions between plaintiff and defendant. If the third party had not appeared, and judgment had been given by default or otherwise, we could not have recovered from him, in consequence of our notice to him that we claimed to be indemnified, without subsequent proceeding. The only effect would be that in such subsequent proceedings he would not be allowed to say that we had not been liable to pay for the damage claimed in the original action. No doubt the Judicature Act 1873, sect. 24 (3), allows a rule of court to be made which would sanction the trial of questions between the defendant and the third party; but the rule of court which has been made to carry out the provisions of the Act, and under which these proceedings are taken, has advisedly (as is shown by comparing Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1873, sched. r. 12, with the rules now in force) not given all the powers which it might have done: (Treleven v. Bray, L. Rep. 1 Ch. Div. 176; 33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 827; 45 L. J. 113, Ch. Div.) Had the plaintiff chosen, under Order XVI., r. 3, to have joined the present defendants and the present third party, he could have done so, and then the court could have decided in that action whether we or the third party had to pay the plaintiff; but he has not done so, and therefore all the court could do was to say that the plaintiff was entitled to recover in this action, leaving the question of ultimate liability between the defendant and third party to be settled in subsequent proceedings. The whole of the rules (17-21) at the end of Order XVI. relate to questions in the action, not to questions between defendant and third party:

Horwell v. London Omnibus Company, L. Rep. 2 Ex. Div. 365; 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 637.

[Cotton, L.J.—Is it not a question in the action whether the tug or the tow is in fault?] If it were I should be wrong, but it is not. It would be no defence to an action against the tow that the master of the tug gave a wrong order, and therefore it is not a question in the action. [James, L.J.—But when the third party has appeared and pleaded, questions as to the orders given by or to the tug can be raised between the plaintiffs and the third party, and in the judgment it would be found whether the tug or the tow was in fault.] Before a judgment could be given in favour of third party against defendant issues must have been joined between them here. There never was any pleading at all on the part of defendant, and the third party never even served their statement of defence on defendant. If in an action brought against us, and in which we have not appeared, questions are to be decided behind our backs between ourselves and third parties, there is a very serious miscarriage of justice.

Myburgh and F. W. Raikes for the third party, owner of Leader.—The judgment is perfectly valid; the fact that the defendant did not plead cannot benefit him. There was no reason why he should not plead, but as he did not do so formal issues could not be raised on the pleadings between him and third party, but in our pleadings we allege acts which are available as a defence for him, whilst at the same time we deny the claim he makes against us for an indemnity, and he had notice of that denial, being a party in the cause, and having appeared, he had access to all proceedings filed in the action, and he had moreover admittedly notice of trial. All that was done by us—our appearance, our pleading, and our presence at the trial—was in consequence of the defendant's application, and it was in consequence of his further application for directions as to the mode of trial of the cause of the collision that this decree was made. Besides, the question as to our liability is a question in the original action. The 4th paragraph of the statement of claim alleges that "the said collision and damage were occasioned by the neglect, default, or mismanagement of the Cartsburn and her tugs, or one of them." The plaintiffs objected to the defendant's application, but the defendant insisted that the only defence available for them was the negligence of the tug, and therefore the negligence of the tug or of the Cartsburn was really the only question in the action. No injustice can be done; the Cartsburn not having pleaded, the plaintiff is entitled to judgment against her, and the evidence at the trial which we, being summoned, gave, shows that the plaintiff would not have been entitled to judgment against us, and therefore, as, had we been to blame, the plaintiff could have proceeded against us for that very damage, the defendant is and ought to be precluded from doing so.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 26.—The judgment of the Court was delivered by James, L.J.—We are of opinion that to a considerable extent the application of the owners of the Cartsburn ought to have been acceded to in the court below, and ought now to be acceded to. So much of the judgment as pronounced that the owners of the Cartsburn were not entitled to any contribution or indemnity against the owner of the Leader must be struck out, as being a decision of a question not properly before the court for determination.

There was no litis contestatio between the parties, and the matter was coram non judice. The only thing in the nature of a pleading between the owners of the Cartsburn and the owner of the Leader is the notice served on the owner of the Leader on the 18th June. [His Lordship read the notice, the material parts of which are set out above, and continued:] That only refers to the claim made by the owners of the Slavia against the Cartsburn, and contains no claim by the owners of the Cartsburn against the Leader which could be decided in this action. There is nothing in it which the owners of the Cartsburn could have recovered judgment against the owner of the Leader without another action, if the Leader had been found in this action to have caused the collision; and if the Cartsburn could not recover against the Leader, it follows that the Leader cannot get a judgment against the Cartsburn.

Having received this notice, however, the owner of the Leader appears, and then an order is made which was perfected on the 28th June in the following terms. [His Lordship read the order as to the mode of trial set out above, and continued:]

Now, it was at that time competent to the court to have made an order on the Cartsburn to bring in a claim against the owner of the Leader, and then when the question between the Slavia and the Cartsburn was decided to have decided that also between the Cartsburn and the Leader; but the court did not direct that course to be taken, and therefore the decree cannot supply that which was requisite, namely, the constitution of an action, the litis contestatio between the Cartsburn and Leader, and therefore the part of the decree which decides anything as between the Cartsburn and the Leader must be struck out.

But it has been contended that this court ought to go further still, and strike out also that part of the judgment which decided that the collision was occasioned solely by the fault or default of the master and crew of the Cartsburn. We think however, that we are not now in a condition to interfere with that part of the judgment. It was a finding as between the plaintiffs, owners of the Slavia, and the defendants, owners of the Cartsburn, and it is the finding on which the judgment against the Cartsburn is based. If there was anything wrong in it, if it was not supported by the evidence, or if there was anything wrong in the conduct of the trial, the only way of getting rid of it would have been by a regular appeal or by a motion for a new trial. It was a finding as between the plaintiffs and the owners of the Cartsburn, and the finding in consequence of which the plaintiffs are entitled to recover against the Cartsburn. Any interference with it in the absence of the plaintiffs would be an injustice to them. The judgment was as between the plaintiffs and the owners of the Cartsburn, though it was also obtained in the presence of the owner of the Leader, and this court has nothing to do now with its consequences. If the finding as to the "cause of the collision" were struck out there could not have been any finding by which the owner of the Leader would have been bound as the finding on that question was the very matter on which he was to be bound.

That portion of the decree, therefore, which pronounced "the collision in question in this action to have been occasioned solely by the fault or default of the master and crew of the vessel Cartsburn" must remain: but that portion which pronounced "that the defendants, the owners of the Cartsburn, were not entitled to any contribution or indemnity against the co-defendants, the owners of the steam-tug Leader, in respect of the said damages or costs," must be struck out.

Under the circumstances, seeing that the whole difficulty appears to have arisen from some mistake as to the meaning of the order, we are of opinion that the justice of the case will be met by giving no costs occasioned by this application to either side either in this court or in the court below. There might have been a difficulty in this court dealing with the case at all in the absence of a regular notice of appeal from the judgment, but the third party, being anxious for the case to de decided, has not desired to raise the objection. It is very desirable that in these cases, where a "third party" is brought in under the powers given by the Judicature Acts and Rules, the order of the court as to the mode of trial should be so framed as to put the matter in a proper train for deciding the questions between the defendant and the third party.

Baggallay, L.J. added:—My present opinion is that it was perfectly competent to the court below to have decided the question between the Cartsburn and the Leader, if it had in the order of the 21st June directed issues between those parties either by amendment of pleadings or the delivery of fresh pleadings between them, and perhaps it was thought that the order actually made on the 28th June would have accomplished that purpose,

APPEALS FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (ADMIRALTY).

Damage — Collision — Contributory negligence — Error of judgment — Imminence of collision.

Where a ship has by improper navigation rendered a collision imminent, and executes wrong manœuvres when close to another vessel, such other vessel will not be held guilty of contributory negligence, or in any way to blame for the collision, if the master under the pressure of circumstances executes or orders a manœuvre which is not the right one under the circumstances. Ordinary skill and care are all that are expected of persons in charge of vessels, and not ability to see at once the best possible course to pursue under the pressure of extreme peril, brought about by the wrongful act of another.

Observations as to the application of the sailing rules in sinuous rivers.

This was an action for damages arising from a collision which took place between the paddle-steamship Princess Alice and the screw steamship Bywell Castle, off Tripcock Point, in the river Thames, on the evening of the 3rd Sept. 1878.

The action was brought by the London Steamboat Company, owners of the Princess Alice, and the owners of the Bywell Castle appeared and counter-claimed in respect of the damage sustained by that vessel in the same collision.

The circumstances of the collision and the cases set up by the plaintiffs and defendants respectively appear sufficiently from the judgment of Sir Robert Phillimore.

The case was heard before Sir Robert Phillimore, assisted by two Elder Brethren of the Trinity House, on Nov. 27, 28, 29, 30, and Dec. 2, 3, and 4, 1878.

Webster, Q.C., Dr. W. G. F. Phillimore, and Stubbs, for the plaintiffs, owners of the Princess Alice.

Butt, Q.C., Clarkson, and Myburgh, for defendants, owners of the Bywell Castle.

After hearing the evidence and arguments of counsel, judgment was reserved.

Dec. 11.—Sir R. Phillimore.—The horrible consequences of this collision are, I believe, without parrallel or precedent. It swept away by a sudden and terrible death about 600 or more human beings in the full enjoyment of life and happiness. This circumstance ought not of course in any way to affect the conclusion at which it is the duty of the court to arrive with respect to the author or authors of this dreadful catastrophe. It certainly was not the result of inevitable accident, but was caused by the bad navigation of one or both of the colliding vessels.

There is a claim and a counter-claim, but in this case the plaintiffs are the owners of the Princess Alice, the vessel on which so many passengers perished.

The Princess Alice was a paddle-steamship of 158 tons net tonnage, and 140 horse-power, narrow and long, 220ft. long by 20ft. beam, used exclusively for carrying passengers between Sheerness, Gravesend, Rosherville, and London. She had a fore and aft raised saloon, under which was a main deck and gangway in front all round the saloon, which had a large window. The steering bridge was between the two funnels, the captain's bridge above over the top of the two paddle-boxes, and the wheel was 2ft. above the roof of the saloon. The crew consisted of the captain, the first and second mates, four seamen, two boys, an engineer, and four firemen. On the 3rd Sept. in this year she was bound on a return excursion trip to London. She had gone down to Gravesend and Sheerness, called at several piers, put out and taken in passengers, and was returning home, calling at Gravesend and Rosherville; more than 100 passengers got on board at the latter place; and it appears upon the whole there were about 800 passengers on board; the tide at the time of the collision was about one and a half hours ebb; the weather fine and clear. About seven o'clock the spring boy put up the lights, and the mate told him to go forward and keep a good look-out. The captain was on the bridge; the second mate was on the lower deck, and it was his duty, according to the first mate, when not at the wheel, to be on the look-out. There were two men at the wheel, namely, Ayres and Creed; the latter has been drowned, but the former has been examined as a witness in this cause. The call boy was stationed, under the captain's eye, on the saloon. The Princess Alice, going full speed, at the rate of about eleven knots, came up Barking Reach on the north shore, and passed over to the south shore, getting about fifty or sixty yards from the south shore. She then saw a screw-steamer ahead of her, called the Spartan, attended but not towed by a tug called the Enterprise, coming round Tripcock Point. The Spartan passed on the starboard side of the Princess Alice. The Princess Alice was a little below the point when she passed the Spartan, and an order was given to starboard the helm for the purpose of rounding the point. The first mate is certain that she answered the starboard helm. She got round the point. There was a powder magazine ship, the Talbot, moored at about 100 yards at high water from the south shore, and 250 yards above the point. As the Princess Alice got round the point and straightened up Galleon's Reach, and a little to the north of the powder ship, the mate says that he then observed the green and white lights of the Bywell Castle two points on the starboard bow; that the Princess Alice was then rather astern of the powder ship, on her port beam. The Bywell Castle was then, the mate thinks, about 300 yards distant.

The Bywell Castle, a screw-steamship of 891 tons, with a crew of twenty-two hands, left the Milwall Dock about 6.30 p.m., and the collision took place about 7.45. She came out of the dock stern foremost. The distance from Millwall Dock to the place of collision is about seven miles. The Spartan and her tugs came out of the dock a few minutes after the Bywell Castle, and went down the river ahead of her. The Bywell Castle, not swinging readily, occupied about five minutes in getting her head round to go down the river. Her master was on the upper bridge with the pilot; the bridge was before amidships, and 15 ft. above the main deck. The ebb tide was just beginning to make, and at the time of the collision was running at the rate, as agreed upon, of two to two and a half knots an hour. The greatest speed of the Bywell Castle, which never exceeded half speed, was a little over five knots through the water, and this not unimportant fact is well proved. There was little or no wind, and she carried no sails. According to the evidence of her master and the pilot she went down Galleon's Reach, keeping about midstream; she was about one-eighth mile down the reach, and a quarter of a mile below Bull's Point, when the red and white lights of the Princess Alice were seen, over the land, two points on the starboard bow and about three-fourths of a mile to a mile off. The captain was at that time on the starboard side of the bridge, and the pilot amidships of the bridge. They saw the Princess Alice pass the pitch of the point, still showing her red and white lights. The captain says she kept on his starboard bow, but crossing and drawing ahead. He had previously observed the Spartan half a mile ahead when she passed the starboard side of the Princess Alice. The Princess Alice was then well over on the south shore. According to the captain's evidence in this court, when the two ships were at a distance of a quarter or half a mile from each other, the pilot ordered "Port a little," and after that the Princess Alice got on his port bow and squared up the reach, a point on his port bow still only showing her red and masthead lights. He says: "We were then red to red, and I did not think there was any danger; when within 100 yards I first thought there was any danger." The captain then proceeds to say that, when the Princess Alice was in mid-channel, or thereabouts, a point and a half on his port bow, she starboarded across his course, and thereby caused the collision. The Princess Alice ascribes the collision to the improper porting of the Bywell Castle.

I have now stated a summary of the cases contended for by each party. I must say a word on a portion of the evidence which has been the subject of much comment. The captain and mate of the Bywell Castle, but especially the former, have made, with respect to a part of the history of the transaction, statements which cannot be reconciled with their evidence given in this court. In his deposition before the Receiver of Wreck, the captain said that he saw, after the Princess Alice had rounded the point, that she was paying off to the port helm, her red light being visible, and that the Bywell Castle's helm was kept hard a-port. In this court he has said that Dix, the pilot, ordered the helm hard a-port after seeing the three lights of the Princess Alice, that is, after the Princess Alice had actually starboarded and shown three lights. In the log it is stated that the Princess Alice was observed in Barking Reach showing red and masthead lights, and that the Bywell Castle ported to keep over to Tripcock Point. In his evidence in this court, in cross-examination, the captain has said that his helm was not ported when the Princess Alice was in Barking Reach, and not until her red light had got ahead of him. He has also said in this court that "it was the porting of my helm that brought the Princess Alice on my port bow." Dix, the pilot, in his deposition before the Receiver of Wreck, has said that, being then about a quarter of a mile off, he ordered the engines to be stopped and sounded the whistle; and he has also said that when the Princess Alice was 300 to 400 yards distant she showed her red and green lights quite two points on the port bow, and that he then ordered the helm hard a-port, and the engine full speed astern; and that after this had happened the Princess Alice's red lights suddenly disappeared, and the green light only was visible. Now in his evidence before this court he has deposed that his helm was put hard a-port fifteen seconds before the collision; and I must also observe that his statement as to having ordered the engines to be put astern is contradicted, or at least not supported, by the evidence of the engineers, who received no such order. These contradictions in the evidence given by the master and pilot of the Bywell Castle have been duly weighed, and the testimony given by the witnesses examined has been carefully reviewed by the Elder Brethren and myself, and we agree in the following conclusions.

First, as to the Princess Alice. It was competent to the Princess Alice, after rounding Tripcock Point, to have run up on either side of Galleon's Reach, due regard being had to the ordinary rules and practice of navigating the river. When the tide is adverse, as it was in this instance, it is usual for vessels, after rounding a projecting point, to go across the river for the purpose of what is called "cheating the tide," the tide being slack on the opposite shore as far as the next point on that side. We believe this course to have been pursued by the Princess Alice on the evening of the 3rd Sept. last, and that she did pass over from Tripcock Point, or from thereabouts, towards the north shore. If she had intended to proceed up on the south shore of Galleon's Reach, it was her duty to have straightened up the reach immediately after rounding Tripcock Point so as to make her intention manifest by showing her green light to vessels bound down the river. According to the evidence of Long, the surviving mate, this is what the Princess Alice did; but we think this evidence is overborne both by the testimony of other witnesses, such as that of the witness from the Ann Elizabeth, and the Plymouth, vessels moored off the north shore, and from the tug Enterprise, which was running down, and also from the fact that the collision took place at a very short distance to the south of mid-channel, and that therefore the Princess Alice must have been over to the north of mid-stream when she suddenly starboarded. It appears to us that, when the Princess Alice was on a parallel course with the Bywell Castle, red light to red light, if their respective courses had been continued they would have passed at a safe distance from each other; but when a very short distance, variously stated at from 100 to 400 yards, intervened between the two vessels, the master of the Princess Alice ordered the helm to be put hard a-starboard, by which he brought his vessel athwart the bows of the Bywell Castle, and this fearful collision ensued. The captain of the Princess Alice having been unfortunately among the number of those who were drowned, it is impossible to ascertain the motive which induced him to give this order; but I may say that the Elder Brethren strongly incline to the belief that he was misled by seeing the green light of the tug Enterprise. There is, however, no trustworthy evidence on this point. It appears to us moreover, that the Princess Alice was navigated in a careless and reckless manner, without due observance of the regulations respecting look-out and speed. In our opinion the Princess Alice is to blame for this collision.

It remains to be considered whether the Bywell Castle in any way contributed to it. She appears to have been navigated with due care and skill till within a very short time of the collision. But the evidence certainly establishes that, having seen the green light of the Princess Alice, she hard a-ported into it. There is no doubt that this was not only obviously a wrong manœuvre, but the worst which she could have executed. The only defence offered for it is, that it was executed so very short a time before the collision. There have been several cases decided in this court, in which it has been holden that a wrong manœuvre taken at the last moment had really no effect upon the collision, on account of the proximity of the two vessels, and I have consulted anxiously with the Elder Brethren whether the wrong action of the Bywell Castle can be placed in this category. They are of opinion that, if the obviously wrong order of hard a-porting had not been given and obeyed, though the Princess Alice might have received some injury, she would not have sunk, and the lives of her crew and passengers would probably have been saved.

I am bound, therefore, to pronounce both vessels to blame for this collision. Each vessel to pay half the damages sustained by the other and no costs on either side.

From this decision the owners of the Bywell Castle appealed, and the appeal was heard before James, Brett, and Cotton, L.JJ., assisted by two nautical assessors, on the 14th and 15th July 1879.

Butt, Q.C., Clarkson and Myburgh for appellants, owners of the Bywell Castle.

Webster, Q.C. and Dr. W. G. F. Phillimore for respondents, owners of the Princess Alice.

July 15.—James, L.J.—Upon the point which is first to be considered, namely, whether the Princess Alice was in fault or not, we have the direct finding of the judge of the Court of Admiralty, and of the Trinity Masters who assisted him. They find in distinct terms that the Princess Alice was at one time on a course parallel with that of the Bywell Castle, red light to red light, and that if their respective courses had been continued they would have passed at a safe distance from each other; but that when a very short distance, variously stated at from 100 to 400 yards intervened between the two vessels, the master of the Princess Alice ordered his helm to be put a-starboard, by which he brought his vessel athwart the bows of the Bywell Castle. That was the finding of the judge and the Trinity Masters who heard all the evidence, the comments on it, and any defence suggested by it. They came to that conclusion, and it would require a grest deal to satisfy me that we, sitting as a Court of Appeal, could, on any considerations that have been suggested to us, overrule that finding of fact. My own opinion, moreover, is that the evidence supports it. Then with regard to the general conduct of the Princess Alice, on which I have not heard a comment made in support of her, the court says, "It appears to us, moreover, that the Princess Alice was navigated in a careless and reckless manner, without due observance of the regulations respecting look-out and speed." That is not to be questioned; therefore, upon the issue, whether the Princess Alice was to blame, there can be no doubt that we must affirm the judgment of the court below. The judge of the court below then says that the Bywell Castle appears to have been navigated with due care and skill till within a very short time of the collision; and I understand our assessors to agree with those in the court below in that opinion. The only question is as to the last act of the Bywell Castle before the collision, which is that she, in the very agony of the collision, just at the time when the two ships were close together, hard a-ported. The learned judge and both of the Trinity Masters were of opinion that that was a wrong manœuvre. I understand our assessors to agree in that opinion also; but they advise us that it could not, in their opinion, have had the slightest appreciable effect upon the collision. Everything else had been done that the few seconds allowed time for. Now, that opinion, if adopted by us—and I think that it should be adopted—is sufficient to dispose of the case upon the question of contributory negligence. But I desire to add my opinion that a ship has no right, after, by its own misconduct putting another ship into a situation of extreme peril, to charge that other ship with misconduct or contributory negligence, if, in that moment of extreme peril and difficulty, such other ship happens to do something wrong. A wrong manœuvre, under such circumstances, would not render her liable for the damage, inasmuch as perfect presence of mind, accurate judgment, and promptitude in giving effect to such judgment under such circumstances, are not to be expected. You have no right to expect persons in charge of ships to be something more than ordinary men. I am therefore of opinion that the finding of the court below that the Bywell Castle was, for the purposes of this suit, to be considered to blame, must be overruled, and that the Princess Alice was alone to blame.

Brett, L.J.—In this case the Admiralty Court has found that both ships were to blame, and there are practically cross appeals. The judgment of the Admiralty Court is made to depend on four principal findings, some of which are findings of fact, and the others are judicial opinions as to the manœuvres which were or ought to have been employed. The four principal findings seem to be these: First, that at one moment these ships had come on to courses which might be called parallel courses—red light to red light—so that if the respective courses had been continued they would have passed at a safe distance from each other; that is a finding in favour of the Bywell Castle, and the appeal of the Princess Alice is practically against that finding. Secondly that the Princess Alice was going at full speed, and the Bywell Castle at something like half speed. Thirdly, that the Bywell Castle, up to a very short time before the collision —which, taken in conjunction with the evidence and the first finding, seems to mean up to the time of putting her helm hard a-port—was navigated with due care and skill; that is a finding in favour of the Bywell Castle, and therefore is challenged by the appeal of the Princess Alice. Fourthly, that though up to that moment the Bywell Castle was right, and although the red light of the Princess Alice had been on her port bow, yet when the green light of the Princess Alice was opened on her port bow, she did wrong in ordering her helm hard a-port, that is a finding against the Bywell Castle.

Now, there being in the judgment of the Admiralty Court four distinct and fundamental findings we are asked to review them. We ought not, in accordance with the rules that govern the Court of Appeal, to overrule any one of these findings unless we are convinced that it is wrong. Therefore, applying that rule to the findings which are in favour of the Bywell Castle, we must consider whether we can say that the Admiralty Court was wrong in holding that at some particular moment these vessels were on parallel courses, red light to red light, and that up to the time of the order being given to put the helm hard a-port the Bywell Castle had been navigated with due care and skill. So far from being able to say that the court was wrong, it seems, on the balance of evidence, tested by the probabilities of the case, that the findings were right; but there was this suggestion—very well put by Dr. Phillimore in the course of the argument—that both ships were going round Tripcock Point on the south shore of the river in parallel circles, and he said that a vessel going up the river on the ebb tide may pass on the inner circle when coming round a point; and if she does so the other vessel ought to keep on the outer circle, the one coming up the stream on the inner or southern circle, and the other going down on the outer or northern circle. If so, at the first moment of sighting each other, the ship coming up the river would be showing her red light, but as she came round the circle it is obvious that she would show her green light, and then they ought to pass starboard side to starboard side. But there is another course which a vessel coming up the river, and approaching such a point, may take if she wishes to cheat the tide; she can go, not necessarily on a straight course to the other side without turning up into the next (Galleon's) reach, nor on a straight line to the next (Bull's) point but round the point under a starboard helm she will be by this means taken nearer to the north shore, and so cheat the tide. Now, that she may do; and not only is that what she may do, but, on the whole, with an ebb tide, it is more than probable that that is what she will do. With regard to a vessel going down, the course will be to go as near as possible down the centre of the stream; and if no other vessel is coming up she will round Tripcock Point, keeping out in the tide, and therefore, when going down Galleon's Reach, she will, for her own advantage, not port her helm at all. Those being the probabilities, we have the evidence here on the one side that no doubt the Princess Alice did come close round Tripcock Point, and her case is that she did take, or intend to take, a course which is not improbable, coming close round the magazine, and keeping on the south side; and that, under those circumstances, she did show her green light to the Bywell Castle on the starboard bow, and that the Bywell Castle showed her green light as she was coming down. But the evidence on the other side is, that the Princess Alice came close to Tripcock Point to pass under the stern of the floating magazine, and did not straighten herself up the river so as to run past alongside of it; and that when she passed by the stern of it she was going directly towards the north shore. She would, therefore, when in mid stream and without starboarding, show her red light to the Bywell Castle before coming up to the point, and after clearing the point and the powder magazine, she would be drawing her red light on ahead, so that finally it came right ahead of the Bywell Castle. That is what the Bywell Castle says did happen, that the red light drew across the river to the north side, and came ahead of her. That would, it seems to me fully indicate to the Bywell Castle that the Princess Alice was going a course which would take her across to the north side; and the answer to the argument that the Bywell Castle ported without having any regard to the Princess Alice is, that it is a very unlikely thing for her to do, but that if she saw this red light passing on until it came ahead of her, it is not unnatural that she would slightly port her helm. It seems a natural and proper thing to do that which she says she did, and for the reason which she gives, there being no reason why she should do it for any other purpose. Therefore the argument that she executed a wrong manœuvre fails. I agree with the finding that it was not wrong. Then the Princess Alice would naturally keep on her course until she got more to the north, as it is said she did. No doubt the slight porting of the Bywell Castle would bring the Princess Alice more on the port bow; so would the fact of the Princess Alice keeping on crossing the river. It has been argued if she was then under a starboard helm, though she got on to the port bow of the Bywell Castle, that the Bywell Castle nevertheless ought to have starboarded or kept straight down the reach. It seems to me that that is to propound a most dangerous rule, that if two vessels are coming round a point in opposite directions, one under a starboard helm, if she crosses so that her red light is on the port bow of the other, she shall have the right to pursue her course and to keep her helm to starboard. It seems to me that the rule that both ships ought to pass port side to port side applies, and it would be dangerous to hold the contrary. It was the duty of the Princess Alice, if under a starboard helm to ease it at once, so as to pass port side to port side. According to the argument she did not do that. It seems to me that not only could I not legally say that the finding of the court below was wrong; but, taking the evidence and the probabilities, I should have decided in the same way, that the red light of the Princess Alice had got on the port side of the Bywell Castle, and that it was her duty to ease her helm. I cannot indeed have a doubt that the Princess Alice was in the wrong. She was in the wrong for not keeping on the port side of the Bywell Castle, having once got there, and she was also in the wrong in going at the time at full speed; therefore she was doubly wrong. Then, if that be so, of course she was still more wrong if, instead of easing her starboard helm, she kept on that helm, and if she did ease it, she was still more wrong in putting it again to starboard if she was on the port side of the Bywell Castle. By her wrong act she put the Bywell Castle's captain into an extreme difficulty in showing him a green light on his port bow when close to him.

The next question is whether the Bywell Castle, being put into that difficulty, did what was wrong. It is said that she did so in two respects; but what is the wrong that the court is bound to find she did? Not merely that she did a wrong thing, but that she was guilty of a want of that care or skill which she ought to have shown under such difficult circumstances. I am clearly of opinion that, when one ship by her wrongful act puts another ship into a position of difficulty of this kind, we cannot expect the same amount of skill as we should under other circumstances. Captains of ships are bound to show such skill as persons of their position with ordinary nerve ought to show under the circumstances; but any court ought to make the very greatest allowance for a captain or pilot suddenly put into such difficult circumstances; and the court ought not, in fairness and justice to him, to require perfect nerve and presence of mind enabling him to do the best thing possible. What the pilot did was to give the orders to stop the engines and to put the helm hard a-port: and the order to stop was carried out. He says that he gave the order not only to stop, but to reverse. I agree that, if he had time to do it, he ought to have done it. There was some dispute as to who did give the order, and it is said that if he did give the order it was not obeyed; but again we must consider the circumstances. He was not called upon to give the order to stop and reverse until the other ship had done the wrong thing. Where did she do it? She did it close to him. The court below has not found that there was any wrong order as to the stopping or reversing, though it has found that the order to port was wrong. We are, however, advised that the order to put the helm hard a-port had no practical effect upon the collision. If that be so, of course it follows that the last wrongful act of the Princess Alice was done so near to the Bywell Castle that it was impossible by any manœuvre to avoid the collision. If the fact of ordering the helm hard a-port had no effect upon the collision, it is immaterial whether it was given or not. Even if it had an effect and was wrong, we have come to the conclusion that the captain of the Bywell Castle was suddenly put into an extremely difficult position, and assuming that a wrong order was given, that it ought not, under the circumstances, to be attributed to him as a thing done with such want of nerve and skill as entitles us to say that by negligence and want of skill the Bywell Castle contributed to the accident. Therefore, though agreeing with all the other findings as to the Princess Alice, we must come to a different opinion as to the last finding, the result of which is that we must hold the Princess Alice solely to blame.

Cotton, L.J.—After the very full way in which Brett, L,J. has entered into the case it is unnecessary for me to say more than that I have come to the same conclusion, but I wish to add a few words. There are in this case two questions to consider. First, was the judge of the court below right in finding that the Princess Alice was in fault? We here are only dealing with the evidence which was brought before the judge of the court below, who had the benefit of seeing and hearing the witnesses. We have not had that opportunity of testing the evidence, and that in this case is of very considerable importance, because a great deal of the argument on behalf of the Princess Alice consisted in commenting on alleged discrepancies in the evidence of the witnesses for the Bywell Castle, and asking us practically to discredit their evidence. In such a case, in order to overrule the finding of a judge of the court below, we ought to be satisfied that his finding cannot upon the evidence be sustained.

This in the present case I cannot say, because, on the evidence which we have heard, I should have arrived at the same conclusion, as the learned judge of the court below. [His Lordship then commented on the evidence, and concluded that he agreed with what in substance was the evidence on behalf of the Bywell Castle, that the Princess Alice going over to the point on the north shore had got on the port bow of the Bywell Castle, and that she did alter her course by starboarding and hard a-starboarding her helm.] On the other point, that the Bywell Castle did not contribute to the accident by hard a-porting before the collision, I agree with the view expressed by Brett, L.J. Our assessors tell us that it could not in any way have been contributory to the accident, which in their opinion, was then inevitable. Even if the collission had not been unavoidable at the time when the helm of the Bywell Castle was put hard a-port, I should not have held that vessel liable, for in my opinion the sound rule is, that a man in charge of a vessel is not to be held guilty of negligence, or as contributing to an accident, if in a sudden emergency, caused by the default or negligence of another vessel, he does something which he might under the circumstances as known to him reasonably think proper, although those before whom the case comes for adjudication are, with a knowledge of all the facts, and with time to consider them, able to see that the course which he adopted was not in fact the best. In this case, though to put the helm of the Bywell Castle hard a-port was not in fact the best thing to be done, I cannot hold that to do so was under the circumstances an act of negligence on the part of those who had charge of that vessel.

James, L.J. added:—I may say that we should have arrived at the same decision as to the effect of the manœuvre of hard a-porting independently of the advice of our assessors. There is, however, another more general proposition suggested by the counsel for the Princess Alice as the result of the cases decided in the Privy Council (The Velocity, L. Rep. 3 P. C. 44; 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 686; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O.S. 308; The Esk, 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 1; L. Rep. 3 P.C. 436; 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 167), that the ordinary rules of navigation do not apply in a sinuous river like the Thames. I endeavoured on a previous occasion to explain what I understood was the meaning of those cases; that is, that in a sinuous river the position of a ship and the direction of her head in the act of rounding a point is not to be taken to show that the direction of her head will be the same and the consequent position of the ship will be the same when the point is rounded.

SITTINGS AT WESTMINSTER.

Reported by P. B. Hutchins and A. H. Bittleston, Esqs., Barristers-at-Law.

Wednesday, Dec. 3, 1879.

(Before Bramwell, Brett, and Cotton, L.JJ.)

Hayton v. Irwin.

APPEAL FROM THE COMMON PLEAS DIVISION.

Charter-party—Vessel to proceed to port "or so near thereto as she can safely get"—Custom inconsistent with charter-party.

A custom of a port, that charterer is not bound to take delivery of cargo elsewhere than at port of destination, cannot be set up in answer to a claim by shipowner on a charter-party, which provides that the ship shall proceed to a certain port, or so near thereto as she can safely get, and deliver.

Judgment of Grove, J. affirmed.

Demurrer to defence.

The statement of claim alleged that the plaintiff was the managing owner of a vessel called the Elizabeth Ostle, and was a partner in the firm of Hayton and Simpson of Liverpool; that the defendant was a merchant in London; and the plaintiff through his said firm chartered the Elizabeth Ostle to the defendant for a voyage from Japan with a cargo of rice in bags, or such other merchandise, being measurement goods, as the charterer's agent might wish. The charter-party went on to provide that the vessel, "being so loaded, shall therewith proceed to a safe port in the United Kingdom or on the Continent between Havre and Hamburg, both ports included, as ordered at Queenstown or Falmouth, within forty-eight hours after receipt of telegrams or letter of advice of arrival, or so near thereto as she can safely get, and deliver the same on being paid freight at the rate, &c. . . . The cargo to be brought to and taken from alongside the ship at merchant's risk and expense." The statement of claim continued as follows:

Paragraph 4.—The Elizabeth Ostle was loaded by the defendant at Japan under the said charter, and was ordered to Hamburg.

5. She sailed for Hamburg, but her draught of water with the said cargo on board was so great that she could not get up the river to Hamburg. Stade was as near thereunto as she could safely get, and when at Stade the plaintiff in accordance with the terms of the said charter was willing to deliver the said cargo to the said defendant there, or to deliver to him there so much of the said cargo as would lighten the ship sufficiently to enable her to proceed up the river to Hamburg.

6. The defendant refused to take delivery of the said cargo or any part thereof at Stade, and refused to perform and broke the said charter.

7. The plaintiff, for the purpose of completing the said voyage, and earning freight, discharged part of the said cargo into lighters at Stade, and the same was delivered from the said lighters to the defendant's agent at Hamburg. When lightened, the Elizabeth Ostle proceeded to Hamburg, and there delivered the remainder of the cargo to the defendant's agent.

8. The lighterage expenses necessarily incurred by the plaintiff in consequence of the defendant's breach of the said charter-party amounted to 38*l.* 13*s.* 5*d.*

The plaintiff claimed the amount of the lighterage expenses.

Statement of defence:

Paragraph 5.—By the custom of the port of Hamburg the defendant was not bound to take delivery of the cargo, or any part of it, at Stade, or elsewhere than at the port of Hamburg, nor were lighterage expenses incurred by the plaintiff for the purpose of lightening his vessel and enabling him to proceed up the river to Hamburg, and there complete the unloading of the cargo, in the absence of special agreement recoverable from the defendant by the plaintiff.

Demurrer to paragraph 5 of the statement of defence, on the ground that it set up a custom inconsistent with the charter-party.

Nov. 8, 1879.—French for the plaintiff.—A special agreement between parties to a charter-party cannot be overridden by a custom of a port to which the ship happens to be ordered :

Wigglesworth v. Dallison, 1 Smith's Leading Cases, 8th edit. p. 605, and notes thereto ;
Norden Steam-shipping Company v. Dempsey, L. Rep. 1 C. P. Div. 654 ; Robinson v. Mollett, L. Rep. 7, H. of L. 802.

The arrival at Hamburg, so as to give delivery there of the whole cargo without lightening being impossible, the custom is not applicable. If the custom could override the agreement, it would not apply without an express allegation that such custom was known to the plaintiff :

Kirchner v. Venus, 12 Moore P. C. C. 361.

Wilberforce for the defendant.—There is nothing in the custom set up inconsistent with the charter-party ; the facts stated show that the ship had not got within the "ambit of the port," which is, without which she cannot be said to have gone as near thereto as she could Metcalfe v. Britannia Ironworks Company, L. Rep. 1 Q.B. Div. 613 ; 2 Q.B. Div. 423 ; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 313, 407.

If the plaintiff was unable to get up to Hamburg without lightening, he was bound to bear the expense of such lightening himself:

Hillstrom v. Gibson and Clark (Scotch Court of Session), 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 302 ; 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 248 ; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O.S. 302, 362.

Grove, J.—This demurrer must be allowed. By the case as it appears on the face of the pleadings, the vessel being loaded is to proceed "to a safe port in the United Kingdom, or on the continent between Havre and Hamburg, both ports included, as ordered at Queenstown or Falmouth, within forty-eight hours after the receipt of telegrams or letters of advice of arrival, or so near thereto as she can safely get." It is then further provided that the cargo is to be brought to, and taken from, alongside the ship at the merchant's risk and expense. The statement of claim avers that the ship's draught of water was too great to allow of her getting up the river higher than Stade, and that she could not therefore reach Hamburg. The plaintiff then took the other alternative ; he got as near to Hamburg as he could, that is, he went to Stade, and then offered to deliver the cargo to the defendant, or at least as much of it as would lighten his ship sufficiently to enable him to proceed up the river to Hamburg. If the plaintiff had refused to deliver his cargo or any part of it until such time as he could deliver the whole at Hamburg, knowing that it was impossible to reach that place at all so long as he drew so much water, such a course would have been unreasonable. The plaintiff, however, got as near to Hamburg as he could safely get with his full cargo on board, and then offered to deliver the whole or part of his cargo. The statement of claim alleges a refusal by the defendant to allow the ship to be lightened at Stade, but that in spite of the refusal part of the cargo was, in order to save freight, put into lighters and carried up to Hamburg, being followed by the rest in the lightened ship, where the whole was delivered to defendant's agent. The defendant contends that he was not bound to accept any part of the cargo at any other place than Hamburg, and that is equivalent to saying that the custom of the port of Hamburg overrides the express agreement in the charter-party, or, in other words, the defendant argues that the plaintiff was bound to deliver at Hamburg whether he could reach that place or not. If that plea contained in the 5th paragraph of the defence were allowed to remain, I should be deciding that the custom of the port of Hamburg could override the agreement made between the parties. I confess I was at the time impressed by Mr. Wilberforce's remarks on Hillstrom v. Gibson (ubi sup.), but on examination that case will be found not to effect the present. I think the demurrer must be allowed, with liberty to the defendant to amend repayment of costs, and the question of lighterage expenses can be settled at the trial.

The defendant appealed.

Bramwell, L.J.—This is a case in which a demurrer is useful, as it raises the question in dispute between the parties in a way which may save expense. I am of opinion that the judgment is right, and ought to be affirmed.

E. Pellas and Co. v. The Neptune Marine Insurance Company.

Marine insurance—Money owing to underwriters by assured—Defence in action by assignee of the policy—31 & 32 Vict. c. 86.

In an action by an assignee of a marine policy against the underwriters, the defendants are not entitled under 31 & 32 Vict. c. 86, s. 1, to set up a counter-claim for money owing to them by the assignor at the time of the assignment, but in respect of matters not arising out of the policy.

The policies of Marine Assurance Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 86), which enables assignees of marine policies to sue thereon in their own names, provides that "the defendant in any action shall be entitled to make any defence which he would have been entitled to make if the said action had been brought in the name of the person by whom, or on whose account, the policy had been effected."

Held, in an action by the assignees of a policy, that the underwriters were not entitled, under this provision, to set off a debt due to them from the person by whom the policy had been effected, the action being one for unliquidated damages in which a set-off could not be pleaded before the Judicature Acts, and those Acts not making a set-off or counter-claim a defence within the Policies of Marine Assurance Act 1868.

Judgment of the Common Pleas Division (Denman and Lopes, JJ.) reversed.

This was an action upon a policy of marine insurance, tried before Lord Coleridge, C.J. at the Guildhall. The plaintiffs were merchants in London, and the defendants were an insurance company carrying on business at West Hartlepool, in the county of Durham.

On the 7th April 1876, Anthony Harris and Co., of Newcastle, effected a policy of insurance (in the usual form) for 300*l.* on a cargo of coals (and cash advances) shipped on board the ship Toivatar, for a voyage from the Tyne to Genoa. The defendants became insurers to Harris and Co. for 300*l.* Harris and Co. were at the time of the making of the policy, and thence up to the date of the agreements hereinafter mentioned, interested in the coals and cash to the amount of all the moneys by them insured thereon, and the policy was made on their account, and for their use and benefit.

On the 22nd May 1876 the policy was assigned by Harris and Co. to M. L. Questa, of Genoa; on the 30th of the same month it was assigned by Questa to Pastorini and Co., of Genoa, and on the 10th May 1877 it was assigned by Pastorini and Co., to the plaintiffs, by virtue of which assignments all the right, title, and interest in the policy passed to the plaintiffs. The coals were duly shipped on board the Toivatar in the Tyne, to be carried to Genoa. The Toivatar during her voyage met with disasters, and did not reach her port of discharge until March 1877. A notice of abandonment was given on the 12th May 1877, and was ultimately accepted by the defendants. Between the 1st Jan. and the 1st Feb. 1877 Harris and Co. became indebted to the defendants in the sum of 40*l.* for premiums on policies other than that sued on in this action. The defendants had no notice that the policy had been assigned by Harris and Co. until after the debt of 40*l.* had been contracted. Harris and Co. filed a petition for liquidation on the 15th Feb. 1877. The writ of summons was issued on the 24th Aug. 1877. The defendants, against the claim to recover 300*l.* for a total loss, by way of set-off pleaded that "at and previous to the date of the writ, and at the time when the loss in the statement of claim mentioned arose, Harris and Co. were, and they still are, indebted to the defendants in the amount of 40*l.* 4*d.* in respect of moneys due by Harris and Co. to the defendants for premiums on policies other than the policy in the statement of claim mentioned, effected by Harris and Co. with the defendants, and the defendants claimed to set-off that sum against an equal amount of the plaintiffs' claim, paying the balance into court. The only question in dispute, therefore, was whether the defendants were entitled to deduct the above-mentioned sum of 40*l.* odd from the 300*l.* payable by them in respect of the total loss. Lord Coleridge decided against the plaintiffs on this question, and directed the jury to find a verdict for the defendants.

A rule for a new trial was subsequently obtained in the Common Pleas Division by the plaintiffs, on the ground of misdirection of the learned judge in holding that the set-off could be maintained against the present plaintiffs; but, after argument, the rule was discharged (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 136; 40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 428).

The plaintiffs now appealed from the judgment of the Common Pleas Division, discharging the rule.

Murphy, Q.C. and R. E. Webster, Q.C. for the plaintiffs.—It is admitted that, if the words of the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 86 are to be read in their extreme literal sense, then the judgment of the Common Pleas Division is right, and the plaintiffs are wrong. By that Act, "Whenever a policy of insurance on any ship, or on any goods in any ship, or on any freight, has been assigned, so as to pass the beneficial interest in such policy to any person entitled to the property thereby insured, the assignee of such policy shall be entitled to sue thereon in his own name; and the defendant in any action shall be entitled to make any defence which he would have been entitled to make if the said action had been brought in the name of the person by whom and for whose account the policy sued on was effected." This is an action for unliquidated damages, and before the Judicature Acts there could be no set-off in such an action. Supposing this had been a suit in equity before the passing of the Policies of Marine Assurance Act 1868, would the defendants have been allowed to set off this sum? [Bramwell, L.J. referred to Higgs v. Northern Assam Tea Company, L. Rep. 4 Ex. 387; 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 33.) The intention of the Act, it is submitted, is to give the defendants the benefit of all the defences arising upon the policy itself, such as concealment, &c., but not to burthen an assignee with the private debt of his assignor. This is not an action under sub-sect. 6 of sect. 25 of the Judicature Act 1873, because under that section an assignee must have given notice of the assignment before he can sue in his own name. This is an action under the Policies of Marine Assurance Act 1868. The defendants must be taken to have agreed that no defence such as this now relied upon should be set up, having issued an instrument which is legally assignable. The general rule that an assignee of a chose in action takes subject to the equities attaching thereto must be qualified in some cases. It is submitted that Lord Coleridge should have given judgment for the plaintiff, and that this court, having all the materials before them, should do so now. They cited

A. L. Smith and Chalmers for the defendants.—Two objections have been taken to this set-off. First, it is said that it is only available against Harris, and that this section is not brought by him. Secondly, that this is an action for an unliquidated sum, in which no set-off is allowable. The first objection is disposed of by 31 & 32 Vict. c. 86. Further, the defendants had no notice of the assignment here, and they are, therefore, entitled to deal with this claim as if it was a claim by the assured (Cavendish v. Deaves, 24 Beav. 163). As to the second, it is admitted that before the Judicature Acts a set-off could only take place between liquidated sums; but by Order XIX., rule 3, a defendant may now set off or counter-claim against either liquidated or unliquidated claims. Consequently, a liquidated debt may now be pleaded as an answer to an unliquidated claim. A counter-claim is not necessary, unless the defendant's claim is also unliquidated, or unless he seeks to recover something from the plaintiff, and not simply to use his claim as a defence to that of the plaintiff's.

Murphy, Q.C. did not reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 18.—Bramwell, L.J.—We are of opinion that the appeal must be allowed. The plaintiffs are the assignees of a policy of marine insurance, and they have brought an action on it against the defendants, who have pleaded a set-off founded upon a debt due to them from the original assured. The question is whether this is any defence in point of law, and we are of opinion that it is not. The defendants rely upon the last clause of sect. 1 of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 86, and their defence is based upon the words, "and the defendant in any action shall be entitled to make any defence which he would have been entitled to make if the said action had been brought in the name of the person by whom or for whose account the policy was effected." This is a statute relating to procedure only: and I do not think that such words as I have read can make any difference as to the rights of the parties in an Act of Parliament relating to procedure. Without the aid of the statute the assignee might have sued at law in the name of the assured, and in a court of equity in his own name. The statute was passed because the Legislature wished to give the assignee a more convenient remedy, and intended that he should be in the same position as if he had sued in a court of equity; no alteration in the rights of the parties was contemplated, and in equity I have high authority for saying that such a set-off as this would be no defence. The assignee would be allowed to sue in a court of equity in his own name, because there was a technical objection to his suing in his own name in a court of law, but in equity the underwriter would not be permitted to set up any defence which he could not plead in a court of law. At the time this Act (31 & 32 Vict. c. 86) passed, this set-off would have been no defence either at law or in equity.

It has been argued that by Rules of the Supreme Court 1875, Order XIX., r. 3, the set-off is admissible as a defence on the ground that that rule is to be read together with 31 & 32 Vict. c. 86, s. 1. The House of Lords have decided that a general statute may repeal a particular statute; nevertheless I do not think that this rule alters 31 & 32 Vict. c. 86, which did not allow such an answer as this. The rule does not authorise a "defence" within the meaning of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 86. It is true that it speaks of "set-off" and "counter-claim," but these are different remedies from "set-off" under the statutes, 2 Geo. 2 c. 22, s. 13, and 8 Geo. 2 c. 24, s. 5. Under those statutes set-off never gave the defendant a judgment for any amount; he never could recover anything from the plaintiff. The former plea of set-off merely alleged that the plaintiff's claim did not overtop the defence. But the argument for the defendants was that whatever was a defence to a liquidated claim has been made by Order XIX., r. 3, a defence to an unliquidated claim. I cannot assent to that argument. According to it, if A. sues B. for damages for breaking his leg, B. may set up as a "defence" a claim against A. as the acceptor of a bill of exchange; is it possible to say that that can be deemed a "defence?" The rule does not authorise such an answer as this, and I am confirmed in this opinion by its concluding words, which allow a court or judge to refuse the defendant permission to avail himself of it. It is hardly to be supposed that this provision can refer to a defendant's right to defend himself. The orders and rules under the Supreme Court of Judicature Acts 1873, 1875, are matters of procedure, and are not intended to alter the law or the rights of the parties. If before those statutes the plaintiffs would have been entitled to maintain the action for the full amount from which the defendants seek to deduct 40*l.*, the plaintiffs can maintain it now.

CHANCERY DIVISION.

(Before Bacon, V.C.)

McStephens and Co. v. Carnegie and others.

Practice—Service out of the jurisdiction—Contract—Rules of Court 1875, Order XI., r. 1.

In an action by a first mortgagee of a British ship and her freight against a second mortgagee, the mortgagor and puisne incumbrancers claiming an account, the plaintiff, the first mortgagee, discovered part of the mortgaged property in the hands of R. and Co., a firm of Antwerp merchants, who claimed to retain it as against a debt due to them from the second mortgagee. The plaintiff thereupon obtained an order for leave to amend by adding R. and Co. as defendants, and for leave to serve them with notice of the writ. On motion by defendants to discharge this order, Held, that the court had jurisdiction to make the order for service of notice of the writ on R. and Co. under Order XI., r. 1, on the ground that the contract in respect of which the action was brought was an English contract.

This was a motion on behalf of some of the defendants Messrs. Ruys and Co., a firm of merchants at Antwerp, to discharge an order made at chambers directing service upon them at Antwerp of notice of a writ of summons in the above action.

The plaintiffs were the first mortgagees of a British ship the India, and her freight, by virtue of a mortgage executed by both parties in London.

The several defendants were—the second mortgagee of the ship and freight; his trustee in liquidation; the master of the ship; the trustee in bankruptcy of the mortgagor; the owners of the ship, Messrs. Baldwin; Law, Surtees, and Co., who claimed a charge on the freight for advances under a letter subsequent in date to the plaintiff's mortgage; and Ruys and Co. (the moving defendants), the holders of the freight, who also claimed to retain the freight as against a debt due to them from the second mortgagee.

The plaintiff's mortgagee was executed in January or February 1877, and the defendant Carnegie's second mortgage in March following. In June 1877 the India arrived at Antwerp from the Mediterranean, and proceedings were commenced at Antwerp in the name of Wetherell, the master, under which a sum of 30,000 francs as freight was ordered to be paid, according to the plaintiff's contention, to Wetherell, as representing the owner Baldwin, but according to the contention of the defendant Carnegie, to Ruys & Co. as agents for him, as assignee of the freight. The fund eventually found its way into the hands of Messrs. Ruys & Co. The India afterwards came on from Antwerp to London, where she was sold, in pursuance of an order of the Admiralty Division, for the purpose of paying the wages of the crew and the wages and disbursements of the master. The plaintiff's claim was for an account of what was due to them on their mortgage, an account of what was due to them for wages of the crew of the India, and for expenses in taking charge of her down to the time of her sale, and for costs in the Admiralty action, a declaration that they were entitled to payment out of the freight, and for a receiver thereof, and an injunction to restrain the defendants from dealing with the same.

An order had been obtained in Chambers for leave to amend by making Ruys & Co. parties, and for leave to serve upon them notice in lieu of service of the writ of summons. The statement of claim as amended alleged that Ruys & Co. claimed to retain the freight against a debt due to them by Carnegie.

Everitt, for the motion.—These defendants are foreigners out of the jurisdiction, and the subject-matter of the action as against them is not situate within the jurisdiction. The case is not within any one of the alternatives mentioned in Order XI., r. 1. The court has therefore no jurisdiction, and the plaintiff, if he sues Ruys & Co., must sue them in the foreign court:

Schibsby v. Westernholz, L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 155;
Cresswell v. Parker, 40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 599; L. Rep. 11 Ch. Div. 601; Tottenham v. Berry, L. Rep. 12 Ch. Div. 797.

H. Burton Buckley, for the plaintiffs.—The main causes of action arose within the jurisdiction, and the relief claimed against Ruys and Co. is merely subsidiary, so that the fact of the cause of action against them having arisen out of the jurisdiction is immaterial. The plaintiff's proceedings are perfectly regular; notice of the writ must be served, not the writ, and there is nothing to prevent the issue of a writ against the foreigners:

Westman v. Aktiebolaget Ekmans, &c., L. Rep. 1 Ex Div. 237.

That is a common law case, but the same rules apply in the Chancery Division.

Padley v. Camphausen, L. Rep. 10 Ch. Div. 550;

In Tottenham v. Barry (supra) and Cresswell v. Parker (supra),

The defendants were resident in Ireland and Scotland respectively, and Scotland and Ireland are provided for in other ways, therefore this court had no jurisdiction. These decisions are not authorities for the present case.

Everitt in reply.

BACON, V.C.—I cannot accede to this application. I am of opinion the court has full jurisdiction under Order XI., r. 1, to make the order the defendants now seek to set aside, for the contract upon which the claim is based is an English contract. The case presents itself to me thus. A first mortgagee claiming against the mortgagor and puisne incumbrancers finds part of the property in the hands of a firm of Antwerp merchants, who make some claim to it, because the second mortgagee owes the money; the first mortgagee's right, which is paramount to that claim, is the right interfered with so that it cannot matter where the contract between the second mortgagee and Ruys and Co. was entered into. The order for service of notice of the writ of summons on these defendants is perfectly right, and the motion must therefore be refused, with costs.

CROOKS AND CO. v. ALLAN AND ANOTHEE.

General average loss—Duty of shipowner—Exemption from damages capable of being covered by insurance.

The plaintiffs' goods, shipped in a steamer of the defendants to be carried further by railway, were injured by water used to extinguish a fire on board. The defendants refused to give any assistance to the plaintiffs to get an average statement made out or to recover contribution, on the ground that the ship was not liable to contribution by reason of a clause in the bill of lading to the effect that the shipowner and railway company were not to be liable for any damage to any goods which was capable of being covered by insurance.

Held, by Lush, J., upon further consideration, that this clause had reference to and qualified the defendants' liability as carriers only, and did not preclude contribution to general average; also that the plaintiffs' loss by the defendants' refusal was recoverable in this action.

THIS was an action tried before Lush, J. at the last Liverpool Summer Assizes, and was argued afterwards upon further consideration.

Herschell, Q.C. and J. C. Matthew for the plaintiffs.

C. Russell, Q.C. and French for the defendants.

The facts and arguments are sufficiently stated in the judgment. Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 20.—LUSH, J.—The plaintiffs are the shippers of goods on board the Sardinian, a steamer belonging to the defendant company, for conveyance from Liverpool to Montreal. In the course of the voyage a fire broke out in the hold, which made it necessary to scuttle the ship in order to protect the whole from destruction. The water materially damaged the plaintiffs' goods, and occasioned a general average loss. The ship returned to Liverpool, the cargo was discharged, and handed over by the defendants to the Liverpool Salvage Association to be distributed and disposed of as might be most for the benefit of the parties concerned.

The complaint against the defendants is that they refused to give any assistance to enable either the association or the underwriters, or the persons whose goods were so damaged, to get an average statement made out or to take any steps to enable the plaintiffs to recover contribution. They delivered up the cargo without taking the usual security from any of the owners of cargo, and the plaintiffs were not only without the benefit of such security, but without the means of ascertaining in what proportions the several cargo owners were liable to contribute or even who, besides the defendants, were the contributing parties. The defendants' reason for adopting so unusual a course avowedly was because they considered the ship not liable to contribution, and they based their claim to immunity from general average on a clause in the bill of lading. By this instrument the defendants undertake to deliver the goods at the port of Montreal (unless prevented by certain specified perils) unto the Grand Trunk Railway, by them to be forwarded, "upon the conditions before and after expressed," thence per railway to the station nearest to Toronto, and at the said station delivered to the consignees at a through tonnage freight. Then follow a number of minute stipulations and exemptions, amongst which is the following: "The shipowner or railway company are not to be liable for any damage to any goods which is capable of being covered by insurance, nor for any claim, notice of which is not given before the removal of the goods, nor in any case for more than the invoice or declared value of the goods whichever shall be the least." The case is, in my opinion, not distinguishable from Schmidt v. The Royal Mail Steamship Company (a) (45 L. J. 641 Q.B.). Although the words "fire and the consequences thereof," which are the words relied on in that case, are here found in the previous enumeration of perils, the words in

"Shipped in good order and well conditioned by H. Ceske in and upon the steamship Alice, whereof Mabb is master for the present voyage, or whoever else may go as master in the said ship, and now lying in the port of Havre, and bound for Southampton. Six cases goods being marked and numbered as per margin, the said goods to be transhipped or landed and reshipped on board the Royal Mail steam-packet appointed to sail for the West Indies on the 17th day of Dec. 1874, and failing shipment by her then by any subsequent steamer in which there is space, for the West Indies, to be carried and conveyed to Colon (Aspinwall) and Panama to San Francisco, that is to say, by arrangement between the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company and Pacific Mail Steamship Company, to be carried to Colon (Aspinwall) by the packets of the said Royal Mail Steam Packet Company from Colon (Aspinwall) to Panama by the said Panama Railroad Company, and thence to the port of destination by the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, with leave to tow and assist vessels in distress, to sail with or without pilots, to tranship from one to another of the packets of the Steam Packet Company, and to lighter from steamer to steamer, and from steamer to shore, and to load at port or ports, and to be delivered in such good order and condition as aforesaid (the act of God, enemies, pirates, robbers, and thieves by land or at sea, privateers, letters of marque, or reprisals, rising of passengers, restraint of princes, governments, rulers, and people, vermin, barratry, collisions at sea or in port, fire on board, in hulk, or craft, on wharf, in warehouses or cars, or on shore, lighterage in the bay of Panama, all accidents, loss and damage from machinery, boilers, and steam, or from accidents or perils of the seas, or of land or rivers, or of sail or steam navigation, of whatever nature or kind soever, or from any act, neglect, or default whatsoever of the pilot, master, or marines, in navigation being excepted), the parties hereto being in no way liable for any consequences of the causes above excepted at San Francisco under Messrs. All responsibility on the part of the above-mentioned companies is to cease on the happening of any of the above excepted contingencies, or on the delivery of the above-mentioned packets at the ship's tackles at the port of San Francisco; and freight and primage is to be considered as earned ship lost or not lost." [The rest of the bill of lading set out is not material to the points decided.]

4. The Nile sailed for Colon with a general cargo, including the said goods. In the course of the voyage, and while the said goods were so on board the Nile, a fire accidentally broke out in the vessel's hold, and in order to extinguish it a large quantity of water was thrown down or pumped into the hold by the defendant's servants, and some of the defendant's said goods were damaged by the water. None of the plaintiff's goods were on fire.

5. By the means aforesaid the fire was extinguished and the Nile completed her voyage, and the said goods were subsequently delivered to the plaintiff at San Francisco.

6. The value of the Nile at termination of the said voyage was 60,000*l.* and upwards. The plaintiff contends that the steps taken to extinguish the fire as in paragraph 4 mentioned were taken for the preservation of the vessel her cargo and freight and the whole adventure and gave rise to a claim for general average, and that the plaintiff is entitled to contribution in general averages from the defendants as owners of the Nile to the damage so occasioned to his said goods.

The defendants contend that the above steps do not give rise to any claim on the part of the plaintiffs to general average as against the defendants; and that, according to the true construction of the said bill of lading and the 503rd section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, (I), the defendants are protected from and are not liable to make any such contribution.

The court is to have power to draw any inference of fact that a jury could draw.

Cohen, Q.C. (J. C. Mathew with him).

Bult, Q.C. (Day, Q.C., and Sutton with him).

BLACKBURN, J.—The position of the parties is a very simple one. The defendants have carried goods belonging to the plaintiff under a bill of lading, and the goods have been injured during the voyage in the way described in the case. Now centuries before the bills of lading or policies of insurance was invented, the rule was in existence that where some goods are sacrificed for the general benefit, the loss was not to be borne by the owner of those goods alone, but the loss incurred for the sake of all shall be made good by the contribution of all. Here question must, like those, be construed to have reference to and to qualify their liability as carriers. I adopt the words which I used in that case, and repeat that "the office of the bill of lading is to provide for the rights and liabilities of the parties in reference to the contract to carry, and is not concerned with liabilities to contribution in general average," and unless the contrary appears the words used must be so construed. The argument receives additional force in the present case from the fact that in the clause in question, the carriage on board the ship, and the carriage by railway are linked together. Goods may be damaged in their transit in ship or on the railway, but general average contribution can only arise in respect of damage on ship.

It was stated by the counsel for the defendants in the course of the argument that these words were introduced in order to get over the case just referred to, and to relieve the shipowner from general contribution. If the words fairly bore that construction, another and a more serious question would have arisen, a question which might equally have arisen if the claim was one strictly within the meaning of this clause. The long list of excepted perils and the much longer list of exemptions and qualifications of which the clause in question is one, and which seem designed to exonerate the shipowners from all liability as carriers, and to reduce them substantially to the condition of irresponsible bailees, are printed in type so minute, though clear, as not only not to attract attention to any of the details, but to be only readable by persons of good eyesight. The clause in question comes in about the middle of thirty closely-packed small-type lines without a break sufficient to attract notice. If a shipowner wishes to introduce into his bill of lading so novel a clause as one exempting him from general average contribution—a clause which not only deprives the shipper of an ancient and well-understood right, but which might avoid his policy, and deprive him also of recourse to the underwriter—he ought not only to make it clear in words, but also to make it conspicuous by inserting in it such type and such a part of the document as that a person of ordinary capacity and care could not fail to see it. A bill of lading is not the contract, but only the evidence of the contract, and it does not follow that a person who accepts the bill of lading which the shipowner hands him, necessarily, and without regard to circumstances, binds himself to abide by all its stipulations. If a shipper of goods is not aware when he ships them or is not informed in the course of the shipment that the bill of lading which will be tendered to him will contain such a clause, he has a right to suppose that his goods are received on the usual terms, and to require a bill of lading which shall express those terms. Notwithstanding the concluding sentence of these small-typed thirty lines, which says, "In accepting this bill of lading the shipper or other agent of the owner of the property carried expressly accepts and agrees to all the stipulations, exceptions, and conditions, whether written or printed," I should have thought it right, if the stipulation in question bore the meaning contended for, to give the plaintiff an opportunity of supplying, by means of an official inquiry, information as to the circumstances under which the goods were shipped and the bill of lading was taken, and whether the special clauses of this remarkable document were brought to their notice or were read by them before they accepted it. It is necessary in the present case to ascertain these facts, because the clause has not the meaning which the defendants ascribe to it, and the only question is the liability of the ship to contribute.

The next question is whether a shipowner is bound to exercise the power he is invested with when a general average loss has arisen, and to afford the means in his power for adjusting the average claims and liabilities, and secure their payment to the parties entitled. It seems strange that such a point has not been formally decided in this country. It has been decided in America in favour of the shipper. (a) I am not aware that it has ever been judicially questioned here, and I can only account for the absence of direct authority by supposing that the universal practice has been accepted as proof of the obligation. It is clear that the shipowner has a lien for general average on the whole of the cargo liable to contribution, and can require, before he parts with it, security for its due payment. In early times the master, when he had jettisoned part of the cargo to save the whole adventure, took and rendered contribution in kind. The ordinary course now is, and has been for a very long time, for the shipowner to require, before he delivers the cargo, an average bond or agreement for the payment of what shall be found due from each shipper for his proportion of the loss. He is the only person who has the power to require this security.

(a) See Parsons on Shipping, vol. i. pp. 475, 477; Gillett v. Ellis, 11 Illinois Rep. 599, 582; Dupont du Nemours v. Vance, 19 Howard's Rep. 162.—ED.

the defendants have carried the goods and the loss has been sustained. But then by the bill of lading they have extended the exceptions of matters for which they shall not be liable to fire and its consequences. That is, they say our obligation on the contract to deliver these goods is subject to these exceptions enumerated. I am perfectly certain on the true construction of the bill of lading that this is the meaning, namely, that their contract as common carriers is subject to the specified exceptions, and it is not that their liability to contribution in general average as owners of the ship is to be taken away. Another point has been raised under the 503rd section of the Merchant Shipping Act. I think the answer to it is exactly the same. The matter on account of which the shipowner is to be excused from his obligation to deliver is these things happening, but there is no intention to say if the whole of the adventure be imperilled at sea and the danger be from fire, that when under such circumstances a sacrifice of a certain part of the cargo is properly made to save the rest of the ship, that loss is to be borne by the one only. We decided the very point in Aspinwall v. The Merchant Shipping Company (not reported) on Tuesday last, and rightly, as I have no doubt, and I decide it again. I will only say further than I said there, that a wilful sacrifice, as in this case, is equally the same as if the loss had occurred in any other less direct manner.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The office of the bill of lading is to provide for the rights and liabilities of the parties in reference to the contract to carry, and is not concerned with liabilities to contribution in general average where a loss has been occasioned by a sacrifice properly made for the general benefit.

[This point seems never to have been raised in the United States, there being no trace of it in the text books or reports.—ED.]

The right to detain for average contribution is derived from the civil law, which also imposes on the master of the ship the duty of having the contribution settled, and of collecting the amount, and the usage has always been substantially in accordance with this law, and has become part of the common law of the land.

I am therefore of opinion, first that the bill of lading does not exempt the shipowner from contribution to a general average loss, and secondly that he is liable to this action for not having taken the necessary steps for procuring an adjustment of the general average and securing its payment. This is all which I am required to decide, and my judgment will therefore be entered for the plaintiffs, with costs.

Forwood v. North Wales Mutual Marine Insurance Company.

Marine insurance—Constructive total loss—Absolute damage caused by perils insured against.

A shipowner claimed against the insurance company, of which he was a member, upon a policy of insurance incorporating the bye-laws of the company. A constructive total loss of the ship was admitted, but the defendants disputed the claim on the strength of a bye-law which provided that, in the event of any ship being stranded or damaged and not taken into a place of safety, it should be lawful for the directors of the company to use every possible means in their power to procure the safety of the said ship, the owner bearing his proportion of the expense incurred; and that no acts of the company or its agents under or in pursuance of the power thereby reserved to the company, shall be deemed or taken to be an acceptance or recognition of any abandonment of which the assured may have given notice to such company; and that the company, under any circumstances, should only pay for the absolute damage caused by the perils insured against, which in no case was to exceed the sum insured:

Held, by Lush, J., on further consideration, that this bye-law was no answer to the action.

This was an action tried before Lush, J., and argued upon further consideration. The plaintiff claimed upon a policy of marine insurance on his ship in respect of a constructive total loss.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 20.—Lush, J.—The only question raised before me in this case is whether the defendants are liable upon the policy stated in the pleadings for a constructive total loss. It is candidly admitted in the statement of defence that the vessel was, whilst the policy was in force, damaged by perils of the sea to such an extent that the cost of repairing would have amounted to more than the ship would have been worth when repaired; that a prudent uninsured owner would not have repaired her, but would have sold her unrepaired, and that the plaintiff within a reasonable time gave notice of abandonment, that in effect there was a constructive total loss; but the contention of the defendants is that the policy read in connection with the bye-laws excluded such a liability, and confined the assured in such a case as this, where the ship remained, and might have been repaired as a ship, to claim as for a partial loss only.

There is nothing in the policy itself which sanctions such a defence. It states that in consideration of the person effecting it agreeing to become a member of the company, and to pay all contributions and other sums which, in respect of such insurance, shall become payable to the company, and in all other respects to observe and perform all things to be observed and performed on the part of the assured according and subject to the bye-laws indorsed thereon, the company insured, lost or not lost, 1000*l.*, on the ship valued at 3600*l.* After enumerating the perils insured against, it expressed it to be thereby declared and agreed that the acts of assurer or assured in recovering, saving, or preserving the property insured should not be considered a waiver or acceptance of abandonment.

This is the whole of the policy, and so far from favouring the notion that constructive total loss was to be excluded, it assumes the contrary, and in view of such an event protects the assured on the one hand from being supposed to have waived his abandonment, and to have resumed the property be endeavouring to save it from utter destruction, and protects the assurer on the other hand from having any attempts which he might make for the same purpose interpreted against him as an acceptance of the abandonment. The argument therefore rests on the 24th bye-law, which is taken to be incorporated in the policy. It is not necessary to consider what would have been the rights of the assured if the bye-law had been at variance with anything found in the policy, for I am of opinion that the bye-law does not affect to deal with a constructive total loss, but with a different state of things. The first bye-law directs the form of the policies, and the bye-laws are indorsed upon it, and it would be strange if either of those bye-laws should contain anything contradictory of or inconsistent with the policy. Any construction which the words admit of must be adopted rather than this. There is, however, nothing ambiguous in them. They are, "Every loss, by stranding or otherwise, shall, without delay be made known to the manager, and all protests, vouchers, surveys, and other statements relating thereto shall be sent to the manager and laid before the directors, and be subject to the stipulations contained in these bye-laws. In the event of any ship being stranded or damaged, and not taken into a place of safety, it shall be lawful for the directors of the company to use every possible means in their power to procure the safety of the said ship, the owner bearing his proportion of the expense incurred; and any owner or his representative refusing the co-operation of the agents of this company for the safety of such ship shall suffer a deduction of not less than 25 nor over 50 per cent., as the directors shall determine in the settlement of the claim. And it is hereby provided that no acts of the company or its agents, under or in pursuance of the power hereby reserved to the company, shall be deemed or taken to be an acceptance or recognition of any abandonment of which the assured may have given notice to such company; and the company under any circumstances shall only pay for the absolute damage caused by the perils insured against, which in no case is to exceed the sum insured."

The object of this bye-law undoubtedly was to limit the amount which the company would have to pay in the event of damage by the perils insured against, not, however, as I think, by excluding constructive total loss, but in the first place by securing the prompt removal of the damaged ship to a place of safety; and secondly by depriving the assured of the right he would otherwise have to claim any extraordinary expenditure by way of salvage or otherwise in addition to the cost of repairs. To this end it requires immediate notice of the loss to be given to the company, and empowers the company to take upon themselves the office of salvors without compromising their right to question the propriety of any abandonment which might have been made, and to charge the assured his proportion of the expense. The proviso shows that the rule has no reference to a total loss, but contemplates a partial loss only; and the last clause, upon which the company mainly rely, declares that the cost of repairs only shall in such case be recoverable. The alternative, in my opinion, is not between partial and total loss, but between cost of repairs simply and cost of repairs plus salvage or other expenditure incurred in conveying the ship to a port of refuge.

I am therefore of opinion that upon the question submitted to me the plaintiff is entitled to judgment.

Glyn, Mills, Currie, and Co. v. East and West India Dock Company.

Bills of lading—Sets of three—Rights of indorsee—Entry under second bill—Liability of warehousemen.

The consignees and owners of a cargo to arrive in London indorsed and delivered the first of three bills of lading to the plaintiffs as a collateral security for money advanced. These bills of lading had been signed by the master of the ship in the usual set, marked respectively "First," "Second," and "Third," and they represented the goods as deliverable to the said consignees or their assigns, that freight was made payable in London, and that the master had affirmed to three bills of lading, "the one of which bills being accomplished, the rest to stand void." When the ship arrived the consignees made entry of this cargo, and it was placed in defendants' warehouses. The master on the same day lodged with the defendants a copy of the manifest of the cargo, with an authority to defendants to deliver the goods to the holders of the bills of lading, and on the following day notice to detain the cargo until the freight should be paid. Upon receipt from the consignees of the second of the bills of lading, the defendants entered the consignees in their books as enterers, importers, and proprietors of the goods, and after removal of the stop for freight delivered the goods to persons other than the plaintiffs, on delivery orders signed by the consignees, the plaintiffs having no knowledge of any dealings with the cargo.

Held (by Field, J.), that upon resorting to their security, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover from the defendants the value of the goods placed with them under the bills of lading.

This action was tried on the 8th Dec. before Field, J. without a jury, when the points of law were argued.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 23.—Field, J,—This action was tried at the last Guildhall sittings before me, sitting without a jury, and after argument I reserved my judgment. The question raised on it is, whether the plaintiffs are entitled to recover as against the defendants the value of some West India produce represented by bills of lading, of which they are the bonâ fide indorsees and holders for value under the following circumstances:

On the 15th May 1878 the plaintiffs advanced the sum of 13,000*l.* to Messrs. Cottam and Co. upon the security of a large quantity of produce of which Messrs. Cottam and Co. were the consignees and owners, and the bills of lading representing which they indorsed and delivered to the plaintiffs by way of collateral security for the advance. A part of the produce consisted of sugar which had been shipped at Jamaica, and was then at sea on board the Mary Jones, and, as the facts in reference to this sugar are substantially identical with those relating to the rest of the produce, it was agreed upon the argument that the produce ex Mary Jones should represent the whole. The bills of lading thus indorsed and delivered had as usual been signed by the master in a set of three, and each of the set was conspicuously marked as "first," "second," and "third." They were dated the 15th April, and represented the goods as deliverable to "Cottam and Co. or their assigns," freight being made payable in London, and they contained the usual clause, by which it was witnessed that the master had affirmed to three bills, "the one of which bills being accomplished the rest to stand void." It was the "first" of the set which Cottam and Co. transferred to the plaintiffs, and it was the only one which they ever indorsed. Contemporaneously with the advance, Cottam and Co. also signed a memorandum of the deposit of the goods, by which the advance was made repayable on the 15th July. Liberty was given to the plaintiffs to realise the goods in the event of default or other "cause of need," and the memorandum contained provisions for the insurance of the goods by Cottam and Co. against fire, and for the application of any money recovered under the policy in part liquidation of the advance. The Mary Jones, which was a general ship, arrived in London, her port of discharge, on the 28th May, and on that day Cottam and Co. made entry of such of the goods on board as were consigned to them, being the goods in question, and those goods, as well as the rest of the cargo, were landed and placed in the custody of the defendants in their warehouse. On the same day the master lodged with the defendants a copy of the manifest of the whole of his cargo, at the foot of which he signed an authority to the defendants to deliver the goods to the "holders of the bills of lading." On the following day, May 29th, the master lodged with the defendants notice, under sect. 68 of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act of 1862, directing the defendants to detain the cargo until the freight should be paid. On the 31st May the consignees of the goods in question, Cottam and Co., produced to or lodged with the defendants the second part of the set of three of the bills of lading of the goods in question, and the defendants then entered Cottam and Co. under appropriate columns in their books as the "enterers," "importers," and "proprietors" of the goods. Nothing further appears to have been done as to the goods until the 7th June, on which day the stop for freight was removed, and the goods remained in the defendants' custody until the 3rd and 8th of July, on which days they delivered them to Messrs. T. E. Williams for their own use and benefit under delivery orders signed by Cottam and Co. on the 2nd July, and lodged by them with the defendants on the following day. In the case of some of the other produce, forming part of the plaintiffs' security, the defendants made out warrants in favour of Cottam and Co. upon orders lodged by them, and the deliveries were as per the indorsements on the warrants to third parties. These orders for warrants and for delivery were lodged by Cottam and Co., and the deliveries under them were made entirely without the knowledge of the plaintiffs, and Cottam and Co. having filed their petition for liquidation on the 15th Aug. with a large balance due by them to the plaintiffs, the latter proceeded to resort to their security. On application, however, to the defendants the plaintiffs discovered the dealings which had taken place with their goods as above detailed, and having made a subsequent demand of delivery, with which of course the defendants could not and did not comply, the present action was brought.

The question involved is the one so often unfortunately raised in courts of justice, as to which of two innocent parties is to suffer by the dishonest dealing of a third, and the only course open to a court in such a case is to ascertain upon which of the parties the loss is cast by operation of the rules of law applicable to the case, and to decide accordingly. In this action the question is one of considerable mercantile importance, and I have taken time to consider the authorities applicable to it, but the legal result of the facts has always seemed and now seems to me reasonably plain.

By the pledge by Cottam and Co., who were unquestionably the owners of the goods, to the plaintiffs, on the 15th May, and the delivery to them of the indorsed bill of lading, the plaintiffs as indorsees unquestionably became entitled to all Cottam and Co.'s rights. This is established (if authority be necessary) by the case of Meyerstein v. Barber (16 L. T. Rep. 569; L. Rep, 2 C. P. 39; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 420, 518; 3 Ib. 449), cited in the argument. It is true, however, that the plaintiffs' right of immediate possession was subject to one limitation, viz, the payment of freight on the arrival of the goods, but upon payment of the freight on the 8th June, or at all events after the subsequent demand and refusal, the right of immediate possession as well as of property was clearly vested in them. It is certain that the plaintiffs have never in any way intentionally parted with either of their rights, and the only mode by which the defendants can justify their delivery of the goods upon the order of Cottam and Co. must be by some act or conduct of the plaintiffs either of omission or commission, whereby they have held out to the defendants and induced them reasonably to believe that Cottam and Co. were the owners of and entitled to deal with the goods as their own property, or by some title paramount to that of the plaintiffs, by the coming into effect of which their title was divested. It was admitted by the learned counsel for the defendants upon the argument that the plaintiffs had not been guilty of any laches or negligence so as to estop them from setting up their title; and after a careful consideration of the evidence, I am unable to find that there was any act or conduct done or pursued by them whereby they in any way held out Cottam and Co. to the defendants as authorised, or induced the defendants to believe that they were authorised, to deal with the property in the goods. The omission to inquire for or take possession of the "second" part of the bill of lading or to give notice of the indorsement to them of the "first" were urged by the defendants' counsel as thus operating, but similar arguments were also unsuccessfully relied upon in the case of Meyerstein v. Barber (2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 420, 518; 3 Ib. 449), and I can give such contention no better answer than it then received in the judgment of Lord Hatherley.

It was in argument further admitted upon the authority of Meyerstein v. Barber (ubi sup.) that as against the persons who took the goods under the warrants or delivery orders, the plaintiffs' rights of property were sufficient to entitle them to recover the value of the goods; but it was said that this was not so as against the defendants, in whose case the question was not one of property but of contract, and it was urged that the delivery of the goods to Cottam and Co.'s order, which was the act complained of, was justified by the terms of the bill of lading (subject to which the plaintiffs admittedly took the goods), the defendants being, as was said, in the same position as the master of the Mary Jones, the goods being, as was said, in the same position as if they were still in her hold. This contention was based upon the fact that the freight remaining as it did unpaid on the 29th May, the master had availed himself of the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1862 by lodging with the defendants the notice to detain the goods, and that was said to have constituted the defendants the agents of the master for delivery. The alleged right of the master to deliver to Cottam and Co. rested upon the contention that as he had for (as it was said) the convenience of the merchant made three copies of the bill of lading whereby the goods were deliverable to Cottam and Co. by name "or assigns," the presentation by Cottam and Co. of any one copy, although unindorsed without notice of any previous indorsement of any other part of the bill, would have rendered it compulsory upon the master to deliver, or, at all events, have justified him in delivering the goods to the consignees notwithstanding that they had previously assigned the bill to the plaintiffs. It was urged that there would be a great hardship in making the master liable to the previous indorsee in such a case, as it would compel him to decide upon conflicting claims, without the means of deciding which of them was best founded, and it was said, by the presentation of one copy by the consignee, the bill of lading became by the very terms of it "accomplished," and so the plaintiffs' copy stood "void." No direct authority in support of the proposition as between the master of a ship and a consignee named in a bill of lading, who, having a right to indorse, had previously transferred his property in the goods and indorsed the bill of lading for value to a third party, was cited. Mr. Herschell, indeed, at the close of his argument referred to certain authorities on which, as he anticipated, Mr. Watkin Williams would rely for the defendants; but, although the latter to some extent urged propositions in the direction of which those authorities tend, he did not cite them in support of his argument. I have, however, thought it my duty to examine them, and this seems to be the result. The earliest case is that of Fearon v. Bowers (1 Sm. L. C. 5th edit. p. 705), which was cited by Lord Loughborough with appproval in his celebrated judgment in Lickbarrow v. Mason (1 Sm. L. C. 5th edit. p. 601), in which in a case of stoppage in transitu by the vendor, where the prior indorsee for value from the purchaser brought an action against the master who had delivered to the vendor's agent upon production of a copy subsequently indorsed to him by the vendor, the master was held by Lee, C. J. entitled to succeed. In this case a mercantile usage is reported as having been proved that, when bills of lading are indorsed to different persons, the master has a right to deliver to whichever he thinks proper, and is discharged by a delivery to either, and is not obliged to consider the merits of the different claims, and it was upon that evidence that Lee, C. J. directed a verdict for the defendant. This case was cited in the argument, with approval by Dr. Lushington, in the case of The Tigress (1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 323; 32 L. J. 97, P. M. & A.). The latter case was cited in the argument of Meyerstein v. Barber (L. Rep. 4 H. of L. 317; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 449), and, although it was not noticed in the judgment, Lord Westbury is reported to have said that possibly the shipowner might be justified, in cases like that before him between two indorsees of the bill of lading, in delivering to the person producing the bill of lading. It is, however, to be observed that the views of these two eminent judges were not necessarily the foundation of their judgment in either case; and in Meyerstein v. Barber (2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 420) Willes, J. appears to have entertained a different opinion, and the doctrine thus enunciated seems to conflict strongly with the general doctrine of the liability of wharfingers, warehousemen, and other bailees, who, it is clear, are under the obligation under similar circumstances to decide between rival claimants at their peril, or to interplead (see per Willes, J. in Meyerstein v. Barber; Wilson v. Anderton, 1 B. & Ad. 450).

In the present case it is not, however, necessary for me to decide this question, for I am of opinion that the defendants did not at the time that they delivered the goods upon Cottam and Co's orders, occupy the position or have vested in them any such right or obligation of the master if it exist.

It seems to me that the only authority conferred upon the defendants by the master was to detain until payment of the freight, and then to deliver to the holder of the bill of lading. Upon the release of freight on the 8th June the interest and duty of the master ceased, and the defendants became either simple agents for the holders of the bill of lading or mere bailees of Cottam and Co. under the entry of the goods made by them. In support of this first view of their character, even if that be not the implication of law resulting from the facts, it is to be observed that, on the day before the master lodged the stop freight, he had lodged a copy of his manifest in a printed form supplied by the defendants for use at their docks. By the terms of this document, as originally printed, the master purported to give an authority to the defendants to deliver the goods to the "consignees or holder of the bill of lading," and it also contained directions applicable to a case in which the master himself, in default of the consignees taking delivery of the cargo, deposits the goods with the dock company under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act, but, as in this case, the consignees, Cottam and Co., took delivery, and entered the goods, the master, before signing the copy manifest, struck out all the latter part, and also struck out the words "consignees," leaving therefore the authority merely to deliver to the "holder of the bill of lading"—in other words, to the plaintiffs—who alone filled that character, and of whom, therefore, after the payment of the freight the defendants would become the agents.

If, on the other hand, the defendants are to be regarded, as it seems to me they are, as the warehousemen or ordinary bailees of Cottam and Co., then they have no better title as against the plaintiffs than their bailors, and cannot justify the delivery to the orders of the latter: (Balut v. Hartley, 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 337; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 594.)

If it is said to be a hardship on the defendants that they should be liable for delivery upon the production of the second part of the bill of lading without any knowledge of a previous indorsement, it may be observed that they had the remedy in their own hands, as the part so produced was conspicuously marked "second," and they had only to require the production of the "first" part, which, as is well known, is usually sent to the consignee, and in case of the non-production of it to take an indemnity before delivery. Indeed, that is the course pursued by the defendants in their East India trade, in which the original bills of lading only are accepted, and in case of loss the defendants require satisfactory proof of title and an indemnity; thus showing that in that trade at least precautions are taken which, if taken by the defendants in the present case, would have protected them against loss. If the law were held to be different from the result at which I have arrived, the consignee who had sold or dealt with goods to arrive would only have to avail himself of his almost necessary earlier knowledge of the arrival of the goods to anticipate, by production of his bill of lading, any production by the indorsee of the original previously indorsed, and thus most seriously affect the transaction of any such dealings which are effected solely in reliance upon the shipping documents. The only remaining question is, whether the defendants have been guilty of what is technically called a conversion so as to entitle the plaintiffs to recover from them the value of the goods.

The various cases cited in Hollins v. Fowler (L. Rep. 7 H. of L, 757) were referred to by the defendants for the purpose of contending that in the present case they had done no more than that which is ordinarily done by packers, carriers, wharfingers, warehousemen, and other bailees, who, when they have merely carried the goods, or dealt with them in the way of their trade, or delivered them to their bailors consistently with the purpose for which they were bailed, have not been held liable for the value of the goods. But the facts in the present case are in no way analogous to those, for here the defendants have absolutely delivered the produce upon the orders of Cottam and Co. to third parties, purchasers, or others, intending to sell or use them for their own benefit. The defendants, therefore have recognised a title, and assumed and exercised a dominion over the goods utterly inconsistent with the plaintiffs' rights as proprietors, which are to take them wherever and when they please, and by this act of the defendants the plaintiffs have been permanently deprived of their property. That such acts entitle the plaintiffs to recover in this action the value of the property seems to me clear, and I therefore give a verdict and judgment for the plaintiffs for the amount which the parties have undertaken to fix.

CAPPER AND CO. v. WALLACE BROTHERS.

Charter-party—As near to safe port as ship can safely get.

By a charter-party the plaintiff's ship was to proceed with a full cargo of merchandise to a safe port in the United Kingdom or on the Continent, between Havre and Hamburg, as ordered on signing bills of lading, or so near thereto as she might safely get, and deliver the cargo on payment of a specified tonnage freight; the cargo was to be brought to and taken from alongside at merchant's risk and expense. The master was to sign bills of lading without prejudice to the defendants; and, by the bills of lading, the ship was ordered to Koogerpolden, about thirty miles from the mouth of the North Holland Canal. The ship drew too much water to get through the canal without discharging more than a third part of her cargo; and no agent of the charterers or the consignees was at hand to give directions.

Held, upon a case stated, that, under the circumstances, the master was justified in considering the voyage at an end, and in treating the mouth of the canal where he was anchored as the place of discharge; and that the defendants were liable for the lighterage from that place.

THIS was a special case, the facts of which are fully stated in the judgment of the court.

Feb. 20.—Herschell, Q.C. (with him A. L. Smith) argued for plaintiffs.

Butt, Q.C. (with him Arbuthnot) for defendants.

The arguments, like the facts, sufficiently appear in the judgment. Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 24.—LUSH, J. delivered the judgment of the court (Lush and Manisty, JJ.):—This is an action for the cost of lightering a cargo from Nieuwedeep through the North Holland Canal to the port of Koogerpolden, which is situated at the extremity of the canal, and about thirty miles from its mouth.

By a charter-party between the plaintiffs, as owners of the Aberaman, and the defendants, it was agreed that the vessel should take in at Bombay a full cargo of merchandise, and proceed therewith to a safe port in the United Kingdom, or on the continent between Havre and Hamburg, as ordered on signing bills of lading, "or so near thereunto as she may safely get," and deliver the cargo on payment of a specified tonnage freight. The only other material terms were, that the cargo was to be brought to and taken from alongside at merchant's risk and expense, and that the master was to sign bills of lading, as presented, without prejudice to the charter-party, at rates not less than those current at the port of loading. The ship was ordered to Koogerpolden, in Holland, and the master signed bills of lading, which stated that the cargo was to be delivered at the port of Koogerpolden. A marginal note stated the rate of freight, and to it were added the words "and all other conditions as per charter-party."

The Aberaman drew 19ft. 6in. of water, being about four feet deeper than the canal, consequently she could not get nearer to Koogerpolden than Nieuwedeep without discharging a considerable part of her cargo. Before the arrival of the vessel, the plaintiffs had opened a correspondence with the defendants, with a view to ascertain what course they proposed to adopt on the arrival of the vessel as near to Koogerpolden as she could safely get, stating what the draft was, and what was the capacity of the canal. The defendants, having sold the cargo afloat, refused to interfere, contending, that by the bills of lading the owners had admitted Koogerpolden to be a safe port, and had undertaken to carry the cargo there. The master had, therefore, no alternative on arriving at Nieuwedeep but either to lighter the whole of the cargo to the port of Koogerpolden or to discharge into lighters a sufficient portion to enable the ship to proceed there with the residue. He adopted the latter alternative, and procured lighters in which he discharged 573½ tons, and thereby reduced the draught to 15ft. 8in., and, having lightered that portion of the cargo to Koogerpolden, and discharged twenty of her crew, he had the vessel towed through the canal, and discharged the residue of the cargo at the port. The plaintiffs claimed the pilotage-harbour dues, and other expenses of going into port, as well as demurrage; but on the argument they consented to accept what it would have cost to lighter the whole, and this was agreed at 167*l.* The defendants paid into court sufficient to cover the lighterage of the 573½ tons, but denied their liability to the residue of the claim.

We are of opinion that the bills of lading have not the effect of altering the contract so as to bind the owners as against the charterers to deliver at the port of Koogerpolden. The master had no authority so to alter the contract even if he had intended to do so, but we are satisfied that such was not his intention, but that he signed the bills of lading in the form presented to him, in compliance with and in order to carry out the terms of the charter-party. The only effect which can be given to the bills of lading as between these parties is to preclude the plaintiffs from objecting that Koogerpolden was a safe port, and to bind the plaintiffs to the same extent as, and no further than, if Koogerpolden had been named in the charter-party as the port of discharge.

It cannot, we think, be laid down as an inflexible rule that when a ship has got as near to the port as she can get, and the only impediment to proceeding further is overdraught, the master is under all circumstances entitled to consider the voyage at an end. He is bound to use all reasonable means to reach the port. The words "as near thereto as she can safely get" must receive a reasonable, not a literal application. The overdraught may be such, and the cargo so easily dealt with, as that the surplus may be removed, and the ship sufficiently lightened without exposing her to extra risk, or the owner to any prejudice, and without substantially breaking the continuity of the voyage, and in such a case, if the consignee is at hand to receive the surplus cargo and to relieve the overdraught, we are of opinion that it would be the duty of the master to lighten the ship and proceed to the port. This is the principle laid down by the Court of Session in the case of Hillstrom v. Gibson (8 Sess. Cas. Scotland, 3rd Series, 463). In that case the master, who was bound to Glasgow, was unable to proceed beyond a point near Greenock with its full cargo on board. The consignee, being at hand, requested him to discharge what was necessary and to lighten the ship and to proceed with the residue. The majority of the court held this to be a reasonable request under the circumstances. The master complied with the request, and it was held that his going on to Glasgow was in the course of his duty, and that he could not claim demurrage for the time taken in reaching the port.

In this case the circumstances are essentially different. We are not informed what the actual tonnage was, but the registered tonnage is stated to have been 1090 tons, and 573½ tons, which was at least one-third, had to be taken out before the draught could be sufficiently reduced to enable the ship to pass through the canal in safety. Moreover, the consignee was not at hand to receive. The charterer had refused to make any arrangement, and no one appeared to take delivery. Under these circumstances, we are of opinion that the master was justified in considering the voyage at an end, and in treating the mouth of the canal, where he was anchored, as the place of discharge. We, therefore, adjudge the plaintiffs to be entitled to 102*l.*, being the balance after deducting the sum paid into court, and give judgment for that sum with costs. Judgment for plaintiffs.

The Matthew Cay.

Practice—Costs—Compulsory pilotage—Merits.

Where a defendant in a collision action raises a defence on the merits, and also on the ground of legal exemption from liability by reason of the compulsory employment of a pilot, and succeeds in the latter defence alone, he will not recover his costs.

Query, whether in cases of inevitable accident, where the practice of the Admiralty Court as to costs before the Judicature Acts was different from that of the courts of common law, the Admiralty Division will now follow the practice of the courts of common law. In cases of compulsory pilotage the Admiralty Division will adhere to the practice of the High Court of Admiralty prior to the Judicature Acts as to costs.

This was a decision as to the costs of an action in which the plea of compulsory pilotage was sustained.

A collision had taken place between the paddle-steamer Wye and the screw steamship Matthew Cay, which had the assistance of a steam-tug as well as of her own engines, in the river Avon, below Bristol. An action for the damages occasioned by the said collision was brought by the owners of the Wye. The owners of the Matthew Cay defended the action on the merits, and also on the ground that at the time of the collision the Matthew Cay was in charge of a pilot by compulsion of law, and that the collision, if caused at all by the Matthew Cay was solely occasioned by some fault or incapacity of the said pilot.

The cause was heard on Nov. 22, 1879, by Sir Robert Phillimore, assisted by Trinity Masters.

Bompas, Q.C. and Myburgh for the plaintiffs, owners of the Wye.

Milward, Q.C. and Clarkson for the defendants, owners of the Matthew Cay.

The cases relied on on the question of costs appear in the judgment.

Sir Robert Phillimore, after detailing the circumstances of the collision, said:—Now the statement of defence contains two pleas, one upon the merits, and the other upon the law as to compulsory pilotage. With regard to the merits I am of opinion, on the evidence before me, that the cause of the collision was the speed of the Matthew Cay at the time she approached the Wye, and that the stopping of her engines was not sufficient to stop her way. It appears to me, therefore, that I must decide the question on the merits in favour of the Wye. But it also appears to me that the plea of compulsory pilotage on behalf of the Matthew Cay must be sustained, as it is proved that all the orders of the pilot were obeyed. As to the question about costs, I will take time to consider, owing to the peculiar state of the law arising out of the cases that have been cited from the Court of Appeal, and also in the case in the Exchequer Division (General Steam Navigation Company v. London and Edinburgh Shipping Company, 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 454), where the learned judges declined to follow the practice of the Court of Admiralty.

Nov. 26.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is a case in which the defendants pleaded by way of defence both the merits and compulsory pilotage. The court was of opinion that the plaintiffs were right on the question of the merits, and the defendants on that of compulsory pilotage, and the matter stood over for consideration on the subject of costs. Recent decisions in the Court of Appeal have not left that question in a very satisfactory state. The decision in the case of The Daioz (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 477; 37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 137) was given in 1877. In that case the Master of the Rolls, in delivering the judgment of the court, stated the rule acted on in Admiralty causes to be that, "In a case like the present, when the owners of a vessel were relieved from liability on the ground of compulsory pilotage, no costs were given on either side either in the court below or in the Court of Appeal," and that the Court of Appeal constituted by the Judicature Acts would follow that practice. That was in a case where compulsory pilotage was pleaded. Then there is a later case on the question of inevitable accident (The Condor and Swansea, 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 115; L. Rep. 4 P. Div. 115; 40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 442), decided in 1879, in which James, L.J. is reported to have said, that "It requires great consideration, and we should consider whether it can be right that there should be one rule as to costs in one branch of the High Court of Justice, and another rule in another branch of that court;" and afterwards that "It may be considered as settled that for the future there will be no difference as to the costs between Admiralty and other appeals." That was with regard to the question of inevitable accident. It appears to me that I must follow the rule laid down in the case of The Daioz (ubi sup.), and I think it would be found upon inquiry to work a great injustice if that rule was to be changed. I say nothing about the rule in cases of inevitable accident, but where compulsory pilotage is pleaded by way of defence together with a defence on the merits, I do not see how the vessel which suffers wrong is to know that there is a pilot on board, or that he is a duly licensed pilot, or that the crew did or did not obey his orders, or did not contribute by their negligence to the collision. There are many circumstances which seem to take the practice with regard to costs in cases where compulsory pilotage, together with a defence on the merits, is pleaded out of the rule laid down in the case of The Condor (ubi sup.) with regard to costs in cases of inevitable accident. Until better instructed I shall adhere to the ruling laid down in The Daioz (ubi sup.) in cases of compulsory pilotage, and therefore I shall dismiss this case without costs on either side; that is, I shall give no costs.

THE DON RICARDO.

Practice—Bail — Sureties — Sufficiency — Cross-examination — Release — Caveat — Damages—Costs—Security.

A plaintiff has a right to require the attendance of sureties, who have justified as bail for a ship in a suit in rem, for cross-examination; but he does so at his peril as to costs and damages occasioned by the delay of the ship under arrest pending such cross-examination.

Security for costs of suit will not, as a rule, be required from a foreign mate suing a foreign ship in rem for wages.

THESE were motions in an action in rem for wages instituted by the mate of the foreign vessel Don Ricardo, against that vessel in the sum of 150*l.*, and in which the Don Ricardo was arrested at Newcastle on the 20th Jan. 1880. The defendants, the owners of the Don Ricardo, entered an appearance and subsequently extracted Bail Papers (R. G. Ad. 1859, r. 39), which were executed and served on the plaintiff's solicitors on the 22nd Jan. the ship being then ready for sea; and after twenty-four hours' lapse of time, on the 23rd Jan., the papers were filed in the registry of the Admiralty Division, and a release of the vessel was asked for. It was then found that the plaintiff had entered a caveat against the release of the vessel. The defendants thereupon moved the court to order the vessel to be released, notwithstanding the caveat. The motion came on for hearing on Saturday, 24th Jan., but was adjourned to Tuesday, 27th Jan., to allow the plaintiff to file affidavits in reply to those of the defendants.

Jan. 27.—Clarkson for defendants.—We are entitled to a release of the ship. The sureties, who have justified on oath, are quite sufficient, and the plaintiff did not take objection to their sufficiency in proper time. The delay of the ship for this small claim, occasioned by the arrest, occasions great loss and inconvenience.

Verney for the plaintiff.—We only were aware of bail being tendered on the 22nd Jan., and we have used all possible expedition; but we are not as yet satisfied that the proposed sureties are people of substance, and we have a right to satisfy ourselves on that point before the vessel, which is a foreigner, and our only real security, is allowed to leave the country. We wish the sureties to appear before the registrar of the court for cross-examination on their affidavits of sufficiency.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I cannot say that, under the circumstances, the plaintiff has no right to cross-examine the sureties on their affidavits. I shall make the order that they attend before the registrar to be cross-examined. The costs of and incident to the examination to be reserved, and the motion to stand over till after the examination.

The sureties accordingly attended before the registrar, who on the 30th Jan. made the following report:

In pursuance of the order of the court made on the 26th inst., J.T.L. and E.W., the sureties, attended before me this day to be cross-examined on their affidavits of justification; and I have now to report that the said sureties are persons of considerable means, and are sufficient sureties for a much larger sum than the amount in which they have given bail in this case, and in my opinion the objection to their sufficiency has been vexatious and groundless.

The defendants on the 3rd Feb. renewed their application for a release of the vessel, and also moved for the costs and damages occasioned by the delay in releasing her, and for security for the costs of the action.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—In this case I must pronounce for the costs and damages occasioned by these proceedings, which it appears to me have no justification. The damages must be referred to the registrar to ascertain. But I shall not order the plaintiff to give security for the costs of the action; there is a difference between the case of a master and that of a mate whose condition approximates to that of a seaman, from whom, even when a foreigner, it is not customary to require security in wages suits.

THE TALCA.

Practice—Bail for safe return—Dissentient co-owners—Minority in interest.

The minority in interest of co-owners are entitled to bail for safe return of the ship as far as the value of their shares extends, if they object to the proposed employment of the ship.

It is not a bar to the claim that the manager or ship's husband who arranged the employment of the ship was appointed with their acquiescence. (a)

Semble, they must give reasonable notice of their objection to the employment of the ship.

THIS was a motion by the defendants in an action commenced in the Swansea District Registry on the 11th Feb. 1880, by an owner of eight sixty-fourth shares of the vessel Talca, against the other owners, claiming a bond for 625*l*. for the value of his shares in the said vessel.

The indorsement on the writ was as follows:

The plaintiff, as owner of eight sixty-fourth shares of the vessel Talca, being dissatisfied with the management of the said vessel, claims that his co-owners shall give him a bond in 625*l*. for the value of the plaintiff's said shares in the said vessel.

In this suit the Talca was arrested, and on the 17th Feb. the defendants' solicitors gave notice "to release the said barque and to condemn the plaintiff in the costs of the said motion and of such release." From the plaintiff's affidavits it appeared that the plaintiff, hearing at a meeting of the owners that it was intended to send the ship away under a charter-party procured by the managing owner, at once objected, and declined to participate in any way in the voyage. On the 19th Feb. the motion was heard in court.

Clarkson for the defendants.—The plaintiff has forfeited any right he may have had to arrest the ship to get bail for safe return by his own laches; the manager of the ship was properly appointed by the owners, of whom the plaintiff is one, and he obtained a beneficial charter-party for the ship before the plaintiff in any way repudiated his authority, and loaded her in accordance with it, which must therefore be taken to have been done with the plaintiff's acquiescence; it is too late for him, when it has been done, to revoke the authority under which it was done.

Gainsford Bruce for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff gave his co-owners notice of his objection to the voyage as soon as he knew it was decided on; he has not therefore been guilty of laches. As they persisted in sending the vessel on the voyage he was justified in obtaining his bail bond at any time before the ship sailed. The right of part-owners, even if a minority in interest, to bail for safe return to the extent of the value of their interest is absolute.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The court has a discretion to exercise in these cases; and I am of opinion that on principle the bail for safe return should be granted, and that a release of the vessel should only be granted on a bail bond being given for the amount of the shares of the plaintiff for the safe return of the vessel. I do not see that the principle is in any way affected by the fact that the manager who negotiated the charter-party to which the plaintiff objects was appointed by the whole body of the co-owners without objection on the part of the plaintiff. The motion will therefore be dismissed with costs.

Solicitor for plaintiff, John Davies.

Solicitors for defendants, Pritchard and Sons.

(a) This decision is open to question. If the managing owner had the plaintiff's authority to procure employment for the ship, it is difficult to understand how that authority could be withdrawn after the employment had been obtained, and the ship chartered; had the authority been withdrawn before the chartering it would have been different. In a former case a ship was chartered by a managing owner, and the management was afterwards taken out of his hands by a majority of owners; thereupon the minority, including the late managing owner, objected to the ship being sent to sea under the new management, alleging that it would be prejudicial to their interests, and they commenced an action in rem for accounts, and also for bail for safe return; the ship being then loaded and ready to proceed to sea, the court, on the application of the charterers intervening, released the ship without bail to enable her to complete her charter-party, holding that the charter-party having been made by the late managing owner and with the privity and consent of the other plaintiffs, they could not be allowed to do anything to prevent the ship from completing her engagements. The two decisions seem inconsistent.—ED.

THE ACACIA.

Conditional bail—Offer of by mortgagee refused.

A mortgagee, although entitled to intervene in a cause in rem for equipment and repair, is not entitled to claim a release of the vessel upon giving bail conditional to pay the claim of the material men, in the event of its being held to have priority over the mortgage.

THIS was an application by motion on the part of the Messrs. Hamilton, of Port Glasgow, as registered mortgagees of the steamship Acacia, for liberty to intervene in a suit for equipment and repairs instituted by the Messrs. Harland and Wolff, of Belfast, and defend for the purpose of raising the question of the priority of their own mortgage over the plaintiffs' claim, and for liberty to give bail for the release of the said steamship as regards the claim of the Messrs. Harland and Wolff, which bail should be answerable for the payment of the claim of the Messrs. Harland and Wolff against the said vessel, in case the same should be found to take priority of the said mortgage.

The Queen's Advocate (Dr. Boyd, Q.C.) in support of the application, relied on the 70th and 71st sections of the Merchant Shipping Act as constituting the Messrs. Hamilton practically the owners of the vessel and investing them with an absolute right of sale. The mortgagees are interested in the vessel to the extent of 5800*l*., and, even assuming the right of the Messrs. Harland and Wolff to arrest the vessel, yet no claim for necessaries as against his client could be set up, unless at the time of the arrest a possessory lien could be established. He would give bail for the amount of the Messrs. Harland and Wolff's claim, but without prejudice to the priorities. He refered to

The Scio, L. Rep. 1 A. & E. 353; Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 527;
The Western Ocean. L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 38;
The Two Ellens, L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 345; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 40, 208.

Corrigan, LL.D., for the Messrs. Harland and Wolff.—Plaintiffs, in two causes of equipment and repair claiming 1400*l*., resist the application on the ground that there was already a defendant in both causes, the official assignees of the owners; that there might be other suits, that no consent of any defendant or plaintiff was shown, and that the court has not been informed whether there is any other detainer on the vessel, and the court must be satisfied that there is not before the motion can be granted. This is an attempt by motion to change the practice of the court with regard to ascertaining priorities between the Messrs. Harland and Wolff and the Messrs. Hamilton. There is no necessity for this motion, as the machinery of the court, of which we have correctly availed ourselves, is the proper method of ascertaining priorities. The question of a possessory lien, and therefore a conclusive question affecting priority, may arise in the Messrs. Harland and Wolff's cause. Again bail has been offered in one cause only, and there has been no appraisement of the ship, and her value is not known; and we are interested in any surplus if the question of priority be decided against us.

Martin Burke, for the official assignees of James S. Campbell, sole owner, a bankrupt, objected to the motion.

The Queen's Advocate in reply.—We cannot intervene now as a matter of course, but only by permission of the court. I stand on our strict legal rights, conferred by the 70th and 71st sections of the Merchant Shipping Act. The form of bail bond usually entered into will not suit here; the bond must be framed to suit this particular case.

Dec. 3.—TOWNSEND, J.—The application made to me yesterday is a novel one. In No. 732 the steamship Acacia has been arrested by warrant at the suit of the Messrs. Harland and Wolff in a suit for equipment and repairs; and subsequently in No. 738 a citation in rem has been issued against the same defendant vessel at the suit of the same plaintiffs, and a suit of mortgage has been instituted by a second citation in rem in No. 739 by the Messrs. Hamilton, who state that they are registered mortgagees for the sum of 5800*l*. The owner of the vessel has been declared a bankrupt, and his official assignees have appeared to defend in the two suits instituted by the Messrs. Harland and Wolff. This motion certainly cannot decide the priority of the claim of the Messrs. Harland and Wolff or that of the Messrs. Hamilton, who undertake to sell the vessel; and if at the hearing it be found that the Messrs. Harland and Wolff have priority, it will discharge their claim, and they are willing that the bail to be given by them should secure the probable amount of the surplus after payment of the mortgage debt and the claims of the Messrs. Harland and Wolff. It is contended for the Messrs. Hamilton that they are not only entitled to liberty to intervene, but that, under the 70th and 71st sections of the Merchant Shipping Act, they are in fact owners of the vessel, and it is also alleged that the sale would be more expeditious if conducted by the Messrs. Hamilton, and would produce larger funds than if carried out by the officers of the court. This application is resisted as being contrary to the practice of the court, and likely to render the claim of the Messrs. Harland and Wolff nugatory as against the surplus, and it is further contended that the sale should be carried out by the court on bail given for the full value of the vessel, and the motion is further resisted by the official assignees of the bankrupt owner. The Messrs Hamilton are clearly entitled to intervene, but perhaps at the present stage of the proceedings they could not do so without the permission of the court.

The question of giving bail as proposed is a new one. I have looked into the authorities which have been cited at the bar, and find that The Scio only decided the priorities of mortgages to material men who are not in possession, while in The Western Ocean no question of such bail as asked for here was raised. In The Two Ellens the bail given was unconditional, and for the full value of the ship. Had such bail been offered here cadit questio. It has been contended that were I to grant this motion, the ordinary form of bail bond would not answer, and it struck me that it would not. [His Lordship referred to the ordinary form of bail bond.] Although the Messrs. Hamilton offer to give bail in any form, it has not been shown to me what that form ought to be, and no authority has been cited to show me that I am at liberty to depart from the ordinary practice of the court. Nor has any authority been shown to me why I should accept conditional bail for the defendant ship. The 70th section of the Merchant Shipping Act does not appear to me to confer any special rights on the Messrs. Hamilton; while, on the authority of The Chieftain (Br. & L., p. 212), I think that if the owner were before the court he would have to give the ordinary bail, and I do not consider that the Messrs. Hamilton are in a better position than the owner, but are merely creditors, who, if they succeed in their demands, must be paid prior to the Messrs. Harland and Wolff. No doubt as between the several parties the offer of the Messrs. Hamilton may be a fair one, but the case is different as between the court and a suitor. I am called on to assume the responsibility of departing from the fixed practice of the court, and of framing a special form of bail bond. I decline to assume this responsibility, and must adhere to the established practice, and therefore decline to permit this property to leave the custody of the court. I must refuse with costs so much of this motion as is connected with the question of bail; but I give liberty to the Messrs. Hamilton to intervene.

Being an interlocutory order, the Queen's Advocate applied for leave to appeal, which was granted by the learned judge.

Motion refused with costs.

(Before TOWNSEND, J.)

THE VILDOSALA; THE EMERALD; THE SATELLITE; THE TOILER.

Consolidation of several causes of damage by collision in respect of the same transaction—Practice of the court with respect to consolidation considered.

The court will, in the exercise of its discretion make such order for consolidation as it considers will meet the justice of the case, and protect the interest of the suitors.

THIS was a motion on the part of the owners of the Vildosala, that their five causes should be consolidated and heard at the same time, and on the same evidence, and on the pleadings and preliminary acts already filed.

It appeared from the affidavit on which this motion was moved that in the month of December, 1879, a collision occurred in the river Liffey between the steamship Vildosala, steaming outwards, and the two ships the Emerald and the Satellite, while the two latter ships were being towed up the said river by the steamtug Toiler. Causes of damage had been instituted on the 23rd Dec. 1874, by the Emerald and the Satellite against the Vildosala, and cross actions subsequently by the Vildosala against them, and the Vildosala had also instituted a cause of damage against the Toiler.

It also appeared that the pleadings were concluded on the original causes by the Emerald and the Satellite against the Vildosala, that no pleadings had been filed in the cross action, and that in the cause instituted by the Vildosala against the Toiler, preliminary acts only had been filed. On the 5th Feb. a consent was served by the Vildosala on the Emerald, Satellite, and Toiler, by which it was sought to be agreed that all the said causes should be consolidated, and should be heard at the same time and on the same evidence, and that the Vildosala, as plaintiff, should file in the causes in which the Emerald, Satellite, and Toiler, are defendants, one joint petition against the three, and that the Toiler, Emerald, and Satellite might as defendants, file one joint answer to the said petition, or that in the alternative the said causes should be heard in manner aforesaid on the pleadings, and preliminary acts already filed as the judge should direct. This consent was altered by the owners of the Toiler, Emerald, and Satellite, by the stipulation of separate pleadings on the part of the three vessels if so advised, and the alternative was refused.

Seeds, Q.C., LL.D. (with him Corrigan, LL.D.)—Twelve pleadings have already been filed, and there is no affidavit to resist this motion. The court has power under the 75th General Order to hear causes where no pleading has been filed save preliminary acts. In The Demetrius (1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 250; L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 523) Sir R. Phillimore refers with approbation to the case of The William Hutt (Lush. 25, at p. 27), as laying down the practice of the court with respect to the consolidation of actions where the decision of each action depends as here on precisely the same facts. In The Melpomene (1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 515; L. Rep. 4 A. & E. 129) a consolidation order was made at the instance of the plaintiff, and without the consent of the defendant, while in The Bartley (Swab. 198) the plaintiffs actually were mulcted in costs because they would not consolidate. There can be no question as to our right to consolidate the causes in which the Emerald and the Satellite are plaintiffs, and for the purpose of this motion we rely not on any particular section of the Act or rules, but on the broad principle by which the practice of the court is guided in respect of the consolidation of causes.

W. M. Johnston, Q.C. (with him Martin Burke), for the Emerald, Satellite, and Toiler.—If this were a motion merely to save expense it would not have been opposed by us; but it is for the purpose of binding us to the terms of a consent which we refused, inasmuch as we considered ourselves embarrassed thereby. [He then read the portion of the consent as altered.] We have altered this consent merely to enable, if necessary, both the Emerald and Satellite, to put in separate defences, and to enable the Toiler, if she has a separate case, to come and make it by separate pleadings. The court has jurisdiction to consolidate only under the 75th General Order, 1867, by which the solicitors on both sides must consent, which they have not done here; nor can the court under the 264th General Order, 1867, alter the rules. We submit that this latter order merely gives to the court a discretionary power with regard to the enlargement of the times fixed by the orders. Our opposition to this motion is only to prevent the defendants being shut out from any defence. The practice at common law with regard to consolidation is shown by the case of The Corporation of Saltash v. Jackman (1 D. & L. 851), which was an action for tolls. The William Hutt only decided that the court had no power to dissever an order made for the consolidation of three actions, and the cases which have been relied on are salvage and not material. Nor is The Demetrius in point. We have only asked by our alteration of the consent that the Emerald and Satellite should be at liberty to file separate defences. On our petitions we have put forward a statement that the vessels were in charge of "duly qualified" pilots, and we have been met with a counter allegation that the Vildosala was in charge of a "duly licensed" pilot and with a plea of compulsory pilotage; we want to be in a position to put forward a similar defence. What the case against the Toiler may be we know not, and that cause cannot in any case be consolidated.

Corrigan, LL.D. in reply.—The circumstances connected with this collision are plain and simple matters of fact, and the question which will have to be investigated is whether the Vildosala, or the tug and tugs which must in this case be considered to be one vessel are to blame. There would be twenty-five pleadings required to make up the record; of these twelve have been already filed, and we ask the court to adopt a course which will obviate the necessity of thirteen more being placed on the record. We base our request on the practice of the court on the authority of Dr. Lushington and Sir R. Phillimore. It is objected that this consent as served by us embarrasses the Toiler, and precludes each of the three vessels from filing different defences. This is not so: the Toiler is not bound except by the preliminary act, and at the hearing she can raise any defence which the law knows of, consistent with her statement in that act, while we are bound by the statement of fact which we have made in our defences. The Corporation of Saltash v. Jackman does not apply in that case; ten ships did a similar act at different times, but here there is one single transaction only. We have followed the practice of the court in serving this consent, which is a simple and reasonable one, and because that consent has been refused have asked for costs.

Townsend, J.—This case has been admirably argued, and I think I can suggest an order which will meet Mr. Johnston's views and also those of the other side. The difficulty of dealing with this case arises not from any misconduct of the parties, but from the peculiar circumstances of the collision in which so many vessels are involved. From the affidavits which have been opened it appears that these are all causes of collision, and that they arose out of one and the same transaction. The Vildosala has been impleaded by the Emerald and the Satellite, and she has answered in both causes; she has also instituted actions against the same vessels, and these two principal cross causes must be consolidated. The Vildosala further says that the Emerald, Satellite, and Toiler are all in the wrong, and brings actions against them, and in the cause in which the Toiler has been impleaded by the Vildosala preliminary acts only have been filed. Inasmuch as the Emerald, Satellite, and Toiler are all represented by the same solicitor and counsel I assume that the case of the Toiler cannot be very different from that of the others. It is proposed on the part of the Vildosala that there should be no further pleadings. Two rules have been cited to me and have been relied on, viz., the 75th General Order, and the 264th General Order. [Here the learned Judge read both orders.] The first cannot apply unless there be a consent on both sides, which is not the case here, and I agree with Mr. Johnston's interpretation of the second, and consider that a power to modify times, or the like, only is given to the court. It is no doubt unfortunate that there have been so many pleadings, but I think we can avoid all others except one. I shall make an order that the answers of the Vildosala to the petition of the Emerald and Satellite be read as her petition in the causes against the Emerald, the Satellite, and the Toiler. I surmise that the Toiler has no new case to make, yet I do not think I have the right to shut the Toiler, the Emerald, and the Satellite out of any defence they may be advised to make. They may therefore file a joint answer to the answer, considered as a petition within one week, but if it should appear on the hearing that the filing of such defence was needless, that will be a question of costs. If there be any defence to raise, an opportunity will thus be given, and should the matter ultimately go to the Court of Appeal, the record will be in a condition to show on what grounds this court has proceeded. I will consolidate the causes in the manner which I have indicated, and thus meet what I consider the justice of the case. Costs of this motion to be costs in the consolidated cause.

COURT OF APPEAL IN ADMIRALTY.

Hamilton (apps.) v. Harland and Wolff (resps.); The Acacia.

Practice to ascertain priorities.

Sale of vessel by decree of the High Court of Admiralty restrained in order to ascertain the respective priorities of material men and mortgagees before appraisement and sale, such priorities to be ascertained by petition and answer in the High Court of Admiralty.

This was an application by motion on behalf of the Messrs. Hamilton, of Port Glasgow, the appellants in this cause, and intervenients in the High Court of Admiralty, in a suit for equipment and repairs, to stay the sale of the steamship Acacia, ordered to be sold by a decree of the High Court of Admiralty, dated the 14th Jan. 1880, pending the hearing of an appeal from the said decree, or to put a stay on the said decree so far as a sale of the said steamship Acacia is ordered by it, pending the hearing of the appeal in the matter.

The suit for equipment and repairs came before the High Court of Admiralty on the 13th Jan. 1880, and on the 14th of the same month the court pronounced its decree condemning the Acacia in respect of the claim of the plaintiffs, the Messrs. Harland and Wolff, and in costs, and also directing that a commission of appraisement and sale of the said vessel should issue forthwith. The Messrs. Hamilton, who had a mortgage upon the Acacia and who were plaintiffs in a mortgage suit against the said vessel, appeared as intervenients in the cause for equipment and repairs, and on the 21st Jan. 1880 gave notice of appeal from the said decree, and also from the order of the court dated the 3rd Dec. 1879, by which the learned judge refused an offer of conditional bail by the Messrs. Hamilton pending the hearing of their cause, and the ascertaining the respective priorities of their claim, and that of the Messrs. Harland and Wolff, a report of which motion appears ante, page 226.

The Queen's Advocate (Walter Boyd, Q.C.) with whom was Kisbey for the appellant.—The Messrs.

Hamilton are registered mortgagees, with a charge of 5800*l.* on this vessel, a sale of which has been ordered at the suit of the Messrs. Harland and Wolff, who have established their claim for the sum of 1070*l.* for repairs. We intervened in their suit for the purpose of protecting our interests, and serious questions will arise as to notice on the part of Messrs. Harland and Wolff of our mortgage before the execution of these repairs. We have appealed from the decree of the Court of Admiralty, directing a sale, and also from the order of the 3rd Dec. 1879. The vessel is now in Belfast in the custody of the marshal of the Court of Admiralty, and we want the sale to be stayed pending the hearing of our appeal. Our mortgage suit comes on for hearing to-day in the Court of Admiralty. He also referred to

The Scio, L. Rep. 1 A. & E. 353.

Seeds, Q.C., LL.D., with him Corrigan, LL.D. for the respondents.—Priorities cannot, according to the practice hitherto existing in the Court of Admiralty, be ascertained until the vessel has been sold, and the proceeds of the sale are in the court. Nor could they in the present case be ascertained until a decree was made in the mortgage suits. When the proceeds were brought into court, then, according to the practice, a motion should be made by each party claiming to have the amount of his decree paid out of the proceeds. Upon that motion the Court of Admiralty decided the priorities of the different claimants: (The William F. Safford, Lush. 69.) The grounds for refusing the motion for conditional bail are most fully stated in the report of that motion ante, page 226.

The Court directed that the motion should stand until after the hearing of the mortgage cause.

Jan. 28.—The Queen's Advocate.—We have obtained a decree against the vessel for the full amount of our mortgage, 5800*l.*

After hearing Seeds, Q.C.,

The Court made the following order: Let the sale of the Acacia as ordered by decree of the Admiralty Court be restrained and postponed until further order of said court, or of this court on the following terms: The intervenients admitting the validity as a charge upon the said steamship of the plaintiff's claim, established by decree of the 14th Jan. 1880, and undertaking within one week to present their petition to the High Court of Admiralty claiming, on such grounds as they may be advised, priority for their claim as mortgagees over the plaintiff's claim, plaintiff undertaking within one week after same shall be presented to answer said petition, both parties undertaking to speed the proceedings on such petition, so as to obtain, according to the course of such court, and without delay, the judgment of the said court as to the relative priority of their respective demands, such priority to be ascertained as against the said steamship, notwithstanding the same has not been sold, the intervenients further undertaking to abide by such order (if any) of the Court of Admiralty as to any loss, expenses, and costs occasioned by postponment of sale of said steamship, subject to right of appeal of either party against any order of the Court of Admiralty in the premises, stay further proceedings upon the intervenients' notice of appeal of 21st Jan. 1880 till further order of this court, and reserve costs of such appeal and of this motion for like further order.

SITTINGS AT LINCOLN'S INN.

The Consett.

APPEAL FROM PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (ADMIRALTY).

Practice—Costs—Reference — Collision — Both to blame—Owners of cargo—Owners of ship—Joint action.

Where an action is brought by owners of ship and owners of cargo laden on board it jointly against another ship for damages arising from collision, and both vessels are found to blame, and as a consequence no order is made as to the costs of the action, and each ship pays a moiety of the damage of the other, those plaintiffs who are owners of the cargo are entitled to the costs against the defendants of proving their claim in a reference before the Registrar and Merchants.

In this case an action for damages sustained in a collision was instituted by the owners of the Jessore, and also by the owners of the cargo laden on board of her, against the steamship Consett. The action was heard on the 25th Jan. 1878, when the judge found both vessels to blame for the collision, and therefore, according to the ordinary practice, made a decree "that the damage arising therefrom ought to be borne equally by the owners of the Consett and by the owners of the Jessore, and he condemned the owners of the Consett in a moiety of the plaintiffs' claim in respect of the said damages, and he also condemned the owners of the Jessore in a moiety of the defendant's counter-claim in respect of the said damages, and he referred the said damages to the registrar, assisted by merchants, to assess the amount thereof; but made no orders as to costs."

Affidavits in support of the various claims were filed in the registry, and on the 31st Oct. 1878 the registrar reported "that a moiety of the loss or damage sustained by the parties claiming amounts to the sum of 27,165*l.* 12*s.* 5*d.*, as stated in the schedule annexed," and from the schedule it appeared that the total claim made by the owners of cargo amounted to 30,191*l.* 2*s.*, of which 30,188*l.* 5*s.* 8*d.* was proved, and the moiety of which the owners of the Consett were liable to pay was 15,094*l.* 2*s.* 10*d.*

The defendants commenced a suit for limitation of liability, and on the 8th April obtained a decree in it limiting their total liability, at 8*l.* per ton, to 13,259*l.* 7*s.* 4*d.* and interest, and directing a further reference of claims. The defendants, owners of the Consett (plaintiffs in the limitation suit), paid into court 13,843*l.* 10*s.* 2*d.*, being the amount decreed, with interest, and, on the 1st Aug. 1879, the registrar reported the portion of the sum due to the several plaintiffs. The report was silent as to payment of the costs of the reference.

On the 25th Nov. 1879 the judge of the Admiralty Division was moved in court by the owners of the cargo laden on board the Jessore, to allow them their costs of the reference and of their affidavits filed in support of their claim, a previous application for the costs of these affidavits, which were used again in the limitation suit, to be allowed in that suit, having failed.

Butt, Q.C. and Myburgh for plaintiffs, owners of cargo.—When both vessels are to blame, and an action has been brought by owners of cargo alone, though they can only recover half the damages from the ship sued, it is now settled that they, not being wrong-doers, are entitled to the costs:

The City of Manchester, 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 106; L. Rep. 5 P. Div. 3; 40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 591.

If, in a case like this, where owners of cargo join their action with that by owners of ship, it is held that the owners of cargo are not entitled to costs, when both ships are to blame, it will lead to owners of cargo always instituting separate suits, and so tend to multiplicity of suits and increase of costs; besides, the defendants in this suit are themselves plaintiffs in the limitation of liability suit, and in those suits plaintiffs always have to pay the costs, and, by the use of these affidavits again in the limitation suit, the costs which the plaintiffs are liable to pay in that suit have been diminished. We ought not to be prejudiced by the fact that, by joining with the owners of ship in one action, the defendant is enabled to counter-claim against our co-defendants, for his counter-claim is not available against us.

Clarkson, for owners of the Consett.—There is a great difference between this case and that of The City of Manchester (ubi sup.) It is open to owners of cargo to bring a separate action, in which case they will recover their costs if the vessel they sue is alone to blame, or if both vessels are to blame; and will have to pay all costs if the vessel sued is not to blame at all; or, to join with the owners of the ship, and so identify themselves with their interests, diminishing the costs they will have to pay, if the vessel sued is not to blame, by sharing them with their co-plaintiff, the shipowner, and taking their share of the burden if both vessels are to blame. Besides, this matter is already res judicata; the decree in the cause distinctly declines to make any order as to costs, and this reference is only a proceeding in the cause, and there is no precedent for the payment of costs of a reference where both are to blame, except for exorbitant demands.

Butt, Q.C. in reply.—The decree in the cause does not apply to costs of the reference. Those costs are in the discretion of the registrar, subject to review by the court. Here the registrar has not exercised his discretion at all, and we ask to have the report amended by giving us the costs, not of the reference as a whole—for that affects the two ships as well as ourselves—but the costs we incurred at the reference by filing our affidavits of claim.

Sir Robert Phillimore.—I am of opinion that the court has not by its decision in the original action adjudicated on the question as to whether the owners of the cargo on board the Jessore are entitled to the costs incurred by them in proving their claim at the reference before the registrar. According to the practice of the court as now settled, the owners of the cargo on board the Jessore would, if they had brought a separate action, have been entitled to all their costs against the owners of the Consett, and amongst them to the costs of these affidavits. The fact that they have joined in the same action as the owners of the ships has not, in my opinion, had the effect of increasing, but rather of diminishing, the amount of costs the owners of the Consett have to pay. I am therefore of opinion that the owners of the cargo laden on board the Jessore are entitled to their costs at the reference, and the costs of and relating to the affidavits which were brought in and used in support of their claims at the reference.

The following decree was drawn up:

The judge having heard counsel on both sides condemned the defendants in the costs incurred by the owners of the cargo of the vessel Jessore (some of the plaintiffs) of and relating to the affidavits filed in support of the claim, and in the costs of the reference, and of this motion; but, on application by defendants' counsel, gave defendants leave to appeal from this order, and stayed execution of same pending the appeal.

From this decree the defendants appealed, and the appeal came on for hearing on the 25th Feb., before Jessel, M.R., James and Cotton, L.JJ.

Webster, Q.C. and Clarkson for appellants, owners of the Consett.

Butt, Q.C. and Myburgh for respondents, owners of cargo on board the Jessore.

The Court, without calling on the respondents, dismissed the appeal with costs, on the ground that the reference was a separate proceeding from the original action, and that the order as to costs made by the judge of the court below therein was a matter of discretion with which the Court of Appeal would not interfere, and which appeared to have been exercised on a proper and rational principle.

The Sir Charles Napier.

APPEALS FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (ADMIRALTY).

Practice—Pleading — Parties — Claim — Counter-claim — Set-off — Representative capacity — Demurrer—Underwriters.

To a claim by a master for his wages, the defendant set up a counter-claim and set-off for damages against the plaintiff for negligence leading to the loss of the ship. To this the plaintiff replied that the ship was insured, and that the underwriters were liable to pay the amount of the loss to the plaintiff, and that consequently the defendant could not maintain any set-off or counter-claim against the plaintiff. To this reply the defendant demurred.

Held, that the demurrer must be sustained, because the plaintiff had not pleaded that the counter-claim was brought without authority of underwriter, or that the money had been received, but leave given to amend the pleadings to raise these issues in terms.

Quære, even if these issues were raised properly, would they form any defence to the counter-claim. (a)

This was an action brought by George Trench, lately the master of the British ship Sir Charles Napier, against John H. Howard, who had been, with others, mortgagee of the said vessel, for his wages and disbursements. The statement of claim set out various sales of the ship subsequent to the engagement of the plaintiff, and which took place without his knowledge, and a final sale on 19th Sept. 1878 to the defendant, previous to the return of the plaintiff to England on the 5th May 1879, and that the original owner of the ship had, previous to the return of the plaintiff, filed a petition for liquidation, and that there were no assets of his estate. The Sir Charles Napier was wrecked on the Island of Ascension on the 18th March 1879.

The statement of claim further alleged that the plaintiff had bought the ship subject to claims for payment of wages to the crew, &c., and concluded with the following paragraph:

18. The defendant insured the said ship, and has received, and is entitled to receive, the insurance money.

In answer to this claim the defendant delivered a "statement of defence, demurrer, and set-off and counter-claim," of which the important paragraphs were as follows:

14. The defendant demurs to paragraph 18 of the statement of claim, upon the ground that the facts therein alleged do not show any ground of action or relief against the defendant, and on other grounds sufficient in law to support such demurrer.

15. The defendant denies the truth of the said 18th paragraph of the statement of claim.

By way of set-off and counter-claim, the defendant alleges as follows.

18. Whilst the defendant was sole owner of the Sir Charles Napier, and the plaintiff was his master, and in command thereof, the plaintiff so neglected his duty as master, and conducted himself so negligently and inefficiently as his master, that by and through his negligence and inefficiency the said ship was wrecked off the Island of Ascension and totally lost on or about the 18th day of March 1879, and the defendant says that a court of inquiry into the said loss of the said ship, and of the plaintiff's conduct with respect thereto as her master, was duly held at Ascension pursuant to the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and the several subsequent Acts in amendment thereof, and that the said court, after inquiry into the said loss and the conduct of the plaintiff with respect thereto and his management of the said ship as her master, and hearing the plaintiff, held and pronounced that the said loss of the said ship was caused by the negligence of the plaintiff as her master, and suspended his certificate as master for a year.

The plaintiff set down the demurrer to the 18th paragraph of the statement of claim for argument, and at the same time moved to strike out the latter portion of paragraph 18 of the counter-claim, so far as it contained any reference to the proceedings of a court at Ascension, as irrelevant and embarrassing.

Nov. 11, 1879.—Hilbery, for the plaintiff, took the preliminary objection that the defendant could not plead and demur together to the same matter without leave (Order XXVIII., r. 5); and having done so his demurrer must be struck out. The objection is not waived by the fact that I have set down the demurrer for argument:

Hagg v. Darley, 38 L. T. Rep. N. S. 312; 47 L. J. 67, Ch. Div.

Had I not set it down for argument it would be allowed against me (Order XXVIII., r. 6), and it cannot be alleged that the impugned pleading is irrelevant, as, if it is demurrable, it must be because it alleged a cause of action. I therefore am entitled to my costs in any event.

Clarkson, contra.

Sir J. Phillimore.—I shall allow the demurrer with costs, paragraph 18 of the statement of claim to be struck out; but also I shall order the statement of defence and counter-claim to be amended by striking out the latter portion of paragraph 18. Costs will be costs in the cause.

The plaintiffs, on the 12th Nov., delivered a reply, the third paragraph of which was amended by leave of the court on the 22nd Nov. 1879. The paragraph as amended, the amendments being shown in italics, was as follows:

3. The plaintiff further says, in answer to the defendant's counter-claim, that the said vessel was fully insured by or on behalf of her owners, of whom the defendant was one, by certain policies of insurance against a total loss, and that the said Sir Charles Napier, being insured as aforesaid, became, on the occasion mentioned in the counter-claim, a total loss to her owners. The plaintiff alleges that the underwriters of the said policies of insurance having (without any deduction for the defendant's claim against themselves, in respect of the moneys and damages claimed in this action by the defendant against the plaintiff, and without being informed thereof) paid or agreed and become liable to pay to the owners of the said vessel, of whom the defendant was one, or to some person lawfully authorised to receive the said money on their and his behalf, the whole amount of money payable under the said policies of insurance to the owners of the said ship, of whom the defendant was one, in the event of the total loss of the said ship, the defendant cannot, without the knowledge and authority of the said

(a) In his judgment, the Master of the Rolls seems to intimate that, if the plaintiff had stated in his reply that the underwriters had paid the amount of the loss, and that the defendant was in the position of trustee to them, and the counter-claim was made without their authority, the reply would have been a good answer to the counter-claim. This point was not seriously argued on the appeal, as the question there was the effect of the reply as it then stood; but the authority of the Master of the Rolls stands so high, that it is as well to point out that his opinion was expressed without argument against this view. If he is right, every plaintiff in a collision acting in the Admiralty Division may reply to a counter-claim in the same way, and if he could succeed in proving the facts stated, the reply would be a bar to the counter-claim. The difficulty, if there is any, arises from the fact that a shipowner who has been paid for a loss by his insurers becomes trustee for them in respect of any compensation he may recover from a person occasioning the loss; but does he become such trustee until he has actually received the money? If not, it cannot be necessary to obtain their authority to proceed against the wrongdoer. Again, it may be asked how can the fact that the defendant has made a contract with underwriters, by which he is indemnified from loss in certain events, affect his rights in respect of that loss against the wrongdoer? The insurers may be entitled to avail themselves of any benefit accruing from those rights, but can the wrongdoer set up the underwriter's possible claims to defeat the claim against himself? In cases of personal injury, it is a well-established rule that the wrongdoer cannot take advantage of anything which has been recovered from an accident insurance company. Does the fact that in marine insurance the assured becomes trustee for his insurers of any sums recovered by him distinguish his position from that of a person insured with an accident company?—Ed.

underwriters, further maintain any set-off or counter-claim against the plaintiff in respect of the loss of the said ship.

To this paragraph the defendants demurred.

On the 16th Dec. the demurrer came on for argument.

Clarkson in support of the demurrer.—This question has really been decided by the court when it allowed my demurrer to the statement of claim. The matter which was struck out of the statement of claim as irrelevant is pleaded again as a substantive reply to my counter-claim for damages. Whether the defendant has been paid or is entitled to recover compensation from the underwriters for the loss of the ship, cannot affect his right of action against the plaintiff. Underwriters cannot sue independently of the person insured:

Simpson v. Thomson, 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 567; L. Rep. 3 App. Cas. 279; 38 L. T. Rep. N.S. 1.

If I recover money in this action from the plaintiff, and have already been paid by the underwriters, I should have to pay over the money to them, but the right of action is mine personally, and I am entitled to bring it by way of set-off or counter-claim against the plaintiff's claim for wages. If the plaintiff's contention is correct, in nearly every action of damage brought in this court the underwriters on one or both ships would have to be made parties:

Hilbery.—There is no doubt a right of action against the plaintiff if he lost the ship by his negligence, but, so far as that right of action is in the defendant, it is in him as trustee for the underwriters, and not in his own behalf, and he cannot set off a claim as trustee against a personal claim against himself. It would be paying his debts with the money of the underwriters. Whatever has been the former practice of this court, it is now governed by that of the Court of Chancery before the passing of the Judicature Acts: (Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1873, s. 24 (1); Order XVI., rr. 7, 11.) If the defendant can set up a counter-claim as trustee for third parties, the court will have to pronounce two separate judgments on claim and counter-claim, and not the one final judgment on both required by Order XIX., r. 3, Order XXII., r. 10. That the defendant would not have been entitled to relief in respect of such a counter-claim as this under the circumstances against a personal claim against himself in a court of equity is shown by a long series of cases:

Bristowe v. Needham, 8 Scott N. R. 366; 7 M. & G. 648;

London, Bombay, and Mediterranean Bank v. Narraway, L. Rep. 15 Eq. 93; 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 572;

Clark v. Cart, 1 Craig & Phil. 154;

Watson v. Mid Wales Railway Company, L. Rep. 2 C. P. 593; 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 94; and that this practice now prevails in the common law divisions is shown by

Macdonald v. Carington, L. Rep. 4 C. P. Div. 28; 39 L. T. Rep. N. S. 426.

With regard to the defendant's claim, he is precisely in the same position with regard to any money he might recover as if he were the executor or specially appointed trustee of the underwriters:

North of England, &c., Insurance Association v. Armstrong and others, L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 244; 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 822; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 330.

Clarkson in reply.

Sir ROBERT PHILLIMORE.—I cannot see, notwithstanding the argument which has been addressed to me, that the cases cited in any way support the plaintiff's contention. It appears to me that there is running through the whole argument some confusion between the principles governing a counter-claim and those applicable to a set-off. The claim of the defendants here is not brought in a representative capacity, though, if he recovers upon it, and has already been paid by the underwriters, he may hold anything that he recovers as a trustee for them. The demurrer to paragraph 3 must be sustained, and that paragraph struck out of the reply with costs.

From this decision the plaintiff appealed.

Feb. 25.—Hilbery for the appellant—The question is, can a trustee, as such, counter-claim in respect of the trust property against a plaintiff who sues him personally for wages? Defendant says, first, that wages are not due to the plaintiff, and secondly, that plaintiff was master of this ship, and lost her by his negligence. To the second defence the plaintiff replies that the ship was insured and became a total loss, and that the defendant has received or is entitled to receive all the insurance, and is therefore a trustee for the underwriter in respect of any money he could receive for plaintiff supposing the ship to have been lost through the plaintiff's negligence. [JESSEL, M.R.—Ought not the application to be made by you under Order XIX., r. 3, to exclude the counter-claim or set-off?] A plaintiff or a person setting up a counter-claim has no right to demur to any statement of fact, i.e., that he is a trustee. The plaintiff is entitled to a judgment for his wages simpliciter, and defendant, assuming that his ship was lost by plaintiff's negligence, is only entitled to judgment, not for himself but for the underwriters, his cestuis que trust, and that is not the subject of a set-off or counter-claim, but of an independent action By the rules of pleading every pleading must contain a statement of all material facts, and no fact can be proved at the trial unless it has been pleaded; therefore we were not only justified in pleading the fact of the trusteeship, but we were obliged to do so.

Clarkson for respondent.—The defendant is not in the position of trustee; his contract of indemnity with underwriters is quite distinct from his right of action against a wrongdoer. It is true that the underwriters may by taking proper steps make him a trustee for them of money which he receives. The reply does not allege that the money has been paid to defendant by underwriters, or that the action is brought without their knowledge or against their interest. Hence, even if the plaintiff's contention is right, it is not duly raised by his pleadings.

Hilbery in reply.—The question on the pleadings is now raised for the first time; if they are to be taken against me, and because I have averred in the alternative that the money has been paid or is to be paid, that it has not been paid, and that therefore the relation of trustee and cestuis que trust has not yet arisen between the defendant and the underwriters. I should be allowed to amend, the objection not having been taken below. But on a total loss taking place, what remains of the property becomes the property of the underwriters, and if any right of action remains in the original shipowner in respect of that property, it can only be as trustee for the actual possessors of it.

Jessel, M.R.—This is an appeal from a decision of Sir R. Phillimore allowing a demurrer to a portion of the reply. I am for my own part loth to allow demurrers of this description which do not go to the merits of the action, and only raise subsidiary questions of little or no importance. The suit being an action for wages by the master of the Sir Charles Napier, the defendant raises a defence and counter-claim that the vessel was lost by the negligence of the plaintiff, and that he is entitled to damages equal to the value of the ship for such negligence. To this set-off or counter-claim the plaintiff replies that the defendant was insured, and that therefore, as he recovers his loss from the underwriters, it is no defence to the action for wages. He says that the fact of insurance is material; and that, moreover, the claim cannot be entertained in this action, as the plaintiff is entitled to one judgment personally against the defendant, and the defendant, supposing him to win on his counter-claim, is not entitled to judgment for himself, but on behalf of his cestuis que trust, and that, therefore, it would be necessary to give two judgments, and not one only, in accordance with Order XIX., r. 3, Order XXII., r. 10. He says that defendant ought not to be allowed to protect himself by setting up a claim as trustee against a purely personal claim against him. The objection, however, to this is, that though the fact that the defendant was insured is pleaded, it is not pleaded that he is or would be a trustee for underwriters in respect to any money he might recover from the plaintiff. No doubt the defendant has a right of action against the plaintiff whom he alleges to have lost his ship through negligence, and it does not appear that he has lost that right. The allegation in the reply is that he has been paid or will be paid, and that interpretation of the pleadings must be taken which is least advantageous to the pleader; it therefore cannot be said that he has lost his personal right of action, as it is not shown that the relationship of trustee and cestuis que trust has arisen between the defendant and his underwriters, neither is it pleaded that this action is brought, or rather this counter-claim or set-off set up, without the knowledge and authority of the underwriters. It must also be borne in mind that a set-off and counter-claim are not the same thing; a matter may be an answer to one but not to the other. As therefore the pleadings do not support the contention of the plaintiff, it is not necessary to decide what would be the result if they did, and the judgment of the court below allowing this demurrer must therefore be affirmed with costs. As to amending the pleadings I think, if the plaintiff can show that the defendant has actually received the money, and considers the fact to be material, he should be allowed to do so, but such amendment cannot be allowed without some evidence. The plaintiff may bring in an affidavit before Saturday next, and if satisfactory the amendment will be allowed.

James and Cotton, L.JJ. concurred.

The pleadings were not amended in pursuance of the above permission.

The Parlement Belge.

APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (ADMIRALTY).

Jurisdiction—International law—Ex-territoriality—Foreign Government vessel—Mail packet—Collision—Arrest—Exemption from.

An unarmed vessel belonging to a foreign sovereign State, and employed in what is considered by that State to be a national service, is entitled to the privilege of a vessel of war as to freedom from arrest in a suit in rem.

Such immunity is not forfeited by the partial employment of the vessel in carrying merchandise and passengers where her substantial employment is of a national character; e.g. the carriage of mails.

Semble, any property of a foreign sovereign or State used for public purposes is exempt from the jurisdiction of any tribunal in this country.

A suit in rem, though primarily a proceeding against the ship or res, is indirectly a process compelling the appearance of the owner to defend his property, and therefore is not applicable where the ship or res is the property of a foreign sovereign or sovereign State against whom an action will not lie by reason of international law or the comity of nations.

The judgment of the court below, that a vessel employed in such a way was not exempt from civil process in a suit in rem, reversed on the ground that the immunity from process was incident to her public character and ownership.

The question decided in the court below, whether the Crown has power to grant by treaty to foreign vessels the immunities of public ships without the consent of Parliament, not considered (a)

This was an appeal from the decision of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division (Admiralty), allowing judgment by default against the steam vessel Parlement Belge, and a warrant to issue for the arrest of that vessel.

The Parlement Belge was a vessel engaged in carrying the mails between Dover and Ostend. The peculiar circumstances of the case which led to the appearance under protest of the Attorney-General on behalf of the Crown are set out in the report in the case in the court below (ante p. 83; 40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 222; L. Rep. 4 Prob. Div. 129).

The appeal was heard on the 11th, 12th, and 20th Dec. 1879.

The Solicitor-General (Sir H. Giffard), Admiralty Advocate (Dr. Deane), with the Attorney-General (Sir J. Holker) and A. L. Smith, for the Crown, appellants.

Webster, Q.C. and Dr. W. G. F. Phillimore for respondent.

The Solicitor-General.—There is no traverse of the facts stated in the information of the Attorney-General (ante p. 84), and therefore for the purposes of this argument they must be taken as true. We admit moreover that the vessel has been employed in the carriage of parcels, but not that she has been used as an ordinary cargo vessel. The carriage of letters is in itself a carriage of parcels of a particular description. [James, L.J.—The carriage of bullion by a regular vessel of war does not divest her of her privileged character.] The broad question is, whether a vessel employed under the conditions in which this vessel is employed is within the jurisdiction of the civil courts of law of the country; our contention is that she is privileged from the jurisdiction of those courts, and further that, even if acting under the conditions of a treaty she has done something which, under other circumstances, might vitiate that privilege, that is not a matter which a subject of this realm can raise. [Brett, L.J.—Is it contended that any person except the Belgian Government derives a profit from the trading of this ship? Phillimore. — The Continental Daily Parcels Express (see ante p. 86). Brett, L.J.—They are only shippers, not interested in the profits made by the ship.] The only evidence of trading is that contained in the circular or advertisement of the Continental Daily Parcels Express. Our first point is, that the Parlement Belge was the property of the Belgian Government, and as such exempt from the jurisdiction of the courts of this country. A public vessel, that is a vessel the property of the State, is free from the civil jurisdiction of other states: (The Exchange, 7 Cranch, (Amer.) 141.) That in that case the vessel was an armed ship makes no difference; the judgment is based on the fact of her being a public ship. The exemption is that of the Sovereign's property, not an incident of the particular purpose for which the property is employed; this is shown by the fact that it extends to all sorts of property, and is not restricted to ships at all. In Vavasseur v. Krupp (L. Rep. 9 Ch. Div. 351; 39 L. T. Rep. N. S. 427) it was held that the courts had no jurisdiction to prevent a foreign sovereign from removing his property in this country, and this although the property, had it belonged to any person other than a sovereign, might have been liable, not only to detention, but also to destruction, in consequence of a breach of patent rights granted by the Crown. There is no precedent for the arrest of a foreign public ship. The Prins Frederic (2 Dod. 451) is no authority on the subject, as the case was never decided. Briggs v. The Lightboats (11 Allen's Mass. (Amer.) Rep. 186) shows that the exemption depends on the public, and not on the military character of the property or ship. But even if the vessel would under ordinary circumstances by reason of her employment be liable to the ordinary civil process, she is exempted from that civil process by the express provisions of the convention (ante p. 84). It is contended by the respondents that the treaty-making power of the Crown is expressly limited to making treaties of peace and war, but in fact the Crown by its ministers is the agent of the country in foreign affairs. [Brett, L.J.—Do you contend that the Government might by treaty with a foreign government exempt hired merchant vessels from the jurisdiction of the courts?] The 6th article of the treaty would exempt such vessels hired for this particular purpose of carrying the mails from arrest. Every state must be understood on the principle that certain persons or things are outside its operation; that is, those persons or things which are not subject to it, at all events without express words, by the common law and by international law as a part of the common law:

Triquet and others v. Bath, 3 Burr. 1478.

The Territorial Waters Jurisdiction Act 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 73) declares the authority of Her Majesty over all foreign ships within a certain distance of the coast, but it could not be contended that by this Act the courts of this country had acquired jurisdiction over foreign ships of war; it was not necessary to specially exempt those vessels from the operation of the Act, because they are exempt from the operation of all municipal law by international law. All statutes must be interpreted salvo jure Regis. [Brett, L.J.—No words, however large in their signification, can give a jurisdiction which did not previously exist, unless they purport expressly to give it; if they do that, the courts must obey the statute.] It is the prerogative of Her Majesty to invest any particular person or thing with a diplomatic and therefore a privileged character. On principle every person in the realm is bound to obey the law or take the punishment, but if he is recognised as an ambassador his liability ceases. If he is recognised as an ambassador, i.e., received as such by Her Majesty, that is sufficient to give him the privilege; the courts cannot inquire into the validity of his credentials or employment. [Bagallay, L.J.—Does your contention go so far as to say that the exemption from civil process would extend to all cases connected with the ship, e.g., a case of smuggling by one of the crew?] Any breach of the municipal law would have to be corrected by diplomatic action between the States, and so also all breaches of the carrying powers given by the treaty: "Treaties of every kind, when made by the competent authority, are as obligatory upon nations as private contracts are binding upon individuals; and they are to receive a fair and liberal interpretation according to the intention of the contracting parties, and to be kept with the most scrupulous good faith. Their meaning is to be ascertained by the same rules of construction and course of reasoning which we apply to the interpretation of private contracts. If a treaty should, in fact, be violated by one of the contracting parties, either by proceedings incompatible with the particular nature of the treaty, or by an intentional breach of any of its articles, it rests alone with the injured party to pronounce it broken. The treaty in such a case is not absolutely void, but voidable, at the election of the injured party. If he chooses not to come to a rupture, that treaty remains obligatory. He may waive or remit the infraction committed, or he may demand a just satisfaction:" (Kent's Com. on Amer. Law, vol. 1, p. 174.) [Brett, L.J.—But that only refers to treaties on subjects which are a proper matter for treaties; if the Crown had no power to make this treaty the principle does not apply. If the Government of Belgium should consider themselves aggrieved by this action it may be that the Government of this country must make it good to them by reason of the obligation of the treaty, though the plaintiff is not prevented from bringing his action.] It is only the nation which can avail itself of a breach of the treaty or an informality or irregularity in it; that course is not open to the individual. If an ambassador or one of his servants were to smuggle contraband articles in the ambassador's carriage, it may be that the goods smuggled might be liable to seizure, but the carriage itself would not, though in ordinary cases the carriage of wrongful goods leads to the forfeiture of the vehicle in which they are carried: (the Customs Consolidation Act 1853, 16 & 17 Vict. c. 107, s. 222); and it is shown by The Exchange (7 Cranch. Amer., 116) that the general permission granted to public vessels to visit the ports of another country is sufficient to invest them with the privilege of exemption from civil process whilst there; a fortiori, therefore, a special invitation to a vessel to come under that privilege invests it with the privilege whilst in the ports of that country which has invited it. [James, L.J.—But the permission given to ordinary public vessels to visit the ports of another country is the invitation of the nation, not merely of one of the estates of the realm.] But here the special invitation is given by that estate of the realm which is the only one in which is vested, so far as foreigners are concerned, the grant of such a privilege. It is not necessary for Her Majesty to invest a vessel with a particular character, but only to say that vessels employed in such a service are so invested. This vessel is from the conditions of its ownership exempt without the treaty, but, as a public vessel engaging in ordinary commerce might be held to have waived this exemption, the treaty says that this vessel shall not waive its exemption by reason of carrying on such traffic as is contemplated by the treaty. There has never in history been a successful attempt to arrest a public ship in time of peace for a breach of municipal law. (Brett, L.J.—The object of an arrest of a ship in a suit in rem is to compel an appearance. The owner, the King of the Belgians, could not be compelled to appear in any civil suit.] The case of The Charkieh (1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 581; L. Rep. 4 A. & E. 59; 28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 513), on which the learned judge of the court below seems to have based his judgment, does not apply. That was the case of a vessel employed to all intents and purposes as an ordinary merchant vessel, and not owned by a sovereign prince, nor the property of a sovereign state, nor employed in the public service, though in the judgment below the fact of her not being a ship of war in the ordinary use of the term is held to bar her from the claim of privilege. The learned judge of the court below admits (ante pp. 91, 92) that the privilege is not limited to ships of war, but is extended to public ships when used for exploring purposes, though unarmed, and to vessels of pleasure or yachts belonging to a sovereign prince. What definition can be given of such vessels which would not include this ship? The dictum extracted from the judgment of Lord Campbell in The Magdalena Steam Navigation Company v. Martin (2 Ellt. & Ell. 94, 114) does not apply here, when the privilege claimed is that of the State property, and not of an individual which may or may not extend to his property; and the judgment of Story, J. in The Santissima Trinidad (7 Wheaton (Amer.) 283) applies by implication to all public ships, though for the purpose of that case it was not necessary to state the principle of exemption for other than public ships of war. The only reason why the treaties relied on by the respondents as having been referred to Parliament before becoming operative were so referred, was either because they enacted penalties in certain cases, which of course could not be inflicted either on a subject or a foreigner without the consent of Parliament, or because, as in the Treaty of Berne, they concerned the revenue.

Dr. Deane, Q.C. (Admiralty Advocate) on the same side.—The privilege is that of a public ship as distinct from a private ship, and not of a public ship of war as distinct from a public ship not of war. The question of privilege or no privilege is decided by the condition of her officers, whether they are commissioned or not; that is, whether the ship is a commissioned vessel (Phill. Inter. Law, vol. 1, p. 404, 2nd ed. s. 350). The same principle is acted on in our Courts of Admiralty, where, in consequence of the immunity of the Crown from suit, in case of collision with a Queen's ship or public vessel, the action is brought against the captain; and this is so not only in the case of ships of war, but also in that of troop ships and unarmed store ships, as in the recent case of H. M. S. Wye (not reported). When the expression armed vessels of the Government is used, it in reality only means fitted out by Government in the sense of the French word armement, which is equivalent to our word "equipment," or armateur, which is the ordinary expression for a shipowner. In Briggs and another v. Lightboats (11 Allen's Mass. Amer. Reports, 157) this question was decided in this sense, for (p. 165) the learned judge says: "It is said for the petitioners that these lightboats were not upon their stations, and that they were not intended for military service. But after they had once come into the possession of the United States for public uses, whether remaining at the builders, or at the station of their final anchorage, or on the way from one to the other, they were subject to the exclusive control of the Executive Government of the United States, and could not be interfered with by State process. The immunity from such interference arises, not because they are instruments of war, but because they are instruments of sovereignty, and does not depend on the extent or manner of their actual use at any particular moment, but on the purpose to which they are devoted;" and so also in the more recent case of the United States ship Constitution (ante p. 79; L. Rep. 4 P. Div. 39; 40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 219), that vessel was held to be within the privilege of exemption, though not at the time employed as a ship of war, but in the peaceful, and indeed commercial, occupation of carrying back to the United States samples which had been exhibited at the Paris exhibition, and which his Lordship in his judgment speaks of as cargo, but for the arrest of which he refused to allow a warrant to issue; therefore it is obvious that the mere carriage of cargo, and non-efficiency for warlike purposes, are not in themselves sufficient to deprive a public vessel of the privilege. In one sense, indeed, every vessel of the Government is armed, as the officers have a right to carry arms forbidden to ordinary civilians, and doubtless the crew have their rifles and cutlasses, &c., and the arming may consist of no more than this. In the case of the boats and steam launches of a regular warship could it be maintained that those boats, when on service detached from the man-of-war, would not be entitled to the privilege? The object aimed at by an arrest is, primarily, to enforce an appearance, which cannot be done here, the owner, the King of the Belgians, not being under any obligation to appear; and secondarily, failing an appearance, to obtain a sale of the ship—that is, in this case, to sell the property of a foreign government, which would be a breach of international law.

Webster, Q.C. for respondents.—There is no authority for the exemption of vessels engaged in trade from civil process, no matter whom they may belong to. The basis of The Exchange (7 Cranch, 116) is that that vessel was a portion of the public armed force of the nation to which she belonged. If she had been engaged in trade she could not have claimed the exemption. The court, indeed, suggests that possibly a private ship not trading may claim an exemption, but this point is not determined, and it only shows that the fact of trading forfeited the exemption. The whole of the case, both the decision itself and the reasoning on which it is founded, apply only to vessels of war in the ordinary acceptation of the term, and the principle is affirmed that in the case of a sovereign trading he would be subject to the ordinary municipal law of the country, so far as the trade was concerned: (The Swift, 1 Dod. 320, 339.) The Santissima Trinidad (7 Wheaton 283) is a direct authority for the proposition that the property of a foreign government may be arrested. [Brett, L.J.—That is a question of the law of prize.] Yes, in a sense, but prize belongs to the Government of the captor, and it is shown by that case to be liable to the municipal law of another country. In the judgment of the court below in that case (The Santissima Trinidad, 1 Brockenbrough Amer. pp. 479, 497), Marshall, C.J. says: "Foreign courts consider the property," that is, in prizes captured either by vessels of war or privateers, "as the property of the Sovereign, and the possession of the captor as the possession of the Sovereign." [James, L.J.—But that case only says that, if the property of the Sovereign is alleged to have been acquired in a way contrary to the municipal law of the place where it has been acquired, the courts can investigate the question whether the acquisition has or has not been lawful, that is, whether the foreign Sovereign has any title to the property at all.] The true difference is, that where any wrong or breach of contract imposes a maritime lien on the ship, which lien can be enforced by a suit in rem against the property, the arguments against personally suing a sovereign or sovereign state do not apply; this is shown by the decision of the American courts in the case of The United States v. Wilder (3 Sumner, Amer. 308, 314), which declared that the property of the United States on board a private ship was not exempt from the maritime lien which the laws of the United States allow shipowners to have over goods to enforce general average contributions. Yet the United States could not have been sued by a subject personally; that shows, for the distinction is drawn in that case, that the only property of the Government which is exempt from proceedings in rem to enforce a maritime lien is that property which for reasons already pointed out it would be contrary to international law and the comity of nations to take any proceedings against, i.e., the public armed vessels of the State. The case of Briggs v. The Lightboats (11 Allen, Mass. Amer. 157) is not really in point; the question there was not of proceedings to enforce a maritime lien, but to enforce a lien given by a statute, what may be called a territorial lien of the nature of, but somewhat more extensive than, a possessory lien; the rights under it were given by a statute which did not bind the Sovereign. Maritime lien, on the other hand, is a lien recognised by all states as binding on the property in whosesoever hands it may be. [James, L.J.—The expression "maritime lien" is not a strictly accurate one; "lien" means strictly only a charge on a thing whilst in the hands of the person making the demand against the owner of the thing.] What is called a maritime lien binds the charge on the thing in whosesoever hands it is, and only cannot be enforced where the thing is the public armed vessel. [Baggallay, L.J.—Suppose damage is done by a ship of war which is subsequently sold by the Government to a private individual, do you say that a lien would attach to her in the hands of her new owner for the damage done whilst a vessel of war?] The exemption is only that of vessels of war, and therefore only exists so long as the vessels are vessels of war:

> Wheaton International Law, by Boyd, s. 101, p. 141.
> Halleck International Law, by Baker, ch. 7, s. 25, p. 176;
> Phillimore International Law, 2nd edit., vol. 1., ss. 343-350, pp. 393-405; and does not extend to persons other than the personnel of such ships even on board of those ships:

> Opinion of Sir W. Scott (Lord Stowell), 18th Nov. 1820; Report of Royal Commission on Fugitive Slaves, 1876, p. 77.

How then can it extend to persons other than the crews of a ship of war or property other than a ship of war? Besides, even if the vessel were exempt as a vessel of war is exempt, or as it is sought to make other vessels exempt under this convention, the Parlement Belge has forfeited such exemption whether claimed as a public vessel engaged in a public service, or under the convention, by the trading in which it has been proved she has engaged. It is the condition on which a man of war claims exemption that she does not trade, and it is the express condition in this convention which purports to extend the exemption to vessels complying with the condition. [James, L.J.—The alleged carrying of merchandise has not in any way caused the damage of which you complain.] That is immaterial. Primâ facie I am entitled to recover for the damage I have sustained, and the vessel claiming an exemption from civil process is bound to prove that she has acted in accordance with the rules on which that exemption is granted.

Dr. W. G. F. Phillimore.—This proceeding being by a suit in rem against the ship is not similar to a personal action against the owner of the ship. No citation is served on any person, but any person, not the owner alone, who considers he has an interest, may appear. That is really the way in which the Attorney-General appears; it is not for the King of the Belgians or the Belgian Government, but for the Crown of the country who consider they have an interest in the suit. An Admiralty action in rem is a legal proceeding for the consummation of an inchoate maritime lien:

> The Bold Buccleugh, 7 Moo. P. C. Cas. 273.

This therefore is a suit against the ship and not against the foreign Sovereign, and does not touch his dignity. [Brett, L.J.—A maritime lien gives no right to take possession of the property, it only gives a Court of Admiralty jurisdiction to hold it till the rights of all parties in it are settled. I doubt much whether a maritime lien would attach to a vessel after leaving the Government service for damage done by her whilst in the service.] There is direct authority that a vessel chartered by a foreign government for warlike purposes is liable to arrest after the termination of her charter for damage done whilst under charter:

The Ticonderoga, Swab. 215.

Before the case of The Exchange (ubi sup.) was decided there were grave doubts amongst jurists as to the exemption even of armed ships, and The Swift (ubi sup.) shows that unarmed ships would in any case not be exempt from the law. [Brett, L.J.—In the case of The Resolute (33 L. T. Rep. O. S. 80; 4 Ir. Jur. N. S. 123), a Government transport which had been arrested in a suit for damage was released.] Yes; but she was a commissioned vessel employed in the military service of the country. In the case of The Prins Frederic (ubi sup.) the warrant was actually executed, and the subsequent proceedings show that Lord Stowell did not consider that there had been anything necessarily wrong in the process. The exemption from municipal law is really only for those ships and persons who are under martial law. A captain of a vessel so situated may both be punished himself and may punish his crew for an infraction of the sailing regulations, but that is not the case here. Can it be supposed for a moment that all the passengers who go on board the Parlement Belge for the passage from Dover to Ostend are under the martial law of Belgium in the way in which a man on board an English ship of war is under the Naval Discipline Act? Besides, a ship of war is frequently sent on missions of the utmost importance to the State to which she belongs, and her detention might lead to the gravest complications. This distinction is the correct one, in the opinion of M. Ortolan, himself both a naval officer and an international jurist, and is shown by his approval of the answer of the Russian Government to a question propounded to it by that of Spain touching the character of a Danish vessel:

Ortolan, liv. 2, chap. 10, 2nd edit., pp. 211, 217.

This ship and her officers are in no sense agens de la force publique. The reason of the exemption is the nature of the service, and here the only public service is the carriage of mails, and that is not a species of public service that creates any exemption. Mail steamers, both British and foreign, are arrested continually. In a recent case where the Dutch mail boat from Sheerness to Flushing (The Stadt Flushing, not reported) was arrested, she attempted to defend herself from the charge of going too fast in foggy weather by alleging a contract between her owners and the Government requiring the mails to be carried at a certain speed under penalties; but it was held to be no defence to the action. On what principle can it be said that the Calais steamer belonging to the South-Eastern Railway Company is liable to seizure for damage done, and that the Ostend steamer employed in precisely the same service is not? The only property of a sovereign or a state that is exempt from civil process is that property which is connected with the dignity or personal comfort of the Sovereign or with the military power of the State. [James, L.J.—In some respects he is under a personal disability; for example, he could not acquire real estate in this country in his sovereign capacity.] Since the passing of the Alien Act he probably could, and if so, it would be liable to the law of this country, but his ordinary movable property would in any case be liable to the municipal law, as e.g., if any person on his behalf stored explosives belonging to him in a manner contrary to the Explosives Act, they would be liable to seizure and forfeiture, and a railway company might sell his property if left on their hands. That under certain circumstances a suit can be brought affecting the property of a foreign government in this country is shown by the case of Lariviere v. Morgan (L. Rep. 7 Ch. App. 550; 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 339, 859), which was a bill against the Government of France. [James, L.J.—In that case the money about the payment of which the bill was filed was in the hands of a stakeholder.] The alleged stakeholder, however, denied that it was held by him in trust for the vendors, and they ultimately won. The law as to appearance by foreign states is laid down in the judgment of Lord Hatherley; he says: "The main argument in the case has, however, been that the French Government, though it has an undoubted interest in the fund, is not before the court. . . . . The question now raised is, whether, in the absence of the French Government, it is possible to ascertain the right to the particular fund, the French Government declining to appear—a very proper course for them to take if they think fit. Is there then to be a total failure of justice because the French Government declines to assert any right to the fund? . . . . In any such case we must ascertain as we best can, in the absence of other parties, what are the rights of the parties who do appear. . . . There may be many cases in which a foreign government has some interest, but the other parties interested must not suffer because it is impossible to compel the attendance of one of those who might claim the fund." And though this decision was not upheld by the House of Lords, yet so far as this portion of it is concerned the House of Lords agreed, for Lord Cairns is reported to say: "No doubt, under such circumstances, the court having a trust fund under its control might well proceed to administer that fund, even although a foreign government might be interested in it, and might not be before the court or subject to the jurisdiction of the court." It appears indeed that, although a foreign sovereign cannot be compelled to appear, he may in some cases be added as a defendant:

Gladstone v. Musurus Bey, 1 H. & M. 495.

The decision in Vavasseur v. Krupp (L. Rep. 9 Ch. Div. 351; 39 L. T. Rep. N. S. 427) depends on various considerations other than the property being in the Mikado of Japan. There was no user in this country, and also the goods were munitions of war, and were here as part of the armament of vessels of war, and it is on that fact—their military character—as affecting the dignity of a foreign state that the judgment is based. [James, L.J.—The case of Betts v. Neilson (12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 719) shows that a patent right may be violated as well by a passive as an active user in this country, and in Vavasseur v. Krupp (ubi sup.), notwithstanding an injunction of the court the Mikado was allowed to remove the goods in consequence of his status]. A suit may be instituted against the representative of a foreign country so long as it does not touch or interfere with his personal liberty or comfort, and in cases governed by the civil law, and where jurisdiction is provided by a suit in rem in the first instance, such suit may proceed:

Taylor v. Best, 14 C. B. 487.

The Court of Admiralty is a court proceeding by the civil law, and therefore a suit in rem may proceed. [Brett, L.J.—The privileges of an ambassador are limited, non sequitur that the privileges of a sovereign are so in respect of his property.] They are the same in kind, and in Taylor v. Best (ubi sup.) the case was argued on the principle of the privilege of sovereigns, and this is the correct principle: (Bynkershoek de Foro Legatorum, ch. vii., viii.) The propriety of proceeding by a suit in rem where possible is shown by Lord Campbell in the Magdalena Steam Navigation Company v. Martin (2 El. & El. 94), where he says: "In countries where there may be a citation by seizure of goods, if an ambassador loses his privilege by engaging in commerce, he not only may be cited, but all his goods unconnected with his diplomatic functions may be arrested to force him to appear, and may afterwards, whilst he continues ambassador, be taken in execution on the judgment." [Brett, L.J.—The only maritime law in this country authorising an arrest of property is that recognised by the common and statute law.] Yes, but the protest of arrest of a ship in an Admiralty action is so recognised. The case of Santissima Trinidada (1 Brockenbrough, Amer. 478 on appeal, 7 Wheaton, Amer. 283) decides two questions: first that it is the duty of a court of law to decide the status of a foreign vessel claiming exemption from municipal law as a vessel of war; and secondly, that at all events pending the decision of the first question the property of a foreign sovereign may be seized. The learned judge who decided this case in the court below based his judgment in both these questions on the authority of previous cases, and specially on that of The Exchange (ubi sup.). [Brett, L.J.—If the seizure is an unlawful seizure, the property in the goods seized does not pass, and therefore never becomes the property of the Sovereign.] It is sheltered by the national flag. The case of Briggs v. The Lightboats (ubi sup.) is no authority for this case. The suit itself was not an Admiralty suit; that is, it was not according to the definition of our law a suit in rem. It was a suit brought to enforce a right of lien given by statute in a particular state, and it was moreover an attempt by a subordinate state to enforce a lien given by a statute of that subordinate state alone against the property of the paramount state, that is, to exercise a jurisdiction which was beyond its authority by reason of the peculiar constitution of the United States:

United States v. Judge Peters, 5 Cranch. Sup. Court (Amer.) Rep. 115.

The fact of the property, the subject of a suit in rem, being the property of the Sovereign, is no defence to such an action:

United States v. Wilder, 3 Sumner, Amer. 308.

[Brett, L.J.—In that case the United States by bringing the action had voluntarily come before the court.] Yes, but the question decided by that case is not as to the right of the subject to sue the State, but as to the liability of the property of the State to be proceeded against in rem. Story, J. says (p. 312): "It is said that, in cases where the United States are a party, no remedy by suit lies against them for the contributions, and hence the conclusion is deduced that there can be no remedy in rem. Now I confess that I should reason altogether for the same premises to the opposite conclusion. The very circumstance, that no suit would lie against the United States in its sovereign capacity, would seem to furnish the strongest ground why the remedy in rem should be held to exist." Besides, though as a matter of constitutional law in this country a subject cannot sue the Crown, it does not follow that by the comity of nations he should not be able to sue the sovereign of a foreign country. That there are differences between the status of the Crown and of foreign sovereigns recognised by our courts is clear; e.g., the Crown cannot be compelled to make discovery of documents:

Thomas v. The Queen, L. Rep. 10 Q.B. 44;
Tomlin v. Attorney-General, 40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 542.

Whereas a foreign Government is compelled:

Prioleau v. United States, 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 700 L. Rep. 2 Eq. 359; and even our own Crown is liable in suits in rem, for all property derelict at sea vests in the Crown as droits of Admiralty (The Augusta, 1 Hagg. 18), and yet such property is subject to suits in rem for salvage in the every-day practice of the court: and that there are vessels belonging to the Government or to a department of the Government which yet are not entitled to the privileges of men-of-war is evident:

The Helen, 3 C. Rob. 224;
The Cybele, 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 478, 532; 37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 165, 773; L. Rep. 3 P. Div. 8.

The writers on international law agree in pointing out that the ex-territorialty attaches only to a vessel of war:

Bluntschli, Droit International, sect. 321, p. 184;
Calvo, Droit International, edit. 2, liv. 6, sect. 259, p. 377;
Phillimore Inter. Law, 2nd ed., vol. 1, pp. 398, 399, sects. 343, 344;
Bynkerschoek, De Foro Legatorum, ch. 4.

So far as our own public vessels are concerned, the flag carried is notice of their condition; ships of war carrying a white ensign and pendant, other public vessels a blue ensign, and merchant ships a red ensign; and in most foreign countries the distinction between men-of-war, that is vessels commissioned for military purposes, and other ships is marked in the same way. There is nothing to show that the ensign carried by the Parlement Belge was anything different from the ordinary Belgian merchant ensign; and even if this vessel, could claim exemption either on the ground of being public property or of being a vessel of war she has forfeited that exemption by trading:

The Charkieh, 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 581; ep 4 Ad. & Ecc. 59; 28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 513.

James, L.J.—As at present advised, we are of opinion that, if the vessel is not exempt from jurisdiction on the ground of being public property or a vessel of war, the convention to which reference has been made would not give her such an exemption. If, however, we should arrive at the conclusion that anything turns on the making of the convention or its provisions, we will give an opportunity for further argument on the subject.

Giffard (S.G.) in reply.—Bynkershoek's opinion was, that all vessels, even undoubted ships of war, might be seized, but all jurists have disclaimed this opinion: (Wheaton Inter. Law, by Lawrence, p. 199.) That the exemption of certain foreign ships depends on their public and not on their military character, is the opinion of the American courts in the interpretation put upon the case of The Santissima Trinidad (ubi. sup.) in Briggs and another v. The Lightboats (11 Allen Mass. Rep. Amer. at p. 186). In France, moreover, the law is that "no suit or proceeding can be brought against property of any kind belonging to a foreign government. It has been decided that no private person can lay an attachment (pouver une saisie arrêt in France upon the funds of a foreign government, and that the courts are incompetent to decide upon the validity of such attachment (saisie arrêt"): (Fœnix as quoted by Wheaton, Lawrence, edit. 2, p. 199, note 69.) There is no real difference between the liability to a suit in rem and a suit in personam. A suit cannot, in fact, be brought against a thing, but as a matter of proceeding the plaintiff is permitted in certain cases to get the court to take custody of goods belonging to the defendant to enforce the appearance of the defendant; but if the defendant is not liable to appear, the process to compel him to appear is not available. The principle on which The Bold Buccleugh (7 Moore P.C. Cas. 267) was decided is not applicable here, for it only decided that a plaintiff, by having elected to sue one set of owners personally in Scotland, was not thereby prevented from suing another, who by purchasing the vessel had become liable for damage previously done by her, in England. In The Exchange (ubi sup.) the attempt was made, as in this case, to make a foreign public ship liable in rem, but the attempt failed. A foreign sovereign cannot in any case be compelled to appear:

Wadsworth v. Queen of Spain; De Haber v. Queen of Portugal, 17 Q. B. Div. 171.

In those cases the attempt was made by means of the peculiar process of foreign attachment, and here by the peculiar process of nailing a writ to the ship's mast; indeed, in this case the violation of the Sovereign's ex-territoriality would be direct, for the service of the writ on the ship is one method of serving it on the individual, just as in cases of ejectment it may be served by fixing it to the door of a vacant tenement.

James, L.J.—Before the Admiralty Court Acts (3 & 4 Vict. c. 65; 24 Vict. c. 10) were passed the Admiralty Court would have had no jurisdiction in this case. The collision happening within the body of a county, the only legal process open to the plaintiffs would have been a suit at common law, in which suit he could not, by any means, have compelled the appearance of a foreign sovereign. Have the Admiralty Court Acts so affected the rights of a foreign sovereign as to make him liable in a suit in which before that act he would not have been liable?

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 27.—The judgment of the court was now delivered by Brett, L.J.—In this case proceedings in rem on behalf of the owners of the Daring were instituted in the Admiralty Division, in accordance with the forms prescribed by the Judicature Act, against the Parlement Belge to recover redress in respect of a collision. A writ was served in the usual and prescribed manner on board the Parlement Belge. No appearance was entered, but the Attorney-General, in answer to a motion to direct judgment with costs to be entered for the plaintiffs and that a warrant should issue for the arrest of the Parlement Belge, filed an information and protest asserting that the court had no jurisdiction to entertain the suit. Upon the hearing of the motion and protest, the learned judge of the Admiralty Division overruled the protest and allowed the warrant of arrest to issue. The Attorney-General appealed.

The protest alleged that the Parlement Belge was a mail packet running between Ostend and Dover, and one of the packets mentioned in Article 6 of the Convention of the 17th Feb. 1876, made between the Sovereigns of Great Britain and Belgium, that she was and is the property of His Majesty the King of the Belgians, and in his possession, control, and employ, as reigning sovereign of the State, and was and is a public vessel of the Sovereign and State, carrying His Majesty's royal pennon, and was navigated and employed by and in the possession of such Government, and was officered by officers of the royal Belgian navy holding commissions, &c. In answer it was averred, on affidavits which were not denied, that the packet boat besides carrying letters carried merchandise and passengers and their luggage for hire.

Three main questions have been argued before us: (1) Whether, irrespective of the express exemption contained in Article 6 of the Convention (the Convention is set out in the report of the case in the court below, see ante p. 84,) the court had jurisdiction to seize the vessel in a suit in rem; (2) Whether, if the court would otherwise have such jurisdiction, it was ousted by Article 6 of the Convention; (3) Whether any exemption from the jurisdiction of the court which the vessel might otherwise have had was lost by reason of her trading in the carriage of goods and persons. In the course of the argument, we desired that it might, in the first instance, be confined to the first and third questions, reserving any further argument on the second question to be heard subsequently, if necessary. We have come to the conclusion that no such argument is necessary. We, therefore, can give no opinion on the second question. We neither affirm nor deny the propriety of the judgment of the learned judge of the Admiralty Division on that question.

The proposition raised by the first question seems to be as follows:—Has the Admiralty Division jurisdiction in respect of a collision to proceed in rem against, and in the case of non-appearance or omission to find bail to seize and sell, a ship present in this country, which ship is at the time of the proceedings the property of a foreign sovereign, is in his possession, control, and employ, as sovereign by means of his commissioned officers, and is a public vessel of his state in the sense of its being used for purposes treated by such sovereign and his advisers as public national services, it being admitted that such ship, though commissioned, is not an armed ship of war, or employed as a part of the military force of the country? On the one side it is urged that the only ships exempted from the jurisdiction are armed ships of war, or ships which, though not armed, are in the employ of the Government as part of the military force of the State. On the other side it is contended that all movable property which is the public property of the Sovereign and nation used for public purposes is exempt from adverse interference by any Court of Judicature. It is admitted that neither the Sovereign of Great Britain nor any friendly sovereign can be adversely personally impleaded in any court of this country. It is admitted that no armed ship of war of the Sovereign of Great Britain, or of a foreign sovereign, can be seized by any process whatever, exercised for any purpose, of any court of this country. But it is said that this vessel, though it is the property of a friendly sovereign in his public capacity, and is used for purposes treated by him as public national services, can be seized and sold under the process of the Admiralty Court of this country, because it will, if so seized and sold, be so treated, not in a suit personally impleaded against the Sovereign, but in a suit in rem against the vessel itself.

This contention raises two questions:—(1) Supposing that an action in rem is an action against the property only, meaning thereby that it is not a legal proceeding at all against the owner of the property, yet can the property in question be subject to the jurisdiction of the court? (2) Is it true to say that an action in rem is only and solely a legal procedure against the property, or is it not rather a procedure, indirectly if not directly, impleading the owner of the property to answer to the judgment of the court to the extent of his interest in the property? The first question really raises this—whether every part of the public property of every sovereign authority in use for national purposes is not as much exempt from the jurisdiction of every court as is the person of every sovereign. Whether it is so or not depends upon whether all nations have agreed that it shall be so, or, in other words, whether it is so by the law of nations, The exemption of the person of every sovereign from adverse suit is admitted to be a part of the law of nations. An equal exemption from interference by any process of any court of some property of every sovereign is admitted to be a part of the law of nations, The universal agreement which has made these propositions part of the law of nations has been an implied agreement. Whether the law of nations exempts all the public property of a state which is destined to the use of the State depends on whether the principle on which the agreement has been implied is as applicable to all that other public property of a sovereign or state as to the public property which is admitted to be exempt. If the principle is equally applicable to all public property used as such, then the agreement to exempt ought to be implied with regard to all such public property. If the principle only applies to the property which is admitted to be exempt, then we have no right to extend the exemption.

The first question therefore is, what is the principle on which the exemption of the person of sovereigns and of certain public properties has been recognised?

"Our king," says Blackstone (bk. 1, c. 7), "owes no kind of subjection to any other potentate on earth. Hence it is that no suit or action can be brought against the King even in civil matters, because no court can have jurisdiction over him; for all jurisdiction implies superiority of power. Authority to try would be vain and idle without an authority to redress, and the sentence of a court should be contemptible unless the court had power to command the execution of it. . . . . But who shall command the King?" In this passage, which has been often cited and relied on, the reason of the exemption is the character of the sovereign authority, its high dignity, whereby it is not subject to any superior authority of any kind. "The world," says Wheaton, adopting the words of the judgment in the case of The Exchange (7 Cranch. Amer. Rep. 116), "being composed of distinct sovereignties, possessing equal rights and equal independence, all sovereigns have consented to a relaxation in practice, under certain peculiar circumstances, of that absolute and complete jurisdiction within their respective territories which sovereignty confers. This perfect equality and absolute independence of sovereigns has given rise to a class of cases in which every sovereign is understood to waive the exercise of a part of that complete exclusive territorial jurisdiction which has been stated to be the attribute of every nation. One of these is the exemption of the person of the Sovereign from arrest or detention within a foreign territory. Why has the whole world concurred in this? The answer cannot be mistaken. A foreign sovereign is not understood as intending to subject himself to a jurisdiction incompatible with his dignity and the dignity of his nation." By dignity is obviously here meant his independence of any superior authority. So Vattel (liv. 14, c, 7, s. 108), speaking of sovereigns says: "S'il est venu en voyageur, sa dignitié seule, et ce qui est du á la nation qu'il représente et qu'il gouverne, le met à couvert de toute insulte, lui assure des respects et toute sorte d'égards, et l'exempte de toute jurisdiction." In the case of The Duke of Brunswick v. The King of Hanover (6 Beav. 1) the suit was against the King. There was a demurrer to the jurisdiction. Lord Langdale, in an elaborate judgment, allowed the demurrer. He rejected the alleged doctrine of a fictitious ex-territoriality. He admitted that there are some reasons which might justify the exemption of ambassadors which do not necessarily apply to a sovereign, but he nevertheless adopted an analogy between the cases of the ambassadors and the Sovereign, and allowed the demurrer, on the ground that the sovereign character is superior to all jurisdiction. "After giving to the subject," he says, "the best consideration in my power, it appearing to me that all the reasons upon which the immunities of ambassadors are founded do not apply to the case of a sovereign, but that there are reasons for the immunities of sovereign princes, at least as strong, if not much stronger, than any which have been advanced for the immunities of ambassadors, that suits against sovereign princes of foreign countries must in all ordinary cases in which orders or declaration of right may be made end in requests for justice which might be made without any suit at all, that even the failure of justice in some particular cases would be less prejudicial than attempts to obtain it by violating immunities though necessary to the independence of princes and nations. I think that, on the whole, it ought to be considered as a general rule, in accordance with the law of nations, that a sovereign prince resident in the dominions of another is exempt from the jurisdiction of the courts here." From all these authorities it seems to us, although other reasons have sometimes been suggested, that the real principle on which the exemption of every sovereign from the jurisdiction of every court has been decided is that the exercise of such jurisdiction would be incompatible with his real dignity—that is to say, with his absolute independence of every superior authority. By a similar examination of authorities we come to the conclusion, although other grounds have sometimes been suggested, that the immunity of an ambassador from the jurisdiction of the courts of the country to which he is accredited is based upon his being the representative of the independent sovereign or state which sends him, and which sends him upon the faith of his being admitted to be clothed with the same independence of and superiority to all adverse jurisdiction as the sovereign authority whom he represents would be.

The reason of the exemption of ships of war and some other ships must be next considered, and the first case to be carefully considered is, and always will be, The Exchange (7 Cranch. 116). It is undoubted that the decision applies, in fact, only to the case of a ship of war. Yet, in considering what was the principle on which the judgment was founded, there are some important circumstances to which attention must be directed. The plaintiffs filed their libel against the schooner Exchange found in an American port, and prayed for the usual process to attach the vessel, and that she might be restored to her owners. Upon this libel the usual process in a cause of restitution was issued and executed; that is to say, the vessel was detained. There was no appearance in the suit. Then the usual proclamations issued for all persons to appear and show cause why the vessel should not be restored to the owners. No person appeared. Then the Attorney-General of the United States appeared and filed a suggestion. In this it must be noticed that the vessel is not described as "an armed ship of war," but as "a certain public vessel belonging to His Imperial Majesty, and actually employed in his service." It certainly is to be remarked that those who conducted this case with unusual ability deliberately, in stating the cause of objection, rested the claim of exemption, not on the fact of the vessel being an armed ship of war, but on the fact of her being one of a larger class, namely, "a public vessel" belonging to a sovereign, and employed in the public service. It is upon the suggestion so pleaded that the court gives judgment. It is right, however, to say that the fact of the vessel being an armed ship of war was before the court, and that the judgment frequently uses that phrase, though by no means invariably. It is impossible within reasonable bounds to set out the elaborate judgment of Marshall, C.J. and the court. The reasoning seems to be as follows: The ship is within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States—primâ facie the court of the United States has jurisdiction. But all nations have agreed to certain limitations of their absolute territorial jurisdiction—as, for instance, they have abjured all personal jurisdiction over a foreign sovereign within their terriority, and this on account of his dignity; and all personal jurisdiction over foreign ministers, and, says the judgment, this is on the same principle; and all jurisdiction over a foreign army passing through the territory. Is the same immunity to be held to apply to ships of war? The judgment answers, Yes, and upon the same principle; i.e., that to hold otherwise would be inconsistent with the dignity—that is to say, the recognised independence—of the foreign sovereign. After dealing with the case of private foreigners and merchant vessels in a foreign country the judgment continues: "But in all respects different is the situation of a public armed ship. She constitutes a part of the military force of her nation, acts under the immediate and direct command of her sovereign, is employed by him in national objects. He has many and powerful motives for preventing those objects from being defeated by the interference of a foreign state. Such interference cannot take place without affecting his power and dignity. The implied licence, therefore, under which such a vessel enters a friendly port may reasonably be construed, and it seems to the court ought to be construed, as containing an exemption from the jurisdiction of the Sovereign within whose territory she claims the rites of hospitality." The Prins Frederic (2 Dod. 451) seems to us to be worthy of great attention. An armed ship of war belonging to the King of the Netherlands was arrested on a claim for salvage. The case was elaborately argued upon the question of jurisdiction. An argument of the closest and most forcible reasoning, to which we see no answer, was presented by Dr. Arnould, the Admiralty Advocate (see p. 466). "There is a class of things," he says, "which are not subject to the ordinary rules applying to property, which are not liable to the claims or demands of private persons, which are described by civilians . . . . as extra commercium . . . . and in a general enumeration are," by them, "denominated Sacra, Religiosa, Publica, Publicis usis destinata . . . . . These are things which are allowed to be, and from their nature must be, exempt and free from all private rights and claims of individuals, inasmuch as if these claims were to be allowed against them the arrest, the judicial possession, and judicial sale incident to such proceedings would divert them from those public uses to which they are destined. . . . . Ships of war belonging to the State are included in this class of things by their nature, and of necessity arising from their nature. . . . . The same inconveniences. . . . which. . . . would arise" from such proceedings in the courts of their own country "would equally arise if such vessel could be arrested and detained in a foreign port. . . . . There is another point of view. . . . . It is the interest and duty of every sovereign independent state to maintain unimpeached its honour and dignity." The point and force of this argument is, that the public property of every state, being destined to public uses, cannot within reason be submitted to the jurisdiction of the courts of such state, because such jurisdiction, if exercised, must divert the public property from its destined public uses; and that, by international comity, which acknowledges the equality of states, if such immunity, grounded on such reasons, exist in each state with regard to its own public property, the same immunity must be granted by each state to similar property of all other states. The dignity and independence of each state requires this reciprocity. It was this reasoning which induced Sir William Scott to hesitate to exercise jurisdiction, and so to act as to intimate his opinion that the reasoning could not be controverted. The case has always been considered as conveying his opinion to have been to that effect: see per Lord Campbell in De Haber v. The Queen of Portugal (17 Q B. 121), who says that the difficulties suggested by the argument were, in the opinion of Sir William Scott, insuperable. But if so, he assented to an argument which embraced in one class "all public property" of the State, and treated "armed ships of war" as a member of that class. In the case of The Athol (1 W. Rob. 374), Dr. Lushington certainly extended the immunity from jurisdiction to a troopship, which was not an armed ship of war, though she was employed in a sense as part of the military force of the country. The reason of his judgment was in terms that in cases of tort or damage committed by vessels of the Crown the legal responsibility attaches to the actual wrongdoer only. That is in effect to say that the vessels of the Crown cannot be touched. We come next to the important case of Briggs v. The Light Boats (11 Allen, 157). By the Massachusetts Statute, it was enacted that "any person to whom money is due for labour and materials furnished in the construction of a vessel shall have a lien upon her, which lien may be enforced by petition to the Superior Court praying for a sale of the vessel." The petition may be entered or filed, a process of attachment issues against the vessel, and notice is to be given to the owner thereof to appear and answer to the petition. This enactment gave a statutory lien on the vessel, to be enforced by process of a court. It is a more extensive lien than the common law possessory lien in respect of work done on the vessel, as it is not lost by loss of possession. It is to be enforced by the same process as a maritime lien. It is therefore in effect an enactment which applies the incidents of a maritime lien to a new subject-matter, viz., a claim for work and labour in the construction of a vessel. It follows that upon the point raised in that case the reasoning must be as applicable to every maritime lien and the means of enforcing it, as to that similar statutory lien. Now in that case the plaintiffs filed a petition and prayed an attachment and sale of the vessel. The court thereupon issued a process of attachment. and ordered notice to be given to the United States by service on their attorney. The vessel was attached, and notice given accordingly. The United States appeared specially and pleaded to the jurisdiction that at the time of the filing of the petition the vessels were the public property of the United States and in their possession, and held and owned by them for public uses, and as instruments employed by them for the execution of their sovereign and constitutional powers, and, therefore, not subject to the process or jurisdiction of the court. The question, therefore, was whether the court had jurisdiction to take possession of the vessels in order to sue them if necessary, and to give notice to the Government that if they had any objection to such sale they must appear. Every step in that case was the same as was every step in the case of The Exchange (ubi sup.), and as is every step in the present case. The objection to the jurisdiction as pleaded was in substance the same as that pleaded in the case of The Exchange (ubi sup.) and in the present case. The vessels, however, were not ships of war, or vessels employed in the military service of the State. They were like the Parlement Belge—vessels which were the public property of the State and in their possession, and held and owned by them for uses treated by them as public. It is obvious that all the arguments which have been used in the present case on behalf of the plaintiffs might have been, and almost certainly were, used in that case. But the court gave judgment declining the jurisdiction. "It is said for the petitioners," says the judgment (page 165,) "that these lightboats were not intended for service. But after they had once come into the possession of the United States for public uses, they were subject to the exclusive control of the Executive Government of the United States, and could not be interfered with by state process. The immunity from such interference arises, not because they are instruments of war, but because they are instruments of sovereignty. These reasons have satisfied us that there is no principle upon which the courts of this Commonwealth can entertain jurisdiction of these petitions." The judgment then reviews many cases. Among others The Marquis of Huntley (3 Hagg. 247), in which Sir John Nicholl treated "Government stores" in charge of a lieutenant, but on board a ship which was only chartered by Government, as beyond his jurisdiction, though the ship and freight were within it; The Schooner Merchant, in Florida, in which it was held that the mails could not be arrested or detained for salvage; The Thomas A. Scott, in which a transport ship, owned by the United States, but not commissioned, was held to be beyond jurisdiction. The judgment ends thus: "The exemption of a public ship of war of a foreign government from the jurisdiction of our courts depends rather upon its public than upon its military character." The reasoning of that careful judgment is the reasoning of the Admiralty Advocate in the case of The Prins Frederic. The ground of that judgment is that the public property of Government in use for public purposes is beyond the jurisdiction of the courts either of its own or any other state, and that ships of war are beyond such jurisdiction, not because they are ships of war, but because they are public property. It puts all the public movable property of a state, which is in its possession for public purposes, in the same category of immunity from jurisdiction as the person of a sovereign, or of an ambassador, or ships of war, and exempts it from the jurisdiction of all courts for the same reason—viz., that the exercise of such jurisdiction is inconsistent with the independence of the sovereign authority of the State. The judgment of Lord Campbell in De Haber v. Queen of Portugal (17 Q.B. 171) seems to the same effect. though the decision may fairly be said to apply only to a suit directly brought against the Sovereign. But he relies on the statute of Anne with regard to the ambassadors, and says, "Can we doubt that in the opinion of that great judge, Lord Holt, the Sovereign himself would have been considered entitled to the same protection, immunity, and privilege as the minister who represents him?" and he cites the statute thus: "It has always been said to be merely declaratory of the law of nations recognised and enforced by our municipal law, and it provides that all process whereby the person of any ambassador or of his domestic servants may be arrested, or his goods distrained or seized, shall be utterly null and void. The italics are as written by Lord Campbell, and further citing The Prins Frederic (ubi sup.) he says: "Objection being made that the Court had no jurisdiction, a distinction was attempted that the salvors were not suing the King of the Netherlands, and that being in possession of and having a lien upon a ship which they had saved the proceeding might be considered in rem, but Lord Stowell saw such insuperable difficulties in judicially assessing the amount of salvage, the payment of which was to be enforced by sale, that he caused representations to be made to the Dutch Government, who very honourably consented to his disposing of the matter as an arbitrator." The decision, therefore, is, that the immuuity of the Sovereign is at least as great as the immunity of an ambassador, but the statute declares that the law is and always has been not only that an ambassador is free from personal suit or process, but that his goods are free from such process as distress or seizure, the latter meaning seizure by process of law, it follows that the goods of every sovereign are free from any seizure by process of law. The latest case on the point seems to be the case of Vavasseur v. Krupp (9 Ch. Div. 351; 39 L. T. Rep. N. S. 426) before this court. The question was whether the English court had jurisdiction to order "shells" belonging to the Mikado of Japan to be destroyed supposing they were an infringement of the plaintiff's patent. All the judges held that there was no such jurisdiction. "I suppose," says James, L.J., "that there is a notion that in some way these shells became tainted or affected through the breach or attempted breach of the patent; but even then a foreign sovereign cannot be deprived of his property because it has become tainted by the infringment of somebody's patent. He says, 'It is my public property, and I ask you for it.' That seems to me to be the whole of the case." Brett, L.J. said: "The goods were the property of the Mikado. They were his property as a sovereign; they were the property of his country." I shall assume for this purpose that there was an infringement of the patent, yet the Mikado has a perfect right to have these goods; no court in this country can properly prevent him from having goods which are the public property of his own country.', And Cotton, L.J. says: "This court has no jurisdiction, and in my opinion none of the courts in this country have any jurisdiction to interfere with the property of a foreign sovereign, more especially with what we call the public property of the State of which he is sovereign, as distinguished from that which may be his own private property. The courts have no jurisdiction to do so, not only because there is no jurisdiction as against the individual, but because there is no jurisdiction as against the foreign country whose property they are, although that foreign country is represented as all foreign countries having a sovereign are represented by the individual who is the sovereign."

The principle to be deduced from all these cases is that, as a consequence of the absolute independence of every sovereign authority and of the international comity which induces every Sovereign state to respect the independence and dignity of every other sovereign state, each and every one declines to exercise by means of its courts any of its territorial jurisdiction over the person of any sovereign or ambassador of any other state, or over the public property of any state which is destined to public use, or over the property of any ambassador, though such sovereign, ambassador, or property be within its territory, and therefore, but for the common agreement, subject to its jurisdiction.

It is said, however, that there are authorities inconsistent with the view that this is a part of international law. The case of The Santissima Trinidad (7 Wheaton (Amer.), 283) is relied on. But, as was pointed out in the judgment in Briggs v. The Lightboats, the former case is one depending upon a well known doctrine of the law of prize, viz., that property captured in breach of the laws of neutrality is held by the courts of the neutral State not to be lawful prize. In The United States v. Wilder (3 Sumner (Amer.), 308) it would be uncandid to say that there are not expressions of Story, J. which are in favour of the contention that the immunity from jurisdiction is confined to ships and materials of war. But in that case the right which was adverse to the United States Government was a possessory lien for general average. The remedy of the shipowner was in his own hands. He required no assistance from any process of any court, as would also be the case in a lien for freight. As a decision, therefore, the case is not in point, because the United States were plaintiffs voluntarily seeking the assistance of the Massachusetts tribunal. But it seems to us sufficient to say that we do not think the observations of Story, J. countervail effectually the arguments and decisions in the other cases which have been cited. There is then the opinion of the learned judge of the Admiralty Division, expressed in the case of The Charkieh (1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 581; L. Rep. 4 Adm. & Ecc. 59; 28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 513.) The decision is, of course, not in point, because the case was decided on the ground that the Khedive was not an independent sovereign. But there is a careful consideration in the judgment of the question whether the ship would have been liable to the jurisdiction of the court in proceedings in rem in respect of a collision if the Khedive had been a sovereign prince. The conclusion is that she would have been. Such an opinion deserves respectful attention. We are not quite sure whether we correctly appreciate the grounds of the opinion. The learned judge agrees that an ambassador is personally exempt from the service of all process in a civil cause, and from any action which renders such service necessary; and that "the law as to the privileges of an ambassador applies with equal force to the Sovereign: but," he continues, "it remains to be considered whether there may not be a proceeding in rem against property of the Sovereign or ambassador which is free from the objections fatal to the other modes of procedure. He then says "that he would be prepared to hold that proceedings in rem in some cases may be instituted without any violation of international law, though the owner of the res be in the category of persons privileged from personal suit." This is an intimation of an opinion not yet conclusively formed that proceedings in rem are a legal procedure solely against property, and not directly or indirectly against the owner of the property. But then he says that a proceeding in rem cannot be instituted against the property of a sovereign or an ambassador if the res can in any fair sense be said to be connected with the jus coronæ of the Sovereign or the discharge of the functions of the ambassador. From this one would infer that no personal process can issue against a sovereign or an ambassador; that no process in rem can issue against any property which can in any fair sense be said to be connected with the jus coronæ, but such process might issue against other property of a sovereign or an ambassador. But then he says that "it is by no means clear that a ship of war to which salvage services have been rendered may not jure gentium be liable to be proceeded against in a Court of Admiralty for the remuneration of such services." Yet such proceedings are undoubtedly by means of process in rem, and it can hardly be denied that a ship of war is property connected with the jus coronæ. "I am disposed to hold," he says, "that in case of salvage or collision the obligato attaches jure gentium upon the ship whatever be her character, public or private." If this includes a ship of war it seems to us difficult to understand how it is not inconsistent with the principle of the judgments in the cases of The Exchange and Briggs v. The Lightboats. If it does not include a ship of war, the distinction between other processes and the process in rem is not always an answer to the claim of immunity. But then the learned judge expresses an opinion that in the case before him there was a nearer goal at hand, because it was idle to contend that the ships were not trading vessels to all intents and purposes, though, when engaged in their regular employment, they carried mail bags. This seems to intimate that the ships then in question were not public ships at all. We cannot think that this judgment discloses any final opinion of the learned judge, either as to the limits of the nature of the property which is exempt, or as to the whole nature of the action in rem with regard to the question under discussion.

Having carefully considered the case of The Charkieh (ubi sup.) we are of opinion that the proposition deduced from the earlier cases in an earlier part of this judgment is the correct exposition of the law of nations, namely, that as a consequence of the absolute independence of every sovereign authority and of the international comity which induces every sovereign state to respect the independence of every other sovereign state, each and every one declines to exercise by means of any of its courts any of its territorial jurisdiction over the person of any sovereign or ambassador of any other state, or over the public property of any State which is destined to its public use, or over the property of any ambassador, though such sovereign, ambassador, or property be within its territory, and therefore, but for the common agreement, subject to its jurisdiction.

This proposition would determine the first question in the present case in favour of the protest, even if an action in rem were held to be a proceeding solely against property, and not a procedure directly or indirectly impleading the owner of the property to answer to the judgment of the court. But we cannot allow it to be supposed that in our opinion the owner of the property is not indirectly impleaded. The course of proceeding, undoubtedly, is first to seize the property. It is, undoubtedly, not necessary, in order to enable the court to proceed further, that the owner should be personally served with any process. In the majority of cases brought under the cognizance of an Admiralty Court no such personal service could be effected. Another course was therefore taken from the earliest times. The seizure of the property was made by means of a formality which was as public as could be devised. That formality of necessity gave notice of the suit to the agents of the owner of the property, and so, in substance, to him. Besides which, by the regular course of the Admiralty, the owner was cited or had notice to appear to show cause why his property should not be liable to answer to the complainant. The owner has a right to appear and show cause, a right which cannot be denied. It is not necessary, it is true, that the notice or citation should be personally served. But, unless it were considered that, either by means of the publicity of the manner of arresting the property, or by means of the publicity of the notice or citation, the owner had an opportunity of protecting his property, from a final decree by the court, the judgment in rem of a court would be manifestly contrary to natural justice. In a claim made in respect of collision, the property is not treated as the delinquent per se. Though the ship has been in collision and has caused injury by reason of the negligence or want of skill of those in charge of her, yet she cannot be made the means of compensation, if those in charge of her were not the servants of her then owner, as for example if she was in charge of a compulsory pilot. This is conclusive to show that the liability to compensate must be fixed, not merely on the property, but also on the owner through the property. If so, the owner is, at least, indirectly impleaded to answer to—that is to say, to be effected by—the judgment of the court. It is no answer to say that if the property be sold after the maritime lien has accrued the property may be seized and sold as against the new owner. This is a severe law, arising probably from the difficulty of otherwise enforcing any remedy in favour of an injured suitor. But the property cannot be sold as against the new owner, if it could not have been sold as against the owner at the time when the alleged lien accrued. This doctrine of the Courts of Admiralty goes only to this extent, that the innocent purchaser takes the property subject to the inchoate maritime lien which attached to it as against him who was the owner at the time the lien attached. The new owner has the same public notice of the suit and the same opportunity and right of appearance as the former owner would have had. He is impleaded in the same way as the former owner would have been. Either is affected in his interests by the judgment of a court which is bound to give him the means of knowing that it is about to proceed to affect those interests, and that it is bound to hear him if he objects. That is, in our opinion, an impleading. The case of The Bold Buccleuch (7 Moo. P. C. C. 267) does not decide to the contrary of this. It decides that an action in rem is a different action from one in personam, and has a different result. But it does not decide that a court which seizes and sells a man's property does not assume to make that man subject to its jurisdiction. To implead an independent sovereign in such a way is to call upon him to sacrifice either his property or his independence. To place him in that position is a breach of the principle upon which his immunity from jurisdiction rests. We think that he cannot be so indirectly impleaded any more than he could be directly impleaded. The case is, upon this consideration of it, brought within the general rule that a sovereign cannot be personally impleaded in any court.

But it is said that the immunity is lost by reason of the ship having been used for trading purposes. As to this, it must be maintained either that the ship has been so used as to have been employed substantially as a mere trading ship and not substantially for national purposes, or that a use of her in part for such purposes takes away the immunity, although she is in possession of the sovereign authority by the hands of commissioned officers, and is substantially in use for national purposes. Both those propositions raise the question of how the ship must be considered to have been employed. As to the first, the ship has been by the Sovereign of Belgium, by the usual means, declared to be in his possession as sovereign and to be a public vessel of the State. It seems very difficult to say that any court can inquire by contentious testimony whether that declaration is or is not correct. To submit to such an inquiry before the court is to submit to its jurisdiction. It has been held that if the ship be declared by the sovereign authority by the usual means to be a ship of war, that declaration cannot be inquired into. That was expressly decided under very trying circumstances in the case of The Exchange (ubi sup). Whether the ship is a public ship used for national purposes seems to come within the same rule. But, if such an inquiry could properly be instituted, it seems clear that in the present case the ship has been mainly used for the purpose of carrying the mails, and only subserviently to that main object for the purposes of trade. The carrying of passengers and merchandise has been subordinated to the duty of carrying the mails. The ship is not, in fact, brought within the first proposition. As to the second, it has been frequently stated that an independent sovereign cannot be personally sued, although he has carried on a private trading adventure. It has been held that an ambassador cannot be personally sued, although he has traded; and in both cases because such a suit would be inconsistent with the independence and equality of the State which he represents. If the remedy sought by an action in rem against public property is, as we think it is, an indirect mode of exercising the authority of the court against the owner of the property, then the attempt to exercise such an authority is an attempt inconsistent with the independence and equality of the State which is represented by such owner. The property cannot upon the hypothesis be denied to be public property; the case is within the terms of the rule; it is within the spirit of the rule; therefore, we are of opinion that the mere fact of the ship being used subordinately and partially for trading purposes does not take away the general immunity.

For all these reasons we are unable to agree with the judgment of the learned judge, and have come to the conclusion that the judgment must be reversed, with a declaration that the Admiralty Division had no jurisdiction over the Parlement Belge.

James and Cotton, L.JJ. concurred.

James, L.J. adding: The appeal sustained with costs. There being no jurisdiction to entertain the suit, the whole proceedings will fall to the ground.

The Robert Dixon. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (ADMIRALTY).

Salvage—Towage—Negligence—Damage—Tug and tow.

Where in the performance of towage services the tow gets into a position of danger, the tug is not entitled to salvage reward for extricating her from it, unless she can show (1) That there was no negligence on the part of the tug causing the tow to get into the position of danger, and (2) That her being in the position of danger was the result of an unforseen and inevitable accident.

Semble, the person in charge of the tow may give express orders as to the course and the tug is bound to obey them, but in the absence of such orders the tug has the general direction of the course, and is bound to tow the vessel in a safe and prudent course.

This was an appeal from the judgment of Sir Robert Phillimore, by which he found that the tug Commodore was not entitled to salvage remuneration for services rendered to the Robert Dixon, and that the Robert Dixon was entitled to recover damages from the Commodore for loss sustained by her through the negligence of the Commodore.

The facts of the case are fully set out in the report of the cause in the court below (ante, p. 95; 40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 333).

Dec. 8, 1879.—The appeal came on for hearing.

Webster, Q.C. and Potter for the appellants, owners of the Commodore.

Milward, Q.C. and G. Bruce, for the respondents, were not called on.

James, L.J.—It appears to us and to the assessors who have assisted us that, though we might not have come to the same conclusion as to one part of the case as the judge of the court below, there is no sufficient cause shown to us to overrule the decision, and that, if the whole of the evidence came before us as a new matter, it would justify the finding, and would not warrant any other conclusion. The learned judge in the court below does not express any opinion on the point on which there is a conflict of evidence, namely, as to whether there were any positive orders and directions given from the Robert Dixon to the Commodore, which orders were disobeyed. And it is not necessary for us to express an opinion on that point, for, if no orders were given except the general ones when the pilot left the Robert Dixon, then the Commodore was towing according to the skill and judgment of her master, and there was no order which could relieve the master of the Commodore from the responsibility of taking the ship a reasonably safe and prudent course, having regard to the condition of the vessel and the state of the weather. It appears to us that to take the ship inside of the in-shore pilot boat was not, under the circumstances, such a reasonably prudent course. That pilot boat was lying on the inside of the ordinary course of passing vessels so as to be out of their way, and therefore it would not be right or prudent for the tug to pass in-shore of her. That being so, the judgment of the court below appears to us to be warranted by the facts. And on the other evidence in the case it is obvious that the Commodore did as a matter of fact—though not wilfully, to create a salvage service—bring the Robert Dixon into a position of extreme peril. It would be strange if, under these circumstances, whether the course which led into danger was pursued from want of prudence or from an error in judgment, the tug could convert her towage into a salvage service. Therefore I am of opinion that she is not entitled to claim as a salvor.

As to the counter-claim for the loss of the anchors and chains belonging to the Robert Dixon, that loss was a consequence of the position in which the Robert Dixon was placed, and therefore of the negligence on the part of the Commodore, and therefore must follow the same rule, and the Commodore must bear the loss. It might not be so if it were proved that the loss was caused by want of proper care on board the ship—as, for example, if the anchors could have been weighed by a sober crew, but the drunkenness of the men had prevented it being done; but the evidence on that point is of a very shadowy and unsatisfactory nature, and it is a matter the onus of proving which is on the Commodore, who alleges it, and I cannot consider that it has been proved.

Baggallay, L. J.—I am of the same opinion.

This is an action for salvage brought by the owners of the steam-tug Commodore, who at the time the alleged services were rendered was under a contract to tow the Robert Dixon from Liverpool to the Skerries. The suggestion on the part of the Commodore is, that in course of the towage the Robert Dixon met with a misfortune which was not contemplated by the contract, and which led her into a position of great peril, from which the Commodore was used to rescue her, and get her again in her proper course. The difference between towage and salvage, and where one may be considered to merge into the other, is very clearly laid down in the case cited in the judgment in the court below (The Minnehaha, Lush. 335; 4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 810; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 111). It is there stated: "If the danger from which the ship has been rescued is attributable to the fault of the tug; if the tug, whether by wilful misconduct or by negligence, or by want of that reasonable skill or equipment which are implied in the towage contract, has occasioned or materially contributed to the danger, we can have no hesitation in stating our opinion that she can have no claim to salvage. She can never be permitted to profit by her own wrong or default." That principle is one universally recognised, and therefore the only question here is, whether the danger from which the Robert Dixon was rescued was one into which she had been brought by the fault of the Commodore. I do not say from the wilful misconduct—that is not charged—but from the bad navigation or management of the tug. Now, upon the evidence, I can arrive at no other conclusion than that it was caused by the negligence of the tug and the want of the necessary amount of skill. I am satisfied that the course of the vessel after leaving the Mersey was not a safe course, and that the vessels continued in it too long.

Brett, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

The plaintiffs were under a towage contract to tow the Robert Dixon to the Skerries, and they bring an action in which they assert that the towage service was altered into one which gives a right to salvage reward. It lies upon the plaintiffs to show that the change in the condition of the ship was caused without any want of care or skill on their part, but arose from some cause or accident over which they had no control. I am of opinion that the burden of proof of both the negative and affirmative propositions lies on the plaintiffs. They must show that there was no want of reasonable care and skill on their part which caused or contributed to the danger, and also that the danger arose from some cause beyond their control. In that proof the plaintiffs, in my opinion; fail, and they fail mainly on their own evidence, and it is not necessary therefore to rely on the evidence given on behalf of the defendants. It appears from the evidence given on behalf of the plaintiffs that when the licensed pilot left the Robert Dixon she was in charge of her own captain, assisted by a Channel pilot, who was not a licensed pilot employed by compulsion of law, and therefore that she was in fact and in law in charge of her own captain throughout. I think it is proved by the plaintiffs' witnesses that a general direction as to the course was given by the Channel pilot, that is in contemplation of law by the captain, under whose orders the Channel pilot acted, and I am inclined to hold that the tug is bound to obey the orders given her by the person in charge of a ship she is towing, and if in this case the captain of the Robert Dixon had insisted on the Commodore continuing to lay that course I think she would have been bound to do so unless it obviously led her into a position in which the tug would be injured; at all events, had the captain of the Robert Dixon so ordered, he could not complain of the consequences of the tug obeying his orders. But here the only order given was one at the commencement of the towage, and that was to tow the ship in a course which at that time was a right course, but, as the towage proceeded, the weather became threatening and the wind increased, and that course then ceased to be a safe course; if, then, no further order was given from the Robert Dixon, it was the duty of the Commodore, who had command of the course to use reasonable care and skill to steer a safe course. In consequence of the increasing badness of the weather the Robert Dixon, which was in ballast, began to fall to leeward of her course. The tug ought then, in the absence of orders to the contrary, at all events to have altered the course so as to counteract this sagging, and by keeping further from the shore avert the danger. But the master of the Commodore does not do so, and by his negligence in not doing so—I do not for a moment accuse him of anything worse than negligence—the Robert Dixon gets into a place considerably to leeward of where she ought to have been; she went inside of the in-shore pilot boat instead of outside of it. I do not say that she ought to have passed seven, eight or nine miles from the shore, but I say that she did pass too close along shore and inside of the track where she should have gone. The Trinity Masters in the court below and our assessors in this court are all clearly of opinion that this ship on that night ought not to have been where she was, and, unless the master of the tug can show that he was there in consequence of orders from the ship, he cannot excuse himself from the charge of negligence causing or contributing to the position of the ship, as he is bound to do before he can convert his towage contract into a salvage service. It is true that, being in that improper place, he may have done the right thing. He altered his course to the northward, but it was too late, and he could not in the then condition of the weather get the vessel to windward. The plaintiff has not, therefore, shown that his want of care or skill was not the cause of the Robert Dixon being in the position of peril from which he ultimately rescued her; that being so, the towage service was never converted into salvage. The question whether they are or are not entitled under the circumstances to towage under the contract is not now before us, but certainly they are not entitled to salvage.

As to the counter-claim the burden of proof here also lies on the plaintiffs in the action. It once being proved that the Robert Dixon was brought into a position of danger by the negligence of those in charge of the Commodore, and was obliged to anchor on a lee shore, unless the plaintiffs can show that the conduct of the captain of the Robert Dixon was in some way unreasonable or improper in slipping his cables, the plaintiffs must take the responsibility of the natural consequences of their negligence in bringing the ship into that dangerous position. In my opinion the plaintiffs have entirely failed in discharging themselves of this burden, and therefore they must be held liable for the loss.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

(Before COCKBURN, L C.J., BRAMWELL, COTTON, and THESIGER, L.JJ.)

JONES AND ANOTHER v. HOUGH AND ANOTHER.

Ship and shipping — Charter-party —Refusal to sign bills of lading—Breach of contract—Penalties—Deduction of, from freight—Non-delivery of cargo—Conversion—Trial by judge without jury—Appeal on facts and law.

A charter-party provided that a steamship should go to Cardiff, take on board a cargo, and therewith proceed to Bilbao, and there deliver the same on being paid freight at a rate named; "the master hereby agrees to sign" bills of lading "as presented . . . within twenty-four hours after the cargo is on board, or pay 4d. per registered ton per day for each day's delay as damages." At Cardiff, the master refused to sign bills of lading, unless a clause was inserted to protect the shipowners against a possible rise in the duties on the cargo. The ship sailed without any bills of lading having been signed. The charterers indorsed and sent the unsigned bills of lading and the invoice to their consignees. The ship arrived at Bilbao, and the master began to discharge the cargo at the consignees' wharf. When a small part had been delivered, the consignees acting under instructions from the charterers, informed the shipowners that they should only pay the freight after deducting 10l. (being 4d. per registered ton), a day for penalties for delay in signing the bills of lading. The master thereupon refused to complete delivery, and warehoused the cargo. In an action by the charterers against the owners of the ship,

Held (affirming the judgment of Lindley, J.), that the captain's refusal to sign bills of lading was a breach of contract on the part of the defendants, but that (reversing the judgment of Lindley, J.) there had been no conversion of the cargo by the defendants, and the plaintiffs were only entitled to nominal damages for the breach of contract, the non delivery of the cargo being occasioned by their own act in instructing the consignees to make a deduction from the freight not authorised by the charter-party.

THIS was an action for damages for the wrongful conversion of a cargo of coals, and for breach of contract in not signing bills of lading, tried before Lindley, J. without a jury.

The plaintiffs were the charterers, and the defendants the owners of the steamship Ellen. The charter-party was made on the 13th June, 1877, and it was agreed thereby that the Ellen should go to Cardiff, and "there take on board as tendered a full and complete cargo of coke . . . . and being so laded shall therewith proceed to Bilbao . . . . and there, as ordered, deliver the same alongside . . . . on being paid freight at the rate of 9*s.* per ton of twenty cwt.; the ship paying trimming, wharfage, consulage, lights, pilotage, and all other port charges whatsoever . . . . The freight to be paid as follows: one third (if required) in cash on signing bills of lading, less 3 per cent. for all charges, and the remainder on the right delivery of the cargo in cash. A sufficient quantity of cargo to be taken on board for ship's use . . . . to be indorsed on bills of lading, which documents the master hereby agrees to sign as presented . . . . within twenty-four hours after the cargo is on board, or pay 4*d.* per registered ton per day for each day's delay as damages." It appeared at the trial that the plaintiffs had contracted to sell a cargo of coke to certain merchants, by name Ybarra and Co., at Bilboa, and they accordingly shipped on the 30th June 564 tons of coke on board the Ellen, at Cardiff, under the above charter-party, and presented bills of lading in the ordinary form to the master for his signature. The master, however, declined to sign them, unless he were allowed to insert the following clause: "The vessel not liable for duties on cargo caused by non-arrival before the 1st July," as there was some reason to suppose that the Spanish Government would charge extra duties after that date; and the ship sailed, no bills of lading having been signed. The plaintiffs indorsed and sent the unsigned bills of lading and the invoice to Ybarra and Co., their consignees, requesting them to deduct 4*d.* per ton per day, i.e., 50*l.* for the refusal of the master to sign the bills of lading. The Ellen arrived at Bilbao on the 4th July, and the master began to discharge the cargo at Ybarra's wharf. When about thirty tons had been delivered, Ybarra, acting under instructions from the plaintiffs, informed the defendants that he should only pay the freight subject to a deduction of 10*l.* a day, being the amount of the penalty named in the charter-party, from the date of the presentation of the bills of lading at Cardiff. The master thereupon refused to complete the delivery of the cargo, and warehoused it at Olaveago for whom it might concern. Lindley, J. reserved the case for further consideration, and ultimately gave judgment for the plaintiffs for 399*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*, the value of the cargo of coke, holding that the master was not justified in insisting on the insertion of the clause as to non-liability for duties, and that there was a conversion of the cargo by his sailing from Cardiff without having signed the bills of lading.

The defendants gave notice of motion on appeal from this judgment.

On the 19th April the Court of Appeal granted a rule nisi for a new trial, on the grounds of misdirection, that the verdict was against the weight of evidence, of surprise, and that the damages were excessive.

The argument on the appeal motion, and on the rule nisi, now came on for hearing.

Holl, Q.C. and Douglas Walker for the defendants.—The plaintiffs thought that they would have to pay extra custom duties and threatened to charge us with them; in consequence the captain had a stipulation put in the bill of lading to give the consignees notice that we would not pay them. We left a bill of lading with that stipulation at Cardiff, and set sail for Bilbao. The consignees at Bilbao refused to take the cargo on the ground that we had not signed the bills of lading, and were bound, as they contended, to pay the penalty of 4*d.* per registered ton (which amounted to 10*l.*) per day. They practically refused, because they would not pay us freight without deducting the penalties, and we were not bound to deliver the cargo without payment of our freight. We were entitled to put anything in the bill of lading that was reasonably necessary for our protection. [BRAMWELL, L.J.—Your argument is that because you were right in the dispute, you were entitled to a statement in the bill of lading that you were in the right. COCKBURN, C.J.—You seek by inserting something in the bill of lading to prejudge the question in your favour.] At all events, they were not entitled to deduct the penalties. The clause in the charter-party refers to "delay" in signing the bills of lading, and is not applicable to a refusal to sign. There has been no conversion here. The ship proceeded to Bilbao direct, and commenced to deliver to the consignees of the plaintiffs; that delivery was only stopped by the conduct of the consignees, acting under instructions from the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs evidently did not at that time consider that there had been a conversion, as they instructed the consignees to deduct the penalty from the freight. They referred to Falke v. Fletcher, 18 C. B. N. S. 403.

Cohen, Q.C. and Jelf for the plaintiffs.—The consignees were entitled to deduct the penalties from the freight. The refusal to sign the bill of lading was a breach of contract. A promise to pay penalties is good in a building contract; why not in a contract to carry by ship? In Hiort v. Bott (L. Rep. 9 Exch. 86; 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 25), Bramwell, L.J. said: "Mr. Bosanquet gave a good description of what constitutes a conversion, when he said that it is where a man does an unauthorised act which deprives another of his property permanently or for an indefinite time." Accepting that definition, there has been a conversion here. The coke was put into the hold only upon the terms of the contract; and directly there was a breach of those terms there was a conversion of the coke. It is an unauthorised dealing with goods put on board ship under an inchoate contract for the master to sail away before that inchoate contract is completed: (Peek v. Larsen, 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 163; L. Rep. 12 Eq. 378; 25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 580.) [BRAMWELL, L.J.—Here you did not even try to stop the ship. Conversions are of two kinds; such a conversion as this is not an actual, but a legal conversion, and that is optional with the owner of the goods. Here you have not chosen so to treat it.] The damage we have suffered here is actual, not technical. [BRAMWELL, L.J.—You told the consignees not to take the goods unless the defendants would agree to a deduction from the freight which they were not bound to agree to.] If the findings of fact are right, the judgment entered on them is right, and those findings cannot be impeached on appeal, they can only be reversed by a new trial.

COCKBURN, C.J.—We think that this appeal should be allowed to a certain extent. We think that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover for the defendants' breach of contract in their captain's not signing the bill of lading, but that they have sustained no real damage. It is quite clear that the consignees would have been ready to take complete delivery under the contract, if the plaintiffs had let them do so. Now I think the learned judge below was wrong in saying that the departure of the vessel without a bill of lading being signed amounted to a conversion. I think this case is distinguishable from Peek v. Larsen (ubi sup.). There it was held that a person who had put goods on board a general ship without any knowledge of the charter-party under which that ship was chartered, was, on discovering the nature of that charter-party, entitled to have his goods returned to him. Now I do not at all say that, if at the time that the captain refused to sign the bill of lading, the plaintiffs had said, "Give us back our cargo," there would not have been a conversion in sailing away with it; but they did not say anything of the kind. Now there were two parts to the defendants' contract. Their captain was bound to sign a bill of lading in the usual form, and he was also bound to take the cargo to Bilbao. One of the things he was to do, viz., sign the bill of lading, he did not do; the other, viz., take the cargo to Bilbao, he did. I do not think his doing so was a conversion of the cargo, there being no protest on the part of the plaintiff.

But even if there was what plaintiffs might have treated as a conversion, it would merely have placed it at their option to treat it as a conversion or not, at the time when the goods were taken out of their order and disposition. In my opinion, their conduct shows that they elected not to treat it as a conversion, ut to speculate upon the chance of enforcing the penalties under the charter-party. Ybarra and Co. were quite willing to take the cargo without the bill of lading having been signed; they knew what the agreed freight was, and were content to pay it. But the plaintiffs interfere and tell them not to take it unless certain terms were agreed to by the captain. What was the captain's position? Did his refusal to deliver the cargo, without payment of his freight in full, amount to a conversion? By the charter-party the charterers were absolved from liability as soon as the cargo was loaded, and were no longer liable for the freight. If he had received it subject to the deductions, the shipowners would have lost that portion of their freight. Therefore he was perfectly justified in saying to the consignees, "Pay me my freight." Their answer is, "We will not, as we have received instructions to deduct 10*l.* a day penalty." The captain says, "Then I cannot deliver the cargo." It is impossible to say that if there was any conversion at Cardiff it was not waived by the plaintiffs' subsequent conduct, or that what took place at Bilbao was wrongful on the part of the defendants. Therefore, there has been no conversion in this case; but there has been a breach of contract in not signing the bills of lading; for the breach of contract the plaintiffs can recover only nominal damages, the plaintiff having sustained no loss, as but for this act in stopping delivery no one would have been damnified. As both parties were wrong each party will bear his own costs.

BRAMWELL, L.J.—I entirely agree with the Lord Chief Justice; but, out of respect for the learned judge from whom we are differing, I will give my reasons. As to our jurisdiction in this case, in my opinion we are to arrive at a conclusion upon the materials which were before the learned judge, and, if we differ from him, and find that his conclusions on questions of fact are erroneous, we must act on our own conclusions, and not accept his finding. When there has been a trial by jury, the case is very different. There the parties have agreed that a jury shall decide the facts, and we cannot be substituted for that tribunal. Where there is no jury, this court can and ought to review a finding of fact by a learned judge. Now I quite agree with the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice, that there has been no conversion in this case. The cases that have been cited are entirely different from this. Here the consignees of the plaintiffs, who were persons acting under the plaintiffs' instructions, actually accepted part of the cargo. If there had been a conversion the plaintiffs did not treat it as one. As to the penalties, if the plaintiffs were entitled to demand them at all here, they may be running now and may go on for ever. Mr. Jelf says that it is the same with every building contract; but that is not so, because penalties under a building contract can only run until the building is finished. The true construction of the clause in the charter-party is that the penalties only accrue when there has been delay in giving a bill of lading, but do not accrue when it is refused altogether. So that there was no right to deduct anything from the freight. But there has been a breach of contract by the defendants. The captain refused to sign a bill of lading when he ought to have done so. Without blaming him at all, because I do not wonder that he did not want to sign a bill of lading that might leave him liable for extra customs duties, I still think that he was not legally justified in his refusal. He was bound to sign the bill presented; it was in the ordinary form, and he had no right to refuse to sign and insist upon inserting an unusual condition. The plaintiffs are therefore entitled to recover nominal damages; and both parties having been in the wrong, each will pay his own costs.

COTTON, L.J.—I agree with the judgments which have been delivered. I cannot but think that what has been done here in obtaining a rule for a new trial is unnecessary. Where an action has been tried by a judge without a jury, there is no need to apply for a rule for a new trial except on the ground of surprise, or where there have been issues settled or a judge has decided separately the questions of law and of fact. It is quite competent for the court to say upon the hearing that they have not sufficiently full materials before them to enable them to decide the question in dispute, and to refer the matter back to the court below. That has been done here in many cases. But the only question in this case is, what is the proper conclusion to be drawn from certain letters? Here we have, in my opinion, all the materials before us for coming to a conclusion. But it is said that it is hard that a man who has had facts found in his favour by a judge should be at a disadvantage as compared with a man who has had facts found in his favour by a jury. That may be; but the answer is, that a man who agrees to try before a judge alone has waived his right to have the facts adjudicated upon by a jury. The Court of Appeal is and ought to be most unwilling to interfere with the conclusions formed by a judge on matters of fact; but if those conclusions are clearly wrong we must reverse them. In this case, I cannot find in the judgment of Lindley, J. any fact which the court would have found differently. I nowhere find in his judgment that he has found that Messrs. Ybarra and Co. were willing to pay full freight for the cargo delivered, or that the master would have refused to deliver the cargo in tender to him without deductions of the freight. Messrs. Ybarra and Co. were not ready to pay, except after deducting what the plaintiff had requested them to deduct from the freight; hence, in my opinion, the master was perfectly right to refuse to deliver the cargo unless the freight was paid in full.

One word on the question of conversion. A contract was entered into to carry a cargo of coke and to give a bill of lading for that cargo. The master wrongfully refused to give a bill of lading; he had the cargo on board and this refusal is said to be a conversion. The plaintiffs did not object to this cargo being carried to Bilbao and delivered to Ybarra and Co., they only objected to the master not giving a bill of lading; Ybarra and Co. were willing to receive the cargo subject to certain deductions from freight; that, in my opinion, cannot be considered a conversion. The cargo was not taken to a person whom the plaintiffs did not intend to have it, as in the case of Falke v. Fletcher (18 C. B. N. S. 403). He did not as was the case in Hiort v. Bott (L. Rep. 9 Ex. 86; 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 25), deliver the documents of title to some person other than the consignees of the plaintiffs. I think, therefore, that there was no conversion at Cardiff in sailing away without signing the bill of lading; and no conversion at Bilbao in refusing to deliver the cargo under the circumstances.

Thesiger, L.J.—I agree.

As to the power of this court to deal with the facts where the action has been tried by a judge without a jury, I will say a few words. There may be cases in which a judge has dealt separately with the issues of fact and the issues of law. It appears to me that Order XXXVI., r. 6, contemplates such a case; and, no doubt, Krehl v. Burrell (L. Rep. 10 Ch. Div. 420; 39 L. T. Rep. N.S. 461) has decided that there may be such cases. But this appeal comes before us just as an appeal came up from a vice-chancellor in the Court of Chancery under the old system. It was proper for a motion to be made here for a rule nisi for a new trial on the ground of surprise; but, except for that ground, there would have been no necessity for such a motion.

The Lord Chief Justice has fully dealt with the facts of the case, and I agree with him. We have to look to what occurred at Cardiff, to what occurred at Bilbao, and particularly to the point of time at which the vessel left Cardiff. Now I quite agree with Lindley, J., that what occurred at Cardiff constituted a breach of contract. But there was no conversion there.

Three cases have been cited which illustrate very well in what conversion consists, and show that here there is not what amounts to a conversion. The first case is that of Falke v. Fletcher (18 C. B. N. S. 403), where the facts were that there was a question as to the ownership of the goods, and the captain carried them off, and refused to sign a bill of lading, asserting a title in some person other than the plaintiff. The plaintiff proving his title to the goods, it was held that a conversion had been committed; but that was not merely because he refused to sign a bill of lading, but because he refused to sign a bill of lading and sailed away with the goods, disregarding the direction of the true owner. The second case is Hiort v. Bott (ubi sup.), where the facts where that the defendant desired to give the goods, of which he had become accidentally possessed, to the true owner, and signed a delivery order by means of which a person other than the true owner obtained them. That was a conversion by the defendant, because he signed a delivery order, which was an assertion of title; and, of course, when an agent acts on his own responsibility he is liable for the consequence to his principal. The third case is that of Peek v. Larsen (L. Rep. 12 Eq. 378; 1 Asp. Mar. Law. Cas. 163), where the facts were that a person had put goods on board a general ship without any knowledge of the charter-party under which that ship was chartered. It was, in fact, attempted to make the shipper enter into a contract different from that which he had made. Under such circumstances it was held that the captain was bound to return the goods.

But here, under his charter-party, the captain was bound to carry the cargo to Bilbao; and looking at the fact that the goods had been sold to Ybarra and Co., I think that he was bound to deliver them to Ybarra and Co., and that they were intended to be conveyed to Ybarra and Co. Then was there a conversion at Bilbao? I think not. I think that there would have been no question of damages in this case, provided that Ybarra and Co. had not been instructed by the plaintiffs to refuse to pay freight. The damages which have been incurred flowed not from the original breach of contract by the defendants, but from the acts of Ybarra and Co. and the plaintiffs, and the plaintiffs are entitled only to nominal damages.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Reported by A. H. Poyser, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Monday, Jan. 12, 1880.

(Before Bowen, J.)

Spaight and others v. Farnworth and another.

Ship and shipping—Charter-party—Freight payable on "intake measure of quantity delivered"—Loss of portion of cargo—Adjustment of freight.

The plaintiffs sought to recover balance of freight upon a charter-party, one of the provisions of which was that freight should be payable "on the intake measure of quantity delivered." The cargo, which was one of timber, had been measured at the place of shipment, the measurements being entered by the shipper in his specification, and also chalked upon each piece of timber. During the voyage a portion of the cargo was lost, on some of the pieces of timber delivered the measurement put on at the port of shipment had become obliterated, on some it still remained marked. There was evidence that the timber lost was of average dimensions.

The defendants contended that the correct mode of ascertaining the amount of freight due from them was by adopting the figures that remained legible on the timber, and by measuring de novo, on the same system as that adopted at the port of shipment, all the pieces where the figures had been obliterated.

The plaintiffs, on the other hand, contended that as the pieces of timber lost were of average size, the proportion which they bore to the rest of the cargo should be deducted from the specification total and freight charged upon the residue.

Held, that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover, as it was the object of the charter-party that the shipment measures should be taken as accurate, and not merely that the "intake method of measurement" should be adopted, and that the plaintiffs' method of measurement showed the intake measure," that is, the intake figures and dimensions actually attributed at the port of loading to so much of the cargo as had been delivered safely.

FURTHER CONSIDERATION.

This was an action tried before Bowen, J. at the Liverpool Summer Assizes 1879, and was brought to recover the balance of freight stated to be due under a charter-party dated the 5th Sept. 1878.

The case was reserved for further consideration. The facts and arguments material to the question at issue are fully set out in the judgment below.

Herschell, Q.C. and Kennedy, for the plaintiffs.

C. Russell, Q.C. and Warr, for the defendants.

BOWEN, J.—The question in this case is as to the manner in which freight should be calculated and paid upon a cargo of deals and battens carried by the ship Shannon from St. George's, New Brunswick, to Liverpool.

The plaintiffs are managing owners of the ship Shannon, and the defendants are timber merchants and brokers at Liverpool, and consignees of the cargo in question. The charter-party under which the freight was payable, and on the construction of which the matter partly turns, was dated the 5th Sept. 1878. The cargo was to consist of deals and battens, with deal ends for broken stowage. Freight was by the charter-party to be paid on deals, battens, &c., at the rate of 3*l.* 5*s.* per St. Petersburg standard hundred of 1980 super feet, and on deal ends at the rate of 2*l.* 1*s.* 8*d.* per the like hundred 8 ft. and under. The charter-party contains the following provision as to freight: "Freight payable on deals and sawn timber on the intake measure of quantity delivered." A cargo of deals and battens and deal ends was duly shipped at St. George's by A. H. Gilmore, jun. and Brothers for Liverpool, consigned to the defendants, and the bill of lading was signed for a specified number of pieces, deals, battens, and scantling, and a specified number of pieces, deal ends, and freight was payable as per charter-party. The usual course of business at St. George's, and the one adopted in this instance, with respect to the measurement of timber is for the shipper to make up his specification showing the number of pieces shipped of various dimensions. The dimensions are arrived at by measuring the length, breadth, and depth of the various pieces of timber, and on each piece of timber before shipment is chalked the figures representing its dimensions. There are various ways of measuring the dimensions of timber; the overall method of measurement is one; measurement by the diaper is another. The overall measurement is that adopted at St. George's. In the measurement of the timber the ship takes no part. The pieces are measured alongside of the ship by the surveyor of the shipper, and pass directly from the surveyor's hands to the ship.

There is no dispute as to the exact number of pieces of timber that were shipped. The cargo consisted of between 30,000 and 40,000 deals, and between 3000 or 4000 deal ends. During the course of the voyage, owing to the severe weather encountered by the vessel, 348 deals and 303 deal ends were lost. The remainder was duly delivered. On some of the pieces delivered the measurement put on at St. George's had become obliterated during the voyage. On some the measurement still remained marked. The dimensions of the timber that was lost were not known either to the ship or consignees, but there was some general evidence that the dimensions of the quantity lost were average dimensions as compared with the rest, What was done on landing was as follows: The defendants took the St. George's marks as the true dimensions on all the pieces where the figures still remained visible. They remeasured de novo according to the overall mode of measurement all the pieces where the figures had become illegible. The defendants claim to pay freight upon these two sets of figures. The result, however, of this mode of calculation would be that the dimensions so arrived at for the delivered cargo if deducted from the total dimensions in the specification would make the residue representing the quantity lost on the voyage to have been of most unusual and abnormal dimensions three or four times as great as the other sizes of timber shipped assuming always that the specification was accurate. The plaintiffs, the shipowners, object to this method of assessing freight assuming that the pieces lost were a fair average of the cargo, and propose to deduct the proportion which the lost pieces bore to the rest of the cargo, and to pay for what has arrived and been delivered on the St. George's specification. It is between these two methods of assessment that I have to decide, and the question is the meaning of the words in the charter-party—"freight payable on the intake measure of the quantity delivered." The plaintiffs contend that these words mean freight payable on the measure actually attributed at the port of shipment to so much of the cargo as was delivered subsequently. The defendants on the other hand contend that "on the intake measure of quantity delivered" must be construed as equivalent to "on the quantity delivered measured according to the intake mode of measurement;" that is to say, the overall mode of measurement to be adopted on measurement taken, not at the port of shipment but at the port of discharge.

As a general principle, freight, in the absence of special agreement to the contrary, becomes payable only on so much cargo as has been both shipped, carried, and delivered. If less has been shipped than has been delivered as in the case of cargoes which heat under sea-water damage, freight is payable on the lesser quantity shipped. If less has been shipped and carried than has been delivered, as for instance in the case of goods which are compressed during the voyage and expand on being unloaded, freight is payable on the compressed and not on the expanded measurements. If on the other hand, less has been delivered than shipped, as in the case of goods lost on the way; then freight would be payable only on the quantity delivered.

For the convenience of business contracts are frequently made to vary this primâ facie rule. Inconvenience in practice must often obviously arise unless some one measurement of the quantity delivered is agreed upon for the purpose of the calculation of freight. Timber, of course, is a cargo that is not liable to change its dimensions between its time of shipment and its time of delivery; but the mode of measuring timber differs in various ports, and probably there is a considerable difference in the accuracy of the modes, and the measurement of large cargoes of timber, moreover, is probably conducted with more expedition than exactness. There is nothing accordingly unnatural that the ship and the charterer should agree that freight is to be paid on the measurement figures arrived at at the port of lading. The shipper, who is interested as between himself and the consignee, in not understating the timber in his specification, is a person whose measurements the ship can afford to trust. This is what seems to me to have been done in the present instance. The plain meaning of the words in the charter-party is that freight is to be paid on the intake, that is to say, the shipment measure, i.e., dimensions of the actual quantity delivered. The measure, that is to say, which the surveyors put upon the timber when it is measured for the purposes of the specification before shipment alongside the ship. I see no reason for attributing to the words "intake measure," the less obvious meaning "intake method of measurement." A provision that one principal of measurement should govern would, no doubt, for purposes of business, be more convenient than no provision at all, but it would not obviate all measurement disputes which, I think, this charter-party desired to prevent; and it seems to me that it is more probable that freight was meant to be paid on the "intake" figures which will be found recorded in the specification, and so far as they remain legible on the timber actually delivered.

Assuming this to be the true construction of the charter-party is the calculation proposed by the defendant or the plaintiff the best mode of arriving at the question what freight is to be paid? In the present instance part of the timber was delivered with the marks still on it, on part the marks were defaced, and part has been lost midway. If the above construction of the charter-party be correct, what has to be discovered is not the accurate measurement as taken here of the quantity delivered, but the measurement attributed at the port of lading to so much as has arrived and been delivered safely. The competitive modes of calculation between which I have to decide are as follows:

First, the pieces thrown overboard or lost are assumed in accordance with the captain's evidence to be a fair average size as compared with the rest of the cargo. The proportion which they bear, on this assumption, to the rest of the cargo is deducted from the specification total, and freight is charged upon the residue—that is the plaintiffs' method. Secondly, the pieces on which the marks remain are taken at the figures still chalked upon them, the pieces on which the marks are obliterated are re-measured, freight is paid upon the total so arrived at—this is the defendants' method.

It is obvious to my mind that neither of these methods can be said to be anything but a rough way of arriving at the measure attributed at the port of shipment to the quantity delivered here. As to (1) the plaintiffs' method, it is based in the first place on a rough calculation of the average size of the cargo that has been lost. It was not suggested before me that the specification figures were not correct reproductions of the measurements actually arrived at at the port of loading, though, if the point had been taken up and pressed, evidence might have been necessary to show that the measurements taken, whatever their correctness, at St. George's, were actually entered in the specification. It was no doubt contended on the part of the defendants that they ought not to be bound by a measurement to which they were no parties; but though the defendants are not bound by the specification as such they are bound in my opinion by the figures taken at the port of loading; and assuming as I do that these figures are correctly entered in the specification, in that sense, and to that extent, the defendants are bound by the specification. I can conceive that far better proof might have been given of the exact dimensions attributed at St. George's to the timber delivered here, but rough and rude as the plaintiffs' method of calculation is, it seems to me to be founded on the real materials for a judgment, viz., the shipment figures, or what, in this case, I treat as synonymous, with those in the specification. The asumption that the pieces lost were of an average is a piece of evidence which might certainly have been displaced, but still until it is displaced may properly be acted on. It is not exact evidence, but it is primâ facie evidence, and having no better, I accept it. The weakness of (2) the defendants' method of calculation, to my mind is that in re-measuring the unmarked timber here the defendant forgot that what has to be discovered is not the exact measurement of the goods delivered but the measurement affixed to those goods at St. George's on shipment. It is evident that there was some difference—probably some mistake—in part of the St. George's figures and this mistake was one to the benefit of which the ship was entitled so far as it related to the timber actually delivered. The defendants' method, by adopting the St. George's measure in part only, deprived the ship of the chance which, in this case, is a very appreciable one, that the St. George's measurements of the timber on which the marks had been obliterated were more in the ship's favour than the measurements retaken here. The object, I think, of the charter was that the shipment measurements should be taken as accurate. Errors of measurement in part would be corrected by opposite inaccuracies in another part. This object the defendants defeat by assuming that as to part the shipment figures are correct, while as to part the defendants substitute remeasurement of their own. I prefer of the two the plaintiffs' method as directed, however roughly, to the true problem which has to be solved, viz., the intake measure; that is to say, the intake figures and dimensions actually attributed at the port of loading to so much of the cargo as has been delivered safely.

Judgment will, therefore, be for the plaintiffs with costs.

If there was no mistake in the St. George's measurements, and if the mode of measuring here must produce identical results with the mode of measurement at St. George's the plan of the defendants would be unimpeachable, but the defendants have no right to take the benefit of either of these assumptions.

Judgment for the plaintiffs with costs.

A material man into whose hands a vessel has been put for repairs by a mortgagor left in possession by the mortgagee has, so long as he retains his possession, a promissory lien for the repairs done, giving him priority over the mortgagee.

The possessory lien of material men is not determined by the arrest of the vessel by warrant of the High Court of Admiralty in a suit by them for equipment and repair (a).

This cause was heard on petition, answer, and conclusion, before the judge on the 23rd, 24th, and 25th Feb., for the purpose of ascertaining the respective priorities of the parties in obedience to the order of the Court of Appeal. The facts appear sufficiently from the previous report (ante pp. 226, 229; 41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 742) and from the judgment.

The Queen's Advocate (Walter Boyd, Q.C., LL.D.) with him Kisbey, for the plaintiffs.—Our claim against the vessel is by virtue of our mortgage dated the 22nd March 1879, which has been admitted, and which primâ facie is a prior charge, and protected by the Admiralty Court Act, and also by the Merchant Shipping Act. No doubt that charge can be displaced by material men such as the Messrs. Harland and Wolff claim to be; but to displace us there must be a possessory lien, and, even if the defendants had one at one time, it was put an end to by the arrest of the vessel under the Admiralty Court warrant. As regards the lien by Messrs. Harland and Wolff, it appears that no repairs were effected on the defendants' premises, but were all made in a public dock. We contend that no possessory lien ever existed; but, even assuming that it did, we assert that it was abandoned by the course the defendants have adopted in arresting the vessel, and, having been once abandoned, it cannot be revived. This abandonment was the deliberate act of the defendants, and if they have adopted a course to their own detriment they have themselves alone to blame. Williams v. Alsupp (10 C. B. N. S. 417) was an action of trover, and not a suit to ascertain priorities as here. They referred to

Seeds Q.C., LL.D. (with him Corrigan, LL.D. and E. P. Johnson).—This cause is new alike to the jurisdiction and the practice of the court. By the order of the Court of Appeal it appears that the plaintiffs were obliged to admit the validity of our claim against the vessel as a condition precedent to the obtaining of the order under which they are now before this court. The owner gave the vessel into the hands of the defendants for the purpose of being repaired. He was then mortgagor in possession, and there can be no question, on the authority of Williams v. Alsupp, but that he had then the right so to deliver her. The fact that the mortgage was not at that time due, and that the mortgagees had no right then to go into possession under it, is conclusive on this point. In the case of Wolff v. Scow Celt (2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. N. S. p. 107) there only existed a maritime lien, and that is as nothing compared with our case. It is true that the vessel was not repaired on the defendants' own premises, but these repairs were all executed in a dock hired in the defendants' own name, and paid for by them, and executed while the ship was in the sole possession of the defendants; and, on the authority of Barr and others (apps.) v. Cooper (resp.), W. N. 1875, p. 67, our lien was a perfect possessory lien. In Ireland, material men may proceed to enforce their lien under the Admiralty Court Act. That statute differs from the English Admiralty Act. By the latter a material man has not any right of enforcing his claim in Admiralty unless the ship or its proceeds are under arrest. In the Irish Act that exemption does not exist, and no authority has been cited to the court to show that, by arrest of the vessel under a warrant issued at the suit of the defendants by the Admiralty Court, our possessory lien has been destroyed. We submit that the owner, who was mortgagor in possession, had a perfect right to give up the vessel to us for necessary repairs, even had the mortgagees been in a position to take possession under their mortgage, which it has been shown to the court they were not; that, on the evidence, the repairs which were executed were executed with the consent and approval of the plaintiffs, and that our possessory lien has never been lost. It was not lost by the fact that the vessel was repaired in a public dock, and we submit that it is still intact, although the vessel at our instance has been arrested by the warrant of this court. The Scio (L. Rep. 1 Adm. and Ecc. 355; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 527) is a conclusive authority for us.

(a) The doctrine of the High Court of Admiralty of England, has for a long time been that the possessory lien of a material man ought not to be infringed on except in cases having a paramount claim; that is to say, where there are maritime liens existing at the time the ship gets into the possession of the material man (The Gustaf, Lush. 506). On the 29th May 1879, Sir R. Phillimore, in the case of The Sussanah Thrift, upheld the same principle; in that case the vessel was in the possession of the shipwright, who had repaired her, when she was arrested at the suit of a mortgagee, and also of her master, who both obtained decrees against her; the shipwright also proceeded against her, and obtained a decree for his claim, retaining his possession; on application for payment out of the various amounts found due, it was held that the master, whose contract of service entitled him to a month's notice or a month's wages on dismissal, and who continued on board the ship after she got into the shipwright's hands, was entitled to his wages due up to the time the ship got into the shipwright's hands, and for a month afterwards, upon the ground that the shipwright takes the ship with all her existing obligations; but that as regards the mortgagee, by leaving the ship in the mortgagor's hands, he had authorised the latter to enter into all engagements necessary to keep the ship in good condition, and consequently to place the material man in a position to acquire a possessory lien. It is to be noticed that in neither of the above cases was it ever suggested that the suits instituted by the material man put an end to their liens; nor has such a contention ever been raised in this country, although cases of this nature have of late been common in the Admiralty Division.—Ed.

Kisbey in reply.—A lien is lost by giving back the res into the hands of the owner. A possessory lien is good against the world, provided possession be not parted with. Here possession has been abandoned by giving up the vessel to this court under the warrant. Under the English Act no such arrest as took place in this case is possible, but the court would, at the instance of another plaintiff, seize the vessel and hold her subject to the possessory lien on the authority of claimants in a position similar to the defendants here. The court must hold that this possessory lien has been deliberately abandoned by the defendants here, who have chosen to substitute another security for that under which they could have made a claim against the res. Counsel at the conclusion of his argument cited

Jacobs v. Latour, 5 Bing. 130;
Burrowes's Estate, Ir. Rep. 1 Eq. 445.

Feb. 27.—Townsend, J.—This cause of The Acacia, of which I have now to dispose, is a suit instituted by the Messrs. Hamilton against the Messrs. Harland and Wolff, to determine the priorities of their respective charges on the defendant vessel.

The Messrs. Hamilton claim on foot of a mortgage for 5800*l.* executed and registered on the 22nd March 1879 for the balance due to them for the unpaid purchase money of the vessel itself; for this mortgage they claim priority over the Messrs. Harland and Wolff, to whom a debt is due for equipment and repairs of the same vessel. On the 14th Oct. 1879 the Messrs. Harland and Wolff caused a warrant of this court (No. 732) to issue, in which they claimed a sum of 700*l.*, and under which the vessel was arrested. On the 31st Oct. 1879 they issued a citation in rem (No. 735), in which they claimed 672*l.*, making the total amount of claim a sum of 1372*l.* Those causes having been consolidated, this court on the 14th of the last month pronounced a decree whereby the Messrs Harland and Wolff were declared entitled to the sum of 1021*l.* 10*s.* 1*d.* and costs, and according to the practice of the court I ordered a sale of the defendant vessel. The Messrs. Hamilton having on the 4th Nov. 1879 instituted a cause (No. 739) in this court on the foot of their mortgage, and there being no question as to its validity, the court, on the 26th Jan. last, pronounced for it, and declared it to be well charged on the defendant vessel. As it does not appear that either side denies the validity of the other's charge, this contest is simply one of priority. The Messrs. Hamilton sought to have the conduct of the sale of the vessel, and brought forward a motion in this court for that purpose. The court, however, declined to grant that motion, it being unusual to decide priorities before sale and realisation of the fund. Such was undoubtedly the practice of this court, and it appears to me to be a reasonable practice, for it might turn out that a costly investigation was unnecessary if the vessel produced enough to pay both demands. However, the Messrs. Hamilton, being dissatisfied with my ruling, obtained on the 28th Jan. last an order from the Court of Appeal [here the learned Judge read the order reported ante, p. 229; 41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 742]. In accordance with this order, the Messrs. Hamilton have filed their petition, which sets forth the grounds on which they claim priority, which grounds are in substance: first, their mortgage; secondly, that the equipment and repairs executed in Sept. and Oct. 1879 were not done or executed with their sanction and authority. They then claim that under the mortgage, as registered, they are entitled to be paid the amount so decreed with interest and costs in priority to the claim of the Messrs. Harland and Wolff, and they pray that it may be pronounced that their demand is in priority over that of the others The Messrs. Harland and Wolff have filed an answer alleging, first, that the mortgagees never were in possession—a fact which is not disputed; secondly, that the repairs done were executed on the credit of the vessel; thirdly, that the owner, Mr. J. S. Campbell, was in insolvent circumstances before the repairs were begun, and that this fact was within their knowledge. They say that the equipment and repairs were done by the order, direction, and with the assent of the mortgagees, and allege that under the circumstances they are entitled to be paid the amount of their charge in priority to the claim of the mortgagees.

The repairs were commenced early in the month of Sept. 1879, and Mr. J. S. Campbell became bankrupt on the 24th Oct. in the same year. No doubt the vessel was unseaworthy when she arrived in Belfast, and repairs were necessary to enable her to resume her traffic in safety. The Messrs. Hamilton's mortgage was not due until the 21st Sept.; they knew of the vessel's arrival in Belfast, and thought she might be sent to sea in a disabled condition; so accordingly Mr. W. Hamilton went to Belfast to look after his interests. He appears to have gone over to ascertain the condition in which the vessel was, and he attended the survey which was made as is usual in such cases. So far as I can form any opinion of his conduct, I do not think he ordered any repairs; he was asked to give his consent, and he replied that he had no power one way or the other—that he was there as mortgagee of the vessel, and to protect his own interest—he would take no responsibility, and he appears more than once to have repudiated ownership, stating that his firm were interested only as mortgagees. I do not lay much stress on the letter of the Messrs. Hamilton of the 29th Sept. in which they state that the Messrs. Harland and Wolff had "a preferable claim;" they may have thought so, just as the Messrs. Harland and Wolff thought that they had a claim prior to that of the plaintiffs. The vessel was docked by Messrs. Harland and Wolff in a public dock, for the use of which they paid. It was, in fact, hired to them, and was, so far as I can discern, used exclusively by them during these repairs. On the 13th or 14th Sept. the crew were paid off by the Messrs. Harland and Wolff, and the captain on his cross-examination said, "I was paid off about that time, and the mate left in charge by Mr. J. S. Campbell's orders. Harland and Wolff paid me and him our wages. I was to look after the workmen, and see that the protest was in proper form." Unquestionably the vessel was put in the Messrs. Harland and Wolff's hands by Mr. J. S. Campbell, and he had then full and complete right to do so, for a mortgagor has the right to get repairs done. [The learned Judge here referred to various letters and telegrams as showing that the vessel was placed in the hands of Messrs. Harland and Wolff in the ordinary way, and that they received her as they would any other vessel.] The insolvency of Mr. J. S Campbell was known at an early date, and also that the vessel was insured for 6000*l.* by the Messrs. Hamilton, and for 2000*l.* by Mr. J. S. Campbell. Three witnesses concur in a statement that the Messrs. Harland and Wolff were to wait for payment of their account until the amount could be recovered from the underwriters on the policies of insurance. It is denied by one, Mr. McLean, and even if Mr. McLean had authority to make such an arrangement on behalf of the Messrs. Harland and Wolff (of which I do not think there is evidence before me), no such arrangement was in fact made. I do not think that the repairs were effected, so to speak, on the credit of the policies, or that payment was to be conditional on the payment of the policies. No doubt all parties expected the policies to cover the losses, and no doubt, if sufficiently secured, the Messrs. Harland and Wolff would have waited for payment of their claim. [The learned Judge here referred to various letters which contained offers on the part of Messrs. Hamilton of handing over the policies held by them in discharge of the claim of the Messrs. Harland and Wolff against the vessel, and continued:] The Messrs. Hamilton indeed say, if they could get the vessel with the repairs they would hand over the policies to the Messrs. Harland and Wolff, but whether they are paid or not on foot of them, the Messrs. Hamilton do not care. However, I consider that the Messrs. Harland and Wolff are entitled to get something more than the mere ground of a suit against the insurers. I have already observed that I do not rely on the expressions "preferable claim," "take steps to prevent the ship leaving port," nor on the statement which was made in the affidavit to lead the warrant, "that the plaintiffs require the assistance of the court;" both parties seem to have dealt throughout with questions of law rather than of fact, and a mere money lien would not enable the contending parties to realise their demand. Still there is the question, did the Messrs. Hamilton not know of and assent to the execution of the repairs?

I find ample authority in the case of Williams v. Alsupp (10 C. B. N. S. 473), and in the judgments delivered in that case by Erle, C.J. and Willes, J., for the proposition that Mr. J. S. Campbell had ample power to place the vessel in the hands of Messrs. Harland and Wolff, and so confer a lien, and I consider the doctrines laid down in Barr and Shearer v. Cooper (W. N. 1875, p. 67) and Wolff v. Scow Celt (2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. N. S. 107) are applicable here. In The Scio (L. Rep. 1 Adm. & Ecc. 353; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 827), no doubt, mortgagee prevailed against material man, though the mortgagee had knowledge of the repairs being made, and the vessel rendered thereby more valuable security, and that the material man expended a large amount in equipment and repairs; but that decision went on the ground that the material man was not in possession as in this case. The cases are therefore different.

There is another and serious question to be considered, which was glanced at by counsel for the plaintiffs in his opening statement, and not much relied on until the case had almost closed; nor can I say that it has ever been fully argued. It is this: assuming that the Messrs. Harland and Wolff had a valid possessory lien on the vessel for repairs done and materials supplied, have they, by the institution of suit [No. 732] for the recovery of their account, now forfeited their possessory lien? No doubt, if the Messrs. Harland and Wolff had not been active, if they had rested on their rights, and if a suit had been brought by some other creditor, the case of Williams v. Alsupp would apply, and the court would not dispossess them of their possessory lien without the satisfaction of their demand. A possessory lien may be lost or waived in various ways, as by claiming goods as one's own, or on the foot of an old debt, or by a party not in possession of them. We are familiar with the cases of solicitors and title deeds in the Landed Estates Court here. When title deeds are brought in, they are deposited expressly subject to the lien, which is protected either by the order of the court, or by the statute itself. Now, just at the close of the argument in this case, the case of Jacobs v. Latour (5 Bing. 130) was mentioned, which was said to rule the present case. In Jacobs v. Latour goods were taken in execution by a sheriff under a fi. fa. sued out by a person claiming a possessory lien on the goods, and were sold to that person by the sheriff: it was held that the lien had been thereby waived. But is a common law writ identical with a warrant of this court? The writ of fi. fa. is an execution directed to the sheriff commanding him to cause the debt "to be levied." The warrant of this court is merely a process commanding the marshall to arrest the property proceeded against, which when arrested is deemed to be in the custody of the marshal, although it may really remain in the hands of the party claiming the lien. The fact is, that in this case the vessel has never left the possession of the Messrs. Harland and Wolff, and is this moment fastened to their quay; the marshal seems to have adopted their possession; his possession is merely constructive and technical, for the actual possession is still with the defendants. If I felt myself coerced to follow Jacobs v. Latour, I should be bound to hold that the possessory lien was gone, and if the possessory lien be gone this case cannot be distinguished from The Aneroid (L. Rep. ? P. Div. 189); but I am reluctant to decide for the first time that the effect of an Admiralty arrest is to destroy the lien for the active enforcement of which it was sued out, or that a party having a valid claim up to that moment can be deemed to forego it by asking the statutory aid of the court to make it effectual. In the absence, therefore, of authority to show that the taking out of the Admiralty warrant would discharge the possessory lien, I cannot in reason or in justice hold that the Messrs. Harland and Wolff are to lose the fruit of their expenditure, when the repairs were, as I think sanctioned, and some of them actually suggested, by the mortgagees, who now seek to obtain the advantage of these repairs and outlays without contributing one farthing. Had these mortgagees never come on the field—had they never been in Belfast—had they not been themselves shipbuilders, and so well aware of the great outlay necessary in such repairs, the case might perhaps be different, but having allowed those repairs to go on, not only with their full knowledge, but with their encouragement, I think it would be unjust to apply the principle of Jacobs v. Latour to this case.

I shall therefore pronounce for the priority of the claim of the Messrs. Harland and Wolff over that of the Messrs. Hamilton, and condemn the latter in costs.

SITTINGS AT LINCOLN'S INN.

Reported by E. S. Roche, J. P. Aspinall, and F. W. Raikes, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Wednesday, Feb. 25, 1880.

(Before Jessel, M.R., James and Cotton, L.JJ.)

Brown and Sons v. The Russian Ship Alina

*Jurisdiction—County Court admiralty jurisdiction. in action for breach of charter-party—*31 & 32 Vict. c 71—32 & 33 Vict. c. 51.

By a charter-party the master of the ship A. agreed with the plaintiffs to proceed to a foreign port, and there load a cargo of timber, and deliver the same in this country to the plaintiffs. At the foreign port the master of the ship A. refused to receive the cargo of timber, and the plaintiffs were compelled to forward the timber to England by steamer at a greatly increased rate of freight. Plaintiffs entered an action in rem in a County Court having admiralty jurisdiction for damages for breach of charter-party, and arrested the vessel; but upon application to a judge in chambers a writ was issued prohibiting the County Court judge from further proceedings in the action, and this was affirmed by a divisional court.

Held (reversing the decision of the Divisional Court), that the County Court had Admiralty jurisdiction in cases of breach of charter-party under sect. 2 of the County Court Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869, notwithstanding that the Admiralty Court had not original jurisdiction in such matters.(a).

(a) If anything were wanted to corroborate the authority of this decision, it is to be found in the Irish Admiralty Court Acts. By the Court of Admiralty (Ireland) Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict., c. 114), s. 37, the Irish Court acquired jurisdiction "over any claim by the owner, or consignee, or assignee of any bill of lading of any goods carried into any port in Ireland in any ship, for damage done to the goods or any part thereof, by the negligence or misconduct of, or for any breach of duty or breach of contract on the part of the owner, master, or crew, of the ship." The jurisdiction so conferred is given almost in the same words as those in which that of the English Admiralty Court is given by the Admiralty Court Act 1861, and would not include jurisdiction over breaches of charter-party. By the Court of Admiralty (Ireland) Amendment Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 28), the jurisdiction in Admiralty of the Recorders of Cork and Belfast (given by the Act of 1867) is extended, and by sect. 3, sub-sect. 2, they acquire jurisdiction in the precise words contained in the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act, sect. 2, sub-sect. 1, and by sect. 16 of the Act of 1876, the same jurisdiction is given in the same words to the Irish Admiralty Court. It could not be suggested that the latter section does not give jurisdiction over charter-parties, and hence the Recorders of Cork and Belfast must have such jurisdiction. The Act was passed after the conflicting decisions mentioned in the present case had been given, and it cannot be supposed that if the Legislature had thought the meaning of the words doubtful, it would not have altered them so as to make them clear.—Ed.

Cargo ex Argos (1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 519; 28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 745; L. Rep. 5 P. C. 124) followed.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs from an order of the Lord Chief Baron and Stephen, J. confirming an order of Denman, J. for the issue of a writ of prohibition to the Judge of the County Court at Yarmouth against further proceedings in an action by the plaintiffs against the Russian ship Alina arising out of the breach of a charter-party. It appeared that by a charter-party dated the 21st July 1879 the master of the Alina agreed with the plaintiffs, who were timber merchants at Luton, Bedfordshire, to proceed to Cronstadt, and there load a cargo of timber, and deliver the same in this country to the plaintiffs. At Cronstadt the master refused to receive the cargo of timber, and the plaintiffs were compelled to forward the timber to England by steamer at a greatly increased rate of freight. The Alina shipped another cargo at Cronstadt, and upon her arrival at Great Yarmouth in Oct. 1879 the plaintiffs commenced an admiralty action in rem in the Norfolk County Court for damages for breach of the charter-party, and arrested the vessel.

Upon an application to Denman, J. in chambers an order was issued prohibiting the County Court judge from further proceedings in the action, and that order was affirmed by the Divisional Court, consisting of the Lord Chief Baron and Stephen, J.

The question, which turned upon the construction of the County Courts Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71) and the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51) has been already raised in three cases with different results. In 1872, in the case of Simpson v. Blues and others (1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 326; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 697; L. Rep. 7 C. P. 290) the Court of Common Pleas held that sect. 2 of 32 and 33 Vict. c. 51 ought not to be construed "so as to create this large, novel, and inconvenient jurisdiction," and did not enable the County Court to entertain a claim in respect of breach of charter-party, the intention of the Act being not to give the County Court admiralty jurisdiction in cases where the High Court of Admiralty would not have had jurisdiction, but only to give to the County Court a portion of the jurisdiction of the High Court of Admiralty. Subsequently, in the same year, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, disapproving of the decision in Simpson v. Blues and others, held, in the case of the Cargo ex Argos (1 Asp. Marit. Law Cas. 519; 28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 745; L. Rep. 5 P. C. 134) that sect. 2 of 32 & 33 Vict. c. 51 gave the County Court jurisdiction in cases of claims arising out of charter-parties or other agreements for the use or hire of ships, although the Court of Admiralty might have no original jurisdiction in such cases. In 1875 the question was again raised before the Court of Exchequer in the case of Gunnestead v. Price (2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 543; 32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 499; L. Rep. 10 Exch. 65), when the court, consisting of Cleasby, B. and Bramwell, B., approving of the decision in Simpson

v. Blues and others, and dissenting from that in Cargo ex Argos, held that sect. 2 only gave jurisdiction to the County Court to try and determine causes which were within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court. In the present case the ground for issuing the writ of prohibition was that the County Court had no Admiralty jurisdiction in cases of breach of charter-party.

On the appeal,

Cohen, Q.C. and Aspinall, for the plaintiffs, contended that the County Court Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act of 1869, sect. 2, clearly gave those courts jurisdiction in cases of claim arising out of charter-parties. This was held by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the case of the Cargo ex Argos (sup.) and they submitted that that decision gave the true construction to the section, although it had not been adhered to in Gunnestead v. Price (sup.) They also referred to as showing that Admiralty Courts always exercised jurisdiction over charter-parties until prohibited by the Common Law Courts, and consequently there was no reason against restoring such jurisdiction.

De Covio v. Boit, 2 Gall. (Amer.), 398;
The Volunteer, 1 Samm. (Amer.), 551.

Herschell, Q.C. and Wood Hill, for the respondents, submitted that the words of the enactment were in themselves far from clear, and that if construed as the appellants contended, there would be this anomalous result, that by going to a County Court you could in all such cases arrest the ship, while in the superior Court there would be no power to arrest the ship, and thus the County Courts would have a wider jurisdiction than the Admiralty Court to which the appeal from them lay. They relied upon

Simpson v. Blues and others, 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 326; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 697; L. Rep. 7 C. P. 290; Gunnestead v. Price, 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 543; 32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 499; L. Rep. 10 Ch. 65.

Jessel, M.R.—The question which we have to decide cannot be treated as an easy one, inasmuch as it has given rise to such a conflict of decisions as to the construction of a clause in an Act of Parliament. But, applying the well-known rules of construction, I must say, speaking for myself alone, it does not appear to me to be so very difficult a question as to have necessarily caused so much conflict of opinion. The rule of construction as laid down in all the cases, and notably in the House of Lords is this, that where you have plain terms used in the enacting part of an Act of Parliament nothing less than manifest absurdity will enable a court to say that the ordinary and natural meaning of the terms is not the true meaning. Where there are two or more readings possible—that is, where there is ambiguity—there, of course, you let in arguments of inconvenience; arguments of the more useful or more likely interpretation may be fairly considered. Therefore it appears to me that we must first determine whether the words are in themselves unambiguous, and if we must arrive at that conclusion then we must consider whether there is any such manifest absurdity as will enable a court of construction to say that the natural meaning of the words could not possibly be the meaning intended by the Legislature to be put upon them.

Now, first of all, as to the words themselves. The Act is to amend the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, and to give jurisdiction in certain maritime cases. If you judge by the title it certainly extends to giving jurisdiction in certain maritime cases. The second section is, "Any County Court appointed or to be appointed to have admiralty jurisdiction shall have jurisdiction, and all powers and authorities relating thereto, to try and determine the following causes: As to any claim arising out of any agreement made in relation to the use or hire of any ship or in relation to the carriage of goods in any ship, and also as to any claim in tort in respect of goods carried in any ship provided the amount claimed does not exceed 300*l*." I am at a loss to see any ambiguity in those words. An agreement in relation to the use or hire of a ship must include a charter-party. It would be difficult to define a charter-party otherwise than as coming within those terms. In fact, it is very often so defined. I see no doubt or difficulty, as far as I am concerned, in reading the words in their proper sense, and they do appear to me to be quite clear. I am very glad on this point at all events to see that, with one exception, the judgments of all the judges who have given an opinion or decision upon this section are unanimous, though the exception is one of great weight and importance.

In the case of Simpson v. Blues (sup.), where there were four judges, Justices Willes, Byles, Brett and Grove, no one alleged, although somethiug of that kind had fallen from Willes, J. on a previous occasion, that the words were anything but clear in themselves, and the ground of the decision in that case was totally different from that in the present. In the case in the Privy Council again we have four judges present, being the four ordinary judges of the Privy Council, and all four agree that the words were clear, and then, when a similar case came before a common law court there were only two judges present, Baron Cleasby and Baron Bramwell. Baron Cleasby does not state the words to be otherwise than clear in themselves, but I admit that Baron Bramwell does, and he states that he considers them ambiguous. Whether or not they are ambiguous is a question, of course, not to be lightly passed over with the opinion of Baron Bramwell the other way, and, therefore, I wish to say a word or two on the grounds which induced him to think them ambiguous.

He says this: "The words are "claim arising out of any agreement in reference to the use or hire of any ship,' not a 'claim arising out of any agreement for the use or hire of any ship.' I cannot think that the enactment is in plain and intelligible language, free from any ambiguity. If I find the words without anything to control them or guide me in their interpretation, I should say they included the cases before us and much more. But, as it is, I declare I do not know what they mean or were intended to mean. A charter-party is not an agreement for the use or hire of a ship, but it is said to be included in a claim arising out of any agreement made with reference to the use or hire of any ship. Would that include a shipbroker's claim for finding a charter?" Then he says: "Take the next words, 'does that include a claim on a policy of insurance?" Some restriction must be put upon the words. Now, it appears to me first of all there is some slip about the charter-party. A charter-party certainly may be an agreement for the use or hire of a ship, and consequently the ambiguity which the learned Baron is then speaking of is one of his own creating. He does not doubt for a moment that a charter-party would be included under the terms. What he doubts is whether something else not before him would be included under the terms. Therefore there was no ambiguity as regards the case then to be decided. The supposed ambiguity there related to something totally different, and the learned Baron did not dispute that the words would include an action for breach of a charter-party, so that one may consider substantially that all the judges are agreed that the words are clear and unambiguous.

Well, now, if the words are clear and unambiguous, are there other words in the Act of Parliament to show that they have a different meaning? That is not suggested, but what is suggested is that by reason of the third section great inconvenience will follow, great alteration of the law will be made, and those inconveniences are such as will induce the court to control the plain meaning of the words.

Now, unless those inconveniences amount to manifest absurdity, it appears to me the law does not allow any such control to be exercised over the plain words of an enactment by a court of construction, and consequently that the judgments given by the Courts of Common Pleas and Exchequer could not be supported in point of law, because all that was relied upon was inconvenience. But I again admit that there is the exception in the case of Bramwell, B. He does put it on what appears to me a true legal ground —the ground of manifest absurdity. It only remains for me to consider whether there is any such manifest absurdity. Now, that I am not misinterpreting the statements given in the judgment in the Common Pleas is plain, I think, from a very few words of the judgment itself. I nowhere find in the elaborate judgment of Brett, J. anything like absurdity, or words equivalent to it in any shape or way. What he says (L. Rep. 7 C. P. 296; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 328) is this: "These considerations lead me to the conclusion that we ought not to construe the words of these County Court Acts so as to create this large, novel, and inconvenient jurisdiction, when we find from the context that the general intention was only to distribute the Admiralty jurisdiction by allowing suits of limited amount to be instituted in inferior courts." And when we look in detail into his reasons, his reasons are these. First, he says, "The Admiralty Court is the Court of Appeal, and it has no jurisdiction to entertain these causes in the first instance." Now, to my mind, that is not a good reason, either on the ground of inconvenience or otherwise. It has frequently happened that the Court of Appeal has no original jurisdiction, and it has not unfrequently happened that even when the Court of Appeal has an original jurisdiction of its own, it has no jurisdiction in respect of the matters as to which the appeal is given, nor is there in that respect any inconvenience, because the Court of Appeal may be a very good Court of Appeal, and yet not a good court of original jurisdiction. Then, the next ground is this, that there is a power of transfer in different cases from the County Court to the Admiralty Court. Well, I will assume for this purpose that the power of transfer applies to these particular cases. Then it is said that the result will be to give to the Admiralty Court at its will and pleasure a new jurisdiction which it did not possess at the time the Act passed. I am not very much impressed by that argument. In the first place it is not to be presumed that the Admiralty Court will transfer causes except in the case in which the Legislature intended the causes to be transferred, cases of such peculiar difficulty that they ought to be tried in the first instance by the Admiralty Court; and therefore there will be no arrogation of jurisdiction except where it was conferred by the Legislature. Then it is said, why confer that jurisdiction on the Admiralty Court? I do not know that there is any objection to it. At that time the Admiralty Court took evidence and conducted its proceedings very much in the same way as the common law courts. There might be some trifling differences, but substantially justice was administered very much in the same way. What inconvenience would arise by giving this jurisdiction to the Admiralty Court? The only suggestion we have heard is that the plaintiff might not get a jury, or the defendant might not; but the answer was very simple. It does not follow that that was considered an evil by the Legislature. We know perfectly well that by the comparatively recent Judicature Act, that very option is given to a plaintiff of going to a division where there is no jury, instead of to a division where there is a jury.

The third objection is this, that, looking at the 3rd section of the Amendment Act, the jurisdiction is conferred on the County Court to proceed in rem, thereby enabling the County Court to arrest a ship in cases where before the passing of the Act the ship could not be arrested. Well, there again I am at a loss to see the inconvenience. It might have been considered by the Legislature to be of very great importance that in these cases you should have the power to arrest a ship. Inconsistency there is, and that is really a part of the argument. It is inconsistent that the County Court can arrest the ship where the claim is for the smaller amount, and the Admiralty Court or the common law court cannot arrest the ship where the claim is for the larger amount; yet, although it is, in one sense, an inconsistency, in another sense it is not. It may be the view of the Legislature that additional remedies are to be given in cases of claims for small amounts, or of a peculiar character relating to ships, which are not given in cases of larger amounts, or of an ordinary character not relating to ships. The remedy to the seamen for their wages, for instance, is different from the remedy of domestic servants for their wages, and it does not at all follow that all that was not contemplated by the Legislature, and I am again at a loss to see the great inconvenience.

Well, then, it was said that charterers and shipowners of smaller vessels would be at a disadvantage, because their ships would be liable to arrest. Of course the answer would be that if the amounts claimed were small the amount of bail would be small, and the inconvenience therefore, as far as they are concerned, would not be the subject of very great consideration.

I have gone through all these reasons because it does not appear to me that the case is made out even as to great inconvenience, but I am also of opinion that even if it were made out it would not be sufficient to enable us to control the plain words of the Act of Parliament.

Now, with regard to the second case at common law Gunnestead v. Price (sup.), the judgment of Baron Cleasby I need not comment upon. He does not really take any new ground which has not been already considered; but Bramwell, B. does. He says: "Shortly, the objections are that, on the construction contended for by the defendant, the County Court has admiralty jurisdiction in cases in which the Admiralty Court has no original jurisdiction;" that I have dealt with. "That the High Court would have an appellate jurisdiction where it has not an original jurisdiction;" that I have dealt with. "That there could be transferred to it from the County Court causes which it could not originally entertain, and so it could hear and decide cases not properly within its own jurisdiction or that of the County Court;" that I have dealt with. "So these objections are to be added, not as aiding the construction of the statute, but helping us to the probable intention of the Legislature, the objections so forcibly stated in the judgment of the Common Pleas to admiralty procedure being applied to such cases as those in question." Therefore, according to Bramwell, B, those last objections are not sufficient—a remark in which I cordially concur. We have only got the remaining three objections therefore, and what does he say is the effect of the three. He says as to the limited construction, that is, confining it to admiralty causes, "With great respect, it seems to me a meaning may be given to the words without the admittedly preposterous consequences the defendants contend for;" and he says further, "This construction gives a meaning to the words without the absurd consequences which would follow on the defendants' construction." Consequently, he alone comes to the conclusion that those three objections are so preposterous and so manifestly absurd that they could not have been within the intention of the Legislature.

Now, with the greatest possible respect for Bramwell, L J.—and no one entertains a greater respect for him than I do—this only shows how different consequences strike different minds. Not only do the objections not appear to me to be either absurd or preposterous, but I cannot see any objection to them at all. I cannot see any objection on the ground that the Appeal Court has no original jurisdiction over the same subject matter. I cannot see any objection that the County Court should have admiralty jurisdiction when the Court of Admiralty has no jurisdiction; nor can I see any objection, which is the third and only one remaining, that the Court of Admiralty should transfer to itself especially difficult cases relating to maritime matters, though the court itself had no original jurisdiction to deal with such a course.

That being my opinion, it appears to me there is no absurdity and nothing preposterous in these reasons to induce us to overrule or control the plain meaning of the Act of Parliament. I am therefore driven to the conclusion that the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in Cargos ex Argos (sup.) is the correct decision, and consequently that we should allow this appeal.

JAMES, L.J.—It appears to me that everything that could be said has been said in the judgments we have heard, with the addition made by the Master of the Rolls. All I can say is that, having considered everything, I do most entirely adopt the language of the judgment of the Privy Council, as it seems to me to dispose of almost the whole of the case.

The only thing that I shall say is that it does appear to me that if you construe this last Act of Parliament irrespective of the third section, merely considering it as a question of ordinary jurisdiction to be exercised by the County Court, there could not have been the shadow of a doubt as to the meaning of the first clause; that is to say, supposing there had not been the third section giving the power of proceeding in rem, it would have been the merest matter of course to have held that the County Court had the ordinary power of a County Court to deal with the claims in question in its ordinary jurisdiction. Well, if that was so—if that was the meaning of the Act of Parliament, irrespective of the third section, it is inconsistent with the ordinary rules of construction of an Act of Parliament to say that a clause, saying in so many words: "In all the cases aforesaid the court shall have jurisdiction in rem," is to be held to take away the jurisdiction in cases which it had in the plainest terms given before? It is as if, in order to remove all doubt, the Legislature had said, "though you may think we could not have meant it, we do in so many words say that in every one of these cases the County Court shall have jurisdiction in rem." It is said that because they say in those cases the court shall have jurisdiction in rem, that is to cut down the cases in which jurisdiction is given. If it had been intended to have said merely that the County Court shall have the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty in those particular cases, it appears to me it would have said so in so many words; that is to say, the Act being an Act to amend a former Act and to give jurisdiction in certain maritime causes, the first section would have said "the court shall have such jurisdiction as the Court of Admiralty possesses in the following matters," and then the whole thing would have been made quite clear. It seems to me that the Legislature intentionally did not do so, but gave jurisdiction in certain matters, and then went on to give the particular remedy of the Court of Admiralty to all the cases in which it had given jurisdiction before.

I will only add these few words to what has been said before, that I adopt as my judgment from beginning to the end the judgment of the Privy Council in the case of Cargo ex Argos.

COTTON, L.J.—If in this case there had not been such a difference between the different judges before whom this question had come, probably I should have contented myself by saying that in my opinion the judgment of the Privy Council in the case of Cargo ex Argos exhausted the case, and was the correct decision; but, under the circumstances, I think it not right so to leave the matter, though I have but little to add. What we have to consider as the primary question in this case, and that really on which the whole question turns, is whether or not the Act of 1869 does or does not clearly include actions which have been commenced in the County Court. Now the words seem simple enough, "that the County Court shall have power and authority to try and determine the following causes:—As to any claim arising out of any agreement made in relation to the use or hire of any ship." We must consider whether or not there is any ambiguity in those words without reference to the question as to what will be the consequence of holding that they do or do not include a particular cause of action. Now it has been said that a charter-party is not a contract for the use or hire of a ship. In some cases no doubt the person who enters into the charter-party becomes for the time being, as it were, the lessee of the ship; but it is quite sufficient to refer to the well-recognised authority, Abbot on Shipping, for the purpose of showing that these words do aptly refer to and include a charter-party; because what he says is this, "A trading ship is employed by virtue of two distinct species of contract, first the contract by which an entire ship or at least the principal part thereof is let for a determined voyage to one or more places. This is usually done by a written instrument called a charter-party" (11th edit. p. 100). So that he does refer to it as a contract for the letting of a ship, and no one can for a moment say that when it applies to the whole of the ship it is not a contract for the use of a ship, or where it does not apply to the whole of the ship it is not a contract for the use of a part of a ship. That being so, here are words which, as regards the particular section with which we have to deal, have in themselves no ambiguity at all, and do aptly refer to an action arising on a claim on a charter-party.

But then there is this to be considered. It is sought to restrain that by saying that this is to be any claim in which the Court of Admiralty has jurisdiction, and I asked Mr. Herschell as to whether or not he would point out any claim arising on a charter-party in which the Court of Admiralty had jurisdiction. He said, "No, except in a matter which would be dealt with and come within the second part of the clause on an agreement in relation to the carriage of goods in any ship." So that practically the argument comes to this, that we must disregard and give no effect whatsoever to the first words of this subsection which apply to contracts on charter-parties. No doubt it might be said that the Court of Admiralty has jurisdiction as regards goods carried under a charter-party, but then that is provided for by the second part of the clause. Are we to give no effect whatever to these words? Of course, in seeing what the particular construction of any clause is, we must not look only to the clause itself. We are bound to look to all there is in the same written instrument, and see whether that has given an interpretation to the words. But here there is nothing of the sort. It is only attempted to control those words which, in my opinion and in the opinion of the large majority of the judges before whom the question has come, are clear as regards the question which we have before us. I will not go through in detail all the matters which have been referred to by the Master of the Rolls; I will refer to two only. It has been said that this case comes within the grasp of an Act which transfers jurisdiction, and therefore we ought to restrict the power given by the section to powers which the Court of Admiralty has. Now, one must really consider here how this power is given. It is given, not in the original Act, and although this subsequent Act is to be read as part of the first Act, yet it is, in fact, a subsequent additional power given to the County Court, and one gets rid of a great deal of the argument adduced against the appeal by considering this, that Parliament had given by the first Act some part of the Admiralty jurisdiction to the County Court, and here it thinks fit to give the County Court this additional power, not altering the power of appeal, but still leaving the power of appeal to the Court of Admiralty, though that court had no original jurisdiction in this matter, and still leaving the power of transfer. It only comes to this, that Parliament having given certain admiralty jurisdiction to the County Court—giving it this additional power in matters or contracts relating to the use or hire of ships—still left a power of transfer to the Court of Admiralty, and still left the appeal to the Court of Admiralty.

Then the only further matter which I mention—and probably it is the most important—is that, according to our decision, there will be a lien practically on the ship in respect of a certain claim of a limited amount when there is no right in respect of claims of a greater amount; but it only comes to this, that Parliament has thought fit to pass an Act which, according to its true construction, does give that right, and, that being so, how it is for this court, a mere court of construction, to cut down the clear enactment of an Act of Parliament because Parliament has done something or the Act has done something which possibly Parliament did not think of, which may be thought inconsistent with the law being altered as regards claims of a larger amount. In my opinion, no such considerations ought to induce us to say that effect is not to be given to the clear enactment of an Act of Parliament. If that is wrong, Parliament who passed the Act must alter it.

James, L.J.—It may not be inconvenient to add this with regard to one point. A great deal has been said about the power of transferring to the Court of Admiralty. When the Court of Admiralty sits as an Appeal Court, its decision is final; but where the matter is transferred to it, it is transferred subject to an appeal.

APPEAL FROM PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (ADMIRALTY).

Practice—Costs—Cargo suing—Both to blame—Right to appeal—Interlocutory order—Discretion—36 & 37 Vict. c. 66. s. 25, sub-sect. 9, and s. 49—Order LVIII., r. 15.

Where an action is brought by owners of cargo laden on board one ship against another ship, for damages sustained by the cargo through collision between the ship in which it is laden and the other ship, and both ships are found to blame for the collision, the plaintiffs will recover half their damages, in accordance with the practice of the Court of Admiralty and s. 25, sub-sect. 9, of the Judicature Act 1873, but no order will, as a rule, be made as to the costs.

On the subject of costs, The Milan (Lush. 388; 5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 590; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O S. 185) overruled but on the subject of damages approved.

Semble, if the defendant in an action brought by the owner of cargo laden on board another ship, for damages arising from a collision, admits his liability, but pleads contributory negligence on the part of the ship on board which the cargo was laden, and both ships are found to blame, the plaintiffs may be condemned in costs, and where cargo owners suing alone admit contributory negligence on the part of the ship in which their cargo was, and only claim half their damages and recover them, they will get costs.

A question of the principle on which costs are awarded is subject to appeal, notwithstanding sect. 49 of the Judicature Act 1873.

An addition made to a decree upon motion, giving directions as to costs as to which the decree itself was silent, is a portion of the decree, and therefore can be examined in an appeal from the decree, and is not an interlocutory order within the meaning of Order LVIII., r. 15.

This was an appeal from the decision of the judge of the Admiralty Division, by which, on the 25th April 1879, he had found the City of Manchester and the Moselle both to blame for a collision which took place between those vessels off Cape de Gatta and also from a decision of the same learned judge, by which he decreed, on the 20th May 1879, that the action being brought by the owners of the cargo on board the Moselle, and not by the owners of the ship, that they were entitled to their costs of suit. The case is reported on the subject of costs, ante, p. 106; 40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 591; 5 P. Div. 3.

The owners of the City of Manchester appealed from both decisions, and the owners of the cargo laden on board the Moselle gave a cross notice of appeal from that portion of the judgment which found that ship to blame.

April 23.—Bult, Q.C. and Clarkson for the appellants, defendants below, owners of the City of Manchester.

Benjamin, Q.C., Dr. W. G. F. Phillimore and Stubbs for respondents, owners of the cargo laden on board the Moselle.

The appeal was first heard on the merits, and the Court affirmed the judgment of the court below, finding both vessels to blame, and that therefore the plaintiffs should recover half their damage only from the defendants.

The question of costs was then argued.

Phillimore took the double preliminary objection: first, that the order as to costs which was appealed from was an interlocutory order, not having been made at the same time as the decree in the cause, but on a subsequent motion; secondly, that the order as to costs was a separate order, complete in itself, and therefore not subject to appeal by reason of the provisions of sect. 49 of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1873.

The Court overruled both objections.

Butt, Q.C. (with him Clarkson).—There is no reason why the position of the cargo owner who elects to sue separately from the shipowner should be better than that of a cargo owner who joins with a shipowner. The practice is well established that in an action by shipowner for damage by collision, where both ships are found to blame, and therefore the damages are divided, no order is made as to costs, and that results in the owner of cargo who joined in the action getting no costs. The owner of the cargo was sufficiently identified with the shipowner to prevent him recovering at all at common law in such a case (Thorogood v. Bryan, 8 C. B. 115), and he is only placed in a different position now by the rule of the Admiralty Court, as laid down in The Milan (Lush. 401; 5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 590; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 185), and which now is the statutory rule in all courts (Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1873, s. 25, sub-sect. 9 (a), and part of which was, undoubtedly, that the shipowner did not recover costs. As to the costs where the action was by the cargo owner, there was no special practice at the time the Judicature Act came into operation; but different orders had been made as to costs in different cases. See the report of the registrar referred to by Sir Robert Phillimore during the argument of the case in the court below (ante, p. 186; 40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 591).

Phillimore and Stubbs (with them Benjamin, Q.C.).—The case is merely that of a person who sues for 1000*l.* damages for breach of contract or tort and recovers 500*l.*, and who is always entitled to his costs. In The Milan (Lush. 401; 5 L T. Rep. N. S. 590) the plaintiff got his costs, and it cannot be supposed that an order was made in so careful a judgment without consideration, and therefore that establishes the custom of the Admiralty Court at the time of the passing of the Judicature Act, and therefore that practice is now binding by statute (Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1873, s. 25, sub-sect. 9) on the Supreme Court of Judicature. That the cases referred to by the registrar in his report were decided otherwise can only be taken to show that they were so decided per incuriam. Recently the case of The Consett (5 P. Div. 52, sup. p. 33) was decided in the court below on the same ground, and that decision has been upheld in this court (sup. p. 34). Besides, the cargo owners are innocent parties, and at common law would, previous to the Judicature Acts, have recovered in such a case as this the whole of their damages from the owners of the City of Manchester there being no contribution at common law between wrongdoers. By the provisions of the Supreme Court of Judicature Acts 1873, s. 25, sub-sect. 9, we are disabled from recovering more than half our damages, and that is a sufficiently great hardship without mulcting us in our costs of suit as well.

James, L.J.—I am of opinion in this case that the order as to costs is really part of the decree in the cause, although it was made at a subsequent date, otherwise there would be no right for me after the thing was disposed of, and the time for (a) The section of the Judicature Act referred to is as follows: "In any cause or proceeding for damages arising out of a collision between two ships, if both ships shall be found to have been in fault, the rules hitherto in force in the Court of Admiralty, so far as they have been at variance with the rules in force in the courts of common law shall prevail."

appealing had expired, to make an order varying it. The litigation ended in final judgment, and therefore the order as to costs made a month after can only be considered as completing the decree, and ought to be part of it. Therefore it appears to me there is no foundation for the objection that it is an interlocutory order for costs, and therefore, an order coming within the principle of Order LVIII., r. 15, as to time. Then with regard to the substance of the order the learned judge below did not deal with the costs as a matter in which he was exercising his judicial discretion. He was dealing with them as subject to an universal rule, considered by him to be established in The Milan (Lush. 401; 5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 590; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 185), that wherever the owners of the cargo, suing on their own behalf, succeed in recovering damages, whether the half or the whole of those claimed, they are entitled to the whole costs of the litigation. Now I cannot agree with that as a statement of a general rule. It seems to me that to do so would be to encourage unnecessary litigation. The owners of the cargo in this case embarked in an action in which they aver in the most positive terms not only that the original defendant was to blame, but they aver and take upon themselves to prove that their ship, that is the ship, which was then carrying their goods, was totally free from blame. There were two distinct issues raised. The two questions were whether one ship was to blame solely or whether the other ship was solely to blame, and it seems to me probable, looking at the evidence before us, that the greater part of the costs were occasioned by that issue on which the plaintiffs fail, because they fail in the attempt to negative misconduct on the part of the vessel on which their cargo was laden, the court below having found two acts of misconduct against that vessel and only one act of misconduct against the other side, the owners of the City of Manchester. It seems to me it would be very unjust to fix the party who has simply failed on one issue with the whole costs of the litigation. I think if there were no fixed rule that there were to be no costs where both vessels are found to blame, the court would act in this case as in any other case before it, and make the costs of the litigation follow the event. What I mean by "follow the event" is the decision as to damages at the time of the hearing, except in so far as the court might think fit to vary it, having regard to the question of either of the parties to the litigation wilfully or intentionally increasing the costs.

Baggallay, L.J.—The judge of the Admiralty Court has given to the plaintiffs the costs of the action, but he has not done so by the exercise of any judicial discretion, but because he considered it right to adhere to the precedents established by the case of The Milan (Lush. 401; 5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 590). Now it appears to me to be clear that this is a question of principle on the subject of costs, and properly therefore brought under the consideration of the Court of Appeal. As regards the costs of the particular action, if we were called on to exercise the discretion not exercised for the reasons I have stated in the court below, I think the justice of the case would be met by there being no costs at all. At the same time, I do not desire to say that in all cases in which a cargo owner is plaintiff he is to be treated, in respect of costs, in exactly the same way as a plaintiff who is a ship owner. The circumstances of each particular case may introduce a variation in the way in which the costs are given.

Bramwell, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. If the learned judge in the court below thought there was an established practice of giving costs in cases like the present, I should have doubted whether it was only the exercise of discretion not to deviate from the practice. But I consider the question as one in which the practice is not settled, and as if permission had been granted by the learned judge below to appeal if such permission was necessary. I therefore have to consider whether the cargo owner should get the whole costs of this litigation. Suppose the City of Manchester had come and said, "We admit we ought to have done"—whatever they ought to have done—"but what we do deny is that you are free from blame as alleged," and that in the result the judge had found that which is now found, that considering the admission of the defendants and the case made against the plaintiff, "you are both to blame," could it be said that the cargo owner was to recover the whole costs of the litigation? He ought to pay the costs on the contrary, as he fails in the only issue in that case before the court. If in such a case he ought to pay the whole, what is to happen when he half succeeds and half fails? It almost follows to demonstration that he should get half.

Butt.—In a recent case (The Lauretta, ante, p. 118; 40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 444; L. Rep. 4 p. Div. 25) your Lordship held that when a cross notice of appeal was given by the respondent, the first appellants, being unsuccessful, paid the costs of the appeal, the respondents paying such costs, if any, as were occasioned by giving cross notice.

James, L.J.—I think the appellants will have to pay the costs of the appeal. It is all one appeal, except so far as those costs were increased by serving and preparing the cross notice. The decree was drawn up as follows: "The Court of Appeal, being assisted by Capt. Henry Needham Knox, R.N., and Capt. Charles Laing, nautical assessors, and having heard counsel on both sides, affirmed the decree of the 25th April 1879 appealed from, save as to costs; and directed that each party should pay his own costs incurred in the court below; but condemned the appellants (defendants) and their bail in the costs incurred in this appeal, save those caused by the cross appeal of the plaintiffs.—Dated the 23rd April 1880."

SITTINGS AT WESTMINSTER.

Reported by A. H. Bittleston Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Thursday, Nov. 13, 1879.

(Before Jessel, M.R., Bramwell and Brett, L.JJ.)

Swann v. Barber and Co.

Ship and shipping—Shipping goods in own ship—Sales of cargo while afloat—Liability of ultimate purchaser—Freight—Purchase-money—Lien.

The plaintiff, a shipowner, sold a cargo of wheat, while afloat on board his ship, to H., at the price of 65s. per 500lbs., including freight and insurance: "freight for United Kingdom to be reckoned at 60s. per ton." While the cargo was still afloat, H. sold to L., and L. to the defendant, upon similar terms. Upon the arrival of the ship, the defendant paid 1000l. on account of freight, and invited the master to complete delivery of the cargo, which was done.

Held, that the conduct of the defendant amounted to an implied contract on his part with the plaintiff to pay freight at the agreed rate for all the cargo delivered.

By the indorsement on the writ of summons the plaintiff claimed 193*l.* 3*s.* 6*d.*, being the balance due on account of freight on 621 tons, 8 cwt., 1 qr., 22 lbs. wheat, ex the Koh-i-noor, at 3*l.* per ton, and of harbour dues on cargo.

The statement of claim referred to the indorsement on the writ as the particulars of the plaintiff's claim. The statement of defence denied that any freight was due from the defendants to the plaintiff, or that the defendants were indebted to the plaintiff in any amount whatsoever, as alleged by the plaintiff in the indorsement on the writ, or that the plaintiff was owner of the vessel in respect of which freight was alleged to be due, or that he was entitled to recover the same or any part thereof.

By way of set-off and counter-claim, the defendants alleged that Balfour, Guthrie, and Co. caused to be shipped on board the Koh-i-noor, in the port of Portland in Oregon, a cargo of wheat, to be carried by the plaintiff from Portland to Falmouth for orders, and thence to a port of discharge, and there delivered, upon the terms contained in a certain bill of lading, certain dangers and perils only excepted; and that the bill of lading provided that freight should be paid in cash, without discount, at the rate of 1*s.* per ton; that the bill of lading was duly indorsed to the defendants, and the property in the said wheat passed to them; that the delivery of the said wheat was not prevented by any of the excepted dangers and perils provided for by the bill of lading; that the plaintiff failed to deliver 290 sacks of the said wheat, the value of which, after deducting freight, amounted to 193*l.* 3*s.* 6*d.*, and the defendants claimed that sum.

By the reply the plaintiff joined issue upon the statement of defence, and denied all the allegations contained in the set-off and counter-claim, and averred that he duly delivered all the wheat shipped on board the Koh-i-noor, and that, if all the wheat was not delivered, such delivery was prevented by the dangers and perils excepted in the bill of lading. Issue was joined on the plaintiff's answer to the set-off and counter-claim. The action came on for trial at the Norfolk winter assizes 1878, before Kelly, C.B., when the following facts were proved:—

The plaintiff was the sole owner of the barque Koh-i-noor, and in the month of December 1876 a cargo of wheat was loaded on board of her at Portland, in Oregon, in the United States, for ship's account. The master signed bills of lading, which stated that the cargo was shipped by Balfour, Guthrie, and Co., of San Francisco, and consisted of 11,200 sacks of wheat "said to contain 1,427,222lbs.," to be delivered in good order and condition "(all and every the dangers and accidents of the seas and navigation of whatsoever kind or nature excepted), unto order or to its assigns. Freight for the said goods payable in cash without discount at the rate of one shilling sterling per ton of 2240lbs. gross weight delivered."

On the 26th April 1877, whilst the goods were in transit, the plaintiff, through his agents at Liverpool, sold the cargo to Messrs. Hamilton and Co. "as per bill of lading, at the price of 65*s.* per 500lbs., bill of lading weight . . . . including freight and insurance. Freight for United Kingdom to be reckoned at 60*s.* per ton." Whilst the goods were still in transit, Hamilton and Co. sold them on the same terms as regards freight to W. J. Leigh, of Liverpool, who, in his turn, sold them on the same terms as regards freight to the defendants. The defendants' contract was for the sale to them of the cargo "as per bill of lading, at the price of 68*s.* per 500lbs., bill of lading weights . . . . including freight and insurance, to a safe port in the United Kingdom . . . . calling at Queenstown or Falmouth for orders . . . . freight for U. K. to be reckoned at 60*s.* per ton."

On the ship's arrival at Falmouth, she was ordered by the defendants to Yarmouth to discharge cargo. She arrived there on the 16th May, and her cargo was in due course discharged and delivered to the defendants, who produced the bills of lading indorsed to them. Prior to the cargo being discharged, the defendants sent to the plaintiff a cheque for 1000*l.*, with a letter stating the payment to be "on account of freight." Part of the cargo on delivery was found to be sea-damaged, and there was also a short delivery, amounting to about 70qrs. of wheat less than the quantity stated by the bills of lading to have been shipped at Portland. After delivery, the plaintiff presented his freight account to the defendants, in which, after giving credit for the defendants' payments on account, a balance of 581*l.* appeared to be due to the plaintiff, freight being reckoned at 60*s.* per ton on 621 tons, which, as was admitted, were actually delivered to the defendants.

The defendants by subsequent payments reduced this balance to 193*l.* 3*s.* 6*d.*, which they refused to pay, on the ground that they were entitled to set off that amount against the plaintiff in respect of the short delivery of 70qrs. The plaintiff then brought this action. It was proved that during the voyage the Koh-i-noor encountered very bad weather, which caused her to labour and strain and become leaky, and the plaintiff alleged that the short delivery was owing to the water having got into the cargo, and caused a great number of the bags of wheat to become heated and rotten. The defendants alleged that the short delivery was owing to all the quantity of wheat specified in the bills of lading not having been shipped at Portland.

Kelly, C.B. in summing up the case to the jury, said that it seemed from the contract that 2854qrs. were shipped at Portland, but on the voyage to England part of the cargo had heated, and part had been damaged by sea water, so that upon discharging the vessel at Yarmouth the cargo was found to consist of only 2784qrs. instead of 2854qrs; that the plaintiff could not recover freight except for the number of quarters actually delivered, but that he was entitled to recover to that extent unless the defendant could make out a cross-claim to that amount. But by the bill of lading, perils of the seas were excepted, and the question for the jury was, did the short delivery arise from the excepted perils? Unless the deficiency was thus caused, the defendants would be entitled to a set-off against the plaintiff; but if it did, the defendants' only remedy was against their underwriters.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for 193*l.* 3*s.* 6*d.*, and judgment was entered accordingly.

The Exchequer Division (Kelly, C.B. and Pollock, B.) refused an application to set aside the verdict.

A rule nisi for a new trial on the ground of misdirection was, however, obtained in the Court of Appeal on Feb. 7, and

Bulwer, Q.C. and W. Graham now showed cause.—We are entitled to be paid freight upon the number of quarters that we have actually delivered. When the vessel arrived the cargo was delivered to the defendants, short some few tons; the defendants had paid to their vendor the price of the wheat, less the freight, before it arrived, and he had in his pocket, therefore, the amount of our freight at 3*l.* per ton. The jury having found that the cargo was lost by excepted perils of the sea, the question of short delivery cannot be raised. [JESSEL, M.R.—You were the unpaid vendor to the extent of 3*l.* per ton. They could not have their goods till they paid you. It does not matter whether you call it freight or not. BRAMWELL, L.J.—What would be your rights against the original vendee?] We should be entitled as against him to freight for all the weight actually delivered. [BRAMWELL, L.J.—Assume that the 65*s.* per ton is the price of the article. Then that is to be divided into two parts, one of which is to be treated as freight.]

Ireland v. Livingstone, 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 89; L. Rep. 5 E. & App. 395; 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 79; Benjamin on Sales, bk. 4, pt. 2, ch. 2, p. 567 (2nd edit.)

The defendants had retained so much of the price of the wheat, they undertaking to pay us our freight. [BRAMWELL, L.J.—The difficulty is, how is the plaintiff to frame his claim? Not for freight; because the defendants would say, We never agreed to pay freight. Not for purchase money; because the defendants would say, We never agreed to purchase from you.] There was a bargain by the present defendants to repay this sum to the shipowner. [JESSEL, M.R.—If there is a contract with you, it is a contract arising from the facts. Having paid you for part of the cargo at a certain rate, you say that there is an implied obligation on his part to take the whole at the same rate.]

Finlay, in support of the rule.—First, This is a claim not only in form, but in substance, for freight. Now the defendant had never contracted with the plaintiff to pay freight. [JESSEL, M.R.—If you got delivery on an implied promise to pay freight you are liable.] The defendant paid direct to the shipowner, in pursuance of an arrangement with Leigh. But that will not justify the assumption that there was a new contract entered into by the defendant with the shipowner. [JESSEL, M.R.—If a man, knowing a shipowner has a lien upon goods for freight, goes to him and says, "Send me up the goods and here are 1000*l.* on account," he is liable for the rest of the freight.]

JESSEL, M.R.—Really, when one knows the facts, I think one can do justice in this case. The action was no doubt wrongly framed; but an amendment would no doubt have been made, if asked for, at the trial. The facts are, that the shipowner was also owner of the goods, and he shipped them under a bill of lading, which provided for payment of a nominal freight of 1*s.* per ton. Then there was a sale of the cargo afloat on the usual terms, "including freight and insurance," for 65*s.* per 500lbs. bill of lading weights; but a proviso was put in that freight should be reckoned at 60*s.* per ton, which really amounts to this, that part of the purchase money should be set aside for payment of freight. The first purchaser sold the cargo to a second, and the second purchaser had knowledge and notice of this provision. The second purchaser sold to a third, who are the present defendants, with the same notice. What was the effect of this notice? That the defendants were bound to keep this sum in their hands to pay to the agent of the shipowner, the captain, when the vessel arrived. The shipowner had a lien upon the cargo until the balance of his purchase money was paid. When the vessel arrives the third purchasers, the defendants, order the cargo to be brought on to Yarmouth, p y 1000*l.* on account of freight at the agreed rate, and invite the captain to complete delivery. He does so, a small balance of freight still remaining due. Then a dispute arises. It turns out that the cargo delivered is under weight. The defendants say that the full weight was never put on board, and the plaintiff says that it was put on board, but got damaged by perils of the sea. The jury found that the loss of weight was caused by perils of the sea. The claim of the defendants to set-off the short delivery against the balance for freight is disposed of by this finding. I think they are liable to pay that balance. Their conduct amounted to an implied contract to discharge the plaintiff's lien. They actually paid 1000*l.*, and they took delivery of the cargo on the implied undertaking that they would pay the rest. I think the rule should be discharged.

BRAMWELL, L.J.—In this case there was no contract of affreightment. The shipowner was the owner of the cargo, so that no freight could properly become due. I say nothing about the one shilling, it is not material to consider it. The plaintiff found a purchaser for the cargo, and the question of the payment of the carriage then arose. If the plaintiff had been merely the owner of the cargo, and another person the owner of the ship, then the plaintiff would have had to pay the freight. When a contract is entered into for the carriage of goods by sea, the freight is to be paid only if the cargo arrives. In order that the plaintiff and the first purchaser might be placed in the position of vendor and purchaser of a cargo carried in the ship of a third person, the purchase money was divided into two sums—one representing the value of the cargo apart from the freight, the other the rate of freight, as if the cargo had been carried in the ship of another owner. One of these sums is paid by the purchaser as the price of the cargo; the other remains in the situation of real freight, and is to be paid on the delivery of the cargo at the port of discharge. Under these circumstances it is manifest that another shipowner would have a lien on the cargo as to that sum, which would be due to him as payment of freight. In point of law no freight is due to the plaintiff, but part of the purchase money which is to be treated as freight is due to him. I think there was evidence of a short delivery, but it is not necessary to decide that here. The defendants purchased the cargo afloat, and it is their misfortune that it is deficient. The policy of insurance was delivered to them, and their remedy is against the underwriters. The plaintiff had a lien on the cargo for the unpaid balance of the price against the first purchaser, and I think his right would be the same against the sub-vendee. The plaintiff's right would be that of an unpaid vendor to retain the goods until payment, and he did not lose that right because the purchaser sold the goods. The plaintiff being in the position of an unpaid vendor can maintain the action upon a contract that, in consideration of his giving up his lien, the defendants should pay the balance of the purchase money due for the goods delivered. I am of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to recover. It is unnecessary to refer to any authority, and I need only say that I think Keith v. Burrows (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 280, 427, 481; L. Rep. 2 App, Cas. 636; 37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 291) fully bears out what we have decided here.

Brett, L.J.— It seems to me that the whole question depends upon the contract between the plaintiff and Hamilton. The plaintiff is both shipowner and shipper. He sells his cargo of wheat to Hamilton at a price named, and then bisects that price into the price of the wheat and the freight. He had a lien against Hamilton for the freight when the cargo arrived on board his ship. It seems to me clear that the defendant had notice of that lien. Hamilton could not take away the plaintiff's lien by any transaction between himself and the defendants, even if he had tried to do so; but he did not try. I am of opinion that the defendant's conduct amounts to a contract by them that in consideration of the plaintiff giving up his lien the defendants would pay what remained due on the cargo.

Distribution of salvage—Seaman's rights—Settlement by solicitors—Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 182—Abandonment.

Where solicitors are duly authorised by seamen to settle a claim against their employers for their share of salvage, after the whole reward to be paid is ascertained, and to make an agreement for that purpose, and the solicitors accept a sum in full satisfaction, such agreement is not void under the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, s. 182, even if the amount accepted is less than the seamen would be entitled to recover in an action for distribution.

Semble, that fraud or concealment or an extravagant disproportion between the amount actually received and the amount strictly due, is necessary to induce the court to re-open such an agreement.

This was an action for distribution of salvage, brought by William Bristow, and six other seamen, formerly part of the crew of the screw steamship Durham, against Messrs. Bailey and Leetham, of Hull, the owners of that vessel, in respect of services rendered to the steamship Afrika whilst in distress with her bows stove in on a voyage in the Gulf of Findland, in March 1879.

The statement of claim set out the circumstances under which the services were rendered, and the large and dangerous share which the crew took in them in shifting cargo from the Afrika, and stopping the leaks of that vessel, and then continued:

13. The defendants have received for and in respect of the said service the sum of 3000*l.*, as and for salvage reward for the services rendered as aforesaid to the Afrika, her crew and cargo, and before its ascertainment or receipt they paid to the plaintiff, William Bristow, the sum of 15*l.*, and to the remaining plaintiffs 12*l.* 19*s.* each on account of the sums due to them in respect of their services aforesaid; but the defendants, though requested by the plaintiffs so to do, have wholly refused to pay to the plaintiffs or any of them any further sum or sums, as their equitable proportion of the said sum of 3000*l.*, and there still remains due and owing to the plaintiffs a large sum as such proportion as aforesaid, and the plaintiffs are unable to obtain the same without the assistance of this Honourable Court.

In the statement of defence the defendants, as far as the plaintiff Bristow was concerned, paid into court a further sum of 20*l.* which was accepted in satisfaction of his claim, and in answer to the remaining six plaintiffs admitted that the said services were of an arduous nature and attended with exposure and risk, and that the said plaintiffs took their fair part with the other members of the crew in rendering them, and then continued:

6. In answer to the 13th paragraph, the defendants admit and allege that they have received the sum of 3000*l.* and no more, as and for salvage services rendered to the Afrika, her crew and cargo, by the Durham, her master and crew, and they say that the said certain plaintiffs and other members of the said crew of the Durham, three in number, instructed Messrs. Singleton and

Martinson, solicitors, to act as their solicitors, and to apply on their behalf to the defendants for the payment of their respective shares of the said salvage, and authorised the said solicitors to settle their respective claims in respect of the said salvage with the defendants, and that after the said sum of 3000*l.* had been finally ascertained and settled as the total of salvage in respect of the said services, and after such sum had come to the hands of the defendants or their agents, and after the said plaintiffs and their said solicitors had full knowledge thereof, the said plaintiffs and the said three other members of the said crew, by their solicitors, agreed with the defendants to accept from the defendants the sum of 132*l.* 10*s.* in settlement of the claims of the said plaintiffs and the said three others respectively for and in respect of the said salvage and their costs, and the sum of 132*l.* 10*s.* was on the 8th day of July 1879 accordingly paid by the defendants, and received by the said solicitors acting on behalf and with the authority of the plaintiffs and the said three others in settlement of their said respective claims for salvage and costs. The defendants crave leave to refer to the authority in writing given by the said plaintiffs to the said solicitors, and to the receipt for the said sum of 132*l.* 10*s.*

The plaintiffs joined issue on the defence, and also demurred to the sixth paragraph of the statement of defence.

On the ground that it does not allege that the sums stated therein to have been paid and received by the plaintiffs in settlement of their said claims were and are enough to satisfy the plaintiffs' claim in respect of the plaintiffs' shares of the said salvage, and also on the ground that the agreement in the said paragraph stated by and under which the plaintiffs agreed to accept and did accept the sums in the said paragraph mentioned in settlement of their respective claims was and is a stipulation by which the plaintiffs consented to abandon a right which they had or might obtain in the nature of salvage, and that such agreement is wholly inoperative under the provisions of the 182nd section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854.

Jan. 27, 1880.—James P. Aspinall for the plaintiffs in support of the demurrer.—The paragraph of the statement of defence demurred to amounts to a statement that the plaintiffs have, in consideration of a sum of money paid to them, agreed to settle and forego and abandon their right to their share of the salvage reward received. Such an agreement is void under the 182nd section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, which makes void any agreement by which a seaman abandons any right he may have or obtain in the nature of salvage. The defendants have not pleaded that the sums paid to the plaintiffs were sufficient to satisfy the plaintiffs' claims and their equitable proportion of the salvage reward. It rested with the defendants to show that this is not an agreement to abandon a right to salvage by alleging that the sum so paid was the plaintiffs' equitable proportion of the sum of 3000*l.*, and was enough to satisfy the claims of the plaintiffs for their share of the salvage, and, as they have failed to do this, they have not made any answer in law to the plaintiffs' claim. The fact that this agreement was made through solicitors is immaterial, as the 182nd section of the Merchant Shipping Act says, "any stipulation to abandon a right to salvage shall be void;" and this case comes under the rules laid down in

The Rosario, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 816; L. Rep. 2 P. Div. 41; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cases 334; and in The Pride of Canada, 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 546; 1 Mar. Law Cases O. S. 406.

E. C. Clarkson, for the defendants, contra.—The agreement is binding on the plaintiffs. They have received an aliquot part of the 3000*l.*, and the fact that the agreement was made through solicitors shows that the best was done for the plaintiffs that could be done, and makes the agreement binding. The 182nd section referred to was not intended to apply to such a case as this. If it were, the rights of seamen to salvage reward would never be settled, and in whatever way a settlement was brought about with them owners would always be liable to be sued by seamen alleging that they had not received enough. In The Enchantress (Lush. 98) it was ruled that an equitable agreement and an equitable tender will both bar the operation of the section of the Merchant Shipping Act referred to, and the statement of defence sets up sufficiently that this is an equitable agreement.

J. P. Aspinall in reply.

SIR R. PHILLIMORE.—This is a case of distribution of salvage. A steamship called the Durham rendered certain services, on the 28th March 1870 in the Gulf of Finland, to a ship called the Afrika, and 3000*l.* had been accepted as the total sum of salvage remuneration paid over to the owner. Certain of the crew have brought an action in this court for the sum due to them, and the owners in their defence set up in the sixth paragraph that those members of the crew had instructed certain persons to act as their solicitors and agree with the defendants as to the payment of their respective shares of the salvage, and authorised the solicitors to settle their claims with the defendants, and "after the said sum of 3000*l.* had been finally ascertained and settled, and after it had come to the hands of the defendants or their agents, and after the plaintiffs and their solicitors had full knowledge thereof," the plaintiffs agreed to accept a sum of 132*l.* 10*s.* in settlement of their claims. This paragraph is demurred to principally on the ground that it sets up an agreement to accept a certain amount of salvage remuneration which is inconsistent with the provisions of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, which provides that "every stipulation by which any seaman consents to abandon any right he may have or obtain in the nature of salvage shall be wholly inoperative." I think that that is to draw a conclusion from the words of the Act which cannot be sustained, If I thought, by rejecting this demurrer, I was preventing the plaintiffs setting up a contradiction of the sixth paragraph, I should not take the course of rejecting it. I think it necessary to say a word as to the law laid down in The Enchantress (Lush. 98), and I take it as now settled. In that case the learned judge, Dr. Lushington, says: "I conceive a duty is hereby imposed upon me to decree, upon application made, what in my judgment is an equitable apportionment of salvage, unless I am barred by one of two circumstances, either an equitable agreement between the parties, or an equitable tender." The latter of these two circumstances we have not in this case to consider. But was there an equitable agreement? This agreement is not before the court at present in such a form that it can consider whether the agreement is equitable or not, but that will be done when the matter is properly brought before the court; and the court will then decide whether this agreement, made by solicitors, and approved of by the parties, was, having regard to all the circumstances, an equitable agreement. I think it is competent for the defendants to set up such a defence as is set up in the sixth paragraph, that after the total amount of salvage in respect of the salvage services had been finally ascertained and settled, and had come into the hands of the defendants, and after the plaintiffs and their solicitors had full knowledge thereof, an agreement was made to receive a certain sum in settlement of the plaintiffs' claims, and that the agreement was made with the defendants before the plaintiffs received that sum, and it was accepted. I conceive that to be perfectly competent to plead. On the other hand, I conceive it to be competent for the plaintiffs to say, admitting the fact that the solicitors did make the agreement in question, that nevertheless, in regard to the circumstances, it is one of those inequitable agreements which, although not fraudulent or illusory, the court has always felt itself competent to consider. Taking that view of the law, I reject the demurrer in this case, and I wish it to be understood that I do so upon that ground. The demurrer must be rejected with costs. I grant leave to the plaintiffs to amend their reply.

The plaintiffs thereupon amended their reply as follows:

As to the sixth paragraph of the statement of defence the plaintiffs further say that, if the agreement in the said paragraph mentioned was made, and if the sum of 132*l.* 10*s.* was paid to the said solicitors in the said paragraph mentioned under the said agreement as in the said paragraph alleged (which the plaintiffs do not admit), the plaintiffs' part of the said sum, that is to say 12*l.* 10*s.* each, was less than the just and equitable share of the said sum of 3000*l.* due to the plaintiffs in respect of the said salvage services, and the said solicitors received the said part in settlement of the claims of the plaintiffs in ignorance of the just rights of the plaintiffs, and the said agreement and receipt limited the proportion of the said sum of 3000*l.* due to the plaintiffs, and surrendered without any consideration whatever the just rights of the plaintiffs to the remaining part of their fair share, and were and are inequitable and inoperative as against the plaintiffs.

To this paragraph as amended the defendants demurred on the ground that the said paragraph did not contain any good or sufficient ground for avoiding the agreement and settlement and payment pleaded in the sixth paragraph of the statement of defence.

The defendants obtained an order to have the demurrer argued at the hearing.

The case came on for hearing on Feb. 25.

The plaintiffs called evidence to prove the arduous nature of the service, and that the crew took more part in it than is usually the case in salvage by steamships. The defendants proved the making of the agreement set out in the sixth paragraph of the defence, and that at the time of the making thereof the solicitors there named had the plaintiffs' authority in writing and knew of the amount of salvage awarded, viz., 3000*l.*; but the plaintiffs denied that this was made known to them. From the defendants' answer to interrogatories it appeared that more than 30*l.* each had been paid to eleven members of the crew, and that 979*l.* 10*s.* in all had been paid to the master and crew in respect of the salvage services in point.

Milward, Q.C. and J. P. Aspinall, for the plaintiffs, contended that this was a case in which the court would have awarded to the plaintiffs, if they had brought their claim into court originally, a larger share of the salvage money than in most cases; that even allowing one-third of the amount to the master and crew, the plaintiffs were entitled to 22*l.* 10*s.* instead of 12*l.* 10*s.* which they had received, and that it could not therefore be said that the agreement was an equitable one; and that the defendants had shown by awarding over 30*l.* each to several of the crew what they considered was justly due, and the defendants admitted that the plaintiffs had done their duty equally well with those who had received over 30*l.*

Clarkson, for the defendants, urged that an agreement had been made through solicitors, and the plaintiffs had received a certain sum through solicitors in full satisfaction of their claims, and that there was no evidence or even suggestion of fraud or concealment, but the solicitors on both sides did their best for their clients, taking a different view of their rights. The plaintiffs' solicitors had received from the plaintiffs an authority in writing to make the settlement, and as the settlement was made by the solicitors in good faith, it was equitable, and the court had no power to interfere with it.

Aspinall, in reply, urged that the learned judge had himself decided on the plaintiffs' demurrer that, although the settlement through solicitors was primâ facie good, yet if it appeared inequitable the court could go behind it; that in this case the plaintiffs had received so much less than their fair share that the agreement was an inequitable agreement, and was therefore an agreement to take less than they were entitled to, and to abandon the rest, and consequently inoperative under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, sect. 182. If the learned judge decided against the plaintiffs, a way would have been discovered by which owners could avoid the Merchant Shipping Act, and great injustice would be done to seamen.

Sir ROBERT PHILLIMORE.—I am of opinion that this agreement does not militate against any of the sections of the Merchant Shipping Act that have been referred to, I am of opinion that the question is not whether, if this was an original suit, I should have awarded more than the sum actually paid or not, but whether any good ground has been shown for interfering with the arrangement that has been made. If there were any evidence of fraud or concealment, the court would not hesitate to reopen the whole case, but no evidence has been given of such fraud or concealment, or of any disreputable conduct made use of in order to induce the sailors to sign a receipt; and furthermore the plaintiffs were assisted throughout by solicitors of good local character who appear to have acted in perfect good faith throughout the whole transaction. Moreover, there is nothing extravagantly wrong in the amount paid, and therefore nothing which points to an inequitable settlement, and I am satisfied that the court would be wrong to allow the matter to be reopened. I must therefore dismiss the case with costs.

APPEAL UNDER THE SHIPPING CASUALTIES ACT 1879.

Practice—Appeals—Shipping casualties—Default of officer—Costs.

Where the report of those who hold an investigation into a shipping casualty does not show that a default on the part of an officer directly or by necessary inference causes or contributes to the casualty itself, his certificate cannot be taken away or suspended.

An officer's certificate cannot be suspended for a default appearing in the investigation which does not cause or contribute to the casualty.

Observations on the duties and position of look out men.

In appeals under the Shipping Casualties Act 1879, costs of the appeal will, as a rule, follow the event.

THIS was an appeal under the Shipping Casualties Investigation Act 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 72).

An inquiry was held at Liverpool on the 4th, 5th, and 6th March, before the stipendiary magistrate of the borough and three nautical assessors, into the circumstances connected with a casualty occasioned by the s.s. Arizona running into an iceberg in the Atlantic ocean about 9 p.m. on the 7th Nov.

The Court arrived at the conclusion that the captain and second mate were in fault, and suspended their certificates for six months.

From this decision the captain was desirous of appealing.

March 11.—E. C. Clarkson applied ex parte to Sir James Hannen, president of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division, for instructions as to the mode of proceeding with the appeal.

The following are the provisions of the Act bearing on the case:

Rehearing of and appeal against investigation into shipping casualty on misconduct of officer.

Sect. 2. (1) Where an investigation into the conduct of a master, mate, or engineer, or into a shipping casualty, has been held under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, or any Act amending the same, or under any provisions for holding such investigations in a British possession, the Board of Trade may, in any case, and shall, if new and important evidence which could not be produced at the investigation has been discovered, or if for any other reason there has in their opinion been ground for suspecting a miscarriage of justice, order that the case be re-heard, either generally or as to any part thereof, and either by the court or authority by whom it was heard in the first instance, or by the wreck commissioners, or in England or Ireland by a judge of Her Majesty's High Court of Justice exercising jurisdiction in Admiralty cases, or in Scotland by the Senior Lord Ordinary, or any other judge in the Court of Session whom the Lord President of that court may appoint for the purpose, and the case shall be so re-heard accordingly.

(2) Where in any such investigation, a decision has been given with respect to the cancelling or suspension of the certificate of a master, mate, or engineer, and an application for a re-hearing under this section has not been made or has been refused, an appeal shall lie from the decision to the following courts, namely:

(a) If the decision is given in England or by a naval court, the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division of Her Majesty's High Court of Justice;

(b) If the decision is given in Scotland, either division of the Court of Session;

(c) If the decision is given in Ireland, the High Court of Admiralty, or the judge or division of Her Majesty's High Court of Justice exercising jurisdiction in Admiralty cases.

(3) Any re-hearing or appeal under this section shall be subject to and conducted in accordance with such conditions and regulations as may from time to time be prescribed by general rules made under sect. 30 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1876.

Rules to be laid before Parliament.

Sect. 4. Any general rule made in pursuance of this Act shall be laid before both Houses of Parliament within thirty days after it is made if Parliament be then sitting; if not, within thirty days after the then next ensuing session.

Commencement of Act.

Sect. 5. This Act shall commence and come into operation on the 1st Nov. 1879, provided that any rules which may be required for the purposes of this Act may be made at any time before the commencement of this Act, but, if so made, shall not come into operation until the commencement of this Act.

No rules had at this time been made under the Act. But a set of rules have since been published in the Gazette. (See Gazette, April 20, Mitchell's Maritime Register, April 23.)

Sir J. HANNEN.—In the present condition of affairs I think the application for directions should be made in the first instance to Sir R. Phillimore.

At a later period on the same day E.C. Clarkson applied ex parte to Sir R. Phillimore for directions, and urged that it would be rendering a right of appeal practically nugatory if the appellant had to go to the expense of having the evidence and judgment of the court below printed.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Until rules are made under the statute to regulate the practice in these appeals, I am of opinion that the best course to pursue will be for the appellant to move this division of the High Court to rescind the judgment, he giving notice at once of his intention to appeal to the Board of Trade, and also four days' notice of trial after printed copies of the depositions and judgments of the court below have been filed. When these steps have been taken, the appellant can apply again for a day to be fixed for the hearing of the appeal, when directions may also be given as to how the hearing is to be conducted.

March 18.—E. C. Clarkson again applied ex parte that a day should be fixed for the hearing.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I have consulted with the President of this Division of the High Court of Justice, and we have come to the conclusion to hear the appeal sitting together, and to have the assistance of two of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House as nautical assessors, and have arranged to hear it on Monday next the 22nd inst.

March 22.—The appeal came on for hearing before Sir James Hannen and Sir Robert Phillimore, sitting together in the Probate Court, and assisted by two of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House as assessors.

The report of the court below, so far as is material to the appeal, was as follows:

The court having carefully inquired into the circumstances attending the above-mentioned shipping casualty, finds, for the reason stated in the annex hereto, that the damage above mentioned was occasioned by collision with an iceberg, which was not seen in time to be avoided, and that the look-out was inefficient, and the court found the master, Mr. T. J., and the second mate, Mr. J. W. J., in default, and suspended their certificates for six calendar months.

The annex referred to above contained the following passages material to the appeal:

The Arizona is an iron screw steamer, ... of 5146 55-100ths gross and 2928 40-100ths registered tonnage . . . . and is of 1200 nominal horse-power . . . . The Arizona left New York on the 4th Nov. 1879 with a crew of 145 hands all told, about 250 passengers, and a full general cargo, under the command of Mr. T. J., who held a certificate of competency as master . . . . who had been nineteen years in the same employ, and who had commanded the Arizona for the last four voyages. . . . . On the morning of that date (Nov. 7th), the whale back which covers over the fore part of the vessel was painted, and owing to this circumstance, when the look-out was placed at 5.40 p m., they were stationed on the skid bridge instead of on the fore part of the whale back. The skid bridge is situated about 125ft. abaft of the stem head and about 40ft. before the main bridge. . . . . On each side of the skid bridge was a space of 6ft. or 7ft. for the look-out. It is about 8ft. lower than the main bridge, and about the same level as the whale back. At 8 p.m. the second mate took charge, and two A.B.'s . . . . were stationed on the skid bridge on the look-out, one on each side. The vessel's course at the time was E. by S., and she was going 15½ knots. The weather was fine and calm, with a slight head swell and tolerably clear, except that a heavy bank extended from E N.E. to S.E. across her bows which somewhat increased in density before the collision. The master was on the bridge at 8 p.m., but went below shortly afterwards, having seen the look-out men on the skid bridge, and apparently he approved of their being placed there. . . . . About 8.45 p.m. one of the look-out men saw something which he took in the first instance to be a cloud. He did not report anything, but consulted the other man on the look-out, and they had concluded that it was ice which they saw, when almost simultaneously with their arriving at this conclusion, the second mate sung out, "What's that ahead?" Upon which they replied, "An iceberg." The second mate ordered the helm to be put hard a-starboard and telegraphed to the engine-room "Stop," and immediately after "Full speed astern," all of which orders were promptly obeyed. But in one minute the ship collided with the iceberg which she struck on the N.E. corner, and which drove in her bows 20ft. The iceberg was about 150ft. to 200ft. long and 40ft. to 50ft. above the water. . . . . No lives were lost, and no one was seriously injured.

Upon the close of the evidence, Mr. Squarey, the learned counsel for the Board of Trade, put the following questions to the court:

1. What was the cause of the vessel coming into collision with the iceberg?
2. Whether the skid bridge was a proper place on which to station the look-out, and whether a good and proper look-out was kept?
3. Whether the temperature of the air and water was tested with sufficient frequency?
4. Whether, considering the fall in the temperature of the air and water which took place between 4 p.m. and 8 p.m, of the 7th Nov., the captain was justified in keeping his vessel at full speed, and in not stationing a look-out on the bows or on the upper bridge?
5. Whether prompt and proper measures were taken when the iceberg was seen?
6. Whether the vessel was navigated with proper and seaman-like care?
7. Whether the master and officers are, or either of them is, in default?

In giving judgment . . . . the court . . . . agreed unanimously . . . . upon the following judgment: As to 1 . . . . the vessel came into collision with the iceberg owing to its vicinity not having been discovered in time to avoid it. As to 2 . . . . the skid bridge was not a proper place on which to station the look-out on the evening in question. The evidence showed that from 8 p.m. there was a heavy black cloud rising across the ship's bows, and increasing in density, rendering it difficult to make out objects in time to avoid them, going as they were at so high a rate of speed. It was admitted that the skid bridge was not so good a place for the look-out as the main bridge, which was so much higher; but, of course, the fore part of the whale back was the best place, and the painting of the whale back, which really was the reason why the look-out were stationed there, was not considered by the court to be an adequate one. Upon the question of look-out, the court found . . . . they did see an object ahead about 8.45 p.m., but, unfortunately, instead of at once reporting it to the officer of the watch, valuable time was lost while they consulted with each other about it, and they only discovered that it was an iceberg simultaneously with the second mate, and too late to avoid a collision. But the second mate was in a higher and better position for seeing, and the court were compelled to conclude . . . . that had he kept a good look-out he must have seen the iceberg sooner. As to 3 and 4 . . . . so slight a fall as that which took place in the temperature of the air and water between 4 p.m. and 8 p.m. would not be any guide to the master as to the proximity of ice. As to 5 . . . . everything was done that could be done after the ice was seen to avoid collision. In regard to 6 and 7 . . . . no fault is found with the navigation of the ship except to repeat the remark as regards the master that they have already made as to the station of the look-out men. For this the master was solely responsible, and there was nothing in the state of the weather to render it necessary that they should be stationed on the skid bridge. . . . . Certainly the danger from which the Arizona received serious damage . . . . was a danger from which the master might fairly have thought himself to be exempt. . . . . The position of the look-out is at all times by night one of paramount importance. . . . . While, therefore, giving every consideration to all that may be fairly urged on the master's behalf, and also bearing in mind his long service in the one employ, the court felt compelled to find him in default for not placing the look-out in the most efficient position. . . . . The court suspend the certificates of Mr. T. J., master, and Mr. J. W. J., second mate, for six calendar months from this date.

The enactments to which reference was made were as follows:

The Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104).

Sect. 242. The Board of Trade may suspend or cancel the certificate (whether of competency or service) of any master or mate in the following cases (that is to say):

(1) If upon any investigation made in pursuance of the last preceding section, he is reported to be incompetent or to have been guilty of any gross act of misconduct, drunkenness, or tyranny:

(2) If upon any investigation conducted under the provisions of the eighth part of this Act . . . . it is reported that the loss or abandonment of or serious damage to any ship, or loss of life, has been caused by his wrongful act or default.

The Merchant Shipping Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63).

Sect 23. The following rules shall be observed with respect to the cancellation and suspension of certificates (that is to say):

(1) The power of cancelling or suspending the certificate of a master or mate by the 242nd section of the principal Act conferred on the Board of Trade, shall . . . , vest in and be exercised by the local marine board, magistrates, naval court, admiralty court, or other court or tribunal by which the case is investigated or tried, and shall not in future vest in or be exercised by the Board of Trade.

Shipping Casualties Rules 1878.

Rule 21. The judge may, if he thinks fit, order the costs and expenses of the proceedings, or any part thereof, to be paid by either the Board of Trade or by any other party to the proceedings. Form of order for payment of costs will be found in the Appendix No. 2.

E. C. Clarkson for the appellant.—The suspension of the master's certificate is not justified either by the facts of the case or the finding of the court. A certificate can only be suspended for a gross act of misconduct (Merchant Shipping Act 1854, s. 242, sub-sect. 1), which this offence, if offence it is at all, clearly is not; or where "serious damage to any ship has been caused by his wrongful act or default" (Merchant Shipping Act 1854, s. 242, sub-sect, 2). The finding here is that "the damage" was caused by the inefficiency of the look-out, and not by the placing of them on the skid bridge, which is alleged as the default of the master. There is no connection between the two things, as it does not follow that, if the men had been stationed on the whale back, they would have kept a better look-out, or any the less have allowed valuable time to elapse between seeing the iceberg and reporting it. [Sir J. HANNEN.—Is it competent to us as a Court of Appeal to go behind the report, and, if we think the report as it stands is not justified by the reasons assigned for making it, consider whether on the evidence it may not be justified by other reasons than those assigned?] No, for this is a quasi-criminal proceeding, and a Court of Appeal cannot in a criminal matter amend the proceedings to the detriment of the accused without special power being given by the Act of Parliament so to do, and this court, sitting as it is under sect. 2 of the Shipping Casualties Act, is distinctly a Court of Appeal, and the hearing is not a re-hearing which is otherwise provided for. I submit that the sentence must be reversed, firstly, because it is not supported by the reasons from the report, and those reasons cannot be amended; secondly, because under the circumstances the look-outs were properly placed on the bridge, and their being so placed was not in fact the cause of the collision; thirdly, because, even if the skid bridge was not the best place, the stationing of the men there was not a default at all, but only an error in judgment, and the Act does not say that persons are to lose their certificates for mere errors in judgment. What difference could the position of the men make? They were some 100ft. further aft than they would have been on the whale back, and there was nothing to obscure the view of the iceberg; the ship was going 15½ knots an hour, and would therefore cover that 100ft. in about four seconds; it was not four seconds loss of time which caused the collision, but an "unfortunate" waste of time in reporting the iceberg when seen. The look-out men in front, in fact, did see the iceberg in time to have avoided the collision, and the officer of the watch might have done so had he been looking in that direction.

Muir Mackenzie for the Board of Trade.—The Board of Trade are in no sense prosecutors in these cases, they only act ministerially to put the court of inquiry in motion when a casualty takes place. Since the Merchant Shipping Act 1862 was passed they do not themselves deal with the officer's certificates (sect. 23), but the court itself deals with them. In this case it must necessarily be inferred from the report that the court was of opinion that the placing of the men on the skid bridge instead of the usual and proper place was the causa causans of the collision, and that act was the wrongful act of the master.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—Having heard the valuable observations which have been addressed to us upon the evidence, and consulted with the gentlemen who assist us, we feel that we are in a position at once to state the opinion at which the court has arrived. With regard to the first point placed before us by the learned counsel for the appellant, that the finding of the court below is not one which brings this case within the terms of the sections of the Merchant Shipping Act to which reference has been made (sect. 242, sub-sects. 1, 2), inasmuch as it does not find that the master was "guilty of any gross act of misconduct," nor that "the serious damage" was "caused by his wrongful act or default," I have only to say that I do not think it necessary to determine that question on the present occasion, because we think that, putting the construction on the language of the finding which we think the right one, in order to make it a proper foundation for the suspension of the officers' certificate, I interpret it as though it had stated in terms that the default of the master was the cause of or contributed to the casualty, and I am of opinion that upon the evidence it does not appear that there was any default on the part of the master which did in fact contribute to the casualty. Although, however, I have stated that we do not consider it necessary to determine the question of law as to the construction of the statute on the present occasion, it is undoubtedly worthy of observation that neither in the formal report, nor in the reasons given for that report, does the learned stipendiary magistrate state anything from which it can be inferred that he entertained the opinion that the default of the master was the cause of the casualty. The manner in which that portion of the case is dealt with tends rather to indicate that the mind of the court was running in a different direction, and expressed only a general opinion upon the importance of there being the best possible look-out kept at all times, and that the master had not in fact used the best judgment he could in that respect, as the look-out men were not stationed in the best position. It is not, however, necessary to state any positive opinion upon that point; it may be that, if this had been the original investigation of the case, the gentlemen who assist us might not have taken so serious a view of the master's conduct in that respect as has been taken by the court below. But, accepting the finding of the court below in its entirety on that point, we have come to the conclusion that the default which is attributed to the master thereby did not cause or contribute to the casualty. This appears from the consideration of a very few undisputed facts in the case. It is obvious that where the men were stationed, on the skid bridge, they had an opportunity of seeing all before them, diminished only to the extent that the foremast could obscure their range of vision, and further, the part of the sea directly ahead and close to the ship, by the stem head; but, with these exceptions, the means of looking out were as good as if the men had been stationed right forward on that deck which is called the whale back. Now, without forming any accurate judgment as to the precise amount of time which elapsed between the object, which afterwards turned out to be an iceberg, being sighted and the collision, it is perfectly clear that the men in the place at which they were did see it for an appreciable time before the mate saw it; and it is equally clear that, instead of doing what it was their duty to do at once, that is to report the object seen they consulted together, and the language which it is proved they used shows that their eyes had been on the object for some time, for when the mate called out to them, at a time when the look-out man, who has been examined, says was a minute after they had observed the object, their joint answer was, "That is ice"—"We think it is ice," showing that the nature of the object had been the subject of their deliberation. There being
